BROWN: The other two were the preparation for normalization. Americans on Taiwan were very concerned that we were going to pull the rug out from under them, that we weren't going to provide for Taiwan and that our economic interests there were going to be sacrificed. We dealt with that. I traveled to Taiwan and had to brief different groups about the thinking in Washington. While I wasn't cut in on the details of the negotiation, I knew the general direction of policy. We had to do the same thing in Washington when people would come through the State Department and get briefed.

The third issue was non-proliferation. The problem there was that the Taiwan's had bought from Canada a natural uranium research reactor, and the French were in the process of selling Taiwan reprocessing technology with the idea that they would be reprocessing fuel from their power reactors and using the reprocessed material for fuel rods for the power reactors. The research reactor used natural uranium fuel that was suitable for reprocessing into weapons grade plutonium. That was a very serious concern because this technology could be turned to nuclear weapons use. So, we expended immense effort to persuade the French and the Taiwanese that they should not go through with these reprocessing plans. A lot about this issue remains classified. I did a lot of the leg work on this for Burt and later Harvey.

Q: That sounds like a nuclear weapons program; what led Chiang down that road?

BROWN: The Chinese had detonated their first nuclear device in 1964 and were developing their nuclear weapons capability. Countering that capability was probably the prime motivation. Later our withdrawal from Vietnam and the enunciation of the Nixon doctrine, which said states should be primarily responsible for their own security, created doubts about the reliability of U.S. commitments. That may also have been a factor.

Q: So how did we deal with that?

BROWN: As I said, we worked to persuade Taiwan and the French to abandon the reprocessing project. We used the fact that Taiwan was a member of the NPT, the Non-proliferation Treaty, and that the safeguards that would have to be applied in Taiwan on any reprocessing facility could only be covered by a safeguards agreement that the United States had with Taiwan. France did not have a safeguards agreement that would cover their sale to Taiwan, and this gave us leverage. By this point in time, Taiwan had been expelled from the IAEA and there was no way the IAEA could negotiate new agreements with Taiwan. We were cooperating closely with the IAEA and one very knowledgeable officer from ACDA helped the IAEA understand some inspection problems at the Canadian reactor. In the end, we persuaded the French to drop the sale, and the Taiwanese to give up their work on reprocessing. Taiwan was in the process of building a second or third nuclear power station at this time, and nuclear energy was a significant part of their electric generation. The nuclear technology and fuel came from the U.S. This was part of our leverage. Although the reactor was a problem, Washington did not object to its operation believing that a combination of IAEA inspections and periodic U.S.-Taiwan nuclear energy consultations would assure effective safeguards.

Q: Did you get any feel for the attitudes for the personnel of the Taiwanese Embassy? This must have been, they must have thought they weren't quite sure where they were going and all this. It must have been a very difficult time for them.

BROWN: Yes, they were trying to do everything they could to maintain good relations with the United States. They realized they did not have a sympathetic ear in the Carter administration, so they were using their connections on the Hill.

Q: Did you find that the Carter administration was sort of turning a cold shoulder to Taiwan?

BROWN: Yes, they were keeping Taipei at arm's length. We were in the process of scaling down our military relationship with Taiwan. After our military role in Vietnam ended in 1973, we began withdrawing military units from Taiwan that had supported the war effort. The whole relationship had begun to change after Nixon's trip. We had made a commitment to the PRC that we would move in the direction of scaling back our military relations in Taiwan. Once Carter got in office, one part of the effort to avoid a sharp break in relations with Taiwan was to start a steady reduction of the military ties with Taiwan. Units were withdrawn and military assistance was shifted to a loan or sales basis. The MAAG and Taiwan Defense Command were gradually scaled back.

Q: Well, then when you left there in '78, I mean it was assumed I guess that we're going to have some sort of relationship with Taiwan, but that we were going to have an official relationship with China?

BROWN: Yes. I didn't know exactly where the negotiations stood. I left in August and it wasn't until December that the negotiations were consummated.

HERMAN REBHAN
General Secretary, International Metalworkers Federation
Washington, DC (1974-1989)

Herman Rebham was born in Poland and raised in Germany. He came with his family to the United States in 1938 and settled in Cleveland, Ohio. After working in auto manufacturing plants in the Midwest, he became Administrative Assistant to United Auto Workers President Walter Reuther, and dealt with domestic and international labor matters throughout his career. In 1972 he became the United Auto Workers Director of International Affairs in Washington, D.C. Mr. Rebham died in 2006. Mr. Rebham was interviewed by James F. Shea and Don R. Kienzle in 1995.

Kienzle: One final question. Do you have any comments about the U.S. Government's Labor Attaché Corps and its performance?

REBHAN: My experience with Labor Attachés was always good. They knew the country [of assignment] and I never ran into one, even during the Reagan period and so on, who spewed the conservative line. The only time someone kind of embarrassed me was in Taiwan, and he was political officer, I think. He wasn't a Labor Attaché. I met with him, and he said, "Well, these are not your real unions. They are government unions. How do you explain that?" I said, "Wait. The time will come." In Taiwan, we had an interesting [situation] in a way. Taiwan was a dictatorship really for many, many years. We had affiliates there. The Japanese worked slowly and quietly there. One time we had an Asian regional conference in Taipei. We checked before hand, because if everybody didn't get visas, we wouldn't hold the conference. We checked with our guys, who told us, "Look, there won't be any problem. The Israelis will get visas." It came time for [the conference], and I got a phone call from the Histadrut. They couldn't get visas. Well, the Taiwanese didn't have representation in many of these countries, so you had to go to Lucerne, Switzerland, to get a visa. That's all right. We didn't care, but they gave us a run around. So two days before the conference I said to our Taiwanese, "You go and tell the Government that we are canceling the conference. Tell them also that when the ICFTU had a congress in Mexico and Mexico didn't want to give visas to the Taiwanese to come to the congress, I voted in the Executive Board to postpone the conference. I fought for you guys to get visas. I think I can [now] expect [visas for the Israelis]." Well, finally the Israelis got visas. They came a day late.

Shea: Was that Giladi?

REBHAN: Giladi. He was a nice man. He died.

Kienzle: He died about three years ago.

REBHAN: He had stomach cancer of some kind. So we had the opening of the conference and the Minister of Interior, who was in charge of labor like in all those countries, was going to speak to the conference in Taipei. I had a prepared text, which I gave to the Chinese interpreter. I wrote out in longhand in English criticism about the visas. So the Chinese interpreter said to me, "Mr.

Rebhan, you're not going to say this?" I said, "I'm going to say that absolutely. This is what happened." He said, "You can't do this!" I said, "I can do this." Then the Minister of Interior had to tell me, "No, there was a misunderstanding and everything is all right."

LEONARD UNGER
Ambassador

Ambassador Leonard Unger was born in California in 1917. He received a bachelor's degree from Harvard University in 1939. He joined the Department of State in 1941 and later the Foreign Service. In 1945, he was worked with the post-war boundary issues in Europe. Ambassador Unger worked in the late 1940's and early 1950's on the issue of the Free Territory of Trieste. This work led to his appointment as the Assistant Secretary for South East European Affairs. He served in Italy, Thailand (where he later was ambassador), Laos, and Taiwan. Ambassador Unger was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1989.

UNGER: So he was Secretary of State at that point. Kissinger was determined to switch our relationship with China so that we would have diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China, Where we already had some kind of less-than-formal representation. We would terminate our Embassy in Taiwan and follow it up with whatever less formal arrangement we could mutually work out with them. So I believe that at the time I was appointed to Taiwan there was pretty much of a conviction, you might say almost a commitment, in many quarters in Washington, to work toward this change, whenever and however it could be most effectively be brought about.

There were many people in Washington, in the Congress, in the State Department, and for that matter, elsewhere in the Executive Branch, people who definitely were not in favor of this move. They were very loyal supporters of Chiang Kai-shek and his government on Taiwan as representing the continuing Republic of China recognized by the U.S. as the government of China.

Anyway, I was appointed and succeeded Walter McConaughy, who had been U.S. Ambassador in Taipei for several years. I was not sure whether or not I was going to be the last ambassador, but recognized that there was a pretty good chance I would be. In some fashion or other, we would be working out a new relationship with Beijing which would oblige us to reduce our representation in Taipei.

I think by that time we had a liaison mission in Beijing. There was George Bush in charge there at that point or soon thereafter. It was the spring of 1974 when I went out; I don't think he was yet in Beijing at that time, but he took over not too long thereafter.

Q: Yes, Bush. It was David Bruce until September of '74. Bush came in October of '74.

UNGER: Yes. So less than six months after I took over in Taipei, he took over in Beijing. Now we're in the Nixon Administration. There was still a commitment--whatever people may have had in the back of their mind for the future--there was still a commitment to Taipei.

Was it Leonard Woodcock who was prior to Bush?

Q: No, it was David Bruce.

UNGER: Yes, David Bruce. You just said it was. That's funny, I can't see David Bruce in Beijing.

Q: He was there a relatively short time. He was there from March of '73 until September '74. Then Bush, then Gates, then Woodcock.

UNGER: In any event, I think my communication with David Bruce was minimal; I was still getting myself installed. I had never, prior to that time, been in China. I don't think I had ever been in Taiwan, except on brief business visits, to say nothing of the mainland.

I don't think anybody knew when I went there just how long I would be there. How long it would be until they felt it was politically acceptable to switch our representation to Beijing--how long before the Administration would want to make that kind of change.

So I became involved with what for many years had been a very special political phenomenon on the American scene, namely, the group that was very loyally devoted to Chiang Kai-shek.

Anyway this was, of course, already a considerable political issue in the United States. By that time, many important people, including people of a generally conservative identification, were feeling that trying to maintain an embassy in Taipei and not give credence to the existence of the PRC was no longer acceptable; they came to believe that the U.S. should appoint some prestigious individual to be present in the PRC and be able to deal with the government in Beijing. It was pretty clear that, barring some international crisis, in which we and the PRC might be at odds with each other, in due course we were going to have an Embassy in Beijing and we would be obliged to close down our Embassy in Taiwan. How we would do it; what kind of continuing representation we would have in Taiwan; what the PRC would insist on in the way of our future relations with Taiwan, if we wished to establish relations in Beijing; all of these were questions that people were working on in Washington.

Q: You had not particular instructions on this. Everybody knew this was in the cards?

UNGER: That's right. No, I was instructed that my job was to go and continue the U.S. relations with the Republic of China and Taipei. Of course, inevitably, I had to take into account their attitude about the mainland, but obviously, in no way seeming to agree with it or support it. But nevertheless, I realized that it was a fact of life and that whatever I did, however I managed my mission in Taipei, I had to take account of how they felt about the mainland. Of course, at that time, it was totally negative. It causes me to look with some considerable interest, and some amazement, at the lady who's just gone to Beijing, whom I knew in Taipei.

Q: She's the head of the Trade Delegation?

UNGER: Yes, I think that is what it was: trade and/or finance. There was a big international meeting-the A.D.B., I believe-to be held in Beijing. She went in a kind of special category; she took part in some things and didn't in others. Shirley Kuo is the person I'm talking about.

Shirley Kuo I knew as a fairly high-ranking person in the economic, financial field in Taipei. Someone exceptionally attractive and talented. So I have to say that I'm very pleased that she's still in that position, and that she was chosen to carry out this mission.

Her husband was, as I recall, the head of the Elected Parliament; I don't know whether he still is; she was a good deal younger.

Q: Did you find, within the State Department, and really almost within the Foreign Service, a group of officers dealing with China who felt we should get on with it and in a way, jump completely into relations with the PRC and to hell with Taiwan? And other groups that were saying no? Could you talk a little about this relationship within the professional ranks.

UNGER: It might be that such a view was increasingly held, as we were moving into the last chapter in what had been a very divisive issue in the United States as a whole and particularly in the Foreign Service. This issue was posed in sharpest fashion once the Communists had taken over on the mainland in 1949 and Chiang Kai-shek had fled to Taiwan.

Of course, for many, many years, the United States Government had no intention whatsoever of any relationship, any official relationship with the government in Beijing, and it very loyally kept up its connection with Taiwan. By the time I was sent to Taiwan, however, I think we already had our liaison mission in Beijing with David Bruce then Leonard Woodcock, and then George Bush. This was seen by many as sort of the beginning of the end of the old pattern and that there was going to have to be a readjustment.

The opposition to that, in the U.S. Congress, and in the Foreign Affairs community was still very strong. I'm not sure I can relate these things precisely, but the mainland had just gone through some pretty unhappy periods of cultural revolution and that kind of thing. So anybody who was taking the earlier line about how Taiwan was a dictatorship, and how the mainland was a model democracy, obviously was being laughed at at that point. [Laughter]

Nevertheless, one had to acknowledge that the real China, was the China with its capital in Beijing. And that important as Taiwan and Taipei was, particularly in a number of special ways, it couldn't any longer represent China as a whole.

So there was certainly an expectation in many quarters that a change in "China policy", change in representation, was going to be coming before too many more years went by. Nobody knew exactly when. Nobody knew what political situation in the United States would permit it. Nobody knew when the discussions with the government in Beijing would reach a point where some of the issues that were very difficult for the United States to face, would begin to be resolved. And also nobody knew when the opposition in the U.S. Congress and in fairly important political circles in the United States, would reach a point where the switch could take place.

Q: Where was the greatest opposition? You're saying important political circles. Can you name any people or areas?

UNGER: Taiwan then, as it has continued to be, was a remarkable locus for American business in numbers of firms and dollars invested and business done and so on. Remarkable particularly when one considers how small an island it is. And yet it's one of the top several--I'm not going to remember precise figures, but I think it was number six--in trade carried on with the United States in recent years. And this was a time, remember, when the mainland presented a very sorry picture of repeated upheavals and cultural revolutions and uncertainties about the future...and certainly of sharp hostility toward the United States.

Also China had had a very close relationship with the Soviet Union; I can't remember exactly when that went on the rocks.

Q: Right now, I think they're having a summit today in Peking and this is the first one since something like '53 or '54, '57 maybe. I'm not sure. But we are talking about 30 odd years.

UNGER: Anyway, there was growing sentiment in the United States that whatever we thought of the PRC, it was just too important a factor in the world for us not to have representation there, not to be in some kind of effective communication. And, of course, this had already had its expression in the setting up the liaison mission. Needless to say, Chiang Kai-shek had thought that decision it was shocking and disloyal to our relationship with him. But we were still not on the verge of the switch that did not take place until December 31st, 1978.

Q: Was Chiang Kai-shek still the leader at that time?

UNGER: Chiang Kai-shek was the leader in my first year in Taipei but he was in very, very poor health, and in April, 1975, he died. By that time, his son, Chiang Ching-kuo was in charge, with Madame Chiang Kai-shek's efforts at very close supervision; Ching-Kuo had pretty much moved into the position of leadership, not in name, but in fact. When I first went to Taipei, Chiang Kai-shek was still nominally President. And the Parliament, which by now has become a body of real political significance, was still made up very largely of people who had come across from the mainland, with very little Taiwan representation. They were mostly superannuated individuals who had come over in '49 and who held onto their positions, but were certainly out of the picture.

And there was still a very marked hostility to the Communist government on the mainland. There was also marked hostility to any other government that had recognized and chosen to establish relations with the mainland government, as opposed to Taiwan. There were still, I would guess, 30, maybe even 40 governments that still had relations with Taiwan, that had not switched. The number now is something like a dozen (although a few small nations have recently opted for Taipei). And everything that took place on Taiwan, except the most strictly internal matters, anything in the international field, anything in relations with the United States, was heavily colored by this concern about maintaining the position of the Republic of China as the only government of China recognized by the United States.

Q: Did you have any feeling that the knowledgeable people in Taiwan were sort of preparing, even within the government, for the time when we would have full representation? Or, were they sort of shutting their eyes to the inevitability of this?

UNGER: I'm sure that individuals who were reasonably perceptive and honest with themselves and well informed were certainly thinking about this eventuality. I think that even among those who were reasonably realistic, given the position of the United States for so many decades as well as that of some other major countries, there were those who had the feeling that somehow or other they would be able to hang on, that their government would continue to be recognized as the government of China by many countries. And that given all the internal conflicts and instability on the mainland, their day and their opportunity would come when, God knows, maybe they thought they might even be invited back. I don't think very many of them any longer thought in terms of military action to retake the mainland, but they felt there might develop a chaotic situation there, in which it would be possible for them to move back in and reassume charge.

Of course, as time went on, and as the mainland began to pull itself together and overcome some of its internal difficulties, these dreams faded. Prospects grew steadily dimmer as countries that had maintained relations with Taipei, little by little severed them, and were willing to send a consul or somebody to Taiwan but were not willing to have their regular diplomatic relationship with China any longer in Taipei--they were moving over to Beijing. As this went on, of course, it became clear that eventually Taiwan and the Republic of China would be recognized and accepted as China by very few nations.

The disposition of the Government of the United States at that time was such that they were fairly confident that the United States would continue its relationship for some time.

Q: You had left by this time?

Q: In 1976.

UNGER: Let's see. I went there in the spring of '74.

Q: No, excuse me. You had left the post in January 1979. You came in 1974 and left in 1979.

UNGER: December 31st, 1978 was the last date we recognized Taiwan. And January 1st, '79 was the first day we recognized Beijing. And so, obviously, my official status came to an end on December 31st. I didn't leave for several days thereafter, although I was under very strict orders to leave immediately. All of this had happened very quickly and I was determined, as far as possible, to remain in Taipei long enough to help the government on Taiwan adjust to the new situation and establish what was going to be the new type of Taiwan-U.S. relationship from that point forward. (We are still there, of course, essentially in that capacity, with our liaison mission).

But the word from Washington became sterner and sterner. I did, in fact, leave something like the 13th of January. I wasn't in Taipei all of the time from the 1st of January to the 13th. I went to a meeting in--I can't remember whether it was Bangkok, but I think it may have been. That was a kind of Chiefs of Mission meeting that I attended. I attended it partly because this whole development had just taken place and everybody wanted to know what had happened, and what was foreseen for the future, and what was going to be the impact of this on Taiwan?

So I went to the meeting with that in mind. Then I returned to Taipei by about the 13th or 14th and left Taiwan for good soon thereafter, leaving in charge Bill Brown, who had been my deputy. He was there in a sort of special capacity and I think he remained until about April or May, by which time the Taiwan Relations Act had been passed by the Congress. This relieved some of the most acute apprehensions of the people on Taiwan as to what would be the future relationship with the United States. And Brown did a splendid job in that interim period when, as you can imagine, feelings ran very high in Taiwan.

The Taiwan Relations Act went a good deal farther toward meeting the concerns of Taiwan than many people in the Carter Administration wished. But it did go through the Congress and was incorporated in law and is now the law. It made it possible for the United States to continue a quasi official relation with Taiwan, and one that Beijing has not worried about unduly.

So this new pattern was developed, essentially in that period, between our very precipitate action in November '78 and the spring.

Q: Did you feel you had much input into the change of relations or was this something that was being called from Washington? This was, of course, the Carter Administration. You were just off to one side on this?

UNGER: No, not entirely. Anybody who knew the temper of the U.S. Administration, in regard to China, knew that there definitely was a desire to make the change. It was, of course, also clear to anybody who had a feel for American internal politics. It was equally clear that this was a move that was going to raise a lot of eyebrows and a lot of opposition; it was going to be a politically difficult move in some respects, but nevertheless, one that I think Jimmy Carter and Secretary Vance were determined to carry through.

I was back in Washington in the early fall of 1978; I had a fair amount of discussion with Secretary Vance about what would be the new kind of relationship that could be worked out. He had his staff working on this; Dick Holbrooke was Assistant Secretary at that time and Roger Sullivan was also involved in the problem. They were at work on a whole set of new charters and relationships that would be put into effect at the time.

There was, however, no discussion of when this was going to take place. The impression was that it was still fairly far down the road, since a lot of planning had to be worked out. It was going to be carried out in a rather gradual way. In this way the impact, to say nothing of the political problems that Cy Vance would have to face in the Congress, would be minimized.

But, in fact, it moved much more rapidly than that. I guess a public statement on the matter was made about the 13th or 16th (or thereabouts) of December, 1978. As soon as that statement was made and I broke the news to President Chiang and opened the discussion of what was to follow, a mission was put together in Washington to come out to Taipei, to work out with the government in Taiwan what would be the new relationship with the United States.

Warren Christopher came out and Dick Holbrooke and a number of other Far Eastern types from the Bureau East Asian came out with him, with a blueprint of a new U.S. relationship to be worked out with Taiwan. There were a lot of questions that were inevitably going to be raised not only by the Chinese government there, but also the U.S. business community and others.

There was a massive demonstration on Christopher's arrival at the Taipei Airport. On leaving the airport he and I found ourselves in our limousine caught right in the middle of a wild protest demonstration. We'll probably never know exactly how and by whom this was engineered. By that time our coming change in relations and all the rest was public property; it was known that it was going to take place although at that time, I don't know that we had a specific date. Washington was the culprit and Christopher came out representing Washington. As we left the airport building, it was clear that we were moving into a demonstrating crowd and obviously not very friendly. I wanted to take a particular route which I knew would get us out of the airport by a back road and then get up to my place up on the hill behind Taipei and thus get away from demonstrations. But the driver was instructed by someone from the local government as to how he was to go. At first I didn't have any reason to be concerned about it; I just felt the other route would be more direct and away from crowds and thus easier to move right along and get to my home.

But what we were directed into was a real mob scene. We were preceded by a truck that had a TV camera on its roof and the TV camera was pointed at our procession. We were the lead car and then, of course, there were several other cars following. As we moved along, and got into the middle of this crowd of demonstrators, the truck stopped so that we couldn't move. There was no way to go back; there was no way to go ahead. It was just a narrow little road and it was lined by a mob of demonstrators on both sides shouting anti-American and other slogans.

We, of course, talked to the driver and asked him whether he couldn't get the TV truck to get on the way and let us move on. But he couldn't and as time went on, he was not even willing to leave the car. Not only was the crowd demonstrating but they began pushing their sticks through the windows of our limousine, and broke our windows if they were closed. Christopher and I didn't really know when this was going to end and what the consequences were going to be.

About at the point when things were beginning to be a little big chancy, and when both of us had been bloodied--not in any serious way, but a little bit--at that point the TV truck began to move. As soon as we got out of that little impasse, I directed the driver, by a back route that I knew, up to our place up in Yang Ming Shan, in the high area behind the City.

We didn't really know that anything serious had happened to us; we didn't feel physically hurt at all. But when my wife saw us, she gasped. Apparently, we were bleeding profusely without knowing it, but only from superficial cuts. That was the end of the demonstration. I will probably never know just exactly how this was engineered. I think I know at least one individual who was ultimately responsible, namely the Foreign Minister, Shen Chang Hwan.

Q: After seeing Vance in the fall of '78, when you said you anticipated this would probably be a fairly gradual process, had you come back and sort of conveyed this in some way to the Nationalist government and then, of course, you were caught to?

UNGER: I couldn't convey it to them in any concrete way; any discussion of the subject was immediately a matter of very acute unhappiness. I was not in a position to say just this or that is what the United States government was going to do. I told them my reading of the sentiment in Washington and of the Carter Administration, i.e. that over time, in Washington they would be looking for a way of establishing relations with Beijing.

I couldn't say, because I didn't really know for sure, (although I strongly suspected this was so) that this would mean an end to diplomatic relations with Taiwan. When I had been in Washington early in the fall, and just prior to that, when Vance actually paid a visit out to the region (I think in August) and visited Taipei, he wasn't in any position to be at all specific as to what could or would be worked out.

What did happen, of course, was that once the announcement was made on December 16th (something like that) the group then came out from Washington, headed by Christopher. We Americans sat down with the people from the government in Taiwan to develop a new pattern of U.S.-Republic of China relationships. It was naturally a traumatic situation; the Chinese on Taiwan were deeply distressed and not much disposed to talk about it, yet they knew they had to in order to avoid a chaotic situation once regular diplomatic relations with the U.S. were broken. It was clear the United States was going to take that action, and it had already become public knowledge. So they had no choice but to work something out with us, angry and distressed as they were.

What we worked out was the set of arrangements and mechanisms that are now operating and have been successfully functioning for quite a while. Leaving aside the political distress they felt in Taiwan, from every other point of view it has worked out quite well.

Q: Earlier on, George Bush, who has now just become our President, was the Liaison Officer in Peking. Did you have any dealings of him and what was your evaluation of him at that time?

UNGER: I didn't have a lot of dealings. I saw his telegrams and he saw my telegrams. I did have a very specific dealing with him at one time at his initiative, which I welcomed. At one point, after he had been appointed and was in Beijing--I don't remember how long he had been there--I had been in Taipei for sometime. We were both scheduled to go to Honolulu where we were having a U.S. Chiefs of Mission meeting. Honolulu was where those meetings were often held, at the Military Headquarters, CINCPAC. People came out from Washington and all of the Ambassadors and Chiefs of Mission, in the East Asian area attended. We all went to Honolulu, and we had two or three or four days of discussion.

We were both going to attend that meeting, George Bush and I. I got a telegram from him mentioning that we were both going to be going to Honolulu, and given the fact that we were both in China, and obviously had common problems and situations to face, he asked what I would think of our meeting and flying together at least part of the way so that we would have a good chance to have some discussion. I said I thought that was a great idea.

We agreed to meet in Tokyo, which we did, and then flew the rest of the way together and talked, talked, talked, all the way from Tokyo to Honolulu. Then, of course, we both attended the Chiefs of Mission meeting. But all of that gave us a very good chance to talk about our respective situations, all in the context of the pertinent American policies. It meant that we had a very good chance to compare notes and for each of us to learn what was the other's assessment of the situation.

From that point forward, we kept in pretty close touch. I don't think we ever actually talked to each other again directly until I came back from Taipei in '79. Then, when he became Vice President and I was back in the States, he asked me to come around and meet with him and I did so. I had been teaching at the Fletcher School in Boston; he, by that time had been in office at least six months, maybe more. So we had a further talk because he was interested in carrying through on the Taiwan/China situation, up to the time I left. He was also interested in various situations and programs with relation to Southeast Asia, where I had spent a lot of time. So we did have that additional contact.

Q: Did he seem knowledgeable and knew the right questions?

UNGER: Yes. All of us in the Foreign Service business, at one time or another, have been thrown together with political appointees. I would say we always talk about whether "somebody has done his homework". I would say George Bush gave evidence of having done his homework a good deal more than many. Certainly, more than Ronald Reagan, "who didn't know from nothing." I mean, he had all kinds of opinions and convictions, but he certainly didn't have much knowledge.

I saw Reagan when he and Nancy came to pay a visit to Taiwan when I was Ambassador there. He was Governor of California at the time. He was 150 percent pro-Taiwan and terribly accusing and negative about those terrible people across the Straits.

Jimmy Carter, on the other hand, seemed to me serious about his responsibilities. I did have an opportunity to talk with him and brief him. I can't remember exactly when; I guess when I came back to Washington once, I found him with a very responsible attitude, even if not terribly well-informed.

Nixon, of course, considered himself a real expert on that part of the world, and very much interested in it. So I had a number of occasions when I talked to him, and he was well-informed. He had a lot of strong opinions, some of which I didn't agree with. But he at least had made it his business to know what was going on in that part of the world. When I was Ambassador of Thailand he had come out there on a visit.

Q: I hope we'll talk more about Vietnam and China in a different series of interviews which will be concentrated on those two subjects. So at this point, I'd like to thank you very much. We'll be getting back then.

UNGER: I think it's perfectly clear that it's a process that I'm very much interested in, too. I regret to have to say what I think becomes evident in this kind of an exercise, i.e., that a memory on which I once prided myself is in rather bad shape! Reconstructing some of these things and relating them properly to other events and so on, doesn't come as easily as it once did.

EDWARD H. WILKINSON
Consular Officer
Taipei, Taiwan (1975-1978)

Edward Wilkinson was born in Indiana in 1936. Mr. Wilkinson received his bachelor's degree at Purdue University and served in the army from 1957-1959. His career included positions in Philippines, Mexico, Costa Rica, Argentina, Taiwan, Ecuador, Korea, Thailand, and Germany. Mr. Wilkinson was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in April 2002.

Q: You were in Taiwan from '75 until when?

WILKINSON: The late summer of 1978. We were there three years, a normal assignment.

Q: What was the political and economic situation in Taiwan?

WILKINSON: Well, Taiwan, at that time, was a police state. It probably isn't very politically correct to say it quite like this, but, in fact, the Chiang Kai-shek party, the Kuomintang, just basically ran it in the way they saw fit. They, themselves, would decide who the next president was to be and then this person would become the president. Period. There was a legislative body called the Legislative Yuan. They were not by any means a democratic organization, either.

Things have changed there, in my opinion, very much for the better. But in a certain sense, even at that time, the political situation was okay. I say this because there was order in the streets.

However, at that time we knew perfectly well that the United States Government was soon going to withdraw recognition from the Republic of China and recognize the mainland. And because the people in Taiwan knew that a withdrawal of recognition was possible (even likely), we diplomats were all very well treated by the populace, presumably to try to stave off the de-recognition. So, as I say, we were treated very nicely by virtually everybody in that country.

Q: You were there when we officially de-recognized the Republic of China?

WILKINSON: No, we left about three months before that happened.

Q: But it was assumed that everybody knew it was going to happen?

WILKINSON: Yes, I think so. But, it was not, in my opinion, well handled. I don't think the ambassador knew precisely when it was going to take place until he was called out of a dinner party – where he happened to be with the president of the country – to be told that the U.S. Government was going to recognize mainland China forthwith. This is according to a story I heard. I cannot confirm it absolutely. As I say, all this took place about three months after we left.

Q: Who was the ambassador while you were there?

WILKINSON: Leonard Unger, formerly ambassador to Thailand. A man who makes his home, I believe, here in the Washington area, as we speak. He was and is a wonderful gentleman, and I think very highly of him and his wife.

Q: What was consular work like there?

WILKINSON: Once again, I would have to say that this was pretty standard operation. When I first got there I was put in charge of American Services. Most of our consular work, though, was in immigrant and non-immigrant visas. Now, in those days the Taiwanese couldn't just get a passport and go somewhere because they wanted to. There were certain restrictions on foreign travel. The same sort of thing was going on in Korea, I believe, at the same time.

Q: Yes.

WILKINSON: This, in a certain sense, regulated our non-immigrant visa business. Taiwan officialdom was very understanding and good to us. And as far as American Services was concerned, like in Korea and like, I believe, in Japan, Taiwan had a foreign affairs police, a police force that dealt solely with foreigners. One of the conditions of being a member of this police force, I think, was to speak either English or Japanese, hopefully both, as well as Mandarin and, in many cases, Taiwanese. They were quite easy for us to deal with, so we had no real difficulties in this regard.

Yes, of course, we had people in jail, although don't forget when I was there we had U.S. military still assigned to Taiwan. Americans who broke the law and were incarcerated were almost always jailed side-by-side with the U.S. military detainees. These were all people who had done something not too serious and were serving, perhaps, a two-year sentence. These were not murderers or so on. Let me put it this way, the U.S. military took very good care of their prisoners to the extent even of putting a refrigerator out where their people were. Our people were able to take advantage of these relatively good conditions.

Q: What about visas? We always think of the Chinese anywhere trying to get to the United States, particularly in Hong Kong there's so much visa fraud. How was it running in Taiwan?

WILKINSON: It's possible, of course, that we were badly fooled by the people who applied for visas, but don't think there was a great deal of fraud or other similar problems, visa-wise. There was the usual business of the occasional fake birth certificate and there were fake job letters and like, but in general I don't think there were a lot of these sorts of problems. I did not, by the way, ever sit on the visa line there. Non-immigrant visa interviews were handled almost exclusively by our Chinese-speaking officers, so I'm speaking second-hand. But, I don't think we had a lot of problems.

I believe it is fair to say there are many parallels between Taiwan and Korea at the time. For example, there might have been people who would have liked to leave Taiwan, maybe because they were anti-Kuomintang, for example. But these were not people who could get passports, I would have to say our visa work – both immigrant and non-immigrant – was manageable.

Q: You must have had quite a bit of traffic in students there, didn't you?

WILKINSON: No, not really. There were certainly student visa applicants, and I always felt that this was very good for the U.S., but once again, the student could not simply go and get a passport to study abroad. I don't recall this being a major problem at all.

Q: With the American military was there a lot of marriage with the local ladies?

WILKINSON: Yes I think so, although I don't have a statistic to give you on that. Unfortunately (for me), the word was in the Judge Advocate General office there that a consular officer had to be a witness for the marriage to be valid in the U.S. Of course, that's not true, but the troops would get very excited if there wasn't a consular officer on hand to witness their wedding.

Fortunately, there was only one place in Taiwan where a foreigner could get married, and that was at the Taipei city hall. So, on two particular days a week, we would be there at a designated time. The G.I.'s would bring their documents later to the consulate, and we would do the necessary paperwork to provide them with a "Consular Witness to Marriage." That wasn't necessary for the marriage to be legal, as you very well know, but we did it anyway.

Years later, by the way, probably around 1993 when I was assigned to Bangkok, I visited the home of a newly arrived officer whom I didn't know. After introductions, we were invited to sit down. However, the host looked at me for a few seconds, and then went into his bedroom without comment. He came back a few seconds later with his Consular Witness to Marriage, a certificate I had witnessed it in 1976!

Q: Did you pick up from your local employees at all any sort of tension between the Taiwanese and the mainland Chinese?

WILKINSON: Oh, yes. Well, I don't think we did get that sort of information from our local employees, largely, I think, because they didn't think that would be a good thing for them to comment about, at least not to us. Tension certainly existed, however. I don't think we had any Foreign Service National employees at the office in those days who were "Mainlanders," i.e., people who had come from Mainland China with Chiang Kai-shek, or their offspring. I think they were mostly Taiwanese, if you will. The Mainlanders wouldn't be likely to have taken a job in the embassy. Those people tended to be generals and senior business people and government people, not "administrative"-type people.

I guess I would have to say that the native Taiwanese people were fairly decently treated by the Mainlanders, although there were some exceptions to that in certain cases. I don't really think this was a horrible existence for them, but there were certain limitations on where they could go and what they could do. I mean that in terms of jobs and so on. Yes, there was tension. There's no question about the fact that there was tension.

We, at least those of us who didn't speak Chinese, had to deal with a population of people where, if they spoke English, they had long since decided it would just simply not be convenient to make too much noise about any tension. So we knew it existed, but I can't give you good examples.

FRANK N. BURNET
Political Counselor
Taipei, Taiwan (1975-1979)

Frank N. Burnet was born in New York in 1921. He joined the Foreign Service in 1951 and served in the Philippines, Thailand, Laos, Vietnam, Taiwan, and Washington, DC. Mr. Burnet was interviewed in 1990 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: Well then you went to Taipei as Political Counselor from '75 to '78.

BURNET: Before, of course, we changed our recognition to Beijing in '79.

Q: So you were there really at our last full-scale mission.

BURNET: That's right, but yet we had already made our opening to China in '72. So it was an interesting twilight period.

Q: What were your concerns, and how was the embassy functioning at that time?

BURNET: I think the embassy functioned very well. Leonard Unger was the Ambassador, he was doing a good job I thought. It was really a hand-holding operation to ease the GRC, the Republic of China government into accepting what was inevitable even at that time: U.S. recognition of the communist regime on the mainland. We didn't know when, of course. But I think our main job then was to say: Look, it isn't going to be that bad. You aren't going to fall apart. The sky isn't going to fall when we shift our recognition to the mainland.

Q: But it was clearly understood that this was going to be happening sooner rather than later.

BURNET: It was understood by us, and we tried to make it clear to our counterparts. Sometimes I think that the Ambassador didn't talk that directly -- he couldn't, really -- to his counterparts.

Q: Well you can't come out with a policy statement when the policy hasn't been made.

BURNET: No, that's right.

Q: You have to work around it to say: Maybe the tides of history are moving in this direction. But it requires a Presidential decision, and a very difficult Presidential decision at that point.

BURNET: That's right. But in my own conversations with counterparts and talking to the media and so on, this is the way we would talk, that, you know, really it isn't going to be so bad. Of course they never realized how good it was going to be when the economic situation really took off.

Q: What was your impression of the Chinese officials on Taiwan that you dealt with? Who were they, and how did you feel they were at this particular period of time?

BURNET: I, of course, had most to do with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the head of the American desk there. I felt that they were professionals and that they were doing their job. I wished, many times, that they could have let their hair down and leveled with me a little bit more than they did. They kept up a pretty good front of official policy. Of course, their views were pretty orthodox, that China was one, and that eventually they hoped to regain the mainland, although that was quite remote at that point.

But it wasn't bad. It wasn't very busy, either. We didn't have an awful lot to do (after all, Washington's focus was elsewhere), as long as we kept things quiet and made sure that the two Chinas didn't get involved over the Straits of Taiwan. That turned out to be one of my major tasks, to keep an eye on the Chinese Air Force and their activities, and to monitor our military's relations with the Chinese Air Force.

Q: Tell me, how does one keep an eye on an air force?

BURNET: Well, you have this island of Taiwan just a hundred miles or so off the mainland which had its own air force. They were flying daily patrols over the Taiwan straits. And the Peoples Republic of China had its air force and they were flying patrols too. Occasionally these patrols met.

We didn't want any flare-up or any exchange of fire, so there were places that we thought these patrols shouldn't be going, and that they should observe a certain restraint and caution.

When there was a contact of some sort, this had to be reported to Washington in great detail: How it happened. Who did what to whom. What was the upshot of it and What steps taken to prevent a repeat performance. Of course the military would make its report, but naturally the Ambassador wanted his own complete report of what happened that day in the air over the China Sea. So it was that kind of a situation. On those days I was quite busy.

Working with the Chinese officials was ok and it was enjoyable. They were dedicated people, professional people. I had a lot to do with certain parts of the Chinese military, but mainly the Foreign Ministry people.

Q: Were you there at the time that Saigon fell?

BURNET: That happened in June of '75. Yes, I was there.

Q: I was wondering whether you were feeling any reflections of this. Were the Chinese saying: Well, here you had an ally and you let them down. Were they throwing this in your face?

BURNET: Not too badly. I think the Chinese were very careful about that. They don't like to lose face, and therefore they can understand somebody else losing face. That was not thrown up to me. If it was not part of our business, it just didn't come up. If it did, it was minor.

Q: Were you feeling a sense of confidence in your contacts about: No matter what happened, we're doing a good a job, and it doesn't look like we're going to be taken over, and we're setting up and...?

BURNET: You mean as far as Taiwan was concerned?

Q: Yes.

BURNET: Yes, I think so. I think there was a sense of confidence in the mission, that we were just biding our time and holding the Chinese hands while they went through this trial, this bad period, when we were going to transfer recognition. So there wasn't anything that we were downcast about; it didn't bother us in particular. We were able to go about our job.

Your mentioning the fall of Saigon reminds me that we had a lot of flow out of Vietnam, as it fell, through Taiwan. A lot of people came by to pick up the family that was safe-havened there during the time that the husband was serving in Vietnam. And then, you remember that General Thieu, when he left Saigon, spent his first days and nights in Taipei.

BURNET: That's right. And his first stop on his way to London, where I think he settled eventually, was Taipei. He flew in with a small retinue and lots of gold bars, rumors had it, on the plane.

I was selected, since I had been to Vietnam and so on (actually, I had even met Thieu at some big function or other), to be the go-between, between the Ambassador and Thieu. Whenever we had some message to give him, I went to his quarters. He didn't feel like talking, I could see that. So I could just sort of take a look at the man, give him the message, and get out of there. That was about it. But anyway, he was there for a few weeks, I believe, before he moved on.

Q: This was just about the time Chiang Kai-shek died, wasn't it?

BURNET: As a matter of fact, Chiang Kai-shek died in the spring of '75, shortly after I arrived. Reminds me, when he died one member of the political section thought of a short, one-sentence telegram to report this grave event back to Washington.

I don't know whether you remember the period in WW II under Stilwell in the China-Burma theater. Stilwell's word for the Generalissimo was the "Peanut." We wanted to send a two-word telegram: "Peanut planted." But we decided the Ambassador wouldn't appreciate this, even in jest, so we never sent it in for him to sign. But we kicked it around a while for fun.

Anyway, he had a vast, very fancy state funeral which the entire diplomatic corps had to attend. We were taught how to go up by threes to the podium and bow from the hips to his portrait in a gesture of sympathy or respect. The whole diplomatic corps was lined up and had to go through this: click, click, bend at the hips, bend twice and move off. And from then on it was Chiang Ching-kuo, Chiang Kai-shek's son, who was running the show.

Q: What was the impression at that time? You, of course, had not seen Chiang Kai-shek in full bloom, but when his son came on, what was the feeling about the situation?

BURNET: It was a very good feeling. A feeling that here's a good, pragmatic, business- like Chinese who was going to take over from the doddering old man. And that things would be a lot easier for us and a lot easier for our relationship under him. Everybody felt the same way -- people in the agency, people in the economic section, my section, the Trade Center -- we all felt good about it.

Q: Speaking of your section, were you all pretty much of one accord as far as our change to the Peoples Republic of China, or did you have some vestiges of: We're selling out?

BURNET: Fortunately, we did not. Everybody was of more or less the same mind. The reason being, I suppose, that almost all of them were Chinese language trainees and had been through the same program in Taichung that I had been through. And they were looking forward to getting to the mainland someday.

Q: So in a way it was a career enhancement program.

BURNET: That's exactly what it was. So, there was none of that feeling. Everybody thought that it was inevitable and that it was just a matter of time.

Q: How about when President Carter came on board with human rights and all. Did this have any particular impact on you?

BURNET: It made a big impact, particularly on me. I thought that I had never seen so many instructions coming out of Washington about our military aid program, and I thought that some of the features of that were really excellent.

The idea was to try to keep this thing of acquiring weapons tamped down, thereby minimizing regional competition in arms. The more we sent military aid and built up some country, the chances of their getting involved, either with their own people or with a neighbor, were that much better. So if you could keep the arms transfers down, everybody was going to be better off.

You remember the guidance we used to get out of the Carter Administration about how we were to treat and handle representatives of the various arms manufacturers when they came calling, and how much help, or how little cooperation we were to give them? We were just supposed to give names and addresses, and that's all. We weren't to set up any appointments, provide transportation, none of that stuff we used to do. They were on their own.

Q: It was a real change.

BURNET: It's just a shame that all of that by the end of the Carter Administration had pretty much gone by the boards. But in one Administration that was quite a change.

Q: How about the human rights. How did you see the political situation evolving when you were there?

BURNET: That was quite a point of interest. Washington let us know that they were not just interested in the annual human rights reports which were just getting going in those days.

Because, as you know, the record of Republic of China was not very good in this area. Arrests of the opposition, throwing people into the pokey for a long period of time and virtually forgetting about them, were going on all the time.

So we had to burrow into the political opposition among the Taiwanese, which wasn't hard to find, and they were always glad to talk to us. They had the scoop. They knew what was going on. They knew who was in jail, and where, and how long they had been there, and what they had done to get there, and what happened at their trial.

All of these things, all of these details Washington wanted to know. We got ourselves in a position to report them and did, I think, a pretty good job of keeping that front covered for the Department.

Q: Was the Chinese government responding?

BURNET: Yes they were.

Q: They saw the winds of change.

BURNET: I think we were effective and our pressure helped. And all other kinds of outside pressure helped, too. Somebody would lean on Washington about a certain individual, and then we'd go to the Chinese and say: Look, we hear he's not well, he's not getting proper food and medicine. How long is he going to be there? And can you see your way clear to make things easier on him or even release him? We'd do it, and we'd get responses from them. We got results,

I think. Slow, but we got them.

Q: Adding sort of a personal note: At the time, I was in Korea and we were sort of miffed at all this human rights stuff.

BURNET: Were you?

Q: Well, of course we had an enemy 25 miles away, a real honest-to-God enemy, Kim Il Sung. But looking at this thing, I must say I think President Carter made a real earth change in the world by doing this. A short period. I must say I was not impressed at the time, but looking back on it I think this was a really major change in the United States. It brought us back to where we should have been a long time ago.

BURNET: I forget whose idea it was, it was either the Ambassador's suggestion or Washington's suggestion, but, to make an impression on the staff, they had us set up a seminar on human rights in general. I organized it, and held it at my home, wives were invited. It was really a good exercise. It was mainly for the American staff people, just to get us thinking in that direction.

Q: It really was an earth change.

BURNET: You must have done the same thing in Korea.

Q: Yes. Well, Frank, looking at your career now, I guess you retired then.

BURNET: Yes, retired in '78 at the end of that tour. I had a heart attack, so that brought that to an end.

CHARLES LAHIGUERA
Political Officer (Refugee Office)
Hong Kong (1975-1979)

Mr. Lahiguera was born and raised in New York. After graduating from Georgetown University and serving in the US Navy, he entered the Foreign Service in 1963. Though he served outside the South East Asia, his primary duties concerned the Vietnam War and its aftermath, particularly refugees. His overseas posts include Germany, Curacao, Vietnam, France, Hong Kong, Thailand and Swaziland, where he served as Deputy Chief of Mission. Mr. Lahiguera was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2000.

Q: Were you there from '75 till?

LAHIGUERA: To '79. To July of '79.

Q: What were we getting out of particularly South Vietnam, I mean it had collapsed. We had expected a, what were we expecting?

LAHIGUERA: Politically it is hard for me to judge. We were concerned about the impact on the rest of Southeast Asia, particularly Thailand and Malaysia. The Chinese at that time were still supporting the Vietnamese, as were the Soviets. We were interested to see how; we were interested in developments in Cambodia as well. The Khmer Rouge had taken over in Phnom Penn. I always said that the Vietnamese were very fortunate in having the Cambodians next to them because compared to the Cambodians they looked like nice people. There was a Vietnamese presence in Hong Kong as well as a Cambodian presence. They had people there to conduct trade and shipping into both Vietnam and Cambodia. There was a flow of refugees from Vietnam. I don't recall any from Cambodia. I guess the Cambodians were principally going to Thailand. So, I was interested in the refugee flows. I had a lot of contact with the Hong Kong authorities on the question of refugees. We were certainly supporting the policy of giving them first asylum and we took the view that people with relatives in the United States or people brought into Hong Kong on American vessels would be taken care of by us essentially. We felt that whatever ship picked them up really should take care of them.

I was interested in debriefing refugees on conditions; I was interested in the fate of our staff in Vietnam. We had a continued interest on the MIA (Missing in Action) question and any sightings of Americans including any Americans who in fact stayed behind. There were those that just elected to stay behind. As I think I mentioned there was in Bien Hoa a young man who was working in a mental hospital. I also recall a priest who stayed behind, an American priest and quite a few others. So, we were interested in those kinds of thing. I followed the Vietnamese efforts to sell goods and to import goods. We had an embargo on American company trade with the Vietnamese. My presence was pretty well known in Hong Kong. I was active in the American Chamber of Commerce there, which is a large organization. They in fact formed a Vietnamese committee of people interested in Vietnam. Some of them had been in business in Vietnam and had left. Others were just looking for new opportunities. We managed to obtain information on what ships were going to Vietnam and what cargo they were bringing, so any time we noticed American goods we let it be known that that was illegal. I recall one ship going into Cambodia and it was carrying a large shipment of Kodak stuff. We had a customs representative in Hong Kong. The U.S. Customs Officer went to Kodak and told them that we were distressed about this. They assured us that they didn't know anything about it and they would look into it. We had a similar thing with Monsanto's shipping chemicals. No great harm would be done by Kodak selling film there, but when we did that the word got around very quickly in the American community that we were watching this kind of thing. I can remember one banker in particular saying, "Well, you know you're not going to stop shipments of stuff into these countries." I said, "Of course not, but it's going to cost the Vietnamese and the Cambodian communist governments an increase of 10% or 20% to buy through a middleman, then we've already achieved our objective. This is not a wartime embargo; it's an economic one." So, I got involved in that kind of thing. I did debrief a lot of refugees. I read the Vietnamese news agency broadcast every morning religiously. It was a chore that I really used to dread, but it was very interesting what you could draw from it. I also developed a range of business contacts who were going into Vietnam and Hong Kong. I used to visit foreign diplomats from Hanoi who would come down and do their R&R in Hong Kong including Australians, Indians, and Swedes. I can remember speaking to the Swedish aid people who were very frustrated. There was an agreement between the Swedes and the Vietnamese that any equipment that arrived became the property of the Vietnamese government. They'd bring in equipment and the Vietnamese would want to tax it going in. Then after that they'd take the equipment and say it's ours now and we'd rather put it on this other project that the Soviets are helping us with and not have it on your project. This used to just drive the Swedes wild. They had this huge paper mill that they were developing in the north of Vietnam. So, this is the kind of information I gathered in bits and pieces. It was interesting. I can't say that there was any major breakthroughs or that I made any great major discoveries.

I did notice that around '78 the Vietnamese had a party congress. All the people associated with the Chinese were removed as well as people supporting the ethnic minority programs. I didn't understand the link at first until I realized that the ethnic minorities in the north of Vietnam, I kept on thinking in terms of Montagnards, but the ethnic minorities in the north of Vietnam were largely out of China. So, they must have looked at these things as being linked. In any event, this was an early indicator that things were going sour between Vietnam and China. There was a gradual buildup of Soviet relations with Soviet aircraft going into the north and Soviet ships going into the Vietnamese ports. I think that's what really triggered the downward slide. Chinese continued to leave Vietnam including leaving through the north into China. The Chinese made some quite a bit of noise about this, but I think their real concern was the developing Vietnamese relationship with the Soviets and feeling circled by enemies.

Q: Obviously we must have been looking for the possibility of a conventional bloodbath after the revolution, after the North Vietnamese had taken over South Vietnam. What were we getting from that?

LAHIGUERA: Yes. We had these terrible reports out of Cambodia. I had very little information about what was going on in Cambodia, but it was obvious from what we had that it was very grim. We were concerned that similar events would occur in Vietnam. I was very pleased to see that it wasn't as bad as I thought it could have been. The first reports I got were about the women who were associated with American efforts, our former female staff. I heard that the women were given very brief reeducation as they called it, usually a month or two, and then released. I attributed this to a certain Asian chauvinist approach that women couldn't have done anything of any real concern so you didn't have to bother much with them. The male staff members had a much more difficult time. I did learn from refugees who did get out that male staff members were in reeducation for at least a year or more. Officers that I knew such as General Ba and General Dao were both in reeducation camps. I recall one particular figure I believe the governor of the central bank of Vietnam who had prevented President Thieu from absconding with the gold. Thieu had, I understand, a Swiss aircraft in Saigon he was going to take the gold on. I forgot how many millions of gold it was, but this gentleman had barred the president's access to the gold. The communists ended up getting the gold and after all that effort they threw this poor guy into reeducation as well. So, I guess that didn't count for a lot.

There were reports in Hong Kong that if you had money you could buy your way out. There were boats that would take people out and drop them off near Thailand or try to get them into Hong Kong. The British also set up flights between Hong Kong and Saigon to take out people who were connected to Hong Kong. I was able to talk to those kind of people. In general things were severe, difficult, but we didn't have the kind of mass executions that occurred in Phnom Penn.

Q: The land reform that happened up in North Vietnam in I guess the '50s when the villagers basically were given carte blanche to go after the land.

LAHIGUERA: In fact the communist government maintained the Republic of Vietnam piaster for quite some time. I had left with a bag full of this money. I didn't think anything of it. I thought it would be worthless the day we left. I had it as a souvenir and I would have gladly have given it away to the Vietnamese staff before I left if I had thought that it was worth anything. I was very sorry about that. I think it took them about two years before they changed to their new communist dong.

Q: Were you consulting with the China watchers on Chinese Vietnamese relationships? Was there much thought given to this?

LAHIGUERA: Yes. Well, in fact this report I wrote on the deteriorating relationship between China and Vietnam sparked quite a bit of interest. We had started to normalize relations with China, we had a liaison office in Beijing at this time. The staff sent me up to visit it. I saw Ambassador Woodcock then, but things started going downhill. In '78 when I visited China, the people in our embassy in Beijing thought that I might be able to get near the Vietnamese border, which is what I would have liked to have done to be able to see for myself any military buildup. They decided that when I got to southern China I should apply for a permit to go from there to the border area and that I'd probably be turned down in Beijing. Anyhow, they wouldn't allow me near the border, but they did allow me to go to the refugee camp and I got an opportunity to interview the Chinese who came out of Vietnam. It was an eye opener to me. What the Chinese were complaining about, and I was certainly not one to be a great defender of the Vietnamese communists, was they wanted some sort of privileged minority status. They wanted a different kind of ID card. The Vietnamese wanted everybody to register and if you were going to live in Vietnam you should be a Vietnam citizen. That included being eligible to serve in the military. Well, they didn't want to serve in the military.

Q: They hadn't in the South Vietnamese system?

LAHIGUERA: These are Northern Chinese. These people had fled from the north. They didn't want to serve in the Vietnamese army and they didn't want to speak Vietnamese and they wanted to have some sort of special status and have their own schools and be left alone. They just wanted to live in Vietnam. I said to myself, well, I can see why the Vietnamese regarded this as unwelcome. Of course, I didn't say that to the Chinese. It didn't sound to me like they were being abused and the Vietnamese took the attitude of well, if you want to go to China, feel free to leave and they did. Of course the Chinese didn't feel they needed any more people. So, this is a bone of contention between the two countries. When I got back from this trip the Chinese had started moving forces towards the border. I can recall that I estimated there were about 1,000 aircraft moved south in the vicinity of the Vietnamese border. I knew at that point that this is not a bluff, this is not posturing. I filed what was to be my only real dissent cable in my career. At that juncture the consul general didn't see it my way. We didn't put it in the dissent channel, although it was originally written that way. He decided to send it in as another view from the consul general. The consensus of the China watchers was that the Chinese were very reasonable people and they were just concerned about these refugees and they were just trying to put some pressure on the Vietnamese. I said, no I thought that they were really concerned about a Soviet buildup in Vietnam. They really didn't care much about the refugees and they fully intended to attack. In December of '78, a China watcher, Sarah Ann Smith, and I wrote a joint cable, saying that the Chinese actions had vindicated our position. I felt satisfied with that. By that time I started meeting with the Chinese officials or semi- officials in Hong Kong. One particular gentleman was specializing on Vietnamese affairs. So, I mean he knew who I was and I knew who he was. The day after the Chinese attacked the border in February of '79 he invited me to lunch. I can recall arriving at the lunch and he was sitting at the table already waiting for me and he was beaming. So, I went in and sat down and he didn't know what to say and he finally looked up to me and said, "Well, what do you think?" I paused and I thought it over a while and I finally said to him, "I think it's pretty good that you're just four years too late." He laughed. I hoped that they reported that as such. But, I can still recall from our conversation that we were in discussions of normalizing relations with Vietnam ourselves. He expressed some very strong views of his disapproval of such a move. He noted we were normalizing relations with China and that pressing to be friendly with these abusive Vietnamese probably would not be taken well in Beijing. I think that attitude had a certain influence on our terminating the exercise. I don't say it was that factor alone, but I certainly think it was relevant.

Q: Hong Kong had developed this China monitoring system, highly sophisticated, getting newspapers and listening to news and interviewing people and all and they had a staff that filtered it out and it's kind of still going on even though we had people up in Beijing at that time and it still for some years remained our major way of finding out what was going on in China. Were you kind of there by yourself though on Vietnam; was there another closed society?

LAHIGUERA: Yes. I was a sort of a one man band and my contacts were people who really were interested or had business links with Vietnam when the Vietnamese were approaching for credit or barter arrangements or that kind of thing. I also followed the Laotians. I went over to Bangkok from time to time as well and met with Charles Twining and we went up to refugee camps and talked to the refugees.

Q: You must have been concerned about all the military equipment that ended up in the North Vietnamese hands?

LAHIGUERA: Yes. One of the disappointments was what happened to the military equipment in Da Nang. We had this mass of fighter aircraft that were all set to be flown off. The Vietnamese pilots instead of flying them off took their families and got on the boats. When the communists arrived they found these aircraft all set up and ready to go. We lost aircraft in Bien Hoa air base as well. I did debrief former military ARV people who got out on the status of the aircraft. The Vietnamese weren't able to maintain and they couldn't get spare parts for much of the aircraft, so it was of limited use. I would think that they have a 100 years supply of artillery however. The aircraft was a more perishable kind of commodity.

Q: Was there any indication that our equipment was being used against the Chinese?

LAHIGUERA: Yes. They used '70s aircraft certainly including against the Cambodians when the invaded Cambodia setting up a new government. That was also during the same time.

Q: How were you seeing the Vietnamese/Cambodian relationship in this '75 to '79 period?

LAHIGUERA: Well, originally, when Pol Pot first took over, there wasn't any obvious break in relations. Things slowly went downhill along the Vietnamese Cambodian border. Frictions, clashes developed and it just slowly deteriorated. But historically they hated each other, so it wasn't a surprise.

Q: Did you have the feeling that in a way that you were looking at Vietnam. I mean, here is a place that we had spent lots of lives, lots of our money and all and this was a focal point of our foreign policy for over ten years and all. Then all of a sudden it disappears.

LAHIGUERA: Yes, it certainly was erratic. In fact, Charlie Twining and I used to say that we two replaced Graham Martin and his cast of thousands. Yes. It went from one extreme to another. Of course, in our realignment, our new relationship with China changed the whole picture and Vietnam became really of marginal interest. I mentioned previously, we made quite a bit of effort with the refugees on the questions of MIAs and also with travelers, people like the Swedes. We were always looking for Americans. I had worked with joint casualty resolution center people in Vietnam and they used to come to Hong Kong as well. So, we were always being urged to see if we could find out anything about Americans. I always thought that they would surface. I was very skeptical about prisoners remaining from the war period, but I expected that deserters would surface. There were reports of an anti-communist insurgency trying to reorganize and I was concerned about Americans going back to support that kind of activity. In fact there were Americans who wanted to go back to get their families out. So, that was another question. I thought there would be a good chance that there would be Americans arrested in the post-war period. We did get some reports from people in the North of seeing Americans. I recall a Swede telling me about a black farmer who apparently spoke English and he was out plowing the fields. That he didn't look like he was a prisoner, he looked like had a farm and a family there. The Swede tried to talk to him and he just ran away. I was very skeptical that there would have been any prisoners because it would have just caused a lot of embarrassment to the Vietnamese government and there was no advantage in their keeping them once the war was over. So, I didn't take the Rambo kinds of things very seriously, but I certainly did take seriously the possibility that Americans were there under other conditions.

Q: Well, as we both know that during a war they had developed a considerable deserter colony in Saigon hidden away where GI's were selling dope and you know, sort of living under cover with a girlfriend involved.

LAHIGUERA: Well, when I was in Bien Hoa we had information on somebody whom we believed was a MIA, who was listed as an MIA. I tried to make arrangements to have him photographed just to show that he wasn't a prisoner somewhere, but he was in fact on the loose. We never were successful in getting a picture of him. We had people who described him. There were a lot of these kinds and reports of these kinds of characters running around.

Q: What sort of apparatus were you reporting to back in Washington? Was there sort of a Vietnamese desk?

LAHIGUERA: Yes, Jim Rosenthal was our original desk officer and then he was replaced by Steve Lyon, a director from Vietnam and Bob Miller was our deputy assistant secretary over all of these kinds of divisions. So, they would get our reporting and they would send me instructions on any particular thing that they would like me to focus on.

Q: Well, is there anything else you should talk about during this time?

LAHIGUERA: I can't say that there was any particular event after the invasion. I was amazed by the press at that time, I'm talking about the invasion of the Chinese into Vietnam. The press made a lot of noise about how it was really a victory for Vietnam because of the high Chinese casualties. That kind of comment was surprising. I couldn't believe Beijing being worried very much about casualties. I thought that the invasion was pretty much a success in sending a message to the Vietnamese that they were very vulnerable to China and better behave. The Vietnamese were fearful of China, China being their traditional colonial boss. They always had this historic fear that they would come back as Ho Chi Minh did. You might like to know that Ho Chi Minh organized the Vietnam communist party in Hong Kong and had the first party congress in Macao. He was arrested by the British and then eventually released. But they had to sneak him out of the colony because they were afraid the French would assassinate him to prevent him from returning to Indo China. I met actually one lady who had met Ho Chi Minh while he was there.

Q: Well, were Vietnamese politics raging in Hong Kong. I mean were these just people that the Vietnamese had got to Hong Kong just waiting to get the hell out.

LAHIGUERA: Most of the refugees that made it to Hong Kong were ethnic Chinese and they had no interest in Vietnam once they got out. Most of them were economic refugees and they would largely like to go to the United States. We had some problem and friction with the Hong Kong government because we weren't willing to take everybody that came out. There wasn't any Vietnamese activism in Hong Kong directed against Vietnam. That didn't develop at all or I would have heard about that. I'm sure of that. It was interesting to see how the attitude in the Hong Kong business community changed significantly after the Chinese government became hostile to the Vietnamese. Then suddenly the businessmen and the American Chamber of Commerce were pretty well decided that they weren't interested in Vietnam and in fact weren't sure that they had ever been. It sort of, this whole effort vanished overnight. That was amusing.

Q: Were you getting any reflection of, I mean there had been a major anti-American movement both in the United States and Europe and all against our involvement in the war and cheers for Ho Chi Minh and all. Did these activists try to head out for Vietnam for the new workers paradise and all that?

LAHIGUERA: I didn't see much of that kind of thing. It seemed to me, after the war, especially on the American side, there was a great loss of interest on what was happening there. I didn't notice any concerns about human rights in Vietnam after we were out in contrast to all the noise that had been made before. I do remember there was an Italian journalist at the Far East National Tribune, Tiziano Terzani, I think he's the editor now. He may have just left. He who wrote a book on the fall of Saigon. He also wrote for the Spiegel, which is funny. I remember I had great pleasure in telling him first how I bought his book in Taiwan. He got the point; he didn't get any royalties on my purchase. I then enumerated all the mistakes he had made in the book. He had written something of a sympathetic presentation of the communists. He went back to Vietnam after the election, after the Vietnamese communists finally set up some sort of election machinery. When he came back again he was very disillusioned. I have to give him credit, he did criticize the new regime. I found that the foreign journalists took a far more serious interest in what was going on than the Americans. They were interesting to talk to and they would ask me far more interesting questions. The Americans tended to call me up and ask me what was new. That was the kind of question I would get while the reporters from the Guardian had really very penetrating questions.

Q: Well, by '79 were you actually getting a little bit fed up with Vietnam?

LAHIGUERA: Yes, but I was still quite interested in Southeast Asia. I was up for reassignment. The deputy principal officer in Hong Kong, Burt Levin went to Bangkok to become the DCM and I expressed an interest to him in being the principal officer in Northeast Thailand. He supported that and I ended up actually getting that job.

WILLIAM W. THOMAS, JR.
Economic Counselor
Beijing (1975-1979)

Consul General
Chengdu (1984-1986)

Science Counselor
Beijing (1986-1990)

William W. Thomas, Jr. was born in North Carolina in 1925. He majored in political science and international studies at the University of North Carolina. Mr. Thomas entered the Foreign Service in 1952. He served in Hong Kong, Phnom Penh, Vientiane, Taipei, Beijing, Chengdu, and Washington, DC. The interview was conducted by Charles Stuart Kennedy on May 31, 1994.

Q: Then you took off again back to your old stamping grounds except on the other side of the Straits, you went to Beijing.

Q: From 1975-79. At that time did we have an embassy?

THOMAS: We had an embassy which was called by another name. It was the United States Liaison Office. It was very small. We had about eight non-administrative personnel. No military program, no economic program, no cultural program. Whatever we did we had to call by another name, which I was used to from Taiwan.

Q: Well, what were you doing?

THOMAS: We were doing normal embassy work but called something else. It was a pleasure to work in a very small outfit like USLO, as we called it. Bush was a good administrator.

Q: This is George Bush?

THOMAS: Yes. He was a very good administrator and I don't think he ever got the credit he deserved for that. It was a very tight knit little organization with a special security arrangement because they wouldn't let us have Marines. The Marines had given a party at what they called The Red Ass Saloon and got kicked out of the country for it. We had to avoid a situation like that coming up again.

Q: How did you deal with the Chinese government?

THOMAS: Very distantly. The first time I got instructions to go to the Ministry of Finance, I didn't know where it was. It was an unmarked building because the Chinese at that time were not marking buildings. They thought it was too sensitive for me to know where the Ministry of Finance was.

Q: How did you get there?

THOMAS: I asked the driver, of course. If he didn't know, he would ask somebody who did. But the Cultural Revolution was a very peculiar time.

Q: Was the Cultural Revolution dying at this time?

THOMAS: It was dying but it wasn't obvious to us that it was. The people were dying, which was obvious. Zhou En-lai died in early 1976. Three big shots died within a year of each other.

Q: Was the Gang of Four still in power?

THOMAS: We didn't call it the Gang of Four, but they were very much in power. Just at the end of Bush's tour, Deng Xiaoping came back temporarily and gave a farewell dinner for Bush who was leaving for the CIA job. Then he went down again and it wasn't until October that things more or less stabilized in China. It still was very unstable. We couldn't travel. There was one time that the only city in the country that was open to foreigners was Canton. We were not permitted to go to Shanghai. My daughter-in-law is from Shanghai and we said, "Oh, we will go see your relatives in Shanghai." We got permission and when we got on the train in Shanghai they wouldn't let her off the train so we all had to go on to the next stop because Shanghai was closed unbeknownst to us.

Q: It was a liberal center in Chinese terms wasn't it?

THOMAS: In Chinese terms, no. It was the headquarters of the Gang of Four.

Q: Oh.

THOMAS: Three of the Gang of Four were Shanghai people.

Q: Were you and the rest of the embassy going out and reading wall posters and other things like this?

THOMAS: Yes.

Q: This was the time of the wall posters?

THOMAS: When we first arrived in 1975 there weren't many wall posters but we discovered later they were of great significance. We would take a different route going to work every morning riding bicycles mainly so that we could see if there were any new signs up. We found out that Hua Guo-feng was Chairman of the Party by going through our hospital courtyard and looking at all the new signs that were up.

Q: Who put up these signs?

THOMAS: We thought it best not to go out at night in those days and so we never saw any signs being put up, but occasionally you could see something. The people putting up the signs would do it late at night and in a place where they were protected by their own people.

Q: So it was little enclaves of Party people.

THOMAS: Not necessarily Party towards the end. At first the Party people felt they had enough support where they could do this without too much risk. Later others decided the risk was not too bad and they might get punished anyway, so they were more free about wall posters.

Q: Were you looking at Beijing as being divided into quarters or something where you would see one type of wall poster in one place and another type in another place?

THOMAS: No, the areas were chosen because of their conspicuousness. For example, the poster for the big 1976 demonstration for Zhou En-lai was put on a certain monument because it has Zhou En-lai's calligraphy on it and therefore everybody would know that this was support for Zhou En-lai who happened to be dead at the time. The central wall posters were put in Tiananmen Square along the four walls, one of which was a police station, which was burned in the 1976 riot. There was a lot of damage during that riot but there was no press so it got no press coverage. And if there is no television, it didn't happen. The later Tiananmen thing was thoroughly covered by C-Span and was quite extraordinary. I never saw anything like it.

Q: What were we seeing from the wall posters? Was there a power struggle going on?

THOMAS: It was very clear, and that is what the wall posters said. "Over throw of Liu Shao-chi," who was the president of the country at that time and who was not only overthrown but was killed...he was sick and not given any treatment. There was frankness in the wall posters that we hadn't seen before or since in China. Throughout 1976, for the entire year, it was very prolific in wall posters and a lot of political information was available this way and through no other way.

Q: Did we very much feel that we were there as more of a listening post than anything else at that point?

THOMAS: We had connections with the Chinese but they were very carefully chosen on both sides. It was a very tenuous arrangement. The restrictions on us were no different than restrictions on other foreigners, except for the few Communist Americans, for one thing. It was a relationship we were afraid could be easily ruined. In fact, it didn't happen, but I think it was the right thing to be very careful in our arrangements.

Q: Part of the time you were there was during the Carter administration. Did you see any change with them?

THOMAS: No, the problems remained the same and our response to them remained the same. Carter came in with full recognition as the goal and achieved it.

Q: Did recognition come while you were there?

THOMAS: Yes.

Q: Did that make any difference?

THOMAS: Yes, it did. It made a bigger difference than was immediately apparent at the working level because the Chinese are very cautious about taking things that may be considered not right. But there was a big difference. There were military attachés; the mission changed from a liaison office with a very small group and the agricultural attaché the only non-State Department person... My office was taken and given to the military, fortunately I was gone by then. We became just an ordinary mission.

Q: While you were there, was human rights at all on the agenda or was it just not a viable thing?

THOMAS: It wasn't a viable thing then anymore than it is now. But the law then was the same as it is now, the Jackson Vanik Amendment. Both Jackson and Vanik came out. They said the line was basically that things were better than they were, which nobody could question. If you look back to the Cultural Revolution days there has been an enormous change and China is a real democracy. If you look at it from the point of view of Belgium, you could make it a different view.

Q: Were you getting any particular view of how the Chinese viewed the Soviet Union in those days?

THOMAS: Partly through out relations with the Soviets. They were fascinated, of course, by the assignment of Bush to the CIA. But we had relatively close relations with the Soviet embassy at that time.

Q: When did you leave in 1979?

THOMAS: Where did I go after that?

Q: To Hong Kong.

THOMAS: That was a short assignment.

Q: But basically you went before things turned sour again with the Soviets by their invasion of Afghanistan which was in December 1979.

THOMAS: Well, 1975 -79, from our point of view in the embassy, relations with the Soviets and the Chinese were good. We were working on the same wave length. The Soviets were still extremely nosey about what we were doing and obviously from their point of view it was very important.

Q: Was there the feeling that we were trying to play China against the Soviets?

THOMAS: Oh, sure.

Q: Did you have any feel for that at all?

THOMAS: My job there wasn't focused on the Soviets except for the Soviet trade and they were reasonably open about that. But they were a suspicious bunch. I think they thought we were trying to play one against the other, and I think everybody else thought we were too. Whether it was actually a fact or not is another matter.

Q: On the trade issues, one of the visions in American life has gone on for two hundred years and that is the tremendous market that China will offer. Here you were as we open up our first embassy. How did you see trade with China and the prospects for it at that particular time?

THOMAS: My great uncle was the head of the British-American Tobacco Company in China and proved that the stories about sell them a button each and you will sell a zillion buttons does work. The problem right now is very different from the problem we had right then. The main problem of trade with China was the poor organization of the People's Republic of China to handle trade. They first had ideological problems with it. Those were overcome by the power of the dollar and then later on they just had administrative problems in handling a major economy with the tools for central planning. Since then they got a better organized economic administration. Their main problem is trying to keep inflation in check.

Q: Were you there for the overthrow of the Gang of Four?

THOMAS: Yes, I was.

Q: How did that play out from your perspective and our embassy's perspective?

THOMAS: I was in Moscow when Mao Zedong died and came back on the next plane, not that my presence was required. It was obvious that there was great tension. Mao's funeral was an extraordinary thing. There were girls lying down on the catafalque wailing in the traditional Chinese fashion. Mao was all waxed up. But the political tension was very strong. It was very obvious in the streets. It wasn't until well into the next year that Deng Xiaoping really got things under control.

Q: Again we were pretty much a passive observer of this?

THOMAS: Oh, heavens yes, with a billion people in China and an embassy of 20 or 30.

Q: Well, I had to ask the question.

THOMAS: Well, it's a fair question. Just because the answer is obvious doesn't mean the question shouldn't be asked.

Q: Well, you left there and went for a very short tour in Hong Kong. What were you doing there?

THOMAS: I got an offer of a better job and took it. I don't like Hong Kong, so when I got offered a DCM job elsewhere, I took it.

Q: Then, off you went to your last tour to China again.

THOMAS: I went to China as science attaché.

Q: You were in Chengdu for a while.

THOMAS: Oh, I had forgotten about the three years in Chengdu.

Q: From 1984-86 you were consul general there. Where is Chengdu and what were you up to?

THOMAS: Chengdu is in southwest China. The consulate district had a 170 million people in it. It includes Yunnan, Sichuan, which has a 100 million people, Guizhou and Tibet. Tibet is the largest in area but with only about 2 million people. We had had an office in Chengdu during the Second World War which was in charge of procurement for our air force which was bombing Japan with B-29s. One of the most active parts of the areas politically in China terms was Tibet. The Tibetans always considered themselves very separate and the Chinese considered them separate as far as any actual contact was concerned. But they got to the point where they were shooting at each other and the Chinese took very stern measures with the Tibetans who were defiant and would, therefore, give us some active reporting to do.

Q: What were you hearing about Tibet from there?

THOMAS: The surprising thing was that the Chinese and the Tibetans agreed on what was going on and that there was suppression going on and it was not a safe place for foreigners to be. The Chinese wouldn't give visas to foreigners except for large groups which were carefully controlled. This came at a time when Lhasa had opened its first Holiday Inn which always seemed to be very odd, but it could have made money if tourism had not been interrupted by the shooting.

Q: How did you get reports of what was happening up there?

THOMAS: We sent people up there as often as we could and talked to people who came out. An occasional Tibetan would come out and talk to us, but that was very unusual. The Chinese would publish a lot more than they had before, and we were a little surprised at this. Once we had recognized Peking, we were able to subscribe to their local newspapers which contained a great deal of information.

Q: How about the local authorities? How did you find them in Tibet and the rest of your consular district?

THOMAS: As usual in China, the biggest problem with the local authorities is bureaucratic. They are highly bureaucratic and their bureaucracy doesn't always mesh with ours. Sichuan has a history going back to the second century AD and consider themselves very separate from the other Chinese. But we got a good reception there, and mainly speaking in Sichuan which is by far the most important of the provinces in that group. Tibet wasn't as important until you get to human rights, and then that was and is a very active area in the human rights discussion. The Chinese essentially wished we would leave them alone and let them run their own business. So we had a little difficulty trying to join in.

Q: Then you moved to Beijing?

THOMAS: Right.

Q: From 1986-90. What were you doing then?

THOMAS: I was the science counselor.

Q: Which meant what?

THOMAS: We had quite a large exchange program. Official changes, like earthquake management. This sounds a little silly, but it is a very active program. As far as the science end of it is concerned, an 8.2 Richter scale earthquake gave us a lot to offer.

Q: What happened?

THOMAS: Well, at the Tangshan earthquake 375,000 people were killed. We felt it in Peking quite strongly. It came at a time when the political tensions were very high. The peasants said that something awful was going to happen and sure enough Chairman Mao died in three weeks. It was a very active program then.

We had problems with the second Tiananmen Square incident.

Q: This was the one in 1989?

THOMAS: Right. Exchanges dropped off quite sharply and later ran into budget problems so they haven't fully recovered. As far as the Chinese are concerned they liked them very much and found they were very valuable.

Q: Are these mainly students coming to the United States?

THOMAS: Students, post-docs, mostly graduate students. I have noticed in the scientific literature since I have gotten back, that the number of Chinese names as principal authors of papers are a lot more numerous than they used to be.

Q: This is a time when the personal computer has started to come on line, were the Chinese able to respond to this?

THOMAS: They are extremely good at it. Their main problem was having money to invest. Our main problem was piracy of copy righted materials, and that is still a problem. But they reacted very rapidly to it. They are particularly good at software and have software companies. I notice there is one of their companies, Stone, which advertises regularly in the New York Times in their computer pages once a week.

Q: How did you deal with the problem of piracy?

THOMAS: We negotiated at a fairly high level on the problem saying that we wouldn't give them Most Favored Nation treatment if you don't stop pirating our computer stuff. This was big business. Book piracy in the old days was fairly small potatoes, but since computers have gotten involved in it, it is much bigger.

Q: How did they respond?

THOMAS: They had not given us a satisfactory response by the time I left, which was in the fall of 1990.

Q: How was Winston Lord as ambassador?

THOMAS: He is an expert, has a Chinese wife. She was born in Sichuan, so we were delighted to have them come down and pay us a visit. It worked out very well. He wasn't there for the whole time because Jim Lilley took over.

Q: And how was he as ambassador?

THOMAS: He was fine. Another China hand. His father was with Standback in east China and spoke good Chinese.

Q: Could you tell me how the embassy reacted to the Tiananmen Square incident?

THOMAS: Well, the Tiananmen Square business first began as a reporting matter for the embassy. We took turns on going to Tiananmen to see what was going on and who was there.

Q: These were basically student demonstrators?

THOMAS: Mainly students, a few others. Sarah and I went down to have a look on regular tours of these things. It came for the Chinese at a particularly unfortunate time because Gorbachev was visiting.

Q: Which was the first visit of a Soviet leader in decades.

THOMAS: Yes, it was a major event for them and it was pretty well spoiled by the demonstrations. We didn't always have to go to the square to get our soldiers. They started bringing soldiers in and put them outside our apartments, just because we lived on one of the main streets. But things didn't work well and they had some trucks stopped and burned by the mob which we could watch out of our windows and they didn't like that. When things got out of control and they were bringing troops in in the middle of the night and started shooting in Tiananmen Square, and many other places all over the city, things got quite dangerous. You have young, green troops with automatic weapons at one point shooting at the apartments we were living in. So, we thought it best to move people and Washington agreed. We got all of the Americans out as quickly as possible. This was not only happening in Peking. In Chengdu there was a riot and they attacked the building the consulate was in. There was much less trouble in Shanghai. It was a little hard to predict which areas were going to be troublesome. I don't think things have fully recovered since in relations with the Chinese.

Q: One has the feeling things are in a state of suspension almost waiting for the new leadership to come in.

THOMAS: Well, don't hold your breath. I find it rather difficult myself to figure that Deng Xiaoping can be 90 and still in full charge, but that is all I hear from anybody. I am a little out of touch now

Q: When you left China in 1990, how did you feel American-Chinese relations were at that time?

THOMAS: There again you have to separate facts from news stories. I found coverage of China very confusing and one of the problems is that the press and television have to have a story and they overwrite the stories and make an issue of something that need not be an issue, except that it is Thursday and we have to get something on the 6 o'clock news. This is a real problem. One of the advantages of the US Liaison Office in Peking was that the foreign press did not have to be feed every day because they simply were not there and when they were there, there were no Americans and we could cultivate them in our own way.

When you get to real reporting, the reporting on the Tiananmen massacre, it was quite extraordinary and everybody did a good job on it. But there was plenty to report and people didn't have to make stories up.

Q: What did you feel about the Chinese students in technology who were coming to the United States? Was there sort of the feeling behind this that we are really in our own way creating a whole new group of people who are in the long run going to have a tremendous affect within China?

THOMAS: In Taiwan, this was a policy. "We need to send Taiwan students to the United States to get Ph.D.s in whatever subject they happen to choose because we need them to run the place when we recapture the mainland." Well, nobody says that anymore, but that doesn't keep it from being partly true. The exchange programs have been very active, although not as active as the Chinese would like. They are willing to let us bring people into the villages of Sichuan if we let them put people in our physics laboratories. I think it has been a good connection. I notice the relations with the missionary Chinese, with what we used to call Christian Chinese, is still very westernized compared with other Chinese. The old Methodist church in Peking is still full of Chinese. The connection has been a good connection and I think it is cost effective, the exchanges. A lot of the people who come, don't come back, but that is a problem that happens...

Q: And we certainly come out ahead on this, getting bright people.

THOMAS: Well, there are people who don't think so. Since my son married one I have the feeling that we get a net gain. But there are a lot of people who are very suspicious of all these A students coming in from China.

Q: Well, why don't we stop at this point.

THOMAS: Very good.

Q: Thank you very much.

Gilbert J. Donahue was born in Virginia in 1947. He received his bachelor's degree from American University in 1968. His career included positions in Mexico, Ivory Coast, Taiwan, Hong Kong, China, and Brazil. Mr. Donahue was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in April 2000.

Q: How did you find the 1976-1977 period at FSI?

DONAHUE: Of course, there is always an adjustment coming back to Washington. However, being in a language training mode means that you almost never get out of your suitcase. We were two weeks late starting our language training because we could not leave post before a certain date and language training must have begun either in late August or very early September. So, we had a lot of catch-up to do. Just getting oriented, buying a car, figuring out where we were going to live, making and then getting ready to make some of the purchases we would have to make down the road. Also, we had wanted to have a family. However, my wife did not want to get pregnant while we were in Africa and while we were taking malarial suppressant pills, not knowing what the impact of that medicine would be. So, after we were off of the tropical regime and after we felt fine medically, we started to be interested in having a family. In fact, that was one of the things that we began to accomplish while we were here in language training. My wife got pregnant. We ended up actually delivering the baby while we were in our second year of training in Taiwan. So, our oldest son was born in Taiwan.

On the one hand, we were adjusting to American life, having lived abroad for over five years since we entered the FS. On the other hand, we had our noses in the books. Chinese language training requires about a 30-hour day. 24 hours are not enough. There is no time out for sleeping. So, the teachers kept at us. There is a tremendous amount of memory work. It's almost like learning two different languages. The spoken language for rudimentary speech, to find your way around and take care of the necessities of daily life, is relatively simple. It's a language where syntax is more prominent than grammar. It's also a language that is highly idiomatic. So, in those respects, it is similar to English. The problem is reading and writing and then integrating reading with speaking. That is the only way to develop higher-level vocabulary. Learning to read takes time. I think your brain is limited to how many characters it can take in at a given period. That part of your memory probably deteriorates with age. So, the people who have the greatest aptitude in learning Chinese would be young people. An aging adult finds it more difficult, which was another reason why that was really probably the window in our career when it was optimal for us to get into Chinese language training.

Q: Also, 1976 was very early on in our opening of relations with China. Was this seen as a time of great promise for a career in Chinese?

DONAHUE: It was. Ever since I entered the FS, there had been the expectation that some president would find a way to bring about normalization of relations with China. The wonder is that it took so long. Kissinger had in fact made his historic visit to China under President Nixon. Following that, there was the expectation that we would be opening up in Beijing and we would need to train a lot of speakers. So, in fact, there had been an effort to increase the number of FS officers that would get Chinese language training. However, it didn't happen. There were a number of reasons. The period of the Kissinger visit was during the Cultural Revolution in China, which had never been well understood in the West because very little information about China was made available by the Chinese – purposely. The conditions were simply not right for the U.S. to establish a permanent mission of any type in Beijing during that Cold War period. That was followed by the Gang of Four period. In fact, when we began studying Chinese in 1976, Mao Zedong had just died. There was this brief period of expectation and certainly our Chinese teachers and the woman who was running the East Asian area studies program at the time, Dr. Hattie Colton, believed, “Now that Mao is dead, this can happen.” But we had not expected the Gang of Four to come together and have a hard-line resistance to any reform and for that period to take as long as it did. So, virtually for the entire period that we were studying Chinese, the Gang of Four was in control. It was a kind of return to very hard line rhetoric in Chinese editorials and a fierce face towards the West. There was a U.S. Liaison Office (USLO) in Beijing, but it was a very small one and what they could do was very limited. So, State was training Chinese language officers to have people in the wings, to be held in readiness. However, we could not be placed in an assignment in China at that time.

Nevertheless, at that time – and I think this is still true – the State Department would only accept people for long-term training who already had an ongoing assignment in a country in a language-designated position. So, my wife and I were going to LDPs [language designated position] in Hong Kong. Still, there was the expectation that during the course of our training our assignments might change and we expected we might be assigned to Beijing.

Q: Why don't we talk a bit about what you were getting in Taichung? First, did your wife have any connection with the Chinese side?

DONAHUE: My wife's family came from the southern part of Guangdong Province, which is in the south of China. Her father's family came from southwest of Hong Kong. Her mother's family came from northeast of Hong Kong. Linda's mother's family was Hakka, which is a group of people ethnically Chinese but culturally distinct from other southern Chinese. They had maintained more of their northern ways as they had migrated to southern China at a later stage of Chinese history, about one thousand years ago, and after Cantonese was well established in the region. The Hakka are very interesting people in Chinese history. Most Chinese revolutionaries have been Hakka. They are seen as very creative, ambitious, and operating outside of the lines. Deng Xiaoping, for example, was a Hakka.

DONAHUE: Perhaps. Also because they were culturally distinct and they were frozen out of society in southern China, they maintained some element of secrecy and separate lines of communication with Hakkas in other parts of China. There were pockets in other parts of China, such as Sichuan Province in the country's interior. They communicated among themselves and had their own intelligence network. Therefore, they were sought after for Chinese intelligence operations because they were very adept at that. One of Linda's relatives, a Hakka, had been an intelligence officer in the Nationalist army. He was active when the Nationalists were being routed from the Mainland and Chiang Kai-shek decided to hold the island of Formosa. That relative ensured that his family was brought over from Guangdong into safety in Taiwan. Linda's family in America had maintained ties with them. So, some of the first people we saw when we arrived in Taipei were that uncle and aunt and their adult children, some of whom were older than we were. They were very welcoming and helped us get into life in Taiwan. Having a family connection there was very useful and allowed us to have the best of all possible worlds.

We would have enjoyed living in Taiwan and working in our embassy in Taipei, but I think my wife breathed a sigh of relief that we were not being assigned there because she did not feel comfortable being subjected to family pressure for granting visas or other consular-type favors. So, we had the best of all possible worlds because we were students, we were at an arm's distance from the embassy, in fact, living in another city. Therefore, the family couldn't really prevail on us to do any favors because we didn't have the ability to do that. It was very apparent that we were there as students, not as officers.

Q: What was the situation on Taiwan as you saw it? This would be 1977-1978.

DONAHUE: Right. Taiwan was already undergoing several transitions. It was apparent to me that they were going to fundamentally change how people approached life in Taiwan. It was an interesting period. My first trip to Taiwan was in 1970 when Chiang Kai-shek was still living, although perhaps not functioning very well physically. This was also during the height of the Vietnam War period. The American military presence was very apparent. We had used bases in Taiwan to help support our air and naval efforts towards Vietnam. On the one hand, there were no copyright laws or at least nobody paid any attention to them then, so you could buy English language books very cheaply. Everything was very cheap. You could live well for very little in Taiwan in 1970. But you also had almost the sense of an occupied country. At least that was my impression in Taipei. The American military presence was so great. There were a lot of English-speaking people, shopkeepers and so forth, but their orientation was to sell something to that military person. During 1977-1978, we lived in Taichung, a small city in the center of the island, a 4-hour drive south of Taipei. That was where the American Embassy Chinese Language School was located.

By that time, Chiang Kai-shek had died. His son, Chiang Ching-kuo, was the president. He was a Mainlander, but he had a different orientation than Chiang Kai-shek, partly because his mother was not Chinese, but Russian. He had had to work hard for acceptance by the Chinese at all. Chiang Kai-shek was never truly accepted on Taiwan because the Taiwanese people saw him as having taken away a good thing. Taiwan was one of the very few parts of the Japanese empire that did not chafe under Japanese rule. It had been lost from China in 1895 and taken away from Japan in 1945, so it had been ruled by Japan for 50 years. The Japanese had treated the Taiwanese very well. It was like an agricultural colony for Japan. All of the people who had been through schooling in Taiwan knew Japanese and didn't know Mandarin Chinese. They spoke their own Chinese dialect at home, Southern Fujianese dialect, whose spoken form is quite different from Mandarin. The written language was based on classical Chinese, not modern Mandarin. So, there was really very poor communication and very little meeting of the minds between Chiang Kai-shek and the Mainlanders he brought with him to Taiwan to administer Taiwan and the Taiwanese, who really preferred the kind of colonial relationship they had had with Japan. Chiang Kai-shek issued a number of very draconian laws forbidding the use of Japanese and prohibiting the importation of Japanese-language printed materials. Everyone must learn Chinese. The language of instruction in high schools must be Mandarin. A number of traditional forms of Chinese government were either reintroduced into Taiwan or were enervated by the state. Chief among them was Confucianism as a state religion to supplant Shintoism, which would have held a similar position as a state-sponsored religion under Japanese rule. Confucian temples were abounding and a lot of money was given to Confucianism. Major museums of Chinese culture were built, including the wonderful National Palace Museum in Taipei. A great deal of effort was made to convince the Taiwanese that, in fact, they were part of the Chinese orbit culturally. The government strove hard to get them to speak modern Mandarin publicly and use that as the language of administration.

Chiang Ching-kuo was much more relaxed about culture. Under his rule – and I think he was seen as quite benevolent and better liked by the Taiwanese – Southern Fujian dialect (Minnanyu) was used more in public. Chiang Ching-kuo understood that people wanted to be able to speak in public the language they speak at home. Under his period, there were television shows and soap operas broadcast in Southern Fujian dialect. They would have been totally forbidden under Chiang Kai-shek. So, the society relaxed a little bit. Also, Taiwan's economy really hit "takeoff" and things started clicking. Big buildings were put up. Chiang Ching-kuo had a series of 10 great projects -- large infrastructure projects for which there was a sound economic need. Some of them were undoubtedly dual-use – airports, highways, seaports. They were part of defending Taiwan. It was a military defense. But they also had a practical commercial value. I think putting those projects in place really allowed Taiwan to have the economic success that it has today.

Q: I assume you were absorbing things through your teachers.

DONAHUE: Yes. Cornell-trained Charles "Chick" Sheehan was the linguist in charge of the Taichung School. A real character, he had been sidelined to Vietnamese training for much of the 1970s and was delighted to get back to his love – the Chinese language. He strongly encouraged field trips and other outings with the teachers, as well as social gatherings in which we used our Chinese. Other State Department students in Taichung were Neil Silver, Richard Boucher and Michael Klosson. One service member, Air Force Capt. Lawrence Mitchell, subsequently served in Hong Kong, Beijing and Taipei.

Q: Did you have the feeling that Taiwan was moving places and that Mainland China was far away and over the horizon? Were you all fixed at all on Mainland China?

DONAHUE: Well, it was surreal. I go back to learning Chinese at FSI. When you start out with a new language, you feel like you are a kindergartner or a first grader and you move up. In terms of our level of language ability, we were probably at upper years of elementary school when we left FSI and junior high when we got to Taiwan with the hopes that we would emerge from high school by the end of that year. Here in Washington, the teachers who taught us had left the mainland and severed connections with it in the late 1940s. We were probably the last generation of FS students to have had all of our teachers be those who had worked for the U.S. Army or U.S. government in some way on Mainland China during World War II or immediately following it. The China Mainland they remembered had been swept away by the Communists. What they knew was definitely an old China. However, the orientation of our studies was toward the Mainland, not Taiwan. At that time, the People's Republic prohibited the export of certain items, including banknotes, the money they used. It was simply illegal to take them out. But of course, we have our ways and through our intelligence apparatus, some of these notes had been taken out. Part of our instruction at FSI was to learn language using modules where we would be going to a store and making a purchase and we had to have some money to exchange. So, FSI copied the Mainland Chinese banknotes so that we would have something to do that with. Also, under Mao, a process that began in the 1950s as an effort to improve literacy, China adopted a new series of characters referred to as "simplified" characters. A student of Chinese must know about 3,500 characters to read a high quality newspaper. Not all of those characters had been simplified. But about 2,000 of them have a simplified version. So, we began at FSI learning the so-called traditional or "old style" characters, as well as the corresponding simplified characters. That meant that we really needed to know 4,500-5,000 characters to be considered "literate."

Outside of our language school in Taiwan, you would never see simplified characters or any books from the Mainland. Their use might be treasonous. Our house was considered an extension of our language school because if we were going to do homework, we had to have some of these Mainland language materials. The first time my wife's relatives came to visit us in Taichung, they were shocked when they saw our bookshelves. They were seeing materials that were definitely forbidden in Taiwan. It gave a surreal quality to what we were learning.

Another strange feature about language learning in Taiwan was the challenge of using Mandarin in public. When we were learning Chinese in Washington, our teachers would arrange opportunities for us to speak Mandarin. We would go to a restaurant where the owner was known to be a Mandarin speaker, or go to a museum and have a special tour by a Mandarin-speaking curator. In Taiwan, outside of the school building, the language we heard on the street was Southern Fujian dialect. So, we were in a country learning one language where we could use it on the street if we initiated the conversation, but even so, we could only expect to speak Mandarin with people of a certain age. Generally, only those who graduated from high school after 1955 were really fluent in Mandarin. So, there was an artificial element to this. People working in our embassy in Taipei, when they dealt with government officials, would use Mandarin. That was the language of government. But we were not doing that. Our main interaction with people was shopkeepers, some commercial transaction, a restaurant, a barber, and we felt like fish out of water. Although our language ability in Mandarin improved, it didn't help us figure out how we could live our daily lives more easily.

Q: That's where the fun is.

DONAHUE: Right. So, it was a bizarre experience.

The other thing was, the language teachers in Taichung, who also were of the same generation as those at FSI, people who had worked for the American forces on Mainland China before 1949, whose knowledge of Mainland China had been even more frozen in time. What they knew of contemporary China was heavily colored by the Nationalist propaganda they had been exposed to in Taiwan. However, because of their lifestyles, some of our teachers in Taiwan were more reminiscent of Mainland China in the 1920s and 1930s than we could have encountered anywhere else on earth. They were that Chinese literati class that really no longer exists. From them, we learned much about the traditional Chinese aesthetic, from “polite language” to “grass writing.” The men teachers were truly “Chinese Gentlemen Scholars” from another era.

Q: Today is May 24, 2000. We're in 1978. You left Taipei and you're off to Hong Kong.

DONAHUE: That's right. Staying in Taiwan for a minute, I'd like to describe some of the characteristics of Taiwan at that time and contrast them with Hong Kong. Taiwan has subsequently changed a very great deal, as our relationship with it has changed. I was a member of the last class at the American Embassy School of Language Studies in Taichung, Taiwan, to graduate while we still maintained diplomatic relations with Taiwan holding the seat of China in the UN. There were many, many changes following my departure from that school. The school itself subsequently was moved to the outskirts of Taipei. Purposely, the State Department had located the language school in Taichung, which was a rather small city, instead of Taipei because they did not want the embassy to look upon us students as a pool of workers who could be pressed into use to fill their needs. We were to be kept quite separate from the embassy staff. On the other hand, we relied on the embassy for administrative-type functions. So, there were two or three times during the year when we had to make the trip to Taipei to visit personnel, to square things away with the embassy in one way or another. We found the embassy very efficient and almost working on a military footing partly because U.S. military bases occupied large parts of downtown Taipei in those days. So, there was an American Air Force base right next to the civilian air facility terminal. On the main road going from downtown Taipei to the famous National Palace Hotel, both sides had U.S. military bases, including an officers club and commissary. All of that subsequently changed entirely in the year following my departure from Taiwan so that we were part of the last of an era. Even while we were there, it was very apparent that Taiwan had grown a lot and the nature of its economy was changing a great deal. There was a sense of great economic dynamism. All of that having been said, however, there was a world of difference between Taiwan and Hong Kong. Although my wife and I felt that we would have benefitted a great deal from having a follow-on assignment in Taipei, certainly it would have cemented our Mandarin being in a situation where we had to use it on a regular basis, nevertheless, we were very much looking forward to our assignment to Hong Kong, which was then and remains now truly an international city. The orientation of our jobs was very much to China, which was a much bigger fish than Taiwan. So, we left Taiwan very much looking forward to working in the realm of China relations, not knowing for sure, but having an expectation that, finally during the course of our tour in Hong Kong, the U.S. government would indeed shift the recognition of China from Taiwan to the People's Republic.

Q: This was the shoe that everyone was expecting to drop.

DONAHUE: That's right. As we were leaving Taiwan, all of our social contacts with Taiwanese had that sense of anticipation. Was there anything we could tell them about when this decision would be made? There was a lot of expectation and concern because no one anticipated the Taiwan Relations Act that would essentially allow us to more or less continue our relations with Taiwan as before.

Q: The real feeling was that they were expecting to be really cast adrift?

DONAHUE: That's right. There was a lot involved with the sense of the loss of national recognition. A lot of it had to do with the Chinese sense of face, that they would lose their face internationally. They were very concerned about maintaining their trade relations and their economic well being.

Q: What about your wife's family relations?

DONAHUE: There are several different kinds of people living in Taiwan. There are actually Aboriginal people related to the Polynesians and similar to the people of the Philippines. They are island Malays, a distinct minority. The people that most English speakers refer to as native Taiwanese are in fact people of Chinese ancestry whose families migrated to Taiwan since the 1700s. They mostly came from the southern part of Fujian Province on the Mainland of China and speak Southern Fujian dialect. It's written in Chinese characters, but the spoken language is as different from Mandarin as German from French. It almost represents a different language family. So, those are the people who are referred to as native Taiwanese.

My wife did not have any relatives among them. Her relatives were so-called Mainland Chinese who migrated to Taiwan with Chiang Kai-shek's armies following WWII. It was a harrowing experience for them. My wife's mother was a Hakka from Meih sien County in the northeastern part of Guangdong Province. The Hakka people are probably originally (2,000 years ago) from the Yellow River Valley in northern China and migrated to the south after the culture of Guangdong Province had become established. They were seen as interlopers, refugees from the north. They were never fully accepted into southern Chinese society. For a number of reasons, they maintained their distinction, so their language is different, their customs are different. The women, for example, never bound their feet. They remained apart from the dominant society of the south. Sort of like the Medicis or other people in Renaissance Europe, they maintained family ties with other groups of Hakkas elsewhere in China. Hakka people were very prominent in financial affairs, having run a kind of banking industry throughout China over the last 1,000 years. The Hakka also were mainstays of so-called secret societies and brotherhoods, many of which had a political dimension and were active in the 20th century revolutions and civil wars.

Q: More like the Masons were in Western Europe in the last couple of centuries.

DONAHUE: That is correct. The Hakka group's secret societies played an important role at the end of the Ming Dynasty and the Ching Dynasty. A foreign group known as the Manchus ruled the Ching Dynasty in China. The Hakkas also played a significant role in the downfall of the Ching Dynasty and the early period of the Republic. Furthermore, the Hakkas played a role in the communist uprising in China, and Chiang Kai-shek used Hakkas on his staff. He probably largely relied on Hakkas in his intelligence network and secret police network. One of my wife's uncles was in fact a general in Chiang Kai-shek's army involved in intelligence.

Q: At the very end there, did you find that the group, including your wife's family, but others, were looking to meld into the Taiwanese population? Were they looking to get the hell out? How was this group getting ready to deal with the situation?

DONAHUE: As a group, the Mainlanders who had migrated to Taiwan following WWII never felt fully accepted by the so-called native Taiwanese, the majority of the population. Under Chiang Kai-shek, the Mainlanders held a privileged position, and indeed, they dominated most high level government positions. As time progressed and the native Taiwanese got wealthier and got more political power under Chiang Kai-shek's son, the relative power of the Mainlanders waned. I think a lot of the immigration to the United States and to Australia from Taiwan has been Mainlanders realizing that their prospects on Taiwan were very limited. They felt they would be better off moving on to someplace where they would be given greater scope. At the time we were in Taiwan, Linda's uncle and aunt were still living. They were very elderly. They had a very large family, eight adult children and two still in high school then. All of them aspired to leave Taiwan. Subsequently, almost all of them did. Two family members continue to live and maintain businesses in Taiwan. However, most of the family went abroad for advanced university degrees and then subsequently either went into business or entered a profession while maintaining their lives outside of Taiwan.

Q: You were in Hong Kong from 1978 to when?

DONAHUE: 1978-1981. That was a defining period for our relations with China. It also was a major period of decision making for what to do with our consulate general in Hong Kong. Hong Kong had been a rather insignificant part of the British Empire for most of the 20th century up until WWII. From the 1890s to WWII, the main city in East Asia was Shanghai, and it had the bulk of British and other foreign presence. That was the economically dynamic region. Hong Kong, while it remained very important as a major port, nevertheless really had no industry. So, what gave Hong Kong its industrial base was the flight of refugees from Mainland China into Hong Kong in the early 1950s, as many of those businesspeople were forced to leave China. Most of the refugees in that early period were the so-called capitalists or what the communists termed "bourgeoisie." They took out whatever resources they could, as well as their skills. Many of the refugees from Shanghai established the textiles industry in Hong Kong, its economic mainstay for much of the '50s and '60s. When we arrived in Hong Kong, the early period of the shock of foreign recognition of Mainland China had already subsided. So, Hong Kong business and the Hong Kong population had gotten used to the fact that western countries were rebuilding their relations with China. However, the U.S. had not yet made that decision. So, there was a lot of expectation, not apprehension, but expectation that once the U.S. did indeed recognize Mainland China, it would be ultimately good for Hong Kong because a lot more business would flow through Hong Kong to China. There were many reasons to believe that. Hong Kong had become the main entrepot for China trade. Probably Hong Kong was responsible for as much as 80% of China's foreign exchange earnings. Many foreign countries would not or could not ship to the port of Shanghai. So, a lot of Chinese goods would go by lighters or coastal vessels from Shanghai to Hong Kong to be placed on international ships.

The British government in Hong Kong had evolved during the course of the '50s and '60s, and by the late '70s there was a maturation process. During that period, from 1950-1980, Hong Kong's population increased about three times. So, during the '50s, which was the greatest period of the influx of refugees, the Hong Kong government had been mainly concerned with how to house these people, how to provide normal city services like schools and water supplies to the new areas that were being built. That was consolidated during the '60s. However, the '60s was a period of great tension in Hong Kong because of the Cultural Revolution taking place on the other side of the border, the flow of another group of refugees, and the concern that Red Guard or similar political activities would cross the border into Hong Kong. There was a feeling of tension. For a period during that time, the Red Guard effectively controlled the Portuguese enclave of Macau on the south side of the mouth of the Pearl River. It was only with great patience and concern and close coordination with the government in Beijing that Red Guard control was ended and the Portuguese were allowed to retain a fig leaf of rule over Macau. It never got that bad in Hong Kong, but nevertheless the Hong Kong government was greatly challenged during that period. There were times when it could not provide a sufficient supply of drinking water to the inhabitants of Hong Kong. They were concerned about power shortages and so forth. That ended by the '70s.

Q: We really want to talk about 1978-1981. Who was consul general, what were you doing, what was the situation?

DONAHUE: At the time that we arrived in Hong Kong, the consul general was Thomas Shoesmith, who had been DCM in Tokyo and was a member of the so-called "Chrysanthemum Club" in the State Department. Virtually all of his foreign assignments had involved Japan, and he did not speak Chinese. It was perhaps by happenstance that he was assigned to Hong Kong. I guess the Bureau owed him something. Perhaps there wasn't the expectation that our relations with China would be affected to the extent that they were during the period of his assignment there. Interestingly, he subsequently became ambassador to Malaysia. Shoesmith was highly regarded and extraordinarily knowledgeable on Japan and the U.S. strategic relationship with Japan. However, he really did not have a background in Chinese affairs nor was he particularly knowledgeable about our relations with China as they were to develop. However, that was also a strength. He didn't have preconceived notions. He was willing to ask for guidance and ideas and took them on board very well and cogitated a lot before determining action. So, he was a kind of broker of options that were put forth by various agencies when the questions arose as to what to do with the consulate in Hong Kong. When I arrived in Hong Kong, I was assigned to what was then called the China Reporting Unit. I have to go back a little bit in history to explain the significance of that and then describe what subsequently happened to it.

Hong Kong had truly been insignificant up until the end of WWII and then it became a staging area for American military operations once it had been recaptured back from Japan (it had been occupied by Japan during WWII). Hong Kong became extremely important to both Britain and the U.S. in the 1950s as Mainland China was taken over by the communists and most foreign delegations were forced to leave China, with the exception of the British. Of the main Western European countries, only Britain retained a presence in China continuously. The British Government did this in part because it felt the need to safeguard its presence in Hong Kong. The other western countries increasingly recognized the value of Hong Kong, as well. The U.S. considerably beefed up our operations there. Hong Kong became very important as a source of intelligence and analysis on China for the U.S. and for Britain during the early 1950s for the Korean War, and in the 1960s for the Vietnam War. It was also an excellent location from which to follow the North Koreans, the Russians, and the Vietnamese. Hong Kong became a significant collection center because it was right there on the coast of China. It was easier to get information than any other place.

The China Reporting Unit was composed of a very unusual group of people, including highly talented FS nationals, some of whom, like David Wong, had actually worked for the U.S. Consulate General in Shanghai during WWII. He was one of the last people who closed our consulate in Shanghai and fled the city when the communists were telling foreigners they had only a limited time to remain. So, David and some of the other people at the consulate, like Vincent Li, literally brought papers with them as well as other belongings from our Consulate General in Shanghai. We had a sizeable library of works on and about China written by Chinese and foreign scholars. We had incredible and extensive files of various kinds of happenings in China. David Wong and others of his generation essentially established the filing system that allowed us to track what was going on in China. I know that various places in Washington had some of the same materials, similar materials anyway, but I think that we would have had to visit several such facilities in Washington, whereas they were all together in Hong Kong. So, Hong Kong became a kind of analyst's paradise. Even as late as the 1970s, it was visited frequently by Washington-based analysts to pick the brain of David Wong and Vincent Li. They could find immediately what the analyst was looking for. The reason why this was so very important was, a kind of theology has developed in the world of Marxism and governments claiming to follow Marxist ideology. Certain terms have a particular meaning and they are often associated with people in the leadership. I'm sure in Russia there were terms or ideas that were associated with Lenin as opposed to Trotsky. In the Chinese context, there were similar ideas. There were ones associated with Mao, with Deng Xiaoping. One of the aspects of the analytical function was to very carefully read Mainland press and look for trends or changes in content that would indicate which leader might be coming to the fore or which political line would seem to be most influential at a given period. People like David Wong were past masters at detecting those ideas. David's strength was economic. His political counterpart was Vincent Li. Both of them had reputations that caused people in Washington to really follow what their thinking was. They were that important. So, the China Reporting Unit was one of the places to be assigned, and it was considered quite a feather in one's cap to be part of the staff. It was a learning experience as much as a job for us to accomplish.

Q: 1978-1981. What was the situation in China as seen by you all?

DONAHUE: When I began studying Chinese in 1976, Chairman Mao had just died. There was the expectation that China could return to a more liberal or pragmatic approach to politics following his death. We had not really expected the subsequent Gang of Four period that lasted for about two years. About the time I was leaving Taiwan and going to Hong Kong in the summer of 1978, the Gang of Four was arrested. At the very time that I arrived in Hong Kong, there were trials for the members of the Gang of Four. These were show trials and were televised by Chinese TV. We were able to pick up that in Hong Kong and we watched the trials in real time. We also taped them. That way, we could watch the tape as a group, stop it periodically, and discuss the import. So, among the first few weeks that I was working in Hong Kong, it was very exciting because we knew that we were witnessing an historical period. We did not know precisely what the outcome was going to be. Deng Xiaoping had been reinstated, which was his third resurrection politically. But he was not particularly well known or understood. There were debates on the extent to which he would reintroduce Maoist-type policies, whether he would carry out more pragmatic policies. There was also some apprehension as the trial of the Gang of Four unfolded as to whether they themselves would garner popular support and make it difficult for the mainstream communist authorities to continue to pursue a criminal case against them. But the Chinese government was very astute in staging the TV show trials and arranging testimony from people who had been directly and awfully affected by the excesses of the Cultural Revolution. Many of those witnesses were able to finger specifically one or another member of the Gang of Four. This totally discredited them. This was over a period of some months. So, it got wide coverage in China and a political pulse reading was taken at that time. I would say by November of 1978, we were beginning to realize that indeed a new era was taking shape in China, that Deng Xiaoping was consolidating his power, that the period of excess under Mao and the Gang of Four was over, and that China was getting ready to take a more pragmatic approach. Also, Beijing began really welcoming foreign investment. Already, it had engaged in foreign trade. However, it was a major step politically and ideologically to actually permit foreigners to own property in China. It was even more threatening to the leadership to permit foreign firms to employ workers in China. This was a big step for them, a major concession to capitalism for a country that until then had not recognized individual property rights. The concept of Chinese people working for a capitalist enterprise was just anathema ideologically.

Q: What were we seeing during this time, the China watchers? Were they concerned about where we might go?

DONAHUE: I think that this is one of the strengths of the China Reporting Unit that we maintained in Hong Kong at the time. We had files that went back probably to the 1930s, including some files that had been carted out of Shanghai. People like Vincent Li and David Wong went back into that material to research extensively the biographies of Deng Xiaoping and the other people he was bringing back into government. So, we looked very carefully at the period when Deng Xiaoping had lived in Paris, which was in the 1930s. We looked very carefully at what we had known about Deng Xiaoping in the '50s and '60s before he had been imprisoned for a period during the Cultural Revolution. We looked at why he had been placed on Mao's enemies list, what Mao had seen in him that he didn't like. Going back to a point that I made earlier, Deng Xiaoping was a Hakka. He had been on the communist side rather than the Nationalist side during the civil war. Nevertheless, he was part of this Hakka family network and there were Hakkas we knew who could shed a little bit of light on what Deng's thinking or likely operations would be. What we saw was that Deng had maintained contact during the period of his disgrace with a number of people who had been pragmatic thinkers in the 1950s and there had been a period in the 1950s in China when China had done something similar to what Lenin did in Russia in the late teens and early '20s. In Russia, it was called the New Economic Program. Lenin had allowed a level of capitalist enterprise to be maintained. In China, there was a similar period in the early 1950s, when Mao had allowed certain types of capitalist activity. He had divided the capitalist society into two groups. One was called the large bourgeoisie, the other the small bourgeoisie. The large bourgeoisie, with capitalization valued at hundreds of thousands of dollars, were the owners of factories. These were the major enterprises that the state decided to nationalize. It was because of that policy that many of those factory owners from Shanghai had fled to places like Hong Kong. But the so-called “small bourgeoisie,” the people who owned small storefront shops, restaurants, various services, were permitted to maintain their operations. There was no problem for them as long as they did not employ people from outside their family. However, this was not a problem culturally. Typically, Chinese never felt comfortable employing people outside their family except in very menial positions. They certainly would not invite people from outside their family to keep their books or have deep insight into their financial situation or their business operations because they didn’t want competition. So, this worked in China. It worked until the period of the Cultural Revolution. During the Cultural Revolution, however, even these small businesses were wiped out. In big cities like Guangzhou, that had thousands and thousands of restaurants, they were reduced to only four restaurants for a population of five million people.

So, what we anticipated was that Deng was going to revive this low-level capitalism. Indeed, that’s what happened. Of course, it took years to actually bring back this activity. China’s economy actually shrank during the Cultural Revolution. There was incredible demand, but insufficient production, of certain items, including most consumer goods. During the waning years of the Cultural Revolution and up through the time that I was in Hong Kong, ration coupons were required to buy mainstays in China. That included not just food but also low-level industrial products such as a fan, a radio, and a bicycle. Therefore, there really weren’t products that small shopkeepers could buy that would allow them to maintain their shops. So, Deng Xiaoping faced a number of problems. He had to increase agricultural production, increase industrial production, and make available products that could be marketed through retail operations at the grassroots level. He did accomplish this by bringing back into government and pressing into service people who had been discredited by Mao and considered Mao’s enemies during the ‘50s and ‘60s. But, it took several years for those people to be located and reestablished.

Q: During this period (You were there up through the second half of the carter administration and the full recognition of China), how did that impact on the consulate general?

DONAHUE: It impacted in a number of ways. First of all, there were opportunities for us to make official visits to Beijing that would include travel to other cities between Hong Kong and Beijing. The U.S. Liaison Office in Beijing asked us to string out our travels so that they wouldn’t have too many visitors at one time. They were very conscious of the need to not wear out anybody’s welcome and they wanted to manage us well, which is also a Mainland Chinese thing, to manage the foreigners. So, the timing of our travel to China was related to the date of our arrival in Hong Kong. Because my wife and I had arrived late in the summer, we were somewhat later on the list for making our trips to China. Some of the people in the office were making their orientation trips to China during that fall, talking with the liaison office, and getting a sense that the shoe was ready to drop. Even so, it was a considerable surprise to us.

I remember being at a Christmas party at the home of Stan Brooks, the head of the China Reporting Unit, in December 1978. It was a beautiful day and life was continuing on per usual. Then we got the news. I believe somebody called him from Washington or Beijing. “The President has announced that we are normalizing relations with China.” So, the party that had been a holiday party ended up being a kind of celebration of our new relationship with China.

We also spent the rest of that time, and indeed the rest of the month of December, ruminating about how our situation in Hong Kong might be affected. We knew that when the Liaison Office in Beijing was turned into the U.S. Embassy, there would be a great desire to make it a full-fledged embassy and to have it do everything that an embassy could do. We thought our whole unit might be moved to Beijing, lock, stock, and barrel.

Well, for a number of reasons, it didn't happen. But we had lots of meetings in the consulate where all of us had the opportunity to make our views known. This was another thing that perhaps was most unusual about how Hong Kong was run. Tom Shoesmith almost viewed us as a combination faculty on China, sounding board on what to do with China relations, and cabinet. All of us members of the China Reporting Unit were given equal standing to voice our opinion. He ran the consulate in a very collegial way. He did not rely exclusively on his section chief to advise him, but really wanted to hear all of our views. One by one, we would go over various themes. I remember contributing to speeches and drafting some speeches he made during that period when he was explaining to various groups in Hong Kong, business groups, groups of Chinese, perhaps even people in the Hong Kong government, what this particular move on the part of the U.S. Government meant for our presence in Hong Kong. He also needed to discuss its effect on our relations with Taiwan because there was considerable dissent about that. As well, our new recognition of the People's Republic had implications for our relations with other countries in East Asia like Japan, and the so-called balance of power in the region. At the time, although we were no longer involved in the Vietnam struggle, we still had a considerable U.S. military presence in South Korea.

Q: We had pulled out of Vietnam fully in 1975.

DONAHUE: You're right, but Hong Kong had been affected in several ways by Vietnam. There was a kind of dirty war going on in Vietnam and the rest of Southeast Asia. There were all kinds of things going on in Cambodia. There was a quasi-military tangle between Cambodia and Thailand that involved U.S. military and other parts of the U.S. Government. We had a Vietnam watcher-type position in Bangkok looking at Indochina from that side, but we also had an equivalent position in Hong Kong looking at the operation from Hong Kong's side. The person in that position is still living in the Washington area and is very much involved in foreign affairs: Charles Lahiguera. I believe he served in Bangkok as well. He was a very astute political officer, and his job involved looking at Vietnam. He also looked at what North Korea was doing in this area. There was concern on that score, as well. Because Shoesmith had served in Japan, he was looked to by a number of people in the Hong Kong community and the Hong Kong government for a readout on how our new recognition of China might affect our relationship with Japan. There had been a feeling in some quarters that as we renewed our relationship with China, we would diminish somehow our relationship with Japan. There was also a concern about whether China would seek for us to minimize our presence in South Korea, whether China would press forward more vehemently to bring about reunion with Taiwan. So, all of those issues were up in the air at that time. They were a matter of debate within the consulate as well as in Washington.

Typical for being assigned overseas, you are aware of but not always completely knowledgeable about debates taking place in Washington. A lot of times, decisions are made in Washington without necessarily involving the post. So, I would say from December 1978 through about May of '79, many of us had the expectation that we would just be reassigned to Beijing. None of us frankly expected at that time what subsequently happened.

In Beijing, the U.S. was Johnny Come Lately. I think the fact that we were so late in our recognition of the Beijing government in comparison with other Western governments made it inevitable that we would be further delayed in bringing our embassy in Beijing up to full status. There was a shortage of everything in China, really a great shortage. Because Beijing was a government city, the government provided all municipal services. That means not just a single municipal water and sewer supply, but the provision of heat was based on a city steam plant and things like that. So, even though we could get a plot of land that the Foreign Ministry would allow us to have to build on, it was on the outskirts of town and not part of their plan to be supplied with heat for another 10 years or so. The better plots, the ones that were already connected to that city grid, had already been taken based on order of recognition. So, we truly lost out. Our tiny liaison office building simply was not sufficient to handle the large number of people and multifarious agencies that would want to be in Beijing during a period of normal relations. Everything had to be done. So, in the end, our embassy was able to obtain a series of buildings on two different compounds several blocks away from the liaison office. It was certainly not an ideal situation. But it became sort of adequate. One of the buildings had been the former Pakistani embassy that was moving to newer, better quarters. We had to refit it and it sort of worked but was never adequate. Then the other compound was where we put administrative, consular, and embassy community functions. It was never adequate either, and they are probably still adding a little room here, there, and the other place. But these were all fixes and they are not a true solution. Just refitting the Pakistani embassy required another year or two to make enough room for people. There was a severe housing problem for diplomats; the embassy could not add personnel as rapidly as it wanted to.

So, a kind of division of responsibilities came into being. First of all, even though we maintained the China Reporting Unit at least initially, we changed its nature fundamentally. We split it into an economic section and a political section. The China Reporting Unit officers were split so that Stan Brooks, Ray Burghardt and Neil Silver went to the Political Section, and John Moddero, Kaarn Weaver and I went to the Economic Section. At that time, we were only concerned about political relations with China, not with Hong Kong. The Political Section essentially was a China Political Section. The Economic Section had some people dealing with our relations with Hong Kong with the expectation that China trade would increase. However, it was expected there would be a lot of Hong Kong-related work involved. So, the China economic unit was analytical, and the Hong Kong economic unit was primarily commercial. At that time, the Foreign Commercial Service function was still part of the State Department, so this was not a problem. However, all of this changed during the period I was in Hong Kong. It seemed like every year we had a reorganization and we went through a number of different section chiefs and so forth. By the time I left Hong Kong, the Foreign Commercial Service had been taken over by the Commerce Department and had moved out of our unit physically, operationally and bureaucratically. Therefore, what had been the China Reporting Unit, global in its scope and providing close collaboration between economic and political officers, became much more stratified and separate and our orientation diverged. But we were also in a way backstopping Beijing. We were doing things that our embassy in Beijing could not do, so they were tasking us for research that they knew only we could do.

Q: I suppose too at this point your Chinese national staff in Hong Kong were highly skilled and were not about to go to Beijing anyway. You had the expertise and all there that could not be duplicated somewhere else.

DONAHUE: This was true. At that time and even now, we cannot hire FS national employees in China. The Chinese employees of foreign embassies are in fact employees of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs who are seconded for assignment to a particular foreign embassy and the foreign embassy pays their salary by contract. They can be yanked out at any time and they usually are recycled on a fairly regular basis. In fact, it's like employing a spy in your operation so you have to keep them at arm's length. By the time they're trained and are helpful, they're taken out and you have to train somebody else. I think that the people in our embassy in Beijing recognized early on that this was going to be the pattern and that we had a resource in Hong Kong that they could use and they needed to use. We had people in Hong Kong who, in reading a newspaper and especially the editorials in People's Daily or Guangming Daily, could immediately remember that a given phrase recalled something from the 1950s. These FSNs knew which leader had been involved and they knew what policy could flow out of that. So, we had a capability of forecasting that people in our embassy in Beijing simply did not have and would never have.

However, State Department Security interjected itself and forced some changes on our operations in Hong Kong. Together with the other bureaucratic changes, these fundamentally altered how we worked. In the days of the China Reporting Unit, the entire unit had been on a single floor. The Americans worked right next door to FS national employees. We saw each other all the time. We had meetings throughout the day. We were in each other's offices all the time. I would say we jointly drafted analytical pieces. Yes, only officers had access to classified information. A lot of times – of course, this was an era before computers – a cable or other kind of report drafted by a FS national employee would come to us and we would intersperse paragraphs that were classified that they would never see. Although we would be responsible for the whole piece, the bulk of the report might be mostly their work. Sometime during this period of 1978-1981, State Department Security decided it would not work for us to be located together. They wanted all of the FS national employees to be on other floors in the consulate and for the Americans to operate behind a hard line. So, we had to make a major shift in our operations. Although we remained very friendly and we had to work with each other, it became a bit of a chore. We had to travel between floors. The national employees had to ring a bell or call in advance to get into our office space. It did alter how we were working. As a result, not right away, but over time, some of the longer serving FS nationals who were among the most skilled and had the most institutional memory of the staff ended up retiring. By the end of the time that I was in Hong Kong, 1981, what was left of the China Reporting Unit staff had been weakened. We had a new generation. They were people who had not been born in China and did not have the sense of familiarity with the Chinese countryside as the people who had departed.

I cannot overemphasize the importance to the U.S. Government of Hong Kong as a listening post on China and other parts of the Asian mainland. Hong Kong was a safe, convenient location, with a solid and supportive government, all of which encouraged the activities of a strong resident China-watching group. This included some knowledgeable expatriate businesspeople, foreign and Hong Kong Chinese academics, non-governmental organizations, and journalists. Although Hong Kong is a big city (4.5 million population), the foreign community, and especially the China watchers, frequently saw each other. There were well-established lines of communication, and many venues for the sharing of knowledge and views. These encounters included meetings of the American Chamber of Commerce's China Commercial Relations Committee, the Foreign Correspondents Club, the Hong Kong General Chamber of Commerce, and various receptions and lunches around town, as well as university lectures.

During both of my assignments to Hong Kong (1978-81 and 1989-92), I was privileged to be invited to participate in the Williamsburg Group. This was a handpicked "club" of no more than 20 China watchers who met monthly for dinner. I believe the original meeting had taken place in the Williamsburg room of a club and so the name stuck even though the meeting place changed many times. During my tours in Hong Kong, the group usually met at the Foreign Correspondents Club. During my second tour, I was the only one from the American Consulate General who received the coveted invitation; all the other participants were in the private sector, working for companies or themselves, or else academics or journalists. The meetings were conducted in English and the main rule was that all discussion would be kept confidential. Journalists and others who wrote for the public were not allowed to attribute any views to the participants. These rules became more important in the run-up to 1997, when people became more concerned about how they might be treated by China or the future Hong Kong Government. I found the discussion at these meetings extremely important to my understanding of events in China, helpful to my reporting and analysis, and invaluable as a way to bounce ideas off seasoned professionals.

Unfortunately, my Hong Kong contacts inform me that the China watching community has dwindled significantly since 1997, which caused many of my former colleagues to leave Hong Kong, for retirement or professional relocation. While some of them moved to Beijing or Shanghai, and are doubtless able to maintain their professional activities there, they may not feel so free to voice their views in settings on the Mainland as they were in Hong Kong during the "good old days" of China watching from a short distance.

Q: What about cooperation with the British and the French in Hong Kong?

DONAHUE: We have, generally speaking, an outstanding working relationship with the British. Perhaps just one rung below are our relations with other English-speaking countries like Canada, Australia, and New Zealand, where we share a very great deal of information. Up until the period when we first established our liaison office in Beijing, we relied almost exclusively on the British to give us a readout of what was taking place in China. The French also had a presence in Beijing, but we have never had the degree of closeness with the French in terms of information sharing that we have with the British. There were times during the Cultural Revolution when even those countries' embassies in China were quite small and there were some weeks when they were advised by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs not to leave their premises. So, even they didn't always know and could not always follow the scene of what was taking place in China. Up until the point when we formally recognized China, we had a very close relationship with the British and I would say there was no conflict and no competition. What they could not supply, sometimes we could through signals intelligence and so forth. So, we had a really hand in glove relationship.

This did begin to change with normalization. The Chinese made a distinction that was very important. We could buy things from China and they would probably buy a few things from the United States, even before normalized relations. But the Chinese had made it very clear from the outset that a full trading relationship would not be possible until we had established a full diplomatic relationship. So, with the establishment of our embassy came an incredible outpouring of interest on the part of American companies in doing business of various types with China. It sort of coincided with the beginning of loosening up in terms of China's overall policy under Deng Xiaoping and a welcoming of foreign investment permission for foreigners to enter into contracts with Chinese enterprises and permission to establish joint venture industrial operations. Of course, American companies were reading about this in the newspaper and they wanted to have part of the action. I think the British and other Europeans chafed at this. There was a feeling that they had been there longer, they had suffered in their relations with China during the period when it was very difficult to live and work in China, and their companies ought to be able to take advantage of these opportunities. They saw Americans as Johnny Come Latelies, wanting to take advantage of an opportunity, and crowding them out. So, there was a sense of competition that we had not had before in our relations with Britain. I saw this competitive sense not only in the period of 1978-1981, but also later when I served in Hong Kong, 1989-1992, in what was getting to be the waning years of British presence there. The British were trying to extract as much commercial benefit as possible from their relationship with China and they really saw U.S. business as wanting to take that away. This was unfortunate, and it did affect our ability to cooperate in some other areas.

Getting back to the French, I never personally found the French very useful or helpful. Perhaps some of the political officers did, but I don't think we had a high regard for French knowledge of China. We had a high regard for Australian knowledge. Australia was gaining a great deal of expertise. Australia and New Zealand had been quite shaken economically and politically when Britain joined the Common Market in the early 1960s because those countries had had a preferential trade relationship with Britain before that. One of the consequences of Britain's joining the Common Market was a trade shift favoring the continent over its former colonies. So, Australia and New Zealand at that point recognized that where they were located geographically had to dictate the countries which were going to be the most important to them politically and economically. Australia was the first Western country to develop agricultural trade with China, a grain deficit nation.

The Australians really made the most of the growing international diplomatic changes with China and they established relations between their academic institutions, their trading institutions, and so forth. There was a constant stream of Australian academics and politicians. On their way to Beijing, they would stop in Hong Kong. In fact, we had a very useful exchange with several of the academics over time, and some members of our staff had indeed studied under some of those academics at Australian National University before American universities could have similar exchanges. So, we got a lot from that relationship.

We also got some benefit from our diplomatic colleagues in the Japanese mission. Japan had also developed a trading and economic relationship with China, and was one of the first countries to provide foreign assistance to China. Since Japan had linguistic, cultural and historical associations with China, it was somewhat easier for them to understand what was going on there. Also, the Japanese are meticulous in recording details. The Japanese Economic Trade Organization [JETRO] provided many how-to manuals for Japanese business to know what to do in China. These were updated on a regular basis. They were able to do things that the U.S. government was never and probably will never be able to do. The Japanese government does both pre- and post-trip briefings of their businesspeople. So, when a business delegation was going to China, government officials would tell them what to look for. When they returned to Japan, the officials would debrief them and ask whom they saw and what they thought about them. Were the Chinese officials at an appropriate level? Were they decision makers? Questions like these. So, these how-to manuals (mind you, only in Japanese) gave a great deal of information about which Chinese official in which ministry was actually the key decision maker. The manuals advised the best people to deal with at each stage of a business transaction. This is one reason why Japanese business became so successful. They knew how to do this. I was fortunate to obtain such a manual from a JETRO colleague. I do not know Japanese, but I was able to provide it to consulate colleagues who do. They were able to glean some very important political insights. We did not turn around and universally make this information available to our businesspeople, certainly not in the degree of detail that the Japanese did. But in our overall briefings to American business, we were able to say, "We understand that in this ministry, certain people are important and the degree of importance does not necessarily match their title or where they are on the official organization chart" and so forth.

Q: Was the Commerce Department picking up the ball? So often, Commerce has not had a high reputation within the FS.

DONAHUE: In the case of China, I think it was somewhat different. This is because the State Department relatively early on, together with a group of politically connected businesspeople, had fostered the formation of the National Council for U.S.-China Trade (subsequently, the U.S.-China Business Council). I could not emphasize too much the importance of that organization in the early days of our relations with China. At that time, the National Council employed a number of people with a serious academic background in China at their offices in Washington and Hong Kong, and subsequently following our establishment of relations, in Beijing. The people they employed were outstanding. One of them, the person who headed their office in Hong Kong, was John Kamm. Despite the fact he appears to have a southern Chinese name, he is a Caucasian American married to a Chinese woman. He became probably the most knowledgeable person anywhere in the U.S. on certain Chinese industries – textiles, chemicals, petrochemicals, and minerals, in particular. There was a lot of strategic interest in what the Chinese were doing in those minerals. So, we tapped into his information. John subsequently became very interested in human rights in China and runs a non-governmental organization on that issue from his base in San Francisco.

The State Department also employed China experts on a contract basis. I'm not sure how they were able to do this. But one of those people, who ended up being assigned for a short period to the U.S. Liaison Office in Beijing and then subsequently the embassy, was a man named David Denny. I believe that, after his contract expired, he went to work for the National Council for U.S.-China Trade. But at that time, David Denny did the commercial work for the State Department in Beijing. He was John Kamm's counterpart in Beijing, the person that U.S. business people would go to for advice. Up until then, very few American businesspeople were able to go officially to Beijing, but some who did developed acquaintances in Chinese ministries and became very knowledgeable. Denny was the one who dealt with them. He was the one who followed the Canton Trade Fair activities from the standpoint of being resident on the Mainland. I should talk a little bit about this.

During the period of the Cultural Revolution, China, like all communist countries, still had to maintain some foreign trade. It could not be economically self-sufficient. However, China wanted to rigidly control foreign trade and, indeed all contact with foreigners. China also wanted to maximize its income from exports and needed to be very judicious about imports. So, it would very carefully predetermine the types of products that it would want to import and often would buy only one item, only one piece of machinery or product, with the idea that the government would turn that over to its engineers to try to reengineer it and be able to produce that kind of product in China. China's exports were mostly agricultural products and raw materials, mineral or other. China was not self-sufficient in raw materials production for its own industry. And, its production was not necessarily efficient on economic grounds. However, for national security needs, China would make available for export enough products to be able to pay for its imports.

That is how it maintained its economy during the Cultural Revolution. It conducted its foreign trade at two trade fairs held in the city of Guangzhou. They used the old name for Guangzhou, Canton. They were spring and fall affairs, one month long in each case. Sometimes they would be themed. One time, they were going to have a textile fair, but usually they would incorporate a number of items. Each four-week session was divided into two parts. Usually, the first two weeks were reserved for China's exports, and the latter two weeks were for China's imports. They would invite people from various foreign countries to attend. The invitee needed to have a personal invitation in hand to obtain a Chinese visa, and to make a reservation at the main hotel – the Dong Fang Hotel near the Trade Fair building. Prior to our establishing full diplomatic relations, very few Americans were invited to the trade fair. To the extent that American companies were able to sell anything to China, it was almost exclusively through a foreign intermediary, either British or Hong Kong Chinese, who would be invited to the fair. In addition to representing a, b, c company, the intermediary could also represent American x, y, z company on the side. Sometimes the intermediary would be chosen because China had a particular need for a given type of technology. For example, something in the computer area. Even so, this type of trade presented a lot of problems.

At that time, the British and American Governments maintained an export control regime for products that had some strategic value. So, when we knew the ultimate purchaser was China, the State Department exercised a degree of control, and we had to decide whether or not to permit that transaction to take place. Before normalization of relations, very few American businesspeople were able to attend the fair. One of the very few was John Kamm in Hong Kong, but even he was given restricted access, so a lot of the information he was able to glean at the Canton Trade Fair prior to recognition of China was from other traders. So, John would follow Japanese practice. He would debrief the traders after they had concluded their contracts and ask what quantity, what price, and so forth. A lot of times, they were willing to give him that information knowing they did not face American competition. John was able to aggregate a lot of that information and yield much data that was of value to the U.S. Government. So, we were able to make guesstimates of what China's total production of a particular product was, what proportion the country was making available for foreign trade, what it was probably selling it for, and what the total amount of foreign exchange was from that. This became very useful.

With recognition of China, for the first time, we were able to participate fully in the Canton Trade Fair of spring 1979. The timing of that trade fair coincided with the opportunity for my wife and me to make our first visit to China. We started our two-week trip in early April 1979. After the trip, I returned to Hong Kong to get a new visa and then traveled back to Guangzhou for the final two weeks of the fair. My main responsibility was to man the "American Embassy Office" at the Canton Trade Fair. I had to bring up with me from Hong Kong liquor setups and so forth so that we could provide hospitality for the American businesspeople who for the first time would be at the trade fair. David Denny from Beijing joined me at that event. We worked together. When one of us was in the office, which was just a hotel suite, the other would be walking around the trade fair picking up things and we would trade off. So, it was a very exciting period. We saw a lot of evolution in how China was conducting business. During the course of my period in Hong Kong, I continued to visit the fall and spring trade fairs on a regular basis. During that period China also changed how it was conducting trade and invited more and more businesspeople to Beijing to conclude deals or to discuss other kinds of business relationships. So, the focus of trade moved to Beijing, and it took on a different characteristic as it was linked to foreign investment.

Q: Canton is where all trade with China had to go?

DONAHUE: That's right. The English word "canton" comes from a Cantonese pronunciation of that province. In Mandarin, the province is pronounced "Guangdong," which means "broad eastern plain."

Q: You left Hong Kong. Were the Chinese becoming more savvy on the economic side? There would be an awful lot of Americans and others who would come in to trade who really weren't able to deliver. This must have been quite a learning period on both sides.

DONAHUE: It was indeed. It was a big deal for a Chinese official to be tapped to have the opportunity indeed to go to Guangdong for a trade fair for a number of reasons. The northern part of China where Beijing is located is a very cold, inhospitable plain and has always been a food deficit area and rather poor region of China. The southern coast from just north of Shanghai all the way down to Guangdong has always been viewed by the Chinese as the land of milk and honey. Northern Chinese have always enjoyed southern food and look upon the region as a kind of lush paradise. So, for a typical Beijing bureaucrat to be tapped to go to Guangzhou for a whole month for the trade fair was nice duty. However, at that time, perhaps even to this day, the Chinese have always been suspicious about Chinese who maintained contacts with foreigners. I'm sure there was always a lot of tension. After they spent the day negotiating deals with the foreigner, they would probably have to spend half the night debriefing the security guy and satisfying him that they weren't giving away state secrets. In those days, even phone numbers in China were state secrets. So, it would have been interesting to be a fly on the wall at one of those business deals because there was so much involved with trade that after you had a meeting of the minds, “I want to buy or sell this for this price,” and became satisfied with the quality and all of that, then you had to figure out shipment details. In which factory is it being produced? Which port will it be shipped out of? On what ship can this be done and which brokering company is going to be responsible for this? Do I need any phone number, any telex number, and all of this? All of that information the Chinese regarded as secret. So, there was a kind of risk involved in giving it to a foreigner in the first place even though it’s a vital part of concluding the trade transaction.

The other thing is, the bureaucrat, the person conducting business at the Canton Trade Fair, was very much removed from anything to do with production, much less business. I’m sure they were given a brief. If you were selling a Chinese product, you must try to sell it for the highest price possible. I have no doubt that one of the primary functions of a Chinese economic officer at a typical Chinese embassy outside China in those days was to gather information about prices for the kinds of products that China would sell. The official would have to examine the world market price and then the government would give a range to these bureaucrats who would try to sell it on the high side and buy on the low side. As you can probably appreciate, there are all kinds of reasons why prices might be different in different parts of the world. A price for a commodity in London may not be the same as the price for that same commodity in East Asia. If China were selling products, buyers had to be very much satisfied regarding the quality. The terms of the shipment themselves – timing, bulk versus container, even entry port – might also affect the price.

Part of the visual appeal of the Canton Trade Fair was the large exhibit halls of Chinese products and machinery. Many of the items that the Chinese were hoping to sell during the trade fair were on display and the Chinese sellers would often provide samples. This was a way to interest other people in their product, and to demonstrate the product’s quality. The Chinese would display some antiquated looking capital equipment and other goods for which the only market would be within the communist world. They certainly would not have met world standards in terms of quality. But they probably would have been sought after in Poland or Albania. Then there were other products, raw materials, for which the Chinese went to great pains to ensure they could match world quality. Such products were feathers, denim, cotton and silk textiles, cashmere, chemicals and minerals. They would show the stages of production from the raw mineral to the first, second, and third stage of processing to the final product to ensure the individual buyer that the Chinese could produce at world standard. Industrial oils and other chemicals were similarly displayed. The same was true for some large equipment. I was told the Chinese produced extremely high quality large industrial valves at a very attractive price. The typical foreign buyer, especially if doing business for the first time, would often ask for and receive a sample that he could take back to his company and have tested. If the company was satisfied, it would then conclude the deal.

There were many interesting anomalies. For example, one of the products that China marketed was something called refractory grade bauxite, which is used to line steel furnaces. In much of the world, this is not produced at a particularly high level of quality. Its use is as a flux in steel making. It is not a commodity per se. No one cares what it looks like as long as it works. In China, it was refined to the nth degree, probably using a lot of hand labor. The bricks were as beautiful looking as gold bricks, except of a different color. The buyers thought it was aluminum rather than refractory grade bauxite. China for a while was able to get a very good world market for this product because it was both beautiful and cheap, but at what cost to China? China made its mistakes.

There are people with long memories and the country is still living with the consequences of some of these mistakes. In the early 1970s, before the normalization of relations with the United States, China had already become a major world supplier of feathers and down. There was a large and growing market for these materials. This was before some synthetic products had become widespread for use in coverlets, jackets, and other things. Because there are so many ducks and geese and fowl of various types that are commercially raised in China, the country was able to gather all of these feathers, wash them with the use of cheap hand labor and provide high quality products. They marketed them successfully. Once they were known for their quality, they marketed them for a very good price. Chinese bureaucrats knew China had very few competitors in the world. Their production was so enormous and they were going to drive their competitors out of business. So, they kept dropping the price and increasing the quantity that they would market. They drove out of the international market some of the other competitors over a period of years. Then they had to deal with the worst period of the Cultural Revolution when all of their production dropped. Because fowl production declined so precipitously, the Chinese could not fill their international orders and they got a black eye on the world market. I would say that this feathers and down shortage was the impetus for chemical and other companies to develop the substitutes that subsequently changed the nature of that entire market. So, the bureaucrats were not as smart as they thought they were.

I cannot overemphasize the importance to the U.S. Government of Hong Kong as a listening post on China and other parts of the Asian mainland. Hong Kong was a safe, convenient location, with a solid and supportive government, all of which encouraged the activities of a strong resident China-watching group. This included some knowledgeable expatriate businesspeople, foreign and Hong Kong Chinese academics, non-governmental organizations, and journalists. Although Hong Kong is a big city (4.5 million population), the foreign community, and especially the China watchers, frequently saw each other. There were well-established lines of communication, and many venues for the sharing of knowledge and views. These encounters included meetings of the American Chamber of Commerce's China Commercial Relations Committee, the Foreign Correspondents Club, the Hong Kong General Chamber of Commerce, and various receptions and lunches around town, as well as university lectures.

Q: In 1986, you're off to China.

DONAHUE: That's right.

Q: You were there from '86 to when?

DONAHUE: I ended up being there for only one year, from May '86 to July '87. At the time of my assignment, my wife and I were both assigned to two two-year jobs in Beijing, so we were expecting to be there quite a long time. My initial assignment was as one of the two deputy chiefs of the Economic Section. We had a sizeable Economic Section divided into two units. One was doing internal reporting. The other was external. I was the chief for external, which meant responsibility for trade and investment. That was one of the peak periods of American business interest in China. Many businesses had already gone in and had contemplated an investment but had not actually made it or were in the process of completing their legal contract work or completing the negotiations with their Chinese partner, whatever it was. They were beginning to run into various kinds of problems. So, we were in a problem-solving mode. On the one hand, we were listening to business and what their concerns were and trying to help them determine who in the Chinese government might be helpful for them. On the other hand, we were also dealing with the Chinese Government at a kind of macro level on trade policy. At that time, we began our negotiations with China on the possibility of its becoming a member of the GATT [the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade], the predecessor to the World Trade Organization [WTO].

Q: Your wife was doing what?

DONAHUE: My wife is a consular cone officer, but her first assignment in Beijing was as a personnel officer. Her second two-year assignment would have been as the deputy head of the Consular Section. My second assignment would have been as chief of the Science and Technology Section, which was sizeable in Beijing.

Q: Who was the ambassador and what was the state of our relations with China from 1986-1987.

DONAHUE: The ambassador was Winston Lord, who had been head of the Policy Planning Staff under Henry Kissinger and had accompanied Kissinger on his famous first trip to China. That having been said, Lord really thought of himself as a specialist on balance of power politics, the broad parameters of power politics, as opposed to China per se. But his wife is Chinese. He did not know any Chinese language, but his wife was fluent. A lot of what he understood about China he learned through his wife. Also, he had a wonderful background in our overall policy and where we wanted China to fit into that from his years of experience on the Council of Foreign Relations. So, he brought an urbane New Yorker's world view to Beijing, which we had not had up until then because his immediate predecessor was Art Hummel, one of the real China experts. Before that was Woodcock, the union man.

There has been a longstanding debate among Foreign Service Officers on the relative merits of career vs. political ambassadors. Having served with both kinds, I believe there is no easy answer. The particular personal characteristics that the ambassador brings to the job are the most important factor in the success of the mission. While it is often argued that a career ambassador, ideally, can draw on years of experience with the system, and the region or country of assignment, most career people lack access to the political level of our own government. Therefore, while they may be highly competent and knowledgeable, unless they have access to the top decision makers, their ability to influence policy formation at that level is limited. On the other hand, while the key strength of the political appointee is access to the White House, in most cases that is limited even for them. Certainly, the political ambassador brings another perspective to the job, a perspective of American life outside of government. Because a political appointee has an independent basis for the views he or she voices, that person may be taken as more credible by the host government. Also, the political ambassador may have contacts in American circles outside of government that could embellish the mission.

Ambassador Lord had many of these assets and used them to great effect. Having served in the State Department under Kissinger, he was well versed on how the system operates and how to get things done bureaucratically. As a result of his tenure at the Council on Foreign Relations in the mid-1980s, he had considerable access with corporate America. Also, he and his wife had many contacts in the American cultural community. They were able to draw on these resources during their period in Beijing to introduce Chinese officialdom to a wider range of movers and shakers in American society than they had heretofore been exposed to. Very few career ambassadors would have been able to accomplish that.

Q: And before that was David Bruce.

DONAHUE: That's right. He was our first representative to China after we established the Liaison Office. Each of our early representatives to China brought something in particular to the job. Winston Lord's immediate predecessor, Art Hummel, was really a China specialist. However, a lot of his personal knowledge of China was WWII era. Winston Lord brought the great interest on the part of U.S. business, the Fortune 500 companies, the New York Stock Exchange, and so forth in rekindling relations with China. During the period that he was in Beijing, I think many of those companies brought their boards of directors for meetings in China. I can think of three or four major companies that had their boards meet in China, either in Beijing, Shanghai, or some other city. Many of the organizations had had some important activity in China before 1949 and were trying to determine whether they could revive those operations. Sometimes, the interest was on the part of China. For example, China had sought out the company that was manufacturing Jeeps to bring new technology into its Jeep plant in Beijing. I think that they had also approached Ford and GM to try to bring new technology back to what had been their original operations. General Electric probably was the same. All of those large companies had had major operations in China. For some companies, a change of ownership in the U.S. made it more difficult to stage a direct return to the Mainland. They were interested in China for other commercial reasons. That was true of many of our banks. There had been a lot of evolution in our banking industry since 1949 and some of the biggest American banks that had played a role in China before then no longer existed. Other banks had bought them. So, there was a great deal of interest.

We were negotiating with the Chinese on becoming a member of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade [GATT], at least moving in that direction. We were discussing with them changes that would be required in their legal system, the establishment of laws to allow Western business to operate, all kinds of things that we take for granted that they did not guarantee, the sanctity of contracts, the ability to own more than 50% of an enterprise, all of the features of a capitalist system. China was so intensely communist that the concept of private ownership was very bothersome to its leaders – both of the government and the party. As a matter of ideology, they only wanted to accept ownership by the state. So, the concern was how to allow a foreign entity to operate in China without full ownership, or without the amount of ownership that made it comfortable. In fact, a lot of the problems faced by U.S. business involved this issue of ownership. Even if a foreign business owned outright its operations in China, it did not have the ability to manage them entirely without Chinese acquiescence or agreement to certain elements of its management. That included hiring personnel, renting office space, certainly putting up a building, all of which required many different kinds of permits. We had to help American businesses sort this out and determine how it could work.

Q: Did you put out a guide to doing business in China?

DONAHUE: The Commerce Department did. By this time, the commercial function overseas had been totally spun off to the Commerce Department. They had globally absorbed about 30% of the State Department officers who had previously done commercial work. However, their Beijing office included many with private sector experience. I think everyone in that office was new to the Commerce Department but had a lot of experience in China or in countries surrounding China. They did put together a lot of how-to guides.

Q: What was your impression at that time? Was it worth it to do business with China?

DONAHUE: Yes, but a lot of times it was a matter of competition with the Europeans or the Japanese. There were several reasons why an American company needed to be in the China market and perhaps could not dare to avoid it. It was considered the largest potential market in the world. There were certain types of products for which the market in the Western world was becoming saturated. A lot of these products were what we call industrial or capital goods – heavy equipment – for which in the entire world there may be a very limited market. An example is diesel locomotives.

For makers of large industrial equipment where the demand was slack in the rest of the world, China was seen as perhaps their most viable potential market. Companies such as Westinghouse and GE, makers of turbine generation equipment, found they had no choice but to try to get into China. In some cases, companies sought to get into the China market to continue producing something which, unless they had a market like China, they would no longer be able to produce. I think GE was in that area with respect to diesel electric locomotives and other large equipment like that. Demand in the U.S. and Europe was slack. The extractive industries were also very interested in China. Again, there was a feeling of intense competition with European and Japanese companies for certain types of minerals, and for oil. U.S. companies believed it was important to make an investment in order to have a claim on the supply stream from that investment. For example, aluminum companies were interested in getting hold of bauxite production. There was a lot of interest in oil exploration in China. Unfortunately, the major oil supply was found far from the coast where it might not have been economically feasible to exploit it.

Q: How did we find the situation in China per se? Were we able to get around? Was there such a thing as politics there?

DONAHUE: 1985-1987 was perhaps the period of greatest relaxation of official prohibitions against public expression. That period continued until about 1989, when it culminated with the Tiananmen Square massacre. During 1986-1987, we found a great deal of liberalism expressed in the editorials of the major newspapers. Censorship rules in Beijing for the publication of manuscripts were relaxed, and a lot of Chinese who had written materials and had carefully hidden them during the Cultural Revolution brought them out and had them published. Also, some papers that had been published in the 1950s were being republished. This was because many intellectuals felt it might be possible to turn the clock back to the period of the early '50s before the ideological wars of the Cultural Revolution. There was the so-called "Hundred Flowers Movement," when Mao invited the intellectuals to criticize what was going on. As soon as they stood up and had their names associated with a criticism, he knocked them off. There was a feeling that the only way for China to really make headway in solving its problems and get ahead with economic development was to allow the intellectuals to debate issues openly, and not characterize their views as anti-regime. So, the late '80s was a period of intellectual ferment throughout China.

There was a square near Beijing University called the Deep Purple Park. It was a place similar to the free speech corner of Hyde Park in London where the students could meet and talk about issues and not feel fear that they would be condemned or face any kind of a problem. It was also a place where foreigners could go to meet students and speak English. Sometimes we would go there, listen to some of the student discussions in English or Chinese, and also speak with some of the students. That was a favorite thing to do on a Sunday afternoon, ride the bicycle over there and appear unobtrusive and sense what was going on.

In terms of traveling around China, when I made my first trip in 1979, we were housed in special facilities. Every effort was made to segregate us foreigners from regular Chinese to the point of having to eat in a special dining room reserved for foreigners, sitting in a rail car exclusively for foreigners. By the time we were assigned in Beijing, the number of foreigners had risen to the point where it was no longer possible for China to maintain those strictures. So, for the most part, if we traveled on vacation, we were pretty much on our own. We were treated as anybody would be. Stand in line to get your ticket. Sit wherever they assigned you. That type of thing. We were pretty free to mingle. If we traveled officially, we still had what we referred to as a "foreign handler," someone from a foreign affairs advisory office in whatever city or province we visited who would generally meet us at the airport and arrange an escort for us. Whatever our needs were, they would take care of it. They were like a travel agency for officials. They would arrange a car and driver, get hotel reservations, and arrange interpreters. They would also set up an itinerary. A lot of times we would make our request in Beijing and before we started our trip be assured that our itinerary was set. Many times, we would arrive in a particular place and find the itinerary had changed for some reason. Sometimes the change might be beneficial, sometimes it was a change that we didn't care for. However, because we were already there, we would not really have many opportunities to change it. Generally speaking, I think we were able to get what we asked for and we were able to see what we thought we ought to be seeing.

The one part of China that remained difficult to access was Tibet. I think that is still true. I think Tibet and the part of Yunnan Province near Burma still have access by foreigners tightly controlled by Chinese authorities. Undoubtedly on some of our travels, we must have gone through some military zones, but I am not aware of any U.S. officials having any problem with that. However, occasionally, journalists did. During the period I was assigned in Beijing, a British subject who happened to be a reporter for "The New York Times" and his Chinese assistant were arrested. They were detained for having traveled through one of these military zones unbeknownst to them. I suppose it's possible because I'm not sure that they're all marked.

You may be going down a road and perhaps see a barbed wire fence and think nothing of it. Then somewhere along the line, you would be stopped, but there would not be a sign saying “foreigners forbidden” or whatever it was. I have a feeling that it was that kind of a case. At the time, this was a particularly interesting situation. The British were in a difficult position. They were in a kind of bind over this incident because they were in a tricky negotiation process on the retrocession of Hong Kong to China in 1997. The British did not want to make a stink of this issue. Ambassador Lord was prevailed upon by The New York Times to weigh in despite the fact that the man involved was a British subject. Lord, who realized he had a limited number of “silver bullets” to use with the Chinese Government, nevertheless, did weigh in with the Chinese authorities and was able to obtain the man’s release. I believe the journalist had to leave the country. I don’t know what happened to the Chinese interpreter. He probably remained in detention. But that incident was a little unusual. Another strange event that took place during that year was the sudden death of the Hong Kong governor who was visiting Beijing for negotiations. Governor Youde, who was not known to be ill, died of a heart attack in Beijing quite unexpectedly. A lot of people were very concerned about that. A number of our colleagues at the British embassy were quite beside themselves with that incident. Those were the two incidents involving the British that I remember very well, the trickiness of their negotiation on Hong Kong and the two unfortunate incidents.

Q: Were you treated with a certain amount of suspicion? Here you were, with a Chinese background wife with connections to the Nationalist regime, as was Betty Bao Lord, too.

DONAHUE: Actually, in our embassy at the time, in the Political and Economic Sections, maybe half of us had Chinese wives. So, it was not unusual, but in fact, it was unusual for any embassy that I’ve ever been posted to to have so many wives with a connection with that country in one way or the other. I am not aware that anybody had any problem during the period that we were there. I presume you may have heard Betty Bao’s famous story when she first arrived in Beijing. It was perhaps one of her first days at post. Most of the time when she was traveling in the official car going to the residence, the ambassador probably accompanied her. The Chinese guard at the gate, a member of the People’s Armed Police, would have recognized the ambassador. Certainly he would recognize the car. But on at least one occasion early on, Betty Lord was in the car by herself. The man at the gate did not want to open the gate, which is incredible because you would recognize the car, the driver, etc. But for whatever reason, he thought, “This is a Chinese woman in the car. I’m not going to open the gate.” Betty Bao opened the window of the car and called the man to come over in Chinese and said, “You look at this face. Yes, I am Chinese, but I am the wife of the American ambassador. You will open the gate and give me entrance to my house.” She never had any problems after that.

We had some wives who had very unusual backgrounds and I am sure that the Ministry of Foreign Affairs kept dossiers on all of us and probably would have followed them very carefully. I’m not aware of anybody having a problem. There was one woman who was not Han Chinese, but from a minority in western China known as the Uighurs. They are quite a small minority in China. They are also a minority people in some independent Central Asian countries, as well. I believe this woman’s father had actually been politically active. This woman had completed her undergraduate and graduate work in the U.S. and was an American citizen, but of course in China she became interested in the plight of the Uighurs and other minority peoples. Because she knew the languages, she could move in those areas. I am sure that she spent some time in Beijing with those communities. There was another woman who had family associations with both the communist and Nationalist military. This was not unusual for many Chinese families. But nevertheless, because some of her relatives had been in high-level positions in the military, probably there was some interest in her. During the time that I was in Beijing, there was one American who “befriended” a Chinese woman who was the daughter of a Chinese general. He lost his security clearance and returned to the U.S. I don’t know for sure if they ever did get married, but I know he wanted to do that. But that was the only such incident I was aware of.

My wife has relatives living in China. One member of the family lived in Beijing at the time we were there. That relative and his wife were a wonderful couple, both of whom were medical doctors. The man had done a residency at Harvard University before WWII, so he was already quite old at the time we were assigned in Beijing. He and his wife had both been high-level officials at the Chinese Academy of Medical Sciences. We were able to visit them in their apartment compound. We had no problem. There were a couple of things that we noted. If we wanted them to visit us at our apartment in the diplomatic housing compound, we had to send them a written invitation. Otherwise, they would not have entrance into our compound. If we went to their place, we didn’t need a written invitation, but I’m sure we caused consternation. We couldn’t just drop in. We had to call them in advance that we would be going there on a Sunday afternoon or something. I remember one instance when they were very concerned. We had a car that was self-locking. You flipped one button and all the doors locked. We had gotten out of the car inside the residential compound and were heading into the relative’s apartment. He was coming down to meet us. He was very concerned that our car was not locked because he had not seen us put down the locks of the doors. He said, “You know, you really have to lock your car here.” I was a little chagrined because to get to that parking spot, we had had to go through three checkpoints of guards. I thought, “If they have that kind of security, why are they concerned about somebody breaking into my car?” However, I could appreciate that concern later on when we had an incident in our own diplomatic housing compound parking lot. Someone broke into the car of one of our secretaries at the embassy in daytime and set it afire. It was within sight of a guard at the gate. He did nothing. We found out about it because our servant looked out the window and told us about it and we called the fire department. Of course, by the time they arrived, the car was beyond repair. Probably, the car had been broken into by children of Middle Eastern diplomats. The attitude of the Chinese guards was that they were there to provide security from the outside, not to provide security from the inside, that whatever took place inside the compound was our common problem, not theirs.

Q: During this time, were you noticing the impact of the great flood of Chinese students who had gone to the U.S. mainly for graduate degrees and returned?

DONAHUE: We were certainly seeing a large number of students going to the U.S. I am not sure that we had seen that many return. There were several phases of these students going to the U.S. Among the first phase were those who had studied abroad or had advanced studies of some type, perhaps in Chinese institutions before the Cultural Revolution, and because they were so bright and capable an effort was made to build their skills up to world standards in the wake of the Cultural Revolution. Then there was another wave of students who were chosen primarily because of their connections with the Party, or there was a political angle that they were being given a benefit because of their father's status in the government or the Party. Yet there was another wave. I think that during the time that I was in Beijing, this was most prominent. The foreign companies that wanted to benefit their operations in China were finding that one way to do this, and perhaps one of the ways around the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, was to provide scholarships to people who they wanted to favor. In some cases, they would be prospective company employees who needed to bring up their skill levels. In other cases, they would be children of high-level Party cadres whose permission was necessary for the companies to make their investments. A number of visa applicants were students who had valid passports and other documentation, but they might be traveling under an assumed name. I know of at least one instance when the consular officer who was interviewing – because occasionally the consular officers would call us up in the Political or Economic Section and ask us, “Is it proper for us to give a visa to this person?” – was not certain about the bona fides of the particular student and asked, “What does your father do?” The student said, “My father is the president.” The consular officer didn't know what he was the president of. It could be the president of an association, an institute, a company, or whatever. It turned out his father was the person who had the title “President of China.” But because the name on the applicant's passport had nothing to do with his father's name, it couldn't be verified. In this case, we went back channel to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to verify the family relationship. So, there were some instances like that. We didn't want to send anybody out of the consular section without something they should have, but on the other hand we wanted to make sure. We didn't want to be entire patsies. I think probably in the earlier period of the issuance of student visas, it was easier to sort it out than it was during my period there.

Q: Is there anything else we should talk about?

DONAHUE: Maybe talk about the stresses and strains of being assigned in China. All of us embassy officials were under constant scrutiny, we were very conscious of the security situation, and this complicated our work style. We had to work in a particular way in the embassy building. We had to go through three doors to get to our offices, all of which required being pestered by the Marine. We had to have clean desks and could not leave any paper on them because there was a Chinese char force after hours. We still have a Chinese char force. I think while we were there, our embassy in Moscow got rid of the local char force and the American officers had that responsibility. We debated whether we would do that or not, but during the period I was there, we didn't. So, if I had to go out of my office for any reason, I would have to carry all of my classified materials with me and eventually lock them up in a safe in the secretary's office. We had IBM electric typewriters in our offices. However, we had to go to another area of the chancery building that had been specially made where all of our computers (at that time, Wang computers) were held. So, if any of us had to type something on the classified computer system, we would be out of our office for some time. Movement within our building was complicated. Our Economic and Political Sections both employed Chinese professional workers that in other embassies would be considered FS national employees. But we could not employ FSNs. So, we obtained our assistance by contract with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Diplomatic Services Bureau. Our employees were themselves Chinese FS officers who just happened to be seconded to our embassy. Therefore, for security reasons we had to keep them in a separate building. But they were absolutely invaluable to us. We used them to peruse the newspapers. They were okay for that. They were okay for compiling statistics. They were absolutely invaluable for putting together guest lists to help us determine who was married to whom. Many high-ranking Chinese officials were married to other officials, either of the State or the Party. But, the wife did not change her name when she got married. So, we had to know who was really paired with whom and what their relative status was. Our local employees were invaluable for that protocol element. They also greatly assisted in putting together itineraries or making appointments when we were visiting places. Many Chinese ministries had only a few telephones. Their telephone numbers were still considered secret. So, if we needed to see a particular ministry, and perhaps we had never contacted them before, a lot of times our local employees would have to go through the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to even find out how to contact them. It was really complicated. Sometimes it would be a lot to do four appointments in one day in Beijing because it's a very large city. You would have to go across town. Drivers sometimes would not even know where the place was. The address would not be clear or there could be all kinds of problems. So, just the process of living and going through normal work experience was difficult.

In our apartment buildings, there were typically six floors of apartments and a seventh floor on top of that, which housed the Chinese "listeners." Our apartments were bugged and we presumed that somebody was listening night and day, probably with a tape recorder, because it would have been really boring in the middle of the night. But we were very conscious of the fact that we were under scrutiny. It was not until after I left China, really, that I realized the amount of pressure we had been under. Being back in the U.S., I was able to relax to a degree that I had not been while in China. As a matter of fact, my wife and I very rarely talk about work outside of the office and we would almost never make any kind of pejorative comment, but nevertheless, it was just the knowledge that we were being listened to.

During the time that we were assigned in Beijing, my wife got pregnant with our third child, which was totally unplanned. We had not expected it, had not planned for it, we were happy with two children, etc. During my wife's pregnancy, we had been injected with a vaccine for Japanese B encephalitis, which uses a live virus. We had to get that in China, not the U.S., because that kind of vaccine is not used in the West. Normally, a live virus vaccine is not given to a woman who is pregnant, but my wife didn't realize she was pregnant at the time. I think the vaccine was given in two or three courses. At least one of them must have been while she was pregnant. So, we had no reason to believe there was going to be any problem with the birth. We were expecting for her to go down to Hong Kong and give birth and then after a short time return to Beijing with the child. What happened was, the child was born in the hospital in Hong Kong. At birth, the doctor realized our child had a major problem, involving a deformed heart and the arterial plumbing that is needed to move the blood to the lungs for oxygenation.

Q: This is what we used to call a "blue baby," isn't it?

DONAHUE: Our baby's problems were more complicated than that. He had Tetralogy of Fallot, which involves four problems with the heart. Some of them are not terribly important, but others are critical. So, he needed to be operated on at birth. Fortunately, they could do a palliative surgery in Hong Kong. But he needed to be medevaced to the U.S., and we knew there was no medical care for him in Beijing. So, I had been in Hong Kong for his birth and realized that he was not going to be able to live with us in Beijing. We considered a number of options. One of them was that I would continue in Beijing, my wife would return to Washington or go to California where her family was, and be on LWOP [leave without pay]. There were all kinds of considerations. So, we didn't really make up our mind what to do until my wife and the baby were medevaced to California when he was six weeks old. He actually turned blue on the plane on arrival in LA, so they whisked him to UCLA Hospital and did another one of these palliative surgeries. At that time we realized we needed to be together as a family. So, my wife and I ended up curtailing two assignments each in Beijing in order to go back to Washington. And that ended our assignment in China.

Q: How did things work with the child?

DONAHUE: I think we're fortunate that our son was born in Hong Kong and they could at least do the lifesaving surgery at birth. We were not certain whether it was in time to ensure enough oxygen in the brain. You always are concerned about the loss of oxygen in the brain affecting learning ability and so forth. Then the doctor that we were put in touch with at UCLA Hospital in California turned out to be a surgeon who had been able to do the more complete open heart type of operation on an infant. He was not yet able to do it on a child as young as six weeks. But he was able to do it when our child was 13 months old. So, during the period we were in the U.S., we had sufficient surgery for Ian to develop fairly normally and the Department was satisfied that we could have another overseas assignment.

Today is June 26, 2000. You're going to Hong Kong in 1989. What were you doing?

DONAHUE: I was preparing to go to Hong Kong as the chief of the Substantive Reporting Section. Since I had been posted in Hong Kong previously, having left in 1981, there had been several organizational changes. When I had left in 1981, there were separate Economic and Political Sections. In the meantime, they had been combined. So, there was a single combined section. However, it was carried on the books as an economic section, and it was called the Economic/Political Section. It really had four functions. It was responsible for backstopping our embassy in Beijing and constituent posts on both political and economic reporting on China, taking into consideration the continued usefulness of the unique China watching community in Hong Kong and the perspective of Hong Kong-based business in particular. Embassy Beijing recognized the value of the views of Hong Kong's politically astute people on what was going on in China. In addition, the Section emphasized to a greater extent than we had before both political and economic issues in Hong Kong and Macau (we were jointly accredited to Macau). Macau was still administered by Portugal at the time.

Q: You were there from 1989 to when?

DONAHUE: Standard three year tour, 1989-1992.

Q: Who was the consul general?

DONAHUE: When we arrived, it was Don Anderson. After about a year, Richard Williams, who had been director of the Office of Chinese Affairs in the State Department, replaced him.

Q: What was the view of events in China in 1989?

DONAHUE: That was a particularly important year. When I had received the assignment in 1988, I had certain expectations. One of them was that the pretty good relationship that the U.S. had developed with China -- that had flowered and reached its full blossom in late 1988 and very early 1989 -- would hold and would be something that we could build on. We were also staring in the face a very important deadline for Hong Kong, which was June 1997, when it would revert to Chinese sovereignty. There was so much work that had to be done, primarily by the British, in their continued negotiations with the government of Beijing. There probably was some expectation that improvement of relations between the U.S. and China might allow the U.S. to play a facilitating role. Typically in preparing for a Chinese language assignment, we had to undergo some brush up. Chinese is a very difficult language to learn, but it's a very easy language to lose. So, I had already arranged to leave the Canada Desk early enough to get some oral practice with the teachers at FSI before going out to post. I was in language class in May 1989, watching with great interest the flowering of the so-called "Democracy Movement" with the students and other people in Beijing taking over Tiananmen Square and seeming to challenge the authority of the Chinese government. Then, I was still at FSI during the Chinese Army's June 4 decision to move on the demonstrators in Tiananmen Square, which has been labeled the "Tiananmen Massacre." Because I was a language student and I was freed from other responsibilities, I participated in the task force and then subsequently became part of the emergency crisis group in the Watch Center of the State Department because it was the height of tourist season. There were many American tourists in China and we were concerned whether they would be able to leave the country safely. We didn't know what was going to happen. We thought the whole place could fall apart. At the end of the day, the situation stabilized quite rapidly. Although our embassy in Beijing had been partially evacuated, that evacuation situation lasted only a couple of months. By the time I reached Hong Kong in August, things were sort of back to normal. American personnel had returned to China, and Hong Kong was operating as though nothing had happened. However, there was a great feeling of jitteriness in Hong Kong, certainly in the business community. The British relationship with China was on a very bad footing. It was almost to the point of having no speaking relationship with China for about a year. So, there was no further movement in the negotiations. There were very few opportunities for the British to negotiate with the Chinese on the necessary procedures to bring about a relatively easy, amicable handover in 1997. The U.S.-China relationship was also quite strained. The job, and what we were actually able to do and how we did it, turned out to be quite different than what I had anticipated when I was getting ready to go in spring 1989.

Q: While you were dealing with Tiananmen Square in the language class and the emergency center, you must have been talking to your colleagues who were dealing with Chinese affairs.

DONAHUE: Yes, with my colleagues in the Department and also by telephone with our posts in China.

Q: What was the reading of what this was all about? Why had it turned into such a mess?

DONAHUE: There were a number of theories at the time and I think that subsequently we perhaps obtained a little bit better information.

Q: How about at the time?

DONAHUE: To begin at the beginning, early in 1989, there was a movement on the part of students at universities in Beijing, perhaps in other cities as well, for improvements in how they were treated as students. Initially, it began with just demonstrations, and then maybe some agitation on campus, for essentials like hot water showers, better housing conditions, better quality of food. Then, it increased to something a little bit more substantive where the students were actually asking for the freedom to study what they wanted or to seek jobs that were more in keeping with their real ambitions or aspirations. Up until that time, and perhaps even continuing to the present day, many students in China are selected for university based in part on examination, but also in part for political reasons, perhaps their willingness to be activists for the Party or their family's Party position or connections. They are often chosen arbitrarily to study a particular field and then tracked into a job in a given field or government ministry. Even when I had been posted earlier in Beijing in 1986-1987, several of the students that we encountered said, "Here I am, a hairdresser, and what I really wanted to study was engineering," or "I am studying traditional Chinese medicine. I really wanted to study chemistry." So, there were many mismatches. I think that the generalized aggravation on the part of the students began this.

In many cases, the university authorities, who were caught unawares, had not realized early enough the seriousness of the complaints of the students and had not realized where the movement would go. The university authorities may have, on the one hand, given into some of the early demands rather easily, inviting the students to ask for more, or in other cases, some of the universities around the country recognized what was going on in Beijing because communications in China were improving and there was a more widespread uprising on the part of the students for better conditions. So, similar to what happened during the Cultural Revolution, classes were suspended and students from many universities around China took the train or whatever transportation they could find to Beijing. For several months, there was a continuous student gathering, a kind of sit-in, in Tiananmen Square. It had incredible ramifications for the country. The students took advantage of a state visit to China by then Soviet leader Gorbachev. That was a state visit that had been expected to represent a rapprochement between China and the Soviet Union. It had been eagerly anticipated for some months by the Chinese leaders. The visit ended up being hijacked by the students because the major international media were present. The students used their presence to get a soapbox for not only national but also international coverage of their own cause during Gorbachev's visit. Gorbachev spoke about the importance of perestroika and glasnost, which had been important elements of his new policy in the Soviet Union to let people comment publicly and criticize how the Soviet Union was organized. The students just grabbed onto that and called for the same and even more of the same, in China. Subsequent to that visit, the students got a piece of old marble and had a student sculpt the so-called "Statue of Democracy," a Chinese equivalent to the Statue of Liberty. The statue was displayed prominently in Tiananmen Square and the students gave every evidence of occupying the Square indefinitely. What went wrong is not entirely clear, what happened in what sequence. But some of the student leaders, including Wuer Kaixi, as well as others, a group of five or six that seemed to be the main leaders of the movement at that time, arranged several meetings with Chinese leaders. The main leader with whom they met was Zhao Ziyang. He gave the impression of being rather sympathetic for the cause of the Chinese students. Perhaps as a result, he was labeled a liberal by the Chinese leadership, and the Communist Party got worried, fearful. So, he was ousted ultimately and put under house arrest. He was replaced by much more conservative people. His deputy, Li Peng, who was an adopted son and protégé of Zhou En-lai, immediately replaced him, and Deng Xiaoping brought a harder edged group into office in Beijing. However, the ramifications of the Tiananmen Square disaster continued to be felt.

What we subsequently learned, or at least think we learned, in the months following the Tiananmen Square business was, there were many students either killed or badly wounded. The numbers could be a range of 1,000-5,000. But most of the students who were directly injured in Tiananmen were not from Beijing. In the days and hours before the June 4, 1989 incident, the students who were from the immediate Beijing area, many of whom were children of high-level party cadres, got the word somehow. Their families had heard that there was going to be a move, a major effort, by the government to rearrange the situation in Tiananmen Square, and those students were called off the street, called to go home or go to relatives' houses. Probably many of them did indeed leave Beijing so that if the secret police came knocking at their parents' doors, they would not be there. They got off the square, they dispersed. Many of the students who remained on the square were from other cities and didn't have relatives looking out for them in Beijing who could tip them off. Also, many people – and this includes Chinese officials – felt that things went wrong because of the way the troops moved into Tiananmen Square. Some of them had been ordered to sweep the streets and move into the Square in an orderly fashion from the west with the idea that they would force the students to give up the Square gradually and move eastward towards another smaller square in front of the railway station. The expectation was the students would be bottled up there and could be convinced to leave the city by train. Unfortunately, one of the columns of troops came in from the south and entered the Square on the eastern side and the students got bottled up towards the middle of Tiananmen Square. There was no route by which they could leave the square. So, they got slaughtered. Perhaps as many as 1,000 of them got truly wiped out. The Chinese expression is fen cui, literally “smashed to dust.”

Q: The real question is, why didn't the Chinese leadership put an end to this at an earlier state? This thing festered for a long time. Anyone who knows about the art of Mao's politics, what have you, knows you don't allow something to fester for a long time. You either do something rather drastic right away while it's still small or you say, "Okay, you've got real grievances." It seems like a lot of the grievances early on could have been solved. "We're going to work on it. We'll set up a working committee. You can sit on it. We'll try to get you hot water." Something of that nature. Why this paralysis? How did we feel at the time?

DONAHUE: I think it was a situation similar to some other grassroots-type revolutions, some of which have been successful, others of which have not been. A little bit of success feeds on itself and something quite significant can grow over very little. It has been said subsequently, and I think that there may be something to it, that one of the events that emboldened the students in Tiananmen Square was the success of the so-called People's Revolution that took place in Manila in 1988. That was an effort by Corazon Aquino to overthrow the previous Philippine government. It was a grassroots effort and it was successful. It also involved people massing peacefully in the streets giving a show of solidarity and nonviolence. I don't believe there was any bloodshed. If there was, it was minor. So, it was seen as a kind of glorious revolution where the voice of the people was heard. I think that there was a great deal of naivete on the part of the students in Tiananmen Square, but probably also on the part of Zhao Ziyang and other like-minded people in the government. The years immediately prior to this had been a period of liberalizing in China. There was quite a bit of economic progress associated with the liberal trend. Some of this had been generated by Deng Xiaoping. When Deng Xiaoping was revived into the leadership following the Gang of Four period, he realized that a lot needed to be changed in order for China to get economic growth working again and free up means of production to allow China to realize its potential. There had been a great deal of progress in that area. He had brought into government people willing and able politically to criticize the hard-line positions previously taken. So, there was already a sense of acceptance of the criticism on policy.

People in Zhao Ziyang's immediate leadership circle, except for Li Peng and other hardliners like him, generally accepted the ability to criticize current policy. I think without a doubt the students went too far and pushed too hard. If they had accepted the honoring of the original requests that they made, which was an improvement of their living conditions within the context of the university, and if it had gone no further, they would have won a victory. I think the leadership would have felt that they had satisfied that immediate need. If the students and everybody had gone back to work, the Party and the Government could have declared victory. For whatever reason, that wasn't deemed enough.

Wuer Kaixi and others around him became increasingly radical in what they were seeking. There is no doubt that they also felt that they could develop common cause with the workers. During the two or so months that there was a kind of sit-in demonstration in Tiananmen Square, they were seeking to bring workers into this movement. I think that they were generally disappointed that they were not successful in doing that. The workers' world view was quite different from the students'. Many of the workers had faced incredible economic and personal dislocation during the Cultural Revolution period and they didn't want anything to do with a movement that would revive the kind of instability that they remembered during the 1960s. Also, under Deng Xiaoping – and they had already had five to seven years of experience of rule by him – they were much better off. Many workers in the Beijing area worked for companies that had joint ventures with foreign firms. They were getting advanced technology, better management, and had order books that were months or years long. The workers saw so much to be gained under the status quo, and they feared they would lose much if they openly backed the students. There was nothing for them in what the students were seeking. In other words, the workers were satisfied. They were not willing to make common cause with the students.

On the other hand, there were many bureaucrats in government and even Party members who were making common cause with the students. I think part of the reason the rest of the world was able to witness this occupation for the long period that it did, and with the degree of international press that it got, was largely because of the willingness of ministries and even Party members to support the cause. Many of them, too, had suffered a great deal during the Cultural Revolution. This was a way perhaps for some of them to get back at the hardliners. It's quite possible that some of them had a kind of shared dream with the students that this was their way to bring about a liberal democracy and trounce for once and for all the hardliners of the Communist Party. I think that there probably was just before and just after the Gorbachev visit this high hope, but without a doubt the student leaders pressed too hard with Zhao Ziyang. Their inability to arrive at an acceptable compromise settlement must have forced the hand of the old guard and the hardliners, especially Communist Party members and military. The leaders had no recourse but to say, "We cannot allow this to continue any longer." It would be interesting to know what kind of discussions there might have been between China and Russia during and after the Gorbachev visit, where either the Russians might have expressed real concern about what was going on in China, or the Chinese might have asked the Russians, "What do you think about what's going on?" The flowering of the Chinese democracy movement and the hard-line squelching of it that resulted in bloodshed, and the intense foreign coverage that this received, had an immediate impact on the situation in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. Tiananmen helped bring about the collapse of those communist regimes. No one really expected this at the time.

Q: With this having happened, you arrived when in 1989?

DONAHUE: In early August 1989. I arrived about six weeks after what we referred to as the Tiananmen incident.

Q: When you came, was there the feeling that Hong Kong was going to for a while revert to its old ways and it might be handy to have a post like Hong Kong where it could look on what was happening without having to worry about official harassment and that sort of thing?

That was very much the case. The U.S. and Britain, and probably most other Western countries, had almost no access with Chinese officials for six months after the Tiananmen crisis and really not very easy relations for a full year. We all collectively held our breath at the one-year anniversary of Tiananmen because we didn't know exactly what to expect. So, it wasn't until the summer of 1990 that there was even a return of dialogue that was comfortable at all with the Chinese officials. That was true even in the U.S. Chinese embassy people who previously had had contacts with other governments just wouldn't leave their offices.

Q: Was this a mutual situation?

DONAHUE: The Western governments certainly did feel the need for stocktaking, and there was a sense that we could not go back to a status quo. So many of the bilateral assistance programs that had been anticipated had to be cut entirely off. For example, when I was on the task force in the State Department at the time that Tiananmen Square occurred, we had to draw up a list of initiatives, programs and proposals that had been scheduled for the rest of 1989. That included CODEL visits, high-level administration visits, initiatives that involved the private sector, and even bilateral negotiations. One after the other, we killed them all. In fact, USTR was ready to enter what I might call the final stage of negotiations to bring about Chinese participation in the GATT, the forerunner of the World Trade Organization [WTO]. The USTR officials felt that in their preliminary negotiations during the spring of 1989, they had just about tied up all of the loose ends and gotten satisfaction from the Chinese government on some of the areas that were of interest to us or were requirements as far as we were concerned for Chinese entry. They were just ready to send a delegation in late June to wrap this up. I had to call USTR and say, "I'm sorry, but none of this can happen." It was a good three to six months before any high-level delegations visited China. We just were holding our breath, looking for evidence of any willingness by the Chinese government to return to contact. So, in Beijing and in the constituent posts, the only kind of contact was a very formal type. Even the visas, especially student visa applications, fell off greatly. Everyone was collectively looking for people to show up to request asylum in the U.S. Many asylum seekers came to Hong Kong. For six to eight months after the Tiananmen Square incident, we had three to five asylum seekers come to our consulate in Hong Kong every week. Perhaps there was a similar number going directly to the British or to the Canadians.

Q: These were student types.

DONAHUE: That's right. I would say that most of the successful asylum seekers were students who had been directly involved in the Tiananmen Square demonstrations in Beijing and were documented as such. Many of them were those who had given interviews to CNN or well-known foreign journalists and had been named in their articles or had had a lot of exposure and were quite recognizable. We were all astounded at not only how many came out and escaped apprehension by Chinese authorities, but also the long period in which they had been able to remain in China undetected. Obviously, they had been given shelter and assistance in making their way from Beijing all the way down to south China. This is a journey that would have involved more than 2,000 miles of travel over many different kinds of transportation. Their pictures were on wanted posters throughout China and yet they were able to escape detection. So, it was quite phenomenal. There was an impressive network in place to assist these people.

Q: Was your unit looking at the situation in Hong Kong?

DONAHUE: We were. From that period, and directly as a result of 1989, there was a great deal of nervousness on the part of Hong Kong people who were interested in politics or were politically active in some way. I would say in that respect that there was quite a difference in the attitude of Hong Kong people beginning in the summer of 1989 in comparison with my previous experience in Hong Kong. Previously, most Hong Kong people would not have thought of themselves as interested in politics. This was a studied avoidance on their part. Many older Hong Kong people or children of older Hong Kong people had been affected in some way by the Chinese civil war that had raged from the 1930s and through the period of Japanese occupation in WWII up until 1949. Many of those families had been on the Nationalist side.

Much of the Hong Kong population, probably 2/3 by the mid-1980s, either themselves or their parents, had been refugees from Mainland China to Hong Kong. Many of them chose to remain in Hong Kong rather than go on to Taiwan because they had been associated in some way or had obtained their personal fortunes during the period of Nationalist rule in China. However, they had also been burned in one way or another by the Chinese civil war. There were some stalwarts who continued to be staunch Nationalists. On October 10, which is the Nationalist national day, they would display the Nationalist flag. This was technically a no-no in Hong Kong, but nevertheless they would do it. Those people often played a role in trying to develop some kind of relationship between Taiwan and Mainland China. But they were a distinct minority. Most Hong Kong Chinese didn't want to play any role in politics at all. On the other hand, in the political spectrum was a small group of left-leaning people. One such group at the grassroots level was communist-oriented. They tended to try to organize transport workers, industrial workers, with some degree of success, but in fact, they were never the majority. They didn't dwell on how wonderful communism would be. Their members were indeed benefitting from capitalism. But they did dwell on the importance of a kind of emotional solidarity with the Mainland. Another group that also emphasized this emotional element of solidarity with the communist government in China for cultural reasons was a group of Chinese intellectuals who were intellectually socialist or communist inclined. Their movement was nationalism more than communism per se. It was a desire to see China, which they felt had been trounced by the West and by Western imperialism, once again take its rightful place among countries of the world and be admired for its heritage and its position in the world of nations. So, this group would have included university professors, lawyers, some quite wealthy people who had connections with Chinese hierarchy in China based on experience on the Mainland, perhaps university education with some prominent Chinese leaders or something like that. Yet it was a small group. A third group that was beginning to grow, but was still quite small, was Hong Kong businesspeople, most of whom had been refugees from China and were either from Guangdong or Shanghai, the industrial heartlands of China. They saw an economic opportunity for themselves in doing business in China. So, they would pay lip service, would carry out protocolary activities with respect to China for their own business advantage. But they were not ideological believers in the sense of the intellectual group. These people even, at that extreme, were quite a small number in the early 1980s. By the late 1980s, there was a group of Hong Kong businessmen who ideologically supported democracy in China. Some of them were indeed financial backers of the democracy movement in Tiananmen Square. As a result of the very heavy-handed putdown of that movement by the hardliners in Beijing -- what seemed by many to be a rise to power of the Chinese military, the PLA [People's Liberation Army] -- many of these Hong Kong businessmen began to quake in their boots because it was quite well known that they had been supporters. In some cases, they had actually donated tents to the demonstrators in Beijing. Some of these people were the Hong Kong owners of the fast food chains in China that had provided free food to the demonstrators over the many months of demonstrations or had in other ways bankrolled their activities. So, they were definitely on Beijing's black list. They were very concerned not only for what might happen to their operations in Beijing following this putdown, but also business and personal repercussions in Hong Kong, too. The PRC apparatus in Hong Kong began to go after them in one way or another. So, grassroots people in Hong Kong were truly disgusted with the putdown of democracy in Beijing. There were bumper stickers everywhere that said in Chinese, "Chinese people do not fight Chinese people." Millions of people in a population of five million total turned out in candlelight vigils on the public streets and parks to protest the heavy-handed putdown of the demonstration in Beijing. The emotions were amazingly open and represented a vast majority of people in Hong Kong. So, you definitely felt a political fervor that just had not existed prior to that.

Q: During the years that you were observing Mainland China, what were you seeing?

DONAHUE: In the first six months after the Tiananmen Square incident, we were seeing an effort on the part of the Chinese hierarchy to root out liberals from the government. I think that the military cooperated very closely with the hard line of the Party in trying to bring about a better balance between economic development -- the high level of economic growth that the government needed and the leadership wanted -- and to have it selectively exclude the improved communications and sharing of information that had made the democracy movement so effective. So, there was an effort to once again control all communications, especially the media. Many of the newspapers or magazines that had flourished in the relatively liberal period of 1986 to 1989 were banned or stopped. That included some media from Hong Kong that had been allowed to circulate on the Mainland. There was an effort in Hong Kong to carefully scrutinize reports and editorials about the Mainland. The Mainland government had a number of agencies operating in Hong Kong, many of them actively, sometimes openly, but more often not so openly. They tried to convince Hong Kong journalists to censor themselves in articles that they would write primarily in the Chinese press, but it also affected the English language press. There had up to that point been opportunities for the Hong Kong press to have their media circulate in China at least to some limited degree. So, there was an effort to marshal editorial views and bring about a single official line once again. I suppose that effort culminated on the anniversary of June 4 in 1990. The PRC released a videotaped version of their view of what happened in the democracy movement, why it had gone wrong, and why they had had no choice but to put it down for the benefit of China. It was a totally whitewashed view, although there were some who felt that the Chinese had put their finger on some accurate elements in their presentation. Nevertheless, the editorial nature of it was a Party line. After that one-year period, there was a kind of return to normalcy, but it was recognized by all concerned as not the normal situation that might have taken place if the Tiananmen incident had not occurred. So, we watched very closely, and other governments did as well, how Britain might be able to renegotiate or negotiate anew with China on all of the fine points that needed to be addressed for the return of Hong Kong to China in 1997. That was one of the issues.

Another set of issues, that fall of 1989, was the world witnessing the collapse of virtually all of the communist governments of Europe. As a result, the nature of those countries' relationship with China changed. The Eastern European countries had enjoyed a privileged relationship with China. It was a shock to everybody's system for what looked like democratic governments to be forming in Eastern Europe, even in the former Soviet Union, and for them to establish a different kind of relationship with what one might call a newly hardened communist regime in Beijing. We saw this happen as well in Hong Kong when, for example, the East German Consulate folded and just went out of business. All of the East German diplomats became unemployed. The West German Consulate took down the sign saying "West Germany," and put up another indicating they were representing all of Germany. There were questions about what would happen to citizens of the former communist countries who happened to be in Hong Kong. The Hong Kong Government up until then had not given easy access to such people. For the first time, people from the former communist countries really had the run of Hong Kong. They were discovering Hong Kong for the first time. It was quite interesting to see Polish television, Romanian television, and Moscow television coming to Hong Kong, where previously they would have pointed out the evils of capitalism in one of the most capitalist places on Earth, highlighting how wonderful capitalism was and how good a capitalist system was for the benefit of the workers and so forth. Then the journalists would talk about the evils of Communist China next door. It was a kind of "Alice in Wonderland" situation.

Another sea change involved the makeup of the PRC bureaucracy in Hong Kong. Many of the PRC organizations in Hong Kong had previously been headed by fairly liberal oriented people sent there to run businesses or carry on trade. Because of the demonstrations in Tiananmen Square and because it was widely known in China that the students had been supported by people in Hong Kong, almost all PRC representatives in Hong Kong were tarred by the same brush. So, there was a housecleaning at the top and they were replaced by real hardliners in many cases, or by people with no prior Hong Kong experience.

For many years, the leading PRC organization in Hong Kong was the New China News Agency (NCNA). Although it was there ostensibly as a media organization, it was known to be the shadow diplomatic representation of China in Hong Kong, and it was accorded a special status. It was really given the status of a consulate in many ways. During this period of the early 1990s, it changed into a government in waiting. It was recognized at that point that it would have a very important role to play in the negotiations with the British on the future Hong Kong Government. However, what had not been recognized up until then was, NCNA was also going to be the power in Hong Kong even after 1997. The British had actually believed what they had told the Hong Kong people about the deal they had worked out with China in the early 1980s on the retrocession of Hong Kong to China. The British had understood that Hong Kong was going to be called a “special administrative region,” that Deng Xiaoping had guaranteed that there would be “one country and two systems,” and that the Hong Kong system would be able to continue for a period of (at least, they hoped) 50 years following retrocession. Everybody was hoping that those 50 years would go on forever, that it would be something that would be extended indefinitely, and that they would really be able to have their own democratically organized government.

There are many ironies in this scenario. One of the ironies was that Britain, which had never fostered democracy in Hong Kong prior to that agreement, suddenly got religion and wanted to bring about democracy before 1997. So, the British government in Hong Kong, which was ruled by an appointed governor from Britain, and the higher level officials of which were all British, nevertheless went out of its way to explain to us and to anyone who would listen that indeed once those people left London and arrived in Hong Kong, they were really working for the Hong Kong people. They claimed that the Hong Kong government they ran had as many problems in its relationship with London as it did with Beijing. That was their line. They had really gotten religion and decided that they were going to stage a number of changes during 1984-1997 that would bring about a fair degree of democracy in the Hong Kong government and establish their own democratically organized government. Therefore, they would allow the Hong Kong people self-determination and the only difference would be that it would not be under the flag of Britain but under the flag of China.

Well, Deng Xiaoping, who knew exactly what he had believed in 1984 when the British went down this road, by 1989, was of a very different view. Every time the Hong Kong Government used the word “democracy,” it must have caused incredible heartburn in Beijing. So, the Chinese leaders went out of their way to disassociate themselves with this line coming out of the Hong Kong government and they tried to block in every way any movement towards democracy, what they saw as democracy. They saw that term and the concept as threatening their position and their ultimate sovereignty over Hong Kong.

There had been an effort to formulate a kind of constitution for Hong Kong after '97 that would provide for supreme court judges who would be selected from within Hong Kong in a free process and they would have judicial independence from any other government. Only in the extreme case would a case go on to a higher court. Where prior to 1997 that higher court would have been the Privy Council in London, following 1997, it would be the National People's Congress in Beijing. Every two or three years in the election of the Hong Kong Legislative Council, a greater proportion of the seats would be open to general election, and some seats that had been appointed or had been elected by special interest constituencies would be diminished. By 1997, the majority of seats would be elected openly. There was also provision for the governor to be elected by all electorates.

As a result of June 4, 1989, every attempt the British government made to have some kind of negotiation with the Chinese government that would have brought about their acquiescence to this process was blocked. At first, the British could not even get an agreement to meet. Then when they finally got an agreement to meet, it had a very limited agenda. Finally when they were able to add onto the agenda some provision to permit free elections, it was blocked. So, the British failed to make any headway under Governor Wilson. Sir David Wilson was a retired British Foreign Service officer who had been British Ambassador to Beijing. He was a China specialist, and quite a scholar on China. He was not a British politician, however. At the time he had been selected to be governor of Hong Kong, if the Tiananmen incident had not taken place, he could have played a very interesting role in being a mediator between the interests of the Chinese people in Hong Kong and interests of the government in Beijing. Instead, circumstances forced him to play a different kind of role. He had neither the backing of the government in Britain nor access to the government in Beijing, although he should have. Because there was a different group in power in Beijing, the people that he would have related to were out. Unfortunately, his efforts were to no avail. As an individual, he really believed in democracy, although democracy from a colonialist point of view, not broad democracy, but a democracy that Beijing might have accepted in other times. However, his efforts to bring about anything were just totally blocked. Governor Wilson was Governor of Hong Kong for virtually all of the time that I was in Hong Kong.

But in the summer of 1992, as I was getting ready to leave to return to Washington, he was replaced by another governor, who was a British politician. His name was Chris Patton. He had been a Member of Parliament and had lost his seat so he wanted a position somewhere and was made the last British colonial governor to Hong Kong. His strength was that he was a politician and he had very close connections with the government in London. His weakness was that he really didn't know anything about China and had no access whatsoever to Chinese officials in Beijing. Ultimately, he became almost persona non grata with Chinese bureaucracy in Hong Kong. So, the situation was made even worse for him. What he wanted desperately to do was to give Hong Kong a completely democratic legislature before passing the reins on to China. He was totally blocked to the point that the Chinese government in Beijing made it very clear before 1997, and I think this was in a series of public statements in 1995 and 1996, so it was quite early, that they would not recognize the Legislative Council that was being majority elected by popular vote and they would be the ones to choose the next governor of Hong Kong. The Chinese made clear they would not recognize the newly democratized institutions of the Hong Kong Government and after 1997, they would be calling the shots. So, Chris Patton became quite an ironic figure in his own right. In the end, he was nothing more than a caretaker governor, no more than a British figurehead. This was political process.

There was an economic process as well. There were a number of areas that concerned us as well as the Chinese. It was definitely not Britain's finest hour in any way. First of all, we felt with respect to democracy, if Britain had been serious about wanting Hong Kong to have democracy, in terms of the preparedness of the Hong Kong people for democracy, they were as prepared in 1980 as they were in 1990. If Britain had really wanted to give Hong Kong a directly elected government, they could have done so well in advance of any negotiation with the Chinese on retrocession. It's easy to say that in retrospect. In the early 1980s, everybody was walking on eggshells, not wanting to do something that would have been seen by the Chinese government as threatening them in any way. Democracy did threaten them. So, I'm not sure that would have been in the hearts of any of them. But people became quite cynical on this issue of democracy. What people really became cynical about and really caused some heartburn in our relations with Britain at this time, was what the Chinese have often argued, and this sentiment had been argued by many former British colonies, that Britain had sought to colonize China primarily for its own economic benefit. There were many in Britain who had made counter-arguments. Certainly this was a strong argument that had been made by the Indian government post-independence, and there was quite an effort on the part of the British government and the British academic institutions to argue otherwise. Nevertheless, we certainly saw that this was the case, at least in the 1990s.

It became widely known in the UK that Hong Kong would cease to be a British colony come 1997. So, this was the last time to make your fortune in the last British colony. Hong Kong essentially opened up its doors to Britons of whatever type, whatever stripe, whatever credibility, etc. Not only were what one might call British-owned Hong Kong commercial enterprises recruiting widely in the UK for managers and other people, but also independent entrepreneurs from Britain arrived in Hong Kong to make their fortune somehow, some way. There was a lot of activity that was seen by the resident foreign community, such as the U.S., but also by Hong Kong business, as rather unseemly. We called the Hong Kong Government on the carpet on several occasions when we called into question some of the practices they seemed to condone. Hong Kong was a member of the GATT in its own right. It got in on the coattails of Britain, which would have been a charter member. But actually Hong Kong for the most part had a freer trade regime than even Britain because it had almost no tariffs. It benefitted a great deal from the GATT. Under the GATT, there were certain elements that every member must abide by. One of those was the generalized tariff system. But then there were other side agreements that they could join or not. The Hong Kong Government, because generally speaking it was of very liberal ideology economically, had signed most of these agreements. One was an agreement on government purchases, which said that for any contract valued at more than $50 million, they would permit open bidding and there would be a very transparent bidding process. Companies from all GATT member countries would be invited to bid, etc. on government tender. In the late 1980s and early 1990s, the British Hong Kong Government unveiled a number of major construction projects that they saw as being their golden handshake to Hong Kong. There were things that they argued needed to be done, but there were also great opportunities for international business. One of these major projects was valued at half a billion dollars or some incredible amount, the building of a brand new international airport on Lantau Island, which did not have any land connection with the rest of Hong Kong. It required incredible engineering: leveling part of a mountain, making a major landfill in the sea because Hong Kong has one of the deepest natural harbors in the world, building a typhoon-proof bridge over to the Mainland, constructing an elevated highway, extending the subway under solid rock, deepening the ship channel, and so forth. So, it involved a lot of work over a period of years to bring about this project.

We initially took the Hong Kong Government at its word that it would make an open bid tender and it would have a fair bidding process and do this in a transparent way. Then, in 1989 and 1990, large American companies made us aware that they didn't think the Hong Kong Government was managing this in quite the transparent way that it should. It turned out that the Hong Kong Government established a separate authority to oversee the contract letting for the airport. It was headed by a brit who was very pro-brit and very anti-American. In all of my life, I've hardly ever met another brit who was so openly and arrogantly anti-American. His desire was to freeze out any contenders that were not British, even if there was a question about the British firm's ability to actually do the necessary construction. We are talking about complicated construction for which perhaps only a few companies in the world have a positive track record. These are the very large engineering companies, some of which have former American cabinet members on their boards. There is a lot of high-level political interest. Because of the high level of interest that we could not avoid, our Consul General sought a meeting at the highest levels with this airport authority, where we were ushered into an absolutely stunning boardroom with all kinds of high tech features to be given a presentation of what was going to happen. We were given all kinds of information about the various parts of the contract that would be let, and we also were given a rationale as to why only British companies would be permitted to bid on certain parts of the project. Only consulate people attended the briefing. We did not have private sector people. Following this meeting, our Consul General had to report to the American Chamber of Commerce. We were looking over some of the architect's renderings that had been made, and the British head of the organization said to the Consul General, "Well, I don't know why you Americans are complaining so much about not being able to have a part in this project. After all, if you had wanted to have business on the coast of China, you should have had your own colony. Hong Kong has been a British colony for 150 years, not an American colony." Our Consul General was Dick Williams. He had the rank of ambassador because he had been the resident-in-Washington Ambassador to Mongolia, as well as Director of the Office of Canadian and Mongolian Affairs. I'm sure it was the first time he had ever been subjected to such an anti-American statement and also one that was patently false or given by someone who didn't understand the full import of the Anglo-American alliance, which had been particularly strong on the China coast. Ultimately, we were able to obtain contracts for some American companies, including several very important contracts because, as the British finally admitted, they didn't want to throw their money down a rat hole. There were only a few companies that could do some of this construction, and many of them were American. Nevertheless, we had to agree with the PRC that in fact Hong Kong's market was not a level playing field. American interests had not been served as well as they might have been in this final period of British rule.

Q: Were you seeing an exodus or flight of people, money and all, out of there?

DONAHUE: There definitely was this, beginning in the late 1980s. It was accelerated in the early 1990s. The Hong Kong people desired to go to other English-speaking countries for a number of reasons. Some of them had a strong preference to go to Commonwealth countries, in particular Australia or Canada. Australia, because if they wanted to continue to do business in China or elsewhere in Asia, it was quite close. I think that the flight from Hong Kong to some place like Sydney is only a few hours shorter than a flight from Hong Kong to San Francisco, but it is much closer in terms of time zones. So, if they were maintaining their business by telephone from Sydney, it would be far more convenient than from the U.S. Also, if they were professionals, professional certification from Hong Kong would transfer more readily to another Commonwealth country. Their credentials would work in Australia or Canada. So, doctors, dentists, and to some extent lawyers, accountants, and so forth, with UK-type credentials were very much attracted to Australia and Canada.

Canada, in particular, had for a long time a different kind of immigration policy than the U.S. We have tended to give preference to what we call “family reunification,” that is, relatives of people who have already immigrated to the U.S. and become citizens. Canada gave a strong preference for people in certain labor categories that they wanted to encourage immigrating. That was in particular professional categories. So, it would be doctors, nurses, computer programmers, and so forth. Every year, they would come out with a list of occupations they were looking for. Of course, there were many highly educated people in Hong Kong who filled those needs. There was quite a move from Hong Kong to Canada in that period. There were a number of reasons for it. Some Hong Kong people were going with the idea they were leaving for good. They were just looking for a good opportunity for themselves and their children. Other Hong Kong people were looking more strategically. In their heart of hearts, they would prefer to stay in Hong Kong and enjoy the lifestyle and all things Chinese that they were used to. But they wanted the best of all opportunities for their children. They wanted to be in Canada or Australia long enough to obtain citizenship and foreign passports for themselves and their children, and then they felt they could go anywhere and do business anywhere. If the situation in Hong Kong stabilized, they would return to Hong Kong. If they could continue to do business in China and make a lot of money, they were quite well situated to do that.

The situation that affected the U.S. in particular was, many American companies, as well as the U.S. Government, found our Hong Kong employees very jittery about their situation come 1997. This was especially the case for FS nationals and employees of companies on the Chinese black list as having helped in some way with the democracy movement. That included franchises like McDonald’s or Kentucky Fried Chicken, perhaps even some of the large foreign banks in Beijing that had been vehicles for transmitting funds to the democracy demonstrators. The Hong Kong employees felt they were going to be given the third degree by the PRC authorities come 1997. Our own FSNs knew they were going to be an anomaly and no one had an answer for their many questions. In China, and this may be unique in the entire world, we were not able to employ Foreign Service nationals as true employees of the U.S. government. The government of China required that all diplomatic establishments, and up until quite recently all corporations as well, could only employ workers provided from a particular corporation run by the Chinese government. In the case of the embassies, this was the Diplomatic Services Bureau, and the people that we were permitted to employ were usually Chinese Foreign Service or intelligence workers. So, we needed – anybody needs – chauffeurs, typists, and telephone operators, multifarious people that maintain certain types of services in the embassy. We knew that those people that we were bringing under our roof were indeed spies for China. This was true. We had to go that route in our embassy in Beijing and in the four constituent posts that we had in Mainland China. In Hong Kong, we employed Foreign Service national employees and we did not know whether we would be able to continue to employ them after 1997 or not. Under previous law, the Consulate General had the ability to provide facilitated immigration for workers of long standing to the U.S. Government, but this had usually been accomplished in a particular way. A Foreign Service national who had given 30 years of outstanding service to the U.S. Government at the end of his or her career and getting ready to retire could petition the consulate to provide facilitated immigration to the U.S. under a special category of the law. Usually, that was granted. But it was at the end of a career.

There was no provision to provide facilitated immigration to someone who would be planning to remain on the rolls of the U.S. Government, and there was no provision under immigration law to provide a similar deal for an equivalent worker for an American corporation. In other words, someone who had worked for Citibank or another American corporation abroad perhaps could arrange to immigrate to the U.S., but that person would be handled under the normal provisions of the immigration law. There was no special deal for that person. We in the U.S. Government and the American Chamber of Commerce collectively realized in the wake of the Tiananmen Square incident that we had a problem. We also had a Congress that was sensitized or could be sensitized to this issue. So, we jointly petitioned for a change of law, that was brought about in the 1990-1991 period, for a special provision for Hong Kong. I don't think it was granted to any other place, although there may have been some other place that got in on its coattails. The new law allowed us to provide a facilitated visa for people who were already FSNs in our government and wanted to remain on the rolls working for us as long as they felt they could do that. It provided a similar provision for Hong Kong workers of American firms that would probably continue to work for those American firms but might have to do so in the U.S. for their own well being. There were some other provisions as well. Immigrant visas were made available for Hong Kong investors who agreed to invest something like $1 million and employ a certain number of people in the U.S., the U.S. created an escape valve for several categories of Hong Kong people. Obviously for a period of time, for a period of some years, the visa work line at the consulate shot up as a result of this visa program. We got a lot of positive publicity from this. The U.S., which had always been the immigration destination of choice, became even more so.

High regard for the U.S. already held by Hong Kong people went through the roof. This was partly because we were measured in the minds of Hong Kong people against Britain. Britain had been petitioned as well by the Hong Kong people to provide facilitated immigration. They came up with a plan that paled greatly in comparison with what we did. In actual numbers, perhaps there were more immigration slots available from Britain than from the U.S. But the way they described their program to the Hong Kong people made it quite obvious it was greatly restricted. There were a lot of people who should have been assisted by the British program who were not, at least not initially. What Britain said was, "We will give immigration slots to 50,000 people." That included individuals and their families so that it was 50,000 "packages." That included a total number of 250,000. But certain provisions had to be met. I believe the individual had to have been born in Hong Kong, and so could not have been from China and then naturalized as a Hong Kong resident. It usually had to be someone who was fluent in English, had a university education. It was better if they were in the UK, had worked for the Hong Kong government at a high level or commanded a certain professional position or something like that. So, it was very obvious that Britain was going to skim off the cream from the top. There was nothing left for people lower down who also might find it inconvenient to remain in Hong Kong after 1997. Some of those groups were important. For example, Britain had a special branch of the police who were very important in Hong Kong, from the standpoint of fighting crime, especially international organized crime, also from the standpoint of gathering intelligence regarding China and whatever was going on across the border. There were parts of the border that were quite porous where all kinds of things could happen. There were both a sea and a land border where a lot of things went across on a continuous basis. The U.S. had a lot at stake in maintaining this flow of information. We relied as much as Britain on the work of the Special Branch. Many of the members of the Special Branch were Chinese and were not, on the face of it, part of this special immigration process that Britain had talked about. I think that subsequently after some of our discussions with Britain, a way was found for at least some of them to get out of Hong Kong. But it was a lacuna; it was a gap in Britain's initial policy.

There were several other groups that were not provided for at all by the British policy. One of them was the very unusual group of Indians living in Hong Kong. During the heyday of the British colony in the Victorian period, Britain had imported a number of laborers from India, mostly to build roads but for other purposes as well. There was actually a period when most of the police throughout the British Empire were from India. The Chinese didn't do that at the time. For road building in Hong Kong, it was necessary to bring laborers from somewhere else because the Chinese believed in the importance of "feng shui," literally "the wind and the water." What it means is the proper placement of things, mostly buildings, but other civil structures, as well. This is the belief in the proper placement of such structures for the well-being of the families that are going to live there or the people who are going to work there. On Hong Kong Island and in certain other parts of the colony, there are rather high mountains. The British wanted to cut roads through passes or make tunnels. That work was greatly resisted by the Chinese people living there, including the Chinese laborers the British might have intended for that purpose. The Chinese felt that they would be cutting the dragon's tail, or they would spill the dragon's blood under that land formation, and as a result that would diminish the prosperity of the place. So, Britain imported Indian laborers to build those roads and other constructions. What happened was, they remained in Hong Kong. They didn't go back to India. They took various menial positions. Generally speaking, they had poor education. After some generations, the only language they spoke was Cantonese. They didn't speak English or any Indian dialect. Because it was so many years after India's independence, India closed the door on these people. They said they could not return to India to live. Britain said, "You can't go to England to live." The PRC very unhelpfully said after 1997, "We do not want anyone in Hong Kong to be a resident unless they're Chinese." So, China also left these people out. They were not a large number, about 10,000. We thought that these people might become stateless and be put on a ship to nowhere. It was a problem and we felt it was a problem that Britain needed to address. I believe they did at least address it for the majority somehow, but I'm not entirely clear how they finally did. During the period that I was in Hong Kong, this continued to be a hot issue.

Another similar issue was what to do with the 200 or so Gurkha soldiers who had been recruited by Britain years ago in Nepal for the British army and served with distinction in many cases. Many of them had remained in Hong Kong after they had been discharged from the British army. During the period I was in Hong Kong, the British were rapidly disbanding the various military units they had stationed there, and if they were British, they were returning to Britain. For the Gurkhas, it was a question of what could happen. If they were Nepalis and married to Nepalis, they could have returned to Nepal. But many of these Gurkha soldiers had married Chinese women from Hong Kong. Under the British Hong Kong government, they were permitted to remain there as Hong Kong residents, but they themselves were not able to become legal Hong Kong residents. As long as their wives were there, they were okay. But because they were not Chinese, the Chinese government had said they could not remain there after 1997. It was not entirely clear to me what would happen to them either. So, they were another possible group of stateless people.

Then the other final group that was a real heartburn for all of us was so-called “economic refugees” from Vietnam. During the mid-late 1980s, there were vast waves of migration of boat people from Vietnam northwards towards China. Many of them went on rafts of the type that sometimes people leave Caribbean islands on heading toward the United States. They were leaky vessels and when they arrived on Chinese shores, the Chinese, who didn’t want refugees (certainly not from Vietnam -- there is no love lost between those people), would help them make their boat seaworthy and then wave them along to Hong Kong. They would have to pass by Macau before they got to Hong Kong. The Macau authorities did not want them remaining there, so they would also very unhelpfully wave them on to Hong Kong. There was no place beyond Hong Kong to go. So, a total of more than 50,000 of these people arrived in Hong Kong. There were no other possible destinations for them. The Hong Kong Government didn’t want them mingling with Hong Kong society. So, they built what looked like concentration camps for these people and walled them off and tried to maintain some basic services for them but also keep them separate from the Hong Kong population. This became a political issue, both in Hong Kong and with respect to China. First of all, at that time, the Hong Kong economy was booming. I don’t know exactly what the unemployment rate was, but there were a lot of employment opportunities available at the low level. So, on the one hand, the UN High Commission for Refugees and various NGOs working with them were trying to catalogue all of these people and determine whether among them were any political refugees. On the other hand, the Hong Kong Government was looking to provide them some opportunity to work if they were willing to do so for the period they would remain in Hong Kong. Several things became apparent. Most of these people were refugees from North Vietnam, not South Vietnam. So, very few of them had any connection with the Government of South Vietnam or had participated in any way with the effort of the U.S. Government that would have enabled us to provide a kind of fig leaf of political refugee status. Very, very few. Of 50,000, maybe 2,000 at the most were accorded political refugee status in the U.S. or elsewhere. Most of them were deemed “economic migrants.” They came from impoverished villages in North Vietnam and really there was nothing to be done for them as refugees. So, those who were willing were essentially allowed to work in Hong Kong on a day labor basis if they would agree to return to the refugee camps at night. That gave them some economic wherewithal. The UN High Commissioner for Refugees and various other social organizations tried to provide medical care, education, etc. for the children and families in these camps. Of course, during that period, their numbers were burgeoning. Britain was beside itself because at the time, the U.S. was not really facilitating their return to Vietnam. On the one hand, we were saying, “We would like Britain to continue to house these people. We would like them to return to Vietnam on a voluntary basis. We can’t do more than that.” China was telling the British government, “As of 1997, we will not allow any of these Vietnamese refugees to be in Hong Kong, so you’ve got to find some way to get them back to Vietnam.” We were saying, “But they can only go back on a voluntary basis.” Well, during the time I was there, Britain did force some of the refugees back on what were termed “non-voluntary resettlements.” We got the UN High Commission for Refugees, and perhaps other UN agencies as well, to be on the receiving end in Vietnam when these people got off the plane to verify that they would not be penalized politically for having departed Vietnam. The people were also provided an economic development package to help them resettle in their village or elsewhere in Vietnam to assuage our own sense of humanity. But even so, it took from a high in 1990 of about 50,000 certainly all of the time until 1997 to whittle that down to a couple of thousand. I believe there are still some Vietnamese refugees in Hong Kong. By now, perhaps some of them have married Hong Kong women. That was already happening when I was there as one way that they were trying to remain in Hong Kong. In any event, that problem sort of whittled down, but it took a lot of effort to get there.

Q: We were very much involved in standing on the sidelines.

DONAHUE: That's right. We couldn't do more than that for domestic political reasons. This is an example of a problem that U.S. foreign policy helped bring about, but was not really able to resolve.

Q: This is a good place to stop. There is one other thing. I would like on this Hong Kong time, 1989-1992, to talk about the problem of corruption as seen from Hong Kong. There was quite a lot of corruption in the Mainland Chinese system, including connections with the Chinese military and all that. What were we seeing? Where did you go after that?

DONAHUE: I left Hong Kong to return to Washington for an assignment in the Office of the USTR.

Q: Today is July 3, 2000. Do you want to talk a bit about our take on corruption within government circles in the Mainland Chinese regime?

DONAHUE: Sure. In order to talk about corruption, I have to mention a group of organizations referred to as the "triad," which traditionally was something akin to a Chinese mafia.

Q: We used to call them "tongs."

DONAHUE: That's right. A tong would be an individual group like a gang. The triad is the organization as a whole. Traditionally, there were secret societies that were involved in some criminal activity in China. Sometimes the activity would be more political; other times, it would be primarily criminal. The triads were tolerated to some extent by most Chinese dynasties. There was a kind of pattern that as a dynasty was waning and losing its power, there was a resurgence of these groups, and many of the disaffected intellectuals moved to these groups for protection. What we saw in the early 1990s in Hong Kong was a rise of activity of the triads. There were several reasons for this. During the period 1950-1985 or so, both the British and the PRC governments had vehemently opposed crime and had sought to at least pressure these groups. They weren't going to be able to put them out of business, but they were backed into a corner. So, in that part of China, one of these safe harbors for the Chinese underworld was Macau. The Portuguese Government didn't have the same power that the British government had to police their activities. What we saw happening in the late 1980s was, under the liberalization influence of Deng Xiaoping, these organizations felt more free to engage in criminal activity. Because trade in general had been liberalized, some of these organizations went into legitimate trade, usually as brokers rather than producers. Undoubtedly, some of their capital was also recycled in production because that was a way to launder money.

So, what we saw happen was, in the early 1980s, when China first began to decide that international trade was important, not only was the central government going after that trade, but it was also facing competition from provincial governments. There was a profusion of Mainland offices being set up in Hong Kong with names that we had never heard of before, and it was not always clear whether they were official or unofficial, or whether they really had the backing of the province that was claimed. I think that this was a period when a lot of these underworld organizations took advantage of a fluid situation to establish themselves in business or at least make themselves look legitimate. Also, in our previous experience in Hong Kong, there had been very low incidents of street crime, and certainly very little crime affecting foreigners. Places in Hong Kong where foreigners tended to predominate seemed to be off limits for even petty crime, like being held up for your wallet or something. During the 1989-1992 period, however, there was an obvious increase in crime and it was a kind of bold crime often under the nose of the police. A typical crime would take place in some of the tony shopping centers in Central District in Hong Kong where there would be two or three blocks filled with jewelry stores and gold stores. Some of them were broken into quite brazenly even during the day. Some of our friends had their pocketbooks taken even in very nice downtown shopping malls. Another problem that was probably worse was large-scale theft of automobiles from Hong Kong, all of which were taken into China. Some of the heists were so brazen that they were taking very high-priced Mercedes and placing them in a rubber bag, sealing it, and then towing it at the end of a high-speed boat to elude the police. During that period, the Hong Kong police bought high-speed airboats to apprehend the criminals on the water, but they were prohibited from going into Chinese territorial waters. The belief was that this activity could not take place without the connivance of authorities in China and the province closest to Hong Kong, Guangdong.

Q: I've heard stories where people have gone there and identified some of the cars and they're being driven around by ranking PLA Army officers.

DONAHUE: Yes, that's right. We know that happened and we know of Hong Kong people who had to pay to ride in their own vehicles while visiting China. Obviously, there were many opportunities for people in China, whether they were with the central government or the provincial government, and they took advantage of those opportunities.

During that time, there was also quite obviously a difference in point of view between the Chinese military in Guangdong and the central government. We were watching closely whether Mainland Chinese would try to sell any of their weapons or weapon products to other countries through Hong Kong. There were times that we got a whiff of questionable material flowing through Hong Kong, probably as samples, but it's not clear exactly where it was going. Nevertheless, there were opportunities and there was probably even more of that type of activity taking place in Macau.

Q: Was there any talk at this time among you China hands in the early 1990s about the possibility of a rupture in China and a breakup of China? China is essentially an empire. It's the only empire left. Was this talked about?

DONAHUE: This question has been a matter of discussion and debate for most of the 20th century. When there was a very weak central government, it certainly looked as though a number of separate countries were going to form in China. That sense of fracture was ended by the strong central government that the communists put together. However, there have been times when that has been under assault, certainly during the Cultural Revolution. We did find that in the wake of the 1989 Tiananmen massacre, there was a great deal of dissension throughout China, and some provinces were seeking to move away from the line laid down by the central government. I am sure that it became more difficult and complicated for the central government to maintain adherence to its general policies in some of those provinces. The problem areas generally were southern China (Guangdong had often tried to demonstrate its independence from Beijing), and then west of Guangdong, the province of Yunnan, which borders on Burma and Thailand, and a lot of drug traffic goes across that border. I think that the existence of the drug traffic alone may be evidence that the central government in Beijing does not have as strong control there as it would like to have people believe. Other areas are Tibet and Xinjiang, the northwestern province of China near the new republics formed in former Soviet Central Asia with the collapse of the Soviet Union. Both of those provinces have a large proportion of so-called “minority people.” That is, they are minority nationalities in terms of China. Both of those provinces have been the target of a great effort for maybe 20 years by China to resettle Han Chinese – that is, Chinese-speaking people – into those provinces for both economic and political reasons. Tibet, which I have never visited, now does have a majority Han Chinese population. Xinjiang province may also. At least, the Han Chinese may outnumber the other minorities, because Tibet had essentially one minority, which was Tibetan people. Northwest China had a number of minorities: Uighurs, Uzbeks, Kyrgyz, and many smaller groups. There were people in that province from all of the nationalities in the neighboring Central Asian republics, and probably some Mongolians as well. I think the most vocal politically are the Uighurs, but all of those groups are there and all of them collectively wanted to resist the increased Chinese presence. Because they did not represent a single large group like the Tibetans that could go head to head with the Chinese, they didn’t have that political ability. I’m sure that the collapse of the Soviet Union and the establishment of the separate republics on the other side of the border intensified pressure on Beijing to make sure that that northwest province did not go the same way, that it remained within China. It’s actually an economically important province, but it’s difficult for China to take advantage of its potential because it’s located so far inland that the cost of transport to the coast is prohibitive.

Q: One last question on China. I’m talking about how you all were looking at it at the time. I remember interviewing somebody who was in Poland in the late 1970s. He said there were probably three dedicated communists in Poland at the time. The rest were opportunists. What about in China? What was the feeling about this vast effort to indoctrinate the people running around with the Little Red Book? How was it taking?

DONAHUE: That is also a complicated question. You can look at it a number of ways. One of the problems with Chinese communism is, it’s not always easy to sort out the nationalism from the communism. I think that most Chinese intellectuals were staunch nationalists and to the extent that what the communists were espousing was what they felt China needed to do to be a strong country, they supported it. However, there were many aspects of communism that they did not support. It was very clear that after a major effort under Mao to establish communes and get rid of private property, that did not work. When Deng Xiaoping returned to power and allowed what he called “economic reform,” which was the development of a market economy, there was a lot of interest in this. There was a groundswell of support. The inevitable result was, some people got quite rich and flaunted their wealth, which had been a taboo during the many years of Maoist communism, and that got some resistance. The intellectuals, that is, the people who would read the newspaper propaganda on a regular basis and would even be writing some of it, people participating in high-level government positions – they would support the Communist Party as long as it was clearly in their interest to do so. What they were finding, and it became apparent by the mid-1980s and was certainly apparent by 1992, was that people who took advantage of the market economic liberalizing trend under Deng Xiaoping and got into the private sector, those were the ones pulling ahead economically. So, the newspapers were filled with stories about Chinese who became millionaires, especially in southern and coastal China. Many of them enjoyed a far better quality of life than Communist Party cadres, who began to be resentful. So, no longer could they say that kind of lifestyle was limited to the capitalist countries under imperialist control like Hong Kong. It actually was part of China’s current reality. It was harder for them to deny. Also, they could not deny – I think this was true of officials at the highest level – the benefit to the Chinese economy overall of all of this capitalist economic activity. The problem was how to allow that to happen and at the same time for them to maintain control. I think they still have not sorted it out.

In those years when Deng Xiaoping was still living, in the 1988-1992 period itself, at the level of popular culture, some of the communist heroes were being elevated to a kind of divinity status so that in parts of South China temples were being built to Chairman Mao and even to Zhou En-lai. For a while, the authorities in Beijing thought there might be an effort to steal the body of Mao from his mausoleum in Tiananmen Square, so they actually closed it to the public. During Mao’s entire leadership period, the Communist Party had strongly discouraged this kind of popular religion, which they labeled superstition, as being injurious to society. They subscribed to the theory of atheistic communism and believed that all of a person’s efforts should go into some kind of economic production or political activity rather than be wasted in religion. I think the people of Deng Xiaoping’s type were greatly chagrined that there would be a desire on the part of the common people to deify Mao or at least give him a place of honor at the level of popular religion. I think it’s to be expected. This is probably how Chinese religion developed over some thousands of years. The temples were built to him not because of his communist ideology, but because of his nationalism for China. So, the question of whether a person who is a Communist Party cardholder is truly a communist or not, I think that this belief in so-called “international communism” and the inevitability of communism representing the ultimate stage in historical development had been totally shattered. If it hadn’t been before, it certainly was by the collapse of the Soviet Union. I think that all of the efforts of the Communist Party in China have been given over to how they could allow capitalist economic activity to thrive and have themselves remain in power. I think it’s going to be futile, but I think that probably there is still a majority of Party cadres and government officials who believe that without the Communist Party there would be chaos because they haven’t done anything to foster any kind of democratic activity that could carry on after communism collapses.

Q: Were you seeing an attempt to rationalize production with the normal communist policies on communism, Marxism, etc. both in the schools and the workplace? These take away from education of other things. Communist indoctrination takes considerable time out of the school place and the workplace.

DONAHUE: During this period that we're talking about, 1989-1992, I do not recall having visited a school in China while the classes were in session. I think where this activity of communist indoctrination was strongest was probably in Beijing and other parts of northern China. The coastal area, and certainly southern China, would have been quick to pick up on the importance of teaching skills that were directly related to production and getting rich. I think that if they could have freedom in that regard, they would have tried to jettison or minimize the rote instruction of ideology except for what may be necessary to pass a test.

During this period, and I think it was in 1991, my family visited the village of my father-in-law, which was southwest of Hong Kong. My father-in-law was an immigrant from part of China known in Mandarin as Taishan. The local people pronounce it as "Toisan." Up until the 1960s or so, the majority of Chinese in the United States were from that part of China. Their dialect is a sub-dialect of Cantonese. Despite the fact that the region had always been an agriculturally wealthy part of China, it was also densely populated. So, there was population pressure for people to go abroad and seek their fortunes. This is what so many did, of course. When we went back with my father-in-law to see his family village, on the way to and from, we saw a lot of evidence of overseas Chinese families having constructed many things there. So, a lot of their money was going back to that part of China. The overseas Chinese families were building major vocational high schools to teach mechanics, low level engineering, and the skills needed for factories. Many of the schools operated in conjunction with a factory. Many of the overseas Chinese were businesspeople and they were taking their capital back to China. They were looking to make investments back in their home communities, but they also recognized the need to train skills. I was somewhat surprised because when I had lived in Beijing in the mid-1980s, we had tried to see whether we could enter into some kind of cooperative arrangement between the Beijing International School, of which I was the chairman of the board of directors, and some Chinese schools. We hoped there could be some kind of interchange, even a sports competition that would allow the students to know or learn something about each other. That effort was strongly resisted at the time and we were certainly given the impression by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs that no involvement by foreigners at all in the Chinese educational system would be tolerated. So, when I visited these areas in southern China and saw whole schools being built and textbooks being provided by "foreigners," the difference was, they were overseas Chinese and probably their investment in the school was scrutinized to make sure that it conveyed foreign technology, but not ideology.

Q: Also, what you're saying is that the split between north and south is becoming more and more profound.

DONAHUE: I think that is true. The southern and coastal part of China has always been economically stronger. A big difference is that there are cultural changes that come with this economic development now. They will profoundly affect the willingness of the people to continue to even pay lip service to some elements of communism that just don't pass muster in the modern world.

Q: One last question on this. Were you seeing any change in the spread of Mandarin and Cantonese?

DONAHUE: Without a doubt, the communist government has been quite successful in fostering the spread of Mandarin as the national language. It has been very important politically and culturally for educated people from the entire country to have a common spoken language. From the standpoint of nationalism, encouraging the spread of Mandarin was a common goal of all Chinese governments during the 20th century.

Mandarin is somewhat lower in quality in areas of China where it has a heavy local dialect or patois, or even different tones. Those areas are Shandong province and Sichuan province, especially. They are within the Mandarin speaking area, but it's a heavily accented Mandarin. In coastal China, Shanghai, Fujian, and Guangdong provinces, the quality of Mandarin is good among Mandarin speakers. Almost anyone under age 40 with a high school education or above would be conversant in Mandarin. It has played a very important role in national unification.

What we saw happen in Hong Kong during this period, 1989-1992, was an intense debate by Hong Kong people over what language they should stress. It was an important debate. Many Hong Kong school educators felt that all Hong Kong public schools at the high school level should teach in English. English is the international language for business and Hong Kong's present and future depended so heavily on international business. They felt that there certainly would not be opportunities for people who were not conversant in English. There is a historical problem, an intrinsic problem, in teaching modern technology in Chinese because Chinese lacks much of the vocabulary. So, at the university level, it is recognized that the teaching of technology has to be in English. Therefore, if Hong Kong is going to move not only into business but also into technology, the city's high school students must be prepared to take that information on board.

At the same time, the University of Hong Kong, which was the premier university, noted that the quality of English for its entering students was declining. Many of us living in Hong Kong also remarked that the English of the average shopkeeper was not quite as good as it had been. There were several reasons for this. One of the principal ones was the great amount of immigration out of Hong Kong by talented people who could immigrate to Australia and Canada and were taking their assets to prepare for their family before Hong Kong would be turned over to China. That exodus provided opportunities in Hong Kong for people who perhaps did not have as much preparation, but it also meant that quality of services was not quite as good as it had been previously. Part of the debate about language recognized the need to maintain good English in schools. Another group felt intensely that 1997 was an opportunity for Hong Kong and Guangdong nationalism. They thought that Hong Kong ought to be fostering education through the high school level in Cantonese, thereby reviving the ancient Cantonese culture. At one time, the area of Guangdong had been a separate kingdom with its own rituals and culture and history, and even its own version of Chinese opera and classical music. Mandarin speakers in the north had quashed those forms of cultural expression. The Cantonese nationalists felt that with their increased economic power, this was an opportunity for an expansion of their cultural presence.

However, many people pointed out that if they went down that road, they were going to face an historical dead end. They were going to run into political problems with Beijing because they expected that come 1997, there would be strong pressure to have Mandarin taught in the schools, at least as a second language. Some Hong Kong business people thought students should become trilingual in Cantonese, Mandarin and English. So, this debate raged. I believe it still has not been entirely resolved, except that there is much more Mandarin spoken in Hong Kong now even in the government, where previously all Chinese employees were speaking Cantonese with each other in meetings, unless there was an expatriate or unless it was a high-level meeting conducted in English. Now, they would also be speaking a lot of Mandarin because the PRC administration was paying close attention to what they were doing. It's interesting that the rise in affluence in southern China and the easing of communication across the border with neighboring Guangdong gave more prominence in China to Cantonese-speaking cultural idols in Hong Kong. So, Jackie Chan and other actors prominent in movies, and pop stars from Hong Kong had quite a following on the other side of the border. Conversely, some singers and other cultural figures from Guangdong also began to have some following in Hong Kong. There was a rise at the popular level of "Hong Kong speak" in Guangdong province's capital city, Guangzhou. People from a fairly wide area of Guangdong province could pick up Hong Kong TV. So, their speech patterns were also going to be affected. There has been an increase in the importance of Cantonese, at least at the local level. However, to do business with the rest of China or with Taiwan, Mandarin is essential.

WALTER A. LUNDY
Republic of China, Desk Officer
Washington, DC (1977-1979)

Walter A. Lundy, Jr. was born in Georgia in 1933. After receiving his bachelor's degree from the University of Georgia in 1954 and serving in the US Air Force from 1954-1958, he received his master's degree from Georgetown University in 1961. His career has included positions in Colombo, Saigon, Hue, New Delhi, Teheran, and Seoul. Mr. Lundy was interviewed by Raymond Ewing in September 2005.

Q: Groups interested in a particular sector or region. Okay, anything else about your good year, better year at the Department of Commerce in '76-'77? Where did you go from there?

LUNDY: I moved to the economic slot on the old Republic of China desk, and that was a very, very good job. I was quite lucky to get it; I thought there were probably enough Chinese language officers available to fill desk jobs related to China. There were no bid lists in those days, but this was just the kind of job I wanted. I thought I would be more competitive for a job back in the NEA bureau, but nothing worked out there. My career counselor in personnel suggested this job to me. I certainly had no better idea at the time, and the East Asia bureau was quite agreeable to taking me back. It turned out to be a very fortunate career decision. Quite a bit was happening on our evolving relationship with China and Taiwan at that time, and I was in on much of it over the next two years.

Q: Why don't you describe in a general sort of way what the context of the situation was at the time that you started in '77 and then talk a little about how things changed in the two years you were there.

LUNDY: The economic desk officer on a busy country desk can exert a considerable amount of influence, particularly when working on an economy which is booming in the way Taiwan's was. There were enormous trade problems, and U.S. and other foreign investment was increasing by leaps and bounds. The country desk receives most of the reporting from all agencies. The economic officer for a particular country probably is the central location for more pertinent information than anyone else in Washington. Just by keeping interested other agency colleagues informed you perform a useful service and earn their gratitude, encouraging them to be more willing to reciprocate by sharing information with you. Everyone gains. You can both promote U.S. interests and help unclog the arteries in the bureaucracy. You can quickly develop a reputation as someone who knows the answers or at least knows where to find them. You also can assist U.S. business interests. There was much demand for a quarterly handout we published covering recent economic developments in Taiwan.

On the political side, it was generally known by then that we were moving toward recognition of Mainland China and the derecognition of Taiwan. This happened about a year and a half after I came to the desk, on January 1, 1979 to be exact. It was in a way a sad time because Taiwan's representatives in Washington, those assigned to the old Republic of China embassy, were first class people. They obviously did not want us to recognize Mainland China. They had bent over backwards to cultivate the desk thinking the bureaucracy might be on their side, but we of course had to be neutral. Recognizing Mainland China in any case was a highly political decision made at the White House. When what came to be termed "normalization" of the U.S. relationship with China took place, the U.S. Government worked out about as sensible an arrangement as could be expected to continue a meaningful relationship with Taiwan. Fleshing out the nuts and bolts was the work of the bureaucracy. As I understand it, U.S.-Taiwan relations continue to this day to adhere to the ground rules put in place in early 1979, which was passed by Congress as the Taiwan Relations Act. We maintain an office in Taipei staffed by Foreign Service officers on temporary leave from the Foreign Service, who are assigned to the Taiwan coordination staff while they are posted to Taipei.

Taiwan in Washington is represented by the Coordinating Council for North American Affairs. There never has been a blip in our working economic relations with Taiwan. American investors did not pull out; trade continued to expand quite rapidly. Taiwan in relation to Mainland China, of course, is a very small country. The United States has made it clear to the governments on both sides of the Formosa Strait that working out the future relationship between China and Taiwan is essentially their responsibility. On the other hand, we have maintained enough of a military presence in East Asia to deter China, which militarily is much stronger than Taiwan, from taking rash actions. We want the dispute to be settled peacefully, not by force of arms. As China and Taiwan have continued to prosper, they both have too much to lose should a war break out. The situation, of course, is far more complicated than we can discuss here. In addition to China and Taiwan, South Korea, North Korea, Japan, indeed all of East Asia, have important regional interests in finding a peaceful solution to the issue.

Q: As the economic officer on the Republic of China desk, to what extent were you involved in relations with Congress?

LUNDY: Not very much on the econ side. There were three political officers on the desk, and they tended to handle Congressional relations. I became involved only when some member of Congress became very interested in a trade problem. These were the days of bilateral textile agreements, orderly marketing arrangements, and voluntary restraint arrangements with Taiwan and other prospering developing countries. These mainly covered politically sensitive export items in which American producers were rapidly becoming less and less competitive and losing market share.

Q: To me it's interesting what you say about Holbrooke's interest in what was happening even on the economic side with the Republic of China; somehow, I guess I would have been a little surprised. There were so many other things going on that you would think that's an area he would let someone else handle...

LUNDY: Oh he let Earl Heginbotham, the econ deputy assistant secretary, also a former Vietnam colleague, handle most economic issues.

Q: Or with the. . . , presumably there was another DAS responsible for China?

LUNDY: Right, that was Roger Sullivan, and before him Bill Gleysteen. They were both China specialists. I didn't work all that closely with either of them but of course my boss, Harvey Feldman, and Dave Brown, who was the deputy director, worked through them. There was a junior political officer as well. I was lucky in having economic issues mostly to myself. Harvey told me early on to keep him informed, but he preferred not being involved in day to day US/Taiwan economic problems. He also was a manager who knew how to delegate.

Q: Now you mentioned that not much changed in trade and investment relations with Taiwan after normalization with the People's Republic. Of course, there was no longer an Embassy in Taipei, just the American Institute.

LUNDY: Right, the American Institute in Taiwan.

Q: In Taiwan.

LUNDY: Yes.

Q: Other than the name change in terms of the economic reporting, the work that the people involved did stayed about the same?

LUNDY: Pretty much the same, yes.

Q: And there was now this other layer in Washington connected with the American Institute in Taiwan?

LUNDY: I think the American Institute in Taiwan's Washington office is also called the American Institute in Taiwan, but my memory may be failing me there. The outgoing economic counselor at the Embassy in Taipei, Joe Kyle, became assistant director.

Q: In the Washington office?

LUNDY: Yes, the Washington office which actually was located over in Rosslyn. By the time it was functioning and bureaucratic relationships had been established, I had left the desk. My feeling is that Joe did not try to micromanage whatever functions were left in the State Department. The Taiwan coordination staff in the Department eventually became part of the China desk and was reduced to two or three officers. Ross Parr replaced me in the economic officer slot, but I don't think the job changed very much. I assume it was down graded to some extent.

Q: OK, before we talk about that, is there anything else we ought to say about your time as economic-commercial officer for Republic of China affairs, as the economic officer on the desk?

LUNDY: No, except that I finally got promoted after eight and a half years as an FSO-4. The job certainly helped me out of a serious career slump.

Q: OK, in '79 you moved over to the office of economic policy, which I think covers the whole East Asia Pacific region, but I don't know all that much about it. You were deputy director, so there was a director. Why don't you talk a little first about the structure and then about the function of the office and what you did particularly.

LUNDY: Well, a deputy director may sometimes have trouble justifying his existence in an office that is not too busy. Again I was lucky; problems stemming from rapid East Asian economic growth and rising exports from the area to the U.S. kept us very well occupied. Our huge trade deficit with Japan was drawing more and more attention. South Korea was somewhat poorer on a per capita basis than Taiwan but was growing just as rapidly. The Association of South East Asian Nations (ASEAN) as it is called, then comprising only five countries, was still in its formative years but also growing very rapidly. The ASEAN governments tended to be conservative and pro-American, in spite of the recent debacle in Vietnam. Southeast Asia was thriving outside of the old Indo-China countries. All of this activity kept the office extremely busy.

Q: So the office in addition to major issues such as trade relations with Japan was very much involved in regional economic matters. There were economic officers serving on the country desks, as you had for Taiwan, with whom you also worked closely?

LUNDY: Yes, quite closely. There were some disagreements over turf, but on the whole relations within the bureau were amicable. We probably fought most often with the Japan desk, which always has been noted for its parochialism. To a lesser extent, the China desk had a similar reputation, but things were changing so rapidly in that relationship there was seldom time to argue over turf. In general we were working in tandem with all the country desks. There was no ASEAN desk; that work tended to gravitate toward our office. Each desk had at least one economic officer, and some had two or three.

Dick Holbrooke's leadership and management style fostered good working relations throughout the bureau. He just would not tolerate people keeping things too close to their chests. We were supposed to keep each other well informed. A regional office fulfills much of its purpose simply by making sure people know what they need to know about policies and procedures which might not otherwise come to their attention. Sometimes regional offices just get in the way of desks, but I hope we kept that kind of obstruction to a minimum.

Q: To what extent were you involved with South Korea's external economic relations other than with the United States, with China with other parts of the world?

LUNDY: One of the economic section officers made some excellent contacts on South Korea/Mainland China trade. We did some reporting which was much appreciated in Washington. Two-way trade between Mainland China and South Korea was just beginning, and very little was known about it. Back then there was some political opposition in South Korea to trade with China which stemmed from memories of the Korean War. Now the two countries are huge trading partners.

WALTER F. MONDALE
Vice President
Washington, DC (1977-1981)

Vice President Mondale was born and raised in Minnesota. A graduate of the University of Minnesota and its Law School, Mr. Mondale served as State Attorney General before his appointment and subsequent election as United States Senator from the State of Minnesota. Elected Vice President of the United States in 1976, Mr. Mondale served for the duration of the Carter Administration as active participant and advisor. President Clinton nominated him United States Ambassador to Japan, where he served from 1993 through 1996. Throughout his career Mr. Mondale has contributed substantially to the welfare of the nation in both the public and private sectors.

Q: Anyway, we were talking about China.

MONDALE: Now we're going to China. That was one of my most important trips. We had had the opening to China about a half a year or a year before when we established... in fact, broke the ice and announced that our presence in Taiwan would be some kind of a foundation, a non-governmental relationship, and that our relationship would be with one China whose capital was Beijing. Following that, we had normalization. Then there seemed to be a kind of a dead spot for 4 or 5 months where we had gotten the bare bones in place but then things were starting to drift downward in stasis. So, my trip was designed to try to get some momentum started in our relationship.

As we prepared for this trip, I did something that I did on all my trips that I thought worked very well. That is, we'd sit down and figure out every conceivable thing that could be an issue in this case with China and every conceivable significant interest that we had pursuing with China and their leaders to serve our national interest. We had a big agenda there because we were trying to open up trade, we were trying to establish a cooperative intelligence relationship, we were trying in this case to get some yet secret cooperation that allowed us to better watch the Soviet Union, we were breaking the ice with a country where it had been awfully icy. So, one of the first things you do when you do that is, you realize that a lot of decisions in our own government that are deadlocked or paralyzed or hidden or unresolved, the intradepartmental disputes and so on, and that was one of the things I could do as Vice President. I could shoot those issues out of there. Then when I came to China, we were really ready. (Secretary of State) Cy Vance has said this was one of the most successful trips in our 4 years.

We took a lagging relationship and turned it around and they really felt good about it, the Chinese did. We worked out Ex-Im Bank credits. We worked out new trade relationships. We developed new rules on export controls that were different than that on the Soviet Union, which they really liked. They allowed me to speak to the University of Beijing on national television. We were able to... I think it really worked and it showed how a vice president can push through changes in the American government so you can come ready to do business. They saw that and it made a big difference.

Q: The other part of that goes back to something we were talking about earlier in terms of public acceptance of policy. Obviously, you'd have to sell normalization with China. Much academic writing has covered the way in which normalization was presented and rationalized. I would suspect that you would agree with the idea that you understood that there was going to be political opposition from the legislature and that in handling that issue you had to be very cognizant of your public support.

MONDALE: Oh, yes, and I was there on the night that the President made his announcement on his dramatic change of policy toward Taiwan and toward China. I was there with Brzezinski and the others when we told what might be called the "Taiwan lobby" what the new situation was. They were furious. They had said that we had promised to consult with them if there were any changes and here we were telling them 2 minutes before the President went on the air to announce it. It was a sign of what was going to come. It was not well received by those who had these ideas about Taiwan. There was an old part of America that identified with Taiwan, hated China, didn't see any chances of reform there. But I would say, overall, the policy was well received in America at large, that they liked the idea of ending this impasse between our 2 nations, they liked the idea of engaging, trying to improve relationships, exchanges, and all the rest, and doing business. By and large, we had that residual resentment that I've described, but overall, the policy was very well received in America.

Q: One of the advantages of your trip was to help focus both our organizations and their organizations on the policy change. At this time, I was negotiating the aviation agreement. I was on the China desk at that time. We were also negotiating a maritime agreement with them. They wanted to do something that we thought was very strange. They wanted an annex to the agreement that would list the ports that US ships could go to, but it had to be equivalent. Well, we have 3 coasts: the Atlantic, the Gulf, and the Pacific. They have a single coast. So, we thought, "How are we going to balance this out?" Finally one of the Chinese negotiators took me aside and said, "This is a mechanism for us to communicate to the provinces and the cities that this is real," that they would have to begin to prepare themselves to receive American shipping and in doing that, that would prove to them that the policy change was real, it wasn't temporary. So they were having their own issues with getting local government and the public on board with the policy. So, I've always thought the normalization policy with China was a fair illustration of your domestic audience and your foreign audience and getting those policies in line.

MONDALE: Right. And that was going on in both countries. We were there, but I think that that trip really changed some perceptions over there. One of the things we did was open up that consulate in Shanghai that you were involved in, once again, trying to put flesh on the bones and show that we were serious about this. I still feel very good about that trip.

Q: It was really exciting to backstop you on the desk.

MONDALE: It was really fun. You had that whole generation of top Chinese career officials who had gone through the terrible days of the last days of Mao Zedong.

Q: The Cultural Revolution.

MONDALE: Yes, and they were finally passed it, and many of them had been victims but were now in government again. Many of them felt especially close to us and felt really good about the fact that America was coming in there now and changing things. We heard many stories about the Cultural Revolution.

THOMAS P. SHOESMITH
Hong Kong (1977-1981)

Thomas P. Shosmith was born in 1939 and raised in Pennsylvania. His career in the State Department included posts in Japan, Hong Kong, South Korea, and an ambassadorship to Malaysia. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1991.

Q: Well, you went to the Senior Seminar for, what, a year? You had been the Deputy Chief of Mission for about five years and you had received an assignment to be Consul General in Hong Kong. You served in Hong Kong from 1977 to 1981. How did that assignment come about?

SHOESMITH: Well, I had been in Tokyo for five years and I guess they were looking for a place for me to go. Hong Kong opened up and the then senior Deputy Assistant Secretary, Ambassador Gleysteen, or subsequently Ambassador Gleysteen, called me one day and asked me if I would like to go to Hong Kong as Consul General. And that's how it happened.

Q: Well, what was the situation in Hong Kong. At one point it was our preeminent China listening and watching post.

SHOESMITH: It still was in 1977.

Q: Why?

SHOESMITH: Well, because our Liaison Office -- this was before normalization -- in Beijing was small, and it was the only presence we had in China at the time. There was the Consulate General in Hong Kong. It had a very large complement, both economic, political, and intelligence. Both the CIA and military intelligence. It was a very good collection point for information about the Mainland. There were many people that went back and forth. Publications were available in Hong Kong from the Mainland, and the Consulate General at that time was still doing translations from the Mainland press. So there were many resources available in Hong Kong for China watching. That was true even after normalization for a time. It is probably less true now.

Q: Did you also serve, in a way, as the consular post for Guangzhou?

SHOESMITH: No, Guangzhou was not opened until 1979, I believe it was. We had no official contact with the Mainland at all until normalization of diplomatic relations. We assisted the opening of the Consulate in Guangzhou. This was the first.

Q: Well, did you travel or go into China?

SHOESMITH: No. Not until after normalization.

Q: I mean, was it media policy to keep up this quasi-relationship or was it on the part of the Chinese to show that we...

SHOESMITH: Well, travel to China by official Americans was very limited at that time. There was no particular need for us to go, and we couldn't do political and economic reporting. We could do it better in Hong Kong than by being in China itself because your movements were so restricted.

Q: Well, here you have a large staff and you were reporting on conditions in China. How did you get your information?

SHOESMITH: Well, as I say, a lot of it was from open sources -- periodicals, newspapers. A good bit of it was interviewing people who came from the Mainland. Or listening to or monitoring radio broadcasts. In that fashion. That had been going on for years, so it was a very well developed system. I think it was very productive.

Q: Well, you must have had an extensive file...

SHOESMITH: Oh, of course, and the people we had on the staff, for the most part they were China experts. They had lots of background on China. Many of them in INR.

Q: That's Intelligence and Research. How about cooperation with some of the other countries -- particularly the British who were...

SHOESMITH: Well, there was a certain amount of that, and both the military and the CIA had good contacts with their counterparts in the Hong Kong Government. Those were the primary sources, I believe, within the Hong Kong Government. Apart from that, I mean, there were very few, other organizations. There were private research groups in Hong Kong- -a variety of research groups that we kept in contact with that had their own sources and resources, analytical groups that we would contact. These were mostly private groups that were China watchers as well. There were journalists. Occasionally, journalists were able to go in and out of China.

Q: Well, the reversion of Hong Kong to Chinese control...

SHOESMITH: That is scheduled for 1997, but that agreement that was reached between the British and the Chinese Governments did not occur until after I had left. So reversion of Hong Kong to Chinese control in those years when I was there was not regarded as a near term matter. It was regarded as a remote possibility. It did not seriously affect Hong Kong itself or the way in which it operated politically or economically. It was only after 1981 that this began to gather steam, culminating in the agreement, whenever that was.

Q: Was your Consular Section feeling any pressure on people looking ahead to whatever might be...

SHOESMITH: No. Not at all.

SHOESMITH: No. I'm sure there was some of that but it was not an appreciable problem. It was not an appreciable trend at that time. Again, this only began to happen well into the 1980's.

Q: What about Americans? We had a lot of trouble earlier on. I think you've mentioned Americans who get on the outs, drift into Chinese waters and are picked up. Were relationships such that this was no longer...

SHOESMITH: There were no incidents in the four years that I was there. I can't recall how much, if any, American travel there was into China at that time from Hong Kong. If there was any, I suspect it was very limited. But there were no incidents like that at the time. Maybe people were more careful, maybe the Chinese were less strict. But there wasn't any problem.

Q: Were you only watching China or were you also watching Vietnam?

SHOESMITH: We had a small Southeast Asia-Vietnam brief with one officer that followed events in Vietnam. For the most part, it was pretty marginal. The information available to us in Hong Kong about developments in Indochina was very limited. A few of the other consulates general had relations with Vietnam, and occasionally we'd see some of their people when they came into Hong Kong. Some of the press occasionally visited there. We had one officer, full-time, in that area. But it was, I think, pretty marginal.

Q: Well, there must have been the problem of boat people coming out of Vietnam.

SHOESMITH: Well, that started in 1979. But the boat people were not significant sources of intelligence. I mean, they were all farmers and fishermen and people of that sort and, as a source of intelligence on Vietnam, not very great, although some effort was made to exploit that resource. When the boat people began to arrive in Hong Kong in 1979, as they did in other parts of Southeast Asia, that became a major responsibility of the Consulate because we were involved in the processing of these people to identify those who might be able to come to the United States.

Q: Were you getting pressure from Washington, then, to try to get the British and the Hong Kong authorities to take more people and not just leave it to us...

SHOESMITH: No, because the understanding at that time in 1979, I think it followed an international conference on refugees in 1979, was that if the various countries, such as Hong Kong, Thailand, Indonesia, and Malaysia would accept these refugees and give them what was called "first asylum," the other, major countries made a commitment to resettle the refugees. At that time, at the start of these programs, it was generally considered by our government that anybody that fled Vietnam was a political refugee, under the terms of our legislation at that time. Not everyone agreed with that, either in the United States or elsewhere. With that assurance that they would be resettled, the British Government, or the Hong Kong Government, at very considerable expense, and at some political cost, began to receive the refugees and to house them. They developed, for some of the refugees, a system whereby they could go into the community and work and return to the camps at night. I said, "some political cost," because, at the same time as the Hong Kong Government was receiving these refugees, giving them first asylum, they were returning people who fled the mainland of China into Hong Kong. They would be rounded up from time to time...

Q: These would be Chinese?

SHOESMITH: And sent back to the Mainland. Of course, some of those people who came in had relatives in Hong Kong. So the relatives and other persons who were sympathetic to that position took exception to the fact that the Hong Kong Government was giving this asylum and receiving these refugees, while it was turning away the people coming in from China. The difference, of course, was that the Hong Kong Government had a commitment that these refugees would not be permanent residents in Hong Kong. They would be resettled, whereas those who came in from the Mainland were seeking permanent residence.

Q: Did you have a problem with the way the United States Government was responding? I mean, these boat people would come in. We made commitments to the Hong Kong authorities. We and other refugee-receiving countries would get them out...

SHOESMITH: No, up until 1981 we in the United States were taking substantial numbers of refugees from Hong Kong and elsewhere. The United States, Australia, and Canada were the main resettlement countries. Although there was some concern in INS [Immigration and Naturalization Service, U. S. Dept of Justice], for example, as to whether these were genuine refugees or whether they were political refugees.

Q: You mean economic refugees.

SHOESMITH: I mean economic refugees. That didn't become a serious problem while I was there. It did subsequently.

Q: Well, tell me. During your tour there, it sounds like a line right through it. The Carter Administration came in and in 1979 China was recognized. We sort of derecognized the Republic of China on Taiwan. How was this received in Hong Kong by the Chinese community in Hong Kong, and did it make any change in your work?

SHOESMITH: Well, I don't have any recollection of how it was received by the people in Hong Kong. Well, I would imagine that it was received, for the most part, pretty well. We were one of the last countries to recognize China -- among the last major countries. And it was felt that this was coming. It was only a question of time. So I don't think that our recognition of China or the establishment of diplomatic relations with China caused any surprise or any concern in Hong Kong. It didn't in the two years remaining that I was there. It did not, to any significant degree, alter the kind of work or the amount of work that we did, or the size of the Consulate. I think we opened Shanghai in those two years that I was there. I'm pretty sure of that. Yes, we did. So we had only two consular posts -- Guangzhou and Shanghai -- and Beijing. And we attempted to work out, with some success, with [the Embassy in] Beijing, reporting responsibilities -- things that we could still do that they could not handle as well, either in Shanghai or Guangzhou, or in Beijing. Apart from that, the work and the size of the Consulate [in Hong Kong] continued very much the same. Of course, I should say that the Consulate included a number of agencies that were doing regional work. I mean the [U. S.] Customs and Treasury people, and that wasn't affected at all. The focus of the Consulate General as China watchers remained constant for the time I was there. Until I left in 1981 there had been no change.

Q: To get a feel for how the Foreign Service was operating, did there seem to you to be a healthy program for developing "China hands"?

SHOESMITH: Oh, yes, there was. It was a very large program. It had been going on for a substantial number of years. My impression was that it was larger than the Japanese language program, partly because Chinese language officers could be assigned elsewhere in Asia, where there was a need for the Chinese language in the Chinese communities in all of Southeast Asia. There were some "China watcher" posts as, for example, in India, where they had a Chinese language officer. There were more opportunities for assigning and moving Chinese language officers around, than there were for assigning Japanese language officers in Japan. Certainly, you couldn't use them outside of Japan as language officers. The Chinese language program was very well established. There were lots of Chinese language officers. When normalization came, as far as I was aware, there was no problem at all in finding Chinese speaking officers for assignments in China as we began to open up posts and expand the Embassy.

Q: Had you had any dealings with the Republic of China Consulate and all that? Did this relationship end in Hong Kong?

SHOESMITH: There was no Republic of China Consulate in Hong Kong. The Republic of China maintained a very low key presence in Hong Kong, an unofficial presence. They did no official business at all. We had no contact with them, or it wasn't of any consequence. They had no official presence in Hong Kong.

Q: Did you sense, both from your soundings of the staff, of a warming of relations when the Carter Administration came into office and made these gestures? I mean, the Nixon Administration had already made the initial jump, but then the Carter Administration came in and...Did you feel that it had an effect on the whole relationship?

SHOESMITH: Oh, I would say it was, in essence. When the new [Chinese] leadership came in, and this was in 1979, I think -- 1978 or 1979 -- and the new leadership seemed at that time to be embarking on a course of opening China to the outside and was interested in expanding a relationship with the United States. So the whole atmosphere of the relationship was considerably more positive after 1979, as one would expect, with normalization. But that in particular did not affect our work, except that after normalization we began to have contact in Hong Kong with representatives of the Chinese Government, in NCNA [New China News Agency]. The head of NCNA was China's unofficial, I guess -- actually official representative in Hong Kong, and was so regarded by the Hong Kong Government. And by everyone else. And by 1980 or so, we had contact with them. They would accept invitations, they extended invitations to us to be at certain things. I got to know, slightly -- well, no, more than slightly, the head of NCNA.

Q: NCNA?

SHOESMITH: New China News Agency. That's their main wire service. And on one occasion he arranged part of a visit that my wife and I made to China, to one particular place that he was familiar with. That was a very definite change. Prior to normalization, we had no contact at all with the NCNA people or their trade representatives. And so on. Afterwards, those contacts began to open up.

WILLIAM ANDREAS BROWN
Deputy Chief of Mission
Taipei, Taiwan (1978)

Trustee, American Institute in Taiwan
Taipei, Taiwan (1978-1979)

Ambassador William Andreas Brown was born in Winchester, Massachusetts in 1930. He joined the "Holloway Program" which was part of the Naval Reserve Officers Training Program and went to Harvard University, graduating with a Magna cum Laude degree. In 1950 he went to Marine Corps basic training in Virginia and later served in Korea. His Foreign Service career took him to a multitude of places including Honk Kong, Taiwan, Singapore, Malaysia, USSR, India, the UK, and Israel. His career includes an ambassadorship to Israel as well as several positions in the State Department, Environmental Protection Agency. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in November of 1998.

BROWN: Well, let's get back to the situation affecting my ongoing assignment after Moscow. As I said, I was approached by Roger Sullivan, who was then Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs, serving in the new, Carter administration under Assistant Secretary Dick Holbrooke. Roger was an old friend. We had been in the same entering class at the Foreign Service Institute in 1956. He let me know briefly that something was up and that I should prepare myself to go to Taipei as DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission]. The obvious implication was that if we broke relations with the Republic of China on Taiwan, my job would be to close the embassy, pack the Ambassador off, take charge of the office, and do what was necessary.

Details were not yet available, but I was to move to Taiwan quickly. So my wife Helen and I flew from Moscow to Tokyo and then to Taipei, arriving in July, 1978. I think that we arrived just after July 4.

At this stage I would like to pause and call my audience's attention to a couple of very important, external sources of information which I have recently learned of. We now have, of course, Ambassador John Holdridge's book, Crossing the Divide. Last month, in March, [1999?], under the joint auspices of the American Institute on Taiwan and the Woodrow Wilson Center of Johns Hopkins University, a symposium was held to mark 20 years of contact with Taiwan under the Taiwan Relations Act. The symposium was attended by old timers, including myself; Mike Oksenberg, who worked on the National Security Council as the China specialist; David Dean; Harvey Feldman; and a number of others. This was an important event, marked by some very trenchant questions raised by members of the audience. The audience included a lot of people with considerable background in Taiwan affairs who had come from Taiwan itself to attend the symposium. The thrust of their questions was: "Why can't U.S. policy move on to the obvious, and that is to recognize the new reality of a free, democratically elected regime in Taiwan and give Taiwan more space to develop its policies toward the People's Republic of China?"

At that time David Dean, [a retired Foreign Service Officer and Chinese Affairs specialist], gave an oral presentation of his recollections of the move to normalize fully relations with the People's Republic of China, particularly from his point of view of having served as the first Director of this new American Institute on Taiwan. This institution had been nebulous at the beginning. He highlighted the difficulties he encountered, including a lack of money, policy differences with certain elements in the Department of State, and great sensitivities in various areas. He paid tribute to those of us who had helped to put this new institution into operation. I would recommend to the readers of this interview to review the papers that will come out of that symposium, including David Dean's presentation. The remarks of Mike Oksenberg at this symposium are also worth reading. They were made from a different perspective and in response to sometimes searching questions on "Why was the decision made to normalize relations fully with the People's Republic of China; why was this done in the way and manner it was accomplished, and why was this done at the time it was done?"

A second source of information on this subject which I have more recently found is a book by James Mann, called, About Face. I don't recall ever meeting Mr. Mann, but he has written a remarkable book, involving considerable research, including documents he obtained from the CIA [Central Intelligence Agency] and other sources, under the Freedom of Information Act. For instance, he obtained in this way a previously classified, CIA chronology of the moves made to normalize relations with the PRC, all the way back from the Warsaw talks with PRC officials conducted by Ambassador Walter Stoessel and continuing through the trip to the PRC by former Secretary of State Kissinger and President Nixon, as well as other senior, American officials since then. It's a remarkable book.

Q: James Mann has used a number of our interviews in this Oral History series.

BROWN: I sensed that he probably had. I would strongly recommend James Mann's book to readers of this interview. I would like to draw from it, and based on it, make some overall remarks which were applicable then. I would also say that they remain applicable today. It is rather poignant for me that today, April 9, 1999, the PRC Prime Minister is in Washington, negotiating with President Clinton on the whole gamut of U.S. relations with the PRC, including trade and other matters. I saw President Clinton the other day giving an excellent speech on C-Span on the rationale for the policies he has followed on China. That is very valuable. I don't recall such a comprehensive speech or rationalization by an American President in its length and detail as the Clinton speech was.

Coming back to Mann's book, I would like to mention some of his observations and mine, drawn from his work. The first point is that domestic politics played a tremendous role in so many of the important, foreign policy moves of our government, whether they involved the Middle East, the Far East, and certainly China.

At this point in this interview, I am describing my move from the embassy in Moscow to the embassy in Taipei. Although we had a bipartisan policy vis-a-vis the Soviet Union over the years, we also had intense, political rivalries within the Executive Branch of our government and between Congress and the Executive Branch. Some of the issues involved were the Jackson-Vanik Amendment [limiting assistance to the Soviet Union unless Soviet Jews were allowed to emigrate to Israel] and other aspects of U.S. policy toward the Soviet Union.

My second observation is that the precedents set by Secretary of State Kissinger and President Nixon and the inheritance they left behind amounted to a secretive, exclusionary and highly personalized form of diplomacy. This itself, in my view, reflected serious domestic, political concerns. Harking back, I can't recall whether I have already told you this but, at the risk of repetition, I will cover this now.

Q: Okay. It makes no difference.

BROWN: When I was at the National War College in 1972, one of the speakers was former Secretary of State Dean Rusk. As I had just visited China, accompanying the Democratic and Republican leaders of the House of Representatives and their party, I was full of beeswax and, perhaps, a somewhat exaggerated sense of my own importance. I asked to be recognized and said that I was a Foreign Service Officer who had long advocated a more energetic policy toward the People's Republic of China, leading to a breakthrough in relations. I asked Secretary Rusk why we had to wait until Richard Nixon became President. I asked why President John F. Kennedy could not have moved toward normalizing relations with China on Secretary Rusk's watch.

Rusk answered that there had been pressures to move more quickly on normalizing relations with the PRC. These pressures came from certain sectors in the State Department, including elements of what might be called the China service. However, Rusk recalled that President Kennedy told him in the Oval Office of the White House that he, Kennedy, was aware of these views. However, Kennedy was faced with tremendous, domestic problems, given the Cuban situation and his difficulties with Soviet leader Khrushchev in Vienna [in 1961], and the fact that all foreign aid and other bills that came through Congress in those days would have had bipartisan, legislative riders tacked onto them containing specific language on China (sometimes then called "Red China" or "Communist China"). Rusk recalled that Kennedy had told him: "I don't want any more of this. I don't need it. I've got other problems." So the possibility of a China initiative was turned off. So there you are. That was a very interesting revelation at the time.

In any event the Kissinger and Nixonian legacy was heavily oriented toward domestic political problems. You may recall that the line that emanated was that only Nixon could do this and, of course, that only a brilliant Henry Kissinger could execute it. From Mann's book and my own recollection, as the Carter administration entered office, it had other and more immediate priorities. These included the negotiations on the Panama Canal, which was a major issue domestically, and specific, agenda items on the Soviet Union, including the human rights issue, which I discussed in a previous interview with you, as well as arms control. These were major issues. Initially, the question of relations with China was somewhat further down on the scale of priorities.

Q: There were questions regarding the Middle East, too.

BROWN: Yes, the Middle East was a major consideration, and President Carter had made up his mind by this time to move ahead on this matter.

Now, the Carter administration had another characteristic which we've seen in several administrations, and that is the rivalries, not only between the Congress and the Executive Branch, but within the Executive Branch as well. There were rivalries between different departments and agencies, if I can use that expression. There were the competing interests of the State Department on the one hand, the National Security Council on the other, the Pentagon, the Department of Commerce, and so forth. Unfortunately, as I looked at this problem from the point of view of a career Foreign Service Officer, the Foreign Service, certainly during the Nixon administration, and to a significant degree during the Carter administration, reflected a cleavage between Secretary of State Vance, on the one hand, and Zbigniew Brzezinski [National Security Adviser] on the other.

Brzezinski used to insist that there was a great, strategic advantage in playing the China card vis-a-vis our number one enemy, the Soviet Union. Secretary of State Vance argued for a more balanced approach to this problem. Brzezinski, thwarted in his efforts to travel to Moscow, made a trip to China and acted like former National Security Adviser Kissinger. That is, on this trip to China he brought with him a very small group of advisers, with the State Department largely cut out of his entourage. Richard Holbrooke, as Assistant Secretary for East Asian Affairs, was unable to participate in the real talks with the Chinese communists during the Brzezinski visit to China. Great secrecy was observed by Brzezinski, who engaged in wheeling and dealing in China. He made various commitments and promises to the Chinese, many of which have only recently come to light.

This kind of secrecy continued to prevail during the Carter administration, particularly the feeling that Brzezinski's trip to China was going to be a bold stroke which would have to be negotiated very carefully. Brzezinski felt that when the ultimate decisions were made on China policy, they had to be implemented very quickly. This subject was treated in James Mann's book, About Face. It was also discussed at the recent symposium that I previously mentioned on China policy and the status of the American Institute on Taiwan [AIT]. At this symposium it was clear that many of the people in the audience still smarted because of their impression that Chiang Ching-kuo, the President of the Republic of China, was only given a couple of hours' advance notice of the intentions of the Carter administration regarding our breaking relations with the Republic of China and opening relations with the People's Republic of China.

In responding to this comment at this symposium, Mike Oksenberg stated that he had argued for at least 11 or 12 hours' advance notice to the Chinese Nationalists, but events overtook this proposal, and there we were.

Against this background there was an element of considerable concern in the Executive Branch about the reaction of Congress, friends of Taiwan within Congress, and the ability of the Taiwan lobby to counter the action planned by the Carter administration. This is important in considering the background to the circumstances under which I was transferred to Taipei. As a professional observer of Sino-Soviet affairs, I sensed many of these elements, but they weren't explained to me in the relatively stark terms which I am now presenting. So the message to me was: "Go to Taipei. Something is up. Probably a decision will soon be made on relations with China." I was led to believe that probably this decision would involve a break in diplomatic relations with the Republic of China. As a result, Ambassador Unger would have to leave Taipei, the embassy would have to be closed, and I would then take over the remaining facilities. However, no specific details were given to me.

So this was the situation when I arrived in Taipei in 1978. I found Leonard Unger, a wonderful Ambassador, who had been there for about four years at that time. He had been told, when he was appointed Ambassador to the Republic of China [by the Nixon administration], that he would probably be the last American Ambassador there and to prepare himself accordingly.

However, the Ford administration was wrapped around an axle in terms of domestic politics, didn't feel that it could move swiftly on the Shanghai Communique, and did not reach a point of decision. Here we were with a brand new administration under President Carter.

Meantime, it was understandable that Ambassador Unger and his staff had sort of gotten used to the situation. Life went on, as usual, in the embassy in Taipei, as it had done for the previous four years or so, notwithstanding this or that trip to Beijing by some high U.S. official. The U.S. military presence in Taiwan had diminished, in accordance with previous assurances to Beijing, but we still had several thousand U.S. military personnel on Taiwan. We had a Rear Admiral who was the commander of the Joint Taiwan Defense Command, with his own structure and staff. We had a huge PX [Post Exchange] and a huge Commissary. We had U.S. Air Force and U.S. Navy people stationed up and down the island. True, the numbers had shrunk dramatically from the level of more than 40,000 people we had had in Taiwan during the Vietnam War.

The embassy in Taipei was a typical American embassy, with good local employees, many of whom had been employed by the embassy for decades. The Chinese Nationalist Government in Taiwan was headed by Chiang Ching-kuo. It was an autocratic, authoritarian government, no question about that. Martial law still existed on paper. There were the first stirrings of opposition to the government, but anything like dissent was rapidly and severely dealt with. One nevertheless sensed that Chiang Ching-kuo was on a track of his own brand of, shall we say, reform and liberalization. His father, Chiang Kai-shek, had died only a few years previously. Mme. Chiang Kai-shek, who was not the mother of Chiang Ching-kuo, had gone off to live in Long Island, New York. Chiang Ching-kuo was undoubtedly in command of the government, which had a very heavy-handed, military element. The Chinese Nationalist military presence was noticeable, the security establishment was very strong, and the intelligence apparatus, with which we had good relations, was very capable. Yet there was no question that life was getting better materially for the people of Taiwan.

Taiwan was already making substantial profits on exports to the United States. A whole system had been set up for bonded production in Taiwan of television and other, higher technological equipment for sale in the United States. Apparel and other goods of Taiwanese manufacture were going to the United States.

When I was transferred to Taipei in 1978, my home leave in the United States had been postponed, so that I could move to Taiwan and take this job as DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission]. Later that year I took home leave and arrived in Washington in December, 1978. My initial impression was that the Department of State was so quiet as to be almost eerie in terms of developments in China policy. I had booked a place down on Marathon Key in the Florida Keys to spend home leave with my wife. One of our daughters joined us there. Shortly before I left Washington for Florida, I had had a conversation over an open phone with Ambassador Unger. He asked how things were in Washington. I said, "Things are quiet as a church." However, just before I left for Florida, Harvey Feldman, the chief of the Taiwan desk, said to me: "Something is afoot. Get ready. Check in with me from time to time." I said, "Okay," and went down to Florida.

I had only been there in Florida for two or three days, when I turned on television, and there was President Carter's announcement of a breakthrough with Beijing, a severance of relations with Taiwan, the establishment of diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China, and so forth. I picked up the phone and called Harvey Feldman. He said, "Get on the plane. Riots are going on in Taiwan. Get back to Taipei as soon as you can." So I gave our daughter the keys to the rented apartment in Florida. Helen and I jumped on the first plane out of Marathon Key, Florida, changed planes in Miami, and raced back to Taiwan, in time to witness massive demonstrations against the American embassy.

Our Security Officer in the embassy at the time was John McPoland, with whom I am still in touch. John and the Marine Security Guard detachment had coped with crowds of up to thousands of people, who had pelted the embassy with rocks, had broken windows, damaged cars and so forth. As John put it, the Marines had invited the demonstrators to go away using tear gas. The embassy was under siege. The situation was hectic, and Ambassador Unger was understandably under tremendous pressure. During all of this there was a great outcry in the Taiwan press. There were demonstrations against us up and down the island. In all, it was a very, very difficult time.

Then came the word that, in view of the Congressional reaction, which was bipartisan and which heavily criticized the manner in which this change in Chinese representation had been handled, Warren Christopher, Deputy Secretary of State, would fly out to Taiwan and negotiate the terms of our new relationship with the Republic of China. We sent in a cautionary cable, taking into account all of the demonstrations that were going on in Taiwan, but we said that we would do our best to support the Christopher visit. The Christopher party stopped in Honolulu to pick up the Commander in Chief, Pacific, Admiral Mickey Weisner, and continued on to Taiwan.

As I contemplated this situation as the DCM in Taipei and in view of the riots which had already taken place against us, security considerations were paramount in my mind. So, through our Security Officer, I kept constantly in touch with the Chinese Nationalist authorities, seeking reassurances that we would be okay in going to the airport, meeting Deputy Secretary Christopher, getting him into his hotel, and so forth. We were repeatedly assured that this was the case. With great difficulty I finally got through over the telephone to General Kung, retired Commandant of the Chinese Nationalist Marine Corps who was now head of the Chinese National Police. He said that there were hard feelings around Taipei and so forth, but "Don't worry. Precautions have been taken."

When I got out to the airport to join the party welcoming Deputy Secretary Christopher, I arrived somewhat later than many other people. My driver had to move the car very slowly through a crowd of several hundred demonstrators. We had arranged for the arrival of the Christopher party, not at the main, civilian airport near Taipei, but at a nearby, adjacent airport which was under Chinese Nationalist military control. However, a crowd had gathered outside the entrance to this military airport. As I went through this group of several hundred people, with my driver moving the car very slowly, I became aware of a sort of grinding noise. I learned later that this was from people rubbing balls made of a mixture of mud and sand against my car as it moved through the crowd.

I arrived at the terminal and immediately made a beeline for Fred Chien, who was the senior Chinese Nationalist official present. I believe that Fred was Deputy Foreign Minister at the time. I also sought out the senior Chinese Nationalist police officer on the spot, Brigadier General Peter Chung, who was a close contact of the embassy. I kept pointing to the fact that I had come through this crowd of demonstrators and expressed concern about it. I continued to receive assurances that the necessary security forces had been deployed and that this situation would not be a problem.

So Deputy Secretary of State Christopher's plane landed at the airport. He was received by Fred Chien, who delivered a very acerbic and vitriolic speech, fully covered by the television cameras. We headed out for the cars. Once again I expressed concern and asked if we should not follow an alternative route, cutting across the runway, rather than out the main gate. Once again, the Chinese Nationalist officials assured me that there would be no problem. So off we went.

I think that we went less than a quarter of a mile from the airport exit to the main street outside it. Going down a lane, we found ourselves engulfed by demonstrators, and they really worked us over. I was in the right front passenger seat. We were in Chinese Nationalist Government cars, because it was a large motorcade, and the Nationalist authorities had provided most of the cars. Roger Sullivan, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian Affairs, and Herb Hansell, the State Department Legal Adviser, were in the rear seat of my car. I could see what was coming. The crowd was rocking and rolling the cars assigned to us. Iron bars were being used to hit the cars. Finally, I said to the other occupants of the car: "Gentlemen, you'd better turn up your collars because they're going for the windshield." Just then a member of the crowd smashed the windshield in front of me with a crowbar, and we were all showered with shards of glass.

Ahead of me I could see that the windows on the car carrying Deputy Secretary Christopher, Ambassador Unger, and, I think, Admiral Weisner, had been shattered, and members of the crowd were pushing sticks into the broken windows. It was a shambles. They really worked us over. I think that this was the longest quarter of a mile that I've ever gone through. During all of this the Chinese Nationalist police were in evidence, equipped with megaphones. We finally worked our way through and scattered to different destinations. As each car managed to get through the crowd, it would take off in different directions. Some of us went to this place and some of us went to that place. We obviously couldn't go to the designated hotel out of fear that there would be another demonstration waiting for us there.

A few hours later there was finally a general gathering of the Christopher party in a huge, bunker complex at the Joint Taiwan Defense Command where the Rear Admiral commanding the U.S. Joint Taiwan Defense Command had his offices. A group of demonstrators gathered outside. We were furious, of course, at this hostile demonstration. A debate then broke out as to whether the members of the Christopher party should just go back to the plane and return to the U.S. because of the insults expressed by the crowd. Deputy Secretary Christopher spoke over the telephone with President Carter, who asked him for his views. The President reportedly said, "If you feel that it is necessary..." There was a lively debate among members of the Christopher party. In the end, Christopher said, "We'll stay." So they stayed, and the situation quieted down. A tremendous Chinese Nationalist security presence was deployed.

Of course, television viewers in Washington and in the world more broadly were treated to this spectacle of a real roughing up of the Christopher party, and tempers ran very high. Ambassador Unger had at least one Band-Aid on his neck. People in the Christopher party had been jabbed, poked, and so forth.

We met with President Chiang Ching-kuo, who was very somber, quiet-spoken, but emotional. He presented an historical review, pointing out that during the Vietnam War the U.S. had made tremendous use of Taiwan as a backup and transit point for aircraft and for rotation of personnel. He said that the Chinese Nationalists had given us all that we had asked for, and now we were breaking diplomatic relations with them.

We then began a process of negotiations. Deputy Foreign Minister Fred Chien and senior Chinese Nationalist officials were on one side of the table, and Deputy Secretary Christopher was on the other, flanked by Fred Hansell and his team, including Roger Sullivan. We had been badly shaken up, but there was work to be done. It was fascinating to see how well prepared the Chinese Nationalist officials were. Ever since the issuance of the Shanghai Communique in 1972, at the time of the visit of President Nixon to the People's Republic of China, they had had time to see the handwriting on the wall and had secretly done a lot of homework.

One of the things, among many others, which struck me at the time was the time the Chinese Nationalist officials spent on their concern that the new accommodation, much as they bitterly resented the whole thing, enabled them to be sued in U.S. Courts. When I heard this, I remember scratching my head and saying to myself: "Why in the world are they doing this?" I have used this story many times since then because I learned that to borrow large amounts of money in the United States at reasonable rates, you have to have a court of recourse. In other words, if you're going to go out in the bond market and borrow great chunks of money and do business as a government or a company, there has to be a system under which you can be sued in court. Otherwise, people aren't going to lend you money. I had never thought of that consideration, which had never really occurred to me. So the Taiwan Relations Act has a specific provision to deal with that matter. The negotiating session came to an end, although there were still many issues left unresolved. In any case, Deputy Secretary of State Christopher and his party left.

Q: Just one question. I would have thought that arrangements to deploy this mob at the airport were planned in advance. I would have thought that, after this incident was over, there would have been a damned good reason for the Christopher party to pick up and go home. In some sense that would have strengthened our negotiating position.

BROWN: I tell you, Stuart, at some times and in emergencies life works in strange ways. Until that point we, in the United States, were the villain, if you will. However, that mob action against us turned the tables, as it were. Chiang Ching-kuo's administration was now on the defensive. This so limited the ability of these very severe critics of the Carter administration in Congress, who had been in full cry, that it undercut that line as well. It reduced it to a grumble, in many ways. On reflection, I commend Deputy Secretary Christopher for going through this experience. It was only the beginning. The Chinese Nationalists then sent Yang, a Deputy Foreign Minister, to Washington, and the negotiations continued.

The situation had been so hectic that I really didn't have much chance to talk with Roger Sullivan and others as to how things were going to go over the next few months. One learned the hard way that the execution of the larger scheme had been done in such secrecy that a lot of fundamental planning had not been done. Now, here I was serving under Ambassador Unger, a wonderful man who had gone through this traumatic experience. The word was that he would have to leave Taipei now because we had promised Beijing that the embassy in Taipei would close and that there would be no U.S. officials left on Taiwan.

The word was that we would have to move out of our embassy Chancery in Taipei, and we were going to set up a new institution in its place. I like to think that I coined the word used to describe it, a new instrumentality. We would call it something. It wouldn't be an embassy. It would be unofficial, and we would discuss the matter further.

Meantime, we would close the embassy and get out of the building. The Ambassador would leave Taiwan. We would protect ourselves but get ready for the next phase. Well, it took quite a while for Ambassador Len Unger to go home, shall we say. He had been in Taipei for four years, the conclusion of it had been a very painful experience, time dragged on, and Washington was more and more impatient. So I had to be a real diplomat in that sense.

Finally, there came a moment when we lowered the U.S. flag, as they were raising the flag at the American embassy in Beijing. It was all very emotional and very heart-rending for those of us on the site. This marked the end of an era. We had invested a tremendous amount of treasure, emotion, and money in the whole relationship with the Republic of China. And now we were ending it.

As we went deeper into the situation, it became more and more complicated. Now came the cry in Congress that the whole thing had been done so poorly and the basis for moving on was so weak and flawed that the whole thing had to be re-done. This was the view widely expressed in Congress. Of course, the Chinese Nationalists in Taiwan were playing to the maximum the role of injured party. Remember, we had broken relations with the Republic of China and we had also served one year's notice of termination of the long-standing Defense Treaty with the Republic of China, which had been in effect since 1954. It was a rather peculiar situation. We broke diplomatic relations and pulled the string on the defense treaty. Remember that under the terms of the treaty we were still in a treaty relationship with the Republic of China for another year, even though we no longer had diplomatic relations with the Chinese Nationalists. Really, this was a crazy situation when you think about it.

Congressional Delegations wanted to visit Taiwan. The Department of State didn't want them to go. One of these Delegations was already on the way, led by Representative Lester Wolff, a Democratic Congressman from New York and Chairman of the House Subcommittee on East Asia. He was on the road, and he and I still tell each other this story.

Q: He lives here in Arlington, Virginia.

BROWN: Yes. He's a Washington lobbyist. We still chuckle at this story.

As I said, the Department of State didn't want him to go to Taiwan. He wanted very much to go and, in fact, was on the road. I was told over the telephone that the Department didn't want him to go to Taiwan and I was instructed: "Don't do anything that will enable him to go to Taiwan." He communicated with me, via both backchannel [very secret] and front channel [open cable]. For its part the Department of State made a real blunder. They used a security argument to try to dissuade Wolff from going to Taiwan. They asked me to support the following message to Congressman Wolff: "Look at the tremendous demonstrations against the embassy. Look at the mob action against Deputy Secretary Christopher. You'd be putting yourself at grave risk."

He then took this message and fired it at me. I prepared a cable which said that the embassy in Taipei was, of course, keenly aware of the demonstrations against us, both at the embassy and against the Christopher mission. However, I said that the situation had changed dramatically. The demonstrations were over. Furthermore, I said that I had called on the chief of the Chinese Nationalist Military Garrison. I think that his name was General Wang [Wang Ching-hsu]. He assured me that he would have over 5,000 troops deployed between the airport and the hotel where Congressman Wolff planned to stay in Taipei. He said that these troops would be available wherever the Congressman went, with gas masks, bayonets, and a full flying wedge. I told the Department that General Wang had assured me that everything would be done to protect Congressman Wolff. Congressman Wolff seized upon these assurances and came to Taipei. He came with a small, bipartisan delegation. They relished the spectacle of this tremendous motorcade, with a flying wedge of police, gas masks under the seats, soldiers at attention and armed with bayonets, deployed along the cavalcade route. The Wolff Delegation was wine and dined. Forever after, Representative Lester Wolff could throw this episode in the face of the State Department.

Then came a whole bunch of other Congressional Delegations, some of which were composed entirely of Republicans. We soon realized that among them were some who felt so strongly about this matter that those of us on the ground were part and parcel of the Carter administration which had perpetrated a terrible insult against Chiang Ching-kuo. I had to do my best to cope professionally with these Congressmen.

Then came the financial problem. I was told to close the embassy in Taipei under the provisions of the Vienna or Geneva Convention for closure, no later than February 27, 1979, at which point we were instructed to have left the embassy chancery and those of us remaining in Taiwan would no longer be considered Foreign Service Officers. We were told that all of those who cannot abide by these instructions would be transferred, leaving a small group, no larger than 50 persons, remaining in Taiwan. We were instructed to ensure that all U.S. military personnel would leave the island as soon as possible. We were instructed to get ready to open this new instrumentality, to be designated the American Institute on Taiwan.

So finally, Ambassador Unger left. There were frantic negotiations with very senior U.S. military officers. Whenever the U.S. military has title to something and has to get rid of it, it has to go through a legal process involving negotiation of a sale or the transfer of title at a price of a few pennies on the dollar, or whatever the market will bear.

At this stage, with Ambassador Unger gone, I began to be deluged with all kinds of visitors, including very high-ranking U.S. military officers. They simply could not believe that the U.S.

Air Force, Navy, and Army had to get off Taiwan completely. I had red-faced generals ready to pound my desk, saying that this just could not be. I said, "Tell that to the President of the United States. He's ordered it. You will proceed. We have a deadline. Do it." As I say, frantic negotiations took place in that regard.

Then came a second, classic blunder by the Department of State. Someone in the Department had it in mind that they would take the unexpended funds for Fiscal Year 1979 and already allocated to the embassy in Taipei and, with the approval of the relevant chairmen of the relevant sub-committees of the House of Representatives and Senate, would roll that money over for the AIT [American Institute on Taiwan]. The Department obtained approval from the Congressmen, but when they came up against Senator Ernest F. ("Fritz") Hollings [Democrat, South Carolina], he balked. In their excitement and agitation they threw a security argument at him, which included the unfortunate remark, "Unless we get this done, the security situation in Taiwan may deteriorate to the point where blood runs in the streets." At that point Senator Hollings, a graduate of The Citadel, the South Carolina Military Institute, for whatever combination of reasons, just said, "Show me! No!" As a result, the AIT had no money.

Now, I had very loyal, dedicated people, and I had assurances that somehow all of this would be taken care of. We were instructed to close down by February 27, 1979, after which "you will not do anything of an official nature or smacking of an official nature of any kind whatsoever." This was put to me in very strong terms.

So we ripped out the security equipment or whatever else was valuable in the old Chancery and we abandoned that building. However, I left one teletype circuit, my automatic ticker, still going. In the interim I used the address: "Bill Brown, Taipei." This signified that there was no longer an embassy, nor was there yet an AIT. I left the ticker running, in case anybody wanted to communicate with me. Every so often I would send an UNCLASSIFIED message to the State Department and sign it, "Bill Brown, Taipei." This kind of communications went around the world. That was our situation. I did phone work from home, sending it to Roger Sullivan, Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs, and under his direction.

Well, Ron Palmer was then in the Bureau of Administration. He flew out to Taipei and did his best to assure us that, somehow, everything would be taken care of. We would set up the AIT. There were some glitches to be resolved and so forth, but it would be taken care of. However, as time went on, the people with me in Taipei were getting more and more concerned. I remember telling the people in the Department with whom we were dealing, among other things: "Whatever you do, as we move into the new entity or instrumentality, for God's sake don't do anything which would cut off our pay!" No, we were assured, the arrangement is that we would continue to be paid and that eventually a new pay system would be worked out. I said, "Until you've worked it out and tested it, don't cut off our pay." (End of tape)

People began coming to me saying: "You know, my allotments haven't come through, and my bank is saying that my bank account is overdrawn," and so forth. I then had a daughter in Veterinary School at the University of Georgia. I found out that she subsisted on a bag of rice for six weeks because our allotments had been cut off! Despite assurances to the contrary, somebody in the Department had nevertheless cut the line to Bangkok [State Department Regional Finance Center], and we were without money.

We closed the embassy and moved out of the Chancery. I found myself in a peculiar situation because of the hangup involving the objections raised by Senator Hollings. There was no money available to us. For six weeks we were in limbo. I couldn't go to the old embassy, because that had been closed. I operated out of my house, the DCM's residence up on the hill. I held working coffees, because we were all unofficial now.

We were told that the Department was worried about Deng Xiaoping's reaction [in the PRC] to everything and was eager to convince Beijing that, truly, the American embassy in Taipei had closed. It was stated to the PRC that there were no officials left behind, the entire U.S. military presence was ending and no official business was being done. I remember Roger Sullivan really working me over very hard and insisting that I assure him that absolutely no business whatsoever was being carried on. I told him: "Listen, Roger, are you telling me that if an American citizen dies tomorrow, as they do all over the world, either on the sidewalks of Taipei or down the island, I'm just to leave the body there and not do anything? I shouldn't go down and assist in the removal of the remains and ship them back to the United States?" He said, "Well, you can do that." I said, "Well, come on, let's be realistic."

Incidentally, during this very period, I suddenly received word, although not through Washington, but locally from the Chinese Nationalist officials, that an American C-130 [transport plane] was flying into Taipei. I said, "What? This is impossible." It turned out that a member of the staff of a Congressional Committee had been in Taipei. On the escalator of a department store, he somehow fell and broke his leg. So the Committee Chairman said, "Fly in a C-130 and evacuate him medically!" So out of Okinawa came the old medevac flight, a C-130. I got this guy out to the airport and on the C-130 and off to Okinawa. I didn't talk about it until it was over. You had to be realistic in these circumstances. We had quite a large American community there which did a lot of business, so we did things quietly. For months thereafter I was signing checks dated February 27, 1979, which was our last, official day in Taipei. There were many bills outstanding which had to be paid.

I was informed that an American Ambassador, Charles Cross, an old China hand, would retire from the Foreign Service and become the first Director of the Taipei AIT office. He had visited us in Taipei the previous summer. The Department said that it hoped that I would stay on until his arrival, which I said that I would do. Meanwhile, I said that I would open up the AIT and get it going.

I found myself in this peculiar position with no money. So I met Deputy Foreign Minister, Fred Chien, off-site and I said, "Look, there is space in the old MAAG [Military Assistance and Advisory Group] headquarters across town. It's kind of a tacky building, but it's empty." Near it was the office being used by our friends down the corridor.

Q: You're talking about the CIA [Central Intelligence Agency].

BROWN: Yes, they were still operating, but very quietly. Here was empty office space next to them. So I began quiet informal negotiations with Fred Chien, which were really extraordinary. The Chinese Nationalists were the injured party. I needed something, and I said, "I'm sorry, Fred, but I don't have any money. I need that space, which is modest, unoccupied, and that's where I'd like to set up this American Institute on Taiwan. I know that it's an area with high-priced rents, but, Fred, I want you to rent this to me for a year for $5,000." He went back to his superiors, consulted with them, and subsequently informed me: "You've got it!" So we opened up the AIT, and that's where it still is.

I went through a tremendously active, consular period. You're an old Consular Officer, Stuart, so you can appreciate this. When the embassy had been in the stage of closing down, we were inundated with a tsunami wave of applicants for consular services in the thousands.

Q: They wanted visas and passports.

BROWN: Yes. Some of them also wanted notarial services. The Chinese Nationalist Army was called out to maintain law and order. Some of those applicants for consular services were in line for days and had brought mattresses to sleep on. We put out the word by radio and television that people shouldn't worry and that everything would work out. That, if anything, probably caused them to come in even greater numbers. They came from all over Taiwan. For six weeks nothing much was done to regularize our status. Officially, we were not supposed to do anything. I was still working with the old budget and still signing checks dated February 27, 1979. I arranged to have a nearby building in this compound rehabilitated by local carpenters, plasterers, and so forth. They were working 24 hours a day. I couldn't call it the "Consular Section." We called it the "Travel Section."

As we prepared to open up, another consular tsunami wave hit us, even though we got on the radio, television, and so forth. People came by the thousands. I went to work on the visa line myself. In the process we had to rename all of the sections of the office, calling them anything but an embassy. The "Political Section" became the "General Affairs Section." The DAO [Defense Attaché Office] became something else. As I said, the "Consular Section" became the "Travel Section." The old "Economic" and "Commercial" sections were combined under another name.

Instead of exequaturs [document issued normally by the Department of State, permitting Foreign Service Officers to perform their functions] on the walls, we had brown pieces of paper which said, more or less, that we reposed full trust in this or that person. Although we were non-official, we performed the vital functions which all Embassies perform. Visa applications were nominally checked through the use of the "IVAC" [Lookout System]. The visas stated that they had been issued by the American Consulate General in Hong Kong. In fact, we got the visa stamps from the Consulate General in Hong Kong and issued them in Taipei. However, on the face of it, they were supposedly issued in Hong Kong.

As the U.S. military pulled out of Taiwan in this situation, some very interesting questions arose. One day, shortly before the U.S. military pulled out, a senior U.S. Navy Captain came to my house, carrying with him two large suitcases. He informed me that I was now to become the owner of hundreds of millions of dollars worth of property. The old DAO people had negotiated as best they could with the local, Taiwanese authorities to get “pennies on the dollar” from our reluctant hosts for certain buildings. The remainder was to be transferred, in the first instance, to me. I said, “What does this mean?” The Navy Captain said, “Well, we sent teams all over the island. We've done an inventory, and here it is. Here are the documents covering it. So, if you will, just sign here.” I said, “Wait a minute. You're talking about millions and millions of dollars worth of property.” For example, this included the Armed Forces Radio Network on Taiwan, with broadcasting and relay stations down the island. There were oil tank farms and large petroleum facilities, pipelines, and so forth. I said, “And you expect me to sign for these?” He said, “Well, you're free, of course, to go yourself and check this list out. That's up to you.” So I took a deep breath and signed for this list of property. In this way I became the owner of hundreds of millions of dollars worth of property!

I also had to dispose of this property. I negotiated then with my Chinese Nationalist counterpart, which was called “The Coordinating Council for North American Affairs,” (CCNA) staffed by professional Chinese Nationalist Foreign Service Officers, including senior diplomats who went through the motions of becoming something else. So we had two organizations which we could portray as non-official for dealing with each other. We, of course, called ourselves “The American Institute on Taiwan.” So I took these two suitcases with documents identifying millions of dollars of property and transferred what had been the Armed Forces Radio Network to the American Chamber of Commerce in Taiwan. It still thrives, I think. Psychologically, it was very important to have independent English language, radio and television stations, operating on Taiwan. the other facilities I signed over to the new CCNA.

So it went across the whole spectrum of U.S. owned facilities and establishments in Taiwan. We had to undo all of the official ties, while Congress was pounding on the administration and the Taiwan authorities were doing everything they could to maintain some sort of officiality. In this connection, they were doing everything they could to get the best piece of legislation passed as the Taiwan Relations Act, whereas the Department of State and the Executive Branch of the U.S. Government had originally contemplated a very loose, very vague kind of relationship. The old, legalistic element in the American political system kicked in, and Congress ultimately passed the Taiwan Relations Act which President Jimmy Carter very reluctantly signed. He had no choice.

I might just pause there, once again, to demonstrate that, notwithstanding the texts of so many of these foreign policy decisions and moves, which were intended to be strategic, far reaching, and so forth, there was a very strong, domestic, political undercurrent here. This is still in effect. Much could be, and has been, written about this situation.

I found Mike Oksenberg's remarks at the symposium I mentioned very interesting. Toward the end of a lengthy, “Q and A” [Question and Answer] session, I finally stood up and said to Oksenberg: “In all of the discussion thus far, I have been particularly interested as an old Sino-Soviet watcher. There has not been a word mentioned about the rationale for the use of the China card with the Soviet Union.” I had just come from the embassy in Moscow and was keenly aware of this. Oksenberg differs with me on this matter. He said that there were some people who repeatedly advocated our playing the China card. He very clearly meant Zbigniew Brzezinski by this term. He meant that Brzezinski wanted to develop military contacts with Beijing and get on with this relationship. Oksenberg says that certainly Secretary of State Vance and he, Oksenberg, were looking on the move to normalize relations with the People's Republic of China on its own merits. That is, to achieve stability in Asia, to prevent U.S.-Chinese confrontation, to build a positive relationship with Beijing, and to do the best that we could under the circumstances with Taiwan.

I differ with Mike Oksenberg. In terms of the rationale for this change in our China representation, and certainly this is the way that I look at it, I would say that, at that time, there was certainly a strong, strategic reason for this change. U.S.-Soviet relations were then pretty poor.

Q: Were you getting the feeling that in Brzezinski's view, particularly because of his Polish origins, anything that we could do to the Soviet Union that would make the Soviets uncomfortable or put them on the defensive was a good thing? China, in itself, was just an object to be used to stick it to the Soviet Union.

BROWN: Well, that's putting it pretty baldly, Stuart. I won't go into Brzezinski's Polish origins, but earlier in this interview I spoke of learning through the Informal Channel of a draft policy paper prepared by Brzezinski which advocated really sticking it to the Soviets via the soft underbelly. He advocated playing up the ethnic, nationalistic differences of the Ukraine and the Central Asian republics of the Soviet Union. So Brzezinski was known in Washington circles as being very strongly oriented in that direction.

Like his predecessor as National Security Adviser, Henry Kissinger, Brzezinski was no China expert. However, like Kissinger, Brzezinski was a quick learner and he certainly used methods like those used by Kissinger, with the approval of President Carter. Beijing exploited both of these opportunities, both during the Nixon, as well as in the Ford and Carter administrations. I would also say that Beijing has exploited these opportunities subsequently. I would say that we paid heavily for this highly secretive, elitist approach to China, allowing the Chinese to extract from us all kind of assurances, but out of the public view. Beijing was then able to use these to play against succeeding U.S. Presidents, and so forth. You certainly saw those chickens coming back to roost in the 1980s and, I would say, even now.

Okay. Back to Taiwan. As the Taiwan Relations Act came to be debated in Congress, our Chinese Nationalist counterparts had really done their homework. The resulting legislation was remarkable in its comprehensive coverage and in the implicit warnings that it gave to Beijing in terms of our view of peaceful resolution of relations between the PRC and Taiwan. We also made clear that a non-peaceful approach, or the use of force by the PRC against Taiwan, would be viewed with grave concern as seriously affecting vital American security interests. There was, of course, the epoch-making determination that we would sell defensive arms to Taiwan.

Now, as you look at James Mann's book and the other literature on this subject, the question of whether we would be able to sell arms to Taiwan in this new relationship was a paramount issue. When Brzezinski went forward with a proposal that, after a one-year pause in arms sales, during which the U.S.-Taiwan defense treaty would lapse, we would resume a modest level of arms sales to Taiwan. Deng Xiaoping read Brzezinski the riot act, and Brzezinski came back to the U.S. very much chastened in that respect.

However, assurances had been given to the Chinese Nationalists, in the face of Deng Xiaoping's outburst of rage on this subject, that we would take into account PRC views but still deal modestly with the sale of defensive arms to Taiwan.

Then, of course, came the Taiwan Relations Act, which is the law of the land and not just administration policy. Next came the question of implementing this legislation. How do you initiate a defense relationship with no embassy, Defense Attache, or formal system of communications? This was a highly complex and sophisticated business.

For example, we had supplied the Chinese Nationalists under Chiang Ching-kuo with F-5's, plus various aircraft parts and so forth. Servicing F-5 fighter aircraft and other equipment usually involves setting up special communications channels with the Pentagon, through which a foreign state operates. There were specialists stationed on the ground, at both ends. Normally, joint teams are set up by the host country and the Pentagon in the United States. These are not just ordinary, military offices. They are staffed by real specialists. You're dealing with millions and millions of dollars of spare parts and replacements.

We had to do or to re-do all of this, and it all had to be unofficial. In fact, everything had to be unofficial. All of the previous official relationships had to be entirely undone.

Now, U.S. Government agencies in Washington were still so hung up that, in the early days, no senior U.S. official could even visit Taiwan. Nobody, which was ridiculous. Congressmen and Senators could and would visit Taiwan.

Q: It sounds as if Mainland China, or whatever you want to call it, was jerking our chain.

BROWN: Well, whether the PRC was or wasn't doing this, my view is that the fear and apprehension in Washington that things would go wrong with the arrangements regarding Taiwan were very palpable, as I saw and heard it. Washington agencies were very much afraid that the arrangements made regarding Taiwan would come undone. It was also feared that Taiwan would take undue advantage of the situation and that we would bumble things. I don't really think that Beijing really had to jerk our chain. People in the U.S. Government agencies in Washington were very cautious in this regard.

So no U.S. officials could come to Taiwan. We had to be thoroughly sterilized, as it were. I had to reduce the staff of AIT down to 50. Of course, when they heard the figure of 50, others in the U.S. Government, and particularly the Department of Defense and our brethren down the hall [i.e., the CIA], said, "What you mean, Bill, is just you people in the State Department complement." I had to answer: "No, the entire U.S. Government component is going to come down to 50." Then they said, "What you mean is 50 officers." I had to say, "No, 50 total, including secretaries and technicians." At first they couldn't believe it. I had to go through a real squeeze process here. CINCPAC, in the person of Admiral Weisner, said, "What you mean is 50 plus my people from CINCPAC, or 50 plus my communications people." I had to say, "No, the overall number is 50." That squeezed him way down. I had to tell people that if they were unwilling to go through this process of paring down personnel, then the Department of State or their home agency would transfer them elsewhere. Some of them couldn't take these reductions and were later transferred. I was really learning my trade at a senior level now. I believe that never in the history of the Foreign Service had this been done. It was a remarkable, educational process for me.

You know, at the risk of exaggeration, I would say that every bilateral relationship requires a scapegoat. Each side fixes on some individual, some guy who is the villain in all of this. Unfortunately, the U.S. side fixed on Fred Chien, Chinese Nationalist Deputy Foreign Minister. Some senior people were convinced that Fred Chien bore partial responsibility for the assault on the Christopher motorcade, since Chien was in the last car of the motorcade.

To this day Fred Chien and his wife get very emotional at that charge. They claim that they had no advance knowledge of this. However, Fred Chien had delivered a vitriolic speech when Deputy Secretary Christopher arrived. I was in a very unusual situation. I very much respected Fred as a professional diplomat. He was a key America watcher. He had been educated at Yale, spoke perfect English, and was a very intelligent and dedicated civil servant.

Here I was in this strange situation where Washington wanted no official status for us, whereas Fred Chien, representing his boss and the Taiwan administration, wanted to give us maximum officiality. As far as passports were concerned, we had to turn in our Diplomatic Passports to the State Department. We then had to negotiate the equivalent, in terms of privileges and immunities, without our being diplomats as such. Fred Chien said, "Sure! We'll give you the whole works. You want clearance through the airport? We'll just put the diplomatic clearance in your new, non-diplomatic passports." I had to be very careful and say, "No, what I would like is a courtesy stamp. It mustn't say 'diplomatic.'" And on and on we went through a myriad of details. As I said, Washington remained very apprehensive and turned its eagle-eyes on this whole range of issues.

Taiwan appointed retired General Konsin Shah (formerly Chiang Kai-shek's pilot and aide de camp) as head of its office in Washington. They, of course, had disposed of "Twin Oaks," the former residence of the Chinese Nationalist Ambassador in Washington. Fearful that Beijing would try to take this property over, the Chinese Nationalists had laundered it through a private organization. For many years Washington would not let any American official attend any function at Twin Oaks. For years the Taiwan representative in Washington tried to get us to have even a cup of tea or coffee there, but we wouldn't do so. The whole thing was kind of ridiculous. I dwell on this in an effort to give you a sense of how very delicate and sensitive it was at this stage.

Eventually, the first, full Director of the American Institute on Taiwan, Charles T. Cross, arrived in Taipei. Until recently, he had been American Ambassador in Singapore and was a career Foreign Service Officer. He had been persuaded by the Department to retire and take on this very responsible job. AIT itself was incorporated under the terms of the Taiwan Relations Act, which is the law of the land, as a District of Columbia, public corporation. AIT decided not to place its headquarters in the District of Columbia but just across the Potomac River in Rosslyn, Virginia, where it is still located. Again, this was an extra cautious move so that AIT would not be portrayed as part of the Department of State.

Indeed, I am still one of the three Trustees of the American Institute on Taiwan. (Two of us are unpaid. The third is the Managing Director) As I reflect back on those circumstances, I am impressed to see how far we've come as far as loosening up is concerned from those very tight, initial days.

Chuck Cross arrived in Taipei. Born to a Missionary family in China in 1922, he spoke Chinese and had joined the Foreign Service in 1949. His first position overseas was that of Assistant Public Affairs Officer in Taipei, which he took up in June, 1949. As a young officer, one of his duties was to go up and down Taiwan and keep in touch with members of the small, American community on the island. This community largely consisted of missionaries. He told them to have their bags packed and be ready, because it looked as if Mainland China would take over Taiwan, and, if this happened, we were going to close the American embassy in Taipei. There were still old timers in Taiwan who remembered him from those days.

Chuck Cross came to Taiwan and got right into the swing of things. Members of the AIT staff were not allowed to go and visit any Taiwan Government ministry. I would call Fred Chien and ask to see him. He would say, "Delighted. Come right over." I would say, "No, from now on we have to deal with the 'Coordinating Council for North American Affairs.'" So we would meet outside of Chinese Nationalist Government ministries. There was, if you will, a lot of polite, "winking and nodding" involved in these contacts, because our Chinese counterparts were obviously still under the direction of the Foreign Ministry. We knew that, but we wouldn't go into that ministry or anyplace else of that kind. I wouldn't let my small group of retired U.S. military officers on the AIT staff go into any of the Chinese Nationalist ministries, even when they had to get a given job done. All such contacts were done, shall we say, off-site, as much as possible.

We ordered new stationery and we took up this new identity. There had been a real scare commercially, as President Carter broke diplomatic relations with the Republic of China. The local stock market plummeted, as did real estate values, on a temporary basis. Some Taiwan businessmen approached me during those dark hours and asked for my views. I said, "We'll get over this, and you'll get over it. Things will work out." Those who were smart enough ultimately profited very nicely. Meanwhile, real estate and other markets plummeted, and for a while there things looked bad.

One Taiwan businessman who had just bought the Coca-Cola plant, suffered a disastrous loss because Deng Xiaoping's visit to the U.S. in January, 1979, featured a trip to President Carter's home state, Georgia, including the headquarters of Coca-Cola in Georgia. The reaction in Taiwan was to boycott Coca-Cola. However, things began to come back to an even keel.

I traveled quite a bit in Taiwan. There were times, before Ambassador Cross arrived, when I was busy as all get out, on the one hand, and there were other times when I had time to spare. I got Johnny McPoland, our Security Officer, to make the best of it. He set up special car crash courses. He had many vehicles which had been discarded by the departed American military establishment. They were second hand and couldn't be sold. He arranged access to a special patch of an abandoned airport runway for training purposes. He taught us all how to do the "J turn," the "bootlegger's turn," and so forth. He even trained me to the point of crashing cars. I crashed many cars, front and rear, to avoid road blocks. He even got me to the point where I could train others. I could take other people out, under his observation, and show them how to do all of this.

We had no Marine Guards left. So John McPoland set up a system for protecting us without any U.S. Marines. That was a challenge, to put it mildly.

As Ambassador Cross settled in, a funny thing happened one day. Out of the blue, my secretary said to me: "There's a call for you from Tel Aviv, Israel." I said, "It must be a mistake. They're undoubtedly trying to reach somebody else. They think that we're a private business concern." She said, "No, there's a fellow named Dick Viets from the American Embassy, Tel Aviv on the phone." Viets and I had served together in India. So I got on the phone, and Viets said, "Bill, I'm DCM here, and I'm going to be Ambassador to Tanzania. Sam Lewis, the Ambassador to Israel, would very much like you to come to Tel Aviv and replace me as DCM." I said, "Dick, I'm committed here. We've gone through hell and are just now getting this place set up. We have a new Director of AIT, but he's just getting his feet on the ground." Dick said, "Well, why don't you think it over? Get back to me."

About a week later came a short cable which said, "Nu?" So I did a cable which said, "Thanks very much, but no. My commitment is here. Given what we've gone through, I should stay here." Then I got a phone call at home from Ambassador Sam Lewis, whom I'd never met and didn't really know. He said, "Look, we got your cable, but you very definitely are the man for this job, on the basis of all of the reports we have on what you've gone through, and so forth." Ambassador Lewis said, "We need your kind of officer here. I'd very much like for you to be my deputy." I said, "Well, Mr. Ambassador, thank you very much. However, I've never lived in or studied the Middle East. I don't know any Middle Eastern language. This is my area. We've gone through a very unique period, and I'm sure that the Bureau of East Asian Affairs would be very unhappy if I were to leave here at this time." Later he called back and said, "Your front office is taken care of." I said, "Well, we'd better check this out with the sixth or seventh floor in the Department of State." He called back later and said, "That's taken care of, too. I can tell you that the Secretary and his advisers would very much like for you to come here." He said, "Why don't you get on a plane and come here? I'll be in Washington."

So I discussed this matter with Chuck Cross. He was very nice about it and said that he would certainly miss me. However, he said that these were the needs of the service and a chance for a new vista.

Off I flew to Washington. When I met Ambassador Sam Lewis, he obviously had wanted to see me in person. He said, "It so happens that Special Negotiator Robert Strauss, [a well-known, Texas politician] has been appointed to Israel to conduct the follow-up negotiations on the Camp David agreement. His plane leaves tomorrow for Tel Aviv, so let's jump aboard! You can get a free ride to Israel and see how it actually looks."

So I jumped on the plane with Ambassador Sam Lewis and got to meet Dick Viets and to get the low down on what things really were like there in the embassy in Tel Aviv. I flew back to Washington with Strauss. It was a remarkable journey back to the U.S. Strauss had met Prime Minister Menachem Begin but had been unable to persuade him with his Jewish, Texas charm. Strauss then briefed the press on the plane in rather characteristic, colorful language. When we landed in Lisbon, the reporters all made a beeline for the nearest phone. I then flew back to Taipei and arranged to move expeditiously to Israel, arriving there in late September or early October, 1979, at the time of Yom Kippur.

I had been blooded, if you will, as a new DCM. I had gone through an unparalleled professional and historical experience in setting up the AIT in Taipei. Let me digress briefly on that. Other countries had done something similar, but we hadn't. There was, if you will, a Japanese model. The Japanese had set up something after they got over the shock of the Nixon visit to China. They quickly moved on recognizing the PRC, but the Japanese model for a replacement for their embassy in Taipei didn't precisely meet our needs as an American model. For example, the Japanese didn't have to contend with Congress. The Japanese have a way of doing things quietly once the fix is in. We find it much more difficult to do things in the way the Japanese do them. I'll give you an example. The Japanese were informed by Beijing at one point that the Japanese national air carrier, JAL [Japan Airlines], could no longer fly into Taiwan out of Narita Airport in Japan. The Japanese accepted this and went right about putting a new logo on the aircraft and scheduling flights out of Haneda Airport in Tokyo to Taiwan. Haneda is fairly near downtown Tokyo and is far more convenient than it would have been to schedule these flights to Taiwan out of Narita Airport. The new arrangement prospered, and life went on.

The Japanese representative in Taiwan behaved in a very low key way and was very quiet. Initially, the Japanese had been very pessimistic about the future of Taiwan and how long it would last. However, when they saw us do what we did, that is, set up the American Institute on Taiwan, they learned their own lessons from the American model. Meanwhile, already during my time in Taiwan, I could see the first glimmerings of Europeans, Australians, and others, looking at what we had done. They had broken diplomatic relations with Taiwan and paid the full price which Beijing demanded for opening Embassies in Beijing.

They now looked at what we and the Japanese had done and began looking for ways in which they could quietly come back into Taiwan, while still preserving their Embassies in Beijing. They started to set up cultural centers, airline offices, and so forth. These offices gradually evolved into something more extensive, but at first they were extremely timid. The PRC had so much more leverage on them, or, more precisely, they allowed the PRC to play them that way. So this was an evolving situation. In some cases these new institutions have evolved remarkably in terms of some countries' representative offices and physical presence in Taiwan.

We are now at a stage, and I'll come back to that at a later point in this interview, where we've had U.S. cabinet officers go to Taiwan if they had business perceived as serving the vital interests of the U.S. This has been done despite protests from Beijing. Remember that when the AIT was set up, not a single U.S. Government official, however lowly, was supposed to be allowed to come to Taiwan. In fact, I had one, almost under the counter [semi-clandestine] case. A representative of the DEA [Drug Enforcement Agency] stationed in either Bangkok or Hong Kong had a house in Taipei and used to go back and forth. The way I put it to him was: "Listen, you no longer have an official presence here. However, if you want to come to Taiwan unofficially, wearing another hat and so forth, that will be all right." As the press of significant business came upon us, relatively low level exceptions to the no visit by official Americans were gradually made, on a case by case basis, so that business of vital interest to the U.S. could be carried on. However, during my last few months in Taiwan, getting the U.S. military out of Taiwan was a major problem.

Q: There is a question I wanted to ask. You mentioned the technical nature of military equipment. You just don't dump equipment from aircraft or ships. Technicians have to go along with a sale of military equipment. How was this handled?

BROWN: Bearing in mind that everything had to be done quietly, let us say that, maybe, the modular packages were re-labeled, but the basic hardware remained inside them. This included orders of special communications equipment. The whole spare parts question is very complicated. We're talking about automated warehouses which the average civilian or the average Foreign Service Officer has absolutely no comprehension of.

Q: I was talking to someone who was in Egypt. He was talking about going through the warehouses in Egypt. There are, perhaps, something like a million spare parts for F-16 aircraft or F-5s. I mean...

BROWN: These days the supply lines for spare parts are all automated. Robot machines go down a line to a given bin, take out a part, and bring it back. Specialists have to evaluate wear and tear on parts constantly and compare notes. The host government constantly wants upgraded [improved] parts and equipment. At first equipment and spare parts that weren't in the pipeline to the Chinese Nationalists just stopped flowing for a year. Then the pipeline was re-opened for new sales, under the Taiwan Relations Act and in view of President Carter's commitment to Beijing not to undertake new sales to Taiwan for one year. Then we got into the question of "What's in the pipeline?" If something has already been ordered, you considered it "in the pipeline," and the transaction moved quietly.

All kinds of side issues came up. For instance, Taiwan was going through the beginning phase of setting up civilian controlled, nuclear power plants. In September, 1978, just around my birthday, my wife had a disc operation on her back at the Clark Air Force Base hospital [in the Philippines]. At about the same time I had an American nuclear delegation visiting Taiwan. Remember, this was before the break in diplomatic relations with the Republic of China. This was an important issue.

First of all, and for years, we had made a major effort to persuade Chinese Nationalist Premier Chiang Ching-kuo to take the Canadian "CANDU" nuclear research reactor and ship its fissionable material out of Taiwan because, although it had been originally been intended for power and research purposes, if mishandled, it could have implications for nuclear proliferation. We went through a long and difficult process of obtaining agreement for that material to be withdrawn from the reactor, shipped out of Taiwan, and replaced with a much lower-powered substitute.

Then there was the question of nuclear power reactors for meeting Taiwan's dramatically escalating electric power needs. Taiwan had no oil. Import of foreign oil was a substantial item in the Taiwan budget. There is coal in Taiwan, but it is soft coal and terribly smokey. Taiwan invited an American firm to come and build a nuclear power reactor to generate electricity. Local Taiwanese technicians participated in its construction. For the second nuclear reactor they contracted with an American firm but with more Taiwanese participation. By this time Taiwan had acquired more and more know how in building nuclear reactors.

I went out to see the first Taiwan nuclear power reactor with a nuclear team. I'll never forget the introduction. We put on the ritual hard hats. The site for this new plant was called "Gold Mountain ("Chin Shan"). It was located on the Northeast coast of Taiwan. The American nuclear team was given a slide lecture with an American woman's taped voice. The lecture started with: "Welcome to the Chin Shan Nuclear Facility. Why did we choose Chin Shan?" [a click sound, as a new slide was displayed]. "We chose Chin Shan because Taiwan is [click] a very seismic island. Here are the seismographic outlines" [click]. "This area is relatively earthquake free." Just then the whole building began to rock! [Laughter] There was a stunned silence as we all swayed. When the ground stopped moving, and it seemed as if an eternity had gone by, the hosts said, "Would you like to go to the Control Room?" We all went into the Control Room, which was spewing out all kinds of recording tape. Lights were flashing amber red and so forth. Meanwhile, in nearby Taipei, a couple of people had been killed by collapsed buildings. That whole question of nuclear cooperation in the new configuration of relations with Taiwan was yet another example.

Now, before I leave Taiwan, let me cover a couple of other points. We had broken diplomatic relations with the Republic of China on Taiwan. We were now in operation with a new unofficial instrumentality [that is, AIT, the American Institute on Taiwan]. This relationship began to have repercussions in local society in Taiwan. The Republic of China at the time was a very autocratic regime, with the Chinese Nationalist military playing the primary role, and Lord help anybody who was identified as a dissenter. Into prison they went.

Just before the announcement by President Carter of a change in the pattern of U.S. relations with China, the first election was scheduled to be held in Taiwan. At this recent symposium on Chinese affairs, held last month here in Washington, DC, a veteran Taiwan political figure, a lady, got up and spoke with emotion and real dedication. She had been one of the candidates in this first election in Taiwan. In the wake of the momentous announcement by President Carter, one of Chiang Ching-kuo's initial reactions was to cancel the elections. Those who had been candidates in these elections and who protested the cancellation, including this lady, went to prison. She ended up in prison for 12 years!

Q: My God!

BROWN: What all of this triggered was great distress over the cancellation of the elections, protests by some of the candidates and their backers, a crackdown against candidates who protested and their backers, and then an increasing cycle of repression. This was such that, after I left Taiwan in December, 1979, demonstrations broke out on the island, and some of them became violent. These demonstrations were brutally and savagely put down, to the point that the Carter administration became very exercised and demanded that the people who had been arrested should be given fair trials, should not be executed, and so forth.

It was a very poignant moment for me, and I think for others in the room, to hear this lady describe her experiences. She is now an elected magistrate of a county in Taiwan.[She later became Vice president.] She said, "I just want you to know that I am a victim of all of this." I think that few of us had ever realized the relative costs of going along with decisions like President Carter's announcement on the change in the pattern of our diplomatic representations in China. She had spent 12 years in prison as a result. I can assure you, well at least I reckon, that they were not pleasant years in prison.

Q: Well, at this point you were not part of the Department of State. You were sort of a civilian attending that symposium. Were you doing the usual, political reporting?

BROWN: Oh, yes. Let's face it. Technically, we reported back to David Dean's American Institute in Taiwan headquarters in Rosslyn, Virginia. However, once we re-established our classified communications capability, although everything read, "AIT-Taipei," our reports immediately found their place for appropriate readers in the Department of State. It was all nominally funneled back through AIT, but it was part of the Department of State communications system.

But to return to this question of local repercussions of the Carter announcement, Mark Pratt was the excellent head of the General Affairs Section previously known as the Political Section of the embassy in Taipei. I had previously studied Chinese with him. He is a good friend. We realized that this was a delicate situation, but agreed that we ought to be in contact with certain mildly dissident Taiwanese.

The government of the Republic of China on Taiwan was, after all, an autocratic regime run by mainland Chinese. However, the Taiwanization of Taiwan was inevitable, given the demographic situation that 85-90 percent of the population were Taiwanese. They spoke a dialect or sub-dialect of Chinese, but they considered themselves Taiwanese, and not mainland Chinese. There was a mainland controlled regime sitting on top of them. Almost all of the principal figures in the regime were mainland Chinese but, over time, this was bound to change. At the time I was in Taiwan, already lieutenants and captains in the Chinese Nationalist armed forces were increasingly Taiwanese.

At this time the business community was already and very significantly dominated by Taiwanese. They had made money during the Vietnam War, supplying our needs in Vietnam. They had built up substantial textile and steel industries in Taiwan which were predominantly but not exclusively controlled by Taiwanese businessmen. There was a very significant, Christian community in Taiwan. It was mainly Presbyterian. My wife Helen was invited to meet with Presbyterian ladies, who turned out to be overwhelmingly Taiwanese and who were therefore, I'm sure under the watchful eyes of the security authorities.

Through Mark Pratt it was arranged that I meet with some young Taiwanese businessmen who worked for larger firms. They were moderate people but were already looking ahead. Before Ambassador Charles Cross arrived to take over the AIT [American Institute on Taiwan], I had some stature by virtue of my office, as the acting Director of the new entity, and decided to meet some of these Taiwanese.

When an evening function was arranged and I appeared in an automobile with Mark Pratt, by golly, there was a big, black Security Service limousine right outside the door. The government authorities were making it unmistakable that we were being watched. In other words, they were not happy that I was meeting with such people. That was the atmosphere of the period. It was to deteriorate sharply in this process that I mentioned, and there were very severe consequences later that same year.

How ironic it is now that we are dealing with Lee Teng-hui, whom I had known as a senior, loyal Taiwanese official of the Kuomintang. He was Taiwanese born and is now the President of the Republic of China on Taiwan. It has become overwhelmingly Taiwanized in every sense of the word. The Chief of Staff of the Chinese Army is now a Taiwanese. The general officers and so forth are Taiwanese. The Legislature is dominated by Taiwanese. It is a free democracy with a free press. All of this has developed in such a short period of time! It's a fascinating development which we can come back to at a later time, once I have completed my recollections of my time in Israel and several other assignments.

G. EUGENE MARTIN
Deputy Political Counselor
Taipei, Taiwan (1978-1979)

A Specialist in Chinese Affairs and a speaker of Chinese, Mr. Martin spent the major part of his career dealing with matters relating to China, both in Washington and abroad. His overseas assignments included Hong Kong, Taipei, Huangzhou (formerly Canton), Beijing, Manila and Rangoon. His Washington assignments also concerned China and the Far East. Mr. Martin was born in Indiana of Missionary parents and was raised in the US. and India. He is a graduate of Kalamazoo College and Syracuse University. Mr. Martin was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

Q: Well then, in '78 you left.

MARTIN: Seventy-eight, I was inveigled by Roger Sullivan to go back to Taiwan, part of my cyclical career. He said that he was going back as DCM and wanted to know if I would come join him there. I said I had just been in Taiwan three years previously, but yes, it would fun because Roger was, at that point, the deputy in Hong Kong and would be DCM in Taipei. So I agreed to move there in the summer of '78, about one month after Roger left for Washington. Roger headed back to Washington to be Deputy Assistant Secretary in the EAP (Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs), and I moved to Taipei. Len Unger was the ambassador at the embassy, and Bill Brown succeeded Roger as the deputy.

Q: Was there any concern, sort of career wise, at this point, of saying, "Maybe I better not get too tainted with Taiwan?" I'm just thinking of the analogy of Israel; and if you're an Arabist, at one point, it wasn't a good idea to have served in Israel.

MARTIN: Yes, but at this point, the embassy was still in Taipei as we still had full, normal diplomatic relations with Taiwan. It was considered to be China, as part of greater China, as it is, and we didn't discriminate. No at that point, Beijing was where everybody really wanted to go, as it was new and more exciting than Taiwan where we had had diplomatic relations for a long time.

Q: You wouldn't feel that too much service in Taiwan would taint you? I mean there wasn't that feeling?

MARTIN: Not really. There was a sense that you could do both, mainly because Beijing had not officially opened an embassy and Taiwan was still there. But we knew that the trend was toward Beijing. As to being tainted, that was not a major consideration, at least for me.

Q: Looking at sort of a career type thing, were you noticing, because of the Nixon trip and the beginning of things, a new surge in China careerists? Young people coming up. Was there a new sort of cadre moving up?

MARTIN: Yes; and this is true all across the country. The number of schools that were offering Chinese language training, China area studies, or Chinese studies was growing very rapidly. At one point, I think they surpassed the Japanese cadre and more schools were offering Chinese. Everybody was taken up by this, certainly after the Nixon visit. The beginning of relations with China came after a long period, from 1950 to the Nixon visit, in which there was almost no contact with China. Now it was acceptable to buy Chinese publications. The FBI (Federal Bureau of Investigation) didn't come and check on you if you subscribed to People's Daily, or the Beijing Review, the Peking Review in those days. So there was a great deal of interest. It started with ping pong diplomacy. Now people could travel to China. There were more students who were going to China to take tours; very few students were actually studying there, but professors could go, there were return visits by Chinese delegations, and so forth. There was a great deal of interest in China, and those of us in Hong Kong who were able to travel to China really had a sense of this is where things were going to start taking place.

Q: When you came back to Taiwan - you were in Taiwan from '78 to when?

MARTIN: I was in Taiwan from 1978 to 1979, just a little over a year.

Q: Did you sense a different mood there than you had been there before?

MARTIN: Not really. It was very much the same because nothing much had changed. There was a little bit more easing of marshal law. Chiang Ching-kuo (CCK) had become president after his father had died and had relaxed the more draconian aspects of martial law. Taiwan was also doing quite well economically, so there was a sense of stability and calm. In fact, the confidence was quite high because they were having national elections in December of 1978, in which for the first time they were going to have relatively open elections. This was the first time the KMT had allowed the opposition to run without a great deal of interference.

So most of the summer and the fall after we got there I spent traveling and talking to people and following the upcoming election. I dealt with the opposition. It was not a party, as they were not allowed to organize as one. Rather, the opposition called themselves “wu-dang-wu-pai” which meant “no party,” no affiliation” running as “none of the above.” They were running as “not KMT.” The opposition was composed of quite lively, exciting and intellectually stimulating people.

There were still a few people beyond the pale, a few who pushed the envelope a little bit too much and got thrown in jail. A number of dissidents, as some were called, were in jail; a couple went into exile to avoid jail. One oppositionist was married to an American woman who came to see us quite frequently after her husband was incarcerated. These were the things that were going on that fall. It was really quite exciting, and there was a lot of stimulation.

Q: Was there a divide as this political thing between the Chinese mainlanders and the Taiwanese?

MARTIN: There were still communal differences, yes, friction. The mainlanders versus the Taiwanese division was really quite stark. The gap was still quite deep. The mainlanders were very much in charge and dictated most social issues. Linguistically, everything had to be in Mandarin, it could not be Taiwanese. The schools were all taught in Mandarin. Students were required to speak Mandarin in the school rather than Taiwanese. Of course, as soon as they went home or at recess, they all spoke Taiwanese. And more and more, you could see the integration of the two, as it had been almost thirty years since the KMT moved to Taiwan. The second, or almost the third generation was beginning to become more and more integrated. The young people and the young students, even though they may come from mainland families, were able to speak Taiwanese; and they were able to communicate and had friends in the Taiwanese community. So the differences were breaking down.

Q: What was your impression of the politicians of the KMT? Were they beginning to just get out of it, or were they hanging on?

MARTIN: They were the establishment, the Old Guard, if you will. They were not very progressive. They wanted to continue to run things as they always had. They had allowed the opposition to run, so this was the first time that they would really have an election. Most new ideas, most interesting comments, and contacts were with the opposition or the Taiwanese. There were Taiwanese in the KMT as well but did not have control over policy. The interesting people we talked to were mostly in the opposition.

Q: What about the business community?

MARTIN: Taiwan’s business community was still very much pro-KMT. They didn’t want to rock the boat. They were doing quite well. They thought the opposition might mess things up. The KMT and mainlanders had given Taiwanese entrepreneurs the opportunity to establish major companies, so they were willing to pretty much support the KMT.

Q: During this time, any problem with Quemoy and Matsu and all that?

MARTIN: Not that I remember. When I was in Taipei, one change was that embassy people were no longer permitted to go to Quemoy and Matsu. In previous years, we were allowed to take the free trips to the island arranged by the Taiwan armed forces or government people. This had changed when we opened the Liaison Office in Beijing. We no longer did that sort of thing, sticking our finger in the mainland's eye by going there. So that had pretty much dried up.

Q: Your job was what?

MARTIN: I was the deputy political counselor in the political section. We had, I think, about six people in the section, a fairly large section. Mark Pratt was the political counselor, Bill Brown was DCM, and Unger was the ambassador. A frustrating thing to me was getting out of the office. When I got there in the summer of '78, I said, "With this many people in the political section, we should have somebody out on the road almost every week. You can take day trips; you can take overnight trips and be back, but we should be out." Unfortunately the system worked against me. There was so much going on in the embassy in terms of reports, and paperwork, and meetings, and so forth, that it was very difficult to get out. I thought this was a real drawback. We should have had people out talking to people, walking around, moving around, visiting places, to see what was really going on. This is, I think, too often the case in so many embassies - you tend to get bogged down in bureaucracy rather than getting out and doing what I think we should be doing.

Q: What was your big job, other than reporting what was going on? Were we doing quite a bit of handholding of the government; say, you know, we still love you despite the fact that we're opening up to China?

MARTIN: There was a good bit of that. The Liaison Office was in Beijing; we still had the embassy in Taipei; and yes, that there was not going to be a big abandonment. Of course, that came along very shortly.

Q: The Carter administration came in in '76. Was that causing concern, do you think?

MARTIN: No, I don't think so particularly. Taiwan was nervous, obviously, as soon as Nixon went to China and we opened the USLO. That was a big shock, or the "shokku" as the Japanese call it. But they had gotten over that. They were uneasy as to why we were still playing both sides here. I'm convinced that they saw the handwriting on the wall, and that we moving in that direction; but there was no indication that it was going to be sudden, or that it was going to be abrupt. I think that they were expecting that it would be maybe a year, maybe two years, down the road before we would make any major move. I think the decision in late '78 was a big shock.

Q: Yes. Were you there at the time?

MARTIN: Oh, I was indeed.

Q: How did that go?

MARTIN: The Carter shockku, normalization, “zheng chang hua” as they call it in Chinese, was a shock. One criticism I would have, although I don’t disagree with the idea of normalization (which I think was time), was the way it was handled. It was handled totally without any regard to Taiwan. This may have been held in very restricted channels, but as far as I can tell, there was really no consultation with the ambassador or the DCM from Washington. Now Bill Brown or Len Unger may have a different story on this, but at my level as deputy political counselor, which I suppose you’d expect I would have seen a good bit, if not everything, was that there was really no consultation, no consideration of what was happening in Taiwan. I think the timing of the normalization was totally driven by the agreement or the negotiations of Deng Xiaoping. The regrettable result of this was that we torpedoed the elections in Taiwan. If they had been able to go through, or if we had initiated normalization two or three months later, Taiwan would have probably been ahead by three to four or five years in its democratic development because, when the announcement was made, they canceled the elections, and no elections were held for a couple years after that. I think that this was a big setback, yes! A big setback and an obstacle to the development of Taiwan, and I don’t think it was necessary. The China watcher in me asks the question, “Did Deng realize this?” Did Deng say, “Well, let’s push ahead at this point?” Did the Chinese say, “Let’s push ahead and have normalization; we have to have it this year,” because they were aware of what was going on in Taiwan? I can’t but believe that they did not know what was coming up in Taiwan, and that further economic or further democratic development in Taiwan was not in the mainland’s interest! That’s just my supposition or theory. In any case, the sequence of normalization was quite dramatic. Washington had made the decision that they were going to normalize. They decided to inform us that it was coming the next morning. The night they informed us was the night of the American Chamber of Commerce’s Christmas ball.

The ambassador and most of us were at the AmCham ball. The duty officer, one of my colleagues, got a call from the State Department Operations Center, saying that (National Security Advisor) Brzezinski needed to talk to the ambassador immediately!

So he went to get him. The ambassador said later he had a sense that something big was coming. So he went to the embassy, to the secure phone line, and called Washington. Brzezinski told him that at ten o’clock that evening Washington time - ten o’clock the next morning our time - the president was going to announce the normalization of relations with China. The ambassador was instructed to get a hold of the president, CCK, and advise him in advance.

Well, this was now about eleven or twelve o’clock at night, and so the ambassador said, “I will have a very difficult time reaching him at this hour of the night!”

Brzezinski said, “Well, you have to do it, because it’s on track, and the engine’s running.”

So the ambassador called the president’s aide and said that he had an important message that he needed to deliver tonight.

The aide said, “Come on!” It’s something like twelve or one o’clock in the morning at this point, and the president had gone to bed, and I don’t want to go in and wake him.

The ambassador insisted, saying he really did need to see him tonight.

So the aide was a bit miffed about this, but finally was persuaded to go and wake the president. The ambassador called on the president at 2 AM, and informed him of the decision. Well, needless to say, the president did not go back to bed thereafter – rather, he began to gather his senior advisors. The fire alarm went off, and everybody rushed to the lifeboat stations. The political counselor, saying that we were going to have a meeting in the embassy of the country team, and everybody needed to be there, called me about six o’clock the next morning. So we all raced downtown. He wouldn’t tell me what it was over the phone, but I had a sense that something big was coming. So we all went down to the embassy where the ambassador informed us what was happening. We decided to man the barricades because we figured that this was going to be a big crisis.

About seven or eight o’clock in the morning, Taiwan TV came on and announced that there was going to be a big development, asked everybody to be calm, and to maintain order et cetera. At nine o’clock, President CCK came on and made the announcement, explained to people what’s going on, and the police were on alert, the military was on alert, et cetera. At ten o’clock, (that was before CNN so we didn’t have live coverage, but we did have a radio link to Washington), we heard the announcement of Carter’s decision.

It wasn’t very long after that that the first crowds appeared at our gates protesting this perfidious act, and betrayal. Thereafter, we were all in the embassy from about seven that morning until at least midnight, at which point we set up duty shifts and sent people home to get some sleep. I went home initially, and then went to the Taiwan Defense Command (TDC).

Q: How could you go home?

MARTIN: We were able to get out through the gates. The police had pretty well manned the gates and allowed us out. That was the first time. After that, it was sealed off pretty tightly. The crowds grew larger and larger. They overwhelmed the police, or the police didn’t control them or let them cover the gates, and so it was very difficult to get in and out. So a number of people were in the embassy for quite a lengthy period of time. I went home mid-evening and got some sleep, then went to the Taiwan Defense Command, the military joint command, met and talked to people there, and communicated both with Washington as well as the embassy. And then early in the morning, I can’t remember what time it was, maybe five o’clock, we wanted to relieve people in the embassy. So I was smuggled back into the embassy in the back seat of a police car, sort of crouching down on the floorboards, and got into the embassy that way, and other people were able to get out. But that was about the last time we were able to have a change of shifts.

I think it was the second day after that that things got worse. The marines were ready for action; they had their flack jackets on, and everybody was concerned about not firing anything, not shooting anybody. So the marines were under close orders not to initiate anything. Well, sometime, later that day, the crowd had become quite surly outside, and they came over the wall! And so a few people came over the wall, and broke into what was then the mailroom, one of the annex buildings of the embassy. At that point the marines fired the riot control powder. That was not a good development because we were crying over our mail for the next several weeks. Every time you opened a letter, you'd have the dust flying around, and we had a lot of tears over the mail. But that flushed the people back over the wall. That was the last time we had an entry because at the point, the Chinese police did step in, and they put up barricades around the chancery so the crowds could not get in close enough.

Do you think that part of the reason for holding this under the hat was the fear, in Washington, the fear of leaks; that if it had been leaked, what remained of the old China lobby would have weighed in in Congress, and it would have been much more difficult?

MARTIN: Oh, I think absolutely so. There's no question in my mind that that was the reason. My understanding, subsequently, was that the people in the know were limited to maybe five people. I think about five people in total knew, including the NSC (National Security Council) and the Department. This, I think, caused a lot of problems with DOD (Department of Defense) as well because the military was really quite upset by this. They had an extensive relationship with the Taiwan military personnel and the joint defense command was there. So I think that really it was a matter of sensitivity, of preventing leaks, and they were very successful in that. I must say, it did not leak! I think anybody who has worked in the government knows that the more people you have, the more chance you have of leaks.

I think that if it had leaked, if it had gotten out, the Taiwan lobby and the opponents of China in Congress would have made a big to-do of it. It would have been much more difficult. But it would have been nice if we'd known a little bit about it.

Q: There must have been a very difficult period thereafter, figuring out what you were going to be doing!

MARTIN: The next thing was the decision to send Deputy Secretary Warren Christopher to Taiwan to discuss the issue, to explain the rationale, and what we were going to do for Taiwan to preserve their status. So we prepared for him to come. We were busy doing briefing papers, all the usual things. The ambassador and everybody else went off to the airport to welcome him. This was quite the night!

The security officer was concerned, given the riots, the crowds and the demonstrators outside the embassy, about what was going to happen at the airport. He had gone over repeatedly with the various security agencies of the government exactly what the drill was going to be, what security provisions had been laid on, what sort of arrangements there were, et cetera. Everybody had assured him that everything was taken care of, and it was - not quite the way he expected it! They got to the airport, the plane landed, Christopher and his delegation got out and got in the cars. He was welcomed by Fred Chien, the chief of protocol at the time (and subsequently the head of the Taiwan office here); at the bottom of the stairs and escorted to the side of the car. As they were getting into the car, the ambassador and Christopher got in the back of the ambassador's car; and the security officer said to Fred Chien, "Why don't you join them in the

He said, “No! No! I have my own car.”

And as they got in the motorcade and the motorcade started to leave the side of the plane on the tarmac, the security officer noticed Fred Chien getting into his car and going the other direction.

And he said, “Oooohh, noooo!”

Well, it was “Oh, no!” because it was all a big setup. As soon as they came out of the gate of the airport, they were met by this howling mob outside, lined up on both sides of the streets, which instantly blocked the road. They had lots of flags they were all waving, and started pounding on the car with flag poles, dumping, throwing eggs and rotten vegetables and other things, probably, on the cars, actually jumping on the hood, and bouncing up and down, and so forth. So it was really quite a demonstration! At one point, they were able to break the window with a flagpole, and ram it through, hitting the ambassador’s glasses on the side of the head, and knocked the glasses off. I think maybe it hit him a little bit, but did not injure him. Nevertheless, they were really kind of beaten on. Finally, they were able to open up a way through the crowd, and the limousine shot out.

At this juncture, I was at the embassy, still, wrapping up the last briefing books, and was about to leave for the hotel when I had a call from the Taiwan Defense Command, saying that this had happened at the airport. About two milliseconds, nanoseconds later, the Op Center (Operations Center) in Washington called saying, “What is going on! We understand there’s been a demonstration, and that the car has lost radio contact, and we don’t know where he is!” For a few minutes there we had a rather nervous time because we didn’t know what had happened. We’d had no contact with the car. I think they’d broken off the antenna or something from their limousine, and so we had no idea where the deputy secretary and the ambassador were. Fortunately, they were able to get through the crowd and make their way up the mountain, up Yangmingshan Mountain to the ambassador’s summer residence. From there they were able to use the phone to call in and say that they were okay. But it was about 20 or 30 minutes before anybody knew where they were.

MARTIN: Oh, absolutely! It was perfectly orchestrated.

Q: But you know, once you turn something loose, you can have a dead ambassador and a dead...

MARTIN: Deputy secretary.

Q: Deputy Secretary of State.

MARTIN: You certainly could.

Q: All right. And that would have just ended it.

MARTIN: Yes.

Q: What was the thinking?

MARTIN: The thinking was to demonstrate their opposition to this policy. The thinking also, I think, was that they could control it. Whether they did or not, I don't know.

Q: Doesn't sound like they did!

MARTIN: It sounds like they went a little further than they expected to. I think they were supposed to demonstrate, and maybe throw things on the car, and so forth. But you know, jumping up and down on the hood, and ramming flagpoles through the windows was, I think, a little beyond the scenario. I don't know! Whether or not that was enough to get the police - who were there (but far outnumbered by the crowd) enough room, enough motivation to push the crowd back so the car could get out at the last minute? I don't know! I was not there, and I can't say. Needless to say, I was on the phone with the Op Center for some time, trying to feed them whatever information I had, which wasn't an awful lot.

Q: Well then, what happened after?

MARTIN: Well, they went up on the hill and then eventually made their way back down the hill to the hotel, the Grand Hotel in Taipei, with a police escort. The message that we sent immediately to the government was, "We need full guarantees that this is not going to happen again, or Christopher's would turn around and go right back! He is not going to talk to the government!" Well, the next morning the city and the hotel itself was surrounded by troops, so that was fully guarded; and the road all the way from the hotel to the presidential palace was lined about every hundred feet by soldiers. So they turned out the troops, and they made the point that they were not going to have any more demonstrations, and it worked. There were no further untoward incidents. But that certainly did color the entire trip by Christopher, and that did not help.

Q: Well then, how did things work? From your perspective, did you see this? Did you feel that our people in Washington had done their homework in figuring out how to set up an organization, or were you left in limbo for a while?

MARTIN: "Limbo" isn't exactly the right word! "Twilight zone" was the word that I used. But that came later. Len Unger had to leave before the end of the year. He packed up very quickly; he just picked up his suitcase, I think, and essentially left. Because this was just before Christmas, Christmas was not celebrated that year, as I recall, not very heartily. He had to leave before the end of the year because 1 January was the official start of relations with China. But the embassy was not going to open in Beijing until the first of March. So we had that two month period in which to come up with the arrangements.

It was quite obvious that nothing really had been worked out as to exactly what the status was going to be in Taiwan. USLO in Beijing was on track to convert itself into an embassy on the first of March, but nothing really was sure as to what we were going to do in Taipei. We began to fish around to figure out what we were going to do. Congress, of course, at this point, was very much in the act; and they started their hearings right after the first of the year; and they were going to take action, which eventually came out with the Taiwan Relations Act.

Len Unger, the ambassador, left the end of December; Bill Brown became chargé. After the first of January, he wasn't chargé. He was sort of in charge. We weren't quite sure what to call him, but we still were respectful to him, of course. We then kept getting messages from Washington, saying, "We're working on this. It's going to be set up. We will have some sort of unofficial relationship, and so forth. Don't worry about it. We'll take care of it."

Well, we did worry about it; and time went on. We went through the weeks of January. Then we got into February, and things were getting pretty dicey because 1 March was looming as the absolute end of the line. We figured that if we didn't know by mid-February, we had to start pulling people out. We could start evacuating people because we didn't want to be in a situation where we had no diplomatic privileges, we had no guarantee, and we had no immunities.

So about the fourteenth, and I can't remember if it was actually Valentine's Day or a day or two before, we decided we had not heard anything from Washington, so we ought to call. So we called Washington! We called the EAP front office, and phone rang and rang and rang. Nobody answered. So then we called the Taiwan desk, and it rang and rang and rang. Nobody answered. We were getting worried as to what was happening, so we finally - what we should have done initially - called the Op Center, and fortunately somebody answered.

And they said, "There's a 14-inch snowfall in Washington, and nobody's at work, except those of us who got stuck in the Op Center!" And so nothing had been done.

We said, "Well, we're going to have to start evacuating, pulling people out."

At that point, Washington did get back to us and said, "No!"

We had been talking to the Taiwan authorities as well; and they said that they were going to continue our immunities after the first of March, so not to worry about it. They didn't want us to pull out either.

By that time we had packed up most of our stuff in the chancery. We decided that we had to pull out of the chancery; we could not remain in the chancery building because of the symbolism. We then made arrangements to lease, or to continue the lease, on the old MAAG building on the other side of town, and that we would use that as the office building for the unofficial entity, although we didn't know what it was going to be called. It came out with a number of different names, none of which lasted very long. We moved most of our furniture into those buildings. We had designated which offices we were going to use, which rooms we were going to use for what sections, and so forth; but we weren't allowed to set up the offices because this would be premature. So we were able to move the furniture in, my furniture was all moved into "x" room, but we could not arrange the furniture. We just had to pile it in the middle of the room. Why? I don't understand!

Q: That still says, "Peculiar to me!"

MARTIN: This was a degree of political correctness or something! You could not set up; you could not set up your desk; you could not set up, I guess...did we have computers? I don't think we had computers in those days. You couldn't do anything. You couldn't put rugs on the floor, hang pictures on the wall, anything; just had to leave things piled up in the room. We didn't know whether we were going to last or not. So the last week at the embassy was really quite farcical because we were sitting on one desk chair and typing on cardboard packing boxes. That was the only furniture left in the embassy. On 28 February, we all walked out of the building; had a ceremony lowering the flag on the flagpole in the front yard, locked the door, and walked out; and we've never been back as far as I can tell. So we walked out - to what? Twilight Zone!

And we didn't know what we were going to do! So we all went home. We had worked out some arrangements for communications and had set up, I think, a communication channel through the Taiwan Defense Command, which at that point I, as the deputy in political division, had been very much involved in helping to close down the Taiwan Defense Command because the military were moving out of there too. They were given a slightly longer period to transition out, so they were able to still have their communication setup there. So we used that.

The telegraphic address was not AmEmbassy Taipei; it was "Bill Brown, Taipei." That was the address.

To keep in touch with each other, Bill kindly said we would have country team meetings in his house every morning. So every morning we would all trundle up to his house. His wife Helen, who was a wonderful cook, would come up with all these wonderful pastries and breakfast delicacies, we would sit there and talk and have snacks all around. That went on for an hour or two each weekday morning. Then the political section would adjourn to Mark Pratt's house for our political section meetings and work. Mark, fortunately, was also a gourmet cook, in both Chinese and French cuisines, as well as having probably the best wine cellar in Taipei. He brought cases and cases of wine from France, and so we had a wonderful time in the political section eating and drinking our way through the afternoon. We would do reporting, and we'd write reports, and we'd talk about what we learned from people we'd talk to, and so forth. That's how we continued work.

Q: Did you find people were giving you the stiff arm?

MARTIN: Many of them did, yes. It was very difficult to talk to people; but there were others who still would talk to us, people we'd known before.

Q: What were you saying? You'd say, "We're going to work this out."

MARTIN: We did. We said that we felt we would be able to continue to have a relationship with Taiwan even though we had opened diplomatic relations with China; but it was a very hard sell. People just did not believe us! They thought we were basically going to pull out and abandon them. But I said, "Look at the papers. Look at what the news reports are, and Congress obviously is not going to have all of us pull out and have no representation here at all, and they're working on something."

So for six weeks, from the first of March until about the middle of April, we were literally in Twilight Zone. We didn't know what to expect. We were very cautious about driving. We were very circumspect about where we drove; how much we drove; tried to make sure that our families did not drive, certainly out of Taipei; didn't get into any difficulty; because we did not know what sort of immunities we might have, if any. There we were, just floating!

Q: Was the government talking to you?

MARTIN: They were. They were talking to us. They were, you know, obviously following what was happening in Washington from their representatives in Washington, who were also going through a similar sort of situation. One of the big things, as I recall, was what to do with the embassy property in Washington, particularly Twin Oaks, which is the wonderful residence of the Chinese ambassadors from early in the 20th century behind Mount Saint Albans, on the other side of the cathedral, on beautiful grounds. That was a big to-do on the mainland because PRC said, "That should come to us." They wanted it too. Taiwan, with some help from its friends here, sold it for a dollar to a private American group, the Friends of Free China Association, an organization which was setup to prevent the PRC from getting it. And so that has remained in their hands and the unofficial Taiwan representatives are able to use it. The Chinese were not happy about that all.

Q: Was their concern on Taiwan that this might precipitate a military move?

MARTIN: There was some concern, yes; they thought that maybe. But at the same time, I think they saw that the Chinese had won out on this one, and that with diplomatic relations they were not going to take any actions that would jeopardize that. They thought maybe there might be some action in Quemoy or Matsu, but nothing developed.

Q: Was there any sort of defections or anything else?

MARTIN: There were people who took money out. A number of people used their visas to the States to take trips that were open ended. There was a lot of insecurity. The economic situation worsened. A lot of people pulled in investments, sold property. Many were concerned and nervous. So it was a shaky period.

Q: Were you personally involved in any of the negotiations, or was this strictly a Washington deal?

MARTIN: It was pretty much a Washington deal because they were working mainly with Congress, and Congress was, basically, rewriting everything the administration had sent them in terms of what sort of follow-on arrangement there would be. It was very clear that Congress was going to write the Taiwan Relations Act and put a lot of teeth into it that the administration had not asked for.

Q: Was there any sort of off channel, or whatever you'd want to call it, sub-rosa consultation with Congress with what is now whatever your limbo organization was, saying, "What do you need?" or anything like that?

MARTIN: Not that I know of. There may have been. I don't know. Len Unger, of course, had come back to Washington. My guess is that he probably had some discussions here, but I don't know that.

Q: How did you send telegrams back, and what did you do?

MARTIN: From Bill Brown, Taipei! The military, as I recall (I'm forgetting my timing exactly), but I think the military was there until about the first of May. By that time, the Taiwan Relations Act was passed by mid April. We then were able to move in and arrange our offices and set up our communications ourselves, so we, by that time, had our own communication channels, and we were able to handle our own communications.

Q: What was your mood, and others', towards the Carter administration putting this together?

MARTIN: We were not very pleased with the way it was handled, but I think most of us agreed that the decision was a correct one. We would've much preferred to have a much more orderly, thoughtful and planned transfer of relations. It would have been all right if they had gone ahead and normalized, but, preferably, with some consultation with us on timing. Again, as I say, my main disappointment was that they caused the scrubbing of the elections, which I think was a big setback. But despite that, I think the idea was right; the decision was correct, but the implementation was poor.

Q: Well, all of you knew this was a shoe that was going to be dropped at some point.

MARTIN: Eventually, of course. When Roger Sullivan "enticed" me to come to Taiwan, I use that word, you know, somewhat facetiously; but he did. I liked working with Roger, and it would have been fun, but Bill was good too. But everybody who had been there since the Nixon visit, was saying, "Oh, Taiwan's just the place to be because you're going to be there during normalization, and it'll be a very exciting time." Well, I made it!

It was exciting, but not quite in a way that people wanted. But people did expect it. We just didn't know when it was going to be. People came and went, and nothing had happened in so many years. Nixon went to Beijing in the early 1970s? So it was six, seven years.

Q: Yes. How about within our military? Because our military usually is not up to the nuances of diplomatic stuff, this must have annoyed, or angered them?

MARTIN: Angered is a better word! They were livid. I think that is not too strongly put. They were very unhappy. They had established relations, which they'd had for really decades, with the Taiwan military. They thought that this was betrayal; they thought this was just total treason, basically; that we had given up. They pledged, "We will never work with the communist military. We will always be friends with our Taiwan brother," blah, blah, you know, on and on, this sort of thing. It was not very long after that that they found it was possible to establish contacts with the mainland military.

Q: How about with the professional diplomats of the foreign ministry? Were you able to have rational talks with them?

MARTIN: Ah...we did. They understood it. They were obviously not pleased. They were very unhappy, in fact. But I think they, too, had seen it coming; and they were mainly interested in trying to make sure that we worked out an arrangement which was going to be beneficial to both sides. I think we were able to do that.

Q: Were you getting any feel for the very formidable network that developed and exists today, of the Chinese business community in the United States? It's probably, in a more subtle way, as powerful as maybe the Greek and the Israeli lobbies. Was that in existence already? I mean was that working on the Taiwan Relations Act at all?

MARTIN: The Taiwan business community?

Q: Yes, the Taiwan business.

MARTIN: Well, I'm not sure I would agree that it was the Taiwan business community that was in the forefront of that. It was more the political operatives.

Q: Kuomintang.

MARTIN: They had a very strong intelligence organization here, and they had a very strong KMT organization here, in the Chinese community; and they also had a lot of friends - the Committee of One Million, which was far less than one million by that time, but it was still quite influential in Congress. They had a lot of friends who were willing to listen and to do what they asked and make suggestions. So they were quite involved in making suggestions for the Taiwan Relations Act in Congress.

Q: When you received a text of the Taiwan Relations Act, one, was there an owner's manual that came along with it, or the equivalent thereof? I mean somebody from Washington came out, said, "This is what this means;" because often when you get an act, there's an awful lot of Interpretations. I mean, there's been a lot of debate; and they say, "Well, this how it's going to work and all. So when you get it, you really have to have somebody explain it to you."

MARTIN: Yes, there was a lot of that! We did not have anybody come out from Washington on that aspect of it. We did have visitors in other aspects, but we had also the legislative history that came out, and all the debates in Congress, and that was quite extensive. So we had a lot of the background that went into the legislation which was very helpful. But obviously, there were parts in the Taiwan Relations Act that the administration did not like; and this caused some problems, and has caused problems over the years. But I think, yes, it took a good deal of reading and interpreting to figure out exactly what was meant and what we were expected to do.

*Q: Was this in a way, sort of a joint effort where you and your interlocutors in the Taiwan government sat down and say, "Well, those #&*@ over in Washington, to put this together, this is how we're going to work it out, you know. I mean they leave all of us with a mess."*

MARTIN: There obviously were some local arrangements made. The most ominous I think was that we could not meet in official government buildings. So we could not go to the foreign ministry to meet with counterparts. Officials could not come to our offices. So we had to find good restaurants. It being Taiwan it was fine as there were lots of them, but it didn't help the waistline.

But until we set up our counterpart organizations it was awkward. They had more of a difficulty because they were being forced to set up what was then called CCNAA (Coordination Council for North American Affairs), which was a mouthful. The administration said the words "China" or "Taiwan" could not be used in the name. They had to come up with the counterpart of AIT (American Institute in Taiwan). They had to set up an organization because we could not come to their foreign ministry or government offices to meet them, nor could they come to see us; so they had to have this cutout, if you will, the CCNAA, like we had the AIT on our side.

This was an awkward situation. They said, "Why do we have to do this?"

And we'd say, "Well, because it has to be unofficial." We had to lead them through all this process, and it was very difficult. They were, I won't say surly, but they were less than fully comprehending as to why we were forcing them to do that. That was a difficult time.

Q: I imagine that an awful lot of your time after this was in putting together the structure?

MARTIN: Very much so. One of the fun things, one of the issues was, we don't have an embassy. We have this, whatever this new, unique creature is called, an unofficial entity, AIT (American Institute in Taiwan). What do we call ourselves? Okay. We have a name now, and Congress came up with the name "American Institute in Taiwan." I don't know whose creation that was, but it was okay. It was certainly easier than Coordinating Council for North American Affairs, which Taiwan came up with! Fortunately, now we've gotten away from that, and they are called TECRO (Taipei Economic and Cultural Representative Office), which makes a lot more sense.

But what do we call ourselves internally? We can't have an ambassador, so we'll have a Director. We can't have a DCM, so we'll call him a Deputy Director. That's fairly easy. Now! Political section, you can't have a political counselor; you can't have a political officer because this is an unofficial entity; so what do we call ourselves? Economics? Well, Taiwan Relations Act said we could have economic and cultural relations with Taiwan people, so that's okay. So we can have an Economic Chief. We won't call him section head or counselor; we'll call him a chief. So we have an Economic Section, and an Economic Chief. All right. We can't have a Consular Section, because that is a diplomatic term, so what do you call consular functions? So we came up with Travel Services. Okay, not too bad, and you have a Travel Services Chief. Administration? Well, administration, that's okay. You know, everybody has administration. All right. We can't have a U.S. Information Service, so what do we call USIS? So we came up with the Information Section. Okay. That's all right. Okay. The one remaining problem was the Political Section. What do we call the Political Section? I feel some sense of propriety that Mark Pratt and I worked this out together, being the titular head of titles. We came up with the General Affairs Section, which was basically plagiarized from our Japanese colleagues who had set up an unofficial entity a few years earlier after Japan normalized with the mainland. We studied them, and use them as one of the models that we emulated. So we came up with General Affairs Section. Then people said, "Look, everybody's going to think you're the GSO!" Well, no in Chinese we'd worked it out in such a way that it didn't come out to be General Services Officer. So it was General Affairs, which, of course, immediately became the GAS station. And so we had the GAS station, the economic section, and so forth; but it was kind of fun. It's worked out. I mean people still chuckle about General Affairs.

Q: What did you call yourselves when you went somewhere?

MARTIN: AIT officers, AIT representatives, or I'm from AIT, or something like that.

Q: Did you find you had to almost reestablish your contacts?

MARTIN: No, most of them stayed with us. That was not a problem. A lot of what I did as a deputy political counselor previously, in addition to the election, which was related to the election in many ways, was the political development. I also dealt with the opposition, with the non-party people running for election, and with human rights. I was involved with the human rights community, and one of leaders of the human rights movement there was the Presbyterian Church. So I dealt with that group of people, who were trying to broaden the envelope within the Taiwan political system.

Q: Of course, this was the Carter administration when it was new. It's now amalgamated into all our policies.

MARTIN: Right.

Q: But it was pretty...during part of this time or during all of this time, I was up in South Korea. We subscribed to the idea human rights is a good thing. But with a formidable North Korean army sitting within 30 miles of where we were sitting, human rights went kind of far down the priority list, and we didn't know people messing around too much with it. How did you all feel about this?

MARTIN: In Taiwan, it was not much of an issue after normalization. But this had been a big issue before normalization because as we were leading up to the December elections, the broadening of political rights, broadening of political opportunities, including human rights. It was a big issue that we were pushing. We had many discussions with officials about political prisoners, opposition activists who had been arrested, sent into exile, etc. These were the key issues in our dialogue. Again, the church was very much in the forefront because the Presbyterian Church was a Taiwanese church. There were few mainlanders who were Presbyterian. I don't know why the denomination sorted out that way. It's just that Presbyterian missionaries went to Taiwan, as they did to Korea, of course.

And it's a very active church, as it is in Korea. I found it an interesting area to work, not only being Presbyterian myself, but also because the people were impressive. So that was a big issue before the election. After normalization, it was still an issue, but not a big one.

Q: Well, a lot of it had disappeared.

MARTIN: It didn't.

Q: It didn't disappear, but why would it diminish?

MARTIN: Mainly because we had other things we were working out. There was no election coming up. The government clamped down again on opposition activities. We still made representations, but I think it was less. I won't say less fervor, but probably less effect than we had before.

Q: Was there concern about KMT intelligence organizations in the United States at that time?

MARTIN: There was because the KMT was known to be quite active in the Chinese communities in the U.S. One opposition writer who wrote an uncomplimentary article on the Chiang family was murdered in California.

Q: Was that during your watch?

MARTIN: Yes. We were increasingly concerned about secret societies, or the gangster gangs, mafia if you will, like the Green Bamboo Gang which was implicated in this murder, as being an arm of the intelligence services, or working on contract, if not regularly, for government representatives. This was a big concern, and Steve Solarz was very much involved in watching all this. He was a strong advocate of Taiwan human rights for many years, and I think, quite helpful on the issue

Q: You say you left Taiwan in 1979?

MARTIN: In April, about the time the Taiwan Relations Act was passed, a delegation came out from Washington from Personnel to explain the TRA and tell us about AIT. Most of us were quite uncertain what normalization, AIT's unofficial status and our assignments meant in career terms. Ron Palmer and a friend of mine, Pat Wardlaw, who was in Personnel at that time, came out to assuage us and say, "Everything's going to be taken care of. You're all going to be okay."

Q: That scared the life out of you!

MARTIN: And then some! It was like the old joke -- We're here to help you. We're from the government. We're from Personnel. We're here to help you.

But many of us were not convinced, because given the record up to that point - the lack of information, the lack of any planning, the lack of any precedents - made it quite apparent that they were running it by the seat of their pants. They didn't have a clue as to who we were, what we were going to do, because fairly early on, it was decided that we had to resign from the Foreign Service. "Well, now! Just a minute there, Ambassador Palmer! What do you mean, 'resign' from the Foreign Service? What does this mean in terms of differentials, in terms of pay, in terms of retirement, in terms of service credit, etc., etc.? They did not know! So my wife and I made a decision that we would not stay on long. Several of us decided to take the option of transferring. We therefore went back to Washington the summer of '79.

Q: You given that option?

MARTIN: Yes, it was a totally voluntary thing because the Department did not believe it could force anyone to resign. The system did work out in time, but it took me almost a year to get my pay records straightened out, even for that short time that I was with AIT. So it was a mess in the beginning.

Q: But there was no assurance! There was not a very good track record, not just Personnel but the whole apparatus of being very responsive to these things.

MARTIN: That's true, yes.

MARK S. PRATT
Taipei, Taiwan (1978-1981)

Mr. Pratt was born and raised in Massachusetts and educated at Harvard, Brown, Sorbonne and Georgetown Universities. Entering the Foreign Service in 1956, he studied Chinese and was posted to Hong Kong. Throughout his career Mr. Pratt dealt with Far East and Southeast Asian affairs, serving in Taichung, Hong Kong, Vientiane, Paris, Taipei and Guangzhou (Canto), where he was Consul General. His Washington assignments also concerned Southeast Asian matters. Mr. Pratt was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

Q: Well, then, in 1978 you moved on.

PRATT: Yes, in 1978 I got a call, and they said that we're going to have to replace our political counselor in Taipei because he's had a heart attack, and therefore we'd like you to go there, and since you're a bachelor and therefore more readily transferable and outside the regular cycle, we'd like you there as soon as possible. Go there. And of course, like most of my previous assignments, as you can see from the fact that there are five years here and five years there and so forth, most of my assignments were not bound to the usual State Department assignment process. So, I went flying out to Taipei. At that moment it was clear that China was again very much on the screen because they had not been able to move ahead and get anything important done with Hanoi, but the normalization of relations with Peking was very high on the agenda of Carter's team as well.

Q: So you were in Taipei from 1978 to when?

PRATT: 1978 until 1981.

Q: Was it an ambassador when you arrived there?

PRATT: Yes, Ambassador Leonard Unger, who had been my ambassador when I had been in Laos, was ambassador to Taiwan [Ed: Ambassador Unger presented his credentials in Taipei on May 25, 1974 and departed post January 19, 1979.]

Q: When you arrived there in 1978, the Carter Administration is getting cranked up, and there were sort of a number of things on the Carter agenda. One was the Panama Canal. Another ended up as Camp David. And then there was the normalization. This was the shoe that was going to drop, wasn't it? Was this, when you went out there, were you and Ambassador Unger and the whole place getting ready for this particular shoe to drop?

PRATT: Yes. Those of us who were adept at reading tea leaves - and I had drunk too much tea in my life, that I could work out those tea leaves very easily . . . In fact, when I was given this assignment, while the Japanese ambassador, whom I had had quite a few dealings with because we had to get him following what we were doing with East Asia and with China and all the rest of it, he invited me for luncheon, and so I told him that, yes, I figured that the reason that I was being picked out was that they did hope - whether they could do it or not is a different matter - but the thing is they did hope to be able to make significant progress in a matter of months, within a year's time anyway, to establish relations with Peking. Therefore, that would be perhaps one of the things that I'd be working on. I had forgotten that the Japanese diplomatic correspondence, which was generally readily readable - I don't think that's true any more, but it was at that time generally readable - by the United States. And so, of course, the Japanese ambassador's account of my conversation in Paris was something which ended up on the desk at INR in a couple of day's time, and of course, they were saying, when I came through Washington, How could you tell them that? I said, "Well, I'd been told absolutely nothing. I'm really running on what it is that has been published in the New York Times and the regular American press and so on. So I'm just really . . . I have no inside information. I told him that. Didn't his cable say that?" He said, "Well, yes, he said you said that you had no direct information, that this was not something which had been discussed with you, and this is not therefore something that . . .but this is your personal view." I said, "Yes, I've got to be able to have a personal view when I'm asked a question." But I said, "The only problem is, of course, that the Japanese don't have enough sense to use their one channel, which is not readable by the U.S., and they didn't use it." And I said, "Now if I were to see the ambassador again, I'd wave my finger in his face and say, 'Now you're naughty-naughty, don't do that, protect your sources.'" But as I say, it didn't cause any great turmoil because, in the first place, it was not readable to the Soviets or the Chinese - it was only readable to the U.S., because we, apparently, knew how the Japanese -

Q: Well, this is also, knowing Carter and all, very much on the agenda.

PRATT: That's right.

Q: And particularly with Brzezinski. You got the feeling that Brzezinski was always looking over his shoulder and chalking up what he was doing compared to Henry Kissinger. I mean, you always felt that Brzezinski was trying to be more "Kissingerian" than Kissinger, in a way, to show his academic colleague up or something.

PRATT: Right. And also to show that he, as a former academic - and Kissinger was a former academic - that both of them could also act in the real world. And he did not want at all to have it appear that he was more cut off from handling practical matters than was Henry. But the other aspect was, you had a Secretary of State who was really very impressive in his own rights - Cy Vance - whereas, of course, Kissinger had - I shan't say a nonentity, but in any case - a Secretary of State who was more interested in appearing to be Secretary of State than in being Secretary of State. (I hope he's not going to be reading this.) But in any case, a very nice man-

Q: Very nice man, but you get this feeling-

PRATT: -but he did not want really to go head to head with Henry Kissinger unless Nixon asked him to, which of course was not what was in the cards. But in any case, Vance was a very different matter, and a very serious and well established Secretary of State. And also, as I discussed with the Japanese ambassador, Vance had made his trip to Peking and had come away, of course, with a big, flat no because of two or three matters. And I said, obviously in Washington, they're sitting down and evaluating what it is they can do to get around these three things.

Q: What were they?

PRATT: Mostly Taiwan. One was disestablishment of any relations with Taiwan, and that meant at that point we were just told there would be none. We asked about a liaison office; we asked about a sort of consulate general or something of the sort, and the Chinese said no to both. So we hadn't worked out what that could be. The end of the mutual defense treaty: they wanted it to end on the day of our establishment with Peking, in other words the transfer of relations. And the third was withdrawal of all U.S. forces from the area. Now there were a few other things along the way, too, but these were the big sticking points.

Q: It seems like the Chinese have some stake in establishing formal relations, too? What were we asking?

PRATT: We wanted to have our embassies, our liaison offices, upgraded to embassies, and we wanted to have access - although we had had pretty good access. Nonetheless, we wanted more access, and I think we wanted also even some military connections.

Q: Well, it does seem that the charge has been made again and again unto this very day that the Chinese sort of sit back and expect other powers to meet their demands, as opposed to . . . and they seem to cave in. It strikes me, looking as you explained it now, did that appear to you that here is China asking a sort of a barbarian nation to say if you want to deal with us you've got to do this and that, and we want to say, well, then you have to do this and that, too, or something?

PRATT: No, we had no real demands. We wanted a relation, and of course, what we wanted to do was to maintain as much as we could of the relationship which we had with Taiwan. And as I say, that was therefore the sticking point. We could agree on many other things, including what we would do about discussing policies in Asia and what we would do in the United Nations and so on. So indeed, the only real sticking point was that we wanted to hold on more to Taiwan than Peking wanted to let us do.

Q: Well, now, when you came back through Washington, beyond being reprimanded for using your own personal judgment on whither Chinese relations, you were going to a place where, obviously, you weren't the only one reading the tea leaves. Just about everybody in the foreign affairs establishment was looking at the same tea leaves. But were you given any guidance from the Bureau of East Asian Affairs, from Dick Holbrooke on down dealing with this?

PRATT: Well, I dealt primarily with Harvey Feldman, who was the Desk officer.

PRATT: As the Taiwan Desk officer he was very much tied in with Holbrooke and then of course also with Roger Sullivan. And I was told that one of the key things was that they were a bit concerned about Ambassador Unger's being excessively defensive of the Kuomintang and Chiang Ching-kuo. On the other hand, Roger Sullivan, who was the DCM there, was well thought of. When he rotated back to Washington, he went to the NSC at the White House. In any case, he wanted to go to a place where he could sail his boat. In any case, he was considered the one who was supposed to keep Washington's interests constantly pressed in Taipei, so that Unger would not be out of line. Obviously, one of the reasons why he might get out of line is that nobody wanted to tell him anything because they felt if they told him what to do and what not to do, he would go and perhaps tell Ching-kuo what he had been told, and they didn't want that to happen. So this was a rather difficult task to do. You are not often sent off to keep your ambassador in line, and particularly a career ambassador, one who has had three or four ambassadorial assignments and is, of course, fairly confident about his own ability.

Q: Who was DCM when you arrived?

PRATT: Well, Roger Sullivan had been DCM, and he was being withdrawn, and therefore I was supposed to handle the interim until they could get a new DCM in. It was going to be Bill Brown. I think you could talk to Bill Brown.

Q: I've had a long set of interviews with Bill Brown. Now when you arrived out there, how did you see the relations with Taiwan at that time?

PRATT: Well, let me just get myself there, because after the conversation in Washington, which included being informed about Brzezinski's trip to Peking, I went through Japan and, as usual, tried to see some of my contacts at the Japanese Foreign Ministry and elsewhere. And I happened to coincide with Brzezinski's travels through there. And it was very clear that Brzezinski at least thought he was going with the answers to the three questions from Peking and thought he could perhaps provide proper, suitable answers to move ahead. So that was the framework when I ran into some of the people in Brzezinski's party in Tokyo.

Q: Who were they?

PRATT: I'm trying to remember now who they were. They were people in the East Asian Bureau whom I had known. These were the people in the State Department he had brought along, you know, to carry bags -

Q: What was their mood? Concern about whether we were giving away the store, or were they sort of feeling, Well, you know, I think we've made some real progress, or were they completely out of the information loop?

PRATT: No, they were in the information loop, and they thought really this time - although they did not know the details of how much Carter had told Brzezinski he could give - nonetheless they felt that they were taking a package which was designed to be acceptable. And therefore, while they couldn't be sure, because of course they hadn't consulted with Peking yet, nonetheless, they felt that the readings of the Vance trip and the requirements set forth at that time and what new they were taking would perhaps work. So this was a positive feeling on what was going to happen on the Peking side. So I arrived in Taipei, also as I say, with some of the things I had with my friends in Japan were that they thought also that we indeed - and I don't know how much we had briefed them on this - that we indeed were trying to get a package which would be acceptable to Peking. Now of course, the Japanese had already gone through their normalization procedure several years earlier [Ed: 1972] , and so they of course had a certain amount of experience and made a certain amount of judgment about what might sell in Peking.

So I arrived in Taipei really considering that this was going to be one of the key things which took place while I was there. And obviously this was not what I was suddenly thrust into, because of course it was business as usual, and to a certain extent a little bit more than usual because, obviously, there was a tendency to try to build up what the Taiwan military forces had in the way of armaments in advance of anything which might restrict us in the future. There was not requirement that Vance had received about the end of any military equipment transfer, but there was indeed a requirement for withdrawal of all U.S. forces. Now that would, of course, presumably include the MAAG, Military Assistance Advisory Group, which, of course, was involved in so much of what the Taiwan military had as their own capability, from the logistic front and utilization of armaments. And therefore, everybody knew that there was an importance in getting the military side cranked up as much as possible because if there were normalization - and of course in Taipei we had constantly to say if, not when - then, of course, it would be important to have the capabilities of Taiwan as advanced as possible at that time. So this was one of the key things which we were doing.

We had all kinds of military matters which we were involved in, and of course the ambassador, who would normally be the person who would go over and give either the good news or the bad news, depending upon what it was that was being asked by Taiwan and what the answer was that Washington gave, as I would normally accompany, because as political counselor I was also chief PM (politico-military officer), I had one deputy politico-military officer who unfortunately was not highly esteemed by our military colleagues, so I had to do more than what I might have had to do otherwise. So this was a key aspect also, of course.

The politics of Taiwan were very interesting. It was very much an authoritarian system, but an authoritarian system which was heading towards institutionalization, and that's I think one of the key contributions which Chiang Ching-kuo made, and he was one of the few, I think, in Asia riding the tiger who knew how to get off. When he died, of course, that did result in a totally different political structure.

Q: In the first place, just to give perspective, how had the Japanese handled their relations with Taiwan when you got there because this would, I think . . . here is a major country which has interests in both places, and so it would serve as a certain model for you to prognosticate how it might come out. How were they dealing with it?

PRATT: Well, obviously when the turnover actually did take place and we did recognize Peking, one of the few things which we had as a model was what we called the Japanese model or Nihon-moderu, anyway the Japanese unofficial presence was called the Interchange Association, Japan.. So I, of course, immediately got very close to the deputy head of their office. The head of their office was always an Italian ambassador who still had good contacts with Tokyo, but they had a presence seconded from the Foreign Ministry to be his deputy.

The Japanese Interchange Association was proposed as the model which we eventually had. So I indeed did have very frequent contacts with him, and we discussed how they handled all sorts of things. The Japanese system was different from ours. They are much better able to keep things out of their press and not to, shall we say, annoy Peking by having stories about what they are really doing. So they had a very big establishment there. It didn't look that big. Ours always looked much bigger, but they always were able to manage theirs so that the number of people who are obvious are fewer. They had, of course, a big economic connection, and that again was also something which was not nearly so obvious as ours because they often were able to have front men from the Taiwan side, and one of the things they were doing, for example, is using Taiwan as a way of getting preferential tariffs for Japanese manufacturers into the United States. And of course the U.S. has been the great, shall we say, absorber of so much of the economic development outside the United States. But they had this very great network, much of it going way, way back. One of the key persons in the Japanese Diet, whom I saw when I went through Tokyo, was considered the "Mr. Taiwan" for the Japanese Diet. He was in his 80s, and he happened to have been one of the young Japanese who had established the first golf course in Taiwan back in 1914 or something of the sort. So they had all of their old people, and for example retired Prime Minister Kishi would occasionally visit and so on. So they were able to do these things and go back and tell the Chinese that this was all totally unofficial. But of course the Chinese could well understand that in Japan almost all of these people are still official in some way or another and tied in with the ruling Liberal Democratic Party. We wouldn't have that kind of system, so we knew we had to be concerned about how we might do things. But then, of course, the Japanese told me, well, the important thing is just to make a façade and then you tell the Chinese that this is then the unofficial façade. One of the Japanese told me, he said, "When we went to the Chinese, they said just make sure everything is not official. And so we asked them, 'What is our definition of not official?' and they said, 'Well, you'll have to come up with that, because in China everything is official, and therefore your society is different and therefore if you say it's non-official, then obviously you know what that means because we don't.'"

Q: Well, now, when you got with Leonard Unger, you obviously had worked with him before and all that. Were you saying, "Look, this is going to happen," and as a political officer this is your advice, we had better get ready for this? I'm sure he'd been given this from others, too.

PRATT: Oh, sure, but the thing is, he had already been well aware of this, and the only thing he was doing, he was constantly trying to convince Washington that we should get a minimum of two weeks' advanced notice so Chiang Ching-kuo could make his preparations and let his key people know what was going on and so on. And I, of course, was telling him, I don't think that's what's going to happen because the problem was domestic American politics.

Q: In other words, you have to present Congress almost with a fait accompli.

PRATT: Well, enough to ensure that Ching-kuo has a sufficient fait accompli so that he can't go and try to go to Congress and to get them to pull his test and sound the fire.

Q: Which could happen

PRATT: Which could happen. I mean, it would at least complicate things. And so I said we won't get very much warning, but we're dealing with them all the time. We have bright people like Frederick Chen, the deputy foreign minister, who knows the United States very well. We have the President's illegitimate son [Ed: John Chang] as basically the key American watcher and one that I had constant back and forth with, and therefore we can say that we have no instructions and we have no information other than what we see in the press, but, you know, you can see what's going on. You have your very bright people in Washington, very much plugged in, able to get information which would astound most embassies. So you know, they're not going to be caught unawares.

Q: Well, how about when you got there, was sort of everybody ready for this particular shoe - I keep using the expression - to drop? This was there. It was almost so obvious.

PRATT: And it was, of course, a key preoccupation, and so many things which took place would be viewed from that angle: what does this mean? I mean the thing is they had, of course, the Vance trip and the Brzezinski trip. And then there were people waiting to see if there was going to be another trip and who was traveling from Peking to Washington and so forth. It was, indeed, a constant concern. I shan't say obsession, because they had these two other things on their minds, but when it came to the United States, that was the key one. Even when we were dealing with military equipment which we were providing, the question was what should we weed out of this equipment agreement? Is this designed to take care of this problem or that problem? We did not do much in the way of draw-down of our forces in Taiwan, and we did not cut into the role and importance of the Taiwan Defense Command, and we didn't cut back on, for example, on one occasion I accompanied the chief of the general staff on a visit to an aircraft carrier. We didn't cut back on things of that nature because, of course, we weren't anxious to indicate either to Peking or to Taipei that we were caving before we were caving. But nonetheless, as I say, this was the way in which everybody was looking at almost everything that took place between the United States and Taiwan: what does this mean about normalization? So on one occasion, for example, I was asked to give a briefing to what they called the diplomatic correspondents of all the newspapers. This was periodically arranged by our very active PAO (Public Affairs Officer). And so I went through all the press accounts of what had taken place. I said, "I'm giving you absolutely nothing which is drawn from any telegrams from Washington. We are basically not very much consulted about things of this sort because we're the ones who are going to have to be passing the message, and they don't want to give us any more of a heads-up than they have to, but as I read the same kind of tea leaves that you ought to be reading, mainly what's in the New York Times, what has been said by various people after various trips and so on, then it looks, indeed, as though the effort is indeed being made to normalize relations with Peking, and for what they consider to be very good reasons. And of course there will be an impact on Taiwan, and you all know what Peking has required of the French, of the Japanese, and therefore, you know, look around you and see that that indeed will have an impact."

Well, there again, that was misplaced, because one person who had not attended the dinner and heard my briefing and heard all the strictures that it was not based on anything from Washington, DC, and so forth, played it in an AP [Associated Press] report back to the United States saying that the American Embassy had just informed the Foreign Ministry that it was moving ahead on normalization. And you can imagine the blistering call that came in. And so, as I say, this was a person, the AP stringer, or rather the AP person there, was a person of Chinese origin - I don't know whether he had American citizenship or not, but in any case, he was very much under the discipline of the Government Information Office, and he would never have sent that story without the approval of Fred Chen, who had previously been head of GIO [Government Information Office], and obviously this was designed to see whether they could get some information out of the State Department to confirm or deny, et cetera. It really was a pretty nasty, low move, and I let all the reporters know it, that this was not what we . . . Everything was supposed to be off the record, and I had told them I was giving nothing which was in the way of classified information, there was nothing which was official. It was just my view of how things were moving in my own country and in Peking. Well, that was in, I guess, September or October.

PRATT: Of 1978, yes. And so of course, things quieted down a bit, and we thought, well, maybe it won't happen until maybe the Congress reconvenes in February or March. Surely the President would never want to be showing that he is showing due deference to Congress by having it take place, actually, when Congress was back in session. Even though he won't tell them in advance, nonetheless, he wants them to be able to respond.

And we said, "And besides, of course, Taiwan is holding its first probably really significant election under Chiang Ching-kuo's efforts to normalize the political structure and get it closer to, say, what their actual constitution is, which means recognizing the fact that they're only the government of the people who are living on Taiwan, and therefore they have to show decent respect for the opinions of the people on Taiwan and to hold elections which are going to be real elections. Well, they were scheduled for the 20th or so of December, and so much of our activity at that time was trying to figure out just how they were going to run these elections, and much of our contact with what had become the DPP [Democratic Progressive Party] which was at that time was called the Tangwai - 'outside the party' or 'non-party' group. So that was our focus at that time, which then shifted to the major internal political development, which were elections. And we sent in quite frequent reports about how the elections were shaping up and how important they were, and how they would not change the KMT's real hold on power, but nonetheless they would show a progression toward something other than a single-party system.

Q: How were you reading this? Were you seeing that there really were developments within the Taiwan political structure that really were encouraging?

PRATT: Oh, yes, very much so. See, I had been there in the language school as a student in 1959, and there I was back basically 20 years later, and there had been, of course, considerable changes. And we saw that more were being planned by Chiang Ching-kuo. And one of the key things was the effort to find a way of getting a role for the Taiwanese as Taiwanese, instead of their being just an adjunct of the Mainland-dominated Kuomintang. They had, in 1977, local elections, which had resulted a bad riot in Chung-li, where they had been faced with the dilemma of being unable to control the demonstration without sending in regular troops, and the alternative, as I say . . . well, the demonstration ran wild and burned down a police station, which from their point of view was very bad symbolically. And yet the other alternative of sending in untrained Taiwanese troops was even more horrendous, because would they actually fire upon their own people? So they refrained from doing that, and the police station was burned, and police cars and other cars were burned, and so on. And that left a very bad feeling, and, you know, is this going to be possible to liberalize without having things come apart. And that of course was one of the big debates within the Kuomintang party structure and the security services and the military. So this was obviously a key period, and this, as I say, I got there in 1978, and the thing that still dominated the internal political scene was that riot there in Chung-li during the previous elections.

Q: Had our embassy prepared for the shock of recognition or something, because the embassy had been the target of a riot years earlier? Was there a good plan of what to do and all? Particularly the thought would be that, yes, there probably would be demonstrations, and considerable ones, once we did this. Were we getting ready for this?

PRATT: Yes, we were, and we were making sure that we did not . . . the same way with the military establishment, but we always figured the military establishment they would not go after because that would be something where our military friends would say, "We don't want to alienate the admiral. We can alienate the ambassador, but let's not alienate the admiral because we may depend upon him in the future." But we made sure that we did not keep materials that we didn't have to. We had a pretty thoroughgoing review of what we had in the way of holdings and what we could have in the way of protection. We had, of course, a wall around the embassy. We had Marine guards, and they were told what they could use. We eventually had to do some of these things. But, no, that's fine, we knew we had to be ready for it. What we would do about housing, we thought they wouldn't go after any of these people in their housing, and of course a lot of them lived up in Yangminshan, which is very close to the area in which a lot of the bigwigs of the Kuomintang lived, and therefore we felt that they would be very unlikely to do anything in that area. But we did consider that this would be one of the things which might occur. As you are aware, it was the Christopher mission when it did really happen. But in addition to that, we were finding it difficult to use our embassy after the 15th, and we did basically for a time meet in a room in the Tienmu area, piggy-backing on the military. Then when the military were out, we then had no premises, of course, because we had had to turn over our embassy to the Taiwanese Government, and we were meeting in our homes. So we were indeed preparing, but knowing full well that it was hard to be [end of tape].

Q: We have your elections coming up December 20th, and you're getting ready for this, and Congress has been adjourned by this time, I guess.

PRATT: Yes, and so we were sort of saying, Well, we will have finally the elections for it, and then after that we will probably wait and see what happens back in Washington. And of course one should remember this was also the Christmas season, and so there were a number of Christmas parties being held and some of those big public ones, where the Ambassador would represent the U.S. - the Chamber of Commerce and things of that sort - and others would be private ones where you would be at a friend's home. And so come the night of the 15th, I was off at a private dinner at the CIA station chief's house, and the Ambassador was off at a big dinner at the Chamber of Commerce, and a telephone call came through. And finally they tracked me down, and Roger Sullivan said, "Where are you all? We've been trying to get in touch with somebody there." And I said, "Well, the Ambassador is off at an official dinner. If you want me to get a message to him, I can do so." And he said, "Yes, get him over to a secure phone in the Taiwan Defense Command. We want to tell him what he's supposed to be doing."

Q: By the way, the Taiwan Defense Command was our office.

PRATT: Yes, it was set up under the Mutual Defense Treaty, and it was located in the northern part of town, and it was a fairly large area because, of course, it was a complex, in that they had several different spots. But the major part was just up near the airport - the then airport which was within the Taipei city limits. So I got in touch with Unger, and the two of us went to the Taiwan Defense Command for the secure phone conversation. And in the secure phone conversation, Roger Sullivan told him the message would be coming through, and it would be a White House channel message but coming through the station. So I had alerted my friend who was the station chief before, and so he knew enough to go to where we would be . . . where the station office was, so we would get the message as quickly as possible. Their office was over near the MAAG, so we were there where the station was, which was much bigger, of course, not just a little part of the embassy, but had its own operation there. So the message came in and told us to... in fact, we were told on the telephone, we spoke to them, and originally they said tomorrow morning, and it was just about 20 minutes advanced warning to Ching-kuo what we were doing. And eventually Unger, if you interviewed him, you'd find out that he was able to persuade Washington to let us do it almost immediately to get the maximum amount of time, not changing the time we were going to do anything in Washington, but making it a little bit more time for Ching-kuo to get his people somewhat organized. So we got the message, and finally we got through to James Soong, who has currently had problems of a political nature in Taiwan, to get through to the president. And as we learned later, they got through to the head of the National Security Bureau, the NSB, who was among the, I guess, only two or three persons who were permitted to wake the president. In other words, the foreign minister was not on this list. The chief of the General Staff was on the list, and formerly the defense minister - I don't know whether _____ [inaudible] I guess at that time he still could do it. So just a very small number of people could put the establishment running so someone could go in and wake the president, because he had insomnia and therefore nobody really wished to face him unless they had to, and the only one who was willing to do so was the head of the NSB. We didn't know that at the time because he was not in evidence when we went over to the president's office. There was Fred Chen there and James Soong as interpreter.

So we delivered the message, and Ching-kuo asked for a written version rather than one which was just read to him, which he would be able to retain, because in it there were reassurances from Carter that the U.S. would continue to be concerned about the security of the people on Taiwan and be opposed to anything which would be, shall we say, a military operation on the part of the mainland against Taiwan, a peaceful solution. I've forgotten just how it was worded, but that would be the gist. And Ching-kuo, in a very sober and very statesmanlike way, said that he thought that we would regret this, that we had made a decision that would not turn out well and we would be sorry. But obviously he had seen it coming. So we went back and reported to Washington through the same channel and finally a few hours later got back a written version of the message which was delivered orally, and we went over and delivered that to his office at his home, which was on a naval base at Tamsui River.

So that was, shall we say, the break, and the turnover was, of course, to take place on January 1, 1979, and the departure of the military three months later and the termination of the Mutual Defense Treaty, in accordance with the required one year's advance notice. So Brzezinski had been able to establish the fact that, yes, we would have no consulate general, no liaison office, nothing resembling an official establishment, and we would do something, as we were learning later, on the order of what the Japanese had done. And then we would break the treaty, but with one year's delay. The Chinese, of course, were not very happy about it. They had agreed to it. And then we would withdraw all American forces, and of course we interpreted that to mean not only Taiwan Defense Command but also MAAG, which then we would have to have under the unofficial office, retired military, and again to manage what the active-duty military had done. So he had been able to get slight modifications to the Peking demands and ones which we felt we could live with. Our basic principle was the maintenance of practical and real relations, and the symbolic things having to go Peking's way. This is one of the things which, of course, was very difficult for Taipei because they were just as Chinese as the people in Peking, and therefore symbols may have meant as much to them as they did to the people in Peking. I don't think that's so true of the Taiwanese population, which is why things are somewhat changing now, although still symbols remain very important in all of Asia, including there. But nonetheless, at that particular time we had a leadership which was composed of elderly mainlanders, for whom the symbolism was again one more humiliation after the symbol of their leaving their home provinces of Chekiang or Chiangsu. So this was indeed very rough for the top leadership, and Chiang Ching-kuo obviously was going to have his hands full trying to manage this. We knew that, and so we, of course... But Unger was deploring that he couldn't get any more time. But I think, really, he made quite a contribution by apparently being able to convince somebody. They couldn't get in touch with the Congress. They couldn't get any bad things done, and if we gave them a few extra hours, so for God's sake, let's give them their early morning hours to do whatever they wanted to do and to tell whatever they wanted to tell so that they could have a statement ready for their own people at the time when the U.S. statement was being broadcast.

Q: Well, when you were doing this, was it clear that we would have a relationship? I mean, we really weren't pulling out. It was the symbols that were changing, but not the realities.

PRATT: Well, we knew that there was a certain amount of the reality which would go with the symbols, particularly the Taiwan Defense Command and the MAAG. And therefore this would have to be handled differently. But my personal view was that the people in Taiwan have always been very resilient and capable, and therefore would work out a way to handle this. And also even when it came to the problem of, shall we say, losing the symbol of an embassy and not being able to use the Foreign Ministry openly because we couldn't go there, nonetheless, they'd be able to work that out, too. In other words, the U.S. would have its problems, and probably some of these problems would be much worse here than they were there because we would have the difficulty of the American media and their role, of the Congress and its carping, and therefore it's very hard for us to do something, particularly since this is not an American game. From the very beginning, from the time when Nixon worked out his Shanghai Communiqué, we sort of agreed to play a Chinese game about Taiwan - in other words, forget about reality and be concerned about the symbols and try to manage this unreal world of symbol. And so that had started way back in 1972. And so we knew that this would be very uncomfortable for us because the United States does not really . . . I mean, I had to go through the so-called "secret war" in Laos when there was absolutely nothing secret about it, and yet to the American press and to the critics and all the rest of it, they used this symbolic thing "secret" - you won't admit it, and therefore you're making it a secret. And so in the same way, you're going to have an embassy in everything but name there, you're going to try to manage things exactly as they were in the past, and there's no change over the role of the American military in the area, and we're going to continue to do this, that, and the other thing even though you say you aren't. Well, that's very difficult for the United States to manage, because this is not an American-type game. Face is indeed important in the United States, but it is not the same kind of game as the one we embarked on with Peking.

Q: It's hard for the press, in a way, to deal with ambiguity. They want to pin this down - what does this really mean? - and all that.

PRATT: And does that mean, you know, is the treaty in force or not? And so you'll have the Congress coming out and saying, Well, the Taiwan Relations Act is the law of the land. Well, what does that mean, and so forth? So indeed, because when the normalization took place, the intention of Carter was to have a far more modest . . . In fact, he originally had just an executive order which permitted us to operate. We had considerable problems, of course, legally, because where's the money coming from? If we didn't have an embassy in Taipei, what budget was the money coming out of, how much of it was going where, and what kind of things could we do? All of that, you see, had to be -

Q: And who is going to staff it?

PRATT: That's right.

Q: You have a Foreign Service, but they can't be Foreign Service.

PRATT: That's right. So how that was going to be worked out, they couldn't even address that kind of question until after the major decision was made because they couldn't inform the people who handled budget and fiscal and the legal department. The Department's legal bureau was involved in some of the major aspects of, for example, the lapsing of the defense agreement with Taiwan, but there wouldn't be enough people involved to look at all the other aspects. They looked at quite a few, and they had a few people involved in it, but still much of it had to be done after December 15th. And we had a cutoff date, basically, of June 1st, when the ambassador was expected to be out, and we had to pull down the flag in our embassy and no place to run it up.

Q: Today is the 24th of January, 2000. Mark, December 15, 1978: alright, what happened?

PRATT: Well, we pulled the plug, as we had been making it very clear that we were going to, from the point of view of Taiwan.

Q: Anyway, let's take you, and what happened?

PRATT: Well, as we were handling this at that end, we of course had a perspective which was primarily looking at what the Taiwan aspect would be because that is what we were being paid for. I don't think we were given much credit for that because, as you are well aware, many of the Democrats had a very strong anti-KMT bias because, of course, they looked at the KMT as being the favored child of the Republicans, which indeed was the case with Barry Goldwater and all the others. Therefore, they were very surprised to find that after recognizing Peking and of course treating Taiwan somewhat shabbily, they found that the Democrats in the Congress were the ones who spearheaded many of the things which they were opposed to, and appeared to be supporters of the Kuomintang.

Well, of course, our principal point, when we were there in Taiwan, was you cannot just deal with a bunch of strutting mainlanders, corrupt and ideologically driven and all the rest of it, and particularly centered back on their mistakes on the mainland, because this was a gerontocracy for the most part. Even Chiang Ching-kuo, who was next generation, had to deal with the buddies of his father, some of whom are now still alive and in their 100s. Madame Chiang, for example, is going to be 103 shortly. Well, we did not consider that that was the major part of what we were there for handling the Taiwan side of things, because we considered that the majority of the population there, 85 per cent of it, was not Mainlander and not necessarily KMT. And therefore we had to be as concerned about this group of people and how we did things, and therefore we felt that there was a good way for the United States to behave and a relatively impolite way, a way in which we would not like to be viewed by history as having handled this side of the equation. As you I'm sure are quite aware, there was absolutely no concern whatsoever on the Carter team about human rights in China.

Q: We're talking about Mainland China.

PRATT: Mainland China. They had gone through and, in fact, barely gotten out of the Cultural Revolution, which was one of the most horrendous periods of any country. It makes the anti-

White campaign that Lenin fought relatively moderate by comparison.

Q: You're speaking about the anti-White Russian...

PRATT: Yes, so our view was that there was a way of doing things which was commensurate with U.S. sense of values, and we knew that Tricky Dick had felt that he had to do a relatively tricky thing to get by the bumps in the road about what you'd say about Taiwan, in order to be able to get things through Peking. And he could do that with Mao Zedong in 1972, and he did it by playing a Chinese game, namely, conceding questions of face, symbol, while maintaining the reality. He wanted to go beyond that, of course. He wanted to normalize relations with Peking, and yet every point along the way he had other things, which, of course, intervened. And of course, that particularly was the problem with the Congress over Watergate and so on. But we all saw that the 1972 game was indeed a Chinese game. We, of course, knew why the Chinese wanted it and what the limits were and what basically some of the rules were. But it was key to us to keep in mind the fact that this was not an American game and we had to take care of American values and interests our old way at the same time we see this in questions of face and symbol to the Chinese-type game.

Q: I want to move you back to you on Taiwan, December 15, 1978, and on. What were you experiencing and observing?

PRATT: Well, we, of course, had to try to get our own status there and our own arrangements worked out because we were not only going to have the embassy closed within two weeks, or just about two weeks - January 1, but we also had to bring down the flag, we had to leave those premises, we had to find other places which we could operate from. We had to figure out new rules of how we would do this, because of course since the "experts" in the Department of State had been excluded from much of the arrangements with Peking, it was taking a while for them even to find out what it was that Brzezinski and company had actually agreed with Peking, and therefore what it is that we had to do, beyond, of course, the basic parameters, which were very clear, namely the termination of the defense treaty, the withdrawal of all forces within three months and so on, shutting down of our embassy by January 1 - the basic lines were there, but the point is that there are always many practical things that you have to figure out how you do, and you have to be able to work out with the host government side how they're going to permit it to be done, and you also have got to be able to tell them clearly what it is they have to do in the United States.

Q: Were you also, more immediately, having to prepare for mobs and that sort of thing?

PRATT: Well, we expected that to happen, and that was - I shan't say the least of our worries, but it was one where we did have to get our security further cranked up. We had to get rid of a lot of things we wouldn't want to have around. Dumping tapes went too far. But we also had to make sure that we told the government that we wouldn't stand for too much of this, that we didn't think that the people on Taiwan would either, and therefore they'd better handle this carefully.

But of course the first step was we had to prepare for the arrival of Warren Christopher and the American delegation, which was going to set forth the policy, explain everything. Something which, of course, they weren't really able to do because they hadn't been able to work everything out either. And of course, it was labeled as a kind of negotiation, but Warren Christopher made it very clear that there was no negotiations; he was here to tell them what it was we had decided and what it was we were going to do, and what it was they were going to have to do. This was, of course, a relatively highhanded and not very polite way of handling this. Of course, Warren Christopher himself was very polite and very much the gentleman and very cool and I think did as well as anyone could the difficult job of trying to find a little way of stroking the people in Taiwan.

However, on his arrival, the biggest demonstrations of all were set up, and these were, in a very hectoring fashion, announced as being designed to show how the people of Taiwan resented what had been done and how the "just anger" of the people of Taiwan was being given free rein to show Christopher and the other American side how they really felt, and that this should be something he should take back to President Carter and the American people, that this was something which had indeed angered them greatly.

Fred Chen was the deputy foreign minister, and he finally made a speech at the airport when they arrived, wagging his finger a bit, and saying in sufficiently general terms but terms which afterwards were considered to have included the fact that there was going to be a mob scene and there would be actually an attack on the motorcade. Now we considered that this was orchestrated. This was KMT-run Taiwan. You won't get this number of people together without having it organized and having permission being given. And the fact that they moved in portable johns and had other conveniences made available showed that they were indeed making their own organized demonstration, and not something which was the "righteous anger" et cetera et cetera. Some of the few people who really did feel some of this were the veterans from the Mainland. There were still quite a few of them around, and in fact, we knew that we were going to have real trouble when they told the ambassador that he should not use his car but the Foreign Ministry would provide a car for him and for Christopher, and then the other cars would also be provided and no embassy car should be used and no embassy drivers used. In other words, taking it out of our power, and also that meant that if there were damaged cars, there would be no claims by the American Government for damage to American cars, which they then would have to have the indignity of having to pay claims on. So this was all designed, I think, the way they had in previous demonstrations, to show that unlike the May 4th Movement in 1919, there were not grounds for the people of Taiwan to consider that their own government was acquiescing in something a foreign government did which was against their interests.

Q: Was there any proposal saying, well, you know, this is moving, maybe Christopher shouldn't come in, which is a perfectly legitimate response to this? To say, "Okay, fellows, if this is the way you want to play it, so be it, but we're not going to be the patsy in this."

PRATT: Well, there was sufficient indication that something might occur, but every time Unger talked to them about this, they said, Oh, no, these are our precautions being taken to make sure something doesn't get out of hand. And at the same time they were giving him assurances that they would guarantee the safety, et cetera, et cetera. And so what could Unger, who was anxious to have some kind of American gesture to make up for the rather shabby way in which this had been handled, to show that the U.S. Government at least was going to listen to their problems and this could be registered and taken back to President Carter by a high-level emissary. So he was most anxious to have this tape played, and of course anxious not to be unaccommodating. So we were accepting their reassurances.

Now I'm not saying they did not play it relatively well. There were only a small number of incidents where they'd really get out of hand, where they broke a few windows and so on. I must say that the drivers they assigned were very disciplined, despite the fact that they themselves were retired soldiers or still maybe active-duty soldiers - Mainlanders, all of them - and therefore they had their strict orders, and they were going to follow them. But they personally were not very happy with what had occurred, and one could see that when they saw the people coming up waving anti-American banners and all the rest of it, they shared those sentiments perhaps more than the persons who actually were carrying the banners, which had probably been written for them by other people.

We learned afterwards, for example, that they mobilized the students from several universities and got them all out there, and of course the students were resentful of being mobilized and sent out to do this thing because they didn't particularly agree with it. A lot of them, of course, were ethnic Taiwanese. And so they, of course, were not, shall we say, with the mindset of the old KMT people, but they were forced to do this anyway. They were given eggs, and one told me afterwards, "Well, I asked, 'Are these rotten eggs, and they said, 'No, no, we don't want to do that. These are fresh eggs.'" Well, they stuck them in their pockets and took them home and ate them. But for some of them it was just a lark, but there are a number of old-time Mainlanders who could infiltrate this crowd of people fairly well controlled and get out of line. But they had security people there in plain clothes designed to grab them and pull them away before they had a chance to do too much damage. Now they did knock off Leonard Unger's glasses and they scratched his face, and in our car, I was in the second car with Mike Armacost and a few others from Christopher's party, and we were basically lightly targeted. The car was shaken, and I think a windshield was cracked or something of the sort, but it was basically pretty minor.

Q: If I recall, Bill Brown was saying in his ADST interview that Fred Chen, after giving his speech, took off and went in a different direction, and Christopher made due note of this and never forgave him.

PRATT: That's right. Not only that, he figured that what he said . . . Well, obviously, we were going one direction, and Fred wasn't, but it was just even getting out of the airfield area. Fred Chen, when he crossed the tarmac and very clearly with design to avoid the demonstration completely, so it wasn't as though he was going to escort anybody to where they were going.

Q: That's a very . . . you know, I mean, just plain . . . I would say rude is even the wrong term, it's greater than that. I mean to say, "Okay, Fellows, we're going to go after you. We'll try to keep it under control, but I'm sure not going to be around of this."

PRATT: "I'm not going to risk it." Yes. Well, we thought, however, that Fred was as much orchestrated as anybody else. So I never held it against Fred because I think that he was really surprised at what happened, and he would have advised against going, not because he wasn't as angry as many of the other Mainlanders, because Fred's been an angry man every since he was probably in his teens, but nonetheless he was not involved in this part; he was merely told what his role was, to be the person who welcomes them at the airport, and such a welcome! I think he played it badly. I would have found it difficult to go through even the kind of speech which he gave, but he didn't realize that he was making the kind of threat which they intended to follow through on in such a physical fashion.

Q: Well, now, you have been making a difference between the Mainlanders and the Taiwanese. I will say, at the time, both before and after December 15th, was there a relatively clear-cut difference between the Mainlanders and the Taiwanese regarding America policy?

PRATT: Yes, very clearly, because the Mainlanders of course were still fighting the Marshall Mission and what they saw as the cutoff of American aid on the Mainland. They considered that the U.S. was the one responsible for their having lost China and for their having to move out of their palaces in the French Concession in Shanghai and losing all of the prestige of being a minister for all of China. One of my friends from Tokyo put it succinctly "Do I want to go down there and be so-called prime minister of so-called Republic of China, which is merely one province?" So the Mainlanders were all very filled with anger with the United States. They think that we have handled China badly for years. The Taiwanese had none of this. The only thing they blamed us for was supporting the KMT in such a fashion that their ambitions for their own island were being given so little weight in the councils of the top KMT leaders. Remember they only had a few token Taiwanese in the KMT, even as late as when I was there. It was not until basically after 1980 that there began to be a more substantial role for Taiwanese, even within the councils of the top KMT leaders. So they indeed looked at the U.S. very differently. They considered that we should have continued with what it is we intended to do originally, in the early 1940s, which was to free Taiwan from Japan and give Taiwan its independence.

Q: Well, now, again, before we talk about developments, you were talking about how shabbily the United States treated Taiwan. In realistic terms, I think you'd mentioned last time, we both agreed, that announcing the change in relations almost had to be done as a fait accompli because Congress would be fighting it out to this day. "If 'twere done, 'twere best 'twere done quickly," but what could have been done that would not have sparked a firestorm, particularly in the Senate and all that, do you think?

PRATT: Well, in the end, as you know, the Congress got its revenge. It passed the Taiwan Relations Act, and we are still today - after all we are 20 years later - and we are still fighting exactly the same battle which we had in 1972, so we've not ended the battle.

Q: Do you think that we could have come up with a reasonable solution that would have been reasonable both to the Communist régime and to the Taiwanese régime at that time?

PRATT: Of course, we didn't have a Taiwanese régime. We had a Mainlander, Chekiang/Chiangsu, régime on Taiwan, and we had a Sichuan régime emerging in Peking, but yes, I think we could have done something differently, done better. I think in the first place we would have had to rely a little bit more on people, one, who understood Peking better - and admittedly Peking is not easy to understand (just this last week there were stories of a bomb attack against Zhang Zemin, which turns out to be a kind of hoax, but something happened there in Shaban), so we still don't know what goes on very well in China. However, there are certain things we can know better than others. Secondly, we did not have to have the view which people like, I don't think Mike Oksenburg was this superficial, but many others were, and that is once we withdraw recognition, Taipei will come and accept Peking's terms very soon, a matter of two or three years, maybe even before the end of Carter's first administration and certainly before the end of Carter's "second" administration.

Q: Do you think that was the thinking?

PRATT: That was the thinking of many people. In fact, one scholar, Eric Akenshaw [Ed: ?], says that this is why they felt we could afford to do this, because they felt that the KMT was so cut off from the Taiwanese and Taiwan that they would recognize Peking as a way of making sure that the Taiwanese never got into power on Taiwan. And when they saw the demography working so that gradually the sons of the top Mainlanders went off to the United States and very few remained behind, and as the Taiwanese took over, the Mainlanders would pull a sellout and invite Peking in and have them land at the various airfields, which they would control through the military, and turn the island over to Peking regardless of what the people on Taiwan thought.

Now those of us in the embassy (still an embassy then) considered this was not the way things would work out. We didn't know exactly what the Mainlanders, many of them, might try to do, but we felt that they would not be able to accomplish it. I talked to one of the Taiwanese, really a rather significant leader, and we mentioned the fact, what if, for example, it looked as though Mainlanders were trying to pull a sellout and were trying to get the military set up to be able to invite in Peking's military to turn the island over to Peking? And he said, "Oh, we'd have to kill them all." And of course by that time, the military was sufficiently Taiwanese (although the officer corps and particularly the top officer corps was not) and a lot of Taiwanese had gotten well enough connected with them so that they would be able to make sure that the military could not pull off what some of them might have intended to do. We didn't think that they intended to do it, either. We thought this was a miscalculation on the part of those persons who were so virulently anti-KMT, so virulently against Chiang Kai-shek and all that he stood for-

Q: We're talking about Americans.

PRATT: Americans, yes - that they could not see that Taiwan had already changed enormously and that the Taiwanese were very significant players even though they were not among the top people who would be greeting them at the airport or seeing them at the top ministry.

Q: Well, now, going back to 1978, at the time this theory was sort of floating around, what would have been in it for the Mainlander officer corps or political leaders to invite the Communist régime in? What would have been in it for them? What was the thinking?

PRATT: Not enough at that time, by that time. And of course, also one thing they failed to understand was that so many of the top leaders of Taiwan were already persons who had made their major career on Taiwan. Sure they had been born on the Mainland, they had been educated on the Mainland, they might have had minor positions on the Mainland, but the positions they had had where they had made the greatest accomplishments were on Taiwan, and therefore although they were Mainlanders and although they really looked down their noses at the Taiwanese, nonetheless they were persons who considered that their major career had been made on Taiwan and that's what they were proud of, and therefore they had a stake in Taiwan. But you couldn't tell this to the people who were living with the concept of the Kuomintang as it was in the 1950's.

Q: Well, now, another question about this. Just as a practical thing, we're sitting in an embassy. We had to so-called give up the embassy. Why couldn't somebody wave a wand and say, "This is no longer an embassy; this is a private office building"? Why did we have to go find other quarters?

PRATT: Because of the symbol, and as I told you, we were playing China's game when it came to symbols. The embassy was U.S. Government property. There was no way. I mean, we sold it.

Q: What did we do now? I mean, what were you doing during this time after the recognition? Christopher came. What was your reading on Christopher and dealing, once he got through the motorcade and all? What were you doing?

PRATT: Well, I went with the motorcade to where we were supposed to have our people be staying, which was the Grand Hotel, so my car got there because the ambassador decided that there might be something still happening at the hotel because we were scheduled to go there. So he went to his residence he had up in Yangminshan.

PRATT: With Christopher, yes. We were then in telephonic communication, and we conveyed the message back to the Taiwan side that we would not be attending the foreign ministers' dinner. That was canceled, obviously, in view of the manner in which we had been received.

Now the new foreign minister - because when we recognized on the 15th the foreign minister submitted his resignation because, of course, he had failed to hold on the American connection, and the new foreign minister was, I think, a very fine gentleman and not at all as unpleasant and difficult as his predecessor. So we were anxious not to affront him personally because we believed he had nothing to do with this. He would have advised against it, and yet, of course, he was not in the loop for that sort of thing. They were not concerned with what they could do to with the internal security. However, we felt that it was certainly wrong symbolism to be conveyed if we were to be his guest at a dinner, so we moved directly to having the first substantive meeting the following day, and also we arranged for a call on the president, who was not supposed to be involved in the negotiations, but we said that we would not even begin negotiations until we there had been a meeting with the president to express our displeasure at what had occurred and to get assurances that nothing more of this nature would take place. And this is when Bill Brown went on this trip, and I'm sure he gave you a very thorough and good account of how Wang Ching-shi, the head of the Taiwan Garrison General Headquarters, was put in charge of all the security for our stay there and told directly by the president that he had full power to make sure everything was maintained in a good, calm way. And of course, he was a very honorable gentleman. Unfortunately, he was married to the daughter of Admiral Hu Ling-ching, who had taken the surrender from the Japanese along with MacArthur, and therefore was considered not to be in the Chekiang-Chiangsu clique of President Chiang, and he felt that he had a problem and was forced out of the NSD later on, presumably somewhat connected with the murder of Henry Liu. But at that time he appeared to be one of the persons who was not only a real gentleman and a very honorable man, but somebody who had enough knowledge of who would be doing this sort of thing and could make sure that they couldn't continue to do it. So those were assurances that came from the president and from Wang Ching-shi, which meant that we felt that we had the Security basis and basic political go-ahead to carry on our discussions.

And the person who handled them was the new foreign minister, and he was also named Y.F. Chiang, but he spelled it differently and was not of the same family as President Chiang. But he was from that area of China, well-educated in the United States and a very savvy person who had been involved with the Americans since the 1950s. He had been on the Joint Commission for Rural Reconstruction, where he played a key role, which was so often played by these Mainlanders, as being able to get information from below up to where it had to go by using the Americans as the intermediaries. The poor Americans didn't realize. They thought they were there because they were so technically competent. Well, he was probably more technically competent than they, but politically speaking we could serve as a means of communication. So had he played that role very well and was indeed continuing to play a very, very good role. But Fred Chen was also there, and one or two times he started to do his sputtering, and Y. F. just turned and fixed with an icy stare and told him to shut up.

So the talks went smoothly. There wasn't really much to talk about. The Taipei Mission did not find that we learned that much about what Washington intended to do, and certainly the Taiwan side didn't. But at least we got the basic outlines retraced and the time frame for various things to occur, and of course they wanted to be able to have a longer period of time for them to adjust their representation in the United States. They wanted to make sure they had the same number or a larger number of offices here than they had as consulates at the time of the turnover, and we were limiting them. So everything that they wanted we had to say, sorry, no, we had to do it our way. And so it was not that easy, except for the fact that they knew where the power lay. And we were not being very clear about the continuing of arms sales because there was going to be a hiatus of quite some time with no new approvals. And the question was, when would they resume and what sort of arms sales would be resumed? So the security side of things was important, but we didn't have the details for much of that because, of course, the people who handled this in the White House were not terribly good on military matters and therefore they hadn't bothered - the hadn't been able, really, given the way in which they were handling this - to get the Defense Department as thoroughly involved in studying this because it would have meant more people in the Defense Department knowing what was going on than they wanted to have know.

But it was a useful exercise. It gave them a chance not only to present their views, but to be seen by the people on Taiwan as presenting their views. Now, admittedly, they still looked very much like the KMT old-timers' views being presented, and the Taiwanese were still pretty much out of this, but nonetheless it did look as though a view of, shall we say, security and other aspects of Taiwan was being presented to Washington.

Q: Now Mike Armacost's position was what?

PRATT: He was still under secretary for political affairs.

Q: Were you getting from him or from the group that came out with Christopher sort of a feeling of saying, Look, we don't have much control over this, this is a White House thing, and these guys are all screwed up? I mean, was that what you were getting?

PRATT: No, not that they were all screwed up, but we were finally finding out what it is they have done, and we're trying to work out what it is we can do to implement this. I think nobody questioned the right of the President to make these decisions and basically to arrive at them and to try to implement them any way that he chooses to. This is what I think is the mistake in the way in which Brzezinski and Carter and, of course, Kissinger try to play things always, as the State Department is always trying to thwart them. Well, the State Department basically, at that level, I don't think has ever had a separate agenda where it says, you know, to hell with the President, who does the President think he is, anyway? I think the major thing, and this is one of the things I think which Elliott Richardson understood and used this, and that is that these are people who are assets to be used and not opponents. We had been pushing for recognition of Peking since the 1960s or late '50s, and we had been the ones handling the conversations with China at various times. So we weren't people fighting it; merely we were trying to use what little expertise anyone could have over what was going on in Peking to try to make sure we safeguarded our own interests as best we could. But that, of course, was not the way in which it was viewed.

Now Armacost was a good soldier. I mean, we were all team players, and so was Warren Christopher. Warren came to this rather late, too, because he had not been very much involved, and although Tyler, of course, says that this was basically a big feud between Vance and Brzezinski, I think their biggest feud was not really over the China issue (and Vance went along with having most of the people in the Department of State excluded, including political appointees like Mr. Holbrooke, in favor of the little "kitchen cabinet" which Brzezinski had assembled within the White House).

So no, we didn't get anything which was critical of what had been decided. They were interested in knowing our views as to why, for example, we thought if it had been delayed 10 days the Congress still would not be in session and it would have given them a chance to hold their election. I think they were supposed to be on the 18th. So the 15th took place then. On the 16th, the president of Taiwan canceled the election. He said we cannot hold elections with the turmoil surrounding the break-off of relations with the United States. Now we would have advised CCK to go ahead with the elections anyway, and merely take this as a circumstance to be handled in the electoral politics, which they generally are pretty good at. And we were advising Washington, of course, one, that we wanted to get advanced notice so that we could tell them what was going on in Taiwan which might indicate to change it this way or that way if they could. We weren't asking too much - say, a week. A week or 10 days would have made all the difference from the point of view of how things were handled in Taiwan. If the elections had taken place, then the first big step that Chiang Ching-kuo was taking towards having the politics of Taiwan involved, and as it was he had to cancel these, and it was two years later and also one dreadful incident down in Kaohsiung later that he finally was able to move to elections.

Q: So how did you all operate? The delegation left, and did you feel that you had instructions? Did you have enough to figure out what you had to do?

PRATT: No, no. But we knew enough so that we had plenty to do, and we could have known about that, of course, as fast as we did when we started the 15th and knew we had to find new premises. We knew we had to do something.

In the meantime, we were told that we could still be getting some money, but there had to be an executive to permit this to happen post-January 1, because, of course, we were in the State Department budget, and that was finished as of January 1. So we had to get word about just how we were going to get the money to pay our local employees and even, for example, our own Foreign Service personnel a sufficient report about what would happen to them - should they stay, should they not stay, if they did stay, what would happen? Ron Palmer came out to give us a bit of a lecture on that and was not very clear because he wasn't told very much about what the shift from status of Foreign Service personnel to not Foreign Service meant. He just told us to hold hands and try to keep the troops from rebelling. But they were really very annoyed because, you know, what was this going to do to their careers. You can argue about being separated from the Foreign Service and what that would mean for the next assignments and all the rest of it.

Q: You know, I mean, a normal person sitting there and told he had to resign - there was no body of law to really back him up, was there?

PRATT: That's right. And we were assured that they'd work something out so that after we had resigned and sort of put in our tour in Taiwan, we would then be returned to the Foreign Service and be able to resume our careers and that we'd suffer no disadvantages from being in Taiwan, that any efficiency report written on us would be given as much weight as a report written anywhere else. And so this was supposed to be really very straightforward and no difficulties et cetera. But our staff was given, however, the right to decide whether they would be transferred and reassigned immediately, and I think if you talked to Gene Martin, Gene Martin was one of the ones basically who advised persons who were at difficult points in their careers, not to trust any assurances they got because Ron Palmer was trying to give assurances which he himself did not really believe.

Q: Well, you know, as a serving Foreign Service officer one of the first things you learn is, don't trust promises given by Personnel. Things change, circumstances change and all, and people look at you and say, "Well, that last group of people may have promised you this, but we can't do it." I mean, there is good, solid reason to mistrust.

PRATT: Sure, and I said there were those who were having, you know, who felt that they could move ahead more rapidly in their careers if they could get a regular Foreign Service position . . . and several in my own section did leave, some did not. In any case, these were part of the number of internal administrative issues we were struggling with. How were we going to handle things in the process if we lost too many key persons in a particular area? How could we get accomplished all the things that had to be done, because from that moment on we didn't have to worry about reporting on the elections. We didn't have to worry about the internal politics so much because we had thrown a monkey wrench into that and nobody would know for months what was going to bubble up later on, but it did mean we had to be concerned about where we were going to locate our offices, how we were going to be getting cables in and out, where we were going to have our communications equipment, because of course we were going to have to leave the embassy? What are we going to do about a secure place to have the code equipment and so forth?

So we had a number of problems of a purely housekeeping nature, and we all had to work on that. In other words, this was not something which was left to admin, because many of these things were questions which involved discussions with the Foreign Ministry and with other agencies of the Taiwan Government and were of a political sensitivity as to what Washington was really trying to get at, what it had agreed to with Peking. And every time admin would come out with what was easiest for them, the Department would say, "No, that won't work because Washington has said that they agreed with Peking that we would only do such-and-such and so-and-so."

In addition to our changes, we also had to try to get the Taiwan side to come up with its own organization with which we could deal, because after the first of January we were not supposed to see Foreign Ministry people in the Foreign Ministry. And so we had to work out where it is we would be able to meet unofficially, and they had a guest house, fortunately, right opposite the Foreign Ministry, and we could meet there. We could also - they gradually were setting up their own sort of counterpart organization to our American Institute in Taiwan. We had to work with them on what kind of name they could have for us. They proposed four or five different names, and we kept saying no, no, no, you can't use this, you can't use that, you can't have "China" in it anywhere, and so on. So we had plenty to do. As Bill Brown, I'm sure, told you, we had a sort of morning staff meeting every morning up at his residence, which was halfway up the Yangminshan Mountain, which meant people could come down the mountain who lived there and people from downtown could move up there, as I did. And we had to then return to our downtown office, and convey to our own subordinates what it was that had been discussed at that morning meeting.

And I think Bill Brown told you that the cable address we had was BILL BROWN TAIPEI, sounding a bit like an e-mail address, but in any case, not "CONGEN" (Consulate General), not "AMEMB" (American Embassy) and so forth. And so that sort of thing had to be worked out, and we had to know how to handle it so that we could make sure that our traffic got in and we could make sure that our traffic would go out and we could handle various classifications and so on. We also had to work with the Taiwan Garrison general headquarters on our own security. We had to work with the Taiwan Defense Command about what they were doing about drawing down their own troops and getting ready for their departure within three months and making sure that they handled this in a way which was compatible with what it is we'd agreed with Peking that we would do, which was not always easy. I think there were probably a few little lapses there which if Peking could have known about them would have been very, very annoyed.

Q: What about immunity?

PRATT: Well, we had to work that out, too?

Q: Was there a period when you were just sort of nude there?

PRATT: No, not really, because we had an arrangement. I don't know how formal it was and how it would have stuck with international law, but we had actually in writing the fact that we would retain the same immunity as we had had, and for example, all of our number plates, license plates, had to be changed because, of course, they had the character on them for 'diplomatic.' We had to have that taken off. And we had to have something on them which would indicate that we would be treated in a special, protected way. And we had also, of course, to make sure that their desire for something similar in Washington and elsewhere in the United States would also take place. And that, indeed, there was no real problem about that, because they had received instructions, of course, from the president to make sure that this did take place, and so they had enough connection with representatives, who were trade officers and so forth, and particularly, of course, they had had the Japanese Interchange Association as a model, so they knew how the Japanese had said it had to be handled, and if we ever had any real problems we'd end up saying, "Well, do to us what you did to the Japanese."

Q: Did you find, though, that maybe the Authorities on Taiwan had already had this experience, but our people in Washington . . . You know, there's nothing like a bureaucracy for not moving.

PRATT: I know.

Q: And particularly, this is Taiwan - all of a sudden you're talking about somebody in Protocol, and this is a very small little matter, and it becomes, "We don't do it that way," or something like that. Was there somebody who was cracking the whip in Washington and saying -

PRATT: Yes, Harvey Feldman was one of the control officers by that point. You've talked to Harvey, have you? Harvey is here at the Heritage Foundation, and he has done a number of articles about this sort of thing.

Q: I think he's been interviewed, not by me but by someone else [Ed: ADST Feldman Oral History interview started in March 1999 and is on the Library of Congress website].

PRATT: Well, I think in any case he's the best source. We, of course, got it indirectly because our local interlocutors would complain to us about what it was they were hearing from their various representatives in the States. Because it wasn't quite so bad in Washington as it was in some of the cities where they were trying to protect their consulates . . . because did they have to leave all their premises in, say, Boston and San Francisco and so on? Were they going to have to lose . . . which of the offices were they going to have to close? We didn't tell them what offices they had to open or close; we merely said that they were limited. Instead of 11, they had to go down to eight, or whatever the figures were. I've forgotten now what the numbers were. But they had to reduce the number of offices they have in the United States. And they of course had their offices for several purposes. One, they wanted to be near many of the Chinese communities, because they liked to influence their Chinese compatriots, the Chinese people, but they also were interested in trade, and they were interested in having people who could take care of the students whom they had here. So they had a real problem when they had to reduce the number of offices they had, because each one that opened only after getting a fight with the budget people about money to handle this and had to justify this new office. So when they were told they had to consolidate and move out, it wasn't nearly so easy as it would be for the State Department, which had been fighting for years but losing every battle to the budgeters. The Foreign Ministry was not accustomed to losing battles over money, because they could go to the president and get the money for something they said they needed. Well, the State Department, of course, as you know, is totally different.

Q: Were you aware, getting reports back, I'm sure that the Taiwanese, whatever you want to call, representatives-

PRATT: We called them Taiwans to distinguish them from the ethnic group, the Taiwanese.

Q: Alright, the Taiwan representatives were all over Congress at this point, weren't they?

PRATT: They were, but the thing is, what they had to do was merely try to influence draft legislation, and they could not fight the problem. Some of them wanted to fight the problem and have the Congress just refuse and try to do something totally different, but for the most part the people from Taiwan were pretty practical, and they went not to the people like Goldwater, who would want to turn things over, but went to Kennedy, went to Zablocki, went to a lot of the key Democrats. And they said, you know, let's make sure that we make this thing work well for Taiwan and we protect the interests of Taiwan. So that's why, as I say, I think that a lot of the doctrinaire Democrats who thought that only a retrograde Republican would be supporting anything to do with Taiwan because, really, it was Mainlander KMT we were struggling with, that they were out of date, and people were already talking about the 22 million people on Taiwan, and not the two or three million Mainlander troops.

Q: This happened in 1978, so we're talking about 1978. How long were you in Taiwan?

PRATT: I left in 1981.

Q: So how did things work out? In the first place, just a simple question: did you have trouble getting paid?

PRATT: No, I think we maybe skipped one pay period or it was three days late for the pay period or something of the sort, but our checks continued to be deposited. We'd get the money put into our accounts. So they did work that out, and they did get an executive order which permitted that.

However, they had to go to the Taiwan Relations Act for a number of other things.

Q: The Taiwan Relations Act came about when?

PRATT: That was in May, April or May.

Q: Of 1979.

PRATT: I think it was signed into effect in May 1979. And so we were doing a number of things for which we had very shaky justification under any executive order, because there were American laws which required certain things, and the executive order, of course, could not supersede a law. And therefore arms sales, certainly . . . We didn't have any; we had a moratorium on that. But nonetheless, our contacts with them about what it is they were trying to buy and so forth and getting their wish list anyway - these were things we basically felt we could not do until after we had some authorization, which was of some legal, legislative nature. We had nuclear programs, and nuclear, of course, required assurance given by a government. So you needed to have something which could act in place of a government, which was not what the case was merely under the executive order. Our lawyers were pretty good, and at some point you might want to talk to some of them. We became the American Institute in Taiwan as of January.

Q: Well, did the Institute have much input into the Taiwan Relations Act, or was this something that was being developed?

PRATT: No, I would say we had some indirect input, because we were talking about what it is we were learning from the Japanese as to how they handled things. We were also learning from the Taiwan side what it is they felt they needed. And we would be sending this information back. But Taiwan's major concerns were being conveyed through their own officers directly to the Congress, because they had, after all, a very high-powered representation here - an ambassador who, of course, had to leave, but he several deputies, including one who reported directly into the president's office, and he had very, very old, long-term contacts with many people in the Congress. So they had their own really good establishment to present their views, but in addition to that you had enough persons who . . . Stephen Solarz [Ed: ADST Oral History interview dated Nov 1996 and located on Library of Congress website] and Lester Wolff. In 1982, Lester Wolff published a really very good book about these issues entitled Legislative History of the Taiwan Relations Act. And people of this sort were really pretty aware of what was going on, and what they did not know they could get out of the Taiwan side without any trouble. In addition to that, of course, the State Department was finally involved, and someone like Harvey Feldman was also very intelligent and very competent, and he knew what the questions were. Maybe he had a limitation because, after all, the draft legislation was set up by Carter and added somewhat by experts at the White House, but it was almost totally turned around and strengthened by the Congress itself.

Q: You went through all these sort of housekeeping chores and all, so this, I imagine, kept you busy, and the political reporting, as you said, was sort of in abeyance anyway. But how about the Taiwan Relations Act? When it finally appeared, you and the rest of your group, what did you feel? I mean, this really moved things up a notch in favor of Taiwan, or sort of made it easier to work, or what?

PRATT: Much easier to work because it was indeed very reassuring to the people in Taiwan because it refers specifically to our concerns about the security of Taiwan. And this, of course, was in clearly vague language - as it always has to be - because every time you want to make something stronger than that you run into the problem that you can't even do this in a treaty, that you still have to say, "subject to the American Constitutional provision." So obviously we had to tell these people that this is as far as it could go under our constitutional legal system. And so it was as good - in fact, some people were trying to say, "Look, it sounds even better than the Mutual Defense Treaty." And we had to say, "Yes, but it's not a treaty, and therefore as legislation and domestic legislation handling the foreign affairs matter, we don't know how it's going to work, because this is very unusual, and we don't know, for example, how the courts may take it." As there was a number of Chinese lawyers who wrote analyses of the Taiwan Relations Act and tried to figure out where the pitfalls would lie, where some person would raise a suit and would get into a court, and some American court might say that this was an unconstitutional way of handling what should be handled by a treaty. And for example, in one of the provisions near the end it refers to "in U.S. legislation wherever the term 'nation,' 'state,' 'country' occurs, Taiwan shall be considered to be covered." Well, this was something which, of course, was required to take care of arms sales and nuclear cooperation and a number of other things, but we can't do it with renegade groups, can't do it with the mafia or something of the sort. We have to be dealing with governments, and yet we had to say that this was not a government. So we knew we had something which could be up for grabs at any point and could be challenged in court and so forth. The fact that none of this had ever gotten into a U.S. court that we know of is, of course, marvelous. We also knew that any sensible judge would say, "This is legislation. It's been signed by the President. And we are a third branch of government getting in there trying to second-guess what it is that the legislature and the President decided was the best way to handle something, and we don't like to get into that kind of political environment because that's not what we as judges are there for." But you know, you can get a judge who won't hold that.

Q: I know.

PRATT: So we were saying this could be a big problem. We also, of course, continued to get into difficulties over just plain nomenclature. For example, we wanted to find a way of referring to what had been called the GROC - Government of the Republic of China. We couldn't use Republic of China any more, so we called it for a while "Government on Taiwan - GONT. And this went on for a couple of months, but I think it was by February the Chinese were coming in and complaining and saying, "You can't refer to it as a 'government.'" We tried to explain that "government" was a sort of relatively value-free determination, just a denotation of being a government. And they said, "No, no, no, you must refer to them as 'authority.'" And we said, "Well, you know, authority comes from the Latin auctoritas, which means 'justified authority.' And therefore, that is something which you say they don't have." They'd say, "Forget about your English language. We use authority to refer to a government that we like, and we have a different word in Chinese, which we translate as 'authority' which we use to refer to unlawful exercise of authority." So they came back and protested about that. Then we had to figure out what we could do, and call up Taipei and all the rest of it. We had no real easy term.

But you know, getting things paired between English and Chinese is not always that easy. When, for example, we were first trying to sell our policy of engagement, the Chinese were very, very confused, because they had very different terms for 'engagement.' There are two senses of engagement. One is engagement prior to a marriage, and the other is a military engagement. They have no term to cover our use of the word engagement as something which is what we say is our relationship with China. So you are constantly finding problems of this sort. We were able to get help from the Japanese, but of course, the Japanese find it much easier to go between Chinese and Japanese because they both use characters, and many of these characters, of course, will have roots in some of the same Chinese literature. But we couldn't quite do that, and so we were constantly having these problems as we went down this rocky road of establishing what is a new, non-relationship. And then, of course, we had to find, for example, we couldn't call my section the Political Section because that would imply that we had a political relationship, which would imply we had a diplomatic relationship perhaps. So I took the Japanese term, which was "General Affairs Section." And the General Affairs Section in Japanese means it's a kind of secretariat that really is a key sensitive group making sure everything works. But when you get into Chinese, it means 'administration.' So there we were taking a Japanese term for the name of my section.

Q: I have a feeling that for the next two years you were sitting there trying to figure out what the hell to call things. An awful lot of time is spent setting the mold. But other than all this, what were you doing? Up to 1981, you were watching events on Taiwan -

PRATT: And on the Mainland.

Q: What were you getting from the Mainland?

PRATT: We were on distribution for many things from about the Mainland, not the most sensitive ones, because we were still handling much of this in Paris. We were still handling it when I got there in the earlier period, but in the point is that they were moving very quickly from the liaison office to embassy, but nonetheless this was still really relatively new for them, even in Peking. So they were doing a number of things trying to get spin-offs from the Chinese how this was working, and of course the Taiwan problem was one of the things that constantly arose. So we tried to keep track of when they were getting their nose out of joint and over what.

Now those of us who were somewhat old China hands knew well that one of the biggest problems always is one of symbols, and therefore of names. They have a term which goes way back to Confucian times of "rectification of names," and that is that if you get the proper name for something then that's solving half the problem. The reality should follow the name. And of course this is the exact opposite of the Western tradition, where God first created things, then he gave them names; whereas with the Chinese you pick out the name first, and then you create something to fit the name. So we're starting out from different directions, and that's why I said this was a Chinese game we had to play. And when you get a lot of people who are American politicians, they are not really easy, don't really fit in with this Chinese concept of names. We were constantly having that difficulty with the Congress particularly, because the Congress, of course, felt that this was un-American to do it this way. Well, of course it is un-American, but we agreed back in 1972 we weren't going to do an American thing, we were going to do a Chinese thing. To get an idea of the difference in approach, just listen to Senator Helms lecturing the Security Council! The United Nations has got to behave as though it were in Carolina. And this is the attitude of so many of the people, and it made it very difficult to keep relations running smoothly. And as I say, there were a number of congressmen who were savvy enough to be able to understand this, and they therefore, I think, did pretty well with the Taiwan Relations Act, which really was an amazing piece of work, and I've really been surprised there hasn't been more doctors' dissertations on this in law schools because - I shan't say it's a model for very much else, because you won't find another Chinese situation until you find another China, but nonetheless - it was a key aspect. And we have the same problem in Taipei, because we were dealing with old-time Chinese people just as they were in Peking. They were just as offended every time we got something that make Peking happy. To the degree it made Peking happy, it made the Taiwan side unhappy.

One of the key tasks was, of course, constantly trying to reassure the people who were - shall we say - key figures in Taiwan but not clued in to what the leadership was doing there, because of course they had nothing but, shall we say, total lack of confidence in what their own government was telling them. They never believed what the KMT had been telling about the Mainland, and they didn't believe what the KMT was telling about the U.S. It's one of the problems, I think, of a big propaganda operation, one concludes that you're being gamed rather than being told what's really true and letting you make up your mind as to what it really all adds up to. So the propaganda apparatus of Taiwan was thrown into full speed, and yet this was the very thing which made a lot of the Taiwanese, that is the local majority population, feel very uneasy; and they, as I mentioned the story about one of these politicians who said, "We'd have to kill them all,"; their mistrust of a lot of the old timers was very, very deep.

The Taiwanese, of course, had been badly treated back in 1947, and from their point of view the KMT had never redeemed itself by treating them as adults who could be told the truth and be brought into a kind of cooperative relationship with government. Obviously, the government was at that time really changing under Chiang Ching-kuo, but the fact that the elections were canceled meant that from their point of view they had lost a good chance of trying to convey to the government a greater sense of the role of the Taiwanese majority population. And this is one of the things that we felt was also an unfortunate occurrence. This was when they began to establish their own organizations for human rights and things of that sort, which they were using to present a distinctly Taiwanese view of events on the island. They were not permitted to form a political party. They therefore all had to run ostensibly as independents, even those who got to be relatively organized and, as we use the term, oppositionists, because we couldn't call them an "opposition" because they couldn't be organized to the point where they would be that sort of thing; but they were "in opposition" and they were somewhat connected with each other, but they couldn't be excessively connected or else they would be rounded up for violating the law.

Taiwan had this delightful law that any organization which they wanted to establish legally could be done only if there were no organization which already existed to handle this. They used it, for example, to prevent even an artistic association because they said, "We've already got an association of artists," which was established by the KMT, run by the KMT, and having its cadre drawn from Mainlanders and being very much opposed to any of the currents of art which the Taiwanese and the younger people were interested in. But they couldn't establish their own association for the longest while because already an art association existed. In the same way, they got a human rights organization established first, and then the government had to chase them out and establish their own human rights organization, and they did not apply it to themselves but they applied it to everybody else. The fact that this other human rights organization had already been set up did not mean that they wouldn't establish their own.

But here these people were trying to get their own political movement, in part because they were able to criticize the existing government for handling both the United Nations earlier and the United States connection so badly.

Q: Looking at this period, the post-recognition period, up to 1981, with your General Affairs Section, were you seeing a real difference? Were you anticipating the Taiwanese eventually moving in to take over, I mean moving in peacefully, or did you see the KMT holding on till the last? How were you foreseeing what was happening on Taiwan?

PRATT: Well, we saw a constant evolution, and we saw Chiang Ching-kuo as favoring it. Unlike his father, he had seen the kind of Leninist views that his father and Mao Zedong had, at first had when he'd been in Stalin's Soviet Union. And he therefore felt that this was not the way the future was going to be. He had all of his children come under very strong American influence, made sure they all learned English, not Russian, despite his own knowledge of Russian, much better than his knowledge of English - not nonexistent, but it was not that good. And so just as his father had learned Japanese and he had learned Russian, he felt the future was going to be American English, and therefore this was going to be something on the American pattern, which meant rule of law, which he was pushing gradually for and also the importance of the constitution. We nonetheless saw that he was himself running the place in his own fashion as an autocrat.

During this period I did several pieces of analysis of just how the various parts of Taiwan were run by Ching-kuo, how he did not use organization that much; he used his own people in each of the organizations and he had his own separate little connections to security, to the military, to the party, to the economy. And he dealt with them in that fashion. In other words, he did not use his position as chairman of the party to deal with the economic side of things. They only dealt with the premier and the head of the Bank of China and the economic planning organization. And when he dealt with the military he dealt sometimes with and often around the minister of defense. He himself had been deputy minister of defense before he became vice-president and then, of course, became president. So he was well aware of the fact that he himself went to the various aspects of the power establishment through his own sense of organization and knew which people to deal with on what matters. For example, they had previously had a party organization, which was similar to the one in Peking and, I presume, in Moscow, but while they continued to have a finance and economic section in the KMT organization, nonetheless, that was not the way in which finance and the economy were handled. They were handled by the president acting as president, bypassing, not using the party, but going directly to the people who ran the economy.

So this was part of the evolution that took place under him, and the question was, is he going to try to have a succession system which brings forth somebody who will take over and rule things his way or not? For a while there it looked as though he was trying to do that, because they established a separate organization called Yu Shaokan, which brought together a lot of these strengths and put them in the hands of his sort of close collaborator of the beginning of the year, Wang Shen. And this continued until I left Taiwan. It was when I was back in Washington handling Taiwan affairs here that he canned Wang Shen and made it very clear that that was not the direction in which he was going. However, it was still not clear how he intended to have the real political structure go, but there was no question that he intended to bring the Taiwanese increasingly in and also that he intended to have the constitution determine things, rather than the party. In other words, you are no longer seeing the party, which was like the Communist Party, and the government merely being an instrument of the party. It was preparing to become a party which would be like other political parties, which meant that you could have a second political party.

VIRGINIA CARSON-YOUNG
Consular Officer
Hong Kong (1978-1982)

Virginia Carson-Young was born in the state of Washington. She obtained a B.A. from the University of Washington. She was the spouse of a Foreign Service officer until she became an officer in her own right after the death of her husband in 1972. She served in consular affairs in New Delhi, Hong Kong, Merida, Bucharest, and Lima. She was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on July 29, 1991.

Q: You were there for four years from 1978-1982?

CARSON-YOUNG: Yes. I was actually American Citizens Officer in Hong Kong and had an extremely interesting time. The Consulate at that time was filled with China Watchers. Their focus was on the Mainland and, of course, there was and is now this huge interesting business community. Because American citizens services are not limited to the destitute, and I had a legitimate reason to know as many as possible, I started going to Chamber of Commerce luncheons. I got to know many of the business people. I became a member of the only overseas branch, at that time, of the League of Women Voters. Working with the League, I was very active in a U.S. program for the 1980 elections, and was on local television promoting the idea of democracy, the responsibility to vote. So I had quite an interesting, but essentially non-visa experience.

Q: What were your main problems and issues that you had to deal with?

CARSON-YOUNG: It was relatively uncomplicated compared to India. We had certainly the drug-related arrests, but the prisons were well run, the officials were uncorrupted, so jail visits and drug problems were not as complicated. And, of course, the geographical area was much smaller, so it was easier to make these visits. Persons qualifying as citizens became one of the main items of interest for me. We recognized China during the time I was there. The Chinese are experts in using our citizenship laws in order to emigrate. I think that at FSI, probably even now, when they are demonstrating citizenship fraud, they use a photograph of a Chinese family as an example. If you count the heads and the number of feet, they don't match up, because some heads have been pasted in, in order to establish a fraudulent family member's claim to status.

During the Chinese cultural revolution, many documents were destroyed. But one thing the Chinese are reluctant to do is to destroy photographs. And they take many family pictures. In Hong Kong I had a former Chinese national employee who had actually been the one to close out Shanghai in 1948. He was Fred Tao, a very dapper little gentleman, in his sixties, I think at that time. He was my citizenship expert. Many of the people of Chinese origin born in the United States in the early 1900s went back to China as children. They were now elderly, newly able to come out of China. Most of their documents had been destroyed. Even if they had a birth certificate, how did we know that this was the same person? They were wanting to go to the U.S. in order to qualify their children to go. These elderly people, I think, did not really intend to remain in the United States, but they were eligible to go if they were citizens. So they tried, through photographs, to establish that they were the same person who left California as a baby, and were U.S. citizens by birth.

Fred Tao was my expert on photographs. He said, "If you will notice, the nostrils and the earlobes do not change." And apparently that is the reason for the three/quarter view for immigration photographs. The ear is a very distinctive feature. A baby's ear and an old man's ear will be the same shape. I think there were probably lots of people who assumed we had records and archives and computerized ways of checking, when in fact I would just take a photograph to Fred Tao and he would check out the nostrils and the ears. He would say, "Yeah, it is okay," and we would often issue the passport on this basis.

DAVID DEAN
American Institute in Taiwan
Washington, DC (1978-1987)

David Dean was born in New York City in 1925 and graduated from Harvard. He entered the Foreign Service in 1951. He served in numerous posts including Kuala Lumpur, Rotterdam, Taichung, Hong Kong and Taipei. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1998.

Q: Brzezinski was National Security Advisor and was looking at everything with a certain amount of Polish view.

DEAN: Yes, that's true. He was a bright and engaging person and who knows, perhaps the idea of using the Chinese against the Russian was an attractive one at that time. We are talking about May 1978. By that time the Vietnam War was long lost, but we were still locked with the Soviets in the Cold War, and Brzezinski felt that China would be a really good ally against the Soviets. So, he wanted to move the U.S. forward into formal diplomatic relations with China, and make them a formal ally against Moscow, but at least use them in the game against the Soviet Union. Brzezinski went out to the Great Wall and brandished an AK-47 and said, "This is for the polar bear." He had his discussions with the Chinese and they agreed to start negotiations later on in the summer between Washington and Beijing. These negotiations were kept very secret. They were run by the National Security Council and by the USLO, the U.S. Liaison Office in Beijing. They weren't disseminated among other people. At that time, my tour was up, and I left for a job in the Department in INR as head of the East Asia section. My replacement, Stapleton Roy, was the one who did most of the work with Woodcock on the negotiations with the Chinese. I came back leading a group of Congressmen and Senators in the fall, just before Thanksgiving, and Stapleton Roy and Leonard Woodcock gave us a good briefing. But, at that point there had been no breakthrough on the crucial question of continued U.S. arms sales to Taiwan to bolster their defense against any mainland attack. The Chinese were adamantly opposed to the U.S. continuing arms sales, even of a defensive nature, and the U.S. side would not move ahead unless there was some agreement that we would continue arms sales. After our visit to Beijing, I traveled all over China with this Congressional group. They were interested and interesting people. Senator Muskie was there, as was Senator Stone, Packwood, and several others. Muskie has died, and the others are no longer in Congress. It was a very good trip. The Chinese made a major effort to accommodate their interests. Stapleton Roy gave us an excellent briefing in Beijing. But as I said, there had been no breakthrough.

The breakthrough came shortly afterwards in early December. The Chinese decided they wanted to go ahead with formal relations. They reserved the right to raise the arms sales issue at a later date. They were putting it to one side and letting diplomatic relations proceed, and we did establish diplomatic relations. President Carter, on the fifteenth of December, 1978, said that as of the first of January, 1979, two weeks later, the U.S. was to establish formal diplomatic relations with Beijing, that we were to break all relations with Taipei, that we were to withdraw the remainder of our military forces in Taiwan, which at that time were just a few hundred, and that we were to give one year's notice to terminate the Mutual Defense Treaty that we had with Taiwan. In 1954 the treaty's revision said that it could be terminated with one year's notice. We were to do all of these things, and of course, not too many people in the State Department or in the whole bureaucracy knew anything about this. Very little preparation had been made. The breakthrough came suddenly; the announcement came shortly after that. The negotiations had been kept secret because the administration did not want Taiwan's friends in the Congress to disrupt them or to hinder them, so here was a fait accompli, but what were we going to do with Taiwan? Well, "L's" (Bureau of Legal Affairs) Jim Michel drew up a quick version of the Taiwan Enabling Act, or what later became the Taiwan Relations Act. It didn't deal with arms sales. It didn't deal with protection of economic interests on both sides. It didn't deal with a lot of issues which Congress, when they got the draft, felt were important. So, on a bipartisan basis Senator Frank Church and Senator Jacob Javits got together in the Senate and Zablocki and Lester Wolfe and others in the House, and they worked on a bipartisan plan to bring about a Taiwan Relations Act which did include a large section on arms sales, which included language very similar to the Mutual Defense Treaty, that any attack on Taiwan would be viewed with serious concern by the United States. They stopped short of saying what our response would be. They protected economic assets on both sides; they gave Taiwan, in effect, the status of a foreign country to argue its cases in U.S. Courts. They gave all sorts of protections of immunities, not diplomatic immunity but functional immunity, which later was similar to immunity given to foreign consulates or organizations in the United States. They added many provisions like that. For example, they gave Taiwan 20,000 immigrant visas annually, similar to the quotas of other countries. This was something Taiwan hadn't had before. They treated them in many respects like a foreign country, but they said the relationship would be unofficial and would be conducted by the American Institute in Taiwan, a non-governmental private organization. That is where I came in. I had been in INR just for a few months, and I volunteered to Dick Holbrooke to help build up this new American Institute.

Q: Dick Holbrooke was...

DEAN: Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian Affairs. We were concerned that AIT not be politicized, that it become a professional organization subject to the Department's guidance in terms of policy. The American Institute in Taiwan was not established to originate policy; it was to carry it out, and that is what we did. So, the Institute was started in a little basement room where the old FSI used to be. We had a room smaller than this. It was about 12'x12'. We jammed three desks in there and we had one secretary and three officers.

Q: Well, when you started, was there a concern that somehow this might turn out to be one of these things where they would haul some political figure out as a very strong proponent of Taiwan, and this would sort of muddy the waters and set a precedent. Was this a concern?

DEAN: Yes, it was a concern, and that person might go directly to the White House, for example, or might be at odds with the State Department over what policy we would pursue. We emphasized in our negotiations with Beijing that we would have only unofficial relations with Taiwan. The Taiwan Relations Act added on a lot of things that were apparently official, but they gave the President certain leeway. President Carter, when he signed the Act, said the Congress had given him certain leeway, and he would interpret that in light of the negotiations with Beijing on diplomatic recognition. Of course, AIT was just an idea. We had to borrow the $15.00 to go down to the District of Columbia and register AIT as a nonprofit organization. We didn't have any money. I got into an argument with the Department administrative people because our people out in Taiwan had been put on administrative leave. Later we were going to turn them into AIT employees. The Taiwan Relations Act said that AIT employees may not be U.S. government employees, so we had to separate them from the Department. In the meantime, they were on administrative leave. Some of the administrators in the Department wouldn't let me send air pouches out there with their letters and credit card bills and everything because the Department didn't have any money for the American Institute in Taiwan. I had to go to a higher authority and say, "Can't you just please pay for them anyway and send them out," and they did. It was that type of little problem that was multiplied a hundred fold in every little thing you could think of. Because the Taiwan Relations Act said we were private, nongovernmental, and our employees were not to be U.S. government employees, we had to deal endlessly with personnel and administration, and not just with the Department, but with other departments and agencies to resolve problems. We wanted everybody in Taiwan to be converted to AIT employees regardless of which agency they had come from; USIA, Agriculture, Commerce or elsewhere. We gave them the same allowances, the same types of leave as Foreign Service Officers.

Every single department had different rules for allowances, shipment of household goods, school allowances and home leave and whether they could ship an automobile and the type of housing they could have. We wanted to treat everybody the same way, and we wanted them all to report through the Director of AIT, and not individually, to their departments. Initially, for the first few years, we were able to hold the line, and everything worked out very well in terms of employee morale. Everybody was being treated the same way and got the same benefits in terms of working together and in terms of our relations with their parent agencies and departments back in Washington and everyone enjoyed a harmonious relationship. Things from that point of view went very smoothly. It was working out the details back here that was really frustrating. Eventually Washington's bureaucracy's insisted on regaining their separate controls. We didn't have any problem with EAP, the Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs. Their policy guidelines were very clear, and we understood them. We followed them, and that pleased Department policy makers. They wanted us to be as unofficial as possible. But the administrative side complained they had no experience dealing with an unofficial organization that was carrying out U.S. foreign policy abroad. Our director was just a private citizen; he was not an Ambassador. So we continued to have difficulties of different sorts up until the present day with the administrative side of things, although we tried hard to resolve them.

Q: How did you, I mean here you are in this organization; did you have a State Department badge and all of that?

DEAN: Because the State Department lawyers said it would be a conflict of interest if I signed the AIT contract with the State Department, while still being a State Department officer, I retired from the State Department, early in January of '79 in order to take over AIT, to help found AIT, and to manage it and sign the contract with the Department. The contract was important because by means of the contract the State Department was able to funnel funds approved by Congress to us on an annual basis. The contracting officer had never had a contract of this type before. The legal provisions kept defeating him and us. We kept trying to modify and simplify it, but it wasn't easy because nobody had dealt with a situation of this type before, so there was a lot of confusion. Anyway we eventually got things working. Fortunately, we had a terrific administrative officer, Jack Connally. He is still on contract with the Department. He has retired, but the Department calls him back and sends him to different spots to try to solve administrative problems. He was really an experienced, positive thinking officer. We were so lucky to have him because the problems were so enormous and so frustrating. He did a marvelous job. We also had Joe Kyle who had been economic counselor in Taipei and had served in the EA Bureau. He came on board in January as our economic officer. Joe was experienced and a good negotiator with both the U.S. bureaucracy and the Chinese. He negotiated many agreements with Taiwan and kept track of economic developments there. Then we had David Evans from Defense who had been a colonel in the Air Force and later a Pentagon civil servant working with the military unit that supplies foreign military sales. He came over to us and virtually ran our military sales. So, we had the four of us together, but we didn't have any money so we had to work without pay. It was a really good group. They were self confident enough in their own fields to go right ahead and do things and not to worry about getting all sorts of clearances; they just went ahead and did it. Without that type of approach, we never would have set up the Institute.

Q: You say you couldn't pay anybody. Most people who work for the government, and I speak from experience, don't have a back log. I mean we need our monthly check.

DEAN: That's right, but we couldn't do anything about that until President Carter signed the Taiwan Relations Act in April 1979. Once he signed the Act, we signed a contract with the Department, and the Department started to fund us. Fortunately, because our staff in Taipei had been put on administrative leave and had not converted yet to AIT, the Department was able to pay them. So, they got paid. It was just the four of us in Washington who weren't on anybody's payroll. Jack had already retired from the Department. David Evans was on transfer. We couldn't pay anybody then but we were able to recompense them later.

Q: How long did this last?

DEAN: We started in January; February, March, April, and we started to pay them in May.

Q: I'd like to get this in here before I forget, how long were you with AIT?

DEAN: I started with AIT in January 1979. We gave ourselves a title. I was Chairman of the Board and Managing Director, for several years from January 16, 1979, when we registered the Institute, until the very beginning of 1987. I was in Washington for the first eight years. Then I went to Taipei as director of our Taipei office from January 1987 to the end of 1989, and I remained a trustee until 1995.

Q: This is a minor detail, but did you say you dug into your own pocket to bring up the $15 to register?

DEAN: Oh, sure. We borrowed it from Leonard Marks in L. We got by, but we were working very hard then. There were so many issues we had never visualized, and I don't think the Department had thought of them either. Political issues, personnel issues, all sorts of different things, but gradually things came to order. You see, part of the problem was that a lot of U.S. departments and agencies had direct dealings with Taiwan before. They dealt directly with Taiwan's embassy here or sent people to Taipei. We had lots of travel back and forth and lots of business. Now, they had to funnel everything through AIT, through our office in Washington, and they couldn't deal directly with Taiwan officials. They had to have us there and present, even if it was a negotiation of a new airline agreement, negotiated by the Department's aviation division, but with AIT chairing the meetings. Everything had to be funneled through us. Of course that created resentment and a big backlog, but eventually we got things moving very speedily. Of course some didn't want their people in Taipei to be merged into the AIT structure, but we were able, partially thanks to the people I have already mentioned, to do all these things. For instance, we had to sign all the military sales agreements. For the first year, all military sales were suspended by prior agreement with China. In the second year, military sales began again and new contracts had to be signed. We had to sign every single one of them. I must have signed hundreds, if not thousands of contracts, and all in 10 copies or more. I should have had one of those signature writing machines. But military sales were negotiated with David Evans, our military representatives, and the Taiwan military procurement group, and DSAA, the Pentagon unit that controls military sales. David and the others did all the negotiations and I did all the signing. That went quite smoothly although every time we would sign something and send it up to Congress, Beijing would protest. It was more of a proforma protest in those days. We also signed agreements on everything else. During the years I was in Washington we must have signed between thirty and forty different agreements on everything from safety at sea to fisheries to intellectual property rights.

Q: I am a bit confused. Let's take fisheries. There are fishery people who know fish, and you don't know fish. There are fishery people in Taiwan who know fish.

DEAN: And we would bring them together.

Q: You would act in what would be known in Hollywood parlance as the beard. The man who takes somebody else's mistress to a party so somebody else can get together with her. That was known as the beard.

DEAN: We were the beard plus! What we would do is bring the fishery delegation from Taipei to Washington, not the other way around usually. Then the fisheries experts would meet with each other. If we could spare a person, we would have them there, if not they would meet by themselves in a place that we would arrange at AIT, or a hotel room, or it could be anywhere at that time, but not in the office of our fisheries experts. So they would meet; they would negotiate. When they got to an agreement we would have to sign it. We would sign it, and there was a provision in the Taiwan Relations Act that we had to report all of these agreements to Congress. We were also the repository of all of these agreements. If anyone in the public wanted a copy, they would have to come to us. They were also printed in the federal register. Yes, in a sense we were the beard, but in another sense, we served as the unit that coordinated people and cut through a lot of red tape. You know if there is to be a meeting of people from the State Department, the Defense Department, Treasury, Commerce, they dance around with all sorts of briefing papers and clearances. We would just pick up the telephone and say we are having a meeting here tomorrow, please send a representative. They always did. We didn't have a lot of paperwork, so we cut through a lot of red tape. We facilitated a lot of agreements; we got things done much faster than the normal process worked. The Taiwan representatives were amazed that things like that were happening. Of course Taiwan didn't like the setup; they wanted an official office, not an unofficial one. They wanted to go to the State Department and the National Security Council and talk to everybody in the various departments and they couldn't do that. They wanted to have high level visitors coming from Taipei, and from Washington to Taipei, and they couldn't have that either. There were lots of things they couldn't have that made them unhappy, but in terms of the substantive work, getting agreements done, cutting through red tape, facilitating real work, then AIT did a pretty good job.

Q: How about the representation of Taiwan in Washington. What was your role in that?

DEAN: We had to make all their official appointments for them. We were the interface for them in Washington. They would come to us if they needed to see someone, and we would meet either in our office or arrange a luncheon or a dinner or a breakfast. We had lots of breakfast meetings, and we would get someone from the Department, maybe the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State and a few others to discuss a particular problem. We would discuss it over breakfast and get a solution usually, I mean if a solution could be reached, or at least they would pass their messages back and forth and hope they would reach the proper recipient. So, they had that type of contact, and when visitors came from Taiwan, legislative groups or others, we would brief them in our office, make their schedule, including calls with the Congress. At that time, the State Department was shy of having these people in the building, but later on legislators could go in, but no Chinese officials, in the State Department or the National Security Council or White House. So things worked out. If I had to do it again, I would have made a memorandum of conversation for every single discussion I had with the Department's administrative people, because we didn't have a good record of what had been agreed upon as the years went by and that was unfortunate.

Other than that, under the circumstances, we did the best we could, and we tried to help Taiwan's Coordination Council. Taiwan's office in the U.S. was called the Coordination Council for North American Affairs. Subsequently, in '94, they changed their name to TECRO, which was Taipei Economic and Cultural Representative's Office in the United States because they had to have Taipei or Taiwan in there so people would know where to go to get a visa. In those early days, we did our best. There were lots of embarrassments. In the beginning the State Department was very tentative about dealing with Taiwan at all. They felt that Taipei and their friends in Congress wanted to throw a spanner in the new gears of the relationship with Beijing. Taipei wasn't helping itself at that time because it was always saying that the relationship with the U.S. had some elements of officiality in it, or when we signed the privileges and immunities agreement, Taipei claimed it was diplomatic privileges and immunities. Before you could say Jack Robinson, the PRC Embassy would be in there protesting about a diplomatic agreement, and about the names Taipei used, the Republic of China, and all this type of thing. Washington was really tentative in dealing with Taiwan and worried about Taiwan's attitudes and what they would try to do. They were worried about the new relationship with Beijing. We tried to soothe these feelings both on Taiwan's side and on the Department's side and to build a bridge between the two so they could communicate in a less frenzied, uptight way. I think that helped a little bit. For one thing, I had a very good relationship with President Chiang Ching-kuo. I had served in Taiwan before, so I had met him much earlier. We had become, I would say, good friends. I admired him and respected him, and I think we had a level of confidence in our conversations with each other. I went to Taiwan soon after AIT got started early in '79 and saw him. He had determined he would do everything he could to make the relationship with Washington work. He saw relations with the U.S. as vital to Taiwan's security, although a lot his countrymen and high officials were livid about the break in the relationship and the U.S. diplomatic relations with China. He himself calmed them down and tried to rebuild the relationship. He really did a great service to his country by doing that. Unfortunately, right after the break in relations, on December 27, 1978, Deputy Secretary Christopher and Roger Sullivan, a Deputy Assistant Secretary in EAP and others in EAP had gone to Taipei on a special mission to work out the new relationship. When they got there, the whole cavalcade was met by a mob of students and workers who smashed the windows of the cars, jumped up and down on the roofs, forcing the roofs down on the seat backs with passengers crouching on the floors. Some of the passengers were cut by the flying glass. I think that this riot had a profound impression on the victims. Christopher and the others who came with him became sour about Taiwan and the relationship. It was foolish of us to have sent a mission to Taipei at that particular time because we should have anticipated some public outrage. We should have met in Guam or Hawaii and worked out things in a calmer atmosphere. Partly it was our own fault and partly it was a demonstration that got out of hand, and partly the fault of the foreign minister and others in Taiwan. Things were pretty tense. Eventually President Chiang sent his ablest negotiator, his vice minister of Foreign Affairs, Yang Hsi-kun, to Washington. He was highly respected here. He was an independent thinker, but really brilliant. He worked very hard with the State Department. He got the agreement we now have with the American Institute in Taiwan, its functions in Taipei, its functions in Washington, and the Coordination Council's functions in Washington. The Chinese set up an office in Taipei too. So the agreement was worked out and both sides began to move ahead with the relationship. I think that it has worked reasonably well. At the very beginning, some people thought this would be a short term solution, that things would change in five or 10 years at the most. The unofficial relationship has been going on for 20 years. The 20 year anniversary will be next April. It looks to me that it will go on for a long time after that, perhaps, another 10 or 20 years. So we have this organization, the American Institute in Taiwan. It has had its ups and downs, but I think it has tried very hard to carry out its responsibility, and it had some very good people. Chuck Cross was our first director in Taipei. We had Jim Lilley and then Harry Thayer, Stan Brooks, and then myself later. I'll get to that.

Q: How did it work? I mean we had our office in Taipei. Somebody would sit down and write the equivalent to a political telegram reporting this. What would they do, send it?

DEAN: Send it to me. The telegram would be addressed to AIT Washington, and our telegrams to Taipei, all telegrams that went out to Taipei were from me. I would sign them; I mean my name would be on them. They would be sent by various organizations. The EAP Bureau would send them to other bureaus, after clearance.

Q: In other words these were basically State Department communications.

DEAN: Yes. We had a circuit to the State Department. I am only telling you what the form was. The form was put that way in case unclassified cables got into the public realm and it would be seen very clearly that they were being sent between AIT Washington and AIT Taipei. But, in the Department, in the communications sector, when AIT/Taipei telegrams came in, they would be distributed to all the departments and agencies according to subject or there even could be a byline on them, pass to so and so. We had the usual protection of our confidential materials. The Sea Bees came from Manila and built up our communications room and everything else with the normal type of equipment that an Embassy would have. We had full scale cooperation from the State Department in those respects. I mean you couldn't ask for better cooperation, in communications and technical support, things of that type. It worked out very well.

I think there was a lot of concern in Congress about Taiwan. The Taiwan Relations Act said that AIT had to report to Congress annually for the first three years, which we did. We would give Congress a report which would use the Department's resources as well as our own, a mutually agreed upon statement. Then I would speak at an open hearing about the relationship. I went up to testify several other times for several other reasons, particularly before Congressman Solarz, who was the chairman of the House Subcommittee on East Asia and the Pacific. He was concerned about several human rights and other cases, some of them just terrible. There was a big riot in Kaohsiung in 1979 at the end of the year. Elections had been postponed the previous year because of the break in relations. It was Human Rights Day so the oppositionists were demonstrating on both of these counts. The demonstration got out of hand. Something like 183 policemen were beaten up. Several rioters suffered some injury too. No one was killed, fortunately but several organizers were arrested. Congress and the Administration were concerned that the Taiwan government was going to give the death penalty to some of these people. Taiwan was still under military rule and martial law, and most of those arrested were going to be tried in a military court. In early January 1980 I was sent to Taipei to speak to President Chiang. This was three weeks after the riot. After we discussed it at length President Chiang assured me that none of the prisoners would get the death penalty, and that most would be tried in civilian court not military courts. In the final analysis, that is what happened. The Taiwan authoritarian government controlled the courts. President Chiang realized the impact on American public opinion if the prisoners were executed. He was a very unusual and farsighted man. He made it clear to me that he wasn't going to do this, and subsequently that proved to be the case. All of the prisoners who were given jail sentences are now out. Their jail sentences were shortened. President Chiang followed through on his promises to us. Some of those who were released from prison are now among the most prominent leaders of the opposition party in Taiwan, and they have played a major role in Taiwan's march toward democracy.

We worked hard, both in trying to restore confidence in our relationship with Taiwan through our military sales which were very important to them, but also through our conversations, negotiations, and other aspects of the relationship to reassure them that the U.S. was not just washing its hands of Taiwan and walking away as we had in 1949-1950 before the Korean War broke out. They had some experience with that. They were afraid we were going to take Taiwan and hand it to the mainland on a silver platter in pursuit of our own national interests. That suspicion was with them then, and I am afraid it is still with them today.

Q: In a way, this early period was helped by the fact that Taiwan was not a democracy and the mainland China was not a democracy so we didn't have an emotional stake of withdrawing our support from a "Democratic" country and pushing them into the jaws of a communist one.

DEAN: You could say that, but on the other hand we had had a long, close, and friendly relationship with the Republic of China, both on the mainland and Taiwan. They had lots of friends in the U.S. and in the Congress, and their economic ties with us were becoming more and more important as well. They had really good links with our military because many had gone to our various military training schools at the highest level. As well as low ones. We had trained their aviators, and had given their navy old destroyers and other ships. It was a very close relationship. We had a joint command, the Taiwan Defense Command, and joint war planning. There was a lot to the relationship which was suddenly brought to an end. This is the first time I can recall that we just broke diplomatic relations with a friend and ally, though we did have a mutual security treaty, in pursuit of our interests elsewhere. I think there was a feeling of guilt on our part for the way we had managed this relationship.

Q: I have done an interview with Nat Bellocchi who held your position somewhat later. I mentioned that the ROC, the people representing there, had an incredible network of friends. They really knew how to network, I mean they already had it through their mercantile interests and their military interests and all this. We are talking now about the early 1990s, the mid-1990s, the mainland Chinese just didn't have this type of relationship. I was wondering whether you found yourself running into that network.

DEAN: Oh, yes. Even in a lot of my testimony before Congress. There were those in Congress who resented the fact that the U.S. had broken relations with Taiwan and asked really pointed questions about the new relationship which they resented, I remember Derwinski, who was a Congressman from Illinois, while we were in some grain sales conference (Taiwan had sent us a grain purchasing mission that was in Chicago.) seated on the same platform saying to me in an aside, "If I had my way we would send our battleships to Taiwan, restore diplomatic relations, and put the U.S. flag back up on the embassy there." He was speaking from the heart; that is what he really felt, and lots of others felt that way. It was a delicate time in the State Department's relationship with Congress, its relationship with Taiwan, and frankly in Taiwan not everybody was going the same way the president wanted to go. There were those who wanted to embellish the relationship and restore officially, but carefully, so as not to offend the U.S. Administration.

Q: Well now, you must have felt you were the greatest nuancer in the world as far as having to deal with this. I was thinking that the Taiwan representation in the United States, particularly in those early times, were trying every way to almost exacerbate the problem.

DEAN: What they had done was to compensate for the lack of official relations by sending over all sorts of missions, purchasing missions, sports groups, cultural groups, and inviting to Taiwan, congressmen, senators, staffers, governors, educators, mayors, everyone you could think of. There was a constant stream of visitors, and still is.

Q: They paid their way.

DEAN: Yes, of course. This is still going on. They use the alumni association of Tung Hai University to invite people, or Suchow University or other private universities. They did this to compensate for the lack of other types of official contact, and quite successfully. They had very good congressional relations through people in their offices in Washington. They got to know all the staffers, all the congressmen. They were dropping in all the time giving them information about what Taiwan was doing. That has continued, but at the time, it was quite delicate and the new relationship made it even more so. It was very touchy with Beijing, and Congress was intent on following up to make sure things were run as they saw fit. Everybody had a different agenda and a different perspective. We tried to bring them all together.

Q: What about the mainland Chinese? Were they rattling rockets and doing much during this period?

DEAN: Well, of course, right after the announcement of diplomatic relations they were still very sensitive. I mentioned they flew off the handle when we signed the privileges and immunities agreement, and Taipei characterized them as diplomatic privileges. They were on the lookout for anything like that. On any showing of the Republic of China flag in the U.S., any sign of officiality, anything, they would protest right away. There were lots of protests to the State Department those first couple of years. Things got even more tense when President Reagan campaigned, when he was the candidate, because he said on several occasions that he would restore diplomatic relations with Taiwan.

Q: This was in 1980.

DEAN: Yes, that's right, the 1980 election. President Reagan gave several speeches. He said, "We will have an official government office in Taiwan. The relationship with Taiwan has many elements of officiality in it." He was known as a good friend of Taiwan. He had been there several times as Governor of California, and Richard Allen was writing a lot of his speeches for him. Richard Allen later became the National Security Advisor and worked in the word "officiality". I counted it eleven times in one speech. This drove the Chinese on the mainland up the wall because they were afraid Reagan would restore U.S. official relations with Taiwan. A lot of Republican visitors to Taiwan at that time, before the election, were promising Taiwan that relations would be upgraded. So here again we had a really tense and difficult situation.

I recall that various invitations for the inauguration had gone to Taiwan. Anna Chennault was the National Republican's Women's Committee leader. She had gotten the senate organizers of the presidential inauguration swearing-in ceremony to invite a delegation from Taiwan led by Y. S. Tsiang, Secretary General of the KMT, and several officials from Taiwan. The Chinese Ambassador heard about this and said that he would boycott the ceremony if Y.S. Tsiang came to it. So, I had to go along with John Holdridge to tell Y.S. he was disinvented. Fortunately he had checked himself into an Alexandria hospital with a "diplomatic illness." Earlier we urged Taipei to tell him not to come. Then Anna Chennault said, "Don't pay any attention to them. Come anyway." We again urged them not to come, but finally they did arrive. Y.S. was here. He knew that he wasn't going to be able to attend the ceremony. He checked himself into the Jefferson Hospital with the flu, and we went to the hospital to give him our commiserations. Anyway, he didn't go; the Chinese Ambassador did come, and the Reagan administration decided they would not upgrade relations with Taiwan.

Even so, the Chinese were really upset and they pressed the Reagan administration. They pressed us hard on arms sales, on the FX fighter plane, on all sorts of issues. Finally the Reagan administration decided that besides not upgrading the office in Taiwan and leaving things as they were, that they wouldn't sell the FX aircraft to Taiwan. We negotiated an arms sales agreement, signed on August 17, 1982, which said that U.S. arms sales to Taiwan would gradually decrease and that they would not exceed the quality or quantity of earlier arms sales. This agreement was made under the assumption that there would be a peaceful resolution to the Taiwan situation. The domestic repercussions were so severe that they affected Alexander Haig, who was Secretary of State in the early parts of the negotiation, and his pressing for this agreement was partially responsible for his resignation.

The entire conservative establishment in Washington reacted with cries of outrage and horror. Senator Barry Goldwater and Walter Judd, a former head of the Committee for One Million, went in to see President Reagan. Of course, this was orchestrated over several weeks and months, through the months of May, June, and July, really up to the August signing in '82. When Haig had gone to China in June, he had to use these words, "We will not exceed the quantity or quality of arms sales." This was not in his brief but they represented what he thought. They were written into the August '82 agreement. President Reagan was upset by his friends' reaction. He sent a letter to President Chiang Ching-kuo in July with six points in it concerning arms sales. Two of the points are still important in other areas. One is that we would not be a mediator between Taipei and Beijing, and the other is that we would not press Taipei into talks or negotiations with the mainland. He sent the letter as a way of reassuring them. He said we had not discussed Taiwan arms sales in advance with Beijing and would not discuss them, would not agree to a certain time for ending arms sales, would not change the TRA, and would not change our position on Taiwan's sovereignty. So Reagan sent the letter in July and went ahead and authorized the signing of the Communiqué. I think by that time we had been backed into a corner and had no other option other than to sign it. But it has caused a lot of dissension. I think that whenever you have a document like that which one side is being forced into, you really can't expect it to last forever, and I think we have to say not only the spirit of the Communiqué has been violated, but several of its terms have been violated by us.

Q: When you talk about quality, what is quality.

DEAN: We had a rule of thumb. If something is no longer being produced, like a M-48 tank, then we were willing to sell the next higher production model. But that wasn't an agreement with China. Every time we did sometime like that, they would object strenuously. So we had a lot of trouble with China in the early Reagan period, during the campaign, during his first year in office, up to August of '82.

Q: Did you as an Institute have, I mean I would have thought you would have wanted to brief and really sit down and talk to the Reagan people around him. These were people coming in, there always is a learning curve for a new administration but particularly for one coming in as the Reagan one did. These were not old government hands who knew their way around. This was a brand new crew.

DEAN: That's right. On the other hand, they had some experienced people, John Holdridge, for example became Assistant Secretary for East Asian Pacific. Jim Lilley, whom I had known for a long time, went to the National Security Council. They knew what the score was, but you see they had two motives. They wanted gradually to improve relations with Beijing for our own national interest, and at the same time, they wanted to improve unofficial relations with Taiwan. And, this is exactly what they did. After the '82 Communiqué, the Reagan administration began to do both of these things. Relations with the mainland improved markedly. Relations with Taiwan improved markedly. From the summer of '82 until Tiananmen, we had good relationships with both sides. I won't say terrific; there were lots of problems with both countries. But they were solvable, and the trend was a positive trend. We did a lot with Taipei. Washington had a very good policy team. For once the National Security Council, the State Department and the Pentagon worked together. It was a pleasure to see because at other times they were so often at odds with each other, and I have seen that. In this case, there was Jim Lilley and Gaston Sigur, and Rich Armitage over in Defense. They were all friends. They were representing different organizations but could resolve whatever problems they had and present a unified position very well, and they achieved a great deal, both with Beijing and with Taiwan. That is where I had a hope things would continue to improve, but who could foresee Tiananmen.

Q: Tiananmen was in 1989, which we will come to. Before we end this, you left Washington in '87.

DEAN: In early January 1987, I went to Taiwan as Director of AIT's Taipei office. Earlier I was talking about some of the developments which I had taken part in when I set up AIT in '79 until '87.

Q: We'll stop it right now at '87. At that time in '87 when you moved to Taipei just when you were going or during the mid-'80s, were you seeing a change, or foreseeing a change in Taiwan from being a Kuomintang dictatorship, with a centralized government to one where the native Taiwanese would essentially assume power takeover and that democracy would come in. Did you see this?

DEAN: Well, yes. In fact, I would go to Taiwan from 1979-87 at least annually, sometimes twice a year, and have talks with President Chiang. He had already announced in '86 to Katherine Graham, the publisher of the Washington Post, that he was going to abolish martial law, that he was going to allow the formation of opposition parties, that he was going to reform the Legislative Yuan, which meant retiring all the elderly legislators and holding elections for new legislators.

Q: They never had an election did they?

DEAN: Most of these elderly legislators were elected in 1947 on the mainland. But Taiwan had elections for the lower levels, mayors, and magistrates, city councils, village chiefs, etc. The KMT won most of these because there wasn't an opposition party. There were only individuals who might run as independents. So CCK's announcement was a major departure from the past, and Chiang Ching-kuo told me that he would have done this much earlier but there were serious problems at home and abroad. I am sure he had it in mind to move toward a democratic form of government because he realized that the mainlanders who had come over with his father were only 15% of the population. The other 85% were represented by locally born Taiwanese, and they were beginning to push very hard. There had been serious political problems in Korea and problems with Marcos in the Philippines. He knew that in the future, if he wanted to preserve stability and progress on Taiwan, that he would have to move toward representative government. He was already bringing in Taiwanese to the lower ranks of the party and encouraging them to join the lower ranks of the civil service; then into the mid-ranks, and then into the higher ranks. His vice president was Li Teng-hui, who now is president. He had appointed him Mayor of Taipei, and then Governor of the province of Taiwan. He appointed him Vice President. He was grooming him for the future, and many others too, not just Lee. So when President Chiang told me that he had in mind to move toward these political reforms, the break in relations with the U.S. had set back his timetable. He said he had to postpone the elections for the Legislative Yuan.

There were several other very difficult things, like the '82 Communiqué that we just have been discussing, which were a big blow. Then there were the murders in the Lin Yi-hsiung family in the Kaohsiung incident. Lin Yi-hsiung's mother and his twin daughters were murdered in early 1980 by some unknown assailant, but everybody knew it was political. Cheng Wen-jeng, a professor at Carnegie Mellon University, had been thrown off the roof of a library after being interrogated for 13 hours by the garrison command. Henry Liu, a journalist in Daly City, California, had been murdered by a hit squad from Taiwan on the orders of the Ministry of Defense Intelligence Bureau Chief.

These events all caused a big furor in our Congress and in our government. President Chiang was trying to cope with that. He announced shortly after, that no member of his family could succeed him. Although he had succeeded his father, it was quite clear to me that he had not trained any member of his family to succeed him. There was one, the middle son, who wanted to and was trying to manipulate things on the side. It was thought that this son might have been involved in the Henry Liu murder, too.

Q: Well, looking at these murders, it sounds like kind of a rogue operation.

DEAN: Yes. I think they were people within the security apparatus who were very right wing and intent on having their own way. But, President Chiang had to deal with all different opinions within his own country. He was quite a remarkable person to try to do this and yet move forward. He didn't just make a decision to move forward into these reforms. He had gone around and gotten everybody's opinion, if not their agreement. At least he had given them the courtesy of long and repeated discussions of the pluses and minuses of moving in that direction. So when he did it, it wasn't a big shock to the establishment. They knew he was going to do it. Gradually things were implemented; martial law was lifted. The plans were underway for the new elections, and then he died. If he hadn't put these things in motion, I don't think his successor would have been able to fight the diehards in the KMT Central Standing Committee, and Taiwan would not be where it is today.

CHARLES T. CROSS
Director, American Institute in Taiwan

Ambassador Charles T. Cross was born in China in 1922. He attended Carleton College and Yale University, and served as a lieutenant overseas in the U.S. Marine Corps from 1942-1946. His assignments abroad included Taipei, Jakarta, Hong Kong, Kuala Lumpur, Alexandria, Nicosia, London and Danang, with an ambassadorship to Singapore. Ambassador Cross was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2001.

CROSS: I stayed in Taipei until late 1981. While in the inspection corps, I was writing a report on our operations in India. One day I was called to come to the auditorium to attend a meeting with other senior officers. It was then that I found out that we had arranged for full normalization of relations with the PRC which automatically called for a termination of diplomatic relations with Taiwan. There would be some unofficial relations with Taipei. After the meeting, I was asked to go to speak to the editorial board of the Atlanta Constitution and to a Rotary Club in Tampa. I was to go the very next day.

That I did. While talking to both groups, I was impressed by how comfortable they were with the concept of better relations with the PRC; I was also impressed by how these groups insisted that we maintain good relations with Taiwan. Without that, I could see that our overall China policy would be in great difficulties. When I returned, I found that my two former DCMs from Hong Kong, Roger Sullivan and David Dean, were going to organize the new institution that we were establishing in Taipei and that David would become the “unofficial” president of the American Institute here in Washington. I asked what they intended to do in Taipei and was told that it would be as low key as possible. But they were looking for a senior officer to head up whatever the institution would be and they said they would be glad to put my name on a list if I wanted to do that.

I then was assigned to inspect the NEA Bureau in the Department. When that was finished, I formally retired from the Service and joined the American Institute in Taiwan as its first director. Of course, there was no difference in pay or FS perks and the job had the same or, perhaps more, responsibilities as an ambassador. That was very interesting and all of us in AIT felt we were engaged in the difficult but essential work of keeping things going with Taiwan.

Q: What kind of vetting did you go through?

CROSS: Dick Holbrooke was the assistant secretary for EA. Harriman had asked to look at some papers, during which I had a chance to talk to Dick in his home in Georgetown. He asked me what I was doing and I told him that I was interested in the Taipei position. Harriman had been instrumental in getting Holbrooke the Assistant Secretary job in the Department and Holbrooke was living with the Harrimans, so that helped considerably, although I must say that I never did get along with Holbrooke very well. He was worried that I was psychologically too close to Taiwan. We never really clashed, but we did not have a close relationship either. He did give the clearest instructions I have ever received; he told me not to ask for anything because nothing could be done for the institute. Deputy Secretary of State Christopher said roughly the same thing.

Q: Did any congressmen talk to you?

CROSS: Absolutely; Congress was after all the parent of the Taiwan Relations Act over the opposition of the Department, which in some details reflected the PRC view. The Department just wanted to sneak me over to Taipei and then we would see what would happen. But in the negotiations with the PRC, we insisted that we be permitted to sell “defensive” arms to Taiwan. That raised - and continues to raise - some contentious issues. Then came the question of what we would do with all the treaties that we had signed with Taiwan, which were numerous. For example, we had the standard treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation. All trade between the U.S. and Taiwan as well as U.S. investment on the island was governed by that treaty. What would happen under the new circumstances?

These questions and many more like them forced Congress to step in and it drafted the Taiwan Relations Act [TRA]. I looked at the draft and saw that it would be easy for us to operate under it. As I said, the Department was unhappy with the TRA in general and about a statement at the beginning of the Act which stipulated that the security of Taiwan was very important to the U.S. That was the rationale for the arms sales. It also suggested that an attack on Taiwan could be viewed as an attack on the U.S. It was a very strong statement that raised objections from President Carter and the Department. But it was passed anyway and the president signed it. So I talked to a lot of congressmen, many of whom were unalterably opposed to normalization - for example Ed Derwinski, who later joined the Department. Jesse Helms was also strongly opposed.

I think we should recognize how good Congress was on this issue. There was a fascinating interplay between Congress and the academic community, for example, that fought the Taiwan Relations Act tooth and nail. Most of the questions were not about arms sales, but how the “unofficial” relations would look. That was hard to explain to my colleagues in the Department and others; it was an unusual arrangement that required considerable pioneering. All of the issues concerning the role of the institute were worked out before I went to Taiwan.

I should mention on the arms sales, with which I was deeply involved, that the Department insisted that we not discuss arms sales in Taiwan. All negotiations on those questions would take place in Washington even though DoD sent a couple of first rate officers - retired - to Taipei. Washington was afraid that we would make recommendations that might be embarrassing. I said that I thought that restriction was unwarranted because it would predictably result in the Taiwan representatives in the U.S. talking to the arms manufacturers, the Congress and DoD, thereby generating lobbies that would really complicate the Department's decision making process. I thought that we in Taipei would be much freer to discuss the Taiwanese requests. We would take a vow of silence; we would just listen and not comment; we would send our recommendations which would not be difficult for Washington to deal with. In the process the Department was establishing, the pressure groups would have been all over the Department before we even had a chance to make our views known. But the restrictions on us were maintained.

The only real dispute we had with Washington was on the question of the follow-on fighter. The Taiwanese had the F-5, which had been the standard export fighter sold to many countries. They were not as capable as some of the more modern fighter planes available by then, such as the F-16 or the F-4. So any follow-on fighter that might be available had far greater capability than the F-5 which had intentionally been built for export and which by then was already many years old. The Taiwanese were partially, if not primarily, interested in a new fighter for symbolic reasons. They knew that their air force could never be adequate to match the PRC's in numbers; so their interest in requesting a new fighter was to see what the U.S. would do after the PRC entered strong objections to the sale as it certainly would. I strongly recommended that the discussions of a follow-up fighter be terminated as soon as possible, before we found ourselves in a major imbroglio with the PRC, the American plane manufacturers, Congress, etc. The decision-making process dragged on and on. President Carter established a new system which required the manufacturers themselves to develop an export model of lower capability than the best U.S. aircraft. These could be sold to countries like Taiwan who couldn't buy the most advanced model. However, Taiwan would still have to have permission from the U.S. government to buy. Both the Carter and the Reagan administrations dithered over their decision, with the PRC fussing all the time.

Our major task in Taiwan was to conduct all of the business of an embassy without being one. We had to do a lot of little things that irritated the hell out of the Chinese. Fortunately, I knew the Chinese well enough that I think we managed to soften the impact of our Taiwan operation; I think, therefore, that our operation became more acceptable than it might have been.

Q: But weren't your operations difficult to undertake lest they be viewed as part of "formal" relations?

CROSS: They were. For example, the Taiwanese wanted to address me as "Mr. Ambassador." I told them that was not acceptable; I might have been one once upon a time but was so no more. Then they tried to treat us socially as they would have any diplomatic mission - there were a few still left; so after a while we just didn't attend such things as national days unless other private Americans were also invited.

Our operations in Taipei had to be conducted with great skill and caution; much of the business was conducted indirectly. I had a couple of contacts which I used periodically for that process. One was Fred Chien, who was a vice foreign minister; he really became the U.S. desk officer. He could be difficult, but I accepted him for what he was, a hard working diplomat. I also worked closely with the advisor to the president, Admiral Ma Chi-chuang. I wasn't allowed to meet President Chiang. I deliberately did not seek any relationship with him. So we never met, even secretly, even though that might have been useful. But sometimes I met Admiral Ma one-on-one to discuss specific issues, such as the Institute's role in Taiwan's human rights - the KMT security services was beating up on the Taiwanese again. I knew that our view would be accurately conveyed to President Chiang. AIT kept plugging away at these issues, all behind the scene. We kept making the point that the regime didn't need to worry about the oppositionists; its reputation around the world was much more important. I think that our quiet approach did have a beneficial impact on the Taiwanese government's action on human rights in the end.

Q: Were we trying to discourage any movement, if there was one, for Taiwan independence?

CROSS: The KMT of course was pushing against that. There was nothing subtle about their goals; they were right up front against independence.

Q: Was there any noticeable difference in Chiang Ching-kuo over time on this issue?

CROSS: The only hints I saw really came after I left. While I was there, there was no public diminution of the KMT stated desire to return to the mainland or against independence. One person I knew well - a former Foreign Minister and later Secretary General of the KMT - spoke in terms of enough time having passed and that Taiwan should now move towards democracy.

Q: Did you have any particular problems with Washington's general desire to expand contacts with the PRC?

CROSS: I had endless problems with the people in charge of U.S.-PRC relations mainly because I think they viewed me as a strong proponent of Taiwan. In fact, I was really downplaying the issue. The main proponents of closer ties with the PRC were on the Desk and in the NSC. I wrote policy papers suggesting that we could not expand relations with the PRC beyond a certain point without giving Taiwan some assurance that their future was safe. One way of doing that was to make the advance fighter available. But Washington was continually concerned that the signing of an agreement for the sale of the advanced fighter - which, by the way, was not yet built - would be viewed by Beijing as a sign that we no longer believed that the two parts of China could be peacefully reunited. I felt that some people in the Department had the view that the PRC thought that U.S. arms sales to Taiwan was the main reason why unification was not happening.

Q: I guess Taiwan was really an embarrassment to the administration.

CROSS: Nixon's policy was quite clear. Taiwan was to be tolerated but would not be allowed interfere with the improvement of relations with the PRC. I think we could have handled the situation much better with both the PRC and the Congress, not to mention Taiwan itself. In fact, the Carter administration would often be viewed as being a hand-maiden of the PRC and doing its bidding. That really frustrated Congress.

Q: Did you have many congressional visitors?

CROSS: Indeed, and they all praised Taiwan for its stance. Of course, the Taiwan leadership had no equal in the world on how to milk these congressional visits. I think almost all of the visitors came with open minds. For example, John Glenn wasn't sold on Taiwan. He and Mansfield were leaders in the Senate pushing for improved relations with the PRC all along. When they would come through Hong Kong, I would discuss the situation with them. I also thought that we should have better relations with the PRC; that was one of the reasons why I took the Taiwan assignment. I wanted to help improve the U.S.-PRC relations, but I always ran into suspicions about my sympathies.

Q: I think you have illustrated one of the problems of our foreign policy. At the second or third level in Washington, you often see people who think they can manipulate the policy and the outcomes and want to show their power. I am sure that the China desk found Taiwan an embarrassment which barred them from doing whatever they wanted with the PRC.

CROSS: Not only that, but the PRC was constantly telling us that we couldn't have anything that could be interpreted as diplomatic relations with Taiwan. Taiwan had a consulate general in Dallas and the PRC objected to including the names of the staff members in the official consular list. So the PRC was always on our backs trying to undermine our relations with Taiwan.

Q: Did you get much pressure from that part of the Chinese-American community that supported Taiwan?

CROSS: The Chinese-American community has supported Taiwan for such a long time that there is bound to be a close affiliation. But I must say that the Chinese-Americans were delighted with the opening to the mainland. They also supported American policy to preserve Taiwan. Most of them didn't speak Mandarin in any case, so communications with the mainland would have been difficult.

I should tell you one story which is very important. During all of the debates about the fighter aircraft, in the spring of 1978, I came back to Washington - at my own request - to talk to Secretary Haig. I wanted to talk to him because it was obvious to me that some people in the Department were willing to proceed with the sale of arms to the PRC on the assumption that then sales to Taiwan would be easier. I thought it was a terrible strategy. I am not sure that Haig was familiar with this ploy, but he did want to reduce the number of fighter aircraft that were to be sold to Taiwan. I thought that the American Institute people in Washington were very good, but I doubted that they had access to the leadership of the Department.

So I came back and had long discussions with John Holdridge, the assistant secretary for EA. We were good friends, having served together in Hong Kong. John told me very clearly that nothing at that point in time would stand in the way of the Cold War; that is to say, our relations with the PRC had always to be seen in the context of our competition with the Soviet Union. That clear message worried me even more; it did not portend well for U.S.-Taiwan relations. But there was nothing I could do about the facts of life. But one day, I was invited by Fred Chien and James Soong, who was then head of the Information Office and later a candidate for president. This was a family affair to take place at a resort on the coast; so Shirley and I went. We had a very nice time. On the last evening, after we had finished the social events, the two Chinese took me off into a private room where they told me that President Chiang wanted me to give a message to President Reagan. The essence of the message was that Chiang would not make any waves about the putative arms sales.

I asked why. I was told that Chiang had a personal message from Reagan which was the go-ahead for a Taiwan purchase of the advance fighter. I then asked what type plane was being considered. I was told that it would be a model adequate to Taiwan's defense needs, meaning the FX. It seemed to me that this strategy had been a very good one for the U.S.; it was putting the Taiwan issue on the back-burner. I called my deputy, Stan Brooks, and a couple of other staff members and told them that we had succeeded in our mission; Taiwan was going to get an advanced fighter which should give them a sense that the U.S. was supporting them. I thought that then my job was done and I could return to the States.

So I left; a few months later, the Department turned down the request for sale of the advanced fighter for Taiwan. This was Holdridge's recommendation; he thought that the PRC might raise serious objections. In fact, as soon as we turned down the fighter, the PRC called in our representatives and told them that it would object to any arms sales to Taiwan. They threatened to withdraw their ambassador from Washington if the U.S. didn't agree to stop arms sales. That pressure finally resulted in the Taiwan communique of August 1982 which stipulated that we would not increase either quantitatively or qualitatively our arms sales to Taiwan. That was completely cynical because within two years, we upgraded our arms sales and then during the Bush administration, we sold F-16s to Taiwan. I still think that had we sold the advanced aircraft in 1979, when I went to Taiwan, we would have saved ourselves a lot of trouble because it would have closed an open wound between us and the PRC. At the same time, we could have restrained Taiwan from making some of its extreme comments because it knew that this aircraft would be delivered whenever it came off the assembly line. ANNA ROMANSKI
Chinese Language Training
Washington, DC and Taiwan (1979-1981)

Assistant Cultural Affairs Officer
Beijing (1981-1983)

Born in England, Ms. Romanski was raised in England and in New Jersey. She was educated at Stanford and Yale Universities, as well as Middlebury College, where she studies the Russian language. Joining the State Department in 1974, her assignments both in Washington and abroad were primarily with USIA, serving in Public and cultural Affairs capacities. A speaker of Polish, German and Chinese, she served in Germany, Poland and China. Ms. Romanski was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2005.

Q: So, in 79, how did the China assignment come about?

ROMANSKI: A special notice came out that they needed people to study Chinese for an assignment in China. This would have been after Nixon had visited China: we were on the verge of normalizing relations with China. There was a shortage of Chinese speakers. The notice said that those within certain grades could apply for the opportunity. Both my husband and I needed assignments, applied and were accepted for Chinese language training.

Q: You took Chinese language training from when to when?

ROMANSKI: We studied Chinese from 1979 to 81. It was a two-year course.

Q: Where did you take it?

ROMANSKI: The first year was at FSI, the Foreign Service Institute in Rosslyn, which is not nearly as nice as NFATC, the National Foreign Affairs Training Center which we have now. The second year was on Taiwan. The State Department had a policy whereby one studied the difficult two-year languages for one year at FSI and one year in the country where the language was spoken so that one could have more exposure to encourage language acquisition. This was perhaps less effective for Chinese because the Chinese language has a great many dialects. We were taught Mandarin because most of us were going to the Mainland, but on Taiwan, they spoke another dialect although most people could understand Mandarin (although not necessarily our Mandarin). In addition, the writing systems are different on Taiwan and in mainland China. Mainland Chinese uses a simplified writing system, while Taiwan retains the original classical writing system, which is much more difficult. Very few of the characters would actually be the same. This meant that we couldn't read Taiwanese newspapers.

So the question arises: how useful was the reinforcement? It was useful mostly because the quality of instruction was much better on Taiwan than it had been back here at FSI. To achieve literacy in Chinese, one would have to know a certain number of characters. In Chinese, as in all foreign languages, we are tested in speaking and in reading. ( Not in writing, thank God.) Chinese is interesting because it contains a great dichotomy. Spoken Chinese is relatively simple, except for the tones, because the grammar is simple and there are no conjugations or declensions. Reading and writing Chinese is very difficult, however, because the Chinese never developed an alphabet. To achieve basic literacy in Chinese, one would have to memorize a minimum of 5,000 characters. The more one could memorize, the better one's reading score would likely be. The first year, we seemed to futz around forever learning the same 500 basic characters over and over again. This meant that we had an incredible workload during the second year in order to get up to speed. All of us complained about it. But, as usual, FSI did not pay any attention to us. I think the feeling was, "We know better than you do. We are the teachers. You are the students." Or perhaps, the teachers were just lazy. In China, teaching -- this goes back to Confucius -- is a venerated profession, much more so than in the U.S. One goes back to the old "laoshi" (teacher) tradition. I felt that it was counterproductive for FSI to ask us to evaluate the course and then not bother to take any of our recommendations for its improvement, but this is what was usually done with each language.

Q: When you were going through Chinese language training that year in Taiwan, were you getting the Taiwanese side of things?

ROMANSKI: Not really because we didn't have much contact with the Taiwanese. The campus was up on a mountain, Yangmingshan. At one point, the school had been in Taichung further south, but it had been moved to a suburb of Taipei, Taiwan's largest city, where the American Institute in Taiwan (the substitute for an Embassy) was located. Taiwan was no longer allowed to have an Embassy since we had recognized Mainland China. As far as living conditions, we were comparatively lucky. We had a separate campus -- not as nice as NFATC, however it included living quarters. The classrooms were located up on the mountain. We all lived in former military housing, which was simple but perfectly adequate. To have contact with the Taiwanese, one would have to descend the mountain to try to locate native speakers. It was an effort. None of us had cars. None of us knew the Taiwanese dialect. We would have to take public transportation. Usually one went into Taipei not to practice one's Chinese but to go to a restaurant or shopping. We also went to the art museum, which had some wonderful items taken from the Mainland, especially massive Shang Dynasty bronzes.

Our teachers were mostly native Taiwanese, but they taught us Mandarin and kept their political views to themselves.

Q: What were you slated for and what was your husband's assignment?

ROMANSKI: I was once again destined to be an Assistant Cultural Affairs Officer. My husband had been assigned to the Political Section.

Q: So then you went to Beijing?

ROMANSKI: Yes.

Q: And you were there from 81 to . . . ?

ROMANSKI: We were there from 1981 to '83. I would have preferred to have stayed longer so that I could have made better use of my investment in Chinese. However, given the nature of the assignment process with its two-year language learning curve, we would have had to extend before we had even set foot in the country. As we were learning Chinese, we would periodically hear terrible stories about Beijing: how unhealthy it was, how anti-American the Chinese were, how everybody hated the assignment, etc. None of our group was willing to take the risk -- the system mitigated against it.

Q: So what was Beijing like then? How would you describe our relations between 81 and 83?

ROMANSKI: They were probably pretty frosty. We were in the process of greatly expanding our relations with China, which was why so many of us were being trained in Chinese and had been sent to Beijing or Shanghai, but we didn't have an attractive embassy at all. We were located in the former Pakistan embassy so it was extremely crowded. I had to share a small room with another officer: the other assistant cultural affairs officer. The press attaché never got tired of telling people that his office was a former bathroom. There was very little privacy and it was often hard to work. My fellow ACAO administered the educational exchange program. When she had visitors in our cramped space, I could hardly concentrate on my own work, yet there was no where else to go....I was living in a hotel so I could not have worked at home even if that had been allowed.

I was the ACAO, Assistant Cultural Affairs Officer, responsible for cultural affairs. The program was just starting up so everyone felt that there would be enough work for two ACAOs. I handled culture and the other Assistant Cultural Affairs Officer handled education. She was the one with the most visitors.

Q: What did you do as a cultural officer in China? How did you find the receptivity to what you were doing?

ROMANSKI: The most curious people about life in America that I have ever encountered were actually the Soviets. They were genuinely interested in American culture and would ask all kinds of questions. They would ask about movie actors they might have heard of, what kind of cars we drove, etc. They were truly curious. The Poles were somewhat curious, although at a more sophisticated level, perhaps asking about the latest trends or universities.

The Chinese were not very curious at all. They tended to be rather isolated. They didn't have a lot of information. At least the Soviets or the Poles had heard of developments, which they could inquire about. The Chinese were starting from a much lower base. Not to mention that the Cultural Revolution had likely discouraged interest in things foreign.

Q: I was going to say, we are still talking about a very early period in Chinese-American relations.

ROMANSKI: That's true.

Q: You might say that that whole Chinese revolution that happened . . .

ROMANSKI: Right, the cultural revolution.

Q: No. Not the cultural revolution. I'm talking about the revolution we are seeing now.

ROMANSKI: Okay. Oh, none of that. In fact, when we were there, one of the things that was so striking was that there were no cars, no privately-owned cars. Everybody rode bicycles. It was much better in terms of pollution. I shudder to think of what the air quality must be like now. The only privately-owned cars belonged to diplomats and official entities such as ministries, units or factories. No private person would have been allowed to own a car.

Q: Speaking of the cultural revolution, this was such a horrendous thing. Was this just a non-topic?

ROMANSKI: I never talked with a Chinese person about the cultural revolution. It was still too close in time, not to mention that one would usually avoid political topics. When we were studying Chinese in Taiwan, one of the more useful teaching techniques was to watch and listen to video tapes of broadcasts from the mainland. I think the trials of the Gang of Four were going on at that time. We would listen to the tapes to try to understand them as best we could. It was even harder to understand the mentality, so unlike our own.

Chinese was one of those very strange languages. It was unlike anything that I had ever studied before. When people on TV would speak Chinese, for quite a while, I would understand absolutely nothing. Then, all of a sudden, I'd finally catch a phrase. Suddenly, almost miraculously, I would start to understand almost everything. It is just a series of sounds, of tones really. Until one grasps a key phrase, comprehension hovers around zero.

Q: Who was the ambassador while you were there?

ROMANSKI: The ambassador was Arthur Hummel. He was an old China hand. He had been born of missionary parents.

Q: PAO and CAO?

ROMANSKI: The Public Affairs Officer when I arrived was John Thompson, but he was soon replaced by Norrie Smith. The Cultural Affairs Officer was Leon Slawecki. Both Leon and Norrie were China hands, which meant that each of them spoke quite good Chinese. Leon was even married to a woman of Chinese descent who had grown up on Taiwan. Norrie was divorced.

Q: How did you find the cultural side of things? Was it a work in progress? Were there good contacts?

ROMANSKI: No. It was definitely a work in progress. We were trying to promote relations, trying to educate the Chinese a bit more about the United States. They were trying to send their people over while we were trying to send our people over. I handled the speaker program, visiting American scholars or other specialists who we thought might be of some interest to Chinese audiences. We would often place them at Chinese universities. As in Poland, but even more so, there was an incredible amount of bureaucracy involved, many layers of approval. It often took a lot of paper work for very little happen.

Q: Were we at the point where there was almost a flood of Chinese students coming to the United States?

ROMANSKI: No. We weren't quite there yet although there was great interest in studying in the U.S. You might remember that I mentioned how Poles were unfriendly until I opened my mouth and they realized I was an American. In China, people would approach western-looking foreigners to practice their English, which was often surprisingly good. This would never happen in Poland -- people rarely spoke English and would never want to practice it. In China, it happened all the time. However, whenever they asked the question of where do you work or what do you do, the response "American Embassy" would be a real conversation killer. Ordinary Chinese were very concerned about their own security forces, much more so than Soviet citizens seemed to fear the KGB, in part probably due to the recency of the Cultural Revolution.

Our Embassy had a large number of Chinese spouses although I don't think there were any Chinese-American officers at that time. Had my Chinese been more fluent, I might have been able to conduct a different level of conversation and attain a richer experience.

American students or teachers had much more contact with ordinary Chinese. They didn't have the stigma of being an official American. In many ways, China was my most interesting tour because I felt like I was something of a pioneer. However, we had only the most limited contact with the Chinese. We lived in a hotel our first year but, by the second year, we had moved into a modest apartment. In all that time, the only Chinese person I was able to invite over was my Chinese teacher who was allowed to come.

On my husband's side, however, there would be dinners for official contacts. The Chinese behaved very peculiarly. One tended to entertain early in China, which I personally appreciated so that we could clean up before the next day. If dinner began at the normal hour of six p.m. and five Chinese guests had been invited, all of them would arrive together exactly on the dot of six. All of them would leave together as well -- precisely at eight o'clock. No one would linger. No one would deviate from the pattern. It would be too suspicious. When we had our apartment, we would also entertain foreign diplomats and other members of the large international community. They came and went in a less regimented fashion.

Q: Did you get out in the country at all?

ROMANSKI: Not much. It was almost impossible to meet people. It was difficult to get out into the country. As in the USSR, one needed permission to travel outside one's area of assignment. It was actually my most fascinating tour, not because of the contact with the Chinese, but because of the interesting international community. Nobody, except for the Japanese, really had decent contacts with the Chinese. They were just too closed to diplomats. So -- for the only time in my life -- during those two years, we had a very interesting circle of friends that consisted of foreign diplomats, journalists, business people and the occasional academic who happened to be in China at the same time with us.

We would socialize quite a bit within the international community. This was the only post at which my husband and I played a significant amount of bridge. For once, I felt that all the bridge that I had ended up playing in grad school was paying off. It was actually a very enjoyable assignment -- in many ways, my favorite.

Q: Tell me about some of the cultural things that you were doing?

ROMANSKI: We brought the New York City ballet over, which was quite a sensation. I remember meeting and working with Jerome Robbins, the famous choreographer, who had worked with Balanchine, an even more legendary figure. Arthur Miller came over to put on a performance of his play Death of a Salesman. It was performed in Chinese so I could just barely understand it, despite having studied the original. The famous Chinese actor who played Willy Loman insisted on wearing a ghastly blond wig, like the hairdo of a rag doll. I guess it was the politically correct depiction of a "foreign devil" since he refused to go on without his wig. In my contacts with Miller, I of course wanted to ask him what it had been like to have been married to Marilyn Monroe, but I didn't dare. After all, I was a diplomat and had to behave "diplomatically."

The actor Kirk Douglas came over with his photographer wife Inge Morath. We had shown his film Lust for Life -- about the painter Vincent van Gogh. I remember having a nice exchange with Kirk. He asked me what travel in China was like as he was to go on to another post. I said that we usually flew, because the train would take too long. I also informed him that the plane had only one class, and it definitely wasn't first. We had to laugh about that.

Another visitor I remember -- although he was not cultural -- was former President Nixon. He was well received by the Chinese since he had opened China, but less well received by the Embassy because we still remembered Watergate. I remember attending some a reception at which Nixon made some kind of sexist remark about being happy to see so many "little women" out here supporting their husbands. Not only was the remark sexist, but it was also off base since all the women he saw were working at the Embassy. It was the kind of post where most of the spouses sought employment, unless they had very young children.

President George Herbert Walker Bush also visited. To demonstrate that sexism was not all on the Chinese side, I got to arrange a tea for the Embassy wives with Mrs. Bush at the Ambassador's residence. I suppose I could have protested, but I honestly didn't mind. In fact, the event was a great success -- contrary to our cookie-pushing image, tea parties don't get one promoted! I think each and every wife came, whether they were working wives or not. This was unusual since a lot of the Chinese-American wives didn't like to mingle much for whatever reason but, for an event of this caliber, they all showed up. It was a lovely event if I do say so myself.

We were working on another big cultural project but just as we were getting to the fruition point, the famous Hu Na incident occurred. Although Hu Na is now buried in the shrouds of memory, she was once a fairly mediocre tennis player who defected to the U.S. towards the end of my tour. Everything was put on hold. Visits were cancelled. Nothing could happen. For my last several months, I basically had nothing to do. Fortunately, I managed to escort a couple of "study groups," which had been allowed under our exchange agreement. I got to serve as a sort of escort -- certainly not an escort interpreter because my Chinese never got good enough so that I could serve as an interpreter. Ironically, I got plenty of compliments on my Chinese, something that rarely happened in Poland. In China, Chinese people would say, "Oh, you speak such wonderful Chinese."

Chinese, as a spoken language, is actually very simple because it has almost no grammar. It is an advanced language in that respect, unlike the highly inflected languages of Polish or Russian. It is difficult because of the tones and because of the writing system. Most of us never really paid that much attention to tones. At first I thought the Chinese were pulling my leg (or perhaps even subtly insulting me) when they complimented me on my Mandarin. However, I realized that since we had been through two years of schooling, we actually sounded pretty good whenever we spoke Chinese with a Chinese for whom Mandarin was a second or maybe third tongue. Everybody spoke dialect. Naturally, we couldn't speak any dialect at all. It was very common, if still disconcerting, for me to get compliments on my rather primitive Chinese. It was just another aspect that made the assignment interesting.

With regard to the study groups, I remember that I got to accompany a group of museum specialists. Another time I got to accompany a National Parks Service delegation to various cities in China. It was fascinating. I welcomed the opportunity to get out of Beijing, which could get pretty grey and depressing in winter. I took that wonderful trip along the Li River near Guilin: this is the magical, misty scenery that one occasionally sees in movies and that regularly appears in many Chinese paintings. It was an unforgettable experience. I enjoyed seeing more of the country, which one couldn't see as an ordinary traveler. One had to apply to travel -- and, it was very expensive to travel as an individual in those days. This was probably another way for the Chinese to encourage group travel. The Chinese were happy to have an Embassy officer accompany official delegations, because even if we couldn't serve as an official interpreter, I could still interpret the culture and explain differences. Delegation members would complain to us and we would try to raise the matter with Chinese officials if circumstances warranted.

I'd like to give an example, not that I could do anything about it, but it is actually one of my more amusing anecdotes. It will also give an indication of how limited my Chinese really was. In China, delegation members were assigned only certain rooms of certain hotels -- rooms that were bugged, basically. One of these rooms had a round mouse hole in it -- it was quite funny actually because it looked exactly like mouse holes do in cartoons. I went to the official escort to ask for another room at the delegation member's request. However, instead of saying that the room had a mouse hole, I said that the room had a tiger hole. The Chinese word for tiger is "laohu," which to me was very similar for the Chinese word for mouse, which is "laoshu." I forgot and said tiger by mistake. However, it didn't make any difference -- not for the guest, who got to stay in his room with the mouse hole, and certainly not for the Chinese, who weren't about to change the room even if it had been a tiger hole! I was amazed at the lack of reaction on the Chinese part. In the U.S., most people would have roared with laughter at someone making such a silly mistake. I never could understand the total lack of reaction. Perhaps the Chinese just expect foreigners to make these kinds of mistakes or maybe they were being polite.

Q: When you were getting something like the New York City ballet, how was dealing with the cultural bureaucracy?

ROMANSKI: Just as in Poland or any of these communist countries, everything was laid down in great-to-excruciating detail. Number of performances. Receptions. I think the American side gave a reception and the Chinese side gave one as well. If I'm not mistaken, I think the Chinese side may have returned some tickets to us saying that they could not be sold. That was certainly not the case because the ballet would have been such a curiosity that people would have been glad to come. Not to mention that the tickets didn't cost anything. This was more likely a reflection on the kind of people who would be allowed to attend such a Western event. We may have gotten permission to distribute leftover tickets to dance students. In any case, it all worked out in the end.

Q: Did you have children there?

ROMANSKI: No. We never had children. That would have served as a kind of entrée, however. The Chinese liked young children. Living conditions in China at that time were very difficult. Except for the ambassador and DCM, we all had to live in a diplomatic compound with diplomats from other countries. It was located not far from where we worked. I would often ride my bicycle to work. That was one of the best ways to have contact with ordinary Chinese, who would often wave in a friendly fashion. They saw that you were living like one of them rather than a privileged foreigner.

In the housing compound, all the apartments were quite small. At that time, if you had a large family, you couldn't bring them all. The Chinese had a one-child policy, we had a two-child policy. The post may have had an unusual profile since, at the time, it consisted mainly of people who were single, married people with no children, and those with one or two children or whose children were older and already in boarding school or college. It was not a particularly child-friendly post.

Q: Did you get any feel for Chinese culture?

ROMANSKI: Some. There was not a whole lot to do during one's time off so we would go out to the Great Wall. We could visit the Summer Palace, the Ming Tombs or a temple. There was a summer resort called Beihai, which one could book for weekends during the summer. There may have been a museum or art gallery as well. We attended one Chinese opera, but I think that may have been in Taiwan. Although my husband and I are both opera lovers (or perhaps because we are opera fans), we never acquired a taste for Chinese opera, which sounds very screechy to the Western ear. We attended a symphony performance but it was not very good -- the musicians were still suffering the effects of the Cultural Revolution during which Western culture including music, and indeed much Chinese culture, had been outlawed as bourgeois, decadent and unnecessary.

Many of us, particularly the women, spent time frequenting the antique stores. Even if one was not a shopper by nature, it was a way to pass the time until one tired of it. One could still find items that had been confiscated during the Cultural Revolution and were now being sold for hard currency. China was the only post where I found time to do any significant amount of shopping.

ROMANSKI: In '83.

Q: Was there a discernable difference in relations from when you arrived?

ROMANSKI: Our relations had actually worsened because of the Hu Na incident. U.S.-Chinese relations did not seem to be on a very even keel but subject to suspicion and fluctuation. Like the USSR and Poland, China was another country which had a strong interest in obtaining sensitive information. China was not a county where one could hire anyone one liked. Diplomatic services would assign people to various positions. The quality of the foreign national staff varied considerably. Two of our cultural section employees were quite efficient and had a good feel for public affairs work. Mr. Wang was a younger man, whose career potential had likely been damaged by the cultural revolution. He was quite smart but his education had been shortchanged. All of our employees were good communists, but it would have been pointless to discuss the respective merits of our systems.

On one occasion, I had to xerox something and noticed that one of our employees, ostensibly a male secretary who spoke almost no English, was copying something. I noticed that it was written in Russian, a language I know. I couldn't see what it was exactly but, when I came, he quickly folded and put the item away. I had some mixed feelings but decided that it would do no harm to report the incident. I told the RSO (Regional Security Officer) that an employee was copying Russian documents which had nothing to do with his work for us. It caused a bit of a flap, but I'm fairly sure we were not able to get rid of this person as his real employer was most likely not our government. If he was a spy, he didn't cut a particularly glamorous figure. Nor could I imagine that he was very effective since his English seemed to be quite minimal.

Q: How did the Hu Na thing play out?

ROMANSKI: I had to leave that summer so I was not around when the Chinese stopped punishing us. In China, we also had a film program featuring American films, many of them quite old. Each section got to invite its contacts. Depending on the film, some Chinese would actually attend. Afterwards, there would be a big reception. After Hu Na, the film program was put on hold. There were also a number of official visits, which were also subjected to the diplomatic climate.

You asked earlier about Chinese culture: a lot of the culture centered around food. We would often go out to eat -- especially with out-of-town visitors, of whom we had a large number since China was recently opened -- but the food in most of the restaurants was really quite awful in those days. It thrilled me that I lost a lot of weight without trying at all. Some of the Westerners we knew who traveled around China ended up getting quite sick. Many family members and even diplomats had to be Medevaced to Hong Kong but I was never so lucky. Everyone had to be tested for parasites stateside when they returned.

You asked about what it was like to be duty officer over weekends. Depending on the country and how large the post was, it could be more or less onerous. In China, so-called death by duck was most common during the tourist season. Fortunately, China was already quite a well-staffed post so I may have served as duty officer only once every six months or so.

Tourist groups were just starting to discover China. Some of the tourists were quite elderly. They would be feted with the usual elaborate twelve-course banquets of rich or oily food, on top of a lot of sightseeing often during hot weather. Not everyone was up to the challenge. The unlucky duty officer in the consular section would have to deal with the results....

I did, however, handle a death case in Poland. The consular officer praised me because I had actually followed the instructions in the duty officer book and sent out a cable. He was also quite surprised since most officers choose to wait for the consular section to re-open on Monday. I guess I didn't know any better since it was only my second tour.

Q: You left China, and then what?

ROMANSKI: Before leaving China, let me tell you a story that is actually my husband's anecdote but I'm borrowing it. Although it was unusual, my husband was actually befriended by one of the houseboys when we lived for a year in the Beijing Hotel. He was invited over to dinner to a typical Chinese apartment a few times. The houseboy was after a U.S. visa, which he eventually got, but he also got into trouble over it. I accompanied my husband only once because the food was very oily and difficult for me to digest. The wife usually cooked the dinner, but one evening, she was not there so the daughter in the family cooked the meal. The "piece de resistance", the highlight of the meal, was the Chinese delicacy known as "haishen," or sea slugs. We knew this delicacy well since it is the most commonplace of all the banquet fare. Sea slugs, even when properly prepared, are almost inedible for most Westerners since they look and taste a bit like tires -- a very rubbery texture. In this case, however, the sister -- possibly new to cooking -- had undercooked the slugs, which rendered them almost inedible. We had been taught in our Chinese culture class that it is very impolite to refuse food. However, a moment arose when all the Chinese tactfully left the room. My husband then distributed his remaining slugs among the host family's plates. They came back, savored the slugs and never said a word.

To avoid situations like this, one of the very few remaining Chinese phrases that I still command is, "Wo siji lai," which means, "I will serve myself." It was a most useful defense against unwanted delicacies piled on small plates by Chinese hosts.

After China, I went back to Washington for a domestic assignment because I was due for one. I had been overseas or studying a language for seven years.

Q: What was your Washington assignment?

ROMANSKI: I started out as the policy officer for Europe at Voice of America. I didn't really care for that assignment, so I managed to switch after about a year. I became a program officer for youth exchange at USIA, which was, and still is, located across the street from VOA. I was once again working on educational exchanges, this time on youth exchange.

Q: How did you find the jobs? The first one was . . . ?

ROMANSKI: Policy officer. It was actually quite boring. Some high level officials at Voice of America, or perhaps at State, had decided to run editorials stating the views of the U.S. Government on various issues. There were five Foreign Service officers located at VOA to read editorials, which other people had written, to check them for possible errors and for political content. If we had any questions, we would contact counterparts, most often at USIA, but sometimes at State. It had a nice title but it was a non-job. As soon as I discovered the nature of the job, I tried to find something more challenging.

Q: So you became a youth exchange officer? What was that about?

ROMANSKI: Youth exchange started because the director of USIA at that time was a great friend of President Reagan's. He was Charles Z. Wick. One of his big initiatives was launching a youth exchange. He believed that young people were key to the future and that too many of the other exchanges were geared towards old fuddy-duddies. He also wanted to leave his mark by launching something new. He started youth exchange programs with as many countries of the world as was politically feasible.

The largest program under this initiative still exists: it is the Congress-Bundestag Exchange, which involves a large number of German and American students, numbering in the hundreds. The German Government liked this program so much that they supported it very strongly -- I'm referring to financial as well as moral support. The Germans pay a disproportionate share of the costs. The exchange involves high school students spending a year studying abroad and spending some time with the legislature in each country. This didn't happen to be my program, but it was the most important program in the office.

My beat was the rest of Europe, excluding Germany. One of my countries was the U.K. England had two priorities in youth exchanges with us. We were ahead of our time in arranging exchanges with Northern Ireland (where I unfortunately never traveled -- the situation was still quite unsettled). The UK's other concern was anti-elitism, i.e. the priority was to arrange exchanges for working-class rather than academic youth. We had to devise exchanges that would involve young people outside the normal parameters of exchange, since most countries prefer to exchange future leaders, often limited to elites. Britain wanted to get away from that.

Although I never got to travel there, I also handled Middle Eastern countries. Israel was one of my countries. It is the only time in my Foreign Service career that I have ever had anything to do with Israel. I think we may also have had a few exchanges with Jordan and possibly Egypt. They were just getting off the ground since there were political difficulties in launching them, even in those days. With Israel, there was no difficulty at all. Israel was only too happy to take and send as many young people as we could afford.

Q: This British program intrigues me. It's hard for us, I think, to reach down into what we would call the working class. The British kind of have definitions. People probably declare themselves to be working class. But we don't. How did you manage that?

ROMANSKI: That's right. We made an effort to recruit some inner-city school kids. We had a wide age range, including down to junior high. Some exchanges involved some less economically-advantaged Americans. This was good for both sides. One of other exchanges with England involved an exchange of deaf youth, although not necessarily economically disadvantaged. We conducted the exchange with Gallaudet. We were broadening the scope of exchanges quite a bit in those days, when there was the money for it.

Q: Coming out of all this, what was your impression of these programs?

ROMANSKI: I thought they were very good. Unlike the Fulbright program, which I also have a high regard for, youth exchange would often involve much larger numbers of students on exchanges for much shorter periods of time. The time frame for the Fulbright program at that time would be a minimum of six months, often a year. Extensions were often given. We would often exchange whole classrooms of kids for two weeks. Sometimes home hospitality was involved. The exchanges weren't necessarily all that costly. The exchanges also didn't need to involve a large amount of travel, but they usually featured an academic or cultural component. From the contact I had with the limited number of groups I met, the results seemed to be quite positive. The young participants acquired a larger world view. These were very much people-to-people type exchanges.

Q: A little bit like the American Field Service.

ROMANSKI: Yes. We worked with Youth For Understanding, American Field Service and similar organizations. We would give the organization an additional grant for this special initiative.

Q: This is probably a good place to stop. We'll pick this up the next time, you had finished your job in Washington, I guess. And whither?

ROMANSKI: After Washington, I would go off to be an Assistant Cultural Affairs Officer, yet again, this time to Bonn. The pattern of my career was the Foreign Service equivalent of "always a bridesmaid, never a bride."

Q: Did you feel this was partly because you were part of a tandem couple?

ROMANSKI: Yes, I very much feel that. There have been some very successful tandem couples, but in my particular case, I always felt that it was holding me back a bit. My husband probably felt the same way. I may have started out with ambitions, but I gradually lost those feelings as I saw the way my career was trending....

Today, a career like mine would be inconceivable. A great many junior positions, like ACAO, have been eliminated. What few remain might be reserved for first-tour officers. Nowadays, a second tour officer might be assigned as public affairs officer in Kyrgyzstan or Armenia. Why not?. During my time, when the Foreign Service was considerably larger and probably more bureaucratic, this wouldn't have been possible. It's a different kind of Foreign Service today: leaner, meaner and tighter.

Q: Well one has to look at this in the long run. I must say that as I do these oral history interviews, did you have fun while you were doing it?

ROMANSKI: Yes, I did. I mean the assignments that we have talked about so far: Hamburg, Warsaw, Beijing were all interesting each in its own way. Beijing was my favorite assignment because it was so different from what I had experienced up to that time. I also valued my career for its personal enrichment. I felt I was learning a lot, meeting all kinds of different people, visiting exotic locales -- it seemed to be a great way to earn a living.

David E. Reuther was born in Washington in 1942. He received a BA from Occidental College in 1965 and entered the Foreign Service in 1970. His assignments abroad include Udorn, Bangkok, Songkhla, Taipei, Beijing, Khartoum, and Kuwait. Mr. Reuther was interviewed by Raymond C. Ewing in 1996.

Q: Today is the August 29, 1996. This is an interview with David E. Reuther which is being done on behalf of the Association of Diplomatic Studies and Raymond Ewing is the interviewer. In talking with you today we want to review your Foreign Service career. You apparently went to high school in Seattle, Washington and then went to Occidental College in Los Angeles and a little later came into the Foreign Service. Dave, why don't you tell me a little bit about your early life and how you got interested in the Foreign Service and what else you did before actually joining the Service, which I think was in 1970?

REUTHER: I have always considered my interest in international events came from being raised in Seattle. As a premier Pacific Ocean port, Seattle offered exposure to the nations and history of the Pacific Rim. The Pacific was where East and West fatefully met and clashed. In school I read extensively about the battles that took place there during World War II. But if history and proximity didn't catch one's eye, Seattle the melting pot did. The main immigrant groups were Scandinavians, of which a large number came after the World War II. There were large Filipino and Japanese communities, and a small Chinese community. The Seattle Art Museum, for example, had few Van Gogh and Degas paintings, but a stimulating collection of oriental art. The University of Washington always had an excellent Far East Asia studies program. Growing up in such an environment encouraged an awareness of Japan and China. Because Seattle was one of the few Pacific entry points into the United States, the city was often exposed to Asian artists touring on Cultural Exchange programs. I distinctly remember watching a performance of Japanese Kabuki performed by a visiting group. Seattle's place in the world and the encouragement of my high school history teacher, Grace Meyers made it seem quite natural to pursue studies in college in political science and international affairs.

Q: So, you finished at Occidental in 1965. What did you do after that?

REUTHER: By then I was deeply interested in China and had already focused class papers and read extensively on China. I had been accepted at the Sino-Soviet Institute of The George Washington University in Washington, D.C., in China studies. It therefore seemed like a good idea at the time to start on Chinese language studies. The summer intensive Chinese language program at the University of Washington, however, seemed more like Marine Corps boot camp. The faculty was great, but demanding, and moved us through the material in quick step. It was very frustrating. The only thing that made it survivable was that of the twelve people in this class, eight were Chinese Americans from the Seattle area and they were having an equally difficult time. It turned out that these young men were from families that spoke Cantonese at home. But the meetings of the local Chinese businessmen society were conducted in Mandarin. Because their fathers were unable to participate in the business meetings, they were bound and determined that their sons would have the language to succeed. So, here were these poor guys who were Cantonese speakers with six tones and all the consonants that Mandarin doesn't have, just struggling away. That helped the rest of us get through.

Q: It was an early lesson, perhaps, of the extreme differences among Chinese.

REUTHER: Oh, absolutely. Like Americans who takes pride in their home state, the Chinese also identify with their regional origins.

Q: After that intensive summer language program you came to Washington, DC?

REUTHER: Yes, to the Sino-Soviet Institute that Professor Franz Michael had just established at The George Washington University. He was my academic mentor and key to finding the necessary scholarship funds. Professor Michael had an extensive association with China. He and Professor George Taylor were important contributors to the strong China program at the University of Washington. They authored one of the key textbooks, The Far East in the Modern World, used through the last 1950s, early 1960s in Asian survey courses. Their personal history is fascinating. Michael was German, Taylor was British. During the 1930s they arrived in Asia and obtained a employment teaching at Yenching University. Their China was the China trying to modernize and resist the Japanese. Their personal history constantly reminded we students that modern Chinese history didn't begin in 1949.

Q: Was this an area studies program?

REUTHER: Yes.

Q: Leading to what?

REUTHER: A Masters Degree in international affairs from The George Washington University and a certificate from the Sino-Soviet Institute, a dual certification.

Q: And you did mostly China studies. Did you do some Soviet studies?

REUTHER: Although an area studies program, there was an implicit assumption that China and the Soviet Union were to be studied as communist nation-states. We were to see communist China, not necessarily Chinese communists. Despite my China concentration, I enrolled in a couple of courses on the Soviet Union. I remember writing a paper on the organization of Soviet agriculture.

Q: Were you interested at that point primarily in political or economic issues or historical and social?

REUTHER: I'm afraid my interest was encompassing. Ultimately what I found intellectually attractive about studying China was the vast difference between what was happening in China versus how it is perceived in the outside world. The China in American newspapers in the 1960s was a gross characterization of what small reality we knew. So, not only did you have an interesting, unique political culture; but also this American caricatures. It is a great lesson in paradigm construction. Harold Isaacs discussed this very point in his 1958 book Scratches on Our Mind.

Q: But at that time, in the mid-'60s, you came to The George Washington University to do those studies there was no reality check by field experience. You weren't allowed to go to China.

REUTHER: And the lack of field experience is what made the subject intellectually challenging. All these things were being said about China in the 1950s and 1960s that seemed more associated with domestic American political partisanship than with Chinese reality. Then there would be intellectual breakthroughs ignored by the political culture because it didn't fit the partisan paradigms. I'm thinking of Donald Zagoria's excellent work on the Sino-Soviet split all drawn from an exegesis of published sources. The implication was that these national leaderships were not communists per se, but Chinese and Russian communists. During the 1950s and 1960s the American Cold War paradigm of monolithic communism reigned supreme. As a consequence, the role of Chinese nationalism in coloring Chinese choices was ignored. On the contrary, in his introduction to the China White Paper in 1949, Secretary of State Acheson argued that Chinese nationalism was a strong force and that, if the U.S. would just bide its time, Chinese nationalism would eliminate Russian influence on China. Acheson argued for a policy of treating China as a Soviet lackey, pressing Beijing and Moscow together under the assumption that Chinese nationalism would corrode the relationship. By 1962 when Zagoria wrote Sino-Soviet Split Chinese nationalism had begun to erode the relationship with Russia—something Acheson predicted. By that time, however, we were in the midst of pretending there was a vast communist conspiracy.

Q: Anything special to say about that? Did it give you a chance to use some of your Chinese and your area studies?

REUTHER: Yes. The National Security Agency (NSA) provides intelligence drawn from the electro-magnetic environment to the analytical community. I joined a program designed to train mid-level managers. This was actually a very interesting experience because the Defense Department has a particular way of training people, that is, from the bottom up. They made you empty wastebaskets, you did the most mundane reports, you were assigned some of the real basic stuff. The idea being that when you become a manager and were directing the work of others, you won't be so silly and arrogant as to demand in an hour some report that you know took you two hours or longer.

But, what interested me at the time was the reaction of my fellow trainees. The 30 people hired for this program were all college graduates, but many were unable to adjust to idea that you had to know what you were talking about before you were given supervisory responsibilities. To them their college degree was a ration card to be exchanged for employment regardless of their interest or capabilities. As you can imagine, those people were weeded out rather quickly.

At NSA I had some absolutely fascinating experiences. I arrived shortly after the North Koreans attacked and seized the USS Pueblo and was assigned to an office that was still analytically cleaning up some of the aspects of that incident. I did some China work and then I came back to the Korea section and was working there when the North Koreans shot down a Navy intelligence EC-121. On Monday, April 14, at approximately 5:00 pm EST, a four-engine, propeller-driven, Navy EC-121 aircraft took off from its base at Atsugi, Japan, for a reconnaissance mission in the Sea of Japan. The aircraft had 30 Navy personnel and one Marine enlisted man aboard. Shortly before 1:00 am on Tuesday, April 15, the Department of Defense received a report that this reconnaissance aircraft had been downed over the Sea of Japan by North Korean aircraft. This became my baptism in quick response. At that time a senior Air Force NCO, who had been in electronic intelligence since North Africa in WWII, covered North Korean issues. From our small office we collated and analyzed electronic intelligence on the North Korean attack. Our primary focus was to determine the location of the American aircraft. As I recall, the path of the U.S. EC-130 carried it outside the internationally recognized 12- mile limit and that the North Koreans launched when our aircraft was even further away from North Korean air space. We provided our findings to the U.S. intelligence and diplomatic community. We also produced maps and charts, some of which were used during the UN debate of the incident. We worked straight through for about four days, just the two of us with people looking in from time to time. This was a unique and pressured situation. Nevertheless, the experience stood me in good stead during my years with the State Department when coups, crises, or interagency conflict called for a quick response and a cold head.

Q: So, somewhere along the line you must have passed the Foreign Service examination.

REUTHER: I passed the Foreign Service exam in 1967. The State Department entrance exam at that time consisted of an extensive written examination, equivalent to the college entrance SAT or graduate level GRE, and an essay. If you passed the written, then you were invited to take an oral examination. The setting was typical. Three gentlemen behind an uncluttered table, you sat in a chair in front. The interview took place on campus so I interviewed with my colleagues. By some luck of the draw, the most intelligent, academically honored, but rather egotistical, student went first. Something went terribly wrong. He left the interview distressed and slammed the door when he exited. That panicked us. If the lion couldn't succeed, what chance did we mice have?

With failure assured, I had nothing riding on this exercise and decided I would enjoy myself. There were basic questions about tracing the westward expansion of the U.S., art, and my China studies. The interviewer who participated the least suddenly asked me to tell a joke. That caught me flatfooted because I am not a joke teller. I can hardly repeat good jokes I've enjoyed! After a pregnant pause I leaned forward and offered a play on words, pointing out that some commentators were beginning to think the Chinese leader Mao Zedong was a CIA agent. Wasn't he being called the Great Helm's man? (The background is that Richard Helms was CIA Director at the time). Apparently still in active contention, I responded to a number of other questions and subjects. Among these was a what-would-you-do scenario. The basic story assumed you were stationed at a consulate in France, the local business luncheon group invites you to speak on American culture. The issue is what topic would you pick? My line of thinking was that every Frenchman knows the Americans have no culture -- except jazz and Jerry Lewis. My father, a jazz aficionado, exposed me to the great talents of that very American medium, so I dipped into his teachings. I've always thought this cross-cultural question was the most difficult of the interview and that my father's love for jazz was why I passed and was placed on the roll of prospective hires.

At that time, the strain of the Vietnam War on all federal budgets meant that the State Department was not hiring. As you know, one's eligibility on the hiring rooster is valid for only one year. Consequently to maintain eligibility one would have to repeat the exam process every year. However, during that period, on the anniversary of my passing, I received a letter saying that the Department had not hired from the eligibility list and therefore it decided to extend the eligibility of those listed. I took the exam in 1967, got that letter in 1968, and 1969. I didn't think too much of it, I had already started at NSA, married, and begun planting my feet. Another letter came in late 1969 saying that the Department was hiring but one had to go to Vietnam, into the CORDS [Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development Support] program. Newly married, working on China at NSA, I passed on the Department's offer. Early in 1970 another letter arrived offering a Foreign Service appointment without prerequisites. The next class started in April. I accepted.

Q: How much language did you have?

REUTHER: Well, I was lucky. At the end of our training we were provided a list of posts with junior officer positions and asked our preferences. My recollection is that there were only three Asian posts on the list and a Political Section job at the embassy in Thailand was as close as I could get to China. I checked Thailand and on the last day of the class, assignments were announced. Bangkok it was! Unbeknownst to me, however, State inspectors had recently completed an evaluation of the staffing in Bangkok. Their report recommended abolishing my junior officer position in the political section. So, suddenly I was in language training, but without an onward assignment. In time the embassy suggested waiting until the next Thai language position opened the following summer. That allowed me a full year of Thai study, a luxury considering junior officers were only supposed to receive six months language training.

I think one of the interesting things about Washington, going back to David Brinkley's book on wartime Washington, was its lack of major immigrant communities, such as New York or San Francisco. With the start of language training in the fall of 1970 the teachers were eager that we have an opportunity to experience Thai cuisine. But, Washington at that time had no Thai restaurants. So, the next best thing was to go to a fairly broken down Szechuan-style Chinese restaurant that had spicy food. What is remarkable is that when I returned five years later, Washington was full of Thai restaurants. Large numbers of Asian immigrants finally arrived in the Washington area.

Q: They were a notable pair, staffers from the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, I believe?

REUTHER: That's right. Richard Moose and James Lowenstein were staff investigators for the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and by the early 1970s had a reputation with the Foreign Service. As I recall, when they visited in 1972 I was alone at the consulate. Tom Barnes and the other officer were traveling. A telephone call from the embassy's Political-Military Section alerted me that Moose and Lowenstein were in Thailand and might come to Udorn. I was to be polite, but not accommodate their rumored interest in entering the Thai Air Force base at Udorn. At issue for us was that the bases we were flying from in Thailand remained under the control of Thailand. We had no status of forces agreement. The RTG [Royal Thai Government] was in total charge. It would be a violation of the arrangements between the American and Thai governments for me to assist Moose and Lowenstein to enter a Thai base.

The embassy's warning turned out to be correct. Moose and Lowenstein - I think this was 1972 - showed up in Udorn, came to the consulate and demanded that I gain them access to the Thai base and the American units it contained. They were not interested in being deflected from their task. I remember this conversation because I was threatened and insulted in ways that I had never previously experienced. The one threat that still rings in my ears was their threat to ruin my career, if they did not get their way. I may have been on my first tour in the Foreign Service, but I was a China scholar and I had heard stories in the hallways of congressional blacklists and the reality that Congress can and does destroy Foreign Service careers. What made the threat all the more believable was that you know that the highest levels of the State Department are not about to protect some first tour officer from congressional wrath. After the browbeating I took from Moose and Lowenstein, I was certain that my career was over. Others tried to cheer me up, but I lived with this fear for some weeks until nothing happened and I decided that I was too small a fish for them to waste their time on.

Q: What sort of job did you have within the political section?

REUTHER: The political section at that time was divided into two sections, external and internal reporting. The external reporting unit followed Thai attitudes towards Cambodia or ASEAN issues; Thailand's foreign policy stance, that sort of thing. There was even a China watcher. Bill Kushlis, myself, and a couple of other people were assigned to the internal reporting unit. We looked at domestic issues: we sought to identify who were the movers and shakers in the Thai system, the major political factions, and what were the personality and policy issues within the Thai bureaucracies. The Thai ministry of Interior was highly centralized and attractive to a talented Thai civil service. Because I already met a large number of Ministry of Interior officers up-country, it seemed natural to be in the internal section. My previous experience thus gave the embassy an advantage in working with the important Ministry of Interior.

I think my first few weeks in the Political Section were typical of Foreign Service political work. One of my early jobs was to write extensive political biographies on the main Thai players. I particularly remember writing on Air Vice Marshal Dawee Chunlasap. Biographic writing may not sound fascinating, but it is key to the skills of the Foreign Service. To write a bio, you have to investigate history as seen by those in the country where you are stationed. What was their view of history as they lived it and what did they take away from that experience? In Dawee's case, he was a young officer when World War II broke out. He was a member of the faction that associated itself with the United States. That faction prospered in the post-war world, vice the faction that allied with Japan. So, one quickly learns the basic lesson of diplomacy - if you don't understand the other side's history, you will miss the common elements needed to build friendships and international consensus.

Within weeks of my return from home leave in the States, Thailand was in crisis. October 16, 1973 was a day I will never forget. Since early October, the Thai student union organized anti-government demonstrations in Bangkok protesting the lack of democracy. As was oft the case, the students and their leaders represented elite academic institutions. There was considerable popular support for the students. The public provided food and blankets during the student sit-in at a central park. Suddenly, that October day, it all went sour. Shooting started. Army units associated with the son of Prime Minister Thanom shot on student marchers, so it was a pretty messy business. For the embassy, this crisis raised a number of issues. We still had a major military presence, extensive commercial interests, and a large American community. We needed to know what was going on and we needed to protect American interests without meddling in an internal Thai matter. At the time I supervised the Political Section's internal reporting unit. Our first task was the same as any media journalist, get the story and get it in the hands of our Washington leadership with dispatch so that the Department could make the policy determinations. We had officers from every section of the embassy working in our crisis center or out on the street during the gunfire. I remember one of the military attachés put on this loud Hawaiian shirt and had one for his son, and the two of them got into his radio-equipped car and went to where the shooting was. They would pose as two lost tourists, poke around a little bit, and then return to the car and radio in what they saw. About 150 people were massacred and many more injured. It was just one mess, just incredible. Everything was rumored, and we had to chase down every rumor. We had to keep vacationing GIs and American tourists out of harm's way. The consular section people called hotels to pass the word and be alert to missing tourists. We ran a 24-hour operation for days.

Q: The military had not tried to come back into power yet?

REUTHER: That's right, they had not. That would come later. There would be another confrontation between the students and the military in 1976. That confrontation forced some student leaders to join the guerrillas in the bush. Later, the insurgency collapsed. The students were uncomfortable in the jungle, the Chinese withdrew their support, the Vietnamese were occupied elsewhere and the insurgency always lacked a claim to Thai nationalism.

Q: Well, perhaps it would have been better if Saddam Hussein had gotten the ornamental pistol, instead of some of the other weapons that he came to acquire in the later period.

Let's move ahead. After you left the Secretariat Staff, I believe you moved to the Office of Chinese Affairs as an economic officer. Tell me a little bit about that. That was a period from 1979-81, the end of the Carter Administration and the beginning of Reagan Administration.

REUTHER: While assigned to Secretary Vance's office, the Carter Administration completed the task of normalizing diplomatic relations with China. The Administration closely held this decision. The January 1979 normalization was as much a surprise to many inside the Department as those outside. With normalization came an expansion of officers assigned to the new Office of Chinese and Mongolian Affairs and I was invited to join the China desk. At that time, the China Desk Office Director was Chas Freeman. The office was divided into two sections: political and economic. I was assigned to the economic half, under Jerry Ogden, and had responsibility for Sino-American economic relations, including export control issues and liaison with Murray Zinoman in OES (Bureau of Oceans, Environment, and Science) on science and technology issues.

Normalization presented an unprecedented opportunity. Chas Freeman, as you know, was office director at that time and his oral history should be perused for important guidance on this period. He is talented, a gifted linguist, and one of the few officers involved in the initial breakthrough in the early 1970s.

He had thought deeply about what it meant to reestablish relations with Beijing. In addition to easily anticipated foreign policy issues, the State Department itself had to prepare for the new relationship. One of the consequences for the Foreign Service of the previous policy of only recognizing Taipei was that the Taipei embassy provided a limited number of positions for Chinese language speaking officers. The post-normalization Foreign Service, which would have to staff an embassy and numerous consulates, needed language capable officers. Checking with Personnel we determined that Chinese language training for younger officers was one of the things that had lapsed over the years because of budget circumstances, lack of need, and the unintended foreign policy signal training a fair number of officers would have sent. There was a sizable number of older officers with Chinese, but precious few younger officers. Even at that, the Department had Chinese language slots in Manila, Bangkok, and Hong Kong, as a method maintaining a cadre of Chinese speaking officers. With diplomatic recognition, the numbers were totally inadequate, so one of Chas' first objectives was to press Personnel and FSI for more Chinese language training. We had an embassy and consulates to staff. Now, if one were just staffing a country like France -- where there are good newspapers, adequate roads, a modern transportation system -- an embassy and a consulate or two might be adequate to understand national trends. But, China is a vast, continental, developing country with primitive transportation and communication networks. So, if you were to find out what was happening you had to be in those places. For comparison, look at German or British embassy staffing in the continental United States. The U.S. is a modern, sophisticated country and excellent media facilities, yet the Europeans just don't rely on an embassy in Washington, but have the United States covered by numerous consulates.

Q: How about on the economic trade side. Was there much business community interest? Were you involved in negotiating agreements? Were you analyzing the Chinese economy? What sort of work did you do?

REUTHER: All of the above. The establishment of diplomatic relations meant replacing the previous tight embargo with trade. To answer the question what sort of market might China be, one of the first things we did was to commission our in-house Intelligence and Research Bureau to conduct some studies for us. I remember one of the questions put to them was, if China were to acquire a telephone network equivalent to Italy or Spain, mid-level European, what would it require? The answer was that it would require the world's production of copper for the next five years to wire China like a mid-level European country. Obviously, if China bought all of the world's copper, prices would skyrocket. So, it was to the U.S. advantage not to have this largest, last, undeveloped country setting traditional modernization goals. Fortunately, satellite technology was at hand, but if the stringent export control laws scared away U.S. business, we would have no commercial relationship, a weak Chinese economy, and potential supply and price problem in the international economy. With this in mind then, we encouraged American companies to consider offering satellite technology.

Of course, such an effort collided with the encrusted export control laws that applied to China. Over the previous 30 years, many a freshman congressman demonstrated his anti-Communist mettle by sponsoring anti-Chinese legislation. The result hardly left any room for any significant trade. There was a need to communicate both to the Congress and the business community that the government was serious about encouraging trade. Our office drafted speeches and sought fora, such as the U.S.-China Business Relations Council, to communicate that the U.S. Government supported trade and encouraged business to sell items for which it earlier could not obtain export licenses.

At the time of normalization our export control laws placed China and the Soviet Union in one category, Yugoslavia, in recognition of Tito's break with Stalin, in another. Written this way, the law assumed that the Chinese would potentially divert any purchase to Moscow, and that any sale to China, became a precedent for a sale to the Soviet Union. One of the most acrimonious aspects of interagency implementation of the new relationship with China was overcoming these presumptions. The whole geopolitical basis of the opening to China was that Washington and Beijing were anti-Soviet! To Chas and others it was obvious that if other bureaucracies dragged their feet implementing existing export control regulations, then trade with China was problematic. In time, because of our interagency delays, we rewrote the export control regulations to remove China from the same category as the Soviet Union. The export control issue took enormous amounts of our time as either we or our principles fought these issues in interagency fora. In time, the Chinese realized little was coming out the pipeline and at high level meetings we began to receive queries from the Chinese as to this project or that computer. Two of the largest issues revolved around the Landsat II Ground station and the Western Geophysical computer for oil exploration. To State, China's economy was so needful that diversion to non-economic purposes was a remote chance were we willing to take. Defense fought us well into the next Administration. We tried to establish export control guidelines for equipment, especially computers: typical graduations were - some low level where U.S. companies threw stuff away (but above current technical limits for sale to China); a low mid-range for which we wanted a presumption of sale; and a high-mid range for which no presumption of sale was warranted and every case reviewed individually.

Even these attempts didn't streamline our deliberations. I remember one seemingly simple case, I think it was of a y level medical diagnostic equipment on which DOD kept stalling. Finally, we tried to create a deadline and get a straight answer from them as to the problem. Turned out that some Army lab in New Jersey owned the earlier version of this equipment and wasn't about to approve it for sale to China until they got the budget to buy a replacement for themselves! With the exposure that the problem was not a level of technology issue, but a budget issue for that lab, we obtained consensus for the sale. Export control remained a contentious interagency issue.

Q. How else did you go about building a relationship with China?

REUTHER: If the first element of our approach was to encourage U.S. business, the second element was to demonstrate to the Chinese that the U.S. sought a full and productive relationship. The trade embargo was only a symptom of the extent to which the United States worked over the years to totally isolate China. While China was a member of the UN after the early 1970s, it certainly was not a major economic or international actor. It might have trade relations with France or the United Kingdom, but let's face it, the United States is the premier world power and American acceptance meant international acceptance in a manner China had not enjoyed since 1949. So, one of our objectives was to look for areas in which we could engage our two countries in responsible, normal, commercial, and diplomatic endeavors. An analogy we used at the time was that there was great hole in the ground that was a lack of Chinese contact with the U.S., and our job was to fill that hole.

So, we approached this task from a number of angles. China was still a centralized economy dominated by significant bureaucracies. How to engage each bureaucracy and give its personnel insights into the workings of a consumer economy? China's association with European economies was insufficient experience for it to connect with the American economy. The American economy was in the midst of deregulation. Unlike the Europeans, we did not have a national airline, or shipping company. We knew the U.S. economy would 'feel' different to the Chinese.

One of our first steps was to negotiate a maritime treaty, for example. That is a fascinating little case study. The State Department's Economics Bureau has a maritime office. Because of its specialized knowledge of maritime issues, it was the lead negotiator for the American side. Of course, our delegation included other government agencies with equities in this issue. There were representatives from Defense, Transportation, Treasury, and others.

With the negotiating team set, we invited the Chinese to Washington. Setting an American venue was very important to us at that time because we wanted to use this opportunity to increase the pool of Chinese officials who had visited the U.S. The penalty for the years of no contact was that Chinese officials had never seen the United States, had no idea how big it was, no idea of our consumer economy and certainly little understanding of our technological advancement. Nothing like an American hotel room or barbecue invitation to a private home to underscore an important message. The Chinese may have visited Europe, but if they only thought the United States was a little bit bigger than France, or like Germany, then they weren't getting the whole picture. So, we were quite eager to invite their teams here as an educational experience.

In this vein you will recall that Deng Xiaoping came to the United States in early 1979. I had not yet taken up my Chinese Desk assignment, but my understanding is that our organization of his schedule was designed to educate him about the size and variety of the U.S. I believe his schedule had him stopping in Hawaii first, and then on to Washington. From there he went to Texas and California. The point of the exercise was not for him to come into the West Coast and do serially West Coast, Texas, Washington and maybe out through Europe or something like that. We wanted him to fly across the United States twice assuming that sitting in that plane five hours would give him a physical understanding of the size and majesty of the United States.

So, we began negotiating a maritime agreement. The first problem was our own legislation which forbade port access to Soviet Bloc countries. But then, wasn't that the key political-strategic factor, China was no longer a Soviet satellite? Of course, in reviewing which ports we would offer to open, in close cooperation with our colleagues at Defense, we undertook a considerable effort to balanced commercial ports with those which may have had naval facilities adjacent to them. We wanted a clear appreciation of our national security and economic interests.

The Chinese, for their own requirements, wanted the final list of Chinese and American ports to be of equal length. This was not easy. The U.S. has three coasts, China one. I remember collaborating with Navy representatives and comparing size, water depth, etc. of the Chinese ports with our ports. It made considerable economic sense for Los Angeles to be on our list and Darien to be on theirs. For face purposes, the two lists of ports are equal, but their list included ports of no particular interest to us because they were too small for U.S. merchant vessels. Nevertheless, we also believed the Chinese port list reflected a signal from the central government to the local governments, and the country as a whole, that opening the country to foreign trade was government policy. Considering the Qing Dynasty efforts to thwart western trade 140 years earlier, the openness of the Chinese position and its connection with its own domestic reform was remarkable.

Q: Were they equally interested in the Gulf coast as well as the West Coast?

REUTHER: At the time a primary product in Sino-American trade was American grain. Economic reform in China coincided with an extraordinary decision to feed the Chinese coastal cities with imported grain. It was cheaper and unburdened the Chinese rail system. So the mouths of the Mississippi and the Columbia rivers were of interest. In terms of industrial trade, of course, Beijing sought access to the southeast and southwest coasts. Part of our objective was to build bridges with the Chinese and overcome the years of separation. In addition to problem solving, we wanted to create scenarios where they would have to talk to us, have to visit us, exchange with us, begin to understand our requirements, the unique aspects of the U.S. market, etc.

The other economic issue of high priority for us was an aviation agreement. An aviation agreement provided immediate economic and cultural benefits for American business, tourists and academics.

Q: Deregulation had started?

REUTHER: Yes, deregulation of the American market had started. Between our deregulation and the Chinese, like all of Europe, with its national flag carrier, we entered these negotiations from two different perspectives. The Chinese already had negotiated a number of civil aviation agreements with Japan and the Europeans by the time their high- ranking team came to Washington. Again, the Department's Economics Bureau, which had an aviation office, headed the American delegation. As with the maritime agreement, the Department of Transportation, Treasury, FAA, and the military were involved.

During these negotiations I heard one of the best advertisements for Boeing airplanes that I have heard in years. During the 1972-79 period, we allowed the Chinese to fly commercial aircraft into the United States on a one-time basis, if they had a U.S. military crewman in the cabin. One of these officers was the Air Force representative to our civil aviation delegation. He told of one flight, which he said was typical of the minimal skills of the Chinese pilots, into Los Angeles. He swore that when the aircraft was five feet off the ground, the Chinese pilot reversed the engines and the plane fell onto the runway. The landing gear absorbed this tremendous impact and nothing untoward happened. After that experience, this air force captain said he loved Boeing quality.

And there were other stories. When the Chinese were going to New York in those days, they had no experience with heavy traffic and the requirement to circle, waiting one's turn to land. Normally, New York air traffic controllers create two stacks of airplanes to safely separate the aircraft and prioritize landings. The Chinese pilots' inexperience with these procedures created a special burden for New York air traffic controllers. Apparently it got to the point that, when the Chinese aircraft arrived, the air traffic controllers pulled all the stacks away from New York, brought him down, and then returned to normal procedures. This story, however, isn't about safety. It's about Chinese inexperience with a commercial economy and the multiple ways in which we could develop a productive relationship with China. We believed it was to our advantage to expose them to how we handled these kinds of problems. China and the United States, as large continental economies and therefore have a great deal in common, particularly the scale of the economic and social issues we both face. Our problems are on a much more vast scale than those facing the Europeans.

Civil aviation was another venue for an interaction in which standards and technical parameters would be exchanged, and ultimately the benefits of American equipment and procedures extolled. At that moment, the Chinese commercial aviation was in its infancy, few planes were in the air, safety relied on the lack of planes in the air. The Chinese piloting experience was to get airborne, be assigned a very small slice of air space (by the military which controlled the sky), get to his destination and be brought down. Every time we exposed them to our system, we were educating, building expectations.

The civil aviation negotiations were interesting because the Chinese brought with them their standard bilateral civil aviation agreement. It was quite inadequate because it assumed both countries had national airlines. During our initial meetings we explained at great length that there was no U.S. national airline. We had numerous airline companies. We described how we allocated routes through a bidding process. The Chinese were absolutely flabbergasted. How could a country like the United States not have a national airline? In their lobbying effort, the PanAm representatives took advantage of the Chinese presumption, saying, in essence: "Don't listen to what the government guys tell you. We are the U.S. national airline. Remember, we served China in the '30s..." In fact, some of the officials in the Chinese aviation system were mechanics with PanAm in the old days, so the PanAm name resonated. The prime American bidders for the routes to China were PanAm and Northwest. PanAm gained an advantage with its nostalgic presentation. The Chinese support for the PanAm bid, to the extent the Chinese were unfamiliar with aviation trends in the U.S., in part reflected the success of our embargo which kept them on the periphery of world trends.

Q: PanAm and Northwest actually participated in the discussions?

REUTHER: As with many of these negotiations, there is an official delegation and industrial representatives. On one hand, the industrial representatives acted as resources for our delegation, but did not participate in the bilateral discussion. On the other, they had full access to the opposite delegation. They hosted some of the meals, privately met with the Chinese delegation and made their own presentations to them. It would be interesting to get the Chinese to tell us what they thought of that whole thing.

Our effort, again, was to try to educate them as to how we operated, why we had so many airlines, why we were so big, how the whole thing worked, because we saw these early meetings with China as methods to educate them as to what we were about.

Q: During this time did you have an opportunity to visit China, or were you pretty much working on the interagency and negotiating side in Washington?

REUTHER: Actually I took my first trip to China at that time. Included in my portfolio of responsibilities was what we called science and technology (S&T). International cooperation in S&T evolved from a concern for controlling the technology of mass destruction and the budding environmental movement. The White House had an S & T office. During the Carter Administration, Frank Press headed that office. The relevant State Department organization was the Bureau for Oceans, Environmental and Scientific Affairs (OES). Again, we saw scientific cooperation with the Chinese as a method of contacting their educational system, generating immediate benefits for both sides and subtly educating them about ourselves. Science and technology exchanges with the Chinese were in fact a very major part of our bridge building program. There was an umbrella S&T agreement with China and under that there were a large number of individual protocols which again sought to fill the void between the two countries. Our objective was to reverse the many years of suspicion and no contact.

My first trip to Beijing was as the State Department escort officer to the annual S&T conference. The conference created a useful deadline for putting the final touches on various agreements under negotiation and a ceremonial focus for the overall relationship. As this was my first trip to a country I had studied from afar, rather disparate images stand out today. The trip took place in January a particularly cold month for northern China. We were invited to a piano concert. The weather forced one to wear an overcoat in transit, but what I didn't realize was that this vast, first-rate (to the Chinese) auditorium was not heated. Absolutely everybody there looked like a buffalo wrapped up as best as they could. The poor piano player was probably freezing his fingers off.

Q: Did we have an ambassador then?

REUTHER: Yes. Ambassador Woodcock.

Q: Who came from the labor union.

REUTHER: Right, the UAW. He had a long time interest in China. In fact, with normalization, things Chinese were all the rage. Major department stores, such as Macy's, had exclusive sales of Chinese products and Chinese influenced designs. It is interesting how Americans flock to fads. One day I took a phone call from a major mid- West manufacturing company. The caller noted that his boss recently finished a golf game during which he heard, at length, about his partner's trip to China. Could we recommend even more exotic Chinese destinations in preparation for the next golf game? One-upmanship in executive travel, if you will, which is absolutely hilarious because China had meager facilities for tourism at that time. It was all quite spartan. These and other travelers had no idea of how desperately inadequate the Chinese facilities were at the time. But, everybody had overly romanticized China.

Q: Well, there had been a long period, of course, of estrangement between the United States and China and to some extent China and the rest of the world...the Cultural Revolution and all that long period...and certainly there was an excitement at the thought of interacting with China. I can remember being on a panel discussion with you, Dave, in January 1981, I think, and you were stressing how important China was for the 1980s and the need for the Reagan and Bush administrations to deal with some important issues with China. I was talking a lot about Europe in the same panel but I think you were right that China was on the front burner and should have been.

Unless there is something else you want to say about that time as the economic officer on the China desk, maybe we should move on to your next assignment, which I believe was to the American Institute in Taiwan in 1981. I think you were there for four years or so. You were chief of the political section. Would you like to say something about the unique arrangement of the Institute not being an embassy?

REUTHER: Certainly a lot has been written about the way in which we organized ourselves in 1979 to assure a proper relationship with Taipei. It appeared to me that the Japanese precedent was in the minds of the American players. The Japanese in 1972 recognized Beijing and established an unofficial office in Taipei called the Japanese Interchange Office. Taipei had an unofficial office in Tokyo. Taiwan used to be a Japanese colony. Taiwan and Japan had important personal, business, and educational ties that they wanted to preserve. The Japanese unofficial relationship worked. When we came on the same decision-point, we saw an advantage to the precedent the Japanese had set. I think there are minor differences, reflecting unique aspects of our law and customs. We told Beijing in our negotiations that we were going to do this and whatever their objections they would just have to table them. Beijing may not have liked it, but it found the arrangement acceptable. So, coming out of Washington I was first assigned to Chinese language training, 1981-83.

Q: Now, you had already had some Chinese before, but you pretty much had to go through the whole program because you didn't have any experience speaking.

REUTHER: Exactly. My previous language training was in academia, which, because American scholars couldn't go to China, was basically training for research purposes. Diplomatic use of language necessarily assumes face to face conversation.

Q: The second year was in Taiwan, in Taipei?

REUTHER: In Taipei. By that time the language school, previously located in Taichung in central Taiwan had moved to Taipei. The pre-normalization American presence in Taiwan was extensive and included a fair military presence. There could be no military presence under an unofficial relationship. The departure of the military left us with this vast housing pool in Taiwan. Instead of having facilities throughout Taiwan, we consolidated basic functions into the housing area on Yangming Shan, a mountain in a northeastern suburb of Taipei.

I finished the second year of language training in 1983 and took up my duties as the Chief of the General Affairs Section of the American Institute on Taiwan.

Q: Dave, we got you out of language training and into the job at the American Institute in Taiwan. You were there from 1983-85 and chief of the political section. Tell me what sorts of things were going on in Taiwan in those days? They were still, I'm sure reacting a bit to normalization of our relationship with Beijing. Was that your primary focus or was it more internal political developments within Taiwan itself?

REUTHER: Actually there were a number of aspects to it. On the one hand our primary mission, since we were still close emotionally to normalization, was to make the idea of the unofficial relationship work. For their part, the authorities on Taiwan spent all their time trying to prove to themselves and their public that we had an official relationship. For two years we engaged in a running game of thrust and parry with the local authorities. For example, Taiwan's unofficial counterpart to AIT was the Coordination Council for North American Affairs (CCNAA). It had an office in Washington (and other American cities) and one in Taipei with which we conducted liaison as if it were the "foreign ministry." Publicly we were seen working with CCNAA which was housed in a separate building a few blocks from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. In fact, we worked closely with talented and patriotic officials at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, but in unofficial venues. At one point, for their domestic reasons, the authorities on Taiwan told us that they would move CCNAA into offices on the backside of the building that housed the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. This would create a situation where, if you will, the address for the ministry is 1500 Third Street, but the address for the opposite side of the same building was 1500 First Street. Despite their arguments of efficiency and obtuseness (the CCNAA and MFA addresses would be different), their intent was to impart the appearance of officiality to the relationship. We begged them not to tinker with the symbols of unofficiality, and they finally dropped this idea.

This game of imparting officiality into the relationship dominated the two years I was in Taipei. Our objective was not to put Taiwan down. The reality was that we could have as robust a relationship with Taiwan as we desired, as long as we kept it unofficial, meaning out of the public eye. A public event would force Beijing to notice; otherwise Beijing would turn a diplomatic blind eye.

Taipei needed the appearance of officiality for the Kuomintang-dominated government to justify its hold on power. The rationale for KMT rule was that it was the government of all of China. In partial proof, there was a national government on Taiwan and a provincial government. Because Taipei needed the psychological boost of officiality, incidents arose from time to time where Taipei would steal a march on us. After our long years of association, Taipei was familiar with American practices and weaknesses. I recall one day seeing a picture on the front page of the local newspaper of an American military officer, in uniform, at a medical conference. The local authorities had invited an officer from a military medical corps, at their expense, to a conference in Taipei. They knew that in encouraging him to wear a uniform, a symbol of sovereignty and hence sovereign recognition, the officer was violating U.S. policy. My office spent the day calling the major hotels in town, tracking the officer down, and getting him out of town. So, one mark on the wall for them.

Since 1979 the authorities on Taiwan sought to make the relationship as official as possible, and we sought to maintain an unofficial relationship. The ultimate audience for this thrust and parry was not the international community or friends in America. At issue for the authorities on Taiwan was their domestic legitimacy which they had tied to their claim to be the government of all of China. For them these exchanges had an edge, yet I think both sides exhibited professionalism and good humor. That's the point. It is the role of diplomacy to manage disagreements and insure that small conflicts do not snowball into major issues.

In the early 1980s, the issue of the Republic of China's position in the Asian Development Bank [ADB] was an illustration of the tension between the KMT and the Taiwanese. Up to this time, the KMT position was that if its rival, the People's Republic of China, joined an international organization, then the ROC would leave. This made sense within the paradigm of the "One China" issue. Neither the CCP or the KMT wanted to establish a circumstance in which both were represented, no two Chinas, no one China, one Taiwan. Of course, this policy left the KMT isolated internationally. The Taiwanese political opposition, starting with the Presbyterian Church's declaration of 1972, argued that the hardline KMT position was isolating the island. Moderate KMT forces were seeking a way to undercut the Taiwanese criticism. So, domestic and international politics came together over the status of the ROC in the ADB.

Q: But what was the role of AIT in all this?

REUTHER: Actually, we played a number of roles which are illustrative of what foreign service work is all about. First, we did extensive reporting on how the various factions in Taiwan thought about the representation issue at the ADB in Manila. We talked to government officials, Taiwanese politicians, and business people. Second, with Director Lilley in the head, AIT Taipei, we were making a number of suggestions of how the issue of the ROC's representation could be handled. This was important because there were actors on the U.S. side, in Congress and in the Executive Branch, whose support of the KMT position complicated the discussions. Ultimately, I think the KMT moderates won a major victory. The ROC stayed in the ADB as "China, Taipei," a formula that opened up renewed ROC participation in a number of organizations and especially the Olympics. But I don't think the record of the internal KMT debates is well documented yet.

Q: Handling an issue such as ADB membership, didn't that involve contact with the authorities on Taiwan at the highest level?

REUTHER: It certainly did and I think part of Director Lilley's contribution, and our efforts in GAS, was to restore a productive association with the KMT. One consequence of the change of relations in 1979, of course, was a much less intimate relationship with the elite, the Kuomintang. I don't remember whether the heads of the American Institute in Taiwan ever did see Chiang Ching-kuo, who was the president at that time. By 1983 he was advanced in age and ill with diabetes and other complications. As a consequence, he was not as readily available to AIT's senior staff.

Q: Were you in meetings with other senior government officials?

REUTHER: Yes, all the time.

Q: Who was the head of the American Institute at that time?

REUTHER: Jim Lilley was the Director when I arrived but left shortly thereafter. He was very well liked and did an excellent, discrete job. Familiar with the Chinese cultural context, he enjoyed superb contacts at the highest levels and performed an outstanding job on both political and commercial issues. He did much to repair the frayed edges of our altered relationship and projected confidence and sincerity in the strength of the unofficial relationship. After a short hiatus, career Foreign Service officer Harry Thayer arrived as Director.

As we moved away from 1979, our relationship with the government authorities stabilized. Taiwan was also changing and the nature of our political work shifted. In addition to myself, there were three other officers in the General Affairs Section. One of them covered what we called the tangwai, or outside the party, that is, the political opposition to the ruling Kuomintang. I covered the Kuomintang. Because of the break in relations, our normal contacts with the Kuomintang had atrophied. AIT had good relations with the economic and the commercial offices of the government and the business community, but not with the ruling party. So, my job for the next two years was to reestablish the relationship with the Kuomintang. When my predecessor introduced me to his contacts, there were no Kuomintang officials at these 'hail and farewell' receptions. Circumstances in Taipei called for a special effort. Normally one arrives at post and your predecessor introduces you to the people he knew and that you are going to be working with. You in turn maintain those relationships and perhaps add a few new people. So, I spent the next two years working on AIT's contacts with the Kuomintang. When I departed post, the third ranking official in the party gave me a heart felt farewell party. Through diligence, perseverance and the fruits of two years of language training, we successfully reestablished a friendly and professional relationship.

Q: Of course, the problem for your predecessor at least partly was that that was very soon after the change of relationship.

REUTHER: Oh, absolutely, in fact, that is quite the point. I was the first officer to arrive who had no relationship with the events of 1979. In 1979, the Department gave people stationed in Taipei the option of staying or departing right away and two officers in the political section, Mark Pratt and Stan Ifshin, decided to stay. They were extremely talented and capable officers of the highest order and chose to stay and do what they could to work through the changed relationship. But to the same extent, they were sort of tainted by the break in 1979. I was the first person to head GAS without any connection to normalization.

Q: Well, it is hard to transform yourself to really in effect be a transition when you are identified, symbolically at least, with the previously situation. I noticed in your sheet here that you did report on democratization of Taiwan. You just talked about liaison with the government party, a pretty strong party, and I don't know how strong the opposition was.

REUTHER: In fact, one of the key things that was happening in Taiwan at that time was a consequence of the January 1979 change in diplomatic relations. The political opposition saw derecognition as damaging to the ruling party's claim to power. It argued that even the Americans have walked out on the KMT; that Taiwan was isolated, weak, and in danger of being turned over to Beijing because of KMT claims to be the government of all China. The end result of increased opposition pressure and derecognition was the Kaohsiung demonstrations on Human Rights Day in December 1979. The entire leadership of the opposition was in Kaohsiung on that day. The government trapped the opposition into a street riot and used that circumstance to crush it. One individual, because he was ill and couldn't make the rally, was the only tangwai leader not rounded up. Also swept up in the government crackdown and tried in military court was the leadership of the Presbyterian Church of Taiwan. So from 1979 on, the worst aspects of the authoritarian government that had been in place since 1949 exhibited itself. Underlining the significance of these events, on the anniversary of the February 1947 massacre of Taiwanese protesting KMT rule, the family of one of the defendants was slaughtered in its home.

Q: The trial was before you arrived?

REUTHER: Right. The trial was during 1980. When I arrived everyone was in jail, the family was murdered, and little incidents denoting pressure on the opposition happened from time to time. For example, a visiting Chinese-American scholar fell off a five-story building while in police custody.

Q: Was this Henry Liu?

REUTHER: No, that was Chen Wen-cheng.

Q: Tell us about that.

REUTHER: With the 1979 round up of the political opposition, the hard-liners dominated the KMT and it entered a new period of repression. Of course, it is not always clear whether acts were committed on orders or by zealous lieutenants. Henry Liu was a KMT-trained political warfare officer, who worked as a journalist, had fallen out of favor with the KMT, and was in the process of writing a biography of Chiang Ching-kuo. The biography was supposedly very critical.

Q: And, he was an American citizen.

REUTHER: Well, at least a green card holder.

Q: But, living in Taiwan.

REUTHER: No, he was living in the United States. He knew he couldn't go back to Taiwan. He was researching this book and some of the people that he was talking to were partisan foes of the government. A group came to the United States in 1984 and assassinated him in his garage in a town outside of San Francisco. There is an excellent book by Kaplan, Fires of the Dragon that gives a fairly good description of the circumstances surrounding this murder.

What is interesting about this event is that it appears to have become a turning point in the way the KMT governed Taiwan. It is my impression that the younger, American educated members of the Kuomintang--those who had been pushing for elections and similar procedures to keep the party in power rather than the strong-armed tactics--were quite upset that they were a party to this murder. They didn't feel it was part of their self-identification. Mainly Mainlanders, they were not willing to see the Taiwanese opposition come to power, but they thought different tools were available to the KMT; that it could base its legitimacy on its success in economic policy. Oddly enough, there were signs of the system loosening, simultaneously with these murders. The KMT lifted censorship in the movies and a number of Taiwan films won awards at Asian film festivals. One USIA officer, Joe Moyle, was particularly close to the film industry. From time to time we would have special showings of movies that handled sensitive social subjects.

The point to make here is that Henry Liu's murder polarized opinion within the KMT. Just as the conservatives used the Chungli election in 1977 to dominate the moderates and went on to stage the 1979 Kaohsiung incident; the moderates gained from Liu's murder. It appears to have been a decision point that moved Taiwan to democracy. Ed Winkler, an academic, wrote an article in the fall of 1984 arguing that politics on Taiwan were moving from hard authoritarianism to soft authoritarianism. This article was published two months before Henry Liu was murdered. Without the murder, Winkler's conclusions would have been premature, but he may have been drawing on the stirring of these American-educated officials who had little influence at the time he was writing, but whose softer line would predominate in the wake of the Liu murder.

REUTHER: A little premature. Chiang Ching-kuo is an absolutely fascinating personality and an excellent biography needs to be done about him because his role in the political transformation of Taiwan is not well understood. He has had so many organizational responsibilities in his career that observers project his organizational roles as his personal beliefs. He first came to Taiwan as a strict enforcer of the security system. Later he was in charge of the China Youth Corps and may have realized very early that if the KMT was going to survive on Taiwan, it needed a Taiwanese patina. Nevertheless, the Mainlander dominated KMT began its rule by trying to convert the Taiwanese into Mainlanders. The Taiwanese language was banned in the airwaves; quota systems were introduced in the school system; your registration card identified you as either Mainlander or Taiwanese. Chiang, however, may have realized that the army, and then the party, in time would exhaust the pool of Mainlanders. This realization probably led to the Taiwanization of the upper reaches of the KMT and government, which all Taiwan watchers, and we in our turn, observed and reported. When a cabinet shuffle would occur, when the Kuomintang would have a standing committee election, Chiang would add one or more Taiwanese, generally balanced by Mainlander appointments, but slowly resulting in increasing numbers of Taiwanese in positions of influence. After each of these events, GAS submitted a cable explaining the significance of creeping Taiwanization. We would add that our interlocutors characterized the Taiwanese appointees as younger, Western educated, and more talented. Young, American educated Mainlanders suggested they and their Taiwanese counterparts were the group Chiang increasingly relied upon. In any event, we saw the process of Taiwanization of the KMT was preliminary to the democratization of Taiwan.

Our reporting from Taiwan focused on a couple of subjects. We watched the Taiwanization of the party. We watched the impact of the western educated technocrats in the economic arena. We also reported on the tangwai, the political opposition, most of which was still in jail serving their Kaohsiung incident sentences. Their wives, however, took up the challenge and rode their husbands' martyrdom to subsequent electoral victories. We extensively spoke to, and reported on, the activities of these opposition leaders.

The Taiwan opposition could be divided between those in exile in Japan and the United States and the tangwai on the island. Despite the government line that the political opposition (meaning the exiles) was a hair's breath from sedition and terrorism, on the island, the two sides played a sophisticated fencing match that defined the boundary for tangwai activity. This was particularly evident in the media field. The opposition was not allowed to own a newspaper, but it could publish magazines. From time to time, the Garrison Command, the premier security agency at the time, closed down the magazines. So, members of the opposition would register a number of magazine names. When the Garrison Command closed one title, for some article mentioning Chiang Ching-kuo's secret fortune or half brother Chiang Wei-kuo's activities, the opposition would return the next month under a new name. This ballet was interesting to watch. Sometimes Garrison Command would let the tangwai distribute an issue and then ban the magazine (collecting copies for sale, but in fact allowing some distribution); sometimes they closed it down at the printing shop. This was a great cat and mouse game in which each side tested the other. In an entrepreneurial spirit, sometimes the opposition would start a rumor that the next issue was going to be banned in order to boost sales.

AIT, and the embassy before it, had long reported on political events on Taiwan. What we were watching was new because the jailing of the opposition leader unified the movement (to the extent squabbling leaders were in jail) and handled it an excellent issue to proselytize the population. I should also note that the U.S. Congress was paying more attention to internal dynamics on Taiwan during the 1980s. Congressmen Solarz from New York visited Taiwan and publicly identify himself with the opposition. His attention assisted their cause and gave them some cover. I recall accompanying him to a speaking engagement at a Taipei hotel. His address was not as remarkable as the opportunity for the opposition to meet without being arrested. It was interesting to note that the tangwai provided its own strict security on this occasion. For those who look at the democratization of Taiwan for clues to the possible democratization of Mainland China, note that the consequences of trade (not only in generating wealth, but training entrepreneurial skills) and American education are far more important than human rights posturing by foreigners.

Q: It was a very interesting period both in terms of U.S. relations, if you will, with Taiwan and in the light of normalization with the Peoples Republic in 1979, but also in terms of what was happening in Taiwan, itself. Of course you were on the political side, but we haven't talked about the economic side but the economy was booming, trade was prospering.

REUTHER: Trade was booming, substantial numbers of American businesses were in Taiwan, encouraged in the early years by U.S. aid programs, American investment and trade opportunities. Although my immediate responsibilities were political, I made an effort to go to the American Chamber of Commerce breakfasts and meetings to gather a sense from them about what was going on economically and politically. The Chamber was very active and a number of individual American businessmen had been in Taiwan for years. I particularly remember a couple of business issues. Most businesses were tied to their American home offices by increasingly sophisticated telecommunications. Garrison Command regulated communications and had set a maximum baud transmission speed so that it could easily intercept and read any traffic. By the early 1980s, however, contemporary equipment had long exceeded Taiwan's allowable transmission speed. Home offices were complaining to their managers on Taiwan. While the companies improved company-wide speeds, their circuits to Taiwan were comparatively slower and, in some cases, required separate circuits. The issue for the resident business people was do they just upgrade their equipment and not inform the local authorities or seek permission? The justification for 'do and don't tell' was in appreciation of the Chinese cultural context: not directly asking saved face. Asking guaranteed a negative response. I forgot how it turned out.

I was impressed with the economic progress evident on Taiwan. Of course, the island's entrepreneurial spirit had its positive and negative consequences. American Chamber of Commerce (AmCham) members from time to time would express concern about losing good mid-level managers. Because of the open economy, lax intellectual property rights regulations and 'can-do' attitude among the Taiwanese, American companies often faced a situation where a trusted local middle manager would learn some part of the company's manufacturing process and then set himself up in business making a clone of that item, often at a cheaper price.

Another entrepreneurial story. During language training we traveled around the island and practiced conducting interviews. Once, we stopped at a substantial shoe manufacturing facility, I think in Taichung. The Taiwanese owner was making good money, but he knew nothing about design or fashion issues. During our interview, it became clear he had an arrangement with a Japanese trading firm from which he received patterns, dies and tools. He manufactured shoes to order for the Japanese trading company that sold to the American market. I have seen little academic writing about the role of Japan in post-war economic developments on Taiwan.

Q: If the economy was booming, the society must have been changing...?

REUTHER: There were a number of things happening in Taiwan. I think somebody ought to research, for example, Taiwan films at this time. During the 1980s the Kuomintang allowed the Taiwan film industry to move away from a very sterile period to producing innovative and interesting pieces. I recall the Taiwan directors even started to win awards at Hong Kong film festivals. The appearance of creative films was the result, in part, of a process where the senior KMT leadership was looking for opportunities to give the new American-trained party members experience. The KMT was a bureaucracy; members worked their way up and proved their loyalty and competence along the way. At the time I was there, it seemed that the leadership started some of the American educated people in the cultural directorate. What these new people did was to loosen restrictions on the movie people and allowed them to be creative.

On the sociological side, Taiwan was the richest Chinese society in human history. But Chinese cultural history and embedded social signals assumed a traditional marginal economic (primarily agricultural) existence. Some in the KMT were concerned that, to the extent that traditional culture might lead people to dissipate their wealth, the KMT began a newspaper based “Ann Landers” column to inculcate new social signals. The message in part was puritanical, invest wisely and stay out of the bars. I often met young Taiwanese businessmen who owned two or three substantial businesses and were now channeling their wealth into mistresses or dance halls. Was this culture or a lack of alternative investment opportunities?

Apparently, as political and social changes accumulated, the ground was shifting under the KMT. I remember being told in all seriousness by a ranking Kuomintang official, that the Americans underestimated KMT factionalism. He argued that one of the reasons for going slowly on democratization was otherwise the KMT would shatter into small parties and lose the reins of power. He was certain rapid democratization would lead to chaos. Perhaps, while there were limits on our ability to see KMT factionalism, we understood the tensions between the moderates and the hard liners during the mid-1980s, primary over elections.

The KMT, which needed a mechanism to legitimize itself and extend to the grass roots, had held elections on Taiwan since the early 1950s. These elections allowed them to fan rivalries among local Taiwanese factions. The KMT would support one local faction one election and another local faction the next election. But, the older hard liners had always believed that the KMT should always win an election by a landslide. The people returning to the island, the moderates, the modernizers, were saying, you could win an election with 51 percent of the vote, your manhood was intact and you were still in power. That was a revolutionary idea and it took years before the older members of the party agreed that the only thing you had to do was to win the election, not overwhelm it. In fact, one of the senior reformers at one time, Lee Huan, lost his job because during an election in the late 1970s because riots broke out over allegations of KMT ballot stuffing, the old timers didn’t think 80 percent was good enough.

Q: In this period from 1983-85, to what extent was there interaction between Taiwan and the mainland and was there investment beginning to take place by Taiwanese entrepreneurs in China or did that all come later?

REUTHER: In the early 1980s there was no investment and little interaction. Getting permission to leave the island was very difficult. The Taiwan Garrison Command watched Mainlander and Taiwanese alike. In those days it was recognized that it was the Mainlanders, brought to Taiwan in the last days of 1949, who longed to visit the Mainland. One tangwai stalwart at the time told me that Taiwanese were always worrying about a sell-out; that, as the Mainlanders aged, they might turn to Beijing in their twilight years and turn Taiwan over. After all, the KMT and the CCP were of a single mind that Taiwan was just a Chinese province.

For the Mainlanders, despite Garrison Command, there was a safety value. One could go to Hong Kong and once in Hong Kong one could disappear and visit mainland relatives. There were rumors that, because the people in Fujian Province spoke the same language as people in Taiwan, Taiwanese business people could sneak back to Fujian and do a little business. This seemed inordinately risky for a Taiwanese to me. The security forces easily monitored such travel. But, the KMT couldn't cut it off because that would damage its Mainlander supporters. So, they thought since they couldn't cut it off, they let the security organs monitor and regulate it. As the Mainlanders aged, contact with mainland China opened a little bit more each year. For example, our language teachers in 1982 were able to call their Shanghai relatives via a telephone link through Hong Kong that switched the call into the mainland system. I remember one of our teachers in tears; they had called for the first time that night. It was the first conversation they had had with their relatives since 1949.

While easily monitored and easily controlled, everyone seemed to believe that some contact was going on. The Taiwanese opposition with whom we were in contact believed it, but saw contact as propitiating the Mainlander community and spoke of this contact as evidence of a possible KMT sell-out. When the domestic reforms of 1988-89 came along, the abolition of martial law removed the authority of the Garrison Command to monitor this contact. The sub rosa contacts increased to the point where it was publicly acknowledged and regulated. Looking into the future, it isn't until you get into the 1990- 91 period and the establishment of the Mainland Affairs Council and States Exchange Foundation that cross-straits contacts include Taiwanese business people in any numbers.

Anyway, every now and then there would be a whispered conversation about a Mainlander who had gone to the mainland. The basic rule was you could go to the mainland and see your relatives, if you don't talk about it, which makes a lot of sense in the Chinese context. Saving face means not trumpeting your activities. For example, at normalization we told the Chinese we would sell military equipment to Taiwan and they said, "Well, please don't do that." We said that the subject was not negotiable; we were committed to not abandoning Taiwan. They said, "Okay, but don't embarrass us by doing it publicly." At that time and I think it still is, on all arms sales of $50 million or more you have to notify Congress, a requirement which guaranteed publicity. So, the Carter Administration chopped up all the arms sales to Taiwan into $49 million packages. They would manipulate package size to keep it below this threshold. Taipei knew it, Beijing knew it, but as long as we didn't talk about it, we could continue an arm sales relationship.

Q: During this period when you were in Taiwan from 1981-85, first as a language student and then the political section chief, I assume you did not travel to the mainland at all?

REUTHER: No Mainland travel, that's right.

Q: Was that against policy?

REUTHER: Well, in my case, I had a full plate on Taiwan and the reporting from the embassy and four consulates in China satisfied any lingering curiosity. Those assigned to AIT were discouraged from Mainland travel. They would have had to travel on non- diplomatic passports. Complications could have arisen in those early days after normalization that could have complicated our claims of unofficiality. Of course, diplomatic passport carrying language students might proceed to their next assignment on the mainland--which they would do via home leave.

Q: Not from Taiwan.

REUTHER: Right. In the first place there were no direct transportation arrangements. And we wanted to maintain the veil of unofficiality. So Foreign Service travelers would go from Taiwan to their home leave address and then on to their assignment.

Q: It was a matter of changing status too, because an officer at AIT nominally left government employment.

REUTHER: Correct, like military officers, Foreign Service officers are appointed under a presidential commission. This bit of personnel arcania was one of the reasons behind the original draft of the Taiwan Relations Act. We needed an administrative device which allowed Foreign Service officers to resign their commissions, take a job with this private company, AIT, and still be eligible for reinstatement as a commissioned officer without the loss of benefits. Let me tell you, it took a lot of legal thinking to turn that light on and in the end we were never able to apply that system to our own military. AIT Taipei had a military section, but there is no way in our legislation, or via the regulations the uniformed serviced followed, for a military officer to resign his commission and then return to duty.

Q: So they were all retired military?

REUTHER: They were all retired military who had had full military careers, retired, and then were picked up as private hires. It was not possible for them to go back at all.

Q: I remember working in Personnel a little later than this and trying to keep track of all these people and arrangements. I think there were times when we weren't perfect and temporarily lost an individual here and there.

REUTHER: It was one of the more unique circumstances, I think, that Foreign Service Personnel has gotten itself into.

Q: And, it still continues.

REUTHER: Yes. It still continues and works well. It is a system that satisfies our need to generate language officers and staff AIT Taipei. There is some debate about moving the language school onto the mainland, but that involves many financial issues and with the present budgetary situation I don't think that it can be done.

Q: It also involves some other issues in the Peoples Republic in terms of hiring teachers and allowing students to be free and travel.

REUTHER: I don't think the PRC has a problem with that because we were running language lessons when I was there and traveling freely. But there is a difference between a few language classes and a complete, FSI-administered, language school.

Q: Not now, but I think in the past they have had issues.

Is there anything else you would like to discuss about your time in Taiwan? If not, maybe we should go on to your next assignment, which was Chief of the Regional Anti-Piracy Unit, Refugee Section, American embassy, Bangkok. That got you back to Thailand, but that is an unusual Foreign Service assignment to be involved with pirates.

REUTHER: More than unusual. Many Foreign Service assignments stress reporting or negotiating skills, rarely do people have program management opportunities. In this case there was a massive outpouring of Vietnamese starting in 1978-79. Actually most of those people were Chinese, although perhaps second generation. In any event, in the eyes of the Vietnamese government, these refugees were Chinese and Hanoi wanted to get rid of its Chinese population. As a consequence, large numbers of people fled into the Gulf of Siam, only to be plundered by the Cambodian/Thai/Malaysian fishermen in the area. Like the refugees at the time of the fall of Saigon in 1975, some in this refugee population had connections to the United States. In any event, the death rate, rape, robbery of the refugees was unacceptable. The U.S. felt a responsibility to act. AID invited Fred Cluny, who was later killed in Chechnya (former USSR territory), to design a program to halt these deprecations. He was a brilliant man and really understood humanitarian relief programs. Congressman Solarz, whom I knew from Taiwan, organized congressional funding for the program.

Cluny's idea was to work on a regional basis with the Thai, Malaysian, Singaporean and Indonesian governments to centralize crime reporting. One of the legal problems was that each country's judicial system was handicapped if the victim ultimately landed in another country. If we were to identify and bring perpetrators to justice, we needed the cooperation of the countries surrounding the Gulf of Siam. My job was to use the prestige and resources of the USG to facilitate that interregional cooperation among the respective governments. I contacted Thai, Malaysian, and Singaporean foreign and interior ministry officials in pursuit of our objectives.

The core of the program was an attempt to professionalize and strengthen Thai police forces to handle this criminal outbreak. My liaison with Thai interior ministry officials, many of whom I knew from ten years previously, was as the blocker for the quarterback. The key member of the team was a DEA agent who first came to Thailand as a Peace Corps volunteer. An absolutely brilliant man, Tex Learly had both the language skills and the law enforcement professionalism to gain the active cooperation of the Thai police.

Q: Was there a narcotics element to this?

REUTHER: Not necessarily, except that Tex was the absolute perfect person for this assignment. He originally came to Thailand as a Peace Corps volunteer, acquired excellent Thai, and enjoyed the country. He later went into police work and DEA. I think while with DEA he had an assignment to Thailand, which he also found attractive. So, when they were looking around for someone who understood police work, had excellent Thai (he could even speak the royal vocabulary), and would understand the needs of the police, his name surfaced. By the time I arrived, Tex was already there. We also had a contractor, Steve Kraus, a young man from Minnesota with extensive understanding of refugee issues and programs, who completed the team. His enthusiasm, knowledge of Thailand, and familiarity with refugee issues was a great addition to the program. My job was liaison with the Thai civil authorities to see that the Thai Ministry of Interior supported this program.

Now you have to understand a little bit of Thai history. Remember we earlier discussed the student demonstrations that sparked the October 1973 coup? One of the consequences of that public uprising was, even though it was the army shooting down the students, the public burned down every police station in Bangkok. Public enmity for the police has a history. The police had lost the coup of 1956. The penalty they paid was that military officers were assigned as heads of the police from that time. The military officers had no interest in suppressing corruption and building a positive public image of the police. So, by 1973 the police had a reputation for venality and corruption. When the public had the opportunity, it burned down the police stations. In protecting the boat people by supporting the police, one is running against the grain of benign neglect into which the police had fallen. So, my job was to liaison with the Ministry of Interior as a symbol of our interest in encouraging a professionalization of the police. There were two police forces actually, the Border Patrol Police and the regular national constabulary.

Q: And in this program we were working with both?

REUTHER: Yes. One of the advantages that I brought to the program was that, because of my previous time in Thailand working the northeast and visiting every district chief and every governor, etc., all those officials I had known ten years earlier had moved up in the Thai system. They were now at the assistant secretary level in the Ministry of Interior. So I could walk in and have immediate rapport with a ranking government official. Of course, the program would have to survive on its own merits but at least one got in the door. In fact I have always thought that one of the things that the Foreign Service should aspire to in these major countries is a situation where people come in as young officers, go on to other assignments, come back as middle level officers, and finally return as senior embassy officers. That way you have your friends moving up with you or you move up with them and you have instant rapport. It certainly made a difference in this case.

So, what we were trying to do was to provide training, encouragement, and political cover to our interest in protecting Vietnamese boat people.

Q: I can remember doing the latter, briefing a congressional group from the middle of a bus, but I never felt that my calling to serve my country required me to parachute out of an airplane, so I think Ambassador Brown was a special kind of person to be able to do that.

After you finished your time in Bangkok in 1987, I believe you went to Beijing. Was that the first time you had visited the Peoples Republic of China?

REUTHER: Actually no. I had that one visit in 1980 when I escorted the S&T delegation to Beijing. But that made going to Beijing on tour in 1987 all the more remarkable because China over those decades of the 70s and 80s is going to be one of those places where people will have such stark comparisons. You will run into people who would say: "Well, you should have been here then," or, "the difference is so demonstrative." I think it is an amazing part of the way China has changed that what we saw in Beijing seven years earlier was quite different from what I saw when I arrived in 1987.

Q: In 1987 who was the ambassador and what was your specific assignment in the embassy?

REUTHER: The ambassador was Winston Lord and his deputy was Peter Thomson. The economic counselor was Kent Wiedemann and I was his deputy and concurrently head of the external reporting unit in the economic section. So, the economic section was divided in half, if you will. One half looked at what the internal economy was doing and the other half basically ran our trade relations with China, thus, we focused on China's external economic relations.

Q: Were you involved then in negotiations between the U.S. and China and what was the MFN, Most Favored Nation, status at that time?

REUTHER: The Most Favored Nation status at that time was as it was when we first started in 1972, that is, sort of an annual update. This is a draw back from the Jackson- Vanick Act which was designed to punish the Soviets over Jewish emigration. The Jackson-Vanick Bill only illustrates, I think, why lawyers and diplomats are worried about precedent, because if you do something in one area you may get stuck with it in another area. For example, Jackson-Vanick more broadly said that to gain MFN a country had to promise to allow free emigration. Well, when we explained Jackson- Vanick to Deng Xiaoping he said, "How many do you want?"

Q: Would 100 million be enough?

REUTHER: Right. Actually he said, "You want 20 million, 30 million? We can do that." And he did it with such a straight face that the Americans really did not know how to respond. Was he pulling their legs, lining people up, threatening, or what? The whole Jackson-Vanick thing is totally inexplicable to China. But, here we are stuck with a policy of making China promise free emigration--which is precisely what we do not want. In fact after getting this promise from him we had to go around and say don't you dare do such a thing. This sort of illustrates that when you are dealing with China on its own, all the stereotypes from the Cold War, all the anti-

Russian stuff, all the anti-Chinese Communist stuff really gets in your way.

Q: Were you still there when Tiananmen Square took place?

REUTHER: Oh, yes. That was in 1989. Before we get into that let me address the issue of continuing negotiations. My office was responsible for economic agreements between the United States and China and many of the things that I had worked on while on the desk from 1979-81 period were still important issues. So, we worked on civil aviation a great deal. Not only negotiating further expansion, because the original agreement I think only allowed one U.S. airline initially could serve Beijing and a second airline could come in and serve Shanghai. We had more airlines wanting to get into the China market and were deregulated. So, we have to renegotiate with them that whole bit plus cargo sharing and things like that. So, yes, during that time I had a little rut in the road from our office to CAAC where we did a lot of negotiating.

Q: Were there also trade negotiations, delegations from the Special Trade Representative's Office that came? STR did not have a person in the embassy did they?

REUTHER: No, because USTR had a worldwide mandate, they did not have a person in the embassy. But, as issues arose, USTR would lead negotiating delegations to Beijing. I can remember one such circumstance involving tungsten. Chinese tungsten was being sold in Europe in violation of a marketing agreement we had with Beijing. Tungsten, like many minerals, is very specific to origins and trace minerals identified it as of Chinese origin. So, with that evidence in hand, we went to the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Trade and Economic Relations (MOFERT) and say, "Look, China is dumping tungsten in Europe against the marketing agreement we have. We will impose penalties, if you don't stop this." They said, "Don't look at us, we are not selling it." What really was happening was that Beijing was decentralizing the economy--as Western economics had been encouraging them--which meant that the province of Yunnan, which controlled these mines, had the freedom to market tungsten and were doing so in violation of Beijing's international agreements. USTR arrived and we had about a week of negotiations on tungsten that resulted in them having to recentralize their economy to the extent that Beijing was required to impose an export licensing system on the provinces. I presumed Yunnan was not happy with this reassertion of central authority and probably bargained for a trade-off in another policy area. This whole incident was typical of new problems that arose from China's participation in international trade. By the mid-1980s economic reform meant that there were more actors on the Chinese side, many of whom had short-term, parochial, interests that would lead to trade disputes with other countries until the central government developed new administrative mechanisms.

So, that was one type of negotiation. Another one, and one that would continue for years as it had in Taiwan, was intellectual property rights. We began to address IPR issues in the mid-1980s. As is typical of Foreign Service work, we in the embassy looked around and said, "Okay, we are about to talk to the Chinese about intellectual property rights. What do you suppose their position is going to be?" We took the initiative to plumb the various ministries, determine which ones might be on a Chinese IPR delegation, and gain an understanding of each ministry's approach to IPR issues. It was easy for us to contact the ministries because the Chinese side saw the Economic Section as commercial officers. So I, or my colleagues in the economic section, had the widest range of contacts around Beijing. We interviewed people at the party schools. We talked to people on the factory floor. We had complete access to the ministries. The whole town was ours. In fact, we had better contacts around Beijing than the Political Section, and often had better insights into the Chinese government and policy debates.

Q: This was in advance to the negotiation team coming?

REUTHER: Yes, in advance of the negotiation. This is what the Foreign Service does to prep for these things. What we found out was that the National Science Foundation and the educational establishment in China opposed IPR. They opposed it on the basis that since China had no patent or copyright legislation of its own, and it was un-Marxian to be paid for the results of your own intellectual endeavors, they saw no benefit in it. We also found out that the R&D sections of industrial enterprises practiced what might be called reverse engineering. It seems counterintuitive, but the Chinese intellectual establishment was not pro-IPR in the mid-1980s.

REUTHER: Exactly. When you get your Time-Life book on how to do your deck in the back, that is what they were doing. On the other hand, when we talked to MOFERT officials they were very eager to obtain some agreement on intellectual property rights because foreign investors had come to them and said, "I am not going to bring my plant here until you can protect my industrial process." So, we reported our findings on the Chinese views on IPR to Washington. This research was in preparation for making the U.S. delegations' presentation as sharp as possible.

A fairly sizable American delegation arrived and we had a fascinating week or so with the Chinese. This preliminary effort was pretty much an educational one. We tried to explain how we looked at patents and copyrights and why we deemed it important; why it was important to our trade; how much of our trade involved IPR issues. We argued how unfortunate it would be for them if they were unable to take advantage of the IPR gateway to technology by paying a few royalties. We pointed out that the industrial world would not be favorably disposed, if China continued to violate these patents. For the Chinese ministries that had intellectual rights offices, and not all of them did, we learned that there was another major input into Chinese thinking on IPR negotiations. These offices were very much aware of the status of our negotiation with the Japanese and Taiwanese on some of the same issues. During my ministry interviews, one of the very sharp comments I received, and reported, was from a senior cabinet secretary who supervised economic ministries, who said, "You cannot expect China to get ahead of what you have gotten out of the other governments."

Q: We will not give more.

REUTHER: Exactly, they would not give more. So, what we had obtained from Taiwan or Japan was a cap for them in negotiating with us. Made sense to me that they would not want to be seen as giving more, or acting weaker, than Taipei or Tokyo.

Q: When you were on the China Desk and here again in Beijing, you were involved in negotiations with the Chinese. Are they tough negotiators?

REUTHER: While I wasn't in a position to be the negotiator for the American side, in Washington and Beijing I did participate in some typical, primarily economic, negotiations. I stress economic because economic negotiations do not tend to be zero-sum enterprises, but areas where both sides could readily see mutual advantages. Of course, any negotiation session involves a great deal of educating the other side as to why you are taking the position you are. Remember our civil aviation negotiations in Washington? How surprised the Chinese were to find that we did not have a national airline?

I am not impressed with the idea that the Chinese are extraordinary negotiators - that the Americans can manly toss vodka with the Russians, but collapse when the Chinese pull out the egg rolls. Often the issue is not Chinese negotiating expertise, but pressure on our side that may damage our own position. When I was on the China Desk, all Cabinet level officials wanted to travel to China. Each trip had to look successful. Something had to be done or signed. I think the Vice President wanted to travel to China and the main trip even would be the opening of the consulate in Guangzhou. Except we had not finished negotiating the space and facilities for a proper consulate. Now, the Vice President's office doesn't care what the needs of the State Department were. State is to serve and suck it up. So we ended up with a consulate in the Dong Fang Hotel, a miserable facility from a work and security angle. Was this the product of superior Chinese negotiating? Not really.

Remember that in negotiating the Maritime agreement, the Chinese were strongly committed to a reciprocal list of ports? Fact. This illustrates why being in the Foreign Service was so interesting. You were there to tell your side what the trends, fads, and goals of the other side were so that you could factor that into your negotiations. Maybe that would help uncover the Chinese bottom line, maybe that would uncover some important deadline.

The reality is that there are differences in national negotiating behaviors, but they are not often as stark as the op-ed pages suggest. I always enjoyed negotiating with the Thai. Thailand had never been colonized, a fact which made the Thai proud and able negotiators. In contrast, I was told, the Vietnamese were always worried that you had something up your sleeve and that the subject of this round of negotiating was only a pretext. I suspect the Chinese are somewhere in between.

Q: About this same time the Uruguay round negotiations were going on to create the World Trade Organization.

REUTHER: In Beijing we were just starting out. Across the straits, we had been seeking IPR agreement from the government on Taiwan for years. When I was in Taiwan, 1983- 85, the Taiwan authorities finally agreed to some basic IPR protection, after almost 15 years of discussion, for American authored books. For years American manuscripts were pirated in Taiwan. The Taiwan publisher would mark the front page "for sale in Taiwan only" or something like that, but then sell throughout Asia. Everybody went through Taiwan to buy their copies of the American classics, academic volumes book of the month volumes - the range of pirated books was significant. Even esoteric tomes such as Ambassador Hummel's father's book, "Biography of the Ch'ing Dynasty," a three volume work, was pirated.

So, Beijing was very much aware of our success in the region on IPR issues and we knew we would have to factor that into our delegation's presentation. Again, it is that kind of background work that the Foreign Service does, not only for Washington as a government negotiating agency, but for American business because, of course, we were sharing our insights with our business colleagues in Beijing and other embassies.

REUTHER: Yes, all with good Chinese and a good understanding of how the Chinese system operated. The Commercial and Economic sections would often share insights about commercial issues and the impact of the ongoing reforms. They were the first stop for arriving businessmen. Commerce would often organize industry specific trade delegations, like medical instruments or something like that, and maybe the Foreign Commercial Service would arrange a schedule and interviews. If the delegation was from the aircraft industry, we might do joint briefings because joint ventures might be the focus of such a group rather than trade. Speaking of civil aviation in China, one of the things we realized was that Chinese civil aviation had no independent traffic control capability. The military controlled the air. So, if a delegation came to sell equipment to improve their airports, you don't sell it to CAAC, you sold it to the military. One of the services the embassy tries to perform is to direct the American businessman to the office that has the decision-making authority.

Q: In addition to that, your two other main responsibilities were reporting on the external economic side and in being involved in actual negotiation - whether assisting a delegation or yourself dealing with a ministry.

REUTHER: Right. And, of course, what made the job interesting and dynamic were the extensive economic reforms that often impacted on areas of interest to U.S. business. So, we have an extensive reporting responsibility. We tried to send economic officers around China to gain a feel for these reforms and how they were being implemented. We might, for example, be interested in regulations on access to foreign exchange. Such access was one of the key issues we watched, because the Chinese very tightly controlled foreign exchange. In the late 1980s foreign exchange issues might create strange situations. A businessman could come in town and find a Chinese buyer and go back thinking he had set the company up for years only to find out that the buyer doesn't have any foreign exchange. To get around foreign exchange regulations the Chinese buyer might suggest that the foreign company import something that the Chinese counterpart could sell to earn the foreign exchange to fulfill the original contract. The end result was that a foreign export might find itself committed to performing export AND importing roles just because foreign exchange was so tight. So, we did a lot of reporting on foreign exchange...who had it, who controlled it, what the policy was. In doing this and other issues embassy officers traveled to other towns to compare the central regulations with local practice.

Q: How much connection was there between this economic reform that you have just been talking about and the political environment. We mentioned before Tiananmen Square, the student involvement in the spring and early summer of 1989. How much of that ferment did you see happening? I assumed you worked somewhat with the domestic political side of the embassy as well. I'm wondering, particularly from the economic dimension was there a connection on the political side?

REUTHER: To me there was a clear connection just because the way economic reforms were implemented under Deng Xiaoping and Zhao Ziyang. In the old days if the central government wanted to implement a new policy, the policy came down as an order to all. Reforms in the 1980s derived from a more flexible, experimental policy. Chinese think tanks were encouraged to design different policies mapping how to move from a command economy to a market economy. Implementation was also more experimental. Hunan experimented with one approach, Sichuan another, and Yunnan a third. But the most important aspect of these experiments were the articles in the papers or internal discussion about, say, how Sichuan was doing with housing reform. If Sichuan's experiment looked attractive to the conditions in another locality, then those officials might also pick it up. But it wasn't a matter of the central government saying anymore, "Okay, all you guys do this." So, there was a lot of ferment going on out there and a lot of experimenting at the local level. Both the anticipation of reform and the flexibility in implementation fed into the frustration of Beijing Spring.

We saw Tiananmen as connected with the frustration that reforms had come to an important junction, but were slowing down - in Chinese eyes because, in opening up the economy, corruption and misallocation of resources also emerged. The banking system didn't exist and that was the only command structure the government had to really keep the economy from flying off into hyper inflation which, if you understand Chinese history, is something to be avoided at all cost. The liberals were frustrated and were pushing an idea called neo-authoritarianism. The Western translation would be "Bonaparteism" or "rescue by man on a white horse," because they couldn't figure out how to put limits on the corruption and move ahead. They were looking for some dictator, some one person who would wave a wand or put all the corrupt people in jail, and move reforms forward. The issue was not democracy. The problem was how to move forward, if corruption involved the sons and daughters of the leading elite.

After all of this experimentation, all of these productive changes that had happened in the agricultural economy, or these great reforms, people were making money, dressing better. They had seen the Promised Land. When one young Chinese woman who was assigned to work in the embassy came in a mini skirt one day, I remember a colleague who had experienced China just ten year earlier -- just after the Gang of Four -- remarking that he was astonished by the changes in so short a time.

I don't know if we mentioned it before but one of the things you have to understand is how infectious and debilitating corruption is. When we are talking about the October 1973 rioting in Bangkok, one of the problems that played into that was police corruption. We talked about that and the fact that even though it was the army shooting at students, the public burned down every police station, because the demonstrators saw the police as corrupt and nobody was doing anything about it. Well, here you have the Chinese population in the spring of 1989 with this economic expansion that was being throttled in their eyes by corruption and their answer was to call for a dictator to clean up the corruption. They didn't see any other method of reinvigorating reform. From our point of view, the spring of 1989 was not a democracy movement. We went down to Tiananmen Square and talked to demonstration leaders. They did not have a sophisticated understanding of democracy.

Remember the demonstration leaders at first were students from the premier universities, meaning they were sons and daughters of ranking party members. When government put out an editorial that said the students were being disruptive, student leaders took offense. In addition to their policy complaints was added the issue of face. So, a lot of things came together.

But Tiananmen was fascinating, in part, because it was a reverberation of what was happening in Europe. European Communism was failing in 1989 yet Gorbachev's visit in the spring and the whole thing starts off in a very Chinese way, a demonstration for the funeral for an honored leader was the excuse to get out into the streets. Once the students were out on the streets you couldn't lock the barn door. Gorbachev came, but the demonstrations caused obvious schedule changes. The longer the demonstrations lasted, the more difficult for the student leaders to maintain control, as new groups and students from outside traveled to Beijing. It was not hard to see a parallel with the student demonstrations of the Cultural Revolution. Finally, I think May 27 or 28 the authorities declared martial law. Now that was a significant event. We had established an office in the Beijing Hotel, which is right up from Tiananmen Square. From the hotel the embassy dispatched two officers at a time, from May through June, to chat with demonstrators in the square on a daily basis. Notice the return on investment in Chinese language training. We didn't rely on the papers, embassy officers had first hand information.

Q: You don't even have to watch CNN.

REUTHER: Right. We could talk to people, see who they were and see what was going on. The authorities declared martial law late May, responding in large part to labor and business people becoming sympathetic to the students. It was something I had seen during the 1973 student demonstrations in Thailand where the general public demonstrated support by offering food and drink to the students. The Tiananmen students were very disciplined. They could have been civil rights marchers in the 60s. They had their own security, cleaned the square and tried to maximize their presentation of themselves as within the Chinese system by their politeness and conduct...

Q: Why don't we talk about the role of the embassy. To what extent did incidents occur there related to what was going on at the square?

REUTHER: As I was saying earlier, the demonstration was very well organized, very disciplined and very big. You have to understand that, at that time and continuing to the present, the Chinese put the foreign diplomatic community in compounds. The main compound is on one of the main streets that exits on to Tiananmen square in a north south direction. From time to time, to keep their morale up and connect with the public, the students marched out of the square and around the internal beltway. That would bring them by the embassy and housing compound. I don't think the Rose Bowl parade or the Macy's Thanksgiving Day parade was ever as exciting as sitting up on the roof watching just miles and miles and blocks and blocks of people -- 10 across -- marching down the road. One of the more beautiful things was the parade of the motorcycle brigades. Economic reforms allowed people to establish private business, the 'getihu.' With their private income, one of these private business people's first personal purchases was a motorcycle. So you had this motorcycle brigade of private business people. Each vehicle had a small Chinese flag on the handlebar and then three very large Chinese flags on poles at about the third rank.

This revving of the engines while going through Beijing was just stirring, I mean it had the emotional impact of a marching band during a sporting event.

Such parades were very stirring and obviously got people quite involved. In fact, the positive public response was the reason the authorities became worried and the hard-liners saw things spinning out of control. What is remarkable about Tiananmen Square is the push and pull between the hard-liners and the moderates right up to the end. We heard rumors that the PLA was divided. The struggle between the two was like the Greek myth about the sun and wind betting which one of them could get a traveler to take his coat off. That is what Beijing was like up to those first days in June. The Conservatives said to the Liberals, "Okay, let's see if you guys can get them to stop demonstrating." So, troops were sent in unarmed without their officers and the Beijing public stopped them from getting to the student center. The moderates in the government failed, the moderates in the student demonstration slipped away with martial law. The streets were left to the people of Beijing and a more inexperienced group of student demonstrators.

Well, if a political process started moderately, it rarely becomes softer, and often reverts to harder. What happened on the night of June 4 was that the hard-liners moved armed troops into Beijing and, like the Paris Commune of 1848, the population of Beijing rose up. The students were a minor focus of what happened that evening. The western press missed a good story by creating a students versus government story. Forgotten in that story—and part of the legacy for the Chinese—was the city of Beijing rose up in revolt. All the destruction, all the death, was caused by the troops fighting their way into Beijing. By the time the PLA arrived at Tiananmen Square, the students surrendered and were marched off very easily, according to a Latin American ambassador who was near the square until early in the morning. According to another account, the only incident between the student demonstrators and the PLA at Tiananmen Square occurred as one group of troops was escorting the students out of the square. In the negotiated surrender, the students were allowed to march out with their flags. However, another unit that had fought its way into town suddenly arrived at the square from the south. Seeing the students with their flags, this second unit apparently opened fire hitting some of the escorting troops as well as students. To the extent that Tiananmen Square was more than putting down a student demonstration, it was an urban uprising. The people of Beijing will remember.

Q: Was there some sort of shooting incident near or at the American embassy?

REUTHER: Obviously on the night of June 4 there was shooting all over the place. Beijing was full of tourists and business people. It became obvious that the situation in Beijing was very unstable. So, all the embassies in Beijing evacuated their nationals. We ultimately evacuated about 1500 Americans, tourists, business people, our own embassy staff. The Japanese evacuated 4000 out of all of China. All the embassies slimmed down their missions. There were probably fewer foreigners in Beijing on June 6, 1989, than in the last 500 years. Think about it. The point is that the dream of any nationalistic Chinese for the last 200 years, since the first opium war, is to get the foreigners out of China, because it is the foreign influence that corrupted and weakened China. So, there were conservative elements in the Chinese structure that were very pleased to see these departures. To them the departure of all the embassies was a next logical step.

Someone acted on that impulse. Across from one of the diplomatic compounds that faced Jianguomen Dajie was a Japanese hotel under construction. By virtue of the way housing was allocated, the Chinese knew apartment assignments among the compound buildings. In the morning of June the 6th, or two days after Tiananmen Square, a group of soldiers who were walking along Jianguomen Dajie in front of the diplomatic compound suddenly started shooting up from the street into the building.

Q: Into which building?

REUTHER: Into the diplomatic housing compound, building number one. They said they had received sniper fire from the roof of the building. More to the point: the platoon hidden in the building across the street simultaneously poured fire horizontally into building number one. Given a 10 floor building, if you are shooting from the street, bullets will lodge in the ceiling the first six inches or so from the window. In this case, however, you had horizontal fire poured into the apartments of the American, British, Japanese and German military attachés, those same embassies' security officers, one American economic officer and one Brit. They just trashed those apartments with automatic weapons fire. Later the American Defense Attaché told me that he received a phone call from somebody he knew in a central military unit who said don't be home at 10:00, click.

Q: So, it was planned.

REUTHER: Something was known in advance. Something whose objective was to scare us away, to make us close all of the embassies.

Q: Were there casualties?

REUTHER: No. All the apartments were empty except for one. The American security officer's kids were still there and the maid got them below the windowsill in time.

In retrospect, the objective of this incident was to do what the Boxers had wanted to do in the summer of 1900, make the foreigners go away. This shooting had a great impact on us, being shot at tends to do that to you, but we were quite determined that we would not break off relations with China, they were stuck with us. We would stay engaged and not be scared out. In fact, we presumed the perpetrators were a small cabal of people and that there would be others who were not supportive of this kind of thing. But, if we left, if we did what the shooters wanted, then we would also leave the reformers naked to them.

What is interesting about this is that the Tiananmen Incident reintroduced China into American domestic politics. American politicians expressed the outrage we all felt. But after a while, moralistic statements about China became just another jab at one's American partisan opponent. So, a situation developed where some in Congress were calling for a break in relations with China and the imposition of penalties which meant the same thing. This created an interesting situation where the last remnants of the Boxer Rebellion and congressional China critics were making common cause, saying, "Break off contact." And you have the Bush Administration saying, "No, we have to stay engaged with China because we can't let them break it off and go their own separate way.” In fact, the advantage at that time of having Bush as President was that, because he had been head of the earlier liaison office, he understood how important the whole issue was. I believe he understood how crucial it was to maintain contact with China so that we didn’t lose contact with the reformers. Dealing with the Chinese has its frustrations, like dealing with the French. But frustration is no excuse to abandon the opportunity to educate.

Q: What was it like, working in Beijing after the embassy families and all those Americans had departed.

REUTHER: It was both frustrating and hard on morale. We were as caught up in reacting to the killings as everyone else, although I had been through a similar event in Thailand 16 years earlier. For those of us in the Economic Section, there was little of our standard economic/commercial reporting to do. There weren’t going to be any negotiating delegations coming for some time either. One of the interesting indices of the frustration we felt was that some of our more talented compatriots turned their frustration into song. I had seen this phenomena when I was in Thailand, Foreign Service officers serving in CORDS came to Bangkok singing new lyrics to contemporary songs. The same happened in Beijing. If I can find a couple of examples, I will add them later.

[Songs of Frustration: to the tune of “Yellow Ribbon”

I’ve just been down in Tian an men
How did we get into this mess we’re in
I used to follow Zhao Ziyang, I wanted to be free
Now the PLA is here, and they have outraged me
They’ve brought those APCs

Chorus:

Just tie some flaming burlap ‘round that APC
We’ve been here two months in the PRC
If you don’t get some burlap ‘round that APC
It’ll run over us, so let’s torch that bus
Put the blame on Li
Just tie some flaming burlap ‘round the ol’
‘round that ol’ APC...]

Q: Now Tiananmen Square was toward the end of your tour. What other issues were you watching?

REUTHER: Remember, we were talking earlier about intellectual property rights. Another educational process that we closely watched was the British negotiations with the Chinese over Hong Kong, the bulk of which was covered by a 99-year lease that would expire in the 1990s. From the negotiating record I say much of those negotiations were not negotiations but educational seminars on how the British ran Hong Kong. I remember one report that talked about payroll deductions. A fairly clear concept to you and I, but alien to recent Chinese experience. In China you belong to a danwei, or work unit, which provides at little cost to you: your schooling, your housing, your food, your recreational facilities, so the wages you get are minimal and do not represent the cost of labor. Well, in a free market economy, of course, you have to buy all those things from your wages and save for a pension. Well, the Chinese don't have that, so the British had to describe to the Chinese the connections between payroll deductions, pensions and using stocks and bonds to make pensions grow. No negotiating team looks bad in its own cables, but there is an educational aspect to any negotiation as each side explains its perspective. In the case of the discussions over the future of Hong Kong, the minutia and detail were interesting to watch.

REUTHER: Yes, some real basics. But then everything about the Hong Kong negotiations was unique. Even the fact that there were negotiations, China did not follow the Indian example. New Delhi extinguished Portuguese Goa by force of arms. The British-Chinese talks began as a rather legalistic discussion. At one point the Chinese increased the size of their delegation to involve bureaucracies that had implementation, rather than legal, responsibilities. I can't conceive of more complicated talks, certainly given the historical animosity between the two countries.

Q: It takes time and you have to start building and developing a foundation before you can get into the issues.

REUTHER: Exactly, and that is where we are with China. People talk about engagement but they are only thinking in national terms seeing China as an undifferentiated whole. But, China, like the United States, is a large continental society. Fortunately we have funding at the moment for five consulates. But if you didn't have those consulates you really would be quite blind to what is going on with the variety of reforms and the variety of circumstances. That would be like saying because there is a French embassy in Washington, Paris will understand Proposition 13 in California. Useful intelligence it not so neatly packaged. While a French Embassy might pass on a definition of Proposition 13, its consulate in California can explain in detail what stimulated the idea, who is behind it, what are the chances for this local movement to become national.

Q: And in some ways China is even more challenging than the United States is because it is so much larger and really has a lot of diversity. Dave, when you were there in the economic section, were you able to travel some in the rest of the country? Did you rely a lot on the consulates for reporting on what was happening in their areas or did you try to get a flavor yourself of the whole country?

REUTHER: Well, my experience was a mixture of both. Being in the cockpit of the embassy, if you will, we tasked the consulates for reporting on specific issues, or to determine whether a reform being touted in Beijing was really being implemented. With the consulate reporting in hand, we would combine it with conversations that we had with the Chinese bureaucracies or think tanks and file a report to Washington that we believed provided the best nation-wide picture. I personally didn't get that much of a chance to travel. I found my schedule crowded with visitors and a growing list of negotiating sessions. But, I had some absolutely outstanding young officers in the economic sections and we tried to free them for travel. I assumed that when they returned for a China assignment ten years hence, they would have a useful sense of comparison. So, officers from the economic section traveled to the port city of Tianjin from time to time. Some of the limits on traveling through China were not caused by our demanding schedules. Even by 1989, China's infrastructure was still rustic. You could not drive from Beijing to Guangzhou on paved roads. Air travel was in its infancy. To cover our district we generally traveled by train.

Q: Approximately four months after the incident. At the time you left how would you appraise the general situation in terms of the relations with the United States on the economic side? Had things begun to return to the way things were before or would that take quite a while?

REUTHER: That would take quite a while to describe. Such a destructive event as Tiananmen Square makes people who need security and stability and predictability in their relationship hold back, and nobody wants stability and predictability more than business people do. Even after we started summer transfers, the business people stayed away. Of course, it is business peoples' interest in stability which makes them good advocates for transparent laws, protection of property and other accoutrements essential to underwriting the transition to modernity, if not democracy. Because most countries seek economic advancement they voluntarily put such instruments in place. Human rights advocates rarely have such a system wide impact, and they often meet with resistance.

The first few months after Tiananmen Square were quite telling. We began a series of economic reports discussing the economic price China paid for Tiananmen. I recall one report on the tourist industry in which we compared all international flights coming into China in the pre-Tiananmen Square period versus what was happening after Tiananmen. Literally everyone just stopped coming to China. Tourism collapsed and most airlines simply did not fly their posted schedules. Hotels, two major Hong Kong invested properties had just opened, had enormous vacancy rates. Some airlines still flew. Lufthansa had a joint venture with the Chinese airlines, which were being deregulated at that time, to build a service center for them. So, they could not terminate all flights. They came in once a week instead of four times a week. And they came in empty.

Q: But they were obliged to continue.

REUTHER: They were obliged to continue. Cathay Pacific was doing good business because all the businessmen took refuge in Hong Kong and then flew up for a day or two maintain their contacts and fly back. So, Cathay Pacific and Dragon Air, the two companies that flew the Hong Kong to Beijing routes, were doing okay, but everybody else was dead. Hotel occupancy rate scraped along at maybe 5 or 10 percent. We calculated that in tourism alone Tiananmen cost China millions of dollars in lost revenues.

So, I would be prepared to offer the proposition that the Chinese paid dearly for Tiananmen. The government understands the financial, prestige and industrial price it paid In the unintended consequences category, for example, under our export control regulations, guidance systems in the Boeing airplanes that China bought had to be under the control of a Boeing official. Such systems were not stored with the Chinese. This meant that after Tiananmen, the Chinese Boeing airplanes weren't safe to fly. The Boeing personnel had left country and there was no one qualified to adjust the systems or install new equipment. They had all left. By the time I left, most of the Chinese fleet could not be safely flown. So, even their domestic commerce was severely damaged by Tiananmen.

Q: I think we have covered China as vast as it is. You were there for one of the major events of the last 50 years, a fascinating experience.

REUTHER: You know it is funny how these things come to you. I was reading a book the other day which pointed out that Herbert Hoover, who would later become the U.S. president, was in Tianjin during the Boxer Rebellion and fired a rifle over the parapet. So, many Americans have had interesting experiences in China.

Q: It probably wouldn't take you very far.

REUTHER: Their destinations were rather limited. I think you could fly to Cairo. The Sudanese were singularly isolated. It was all part of the difficulty of that environment. I don't think I have ever been in a more physically inhospitable environment.

I was also on the employees' welfare board and ran our little commissary. Our little commissary was important to morale because literally there was little on the local market to buy. You couldn't send your servant out and say, "Well, buy some broccoli or squash for dinner." We often had colleagues at the embassy in Nairobi cut a deal with a crew member of the Kenya Air flight that arrived once a week to put a box of vegetables on a plane for us.

Fresh food was such a scarce commodity in Khartoum that hunting for it became second nature. For example, at the Khartoum embassy, Matt Ward, who was the embassy economic counselor, and I had most recently been in China. He came from Shanghai and I came from Beijing. The two of us hung out at the Chinese embassy from time to time because the Chinese embassy grew its own food in its walled compound. By the way, the Chinese diplomats were excellent Arabic linguists. Or so my Arab-speaking colleagues remarked. For Matt and I this was a chance to retain our Chinese language skills and eat.

Q: You mentioned that you worked closely with Australia on New Zealand policy. What were other aspects of our relationship with Australia that you recall?

REUTHER: As a Foreign Service officer in Asia I always worked closely with the local Australian embassy. In a place like China where the Americans often had more language skills, officers from the English speaking embassies, such as the Australians, would often meet and share notes. The tour in the Pentagon, however, underscored for me the intimacy in Australian-American relations that I consider remarkable. The U.S. military has many exchange programs with foreign militaries, but our exchange with Australia was extensive. To the point where Australian officers were holding billets in the Pentagon in fields such as logistics and procurement. Australia was fully integrated into the inner core of the American security establishment. Cross training and mutual exposure built high levels of confidence when events such as Desert Storm arose.

You could see this remarkable relationship in the work of the Australia Desk. An arrangement had developed over the years where the Director of Asia-Pacific Affairs (that is, the #2 position in our office, usually a one or two star military officer) had a formal quarterly meeting with the Australian Military Attaché. These meetings were called the HADS-ISA meetings (e.g., Head of Australian Defense Service). Military attaches from other countries had good working relations and easy access to the Desk officers and our bosses, but these formal meetings were particularly symbolic of our close relationship of Australia. Because our relationship was so rich, these meetings provided a centralized venue for raising any security related issue. The agendas that I prepared for these meetings were extensive and covered not only our policy toward some world event, but the status of mutual scientific projects and the constant coordination on New Zealand policy.

Also symbolic of the intimacy of the relationship were the annual Australian Ministerial meetings. I'm not certain when they started, but they certainly were the highlight of my tour. These were annual cabinet-level meetings that alternated between capitals. In 1994 the venue was Canberra, 1995 Washington. These were major administrative events because protocol called for both the secretaries of Defense and State to attend. It is a project of enormous proportions to coordinate the schedules of these two American cabinet officials. Once the AUSMIN was tentatively on their schedule, my State Department colleague, the Australian embassy and I began to work on an agenda. The agenda would cover the waterfront. There wasn't an international subject that wasn't covered. Furthermore, there was an extensive communiqué to negotiate. The communiqué, of course, illustrates the connection between foreign and domestic policy because it was as much for the domestic audiences as mutual allies and neighbors. One of the difficult aspects of the whole proceedings, however, was to arrange the topics so there would be sufficient and substantive topics for each American cabinet official to address in the meetings. This was the job of the working level. There were murmurings from the immediate staffs of the secretaries of State and Defense over the allocation of topics, but such turf questions were to be expected.

The Australians hosted my first AUSMIN (as was our shorthand for these meetings) in Canberra. Ultimately the Secretary of Defense dropped out of the schedule and the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy, Ambassador Frank Wisner, headed the DOD contingent. This was my first time in Canberra. The Australians were gracious hosts and a number of our embassy officers in Canberra were FSOs with whom I had served in other posts. The meetings were held in the unassuming Cabinet room of the new Parliament building. While in town I had my own full schedule of meetings with a spectrum of Australian officials, including representatives of the Prime Minister's office, the Department of Defense, and the Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade. I also took advantage of the opportunity to visit the War Museum in Canberra and the Navy command center in Sydney.

The second AUSMIN was in Washington. Again, the job of the desk officer was to accomplish the preliminary coordination between State and Defense and the Australian embassy. Next task was to commission background papers that provided a snapshot of the subjects to be covered. Working closely with State's Desk we coordinated and cleared the talking point papers from which the principals would speak. Closer to the event one would draft the scope paper that provided an overall view of where this meeting fit into the relationship, what the other side hoped to accomplish, and finally what we hoped to accomplish. After the appropriate clearances, these papers were put together in a briefing book, at least three inches in this case, and passed forward to the principal, with copies to the deputies who would also attend the meetings. Always a frantic time meeting the deadline for these briefing books. Nevertheless, briefing books are an invaluable photography of a relationship.

One final thought on the relationship with Australia is an observation about how democracies interact. One of my main projects was the preparation of the Annual Facilities Report. For decades Australia's contribution to the alliance was the provision of space for joint facilities that performed a number of defense monitoring functions. The Labour opposition liked to characterize the joint facilities as "U.S. bases" or as performing functions the Australian public would not approve. At one point the slow response to a question in Parliament about some construction at one of these facilities embarrassed the party in power. As a result, at least through the 1980s, the Australia desk officer queried the U.S. uniformed services that had equities in these joint facilities what our plans were. In my turn I gathered these responses and coordinated them into a report which was then forwarded to Canberra via the Australian embassy's defense attaché. The irony is that one of my duties was to assist the Australian government fend off potential domestic political attacks.

Q: Did I remember you saying that you were also desk officer for another island, Taiwan. How did that come about?

REUTHER: When I arrived at Asia Pacific Affairs Eden Woon covered all China issues. Post-Tiananmen sanctions restricted military-to-military contacts with Beijing and contacts with Taiwan were predictable. Dr. Woon had come to the position of Head of the China desk while he was still in the Air Force. In late 1994 he left ISA/AP to become director of the Washington State China Relations Council in Seattle. So, I added the Taiwan desk officer duties to my portfolio for about the last 12 months of my assignment to the Pentagon.

Q: Beijing-Taipei issues are in the news all the time now, wasn't that taking on a heavy load?

REUTHER: By this time an office reorganization allowed me to turn over my Korean responsibilities to a new officer. So, the portfolio balance remained. But you are right, Australian and New Zealand affairs dominated my attention. In mid to late 1994 we were in the midst of another round of Inter-Agency Working Group meetings on the Australian South Pacific Nuclear Free Zone proposal. Australia and New Zealand had long expressed interest in a nuclear free zone. Some fruitful international discussions had been held, but the Reagan Administration lost interest. This was just one of a number of issues the Clinton Administration was reinvestigating. I was the lead ISA representative to the interagency meetings, most of which an NSC representative hosted. Our position was that nuclear free zones were a function of the Cold War, President Bush had removed nuclear weapons from U.S. naval vessels, and therefore the issue was overtaken by events (OBE). Law of the Sea concerns and U.S. Navy views were a large part of our disinterest. State was also not interested. Peripheral agencies interested in the issue were not strong enough to move the issue forward. As I was saying, though, as to Taiwan we were in the calm before the storm.

Q: Can you give us a flavor of the Taiwan issues that did come to your attention?

REUTHER: Our priority issues were maintaining the unofficiality of the relationship with Taiwan and organizing our best judgement on the issue of arms sales to Taiwan. The Clinton Administration, as it had with New Zealand policy and other issues, conducted an interagency review of policy toward Taiwan. Given the political sensitivity of the relationship, State was the lead agency. That policy review was completed around July of 1994 and announced around September, just before I accepted the Taiwan portfolio. So, I did not participate in the policy review, but kept abreast of the issues during the twice-weekly office staff meetings.

The end result of the Taiwan policy review were a few changes in procedure and nomenclature. CCNAA changed its name to the "Taipei Economic and Commercial Representative Office." Fair enough. CCNAA don't specifically refer to Taiwan or Taipei. On the grounds that trade had grown, economic officials of the two authorities could meet in each other's office. For everyone else, in order to underscore the unofficiality of the relationship, American Institute in Taiwan and TECRO offices were the unofficial meeting places of choice.

For DOD, the policy review meant no changes. Because officers in uniform and government arms sales imply officiality, new rules about Taiwan representatives' access to U.S. Government agencies did not affect DOD as they did Commerce and State departments. DOD equities required strict adherence to the unofficiality of the relationship with Taiwan and DOD continued to work through the AIT office in Rosslyn, Virginia.

Despite all the pro-Taiwan fuss in the media at the time, it is not clear that the interagency group could have changed much. The Republic of China, that is, the authorities on Taiwan, is the successor government to the Qing dynasty, and our normalization with the People's Republic of China meant that the PRC was the successor to the ROC. To illustrate this legitimacy linkage, one of the first requirements the USG made of the PRC was that it resolved the issue of the Kwang Hua Railroad bonds from the Qing Dynasty. Any activity then that supports the officiality of the ROC impinges on the legitimacy of the PRC. This was particularly true during the 1970s and 1980s when the ROC unequivocally argued that it was the government of China of which Taiwan was a province. The contemporary PRC claim is a reflection of the earlier ROC claim. Calling on the ROC to change its name so that it is no longer the successor government to the Qing runs into problems on the Taiwan side. The political party that ruled Taiwan from 1945 to the present is the Kuomintang. It legitimized its rule and hence financial and power position in Taiwan on the grounds that it was the government of China. Changing the name of the government on Taiwan has serious consequences for the Kuomintang and its relationship with the people of Taiwan. These are complicated Taiwan legitimacy issues that the USG cannot resolve. That is why our official position since the 1972 communiqué is a neutral one. The issue is for Beijing and Taipei to work out peacefully. The issues are delicate and so interwoven that cutting one innocent thread may lead to powerful unintended consequences.

Q: You were saying that one of DOD's main responsibilities was arms sales to Taiwan. The 1982 Communiqué talked about a steady decline in the amount of arms sold. How were Taiwan's legitimate defense needs handled?

REUTHER: Shortly after I assumed the Taiwan portfolio we began the annual arms sales process and a review of Taiwan's defense needs. This starts with a visit to Washington by a Taiwan delegation from the Ministry of Defense that presents Taiwan's list of the equipment it wants and justifications. We call this the pre-Arms Sales Talks. Taiwan's list is often eclectic. The list often included a wide variety of equipment from submarines to communications equipment to request for technology transfer for co-production purposes. My recollection is that this list comes to us toward the end of the year, November/December, and then we hold the Arms Sales Talks themselves in March or April.

Taiwan's list always reflects the unique political situation from which it arises. RAND recently completed a study on the Taiwan procurement process and that study notes that Taiwan's list is a combination of what Taiwan's military professional think they need to accomplish specific defensive tasks in addition to what the political leaders add to the list. The government wants to communicate to the Taiwan public that it is doing its best to purchase the latest equipment. The problem is that you end up with a list that can be both practical and hype. We have a responsibility not to rubber-stamp it, but give each item due consideration. We break the list into functions and turn it over to our best military and intelligence people to look at the functional components: air defense or anti- submarine warfare, etc.

Q: Both practical and hype? How do you contribute to the analysis?

REUTHER: Diplomacy is part of the nation's defense and one should not be unfamiliar with the thinking of the military side of the house. Personally, my avocation is World War II history. My personal career has been intimately bound with that of my colleagues in the uniform services. Thailand dealing with the Air Force; insurgency issues including my exposure to Foreign Service colleagues who saw service in a CORDS assignment in Vietnam. Iraq issues certainly had a military component. Some FSI training involved a class at an Air Force installation in Florida. When we were evacuated from Sudan, I had a temporary assignment in the Political Military Bureau that exposed me to my uniformed colleagues. Finally, at DOD each issue we handled whether Korea, New Zealand or Taiwan, we handled the military side. So, I was able to guide and contribute to the ongoing discussion.

Q: So, you orchestrated one session of an Arms Sales Talk with Taiwan. Lot of paperwork?

REUTHER: There was a considerable amount of information to digest between the Pre- Talks and the Talks. Primarily we wanted to make certain we understood where Taiwan was in its execution of some function and what might be the next best step to improve its performance. When you introduce whole new systems, it is important to determine whether the training, tactics and budgeting are in place. Buying the latest fad is a waste of money if one cannot integrate the system into current procedures. Also, by the time I was involved, a number of political changes in Taiwan had significantly impacted on Taiwan's procurement process. Under the unchallenged Kuomintang era Taiwan's defense budget and requests were sometimes more extensive than we could approve. With the impact of a more democratic system, the Democratic Progressive Party (DPP) opposition was generally anti-defense budget and by 1995 had made significant strides in both cutting the budget and making the Ministry of Defense more accountable. As a result, American defense companies would often contact us and complain that the Defense Department was holding down Taiwan's spending and they were losing contracts! In fact a much more sophisticated game was afoot. Democracy was coming to Taiwan.

The American defense contractors had never experienced democracy in Taiwan and they were unprepared for its consequences. This is not an unusual phenomenon. Twenty years earlier, as the American were winding down in Vietnam and the Congress was cutting the defense budget, we often were involved with the Thai Government to negotiate one politico-military issue or another. One incident I specifically remember was that we wanted to shift reconnaissance aircraft from an upcountry airfield to a southern airport. The distance was a couple hundred kilometers, but the saving on gas and maintenance was noticeable. Thai authorities had never been asked to approve an American proposal on the basis of financial savings. After all the money we had spent in Vietnam, we were asking to save the cost of a couple hundred kilometers! The Thai were dumbfounded and believed for a period that we had some ulterior motive. I suspect that the arrival of a more open system on Taiwan was equally bewildering to the defense contractors used to Taiwan's steady, no-nonsense, military purchases.

Q: You spoke earlier that you covered Taiwan in the calm before the storm. What are you referring to? What storm?

REUTHER: 1995 was the high mark of amiable cross-straits relations. Taipei and Beijing were conducting serious and highly educational talks through their mutual unofficial mechanisms labeled the Straits Exchange Foundation (SEF) on the Taiwan side and the Association for Relations Across The Taiwan Straits (ARATS) on Beijing side. It should be noted that the used of 'unofficial' offices to conduct real exchanges was inaugurated by the Japanese in 1972 when they established an unofficial office in Taiwan and copied by the U.S. in 1979 with the American Institute in Taiwan. Here was Taipei and Beijing copying the Japanese and American precedent! There had been an earlier summit between SEF and ARATS and one was tentatively scheduled for late summer 1995. A second successful summit was predicted to open further the budding economic and social relationship between Taiwan and the Mainland. It was not to be, however. Appointed President of Taiwan Lee Teng-hui was about to seek election as the Kuomintang candidate in the first popular election for President on Taiwan. A marvelous milestone in the democratization of Taiwan. Unfortunately, to demonstrate his talents in foreign policy for the electorate, he decided to he wanted to travel to the United States. Actually there had been informal musings about allowing short visits to set a precedent and move from there. With an election deadline, however, Lee couldn't wait. With a campaign chest of $4.5 million the Kuomintang hired a lobby firm to exert pressure on the Executive from the Congress to give Lee his trip, the venue was a speech at his alma mater, Cornell University. The Kuomintang move coincided with the swearing in of the highly partisan 104th Congress under Speaker Gingrich. Support for Lee's travel to Cornell mushroomed and caught many unawares. In the Executive Branch there were many who were blocked from trying to head-off this train wreck because they could not conceive that Congress could be so irresponsible. In these circles there was no doubt Lee's trip to Cornell, especially under circumstances of obvious Kuomintang lobbying, was a worse case scenario. But, Lee got his trip. The second SEF-ARATS summit was never held. The State Department shunned the TECRO representative. And, consensus withered for moving ahead on the provision of some of the systems the March 1995 Arms Sales Talks had favored.

The lesson here is that we can have pretty much any relationship we want with Taiwan, as long as it is low profile. Little has changed since the Carter Administration when we sold arms to Taiwan in batches less than had to be reported to Congress. In ending Carter's policy and publicly announcing a major arms sale to Taiwan, the Reagan Administration poked Beijing in the eye, guaranteed a reaction, and ended up with the 1982 Communiqué. The issue is not that we need Beijing's permission or are kowtowing to Beijing in our relationship with Taipei. The issue is that the lower profile a relationship we have with Taipei in certain areas, the more fulsome it can be. Until the two of them work out some mutual agreement. Anyway, Lee's trip to Cornell was a watershed in which we were left with deteriorating relationships on both sides of the Strait.

Q: Given your long interest in China policy. These were rather anticlimactic circumstances for the end of your career.

REUTHER: Perhaps so, but one is always learning. It is always interesting to see how some of the events that one has been involved with are represented in the press or the academic community. For example, I have read academic tomes on Sino-American relations that note that we refused to sell Taiwan the manpack Stinger missile and forced them to purchase a jeep mounted version. And there is a half-truth to this story. After Afghanistan and Stingers showing up in unexpected places, the uniformed side of the house disapproved of providing the manpack version of this weapon to anyone. I found this out when New Zealand sought to purchase this equipment for one of its UN peacekeeping forces. We did not sell manpack. The stingers had to be attached to something larger - so they would not show up in unexpected places. That we consummated a Stinger sale for Taiwan is a demonstration of doing our proper job, not abandoning the Taiwanese as critics charged. Anyway you are right. I transferred out of ISA/AP in October 1995. It was an enormous pleasure to work with my uniformed colleagues from Thailand to the Pentagon.

A Specialist in Chinese Affairs and a speaker of Chinese, Mr. Martin spent the major part of his career dealing with matters relating to China, both in Washington and abroad. His overseas assignments included Hong Kong, Taipei, Huangzhou (formerly Canton), Beijing, Manila and Rangoon. His Washington assignments also concerned China and the Far East. Mr. Martin was born in Indiana of Missionary parents and was raised in the US. and India. He is a graduate of Kalamazoo College and Syracuse University. Mr. Martin was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

Q: Today is December 15, 2000. There has been a hiatus where Gene was off, called back to serve as DCM in Beijing. But now we're picking this up again, and we're going back to 1979. You went to S/S. What type of work were you doing? Could you describe what S/S or S/S-S was doing at that time because the roles sometimes change around, and then what you were doing?

MARTIN: At that time, S/S was still in the throes of having been built up during the Kissinger era, when S/S became really the private staffing organization for the Secretary. What I came into was S/S-S, the Secretariat Staff, which essentially was responsible for handling paper from the department to the Seventh Floor Principals, as well as staffing the secretary's overseas trips, of which there were many.

Q: Well now, the secretary at this point was...

MARTIN: This was during the Carter Administration. The secretary was Cyrus Vance and Warren Christopher was deputy secretary. I came in during the summer of '79, just before the Iran hostage crisis. Having just come out of Taiwan and the normalization process, I went into the officer position on the team handling East Asia, refugees and politico-military affairs. But East Asia generally kept me fairly well occupied.

Q: This was about three years after Kissinger had left. Was there a change in the attitude of the department, how it operated, from what you were getting from older hands? Under Cyrus Vance, was it different?

MARTIN: I think it was lower key, the pressure was less, and there was a less frantic pace than it had been under Kissinger. I had only been in the department under Kissinger when I was on the Burma desk previously but had been quite removed from the seventh floor. Kissinger did not spend a great deal of time on Burmese affairs, as you can imagine.

But I think that the staffing was still there, and the traditions and procedures put in place during the Kissinger era basically continued. I think in subsequent years this has changed. I was responsible for East Asia, primarily; but we also took turns working the secretary's overseas trips. It did not necessarily mean that you would go only to your geographical bureau. You would go on whatever trip was scheduled on a rotational basis.

My first trip was to Panama for Vance's signing of the Panama Canal Treaty, which had been a big political battle on the Hill. In many ways, it was similar to the PNTR (Permanent Normal Trade Relations) battle this year for China.

Q: Would you explain what that means?

MARTIN: The granting of permanent normal trading relations, or what previously was called MFN (Most Favored Nation) status to China after we reached an agreement on PRC accession to the World Trade Organization (WTO). The battle, or the all court press this year was really reminiscent in my mind of the effort that was put on by the Carter administration to ratify the Panama Canal Treaty, which was very controversial.

Q: Was the fact that it was signed in Panama, and then Vance went down there, apparently to avoid getting the president too exposed back home, do you think?

MARTIN: Actually, as it turned out, I was the advance team, as the Secretariat was called. The advance team went first to work out the details of the secretary's schedule with the Embassy, and then a second team came in with the secretary on the airplane. The two Secretariat teams supported the secretary with paper, communications, staffing, such as preparing Memoranda of Conversations, cables, etc. I went down and spent a day or two getting ready for the visit, then got word that he had to cancel his trip because of Afghanistan. So he never came. I had an extra day in Panama to do a little sightseeing, see the canal do some shopping, and then turn around and come home. So that was my first trip with the Secretariat, which turned out to be a dry hole.

Q: What was the Panamanian reaction. Did they understand that Afghanistan was a big deal?

MARTIN: I think they understood that, mainly because they already had the agreement on the treaty and they had gotten what they wanted, which was the canal; and so whether or not Vance came or not, it didn't make any difference.

The second trip I took was to Europe when Vance was going to Bonn and to a number of other places for a whole series of meetings, nothing particular in my recollection. Again, I advanced the trip, first to Bonn, and then to Rome, and then to London. And that was the usual frantic pace that the secretary's visits usually cause, which has gotten only worse since then. The "baggage" that goes along with any secretary when he or she travels these days is quite significant. That was an advance trip, which again, was fun in many ways, seeing different parts of the world in which I had not served, having an opportunity to go and spend a couple of days in each place. It generally worked out pretty well.

Q: Was there an entourage that always went with Vance, for example, or was it sort of a mix?

MARTIN: It was a mixed gang. The regional bureau representatives would go along, obviously, doing whatever, depending on where he's going; and then Secretariat staffers and a Deputy Executive Secretary would go along on the trip to try to run the administrative side of it. In many ways Vance was quite low-key. He didn't do as much traveling as Henry Kissinger had done.

Q: Who was the head of the Secretariat?

MARTIN: The executive secretary at the time was Peter Tarnoff. The Director of the S/S-S was Art Hughes. I was only there less than a year. I'd come back in the summer of '79 from Taiwan, and in February of 1980, I moved over to be the special assistant to the Deputy Secretary, which was Warren Christopher.

***

Q: Yes. Well now, what was Warren Christopher like to work for?

MARTIN: Privately, he was a wonderful person. He's a really very warm, engaging, humorous person. Publicly, however, he had a totally different image. He was a lawyer's lawyer. He kept everything extremely close to his chest. While he treated his staff well and was personable, he did not share a great deal of the information. He tended to keep his own counsel. Often we would have to ask him about an issue. If you asked, he would then tell you what he was thinking, all that was going on; but he did not volunteer it. But we had a good group of people working in that office, and it was very enjoyable.

Q: What was your role in that particular staff?

MARTIN: My role was to make sure he was aware of what was going on in the building; that he was fully briefed; that when he was having meetings or when he was asked to have meetings, he had all the information he needed to make the decision; and that he had the necessary papers to be able to conduct a meeting. I was also responsible for making sure the bureau for which I was responsible knew what his thinking was, and also to try to be able to run interference when necessary to get things done.

Q: Did you find at his level that the hostage situation in our embassy in Tehran pretty well tied everything up, or was it business as usual?

MARTIN: For the first few months it was more business as usual; but as the hostage situation dragged on, he became increasingly wrapped up in it. By the end of my tour there, he was spending almost all of his time on the hostage negotiations because he was the designated negotiator and had the responsibility for the talks. But before his almost total focus on the hostages, he was engaged in pretty much a full range of the Department's activities. Desert One, the hostage rescue attempt that failed so dramatically and tragically in Iran, made him the key person in the crisis.

During the first few months of the hostage negotiation, there was a great deal of pressure for the U.S. to try to do something, to try to rescue the hostages. There were diverse ideas and suggestions floating around. Ross Perot and EDS (Electronic Data Systems) was quite successful in getting some of his employees out of Tehran. There was a great deal of to-ing and fro-ing as to whether it was possible, whether we could do it. The military was anxious to do it, to prove it could be done. So the mission group was cobbled together, a joint command as all the services wanted to participate. There's been a lot written about this, so I don't need to go into a lot of detail. From my perspective, it was an effort to make sure that we notified allies, that we were able to keep everybody aware of what's going on without letting anybody know what we were going to do, which is sometimes difficult.

What happened, as everybody knows, was that we went in one night for the rescue attempt, and something went badly wrong, and one of the helicopters collided with the fuel carrying C-130 causing a big explosion which killed a lot of people and prevented others from getting out on the other aircraft.

Christopher had been involved in a long series of White House meetings at the National Security Council for several weeks. We were aware, I won't say totally, but in general terms, as to what was being planned, but we did not have all the details, which were closely held. The night of the event, we spent the whole night in the office at least until about four in the morning, waiting to hear whether the rescue was successful. When the tragedy occurred, we were there trying to pick up the pieces. It was a long night but a dramatic, memorable time.

Q: While you were working with Christopher, which was after we had normalized relations with Mainland China, was much coming out of this?

MARTIN: Oh, I think so. At that time, it was still very much a rapturous time of relations, despite the difficulties with AIT and the Taiwan Relations Act, which had been taken care of in the spring. By the next year, things had pretty well settled down. Taiwan was not collapsing; its economy had recovered somewhat, and it looked as though they were going to be able to regain their feet and maintain their balance. Deng Xiaoping had visited the States, the summer or '79 and there were as series of visitor exchanges.

One particular visit, which remember, was General Yang Shangkun, who was one of the old cadre, one of the old military leaders in China, came for a visit. He was having meetings in Christopher's office, mostly with Christopher, but also with the other people; and these went on for several days. I was involved in orchestrating and helping arrange it. At one point, the talks broke for a rest stop, or a pit stop, and Yang, who was at that time probably in his late 70s (still middle-aged in Chinese terms), had to go to the bathroom. So he got up, but kept talking with some other members of the American delegation as they walked out of the room and down the hall. Vivian Chang, who was our interpreter, was walking right alongside of them to interpret. They walked into the men's room, relieved themselves, and came back out, all still talking, and Vivian still translating.

It was rather humorous. A couple of us tried to flag her down as she went into the men's room, but nobody else seemed to notice. Obviously, they were well focused on the discussion. The exchanges at that time were good as we were beginning to establish some basis for the various agreements that we have with China in science and education, exchange agreements, and things like this. So there was a good deal of back and forth. Christopher was not involved a great deal, except as the protocolary host to senior Chinese leaders.

Q: Well, while you were in Christopher's office, did you get any feeling about the role of the National Security Advisor, Brzezinski, whether there was a feeling of either competition or being left out as there had been during Kissinger's time as National Security Advisor?

MARTIN: No, it wasn't the same personalities. Vance was lower key, and seemed not to play the power games. Brzezinski played the National Security Advisor role to the hilt, but I think Vance was able to hold his own. It was Desert One, the rescue mission, however, that caused Vance to resign. He disagreed with the policy to go in, and he decided that he could not continue as Secretary.

Q: What was the disagreement over?

MARTIN: I think the disagreement was whether or not it would be successful; whether the risk of the hostages being killed was greater than a possible success. I haven't read his memoirs, but that was my understanding of it at the time.

Q: I've talked to some of the hostages and to a person, they thanked God it didn't come off, because they said, "I don't think I'd be here yet."

MARTIN: A lot of the people that I've talked to subsequently felt that way too. There was a possibility! You sometimes have to take these chances. But I think that Vance felt strongly that this was not going to succeed, and unfortunately, it did not. So, in the end, the administration turned to negotiations; and Christopher spent the next seven or eight months, negotiating with the Iranians in various places. Some sessions were lengthy; some were quick trips out and back.

Q: Did you get involved in that?

MARTIN: I did not because another of his special assistants handled the Mid East. They went with him for the negotiation sessions. The legal advisor's office was represented, as well as the NSC and a number of other offices.

Q: What impression of President Carter and his handling of foreign affairs that you were picking up in the higher reaches of the Department?

MARTIN: I think the sense was that the hostage crisis was something that nobody would have been able to handle better, that it was a difficult situation. I was not an expert on Iran by any means, nor am I now, and I don't think I could have second-guessed Iranian policy. I recall was a lot of criticism of him, which partly was the reason for trying the rescue attempt. In the end, it just came down to hammering out a negotiated settlement.

Frankly, I think Reagan's stance, when he was elected, that, "I want those people freed, or there will be repercussions" helped move the negotiations to conclusion. The Iranians, of course, waited until the very last minute to release them, just as the inauguration was going on; but I think Reagan's taking office at that point was what really put the final chapter on it.

Christopher had reached the agreement prior to that during several trips to Algeria. I remember one time he expected to be gone for two days, then stayed two weeks. He told us he had only taken a couple changes of clothes, expecting to only be there a couple of days, and the two days dragged on and on and on. He ended up spending a lot of time washing out his clothes in the sink at the hotel, and extra items. But the president in Algeria took good care of the delegations as they were talking. When Christopher came back from one of these long sessions in Algiers, he brought back a couple of cases of wine that the president had given him; a case from the “La Réserve du Président.” He opened it in the office with the staff. It was probably the worst wine I’ve ever had! It was just awful! I think we could taste the sand of the desert in it still. I can guess why it was the president’s reserve -- he reserved it to give to other people and kept the best to drink himself!

Q: Algeria, of course, used to be a premier wine growing country.

MARTIN: Indeed! And many Algerian wines still are quite good, but this was not one of them! So after that I think the cases probably moldered away in the back room until they were poured out or given away. It was not good wine.

Q: During the time you were with Christopher, did any Asian issues of particular importance come up?

MARTIN: Human rights was a big issue at that time, of course. Under Carter, human rights became one of the key principles of our foreign policy. That was quite a dramatic change for a lot of the traditionalists, who felt you shouldn’t worry about human rights in foreign policy. You should look at international relations in real politic terms -- power structure, balance of power, force advancement, and so forth. Patricia Derian, who was the assistant secretary for Human Rights Affairs and a dynamic advocate of human rights. One of Warren Christopher’s more difficult jobs, at least in my area of the world, was refereeing (I think is the best word) or, basically, being the body block, between Pat and East Asia Assistant Secretary Dick Holbrooke, who did not like each other, or at least did not act as though they liked each other, and had diametrically opposed views on human rights and policy toward Asia, particularly Korea, the Philippines, China to a degree, Taiwan.

Q: There were a lot of problems. I had just left Korea, and our feeling was that’s all very nice, but they don’t have a massive army thirty miles away.

MARTIN: Right. Well, in retrospect, you look back at the famous Kim Dae Jung issue -- the time he was captured by the KCIA in Japan, smuggled back to Korea, and sentenced to death. All those issues were major, major concerns. It is interesting to look back now that Kim is president of the ROK.

Q: Well, did you find yourself sort of brought in on the China, I mean not just China, but the Asian Affairs thing more, or were you sort of a jack-of-all-trades?

MARTIN: No, I was brought in on the Asian issues. I was responsible for East Asia, politico-military affairs, and refugees, a similar portfolio that I had in the Secretariat.

Q: Were you seeing problems with the Philippines at this point? I’m thinking about the Marcos regime. Was this getting kind of a bit smelly?

MARTIN: It was getting smelly at that time, yes indeed! Imelda was beginning to come into her own at that point. It was not quite the corrupt autocracy that it became in subsequent years. But about '79 –80, by '80, yes, it was really beginning to impact. Filipino exiles overseas were beginning to organize, get a hearing on the Hill, and some attention in the press. This was beginning to get more attention on the seventh floor. I don't remember whether the secretary or the deputy secretary ever visited the Philippines at that point, but I don't remember any such trips during the year I was with Christopher.

Q: How about China? This has been your area. We now had diplomatic relations with Mainland China versus Taiwan. From your point of view, how were things developing after we'd recognized one and de-recognized the other? You were there at the beginning of things.

MARTIN: I think it was working. But after the Shanghai communiqué in 1972 during Nixon's visit, and then the normalization agreement, the second communiqué, the Chinese began to push hard about arms sales to Taiwan, because with the Taiwan Relations Act and the severance of relations, Congress insisted and the administration agreed to provide quite a number of arms to Taiwan. There was a lot of pressure from China to reduce our arms sales. This was working its way through the system in 1980–81, finally resulting in the 1982 communiqué. In that agreement, we agreed to limit arms sales, to not increase arms sales qualitatively or quantitatively beyond the level they had been at normalization. Since then, of course, the "basket" has been stretched far beyond all recognition in both measures.

Q: Were you seeing the Taiwanese lobbying? Its influence, was it pretty obvious?

MARTIN: It's always been fairly obvious. After Carter surprised everyone with recognition, the real lobbying, began in Congress on the Taiwan Relations Act. After the TRA gave Taiwan a sense of insurance, the lobbying continued; but the fact that Taiwan did not crumble, that the Chinese did not invade, and that our relationship with both China and Taiwan continued to develop took much of the wind out of the sails of the lobby. And the public rapture with China perhaps weakened the lobby's effectiveness and visibility. We didn't have that much of a problem, at least from my perspective, in terms of policy toward China.

Q: Were we seeing a rapid influx of Mainland Chinese students into the United States at this point?

MARTIN: Just the beginning. They didn't really begin until about 1982 when the PRC government began to send state sponsored students to the U.S.

Q: Well, I'm told there are something like 200,000 right now!

MARTIN: We have about 59,000 here at any one time still in student status. Many never went back after '89. I think that's where you get the 200,000 figure. Many of them are children of leading Communist officials, so the fact they didn't go back because of political persecution doesn't really have much validity. But students from China are the largest student contingent here from any foreign country.

Q: Were you getting any feedback from people in the East Asian Bureau about developments? Working with both Mainland China and Taiwan, were we able to balance these two?

MARTIN: I think so. I think everybody felt, despite initial misgivings or concerns, that the normalization seemed to have worked. The Taiwan Relations Act probably went a little bit further than some of us China people would have liked because it really boxed us in more than it would have been useful to have. Generally, however, it was working and things seemed to stabilize. Taiwan was beginning to make its first steps toward political reform domestically. Chiang Ching-kuo was taking some steps, which initially seemed to be quite risky, but he eventually abolished marshal law. He eventually opened up the political system, which has continued to help stabilize Taiwan and get it to where it is now. I think, at that time, it looked destabilizing and uncertain. Everybody was quite a concerned, but I think by '80, or the middle of '80, it looked as though it was coming along okay. Of course, we had the election that year; China was an issue, but it wasn't a big issue. Reagan came in with a very strong position on Taiwan.

Q: There was disquiet when Reagan became a candidate because he had been the governor of California, and California had been a center of the China lobby. When he was nominated, there must have been a certain amount of holding one's breath on the part of the China hands, just because this could upset an apple cart.

MARTIN: Right, very much so. I mean they were fairly concerned, and the comments he made during his campaign did cause people wonder what would happen. He talked about giving Taiwan the recognition it really deserved. He felt Taiwan really was a separate entity; and he made other comments, which could have thrown a wrench into the work. But like so many other candidates, once elected, they suddenly realize that they don't have a clear plate on which they can do what they want.

And I think their policies, while perhaps less friendly toward China initially, ended up about pretty much on the right track.

Q: The election, the new administration, the Reagan administration took over on 20 January 1981, and there you are as the assistant to a political appointee, Warren Christopher. What happened to you?

MARTIN: Well, let me go back a step. After Vance resigned, Ed Muskie became the Secretary. He was good, I thought, in terms of a bridge secretary at the end of the Carter administration. He had no great ambitions beyond that. I think he was a good man for the job at that juncture. He was able to run the department, run the rest of the world in terms of foreign policy while Christopher was so engaged on the hostage negotiations. I remember one of the things he said. I was sitting one night in my office waiting for a meeting to start when he came in and sat down across the desk from me. We chatted and he asked me how I like being a special assistant to Chris.

I said, "I like it as I feel I can be helpful to Chris on key issues."

His comment was, "In a way, we're all special assistants to the big guy," I thought that was a good perspective on our role in the administration, and, in my mind, summed up his whole attitude: that he was there to serve, to do what he could, but realized his position in the staffing pattern was to serve the President and his policies. He was an amiable, pleasant fellow without pretensions.

I enjoyed my year with Warren Christopher. Again his “private” personality was warm, and pleasant; but his public image was aloof and even cold. A couple of times I urged him to drop down in his private elevator to the fifth floor or the fourth floor of the department, and walk up and down the hall. I said, “Take 20 minutes; it’s not going to take more than that. Walk into offices and meet people, and say, ‘Thanks for what you’re doing.’ You’d make a tremendous difference to the morale in this building.” But he never did it. It was not his style. He wasn’t that kind of an outgoing, kind of guy. He was friendly privately, but not publicly. Perhaps it was shyness.

Q: Well, I had the same experience. I had George Kennan as ambassador, and it took me about a year to get him to come to the consular section. It was in a rather small embassy, he was on the fourth floor, and I was on the first floor. I always thought it’d be nice to come on in and say howdy. It took almost an act of God to get him down. I mean it was funny. He was a very nice man, and he was obviously a great intellect and of all that, but that inability to do a very simple thing. It’s amazing!

MARTIN: I tried the same thing with Chris. I said, “Instead of eating in your office,” which he often did, “or going up to the eighth floor, go down to the cafeteria and eat down there once in awhile.” Again, it was something that was not appealing, appetizing to him. It’s a different approach. It’s not a good or bad, but I think in terms of morale, it would have made a big difference to the worker bees down in the rest of the building.

Q: Well then, what happens? You have a new administration coming in.

MARTIN: Right. Well, first I wanted to get a Congressional fellowship. I wanted to go up on the Hill and learn something about Congress. So I was lobbying for that, and by the end of the year, of 1980, I had secured a Congressional Fellowship for the following fall. So I needed a six or eight month bridge assignment. Christopher didn’t actually leave office on January 20th because he was still in Algeria welcoming the hostages off the plane. So he was given dispensation for two days to be able to come back and then clean out his office, although he’d moved a lot of stuff by that time.

I initially thought I could stay in “D” with the new Deputy Secretary until I started my fellowship in the late summer. General Alexander Haig had been nominated as secretary, and Judge William Clarke, Reagan’s special assistant from the governor’s office in Sacramento, had been appointed as deputy secretary. Clarke came on board as Haig completed his three grueling days of confirmation hearings. The committee had gone through every iota of information that anybody could think of, from the most detailed to Haig’s view of the grand scheme of the world. Haig’s three briefing books were each about six inches thick, and I think they had studied them all. Haig, of course, was confirmed; and those briefing books, copies of them at least, were passed down to Judge Clarke for his use, to prepare himself for his confirmation hearings. He came in as a novice to Foreign Affairs. He had no experience, interest or background in international issues. So there was a bit of a dilemma as to how he was going to prepare for his confirmation hearings.

Meanwhile, all but one of the other staff assistants had left. The other career person and I were still there. One of the other career people had transferred at the beginning of the year, or at end of December, so we were down one; and the three political Schedule C assistants all left with Christopher, so we were down to just the two of us; and he was about to leave in March or in February. So there were just us two FSOs and the secretarial staff in the deputy's office.

When Clarke came in, he initially said, "Well you can stay on, and we can work together on this until we get settled." David Abshire took the lead coaching Clarke for his confirmation hearings. They worked long hard hours, very assiduously, but soon realized they were never going be able to bring him up to full speed by the time of the hearing. They certainly could not equal the Haig performance, Haig, of course, being quite the master of all sorts of details in foreign policy.

So what they decided to do was for Clarke, when he was asked a question, to say, "Well, I really do not have a position on that;" or "I don't really know about that, so I don't have an answer," or "I don't have a position. I don't know." So that is how the hearing went. It was really quite uncomfortable.

Q: Were you there?

MARTIN: Oh, yes! I was there. We went up together. I think he did all right, but he just did not have a handle.

Q: Well, was the questioning hostile, or was it what you'd call sort of the normal probing of somebody who's the number two position in State Department?

MARTIN: It was probing. It depended on the party of the questioner, of course. The Republicans were generally fairly friendly and calm; but even they, after a while, began to get a little bit concerned about his lack of any knowledge. They asked him what he read.

And he said, "Well, Newsweek and Time occasionally."

"And how often?"

"Well, maybe once a month or so."

"What other magazines did you read?"

"Well, I didn't really read magazines."

You know, and, "What books did you read?"

"I don't read many books."

It was very difficult, it was laborious; and for a while, people probed, but when they got nothing back, they finally gave up.

The hearing was about three hours long, as I recall. It wasn't ominous; it was just difficult. As we were riding back to the Department in the car, he turned to me and said, "Well Gene, how do you think I did?" This put me in a bit of a quandary as to how I could answer, since I was really quite discomforted by the whole event. So I made a comment, which I thought was a safe one when I made it, that, "Well, it'd be like me trying to pass the bar exam after two weeks of cramming." As soon as I said it, I remembered he had failed one portion of the California bar at least twice.

I don't know whether that ruined my relationship with him or not. Nevertheless, I offered to stay on for six months, if he wanted me to, to help him get settled and to staff the office. He decided he really did not need any staff assistants, that he would be able to operate with the secretarial staff, and drop (phone) lines he installed on his phone. If he had a question about Asia, he could push the button and call the Assistant Secretary for East Asian Affairs; if he had a question about Africa, the AF Assistant Secretary; or the legal advisor about legal matters, and so forth. He said he didn't really need anybody to interfere, or run interference between him and the bureaus. I realized at that point that there wasn't much of a role for me there, and so it was time to move on.

Q: Did he show any sort of intellectual curiosity or engagement in foreign policy when you were trying to bring him up to speed?

MARTIN: Not very much. It was totally alien to him and totally, if I may say "foreign."

He had no experience, he had no native interest in it, and his background was as a rancher and as a California staffer. He wasn't a politician. He was a judge; he was a Supreme Court Justice in California. Basically, he was there because he was a close, long time friend of Reagan.

Q: Did you get any feeling from other people about why he was put there?

MARTIN: The scuttlebutt around was that he was there to watch Haig. He to keep an eye on Haig and make sure he didn't get out of line in terms of the White House.

Q: Haig was considered by the Reaganites to be running away with the ball in a way, and it didn't take them too long, about a year, to get him.

MARTIN: Right after the Hilton shooting. The "I am in charge!" comment was the final straw, and then they got him. By that time, after Haig left, Clarke moved over to White House and became National Security Advisor.

***

Q: You were there from '84 to when?

MARTIN: I was there from March 1984 until July 1985, about a year and a quarter.

Q: What were some of the issues in which you were involved?

MARTIN: China obviously was a big issue. This was right after the '82 Communiqué with China.

Q: What was the '82 Communiqué?

MARTIN: This was the one about arms sales to Taiwan. This was also, the first Reagan administration; and we were still trying to sort our way through China policy at that time. The '82 Communiqué had been done during Secretary Alexander Haig's term. When George Shultz came in as secretary, there was some difference of opinion, so we were trying to sort out exactly what our policy was going to be regarding China and Taiwan. Subsequent issues included Japan trade issues and Korean human rights, especially regarding Kim Dae Jung. Southeast Asia was a little less troublesome except for the Philippines. We were coming up on the end of the Marcos era, and that took an awful lot of time as it was increasingly apparent by '84 that Marcos was on the skids and our policy needed attention. Benigno Aquino went back to the Philippines from his U.S. informal exile and was assassinated at the airport. So most of our effort was spent on the Philippines, China, Japan trade, Korean Peninsula, and South East Asia in general. The rest of ASEAN (Association of Southeast Asian Nations) was doing okay. In New Zealand, we had the problem with David Lange, who was elected to be Prime Minister and immediately turned off any nuclear cooperation with the U.S. and banned nuclear ships. As a result, our security relationship with ANZUS (Australia-New Zealand-United States) was curtailed, becoming just an Australian-U.S. relationship.

Q: An area that was always the center of your interests, I would assume, would be the two-China relationship. How was that being played? Did you have any role in this during this '84 – 85 period?

MARTIN: Our role was mainly as an observer and a participant in the sense of sort of making sure that things were working as they were decided. I can't say that I was the one who made policy!

I accompanied Paul on his trip to China in the summer of '84 for what was a good visit, and participated in his meetings with Chinese leaders. It gave me a chance to learn about what was going on in China from high-level interlocutors. I hadn't been in China for several years at that point, so it was good to get back and update my information.

Q: Whither China at that point? Where was it going?

MARTIN: At that time, Deng had come back in power certainly. The reforms were taking effect. The changes were really quite dramatic! Deng had returned to power in '78 and had launched his economic reforms. The countryside was really becoming quite prosperous. The cities were less advanced, I think, than the countryside, but the country as a whole had a lot more optimism. They were beginning to build; they were beginning to be more open to the outside. That era was probably one of the more optimistic in the last several decades. This, of course, all ended in '89 with Tiananmen.

But in 1984 it was quite positive. Everybody was looking forward to Reagan's visit in his second term and we were already starting to plan for that. Shultz went to China in 1986. So I think that there was a fairly good feeling that bilateral relations were moving the right direction.

Q: How about Taiwan? What was happening there at that time?

MARTIN: On Taiwan, they had made considerable progress as well. Of course, in '79 when we normalized with the Mainland, Taiwan went through a crisis. But they had turned around. Their economy was doing much better. They had relaxed some of the marshal law restrictions and soon ended the decades long martial law and moved toward democracy. So Taiwan was beginning to look quite stable. This was only about two, three years after the '82 Communiqué. I think the idea that we were not going to enhance our arms sales to Taiwan arms was the common belief in Beijing, resulting in their willingness to improve relations with us.

Q: Was there any concern in the bureau that we'd come up with this elaborate arrangement for dealing with Taiwan that prevented senior officials from visiting look around and have face-to-face meetings?

MARTIN: It did. But I think there were enough ways to meet with Taiwan authorities when they came here, or in other places. We had the AIT Washington office here; and whenever Taiwan people came over here, there were ways in which the State people could go over and meet with them. They didn't come into the State Department building. There was a sort of a fence around the building, but there were no restrictions on the number of people who'd go and talk with them, even at the assistant secretary level. Obviously, Shultz or other principals didn't, but they had worked out the arrangements in such a way in the previous five years that we were able to make it work. I remember Double Ten (anniversary of Republic of China) parties at the Four Seasons Hotel in Georgetown, which were attended by everybody. In those days, Taiwan's unofficial office in the U.S. was called CCNAA (Coordination Council for North American Affairs), a rather awkward name and almost unintelligible acronym. Rather senior officials attended the Double Ten receptions, unofficially of course. The fiction was there, but the work went on.

Q: What were the political issues?

MARTIN: The issues have changed considerably in recent years, but some remain the same – Taiwan, human rights. Trade was less of an issue than it is now, because we didn't have as much trade. We obviously had the annual MFN discussion and debate in Congress, but even at that early stage it pretty much went well. It was before Tiananmen, so the yearly determination and Congressional response under the Jackson-Vanik bill was not nearly as contentious. MFN went through quickly. The major difference, I think, was that at that point, the U.S. had a security relationship with China in a sense. Since the cold war was still "on," we were still playing China off against the Soviet Union. We actually had military-military relations. We had agreed to sell avionics components for the F-5 fighter that was very much in the works. So there were a number of politico-military relationships to manage.

Q: What sort of information were you getting from CIA, military, and from our own embassy and all about what's going on in China?

MARTIN: China is always opaque. It's difficult to get information about China. At that point, it was beginning to change. Hong Kong traditionally was the window on China, and it was easier to get more information on China in Hong Kong than one ever could in the mainland because people would come out of China and feel more comfortable meeting with foreigners. Even Party cadre, government officials would come out to Hong Kong occasionally, and if you could meet with them, they would tell you more than they would tell you back home. But by the mid-1980s things were beginning to open up in China. The good relations with the U.S., I think, helped people feel more confident about talking to us to explain the situation after the change, explain decision making, explain factions within the government, to give us a little bit more of an insight on how decisions are reached, what different interest groups were pushing. A lot of it was economics because the reforms were focused on agricultural and industrial reform. The military was still the fourth modernization. They were the ones at the bottom of the heap, and so the military was not getting a lot of attention or resources from the government. And the Taiwan issue was not a very live one. It was there, there was no question about it, but it was not in the forefront.

There was a general feeling that things were getting better in China, that they were making slow progress to a more open society. There was more of a dialogue with the foreign ministry and diplomats abroad in terms of things that we were doing. The relations with the Chinese embassy here were good. The desk had close relations with them, and we dealt with them on an amicable way. So in a sense, there was a sense that things were improving, things were getting better, and so forth.

Q: How did you find the Chinese embassy dealing, say, with the Washington political system? In many ways the State Department's not the real player; it's more Congress and the media.

MARTIN: Oh, it's disastrous. It's always been disastrous. Their idea of congressional relations is to go up and hammer on the table and say, "You can't do that because it would hurt the feelings of the Chinese people." The usual answer, in substance if not words, was, "Yea? Get out of my house!" I also think they did not fully understand how the system works. They thought the State Department and President determined U.S. policy and could bring Congress into line. So Congressional resolutions were seen as evidence the U.S. government (i.e., the executive branch) was not being honest with them and really wanted to double deal, especially on Taiwan. But they've improved recently. They are certainly more active, and more knowledgeable, but I still think that they have difficulty understanding the USG is not a monolithic system. That is what they are used to at home as the National People's Congress (NPC) is still essentially a rubber stamp for what the Party and government want. But even their system is changing and the NPC is somewhat more autonomous of the Party and government than before.

Q: How did the Chinese embassy compare with the Taiwanese ability to operate in Washington?

MARTIN: They're masters! The Israelis and the Taiwanese are probably the unsurpassed masters at this. The mainland Chinese have never been able to match Taiwan's representatives. So I think they had a problem. But again, the public attitude on China in those days was still positive, the good feelings from normalization of relations and the growing trade, business dealings and academic exchanges affected policy. So the embassy was able to have a pretty good PR program.

Q: Were you seeing the massive influx of Chinese students, coming to the United States at graduate level and many of them returning, as making a change? Was this positive? How were we viewing this?

MARTIN: Oh, it was, very much so. Starting about 1981 – 82, they began to send a lot of scholars, government students, government sponsored students to the U.S. for graduate work. By '85 – 86, they were beginning to allow more and more students come privately, at their own expense, not sponsored by the state. When the state sponsored students here, it had a pretty good tight lease on them, and most of them returned. Not all did, but most went back, because of family, the bond they had put down as a surety, their old job waiting for them, etc. Subsequently, many found their return to their old jobs didn't work out, because once they'd been overseas, many were unwilling or unable to fit back into the old bureaucracy. Once you've been to Boston or San Francisco and studied at the best universities in the world, how do you go home again?

There were many frustrations for these scholars who went back to China, back into their old state sector jobs. They returned with new ideas, which were not welcomed by the people who didn't go to overseas; they came back with expectations and an awareness of how you can do things in the States; and even in those days, had learned to use computers, and many Chinese offices had little electricity, much less computers! And so there was a great deal of dissatisfaction among returned students but generally, the idea of people coming and studying in the States and then going back was a very positive one.

Q: Did you run across any of these? Early on there were always people who sought asylum - I always think of the tennis star. I would think this would have been a burr under your saddle all the time.

MARTIN: Oh, we had these hiccups. Hu Na, the tennis star who defected on the West Coast, caused heartburn. But these things were just bumps in the road and generally didn't last long. I think the Chinese realized the risk they were taking sending people out of China but decided the payoff was worth it.

Q: Was there concern about the Mainland Chinese, their operatives, intelligence operatives working in the United States?

MARTIN: The one that really got everybody's attention was Larry Wu-tai Chin, a FBIS and CIA translator for many years, who turned out to be a long-term mole. He was arrested but hung himself in jail before trial. That obviously caused a big stir so everybody was immediately looking around for other spies. I remember having met with Larry when he came to the desk. I talked to him a number of times. He was very effective. The Chin case put everybody's teeth on edge. We spent a great deal of time with the FBI counterintelligence office, talking with them, dealing with them, looking at various Chinese that had come on trips, come on delegations, and so forth. Yes, so there was obviously considerable attention to intelligence issues

Q: What about Taiwan? In your work, what was happening in Taiwan?

MARTIN: Taiwan, again, was continuing to loosen up, continuing to democratize its system. Chiang Ching-kuo died about that time and a new generation of leadership moved in. My office was situated in a short hall between the China desk suite of offices and the Taiwan coordination office, part of the bureau's regional affairs office. As these two offices were side by side and my office was in between, I considered myself as being in the Taiwan Strait, the guard between the two sides. We had a lot to do with the Taiwan coordinating staff, making sure that we coordinated with them and with AIT's Washington office across the river in Arlington.

Q: Was there concern about the growing democratization of Taiwan? As long as you have a nice solid authoritarian regime on Taiwan, it's fairly easy to dismiss them and to say, "Well, you know, we got one here and one there, and now one's bigger than the other, so we'll pick the bigger one as our thing." But when you have one who's all a sudden becoming more like us, it's hard.

MARTIN: That was a dilemma! It's become more of a dilemma. In those days, it was still at the early stages, so there wasn't quite as much democracy to brag about. But the trend was evident. There was, I think, a lot of discomfort in the mainland about this because they saw this change, but still, the KMT was in power. The KMT had been in power since Chang Kai-shek came to power in the late '20s. So there wasn't a lot of change, but there was a liberalization, a general relaxation of the political system in Taiwan. We saw this as a potential problem for the future, but it was not an issue at that point.

Q: Yes. Were you feeling pressure from... say Texas and all to sell more planes? I mean congressional pressure on, you know, arm sales, particularly to Taiwan, but also to Mainland China now?

MARTIN: Well, the Mainland China sale was basically the avionics upgrade of the F-5, which never really got very far, but it did go through. We dealt with the Rolls Royce Spey Engine, which the British were selling. We had lots of discussions about how it would be used, whether or not it could be reverse engineered and then they could start manufacturing it themselves, and what it would do for the fighters that they were going to put it in. The Chinese had a lot of problems with that. That engine had a lot of potential, but the problems were even greater because the engine was of a configuration that they would have to basically modify the entire fuselage to be able to fit the engine into it. Basically, they would have had to rebuild the plane! So, even though on the outside there were occasionally potshots by the Washington Times and conservatives who were worried about this sort of thing, in reality, the more you got into it, the more problems they had. Frankly, looking at the Chinese arms industry, defense industry, in terms of their technology, their machine tools, their metallurgy, and so forth, they were nowhere near a level that could have manufactured that engine. They've improved a lot since those days, but this was early on. You must remember, this was only a decade after the end of the Cultural Revolution. They had to rebuild their manufacturing base in those ten years. In the last ten, fifteen years, they have certainly progressed much faster.

I think the issue with Taiwan really was an issue on arms sales. It always was an issue even after the '82 Communiqué. The bucket, which we said was not going to expand, didn't expand, but it was very elastic. The bucket tended to grow, even though it may not have expanded. The main issue at the time was the agreement to let Taiwan build an IDF (Indigenous Defense Fighter), which, some people, said was essentially an F-16. General Dynamics gave Taiwan considerable assistance with plans, designs, and so forth, but we insisted the IDF was Taiwan's own fighter. Again, you play the show game.

Q: What about the relationship between China and the Soviet Union? This is still the Soviet Union at this point.

MARTIN: The triangular relationship still pertained. China didn't have very good relations with the Soviet Union. Gorbachev had come into power at that point and the Chinese were concerned about what Gorbachev was doing domestically in terms of relaxation of political control, "perestroika" (restructuring) and "glasnost" (openness), and worried about what that was going to mean. But since they didn't have close relations with the Soviet Union, the three way "card game" we were playing with them was not as active. Moscow was mired down in Afghanistan, and it didn't have much of a role outside. There were still concerns in Eastern Europe, of course, but I think generally that was not an issue with which we dealt.

Q: Did people who were in the Chinese embassy come over and talk about what's happening in the Soviet Union? I mean was it that type of relationship where they could get much information?

MARTIN: Not really. They've never been very good about talking about a third country. Occasionally they do, particularly more recently. My experience in Beijing was that we held more "tour d'horizon" (general survey) discussions on what was happening in the Middle East; what their views were on South Africa; how they felt about what was happening in Korea; their relations with Vietnam, India, etc. So we did have regional discussions, but that was not really the case when I was on the desk.

Q: At that time, and speaking of Korea, were we using the Chinese to figure out what was happening?

MARTIN: We didn't get much from them on that. No, they were careful about not saying very much about North Korea. That was still their special relationship, not quite the old "lips and teeth" but still unique. I think by the mid-1980s they had begun to drift away from the DPRK as China focused on its economic development and growing relationship with the U.S..

***

Q: What was the job you had, and where did it fit?

MARTIN: The job was as the chief of the Asia-Africa area, which essentially was the entire heroin account in those days. That was before Columbia drug lords began to grow poppies and make heroin. Most of the heroin in the States was coming out of Southeast Asia or South Asia - Afghanistan, Pakistan, and border areas. Burma still was the largest producer of opium and heroin. When I began the assignment, I found that 99 percent of the US government's attention was on cocaine. Resources, programs and personnel were focused on South America. There were narcotics control officers at the embassies, and military personnel from SOUTHCOM (U.S. Southern Command) in Panama were actively engaged in the effort. While there was no question cocaine and crack was a serious problem, and that we needed to spend most of our resources on sources of cocaine, I felt the amount of attention and resources given to the heroin problem was not adequate. I was able to do some traveling. I went to China with the assistant secretary, who was Mel [Melvyn] Levitsky; traveled to the China-Burma border from the Chinese side; worked with the Chinese closely in an effort to increase our counter-narcotics cooperation. I also went on a trip around the world with an interagency team - from DEA (Drug Enforcement Agency), the CIA, and Defense Department - to key capitals to talk about cooperation. My job was to work with host governments on crop substitution programs and counter narcotics prevention and enforcement training. We worked with police, military, and different ministries in the various countries trying to get them to increase cooperation with us and to cut trafficking routes as well as opium poppy growing areas. And I even got a trip to Lagos and to Benin. That was for three days, and that was quite enough!

Q: Was Africa much of a problem?

MARTIN: Africa was a problem mainly because of the Nigerian traffickers. Nigerians were just beginning to get involved in the trafficking of heroin around the world. There was a big West African community in Bangkok. A lot of people were being used as mules, or drug carriers. They had a network which persuaded various people - travelers, tourists, students - to transport narcotics internationally for $200 to $300. Many were caught and incarcerated, learning the hard way that $2-300 doesn't do you very much good in jail for 15 or 20 years. The West African traffickers initiated what we called the "swallowers." The dealers would encapsulate heroin in condoms, tie them off and have the carriers swallow them. The carriers then would get on the plane and travel to the United States, and after arriving - how should we put it delicately - deliver the goods. Occasionally, one of the condoms would burst in the stomach, and you would have a massive overdose and death right there on the plane, or at the airport. It was a messy business. When I visited Pakistan, I went to Northwest frontier and stepped across the border into Afghanistan. What a difficult area in which to work. Pakistan's northwest frontier seemed like a different world from the rest of Pakistan. We are seeing that in today's situation. I found INM to be a good job! It was interesting because I was involved with a lot of different agencies I had not dealt with before - the National Drug Control Center, the Drug Czar's Office, the Defense Department, and DEA. CIA was very much involved in counter narcotics efforts - working on intelligence backgrounds, networks of traffickers, kingpins, and ways to block the various trafficking routes and networks. Chinese triads and secret organizations, of course, actively trafficked narcotics around Southeast Asia and across the world. Mostly it was heroin. Ice, D-methamphetamines, which is very popular in Asia, particularly in Chinese communities and Japan, was just beginning to be a problem for the U.S., coming into the States through Hawaii and the West Coast. We were constantly having to find new programs and techniques to turn off the supply. I was also involved in the demand side of the drug issue -- rehabilitation, education, trying to get people to rehabilitation centers, to find methadone treatment programs.

Q: What was the attitude at that time? Here was a war. Were you winning, losing, or treading water, or what?

MARTIN: Treading water at best, I would say. The amount of money involved in drug trafficking, then and now, is so fantastic that some people will take a chance on trafficking in it because the payoff is so great. Innocent, or not so innocent, tourists abroad who would be willing for a couple hundred dollars or a couple thousand dollars to try to smuggle drugs into the U.S. Many of them got caught but we had the sense that we were catching was only a small percentage of what was flowing. The amount of drugs that came in, in containers aboard ships, by air, in the mail, all sorts of different routes - it's a difficult product to lock out, and the demand is such that there will always be a market and profit for those who can bring in the product.

Q: How did you find the various American agencies worked together?

MARTIN: Fairly well. There were obviously turf battles. Part of the problem was everybody had their own agendas and their own budgets. Customs and DEA, perhaps, were the two main rival, if that's the right word, agencies. They were always trying to make the seizures so that they could take the credit for "x" amount of tons of drugs. They didn't want to share information, didn't want to share intelligence back and forth, because they didn't want the other guy to get the credit. The FBI wanted to get into the act, so they were trying to set up their own counter narcotics division. They resented their sister agency in Justice, DEA, getting all the action. There was cooperation to a degree but still a lot of rivalry.

Q: State didn't have a particular stake in this particular area.

MARTIN: State did not really have a stake in the enforcement side of things. We were mainly involved in policy. We negotiated cooperation and training programs with other governments. The only place we were involved in operations was in Central and Latin America, in Peru and Ecuador where INM had its own little air force, flying planes with State Department employees.

Q: How about foreign governments? As you saw it, what was the attitude of certain governments towards this? Were some already bought by the drug lords? Were the others trying to do it, but ineffectively; while others were effective?

MARTIN: I can't talk from personal experience about South America where we have heard about the drug lords controlling vast areas of Columbia, and problems with corrupt Mexican police, and military in other places. In my part of the world I think it was basically a matter of ineffectiveness, the inability to really do very much about it. There was corruption - no question about it - in Thailand and in Pakistan. Burma was a difficult case because the government claimed, with some validity, that they did not control the drug growing areas or drug trafficking areas in the northeast and the northwest. At the same time, they made alliances with the hill tribes that were growing opium poppies. In return for stopping their insurgency against the Central Government, Rangoon allowed the hill tribes to have autonomy, i.e., to grow whatever they wanted, which was usually drugs since that was the most profitable crop. There were always rumors and stories about the government leaders in Rangoon being involved in corruption, and drug payoffs, but there was never any hard evidence on that. China was a difficult case because China's view basically was, "We will take care of our problem [within China's borders]. You take care of your problem [in your cities]." Many countries felt, "Well, it's America's problem. It's your domain. It's your people that are doing this. If you just get them to stop buying and using the drug, we wouldn't have this problem. We're just the victims too. It's all just passing through us." I would respond by saying that the trouble is when you have a pipeline, it tends to leak. When you have drugs on the back of a truck, some falls off the back of the truck, and you pretty soon have users, addicts all along the trafficking routes. This is exactly what was happening in Burma, Thailand and China. The traffickers started paying the people along the way, the couriers if you will, in drugs, at least in part; and so they became addicted. They then became pushers themselves to pass on the drug, and China now has a tremendous drug problem. Pakistan also has a growing drug abuse problem, as does Burma. All these countries, which previously were just routes through which the drugs passed, now became users. So the problem has come home to them - that it is not only the West's problem, it's also theirs.

Q: How did you find the State Department hierarchy up above? Did you yourself get good support?

MARTIN: I think pretty good support. I attribute that mainly to Mel Levitsky, the INM assistant secretary at the time, who was very well regarded by the Seventh Floor, was able to explain his position and go after the resources that he needed. I think he was well respected by the drug czar and by other members of the community. I thought he was quite effective.

***

Q: Were you trained in Mandarin or Cantonese initially?

MARTIN: I was initially trained in Cantonese. So it was an ideal job for me. I was one of the few in the Foreign Service that actually took Cantonese. Three of us in Hong Kong back in the mid-1960s were sent to the Yale in China program at the Chinese University to learn Cantonese. The other two officers were Sidney Goldsmith and Joe Moyle. So even though my Cantonese was only at the two level, it was still useful. I was able to dust it off enough to use it for social courtesy purposes. All officials, even though they may have been Cantonese and spoke more accented or worse Mandarin than I did, had to use Mandarin in their official dealings. I found it useful to listen to their side comments in Cantonese. Once they realized I could understand Cantonese, they were more cautious. After I spent six months re-learning Mandarin at FSI, I went off to Guangzhou in January of 1993. I was there three and a half years until the middle of 1996 when I went back to Manila.

Q: What was the situation in Guangzhou? I mean how were our relations, and how was the consulate doing because this was still the period after Tiananmen. Was a cloud hovering over everything?

MARTIN: Guangdong, South China really is quite different from the rest of the country. Their mindsets are different from the northerners', particularly those in Beijing. They're different in terms of their outlook toward the west, or to the outside world in general. They've had much more contact with the world. Most of the overseas Chinese, at least until recently, have been from that part of China. Most of the Chinese American community came from four districts of Guangdong Province, speaking Toishanese and other local dialects. So in many ways there was a lot more connectivity between Guangdong, and the Cantonese people, and the rest of the world than there was with China at large. I think Tiananmen seemed like it was far away to the Cantonese, and it was not an issue that came up very much in our discussions with the officials down there. The consulate itself was primarily focused on consular work. It was the only immigrant visa issuing post for all of China. So people from all over China had to come to Guangzhou to get their immigrant visas. The reason that was put in place was because initially most of the people going to the States, because of the Cantonese emigration, had family connections with South China. So it made some sense to put all the immigrant visa work there. In future it seems to me there's some question as to whether we need to have two immigrant visa issuing posts a hundred miles apart - Hong Kong and Guangzhou. As Hong Kong becomes more and more linked into China, it makes some sense, in my view, to perhaps centralize immigrant visa issuance, probably in Guangzhou. But we will probably have to wait until after 2047, after Hong Kong's 50 year Special Administrative Region (SAR) status ends and it is (presumably) integrated into China entirely. So we had a large visa operation there. At the same time, we also had a very important economic and political reporting function, because at that point in '93, Guangdong was at the peak of its economic reforms; at the beginning of its economic boom. In 1992, Deng Xiaoping had taken a trip to the south. After the '89 Tiananmen incident, the government was forced by the conservatives in the Party, to back off on economic reforms, to back off on opening to the outside. So when Deng came to Shenzhen in '92, looked around, and said, "Hmm, this is pretty good," everybody said, "Whew!" and off they went, and started a big economic boom. By '93 Guangdong had become the powerhouse of the Chinese export market; and even today, I think, or at least until recently, almost 40 percent of Chinese exports came from Guangdong Province alone. It was really "the" major export oriented market. Businesses were in there. U.S. businesses came in and invested. Hong Kong businesses came across the border. Almost all the manufacturing that had previously been done in Hong Kong had moved across into Guangdong Province. So the Consulate had a big economic role. We had a political role in terms of what was happening politically in South China, which again, had a different perspective both on the world, as well as on how politics should be run, from what Beijing wanted done, or what they felt needed to be done. If Beijing "put politics in command," as Mao used to say, in Guangdong, they much preferred to put "economics" (in reality, money) in command.

Q: Let's look to the economic side first. Now these companies, American companies, who were investing there, would be investing in order to get cheaper laborers - essentially good cheap labor, I guess.

MARTIN: That was one factor but not the only factor. In my opinion, the factor that brought them there, was to get a toe into China's potentially huge domestic market. Most were consumer product companies - the Kelloggs, the Proctor and Gambles, soft drink manufacturers, beer companies and so forth. They were initially required to export most if not all their products, but they were all positioning themselves for a future role in the Chinese domestic market.

Q: Getting a foot in there, in the Chinese market.

MARTIN: Right, because they saw the potential for a Chinese market, and it was tremendous! Now, this is the old song, of course, which has been sung by starry-eyed foreign manufacturers for nearly two hundred years -- if only every Chinese man wore his shirt one inch longer, the mills of Manchester would run forever. Given China's present domination of the textile industry, I find this quite ironic. The Manchester mills are long gone. I think many companies felt that this was the way to ride the economic reform wave. As China opened up to foreign investment, initially foreign companies were forced to establish joint ventures with local, state owned enterprises (SOEs). Many of these local joint ventures. While some local partners made sense, others were really quite off the wall. One company, which manufactured household soap and laundry products, was joint ventured with a long-term soap manufacturer in Guangzhou. Colgate linked up with a toothpaste manufacturer. These made sense. On the other hand, a soft drink company came in and tried to partner with the Chinese air force. It didn't make a lot of sense. That endeavor did not last very long. However, military units were in the commercial business. At that stage of economic reforms, Deng Xiaoping had told the military that they were the fourth modernization, the fourth of four. The order of the four modernizations was agriculture, heavy industry, consumer industry, and military. And so the military was told, "You're not going to get a big budget increase. You're not going to get a lot of resources. But to help you out, we will let you find your own means of becoming self-sufficient. We'll let you develop your own sources of income." Well, this was opening the barn door, and off they went! There are many military units in the Guangzhou Military Region (MR), facing Hong Kong, Taiwan and Vietnam. Having been in place since 1949, often having to grow their own food, build barracks, etc., they jumped at the chance to get into all sorts of commercial enterprises. Some, such as using logistics vehicles in the construction business, were beneficial in developing infrastructure -- roads, buildings, factories, etc. Others were less honorable, everything from soft drinks to hotels, brothels, nightclubs, and smuggling. So every local unit had a commercial enterprise in which they were involved to try to increase their budgets. This privilege was subsequently revoked in the late 1990s and the military told to get out of their commercial enterprises. But at that point, the military was much involved in all sorts of economic endeavors. I often thought, from our perspective, it was to our advantage. One, it gave the military a stake in the economic reforms, so the communist party conservatives couldn't try to use the military to oppose Deng's economic reforms and the opening up. And second, the commercial activities diverted personnel, equipment and money from military training. They slacked off on doing exercises, PT, or other activities, which probably didn't help their combat ratings.

Q: What about Vietnam? While you were there, you would have been covering that border?

MARTIN: Yes, Guangxi Province was in my consular district. Relations were pretty frozen most of the time I was there. The legacy of the '77 war with Vietnam continued. It was still very icy. One of my favorite trips was going to the border of Guangxi Province and Vietnam, and visiting the Qing Dynasty era Friendship Gate, a very elaborate multistoried tower similar to those along the Great Wall, in the middle of Friendship Pass, a traditional trading route. The gate, particularly from the Vietnamese side, was riddled with bullet holes, absolutely pockmarked.

And I thought this was an appropriate symbol of the state of Sino-Vietnamese friendship at that point. The Vietnamese had fired on it from their vantage points on higher ridges on their side of the border to prevent the PLA from using the pass to enter Vietnam. During my posting in Guangzhou, things did warm up enough for them to re-open the railway line that crossed the border into northern Vietnam. The problem was that Chinese and Vietnamese rail gauges were different. So they added a third rail so the train carriages could go to a border point where they were lifted up and transferred to a different width wheel unit. This is similar to what is done on the Mongolian border for trains entering the trans-Siberian railway system.

Q: How about the politics? Were you seeing anything in China, between you and the embassy and other posts, looking towards China perhaps breaking up?

MARTIN: We did have difference of opinions with the embassy in terms of what was happening, because they tended to report from the perspective of the capital, from the perspective of Beijing, and the people they talked to, which was accurate from that perspective. But we had a different view down where we were. We did not see China breaking up. At least I didn't. My view was that the psychological impetus for China to unite, to stay together, and for the Chinese to support the sense of oneness of being Chinese was far stronger than the regionalism, the provincialism, and the difference in economic development that was pulling South China away. A lot of people talked about Greater China, which included Hong Kong, South China, and Taiwan, as perhaps having a sort of economic bond between them which might separate them out into a separate entity from the rest of China. I didn't see that and I still don't. I think that the idea of China uniting, which is why the whole issue of Taiwan was so very important to most Chinese wherever they live, is a factor, I think, that keeps them together more than it pulls them apart.

Q: I don't understand. I mean why is the desire to bring Taiwan in? Do they feel that it might sort of suck off the wealthier coastal provinces?

MARTIN: No. I think Taiwan is the only remaining part of what is considered to be a Greater or Great China, or the traditional China if you will, which is traditional only in the Qing Dynasty, of course; and the Qing Dynasty borders are what China generally claims as its borders now. Taiwan is the last remaining piece that is not part, not ruled by a central government in China. I think that this is what is at the bottom of the whole issue - it's very important for Chinese sense of belonging to the world and regaining their rightful place in the world as a united country. That's why Taiwan is such an emotional issue.

Q: You must have been up against all sorts of Taiwanese entrepreneurs to meet you?

MARTIN: Taiwanese businessmen all over the place! Particularly in Fujian Province, which is the province facing Taiwan across the strait. The Taiwan Chamber of Commerce in Xiamen, or the old Amoy, was the largest in town by a long shot. We had a few American businesses there, but they couldn't hold a candle to all the Taiwanese businesses that were operating there. Same thing in Guangdong Province - a lot of the Taiwanese had come in. Taiwan government rules, more than anything, set up a dummy front companies in Hong Kong, and then invested in Guangdong. We had hundreds if not thousands of Taiwan companies invested and doing business in South China and southern Guangdong Province. They even had a Taiwanese school, they had a Taiwanese Chamber of Commerce, and so forth. They were very much a part of the economic boom. But we at the U.S. consulate did not have much to do with the Taiwanese business community. They knew better than we (or U.S. businesses) how to operate in the Chinese environment. And in Fujian Province, the local language was the same. Taiwanese and Fujianese are essentially the same as is the culture. So they did not need our help. Our involvement would have complicated the "arrangements" they had made with local officials and partners.

Q: How did you see this fitting into keeping together during the '93 – '96 period.

MARTIN: Again, I would say that the attitude was that the south gave lip service to the idea that Taiwan needed to reunify with the mainland, and that any move to go independent would bring dire results. The missile exercises that were used in '95 – '96, when Lee Teng-hui was running for office, when he visited the United States, was all orchestrated by Beijing. These basically, were disregarded in the south; that was not a big issue there. They supported the national policy publicly, of course, but this was not a major issue that people spent any time worrying about or talking about. In my official contacts with business leaders or with government officials there, if it came up, they would mouth the government line, but then they'd go on to, "Well, we were anxious that the policy would impede more Taiwan investment here." My view is that the economic interrelationship is going to be the critical factor, It eventually is going to link the two sides together. Whether or not it's political, whether or not it's some sort of a federation, confederation, whatever it may be, I think both sides will eventually use the economic mechanism to work out a modus operandi.

Q: You were there when the Taiwanese president was going to the United States.

MARTIN: Lee Teng-hui got the visa to come to the States.

Q: Yes. Was this a real issue down where you were, or was this a Peking issue?

MARTIN: It was a Peking issue. It was not an issue in our area. Again, as I say, if the subject came up, officials would repeat the official line, but that's all it was. It was evident that this was not an issue that they spent a lot of time worrying about. I had four provinces in my consular district, all very different, including Fujian Province, which is the one that faces Taiwan and is the closest in relationships and linguistically with the Taiwanese. Taiwan came up more often, obviously, in my talks with the officials, but even there it did not seem to be a major issue.

Q: 1993 – '96, we've talked about the economic boom there. Were any of your provinces deprived in economic role?

MARTIN: I'd like to talk a little bit about the differences between all four provinces. They were all very different. And I'd like to talk a little bit about some of the visitors I had there, starting with President Nixon, and a little bit about the relationship with Hong Kong.

Q: First we want to talk about the difference. You had four provinces.

MARTIN: We had four provinces in the consular district with 135 million people in them, which is probably larger than most of Western Europe. The provinces were Guangdong Province, where Guangzhou was; Fujian Province to the east, facing Taiwan; Guangxi Province to the west, which bordered on Vietnam; and Hainan Island, which hangs down into the Gulf of Tonkin and the South China Sea. They were all quite different. Guangdong, obviously, had the most notoriety, the best reputation, was the most developed. It was the one that all the Hong Kong manufacturers moved into after China opened up in 1978, and so they had a tremendous amount of foreign investment. As I said earlier, Guangdong Province was reputed, at that point at least, to export about 40 percent of all of China's exports, most of which were foreign invested companies, to the United States and to Europe, also some to Japan and Southeast Asia. Guangdong province had a large amount of Taiwan investment. The province itself was really quite varied in the sense that the southern part, close to Hong Kong along the Pearl River Delta, was really developing rapidly. The north and the east were less so, and the western part, outside of the Pearl River Delta, was still fairly traditional and less developed than the delta region. The delta region was the one that you always heard about, between Hong Kong and Guangzhou. While I was there, Gordon Wu, who was a big developer in Hong Kong, built a highway between the border town of Shenzhen, which was becoming a city, and Guangzhou. It took him several years to build it, but he built a superhighway. We called it Darwin Highway, because the first three months it was open, there were about 75 deaths on the highway, mainly because nobody knew what a superhighway was. An old peasant would walk out in the middle of the highway and say, "Oh!" And wham! A Mercedes going by at 120 miles an hour would wipe him out!

Similarly, a lot of people said, "Wow! A new highway! I have to drive my car on it." So these old guys would get out in their old cars. They and the car, neither of them had ever gone over 30 miles an hour, would get on the highway, floor the thing, and the car would fall apart, or the driver would lose control, and one more would be eliminated. So by the end of three months we figured that the fittest survived, as after that there were not as many accidents! But it was sobering for a while because you'd have these black Mercedes, which would usually be the government cars or PLA (People's Liberation Army) cars, going by at 120 to 150 miles an hour, and some guy would be riding his bicycle in the left lane. It was a difficult but interesting experience in modernization. Guangdong Province was uneven. There were lots of pockets of poverty and lack of development in other parts outside the delta. But generally Guangdong was a fairly forward-looking, fairly active province in terms of economic development. Fujian Province was different. Fujian was what was long considered the front line with Taiwan. The military had a great deal of influence and control over large percentages of the province. They had military forces, missile deployments, and airfields throughout the province, to maintain their face off with Taiwan. At the same time, you had a tremendous amount of investment from Taiwan in Fujian, mostly in southern Fujian, where most of the native Taiwanese people's ancestors originally came from nan-Minan (southern Minan) people. There was a large Taiwan Chamber of Commerce in the city of Xiamen. Many Taiwan businessmen came in to invest. There were many direct contacts between Taiwan and Fujian, usually at night by small boats. People would come and go. Taiwanese would come over, go to the karaokes, the nightclubs, and then go home, or they'd come for business. There was a lot of back and forth, at night, or underground, and certainly not on a legal basis. The rest of Fujian province, particularly the north, tended to be somewhat more conservative. Fuzhou City was a traditional Chinese city. It didn't have a very progressive-looking government structure, was pretty much under the thumb of Beijing, didn't have much of an independent prospective or vision of its own. One of the problems that we had with Fujian was that was where most of the illegal migrants to the U.S. originated. Changle country, near Fuzhou City, was the hotbed of illegal immigrants. People in the Golden Venture were mostly from Changle County, and most of the illegal boat people into the United States come from that particular county or the ones around it. I had a chance to visit Changle County. It is a very hard-scrabble place. Agriculture's not very good because of the rocky soil. But the houses and the accouterments you see in the villages there are really quite spectacular, mainly because they've had people emigrating from there for about the last 300 years. People with two, or three, four, five-story houses, marble on the outside, marble bathrooms, Jacuzzis, fountains in the front yard. I didn't notice any swimming pools, but I wouldn't doubt that there probably were swimming pools as well. So obviously the remittances from the people who did succeed overseas were quite useful in terms of building up the standard of living of the relatives left behind. But that was not all over Fujian, and I think that most of the places were still fairly hard-scrabble. A comparison between their lifestyle and the lifestyle of the people further into the interior of China makes it clear Fujian is doing quite well, considering the other parts of the interior. Going to the interior, Guangxi Province was probably the most underdeveloped and backward of the four provinces in my consular district. Guangxi Province really had been left behind. Officially, this is a Zhuang minority autonomous region. The autonomous region meant that you had a token governor, who was from the Zhuang minority, but the party secretary was invariably a Han, and therefore the one with the power. It had not seen a lot of progress. Nanning, the capital, had become somewhat more modernized, but was still 20 or 30 years behind Guangzhou and the delta area. The contrast was really quite striking. One of the best ways to travel into Guangxi was to fly there, and then drive around, or take the train. There were lots of places we could travel, which was useful. China was not an easy place to drive since the people had little driving experience. The roads were narrow, and people tended to drive rather quickly. My successor, Philip Lincoln, was killed in Guangxi shortly after his arrival in 1996 when a bus hit his van in a head-on accident.

Beihai, a coastal fishing and increasingly a beach resort destination on the north cost of the Tonkin Gulf. It had an extensive beach - level, nice sand - but the development of tourist facilities on the edge of the beach was what I would call "with Chinese characteristics." Whereas in the west we might like some space and privacy between buildings on the beach, in Beihai, it was a solid row of establishments. Apartment buildings next to restaurants, karaoke parlors, bars, amusement parks, etc. It reminded me of boardwalks in Ocean City or Atlantic City, with little if any zoning or separation of functions. The fourth province in my consular district was Hainan Island, which used to be the penal colony, or the Georgia or Australia of China. The emperors sent their internal exiles and prisoners there, the most southern part of the empire. It is second largest island in China after Taiwan. But during my day they were trying to develop it into the "Hawaii of China." They thought that its beautiful beaches would be worth developing to bring in tourists from Hong Kong, Southeast Asia, and other places. The problem is that their sense of development, certainly to Western eyes, left something to be desired. They figured the way to develop something was to put in casinos, karaoke parlors, and lots of restaurants, and that would attract tourists. They might attract some Chinese tourists, but wouldn't attract many Western tourists. The problem was overbuilding, and internal corruption and connections. Haikou itself, the capital of Hainan, on the northern end of the island, was undergoing a building boom when I was there. Everybody was building like crazy. Every corner, every street of the city was under construction. It turned out, subsequently, that this was all speculation, that a lot of the money was coming from other parts of China. People, companies, cities, municipalities, even provinces were investing their money in Hainan real estate. When the central government's ax came down, and Premier Zhu Rongji stopped all this, or decided to require some inspection and some accountability, the money dried up. The city in Haikou became a ghost town with skeletons of buildings left half completed. One interesting aspect of Hainan was the naval base in Sanya, in the southern part, which has become much better known in the West since the EP3 incident in 2001. We didn't have much access to the military there or in any of the bases, but we did travel down there and looked around to see what we could see. The other thing of interest was that there was that there was a large overseas Chinese community in Hainan. Many Indonesian Chinese, after 1965 riots against the Chinese and the Communists, came back to China; and many, if not most, of them were sent to Hainan. They were assigned to work in the fields of the state farms there. The problem is, most of the Chinese who came back were urban Chinese, urban overseas Chinese who'd been small shopkeepers, and they knew next to nothing about agriculture. So their adjustment was really rather difficult. But they were making some progress. A lot of them now were second generation, beginning to establish themselves and become more economically prosperous than they were before. So the variety between the four provinces really was quite interesting, and it gave us a chance when we traveled to be able to see different parts of China, different stages of development, different stages of openness to the outside. We had an incident in Beihai, the beach and port city of Guangxi Province, with an American businessman of Vietnamese-Chinese ancestry. His family, originally from Guangxi, had emigrated to Vietnam several generations earlier, as many of the Vietnamese-Chinese had come from that southern part of China. He had been caught there during the French-Indochina War, had moved to Saigon with his family, and finally left in 1975 at the end of the American-Vietnamese war. He went to the States, became an American citizen, and then returned to Guangxi, to Beihai, and opened a shrimp packing business. He was quite successful. Obviously he spoke the language and fit in well with the community. He contracted with fishermen to catch the shrimp. In the plant, they would clean and quick freeze dry the shrimp. He had good sanitary conditions, so was authorized by the Food and Drug Administration to export to the United States. It was too ideal. The problem was that the local municipal officials couldn't keep their fingers out of the cookie jar. They were constantly leaning on him to do this, do that, to pay more taxes, to give them a piece of the action, to hire their nieces, nephews, friends, and what have you. Finally, he walked away. He said he could not take it anymore. He just disappeared and went home. He tried to sell the company, but could not get a decent price to recoup his investment. as the government wouldn't offer him anything. He also was concerned that he might not be able to leave. Officials said, "If you don't pay the taxes we won't let you go! We'll keep you here!" So he went to the States or Hong Kong on a business trip and never returned. Subsequently, when municipal officials asked me to encourage American investment in Guangxi, I would remind them they already had a chance blew it. The level of sophistication regarding foreign investment and working with foreigners, even then, wasn't based on the rule of law. There were few restrictions on what municipal officials could do. This was true in other parts of South China. In Guangdong we had a tremendous IPR (Intellectual Property Rights) problem. I used to call it the pirates' den, as it was the world's largest operation, many little operations, pirating CDs, pirated computer software, books, most everything else. There were probably 15 or 20 major CD manufacturing companies that were ripping off copyrighted intellectual property, making CDs and movies, movie videos, and computer tapes for a fraction of the price that you would pay legally. We went after them, working closely with the business community. U.S. companies were frustrated because they had to do and provide everything. They had to do the investigations, buy the research as to where these people were. They had to get the goods on these people. Then they had to pay the police to go out and do the raid. They had to participate in the raid so the police would go into the right house instead of the house next door; and they would have to be careful to try to keep confidentiality. Often the raid would go into the plant where the U.S. company knew counterfeit goods were being manufactured, and there would be nothing there. Or there would be one machine and a few boxes of product in the corner, which the police would seize. You knew that the guy had been tipped off, and he'd moved the stuff next door; or in the back room and they wouldn't go look for it. So it was a frustrating event. We had a lot of people who worked with us on IPR. Lee Sands from USTR (Office of the United States Trade Representative) came through many times for negotiations on intellectual property rights agreements and tried to curtail the issue. I think, finally, the government began to clamp down, and they began to really take some serious action. Much of the problem was that municipal governments were invested in township, village enterprises (TVEs) who were doing the counterfeiting. So local leaders weren't about to cut off a company which was providing income to municipal coffers, or individual officials.

Q: How about the PLA, the People's Liberation Army? What were you observing about their business practices?

MARTIN: They were very much in business at that point. As we said earlier, the military was the fourth of Deng's four modernizations. Being the last, they were given permission to get into business so as to provide for their own resources, which they couldn't get from the national budget. They got into business in a big way. They were doing everything from hotels to travel companies, construction companies to karaoke parlors, and brothels. Shenzhen was particularly bad in that sense. I would say probably 30 to 40 percent of the business in Shenzhen was military connected, and they were in everything. PLA logistics trucks did much of the construction -- of buildings, highways, apartments, parks --.

Q: Were we keeping an eye on the military across the straits from Taiwan to see how serious they were about doing something?

MARTIN: In terms of our access to the military, it was very limited. We had visits, consular officers would travel in Fujian regularly. We had defense attachés come in from either Hong Kong or down from Beijing and travel, but their trips were quite limited. In 1995 we had a real problem with a couple of attachés that came in from Hong Kong without informing us or getting our authorization as was required. They were picked up near a beach in Fujian, where the PLA was conducting exercises. That became a bit of a do. After holding them a few days, and registering a complaint with the Embassy, the government threw them out of the country. After that, those particular Hong Kong attaches were not allowed back in, at least during my assignment. We tightened up our requirements for others from Hong Kong to get clearances before they came in.

Q: How did you find the discrepancy? You were in provinces that were the beneficiaries of this new prosperity although you had some hard-scrabble places. Were you in consultation with any other consular colleagues? Was there any thought about China splitting up into regional warlords, or economic lords, or power centers?

MARTIN: There was a lot of speculation as to whether China might split apart or break up. South China, Hong Kong, and Taiwan was often seen as an economic cohesive unit which perhaps could become quite prosperous on its own if it had its own autonomy. It was occasionally referred to as Greater China. There was a big difference, I think, at that time between what was happening in the south, particularly Guangdong Province, and the rest of China. Guangdong really was the laboratory or the experiment that the north allowed to happen and encouraged. I don't think there was ever really any risk of it breaking off, for a number of reasons. One, I think the sense among all Chinese, even in the south, despite their frustrations with the north - their different culture, their different language, and so forth - is the sense that the oneness of China was very important, the psychological importance of that. Secondly, I think that the government really did have good tight controls over what was happening in the south. The Cantonese got away with an awful lot. They would not follow directions very well, they would interpret them in the broadest sense that they could. They would be selective in how they carried out the rules from Beijing. They were not above, like any other place in China, playing games with the accounts. They were required to send a certain percentage of their tax revenue to the central government. But every region in China starved the center, sending only the minimum to Beijing. The amount of taxes that went to the Central Government was somewhere between 13 and 18 percent of the total revenue collected in the country. And so the national government was operating on a shoestring compared to the potential or the actual revenue collections throughout the country. The provinces or regions would find all sorts of ways to finagle the taxes. They wouldn't collect "taxes" per se. They'd collect fees, tolls, service charges, or payments due. They'd call them anything but taxes, so they wouldn't have to remit so much to Beijing. Local people staffed the tax bureau, and so it was natural that the center would not be getting a very big take of the taxes. This was all under process of change when I was there. Zhu Rongji established a new tax system, with a national tax bureau, which was going to establish offices in all the cities and provinces, to ensure that the center gets its fair share. I don't think it's worked out very well at this point. The other thing to remember is that until after the Cultural Revolution and the beginning of the economic reforms, China did not have a taxation system. Everything was government. There was no private property. There was no profit. Any excess revenue, as it was called, went directly to the government, because the state sector, the state owned enterprises, were all part of the government. They were all part of various ministries -- heavy industry, railway industry, telecommunications, etc. There was no taxation because everybody worked for the government. This has changed only since the economic reforms and opening up after 1978, during which the government allowed private enterprise entrepreneurs, non-state sector businesses, to operate.

Q: We knew China was a Marxist state. They had a huge apparatus of Marxist studies. How was Marxism playing by the time you were there in the '90s?

MARTIN: In South China, Marxism was rather low key. Party cadres still mouthed the usual slogans and the usual phrases. The government was still organized in terms of the Communist Party monitoring, controlling and running everything, but there really was no fervor in it. The Cultural Revolution had exhausted everybody; and the Cantonese, particularly in the south, were delighted to be left alone to do their thing. And their thing was to try to improve their standard of living, to improve their economic well being. There was the usual window dressing in terms of what needed to be said; but the sense I had was no one was a committed Marxist.. The difference between Guangdong or Guangzhou and Beijing was that we got very little in terms of harangues or representations about Taiwan, about U.S. policy, about this, that, and the other thing, which, in the embassy you'd get all the time. Down there, there was almost none of that. It was very straightforward in terms of working together on economic investment, to try to improve rough situations, and so forth. However, we did have a very suspicious Foreign Affairs Office (FAO). The Foreign Affairs Office is the local barbarian handlers, responsible for keeping watch, particularly on the consular corps, but also on any foreigners in their area. And they were not helpful. They were actually very much the block, the obstacle to our dealing with the government bureaus at a provincial level. We had to go through them to get appointments, to see officials, visit offices or factories, and to travel in the consular district. Most of the time, they were obstinate. We would talk with them, try to establish good relations with them, which I think we did generally; but they were just hardheaded about it. It was frustrating because our economic officers had developed very good relations with various government bureaus, such as the planning bureau, the industrial bureau and so forth. Officers would call their counterpart whom they'd met, and say, "Well, can I come talk to you about such and such?" And they'd say, "Well, as far as I'm concerned, great! You can come over anytime, but you have to go through the Foreign Affairs Office." My officer would say, "We'll try to get permission. I'll see if I can come see you next week. Are you going to be around?" The contact would say, "Sure, Tuesday would be fine." We'd call the FAO, and they'd say, "We'll check." And we'd wait, and wait, and wait, and finally the FAO would call back saying "Oh! Well, he's out of town!" or "He's not available. He can't see you!" It was total nonsense, but that's how they operated. It was frustrating trying to work with them but we had no choice but to work through the system.

Q: In some Communist countries a consular officer could take off on his own and go anywhere, whereas a diplomat would have limitations and have to go through the foreign ministry. Were you able to play the consular ploy a bit?

MARTIN: No, because we still had to go through the Foreign Affairs Office. The provincial or municipal FAO was the foreign ministry representative locally. They often said they had to refer to the foreign ministry for approval, but most of the time, it seems to me, they pretty much had the authority to decide what they would and would not do. It varied by province or locality. The further away from Guangzhou, from the capitals of the provinces, the more relaxed everybody was. In remote areas, officials would welcome you, throw a banquet, and take you around to show you pretty much anything you wanted to see. It was really only in the urban areas that we were restricted. We just had to find ways to work around the FAO to make contacts and get information on developments.

MARTIN: I think there were probably a few true believers at the university levels who still taught Marxism classes. My understanding was that these were required classes - that students and officials had to take. They were usually large lecture courses on weekends or after hours. Occasionally, we were able to get ourselves invited to the universities to talk to these classes. That was kind of fun, to get into their political theory or Marxist education classes, and have a discussion with the teachers and the students. We didn't get to do so very often, but it was a good opportunity to see what people thought. The students generally didn't say very much. The faculty would carry the conversation. The students seemed to be cautious in front of professors and our FAO escorts.

Q: Did you find you and your fellow Americans hit all the time on the streets by people wanted to talk English?

MARTIN: Yes. They would be quite open about that. Everybody seemed to be learning English. At the train station, young people, girls and boys - would come up and say, "Please, sir. May I practice my English?" It was really quite striking, considering that only a few years before, being seen talking to a foreigner would have been suspicious and the people would have been nervous about it, if not restricted. Young people were all eager to learn English.

Q: Did you get a feel about how your Chinese contacts were dealing with the Cultural Revolution years?

MARTIN: Most would not talk about it. A few would. It was still a painful episode for most. A few felt talking about it, and bringing it out into the open would help them deal with it. But it was difficult for most people, I think. Most of the people that I tried to talk to would slough it off and not really address the issues. This was particularly true of the cadres. Many of the younger ones had been Red Guards while the older cadres had been under attack by the Red Guards for being the old worms, cheating, lying, capitalist rodents, for taking the Liu Xiaochi capitalist road in the party. They had had a very difficult time, because they all thought themselves as true Marxists supporting the party. Suddenly all these young kids came in, beat on them, and forced them to work on pig farms for 20 years. They came back subsequently to their old positions and jobs in the party and government. Hard to keep one's dedication to the Party I would think. The few people that talked to me about the Cultural Revolution would admit to their being involved in the violent acts. Most of them said, "Well, we were neutral. We were not one faction or another," which in most cases is probably not true because most people did take sides, either with the party cadre or with the Red Guards that were attacking them. Guangzhou, and Guangdong province as a whole, was very violent during the Cultural Revolution. I remember when I was in Hong Kong, reading in the papers about the bodies floating down the Pearl River, and the sharks growing to enormous lengths because they had a wonderful feed that summer. In neighboring Guangxi, subsequent books reported cannibalism, people actually killing opponents and eating their organs. It was an extremely cruel, violent situation.

Q: How did you find the writ of Beijing?

MARTIN: Generally, the central government appointed a few senior people to party and government positions. When I was there, the mayor and the party secretary of Guangzhou City were both Cantonese as was the Guangdong party secretary. The provincial governor was from Shanghai. Generally, Beijing assigned senior officials from other provinces or regions so as to ensure loyalty to the center rather than localities. But the second level and third level were almost all Cantonese. One could compare it to having a political ambassador with career Foreign Service subordinates. The political ambassador can make decisions, certainly, because of his connections in Washington, but the people who run the embassy are career people, That's how it was in Guangzhou and Guangdong Province.

Q: I've been in various places where I've seen this north-south business, where people in the north look down on the people in the south for somehow being less than hardy, less intellectual. How did that work in China? Was there a difference of how the north and south looked upon each other?

MARTIN: There is some historical enmity, and some sense of superiority and inferiority. The Cantonese consider themselves the true Chinese, descendants of the Tang Dynasty, one of the high points of Chinese power and culture. They call the Cantonese language Tanghua (Tang Dynasty language), and they call themselves Tangren (Tang people). Historically, southern China was absorbed into the Chinese civilization about 200 BC when (Emperor) Qin Shi Huangdi of the Qin Dynasty, who first united the country, conquered what was then called the Yue Dynasty in the south. The Cantonese still call themselves the Yue people. That's the traditional name for Guangdong Province. Yue is the same word as that for Vietnam (Yuenan). There are many cultural and ethnic relationships. China's increasing circle of civilization essentially integrated, amalgamated, conquered, or replaced local peoples as they expanded out from the centers of north China civilization. The northerners see the Cantonese as mercantilists, commercial, greedy, and business oriented, not very orderly, not very intellectual in their pursuits. The Cantonese see the northerners as cold and aloof, and sort of Prussian, rather rigid in their views. But despite historical and cultural differences, they are all considered to be "Han." There are also many minorities in the south, too. Hainan Island has several minority groups, Guangxi Province is the Zhuang (minority) Autonomous Region, Fujian has many hill tribes related to other minority groups in the area.

Q: What about the influence of American-Chinese? Canton was the area where practically the entire American-Chinese exodus came from. Did the American-Chinese play any role from your perspective?

MARTIN: They did some, mainly in the sense of business investment. Most business investment in China is, or until recently has been, overseas Chinese. Hong Kong, Taiwan, and Southeast Asia has been by far the source of the largest percentage of investment in China. I'd say probably two-thirds of all foreign investment in China has been from the overseas Chinese community. American-Chinese did invest there, but not in a major way. Many American-Chinese came to do business in Guangdong with various companies. Some were good; some were not. It depended on how much they identified with China, and how much they could relate to China. One officer in the consulate was, I think, third or fourth generation Chinese-American, who didn't speak any Chinese at all. He had taken some language, but he didn't have any native Chinese, linguistically. His Caucasian wife did, and so it was fun to be with them in the markets. She would speak to the stall keeper, and the stall keeper would answer to him. The wife would speak to the stall keeper again, and you'd see the latter's confusion as she would reply to the one who should be speaking Chinese. It became confusing and humorous. Many American-Chinese could not related to the political and cultural situation and did not connect well with the local interlocutors. But there was a strong connection with the United States because most Chinese-American families had come from four districts on the Pearl River Delta. We had many visitors who wanted to return to their native villages. Washington State Governor Locke's visit to his family village was a big media event.

Q: Were we concerned about the Chinese mafia, the triads, or whatever, at that time, because of smuggling illegal aliens, and other things?

MARTIN: It was a growing concern. Absolutely! The international crime organizations, of which the triads or the secret societies were a part, became increasingly active. As Hong Kong became more integrated into China, the triads and other criminal organizations in Hong Kong, developed contacts and branches across the border. The Communists had suppressed, not eliminated, but essentially suppressed secret societies and criminal organizations after 1949 by ruthlessly wiping them out, and keeping very close tabs on what everyone was doing all the way down to the individual level. But as they opened up, as Deng Xiaoping said, "You open the door, and flies come in," a lot of criminal activity re-surfaced. Some were internal, having never gone away. They had had been operating underground, surviving because of corrupt police officers and party officials. Others came in from outside, with international connections. Drug trafficking became a big issue; prostitution; karaoke parlors; gambling; illegal smuggling. More than criminal organizations were involved. Smuggling along the south coast of China - most of it from Hong Kong, but some from the Philippines or Taiwan - was carried out by the military. The navy was up to its gunwales in smuggling. And it was big business. Most of the cigarettes that came into China on the south coast came in on navy vessels. One of the reasons Jiang Zemin ordered the military out of commercial businesses is because of this smuggling problem. The army was involved to a degree, but they didn't have the resources the navy did of smuggling across the borders. I remember one particular example. During a visit to a town in the Pearl River delta, one of our officers noticed a big parking lot next to the police station was full of Jaguars, Cadillacs, Lincolns, and other cars, many of them with U.S. license plates still on them. He started asking questions, and the police said, "Oh, we found those. We've captured them." My guess is they were being resold to domestic customers rather than being returned to their owners. These were shipped into China by container after being stolen in Los Angeles, San Francisco or New York. Similarly across the border from Vietnam, we saw Mercedes and BMWs being driven across the border into Guangxi Province. So corruption was a problem. We also dealt with the illegal migrants out of Fujian Province that had gone to the States and were, when I was there, starting to be repatriated back to Fujian. Initially, INS flew them to Xiamen, and then trucked them to holding areas, where they were questioned and detained by Chinese authorities for a while, and then let go. I went to see the first flight that came back. I think there were about 40 people off one of the snake boats, as smuggling ships are called. The human rights people, of course, got very excited about this, saying that they were going to be persecuted, and detained, and so forth. Our best information was that they were detained, questioned, fined, and basically let go, because in subsequent years we found the same people showing up a second and even a third time. They'd come back, be let go, take another snake boat, get caught, and be brought back again. So after two or three times, it became sort of a cycle.

One additional point on the illegal immigration of that period. I was bemused as how quickly migrants intercepted by the U.S. Coast Guard before they reached American soil learned the latest "reason de jour" for requesting political asylum. First, it was their involvement in the Tiananmen protests, requiring the U.S. not to send them back to certain arrest and imprisonment. When U.S. officials quickly determined few if any illegals from Changle County had ever been out of Fujian Province or engaged in any political activity, the rationale changed to family planning. Many were given asylum by arguing that they were being persecuted by family planning officials for wanting to have more than one child. The truth came out after they were given asylum and petitioned for their families to join them under a special visa category. We had families with 3, 4 or 5 kids come into the consulate for visas. As far as we could determine, all the illegal migrants the U.S. repatriated to Fujian suffered no more than a fine and perhaps brief detention.

Drug trafficking was a big problem. We worked with DEA in Hong Kong since, at that point, DEA did not have permission to open an office in the embassy in Beijing. As the U.S tightened up the drug trafficking routes through Thailand, they began to go north from Burma into Yunnan Province, across Guangxi, into Guangdong. The drug would be repackaged in Guangdong, often along the border with Hong Kong, and then shipped out through Hong Kong to the States or wherever. Drug trafficking, drug addiction became much more of a problem domestically for China. In Yunnan Province, AIDS became a problem. I used to tell people the drug tends to either fall off the truck or leak out of the pipelines as it goes through, and people were getting addicted. And they got AIDS from the needles, or drug addiction from smoking. We had problems developing cooperative relationships with the police. They wanted us to help. We were willing to help, but they were not very good at cooperating on a timely basis. In one particular case, we had good intelligence from Bangkok that a junk loaded with heroin was going to drop its cargo offshore in the Pearl River Estuary in Chinese waters, outside of Hong Kong, and that a Hong Kong junk that would come pick it up and take it into Hong Kong. We had the location and coordinates of the drop and the time. We told the police about it, and they said, "Okay. Thank you. We'll take care of it." Well, they may have taken care of it, but not in the right way. We never heard that they ever seized it, never confiscated it, as far as we know; and these were the kind of things that made it frustrating because we could have worked out a good relationship! But they were unwilling to cross the boundaries and cooperate internationally. Everything had to be checked out of Beijing.

Q: How were relations with Hong Kong at this time?

MARTIN: I left Guangzhou in 1996. And Hong Kong reverted to Chinese sovereignty in 1997. So they were well on their track to reversion. The implementing aspects of the agreement between the UK and China had been carefully formulated. There was still some nervousness in Hong Kong as to what was going to happen after '97. People were still leaving, going abroad to Australia, Canada, the U.S., punching their ticket to get their insurance policy allowing them to get back if necessary. Once they had that, many came right back to Hong Kong to work and to live. But many people were still nervous. Subsequently, I think it's turned out remarkably well. There were many detail that had to be worked out between the two Hong Kong government and Chinese authorities -- border controls, immigration, customs, cross border trucking between Hong Kong and Shenzhen, and issues of tariffs. But both parties were working through those logically and pragmatically, without political pressure. In the end, I think that the reversion was calm and peaceful.

Q: Did you have any human rights issues, Americans caught or American academics of Chinese ancestry arrested?

MARTIN: At that time, no. We had some Americans who came in and got into trouble. A number of political dissidents from Guangzhou were active. A couple of them had been in jail and had been released a year or so earlier. We had some contact with them. We tried to keep in touch with them, and find out what was happening, and what their position was. Most of them were under quite strict surveillance. One was an artist who had gone back to his artwork without too much interference. The other was not able to find a job so was having a difficult time living off his family and relatives. He subsequently was able to go to the States. A few Americans would drop by the consulate to say that they had special information that they wanted to share. Some was of use; most was pretty scurrilous, wild rumors that had no basis in fact. We had a couple people who tried to walk in and ask for asylum, which is always a problem. We tried to give them advice, but then tell them to go try their luck elsewhere. If they could get to Hong Kong, generally they were in a better position to get some assistance. But we couldn't do much for them in Guangzhou.

Q: You mentioned Nixon's visit. This, of course, would have been after he'd long since been president.

MARTIN: He came to China in the spring of 1993, April or May, 3 or 4 months after I arrived. That was his last visit as he died in 1994. I don't think he had ever been to Guangzhou. Certainly not during his famous first visit to China. In any case, he wanted to visit Guangzhou. We learned he planned to visit with a small team. His security "detail" was limited to one New Jersey State Policeman since he had given up his Secret Service protection. One secretary/assistant traveled with him. Also along on that China trip were a couple of his friends - Charles "Bebe" Rebozo, and Robert Abplanalp, and Raymond Price. So there were six altogether. When I heard they were coming, I communicated with his secretary and one of the first things I said was, "When you're here, I'd like very much to have President Nixon come and talk to the American community and the consulate community." The answer I received from his staff was, "Well, it's going to be difficult to do that. You know, he's somewhat elderly. He's not been in the best of health. It's the end of a long trip, etc. etc. So you shouldn't plan to do that." I said, "Okay, but it's too bad" since we didn't get many presidents coming to Guangzhou. He arrived on a chartered (Chinese Air Force owned) "United Airlines" plane. At the airport, he was met by the Governor's representative - not the governor - Foreign Affairs Office leaders, and me. The second thing he said, after he got off the plane and greeted me, was that he wanted to come meet the whole consulate staff, Chinese and American. I said, "Great!" I got on the radio as we were going back into town, and I said, "Try to get everybody together to line up in the driveway of the consulate building, and we'll have a chance to see him this afternoon about five o'clock." That was in a couple of hours. Driving into and through Guangzhou, I noted the Chinese treated him like a visiting emperor. They closed off all the streets, police blocking each intersection, so the motorcade whipped through town in about 15 minutes. He stayed at the White Swan Hotel, which was next door to the consulate. After resting a little in the presidential suite where he was staying, we walked the block to the consulate. The entire Consulate staff and as many from the American community as we could reach, were lined up in the driveway. After I introduced him, Nixon gave a few remarks. It was probably his Foreign Service post speech number 462 but I thought it was appropriate. The gist of his remarks were: You're a long way from home. People don't appreciate what you do back in the States. But I want to let you know that I know what you're doing, how much I appreciate what you're doing. It's important, etc. etc. It was just right. And then he said, "I would like to have a chance to meet all of you." Everyone lined up and walked through the line, getting a chance to shake his hand, and having a picture taken with the President. The Chinese staff thought they'd died and gone to heaven. This was probably the highlight of their consulate career. Afterwards, everybody had the picture of their shaking hands with Nixon on or over their desk. They talked about it for months. That night the governor of Guangdong Province gave Nixon a dinner at the White Swan. In typical Chinese fashion, before dinner, the guests of honor meet the host for short conversation. The chairs in the meeting room are arranged in a u-shape with the host and VIP in the middle and others arrayed in protocol order on either side. As we walked into the room, the governor greeted Nixon very warmly. I was right behind Nixon so I shook his hand. The governor sort of nodded. I'd been there about three months but the governor had been "too busy" to see me, even though I'd asked for an appointment several times. I mentioned that to Nixon on our way to the dinner. The first thing Nixon did when he was asked for his comments was to turn to me, then looking at the governor, said, "Governor, I wanted to let you know that Gene Martin here, Consul General Martin, is one of our best Foreign Service officers. He was sent here particularly because of the importance we attach to Guangzhou, to Guangdong, and it's very important that he work closely with you." Well, I thought the governor was going to fall down and kiss my feet. Whenever I needed to see him thereafter, I was able to, and he was always friendly. I said to the president afterwards "President Nixon, that was the most helpful thing you could do." And he said, "Well, it's my pleasure - always try to help!"

Q: From all account he always had problems with the Foreign Service. But essentially, the Foreign Service respected him because he knew his brief, he was very sharp.

MARTIN: That was the only time I met him personally but I had the sense he was attentive to what he was doing and the circumstance. He seemed aware of what we do, of the importance of the Foreign Service, of the importance of our representation overseas. I remember in the mid-1960s, when he was out of power, he traveled the world and regularly called on embassies and consulates for briefings. I met him casually in Hong Kong. I also heard he never forgot FSOs who were too busy to see him, as well as those who took the time to do so, when ambassadorial assignments were given. Even the last year of his life, he was still cognizant of the Foreign Service. He did the same thing for me in Shenzhen. We saw the party secretary and the mayor who also had been too busy to see me, and Nixon made the same comment, and received the same reaction.

Q: It's hard to visualize, but for the Chinese, Nixon really is a towering figure!

MARTIN: Absolutely! He is the one that cut through the Gordian knot and made relations possible. None of us could have.

Q: And I suppose many ascribe a certain amount of changes in China, because once that opened up all sorts of other things opened up too.

MARTIN: That's very true! The other thing interesting that evening, after that high point for me, was to watch the toasts at dinner. At the dinner table, sitting around in typical Chinese fashion, there's a plethora of toasts. One has to toast almost every course that comes, every dish. Nixon did not drink at that point. He told us at the table that Zhou En-lai had taught him the importance of how one makes the rounds of a dinner table coming back with still almost exactly the same amount of (fiery) Mao-tai rice wine in your glass as when you leave. They made the rounds of the Great Hall of the People with probably 1,500 or 2,000 people when Nixon visited, and he said, "Zhou En-lai and I came back, and we still had full glasses." Since he didn't drink in Guangzhou, Bebe Rebozo was his designated drinker. I watched incredulously during dinner. Just to begin, he would have a few beers, and then came the toasts. He would drink the toast for Nixon and then drink his own Mao-tai, followed by a couple more beers. The next dish came, two shots of Mao-tai, and a couple more beers. This went on through the full twelve course dinner. I thought to myself, "How long is he going to be able to stay with us at the table." Amazingly, he got up and walked away! How he did it, I don't know, but his face became redder and redder as the meal progressed. Somehow or another he made it through the dinner. It was a memorable evening.

Q: Did you have any other visitors there that stick out?

MARTIN: We had almost all the former Secretaries of State come through. Al Haig came through regularly as he was on the board of United Technologies which had Carrier Air Conditioning and Otis Elevator plants, in the province. He also visited on his own behalf as he is well known in China and keep current on developments. It was always useful to see him and keep in touch with him. Larry Eagleburger came through once. One vignette I recall was as we were coming out of the hotel to the car, my driver held the door for him on the right side, and he said, "No, no! You're the Consul General. You sit in the right seat." And he walked around and got in the other side of the car. I thought, "There's a guy with class!" That impressed me. George Shultz came to town and had a very successful visit. Henry Kissinger came to town. We saw him from time to time. I always felt sorry for the interpreter trying to understand his accent. The only one I didn't see during my assignment was Jim Baker, but he didn't have much of a connection with China, as I recall. Those were useful visits. Other than that, we didn't get many official visitors. We had a few Congressional Delegations (CODELs). Dick Gephardt came through with a fairly large delegation looking at why the U.S. should give China Most Favored Nation trading privileges. We were able to arrange a helicopter from one of the oil companies to fly them over the Pearl River Delta. They came back with their jaws dragging on the ground because they said they never realized how much development, and how much industry, and how much export oriented manufacturing there was going on in South China. From Hong Kong border all the way north to Guangzhou was a seamless stretch of one factory after another. It was a good way of demonstrating visually to them what was happening in South China.

Q: Were you able to observe the absorption of American-trained Chinese, the ones going to our best universities and coming back

MARTIN: That had not started yet. The first people that had gone overseas were in probably the early '80s. 1981 or '82 was about the first time scholars were allowed to go overseas to study. Most were government officials, who studied a couple years and then went back. Those who came for study on their own, either privately or with government sponsorship came later. By the time I was there, they'd only had about 10 years in the States. Many had not come back. I would say that of the half dozen I met, half of them were quite happy, half were most unhappy and I think, subsequently, went back to the States. The problem was that when they came, the Chinese didn't really know how to use them. Some were put back into the old bureaucratic system, which frustrated them, and made the people who had not had the opportunities that they'd had for study abroad resentful. And so they tended to suppress their new ideas, their different ideas, or they were left on their own to try to find out their own niche. Some were successful, but it was too early to start private businesses or research endeavors. Subsequently, many more have returned, and I think in the last five or six years it's been quite a flood. One returnee I met was working at the tourist bureau as an adjunct to the Foreign Affairs Office, promoting foreign investment. She seemed to be doing okay, but it was a big adjustment.

Q: At this time, were the secret police, or whatever, trying to frustrate or set up people? With your staff? Was this a concern?

MARTIN: The Chinese Ministry of State Security (MSS) is the counter intelligence ministry. We had some approaches in that regard. People would sidle up to our staff, or the spouses, on the street and would try to talk to them and befriend them. The staff was pretty attentive to that. There was never any kind of a concerted press as far as we could tell. We didn't have marine security guards in the consulate. We had White Swan hotel security guards who manned our booth at the hard line, rather like the fox watching the chicken coop. But we had a lower level of classification as well as a restricted area that was kept only for American cleared personnel. Generally, we felt fairly comfortable. Diplomatic security people in the department and the embassy were not quite so comfortable, but as far as we could tell, there were no penetrations that were evident or that we were able to determine. This leads into relationships with the embassy. Relationships between embassies and constituent posts vary considerably. I saw both sides as I subsequent was the DCM in the embassy in Beijing. I think when I was in Guangzhou, our relationships were really quite distant. We were believers in the old Cantonese saying - the mountains are high and the emperor is far away. The embassy didn't bother us very much and didn't ask us for much in return. We did our reporting. We did our consular work as was required. We had irregular visits from the embassy's leadership. The Consul General would come down periodically to talk to the consular folks. Commercial and public affairs officers visited periodically. The DCM came down, I would say, one and a half times - one time because he was on his way to Hong Kong, and he just stopped in overnight; and one time he came down for a specific visit to Guangzhou. The ambassador, Stapleton Roy initially, came just once, spent a couple days and made a couple of calls on officials such as the governor and mayor and met with the American business community. Jim Sasser, his successor, came down once. But that was all during my three and a half year tour. DCM Scott Hallford came to Fujian once, where I met him and traveled with him. We had a few department visitors, mostly on drug matters. The Assistant Secretary for International Narcotics Matters (INM in those days) came to Fujian. The Pacific Command Commander, then known as CINCPAC, visit was valuable as it gave me an opportunity to meet the PLA Guangzhou Military Region commander and officers with whom I had little contact. We didn't have a lot of official visitors but they generally were helpful in giving me access to a wider range of Chinese officials. One issue we had with the embassy was their desire to send their economic and political officers down to southern China to see what was happening. We'd get messages saying, "Joe Blow is coming down to your district to report on such and such a topic. And we'd say, "Well, wait a minute now. We did a report a month ago on the same subject. Is this really necessary? The way to have said it was to ask to do a joint reporting trip with us, so Embassy officers could get a different perspective." The only real contention we had with the embassy was at one point they sent in a generalized report saying, "This is what's happening in China." It was totally from the embassy perspective. So we sent in a report, which we probably should have cleared with them first, saying, "Well, from the south it looks different to us." We got our knuckles rapped for that. But generally, we didn't have much of a problem with the embassy. The relations were cordial, but distant. We'll get back into Embassy-Consulate relations later when I talk about my Beijing experience. At that time, the ambassador and I worked consciously to create much more of a sense of a unified mission. We brought the consulate people more frequently and regularly into discussions in the embassy, had them visit periodically, and held joint conferences and meetings so we all were more or less on the same song sheet.

Q: Before we leave Guangzhou, let's talk a little about the aftermath of the Vietnam War.

MARTIN: One of the interesting things that occurred while I was in Guangzhou from '93-'96 were Chinese discoveries of U.S. fighter crashes from the Vietnamese War in my consular district of southern China. Some of these planes had been shot down; others became lost over North Vietnam and crashed. Usually the JPRC (Joint Personnel Recovery Center) in Honolulu would send experts to excavate the crash sites. Others would come down from the embassy, and we usually sent somebody from the consulate. One site was in Guangxi Province, the province bordering Vietnam. Another time it was in Hainan - the island made more famous during the 2001 EP-3 incident. But the crash sites often were in remote, isolated areas that were difficult to reach, usually by hiking over the mountains and into the jungles to find these places. I did not go along on the site visits, but some of my staff did. The reporting that came out of those trips, in addition to finding the crash sites and occasionally some remnants of the crew, was interesting. There was a tremendous contrast with the rest of South China in terms of economic development and reforms and the standard of living. One of my colleagues observed that western Guangxi Province for all appearances could have been right out of the 19th century. Almost no change from traditional China. The only thing that had changed was a small karaoke parlor in one of the villages. No paved roads, no electricity, nothing, but they did have a karaoke machine, and that's what they did at nighttime. I guess that's progress in some respect, but it was illuminating because it helped us realize that what you see on the eastern coast and what you see in the urban parts of China really does not apply all the way across the country. There are many places where it's still very remote and very primitive.

Q: A question I'd like to ask before we leave this Guangzhou time. Could you characterize how you and your fellow officers perceived what was happening in China? Was this sort of exhilarating to see great changes, or was it one where you were looking at it and saying, "This is all fine, but there are systematic problems and maybe China's not moving a way we'd like to see? How did you all look at it?"

MARTIN: I think most of us were quite optimistic in the sense that the changes were really quite dramatic. I will say that the social psyche or the people had a hard time keeping up with the economic changes, because in terms of social structure, in terms of their ability to operate in a rapidly changing society, it was difficult. So it was a little uneven in that sense. Driving capabilities, being able to handle urban life, being able to interrelate in a non-structured society was difficult for a lot of people. There were imbalances, there were disconnections within society but generally the progress was positive. People were optimistic about the future. They realized the problems. When asked about corruption, of some people above the law or not having any legal restrictions, one interlocutor cited the United States in the late 1800s when we had robber barons who operated outside the law. They could do what they wanted - the Rockefellers, the Vanderbilts, and others. He said, "We're going through the same stage now. After we get a critical mass of capital, we'll then start limiting and restricting what people can do." That may have been an excuse, but there was some validity to his comment, that you have to go through a certain stage to be able to develop the infrastructure before you can limit it. But I think corruption remains a serious millstone to sustainable development in China.

Q: There is this perception that people from various areas, the Chinese, people from the Levant, including the Lebanese, Palestinians, and Jews, have a predilection for business. Did you find this?

MARTIN: Oh, certainly. Of course, we were in Guangzhou, which was the home of the Cantonese who, along with the Shanghaiese, have been known for centuries as being good businessmen. But I think in general, the Chinese are innovative, aggressive and assertive in terms of business acumen. However, in China, as in every other country, you may have five or ten percent of the population who are good at business, and the rest have no particular business capabilities. So development has been quite uneven. Many people from the countryside were country bumpkins fighting to survive in the new society.

Q: What about the role of women? In rural areas, obviously women and men just worked in the fields. Did you see women moving into the business world?

MARTIN: Women were moving. Much of the migrant population was young women who worked in the foreign invested factories – making shoes, electronics, clothes. A Nike factory may have 3,000 young women between the ages of 18 and 21 and maybe 50 men. This obviously caused all sorts of social problems, as you can imagine. In addition to the contract workers from rural areas of China's interior who came to the coast to work in the factories, you also had many local women who seemed to be doing much better. Although, despite Mao's statement that women hold up half the sky, they don't get half the cake. They do more than half the work, but they don't get the rewards. Even when women are graduated first in their class academically, men usually get the best jobs first. That's changing, but women still have a tough time. In state-owned enterprises downsizing, the men tend to be kept on while women are the first ones to be laid off. But I think educated women do well. Two thirds of our consulate employees were women who were extremely capable people for the most part. Several of them had good English capability. Some were recruited for jobs in Hong Kong because their English was better than that of native Hong Kong school leavers, whose English was not as good.

HOWARD H. LANGE
Chinese Language Training
Taipei, Taiwan (1979-1980)

Economic Officer
Beijing (1980-1982)

Mr. Lange was born in 1937 and raised in Nebraska and educated at the Universities of Nebraska and Washington. After service in the US Air Force, he joined the Foreign Service in 1969. After Vietnam training in Washington Mr. Lange was posted to Vietnam. Many of his future assignments, both in Washington and abroad concerned the Far East, China and Taiwan matters in particular. Mr. Lange's overseas posts include Hue, Saigon, Manila, Taipei, Beijing, Warsaw and Malta. Mr. Lange was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2000.

LANGE: In 1979, we had the opening in China – the establishment of diplomatic relations. Because I had studied Chinese in the military and done postgraduate work on China, my interest in the China game was reawakened. I made my availability known and in due course was sent to Taiwan to pump up my Chinese for an unspecified assignment to Beijing.

Q: So you were in Taiwan from when to when?

LANGE: '79 to '80.

Q: You'd been there before, hadn't you? How did you find, by this time, of course, we had interest –

LANGE: I'll get into this more because later I was Director of the Taiwan Coordination Staff (Taiwan desk) in the 1990s. We had established the American Institute in Taiwan (AIT) in 1979 to manage our unofficial relationship with Taiwan. The language school was part of it, and it moved from Taichung, which was in the middle of Taiwan, to Taipei. We were the first class that was not in Taichung. This was the early part of this unofficial relationship following our recognition of Beijing and withdrawal of recognition from the "Republic of China" (Taiwan), and we still weren't quite sure how this would go down with the people in Taiwan. There had been some consideration of moving the school to the PRC, but practical considerations – costs and relative ease of administration primarily – argued for keeping it on Taiwan.

Q: People who've gone to the old one when they went there - Taichung - had remarked how good it was to be removed from the embassy and that sort of thing. In other words they were some distance removed, and they really had to use Chinese much more away from the office atmosphere. Did you notice a difference, just internally? Of course we closed our office there but it was still a functioning interest. Did you find that that was a distraction for learning?

LANGE: That aspect didn't really change very much. The location of the school itself was at Yang Ming Shan in the mountains north of Taipei, which had become a rather well to do suburb of the city. It was a real excursion to go downtown, so we were really separate from day-to-day AIT operations, both as a matter of policy and in a geographic sense. Still, while we were exposed to Chinese language and culture outside the classroom, it was not exactly immersion; we led a rather suburban existence, and passed much of our free time together, speaking English among ourselves.

Q: This was a time of change on Taiwan. Were you picking up at the school, from your contacts, a sense of growing Taiwanese nationalism itself, concern about China? Things were changing.

LANGE: That's right. I noticed outside the room here a book by Chuck Cross, the first AIT director in Taipei. I'm sure he covered the transition very well. Taiwan was still under martial law, as it had been since the late '40s. Politics were still very much dominated by the KMT, the Kuomintang. 1980 was the time of the Kaohsiung Incident, when a demonstration by the Democratic Progressive Party - the DPP - in Kaohsiung turned violent. A number of DPP figures were arrested and tossed in jail. At that time - '79-'80 - the people on Taiwan were reeling under our derecognition and still very fearful of what that meant. Very watchful of the effect of the Taiwan Relations Act and to what extent they could still rely on the U.S. umbrella to help them avoid reunification with the mainland. There was a lot of uncertainty, and a certain fatalism as well because virtually everyone else in the world, with the exception of two or three dozen smaller countries, had recognized Beijing. That's what makes present day Taiwan so remarkable, because that's only 20 years ago. Within 10 years after the Kaohsiung Incident, the DPP was legal, martial law had been lifted, and Taiwan was on its way to real democracy.

***

Q: You finished there in 1980. Where then did you go?

LANGE: We went to Beijing.

Q: And you were in Beijing from when to when?

LANGE: '80-'82.

Q: What was your job?

LANGE: I was initially in a combined economic and commercial section, which was later divided. The commercial side split off to coincide with the establishment of the foreign commercial service under the Department of Commerce. I was head of the internal reporting unit of the economic section.

Q: Well of course you were there during a transition time between the Carter administration to the Reagan administration. Who was your first ambassador and then the second one?

LANGE: The first one was the Labor leader from Michigan, former head of the UAW Leonard Woodcock. Then he was replaced by career diplomat Art Hummel.

Q: How did you find being right in the heart of the beast, being able to get economic information at this point? You'd already been used to playing around with reading the local papers down in Hong Kong and elsewhere, and all of a sudden, here you are. So, how did things change and how did it work?

LANGE: Well, there was quite a lot available in academic journals, and more was appearing all the time. There was more scope for Chinese economists to explore the nature of their economy. There was a growing acceptability of alternate models. As of '78, Deng Xiaoping had embraced opening to the outside world. So this was a major new factor in Chinese economic orthodoxy. Getting a handle on the Chinese economy was of course something else. Statistics were (and still are) extremely suspect, regardless of the new attitudes and acceptability of new ideas. There was still pressure from the leadership to report positively. So all the statistics were quite doubtful. We spent a fair amount of time trying to identify, through looking at the press and journal articles, individuals that we could talk to, who could give us some insight into policymaking, trends, attitudes, and particularly those that had some importance to American businessmen and others. There were just three of us in the unit. One of the others was on loan from the Agency and his Chinese was excellent because he had grown up in Taiwan. He's since joined AID with his wife.

Q: So was he doing Agency work?

LANGE: No, it was really an embassy position; it was not an Agency position. The arrangement provided a cross-fertilization benefit to the Agency and the embassy gained a Chinese language resource. The position was short term, but it was reestablished from time to time.

Q: I would think in a country with such tight controls as China, trying to talk to anyone, particularly a bureaucrat but others, [they'd be] so sensitive about giving out economic information, like how many shoes they sold would be a state secret or something. And this would be an inhibitor on the part of people who'd be willing to talk to you.

LANGE: Quite right. To have a spontaneous conversation with anybody in China was extremely difficult for a foreigner, and as a representative of the embassy, we were even more on the outside. The Chinese have a foreign affairs bureau for any sizeable institution. The job of these "barbarian handlers" was to deal with foreigners, either businessmen or foreign officials. You had to go through them to set up meetings or visits. To be fair, some of these offices really did do their best to facilitate access to people and information. But they often were barriers and saw their jobs as minimizing contact between the foreigner and real people in the organization. Their function was also to present a picture that was approved by the local party structure. There was an additional constraint. At the time I was there, there was a system of notification of the foreign ministry whenever one traveled outside of a certain perimeter around Beijing. Usually we could go where we wanted, but it meant that everyone along the way knew you were coming. The economists and officials were usually quite careful, limiting themselves to saying what they'd already said in print. So it magnified the problem of trying to understand what was going on.

Q: In a way, particularly in economics, which is so important - and I'm thinking of countries such as China - it sounds like you were, with all this fancy “restoring relations” and all the hubbub and all, you were almost back, as far as you were concerned, to the bad old days of sitting around in Hong Kong and trying to figure out what the hell was happening by reading newspapers and reading journals and picking up information that way.

LANGE: Yes and no. Of course, you could read all the journals in Hong Kong and the newspaper articles. But I think the added element was personal experience, the ability to observe things that were going on. You visit a factory, and they couldn't totally pull the wool over your eyes because you could see what was going on. Was stuff coming out the other end of the assembly line or not? Was machinery sitting idle or not? And notwithstanding limitations on contacts and pervasive self-censorship, we could talk to people. During the period I was there, there was a certain amount of rivalry between our missions in Hong Kong and Beijing, but the balance of value-added reporting had clearly shifted toward Beijing. The other consulates we had established already - Shanghai and Guangzhou, had also become significant bases for reporting, even with their constraints.

Q: I would think the strength, the muscle that made everything work in Hong Kong was its staff of Chinese foreign service nationals who'd been doing this for years who were not particularly, they, just by the fact that they were in Hong Kong, they were not tools of the Chinese mainland government. I know that during this, they were really finely honed, as far as picking up things. Whereas in Beijing, my understanding is that the ministry that handles barbarians was assigning you people. You couldn't go out in the street and hire people. So, in a way, you were deprived of objective, local nationals to read the journals.

LANGE: That was certainly a weakness of the operation in Beijing. The local employees were assigned by the Diplomatic Services Bureau, an office under the foreign ministry. The embassy could refuse people on interview, for one reason or another, but you couldn't, as you say, go out and recruit people for a position. It was John Thompson, who was running the information section, who first managed to get around that. He identified somebody who made himself available through the Diplomatic Services Bureau. I don't know the details, but he got a very good person as a senior FSN. But usually the people you would get were career diplomats or government people who had an English language capability, who accurately saw this assignment as not contributing to their career. We suspected that some might have been made available by their parent organization to the DSB because they weren't performing. So we got a really mixed bag of Chinese employees, and we relied on them much less than did the operation in Hong Kong. Remember, however, that things were changing fairly fast, and the job of reporting from China posts shifted away from reading tea leaves toward keeping on top of developments. We did have our employees in Beijing scan the press and alert us to interesting developments and do the contact work - setting up appointments and so forth. But we certainly didn't have a cadre of really topnotch local employees to provide analysis.

Q: Say, you were going down to see “Such and Such Golden Pheasant Electric Company.” How would you find making contact and seeing the various people? Were they responsive, or did you feel they were told to let you come but don't show too much or something like that?

LANGE: It varied a lot. Once you penetrated this layer of barbarian handlers and got to people beyond that barrier, often they were enthusiastic. They were thrilled in some cases that somebody was interested in what they were doing, or more importantly, that it might lead to foreign investment and change their lives. In some cases, not; they didn't see any advantage to cooperating or revealing any more than was required. They didn't see any relevance; they were just going through the motions.

Apart from more or less formally-arranged visits, it was possible to deduce quite a lot just from direct observation. To illustrate, I might relate some experiences from a visit to Sichuan Province.

Q: This was when

LANGE: This was the winter of 1980-81. I took the train, which was the principal means of travel within the country, and it probably took between a day and 30 hours. In that time, I passed from the harsh winter landscape of northern China, through the even more forbidding mud-brown villages of Henan, then into the mountains separating North China from the protected basin of Sichuan. At about this point in the journey, it was time for dinner. Foreigners could not go to the dining car while Chinese were there, so I was summoned to dine after all others had eaten. I was the only foreigner on the train. It was darn cold in the car, so cold in fact that the grease that is a normal component of Chinese cuisine had congealed on top of the dishes. I picked at it, but couldn't get anything down. About a half hour after I returned to my compartment (which again, I alone occupied), a terrified-looking cook called on me to ask if there were anything wrong with dinner. He seemed petrified that I was going to complain when we arrived. I assured him, and the conductor who was there as a witness, that I suffered from a tender stomach and simply was unable to keep anything down. He was clearly relieved that I was sick.

Deng Xiaoping had only established the "opening to the outside" economic policy in '78, and there was a terrific lag in carrying it out, especially in the hinterlands. It was really only getting underway at that time. Sichuan is an interior province, far from the coast. It is the province to which the Nationalist leader, Chiang Kai-shek, retreated in the face of the Japanese invasion in the late 1930s and established the Nationalist headquarters. It is an incredibly populous province, with over 100 million people even at that time. So it's very important. Because of its isolation, ideas and trends often got to Sichuan much later than to the coastal areas. But it was very lively at that time; the markets were packed. There was a lot of very small-scale market activity - people selling things off the back of their bicycles and so forth. One seller of baskets was an old man who came in from the countryside. They were very attractive, and I still have a couple of them. So I began to engage him in bargaining. Eventually we struck a price, and by this time we had drawn a crowd of maybe 150 people who were watching this process because many of them had never seen a foreigner. So after he had exchanged his baskets for my money, he started talking to the crowd, defending his price as a fair price. He insisted that it was the same he would have charged anybody else; he hadn't exploited the foreigner, there was a lot of work involved in making the basket, etc. This resulted in a lively and serious discussion among all these people about whether this was a fair price or not. Eventually the consensus seemed to be that yes, this was a fair price. It was strange that he felt obligated to defend his price, possibly because he had always operated with fixed prices, selling to his cooperative or whatever. And passersby didn't think it odd to pass judgment on whether his price was fair or not. You won't find that sort of innocence in any corner of China today.

Generally, prices were low in Sichuan. Seven of us went out for a big dinner – admittedly unrefined food (Sichuan cuisine is considered to be peasant fare among sophisticated Chinese) – and it cost the equivalent of a dollar apiece. Radio and TV retail outlets were doing a very brisk business. Bicycles and sewing machines and watches – all measures of relative prosperity in the interior in those early days – were selling well.

Other vignettes from Chengdu, the capital of Sichuan.

- There was a memorable, 30-foot-high statue of Chairman Mao standing in the middle of the city, with right arm raised in a salute to the masses. When I was there, it was surrounded by scaffolding, and there were wild rumors that it was being torn down. But as it turned out, it was just being scrubbed. They hadn't quite worked out their attitude toward Chairman Mao at that time, though I noted that in the bookstores, the obligatory section devoted to the works of Mao had tarps over the books, dust covers that had apparently not been disturbed for months.
- There was a large family planning billboard at the main downtown intersection in Chengdu. This was at the height of the one-child-per-family campaign, which it later became clear was a failure in the countryside. It worked in the cities where they had some control over housing, ration coupons and so on, where you could really put some pressure on people. But in rural areas, it never really worked very well. The billboard depicted a happy mother, father and child. The text was translated into English because, as a bystander told me, "some foreigners have the impression that there are too many people in China." But the English translation was unfortunate because it said, "You better have just one child," which to us sounds like... "or else..."! I really don't think that was the intent, though the history of family planning in China includes local and regional officials who took drastic measures, including coerced abortions, to insure one-child families.
- In the middle of Chengdu there was an advertising agency, a small, storefront operation. Of course the concept of an advertising agency was new to begin with, and it had the interesting name of "The Hundred Flowers." --- Q: A hundred flowers bloomed, and then they were all chopped off. --- Exactly. Chinese were in the mid-1950s invited to offer their honest views on political and social developments – "Let a hundred flowers bloom and a hundred schools of thought contend" – then were attacked and persecuted for doing so. Given campaign and numerous other reversals in Chinese history, the name of the shop showed remarkable faith in the new policies, or perhaps foolish bravado. On the back wall of this agency was a list of services and prices, flanked by portraits of Karl Marx in one corner and Lenin in the other. I couldn't find anyone to ask, but perhaps they were leftover decorations from the era just past. I doubt that the irony was intended.

I returned to Chengdu in 1998, and in most ways it had joined the rest of China in terms of consumer goods, traffic choking the streets, pollution - all of the trappings of modern China. Pollution is particularly bad in that area. All of Sichuan is a basin, which largely accounts for its fertility and mild climate. But it also traps air pollution close to the ground, which is quite unpleasant and truly bad for health.

Q: Were there any events during this time? Did you find - I have a feeling that initially there was a cooling off period when the Reagan administration came in?

LANGE: There was a lot of nervousness among the Chinese about the Reagan administration. Soon after I arrived in 1980, George Bush made a visit. Just about the time Bush touched down, Reagan made a statement that was tantamount to suggesting reestablishment of official relations with Taiwan. Bush seemed as surprised and nonplused as were. The Reagan statement of course sent the Chinese through the roof and cast a pall over Bush's visit. So certainly there were a lot of doubts about the Reagan administration and its meaning for the relationship with China. The statement also highlighted the unfinished business - still unfinished today - of our arms relationship with Taiwan, and this led to the excruciating negotiation of the 1982 communiqué on arms sales to Taiwan. I was not a part of that negotiation, but it was certainly part of the background to life in the embassy. We could see the pressure that Ambassador Hummel was under.

Political concerns however did not dampen Chinese interest in foreign investment, new technology and trade. The promise of the China market allowed them to turn that to political advantage. For example, China was just beginning to open up as an aircraft market while I was there. The Chinese were not shy about hinting that an upcoming major buy of aircraft could well go to the Europeans if the terms offered by the Americans were not right or if political relations turned sour. The Chinese are not alone in playing that card, but the market was really meaningful to Boeing. The political environment is a consistent source of anxiety I think to major players in business in China.

To illustrate the power of Chinese interest in the latest technology, I accompanied a group of American businessmen who were selling port-handling equipment, that is cranes, straddle carriers, that sort of thing. We visited the major ports, about a half dozen. We were provided access that you normally couldn't get and observation of the truly retarded state of modernization in Guangzhou, Shanghai, Qingdao and other ports. This was clearly a product of Chinese eagerness for foreign business competition and world class technology.

This discussion relates to one of the enduring arguments in the China relationship: Is our investment and technology transfer an agent of change in the Chinese system, or is it "selling the rope with which they will hang us" - that is, does it act primarily to strengthen the present system. There is a lot of simplistic thinking on this subject, and the time horizon for some people is clearly very short. I firmly believe, however, that contact with non-Chinese societies will change the Chinese system, and that trade and commerce are powerful agents of such contact. The change may not always be what we expect, or even necessarily for the better, but isolation is not really an option.

Q: You were there when the commercial service cut loose from the foreign service and moved to the Department of Commerce. How did this seem to work in the field and in an important new market? What was your impression?

In 1982, I was back in the department. For a year I was in the EAP Regional Economic Affairs office. That was from '82-'83. Then from '83-'85, I was on the China desk.

Q: In Regional Economic Affairs - '82 to '83 - what were your concerns? What was our economic policy? What were you dealing with?

LANGE: This was just a one year assignment, and I have to say, it was a year I prefer to forget. Not much happened in my personal career, and not much happened that I can recall in Regional Economic Affairs. This was just sort of a parking place till I got on the desk.

Q: Okay, this happens.

LANGE: I didn't enjoy the assignment very much. And the office was somewhat demoralized and disorganized. My portfolio was to coordinate aid, investment and commercial policy in the Asia region.

Q: So you moved on to the China desk? And you did that from - ?

LANGE: '83-85.

Q: What piece of the China pie did you have?

LANGE: At that time, there were three deputy directors, a principal and one each for economic and political – a fairly egregious example of title inflation. I was chief of the economic affairs side of the desk, which had four officers and two secretaries. It was a busy time. This was still early in the relationship, but we were already catching a number of things on the rebound. During the very early days, we had negotiated a number of economic and trade agreements, and now, four years on, it was time to either extend them or renegotiate to try to fix the things that were wrong. Many of them were concluded in the haste of preparation for this or that high-level visit. You know the way agreements are done. They're not negotiated in a calm environment; the deal isn't cut until there's pressure to do that, and usually the pressure is a high-level visitor. The result is sometimes not pretty, and flaws are soon exposed. I spent a lot of my time with a maritime agreement, which we had concluded in '79, which was up for renewal and which wasn't working. It lurched along through a couple of renewals but eventually was allowed to lapse. There are still notions that a new one can be negotiated.

Q: What problems?

LANGE: One of the key issues that went to the heart of the Chinese system was that our carriers wanted the ability to market their services in China. On the Chinese side, you had a monopoly. And the monopoly, COSCO - China Overseas Shipping Company - was not about to easily give up its position. And just as we signed agreements under political pressure, the Chinese did as well. They may have had good intentions in 1979 were never really able to deliver on that agreement. This was a constant source of grievance for our carriers. Chinese grievances were related to some leftovers from the Cold War in terms of access to certain U.S. ports, the fear being that it was possible to gain technical intelligence in ports that were near U.S. naval bases or where U.S. naval ships transited. There were a number of restrictions on Chinese access to these ports, though we were able to remove most of them. The fundamental problem remained – American carriers could not get direct access to the Chinese economy to provide services complementary to shipping. Without that, they had limited ability to compete with COSCO and its lower operating costs. It was incredibly time consuming and frustrating to try and get those problems fixed. Perhaps WTO membership for China will help in addressing them.

Q: In a way, problems on both sides.

LANGE: On both sides. The Chinese for their part want instant acceptance on a basis, to cite their mantra, of “equality and mutual benefit.” Residual limitations on port access rankled. But this couldn’t be quickly fixed. In general terms, in the U.S. one saw almost daily in the press evidence of suspicion of the Chinese from two angles. One was a doubt that they are able or intend to deliver on agreements that they make. My own feeling is that there are some notable failures, but that the Chinese do about as well as most countries in that regard. A second area of suspicion relates to intentions. Is China a long term threat to the U.S.? Do Chinese gather intelligence as a byproduct of commercial activity? It is difficult to assess Chinese intentions, but frankly, I think we are inclined to overrate their intelligence abilities. In any case, one hears a bit less of “China is a threat” discussion these days, perhaps because other, more tangible issues are commanding foreign affairs attention, but it was a significant theme 20 years ago, and it did not facilitate agreement on maritime relations.

Q: Did you feel, by this point, as the Reagan administration had been in about two years - Ronald Reagan had been obviously the Cold Warrior par excellence, a great supporter of Taiwan coming from California - did you feel that you were dealing rationally with China by this time, as far as administration direction?

LANGE: Oh, yes. I think there was substantial transformation in the thinking of President Reagan, and this really started soon after he took office. The third agreement with the Chinese, the August ’82 Communiqué on arms sales to Taiwan, I think was a measure of recognition of the young Reagan administration of the importance of China in our overall foreign policy. And I think that’s something that all administrations since ’79 have recognized, or you could trace it back to ’72. At that time, of course, the Cold War was still a reality and a factor in the U.S.-China relationship. Since ’89-’90, that hasn’t been a factor, and that has somewhat complicated the relationship in the sense that a lot of people now question whether we need China, since it no longer functions as a counterbalance, as it once did, to the Soviet Union. The conclusion of the 1982 Communiqué was sort of a watershed event, in that the Administration at least recognized the implications of normalization. The agreement opened the way for three visits at the highest level from 1983 to ’85. Those visits couldn’t really have taken place unless, as you imply, there was a pretty rational and clearheaded approach to the relationship on the part of the Reagan Administration.

It is worth noting here that, just as we question China’s fealty to agreements, the Chinese do not believe that we are living up to the 1982 Communiqué. The 1982 Communiqué set out limitations on our arms sales to Taiwan, which we have, well, observed in our own way. Our official position is that we abide by the terms of the 1982 Communiqué, even though the language of the communiqué envisions that we will not increase military sales to Taiwan, and will eventually terminate them. That has not happened. We maintain that one of the conditions for concluding the communiqué was our understanding that it was Chinese policy to peacefully resolve the Taiwan question, but that that policy has not been realized, that in fact there continues to be a threat from the Mainland side. The Chinese counterargument is that while Beijing seeks a peaceful resolution and has no intention to use force against Taiwan, it cannot forswear the use of force, since that would be tantamount to an invitation to Taiwan to declare independence. I think it is fair to say that in 1982, Beijing thought that we really would gradually phase out arms sales to Taiwan. They regard the facts of the matter – increased arms sales to Taiwan – as a sign of either bad faith or inability of a series of administrations to deliver on the 1982 communiqué.

Another event of the 1983-'85 period was the entry of the PRC into the Asian Development Bank (ADB). This was very difficult, because Taiwan (the “Republic of China”) had a seat in the ADB. Taiwan had to somehow be accommodated at the same time that the PRC was admitted. It was a difficult negotiation that went on for a long time, which the Koreans were active in intermediating. The outcome was not bad – it has worked – but the solution, as is often the case, wasn’t wholly satisfactory to either side. Taiwan still has a voice through the Korean executive director, and the PRC has its seat. The PRC could not freeze out Taiwan, but the price for Taiwan was to accept a new name for use in the ADB. This gets deeply into the theology of China nomenclature, but the Taiwan authorities believe that the name under which they now participate – “Taipei, China” – comes uncomfortably close to an acknowledgment that Taipei is a part of China as we know it today, that is, the PRC. They thought that this formulation, with the comma as opposed to without, could compromise their position in nomenclature battles to come. As you see, this is extremely arcane, almost nanopolicy, but these issues are quite important to both sides.

Many Americans feel that such things as a seat in the Asian Development Bank should be a reward for good behavior and essentially for adopting an approach to governance that meets our test. This is one of the reasons there’s such emotional support for Taiwan in the Congress and editorially because Taiwan has embraced democracy and our concept of governance, while Beijing explicitly rejects it. So ideologically there’s more support for Taiwan today than there was in ’79 when Taiwan was authoritarian and under martial law. This is all by way of saying I think our policy toward the PRC gradually normalized to accord with our official relationship. However, the specific problems multiplied because we had a broader and deeper relationship covering many different areas.

Q: Did you get involved in the equivalent to trade complaints? For example, Xerox wants to set up a factory there, and they’re finding that they’re being... or some firm wants to get in there and sell goods. Did that hit you?

LANGE: One of the specific issues during this period was a countervailing duty case that was brought against Chinese textile imports, one of the pressure points in the trade relationship. We had a textile agreement that provided for a certain growth factor. But it was easily foreseeable by the late '70s and early '80s that this was going to be one of the really difficult trade areas because they can produce so cheaply, and because on our side we had such a vociferous and effective lobby to protect domestic textile manufacturers. This was kind of an imaginative filing on the part of the textile lobby. It was based on a notion that Chinese textiles were being sold in the U.S. for less than "fair market value," and that compensatory, or "countervailing," customs duties should therefore be imposed. It was a complicated and difficult case to make, requiring calculation of imputed costs, for example, and the factual part of it depended to a significant degree on advice to the industry from a retired foreign service officer who'd served in China in the late '70s – early '80s. He became convinced that Chinese textile exports to the U.S. were vulnerable in this area. This was primarily the province of USTR and the commerce department, but all of us concerned with China economic affairs spent an awful lot of time on the case. The Chinese had no understanding of our process, and they refused to get engaged in the case, other than to exhort us diplomatically to direct that the case be dropped. The countervailing duty case had broad implications for imports from China across the board. It would have effectively provided another tool for keeping Chinese imports out of the U.S. market, but it eventually failed.

I mentioned high-level visits. One of those was by the Chinese premier, Zhao Ziyang. That was really our first high-level official visitor from China. Deng Xiao-ping came in 1979, but he had no official government position at the time. Zhao came in January 1984, and the visit was quite successful. Zhao was one of the real architects for the China economic reform, and he was a practitioner as well. He was imaginative; he thought outside the box. He had been very successful as a party secretary in Sichuan, China's most populous province, which now has over 100 million people. As it turned out, he was a little too imaginative and political. His downfall was one product of the Tiananmen Square episode in 1989. He was evidently in favor of hearing the students out, but he was in the minority. The leadership's position was, "We've heard enough from the students; let's stop this now, before they become a threat to stability." Zhao Ziyang, who did not sign on to the decision, has ever since effectively been under house arrest. But his 1984 visit here was quite successful.

It was followed a few months thereafter by a visit to China by Reagan, which, as you can imagine, consumed us for months in preparation. I guess the single most dramatic outcome of the Reagan visit was that the White House insisted and, somewhat to our surprise, prevailed in getting Reagan access to live TV in China. This was a big deal; he wanted to address the Chinese people directly. And that has since been a necessary component of presidential visits to China. During Clinton's visit in '98, a lot of planning revolved around opportunities for communicating directly with the Chinese people.

In 1983-84, tech transfer was a huge issue. High tech exports were controlled through COCOM – a coordinating committee made up of developed exporting countries.

Q: It was basically there to prevent technical goods of military value from getting into the Communist orbit.

LANGE: That's right, and this was, since we had customarily been more restrictive than other countries, an effort by us to get everybody together to agree on what those standards should be, particularly for so-called dual use items, that is things which are imported for non-lethal use but can have military applications. The classic example is a supercomputer, which is used for weather profiling and prediction but can also be applied to nuclear weapons design. There are many others, and this effort to coordinate standards and approach when everybody's out there competing and trying to sell is very difficult. We created a separate category for China, to reflect their difference from the Soviets in terms of both their capability and their apparent threat. So we, along with the Europeans, tried to create different standards to apply to our exports to China. One of my officers – one year it was Richard Boucher, another it was Steve Schlaikjer – spent virtually all his time on this issue of tech transfer.

LANGE: That's right, his last assignment was consul general in Hong Kong. Back to 1983: We were negotiating an investment protection agreement with China. That never got done. It's still resurrected fitfully, but we never have signed an agreement with China, because the fundamental approach to something like the protection and treatment of investment, and all of the structures that support an investment climate, is just so different that it has proved impossible so far to bridge the gap. The other factor is that there's plenty of investment that goes into China anyway without an investment agreement. So there's limited pressure on our side or on theirs to get one done.

Another issue was civil aviation. Pan American had service to China at the same time that they wanted to resume service to Taiwan. Northwest wanted to come in as a second carrier, while retaining its service to Taiwan, where the market was strong and growing. That was very difficult to work out, to ensure that there was no discrimination against Northwest in terms of its access to the China market because it had service to Taiwan. Particularly in those early years of our relationship, Beijing was extremely sensitive to anything that had to do with Taiwan. Beijing tried to apply pressure to companies to pull out of Taiwan, but that has largely failed. Boeing sells both to Taiwan and the mainland. Carriers serve both places. I think that's one of the successes of our policy, that we were able to separate to a large degree commercial activity from the political. We framed it as economic relations with the "people of Taiwan". Much as Beijing would have liked our cooperation in raising economic pressure on Taipei, we could not go along with it.

Q: Well, what were you doing? Were you giving ammunition to the Special Trade Representative or were you dealing with the Chinese through the embassy on these things? How did it work?

LANGE: In the case of civil aviation, of course, that's one area where the department has retained primary negotiating responsibility. So in that case we on the desk worked very closely with the airlines and with EB (Bureau for Economic and Business Affairs), which negotiates these things, to ensure that we didn't compromise any of our basic principles in negotiating with the Chinese. Sometimes the airlines were almost desperate, and they may have been tempted to make a calculation - should we give up Taiwan because in the long term the PRC is the larger market? I think we helped give airline management the backbone to resist any inclination to give up on rights to Taiwan.

Q: Well this reflects in a way a battle we'd gone through for a long time on the Arab boycott of any American business dealing with Israel except there the political clout was such that no American company could go along with the Arab boycott because of some domestic repercussions. But you didn't have that particularly in the China thing, did you?

LANGE: Not exactly, but domestic considerations were definitely a factor. There was always the potential that you'd have this domestic backlash if it were seen that we had pressured or encouraged a company to acquiesce to PRC political pressure and give up commercial activity in Taiwan. I think the danger of that happening is very low.

Another issue at the time of the Zhao visit was a grain trade agreement. China had undertaken to buy six million tons of wheat a year, but they didn't meet their commitment. Other exporters were offering competitive prices, and China's crops improved. They just didn't need to import as much as they had in years previous. Even though we were working against market forces, we had to keep up the pressure on the Chinese, and it was an irritant in the bilateral relationship.

Yet another issue was peaceful nuclear cooperation. China wanted our nuclear power technology, and our companies wanted badly to sell it. But we needed an agreement to deal with the non-proliferation issues. It was a very difficult negotiation, pitting the requirements of our Atomic Energy Act against their pride and notions of national sovereignty, and given our concerns about Chinese relationships with nuclear programs in Pakistan and other countries. An agreement was signed in 1985, but the president did not forward the necessary determinations to Congress, a requirement for implementation, until late in the 1990s. As far as I know, there hasn't been any actual transfer of nuclear technology or materials.

After the Zhao Ziyang to the U.S. and Reagan to China trips, a third big visit that we dealt with during that period was the visit to the U.S. by the Chinese president, Li Xiannian. The part of that visit that I was more closely associated with was one of his vice premiers who came along, Li Peng, who later became premier. Li Peng was well known to us because he was not then, and has never since been, very friendly to the U.S. He's a Soviet-trained engineer. He had a sharp tongue, very acerbic, obviously never liked us very much. He was a key figure in the management of the Chinese economy. We saw this as something of an opportunity - it was his first and until now only visit to the United States - to open his eyes and perhaps give him a different perspective. So we gave him a separate program after Washington. Strangely enough, one of the key movers in this special program was the Corp of Engineers. Why the Corp of Engineers? Well, at that time, planning for the so-called Three Gorges project had reached the point where the Corps felt that there was a possibility for the Corps and U.S. business to get involved.

Q: It was a huge dam basically.

LANGE: A huge dam project on the Yangtze, which had been conceived decades previously, but was and is such a massive project, with so many pros and cons to weigh, that it had never gotten off the planning table. It is now in construction, and it's very controversial.

Q: Its environmental impact--

LANGE: Environmental impact, population displacement - you're talking about moving one million people, which is mind-boggling and quite inconceivable in any other country. There are endless arguments about the costs and benefits, in terms of hydroelectric power and irrigation -

Q: And flood control.

LANGE: That's right. In any case, Judge Clark, who had been Reagan's national security advisor...

Q: He'd been undersecretary of state, then moved over to security advisor, then moved over to a Cabinet position.

LANGE: He was out of the Cabinet by this time, but he was still clearly an eminence gris, or at least people assumed he was still close to the president, which in Washington is nearly the same as being close to the president. He was urging the Corps of Engineers and the Interior Department to mount a really major campaign, directed and coordinated by the Interior Department, to get a piece of the business from this project.

Anyway, the Corps' involvement tended to shape somewhat Li Peng's program, which included a visit to part of the Mississippi lock system in Illinois and Boulder Dam in Nevada. The visit to the lock system was all right; the Chinese were duly impressed with the volume of barge traffic on the Mississippi. Boulder Dam, however, gave Li Peng an opportunity to exhibit his well-known sarcasm. At a meeting after touring the dam, he asked bluntly, "What exactly is the point of showing me this 50-year old technology?" This is not the sort of thing you want to hear from a high-level visitor that you are trying to impress. This was after they pulled out all the stops, with ruffles and flourishes, but he professed not to be impressed, and I guess he wasn't. Similarly, there was a visit to a nuclear power plant under construction near Chicago, which was idle. Construction had been held up by a court case for a couple of years or so. At the conclusion of the visit, he said, "In China, when we decide to do something we do it. We don't wait around for a court case to clear." I don't think he said that for effect. I think he was genuinely puzzled. He really didn't understand why we thought our system was superior to theirs, because theirs got things done. Another visit in his program failed to impress. A Ford plant outside Chicago really was a throwback to an earlier era. It looked to me like something out of the '20s or '30s. It was poorly lighted, and the workers didn't manage to convey any sense of engagement or efficiency. At the end of this tour, one of his accompanying vice ministers said with some apparent irritation, "I've been to Japan where they've shown me modern factories. Why are you showing me this?" Though it is hard to say, the irritation may have been real, not feigned. Remember that the background was our limitations on technology transfers to China. He may have believed we were purposely showing them a second-rate factory. In reality, of course, this old factory simply fit into the schedule, and in truth it probably was representative of a mature industry.

As you know, planning for a visit like this incorporates several objectives. I think for political reasons, the White House had decided early on that Chicago was one of the preferred stops, so that becomes one of the determinants of what you can do. What can you arrange in the vicinity of Chicago? And given that this vice minister's special responsibility was automobiles and that we had U.S. companies that were interested in getting into the automobile production business in China, this factory visit fell into place; you wanted to show him something. As for the nuclear plant visit, there weren't many - I doubt today there are any that are under construction - in that day there were darn few. So we had to show him what was available.

Another visit was to the Board of Trade, also in Chicago. I don't know if you've ever been there, but it's apparent pandemonium. Buyers and sellers of commodities such as grains, pork bellies, etc., are shouting orders back and forth and are clearly on the emotional edge. I just looked at it as good theater and as an intense expression of the market at work. As we were about to leave, another of the vice ministers who was on the trip characterized the scene as an example of inhuman exploitation. He reacted to the human dimension of what was going on on the floor, where people were yelling in one another's face and building up lots of stress. Incipient ulcers are what he saw, I guess. He may however have been predisposed to be negative, because he was the one who blew up on the way in at some poor Secret Service guy who didn't see his special access lapel pin and tried to search him. He went into high dudgeon, a classic affronted Chinese dignity act, and the Secret Service supervisor had to offer an abject apology. The incident illustrated the difficulty of divining what these Chinese officials were actually seeing and thinking. Was he genuinely upset by his treatment or what he saw on the trading floor, or was he scoring political correctness points in front of his colleagues?

The final episode I wanted to mention out of that trip with Vice Premier Li Peng was a stop in Silicon Valley. We visited two or three companies, and then concluded with a meeting with overseas Chinese students at Stanford. We gathered in an auditorium; there must have been about 100 of them, almost all in post-graduate study. Some were restrained and didn't want to say much. Others made some pointed observations, contrasting conditions in the U.S. and China. At this point, Li said, "Look, we recognize that some of you coming to the U.S. for study will be seduced by materialism and consumerism, and you won't want to go back to China. That's fine; we don't want you back." This was obviously not a politician in our sense of the term, but he was a very successful politician in the Communist Party context. I daresay he must have convinced 10 or 20 in the audience who were wavering, "Okay, I guess we will stay in the U.S." It just seemed very ill advised for him to say something like that to a group of Chinese academic elite, but he is a dedicated communist and Chinese nationalist, and he apparently calculated that China was better off getting back dedicated, uncontaminated nationalists, even at the cost of some brain drain. Today, of course, these academic elites can pursue their materialistic dreams in China.

Li Peng went on to become premier. Given his reputation as a hard-liner and, later, his supposed role in the Tiananmen Square events, he never got an invitation to the U.S. as premier, and that was a little awkward at times. Like others in the Chinese leadership, he must have had a deep ambivalence about China's course. He was picking his way and trying to somehow find a balance between a market system and opening up to the outside on the one hand, and the state dominated system he was accustomed to on the other. This did not apply only to Chinese in the leadership.

Q: What about some of the larger countries, particularly China and Thailand?

LANGE: China became the big issue during the time I was in this office. Taiwan was also a problem, and this went back for years, starting with books, moving to sound recordings, then to visual recordings. But part of the story with Taiwan is that as it became more prosperous, it developed a domestic constituency for protecting its own national product, and it turns out that's rather important. The same thing happened with Korea. They became interested domestically in protecting intellectual property rights, and that helps a lot. We're not in the position of saying, "Protect it for us!" We're saying, "Protect it for yourself as well." An element of our mythology, going back to the early days of the Republic, is that protecting intellectual property rights inspires creation of intellectual property. Well, yes sometimes it does, but not always, and in my humble opinion, it is possible to carry protection too far, beyond the point of diminishing returns. (For example, copyright protection 70 years after the death of the original copyright holder.) But to return to the main point, it is certainly true that if you get an interest group made up of artists, authors, inventors and others, it helps to sell protection of IPR.

I had a bit of exposure to the influence of domestic IPR stakeholders in Malta. Talk about a tiny market. The concern started with videos and audio cassettes. You could buy any cassette in the open markets in Malta, and they were always pirated. You couldn't buy or rent a legitimate video there. All the videos we watched at home for three years were pirated. The Maltese approach, not surprisingly, was, "Look, these are available at a fraction of the cost of legitimate products. We don't do the pirating, and our people are poor." Many countries take that approach – that their people can't afford the legitimate product. In Malta's case, they didn't believe, with some reason, that sale of pirated products there had much impact on the world market. We began to make some progress, though, and one thing that helped was a fairly influential guy who wanted to open a multiplex cinema. He wanted to show legitimate movies and make a profit. It was against his interest to have immediately pirated videos in the market, if he was going to be showing the same movies in his multiplex. So that, combined with our threats – and like the proverbial mule, to get their attention you had to hit them with a two by four – gradually persuaded them to take the problem seriously. No government wants to address this politically unpopular issue: they all want to ignore it and hope that it goes away.

Q: You would rent a room or something?

LANGE: Taiwan would pay for a meeting room. Everyone understood that a meeting at that level would take place there. Meetings could take place at the AIT offices in Rosslyn as well, and some did take place there, usually at a lower level. But it would be inconvenient for the assistant secretary to cross the river and go up to the AIT offices.

We followed different rules with respect to other departments. From the beginning, we tried to establish the principle with Beijing that certain elements of the relationship, particularly in the economic area, had no policy significance and were necessary to carry out an effective relationship with Taiwan. Our case was that to have good coordination with Taiwan in finance and trade, it is clearly in the interest of the Asian, and indeed the world economy, in everybody's interest to have effective coordination, and so we need to have contact at all levels. Sometimes that might even require a meeting with a cabinet secretary. Of course Beijing never explicitly agreed with this approach. But at the same time that we maintained that we needed to have such meetings, including occasionally at a cabinet level, we thought that it looked rather official if a Taiwan minister of the economy, for example, comes in and calls on Secretary Rubin in his Treasury Department office. Therefore we determined that those meetings should not be in the cabinet member's office. You can easily imagine how much effort and blood was spilled on the floor trying to enforce this guideline on departments that had little understanding and less sympathy with our Taiwan problem.

That was one of the issues addressed in the so-called Taiwan Policy Review in 1994, which was just approaching implementation at the time I took over the office. Pursuant to the review, cabinet secretaries are now permitted to have meetings in their office. This sort of rulemaking and enforcing, which to most Americans looks petty, unproductive, and even pusillanimous, took up an awful lot of time and effort. But we thought that some of it was necessary to preserve the principle that we were serious about not having an official relationship with Taiwan.

In many ways, and on almost a daily basis, we confronted the tension arising from different policy objectives: Our wish to have unofficial yet dynamic relations with Taiwan; Taiwan's effort to raise its international profile – to gain more international space; and Beijing's adamant opposition to any event that would enable Taiwan to avoid coming to the table to negotiate its future as a part of "one China". For example, Taiwan sought the highest possible U.S. representation at the annual meeting of the U.S.-ROC Economic Council, a group composed of all the important businesses involved in U.S.-Taiwan economic relations. Our job was to identify a cabinet or sub-cabinet level official in the economic area to participate, one who covered an area where Beijing would think twice about retaliating. One year, we sent Secretary of Transportation Pena to the Taiwan meeting, reasoning that Beijing had important transportation interests and would not be inclined to shut down communications with our transportation secretary or retaliate in a more tangible way. Still, Beijing responded by refusing to let Pena travel to China. For Taiwan, this annual U.S.-ROC Economic Council exercise was about equal parts substance and symbol. For Beijing, it was wholly symbolic.

Another area where these differing policy objectives clashed was participation in international organizations by Taiwan. The 1994 Taiwan Policy Review, to which I previously referred, committed us to find organizations where Taiwan's participation might be possible and to help promote entry, or at least allow "its voice to be heard". This particular outcome of the Review probably grew out of the successful effort in the early 1990s to secure Taiwan's participation in the Asia Pacific Economic Coordination forum (APEC). A high-ranking economic official from Taiwan took part thereafter in the annual APEC meeting, and Taiwan participated in subsidiary organizations. The agreement that opened the door to that participation, however, did not extend to a "Leaders' Meeting" associated with the APEC meetings, and which typically drew heads of government. Beijing drew the line there; it was absolutely opposed to letting Taiwan's president take part in the Leaders' Meeting. As we soon learned, there are no other organizations like APEC, which could be viewed as a gathering of economies, not countries. Other international organizations were either affiliated with the UN or otherwise required statehood for participation. The PRC was firmly opposed to Taiwan participation in such organizations, and it could easily mobilize the votes by other country members to keep it out. From Beijing's point of view, permitting this camel's nose under the tent would be yet another encouragement to Taiwan's independence.

Taiwan has done little to make this easy. Since the early 1990s, it has pursued a seat at the UN, using the 28 or 30 countries with which it has official relations. It doesn't have a chance, and the effort has heightened Beijing's sensitivity and its resolve to fight tooth and nail any notion that Taiwan was going to get a seat in an international or UN-affiliated organization. We explored observer status in the WHO, for which there was precedent for non-state participation (e.g., the PLO). Beijing was uncompromising. So we spun our wheels but found nothing, even among obscure and highly specialized organizations. Members of Congress, not surprisingly, thought we were not really trying; that we could work our will if we really wanted to.

Q: I would imagine, particularly after the 1989 Tiananmen Square episode, that: 1) relations weren't that great with China; and 2) that Beijing's continual carping about these little niceties of who meets who when and where and all that were beginning to run a little sour as far as we were concerned, weren't they?

LANGE: Yes, and that applies particularly to the Congress and to editorial writers. Going back to 1972, when the Shanghai Communiqué expressed our intention to "normalize" relations with Beijing, and 1979, when we shifted our recognition from Taipei to Beijing – these policy decisions were rooted in a strategic assessment that we needed an official relationship with the "new" China rather than with the China that had lost the civil war in 1949. A relationship with the PRC was useful to us as a counterbalance to the Soviet Union. Also at that time, in terms of the nature of the two regimes, there was a lot less to differentiate Taipei from Beijing than there is today. Until well into the 1980s, the Kuomintang followed policies and principles that would have been very understandable in Moscow and in some cases can be traced back to Comintern agents – most famously Mikhail Borodin – who visited China in the 1920s. The organization of the KMT, and its intolerance for dissent, did not make it exactly a model defender of human rights, to say the least.

Then in 1989, we had Tiananmen and in the same year, the fall of the Berlin wall, and shortly thereafter, the collapse of the Soviet Union. So changes in our strategic calculations and in our emotional attitudes coincided. We didn't need Beijing quite as much as we had before. The other thing that happened was that out of necessity, the government in Taipei, and more importantly the KMT, began a genuine process of democratization. After WWII, the KMT was a party that had dumped itself in Taiwan after losing the civil war on the Mainland, was a minority party, and was seen as an alien imposition on the Taiwan population. But over a period of years it very gradually became "Taiwanized," and democratization of the political process became really a matter of survival for the KMT. I don't think it grows primarily out of an ideological attachment to Jeffersonian principles, though a lot of policymakers had received educations in the United States or in the West and were certainly familiar with Western notions of democracy. It couldn't have happened in the absence of a pragmatic decision that the KMT had to broaden its appeal and had to democratize in order to maintain power and avoid an explosion. So increasingly Taiwan's system began to look attractive to us. On the other side of the strait, the PRC government not only did not embrace our value system, it explicitly rejected it. Since much of our own national identity is bound up in values that we promote around the world, rejection of those values are difficult for us to tolerate, and that can be a heavy burden for a relationship to bear.

So after Tiananmen, there was a clear shift in public, congressional and media sentiment away from Beijing and toward Taiwan. This contributed to pressure to ratchet up the official nature of our relationship with Taiwan as much as possible and to reject pressure from Beijing not to do so. This led to a couple of things. One was the so-called Taiwan Policy Review, to which I have already alluded. This was really a misnomer. It wasn't a review of policy so much as a review of how we implement policy. There really wasn't a serious notion that we would change policy, and it was unfortunate that on the Hill, and to some extent in Taiwan, the impression was that we were considering a change in our policy in some fundamental way. That was never in the cards. The actual review, which took quite a long time, preceded my tenure in the office. What happened after I arrived was the rolling out of the review. The results really affected only a few things on the margin, and to this extent were a disappointment in Taiwan and on the Hill. One example was the change in the name of the Taiwan office here, from the awkward and somewhat mystifying "Coordinating Council for North American Affairs." There was clearly a case for changing the name, and Taiwan would have liked to change it in a way that would make it look as official as possible. Many on the Hill also wanted to make it as official as possible. We wanted to change it in a way that clearly identified the office as representative of Taiwan, but at the same time did not identify it as an official organization. We eventually settled on "Taipei Economic and Cultural Representative Office." It's still pretty awkward, but at least it provides some clue of what the office is about.

Q: I'm told that, one hears about the Israeli lobby and the Greek lobby, but the Taiwanese lobby in the United States is no small matter. Did you feel its hand?

LANGE: We rather thought in our parochial way that Taiwan was second only to Israel in terms of its influence. That may be overstating it, but clearly they are very effective. They've been practicing since the early '40s, when Mme. Chiang Kai-shek was such a hit with the Congress. Many people from Taiwan have been educated in the United States and speak fluent English. They adopt familiar given names – Fred, Jimmy – and that makes it easier for Americans to relate to them. They understand our system. They patiently cultivate the grass roots. For example, using their many branch offices – the equivalent of consulates – they obtain friendly resolutions from city councils and the like. In Georgia, they managed to get the state authorities to issue diplomatic plates to their people in Atlanta. The contrast with Beijing, which by and large has been dismissive of such retail diplomacy, could hardly be starker. One of the ironies of the PRC election influence scare, the notion that Beijing was trying to improperly influence our political process, is that the PRC, unlike Taiwan, would hardly have known where to attempt to exert improper influence.

Q: We're talking about the 1996 elections.

LANGE: That's right. I think what the Chinese ambassador was trying to do – to the extent that the press is correct about what we know about meetings in the Chinese embassy – was to exhort his people to try and become at least half as effective as their Taiwan counterparts in knowing what was happening on the Hill and trying to be influential. And of course that's what our system is based on – influence. Although we will probably never know all the facts, I am doubtful that they contemplated directly buying election influence. The Chinese ambassador was at the time under the gun from Beijing, since this was shortly after the shock we administered by allowing Taiwan's president to address a Cornell graduation.

Q: What were the major points that he was making?

LANGE: As I suggested earlier, the content of the speech was in my view secondary to the mere fact that he was making it: The first president of Taiwan, with which we have unofficial relations, visiting the U.S. for a high profile event and using that stage to say anything at all on Taiwan's status was going to alarm Beijing. The speech itself wasn't blatantly political, but to those fluent in the code of cross-Strait relations, it was provocative. On both sides of the Taiwan Strait, they pay absolutely excruciating attention to terminology. For example, when Lee referred to the "Republic of China on Taiwan", that conveyed a certain message to Beijing. The previous formulations had always been "Republic of China," period. The historical background is so important here. When Chiang Kai-shek lost the civil war and retreated to Taiwan, he always said that he would retake the mainland, reinstall the rightful government of China, and restore the Republic of China. We went along with this fantasy for 30 years, some even maintaining that we should "unleash Chiang". After Chiang Kai-shek died, his son, Chiang Ching-kuo, became president. Toward the end of his tenure, Chiang the son explicitly dropped the notion that they would reinvade the mainland at some point and reestablish a Republic of China government. But he did not declare a second China located on Taiwan, or an independent Taiwan. Both sides still subscribed to one China policy; that is, that Taiwan is a part of China. Whether the Taiwan side under Lee Teng-hui still adhered to a one China policy was in doubt, and when Lee alluded to the "Republic of China on Taiwan", it sounded tantamount to a declaration of a second China. But this was not earth-shaking, and what he said was by and large consistent with what he had said on previous occasions, not that Beijing liked hearing them then, either. What was new was that he gained an important political platform. He could have come to Cornell a few years later, when he would no longer be President of Taiwan. But of course he and Cassidy, and for that matter Cornell, weren't interested in that; they wanted to do it while he was president.

Q: Did you see during this time, shortly before, a year or two before, we had the demise of the Soviet Union. Particularly with the right wing of the Republican Party, I've had sort of the feeling that it's been looking around for an enemy, and China has become sort of the designated enemy and continues today. Did you have any feel about that? They were building up an atmosphere that China was going to be the enemy.

LANGE: It's a question that's being thrashed out today. Entire conferences are organized around the question of whether or not we are demonizing China. Current press articles deal with disagreements within the Republican Party about the appropriate stance toward China, worrying that we can have no confidence about the direction in which China is going to go. There is this notion that people were looking for the next adversary as the Cold War wound down. As David Sanger of the New York Times titled an article: "Looking for an Enemy, and Finding China". It is useful to recall the self-fulfilling prophecy to which Winston Lord often referred: If we want China as an enemy, we can assure that by treating them as such.

The fact is that Beijing explicitly rejects many of our notions about governance, for example, or human rights. As a nation, we have a relatively short history, and we are the product of many different social and historical traditions. One thing that ties us together is shared values, and we actively promote those values abroad, much more than other countries do. We are comfortable when others accept those values. Taiwan has bought into this vision, but the PRC has not. Another problem is that large countries have large interests, usually think they're right, and don't like to be told what to do. That's true of China – literally, the “Middle Kingdom” – and of the U.S.

Here's an illustration of how our differing perceptions of the PRC and Taiwan can come into play in a concrete way. Taiwan has official relations with some smaller countries in Central America and Africa, often those where Taiwan's aid programs can influence diplomatic recognition. From time to time, Taiwan's political leaders, including the president, want to visit those countries. The only convenient way to get to those in Central America is through the United States, so we've worked out these carefully delimited arrangements for transit. This is strongly opposed by Beijing, which would prefer to keep tightening the noose and completely isolate Taiwan. We've told Beijing that we are nevertheless going to permit transits, for the “comfort and convenience” of the traveler. These transits are not meant to be political events, but not surprisingly, Taiwan usually tries to push the envelope and gain some political mileage of one sort or the other. One of these episodes provided the backdrop for the Cornell visa decision. In 1993, Lee Teng-hui wanted to visit Central America. He wanted to stop in Hawaii and while there touch base with Chinese-American groups. We tried to negotiate an arrangement whereby he could refuel the plane, but rather than contact overseas Chinese, take a rest in the VIP lounge at Hickam AFB. This was consistent with policy but did not meet Lee's expectations. He was so teed off that upon landing, he refused to deplane. It was a master stroke, aided by the press which widely reported that he was not allowed to deplane. Friends of Taiwan were outraged, and were determined that we would never again show such “disrespect” to the president of Taiwan, or “kowtow” to Beijing. The rest, as they say, is history.

The 2000 Taiwan presidential election resulted in the election of Chen Shui-bian. This is remarkable in itself, because Chen heads the Democratic Progressive Party (DPP), which only 20 years previously was outlawed in Taiwan. The DPP has as an explicit element in its platform calling for independence for Taiwan. To his credit, Chen has soft-pedaled this plank and has tried not to antagonize Beijing. He requested a transit of the U.S. to visit Central America, and my understanding is that his people were quite understanding and did not themselves try to create pressure for political events. Some congressmen were not so cautious – Sam Gejdenson, Dana Rohrabacher, a couple of others – wanted to have a meeting with Chen. He said it wasn't convenient. Rohrabacher apparently showed up at the hotel anyway and sort of invited himself to have a meeting with Chen. Now, our congressmen have a right to see a visitor when comes to the U.S. But is the question rights or is it interests? In this case, the Taiwan leadership saw that it was not in their interest to have these meetings, particularly on the first transit. The congressmen had a different agenda and reached a different conclusion. How long Chen sees it in his interest to exercise restraint remains to be seen. His domestic political considerations may persuade him to be more demanding in the future, particularly if he judges that the risk is limited because of a security guarantee from the U.S.

Q: This transit took place when?

LANGE: Just last week. In a sense it goes back to your broader question of how we view China. Is it or could it be an adversary? What are its intentions, to the extent that we can determine them? Is it in our interest to promote the international status of Taiwan in the course of one of these transits, even if it complicates our relations with the PRC? From our standpoint, it could be viewed as the “right thing” to do, consistent with spreading our values beyond our borders. Beijing however is likely to view it as a threatening interference in a Chinese affair.

Q: What were the issues that you were dealing with?

LANGE: Well, there’s a standard quartet of big issues that we deal with on China. One we spent some time on already, which was Taiwan. The second is human rights. Third is proliferation of weapons and delivery systems. The fourth is trade and all of its various manifestations. While I was there we had a fifth one as well, which was the reversion of Hong Kong to Chinese sovereignty. So any one of those is a major issue and is time-consuming and - in the classic foreign affairs sense – tends not to be resolvable; the best you can hope is that issues are manageable. One gets from point A to point B but never comes out the end of the tunnel.

It might be helpful to briefly describe the foreign affairs bureaucracy as it relates to China. Because of the importance of the relationship, the White House always has an interest. That is particularly true in advance of high-level visits, and one of those was always on the horizon during my tenure on the Desk. The president’s national security adviser has a direct interest in teeing up these visits. This means that the NSC takes an active part in all significant policy issues, leaving the Desk to manage the day-to-day relationship and, especially when there was a crunch for briefing papers, to act informally to support the small NSC staff. In 1996, shortly before I took over the Desk, the NSC had tried to establish a high-level dialogue, in part to get above the forest of issues and problems and get into the clear air of high strategy. This led to direct insertion of NSA Tony Lake into the dialogue. The nearest counterpart that could be found on the PRC side was Liu Huaqiu, who was director of the State Council foreign affairs office. Lake’s meetings with Liu came at roughly the same time as the Strait missile crisis in 1996, and this had the effect of further reinforcing the NSC’s hold on China policy.

My experience was that the important policy work was done by a small group composed of the NSC deputy for Asia (Sandy Kristoff during most of my tenure), the NSC China person (Bob Suettinger, then Jeff Bader), the EAP DAS for China (Jeff Bader, then Susan Shirk), and Al Romberg, who had the China portfolio in the State Policy Planning Office. They provided the interface to the seventh floor (the policy level) in State, and to the president’s national security adviser at NSC. They also made the trips to China to advance important visits. Significant developments in policy or in public diplomacy came out of that group. State, with its manifold responsibilities and relatively ponderous and multi-layered structure, really played second fiddle to the NSC when it came to China policy. The NSC has a lean bureaucracy, and has the pick of State’s China people to staff its effort. Half way through my tenure on the China Desk, Susan Shirk came in from academia to fill the China DAS position at State. I think that it was extremely difficult for her to learn in a short period of time what she needed to know about the Washington environment and at the same time establish a working relationship with this small group that was formulating and packaging our China policy.

We had an awful lot of high-level visitors in those days in both directions. Chinese president Jiang Zemin visited the U.S. in October 1997, and President Clinton visited China in June 1998. These summits always involve intense preparations, where all aspects of the relationship are examined, with a focus on possible “deliverables” – agreements, for example, that can be pushed to completion and lend the visits some substance. In both cases, after the summits we prepared multi-page “fact sheets” on achievements that were catalogues of the broad sweep of the relationship. They covered areas such as weapons non-proliferation, regional stability, peaceful nuclear cooperation, human rights, political and security dialogue, military-to-military relations, promotion of the rule of law in China, cooperation in law enforcement, economic and commercial relations, energy and the environment, and science and technology.

We had a number of other high level visits as well. The vice president, Secretaries of State Christopher and Albright, and CIA Director Deutsch visited China. We had corresponding visits in this direction by China’s foreign minister and its national security advisor. The U.S. president and the Chinese president always meet during the annual APEC meeting. There was also a real spike in congressional visits to Beijing. I think during a six-month period, about 20% of the members of congress visited Beijing, which was much more of a load for the embassy in Beijing than for us, but we had to provide briefings and prepare trip materials and all that. We prepared lots of testimony on the Hill. There were a number of meetings with the Chinese on non-proliferation. The Hong Kong reversion really took a lot of time and effort.

Q: After all, Hong Kong was between the British and the Chinese. What was our role, other than as an observer?

LANGE: We asserted ourselves for two related reasons. First is our abiding compulsion to spread our political culture -- liberal democracy -- wherever possible. Secondly, we have assumed a global role as judge of the state of human rights. Remember that every year we publish well over a thousand pages of text on how think other people in the world are behaving with respect to human rights. We took an interest, almost a proprietary interest, in human rights in Hong Kong. Hong Kong had not drawn much human rights attention during over 140 years as a colony of Britain, but it captured our imagination now that it was reverting to the sovereignty of “Red China”. Hong Kong had become a success story, really a poster child of laissez-faire capitalism, a free wheeling environment that capitalism hasn’t enjoyed in this country since the days of the robber barons. It exhibited the sort of freedom of expression that one would expect to see in any place that had been absorbed into the British system. With reversion to Chinese sovereignty in the offing, Britain had recently begun to allow limited exercise of the right to vote. The Chinese and British had reached agreement in 1982 about arrangements for reversion. In 1992, Congress passed the Hong Kong Policy Act, which mandates an annual report by the State Department on how well China carries out this agreement with the British, with particular attention to Hong Kong’s autonomy, specified in the 1982 Sino-British agreement in very broad areas. Hong Kong is to maintain its own customs territory, which means it has its own trade laws. It handles its own immigration and issues its own passport. In any number of lesser ways, it does maintain a separate identity. A process is specified by which Hong Kong people will progressively exercise more direct say through the vote in the selection of a legislative council and a Hong Kong chief executive. The process is deliberate, too slow for some in the U.S. and some in opposition parties in Hong Kong. There were also doubts about the democratic credentials of the first chief executive, who was a business tycoon. He was Beijing's pick, and this rankled among those who thought Hong Kong should be as independent as possible. My view is that in the real world, it made sense in those early, uncertain days that whoever was chief executive in Hong Kong, where China exercises sovereignty, should have a good relationship with Beijing. Otherwise it wasn't going to work.

Given its iconographic status, there was a great deal of attention in this country to Hong Kong. There was pressure from some quarters on the Hill that the United States should declare that Beijing was in breach of the terms of the '82 agreement with the Brits, even though the party directly involved, Britain, was not going to take that step. We decided not to involve ourselves in that question, I think wisely so. Considering all of the doubts that the PRC organism would be able to tolerate the introduction of Hong Kong into its system, or that Beijing might smother the goose that was laying golden eggs, the reversion went pretty smoothly. The PRC handled it carefully. For the reversion ceremony in June 1997, Madeline Albright went to represent the United States. The Chinese army had sent a token garrison, but they stayed in their barracks at the time, and I believe there continues to be little outward sign of a Chinese military presence there. Hong Kong had considerable economic difficulty growing out of the 1998 Asian financial crisis, but had a period of recovery from that and generally speaking has done pretty well financially and politically, much better than I think critics had anticipated. The long term is another question. As other Chinese coastal cities, notably Shanghai, become economic powerhouses, they could become effective competitors. Hong Kong's boom years may not return.

Politically, there are certain areas where Beijing is extremely sensitive and where the authorities in Hong Kong are going to respect that sensitivity. Advocacy of Taiwan or Tibet independence, for example, will continue to be neuralgic activities in Hong Kong. But Hong Kong these days is much lower on the radar screen than it was during those years leading up to reversion to China.

The reversion of Macao from Portuguese colonial rule to Chinese sovereignty at the end of 1999 occasioned much less attention from us. It has a much smaller population than Hong Kong and is not very significant economically. Also, the Portuguese have made less pretense of democratic process in their colonies than the British have, so it presented a less compelling object of human rights concern.

There is a broader significance to Hong Kong. In the early days of the reversion, Taiwan was at pains to point out that Beijing's policy of "one country, two systems", as applied to Hong Kong, is not a model for Taiwan, and that's quite true. However, Hong Kong is a test for how well Beijing can handle incorporation of a radically different system. Can it manage to keep its hands off? Can it show tolerance of an entity that is much different than anything else on the mainland? In general, can it show that it is able to deal in a flexible way with something that it claims is part of China and in that way begin to develop the sort of trust that is necessary to work out similar, perhaps even more flexible arrangements with Taiwan? On the face of it what Beijing offers Taiwan seems not all that bad. The Beijing leadership has said Taiwan can maintain its own military, keep its own flag – many features of separateness, but without sovereignty. Maybe Beijing would even be willing to work out arrangements for Taiwan participation in international organizations, but that seems a distant hope for now. As I have earlier indicated, both sides look at international organization as a zero-sum game. There is no sign of an emerging will to compromise.

Q: What about Tibet during this '96-98 period?

LANGE: Tibet has captured the imagination of the West, particularly Hollywood. Orville Schell, China scholar and Dean of the Graduate School of Journalism at Berkeley, wrote a nice book on the subject: "Virtual Tibet: The Search for Shangri-la from the Himalayas to Hollywood." I'm sure you're familiar with the current situation. China occupied Tibet in 1950. In '58, the Dalai Lama escaped to India and has been in northern India ever since with a large number of his followers and a government in exile. He also has the stature of a Nobel Peace Prize winner and is a legitimate and compelling religious figure. There's widespread sentiment in the West that Tibet deserves to be an independent country and a sense that Tibetan culture is being compromised, not only as a result of explicit Beijing policy but because of settlement in Tibet by large numbers of Han Chinese – not out in the countryside, but especially in Lhasa, the capital. The Dalai Lama has effective representation in the United States and the Tibetans have good relationships on the Hill. In many respects Americans have fallen in love with what Schell terms "virtual Tibet," that is, our projection of a fantasy Tibet.

Q: Shangri-la refers to a book by James Hilton; it came out in the 1930s.

LANGE: Yes, Lost Horizon, in 1933. It was, by the way, the first paper-back book ever published. Shangri-la is an other worldly place, a utopia. People are kind to one another, and life is reflective and rewarding. During the time that I was on the desk, there was an initiative on the Hill to pass legislation mandating a special envoy for Tibet. Now the title "special envoy" conveys a certain officiality. It implies in some sense a recognition that Tibet deserves independence. It was something that, in the judgment of the Department, was not wise and would not promote resolution of the Tibet problem. So in due course, the Department in order to preempt such legislation decided to appoint a "special representative" for Tibet. The person selected for this position was Greg Craig, who at that time was director of Policy Planning. This was years before Elian Gonzales episode, when Craig received much wider public exposure. The rationale was that China and the United States had any number of reasons for Greg Craig to interact with his counterparts in China. We had strategic interests in common that we had a mutual interest in discussing, and therefore, the thinking went, the Chinese would be encouraged to deal with Craig and this might promote his acceptability to them as a Special Representative for Tibetan Affairs. It didn't exactly work out that way. The Chinese were very hardheaded about it. To the extent that they dealt with Craig, they attempted to ensure that he would not try to discuss Tibet with them because in their view there was nothing to discuss. It was better than legislation mandating a special envoy, but it didn't really advance our interest in promoting dialogue between Beijing and the Dalai Lama.

Q: What about weapons proliferation? What were the Chinese doing? We got political and we got quite involved during this period.

LANGE: There are a couple of different aspects to this. One is that Chinese firms or entities were engaged in shipping bad stuff to bad people without the explicit authorization and perhaps even without the knowledge of the central government. The other aspect is the extent to which they knowingly assist countries that in our view should not be assisted. That typically applies to Pakistan, both in the nuclear area and in delivery vehicles; i.e., missiles and missile technology. This gets to be very technical, and I personally did not participate in proliferation discussions with the Chinese. The question can turn, for example, on the very specific provisions of the Missile Technology Control Regime –our understanding of what they mean and the Chinese understanding of what they mean. Clearly they skated on the edge with respect to Pakistan. On the other hand, they cooperated with respect to Iran, to which they were sending cruise missiles and where they took steps to end that relationship. This was not easy for China, in terms of its relationship to Iran. It also clearly had a more benign view of Iran than we did. The overall picture is a mixed one - some successes, some areas where we still have a lot of work to do, and a very difficult dialogue. Here is where you come up against Chinese pride, and their sense they're being subjected to standards that we don't subject ourselves to. We identify the bad countries in the world and expect others to agree with us, that sort of thing. It's a very, very tough sell. The other complication is Taiwan. The opening Chinese response in any discussion of proliferation is Taiwan. They always try to leverage our interest in other areas into concessions on arms sales to Taiwan. They would not even accept this characterization – "concessions". In their view, they are calling on us to meet our commitments under the 1982 communiqué on arms sales to Taiwan.

Q: Now their motivation, irrespective of the Taiwan thing, to Iran, Pakistan and all, would you say that their interest was projection of power or was this commercial?

LANGE: It was a combination. It's actually quite similar to our own situation: Commercial interests find the arms trade lucrative; they sell arms to make a profit. Many Chinese parastatal organizations with arms to sell are on a commercial basis. Their prosperity depends on the bottom line, much like Boeing or Lockheed Martin. Governments permit arms sales if they are consistent with their efforts to exert geopolitical influence. In the case of Pakistan, there's a long historical relationship dating back to China's confrontation with India in the 1950s. In the case of Iran or other countries in the Middle East, it's interests similar to our own – securing relationships in the region that are going to be longstanding and help them secure sources of petroleum. We've demonstrated that we're prepared to go to war over oil, and we'll almost certainly do so again in the future, so it's not surprising that China is prepared to develop arms sales relationships toward the same end. China also has an interest in relationships with the Muslim World that might help to counterbalance Muslim separatist efforts in China's Far West.

Q: How did you, in this, you had moved from the Taiwan to the China desk, how did you view the effectiveness of the Beijing embassy as opposed to the Taiwan representation? How did you find the PRC representation here in Washington?

LANGE: Beijing? It's not good. They are backward, and the investigation into the '96 fundraising probably set them back even further. They still have a feeling that they don't quite understand the rules, and they have a clear sense that a different standard is applied to them. This is particularly the case now that Taiwan has drawn closer to our own political value system. There's a certain maladroitness in the way the PRC reps present their case. Sometimes it's even a failure to present their case. I've heard staffers on the Hill, even sympathetic staffers, tell me -

“We haven’t heard from these guys.” They lack confidence. They lack fluency in the language of the Hill. They feel constrained in a way that people from Taiwan don’t. They always hew very tightly to policy lines, and this often comes off as strident and uncompromising. They’re just not very good at playing the Washington influence game.

Q: I’ve heard some of the same, not quite those terms, but some of the same of the Indian representation in the United States. While the Pakistanis are ready to go out and be called by their first name. They’ll talk to anyone. The Indians want to talk to somebody of exactly the appropriate rank and all. And once you do this, you’re not going to get very far within the Washington scene. You want to be able to have the ambassador sit down and be able to lunch with a couple of staffers on an important committee or something like that. They can’t respond to this type of thing.

LANGE: The current Chinese ambassador, Li Zhaoxing, came up through the interpreter ranks, not unusual in the Chinese system, and his English is very good. On a one-to-one basis, he can be quite charming. But in his public appearances, he often sounds as though he’s reading from his instructions and speaking for Beijing ears. One of the reasons the previous ambassador who was here in ’95 took a real hit was failure to understand Washington, and to foresee the Lee Teng-hui visa decision. It was a glaring example of their inability to read us inscrutable Americans. A few weeks prior to our decision that Taiwan’s president could come to Cornell, there was a meeting in New York between Chinese Foreign Minister Qian Qichen and Secretary Christopher. Naturally, Qian asked about all of the media stories about pressure to issue Lee a visa. Christopher’s response was that it’s the Administration’s policy that we will not agree to this visit but, he went on (I paraphrase), “you have to understand that there is terrific pressure on Capitol Hill. The two houses just passed two resolutions virtually unanimously.” As we read the account of the meeting, we thought to a person that Christopher was trying to convey the real situation. To us, the true meaning of his words was that, “This is the policy today, but tomorrow it could change; you’d better alert Beijing that things could change.” It went right over their heads; the Chinese didn’t understand it at all. They undoubtedly reported back to Beijing that they had a fresh, firm assurance from Secretary Christopher that Administration policy is that there won’t be a visit by Lee. They truly didn’t understand. At the working level, we couldn’t give them a clear heads up. Policy is policy, until leadership decides it is no longer policy. The Chinese really felt that they had been badly misled. The Chinese ambassador had to go back to Beijing, and he was still bleeding when he returned to Washington. I think any ambassador here now must feel like he has to be extremely aggressive in pressing Beijing’s agenda.

Q: And it doesn’t work. I mean that’s just the wrong way to go about it.

LANGE: It wasn’t long after this that a great brouhaha arose over alleged Chinese attempts to improperly influence our political process, and the ensuing campaign finance investigation. I thought from the time of the first media story, which was based on leaked intercepts, that the information was ambiguous and after storm and fury would still not lead to a clear conclusion on the facts. That was in fact the outcome, but the episode was an invitation to those inclined to “demonize” China in any event to put the worst face on the evidence, such as it was. The irony is inescapable: Lee Teng-hui to Cornell happened in part because the PRC hadn’t a clue how to influence or even interpret American political events. When they tried to beef up their ability to play the game, even though that effort may have even been legitimate, that also blew up in their face.

Even had the Chinese been knowledgeable and able in the ways of Washington, I'm not sure how much they could have done, given an atmosphere approaching hysteria. Scandal piled on scandal, invariably hyped by partisan politics. There were the campaign finance and political influence investigations on John Huang, Maria Hsia, Johnny Chung and Charlie Trie (Chinagate, Donorgate). I think that all of these people were essentially influence peddlers, not sinister agents. Congressional investigations and hearings, headed by Fred Thompson on the Senate side and Dan Burton on the House side, churned the water furiously but in the end came up with no persuasive evidence, in spite of illegal campaign finance activity, to support wild allegations that the Chinese had affected elections. Then there were national security issues raised over involvement in trade of companies controlled by Chinese military units, allegations of assistance to Chinese missile design by U.S. companies Hughes and Loral, and a story that Wen Ho Lee had obtained nuclear secrets from the Los Alamos labs. There were even notions that acquisition by a Hong Kong company, Hutchison Whampoa, of port facilities at either end of the Panama Canal constituted a potential security threat. A select committee headed by California congressman Chris Cox examined all these issues. The Cox Committee findings were dispiriting, not because of the findings per se, which could have been anticipated, but because they were the antithesis of careful and objective inquiry. The report reached dark and categorical conclusions about China's spying activities in the U.S., which rested however on poor analysis and on worst-case assumptions with respect to every ambiguous piece of information. Academics and others discredited the committee's work, but the damage had been done. Well, perhaps this overview serves to give some sense of the noxious climate in which we were trying to conduct relations with China.

LANGE: That's when I retired. Before we retire from this, though, I mentioned at the outset four big issues that occupied us from '96 to '98. We haven't devoted much attention to human rights or trade.

Human rights occupied one desk person full time, and it suffused nearly all activities on the desk. At any one time, we were likely to be actively engaged with one or more specific cases, e.g., Harry Wu and prison labor, detention of religious figures in China, suppression of speech, high profile political prisoners, the Falun Gong issue, alleged traffic in human organs. There was always something. It was always a component of high-level meetings. We tried to engage the Chinese, and we tried to exert pressure. Production of the human rights report on China was an annual ordeal. Where did the emphasis belong? Was it on the historical context, in which the experience of the typical Chinese looked quite favorable, or on a universal standard, against which many human rights practices fell short? Typically, those who produced the draft in our embassy were impressed by improvements and the unprecedented enjoyment of human rights in some areas, while the Washington human rights bureaucracy looked through the prism of the human rights professionals, including the non-government organizations. Three-way drafting battles shifted back and forth among the embassy, the desk, and the human rights bureau (DRL). Sometimes, specific issues got to the assistant secretary level. It seemed that no entry could be dropped in subsequent years. The report got longer and longer and the process more excruciating.

After my retirement, I went to annual meetings in Geneva of the UN Commission on Human Rights to help push for a resolution addressing human rights in China. We had tried for several years to pass such a resolution but had come close only once, in 1995. China assigned a high priority to defeating the resolution and used a combination of enticement and threat on the other delegations, many of which recognized that they themselves could one day be the subject of a country-specific resolution. China argued that a confrontational resolution was not the way to influence human rights behavior and that, regardless of who joined us as cosponsors, the U.S. was trying to impose its human rights standards on others. Every year, a majority of commission members, whatever their views of human rights in China, decided that it was not in their interest to vote for a China resolution. Some human rights advocates argued strongly that the act of presenting such a resolution had a beneficial effect on human rights in China, but after a decade of unsuccessful campaigns, even some non-government organization NGO reps at the Geneva meeting told me that losing efforts were becoming counterproductive.

Our bilateral efforts to deal with human rights met with mixed success. Between 1996 and '98, our bilateral "human rights dialogue" was on hold, in part because of a controversial meeting in earlier years that State's assistant secretary for democracy and human rights, John Shattuck, had set up with a dissident during a visit to Beijing. We made some headway on separate human rights initiatives – the beginnings of a program to promote rule of law in China, obtaining agreement for a visit by a delegation looking into religious freedom – but progress was fitful. One tempting initiative, particularly in advance of high-level visits, was to secure the release of high-profile political prisoners. Many of us were skeptical about the wisdom of submitting lists of such prisoners to the Chinese, since they could always present any releases as gestures of good faith, with little or no significance to the larger human rights picture. Moreover, the releases were always on "medical" grounds, for treatment outside prison but with the understanding that treatment would be sought abroad; the prisoners were subject to reincarceration if they attempted to return to China. The Chinese thus skirted the potential problem of releasing these dissidents back into Chinese society. We managed to get Wang Dan and Wei Jingsheng out in this way. The case of Wei Jingsheng is instructive. He had captured the imagination of the West, because of his personal courage and implacable challenge to the Chinese authorities. He was the dissident with whom John Shattuck had met earlier. But he was largely a solitary figure, not high educated – which counts for much in the Chinese context – and he did not have strong connections to the expatriate Chinese dissident community. He has not learned English. He has a research position, I think at Harvard, but he has not been able to establish a life for himself outside that of a sort of professional Chinese dissident. By releasing him, China rid itself of an irritant in the U.S.-China relationship at little cost.

What makes human rights such a difficult issue between us? For some Americans, China is a highly visible outlier in an international human rights structure. Other Americans are committed to a particular aspect of human rights; e.g., religious freedom, and China has long been a target of Christian missionary effort. At root, I think, is the sense that Chinese human rights practices represent American failure to promote our values and institutions – an explicit rejection of what George Kennan, for example, has identified as our messianic notion about U.S. responsibilities in carrying out its foreign relations. In a related way, large numbers of Americans regard promotion of human rights in China as a tool to weaken the hold of an ideology that is corrupt and against which we were pitted during half a century of Cold War.

The Chinese authorities view our emphasis on human rights as an element of a long-term policy to change their system. On the most obvious level, certain manifestations of human rights, such as freedom of speech or assembly, could turn into threats to the control of the Communist Party of China, and self-preservation dictates resistance. But there is a more broadly Chinese factor at work, a Chinese aversion to luan, or disorder, and a substantial emphasis on collective rights. For traditional Chinese, Western emphasis on individual rights comes across as self-indulgent and, well, foreign. Resentment of foreign efforts to impose change has a long history, predating the Opium Wars of the 1840s. For all of these reasons, I think that we are well served to be patient, and to allow indirect influences – the Internet, growing prosperity, interaction of trade and foreign investment, and student exchange – to induce change from within. Unfortunately, our system favors results in four-year cycles. When administrations argue that contact and engagement would bring beneficial change to China, and administrations uniformly make such arguments, they are within two or three years called upon to explain why change has not yet manifested itself. Patience is not one of our virtues.

Trade seems likely to cause friction for the indefinite future. China has a nearly inexhaustible supply of cheap labor and a rapidly improving technological base. We have a seemingly unlimited appetite for finished goods and the ability to buy them, at least as long as other countries are willing to finance our consumption by buying our debt. That adds up to a chronic and growing trade deficit for us, and to pain for specific sectors such as textiles. It may be true, as economists believe, that bilateral deficits don't matter; but as long as the overall balance is in chronic deficit, huge bilateral deficits are difficult to defend at the political level. From time to time, there have been efforts, legislative or otherwise, to deal with particular pieces of the trade problem on a bilateral basis. Hopefully, with China's accession to the World Trade Organization, we will be able to manage some of the trade issues on an international basis.

China trade and human rights issues met, until China joined the World Trade Organization in 2001, in the annual ritual of most-favored nation (MFN) hearings. The Jackson-Vanik Amendment to the U.S. Trade Act required a certification that communist countries such as China were not hindering emigration. This was a hangover from the period when the Soviet Union was preventing Jews from emigrating to Israel, but notwithstanding the language of the law, it had mutated over the years into a broad examination of human rights practices in communist countries. The congressional and editorial debates on the pros and cons of MFN for China – whether extending it or withholding it was more likely to bring about positive change in China – were repeated year after year. The annual renewal effort engaged all of the economic agencies for months and generated reams of congressional testimony. The outcome was always the same – renewal of MFN for China – but only after exhaustive and extravagant application of bureaucratic and political capital, from the White House on down. The exercise became part of the landscape, and many in the media and on the Hill regarded it as an opportunity to get in their licks on China. As one member of Congress said, it had become a habit. Perhaps one can understand Deng Xiaoping's confusion about the source of this annual uproar and, upon being informed that the U.S. law in question called for freedom of emigration, his bemusement. He suggested that China would be willing to part with a million or so Chinese emigrants if the U.S. would take them.

U.S.-China relations have been characterized by wide swings of the pendulum. During my first involvement, 1980-85, there was great optimism, even euphoria, about the future of the relationship. During my second involvement, 1994-98 (including my period as Taiwan coordination advisor), we seemed to lurch from crisis to crisis, and to be continually called upon to justify a non-confrontational relationship with China. Even a neutral characterization of the relationship is hard to find. The last-minute product, in connection with preparations for the 1998 Clinton visit to China, was that the U.S. and China were "...working toward a constructive partnership." The media truncated this for public consumption, dropping the "working toward" element, and making it appear that the Administration was overselling the relationship, or naive, or perhaps both.

I would like to be hopeful that we can smooth out the ups and downs of U.S.-China relations, but I am actually not very sanguine. We do have some interests in common. One of these is an interest in stability, which argues for common cause in places like the Korean Peninsula, for economic and trade growth, against regional terrorism, and against proliferation of WMD, even though we may differ on the particular elements of controlling proliferation. On the other hand, China is clearly a rising power, one that will become increasingly important in the region, while we are committed to asserting our interests in the region, including through forward deployment of military forces. On both sides, nationalist sentiments run high. On Taiwan, it is difficult to anticipate resolution of our differences, and there are clearly forces acting to exacerbate those differences. Most fundamentally, China seems unlikely under the current order to embrace our notions of governance and social interaction. Even a new Chinese order, which would probably not come about without a period of disorder or even chaos, might fall short of our ideal of a liberal democracy.

A constructive relationship is clearly in the mutual interest of the U.S. and China. Given the forces continually heating and cooling these two bodies, it falls to the State Department to anticipate and modulate sudden shocks, and to keep the relationship on track.

ROBERT GOLDBERG
China Analyst, Bureau of Intelligence and Research
Washington, DC (1980-1982)

Mr. Goldberg was born and raised in Baltimore, Maryland and educated at Gettysburg College and the University of Chicago. He accompanied his Foreign Service wife on her assignment to Tokyo before entering the Foreign Service in 1983 as Foreign Service Officer. A Chinese language specialist, Mr. Goldberg served both in the State Department of State in Washington, DC and abroad dealing primarily with Economic and Chinese affairs. His overseas posts include Tokyo (as spouse), New Delhi, Hong Kong, Guangzhou and Beijing, where he served twice, once as Deputy Chief of Mission. Mr. Goldberg was interviewed by

Q: So actually your first job at State was on the Civil Service side.

GOLDBERG: On the civil service side. I did that for 14 or 15 months and was a foreign policy analyst of Chinese affairs. The senior analyst at that time was Carol Hamrin. She was very good, but we had a few others. Daniel Kiang was in the office. Daniel just recently passed away.

Daniel was in the office, and Lou Sarris who never tired of talking about fighting the good fight on Vietnam, was the deputy director. Galen Fox was the INR/EAP senior Northeast Asia and China person. Towards the end of my time there, Galen left - he subsequently left the Foreign Service and went off to Hawaii where he became a state legislator for a period of time – and was replaced by Bob Randolph, who was a gracious individual who let us pretty much write and research whatever we thought important. I remember doing a piece based on Chinese foreign ministry guidances about the third communiqué in 1982 and making some folks on the China desk unhappy. The desk director at that time was Bill Rope. Scott Hallford was his deputy.

Q: What was his concern?

GOLDBERG: We had found some comments that suggested the Chinese were happier with what they got in the third communiqué that we had thought and that they might have settled for us. In retrospect, knowing what we know now about these guidances and how much propaganda was involved, maybe the Chinese just wanted to play this up as part of their public line to their own population. I suppose some of what I wrote did not accord with the China desk agenda for selling the communiqué government wide.

Q: Now INR as the name suggests is intelligence and research. You are not dealing with daily things. You are supposed to look at information and thinking of trends over a longer time frame.

GOLDBERG: You know in those days so much of what I did was spot analysis. The longer pieces were few and far between. So we were really doing a lot of spot analysis that was sort of a snapshot of China policy at a given moment. The INR product at that point was divided into two areas – front of the book and back of the book. I don't know how it is divided now. Front of the book was maybe five or six, or maybe even more, one paragraph pieces drawn from intelligence sources that spoke to issues that would be of concern to the seventh floor state department principals. Then the back of the book was two or three pieces, each limited to no more than one page. As analysts, we always felt the editors destroyed our work

Q: For the researcher who might be interested in the book, would you describe it a little bit? Was it a daily?

GOLDBERG: This product went to the Secretary and others on the seventh floor. It probably was not more than four pages. A daily brief for the secretary. Was Al Haig interested in this stuff? Yeah, I think on the China side he was. Was George Shultz interested? Yeah. I think he probably was as well. But with everything they had to read, including the Presidential Daily Bulletin, I never had a sense that the INR contribution was all that critical. In subsequent years

INR developed a reputation for critical thinking and did some great work on Afghanistan and Iraq and their analysts at times dissented from the common wisdom that passed as the sense of the intelligence community. This was especially true when other agencies were being pressured to produce intelligence that “confirmed” the views of policymakers rather than challenged those assumptions. INR didn’t face the same constraints when I was there in the early 80s. It was interesting work; don’t get me wrong. I enjoyed it. It was a terrific re-introduction back into China issues, but I never got the sense that much of what we on the China side did was well regarded or closely read.

Q: This topic is interesting because this is still the initial period of formal relations.

GOLDBERG: What you have got was a very powerful desk in the Bill Rope years. And an embassy - with Art Hummel out there as ambassador and Chas Freeman as DCM - that was offering a lot of very good analysis and information. There was very close coordination between Freeman and Rope about the line that they felt ought to be taken by State with regard to issues in China. Nineteen eighty-two was a very difficult and significant year in terms of the last of the three communiqués; the stakes were very high in terms of the relationship. We were mainly observers in INR, rather than players and, of course, we didn’t want a sound policy derailed because of some flawed analysis on our part.

Q: Because of how were you casting the issue?

GOLDBERG: I wish I could remember exactly, but the conclusion may well have been: can we depend on the Chinese to honor this particular agreement. If you are questioning Chinese intentions with regard to the agreement, you are creating some waves. But it was a tempest in a teapot. It was a little four or five page paper with citations and stuff. It surfaced at a time when people were very nervous about the communiqué and I’m probably suggesting it was more consequential than it really was.

Q: After this spirited baptism in INR you moved to join the Foreign Service. Did you take the exam or was it a lateral transfer?

GOLDBERG: No, I took the exam. I recognized early on that the things I wanted to do couldn’t be done from an INR perch unless that’s all I wanted to do – and you know as well as I that the Foreign Service, especially at that time, existed for the Foreign Service Officers. Directors and deputies, even unit chiefs like Galen Fox and Bob Randolph were Foreign Service officers. So as a civil service officer, you were basically limiting yourself in terms of what you might do over the course of 25 or 30 years. I wanted to do something different. I wanted to go off to China at some point and live and work there. So it was sort of thinking that I might not be able to broaden my horizons and meet different challenges without being an FSO.

WILLIAM PIEZ
Director, East Asia Bureau, Economic Policy Office
Washington, DC (1980-1982)

Deputy Assistant Secretary for Economics, East Asia Bureau
Washington, DC (1985-1989)

Mr. Piez was born and raised in Rhode Island and educated at the University of Rhode Island and the Fletcher School. After service in the US Armed Forces, he joined the Foreign Service and was posted to Frankfurt, Kabul and Manila as Economic Officer. During his career Mr. Piez dealt primarily with economic matters of East Asian countries, particularly Japan, where he served first as Economic Counselor and, from 1983 to 1985, as Economic Minister. In the Department in Washington, Mr. Piez was Deputy Assistant Secretary of East African Economic Affairs, and from 1989-1991, Deputy Assistant US Trade Representative. Mr. Piez was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2009.

Q: Well you left there when?

PIEZ: Well I left there in 1980 to come back to the East Asia Bureau to the Economic Policy Office. I was the office director.

Q: You were there from when to when?

PIEZ: I was there for about two years. In 1983 I left that job. Transferred again.

Q: Well what was this '80 to '83 period. We have been talking about economic difficulties. How stood Asia at this point?

PIEZ: Well at that time it was the region of the economic miracles. You have got Korea, Taiwan, Singapore, Malaysia not too far behind. Vietnam was settling down. We were dealing with some of the political issues like the POW/MIAs. We had an extensive structure of regional organizations in Asia. We had ASEAN (Association of Southeast Asian Nations). We had the Asia Pacific Economic Council (APEC). It included Australia and New Zealand. The American Chambers of Commerce in the different countries had their organizations in the region and they met every year dealing with various questions of their business interests in the Asian countries.

Q: From your perspective when you got there in 1980 what were sort of our economic concerns?

PIEZ: Well there were still trade issues, and we still had a number of questions relating to encouraging our exports, and the increasing importance of China as an economic power was certainly of interest. A lot was going on there.

Q: Well how did we feel about China? Did we see China as a potential market? All this oil for the lamps of China idea that this is a great market, at the same time if this thing starts going it will flood us.

PIEZ: Occasionally you would have someone say if every Chinese lengthened his gown by one inch there would be a market for 80 million square yards of cotton. Well Ok. I was not too impressed with that sort of thinking. We didn't see China developing as a threat in particular, but certainly Chinese economic development was very much to be desired. China as a poor country was not something that would be to our interests at all.

Q: Was India included in your bailiwick or not?

PIEZ: When I was in the bureau, No. That was part of South Asia and still the NEA bureau. We went as far as Burma and after Burma that was it.

Q: During the time you were there, two years or so, did the investments in Thailand and Indonesia were they beginning to go sour? Were their economies in pretty good shape?

PIEZ: On the whole they were. Indonesia had some pretty forward thinking industrial and economic leaders. I think it was pretty well known the system was highly corrupt. To get into the category of economic or industrial operations in Indonesia you had to have connections. But on the whole the country seemed politically stable, and economically developing at a reasonable rate. There were continuing problems in the Philippines. Thailand was doing well. The East Asian financial crisis occurred only after I had retired.

Q: The Marcos regime was beginning to come apart right while you were doing that.

PIEZ: It was during the Carter Administration that the Marcos regime collapsed. Richard Holbrooke was our Assistant Secretary and he was concerned that Marcos be replaced, but in an orderly fashion and without violence. That was how it worked out, essentially, although economic advancement in the Philippines was still slow and sporadic.

Q: This was the Reagan administration, at least after you were there Reagan came in. You know, Reagan being a Californian and all, also his people were from California, so they must have been a little more oriented...

PIEZ: More oriented toward East Asia. The Reagan Administration came in while I was in Washington. I recall that, during the Air Traffic Controllers strike, I was on night duty for a time. Because of the time difference a lot of the traffic on related issues came in at night. Our concern was to keep flights from and to East Asia operating safely as much as we could.

Q: Did you feel that you were getting your due share of attention in the State Department.

PIEZ: Oh yes. Ambassador Mansfield, one of his repeated expressions was the U.S.- Japan relationship was the most important bilateral relationship in the world, bar none. He could make that case. One might choose to argue, but he had a pretty strong case. President Reagan kept him on as ambassador, a wise decision.

Q: But also to the point where you take a look at the situation you have differences. If you look at say Europe. You have a whole bunch of countries, but they are all rather cohesive. But when you look at Asia you have only really got Japan.

PIEZ: Well Japan was clearly by far the second largest economy in the world.

Q: China, you didn't know where it was going. Korea was in the middle of a dictatorship. Park Chung Hee had been killed...

PIEZ: The harsh realities of dictatorship.

Q: Did you feel that you were getting your due share of attention in the State Department.

PIEZ: Oh yes. Ambassador Mansfield, one of his repeated expressions was the U.S.- Japan relationship was the most important bilateral relationship in the world, bar none. He could make that case. One might choose to argue, but he had a pretty strong case. President Reagan kept him on as ambassador, a wise decision.

Q: But also to the point where you take a look at the situation you have differences. If you look at say Europe. You have a whole bunch of countries, but they are all rather cohesive. But when you look at Asia you have only really got Japan.

PIEZ: Well Japan was clearly by far the second largest economy in the world.

Q: China, you didn't know where it was going. Korea was in the middle of a dictatorship. Park Chung Hee had been killed...

PIEZ: The harsh realities of dictatorship.

Q: It had problems and of course you had the other countries, Sukarno and Marcos. So Japan was sort of the keystone of holding things together. How stood during this time were there any particular issues with Japan?

PIEZ: Well I think that was a period beginning in 1980 when the Treasury Department really started working very hard on the question of the exchange rate. There was a break through early in that period and the Japanese gave up their 360 rate. They ended up negotiating that with Treasury in some detail because the Japanese intention was to upvalue the yen but then fix it again. They settled on 301 and a fraction. There were last minute negotiations over the tenths and how many tenths. It was interesting. I find in many negotiations, after all the big issues are settled, there are many nettlesome little ones.

Q: They say the devil is in the details. Well basically you are still dealing with sort of the same people in East Asia that you have been dealing with for a long time.

PIEZ: I had continuity.

Q: Except China was changing wasn't it.

PIEZ: Yes.

Q: How did you feel about China at that time? Where was it going? What were you thinking?

PIEZ: Well I think at that time the developments in China - Deng Xiao Ping and the economic changes were seen as very much in our interests. So we were more than glad to see all of that progress. Yet there was a recognition that a country that big and with that potential was going to change the landscape of Asia and of the world. Of course Washington was awash in China experts, all of whom had an opinion on what was going to happen next. My own feeling was that China would be making those decisions, and that we would be on the margins.

Q: Well here you are now, you have moved up so you are dealing with the whole thing. Did you find that the China Hands and the Chrysanthemum Club and others, was there any problem?

PIEZ: Not really. I didn't find that there were difficult economic or bureaucratic rivalries operating. There were regular meetings held by the East Asia bureau assistant secretary with people from the National Security Council staff, the Pentagon and the Treasury and the East Asia bureau people. I would sometimes attend in place of the DAS who was the regular member. Those events went very smoothly.

***

Q: You were there from '85 to when?

PIEZ: Until '89. In 1988 George Bush the elder was elected and inaugurated in January 1989. At that time (1989) the new Secretary of State was James Baker who had come over from treasury. He had a treasury officer that had he thought would be very good for my job. I had been in it for four years, after all, so Bob Fauver replaced me coming from treasury.

Q: Ok, well let's talk about the '85 to '89 period. Were the issues changed much?

PIEZ: Not very much. Japan was still the number one interlocutor in East Asia for the United States, but of course the job was regional and there were any number of organizations and problems and situations in the region to occupy my time. There was the Asia Pacific Economic Council. There was an Asia Pacific Council of private, mostly business representatives. The American Chambers of Commerce in all of the East Asian countries had their regional organizations. And of course there was ASEAN that I mentioned earlier. So during that four year period there were endless gatherings and meetings. I also participated in many of the bilateral talks. The Undersecretary of State for economic affairs had regular meetings with his counterparts in individual East Asian countries, and I participated in many of those negotiations and conversations. Allen Wallis was the economic Under Secretary at that time. He was an interesting person to work with and for. He had steady nerves and never showed any ill temper. He would not disagree directly with anyone. Instead he would just state very clearly and simply his own conservative economic views. For example, he believed strongly that markets should not be regulated closely, whereas many East Asian economic experts thought that governments should apply extensive controls, or impose taxes designed to direct development of favored industries. They had a rather dirigiste approach to economic development. Allan Wallis, however, never came across as doctrinaire. He always favored economic freedom, and it was not easy to argue with him.

My job those four years involved extensive travel. I also made many domestic trips talking to audiences around the country. On one occasion I was paired with another speaker at a student conference. The other speaker did not show up, so I filled in for him, giving three different speeches on different subjects in one day. And I'd get drafted into other things. If Mike Smith had some talks with the Thais on textiles, I might be brought along as part of his delegation.

Q: Well how about something we haven't mentioned. I am not quite sure I am leaving out. The term now used is intellectual property. How about copyright. Copying things, movies, songs and books and other things has gotten easier and easier. You were there when things were...

PIEZ: That was just heating up, and it was a particular problem in Hong Kong and of course China quickly came along as a source of fraudulently marketed or bogus intellectual property. To start off there was the old problem of imitation Rolex watches and that sort of thing. Those would come from Korea or China and they were often sold in Hong Kong. I think not so much manufactured there but brought in from China or Korea, and it was spreading quickly into movies and software of all kinds.

Q: Was your bureau heavily involved in trying to do something about this?

PIEZ: It was a growing issue at the time. The number of complaints that were coming in was not anywhere as great as they became later on. The office of the U.S. Trade Representative was a major player in intellectual property because it really is a trade issue. Our economic bureau was very much interested in it.

Q: Well how about by this time China must have been a loomed heavily on your job didn't it?

PIEZ: Becoming more and more so, yeah.

Q: How did you find dealing with the Chinese in economic matters?

PIEZ: Well we still continued to have textile issues. In other areas Chinese exports to the U.S. were not of major importance. It was still also not a particularly attractive place for U.S. investment. But more and more the Chinese officialdom was at that time particularly anxious to listen and to learn, and also to be recognized as serious players.

Q: Well there has always been this thing that goes way back in American history, the looming China market. One of the phrases used to be oil for the lamps of China. Which you know the idea I heard at one point in the 20's American coffin makers were saying, 'Gee, just think of how many Chinese die.' We want to get them to buy American coffins. Was it then a period of let's take, it may be difficult and we might not make much of a profit, but once we get our nose inside the tent, eventually we will get something? How did that work?

PIEZ: I don't think at that time that American business saw the Chinese market as a great opportunity. Of course there were these stories about just think of the market for textiles. Lets just pick an example of an area which was foreseeable. China was about to become a big producer of textiles. Not a big importer. There were still issues on the political side, questions of freedom. While I was in the East Asia bureau as deputy assistant secretary the Tiananmen Square demonstrations and oppressions took place. That was a hot political issue that pushed any economic issue into the background.

Q: Everything came to a halt for a considerable amount of time. Were you getting a little tired of taking trips to these various countries?

PIEZ: I counted up. During the time I had that DAS job in the bureau I traveled to East Asia, usually more than one country, sometimes five or six countries on one trip. During that four year period I made 43 trips, just about one a month. And, as I have said, a number of domestic trips. I might go as far as Hawaii for meetings. We used to have meetings with the Japanese in Hawaii because it was a convenient point between Tokyo and Washington for both of us.

JAMES T. LANEY
Visitor
China (1981)

Ambassador Laney was born in Arkansas and raised in Arkansas and Tennessee. A graduate of Yale University Divinity School, he first went to Korea as Methodist minister and professor at Yonsei University in Seoul. Returning to the United States, he continued his career as minister and educator, teaching at Yale and Vanderbilt Universities and serving as professor and President of Emory University. In 1993 he was named US Ambassador to Korea, where he served until 1996. Ambassador Laney was interviewed by David Reuther in 2004.

Q: Speaking of Korea...we haven't mentioned Korea for quite a while...but while you're president of Emory, did you develop a relationship, a formal school relationship, with Yonsei University -

LANEY: Yes. We also did that with Peking University.

I went to China in 1981, as a guest of Peking University. We were there three weeks, and traveled around, and came back, and we began bringing people here. In fact, the president of Beijing Medical College, which is now folded into Beijing University, was a research professor at Emory for two years, and then every summer since then. He's a cardiologist, and he'd come back and do his research here, and his wife Yuan Ming is a major player in the Center for International Studies [professor of International Relations and director, Institute of International Relations] at Beijing University. I've kept up with her; we were at a conference in Salzburg, at the Salzburg Seminar last December.

Q: This period coincides with our formal diplomatic recognition of China, the negotiation of various Science and Technology Agreements as the U.S. government tried to create ways to hook up American institutions with Chinese institutions.

LANEY: Well, I enjoyed that very much. We had a number of exchange students and graduate students and all that sort of thing. It's harder to get our people to go over there.

We used to stay at the Friendship Hotel. Boy! I tell you, they left something to be desired! Let me tell you!

Q: A very basic, Soviet style hotel, right?

LANEY: Yes. A couple of times when we...I think we were in Shanghai, we stayed in the guesthouse that Zhou Enlai had stayed in. It was very nice, real rococo, but very nice. But boy! The Friendship Hotel was something else! Oh, Lord, they were bad!

Anyway, in Shanghai we stayed in the guesthouse. As you may recall in 1981 things were still very primitive and the government was very suspicious. I tried to give my little Walkman to - we had two people that went with us all around the country - tried to give it to him, because when he heard it his face was transported to hear a symphony just explode in his ears, you know, this little thing. So I gave it to him. When I got ready to leave they said, "Where's the Walkman?" I said, "Oh, I lost it!" They found it on that guy, and they made him give it back! And I thought, you know, I may have caused that guy real trouble, but they were that tricky then. It was that serious!

Q: Yes, because both sides, while starting out anew, were encumbered with old stereotypes.

LANEY: I have to tell you! When we flew from Beijing to Xi'an on the Chinese Air, we got in our seats, the two seats right in the middle of the plane; and before we took off, the woman came and pulled a curtain, like a shower curtain, all around our seats, so we were totally cut off; we were enveloped by this shower curtain! I said, "What is this?" She said, "You first class."
[Laughter]

Q: These are great vignettes, but you do set up an agreement with Yonsei University.

LANEY: Yes, actually we did in 1990 I believe it was. Right, and we'd bring ophthalmology professors over here to do a year's research; there's one a year that comes over from their ophthalmology department and has a whole year of research here. Our ophthalmology is very, very good, and they're pleased to have both the year off and also the research opportunity.

These relations have continued, and now are relationships with lots of other places as well, as most colleges do. Of course, that's the one that's close to my heart!

DAVID G. BROWN
Chief of Economic Section

Beijing (1981-1983)

David G. Brown was born in Boston, Massachusetts in 1940. He graduated from Princeton University in 1964 entered the Foreign Service. His assignments include Taipei, Saigon, Yokohama, Tokyo, Vienna, Beijing, Oslo, and Hong Kong. Before retirement in 1996, he served as Director of the Office of Korean Affairs. Mr. Brown was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on January 28, 2003.

Q: '81, whither?

BROWN: I went to Beijing to head the economic section.

Q: And you were there from '81 to?

BROWN: Until 1983. I respectfully commented to the people who had asked me to head the economic section that, with the exception of some work on economics at the Japan desk, I didn't have any economic experience or training. I was delighted by the prospect of going to China, but wasn't certain I was the right person for the job. The answer was that there wasn't a lot of economics in this job. It would be much more about understanding the politics of how things get done in China. They said it didn't bother them, please come along, we need you.

Q: I can't remember had you been in Beijing before?

BROWN: No. I'd been in Taipei and worked on Mainland China in INR.

Q: Beijing in '81. What was it like there?

BROWN: Well, I arrived at a fortuitous time because the process of Deng Xiaoping's reform and opening had started two years earlier. Just when I arrived the Chinese government had decided to do what they called opening 40 cities to travel by foreign diplomats. This meant that one no longer had to obtain Foreign Ministry permission each time one wanted to leave Beijing to travel to these 40 cities. So, we were there at a time when you could get out and see the country. It was also the beginning of the Reagan administration and that was the period when U.S.-China relations had worsened because of Reagan's campaign rhetoric about moving back toward an official relationship with Taiwan. So the political aspects of U.S.-China relations were tense for most of the time I was there. The economic relationship was starting from a low base, but was opening up rather remarkably. Trade was growing. We were beginning to get into our deficits with China. But the main thing was the trade was growing, and the economic relationship was seen as a new positive element in what had been just a strategic relationship until then. We in the Economic Section had a lot of opportunities to meet with academics in the Chinese government who were wrestling with the early stages of the reform effort. The Political Section didn't have much luck getting out and meeting these academics. In those days, when you went to see an official you had to call up to get his organization's permission to interview him. It was very structured society, but the structure was opening up on the economic side. We could travel, and the Economic Section set out to write an economic profile of each of the provinces in China, taking advantage of our new opportunity to send officers off for a week of interviewing in the provinces. We wanted to see how reform policies adopted at the center were actually being implemented in the field. We were also negotiating agreements in the economic area.

Q: What sort of things were you negotiating?

BROWN: Textiles, aviation, tourism, ocean shipping. There were a lot of bilateral negotiations going in this period.

Q: Was there a concern I mean we had done so much to turn Japan into a viable state and an economic power and all, this is our policy. All of a sudden we turn out with these huge deficits with Japan. Were we seeing as we did this we might have created another deficit monster in China?

BROWN: I don't recall that we saw China becoming a deficit monster, but it was very clear to us that the restrictions that the Chinese had on their markets combined with the openness of the American markets were leading in the direction of deficits. At that time, the numbers were only in the hundreds of millions of dollars. However, we were already in a situation where the Chinese statistics painted a different picture from the American statistics. So we were in the early stages of the debates about why this was so, trying to get the Chinese to focus on the fact that this was going to be a problem and that, if they didn't do something about the deficit, it was going to have an impact on the relationship. This is a story that was only beginning at that point and it's certainly not over yet.

Q: Say on textiles, were we trying to do limit the textiles?

BROWN: Yes.

Q: How successful or unsuccessful were we?

BROWN: We were successful of course because we could simply put on restrictions in those days if we judged that circumstances warranted it. However, we didn't want to act arbitrarily. We wanted to handle it within the context of the agreement and have the Chinese cooperating in managing the issue. Their textile industry was growing rapidly, and there were problems of shipping goods out to Hong Kong where they would be mislabeled and all sorts of shenanigans going on. These were typical trade negotiations. Both sides were being very tough and the embassy's role was to try and help the negotiators from Washington to get the best deal we could.

Q: Can you characterize the Chinese form of negotiating?

BROWN: The standard picture you have of Chinese negotiators is that they try and establish basic principles that will shape the negotiation at the beginning. They spend a great deal of time on trying to shape the parameters of the negotiations so that once those have been set, then the specifics would be easier to negotiate. The specifics of course were what Washington's negotiators wanted to focus on. For the Chinese, there were "principles" involved in the sense that the Chinese system was a planned managed economy, which they wanted us to accept as a given. You saw this on the shipping issue where they were just adamant that they had one major shipping company and it was going to control the ports and it was going to do all of the coastal shipping along the Chinese coast and that the role of foreign shipping was going to be very tightly regulated and controlled.

Q: Well, did we, there weren't Chinese ships that were going to be plying along our coasts anyway, were there?

BROWN: No. What we wanted was for U.S. shippers to get into the ports, set up their own loading and unloading facilities rather than using Chinese ones. We were pressing them to permit American shippers to operate intermodal services where we could not only ship things to the port, but also have a role in moving them beyond the ports to the consumers and this was just unacceptable to the Chinese.

Q: What was looking at the Chinese economy at that time, were you seeing I mean what did it look like? Were there still these huge government things sometimes run by the army or something like this?

BROWN: Well, the army's role wasn't very apparent at that time. In fact, the army in those days was not involved in the economy per se beyond the particular munitions industries that were linked to the military. In those days, China's international trade was still controlled by a relatively small number of large state trading companies that dealt with textiles or machinery or coal or so forth. If you wanted to export to China you had to deal with those monopoly companies. The process of reforming the Chinese economy had not gone very far at that point. They had started the creation of special economic zones in South China to promote a more open, free market approach to trade. Within these zones, it wasn't the central trading company that you would deal with; you could actually go deal with individual manufacturers or companies in these zones. You could set up joint ventures in the zones, primarily to export from China but do some sales in China too. The economy was just beginning to open up, but it was still very heavily managed and a lot of what we did, in addition to negotiating agreements, was to try and understand the process of reform and how it was being debated internally within China and who was promoting reform and who was against reform.

Q: What about companies, American companies coming to China? Were we encouraging them?

BROWN: Yes, we were working very hard to support them. In fact while I was there the Commerce Department set up their first Foreign Commercial Service office in China. We worked very hard to help companies get contracts and to lobby the Chinese government on behalf of American businesses.

Q: I would have thought that you would have been deluged by people who would take one look, I don't know what the population was, but it was probably approaching a billion at that time.

BROWN: A little over a billion. China conducted its first census since the '50s when we were there and it came out to about 1.1 billion

Q: I always think about it, supposedly, I heard somewhere where a casket maker in Ohio took one look and started doing a little calculation and said, hey. In other words, there's always business, but I think it goes back to the oil for the lamps of China and a book on.

BROWN: Add one inch to the garment of every Chinaman and you'll be rich.

Q: Yes. I mean and there is validity to this in the long run, but you must have had to deal with an awful lot of people who were pretty naive coming in.

BROWN: Yes, but most of the people we dealt with were the large American companies. There were also a number of small trading companies that had grown up during the '70s when the relationship was beginning to open up, but before we had full diplomatic relations. These were people who had been in China for a period of time and were establishing personal ties with people in the bureaucracy that dealt with economics. Law firms were also beginning to come in at this time. Some banks were already well established.

Q: At that point, were companies sort of looking towards, you know, right away making sizeable incomes or were they trying to establish bridgeheads with the potential for something later on?

BROWN: Well, you had both, but the mantra of everyone who had been involved in China was that you had to adopt a long-term perspective because you're not going to make money right off. You have to establish good business relationships and then the opportunities will start opening up and you can make money. That was the mantra, which was valid.

Q: Were you watching the rise of an entrepreneurial class within China? I mean it's almost, it's the idea of saying an entrepreneurial class developing. I mean the Chinese I think have it in their chromosomes. Still you have this bureaucracy. Was there something coming out of the bureaucracy?

BROWN: You'll have to remember this was '81 to '83. Deng had only regained power in December of 1978 and begun the reform process. Reform had started with agricultural sector. There was change in land ownership arrangements and in the way crop planting decisions were made. So, the thing that was very apparent when one traveled around was that in certain parts of China, the Yangtze River Delta and in Southern China, that farmers were able to take advantage of these looser arrangements and that the countryside was really beginning to take off. You could see evidence of prosperity in the form of new homes being built that were dramatically better than what had been there earlier. What you did not see at that point was the development of an urban entrepreneurial middle class. That came later. Another thing you didn't see at that time was an open job market. People could not easily move from one area of the country to another the way they can now. If you were a college graduate, you were still allocated a job by the state. You couldn't go out and obtain employment in a private company the way Chinese can now. If a joint venture wanted to hire people, they would go to a government service bureau that provided personnel to joint venture organizations. The embassy had to do the same thing. It went to the Diplomatic Services Bureau and was allocated Chinese employees to work in the embassy. A lot of the things that eventually loosened up life for ordinary Chinese had not occurred in '81, '82 or '83.

Q: Were we looking, I mean we have our trade negotiations, but were we looking at China at that time and seeing that the system that you just described and other attributes of the same central thing was going to have to dissolve and what would that leave?

BROWN: No. I'm trying to think of how to explain this. It's not that we didn't think that there were some possibilities that this might happen over the long term, but the system hadn't started changing enough that you really spent very much time thinking about the implications of it.

Q: I guess this is what they called the iron rice bowl or what was it?

BROWN: Yes, perhaps a better way to understand it is what they called the work unit system. Every Chinese was assigned to a work unit. If you were in the rural area you belonged to a cooperative. These cooperatives were breaking down and people were having the right to lease over a long period of time, land that they would then be responsible for developing under a contract between the family and the local cooperative on what they should produce. If you lived in an urban area your work unit was your university, your government organization, your factory, and these organizations were generally involved lifetime employment. If a Chinese wanted a house he would go to his work unit and they would allocate it. If he needed medical care, he went to the clinic that was run by his work unit. If he wanted to get married, he would ask permission of the work unit. When the couple wanted to have children, they would ask the work unit for permission to have a child.

Q: A child?

BROWN: It was all a very controlled society and people yes knew that if China was really going to reform itself all of these things would have to change, but in '81, '82, '83 the change was only taking place in the rural areas.

Q: What were you seeing as you traveled? I mean what was your impression, I assume you did go out and did the usual Foreign Service thing of going to a city and going out and looking at the steel mill and you know, visiting the university and that sort of thing. Were you getting a sense from the people a sense of excitement that things are beginning to change or what?

BROWN: I did this. I visited Shenzhen, which was the special economic zone across from Hong Kong. I had been up to the border in Hong Kong in the '60s and looked across at what was basically rice fields. I came back in '81 a couple of years after they had established this zone and in the zone you began to see a small city taking shape. There were joint venture companies being established some of which involved American companies. Such visits made it clear that something really important was happening. I also visited Hunan, the province where Mao Tse-tung had been born and spent a week going out into the countryside. One saw an agricultural scene that was becoming more prosperous and a little loosening of the controls on people. By contrast, if one went to North China, which is a less fertile wheat growing area, one didn't see signs that life had changed very much for people. So, it was a very, quite a mixed picture you would get traveling.

Q: Were Taiwanese able to do any investment at that point?

BROWN: Taiwanese had permission to travel to the mainland. We knew that a certain amount of investment was taking place. We knew that there was Taiwan money mixed in with the money that was coming in from Hong Kong, but it wasn't a big factor in the equation. Was the SEZ, the Special Economic Zone experiment in China something that had at least some antecedents in the export processing zones, which Taiwan had developed in the late '60s? Yes. People in China had been looking around at what the Asian Tigers, including Taiwan, had been doing to successfully develop their economies. The Chinese approach wasn't the same, but it had some antecedents there. When one talked to Chinese academics or got access to their internal publications, it was clear that they had studied these things.

Q: Well, now Hong Kong was not part of China at this point.

BROWN: It was a British crown colony.

Q: At that point it was in '89 when it was turned over to?

BROWN: Reversion was in 1997. The agreement that started this process was negotiated between the British and the Chinese in 1984 after I had left.

Q: So, at that time Hong Kong was seen as an entree point or something like that?

BROWN: Yes.

Q: Was your experience in dealing with the Chinese bureaucracy different than say the political section, was it a different breed of cat?

BROWN: Well, as I said, the economic relationship was growing at a time when political relations were strained between the U.S. and China. The economic section had more access. Positive things were happening, things the Chinese were interested in and so we had easier entree into Chinese society than the people in the political section did.

Q: What about the universities? Did you see these? Were they kicking out pretty good people in the economic field, technical fields?

BROWN: We did not have a great deal of contact with the universities. However, this was the period when China resumed post-graduate education. That had collapsed during the Cultural Revolution and no masters or doctor degrees had been issued for about a decade. In '81 and '82 they began to graduate their first classes of new Ph.D.'s. Things were happening in this area, but it wasn't an area that the U.S. Embassy had a great deal of contact with at least not in the economic section. We went to the economic research institutes.

Q: During part of this period, I was seconded as a consular officer to the immigration and naturalization service and I remember every morning I would get a copy of the student applications for or waivers for students to come in. China was really beginning to deluge our

BROWN: Yes.

Q: We must have seen this as a really major thing.

BROWN: Yes, it was a sign that they were opening up. I don't remember the numbers.

Q: I mean obviously we're talking about a billion, you're not talking about, but essentially there were a significant number of people coming in at that time.

BROWN: Yes and it was significant because in the '50s, '60s, '70s, Chinese had not gone to the West. They had gone, to the extent they had gone anywhere, to the Soviet Union and the Soviet bloc. So, something important was happening. Of course, there was uncertainty about how many of the students who went overseas were going to come back. Even though in the early days the Chinese government was financing most of those who went.

Q: I think wasn't there a tennis player and a few problems like that?

BROWN: You've got a good memory. Yes, Hu Na, I believe. She defected while we were there and this was one of the frictions in the relationship because she had played tennis with one of the principal reform leaders.

Q: Well, also were we noticing and was it true that the I don't know what to call them, the cadre, in other words, the top dogs were sending their children to the United States, weren't they?

BROWN: Well, they certainly are now. I don't recall that that pattern had developed at that time. We did have some issues related to Taiwan that came back on the economic side. One had to do with U.S. airlines. Could they fly both to Taiwan and to the mainland? The answer at the time was yes. However, the political tensions in the relationship threatened that pattern. The Chinese tried to argue that if the airlines are going to expand in China those same airlines couldn't be expanding their operations in Taiwan. There was also an issue related to I think it was First Chicago Bank that was pressured by Beijing to close their banking operations in Taiwan as the price of getting into China. Then subsequently other banks got in without paying that price. So, part of what we were trying to do was to argue with the Chinese that they shouldn't be putting these political conditions on economic relationships. To the extent that issues involved government-to-government agreements, i.e., in the aviation field, we weren't going to tolerate that kind of conditionality.

Q: Did you get the feeling in this time that the Reagan administration was beginning to change its attitude towards China? I mean a lot of administrations come in with an attitude and then when it brushes up against reality and the sort of economic thing it begins to change.

BROWN: Yes, that was happening. It was happening next door in the political section in the sense that during that period we were negotiating on arms sales to Taiwan. You could see in the process of that how the Reagan administration was adjusting to reality. Contrary to his campaign rhetoric, the administration decided early on that it wouldn't try to restore an official relationship with Taiwan and then they made the decision not to sell Taiwan in advance aircraft. Then in order to get over the political problems in the relationship, the Reagan administration agreed to negotiate a long term relationship on arms sales to Taiwan. That resulted in something called the August 1982 communiqué, which set some broad parameters for how arms sales would be handled. What had happened was that the Reagan administration had decided to drop a lot of the things that they had been thinking about doing with Taiwan because they realized that China was an important element in dealing with the Soviet Union.

Q: How did we look upon other countries opening up and doing economic things, commercial work with China? I mean did we find ourselves, was it a rivalry or was everybody happily going about their business without worrying about the others?

BROWN: It was much more a cooperative endeavor to understand how China was changing and how you could encourage movement in that direction. Was their rivalry? Yes, there was some because you were still dealing with a country where most decisions were being made by government organizations. Therefore, companies needed their government's support. In parallel with that was a very close cooperation in trying to understand what was going on inside China because it was not a transparent decision-making process. When a German delegation would get access to certain people that no American delegation had been able to meet, you would trade notes with the Germans about what that particular person had said and then compare it to what other people in other parts of the Chinese bureaucracy were saying to Americans. The aim was to piece together this picture of who was promoting what kind of reform and who was trying to delay which kinds of reforms to get a picture of where things were going over the long term.

Q: Did the academic world in the United States and elsewhere play much of a role as far as its understanding. I mean we'd had academics of looking and reading stuff about China for eons practically, but was there much, any relationship with them?

BROWN: The place that I would say the embassy got the most insight was from the World Bank. They Bank had been asked by the Chinese to come in and do a study of how reforms could be promoted. One of the first things I read before I went was a World Bank report that was literally a foot high. It had been written by economists who had been given access to information, data, statistics, about the Chinese economy, access to people who were involved in the planning process that went beyond what anyone else had. The Bank was perceived as constructive and it had large amounts of assistance to make available. The Chinese had to let them inside the tent so to speak in order to get that money.

Q: Was the Soviet Union a player in the game at this point?

BROWN: They had in this period still very tense relationships with the Chinese. The whole process of "normalizing" after the Sino-Soviet split had not taken place at this point. The Soviets did have their old state trading relationship. One did try to learn from their window of access into China, but they were not a big player. I think, to look back in retrospect, it was the problems at the beginning of the Reagan administration and the uncertainties about what the U.S. was going to do with Taiwan that began to get the Chinese thinking about moving towards a more independent foreign policy, i.e., one that wasn't so aligned with the U.S. against the Soviets but was more independent. You heard some of that rhetoric when I was there, but it wasn't until the end of the '80s that that all coalesced.

Q: Did the Taiwan issue come up every time you sat down and talked with Chinese?

BROWN: On the economic side, rarely. One exception was the civil aviation negotiations, as I said.

Q: What about while you were there dealing with the problem of corruption, of payoffs and all that?

BROWN: Not a huge issue at that time, yes some companies felt they had to do some things like this, but it was not a big issue in 1982.

Q: Did we get involved in the problem of I'm trying to think of the term, but when you're publishing pirated things.

BROWN: IPR. Intellectual property rights.

Q: Yes. Was that an issue?

BROWN: I don't recall it as an issue, it may have been, but I don't recall it at that time.

Q: Who was the ambassador while you were there?

BROWN: Arthur Hummel was Ambassador and the DCM was Chas Freeman.

Q: Dealing with, I'm just thinking of going back where we started, before you went to the Atomic Energy Agency, you were dealing with Taiwan, was Chas Freeman, was he there at that time?

BROWN: I replaced Chas on the Republic of China desk. He had been Burt Levin's deputy and I took his place.

Q: Well, he's quite a character in a way, isn't he?

BROWN: Yes.

Q: I interviewed him and it was almost I mean he, from memory or just sort of dictated practically his.

BROWN: Yes. He has an extraordinary memory. He is sort of a modern version of Teddy Roosevelt. He reads voraciously, remembers everything, intellectually very dynamic, very strong willed, he knows what he wants to do. He and I live across the hall from each other. So every morning I would ride to work with Chas. Every morning he would try to tell me what to do during my day.

Q: Oh, I can believe that. What about living in Beijing in those days? You had a family, how big was your family?

BROWN: Erna and I had two small kids.

Q: How was it?

BROWN: We loved it. As I said we could travel, not just officially, but privately, Erna and the kids and I went on numerous trips around China. You could go to restaurants. You could go visit temples. You could go and drive your car out 20 miles into the countryside before you ran into the little signs saying that diplomats weren't permitted to drive any farther without a permit. You could get permits to go further a field. We could go to Beidaihe on the coast in the summertime. We traveled down the Yangtze River and went through the three gorges and into Inner Mongolia. It was a delightful time to be there.

Q: How about apartment living and all that, how was that?

BROWN: On average, when you arrived at the beginning of a two years assignment, you spent about five to six months in a hotel waiting for an apartment because the Chinese government hadn't built enough to deal with a rapidly expanding diplomatic corps. That was very unpleasant. Once you got into your apartment and got used to the fact that you were living on a diplomatic compound, you could travel around the city very freely. You could get on your bicycle and go anywhere you wanted. We took bike tours out to the Ming tombs. You could drive to the Great Wall. You could go to the Forbidden City. You could go into art galleries and antique stores. It was a fine time. A small school was operated in the back of the embassy compound with about 100 kids. It had gotten to the point where you didn't have to worry about educating your children when you were serving in Beijing because of this.

Q: Art Hummel of course way back he'd grown up in China. How was he as ambassador?

BROWN: A wonderful man. Easy to work for. Of course most of my work was with Chas and Chas wasn't so easy to work for, but Art was a delight as was his wife, Betty Lou Hummel who worked very hard to maintain morale amongst the embassy staff.

Q: How did he, Art Hummel, did he seem frustrated in dealing with the Chinese bureaucracy and all?

BROWN: Art was a taciturn individual who didn't open himself up a great deal. He was very supportive if you had a problem you could get time with him. He would listen and he would give you his advice, which was usually good advice. He was wrestling the most of the time I was there with this whole arms sale thing and how to work this out. There were only four people in the embassy who were involved in this. They held it very tightly because of its sensitivity. If he got angry and frustrated in that process it didn't wash off on the rest of us.

I might say it's funny how certain things stick in your mind. Dick Nixon came to China while we were there. It would have been in '82, early '83 and spent two or three days there. I very much recall that four or five of us spent about two hours discussing U.S.-China relations with him. Nixon said what was music to the ears of the economic section. He was convinced that things were changing in U.S.-China relations and that in the future it was going to be, the economic relationship that would become the real underpinning of the relationship, not opposition to the Soviets. I remember that because he was the architect a decade earlier of the opening to China, basing it largely on opposition to the Soviets. Nixon was thinking ahead and recognizing that over the long-term economics would be very much the center of U.S.-China relations. I'm not a great fan of Richard Nixon, but he impressed us that night.

Q: What about delegations? China has always fascinated Americans and I would think that you would find yourself deluged with political types and other types coming there just to see the elephant kind of.

BROWN: Well, that's true. There was what we called "death by duck." Every delegation that came Beijing had to go to the Peking Duck Restaurant for a formal dinner either hosted by its Chinese host or, if they didn't take care of it, the embassy was expected to make the arrangements. So, we went to duck dinners about twice a week for the two years I was there. Delegations were a very important part of what we were doing. They were the way deals were sealed and the way you got access to senior leaders in the Chinese government. Art Hummel could get access once in a while to senior leaders, but much of his access came when he accompanied high level delegations that would get calls on Deng Xiaoping, Hu Yaobang, Zhao Ziyang or other leaders.

Q: Then were there any sort of incidents or problems or things that you haven't mentioned here that particularly strike you while you were there?

BROWN: One thing that was interesting was an issue called the Hu-Kuang railway bonds. These were bonds that had been issued just before the Chinese Revolution in 1911. Some American speculators had bought up these depreciated bonds. After we normalized relations with China, the speculators tried to hold the Chinese government legally responsible for the prior obligations of all former Chinese governments. These bonds were almost 70 years old and nothing had been paid on them for decades. After normalization, the American bondholders went to court to compel the Chinese communist government to accept responsibility for repayment of these loans. A court case was started I think in Georgia. The U.S. government had to persuade the Chinese government that they should go into U.S. court and make the arguments that they were not legally bound to repay these debts of the Qing Dynasty. When this came up you got an almost instinctive political reaction from the Chinese. Hell no, we're not going to subject China to the jurisdiction of American courts on these debts. We tried to explain to them, with the help of a delegation led by the Department's Legal Advisor, why they had to go into U.S. courts. If they didn't go into the U.S. courts, then the court might well grant the bondholders' request. Then when the next Chinese aircraft arrived in the United States the bondholders might put a lien on it for repayment on the bonds. When the U.S. delegation arrived to have the discussions with the Chinese legal experts, who were they? They were people who had studied law in the West in the 1930s. People who had been on the outs for years; many of them were vilified during the Cultural Revolution. But, China didn't have any other legal experts. While I was there we never persuaded the Chinese to go into court. Fortunately, the Chinese later did go into court and did make the case and the courts decided that the American bondholders didn't have any claims in this particular instance. The issue is not entirely dead however because I have heard that there are still some of the bondholders trying to make another run at the issue now.

Q: You know, for years we used to hear about the Czarist war bonds and I guess it is the same thing.

BROWN: Yes, the same kind of thing.

MARK E. MOHR
Deputy Director, Office of Taiwan Affairs
Washington, DC (1981-1983)

Mr. Mohr was born in New York and raised in New York and New Jersey. He was educated at the University of Rochester and Harvard University, where he studied the Chinese language. After service in Korea with the Peace Corps, he joined the Foreign Service in 1969, and served abroad in Taipei, Taichung, Hong Kong, Tokyo, Beijing and Brisbane. In his service at the State Department in Washington, Mr. Mohr dealt primarily with Far East Affairs. After his retirement he worked at the Department of Energy on Nuclear energy matters. In 1997 he was recalled to the State Department, where he worked as Korean desk officer. Mr. Mohr was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2009.

MOHR: Correct. After one year back in Washington, where I had been working in the Office of Pacific Island Affairs, I was then transferred in 1981 to the Office of Taiwan Affairs. Mike Armacost, who was then principal deputy assistant secretary in the bureau, told me we were about to enter into sensitive negotiations with the Chinese over U.S. arm sales to Taiwan, and the office director for Taiwan, Don Ferguson, needed a deputy who was politically sensitive and experienced both on Chinese and Taiwanese matters. The front office felt I was the best person for the job.

The background is as follows. In 1979, under the Carter administration, we established full diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of China (PRC). We broke diplomatic relations with the Republic of China on Taiwan. We cancelled our defense treaty with Taiwan. To continue unofficial relations, the U.S. and Taiwan established liaison offices in Washington and Taipei, respectively, with no diplomatic status, but with a charter to carry out economic, commercial, cultural and other forms of non-governmental relations. Our office was—and still is—called the American Institute in Taiwan (AIT). Needless to say, the Taiwanese were a bit nervous about the new relationship, so to reassure them, we agreed to continue to supply them with arms, even though we had no defense treaty. Naturally, the PRC did not like us selling arms to Taiwan, after our having established full diplomatic relations with them, and having recognized that there was only one China and that Chinese on both sides of the Taiwan Strait agreed there was only one China. This was the language of the normalization document between the U.S. and China. With regard to U.S. arms sales to Taiwan, the PRC view was simple. As one PRC official told me, “Taiwan is part of China. We don’t sell arms to Mississippi, so you shouldn’t sell arms to Taiwan.”

In the fall of 1981, Chinese foreign minister Huang Hua visited Washington and told President Reagan that if we didn’t conclude an agreement with them, a bilateral executive agreement to limit arms sales to Taiwan, they were going to downgrade diplomatic relations. Reagan, as I understand it, told Huang that he understood China’s position, and suggested that China do what it had to do. He made no commitment. But when then Secretary of State Alexander Haig learned of the Chinese position, he advised the president that the U.S. should enter into such negotiations. To my amazement, the president agreed, and in the first year of the Reagan administration, the State Department led negotiations with the PRC to limit arms sales to Taiwan. It was in this environment that I was transferred to the Taiwan desk, to be the desk’s representative, at the working level, for these negotiations.

I was against these negotiations for several reasons. In principle, I did not see the logic in negotiating with China over our actions toward Taiwan. Additionally, I thought having our relations downgraded, that is, China sending our ambassador home from Beijing while it withdrew its ambassador from Washington, was a small price to pay for continuing to sell arms to Taiwan. I also thought it was possible that Haig was misreading Reagan. I couldn’t see how Reagan would ever agree to a date certain to end U.S. arms sales to Taiwan, which is what the Chinese asserted was their main goal for these negotiations. So I was against the negotiations, but participated in the talks and argued my views. For the most part, during the negotiations, my arguments went unheeded, and the negotiations advanced.

Another reason I thought the negotiations were a bad idea was the existence of the Taiwan Relations Act (TRA). The Senate Foreign Relations Committee, once it heard that the Carter Administration was going to normalize with Taiwan, passed the TRA in 1979, both to set up a legal framework for unofficial bilateral relations with Taiwan and also to provide Taiwan with a guarantee that the U.S. would support its defense. Among the TRA’s provisions, accordingly, was one asserting that it was the responsibility of the U.S. to provide Taiwan what it needed for its self-defense. The definition of what Taiwan needed was to be left up to the U.S., but nonetheless there was now a law stating the U.S. had certain obligations to provide Taiwan with weapons, with military equipment. However, Alexander Haig wanted to negotiate with the Chinese to limit, and perhaps terminate this obligation. I really thought we were entering into dangerous territory, and felt it would be best not to do so. In my opinion, Haig was a bit panicked over the prospect of having relations with China downgraded on his watch. In any case, he favored the negotiations, and we plunged ahead. The main working level person who moved the negotiations forward was Bill Rope, then director of the office of Chinese affairs at State.

Q: I am not sure I know him.

MOHR: I had lots of arguments with Bill, but we got along. He naturally thought my views were misguided. He would lecture me about the strategic picture, and how I was failing to grasp it. He really wanted a security relationship with China, felt Taiwan was an obstacle toward this goal, and believed with the Taiwan issue gone as an irritant in the U.S.-China relationship, China would grow to be a reliable strategic partner, thereby greatly shifting the strategic balance against the Soviet Union. I argued that China had no interest in being a strategic partner of the United States (it still doesn't), and in any case, neither the president nor the Senate would allow us to do anything that was seriously inimical to Taiwan's defense interests. Bill was supported in Beijing by Chas Freeman, who had been office director for China during normalization, and was now our deputy chief of mission (DCM) in Beijing.

MOHR: Yes, Bill and Chas were the main forces leading the negotiations from the U.S. side, but it is important to remember that they were at all times carrying out the wishes of the secretary of state. Another unusual thing about these negotiations was that there were no checks and balances within the USG. It was a totally State-run policy and negotiation. Jim Lilly, who was a China expert, had been at the National Security Council (NSC) supervising China and Taiwan policy for the White House when he was appointed head of AIT in Taipei. The White House, in its wisdom, felt there was no need to replace Lilly at the NSC anytime soon, despite the fact that we were entering into negotiations with China over limiting arms sales to Taiwan. So throughout the negotiations, which lasted almost a year, there was no NSC person for China to advise the president. Haig also did a pretty good job of keeping the Department of Defense (DOD) and the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) out of the negotiations. So the China desk at State, in the person of its director, Bill Rope, and sometimes the deputy director, Scott Hallford, essentially did all the work in moving the negotiations forward. Bill kept his bosses informed, but John Holdridge, the assistant secretary of state for East Asia, also fully supported the wisdom of the negotiations and trusted Bill to execute the policy.

Since I wasn't key to the negotiations, I knew very little at the time they were going on regarding the details, although I was aware of the general trend. However, by the time the agreement was concluded on August 17, 1982, George Shultz had already replaced Alexander Haig as secretary of state. During that summer, Paul Wolfowitz had replaced John Holdridge as assistant secretary of state for East Asian affairs. Wolfowitz was much more conservative than Holdridge, who was a foreign service officer and had been an assistant to Kissinger at the NSC when relations with China had first been established. Wolfowitz was much more skeptical toward China, and much more positive toward Taiwan. In any event, Wolfowitz called me into his office in the spring of 1983, as my tour on the Taiwan desk was winding down, and said he wanted me, and not Bill Rope, to write him a memo detailing the history of the negotiations leading to the agreement concluded in August 1982. This is how I learned a lot of the behind-the-scenes events during the negotiations. I had access to all the secretary to the president (Sec-Pres) memos that Haig had sent detailing our strategy for the negotiations, his suggestions for how to overcome problems raised by the Chinese, etc. If these memos ever become public, they would be a good read. They are fascinating. In my opinion, they indicate that Haig essentially agreed with the Chinese on the need to terminate arms sales to Taiwan, and felt he could win the president over to his views. It is my contention that one of the reasons, perhaps the main reason, for Haig's dismissal in 1983 was that Reagan came to realize that Haig was absolutely serious in his resolve to terminate U.S. arms sales to Taiwan, and this was not what Reagan wanted.

Following the signing of the joint communiqué in August 1982, the Taiwanese, understandably upset, sent a secret arms buying mission to the U.S. to test Reagan's reassurances to President Chiang Ching-kuo of Taiwan that the communiqué would not harm Taiwan's security interests. We at State were told by the NSC, just weeks after the signing of the communiqué with China, that a secret arms buying mission was coming from Taiwan, and that if we wanted to deny the Taiwanese any item from their wish list, the president himself wanted to be informed in detail as to the reasons for the denial. In other words, the White House was telling us, despite the communiqué, to give Taiwan as much in the way of armaments as possible. It seemed to me that not only did we have a two-China policy, but that the policy was determined by which China could complain the loudest.

It took about a year for the arms package to be announced for Taiwan. In the meanwhile, in January 1983, there occurred another remarkable event. A conservative magazine, Human Events, published an interview with President Reagan. The interviewer began by asserting that many of the president's supporters were greatly disturbed by the joint communiqué, believing it had brought great harm to Taiwan. As I recall what was in the magazine, it ran something like this: "Your base is terribly upset. They think you sold out Taiwan. They think you are going to stop arms sales to Taiwan." To this, Reagan replied, (I am essentially paraphrasing here) "No, not at all. If you read the communiqué carefully, all it says is that as tensions are reduced between the two sides, Taiwan's need for arms will accordingly be reduced, so at that time, we will reduce our arms sales to Taiwan. It does not say we will willy-nilly reduce arms sales to Taiwan. The U.S. position remains unchanged with regard to the resolution of the differences between China and Taiwan. They can adopt whatever means they feel necessary, so long as it does not include the use of force."

One of the reasons I was shocked by what Reagan had said in Human Events magazine was that we were in fact meeting in then deputy secretary of state Larry Eagleburger's office every Saturday following the signing of the communiqué to plan out what our yearly reduction of arms sales to Taiwan should be. In other words, we were "willy-nilly" meeting to decide how to reduce arms sales to Taiwan on a yearly basis, to show the Chinese we were carrying out the communiqué. Following the publication of the Human Events article, I raised the issue with deputy secretary Eagleburger. He assured me that the secretary of state (Schultz) and the president were exactly as one on this issue, and our meetings would continue. When I noted this was exactly what he said about the previous secretary (Haig), and that person had been dismissed, Eagleburger snapped that nobody likes a "wise-ass," and if I was not on board with the program, I could easily be terminated from these meetings. At this point, I decided it was best to keep my mouth shut. The meetings went on, and finally there was agreement to slowly limit arms sales to Taiwan on a yearly basis. Arms sales figures are public, so this would indicate to the Chinese that we were carrying out our commitments under the communiqué.

One of the reasons I found these negotiations fascinating is that they revealed a major error in judgment on the part of the Chinese. Traditionally, one of the criticisms of American foreign policy is that American practitioners are not good listeners. We hear only what we want to hear. It is also said that the Chinese are excellent listeners. Well, in the case of the negotiation and aftermath of the communiqué, when the Chinese realized that U.S. arms sales to Taiwan were not decreasing by any significant amount, and would never in anybody's lifetime go down to zero, they felt that they had been outsmarted by the U.S. I heard this several times during my tour in Beijing from 1988-1990, again from a senior Chinese official when I was in Brisbane in 1993, and again from a senior Chinese friendship association official in 1997. To all of them, I had the same reply: during all the months of the negotiations on the joint communiqué, you could have easily sent your ambassador in to see President Reagan, or you could have sent your foreign minister to see President Reagan. But you didn't. You chose to believe the words of the secretary of state, Alexander Haig, because you liked what Haig was saying. It agreed with what you thought. This despite the well-known fact that the president is senior to the secretary of state, and in this case the president was a conservative Republican with a documented fondness for Taiwan. So, I told the Chinese that actually they had outsmarted themselves, and they had only themselves to blame when the results of the communiqué were not as they had wished them.

Q: Did you get involved with the Chinese PRC people at all?

MOHR: No. I was on the Taiwan desk, and my job was to listen sympathetically to the representatives from Taiwan in Washington when they asked about the status of the negotiations, and then tell them nothing.

Q: Well did you find they had pretty good intelligence on what was going on?

MOHR: The Chinese?

Q: No, the Taiwanese.

MOHR: No, not on this, because on this, as I said, even most of the rest of the U.S. government did not know what was going on, so there were no leaks. Jim Lilly, formerly of the NSC and then the head of AIT in Taipei, was also kept out of the loop. He was very frustrated. So the Taiwanese did not know what was going on, and they were very anxious.

Q: Well was the political consideration that you had with the F-16 being produced in Texas, which was George Bush's...

MOHR: That was later, in the early 1990s, at the end of President Bush's term. At the time when Reagan became president, in 1981, Taiwan wanted the latest advanced fighter, known as the FX. Perhaps this is what agitated the PRC in the first place to demand a communiqué. In any event, the then head of the NSC, Richard Allen, wanted to sell Taiwan the FX, but Secretary Haig argued against the sale, and won the argument. By then, we had begun negotiations on the communiqué, and Haig convinced Reagan that while the negotiations were going on, it would be a bad idea to give Taiwan a new fighter jet.

So when George Bush became president, and he sold the F-16 to Taiwan, the Chinese said, "Ten years ago we signed a communiqué saying you would limit arms sales to Taiwan, and also limit the quality and quantity of such sales. Now you are selling them your most advanced jet fighter. What is going on?" Some at State somewhat facetiously replied to the Chinese that an election was coming up, the fighter was made in Texas, and Bush needed that state's electoral votes. Thus, this was a purely internal U.S. affair, and as such, the Chinese had no right to complain. The Chinese did not think this "joke" very funny. I actually thought it was, because whenever you raised certain issues with the Chinese, such as human rights, they would respond that it was an internal affair, and the U.S. had no right to interfere in their internal affairs. But I could see where the Chinese would not appreciate the humor regarding a U.S. jet fighter sale to Taiwan.

Q: Anybody who knows the Taiwan issue knows it is a hot potato. The foreign service knows because we had our noses smashed in; the China hands especially suffered. Haig was a Europeanist, a NATO hand. Perhaps he saw the issue from a different perspective, and miscalculated.

MOHR: I agree that he miscalculated, definitely on how far he could bring along the president, but also in his analysis of China's leaders and their motives. In my opinion, Deng Xiaoping was under attack from his left. They were charging that he had engineered the normalization of relations with the United States, but Reagan was now president, and China was not getting anything from the U.S. I believe Deng cooked up this communiqué idea to look tough to his opposition. I also believe—and this is just speculation—that Deng was as surprised as anyone else when the U.S. agreed to negotiate. Remember, China was only threatening to downgrade relations if we refused to negotiate. It was not threatening to break relations. I hope that someday the Chinese government internal documents will be opened to the public, so we can get a better idea of what Deng was actually thinking. I really don't think they would have broken relations with us had we refused to negotiate. After all, at the time, they needed us far more than we needed them. They were very poor. They needed a big country to buy from them and jump-start their economy.

Q: Well after you finished this communiqué business what were you doing?

MOHR: The communiqué was finished in the summer of 1982, and it took about a year to decide what kind of big arms package we would sell to Taiwan without causing a major rift with the PRC. Somehow, we accomplished all this, and by the summer of 1983 I was due for another transfer.

THOMAS P. SHOESMITH
Deputy Assistant Secretary, Bureau of East Asian Affairs
Washington, DC (1981-1983)

Thomas P. Shosmith was born in 1939 and raised in Pennsylvania. His career in the State Department included posts in Japan, Hong Kong, South Korean, and an ambassadorship to Malaysia. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1991.

Q: Well, when you left Hong Kong in 1981, and you came back to become a Deputy Assistant Secretary in East Asian Affairs, where you served from 1981 to 1983, the Reagan Administration was just getting in, and all administrations -- sometimes the transition can be a little bit difficult. The Reagan Administration came from a different part of the -- from the Right wing of the American political spectrum. Carter was kind of from the Left. Did you find any discontinuity or any problems in East Asian affairs because of the transition?

SHOESMITH: Well, it's probably something of an oversimplification to say that the Reagan approach to China, the Reagan Administration approach to China, was less unambiguous and somewhat less positive -- certainly more conservative -- than it had been under the Carter Administration. The Reagan Administration had a very sympathetic and somewhat protective attitude toward Taiwan, even though, by that time, we no longer had official, diplomatic relations with Taiwan. But they were much more solicitous of Taiwan's interests or Taiwan's concerns than perhaps the Carter Administration was. Of course, President Reagan was regarded as particularly solicitous of Taiwan. So there was, to some extent, a change. That had some effect on the management of the relationship with Taiwan, or rather with the Mainland, as well as with Taiwan. We still had the unofficial relationship with Taiwan, through the American Institute on Taiwan, and the counterpart, the Taiwan representation in Washington. This, I suppose, came to a head at the time when the Administration began to consider foreign military assistance to Taiwan.

I've forgotten now. There was legislation in Congress at the time of our recognition of China, which, as I believe -- I'm very vague on this -- but there was a Congressional mandate to be concerned with continuing support for Taiwan's security. In late 1981, I guess, and into 1982 we began to try to work with both Taiwan and the Mainland to develop a framework, within which we could continue an arrangement for continuing to support Taiwan's military establishment. And that proved very contentious.

Q: Did Mainland China have any appreciation of the political need for having something like this, or...

SHOESMITH: Well, they simply denied the need, and they felt that we were going back on the Shanghai Communiqué, as well as the arrangements that were made at the time of normalization. They felt that we were trying to maintain and prop up Taiwan through the back door. But eventually, we worked out an agreement with the Mainland, with Beijing. It was a very long and sometimes very contentious process. It must have taken the better part of eight or nine months and was concluded, I think, in the latter part of 1982. It had strong support, of course, in the White House. But they remained concerned about the relationship with the People's Republic of China. There was no sense at all of ignoring the interests we had there. But, at the same time, it was felt that we -- and there were strong Congressional voices -- that we had an obligation to ensure that Taiwan was not left completely defenseless. That it had the resources and that we should assist, to the extent that we could, in providing the resources for them to maintain an adequate defense of the island.

Q: Was there anything resembling the "China Lobby" in Congress and all of that?

SHOESMITH: No, there were individual senators and congressmen who were very interested, very concerned to see that what they regarded as an appropriate level of support for Taiwan's defense be maintained. But there was no group which you could characterize as a "China Lobby."

Q: What about Secretary of State Alexander Haig and then Secretary Shultz? You had both of them at the time. Did they focus much on China, or was this left pretty much to the Bureau?

SHOESMITH: Well, Secretary Haig was very much involved in these negotiations on trying to work out this arrangement for continuing to support Taiwan with military equipment. But there were other things that were occupying Haig's mind, and I wouldn't say that he was himself greatly focused on China. He visited there once, as I recall, during the time when he was Secretary of State. I'm not sure of that. But his focus was much more on Europe, compared with Shultz. Haig's focus was much more on Europe than on Asia, whereas Shultz, I think, had a very large interest in Asia as a whole, including China, of course.

Q: Well, you were the Deputy Assistant Secretary. John Holdridge was the Assistant Secretary...

SHOESMITH: For most of the time, until late 1982, I think it was, when Paul Wolfowitz took over.

Q: Well, what was your particular area?

SHOESMITH: I was the senior deputy, with responsibility for Japan, China, and Korea. These long, extended, and convoluted negotiations that I have been talking about on China and Taiwan took up so much time that, unfortunately, I think, I was not able to give the attention to Japan, much less Korea, that I probably should have. Although in neither case were there serious problems during those two years when I was... There were problems. There are always problems when dealing with Japan. And, to some lesser extent, in dealing with Korea. But they weren't of a magnitude that took up a great deal of my time. And I really had just so much time. I think I must have spent 60 percent of my time on China and Taiwan.

Q: Well, you spent time on Taiwan. Technically, Taiwan has this extracurricular, whatever you want to call it, relationship where it has an institute representing it. But essentially, how does that fit into the State Dept?

SHOESMITH: Well, there was a Taiwan desk. My recollection is a little hazy. I think it was a part of the China Division. But there was a Taiwan desk. The ground rules were that we were not to have, on either side, official contact. What that finally came down to was that our people in Taipei did not meet with officials of the Republic of China in their offices. They met them outside, somewhere. And the situation here was similar. The office in the State Dept, however, worked with the American Institute on Taiwan or in Washington on some aspect of our government relations, such as transfer of certain military equipment, or whatever. We saw their representatives outside of offices, in their homes or whatever. The relationship has worked well, I think. As a matter of fact it's worked so well that other governments have adopted that system for maintaining relationships with Taiwan. But we were the first. The Japanese have it now. The Australians, the Canadians, the French, and many other governments have established similar, unofficial representations in Taiwan.

Q: It sounds like ancient history now, but during this period what was the view of the Soviet threat or Soviet influence in Vietnam, or elsewhere?

SHOESMITH: I really can't comment on that in any meaningful way. I was not concerned with that. I would just have to say that it was in the background. Of course, you're aware of it, and I, as senior deputy, had to keep track of what was going on in the whole region. But I can't say anything meaningful about that. Let me put it another way. I have no particular insights into it.

Q: Well, did you get a feel that there might be a rapprochement between China and the Soviet Union to our detriment? Was this in the cards at all?

SHOESMITH: Oh, there was speculation about that. The possibility of a warming of China-Soviet relations, but at that time it seemed very remote. I mean, as of 1981-1983, the Cambodian issue was still very hot, as well as Afghanistan. On both of those issues the Chinese and the Soviets were at loggerheads. There were still problems along their own border. The Soviets were building up their military presence in East Asia. None of these things seemed to augur any improvement in Sino-Soviet relations. On the contrary, although it was regarded as a possibility, if not a near term probability, those who thought it was a possibility would always add the caveat that it will never get back to where it was prior to 1960, at the time of the Sino-Soviet split. That both countries -- and particularly China itself -- had moved to a degree that any sort of full rapprochement was unlikely. There would still be suspicions on the Chinese side. There would still be conflicts of interest between the two. I think that what has happened has pretty well matched that caveat. That what has happened since Gorbachev and since the Soviet pullout from Afghanistan. And the apparent modification of its position in support of Vietnam and the Heng Samrin Government in Cambodia.

CLARKE N. ELLIS
American Institute in Taiwan
Taipei, Taiwan (1981-1984)

Clarke N. Ellis was born in Boston in 1939. He was raised in California and attended the University of Redlands in Redlands, California. He entered the Foreign Service in 1962 and was assigned as a Junior Officer to Munich. He later served in Italy, Eritrea, Austria, Switzerland, and Taiwan. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1998.

Q: You went to Taiwan from 1981 to 1984. What was your job?

ELLIS: While I was at the War College, I was trying to find my next assignment. I had submitted my bid list and I got a call from my counselor, and he said, "Come over and we'll talk about your bid list." So I went over, and he said, "Clarke, everything on your bid list is completely out of the question. What is it that you realistically hope to get?" I said, "Well, I'm an economic officer, and I've never been an economic counselor. I think if I have hopes to be promoted into the senior Foreign Service, I really need to get that under my belt."

He said, "Okay, let me see here," and he started flipping through the pages. He said, "Well, I'll tell you what I've got. I've got a job that's not only" - by then they had split the economic and commercial sections—"the economic counselor but it is still the commercial counselor as well." I said, "Oh, really, that sounds good." And he said, "Of course, there's one little thing; you have to resign from the Foreign Service." I said, "Oh, well, where is this?" He said, "Well, it's the American Institute in Taiwan." As you recall in 1978, we broke diplomatic relations with Taiwan and recognized the Peoples Republic of China. We then set up this private non-profit corporation called the American Institute in Taiwan, which handled American relations there.

Q: Could you explain about the resigning and all.

ELLIS: It is basically a pro forma thing. You are then hired by AIT, and your salary and benefits are the same as if you were employed in the Foreign Service. You are still reviewed for a promotion as if you were in the Foreign Service and can be promoted as if you were in the Foreign Service.

Q: When you went out there in 1981, what was the situation in Taiwan both economically and politically?

ELLIS: The Taiwan authorities had still really not reconciled themselves to the derecognition, and they hoped that there would be some change. Ronald Reagan had been elected in 1980, and they had hoped that with the Republicans that somehow they would get back some official status. They were always trying, politically, to get an element of officiality back into the relationship, and we were always trying to hold that back and make sure that the relationship stayed unofficial. That was the game that was being played politically.

Economically, the Taiwan boom was really getting underway, and you could see the vibrancy of the economy, the dynamism of the economy as it was really beginning to pick up steam. It was an interesting time to be there. There were always questions of who would be allowed to visit Taiwan, for example, in terms of official visitors. The wording of messages, for example, was important. The first director for a few weeks when I got there was Chuck Cross, whom I'd known from the University of Michigan. Then it was Jim Lilley after that, a marvelous person.

Q: I'm in the middle of an interview with Chuck Cross right now. He is out in Seattle, and I just started one with Jim Lilley.

ELLIS: For example, the ground rules were that you could never call Taiwan a country. It didn't have a government; it was always "the authorities on Taiwan." The director could meet with the foreign minister but not in the Foreign Ministry. No one really at that time above a deputy assistant secretary level was allowed to come to visit, and they could only come as consultants to AIT. There was a whole litany or catechism of rules and ways of doing. The Taiwan authorities were always trying to push that envelope. It was an interesting time.

Also, we had a very active military sales program but the people who would normally be MAAG or attachés were all retired military. One complicating fact came because those of us who were at AIT tended to want to get some liberalization of the rules. For example, a fairly senior military officer, a bird colonel, was being groomed to be our defense attaché in Beijing. Well, first, he was the air attaché and, then, he was going to be the defense attaché in Beijing. He needed to get language training, and it's not possible to separate military officers the way it is Foreign Service officers. So, it was agonized back and forth, back and forth, whether this guy would be allowed to come out to Taiwan for his language training. Finally, Washington relented and allowed him to come out study at the language school. He was the first. Even when you had congressional committees coming over on military aircraft, they were allowed, under our guidelines, to land in Taiwan but they couldn't overnight.

Q: They had to leave and then come back.

ELLIS: All of this ideology and some of the rules seemed to be a little petty but many of them were relaxed to a certain extent. Of course, there was always the question of visits of senior Taiwan people to the United States, which has continued to be an issue even in 1996 when Lee Teng-hui was given an honorary degree at Cornell. These were some of the issues, particularly after I'd been there for a while.

I really enjoyed working with Jim Lilley, and Jim gave me a chance to work on a couple of issues that were fairly controversial. One was Beijing's announcement that it intended to join the Asian Development Bank. The initial position of the government of the Peoples' Republic and of our embassy in Beijing was, of course, just like Taiwan got kicked out of the U.N. and the IMF, it would be kicked out of the Asian Development Bank as well. But Jim was determined to resist that, and I agreed with him fully. There was a major difference in Taiwan's ADB membership from its U.N. or IMF memberships, in that Taiwan joined the ADB only claiming jurisdiction over Taiwan, the Pescadores, Quemoy and Matsu. It never pretended to represent all of China in that context. In addition, the Congress, as I recall, passed a resolution, saying that, if Taiwan were kicked out, the U.S. would pick up its marbles and go home and stop contributing to the Asian Development Bank. These two factors caused Beijing to finally relent. Beijing said that Taiwan could remain, and then there was the negotiation over the name that Taiwan would use. Also, the amount of military sales to Taiwan was a big issue during the time that I was in Taipei. There was a third thing, a minor thing, but again it was incremental. There were chief of mission meetings for our ambassadors in East Asia and the Pacific with the Secretary, and the director of AIT Taipei was not allowed to go at that time. I think now the AIT director is allowed. As an incremental step, Jim Lilley proposed to Washington and, after some discussion, got it approved that I would go to the chief of mission meeting and sit there with a "paper bag over my head" and be an observer. At least I would be able to carry a message to the Secretary from Jim and then come back with a report on the meeting.

Q: I am told that particularly the Taiwanese Chinese, I mean the people who are there, are part of the Chinese overseas community, which is well connected and has, very good business sense and all. It would have been a very difficult group to ignore. They are well connected, particularly in the United States, and quite aggressive. Did you find that true?

ELLIS: Yes, but in those days it wasn't so much that. It was only in the last year or so that stories appeared about illegal campaign contributions. Certainly, the Nationalist Chinese have had a good lobby in this country for years. But, on the economic side, it was just a lot of business opportunity. We had an extremely active American Chamber of Commerce. We held a number of trade negotiations with the Taiwan authorities. Intellectual property rights questions were a major issue. While I was there, Taiwan became one of our largest trading partners.

Q: What about intellectual property rights? Taiwan used to be the place that you served in the Far East where you'd have whoever when there to pick up bootleg books and records.

ELLIS: Then, they graduated to Rolex watches, computers, and things like that. That was a major problem, and we had a number of negotiations and tough negotiations with them on intellectual property rights. As Taiwan moved up the economic ladder, they began to see the benefit of having intellectual property rights protecting themselves. In the late 1980s and early 1990s, when I was dealing with Taiwan again from the Washington side, they had a much more cooperative attitude because they were being ripped off by the Mainland Chinese.

Q: Were there any developments at all between Mainland China and Taiwan?

ELLIS: There weren't any in that period, or very little. There were people who would surreptitiously visit the Mainland, but, at that time, no. They hadn't started the dialogue. Another thing in the rules of the game for example, we were not allowed to go to Quemoy or Matsu. We would also get invitations to go for the Double Ten Parade in Taipei. October 10 - or Double Ten - is the Nationalists' national holiday. The director could go but no one else could go there, except maybe the deputy director. No one else was allowed to go to the Double Ten Parade. Of course, each year we'd get the invitation, and we'd have to say no.

Q: Were there any particular threats from Mainland China at that point?

ELLIS: No, there weren't.

Q: What was the attitude of the people at the American Institute of Taiwan towards the future of this peculiar national manifestation?

ELLIS: Well, I think I got the job because no one else wanted it. At the beginning, people were very skittish about serving in AIT from a career standpoint. Not only was it still a new thing - it had only been set up in 1979 - and there were a lot of bugs still in the system. Some people didn't get paid for months. People didn't know whether it would really be considered valid for promotion purposes or not. I think that there was a good deal of feeling that AIT would be some sort of transitional thing, and that Taiwan would, in certainly 10 years, be absorbed by the Peoples Republic of China. That was the general expectation.

Q: Were there any particular trade problems?

ELLIS: There was the IPR problem. Other than that, we had basically wanted to reduce Taiwan's trade barriers, and based on limited negotiating authority left over from the Tokyo Round were able to conclude a trade agreement.

Q: Were we seeing Taiwan reaching out to other countries?

ELLIS: Oh yes, they were continually trying to get new or keep old diplomatic relations. Where necessary as they became richer, particularly in the 1980s and 1990s, they sought to buy diplomatic recognition.

Q: Did we have any particular attitude towards this, or is it not our business?

ELLIS: I don't think we got involved.

DONALD A. CAMP
Chinese Language Training
Washington, DC (1981-1982)

Chinese Language Training
Taipei, Taiwan (1982-1983)

Political Officer
Beijing (1983-1985)

Donald Camp was born in New York in 1948. He received his BA from Carleton College and an ND from University of Chicago. He joined the Foreign Service in 1974. His overseas assignments include Colombo, Bridgetown, Beijing, Chengdu, and Kathmandu. His sister, Beatrice Camp, is also a Foreign Service Officer. Mr. Camp was interviewed by David Reuther in 2012.

Q: Now, your next assignment is quite interesting because you're coming into your third bureau. This is unusual.

CAMP: I'd had my eye on China for a while, particularly after my interest was piqued by Bill Rope in the Operations Center. He recruited me for China. He also recruited my colleague at the time, David Summers, who was in the Op Center with me and had come into the foreign service in the same entering class as I. And at the time I did not realize that he was on the verge of marrying my sister and taking an assignment in China as well. I was also getting married at the same time to Betsy, who'd come down to visit Barbados where we'd gotten engaged. So suddenly we were separately assigned to language training with an onward assignment to Beijing, David and my sister and myself and my new wife. So we were together for four years as a large family.

Q: Now, for these hard language assignments, personnel assigns you to the Beijing job and then says you have to take language first. And that's why it becomes a four-year commitment. You don't get the language without having an ongoing assignment. Is that correct?

CAMP: That is correct. We all knew what assignment we were heading to two years hence when we began language training.

Q: Well, being a fabulous linguist, which you've already proven, in Tamil and whatnot, what was FSI Chinese like?

CAMP: I'm far from a fantastic linguist, but I found FSI Chinese in general a fascinating intellectual exercise and also a great bonding experience. My Chinese language colleagues and my A100 class are the people with whom I'm still closest. We sat around and talked about our biographies in Chinese and about our interests and got to know everything about ourselves four to six hours a day, and then went to Taiwan and lived together for the second year of language training.

Q: So your program was one year at FSI in Washington and one year in the language area, in this case Taipei. Yangmingshan? Big class?

CAMP: The State Department was beginning to ramp up our posts in China and the numbers of officers assigned to language training. A very wise decision was made to train a large number of people in Chinese, assign them to China or Taiwan or Singapore or Malaysia and hope that they would catch the China bug and come back for a future assignment. There was no requirement to take two assignments using Chinese, which is kind of surprising when you're committing the resources to give someone full-time language training for two years.

Q: How about the teachers? And the linguists and the whole academic part of it.

CAMP: The teachers were a combination of some older teachers who'd been there for a long time and a few younger ones. One was the wife of a former Taiwanese diplomat in Washington. But FSI was beginning to hire teachers who had come from China since the re-establishment of relations. It was important for us to be familiar with the latest idioms and cultural aspects of a changing mainland China, and it was these younger teachers who could help us there. One of the teachers was a fascinating woman who had been born in New York City to an American father and a Chinese mother. The mother had gone back to join the revolution and she had grown up entirely in the Mainland before coming to the United States after normalization. She was one of our best teachers and ended up marrying Jeff Buczacki, one of my fellow students.

Q: And the Chinese I assume was done both in the simplified characters that were used in the Mainland and the traditional characters?

CAMP: One gripe I had with the program was that the entire first year focused on oral Chinese, and only later got into writing. I would have liked to have started writing a little earlier. But each of us knew where we were assigned and therefore knew whether we wanted to concentrate on learning the simplified characters (for the mainland) or the traditional (for Taiwan or Hong Kong).

Q: Now, that year in Taiwan, having mainland educational materials and simplified characters presented a problem. How did FSI get around that?

CAMP: I can only assume that our school, as part of the American Institute in Taiwan, had a certain inviolability from the domestic politics of the day. Everyone knew that we were going to the Mainland and needed to learn the simplified characters, the Chinese communist phraseology of the day, the cultural revolution allusions and the like. The Taiwanese teachers were very well clued in to what we were going to need. I give a lot of credit to the linguist Neil Kubler who did have Mainland experience. I don't recall that ever being a huge issue.

Q: Could you describe the school and the facilities that you were in up there? Because the previous school had been in Taichung, if I recall.

CAMP: That's correct. The school had moved up to an area above the city of Taipei with a beautiful view -- Yangmingshan. While technically assigned to the American Institute in Taiwan (and accordingly formally "resigned" from the State Department), we were physically isolated from the offices of AIT and from their day-to-day work dealing with the political issues of the day.

Q: Now, Taiwan's a very small island. Did you get a chance to move around the island, either on your own or as part of the class?

CAMP: The school was good at organizing class trips on the assumption that this would help our language ability. When we first arrived in Taiwan from our year at FSI we thought "What have I been learning for a year?" I couldn't understand anything on the street and I couldn't make myself understood. So we really did need to get around and actually speak Chinese in a Chinese environment. And so while exploring Taipei and its surroundings served that purpose as well, it was very helpful that we were able to take some trips down to Gaoxiong and Tainan in the south, and a fascinating air trip to the Pescadores (Penghu). We also went to the East Coast and Sanming Lake, so we did a fair amount of traveling. I didn't really want to travel too much on my own given what I saw of the freeways and the craziness of driving in Taiwan. I'm sure you get used to it if you've been there for a while, but we were tucked away on Yangmingshan. I kind of liked my isolation studying as a scholar in the Chinese tradition.

Q: Studying. What might a typical day have been like?

CAMP: We had a good FSI organized program with textbooks of recent reading -- like newspaper articles -- from the Mainland. We watched videos of Mainland newscasts. That would have been even more sensitive than reading in Mainland script. So our teachers really tried to get us to understand newscasts, got us to do some role playing in Chinese. I really wanted to be able to read newspapers and more complicated things. So I focused on that to the extent there was any sort of flexibility. I focused on that more than speaking, -- just a function of my own preference. And it served me well because my reading got to be quite good. My writing never did become very good. Years later my Chinese teacher would say, "You know, you still write like a first grader." But at least that was something. But the reading got to where I was happy with it.

Q: While you were in class from the '81 to '83 period, you're saying you're fairly isolated, certainly from AIT downtown, but how about other general China related events? For example, the Shanghai Communiqué of August 1982 was a big thing in the China area.

CAMP: We all knew that it was going to make a big impact on U.S.-China relations, but it was not something that we were focusing on up in Yangmingshan. We would occasionally have visitors from Washington who would apprise of developments in U.S.-China relations. And of course, Jim Lilley, the AIT Director at the time was a very nice person who tried to bring us into the AIT community. Again, I felt like I was prepping myself for two years in China, but I didn't feel part of the policy process during those two years at all.

Q: How would you summarize the effectiveness of the FSI China course?

CAMP: Apart from a few minor issues, I thought they did a pretty good job. The one thing I noted was that we had people of all ages in our Chinese class, from first or second tour officers up to people who I thought at the time were old, probably in their mid-forties. And you could tell the difference in language ability. It was so clear that the youngest people learned it very quickly and frankly, the people 45 and older didn't have a clue. I was right in the middle. But that was my takeaway from language training; learn a language early!

Q: Now, the assignment that brought you to language training was at the embassy in Beijing. And you arrive in the summer cycle of 1983 and you're a Political Officer following on your Caribbean success. Who's at the embassy and who's your boss and what's the environment there?

CAMP: We had as our ambassador, Arthur Hummel who was a giant in the field of China scholars. He had an amazing World War II history; he had been interned by the Japanese in Shandong, escaped, and fought with the Nationalist guerillas. When he came as ambassador, he was a link to the 1940's and World War II and an era of U.S.-China cooperation. His DCM was another larger than life figure, Chas Freeman who I hope has done his own oral history, and has stories galore. His Chinese language proficiency was legendary. He said he concentrated in language training on learning to read Chinese characters upside down so that he could be in the office with a Chinese bureaucrat and be able to read what was on the desk in front of his counterpart. And he was that good. The Political Counselor was Dick Hart followed by Daryl Johnson a year later. My immediate boss was Don Johnson, who was the head of the external side of the Political Section. My job was fairly narrowly defined. I was in charge of following China's external relations with South and Southeast Asia, which was my choice, because that was an area of the world I was particularly interested in. I also had the counter-narcotics portfolio, at a time when we were just beginning cooperation in that area with the Chinese. I also took advantage of the embassy's willingness to let everyone do some internal reporting. This was an era when travel around China was still fairly difficult. I remember a reporting trip I took to Henan province – Zhengzhou, Luoyang, and Kaifeng. I also traveled to Tibet and Xinjiang. It was a stage where you could still do what we called Marco Polo reporting, because there was so little known about some of these places that you could write a travel blog and it would be well received in Washington. We did obviously more detailed reporting than that, but it was still a fascinating time to travel around China just as it was opening up in many places.

My interviews outside Beijing had a standardized tone, because everyone knew the Chinese communist party line at any time. For instance, one of the first phrases I learned in the Mainland was, "Since the third plenum of the eleventh central committee we have adopted the policy of reform and opening." So whenever you asked a question of a Chinese official (or even, often, a man-in-the-street), the opening parlay would be, “Well, since 1978 and the third plenum of the eleventh central committee.....” Also, in those days, everything was preceded by “under the chairmanship of Chairman Mao,....”

It was very telling that this was what everyone knew they were supposed to say. It was only five years after Deng Xiaoping had begun the turnaround of the Chinese economy and society. We were just beginning to see the economic and social momentum that I thought at the time could not be sustained. In fact, that momentum was not only sustained but accelerated over the next couple of decades.

Q: What kinds of things are you defining as this momentum?

CAMP: Well, primarily economic. For instance, when we first arrived in Beijing in the summer of '83, there were no cars on the streets. Bicycles and buses were the means of transportation. By the time we left two years later there were taxis and the first private car had been purchased. That first private car was highlighted on the front page of The China Daily. It was considered very newsworthy that a woman who'd made her money in chicken farming had managed to buy a small Japanese car. And that was of course just the beginning. Similarly, when we arrived everyone was still in their blue Mao suits. By the time we left, the dress of choice, particularly in the winter, was a puffy ski parka that was now being made in Chinese garment factories. When we arrived you ate a lot of cabbage when you were out of Beijing. And in the winter particularly you'd see cabbage on every balcony in Beijing because that's what people ate all winter. I remember very clearly on May Day in 1984, suddenly there were bananas on the streets of Beijing being imported from South America. That was the beginning of outside products being brought in. And suddenly things changed. So we saw that kind of change in our two years in China. Suddenly, New Year's was celebrated even more exuberantly than before. Every year you could see it. And I thought this pace of change couldn't be maintained. Of course it was. I went back years later and I kept saying the same thing. I was wrong.

Q: How about things like restaurants and other consumer areas.

CAMP: One of our main sources of recreation in China was going out to eat. But in 1983 all restaurants were government enterprises. So whereas you could still find a good hotpot or a good Sichuan restaurant, you had to be careful when you ate because restaurants all closed around 6 or 6:30. And the waiters and waitresses would come around with big buckets of soapy water and start sloshing them to wash off the floors. They were going to go home at 6:30, come what may. There was not a lot of service orientation. By the time we left two years later there was the beginning of private enterprise. People were running very small restaurants out of their home and the food quality improved dramatically.

Q: Can you give me a description of your own living arrangements?

CAMP: The embassy did not have nearly enough housing for everyone, as the mission was expanding quite rapidly. So almost all of us lived in hotel rooms for a little while. A little while in our case extended to about nine months, first in the Beijing Hotel, right on the main drag in Beijing, and then at the slightly more upscale Jianguo Hotel. People who had families moved into apartments much sooner. Once we did move into an apartment, we were in an area called Jianguomenwai, a foreigner complex of high rises. And we lived cheek by jowl with all the other diplomatic missions. It was Chinese government-assigned housing, so people lived next to random diplomats, including for instance to the Iranian Military Attaché. We lived next to the Thai DCM. It was nice to have a mix of people in these buildings. We were on the fourteenth floor of a sixteen-floor building. Our assumption was that we were all very well monitored by the Chinese Security Services. This was verified in our minds by the fact that we saw these Chinese workers in the elevators every morning going up to what was apparently a seventeenth floor. We never got up to the seventeenth floor, but we assumed that we were being overheard. And we worked on that basis all the time in China. But we had comfortable living accommodations. The atmosphere in Beijing was polluted. We had to scrape off the dust from the Gobi Desert every morning. But you had the sense that you were watching the opening up of China and you were lucky to have what you had, and of course we were. We were living in considerable luxury compared to people in the traditional Beijing compounds – the hutongs. We got around by bicycle a lot too. It was a nice town to bicycle around, and to explore on weekends. And of course the history was incredible.

Q: What was your work environment like? What was the embassy like?

CAMP: Also expanding rapidly. For my first year, I was tucked into a small office cheek by jowl with another Political Officer. We actually had desks facing each other. It was hardly ideal, but everyone was in the same position. By the second year the embassy had bought the old Pakistan Embassy and expanded rather dramatically into a new office building with all of the security arrangements, and even a swimming pool. So we spread out quite a bit. But we were still in three different buildings, scattered around the diplomatic community. There was the Consular Section and Admin in one building. There was the ambassador's residence next door to the USIS Office in the same compound, and then there was the ambassador and Pol-Econ and Science Sections in the new compound .

Q: This is four years after normalization, but you'd had an Interest Section there since '72.

CAMP: Right. But it had only recently I think expanded to the size that it was after normalization.

Q: In fact, at this time there are two consulates in addition to the embassy, Guangzhou and Shanghai. As a Political Officer, did you get an opportunity to travel to the consulates? Or what was your relationship to the consulates and the consulates' reporting?

CAMP: My job was to follow China's foreign relations. . So I didn't travel that much on business. The people who did the internal reporting tended to go for consultations to Shanghai and Guangzhou. And of course Shanghai and Guangzhou wanted to do their own reporting. So there was the usual embassy-consulate jockeying about who's doing what. My narcotics work got me down to Guangzhou once. And in fact, the counternarcotics work was interesting because the time was ripe for increasing cooperation. So I worked fairly closely with the Chinese Customs Department. And we started the beginnings of what became a rather extensive counternarcotics effort, focused especially on Yunnan and the areas down south. We sent some Chinese customs officials to the United States for training while I was there. That was part of my job. The other part was China's foreign relations with South Asia and Southeast Asia. India and Vietnam were the big issues for us in that region. I'd go into the Foreign Ministry for meetings and not get much satisfaction – just what the official newspapers were already reporting. I'd go over to the Indian Embassy and they were much more forthcoming. And here it's worth commenting on our interchange with other diplomats in Beijing. Because the Chinese government said so little to us and because we had so little access to Chinese citizens, the diplomatic community was much more active than I have seen in our countries. We looked for opportunities to exchange the small snippets of information (or sometimes gossip) that each of us had picked up. At every level we had luncheon groups. The ambassadors had their periodic lunches. But so did the political second secretaries. Other embassies had insights that we didn't have and they thought we had insights that we didn't have. In some cases, we did. So I got a lot of my information from the embassies. And there were some unusual elements of the foreign community. For instance, Prince Sihanouk of Cambodia lived much of the year in Beijing. He and his wife, Princess Monique used to throw elegant parties and dances during which Sihanouk would sing. It was one of the more scintillating parts of a very gray sort of Beijing social life. I don't recall I picked up much at those dances, except I always remembered I was to avoid having anything to do with the representatives of the Khmer Rouge and of North Korea who were also there.

The sexiest reporting at most embassies – and Beijing was no exception – tended to be bilateral relations. That was done by the front office – ambassador and DCM – and the political counselor. I was four levels down from the ambassador – through the DCM, Political Counselor, and the Deputy for External Relations. So I very rarely saw that, except when there was a senior visitor from Washington and I was the control officer, accompanying him to meetings.

Q: Now, I would assume this is still early in the relationship so you'd be the target of a number of high-level visitors.

CAMP: Indeed. Both the blessing and curse of being in any large embassy is that you are called upon frequently to be a control officer. Sometimes, it's part tour guide, but the positive aspect is that these visits give you access that you would not normally have. The State Department's policy planning chief Peter Rodman was quite well known in Chinese circles; he got senior appointments at the few Chinese think tanks and at the Foreign Ministry. They were trying to develop a policy planning capability at the time themselves and wanted to talk to Peter Rodman. And I went along, thank goodness not as interpreter, but as aide-de-camp and notetaker. This was the era when it was clear in the Chinese mind, as well as ours, that we had much in common because we were cooperating on Afghanistan and the Chinese assumed that we could be a help in their ongoing ideological battle with the Soviet Union. So Peter Rodman was very well received.

And then of course our really big visit was the presidential visit of Ronald Reagan in April 1984. Any presidential visit is a huge operation. I remember the Chinese being befuddled by the number of press and accompanying officials. Our job at the mid levels of the embassy was to serve as what were called site officers as well as note takers at the various meetings. I drew the meeting with the President of China at the time, Li Xiannian. That would have seemed to be an important meeting, but in fact the president was less important than the party secretary or the premier. So it was more protocol than substance. Nevertheless, I recall walking in and as note taker feeling I could grab a seat fairly close to the two principals, which I did. And then this guy tapped me on the shoulder. He said, "I'm sorry, could I have this seat please?" And in fact, it was the National Security Advisor, Bud McFarlane. So I quickly gave up my seat and moved to a place a little farther away where it was harder to hear the conversation, but more in keeping with my rank.

The other thing I remember about presidential visits is that everyone else, including the National Security Advisor, is only a sideshow. Secretary of State George Schultz was along on the trip. I saw him once walking totally alone without any minders on the steps of the Great Hall of the People. And I realized he's just another hanger-on in this huge visit that is centered around one man: Ronald Reagan.

Of course, presidential visits are always successful by definition, and this one was as well. I don't recall anything substantive that came out of it. There were several large banquets. Reagan gave a return banquet at the Sheraton Hotel, and we were all invited to fill tables there. Again I enjoyed the opportunity to meet senior officials I would normally not see; I was seated with the Defense Minister at the Reagan dinner.

Q: Now, before a visit like that even takes place, the embassy's energized to do scene setters, reporting, or liaison with the Chinese to determine what are going to be the events, what are going to be the sites. Did you get into any of that?

CAMP: U.S.-China relations were handled more by the front office and by the Political Counselor. That was true even for the visit planning. A couple of us were site officers and had to go and scout out these places in advance. There was even, you know, pre-testing of our banquet food and speculation about what Chinese would think of our food choices, including something that we unfortunately called "panda salad" -- that kind of non-substantive stuff. And of course a lot of a presidential visit is non-substantive stuff, let's face it.

Q: Now, one of the big issues this time would have been the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan. You would have been doing quite a bit of reporting on that, or at least as perceived by the Chinese.

CAMP: We were actively cooperating with the Chinese and as I learned years later, importing mules from China and things like that to help the jihadis, through intelligence channels. But I learned a lesson about the fungibility of security classifications. Every day we would get a confidential report on developments in Afghanistan and I was instructed to take off the confidential line, reproduce it, and carry it over to the Chinese Foreign Ministry and brief them on what we were doing in Afghanistan. It was a small part of that whole effort, and it wasn't particularly sensitive. For some part of our bureaucracy it was a confidential document. But we were working closely with the Chinese and I was part of that effort.

Q: You were mentioning earlier something about Tibet.

CAMP: Yes. Tibet was not part of my reporting bailiwick, but I wangled a permit for a personal trip to Tibet in September of '84 at a time when Tibet was just opening up to tourism. And it was one of those periods of opening where they were more relaxed about what was happening there. So Betsy and I wandered around Lhasa for a week with a fair amount of freedom. The authorities cracked down again a year or two later, but during the 80's Lhasa was still very much a Tibetan city, with very little Chinese influence. And the only foreign presence in Lhasa was the Nepal Consulate. The Indian consulate had closed years earlier, perhaps during the India-China war in 1962 but Nepal was allowed to maintain its historical presence. I called on the Nepali Consul General and made a stab at engaging him on political events in Tibet. He was not willing to say much of anything. I'm sure he knew he was being monitored by the authorities and didn't want to endanger his status by sharing anything with the Americans.

I remember being startled -- while wandering around Lhasa -- by the degree of autonomy enjoyed by the monasteries. There are three or four major monasteries in Lhasa. And the police and security forces just did not go in there. They weren't welcome and they didn't barge in. So you'd go into the middle of the largest -- the Jokhang -- the main Buddhist center in Lhasa. And in the sanctum sanctorum there would be pictures of the Dalai Lama all over the place. In the bazaar surrounding the Jokhang, even though that was an area where you would have security forces, you had pictures of the Dalai Lama on sale. So it was by Chinese standards a fairly relaxed time. Buddhism was beginning to flourish again. Post-Cultural Revolution and post-Deng Xiaoping opening and reform, religions, Tibetan Buddhism as well as Christianity were beginning to be allowed to flourish, as long as they presented no threat politically to the regime. And of course that is what has caused Tibetan Buddhism problems over the years in Tibet, because it is perceived to be a threat to the regime. The trip to Tibet was brief but a fascinating glimpse at a time before Sichuan settlers and other immigrants from Han areas came into Lhasa and changed the character of the city.

Q: Each tour that you've had, there's something unique about it. And in this case, you'd just come across all the paraphernalia that goes on with a presidential visit. What takeaway then would you list for what this tour did for you?

CAMP: Well, it, it was my first time posted in a world capital. The fact that you were part of a huge diplomatic community, that we were all focused on the leadership of China and China's relations with the outside world and China's dramatic change was a polar opposite to my tour in the Caribbean where what happened was of little moment to world affairs. Whereas here you were suddenly at the center of much of U.S. foreign policy, be it our foreign policy with the Soviet Union, our foreign policy toward Southeast Asia, the Soviets in Afghanistan and the like. So this was where things were happening.

Q: And how would you rate the usefulness of the language training to the assignment?

CAMP: In China it was crucial. Not that I was ever completely fluent or confident in my fluency. But you had to have it and make a stab at it to work in China. When I went to the Foreign Ministry if it was an important issue where I had to get the nuances exactly right I didn't trust myself. I'd go with the embassy interpreter or often they spoke English themselves. But you couldn't grasp Chinese society without having an understanding in the language. And you could tell that. People coming from Washington were total newcomers and very naïve in the Chinese cultural context. They didn't know how to work a banquet, they didn't know how to toast at a banquet, they didn't know how to handle a meeting. Occasionally I would actually find myself doing some interpretation at dinner, for instance, where the honored guest from Washington was attempting a conversation and there was no interpreter present. So I'd say the language was absolutely crucial, and I think the department was very wise then to invest so much in language training and to continue to do so. They've developed a China cadre that's very impressive.

MARSHALL P. ADAIR
Economic Officer
Hong Kong (1981-1984)

Economic Officer
Beijing (1984-1986)

Mr. Adair, son of a United States Foreign Service Officer, was born in Maryland and raised at Foreign Service posts in the United States and abroad. He was educated at Middlebury College and joined the Foreign Service in 1972. During his career Mr. Adair held a number of senior positions at the State Department in Washington, DC, dealing with a variety of areas, including relations with the US military Commands, Economic and political issues in Europe and Department personnel matters. A Chinese language specialist, his foreign posts include Paris, Lubumbashi, Taiwan, Hong Kong, Beijing, Rangoon, Chengdu (China), and Tuzla (Bosnia). Mr. Adair was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2011.

Q: Were you yourself pointed towards any particular place?

ADAIR: I had an assignment to Hong Kong. I'd been given a choice before I left Washington of being the head of the economic section at AIT (American Institute in Taiwan) in Taiwan or being the deputy head of the economic section in Hong Kong and the head of the reporting unit that dealt with mainland China. I chose Hong Kong; both because I wanted to experience Hong Kong and because I thought I'd be dealing more with mainland China there than I would in Taiwan.

Q: So you went to Hong Kong.

ADAIR: After a year of study in Taiwan I went to Hong Kong in September. I returned to Taiwan in October to get married and then Ginger and I both settled into Hong Kong for three years.

Q: Well did you find your Chinese studies paid off or did you end up by speaking English mainly?

ADAIR: The official language in Hong Kong was English, and the language of most of the population was Cantonese. I had learned Mandarin Chinese. I actually used the Mandarin that I had learned quite a lot. There were many people in Hong Kong – people originally from the mainland that had fled to Hong Kong after the civil war and more recent arrivals who preferred to speak Mandarin rather than English. I also spoke it at home, because my wife didn't speak much English at the time. However, I didn't keep up my reading as much as I should have.

Q: Who was the consul general when you were there?

ADAIR: For most of the time that I was there the consul general was Burt Levin, who put in one of the most impressive performances I saw in the Foreign Service. That was a very tough time for Hong Kong. The Peoples Republic of China (PRC) made its push, and increased the pressure on Great Britain to negotiate a turnover of Hong Kong. The UK agreed to negotiate and concluded the agreement to return Hong Kong to China by 1997 while I was there. That caused a crisis of confidence in Hong Kong: anxiety as to what was going to happen, a financial crisis over the Hong Kong dollar and a massive effort to emigrate to the United States, Canada or Europe.

The United States could have just played a quiet, neutral kind of a role. We also could have speculated and been more alarmist. Many people in the United States were as skeptical as the population in Hong Kong about the prospects for freedom and prosperity in a Hong Kong under PRC rule. There was a great deal of doubt that the PRC could or would actually honor any agreement made with the United Kingdom – or that it had any intention whatsoever of allowing Hong Kong a degree of independence. In these circumstances Burt Levin arrived in Hong Kong, and immediately made it very clear to everyone that he believed what the British and the Chinese were doing was right. He told the doubters at the consulate general, “You guys are all wrong. The Chinese are perfectly capable of this. They have no intention whatsoever of spoiling what they’ve got here in Hong Kong and this is going to work.” He repeated that to the media and to all others that would listen. He was very articulate, and his arguments were powerful.

Then he pulled everybody in the consulate together - it's a big consulate, bigger than most embassies in the world. He said this was what he believed, it was the policy of the U.S. government, and it was what we would say to the public and to the world. He told everyone in the consulate that we could and should question that policy within the consulate, and that we could write analyses and reports that the consulate would send back to Washington. However, no one was to question the policy outside of the consulate. Inside – anything goes – but outside we would exercise strict discipline. And he pulled it off.

He had very solid experience in Chinese affairs, and great political and cultural understanding. His Chinese was really good, and he developed extensive contacts with both Hong Kong and PRC Chinese. I think that he, the consulate and the United States really contributed to stability in that area and helped to make it easier for the UK and the PRC to negotiate an agreement which has worked so far.

Q: The British had the real responsibility - but we had to worry about our relations.

ADAIR: Well we had lots of interests. We had strategic interests, because of the harbor and the extent of our reliance on Hong Kong for transportation and communication in Asia. The strategic interests were not quite the same as they'd been during the Vietnam War, but we certainly wanted to continue to have access to Hong Kong for both military and commercial shipping. We had economic interests. There were many American companies in Hong Kong; and there was substantial trade between the United States and Hong Kong, as well as trade between the United States and China that transited Hong Kong.

Q: Well you were what, number two in the economic section?

ADAI: Well as it turned out I wasn't number two, because the then head of the economic section changed that before I arrived – another lesson for me in the fickleness of bureaucracy. However, I was still the head of the economic section's China reporting unit.

Q: So what was your responsibility?

ADAI: My responsibility was to watch what was going on in China, and to analyze and report on trends in the Chinese economy.

Q: What was your impression of the Chinese economy at the time?

ADAI: In 1981 changes were already taking place in Chinese economic policy and on the ground. However, we were not aware of many of the changes that were happening, and we did not understand how long the reform effort would last or how extensively it would impact China's economy and politics. The PRC leader at the time, Deng Xiaoping - and the PRC official government statements - had begun to articulate changes to China's economic system – allowing supply and demand to operate and giving more freedom to individuals to engage in economic activity. There was a huge amount of skepticism among “China watchers” that they were actually going to do it. I personally was really skeptical.

We had several Chinese working for us in the economic section who had been studying the Chinese economy for some time. One in particular, a man named David Wong, had been watching the Chinese economy for the American consulate since he fled to Hong Kong from Shanghai when the Nationalist government fell. He was probably the best analyst the U.S. government had of what was going on within the PRC economy; and I had the privilege of working with and learning from him. Other analysts and observers of the Chinese economy would come from other U.S. government agencies in Washington or from universities in the United States on a regular basis to talk with him, to get ideas about what was going on, and to bounce their ideas off of him. He demonstrated to me what a “tea leaf reader” actually was. He would read all of the volumes of material coming out of China, pick out obscure references or apparently mundane stuff, and say, “Look at this. This means.....:” and then he would explain things that the rest of us would have completely overlooked. We had constant competition within the consulate from the political section, because economic and political analysis would naturally overlap. What the economic policy was going to be in China was going to depend on the political configuration – and vice versa. So we were all looking at the same general picture. David, however, was just much better at putting the pieces together than anyone else.

For many years the constant job of the China watchers had been to say, “this person's on top, these are the factions around him” and so on. The constant battle for power was usually the primary focus. David Wong was the first one to say, "Wait a minute. That struggle for power is still going on in principle, but it's been subordinated." He argued that Deng Xiaoping was clearly in control, that he was setting China on a path that had been inconceivable for the last 30 years in China, and that China would stick with it. There was only one other person in the U.S. Government that I was aware of that was willing to go that far.

Q: Who was that?

ADAI: That was Chas Freeman, who at the time was the deputy chief of mission in Beijing, and previously had been the director of the Office of Chinese Affairs. Deng Xiaoping had declared that China would quadruple its gross national product by the end of the 20th century. Most in the U.S. government, including myself, thought that was absurd. Both Chas in Beijing and David Wong in Hong Kong said, "No it's not absurd." David was a little more skeptical than Chas about China's eventual success, but he said they were definitely going to try it. They did, and they succeeded.

Q: Were you there during Tiananmen Square?

ADAI: No. I was only in Hong Kong until 1984 and then I went to Beijing. I was actually in Burma when the crackdown in Tiananmen Square happened in 1989.

Q: What about the other foreign powers who had consulates in Hong Kong; were they all pretty much on the same wave length or were they hedging their bets? What were they doing?

ADAI: I think most of them were hedging their bets.

Q: Were you in your job in close touch with your British counterparts?

ADAI: I had lots of contact with people in the government in Hong Kong but I had less official work with them than did some other colleagues in the consulate, because my job was to look at mainland China, rather than work on the bilateral relationship with the government of Hong Kong.

Q: What was happening to the China watchers now that we had an embassy in Beijing? Before, we'd been sort of looking at the tea leaves from afar in Hong Kong. What happened to that whole apparatus?

ADAI: Well most of the American diplomats that had been working on China over the previous thirty years tried to get assigned to the mainland. They had the background. They had studied Chinese history, politics and culture; they had studied the Chinese language; and they had been analyzing developments there for years. However, they had not been able to set foot on Chinese soil and actually look for themselves at what was going on. The openings of the Interests office in 1972, and later the embassy and consulates after 1979 were fantastic opportunities to get in and see, finally, what it was like.

That said, in those early years it was still very difficult for them to produce the kind of analysis and reporting that would expose trends and accelerate our understanding of China, because their access in China was so limited. The circle of government officials that they could see was small, and most of them wouldn't say very much. They were very restricted in terms of the people that they could meet and talk to on the street and in the society; and their physical travel within and beyond the cities was restricted as well. So they were in these little bubbles – that seemed to grow oh so slowly. Because of that there was still a role for “China Watchers” in Hong Kong. During that particular time, I think those of us in Hong Kong were able to do more than most of the posts in China in terms of analyzing developments and trends.

Q: The apparatus in Hong Kong, which had been designed to look at developments in China, had not been disassembled?

ADAI: There were less resources going into it but it had not been disassembled. No, there was still a huge effort to learn from business people, intellectuals and others who moved back and forth between Hong Kong and the mainland. Most of those people were very relaxed about sharing their experience and their knowledge. There was a growing group of Chinese officials who were in Hong Kong then as well. They were mostly assigned to the PRC press. We tried to get to know them, talk with them and learn from them. In the early 1980s, I would say there were more opportunities in Hong Kong to get that kind of information and give a balanced appraisal of it than there were in the posts in China.

Q: Could you travel into China?

ADAI: Yes, but I didn't travel very much because I didn't have the budget to do it. I made two big trips and several smaller ones. It was pretty easy and inexpensive to visit the areas near Hong Kong like Guangzhou, the capital of Guangdong province, and Shenzhen, the new “special economic zone” (SEZ) that the Chinese were building there.

In addition, I traveled to Shanghai in the fall of 1981: and - I'm not sure whether it was the winter of 1982 or the winter of 1983 - I went to Beijing and made a trip by rail down to Zhengzhou, Xian, Xuzhou and Shanghai.

Q: When you studied these new economic zones, did they appear to be viable?

ADAI: Again, I was skeptical that the Chinese authorities would really allow or promote the kind of freedom necessary to allow those places to grow and prosper; and therefore skeptical that the SEZ's would have much of an impact. What I didn't understand at the time was that the government in China didn't need actually to do much to promote economic activity. The Chinese people seem to have almost unlimited energy and determination, and given even the smallest opportunities will take hold and develop them to – and often beyond – their limits. In China, for thousands of years, the government's job has been more restrict the population of China – to prevent it from reaching that critical mass that might result in an uncontrolled explosion.

So when the government of the PRC announced that it was going to establish these SEZ's that would allow people more freedom to engage in economic activity than elsewhere in China, my reaction was, “I'll believe it when I see it.” The Chinese, however, poured into those zones from all over the country. The response was beyond what was expected officially or permitted officially. However, the people basically took the reins, pushed the envelope, and what happened was phenomenal. In the case of Shenzhen, they took something that was a little bigger than a fishing village and made a huge city out of it, with industry of all kinds – and in almost no time it was competing with Hong Kong.

Q: How did you find social life in Hong Kong?

ADAIR: Hong Kong's a very busy, active place. Nobody is ever going to be still or isolated for long in Hong Kong. Ginger and I spent time with a variety of people in Hong Kong. Some were British - people that I met in the government or through running with the "Hash House Harriers". We met Chinese whose home and ancestors had been in Hong Kong for a very long time, and others who were more recent arrivals from the mainland. Some were through my work, and some were people that Ginger met in the course of her daily activities. Of course, we met quite a few people from Taiwan. We had American, British and "third-country" friends from the business community and other consulates. We didn't do a lot with officials from the PRC because at that time they weren't engaging much in social encounters. We were pretty much restricted to visiting them in their offices or an occasional official lunch. There were, of course, the Americans at the consulate as well; but I've always tried to avoid spending too much time with the official Americans wherever I go.

We had some social connections with the large Chinese entrepreneurs. We got to know some people who were doing business in China and whose families were still in China. There was a huge expatriate community of Europeans and Americans in Hong Kong. If I had been single, I might have spent most of my time with them. However, because Ginger was from Taiwan she had a natural connection to the Chinese world, and I was lucky enough to be able to share that.

Q: I speak as an ex consular officer, now. What about Chinese coming to you - nervous about the changeover - and wanting your assistance in going to the United States?

ADAIR: Yes. Well, first of all I was not in a position to give anyone much assistance in going to the States because I wasn't in the consular section. Yes, people did come to us and ask for help. I could give them advice, and I could refer them to officers the consular section, but I couldn't influence what happened next. Some of our Chinese colleagues at the consulate asked for my advice on what they should do when the financial crisis when the Hong Kong dollar seemed to be going down the tubes. I was a little reluctant to give advice, and when I did it turned out to be wrong.

It's insane for anybody that's not really deeply involved with currency fluctuations to give advice. In this case the trend was sharply downward. However, when it looked like there was no where for the currency to go but down, the British government stepped in to support it. At first people said they're crazy, and they're going to lose money too. However, the support was given without reservation and it worked. The Hong Kong dollar, which had been selling on the markets for something like one-third of its value went right back to where it was.

Hong Kong in that time period was a crazy place. The economy was booming and the rapidity of change was something that I had never seen in the United States. For instance, when I arrived, there was a building being built across the street from the consulate when we arrived. It was a small skyscraper and it went up pretty fast. However, when finished it remained empty for about three weeks and then the owner knocked the whole thing down and rebuilt it bigger - just because that was the way things were going. Hong Kong was also way ahead of the United States in terms of applied technology. There were people using cell phones in Hong Kong in the early 1980s and by the mid and late 1980s everybody had them. The cell phone phenomenon had barely started in the United States. I think Hong Kong is still ahead of the U.S. in applied technology. And, of course, most of those things were far less expensive over there.

Q: Were you computerized at your office?

ADAI: Only in a very limited way. In the 1970s only a few offices in the Department of State had computers. We tried to experiment a little bit with the beginnings of online data collection and stuff like that but it really wasn't going anywhere yet. In Hong Kong we had the systems that the State Department had begun to put in in the 1970s, the Wang word processing system. But at that time the Apple personal computers began to come out. There was a whole section of Hong Kong where the copies came out and they were one-tenth the price of the Apples selling in the fancy stores. Everything was pirated.

Q: Did you get involved in anti-pirating?

ADAI: There were some discussions with the Hong Kong government, but I was not involved. The Hong Kong authorities would occasionally raid these places but that kind of activity had been going on for a long time – like with watches and high end name brands. In the case of computers, most of the merchandise was consumed in the Hong Kong market.

Q: I go back to the time when I was in Saigon and we used to drop off in Hong Kong. Were American military making port visits and that sort of thing?

ADAI: Yes but not on a big scale. The ships would come in, but you really didn't see that many American sailors and military around the streets of Hong Kong. It was very interesting when the fleet came in, because we got to visit the aircraft carrier and talk with the crew.

The British military presence was much more noticeable of course. I got to know them not through work but because I would run with them in the evenings, the Hash House Harrier groups.

Q: When you leave Hong Kong?

***

Q: Eighty-four. Then you were off to where, Beijing?

ADAI: Yes.

Q: How was that? Was it different?

ADAI: It was really different. Hong Kong was a big, bustling international city where you could get anything and everything was available. People were available, information and communication were available. When we moved up to Beijing it was a completely different atmosphere. We didn't even know when – or even if we would get an apartment. For years before we got there some people spent their entire tours in a hotel. As it turned out we were lucky and got a little apartment in the diplomatic area within a few months.

The city, of course, was very different. It was still much more like it had been for the last 30 years than what it is now. There were almost no cars on the streets, mostly bicycles. There were virtually no stores except for the big government centers. We could not go to those. We were limited to the "Friendship Store", which was created specifically to cater to foreigners. But things were changing. Little places began to pop up in little nooks and crannies of the buildings where people lived, teeny little places about the size of this room. They started out selling food, extra produce that the government distribution centers didn't want, then food that enterprising farmers brought in to the city, then articles of clothing and so on. These stores began to mushroom. In the beginning they were very uncomfortable if we went in, because people were not sure how they should behave with foreigners. Many people at that time, even in Beijing, had never seen foreigners; so that made them uncomfortable. Those who were more familiar with the phenomenon understood they had to be careful in dealing with foreigners and it wasn't clear how far they could go.

We had to be very careful in our dealings with other people. Sometimes they would brush us off or try to isolate us – sort of like germs. We understood that it was difficult for them, and that they had to be careful, but it was hard to avoid taking it personally sometimes. There seemed to be a tone of xenophobia or racism sometimes as well. I think that most of it though was that they just didn't know what they were allowed to do.

Then there were the government officials. Some of them were required to deal with us. Some of them were simply allowed to, and many more were not allowed to deal with us. We could request appointments and call on government offices. We could try to have conversations, try to understand what they were doing, and deliver our own points of view. Language, of course, was a limiting factor since my Chinese was still limited – and there were lots of different accents and vocabulary that I had yet to assimilate. We also had a few American interpreters to help us with formal communications, and some of Chinese staff could help as well. Nevertheless, for the most part we didn't get very far. The Chinese officials either didn't have much to tell us, or they didn't want to tell us, or they'd been told not to tell us. Sometimes they knew more than we did about the intricacies of international trade and regulations. It was sort of hard to predict.

In Beijing I was in the economic section, but I was working on bilateral U.S.-PRC relations, rather than the analysis of the Chinese economy. I wanted that change. There were two areas that were particularly active then. One was the textile negotiations. The PRC wanted to export more textiles to the United States, but Chinese exports were limited by the existing system of American import quotas for textile imports. Those negotiations were very active. Since the Chinese were very interested in them, we had more access to and more contact with those government offices.

The other was the civil aviation relations. American airlines were very interested in gaining more access to Chinese destinations. When I first arrived, there was only one American airline that had official permission under a bilateral agreement to fly to the PRC, and that was Pan American. Pan American wanted greater access – to more cities; and other American airlines – like Northwest - wanted similar access. However, at the time, the PRC had only one national airline. Their attitude was sort of, “We have one airline with access to your market. You get one airline with access to our market.” There was a systemic difference. China had one government airline with access to all parts of China. The United States had many private airlines with access to different parts of the United States. It was really difficult to mesh these things. There were legitimate worries on the part of the Chinese in terms of competition, because the American airlines were more experienced, more developed and – at least at the time – had more money. There was also a security aspect, because in China the air space was controlled by the military and only certain civilian routes were allowed in through that military air space. In the United States it is just the opposite. But in some respects we were negotiating with the military in absentia. The civil aviation authorities probably had to clear everything that they said to us with the military. The military did not seem to have much incentive to compromise, so communication between us and the civil aviation authorities was usually quite sterile. It was very frustrating.

But the city itself was – there. We could walk around. We could even drive around. Ginger and I took a small car up that we had purchased in Hong Kong. It was fascinating to wander around and just look. There were almost no stores, and the buildings were very grey and dingy. However, if you went beyond the diplomatic area and the area of government buildings and looked more closely most of the buildings, streets and alleyways were quite old.

We could also visit the Forbidden City, which was and is a national museum. For centuries that magnificent royal city had been pretty much off limits to ordinary people. There were temples that we could go to. There was a Tibetan temple right next to the Forbidden City. We were able to drive outside the city as well. We could drive to the Great Wall, and out to the Ming Tombs.

At that time there were a few Western hotels that had been built in Beijing, so we could go there for different kinds of food. And the city was constantly changing. Every month there were more changes. You would see it in the people as well - the people that we dealt with.

As I mentioned, it was difficult to associate with Chinese officials when we arrived. About a year into our tour, however, the embassy received some movies that were just coming out in the United States. One of them was “Kramer versus Kramer.” We decided to try inviting some Chinese officials and see if they come. Each section of the embassy got to invite people. Most of the sections did not get much response. However, the economic section got a big surprise. The Deputy Minister who led the PRC textile negotiation team arrived and brought his wife. That just blew us away because we almost never got to meet officials’ families in those days. In addition, when he arrived he wasn’t wearing the standard blue Mao suit. Some government officials had Mao suits that were made of better quality material than the people on the street, but the design was essentially the same. This man wore designer clothes from Hong Kong, and was friendly and gracious to match. Things really were changing.

That didn't mean that people could pull out all the stops, or even relax. I met an academic from another city in China on a trip, and later he called on Ginger and me when he visited Beijing. We took him out to dinner, and then back to where he was staying. We talked for a fairly long time in the car, because I thought it might be a little safer to talk there than in the restaurant. A week later we got a message, an informal message, from him saying he had been warned not to talk with us and asking us not to contact him again. Things were still being controlled. People were still being watched, and we had to be careful not to get others into trouble.

Q: During what time period were you there?

ADAI: From '84 to '86.

Q: There are always incidents. Chinese tennis players or dancers would defect or something would happen. There would be collisions. Did anything like that happen while you were there?

ADAI: The incident with the tennis player, Hu Na, happened in 1982, before our tour in Beijing. The asylum in the embassy for Fang Lizhi, the Chinese astrophysicist, happened in 1989 after we left Beijing and before we served in Chengdu. We didn't have any major incidents of that sort when I was there.

Q: What was the city of Beijing like?

ADAI: We both actually ended up liking Beijing a lot. In the winter it was cold, and the pollution was pretty bad because they mostly used coal for heating. It was actually very pleasant in the spring and even in the summer. The city itself was fascinating. We had a book called "In Search of Old Peking" that had been published in the early 20th century. It seemed to be a pretty accurate guidebook to Beijing, though a lot of the buildings and places that it described were no longer there.

Q: I understand that old quarters would just disappear.

ADAI: Yes, well that is what has been going on recently. What we saw was the results of the destruction that Mao Zedong's regime wreaked on the city. In some respects what we could actually see was less significant than what we could no longer see. Beijing used to have magnificent protective walls all around the city. Those walls were almost entirely gone when we got there, torn down in the frenzy of the Cultural Revolution. But it wasn't like the tearing down of the Berlin Wall. The walls around Beijing were 60 feet high and 40 feet wide. It must have been a monumental effort to tear them down. Some pieces were still left along with some of the entry gates to the city. It was pretty amazing stuff, and very sad that it and so many other historical buildings were gone.

Q: What about visitors? I've talked to people who served in the economic section I think maybe a little before you. They used to talk about death by duck. The Chinese would invite visiting delegations out to have Peking duck, which is awfully rich. You do that a couple of times a week, and perhaps you're not looking forward to doing it again. How did you find it?

ADAI: Well it wasn't so much the duck that was dangerous as what they served with the duck – the famous Chinese “baijiu”. It's made from grain and is extremely strong. It's “white lightening” with several thousand years of refinement behind it. When I had been stationed in Paris I really loved drinking the wines and trying all the different kinds of alcohols. I tried it in Taiwan as well. Drinking is a long and honored tradition in China – well, not honored by everyone. It seems a little bit more civilized than what I have heard about in Russia. It is primarily designed to loosen you up and promote friendship. The phrase “gan bei” means “drain your glass” and they do it. There is also an element of competition, and one has to be careful. I wasn't careful and learned the hard way. Within the first month after I arrived we had a delegation of American mountain climbers come through from Seattle. They were led by Lou Whittaker, and were going to make an attempt on Mt. Everest. The Chinese Mountaineering Association hosted a dinner for them at the big Peking Duck Restaurant in the middle of Beijing. It was just an immense restaurant, and foreigners called it the “duck factory” because that's what they specialized in.

I was representing the embassy because the ambassador or the DCM either couldn't go or knew enough not to go. I sat next to the head of the mountaineering association, a very jovial and very tough gentleman who loved to drink. I was determined to keep up with him and I did. I counted. I kept track of how many glasses I was drinking. It was served in shot glasses, and I drank 20 of them.

Q: Good God!

ADAI: At the end of the dinner I wasn't sure if I was even going to be able to stand up. But I managed to stand up, say good night respectfully and walk out to the car. I managed to walk out, get in the car, and go back to the hotel. Ginger met me in the lobby. She says I smiled and said proudly that I drank 20 glasses, then went upstairs and was sick for three days. It was awful. I had poisoned myself. After that I was more careful.

Q: Well you must have been quite busy with visiting business groups.

ADAI: Not so many business groups, and they were primarily hosted by the Commercial Section. The American business community was almost invisible in China. The embassy had really increased the size of the commercial section; bringing people up from the Hong Kong business community who had lots of experience with American business there. They worked really hard. There were some American business people on the government delegations that came to negotiate on things like textiles and civil aviation. There were certainly visitors from banks and big corporations, but compared to the Japanese and the Hong Kong Chinese the Americans were barely players at all.

Q: Why? Why was this?

ADAI: American corporations were risk averse – at least when it came to China. Several years later, when I was the consul general in Chengdu, I traveled to Hong Kong to try and encourage businesses to come up and take a look at Sichuan province. The American Chamber of Commerce organized a meeting for me. Not very many people came to my presentation. I think those that did mostly came because they'd known me when I had been in Hong Kong before. Afterwards, I talked with several of them and they said if I could give them a guarantee of profits in the range of 25-50 percent, then they would think about coming up and looking. Otherwise they were not interested. Because American businesses have this really short timeframe and they have to make a profit within a certain period of time - otherwise their boards and stockholders get unhappy - it's just too risky. And the Japanese and others were going in for the next 20 to 50 years. Americans were way behind – and I think they are still far behind.

Q: Were there any efforts on the part of business organizations or something to look at the Chinese market over a long period of time or just no effort to change this?

ADAI: Well the Chambers of Commerce constantly pressed the U.S. Government to work on Chinese trade barriers and things like that, but in my career I have not seen much evidence of the American business community planning very far ahead – with the possible exception of resource extraction companies. Some companies in the China field were willing to take some risk. They found people that were Chinese language scholars and were willing to - wanted to - go in and spend time in China. Many of them were very good. They got around and learned a lot. But they also had trouble getting their companies to step forward. Admittedly the risks were pretty high. It's difficult now to go into China and deal with the national and local governments and the population. It was even more difficult then.

Q: Did you have to have a Chinese partner?

ADAI: I think the actual requirements for investment varied. Foreign investors did not necessarily have to have a Chinese partner in the same way that the business people in Zaire had to have a Zairian partner – or the way foreigners had to go through Chinese intermediaries in the 19th century. But they did have to deal with a myriad of requirements imposed by both the national government and the local governments, and those requirements were changing constantly as the national government experimented with policy and the local governments and local officials sought to enhance their own profits and power. So for a lot of businesses that was difficult.

Q: Well then you left there in '86? Where did you go?

ADAI: After that I went back to Washington for two years.

Q: Okay, just before we leave, who was your ambassador while you were there?

ADAI: Part of the time it was Art Hummel and part of the time it was Winston Lord.

Q: How were they?

ADAI: Well Art Hummel was an extraordinary person. He had good Chinese, and he knew China really well. His own personal experiences, as you know, in China were almost unbelievable.

Q: He fought as a partisan.

ADAI: He was a prisoner of war of the Japanese in China. He escaped and then fought with the Chinese guerillas against the Japanese. He was very good with the Chinese officials, and had tremendous patience. I would go into his office and argue that we should take various measures, including punitive measures – reciprocal measures - to get the Chinese to reduce certain barriers to trade. He would just cut me off and say we're not going to get into that business. And he was probably right at that time.

Q: Yes.

ADAI: It's a hard call.

Q: How about Winston Lord?

ADAI: Winston Lord was very different. He's smart and a very nice person. He had experience on the policy side - obviously, with Kissinger and that first trip to China. And his wife, Betty Bao, is Chinese so she understands the milieu and I'm sure helped him to understand it better. He was a very energetic and dynamic ambassador. But he did not have the kind of Chinese background that gave him a personal understanding of the whole dynamic that Art Hummel had, and that some of the ambassadors after him had, like Jim Lilley and Stape Roy.

Q: Can you explain how a deeper understanding of the background of a country makes one a better ambassador there?

ADAI: That's a little difficult to describe. With China, we are dealing with a whole civilization that is far older than ours, and far more complex than ours. It has a dynamic, an inertia and wisdom that most people who haven't been exposed to it can barely imagine. We tend to deal with everybody in the world in the here and now. We tend to look at the past as perhaps being a nice cultural picture, but primarily an encumbrance, a drag upon progress. We don't see it as being a foundation for something else. We see the negative part of it, the part that weakens our potential adversary or partner, but not the positive side. Consequently, we are less likely to study it carefully. As a result I think that when we have dealt with truly old and established cultures we have been at a disadvantage. Both China and Japan are in that category.

We dealt with them, we thought, from a position of power; Japan because we defeated them militarily, China because it was a basket case. In the 19th and 20th centuries we thought we were superior because of our greater military and economic power. We also considered ourselves to be very philanthropic with our missionaries and the effort to save Chinese souls. However, in actuality the Chinese have a more solid foundation on which they are standing than do we.

Some of the people who have studied Chinese and Chinese culture and have immersed themselves in it understand that. Art Hummel understood that. Stape Roy understands that. Their perspective is substantially different. Therefore, the way they deal with individuals, and the decisions that they make are different. They're dealing with both the past and the future; whereas the others tend to be dealing solely with the present. It would be very difficult for someone without a deep knowledge of Chinese history, Chinese government and the Chinese character to do what Burt Levin did in Hong Kong. He arrived and said categorically, "This transfer of power is going to work. You don't understand the Chinese. Chinese communism is a blip on the screen. Hong Kong may be the most profitable city in Asia after Tokyo, but it is just a pimple on the rump of Mother China. They've got a perspective in Beijing that we don't have here." So he was able to say with perfect confidence that, although it looked like total chaos for the next three years, in 10 to 15 years it would be fine. Most Americans don't do that.

ELIZABETH RASPOLIC
Chinese Language Training
Washington, DC and Taiwan (1981-1983)

Chief, Consular Section
Guangzhou (1983-1986)

Consul General
Beijing (1986-1988)

Elizabeth Raspolic worked for the Peace Corps in Pakistan, Thailand, and Tunisia before joining the Foreign Service in 1973. She served mainly as a consular officer in France, Korea, Ethiopia, and China. Ms. Raspolic was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1989.

Q: You went to China. What sort of training did you have, and what was your first assignment in China?

RASPOLIC: I had the standard two years of language training, Mandarin, and it was one year at FSI in Rosslyn, and one year at the Department Language School in Taipei, Taiwan. I went from there directly to Guangzhou, where I was chief of the consular section. That's formerly known as Canton. Believe it or not, the British traders, when they came in the mid-19th century, when they heard Guangzhou, supposedly transliterated it as "Canton." (Laughs) I mean, why not?

Q: What was your job in Guangzhou?

RASPOLIC: As chief of the consular section, I was responsible for supervising a section that handled immigrant visas, non-immigrant visas, and American citizen services. Including myself, we had nine American officers, one American secretary, and 27 Chinese employees.

Q: That's a huge section.

RASPOLIC: It was a big section.

Q: Was that the main task, really, of our consulate in Guangzhou, would you say?

RASPOLIC: It was certainly a major task as a consulate. Our commercial section was equally busy. There were many American businesses who were interested in business possibilities in southern China, which is where, if you're at all familiar with what's going on in China now, the majority of the innovative economic activity is going on in the southern part of China, in Guangdong and Fujian provinces, directly north of Hong Kong. Our political section really was not as active. Our administrative section was very busy, but mostly administering us, rather than providing a service to the public. So it was primarily consular and commercial.

Q: What were your main functions there in the consular section?

RASPOLIC: Certainly the biggest chunk of our time was taken up with immigrant visas, because traditionally over the years, Americans of Chinese origin came from the southern part of China. Until we normalized relations in 1979, these American citizens were not able to file immigrant visa petitions for their relatives. So there was a tremendous interest and activity in the filing of immigrant visa petitions from 1979 onward.

I was in Guangzhou from August of 1983 until July of 1986. When I was there, we had over 50,000 names on file in our immigrant visa files, people waiting for their petitions to become current so that we could issue visas. Traditionally, Americans of Chinese origin came from the four-county area, which is four counties within Guangdong province, but basically these counties were between Guangzhou and Hong Kong. Keep in mind that Guangzhou is really only 100 miles north of Hong Kong. So Taishan County and the others were the main sources of immigrants. A tremendous amount of activity.

As the years progressed, we saw more and more immigrants going to the United States as it became easier for them to get their passports and papers in order. We also saw more and more Chinese Americans coming back to visit the homeland to see what relatives were still around. We also began to see more and more retired Chinese Americans coming back to China to retire. Their Social Security checks would certainly go a lot further in China. This was a source of foreign exchange certificates for their family members, and they could live really quite well on their basic Social Security check.

Q: What years are we talking about?

RASPOLIC: 1983 to 1986.

Q: How did you find your staff, both Chinese and American?

RASPOLIC: The American staff, I thought, was really very good, exceptionally good. We were uneven in that we only had myself and one other position designated as an experienced officer. Then we had seven JO positions. But we had been very fortunate during all three of my years in Guangzhou that one of those JO positions was also filled by a second-tour officer. So we did have the luxury of having a third experienced officer to help deal with the JOs, because it's very hard to be a sounding board for seven JOs all day long every day. There are certainly going to be many areas where you simply haven't had as much experience. And sometimes there's not conflict, but sometimes some people communicate more easily than others.

Q: So you need another person.

RASPOLIC: I think to have the section function well, you need at least one other officer. What we tried ultimately to do was upgrade two of the positions. We won the battle but lost the war, because we upgraded the position, but then we couldn't get any experienced officers worldwide to bid on them. So then we had to fill them with junior officers again! (Laughs)

Q: These all had to be language officers?

RASPOLIC: Yes, but under the terms of the new Foreign Service Act, a junior officer is not offered the opportunity to have any more than six months language training before they can be tenured. So what we would do was send people off for either six months of Mandarin, or we also experimented and sent three or four officers for six months in Cantonese. We had them get off language probation on the basis of that, and using those six months, those officers who were interested in it had no problem at all in taking care of their work in Chinese, and many of them really became quite adept at handling interviews in a lot of the other dialects that were used in the area. The JOs are a constant source of amazement to me. I think they're great.

Q: In Guangzhou, this was your first time, really, in running a section?

RASPOLIC: Other than the very small section in Addis Ababa, where I had one part-time American employee and two full-time Ethiopian employees, until we fired one.

Q: How well did you feel you were prepared at this point to run really a very large section?

RASPOLIC: I felt probably that the State Department had not prepared me to run it, but that I had had sufficient previous experience in the Peace Corps that I could run it. I suppose the largest group I had ever been responsible for was when I was regional director in Thailand and had 120 Peace Corps volunteers in my region that I was responsible for. Granted, I didn't have them all around me every day, but they were all over the countryside. Still, I was reasonably familiar with some of the problems.

Q: Were you consul general in Guanzhou?

RASPOLIC: No. Because it was a constituent post, the principal officer was the consul general. I was the chief of the consular section.

Q: What did you see as your principal job?

RASPOLIC: My principal job was really a management job, not a consular job. I felt that my principal job was to see that the section opened for business every day and got through the business day in as smooth and as efficient and as legal a manner as we possibly could. That was the basis of the daily operations, and from then on I would try to work with various officers whom I felt were interested in special projects. We had all sorts of special projects going all the time. Somebody was doing research on how a Chinese cook could qualify for P-6 status; someone else would be doing a special project on how to interview for fraud in a country that wouldn't let you go out and do field interviews for fraud. Things like this. Trying to utilize various officers' special interests and keep them occupied.

Q: I don't mean this term pejoratively, but would you make up these special projects?

RASPOLIC: No, no, not at all. Not at all. Usually the special project would come about because we would have requests from perhaps INS in Hong Kong, saying, "We've got a real problem with P-6 cooks. How are we going to deal with it?" So then I'd sit down and we'd have one of our weekly staff meetings. We'd sit around and shoot the breeze about how could we approach it. Somebody would say, "Listen, who's been out talking to the public health officials about how you qualify, how are you licensed in China to be a cook?" Then somebody would say, "Gee, I met somebody the other day who might be able to give me a hand on that. Let me look into it." It would start that way. It would not be any kind of make-work project at all.

Q: Were the junior officers ready to do this type of work, or did they need quite a bit of guidance?

RASPOLIC: It varied so much from officer to officer. I found most of them were really quite ready, and they had gone through the ConGen Rosslyn course, which seemed to be relatively successful, I must say, much more so than I felt my training had been. There were always exceptions. (Laughs) There were several officers whom I don't think performed as well as one would have hoped, and I don't think it was necessarily Guangzhou; I basically felt that they perhaps weren't really right for the Foreign Service, and maybe Guangzhou brought it all out a lot sooner than an easier post would have done.

Q: What were the pressures on you and your staff?

RASPOLIC: Basically, it was not traditional kinds of pressures. We had pressures to issue visas, yes, but in Guangzhou, people spend a lot more time feeling sorry for themselves, I think, and you had to watch among the JOs not to let them feel sorry for themselves. It is not a pleasant post by any means.

Q: Feeling sorry for themselves in what manner?

RASPOLIC: The city is not a comfortable city. It is not all that charming. It's a very commercial city that you can see the main sites of within the first 45 minutes that you're there, but you're there for two years or 18 months or three years, it depends on your tour. So what are you going to do with the rest of the time? It's too easy to say, "I'll go to Hong Kong every weekend." You can catch the train Friday night and come back on Sunday afternoon, and have a very pleasant weekend in Hong Kong, but that's sort of living with one foot in each country, really giving Guangzhou short-shrift.

One of our biggest problems was our facilities in Guangzhou. We were in a hotel, the Dong Fang Hotel. For the first two years that I was there, our office was there and our living quarters. I lived in two hotel rooms in Guangzhou.

Then the third year that I was there, we moved into a marvelous apartment complex. It was really just very lovely. It was a joint venture built by Chinese construction workers with Hong Kong architects, and it was really very nice. But that was the third year.

Our offices continued all that time to be in the Dong Fang Hotel. The consular section was on the ground floor. We had absolutely no security, which bothered us from time to time very much. The first year that I was there, I managed to expand the offices. There was the hotel Sauna that was located next to us, and the hotel was building a new sports complex on another corner of the compound, so this space became available. So we got permission from the embassy to rent it, and we expanded our consular section, which almost doubled our floor space and made a big difference. But we were on the ground floor.

There was a lot of foot traffic outside, a lot of noise. We had no natural light at all, because for security reasons, we had to cover up the glass windows leading out to the courtyard on the interior side. On the exterior side it was just cement brick wall anyway. We had rats in the ceiling, we had cats in the ceiling. In fact, one day a cat fell through the ceiling; it was fighting one of the rats.

We had fleas in the carpeting. In fact, at one point we used to have the exterminators come in, and I really am still, to this day, concerned about what they used to exterminate the fleas with, because we would have to leave. We could not work. Everybody always used to work late in Guangzhou, particularly when we lived in the Dong Fang. There was nothing else to do, so we would work late. We would always have to leave on time the day the exterminators were coming in, because this stuff really was very potent.

We used to also worry about the Dong Fang employees who came in and used their electrical equipment to spread this disinfectant, or whatever it was, because they only had a little gauze mask on. I really was concerned about whether this stuff was eating up their lungs or not.

We had huge roaches, huge water bugs. Not until we expanded the office space did we have a staff toilet, men's room, ladies' room. Before that, we had to leave the office and go out and use either the public facilities that belonged to the hotel or go to your own quarters on another floor, go back to your own apartment and use the john. (Laughs) It really was very unique.

We had a tremendous problem with administration the first year that I was there. I was there for three years, and we had four administrative officers. The first three were the first year that I was there, and then the fourth one came, and he stayed for two years. He was a godsend. He was very, very easy to work with.

Q: The other ones just said to hell with it and left?

RASPOLIC: The first one was fired for having his hand in the till, not at that post, but at his previous post. The second two were TDYers, temporary-duty people, sent out to help out until they found some poor soul who was willing to come out. Then the fourth one came on regular assignment.

That's fine and dandy for the rest of the post, but you can't operate a consular section that's issuing 15,000, 16,000 immigrant visas a year unless we know damn well we're going to have forms. We used forms galore. I mean, we had not only just plain immigrant visa issuance forms, but a large variety of application forms. We had all the forms that we sent to people when we scheduled their appointments. We had lots of forms, some of them required by the Department, some of them local forms. But we couldn't operate without these forms.

We also had the problem with our Chinese staff in that we had to train them. They were not accustomed to working in a Western office, and they were not our employees. They were employees of the Diplomatic Service Bureau who were assigned to us. They were actually dragooned from their own work units, sent to the Diplomatic Service Bureau, and then assigned to us. So their allegiance was clearly not to us. We would try and tell them what our expectations were, and we would have training sessions for them, but there were certain American concepts that were very hard to get through to them. One of them was, "Please, when you're using a form, don't come to me when you are down to the last form in the last box. Tell me when you're down to the next to the last box of 1,000 each. Give me a fighting chance to get some more printed or Xeroxed or something or other!" But that continues to this day to be a problem in China. Planning ahead is not rewarded, I guess. I don't know. I don't know what it is, but it made it very difficult.

Ultimately, I had to establish the consular section's administrative subsection. When we expanded our office, we purposely built in a huge storeroom, and we kept all of our forms down there, separating them out from the main consulate storeroom, so that we knew what we had and what was needed to be reordered. We set up our own inventory system. I hired a British woman whose husband was temporarily in Guangzhou with one of the oil companies, and she was one of the best things that ever happened to us, because she was terribly well organized. She set up a very easy-to-deal-with and very comprehensive inventory card system, and worked with the Chinese employees on how to keep it up to date.

Q: There's no thought of moving into the electronic field in visa issuance, inventory, and all that?

RASPOLIC: Not in inventory. We have gone to IVACS, the automated visa issuance system in Guangzhou. We made all the arrangements for it while I was still there. I left in July of 1986, and the system actually went into effect in Guangzhou, I believe, late that fall, in September or October, when the training team had come out from the Department.

Q: With all the problems there, you could still run a system like that?

RASPOLIC: Yes. With all the problems in Guangzhou, oddly enough, electrical supply was not one of them. The electrical supply was never intermittent at all; it was quite constant, number one. Number two, with the installation of IVACS, we got an additional position in Guangzhou, and that was a systems person, AIS, automated information system. That person's main role was to keep the IVACS system in the IV section, and also to service all the Wangs that we had in the other sections. We only had WANGS installed in Guangzhou. WANG is a type of word processing. We only had that system made available to us in Guangzhou, I believe, no more than one year before, probably late 1985 or early '86. We reluctantly moved into the 20th century. (Laughs)

Q: Besides the immigrant visas, were there other problems?

RASPOLIC: Sure. We had non-immigrant visa that were relatively active, although it was really only the third largest issuing post in China. Most people in Guangzhou will tend to wait for their immigrant visa turn to come up. There certainly are bad NIV cases and applications in Guangzhou, but it could be a lot worse than it is, I must say.

We also had an American Citizen Services section. We had more and more retirees coming to live there, and they would come in and register. We had some American students who had come to study. We had certainly a lot of American tourists coming through, and we would have several very important tourist sites located in our consular district. When we had death cases, invariably they would be up there and not down in Guangzhou. As I say, Guangzhou itself is not very scenic, so tourists would come and make connections on their way to Hong Kong, and they'd stay overnight, if that. We had an anti-fraud officer, and the anti-fraud officer was the only position like that authorized for China. We kept that person busy. We rotated our JOs in Guangzhou, so we tried to give them as much experience as we could, and we also tried to keep them from being bored. They all seemed to like the AFU position. The AFU position gave some of them some very creative leeway. They devised new systems.

Q: This interview is for people who may be dealing with the consular operation. One of the big things is to try to rotate officers and keep them having fun, or at least to keep them from being bored in some of the more routine things.

RASPOLIC: Yes. If you're going to be running a section with lots of JOs, you have to be concerned with their careers and training them for what comes next. Then you've got to sort out among the JOs who has already said that he or she is going to be in the consular cone, and who is in another cone. We tried to give consular-cone people as broad experience as we can, because even if it's only a month doing this and you don't do it again for two tours, you will think back and remember and absorb some of this experience, and it will surface again later to the benefit of the Department.

If the person is just paying their dues as a one-time consular officer, then they're going off to make their mark as an econ or admin or political officer, we certainly tried to provide more experience for them, but probably they won't get as much as a consular-cone officer.

What we tried to do was split a JO's tour. First of all, we tried to split the JO's tour, I think, probably too frequently. They had 18 months. We said, "We'll divide it into four sectors. Two of those sectors will be in immigrant visa, since that's the bulk of our work. The other will be either NIVs or AFU or ACS. We'll just see how it works out. You'll have the luck of the draw." I would work it all out tentatively in pencil and take it around and talk to each one of them, see if they could live with it. If they wanted some changes, we'd see what we could do.

It turned out, frankly, that I thought it seemed to be working reasonably well, but some of the JOs felt that we were rotating too frequently, because they felt they were just getting a handle on the new assignment, and then they'd be moved out into another section. So we said, "Okay." Then we made it three rotations rather than four throughout the tour, and that seemed to work out best for everyone concerned.

Q: Was the section able to make much contribution to the political or economic reporting?

RASPOLIC: As the section, yes, I think, because we tried to encourage the JOs to do some reporting for the other sections. One of our officers, who started off as an admin cone officer, now has an econ assignment in the economic bureau here in the Department, and he's switching cones to econ. He used to do some econ reporting for the econ section while he was in the consular section in Guangzhou. Some of his reporting would be based on things that came up during the course of interviews with Chinese citizens over visa matters, and some of them would just be based on his reporting on economic activities that were highlighted in the local press, and some of it would then be tied in with some field work, perhaps, that he had done. He was an excellent reporter.

We had other officers who did non-consular reporting. One fellow did quite a long and very interesting piece on Muslims in Guangzhou. We had another officer who was admin cone, who did quite a bit of food-market research and tried to chart the course of a mild inflation that was going on, watching the price of various things as the prices invariably went up. The prices never seemed to go down.

Q: No! (Laughs)

RASPOLIC: I think maybe the world wasn't waiting with anxious breath for some of our reporting, but we did try to give the JOs non-consular experience also.

Also I tried to make sure that the JOs were involved when important people came to town and we had to set up control rooms or whatever. I must say, in three years in Guangzhou, we only had two CODELs [congressional delegations], so you can see. But on the other hand, we did have Vice President Bush come through town. We closed the consular section for a day, other than we had one officer handling emergency ACS cases, and that was it. We felt we could not close that, but we certainly closed everything else. That officer who was handling the ACS cases was actually writing thank-you notes for the Vice President at the same time. (Laughs) Everyone else was down in the control room and working very hard.

We also set up a series of orientation trips for the JOs to travel in China. We used our travel budget that way. This was all on official business. We would send them to the embassy for two days to see how the consular section there functioned, and then to the other consulates for a day each, to see how they functioned there. So it worked out very, very well, I think. We always knew whose turn it was next to go on the orientation trips.

Q: It sounds like you had a well-organized program for the care and feeding of the young officers.

RASPOLIC: We tried. You never succeed with all of them, and you never get through to all of them, but I think we did pretty well, considering what we had to work with.

Q: How did you get along with the local officials there from the consular group?

RASPOLIC: Quite well. I think we had a reasonably healthy relationship. We did not see each other all that often. We really only saw each other when there were problems or at social functions, but our relations were really very, very cordial. I knew that I could always call on them when I did have a problem, and I would always receive a very cooperative response.

We had a very bad ACS case toward the end of my time in Guangzhou, and the ministry people could not have been more helpful.

Q: What was the problem?

RASPOLIC: There was a lady, an American citizen, who was married to a British citizen, and she lived in London. Apparently the lady had a history of psychiatric problems. Of course, hindsight is wonderful. We found this out after the fact. The first thing we knew about her, she was in a town near Guangzhou, about 40 miles west of Guangzhou, called Foshan. The authorities there were reporting her as perhaps being ill. "Perhaps" -- they had her locked up in a hospital in the director's office. And would we please come and investigate.

We sent off one of the JOs to see her. (Laughs) Fortunately, it was a good choice of JOs, which I didn't know at the time; he just happened to be available. He once had worked in Silver Hill, which is a psychiatric institution in Connecticut, so he at least knows a psycho when he sees one! (Laughs)

The lady had come to China to find the inner meaning and inner truth. Someone in her family had died, and she had inherited something like $15,000 or $20,000. She had brought all the money with her to Hong Kong, and had the money transferred into Chinese foreign exchange certificates, of all things, in Hong Kong, transferred directly to the Bank of China in Foshan. For some reason or another, she had read about Foshan before and knew about Foshan, and wanted to go to Foshan. This lady arrived with $20,000 in the bank in Foshan. She probably had more money than the entire city budget, and it was all in her name. She was staying in a hotel, and she then started acting very strangely. She painted a mustache on her face and was parading around the hotel. She'd get undressed in the hotel room with the hotel door open. I mean, not in China! Not in China! No, no, no!

Q: Maybe St. Tropez or something. (Laughs)

RASPOLIC: But not in China, no. I think she stole a table knife. She claimed it was a table knife; the hotel claimed it was a carving knife. Stole it from the kitchen and slept with it under her pillow. Just a series of rather bizarre things. The affect was completely wrong.

So they had put her in a mental institution. The Chinese wanted us to get her out, and we kept saying, "She's an American citizen. We cannot force her to leave. If you want her out, you're going to have to make arrangements to take her." Under our regulations, we have to protect her rights.

Q: This is an argument that is going on on a daily basis somewhere in the world.

RASPOLIC: Absolutely. As an American citizen, we have to protect her rights, even though she is totally unaware that we're trying to protect her rights. So we went around and around and around. This started in early June. At one point, the Chinese said they would sedate her, take her to the Shenzhen border. Shenzhen is a special economic zone right on the border between Guangdong Province and Hong Kong. They would put her in a van. They wanted us to send a vice consul to Foshan to ride in the van with her, sedated, to the border. They would take her out, put her in a wheelchair, and the vice consul would then wheel the wheelchair across the border to Hong Kong. We said, "Yoo hoo! No, no, no, no, no. We're not doing this at all."

Their idea of getting rid of her was to take her to Hong Kong, not send her back to her home in London, because it was so much cheaper for them. The Chinese will not spend money on anything that they don't have to, and certainly not foreign exchange certificates.

Then we contacted Hong Kong, and Hong Kong said if this lady comes down to Hong Kong, according to Hong Kong law, there is nothing they can do for her. They cannot hospitalize her unless she voluntarily commits herself, because she would not have committed any act that would be contrary to Hong Kong law, and she would not be a threat to either herself or society.

So we knew full well that if this lady was on her own in Hong Kong, what she would do is turn around and come back to China. So around and around and around. The family in London was no help at all.

Finally, after enormous, enormous, enormous finagling and dealing with the British Embassy in Beijing and dealing with the family through our embassy in London, we made arrangements. The Chinese were willing to declare her incapable of making decisions on her own. So with that in hand, then we were able legally to step in and make arrangements on her behalf. We had the family's permission. The husband was so touching, he was really wonderful. He permitted us to use her money to pay for her way, for her Medevac. Very thoughtful to the bitter end.

But to get her out, we could not even send her out on a plane that transited Hong Kong, because for one thing, she would have to transfer planes in Hong Kong. It would be a stretcher case, because she would have to be sedated and escorted all the way back to London. If she transferred planes, Hong Kong immigration would consider her to have attempted to enter Hong Kong, and therefore they would not accept the mainland Chinese psychiatric evaluation that she was incompetent. So we had to find a flight that got her out directly, bypassing Hong Kong, back to London. We had to send her up to Beijing on CAC and have her transfer to a British Airways flight, and then go back to London that way.

First we hired one nurse to come up from Hong Kong to escort her all the way back to London, and British Airways announced that she couldn't fly unless she had two nurses, so we had to hire a second one. That was at the last minute, we got this nurse. This all happened during the very week that I was transferring from Guangzhou to Beijing, so I was making all the arrangements in Guangzhou. Then I flew up and moved to Beijing and was there for her arrival when she came up. I went out to meet the plane.

It turned out that the "wonderful" psychiatric institution in Foshan did not supply sufficient sedatives to the nurses to last them for the entire trip to London. I only found this out 45 minutes before the flight was due to leave Beijing, so we went running around. Fortunately there's an airport clinic in Beijing, and they happened to have, because we were still in China, exactly the same kind of sedative that they'd been using down in Guangzhou. So we bought out their entire supply and sent it along, just in case. (Laughs) It worked out just as well, because apparently the flight was delayed at a couple of points along the line.

When last seen, she was ambulatory when she arrived in London, and British Airways wanted to take her to a hospital for "a check up" at the psychiatric hospital. She refused to go, and walked out of the airport on her own steam, and has never been seen since. (Laughs) I mean, her family has seen her. She went home, but she, fortunately, never came back to China.

Q: Then you became consul general in Beijing. When was this?

RASPOLIC: This was July of 1986, and I was there until July of 1988.

Q: When you were in the consulate, how did you view your consular support from the embassy?

RASPOLIC: Quite differently. When I was in Guangzhou, I regarded the Guangzhou operation as entirely independent. I would pick and choose which issues I wanted to inform Beijing about or to keep them informed if I thought they might be interested in it, or if I thought it might be precedent-setting, you know, contribute to consular operations in general in China. But I felt that we were the largest post in the country in terms of manpower and IV caseload, and we dealt directly with the Department. Beijing did not visit us and was totally unaware of what the hell we were doing, so therefore I felt no strong allegiance to the consular section in Beijing.

Q: Now you changed hats.

RASPOLIC: Now my opinion of Guangzhou is, "What the hell are they doing? Don't they know that they can't do that? Didn't they read our last directive? Haven't they been following the correspondence, for example, from Shanghai, where we've infoed all the consulates? What are they doing? Why are they not acknowledging that this is not new ground?" This kind of thing. "On this particular issue, whatever it is, why are they going directly to the Department? Why aren't they asking us first? Why aren't they giving us the option of speaking for all posts in the country, rather than negotiating with the Department independently?" Your perspective is quite different.

Q: What was your operation like in Beijing?

RASPOLIC: It was half the size of Guangzhou in the sense of manpower, and we only had five American officers and one American secretary. We had 14 Chinese employees. It literally was half. But the division of labor was quite different, and the portfolio was different. Granted, in house we had normal visa operations and American Citizen Services.

In terms of visas, when I first got there, we issued both immigrant and non-immigrant visas, but we were in the process of trying to consolidate all immigrant visa issuing in Guangzhou. We felt it was unnecessary to have a duplicate operation in Beijing, in terms of IVs. We didn't have sufficient American personnel, and our Chinese staff was not experienced enough to be able to deal with the variety of cases that we were getting. Whereas Guangzhou had so much experience in this and these cases were just routine in Guangzhou, we figured out that obviously it was going to be physically inconvenient for some of our northern applicants, but since over 85% of the applicants came from the south and of the Beijing applicants, Shanghai used to be in their consular district for IV purposes, almost half the Beijing applicants were from Shanghai and it was equidistant for them to go to Guangzhou as to Beijing. So we felt ultimately we were inconveniencing maybe 200 to 400 people a year, but we were benefitting almost 15,000 to 16,000. So that's what we did. We really received very little flak for it. I think it was much more efficient.

It also gave us time in Beijing to concentrate on our biggest operation, and that was non-immigrant visas. Last year I think we issued in between 35 and 40,000 non-immigrant visas, and those were issuances. We must have refused thousands more. So we were very, very busy in our NIV section.

Before, we had not been utilizing our staff, I think, very efficiently. Our experienced officer was issuing IVs, because it was more complicated, even though it affected a very minimal number of people, whereas NIVs, which were not as complicated but had a much broader impact, were being supervised and issued by junior officers, with very little supervision. I was not at all at ease with that. I think we have a much more efficient, much more reliable operation now.

American Citizen Services is very busy in Beijing because most American tourists who come to China are certainly not going to leave China without having visited Beijing. It's a very popular tourist site. We have the traditional gamut of problems of ACS, and we have a lot of deaths, a lot of people suffering from what a consular officer several years ago referred to as the "Peking duck syndrome." (Laughs) Death by duck. The elderly person, because a tourist in China generally is elderly, because they're the ones who have the money and the time to afford to go to China, they go, they're taken out at 6:00 in the morning, they're off to see the Great Wall, then tromping through the Ming tombs, and they stop off at the Forbidden City. Then they go back to the hotel, shower and change, and go out for a banquet. By the time they get back to the hotel, it's 10:00 or 11:00 at night. You're 75 years old and you had a bypass 15 years before, and bingo! It happens.

Q: How did you find the Chinese as far as helping you with the death cases?

RASPOLIC: Very helpful. We had, I think, very good relations with the major hospitals in town. We had two or three hospitals with foreigners' clinics that we dealt with extensively, both for death and illness cases. The civil authorities were very helpful, the people at the crematorium were very helpful to us, Customs, when we had to ship ashes or bodies out, they really went out of their way many times. The Chinese were very, very thoughtful. Tourism is an important business to them, it is their main industry, and they certainly don't like seeing tourists die.

Q: How did the consular section fit into the embassy?

RASPOLIC: Quite well. This gets me back to one other point that I wanted to make. Our division of labor at the embassy regarding consular affairs did not necessarily match the division of labor at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Therefore, as the consul general, I was responsible oftentimes for administering parts of our bilateral Consular Convention, which the Ministry of Foreign Affairs associated with the consular section because it was a consular convention. However, within the embassy, the issue at hand was probably either an administrative matter or something that would be normally handled by the front office, but which I would be involved in because of the Consular Convention.

To give you some specifics, the whole question of reciprocity. If we let their staff in Chicago travel within a radius of 25 miles of the post, then that means our staff in Shenyang can travel within a radius of 25 miles. Are we going to argue back and forth as to who's not getting their 25 miles? Or if we opened Route 395 for them to exit Washington via the south, does this mean, then, that the people in Shanghai can drive to Hangzhou directly, or do they have to go by train and not take a personal car? This is the kind of negotiation that I would get involved in because of the consular convention, not because of the consular section.

Customs clearance matters were in the Consular Convention and several other points like that. I oftentimes would get involved in things that wouldn't normally be considered to be consular work at other posts.

But as far as how we fit into the other sections, we worked very closely with a lot of the other sections. We worked very closely with P and C, which in China is called the Press and Cultural Section, which in most other posts is the USIS section. But for a variety of reasons, when posts were established in China, they could not be called USIS, so they were called Press and Cultural.

We dealt frequently with the cultural affairs office because there were lots of student exchanges going on, and these people were using the form IAP-66. It used to be DSP-66.

Q: This is the exchange-student form.

RASPOLIC: Yes, the exchange-student form, cultural exchange. These would be issued by P and C, and so we worked very closely with them. We worked very closely with them also because they were constantly expediting sending over large groups of Chinese entertainers to the United States, who would have contractual commitments here to perform on X date, but their passports wouldn't be issued until the last minute by the Chinese authorities, so therefore it was up to us to expedite the visa issuance.

The Chinese have very laborious passport issuance procedures, and they could care less about other countries' visa procedures. If we wanted the person in the United States by a certain date, or if they had to be there by a certain date, then it was certainly not up to them to waive their passport procedures, but it was clearly up to us to waive our visa issuance procedures. So we would go round and round and round about this all the time. We had very complicated China-specific visa procedures that we have to follow.

Q: Is communism a problem?

RASPOLIC: Oh, sure.

Q: As far as clearances.

RASPOLIC: Very much so. Our law requires it, our procedures require it. We have to presume membership in most cases, because in most cases the membership is not acknowledged by the individual applicant, but we do have to take a look at the applicant and what his or her position is, and whether it is not unusual to assume that that person would be a Party member.

Q: Did you attend country-team meetings? Were you a part of that?

RASPOLIC: Yes, very much so.

Q: Did you find that you were being used as a source of information about how things were going?

RASPOLIC: Not necessarily a source, but I felt very much that I was an active participating member of the country team. If the ambassador asked for comments on any given situation, there was never any reason for me to feel that my comment was not as well received as anyone else's around the table. The ambassador, I think, was very good about that.

Q: How about dealing with Washington? In my days, particularly with matters of visa problems, I found that if I wanted to stall or didn't want to do something, I would refer things to Washington. I found it's far better to resolve almost anything you could think of right at the post if you wanted to take action, because you never were sure of what answer you might get, or if you would get an answer. Have you found this to be true?

RASPOLIC: Not as much as it used to be. I agree with you that before, if you went back to the Department and asked for guidance, that really was putting the whole case in the deep freeze until you got the guidance. But you could pretty much rely on getting the guidance. I don't think that that is used all that much anymore, primarily because the Department, in some offices, has been notorious in not responding. Therefore, it is not efficient to go back and ask for guidance when you're not going to get any guidance. What you're going to have is a very unhappy applicant, his family, supporters, and congressmen, and it puts you in a untenable position because you can't keep saying you're waiting for guidance when this goes on month after month after month, no matter. For example, if you're talking about the Visa Office, I found that the Visa Office simply has no shame, so therefore you can't try and shame them into replying to you. They simply won't.

So if I had to send something back to the Department, I would tell the applicant that it's not a question of, "Change your plane reservations or whatever. We're going to go back and ask for guidance." What I would have to say is, "I have to refer this case to the Department. I don't know when I will receive a reply. It may be up to six months. Don't call me; I'll call you." It would have to be under those circumstances.

I was very frustrated, particularly during the Beijing tour, with the lack of prompt reply from the Department. I felt that it clearly hindered some of our operations, our visa negotiations, our treaty negotiations that we had going on with the Chinese. I think they could have moved forward much more rapidly had we had some prompt replies. I think that the lack of prompt reply is a direct reflection on who is operating at whatever level in the Visa Office, the people who were in one particular office. When I was in Guangzhou, the Visa Office had established one particular back-up person in Washington, one position to back up the visa negotiations from the Washington side. My predecessor in Beijing had the advantage of that.

When I got there, the visa office, for some unknown reason, abolished the position and gave that responsibility to someone else who already had a full plate. Therefore, I would send in visa negotiation updates asking for guidance, and then I would have to fight to get a reply. Sometimes it would take up to six months! Well, the Chinese, I believe, totally misunderstood this and thought that this reflected a lack of interest on the American side, which simply wasn't the case.

If they're not going to give you authority to conduct the negotiations without the guidance, then they damn well ought to take the responsibility of giving you the guidance! You can't have it both ways. I found that extremely frustrating.

Robert Knopes was born in Janesville, Wisconsin, raised on the family farm, and served in the U.S. Navy during the Korean War. He received his BA and MA from the University of Wisconsin before entering the Foreign Service in 1961. He served with USIA in Thailand, Taiwan, Hong Kong, and Italy. He was Chief of the East Asia/Pacific Division of Voice of America. Mr. Knopes was interviewed by David Reuther in 2014.

KNOPES: Yeah. I got about six months of refresher Chinese, a lot of reading, mostly Renmin Ribao. I tested out again at S3-R3. Karen and I left for Beijing in July or August of '82.

Q: And up to this time China had been -- the Reagan administration had finally come to some decision on how it wanted to handle China versus Taiwan. And in fact, Hague is asked to leave in July of '82 because of this maneuvering. And Shultz comes in. So you're assigned to Beijing --

KNOPES: Mm-hmm.

Q: And your job is PAO?

KNOPES: No, not at that time. Once again I went out as the field program officer. I seemed to start out with that title in all my assignments, but never worked in that job.

Q: No.

KNOPES: There was no deputy PAO in Beijing at that time. Given the shortage of housing and office space, creating a new position was not possible. The area director said that when the situation changed, I would be named Deputy PAO. In the meantime I should look around and do whatever was being left undone. One of those tasks would be to systematize the distribution list for Jiao Liu, the Chinese language magazine. Another job would be to set up a Distribution Record System (DRS), a centralized list of all the embassy's contacts. DRS was being set up worldwide, not just in China. It was a pretty good idea. Previously, when an officer left post, he carried away his contact lists in his head. His replacement had to start over again. A centralized system would give the new officer a head start. I would also oversee the branch post in Shanghai, open a second in Guangzhou, and plan for a third in Shenyang.

Q: You arrive in '82.

KNOPES: I arrived the summer of '82, that's right. In October of '82, I went on a trip through the northeast, to Harbin and Dalian, Jilin, and Shenyang. In Shenyang I looked over the site for our consulate. In the other cities I visited universities and officials to determine what activities USIS, or P&C (Press & Cultural) as we were called in the PRC, could best introduce. I checked on reception of Jiao Liu, added names for the DRS list, and generally surveyed the northeast for program opportunities. I learned a lot about China in that one trip. In Harbin I made my first contact with the foreigner handlers, who were the guys that --

Q: Oh, diplomatic security?

KNOPES: Yeah.

Q: PSB?

KNOPES: The security, PSB. They were called the waiban, the foreign office. I told them who I wanted to see in the government but they weren't very interested in helping. They didn't know much about me or the American embassy. For some reason, in our conversation I mentioned that I was from Wisconsin. Suddenly, they became very cooperative because the governor had just returned from Wisconsin. He had set up a sister state relationship with Wisconsin.

Q: Oh!

KNOPES: Riding in from the airport, I looked around and thought, "this looks like Wisconsin." It was flat, with big fields and heavy equipment to work them. Not at all like the south, where tiny plots were worked by hand. I didn't meet the governor, but the lieutenant governor had a dinner for me. I told him what I could about Wisconsin and I learned a lot about northeast China.

Q: Love it. Was that off of an IV, or how did he get to Wisconsin?

KNOPES: That's a good question. I don't think it was an IV. It was too early in the relationship. I think it was arranged between Wisconsin and Heilongjiang.

Q: Yeah.

KNOPES: I don't think P&C was geared up for IVs yet. There were more and more sister city connections being made, and I think other provincial governors were visiting the States to promote trade. These were arranged independently, often by Americans, who also wanted trade and cultural exchanges. I met officials in other provincial capitals on that trip but those meetings weren't very useful. The biggest change I saw was the opening up of universities. They were coming out of hibernation after the Cultural Revolution, expanding, looking for ideas and programs. Almost all had foreign experts recruited from the US teaching English. A lot of books, even foreign books, had survived the Cultural Revolution. University libraries could now order books and magazines from overseas. Several libraries I visited had already built a broad collections of publications. Space was the major problem for most libraries. Several university librarians told me that stacks of boxes I asked about were ancient books and manuscripts. There was no room to unpack and display, let alone use them. Another frequently cited problem was building a centralized collection. Every department wanted its own library. When it got hold of a book, it wouldn't share it with anyone else. The student population was growing. Incoming classes were chosen on merit, not political steadfastness. The bad news was student housing. It was just terrible -- crowded, dusty, and cold in winter. The housing of foreign experts. was pretty grim, too. But they were enthusiastic. They accepted their substandard accommodations. Their biggest complaint was the restrictions placed on them. The waiban, university security people, wouldn't let them talk to their students after class, or even mix with the faculty outside of classrooms. They were kept separate, almost in isolation. Many were leaving because of that.

Q: And what was the source of them? I mean were these just people volunteering, coming out or --

KNOPES: Yeah, they'd volunteer. I think the Chinese embassy and consulates put ads in papers and flyers in universities. Most of the foreign experts taught English. There were none in political science or government. Probably not much on the history side either. It depended on the university. I talked to one American specialist who said, "I give talks on American institutions once a week. I started out with 10 people and now hundreds are coming." That was the exception, however. On that trip also I visited a music school, a movie studio and the home of Zhang Zuolin, the subject of my Master's thesis.

Other than foreign experts, I didn't see another foreigner on my trip. Not even in my hotels. For breakfast in Jilin, I headed for a large dining room filled with uniformed Chinese, government officials, I think. A waiter stopped me at the door. "Bu xing," he said. Not allowed. I protested a bit but finally turned and went to the foreigners' dining room, where I was served runny eggs, burnt toast, and weak coffee by a young waitress. I was the only customer there.

Q: Did you get a chance to hit the other consulates, Shanghai, Guangzhou?

KNOPES: Yeah, I did. In Shanghai Don Anderson was the CG and Dave Hess was the BPAO. I visited Shanghai quite a few times. Dave was a great contact person, but he was a little loose on administrative and reporting duties. He didn't like to put anything on paper. In early 1983 we added a branch PAO in Guangzhou. I went down to see if he was getting settled. The 3 of them, Carl Chan, the BPAO, his wife and baby were doing all right. They had two bedrooms in the Dong Fang Hotel above the consulate and were heating the baby's bottle on a hot plate in the bathtub. I said, "We can make things a bit more comfortable for you. Let me know what you need." He never did, though.

Q: (laughs)

KNOPES: He was good officer, very conscientious. I don't know where he is now. But you know, all the JOTs I worked with are now retiring (laughs). I am beginning to feel old.

Q: Yes.

KNOPES: It's kind of distressing.

Q: One of the officers I mentored became an ambassador (laughs).

KNOPES: Right.

Q: Conditions in Beijing were pretty basic at this time, certainly on the living side of things, a lot of people went off -- and the desk back in Washington was wanting to be helpful, but the help was basically to block all the other agencies from sending out thousands of people, because everybody wanted to go to Beijing.

KNOPES: It's all they could do, that's right. Our progression through the housing in Beijing was interesting. We started the Fuxing Hotel. Did you ever see the Fuxing?

Q: Mm-mm.

KNOPES: Way out in the west, past the Diaoyutai guest house.

Q: Mm!

KNOPES: It was a new hotel, but you wouldn't know it. The plumbing didn't work and the cockroaches were already in residence. It was a terrible hotel. We were there only about 10 days when a room opened up at the Beijing Hotel. So we moved up, uptown and upscale. We were in the Beijing Hotel less than a month when we moved to the Jianguo Hotel, a new hotel over by the embassy. It was a California-style motel built on Chang An Lu, not far from the Friendship store. We had a two-level apartment, with the bedroom upstairs, a little kitchen and a sitting room downstairs

Q: I think that's the Toronto.

KNOPES: No. It wasn't, it wasn't Toronto. This was the Jianguo. The staff was well-trained and provided good service. It had a good restaurant, several good restaurants. We moved there in November and stayed until I took over as PAO in February, 1983. I wasn't expecting to become PAO in Beijing. The plan was for me to be DPAO in the fall when a new PAO was to arrive. But the incumbent PAO had not been effective. He was thinking of retiring, planning to be a writer. But he knew China. When needed, he could sit down and write a persuasive memo for the ambassador in a half-hour. But he was not running the office. Complaints about his lack of attention had reached Washington.

The area director came to visit in February. After a private meeting, the PAO called the staff meeting to announce that he had decided to retire. He would be leaving in two weeks. The area director said that I would be acting PAO for the rest of the year. So we moved from the very comfortable Jianguo Hotel to the PAO's apartment, a very big, very nice apartment. It had three bedrooms, a spacious living room, and a big kitchen. But it didn't have daily maid service like the Jianguo, something Karen had appreciated. I took over as PAO but my job did not change much. What I was doing had to be done anyway. The American staff was excellent. Most had been there for a year already and they were doing a fine job. I continued working on the distribution list, supervising the branch posts, and developing contacts. To get a DRS going I met with embassy officers to explain the system and get their input. I began to work on a budget for P&C. The post had grown rapidly, funding was available to expand programs, and things were going well. But we didn't have a clear idea of where the money was going, accountability was a problem. I worked with the administrative assistant and, with help from the admin section of the embassy, produced a reasonable plan for the coming year.

Soon after I took over, Chinese authorities short-circuited one of our projects. A major exhibit of portraits from the National Portrait Gallery was packed and ready to leave Washington for Beijing. Leon Slawecki, the CAO, had worked with various ministries on this show for almost two years. Everything was settled, all clearances were in hand. Then came a call from, I think the Ministry of Education, saying, "We've looked over the list of paintings in the exhibit and we object to two of them. These must be removed." One was of Douglas MacArthur. There might have some rationale for that one. The other was Golda Meir, who was in the exhibit because she had been born in Milwaukee. Someone apparently wanted her out because of Israel's attitude toward the PRC. We pointed out that all portraits in the exhibit had been approved, that the exhibit was packed and ready to ship, and that it could not be changed at this late date. The matter was non-negotiable, came the reply.

I explained the situation to Ambassador Hummel, who agreed that we could not consider changing the exhibit. If the Chinese insisted, we must cancel.

We informed State, USIA and the Portrait Gallery by cable. My first action as PAO was to cancel the biggest event planned since the embassy opened.

Q: Where was the exhibit going to be?

KNOPES: I don't remember. It was a major venue, in Beijing. There weren't many attractive, even suitable, exhibit halls in Beijing at the time. I don't recall where it was going to be. Leon Slawewski, the CAO, had made most of the arrangements. The interesting thing is that five or six years later, when I was PAO in Hong Kong, we brought that same exhibit to Hong Kong, with resounding success. I hoped the Chinese authorities in Beijing read all the glowing reviews about it. In the long run, I did get to hang that exhibit, but not where it was originally intended.

Q: Actually, you're making an interesting point here. This is really, this is just three years after normalization. So --

KNOPES: Mm-hmm, right.

Q: -- the Chinese bureaucracy is feeling it's way probably.

KNOPES: Sure, yeah.

Q: Within its own structure. We're feeling our way. And these kinds of things come up in this kind of --

KNOPES: Yeah.

Q: -- early stages.

KNOPES: Yeah, somebody higher up must have taken a look at the list of paintings and exercised his power. Since it was non-negotiable, he must have been very high up.

Q: Now, you were saying that the post creates an annual program, this is what we'd like to do, kind of speakers. How was that process doing in Beijing?

KNOPES: Well, I can't say that I wrote one in Beijing. Country Plans were written in the fall, as I recall. So my predecessor would have written the one for 1983. I assume I wrote one 1984. I also assume that expanding and targeting distribution of Jiaoliu magazine was a major goal. Another would have been getting a DRS up to speed. Just getting the post organized was an important function, if not a goal. From 1979, when John Thomson went out as the first PAO, the post had expanded from 1 to 8 officers in Beijing and opened two branch posts. It had just grown, with everyone scrambling to get programs started, to build up useful contacts, and learn how to get things done in China. We were building up a list of official contacts, but it was hard to get beyond the official side. Chinese were reluctant to talk to you in private. Talking to a foreigner could get them into trouble..

Here's an incident about guanxi (relationships) and contacts in China. One day I got a call from someone who introduced himself as Mr. Jin and asked if I had studied Chinese in Washington.

I said, "Yes, I did. Mr. Jin was my teacher."

He said, "This is his uncle. I have something I would like to discuss with you?"

And I said, "Fine, where can we meet?"

We arranged to meet on a street near the International Club, not far from the embassy. Mr. Jin was a scientist, maybe a teacher, at the Beijing Union Medical College. He, his wife, their daughter and son-in-law lived in a house on the campus. The son-in-law had been accepted by a college in Texas, but had been refused a visa. Mr. Jin asked if I could do anything to help.

I said I would ask the consulate about the case but could not intervene on his behalf.

P&C was in the same building as the consulate. I explained the situation to the consul general and asked if someone would take a second look. The consulate was inundated with applications from Chinese students who had been admitted to small colleges in the US. The suspicion was that few would return. Mr. Jin's son-in-law was leaving his wife in China, evidence of his good intentions. A consulate officer took a second look and issued a visa. As a result, the Jin family invited Karen and me to dinner at their home. This was one of two invitations to private homes we were offered in Beijing. The other was an official of the Bank of China I had met in Hong Kong. The Jins lived in a western-style, two story house on the PUMC (Peking Union Medical College) campus. They had lived there in comfort for 20 years, with plenty of space, until the Cultural Revolution. Now they had only the upstairs, two unrelated families shared the ground floor. Mother and daughter cooked a delicious dinner on two burners in a curtained off kitchen area. After dinner conversation turned to the Cultural Revolution. The daughter, in middle school at the time, said she had been completely swept up by it. One day after a meeting she came home, broke all her father's classical records and burned some of his books. Her father said, "Yes, that's true. But we have put it behind us." This was the first time anyone in China even mentioned the Cultural Revolution. We didn't see the Jins again. We would have liked to repay their hospitality but didn't want to jeopardize them by trying to maintain contact.

Q: Now, would this be an environment in which you would propose bringing in the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra or the Detroit Ballet or those kinds of things, or we weren't there yet?

KNOPES: We didn't bring in any major shows. The Portrait Gallery exhibit was to be the first. We saw the Royal Ballet in Beijing. They came, they had the --

Q: The Brits.

KNOPES: Yeah, the Brits. It was the Royal Ballet, the real thing. The venue was old, the seats were squeaky, and the floor was warped. It must have difficult dancing on that stage. How they handled it, I don't know. Arthur Miller came out to direct "The Death of a Salesman" in Chinese, but that wasn't under our auspices.

Q: Hm!

KNOPES: It was a solid hit, with excellent Chinese actors. Even if you didn't know Chinese, they carried the message and drama of the play. I took Arthur Miller and the cast to lunch to show them the embassy was interested and supportive of what they were doing, but we were not involved. Did you see "The Last Emperor?"

Q: Yes.

KNOPES: The jailer in the opening scenes was Willy Loman in "Death of a Salesman." A fine actor. I think he was later Minister of Culture.

Q: Oh!

KNOPES: It opened up in the fall of 1983.

Q: Because what's his name brought "Caine Mutiny."

KNOPES: Oh, Herman Wouk?

Q: No, the actor. Charlton Heston.

KNOPES: Oh, did he really?

Q: Brought "Caine Mutiny" out and had it produced in Beijing.

KNOPES: Well, there was a lot going on. I know Pat Corcoran talked about escorting Gregory Peck in China. I think the first P&C project in China was an exchange of films. One was "Coal Miner's Daughter," another was "Breaking Away." There were five or six of them, shown in several cities in China. Yehudi Menuhin gave a master class and performed at the Beijing Conservatory. A lot of people wanted to visit China once it opened up. If you had a skill or reputation they were happy to have you. China got international exposure out of those visits, too.

Q: Were there any _____?

KNOPES: Not when I was there, no. The only real bump was cancellation of the exhibit. That happened early on. Art Hummel was the ambassador and Chas Freeman was the DCM (deputy chief of mission). That's a great team. And easy to work with. You asked about P&C relationship with the embassy. It was easy to get to know everyone because we were so cramped for space. P&C shared a building with Administration, the Consular section, the nurse's office and the commissary. This was Erh Ban (Second Building.) The chancery and all other offices were a quarter mile away in what was called Yi Ban (First building). On a visit to Yi Ban I would meet most of the political and economic officers. Everyone was squeezed into a tiny, tiny space. The office of P&C's information officer's was a converted bathroom. You could still see where the stool and the bath tub had been. The PAO's office was little bigger than a walk-in closet.

Q: Because Jerry Ogden was there about that time. No, he was down --

KNOPES: He was in Guangzhou. I think Dick Williams was there when I arrived in China. Jerry came later. You asked about my departure from Beijing. The designated PAO, Lynn Noah, was due to arrive in December of 1983. I would be his deputy. Though I didn't know him well he had been one of my predecessors as BPAO in Songkhla. He had taken Chinese language training a couple of years before me, and he had been CAO in Taipei. When we moved to Taipei from Taichung we took his house. I was looking forward to working with Lynn, but in September I got a midnight phone call from our desk officer in Washington. "Harry Britton is retiring and will leave Taipei in December. Would you be willing to go there as head of the Cultural and Information Section (CIS) of AIT (American Institute in Taiwan)?"

I was dumbstruck and could only say, "I'll have to think about it." Beijing was beginning to open up. It was an exciting place to work. But Karen didn't like it much. Dependents were restricted in what they could do. She had taught English in every previous post, but there was no place where she could teach in Beijing. To keep busy she worked as receptionist at the embassy. We both liked Taipei. I would like to have worked with Lynn Noah but I would have my own post in Taipei. I said yes, I would make the move. Lynn arrived in October. I left for Taipei in mid-December of 1983.

Q: Here we are, it is the 17th of July, 2014. We're returning to our conversation with Robert Knopes. As we finished up, you were coming to an assignment at AIT in Taiwan from the mainland. You were replacing Harry Britton I think.

KNOPES: Yeah, right.

Q: First, can we set the stage by saying how was the AIT-USIS set up, organized, and how might it have been different from Beijing?

KNOPES: Beijing was a growing operation, whereas USIS Taipei, now called the Cultural and Information Section of AIT (CIS), was a well-established program. Our offices and library were in the same building I had worked in as ACAO in the late-1960s. We would be doing fundamentally the same USIS programs. Beijing was just getting a Fulbright Program established, there was no library and the prospect of getting one set up in the near term were not good. In Taipei both were firmly established. There were multiple newspapers in Taiwan and we had close contact with all of them. In Beijing our contacts were mostly with Xinhua, the New China News Agency, though we did know a few people at Renmin Ribao (The People's Daily.) It was a developing situation in Beijing but an established set of programs that I was returning to in Taipei. CIS would be a smaller operation than the USIS one I had worked at 15 years before. There were no more publications. Student Review, World Today, translated books, donated books were no longer produced. The important aspect for me was that CIS was part of AIT. I would not have my own budget or the independence of programming I had in Beijing. If I wanted to initiate a new program I had to get the approval of the AIT director and negotiate funding with the admin officer.

My predecessor, Harry Britton, had been deputy PAO in USIS Taipei in the early 1970s. When he returned as chief of the CIS office he expected to continue as before, resulting in a series of conflicts between him and the admin office. These battles may have been a factor in his decision to retire early. Harry's discontent made it easier for me to establish myself as a team player at AIT. I knew what I was going into. I planned to be diplomatic, to work with admin and the director.

Of course, we still had backup from USIA. There could be little programming without USIA support. Exchange programs, books for our library, speakers, everything came through USIA. At that time, AIT was well funded. I had no trouble getting money for conferences and other local programming. Everything CIS did was in the interest of AIT and of the United States. We gave a great deal of support to the US Trade Center -- doing their press releases and helping set up local programs.

Q: Following up on the organizational side of things, how many officers did you have and what were their specific assignments?

KNOPES: I had three - information officer, Dave Hess, and cultural affairs officer, Charles Silver, and a BPAO in Kaohsiung. The branch post in Taichung had been closed some years before.

Q: Was Joe Moyle there when you arrived, or he came later?

KNOPES: Joe Moyle was still there, in the political section. Harry Britton had pulled Joe over to CIS as information officer for a while. John Lundin was information officer when I arrived, but on his way to another assignment. Shortly after I arrived, Dave Hess finished a year of Chinese and took over as IO.

Q: But Silver was in --

KNOPES: Silver was already established as CAO. He had just finished language school. I don't even know who Silver replaced. Were you there at the time?

Q: Yeah.

KNOPES: Who was before Silver?

Q: I'm not sure.

KNOPES: Silver must have been on the job because I didn't meet any other cultural affairs officer.

Q: One of the things you'd mentioned was you'd been assigned to Taipei before. Let me ask, what comparisons would you have from that first -- the atmosphere of the first assignment you had to the atmosphere in Taipei right after you arrived there?

KNOPES: Yeah, this was -- so I got there in '80 --

Q: Three.

KNOPES: '83, yeah. It was much more open. I think martial law was -- had been --

Q: No, that'd come later.

KNOPES: That was a little bit later. People had always been willing to talk with us. That was not a problem. Martial law was still in effect but now considerably relaxed. People, especially students, were less concerned about being watched. Chiang Ching-kuo was president, and I think he had decided that greater liberalization was the way to go. The clearest sign of the loosening was the formation of the Democratic Progressive Party. A few years later a DPP candidate won election as president. That didn't turn out well but it was the start of a two-party system. I had lunch with some of the founders of the DPP (Democratic Progressive party). They had big plans. The government was not harassing them. They spoke openly about politics, which was not the case when I had been there in the late '60s. That was the biggest change. It was an opening that was allowed, and even encouraged. I renewed contacts and acquaintances from my first tour. As non-official representatives of America we could not visit government offices. The officials I contacted were not standoffish. They were always happy to -- well, I shouldn't say happy -- they were always willing to get together. I had lunches with John Chang, the head of North American Affairs in the Foreign Ministry and with Ma Ying-jeou who is now president of the ROC. During my first tour, the Taiwan Independence Movement was a bogey-man for the KMT, but even then I didn't see a groundswell of Taiwanese backing for that position. What they wanted was greater participation in government. The DPP provided that.

Q: Right. And as you said, you know, you're, you're there shortly after 1979 when we switched diplomatic --

KNOPES: Yeah, yeah.

Q: And in fact, wasn't Fred Chien the ambassador in Washington at that time?

KNOPES: At that time.

Q: He was quite miffed at the whole --

KNOPES: Oh, absolutely, I'm sure he was. But things were finding their level at that point. Government officials were figuring that they were going to have to deal with us. It was the Taiwan Relations Act, an act of Congress, that established AIT and stabilized the relationship. Taiwan officials were coming to terms with their new position in the world.

Q: Now, in this new environment, did that impact on who you selected as speakers to come in the programs or whatnot?

KNOPES: Not much. We could offer more speakers on American politics and governance, that sort of thing, than before. Universities were open to a wider range of speakers.

Q: Now, the Fulbright Program is run by a board that has local embassy, AIT in this case, people. Did that transition well?

KNOPES: There were no major changes. The Fulbright Program always worked well. It was a prestigious program. It always attracted good people. The change was the expansion of universities in Taiwan. On my first tour we dealt primarily with National Taiwan University and Taiwan Normal University. Now there was a large technical university south of Taipei and a growing university in Kaohsiung. Professors who went to any of these universities were well received and well utilized. The Fulbright program was supervised by a bi-national board of directors, of which I was the chairman. One of the members was the president of National Taiwan University. I don't remember any of the others. The program was administered by an office that had its quarters in part of the CIS building. The CAO worked closely with them in selecting, assigning, and looking after Fulbright scholars in Taiwan.

Q: One of things you said was they seem better funded. I would think that that was also a part of the comparison between the first time you were there and this assignment in the early 1980s. The economy in Taiwan had improved.

KNOPES: Oh, tremendously. In the '60s Taiwan was a successful agricultural economy, just beginning its transition to a manufacturing society. In the 1980s Taiwan was moving into technology. In the 1960s, ox carts were a common means of transport, even in Taipei. In the fall, harvested rice was spread out and dried in the street near our house in Taichung. In 1984, I returned to rural villages I had known in the 1960s. Then the villagers had large families, worked the fields with an ox, and had little contact with urban areas. In 1984, the older generation was still there, but the young people had gone to the cities. Rice paddies were still thriving, but were planted and harvested with machines. The kids came back in the spring and fall to plant and harvest the crop.

Q: Now, you're saying in Beijing there were no papers other than the party Renmin Ribao.

KNOPES: Right.

Q: The paper situation in Taipei was --

KNOPES: Oh, it was wild compared to Beijing.

Q: -- much different --

KNOPES: Yeah.

Q: -- yet party influenced. I mean --

KNOPES: Well, sure.

Q: Some were actually KMT spinoffs.

KNOPES: The Central Daily News was KMT-oriented and subsidized. It had a large circulation. The publisher of the United Daily News, a more independent paper, was Wang Tiwu, a good friend of USIS. I don't remember the others. We had easy access to all of them, and to the TV station. IO Dave Hess was great with people. He knew reporters on every paper and had easy access to all the media.

Q: There was a thriving periodical market as I recall.

KNOPES: Yeah.

Q: In Taipei at that time. And that was the one where the Taiwanese --

KNOPES: Yeah, right.

Q: -- were getting in censored form time to time.

KNOPES: Yeah, they would. We knew some of the editors of those periodicals -- Anthony Chang was one of them. He was advisor to the DPP and his magazine was a factor in its growth. He was a responsible journalist. I don't think he had any problem. Other magazines would push the limits on political commentary, be closed down, then appear the next month with a new name. It would be the same people. They could continue until they stepped over the line again. The government could close them permanently if it really wanted to. They didn't do that. Closing a magazine delivered a message: Don't go too far.

KNOPES: Yeah.

Q: Returned to the Philippines in a flight from Taipei.

KNOPES: Mm, mm-hmm.

Q: And then was murdered at the airport.

KNOPES: At the -- yeah.

Q: Did your contacts vibrate from that? Were they concerned about that? Did they talk about that?

KNOPES: I don't recall. I recall the incident, but I don't remember talking to anybody specifically about it. On the political side it might have been more significant.

Q: At the same time, Henry Liu was murdered in San Francisco in October of '84. And there was newspaper coverage in Taiwan.

KNOPES: A lot, yeah. Newspaper coverage over the long term indicated that the ROC government was in some way involved. It made an impact. It was well covered by the Taiwan newspapers, with a lot of conjecture -- how and why did this happen? Why this major move to silence somebody who was not well known? It was an indication that censorship of news was no longer a concern for the press.

Q: I don't want to ask day in the life of, but you're -- you and your officers obviously had an opportunity in this environment to really get out and know the publishers and academics and whatnot.

KNOPES: Mm-hmm.

Q: Did you kind of divide up your contacts? Do you do all the university professors? Somebody does -- or --

KNOPES: Dave Hess was the information officer. He was a great with people. He held open house for journalists almost every night. Journalists would just drop by for a drink, ready to talk. His friendliness inspired openness in others. He picked up a lot of information. He had done the same thing in Shanghai, developed all kinds of contacts in a place where that was not easy. Dave's problem was that he usually didn't tell anyone in the consulate, the embassy, or now in AIT, what he was getting. One of my tasks in Taipei was to get Dave to funnel information back to me and others in AIT. I left daily press contacts up to him while I did more formal representation with senior editors and owners of major papers. I was not an information officer. I tended to work more with the cultural and educational side. I was chairman of the board of directors of the Taipei Language Institute. The Institute had begun to teach English to people AIT was sending to the United States in the 1950s and early '60s. It was still the best English teaching program in Taiwan. It wasn't a busyiban, a for-profit, learn-English-quick operation that was common in Taipei. The teachers were all native speakers, mostly Americans who liked living in Taipei. They made their living by teaching at the Taipei Language Institute. My wife taught there. In other programming, CIS, actually CAO Charles Silver, set up a couple of major conferences, just as I had done in Rome. Rather than bring out individual speakers, we requested a panel of speakers and worked with National Taiwan University, the Bank of Taiwan and the Ministry of Finance on a major economic conference. Harry Thayer, the Director of AIT, attended the opening ceremony and some of the sessions. The two-day conference was well-received and well-reported. We tried to do things that would have a greater impact than individual speakers. It was the academic side that I was interested in.

Q: One of the things that was interesting in that environment was the local authorities were interested in demonstrating to their public that they had a close connection with the Americans.

KNOPES: Mm-hmm.

Q: And so I would presume that as a counselor level person in AIT you had, you know, lots of invitations and meetings at a high level.

KNOPES: Yeah, I'm sure I did. We didn't deal with Ministry of Foreign Affairs a lot, but did have contacts with them. Karen and I were out often in the evening for dinners and other functions. I'm sure a lot of them were with senior officials. I don't recall anybody in particular. I set up a meeting for Harry Thayer with the Minister of Education through my contacts and one of the supreme court judges was a friend from my previous tour.

Q: Well, I'm thinking too that at that time Harry was there, the director, was making the point from time to time about being concerned at us being at an event where you'd have an American flag and an ROC flag.

KNOPES: Right.

Q: And there had been instances where the local authorities had tried to put a much more formal spin on the relationship.

KNOPES: Right.

Q: And that tension was in those first early days as, as we tried to not -- we tried to maintain our unofficiality.

KNOPES: Right, and they tried to get it back.

Q: They tried to maintain their officiality.

KNOPES: I recall the issue but I think it pertained more at the director's level. We didn't display flags at any of our functions. I don't recall anybody making an issue of it. In the major conferences that I just mentioned, we had control. With individual speakers it was not a factor. I think that was more at the director's level.

Q: Now, you're in Taipei from '83 to '86.

KNOPES: Yeah, right, well, December '83 to about July of '86.

Q: And your next assignment is USIS Hong Kong.

KNOPES: Yeah.

Q: How did that assignment come to you?

KNOPES: That was part of the deal when they called me in Beijing and said, "Would you like to go to Taipei?" The Taipei tour would be only until the summer of 1986, two and a half years. It couldn't be extended because Harry Britton's successor was already named, Mike Yaki, who was PAO in Hong Kong at the time.

I was concerned that, after those two and a half years, I would be thrown into a bidding process that might send me some place I didn't want to be. I wanted an assignment after Taipei.

They said, "We don't have a replacement for Yaki in Hong Kong yet. How would you like Hong Kong?"

That sounded great to me. Beijing to Taipei to Hong Kong, a pretty good circuit as far as I was concerned. I had served in Hong Kong before, it would be an interesting post. That's how my Hong Kong assignment came about. It was negotiated before I left Beijing.

Q: Now, you've come out of Beijing, you've gone through Taipei, you're going into Hong Kong. How would you compare the public affairs, USIA environment of those three posts?

KNOPES: Well, returning to Hong Kong it was going back to a USIS post. I was back in the fold, with my own budget. Many of the staff I had worked with before were still there. USIS offices were in the consulate. Our library was over near Wan Chai. There were four Americans - PAO, IO, CAO, and a publications officer who produced Jiaoliu magazine for Beijing. Part of the USIS Hong Kong operation was support for the Press and Cultural Office in Beijing. World Today had died, but had been resurrected as Jiaoliu magazine about 1980. Including the Jiaoliu editorial staff, we had 30 to 35 FSNs in the Hong Kong operation. When I arrived in Hong Kong, both the CAO and IO were ready to leave. All the American staff but the publications officer would be new. Dan Sreebny arrived from language school to take over the IO position but the designated CAO had to curtail his assignment because of illness in his family. Let's take a step back. As I mentioned, CIS/AIT had a branch post in Kaohsiung when I arrived in Taipei. After AIT opened a quasi-consulate in Kaohsiung, our BPAO was not fully occupied. With the agreement of USIA in Washington and the AIT director, I closed the Kaohsiung post. Anything we wanted to do in Kaohsiung we could handle from Taipei. When the officer slated for the Kaohsiung post finished Chinese language training it was natural for her to be assigned as CAO Hong Kong, to fill the gap caused by the curtailment of the designated CAO.

Q: And of course the education and public affairs environment in Hong Kong was so much more sophisticated than Beijing.

KNOPES: Oh yeah.

Q: So your part of Hong Kong was, more focused on supporting Beijing embassy than some of the earlier programs that had been Hong Kong alone?

KNOPES: The USIS operation went on much the same as it always had. Support for Beijing was production of Jiaoliu magazine and shipping supplies up through our warehouse unit. What we were doing for Beijing didn't detract from what we were doing in Hong Kong. We still ran a Fulbright Program, maintained contacts with the media - HKTV and RTHK, and all the newspapers. We had regular contacts with the two major PRC-leaning newspapers, Wen Wei Pao and Ta Kung Pao. Ta Kung Pao was the largest and most influential. When the owner died the funeral was a major event. Don Anderson, the consul general, and I attended to pay our respects and show a continuing relationship with the paper. Of course, we had regular contact with the two English newspapers, The Hong Kong Standard and the South China Morning Post. There was a Xinhua (New China News Agency) office in Hong Kong, but we were never able to establish a close relationship with them. The Asian Wall Street Journal was there, too. I took senior editors from the English papers on a cruise on the aircraft carrier Enterprise to show how the Seventh Fleet operated. We met the ship in Subic Bay and sailed back to Hong Kong - two nights and one day. The journalists wrote feature articles about the 7th Fleet and the skill of the American navy. We did the same for Chinese newspapers too, flying them by helicopter out to the battleship New Jersey as it came into port. That sort of event always resulted in positive stories. Either Dan Sreebny or I accompanied them. It was one of the perks of the job.

Q: (laughs)

KNOPES: One of our goals was to show that the United States was still maintaining a military presence in the Pacific, that we were there to stay. These trips were one way to do that.

Q: Now, as you said, the Sino British negotiations were going on about reversion.

KNOPES: Mm-hmm, mm-hmm.

Q: Hong Kong reverting back to Beijing. How closely did you follow it, or --

KNOPES: Not very much. I'm sure the consulate was following it, but I didn't. Hong Kong was a British colony. The matter was for Great Britain and China to resolve. It did not impact our programming at all.

Q: Now, Hong Kong's a pretty open environment. I would suspect that a lot of foreign journalists come through and the consulate and your operation would talk to them.

KNOPES: Oh yeah, a lot, a lot --

Q: Help them out.

KNOPES: Mm-hmm. One of the great places in Hong Kong was the Foreign Correspondents' Club. I was a member and so was every journalist in Hong Kong. You met everyone there, including editors and journalists who were passing through.

When we talked about Beijing I mentioned that one of the first problems I had when I became PAO was the cancellation of an art exhibit from the National Portrait Gallery. I talked about that before. One of the first things I did in Hong Kong as PAO was bring that exhibit to Hong Kong.

Q: (laughs)

KNOPES: We held the exhibit in the art gallery at the city hall, which is more than a city hall. It's the public library, office building, and a very good gallery for visiting exhibits. The director of the Portrait Gallery came out for the opening. He and Don Anderson, the consul general, did the opening ceremony. Turnout of Hong Kong officials, artists, and media was wonderful. The exhibit got excellent media coverage. I'm sure news of the exhibit's success reached Beijing, letting them know they had missed out on a good thing.

Q: Now, was this the time when Patten was the governor, or?

KNOPES: No, Patten didn't come until 1992. The governor when I was there was David Wilson. I met him only once, when I took Charles Wick, director of USIA, on a courtesy call. I knew most of the heads of Hong Kong departments. I had lunch regularly with the chief of the information office, exchanging information on plans and upcoming activities. Day to day operation of information activities I left in the hands of the very capable IO, Dan Sreebny. We had no problem with the press when Dan was taking care of things. The cultural office was another matter. As I noted before, the officer slated to be BPAO in Kaohsiung became the replacement for the officer who could not come. She was a very nice person, well-meaning, but very deliberate in getting things done. Not the ideal CAO in an active post like Hong Kong. I spent more time on the cultural operation and supervising the cultural activities than I might have under other circumstances. During our time in Kong Hong budgets of American government operations were being cut, across the board. USIA was forced to cut a number of branch posts around the world, generally reducing the number of people overseas. In my second year I got a call from the area director. He said. "We're going to have to eliminate the cultural officer position in Hong Kong." He was surprised when I didn't put up a strong argument for the position. But I knew it wouldn't be a great loss. I was already spending a lot of time on cultural activities. I acquiesced and took over the cultural operation. It was not a big problem. The FSNs were excellent, well-connected with cultural contacts. They handled day-to-day activities as well as anybody could. We worked it out.

Q: And at this point, let me ask. What would be cultural? What would the cultural officer or the cultural program entail?

KNOPES: There was a library, located in an office building not far away. The library staff was professional, very capable. It required little oversight. We worked closely with an active American Studies organization organized and run by a professor at Hong Kong University. They used the library for meetings and programs. The Fulbright Program was important in Hong Kong. I became good friends with the president of the University of Hong Kong and the school accepted its first Fulbrighter while I was there. Up to that time the school was completely Europe-centered. Chinese University, the Technical University and Baptist University all made good use of the Fulbright program. All of those schools, plus RTHK (Radio Television Hong Kong) were across the harbor, in Kowloon. There were two tunnels but they were always jammed. Sometimes it took an hour just to get through the tunnel. It was faster take the ferry or the metro across, then take a taxi to wherever you were going. Often I would do that, then have the driver pick me up for the ride back to the consulate. We also had one or two American speakers a month.

Q: On the other hand, here's Hong Kong, very sophisticated environment. There would be people back in the States saying, "Why do we need a cultural or information program at all?"

KNOPES: No, I don't think that ever came up. USIS Hong Kong had been an integral part of the consulate since the 1950s. USIS programs in Hong Kong provided information and understanding of US policies to a broad range of residents, including those aligned with the PRC. Now USIS Hong Kong was supporting P&C Beijing with a magazine, books and supplies.

Q: We're returning to our conversation. We were talking about Jiaoliu, which is the Chinese language magazine to be distributed on the Mainland. But in fact, was put together in Hong Kong. And back in Washington there's an office that provides materials for it?

KNOPES: No longer an office dedicated to magazines, but there was still a press operation that provided articles and assistance.

Q: Now, the content of Jiaoliu. Think pieces? Long pieces? Fluffy pieces?

KNOPES: It's a long time ago. I didn't work directly on the magazine. I worked with McKinney Russell, the Beijing PAO, on selecting suitable articles. I can't recall anything specific. There were statements by the secretary of state and articles on U.S. Asia policy. There were articles on life in America -- business, agriculture, and science. It was a general magazine.

Q: Of course magazines are put together months in advance, or at least scoped out. I suspect therefore you had a pretty close connection to the PAO in Beijing.

KNOPES: I attended branch PAO conferences in Beijing to hear about their programming and get suggestions on what Hong Kong might do in support, maybe get ideas for Jiaoliu. McKinney Russell came to Hong Kong at least quarterly to meet with me and the publications office on future issues of Jiaoliu. Then it was up to the publications officer to get the articles and lay out future issues.

Q: Now, Hong Kong, as you said, is a fairly large post, which means that there's all kinds of other federal agencies in there, immigration, whatnot. Did you have much interaction --

KNOPES: We did a lot with the Foreign Commercial Service and the agriculture office. I think we put out some press releases regarding the FBI and answered questions on our refugee policy for the press. A new tool we had was EANET, a satellite link with Washington for interviews with well-known academics and senior officials who would not otherwise have been available. This was one of USIA Director Wick's contributions to programming. We used them regularly, often cooperating with the political and economic sections on topics like US foreign policy, trade policies, and US/PRC relations. Many were held in the 4th floor conference room in the consulate.

Q: -- or at least explanation to the Hong Kong press?

KNOPES: I knew everybody in the consulate because the consul general had a regular staff meeting. I don't know if it was every day or a couple times a week. We handled everything for the consulate, all the press releases, press inquiries, and organizing special events, such as a speech by the CG or a visiting American official. We also provided press support for the American Chamber of Commerce, since this fit with our goal of trade promotion.

Q: Even though it's a fairly large consulate, the State Department component is quite modest I would assume.

KNOPES: That's right.

Q: In July of '88, Secretary Shultz goes through Asia and makes a stop in Hong Kong.

KNOPES: Mm-hmm.

Q: Did your officers get sucked up into that?

KNOPES: Oh yeah, everybody was pulled in. He came more than once. Maybe three times when I was there. I remember the planning meetings. Everybody was part of those. We handled all the press arrangements for both the local and accompanying press. One of those trips had covered most Asian countries and the press contingent was huge. We arranged a press briefing by Stapleton Roy -- he must have been the Assistant Secretary of State for Asia. Those visits were big events. But not filled with important activities in Hong Kong I'd have to say. The secretary usually had a tennis game, had some shirts made and called on the governor. It was more of a rest stop, though there was plenty of press interest in the visit.

Q: But it certainly keeps everybody busy.

KNOPES: Yep.

Q: And puts great pressure on the staff.

KNOPES: He came through Beijing when I was there too. That was even more hectic because it was harder to organize. The Chinese didn't have the staff, the facilities, or the experience to deal with the American press.

Q: You said a couple of times -- yeah, I'm noticing, Shultz stopped in Hong Kong in June of '86.

KNOPES: Uh-huh.

Q: You might have just arrived.

KNOPES: No, I don't think -- July? It might have been. I might have got there in July, but not in on the planning. I do remember a dinner at Burt Levin's residence. Burt was CG, preparing to leave for his next assignment as ambassador to Burma.

Q: And then again in March of '87.

KNOPES: Mm-hmm. Yeah, I remember that visit.

Q: So March of '87 --

KNOPES: Oh, I was definitely there --

Q: -- March of '88 --

KNOPES: Oh, March of '88, yeah, those two I remember. Those were the two I was thinking of. Well, as you said -- it did keep the Hong Kong staff busy. As a matter of fact, I think one of the admin officers suggested that perhaps in the future it would save us all trouble if we sent his shirt maker down to Singapore.

Q: Along those lines, I suppose Hong Kong would certainly be a favorite spot for congressional delegations.

KNOPES: Well, I don't recall many during my second tour there. At least, I don't remember escorting any of them around. I took a couple of senators around when I was there as a junior officer. There were a lot of visitors though. This reminds me, regarding your question about our relationship with the PRC. When John Burns, The New York Times correspondent in Beijing, was expelled from China -- in 1988? -- CG Don Anderson and I made it a point to go to the airport to welcome him to Hong Kong. We wanted to make clear to the Chinese that the consulate in Hong Kong and the U.S. government supported The New York Times and a free press.

Q: At that time was that also the height of the Vietnamese refugee thing or that --

KNOPES: Yeah, it was. Let me see. It seems to me there was still a camp for Vietnamese refugees on one of the outlying islands. I believe USIS put out several press releases on US refugee policy, maybe even did an EANET, a video connection with an American expert. There might have been an article in Jiaoliu as well. USIS worked closely with all elements of the consulate in getting out information on their programs. We were well-integrated with everything that went on there.

Q: Returning to government administration issues, you were saying in '88 serious budgetary things came up.

KNOPES: Mm-hmm.

Q: You at least got a call, here's what we're thinking. More than likely, perhaps in this time for other places, Washington just says, "Cut 10%," or some percentage.

KNOPES: I lost the cultural affairs officer. It is likely that our budget was cut a bit, too. But I think our contribution to budget reduction was the CAO position. Personnel costs are the major part of any operation. At that point there wasn't much left to cut except personnel. We couldn't continue to snip away little pieces of programming. Something major had to be cut. I heard that some complained that USIA was taking most of its cuts overseas, saving jobs and activities in Washington. I don't know if that was true or not. All through my career, every few years we had to make a 10% cut here, later 10% there. We had gotten to the point where we had to start making big cuts.

Q: Well, when you started out in USIA there were all kinds of programs, you're talking about the magazines.

KNOPES: Yeah.

Q: And all these things. Now, here we are in the 1980s, they've either been superseded or dropped off or the environment for their need has changed.

KNOPES: Mm-hmm, yeah. Well, that was the --

Q: And so USIA is kind of naturally shrinking.

KNOPES: Shrinking, yeah.

Q: Down to personnel issues.

KNOPES: USIA was beginning to close libraries at USIS posts. Part of it was budget, but a good part was because of access to the internet and growing reference databases. Posts with good international communication connections didn't need a big reference collection anymore. We were moving that way in Hong Kong. Of course, it wouldn't work in Taipei or Beijing because telecommunication connections weren't there yet. In Hong Kong we set up a computer in the library and helped people do research using databases in the United States.

Q: Now, coming up to 1988, 1989, November '88 the Americans have a presidential election.

KNOPES: Yeah.

Q: How did USIS Hong Kong play in that?

KNOPES: Yes, we set up an election headquarters in the ballroom of one of the big hotels in Central, maybe the Hilton, with TVs and tote boards to show the returns. It was well attended by the press. Businessmen and officials dropped in during the day. The 12-hour time difference with Washington made ideal timing for us. Returns were coming in all during the day. Of course, RTHK and radio news reports kept people informed, too. Our center provided more color and detail, and provided extra materials for the press. Dan Sreebny and the information staff did an excellent job on it.

Q: Well, 1988-'89 then would be the transition to a new administration that comes in in January '88. Did you particularly notice any changes in --

KNOPES: No, no. This would be --

Q: -- for your operations?

KNOPES: -- the first George Bush. No, I don't recall any major changes. I suppose we provided a lot of information to the media on the new administration. But no, I don't think it had an impact on our operation.

Q: But when did you leave Hong Kong?

KNOPES: Well, that's a story. I left Hong Kong for Washington in July of '89. I knew I was going back to the Voice of America to head the East Asia Pacific Division. In May I took a trip all through Southeast Asia, visiting countries where VOA did language broadcasts --Thailand, Indonesia, Singapore, and Malaysia. I visited the short-wave relay station in the Philippines. I may have gone to Burma, too. My last visit was be to Beijing, where students had been occupying Tiananmen Square for several weeks already. The situation seemed to be getting touchy. On June 3, as I got ready to leave for the airport, I called Larry Daks, the deputy PAO in Beijing to check on the atmosphere. I said, "Larry, I'm ready to go to the airport. How do things look on Tiananmen square? Should I put off the trip?"

Larry said, "Well, we don't know what's going to happen. We'll find something for you to do. Come on up."

Q: (laughs)

KNOPES: I arrived in Beijing the afternoon of June 3, checked into my hotel. It wasn't the Jianguo Hotel, it was one that was a little farther out on Chang An Lu.

Q: The Sheraton?

KNOPES: No, no, it was smaller, only two or three-stories -- I can't remember the name of it. I stopped by the embassy, then walked over to Tiananmen Square to talk to the students. One of them said, "There's a lot of activity around here. You better be careful. We fear something might happen tonight." I took pictures of the goddess of liberty and the tents, then walked back to my hotel. Near my hotel a line of military trucks loaded with soldiers had been stopped by people coming out of the hutong, the neighborhoods. The soldiers were not armed. The people were orderly. After a lengthy conversation between citizens and the military leader, the trucks turned around and headed out of town. I thought, "That's a very good sign. Maybe this situation will be worked out peacefully Maybe the students will disperse on their own." I had dinner and went to bed about 10:30. About midnight I heard clanking noises, looked out the window and saw tanks going by. Big tanks with big guns, swinging back and forth, at times pointing right at my window. After the tanks came a line of armored personnel carriers, then truckloads of armed soldiers. Looking toward Tiananmen, about a mile away, I could see flames and hear small arms fire. In the morning I went down to Chang An Lu. People had gathered, talking. Around them were remains of buses and feeble barricades that had been crushed by the tanks. It was a grim scene.

Q: Because the buses had been turned over in the intersections.

KNOPES: Yeah, right.

Q: Long before the --

KNOPES: The people in the street were listening to radios, but they heard nothing but martial music. I tried to strike up a conversation, but they were not about to speak to a foreigner, even in Chinese. I walked over to the embassy, which was, as you know, in chaos. They were trying to figure out what was going on, what might happen next. USIS was trying to get in touch with Fulbrighters and other Americans who were there under our auspices. Concerned calls were coming in from Americans in Shanghai, Chengdu and other cities where there had been student demonstrations. For much of the day I answered calls and did my best to reassure the callers. I didn't find out much about Voice of America broadcasts, the primary reason for my visit, except that jamming had been increased. The CNN Beijing operation was our primary source of information until it was closed down the day after the crackdown. From then on VOA and BBC provided whatever they could get out of China. Then the VOA correspondent, too, was expelled. I had a reservation on Cathay Pacific back to Hong Kong on June 6. On the way to the airport we passed several military encampments. The airport was chaos. Foreigners and many Chinese trying to get out. Back in Hong Kong the next day, I watched tens of thousands march in the streets, protesting the killings in Beijing. They still have a commemorative protest march on June 4 every year in Hong Kong.

Q: One of the consequences of Tiananmen Square is, as you were saying, the embassy contacted all American citizens and urged them to leave, and in fact brought in charter planes I think --

KNOPES: I think they might have, mm-hmm.

Q: -- over a thousand people. I'm not quite sure where all those people went. Did any of them, any of the main journalists come down to Hong Kong?

KNOPES: Not that I know of. But I was already on the way out. I left for Washington a few days later. Journalists, if they couldn't stay in Beijing, probably went to Japan, which was closer and not as directly involved as Hong Kong.

Q: Well now we have you at Voice of America. And I don't think we've talked to anybody about what Voice of America is.

KNOPES: Ah.

Q: And I think there's a number of issues. Just how is it organized itself and then what's the relationship between it and guidance from the State Department and such. If you'd like to approach that.

KNOPES: Voice of America started in 1941 or 1942, at the beginning of World War II, to provide news and information to the occupied countries of Europe. I think the expansion to Asia and other countries came later. It was authorized and funded by Congress as an independent news operation. In 1953, when USIA became an independent agency, the Voice of America became a part of this new agency, though it retained a great deal of independence. In 1976, President Ford signed into law the VOA Charter. The Charter has been instrumental in protecting VOA from outside influence and interference on its news gathering and broadcasting, including from the Department of State. There was a fierce independence throughout the organization that I respected, though I had been on the complaining end about some coverage when I was overseas. I went to VOA as chief of the East Asia/Pacific Division, managing the services that broadcast in Burmese, Indonesian, Lao, Vietnamese, Cambodian, Korean, Mandarin Chinese, and Thai. Well, Thai was something separate. The Thai service, only 3 staffers, prepared daily programs that were not broadcast, but sent by satellite to Thai medium-wave stations for airing as they saw fit. I started Tibetan and Cantonese services while I was there. Starting Tibetan brought a lot of criticism from the PRC and a lot of jamming when we began broadcasting. Of course, English programming went on around the clock, reaching all parts of the globe.

Q: Who was the head of, of USIA and VOA at that time that you were there?

KNOPES: Dick Carlson was the director of VOA and I think Bruce Gelb was the head of USIA. They did not get along. Dick Carlson was appointed by George Bush, the first George Bush. He had owned some newspapers in California. Bruce Gelb was also a political appointee, but not as well suited to the job. His background was in the cosmetics industry or something of the sort. They were both fundraisers for Bush and the Republican party. They had a disagreement about funding for VOA. Congress appropriated money for the Voice, but it was funneled through USIA. Funds for VOA often didn't come as quickly or as completely as expected. The outcome was that Dick Carlson left VOA, went off to the Seychelles as ambassador. I think Gelb went to Belgium as ambassador. In the long run their public feud didn't help either organization.

Q: As the chief of the East Asia Division of VOA then, what were your responsibilities and duties?

KNOPES: I took over right after Tiananmen. The China branch, which had been broadcasting about 10 hours a day to China, increased programming to 12 or 14 hours a day after Tiananmen. Congress appropriated funding for this expansion. Additional new staff was hired to cover the expanded programming. In the aftermath of Tiananmen, the Bush administration extended the visas of all Chinese students who were in the United States. Some were finishing classes and needed a job, many did not plan to go back to China anyway and were looking for work. There was this tremendous pool of talent available when VOA went recruiting for Chinese broadcasters. This worked out well in another way. VOA Chinese broadcasters were all talented and professional. But almost all had come from Taiwan years before. They were anti-communist and pro-KMT. Some had been there a long time. VOA needed broadcasters who knew the PRC and had current vocabulary. The language had changed both in Taiwan and in the PRC, but not at VOA. Bringing in these young, talented people helped the service tremendously, but it led to a certain amount of conflict between the two groups.

Q: So under the East Asia Division then there would be language specific -- KNOPES: Yeah, language services. But the China branch was the biggest.

Q: Right. Who ran the China branch?

KNOPES: Dave Hess, who had come --

Q: Dave Hess! OK.

KNOPES: Who had come from Taipei. Dave worked for me when I was in Beijing and he was in Shanghai. He went to Taiwan for language school and AIT. I expected to be in Beijing a couple more years at least. When I unexpectedly went to AIT Taipei, there was Dave Hess as information officer. When I went to Hong Kong I didn't expect to work with Dave again. Then VOA came up and we were together again. We couldn't have done much better than Dave for running the China branch during and after Tiananmen. He had experience in radio, having been a broadcaster for Armed Forces Radio. He spoke Chinese, loved China, and was good with people. He did a fine job of getting news of the outside world to a China that was locked down for some time after the massacre. VOA reporting was very irritating to the PRC authorities, much of it the reporting of our correspondent in Beijing, Al Pessin. I knew Al from my time in Beijing. A couple days after the crackdown on Tiananmen he was expelled from China.

The Voice of America was an adjunct member of an organization called the Asian Broadcasters Union (ABU). Any organization that broadcast to Asia was eligible. In addition to VOA, Netherlands Broadcasting, Canadian Broadcasting Company, and Deutsche Welle, were adjunct members. The ABU held an annual meeting in Asia, with the 1989 meeting scheduled to be held in Beijing in November under the sponsorship of Radio Beijing. The leadership of the ABU was concerned about going to China so soon after Tiananmen, but feared cancellation would have create long-term problems. It would have been a major loss of face for Radio Beijing. We in VOA wondered if we should attend, if our attendance would send the right message? I argued for it as a chance to see first-hand what was happening and to find out how other broadcasters were handling the situation. We might even get support from Radio Beijing for replacing Al Pessin. It was decided that Sid Davis, VOA's head of programming, and I would attend. The meeting was held in a new hotel in Beijing, I think it was called the Prince Hotel -- do you remember that at all?

Q: Yeah, I was --

KNOPES: It was one of the new hotels. Tiananmen had had an effect. Except for the ABU, there were only a handful of other guests. There didn't appear to be any surveillance or restrictions on our group. One afternoon I walked to Tiananmen and found it well-guarded. There were PLA and plain clothes guards all over the place but I was permitted to walk around. There were no Chinese, just a few tourists. Beijing was still very quiet. Sid Davis and I attended all the ABU sessions, talked with other broadcasters. We even had a talk with the Radio Beijing people, but with little substance. We requested and got an appointment at the Foreign Ministry. After tea was served, the official, I don't remember anything about him, launched into a tirade about how Al Pessin had broadcast false and misleading news about what happened at Tiananmen. Al had been expelled because he misrepresented the facts. Sid was nonplussed at this overheated diatribe. I took it as theater and rejoined with a description of VOA's news organization, journalistic responsibilities, and our congressional charter. Al Pessin reported what happened, I told him, as did all western journalists. I said it was time to allow VOA to restaff its Beijing office. Of course, nothing came of that meeting. It wasn't an exchange of views, just an exchange of opinions. A few months later a VOA correspondent was accredited and we re-opened our office. Maybe our mild confrontation had a positive effect in the long run. Before I left VOA, we were able to add a Chinese speaker to the Beijing office. The correspondents were not Chinese speakers. A short time later I was able to send a senior staffer from the China Branch to the new VOA office in Hong Kong.

Q: Did the Chinese jam the broadcast?

KNOPES: Oh, that was constant. When I traveled to China, I always took a shortwave radio to check our frequencies. There was always jamming, but we broadcast on several frequencies simultaneously. A listener could usually find one that was not jammed. VOA had monitoring offices around the world analyzing frequencies and interference with our signal. There was always jamming in China. Jamming cost money so I think they concentrated their efforts on Chinese broadcasts. They weren't as successful in jamming English broadcasts. They probably weren't as concerned about the English-speaking audience. At the same time, VOA was moving away from short-wave broadcasting, putting more and more on satellite. Shortwave signals went from Washington to a relay station in California. From there it was sent to transmitters in the Philippines, then broadcast around Asia. That's probably a little easier to jam. Sending the signal up to a satellite, then down to the ground gives a stronger signal. probably more difficult to jam.

Q: Now, just at the time that you're heading the East Asia Division, all sorts of things are happening. What I wanted to ask -- all kinds of things happened in '89/'90. You have a coup in the Philippines. The Americans fly jets over Manila. How does VOA, what role does the East Asia Division have --

KNOPES: As I said, VOA was a news organization. We had correspondents in Bangkok, Tokyo, Hong Kong, and Beijing, who traveled to cover breaking news like a coup in Manila. The central news room in VOA worked 24-hours a day, gathering correspondents' reports, plus items from wire services, and daily newspapers to prepare articles that were sent to all language services. The services also wrote stories on their own countries based on information they gathered from local media. To ensure accuracy, nothing could be put on the air unless it had three independent, reliable sources.

Q: So they had correspondents actually stationed all over Asia.

KNOPES: All over Asia, yeah.

Q: That could be sent to --

KNOPES: VOA had correspondents in Beijing, Bangkok and Tokyo. Those in Tokyo and Bangkok were constantly on the move, covering the entire region. VOA had stringers, too, local journalists who would report breaking news and send in feature articles. VOA also had an editorial office, separate from the news operation. Services were required to carry at least one VOA editorial each day. Those editorials were a constant issue between VOA, USIA and the State Department. Editorials were supposed to reflect U.S. policy, but they often reflected a more conservative and rigid point of view. At one point, the State Department wanted to have a chance to look them over, maybe edit them. That didn't happen. They were always a sore point, even within VOA. I think every division would have welcomed a chance to reject some of them, but they were required. No one liked them but we couldn't get rid of them.

Q: So the editorial shop wasn't under you, it was a separate --

KNOPES: It was separate, with some outside support that made it secure. I really don't know how it came about, who started it, who supported it.

Q: So Desaix Anderson who was the DAS --

KNOPES: He was the -- was he?

Q: Or Kent Wiedemann didn't call you?

KNOPES: No. No, they really didn't. We got some complaints through the EA office of USIA, but State did not call me directly. I kept in touch with State desk officers about some issues. But we made our own decisions on what to carry in the services. We set up interviews with senior officials at State to discuss American policy towards Asia. Assistant Secretary Dick Solomon was one. We were a news organization and we interviewed the policymakers and newsmakers. Sometimes news makers we interviewed overseas made comments counter to our policies or against some US position. That caused some problem but was just one voice among many we carried. We always tried to be balanced. There was always that tension. There is another point I should make about the evolution of VOA. When I came into USIA in the early '60s, all VOA division chiefs and almost all the language service chiefs were Foreign Service Officers who had served overseas, usually in the countries they were supervising. There was an awareness of what was going on in those countries and perhaps more awareness of U.S. policy toward those countries. By the 1980s, assignment of Foreign Service Officers to VOA had been phased out. Not because of an issue with their abilities or their point of view, but because language broadcasters, who were very good, very professional, complained about the low ceiling. Why could they not aspire to be service chief? Or even division chief? That was a reasonable position. VOA began promoting broadcasters to head language services, leaving fewer jobs for Foreign Service Officers. Most of those promoted did outstanding jobs as supervisors. But some lost touch with their home country, especially a country they couldn't visit. And some stayed well beyond their productive years.

Q: Well, Dave Hess was head of the China Section. Were other sections headed by FSOs?

KNOPES: No. Personnel matters in the China branch were sensitive, mostly because of the --

Q: Tiananmen.

KNOPES: No, from the broadcasters from two sides of the Taiwan strait. You couldn't choose someone who had come from Taiwan, or one who had come from the PRC, to head the Branch. The factions were too entrenched. That was one of the reasons for keeping FSOs in those jobs. I was one of two FSOs as division chief at that time. All the other division chiefs had come up through the language services. When I left, I was replaced by an FSO. But when he retired, my deputy, who had been a Chinese broadcaster from Taiwan, moved up to be division chief. After Dave Hess retired, I brought in a couple of FSOs to run the China branch. One was Bill Palmer, whom I had known in Shanghai. He stayed a couple years. To replace him I got Dan Sreebny, who had been the information officer in Hong Kong with me. Dan was, as I said, a very good information officer, a very good Foreign Service Officer. He was so good that they took him out of the China Branch and made him the head of the Near East division. He knew Arabic as well as Chinese. That was about the time I was leaving. Of course, USIA was folded back into the State Department a couple of years after I retired.

Q: While you were head of the East Asia Division, did you get to do any traveling?

KNOPES: Oh yeah.

Q: You'd done the orientation before you --

KNOPES: I visited all countries with VOA language services while I was still in Hong Kong. As division chief I made quite a few trips to the area. I attended at least two Asian Broadcasting Union meetings -- the one in Beijing and another in Seoul, Korea. My deputy went to a couple, also. We tried to go every year. It was a chance to meet other broadcasters and to keep up contacts with Radio Beijing. One of my trips was to try to increase audio feeds to medium-wave stations. On that trip I visited the new relay facility VOA was building in northeast Thailand. When it opened a year or so later the signal to all of Asia was much stronger, especially into China. On all of my trips I met with PAOs to talk about VOA and what we might do to make it more effective their country.

DENNIS G. HARTER
Chief of Political Section
Hong Kong (1982-1984)

Mr. Harter was born and raised in New Jersey and educated at Georgetown University, Seton Hall and American University. He joined the State Department in 1966 and was assigned to the CORDS program of USAID in Vietnam. He subsequently studied Chinese and served in Taiwan, Hong Kong, Guangzhou, and Hanoi, where he was Deputy Chief of Mission (1997-2001). In his Washington assignments Mr. Harter dealt primarily with East Asian matters. He also served as Director of the State Department's Press Office in Washington and as State's Representative to the Washington Council on International Trade in Seattle. Mr. Harter was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2004.

Q: Well then, off you go in 1981 was it or 1982?

HARTER: I went back to Hong Kong in 1982. Burt Levin, who had been the Deputy Consul General just as I was finishing up in Hong Kong in 1978, was now the Consul General there. He returned to the Department on consultations in the spring of 1982 and asked me to join him that summer as head of the Political Section. He was concerned because Hong Kong's role as a China watching post had been seriously eroded as the result of the normalization of relations and the opening of an Embassy in Beijing as well as Consulates in Shanghai and Guangzhou, the latter only a few hundred miles up the Pearl River from Hong Kong. Hong Kong's Political and Economic Sections had already been raided for personnel slots for the new posts and the Embassy and Consulates were already churning out all kinds of reporting. With a new, more open China, diplomats in China could travel and had greater access to Chinese officials and others throughout the country. Burt saw Hong Kong becoming marginalized, but he and other senior officers still believed Hong Kong had a role as a China reporting post. Burt felt I could develop that new role based on my recent four-year experience there. I had enjoyed my year on the desk and my four years in Washington, but I too was anxious to go back overseas. Moreover, the structured layering of the China Desk with its three deputies system had left me out of the biggest of the bilateral issues and that was also a bit frustrating. That arrangement was not likely to change even though there were new people coming in. The EA Front Office people who knew China affairs, Assistant Secretary Holdridge and Deputy Assistant Secretary Tom Shoesmith, both agreed Hong Kong had a role to play in China reporting and both encouraged me to go back to Hong Kong. But no sooner did I get to Hong Kong in 1982 than British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher made statements about the return of Hong Kong to China and she traveled to Beijing to propose the start of negotiations between Britain and China over the return of Hong Kong to PRC sovereignty.

The talks began in 1982, but the actual return date was 1997, 99 years after the lease of the New Territories. This marked the first time the USG was looking at the situation in Hong Kong as something other than a question of textile imports and quotas. Previously, that was the only real issue in our relations with Hong Kong, although we of course did deal with refugee issues, first the refugees from China and then the refugees from Vietnam. But these were largely "international" issues in Hong Kong and while they had an impact on the local population, they weren't really Hong Kong issues. Our Economic and Commercial Sections had wide-ranging contacts in the business community and in the Hong Kong Government with those who dealt with textiles, but we never had much to do with the other parts of the Hong Kong Government or with popular organizations in Hong Kong. We had never been involved with the education system; we'd never been in to talk to people in the local councils or the district administrations.

Politically, we were starting out at ground zero. Over the years, we also had very limited contact with the PRC representatives who were in Hong Kong. Actually, that's an interesting story in itself, going back to my first tour in Hong Kong in 1974-1978.

Because we had diplomatic relations with Taiwan, we did not have any kind of regular access to any of the PRC people who were in town, for the most part under the aegis of the New China News Agency (NCNA). If Britain had a Hong Kong issue to discuss with China, they would meet with the NCNA representatives in Hong Kong and messages would get relayed up to Beijing for resolution. Of course, the British could use their Embassy in Beijing to do this, but the PRC preferred not to deal with Hong Kong issues that way, I guess to keep from making the sovereignty issue so prominent in the pre-1982 periods before they were discussing Hong Kong's return to mainland control.

Separate from the NCNA operations, China ran a "united front" program in Hong Kong to deal with non-communists and to promote PRC policies indirectly. The "united front" organization was largely centered in the labor unions, some of which were dominated by the Communists and their supporters, and the newspaper groups led by the Wen Wei Pao and the Ta Kung Pao. The Ta Kung Pa was run by Fei Yimin. Fei was from an old conservative Shanghai family, but he had been a long-time associate of the Communists and he was used by them to influence non-communist intellectuals and students. Fei moved to Hong Kong after 1949 and took on publishing the newspaper. He had played a role in helping to keep things from getting too out of hand during the Cultural Revolution's spillover into Hong Kong and he had regular dealings with Hong Kong Government officials. While we could not see the NCNA cadres, we could see Fei. He would see us in his offices and talk about PRC policies in Hong Kong and around the globe and we'd discuss U.S. activities as well. Occasionally, he would agree to meet us socially, but usually, if we ended up having a meal together, it was in his offices. Fei was a good source for PRC policy guidelines and gossip on issues in both Hong Kong and the mainland. He would occasionally embellish stories so one had to be careful about subscribing too much credibility to everything he said. But, particularly in the early years when the Liaison Office had limited access anywhere in China, Fei was quite valuable as a source of information. By and large, the New China News Agency officials wouldn't see us, though there were occasional exceptions. I don't think we had any meetings with the NCNA during the time Wever Gim was our Political Section head. A new Consul General or a new head of the Political Section could get to see one of the Deputy Directors at NCNA. If we had one of those meetings, I would usually go along and take notes with either Stan Brooks or Don Anderson when they were leading the Political Section.

After we normalized relations in 1979, the opportunities to deal with NCNA expanded, and we could occasionally get NCNA Deputies to attend Consulate General functions. I had my own regular contact with one of the NCNA correspondents and then later with some of their foreign affairs office people, including one who was the daughter of a high ranking military man in Beijing. When I returned to Hong Kong in 1982, I resumed these contacts, including contact with Fei Yimin and one of his sons who was also working at the paper. Moreover, we could see NCNA officials regularly and at our request. Similarly, our Economic and Commercial people were able to get access into the PRC-run commercial entities, from the Bank of China through the various merchandising operations that China had opened in Hong Kong.

It was a bit ironic, I had been brought back to Hong Kong to try to rebuild the ConGen's China reporting credentials and we now were starting an entirely new focus on local Hong Kong issues and the bilateral negotiations between China and the UK. On the negotiations issue, the basic USG policy was to stay out of the negotiations and to urge both sides to keep the stability and prosperity of the Hong Kong people at the forefront of the negotiations. We did not want to take a position that favored one side or another, but in reality it was very difficult to avoid being seen as supportive of the British negotiating position. And so, while U.S. officials tried to maintain an impartial stance, the PRC regarded our intentions with some suspicion. The British and the Chinese were often at loggerheads and there was a real dearth of contact among the various players in Hong Kong who represented concerned elements in the negotiations. This included the two direct negotiation partners – Britain and China – but it also involved a variety of very diverse groups in Hong Kong. These groups would often vilify one another in the media and they advanced arguments about Hong Kong's future in stove pipes. There was very little cross fertilization of ideas and very little common ground of policy understanding. Because we were out talking to people in all of these groups and getting a variety of opinions about Hong Kong's future, it seemed remarkable how little the various people talked to one another.

After several weeks of the Section producing reports on a variety of these separate views on Hong Kong, I decided to try a little cross-fertilization. After hearing my ideas, Burt Levin and his Deputy, Dick Williams, authorized me to try to put together small dinner parties that would assemble some of these individuals and try to get them to communicate. Burt decided not to participate so as to lessen the image of this being a USG-authorized function and we decided we were likely to get higher level attendees if the Deputy CG was the host rather than the head of the Political Section. I wasn't certain we could get the individuals to come to the same table, even if it was a dinner table, without risking some thoughts that we were "interfering." It was also possible that once the people gathered there would be no real conversation and we'd never have a second opportunity to try this approach. But, we went ahead with the plan and brought representatives from NCNA, the British Foreign Office representatives in Hong Kong, Hong Kong Government executive and legislative branch officials, academics, journalists, local government administration representatives and business leaders to the table. It didn't take us very long to get the conversation started and the guests were quickly speaking out on their views of the Hong Kong situation. The participants soon found areas of common ground even as they articulated confrontational views on a variety of topics related to Hong Kong's future. The first dinner proved to be very successful and both the NCNA and UK Foreign Office people from Hong Kong expressed how useful they thought it was for them to hear differing views in a non-political setting. Other participants were equally enthused and the word got out about the dinners so we never had a problem finding willing invitees, eager to participate in the discussions. We were able to bring different participants together on three or four more occasions over the next few months as a way to encourage more dialogue among those with direct interests and roles in Hong Kong's future. Although I don't know if anything came up in those sessions which made its way into the "Final Settlement", I do know we had discussions of a number of very controversial issues that as they progressed became less combative and more nuanced and blended among the representatives of the two sides. The next day, I would write up these sessions in reporting messages back to the Department.

As I developed my own contacts in the local community, I discovered my Political Section colleagues and I were all operating at a distinct disadvantage. All of us were FSI Washington and FSI Taiwan trained Mandarin speakers. Hong Kong was largely still a Cantonese speaking city so quite often our language officers were taking FSN (Foreign Service National) interpreters with us so we could converse with some of the local Hong Kong officials who were not part of the British educated elites.

Q: How did you deal with the cadre of Hong Kong nationals who had been translating, I mean you know, you build up this very impressive group of experts, a part of the China watchers. What was happening with them?

HARTER: When I went back to Hong Kong in 1982, many of the local employee specialists were still working there. The senior Political Section local was Vincent Lo and he had another assistant who had come out of one of the Hong Kong University staffs. The senior people on the Economic Section staff were also there and they too had added some younger assistants. Vincent, like many of the other local employees, eventually emigrated to the U.S. He'd worked for the U.S. government long enough to qualify for the special service visa and so he took his family and came to the United States in the late 1980s. I believe he settled somewhere in this area, but I've never really had any contact with him beyond an occasional Christmas card maybe 15 years ago. Vincent, like many of the other local ConGen employees of his generation, had fled China with his parents as a young child some years after the Communists came to power in 1949. There were quite a large number of such people in the overall Hong Kong population. Because of this background, many felt very insecure about their futures once the PRC took over in 1997. Almost from the start of the Sino-British talks on Hong Kong's future, many people with this background or who were associated with the Hong Kong government were making plans to find alternate residences abroad.

In the two years I was in Hong Kong, there were a lot of times when public confidence was deeply affected by local perceptions or press perceptions of the degree of progress in the talks about Hong Kong's future. The Hong Kong dollar went through a number of troughs, the worst of which virtually cut its value by a third in one afternoon which marked the end of a multi-day session of the bilateral UK-PRC dialogue. For the preceding sessions, the British spokesperson who reported to the press about the state of the talks had used a formula which was bland but at least positive sounding. On this particular Friday, however, he didn't use the same formula and the press and the Hong Kong community interpreted the somewhat different comments as the sign of a great failure. It was probably true that up to that time, this had been a more contentious session between the two sides and there was probably reason to think that the results were therefore a bit of a disappointment to the negotiators. Even though it might not have been as successful a round of talks, however, it would not have hurt for the British to use the same phrases about "frank" and "cordial" talks on that particular occasion. But, nobody perceived that a slight alteration in the formulaic public press comment would trigger such a reaction. The Hong Kong dollar went from something like 6.2 to 1 US dollar to 9.6 to 1 by the end of the day. Prior to this, the Hong Kong Government had been adamant it would not peg the Hong Kong dollar to a fixed exchange rate. But over that weekend, the Governor and his chief financial advisors changed their minds and fixed the Hong Kong dollar at 7.87 Hong Kong dollars to one U.S. dollar and it has pretty much stayed at that rate ever since.

Q: Were we offering assurances to our people there that we would take care of them?

HARTER: Yes, in a very informal way we were doing that. We made it clear to the people who had been with the Consulate all those many years that the service visa option would be available in Hong Kong. Admin staff members had discussions with the FSNs through the employee association and individually they had their situations reviewed in their various sections. Procedures were clarified and employees understood their opportunities would not disappear so there was no need for a sudden rush to leave Hong Kong. So, yes I think the ConGen made a conscious effort to reassure folks. The Hong Kong government was of course trying to do the same thing and trying to avoid the hemorrhaging of its experienced personnel. The people who had the biggest concern of course were the people in the police and those who had been in the correctional institutions who felt they would suffer at the hands of the locals once they were no longer part of the official government system.

The British had been very reluctant from the beginning of the talks to share anything with us. That included sharing at our Embassies in London and Beijing and their Embassy in Washington. But, a couple of the Hong Kong British officials, the Political Advisor and his Deputy, both of whom were British Foreign Service officers assigned to the Hong Kong government were accessible. And, within certain guidelines, they did let us have a pretty good idea of where things stood. They were not allowed to go too deeply into details, but in Hong Kong we were able to learn much more about what was going on in the talks than anywhere else. The Consul General, his Deputy and I maintained that particular dialogue with the Political Advisor's Office.

Q: When you arrived there, how would you describe the British role in Hong Kong? I've heard it said that they were caught a little bit by surprise. They'd been running it more as a sort of old style colonial place.

HARTER: Yes, that's true. There was very little "interference" from the local population or from people on the outside. If the UK Government wanted to take a particular action in Hong Kong, they simply did it. I was chatting yesterday with a friend of mine who recounted a story about how he had been invited by the Hong Kong Political Advisor to go out and visit the so-called "Walled City." The Walled City was a small piece of territory inside the Kowloon/New Territories portion of Hong Kong that somehow got omitted from the maps that were drawn up when the British leased these territories from the Qing Dynasty in the 19th Century. So, this was a little section of Hong Kong that was a lawless no-man's land. It had no government, it had no police, it had no authority outside the local gangs who controlled illicit activities in the area. It was a place of squalor and slums where drug dealers and pimps operated freely. Some entrepreneur had built an apartment building in the area. If you remember anything about Hong Kong before the late 1990s when they moved their airport to another island away from the major populations centers, Hong Kong used to have its airport in Kowloon in a very heavily populated part of the city and right along the edge of the inner Hong Kong harbor and you would fly in along the overland flight path and you'd be down the last leg of the route and you'd look in apartment windows as you descended onto the runway.

Q: Yes, scary.

HARTER: Well, anyway the Hong Kong Government had regulations about how high buildings could be so they wouldn't interfere with the flights. This entrepreneur had gone in and built something that would have been a couple of stories into the flight path. And, I guess he either didn't know about the regulation or he figured the Hong Kong Government couldn't touch him. So, the purpose of this particular trip, the one my friend was recounting, was to have the Political Advisor enter "no-man's land" and tell the entrepreneur he had to remove the top few floors of this building. He was given a deadline to complete the project or else the Political Advisor promised he faced having the entire building razed to the ground. So, even here, where it was the "Walled City" and the British actually had no legitimate jurisdiction, they felt they still had the right to operate there if the situation required it. My friend recounted the story also to demonstrate that it was indeed a special circumstance, however, that permitted the British to go in to take action. Occasionally, in hot pursuit of a criminal, Hong Kong authorities would cross the boundary into the Walled City, but that was not a common occurrence and it required a pretty serious offense for the British to consider "crossing the line" there either in hot pursuit or as part of a raid to locate someone reputedly hiding in these few blocks of tenements.

Q: Was there much of a local Chinese, Hong Kong representation?

HARTER: Well, they certainly had advisory groups, and some institutions that represented the well-to-do Chinese in the business community of Hong Kong. The Executive Council and the Legislative Council created a facade of "Chineseness" to the overall administration. British civil servants were scattered throughout the government administration and only a handful of Chinese had anything approaching "executive" authority, and often only several layers down in the administration. The court system was exclusively British. The administration of all of the government services was British. There were some Brits scattered in the lower levels of the colonial administration, but overwhelmingly the majority of the personnel in the offices were local Hong Kong Chinese. It's just they never got beyond a certain cap and couldn't become real administrators of Departments. During the '80s, and particularly once the negotiations began with the PRC, the British introduced transitional changes that retired more of the colonial officials and more of the local Chinese came in to take increasingly more senior positions. There was also a greater enfranchisement of the local population and a broader range of offices that could be elected at the local levels.

Q: Did we play any role in - had we been talking to the Brits about this? I mean, wasn't it a way of our business, but --

HARTER: We had, I think, been as surprised as anybody else by Margaret Thatcher's proposals to start negotiations with Beijing on Hong Kong's return to the mainland. I don't think anybody was focused on it as a significant issue because the lease expiration was still 15 years out. While I'm sure she'd discussed this with the Foreign Office, one had the impression the initiative was her own. And, unlike a lot of other issues where our special relationship with the UK meant we had very intimate exchanges of information, I don't think she or the UK Government ever told us beforehand that she would open the dialogue in 1982. Once that issue was out in the public eye, I am certain we had any number of dialogues with the British urging that they try to negotiate some quasi-separation for Hong Kong from the mainland. But that wasn't anything special because the UK had as its own chief objective the maintenance of some kind of continued British administrative presence in Hong Kong after 1997.

Quite apart from what the British were doing, the USG was also involved in looking at our own status in Hong Kong after 1997. Would we merge the Hong Kong Consulate with the Consulate in Guangzhou and cover all of south China from there? Would the Chinese permit Consulates to operate in Hong Kong at all? If the Consulate remained, would we be able to maintain defense attaché officers and ship visitation rights once the PRC assumed sovereignty? We had to determine what to do with the FBIS (Foreign Broadcast Information Service) operation in Hong Kong and all of its sundry monitoring of broadcast and news information inside China. We did develop certain contingencies including reducing the size of our staff in Hong Kong and scaling back on our operations. So, there were a lot of those kinds of issues that had to be thought about as it related to the future positioning of a Consulate General in Hong Kong.

That was certainly part of our internal focus back in 1982, 1983, 1984, the time period that I was there. None of these issues was fully resolved before I left in 1984, but later that year the Basic Agreement was in fact concluded and it became clear we would be able to maintain our facilities in Hong Kong after 1997. And much of what we were able to do before 1997 continued to be possible afterwards. In addition to making clear that there would be no residual British role in Hong Kong after 1997, the key to Hong Kong's future began to evolve as part of a five-year transition immediately before the 1997 turnover.

Q: How was this worked out? Was this something that we - up in Beijing, we're talking at that time and saying, hey fellows, while you're doing this. talking to the Chinese, how about us?

HARTER: There may have been some informal talks of that nature in Beijing I don't believe, however, there were any decisions made by the Chinese about what else would happen in Hong Kong as it applied to other institutions until it was quite a bit clearer what the final agreement would look like. So, I would say much of that discussion took place in the intervening years up to 1997, working out the overall relationship for the consulate and the staffing and ship visits, etc. There were lots of those sorts of issues involving the practical operation of Hong Kong that were taken care of later. Part of the problem in this particular time period is, we had very little idea what, if anything the U.S. government was doing with the reporting we were sending back. We knew a little bit of what the Brits and the Chinese were doing in the talks and how they might play off some things we had discussed in Hong Kong. But whether there was anybody in Washington who was really paying a significant amount of attention to this, we really didn't know. We virtually never got feedback. I mean, people might say about our bringing the various groups in Hong Kong together around the dinner table, "Oh, great idea, good that you're doing this sort of thing." But, Washington never shared any of its thinking on the formulation of U.S. policy on this issue. I found it frustrating. Knowing the materials we were providing and the way in which we were putting different ideas into the collective mix for those involved in the negotiations, but we had no idea what anybody in Washington thought or whether they really cared about where the negotiations were going. All we got were a few "attaboys."

Q: What was the -- you were there first place from when to when?

HARTER: I arrived in the summer of 1982 and stayed there until the summer of 1984. I left very, very quickly to go to Indonesia, because that particular assignment was up in the air until the last moment because of some personnel assignment issues in Washington.

Q: By 1984 had the preliminary final agreement been reached?

HARTER: Yes, it was finalized in 1984, but not until after I left.

Q: What was your prognosis, yours and your colleagues about what was going to happen?

HARTER: Well, because we had seen the uneasiness among the local population and the large numbers of people already trying to get out in the 1982-84 period, we projected a much larger outflow of people over those coming years than in fact actually happened. Something none of us foresaw, many of the people who went abroad in the 1982-84 period in fact, returned to Hong Kong in subsequent years.

The people who left Hong Kong in this time period got themselves documented in Canada, in Australia, the U.S., Europe, etc and then they came back to Hong Kong to live and work. With their futures secured by foreign citizenship or residency rights, they much preferred living in Hong Kong than they did in Vancouver or New York, or Houston, or Los Angeles or any of the other places they obtained residency. This was a time too when a variety of places sprung up as instant citizenship meccas where you could for fifty thousand dollars contribution to the government of the Maldives or a seventy-five thousand dollar contribution to the government of Tonga, become a citizen of those wonderful places. Actually, in most cases it was a lot more than fifty thousand dollars, but the idea was to attract financial investment to some of these mini-states in return for citizenship. In some cases you had to wait a period of time after depositing your money, but in other places you could get a new passport virtually immediately after making that basic financial commitment. A lot of the more wealthy people had done this years earlier and at this time it was the middle class people who went out and established rights of abode in other countries. My impression is that most of those who came back have in fact remained in Hong Kong after 1997 because the financial opportunities outweighed the PRC political "control" imposed after the British left. I don't know whether this current problem that exists -- the British democratization process was moving incrementally along in Hong Kong in the 1990s but it's been more or less stood on its head by Beijing. Whether that's going to create a new exodus or not, I just don't know.

Q: It's in the evolving process as we speak in 2004. What were you getting from your contacts with the New China News Agency and all? Being the de facto representatives of Beijing. I mean, were they taking a pretty hard line or --

HARTER: In general, yes, especially at the beginning of the talks. Margaret Thatcher and Li Peng did not get along in their initial meetings in Beijing, because she thought there ought to be a residual British role and Beijing made it quite clear there would not be any role for the British after 1997. They were taking quite a hard line. The situation, in fact became very difficult, particularly in Hong Kong, because the British had been used to having their own way on political and economic matters and they were not used to having to consult with other authorities. Moreover, NCNA was still staffed by individuals who were really quite minor-level bureaucrats. There was no one of stature to deal with the Hong Kong Governor.

But, quite unexpectedly, Beijing sent a cadre with stature, Xu Jiatun, to head NCNA. He was a former Party First Secretary in Jiangsu Province, the province surrounding Shanghai, a member of the Central Committee of the Communist Party. Xu was an effective representative for Beijing, who had clear prominence, was an established party official, and yet he was quickly able to move in the various political circles of Hong Kong. When he arrived in Hong Kong circumstances came together in an unusual way and I was the first person from the U.S. Consulate General to meet him.

Back in the Nixon era, ping pong had been the big sport that put the US and China together but, in this case it was volleyball, woman's volleyball. China and Japan had two of the top teams in the world and the United States was an up and comer, featuring a couple of stars who actually played in competitive leagues in Japan. As it happened, one of the leftist run sports associations hosted a three team woman's volleyball match in the colony which included these three nations. So, as usual in those sorts of public occasions the organizers send out complimentary invitations, and quite logically one was sent to the U.S. Consul General. Burt Levin said, "I don't want to go to this," and his Deputy, Dick Williams said, "I don't want to go to this. Harter you go." So, for the three nation competition, I was in the box of honor representing the United States, and I was seated between the Japanese Consul General and the Chinese representative, the new head of the New China News Agency, Xu Jiatun. So, we chatted back and forth in Chinese for a little bit before and during the matches. I went back to the office the next day and said, "You'll never guess who I met" and Burt and Dick were a bit surprised because nobody had known Xu would show up for this event. And, they were a bit concerned they might have created the wrong impression by not having made the effort to attend the competition. But, as I said, nobody had any idea Xu would show up at this event.

But, what was interesting is that Xu had a different mission in Hong Kong than any of his predecessors. His role was to project Beijing's "smiling diplomacy" toward Hong Kong. He went everywhere and talked with everyone, all with the purpose of reassuring the people of Hong Kong that Beijing had the people's interests at heart. Xu was out in the local village communities in the rural areas; he was in the schools and universities; he visited factories, business enterprises and town meetings talking to the people in the government administrations. It was a totally different focus for China's top representative in Hong Kong. He was very effective and very highly thought of in most circles. Xu remained as head of NCNA until 1990 when he fled Hong Kong for the United States, some say largely because of his apparent sympathy for the student democracy movement, many of whose leaders were able to safely avoid Chinese patrols along the Guangzhou-Hong Kong border and reach Hong Kong. Others say, however, that he had become a U.S. asset and he was spirited out of Hong Kong by the CIA because he was under investigation that would likely have led to his recall to Beijing. Whatever his motivation, Xu ended up in the United States.

Q: Were you finding that - were they sort of saying what they were up to? I mean, in general terms?

HARTER: Well, after Xu arrived, the articulation of PRC policies softened a bit and Chinese pronouncements on Hong Kong's future featured more assurances to the people of Hong Kong. The presentations were all more sugar-coated. It was all much smoother than in the earlier period where Beijing seemed satisfied just to say "we will be in charge." I'm not sure there was any overall change in Beijing's intentions. Beijing now willingly acknowledged there would be a local administration, some sort of operation which reflected the special nature of Hong Kong and protected the economic system which had sparked China's most recent economic growth. But, ultimately, there was no way Hong Kong was going to be allowed to be "independent" and the Hong Kong administration would be a facade that masked Beijing's ultimate decision-making authority across the political and economic spectrum. The PRC had to be very careful about how it played all of these public pronouncements and maneuvers, because Hong Kong was only part of China's territory that needed to be rejoined to the mainland. Taiwan was the principle prize and everything that was being played out for Hong Kong was being watched in Taiwan to evaluate how the Chinese would handle this transition.

And, of course there was a little issue to be dealt with in Macau, the Portuguese colony which had a 1999 lease expiration date, but which everyone knew would follow just behind Hong Kong once that arrangement was completed. Many years earlier after a big change in politics in Lisbon, Portuguese officials had gone to the Chinese and offered to return Macau. This would have been in the '60s and '70s. But the Chinese said the timing was not appropriate and Beijing would let Lisbon know when the time was ripe. So, while a lot of the new Beijing diplomacy was articulated in terms of Hong Kong's future, it was really being pitched for the audience in Taiwan. I think that's one of the reasons why they sent Xu to Hong Kong. He was a much more polished person than the bureaucrats who had staffed NCNA before this and who would have no flexibility to react to local circumstances. Xu had a flare and a public persona that was approachable. He was relaxed, didn't stand on ceremony, and the most negative thing the press could say about him after several weeks on the job was his penchant for wearing dark glasses all the time. Nonetheless, based on his background, he was certainly more than just a concerned observer and I'm sure if he was required to be a negotiator, he would be hard as nails.

Q: What were you picking up during this period? What was happening in China? Was there any - were we picking up things in Hong Kong?

HARTER: Yes, we were able to find a China reporting role for Hong Kong despite all of our focus on Hong Kong. It was certainly secondary to what we had to do on Hong Kong during this particular period, but, there definitely was a role. There were government officials, journalists and business people who, after traveling through China, would have their first contact with any US official in Hong Kong. Hong Kong was a convenient exit point for China and a comfortable place for people to decompress for a couple of days before heading back to their home bases. So, we had opportunities to meet with those people and talk to them and get a better perspective of China developments well before anybody in the Embassy or Consulates who tended to see people more as they started their China activities. The ConGen also had long-standing connections and contacts with the press. After 1979 and normalization of relations, the New York Times, the Washington Post and a many others left their Hong Kong offices and based their reporters in Beijing. But, Hong Kong was still the place to come to get away from Beijing or to do additional research on China stories. Even though China was a lot more developed than it had been a decade earlier as we were starting the Liaison Office operations, Hong Kong provided a real break from the mainland routine and we were able to take advantage of our reputation on China issues to talk to many of these journalists who also wanted to pick our brains on China or for that matter on the new big story about Hong Kong's future. Those reporters, mostly with periodicals – Time, Newsweek, the Economist, etc. -- who were still assigned to Hong Kong tended to have a regional responsibility and Hong Kong served as their base to cover the rest of Southeast Asia. These would be people who had to periodically drop everything and run off to the Philippines or Malaysia or Singapore or somewhere else in the region because of local stories there. We still had the periodic luncheon meetings of China watchers but over time that too shifted to focus on Hong Kong's future.

Q: How were your relationships with the Consulate in Guangzhou?

HARTER: They were OK. We didn't have any jurisdictional problems or anything related to border control issues. ConGen officers still had limited opportunities to go in and out of China. I mean we didn't go in and out as frequently as we would have liked to, but we did try to work out arrangements where we would send officers to Guangzhou to help cover gaps. This was largely something that benefited the Consular side of the house. When we had our planning sessions for consular operations in China, it was decided that all immigrant visa (IV) operations for China would be centered in Hong Kong. That was primarily because the Consular district was the primary homeland for those Chinese who had settled in the United States. More than 95 percent of all the Chinese in the US came from Southern China – primarily Guangdong and secondarily Fujian. So, it just didn't make sense to replicate all of the normal IV processing in Shanghai and Beijing. People who lived outside the Guangzhou Consular District and could not readily get to the Consulate could do all their initial IV paperwork by mail and then come in for the final interview. If the familial linkage in the case was clear and all of the documents had been properly presented, the applicant traveled but once to Guangzhou and got the visa issued on the same trip. Obviously, they still could return home to settle their affairs and they didn't just go from the ConGen directly to the airport to depart. So, while Consular Sections in Beijing and Shanghai had three to five people who focused on non-immigrant visas, the Consulate General in Guangzhou had ten or twelve consular officers focused primarily on immigration cases. Some Hong Kong ConGen specialized agencies had worked out access for personnel who were based in Hong Kong to cover mainland China issues. INS Hong Kong was always sending people in to deal with emigration issues and the DEA (Drug Enforcement Agency) representative was also welcomed by the Chinese from time to time for visits. Customs personnel usually went in to investigate illegal textile shipments so I 'm not sure there visits were all that welcome.

Q: I think it's probably a good place to stop here. I've got a question I'd like to ask before we move you on and you can cover it next time - relations with the British. Were the old colonial types having problems coming to grips with their diminished role?

HARTER: You'd hear about some stories like that or read about families who'd been in Hong Kong for generations and were now leaving. I guess this was mostly among the middle-level bureaucrats and smaller business operators. The top UK businessmen either moved out like Jardine Matheson, which re-headquartered in Bermuda but kept its Hong Kong investments, or planned to stay on as independents. The top Hong Kong Chinese businessmen had all been investing in China over the previous decade and their links to the mainland were already well-established. When I had dealings with the top Hong Kong businessmen like Li Ka-shing and Gordon Wu, it was largely to get their views on the evolution of Hong Kong's political scene or their understanding of PRC plans for the colony's future. They also gave me their insights into the economic development opportunities in China and they, for the most part, were optimistic about Hong Kong's survivability under the PRC. But, when it came to dealing with the British, aside from some journalists, the people we dealt with were the people involved in the negotiations, fellow foreign affairs professionals. I think from a political perspective, Consul General Burt Levin and the Governor of Hong Kong, Sir Edward Youde, probably had more of those kinds of discussions about the impact the turnover would have on local British expats. But, even Youde was a foreign affairs professional, a diplomat and a China specialist. He probably had more conversations with Burt about those kinds of issues, reflecting expat concerns and reflecting colonial attitudes within the overall government administration. Press stories, as I said, often reflected a colonial mentality and depicted concerns about Hong Kong's administrative integrity. But, I can't say I ever really had a one-on-one conversation that reflected this bias.

JAMES R. LILLEY
Director, American Institute of Taiwan
Taiwan (1982-1984)

Ambassador James R. Lilley was born in China in 1928. After serving in the US Army from 1946-1947 he received his bachelor's degree from Yale University in 1951. From 1951-1958 he worked as an analyst for the US Army. His career includes positions in China, Japan, Thailand, Cambodia, Philippines, Laos, and ambassadorships to South Korea and China. Ambassador Lilley was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in May 1998.

Q: We're still talking about the 1968-1970 period. The changes in Taiwan weren't really in the forecast.

LILLEY: Taiwan was really beginning to "take off" at that time. American economic aid to Taiwan stopped in 1965. However, after all of the mistakes that we had made on mainland China, we finally "got it right." We had some really "crackerjack" people in Taiwan, including men like Wolf Lada-jinsky. He promoted real land reform, the move into agriculture and light industry, export promotion, import substitution. Taiwan made a lot of progress economically.

Politically, Taiwan had to fight against authoritarian and single political party KMT control of the system. This is basically similar to what has been done in Singapore. So there has been economic dynamism and political feudalism. Taiwan had gone through this process in the 1960s. By the time I visited Taiwan in 1970, we could really see this process "taking off." However, in the late 1960s and early 1970s mainland China had gone through the awful consequences of the Cultural Revolution. All of this had happened in mainland China, when Taiwan was beginning to move forward economically, although politically and militarily, the progress made was not so

Q: Did you see indicators that everybody else was missing, including the view: "Don't fool around with China. Don't upset relations with China."

LILLEY: Yes. I think that we were beginning to see that the mood was shifting in the United States regarding relations with China. We read information on China which was being sent back by the Consulate General in Hong Kong. The State Department was getting its own reports, too. I felt that, at that time, that we should move ahead in terms of relations with China. However, we had to protect our interests in Taiwan.

Some people said that we were already on the scene in strength in Taiwan, but others questioned and said: "Why are you dealing with these relics of history?" The question was how long it would take us to get out of this relationship with Taiwan. They asked whether there were any plans to do this. They admitted that China was in bad shape, but there were better elements in China that would come to power, and so forth.

***

Q: In the first place, did the China desk also cover Taiwan?

LILLEY: At that time there was an ROC [Republic of China] desk in the State Department. Then there was also the PRC(M) desk [People's Republic of China (Mainland)]. That was the division of responsibility in the State Department.

Q: I was talking about the arrangement in the CIA.

LILLEY: In CIA there was a Directorate of Operations which included both Mainland China and Taiwan.

***

However, right from the beginning Zhou En-lai said that even though we might work together, Taiwan was necessarily first on their list of priorities. That's when he laid down the importance he attached to Taiwan, no Japanese takeover, and so forth. And they were clear in this from the beginning. They said right from the beginning that we can't really move unless there were understandings on this. We said, okay, basically, and of course it became much more subtly stated in the Shanghai Communique when people like Marshall Green [then Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs] and others really felt that it was very important to have agreed language on Taiwan that didn't get us sucked into the Chinese position.

***

LILLEY: That language on Taiwan is important today in working on China. The Chinese communists say that we recognized Taiwan as a part of China. In fact, what the communique says is that we acknowledge the Chinese position. This is an important distinction, which came out in the statement on the normalization of relations between the U.S. and China. However, that distinction did not appear in the Shanghai Communique. Although we didn't really and fully factor in the Taiwan issue in the Shanghai Communique, we did say both sides of the Taiwan Strait regard Taiwan as part of China and we did not challenge the Chinese position. Right now we have challenged it because we don't fully accept the Chinese communist position.

At the same time the Chinese communists are opposed to a Taiwanese declaration of independence. I think that the people who drafted those important communiques were too much involved in a rush to normalize relations with China, leaving aside the future disposition of Taiwan.

***

LILLEY: No, he was in CIA. He worked for Stansfield Turner. We drafted this paper and we had really "put the finishing touches" on our study of the situation there. The Carter administration at that point was really "veering over" in the direction of normalization of relations with China. We sort of grabbed them and said: "Hold it. We've got real 'equities' in Taiwan. The Chinese Nationalists have been our friends. They stood by us during the Vietnam War. We can't really do this to them. This will have a bad effect in Asia. It will hurt the administration's China policy. It is essential to 'get this right.'"

I think that this approach had some effect because, as you know, by 1979 there had been a reaction to this normalization. The secret way it had been done got nowhere near the positive public reaction which had been seen in the case of the Nixon and Kissinger visits to China. They same techniques were used, but the results were different. There was a growing group in Congress, all the way from Kennedy on the Left to Jesse Helms on the Right, and including Frank Church, Jake Javits, John Glenn, and Clem Zablocki. All of these people, with different political views, got together and said that the administration had to do better by our friends on Taiwan. They said that the deal which the Carter administration had gotten was not a good deal, because it did not have the necessary security guarantees for Taiwan. It didn't keep our relationship going legally with Taiwan, through an extension of the existing treaties. They said that they were going to change this situation and were going to give the administration the basis under which it could set up a non-diplomatic, "mission" in Taiwan. I think that that piece of legislation, [the Taiwan Relations Act], was one of the most brilliant pieces of legislation Congress ever passed. It really had many capable members of Congress in support of it.

***

Well, all of these things changed. First, provision for a U.S. office in Taiwan was covered in a line item in the State Department budget. Secondly, Foreign Service Officers [FSOs] continued to serve in Taiwan but went through the legal process of "resigning" from the Foreign Service, while still retaining their seniority retirement and health insurance and promotion arrangements. Thirdly, we had a person in charge of the office in Taiwan with Ambassadorial experience, Charles [Chuck] Cross, who had previously been Ambassador to Singapore. He was a retired FSO, born in China and an experienced, China hand.

***

He is really quite a guy. I think that what set this office back was when Secretary Warren Christopher went out to Taiwan and there were riots in Taipeh. Demonstrators rocked his car and kicked it. This was in Taiwan in December, 1978.

I think that Roger Sullivan accompanied Secretary Christopher on this occasion. I think that they thought that this riot was "contrived" and arranged for by the Taiwan authorities. They were angry about their treatment. However, it didn't get the average American angry.

There still are some signs of resentment from people like Senator Ted Kennedy [Democrat, Massachusetts] who said: "I told you guys to keep us informed in Congress about what you were doing with China. But you didn't tell us." Well, the administration said that there had been "secret negotiations." That ploy didn't work the second time around.

I think that generally what happened was that people who were "pro-Taiwan," like Ray Cline and others like that, got into this act very vigorously. However, those who had long been "pro-Taiwan," like former Congressman Walter Judd became re-engaged. The American Chamber of Commerce in Taiwan got very interested. The people who then testified before the Congressional committees were very articulate, more so than the people who defended the China policy of the Carter administration. The Chamber appeared to be defending the "small guy" against the "big guy." They included those who feared China. They expressed Taiwan's fear of China. We had large, commercial interests in Taiwan. We had American missionaries in Taiwan. We had all of these ties to Taiwan. These arguments were made.

Q: By the time you retired from the CIA in 1978, what did you think of the future of Taiwan, from your office's point of view?

LILLEY: The CIA should not make policy. CIA's responsibility was to call the situation the way it saw it. I think that at the time when our relations with China were normalized, there was a moratorium on arms sales to Taiwan for one year. We terminated the defense treaty between the U.S. and the Republic of China. We pulled our troops out of Taiwan and broke diplomatic relations with the Republic of China. All of these things were done. But by this time I was out of the Agency. However, I would assume that CIA officers were writing about the effects of these actions on Taiwan during this transition period. Of course, Taiwan was turning to us and saying that these actions would have a terrible effect on Taiwan. They said that they were "going to hell in a hand basket."

I think that in September, 1979, communist China began to alter its policies toward Taiwan. They came out with the "nine points leading to peaceful reunification." They switched from the idea of liberating Taiwan to reunification peacefully. Chinese policy began to shift and to become more "flexible."

Q: During the time when you were still with the CIA, did we see a change in Taiwan that would make it a more democratic country?

LILLEY: That was beginning to emerge, but then it was "crushed" by Human Rights Day in 1979. There were riots in Kaohsiung [port in southern Taiwan], and the Chinese Nationalists threw all of the advocates of independence for Taiwan into jail. There was the famous "Chen" case, in which a Taiwanese from the U.S. died mysteriously. He "fell" from the fifth floor of a building and was killed.

Q: Was this in the United States?

LILLEY: No, in Taiwan. I was just going out to Taiwan. The Taiwan authorities were dealing out fairly rough treatment to people who advocated Taiwanese independence. I think this was largely because the authorities felt "insecure." But they were tough. There was a feeling that the Taiwan president was not a very good guy. Beijing was acting in a conciliatory fashion at this time. They had stopped bombarding Quemoy [Kinmen], and were conducting a sort of "peace offensive." Then the Taiwan authorities made a series of mistakes.

I went to China in the summer of 1980 with George Bush as a member of his "team of advisers." We visited both Japan and China. President Reagan was elected as a sort of friend of Taiwan. A couple of things happened. George Bush was Reagan's vice presidential running mate. At about this time Reagan announced that he thought that we should restore official relations with Taiwan. Oh, boy, the Chinese communists just went right through the roof! Here was Bush, on his way to China. It was a rough trip. Bush was not at all happy. The Chinese asked Bush, in effect: "What the hell is going on? Are you going to set the clock back?" We kept saying: "Look, you've taken us out of context," and so forth. Then, when we returned to Los Angeles, we were going to have a joint press conference with Reagan and Bush and we were going to discuss Bush's trip to China.

This press conference did not turn out as badly as we thought it would. I think that we got Ronald Reagan to "back off" on some of this emphasis on Taiwan. He emphasized our hope for peaceful relations and prosperity for all Chinese on both sides of the Taiwan Strait. He said that this is our policy and he didn't get into the question of "official relations" with Taiwan at all. I think that this attitude tended to "smooth over" a potential controversy.

Q: Did you have the feeling that Reagan at that point was sort of speaking "from his heart," which he would do from time to time? He would occasionally sort of "louse up" the situation for people who were trying to create an organized world.

LILLEY: I think that part of this was Reagan's own instincts, and part of it was that some of his people really thought this way. They had very close ties with Reagan. I saw Reagan before I went to Taiwan as the second Director of AIT [American Institute on Taiwan], replacing Chuck Cross. I attended a White House meeting for outgoing chiefs of mission. The State Department initially took the view that I could not be included in this group, but a way was found to include me. Reagan had 3x5 cards on each of the diplomats attending the ceremony. For example, the cards would say: "This is Harry Barnes. He's going to India." When the time came for President Reagan to say goodbye to the attendees, Reagan would say: "Have a nice tour of duty."

Goodbye." I was 14th on the list of American diplomats meeting Reagan. I came in last. President Reagan said: "You're going to Taiwan?" I said, "Yes." He said: "Please sit down." His wife came in. Vice President George Bush came in. We were there for 15 or 20 minutes. Reagan was telling stories. He's a very charming guy. My family who were with me have never forgotten this.

Finally, when I left, President Reagan said to me: "You must understand this. I like those people in Taiwan." I'll not forget those words. I think that those were probably as good directions as I needed and where he wanted me to go. At the same time, however, the F-16s and F-5Gs [fighter planes] had been turned down for sale to Taiwan.

Q: We're talking about types of fighter planes.

LILLEY: The proposal had come in that we should do this. Everybody was saying that President Reagan was strong for this. I was the guy from the NSC [National Security Council] staff. So I said that we were studying that. The idea was to get the Defense Department to do a study of this matter. I didn't think that the CIA would do it. The proposal to sell aircraft to Taiwan was based on Taiwan's defense needs, in accordance with the Taiwan Relations Act. So the Defense Department did a study and concluded that Taiwan didn't need these aircraft. The "Washington Post" picked up this story and published it. Eventually, President Reagan and Vice President Bush decided that they wouldn't sell the aircraft to Taiwan.

So when I arrived in Taiwan, and on the same day, I think, I had to confirm to the Taiwanese that we weren't going to sell them the F-16s or the F-5Gs. It was a "rocky way" to start a trip. However, the Taiwanese believed that I hadn't been involved in the turn down.

When I had been on the NSC staff for about six months, administration people came to me and said: "Listen, we want to get the 'right man' in Taiwan. Things are not going well. You are a man who is trusted by the Reagan administration. You have a good reputation in Taiwan. Why don't you go there as Director of the AIT [American Institute on Taiwan]?" I said: "Fine."

***

There was a very strong movement at that time to move forward the relationship with the PRC [People's Republic of China]. This movement came from Secretary of State Al Haig, John Holdridge [Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian Affairs], and Bill Rope, who was then on the China desk. They were pushing this course of action hard. This is what led to the communique of August, 1982, which got us into some trouble with arms sales to Taiwan. At that time the PRC were pushing very hard with the line that the Carter administration had allegedly made a commitment to terminate arms sales to Taiwan. We made a very thorough search of the files and we couldn't find any record of such a commitment. We talked to Zbigniew Brzezinski [former National Security Adviser to President Carter] and we talked to anybody else who might have knowledge of this matter. Finally, President Carter himself was contacted, and he said: "I never made such a commitment. I can tell you that I wouldn't have made it."

Then the PRC started to apply tremendous pressure on Ambassador Art Hummel in Beijing, Secretary of State Al Haig, and other people to terminate arms sales to Taiwan. So there was evidently going to be a big problem with China on this issue. At about this time a memorandum was submitted to President Reagan by Secretary of State Al Haig, following his talks with Huang Hua, the Chinese Foreign Minister, which referred to quality and quantity limitations on arms sales to Taiwan.

A good friend of mine, an FSO [Foreign Service Officer] at the State Department, called me up and said: "This memorandum is coming to the President. It's bad news. See what you can do." I tried to go to the State Department and get a copy of this memorandum. However, this memorandum arrived at the White House at 6:00 PM that same evening. I went to Dick Allen the following morning and said: "I've been told that this memorandum on arms sales to Taiwan is not a good thing and that we should do something about it." It had gone right through Dick Allen's office to President Reagan. It was described as a commitment made to the Chinese communists.

Q: I'm surprised that any President, and particularly Ronald Reagan, would allow something to come to him overnight, bypassing his National Security Adviser.

LILLEY: This happened during a period of 16 hours. You can't imagine the confusion in the Reagan administration in its early period in office. The administration had been in office for about six months, but things still hadn't been straightened out, and things were "slipping through."

Q: Do you think that Secretary of State Al Haig was "playing a game" and slipping matters through?

LILLEY: I would hesitate to put that "monkey on his back," but that certainly is what happened.

Then the PRC tried to ram something through by the tenth anniversary of the Shanghai Communiqué of 1972. This was in February, 1982. But they couldn't do it. This sinocentric group in the State Department went to the Chinese and said: "Look, Jaruzelski in Poland is a pro-Russian communist, and the Polish democratic force is coming up, under Lech Walesa. These are the forces we support, and this is good." The Chinese, in fact, didn't want Lech Walesa to win.

Q: Why anybody would advance an argument like that...

LILLEY: They had some weird ideas. They thought that, somehow, this would "soften up" the Chinese communists to get something done by the tenth anniversary of the Shanghai Communiqué. Well, the Chinese communists got tougher and tougher. Zhao Ziyang was premier at the time. He hit President Reagan very hard on this matter at a meeting in Cancun, Mexico.

Q: This was a meeting of the leaders of the principal economic powers.

LILLEY: I forget which one it was. It was a conference of leaders, and Huang Hua and the Chinese Ambassador to the U.S. pushed this whole concept of a limitation on arms sales to Taiwan in terms of quantity and quality. That had already gotten through us. Then, the next issue involved what was called the "F-X," a new fighter aircraft for Taiwan. It was similar to an F-16 A or B or an F-5G. The F-16 was made by General Dynamics, and the F-5G was or would be made by Northrop Aircraft. The assembly line at Northrop was running out of parts for F-5Es. Communist China had about 5,000 obsolete, MiG fighters, but it was time to improve Taiwan's inventory of fighter aircraft.

When this recommendation to President Reagan came through to the White House, the whole issue "leaked out," and there was an outcry from people who were very concerned about U.S. relations with the PRC and the way that Reagan was allegedly "messing them up." Articles on this issue hit the press and appeared in the "New York Times." The people who wrote these articles said that we shouldn't sell these aircraft to Taiwan, as such a sale would lead to a break in relations with the PRC.

I decided to take the whole issue and give it to the Defense Department "to do a study" as to whether the proposed sale of these aircraft would meet the defense needs of Taiwan. This procedure was in line with the Taiwan Relations Act. The question was: "Does Taiwan need a new fighter aircraft?" Charley DeSaulnier in the Defense Department prepared this study. I didn't trust CIA to do this study. I knew the CIA very well and didn't think that it would come up with an "objective" report. I had worked there and knew those people very well. In a word, they weren't "dispassionate" on this issue.

So Charley in the Defense Department did this study. He contacted me and said: "Jim, I'm not sure that you'll like this, but we really come out against the sale of this aircraft to Taiwan." I said: "Charley, this has nothing to do with whether I like it or not. I want to know what the objective situation is." In the report Charley made the case that Taiwan had a sufficient number of F-5E fighters to defend Taiwan. The assembly line at Northrop could be extended and continue to produce them. This aircraft was better than anything the Chinese communists had. The F-5E was a short-range, high performance aircraft. The study concluded that Taiwan didn't need a new type of aircraft, which would be unduly provocative. So this report went to the President, and the State Department immediately "leaked it" to "The Washington Post," under the headline that the Chinese Nationalists did not need a new fighter aircraft. The team at the State Department agreed with this view, and the "Washington Post" carried this story.

At this time I was getting ready to leave the United States for Taiwan to serve as Director of the AIT. A very high official of the Reagan administration came to me and said: "Well, do you accept the findings of the DIA report?" I said: "I really can't refute them." This man said: "Do you think that Taiwan needs a new fighter aircraft?" I deferred to the Defense Department on that question. Maybe I shouldn't have done this, but I did. Then the Defense Department arranged to announce that President Reagan had turned down the sale of the F-5G and the F-16A or B to Taiwan on the day I left for Taipei.

So I arrived in Taiwan against this background. However, my friends in Taiwan immediately concluded that this was deliberately done to screw me up. Maybe it was just a coincidence that it happened that way. (End of tape)

Q: You were saying that there was a strong, pro-PRC lobby within the White House or the administration.

LILLEY: There were people holding those views. I don't want to name them, but they were there, and you can pretty well guess who they are. I can't say that this was done deliberately, but it happened just when I was landing in Taiwan. The Taiwan people knew that I hadn't done this. I received very good treatment during the 2 ½ years I was in Taiwan, from January, 1982, to May, 1984. I stayed through the inauguration of Chiang Ching-kuo for his second term as President of the Republic of China. Li Teng Hui was Vice-President of the Republic of China. I knew them both. Actually, an unofficial, U.S. delegation headed by retired Ambassador Walter Stoessel was sent out for the inauguration. Before he retired, Stoessel had been Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs. A great guy. He had also been Ambassador to the Soviet Union and to Poland.

Very quickly, the Taiwanese authorities turned on the charm offensive. They figured that I was a new, political appointee, a supporter of President Reagan and Vice President Bush. They thought that I would understand Taiwan's needs better.

I arrived in Taiwan just as the "August Communique" [of 1982] was being negotiated between the U.S. and the PRC. That was a rough experience. Some of it was negotiated in Washington, and some of it in Beijing. The Chinese communists pushed very hard for the termination of arms sales to Taiwan.

Q: When did the "August Communique" come out? What was reason for it?

LILLEY: When the Reagan administration entered office, the Chinese communists told us that the Carter administration had made a commitment to terminate arms sales to Taiwan. We couldn't find any record that such a commitment had been made. Then the Chinese communists hit both Secretary of State Al Haig and President Reagan, saying: "You've got to do something about these arms sales to Taiwan. They are intolerable to China as well as deeply offensive to us."

In the fall of 1981 the Reagan administration started negotiating with the PRC for some kind of joint communique to cover arms sales to Taiwan. With the agreement of President Reagan the two sides agreed to include this term of reducing the "quantity and quality" of arms sales to Taiwan in the agreed language. Then the Chinese communists started pressing for a "date certain" for the termination of all arms sales to Taiwan. There were people in the State Department who were arguing that we should agree to this. The Chinese communists indicated that the alternative to this was a "downgrading" of relations between the U.S. and the PRC. They had just "killed the chicken to scare the monkey." They had "downgraded" relationships with the Netherlands for selling two submarines to Taiwan. This was clearly a message for the U.S. In other words, "If you don't agree to a date certain for termination of arms sales to Taiwan, we will downgrade our relations with the U.S."

Memoranda on foreign affairs that came to President Reagan from the State Department passed through the NSC. By this time Judge Clark, who had formerly been in the State Department, had moved over to the NSC. We were then able to watch much more carefully the recommendations going through to the President through the NSC. As I understood it, the memoranda from the State Department took the position that either we would set a "date certain" for the termination of arms sales to Taiwan or we would face the downgrading of relations with the PRC. By this time, as I was now in Taiwan, I didn't have access to these memoranda but I heard about them.

Q: The "downgrading" of relations between the PRC and the U.S. would have meant what?

LILLEY: Probably recalling Ambassadors and leaving the respective Embassies under Charges d'Affaires. This would affect us across the board in terms of trade and other matter. The Chinese communists always greatly emphasized trade. At that time, I think that we had a trade surplus with the PRC.

Anyway, termination of arms sales to Taiwan was being pushed very hard. In my position as Director of the AIT, I was being pushed very hard to see whether Taiwan would agree to this, if we could "sell" this proposal to Taiwan. I was brought back to Washington for consultations. The State Department pushed me hard on this issue. I returned to Taiwan and then wrote a message back to the State Department, saying: "This is the wrong thing to do, both in terms of the security of Taiwan and the Taiwan Relations Act." I said that we couldn't do this.

Meanwhile, President Reagan had already decided that he wasn't going to press ahead with the termination of arms sales to Taiwan. He said: "We'll risk a 'downgrading' of relations with the PRC." He got this message through to the PRC leaders at an authoritative level: "If you insist on our terminating arms sales to Taiwan, we're not going to do it." Then the administration worked out language on a decrease in the "quantity and quality" of arms sales to Taiwan, indicating that it would lead to some kind of final solution of the issue. They dropped all references to the termination of such arms sales to Taiwan and also insisted on peaceful means.

Then they worked on what they called the "six assurances" to Taiwan. I participated in the negotiation of these assurances in Taiwan, and there were also negotiations on this issue in Washington. These basically boiled down to the point that the United States would not pressure Taiwan to negotiate, the United States would not serve in an intermediary role, and the United States would not terminate arms sales to Taiwan. There were six such assurances. These points were all worked into a statement which John Holdridge made, subsequent to the communique of August, 1982. President Reagan's interpretation, as relayed through Gaston Sigur was: "Listen. This issue hit me at the last minute. I don't like it. I want you to understand that my intention is that in the implementation of this communique we will maintain a balance. If China becomes belligerent or builds up a power projection capability which brings insecurity or instability into the area, we will increase our arms sales to Taiwan, regardless of what the communique says about quantity and quality. That is my interpretation of the communique," he said. There is also a phrase in there that all of this is contingent on peaceful resolution of the status of Taiwan.

So, if China made belligerent statements and started to obtain a power projection capability, China would be breaking the spirit of the communique. That was our argument, you see, and this was the Reagan interpretation.

Then there was a "housecleaning" at the Department of State. Alexander Haig resigned in June 1982, as Secretary of State. John Holdridge was assigned to Indonesia as Ambassador, and Bill Rope was replaced on the China desk. I was in Taipeh when the new team came in. Paul Wolfowitz came in as Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs. I forget who was on the China desk in State. Maybe it was Don Anderson. George Shultz became Secretary of State. In short, we had a new team. A reason for this was that Paul Wolfowitz, when he was Director of Policy Planning, wrote a critical memorandum on the way that China and Taiwan policy were being handled. It was a brilliant piece of work. Sean Randolph, in the Office of Policy Planning, helped Wolfowitz write this.

Then Paul Wolfowitz was selected to be Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian Affairs. This made a big difference. Paul came from, let's say, a more conservative, hard line tradition but was brilliant, both in his personal relationships and in his handling of issues. He brought in Bill Brown as the Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian Affairs. Bill was "first class." He had a Ph.D. from Harvard in Chinese affairs. He had been a Captain in the Marine Corps. He had all of these credentials and had a very good record. Gaston Sigur moved into the NSC staff. He was a very good politician and a very smart guy, wired right into President Reagan. And Rich Armitage took over as Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs.

Q: When you were in Taipeh, did you have a feeling that this was a more "compatible" team with which you would be working?

LILLEY: No question. All of a sudden, things started to "pick up." This was not a "pro- Taiwan" group. These guys were going to open up to China. Rich Armitage had military ties being built up with the PRC. A lot of things were going on. We were beginning to arrange for the Reagan trip to China. Art Hummel, a professional diplomat, was Ambassador to the PRC in Beijing. We were beginning to push the relationship with the PRC forward. The comment was made: "Bring Reagan to China. Show him! He's never been to China. He's never met a Chinese communist leader." He once had a conversation with a Chinese communist leader at a meeting in the White House in March, [1982]. This appointment was intended to give him an opportunity to meet a Chinese communist for the first time.

So we got this Chinese official, Ji Chaoghu, who was Harvard-educated and had been Zhou En-lai's interpreter. He was "smooth as silk." We wanted to bring him to the White House and show him to Reagan. "Look, Mr. President, this Chinese gentleman speaks English" and so forth. However, the Chinese Ambassador, Chai Zemin, said that he would have to go along also at this meeting with President Reagan. Chai Zemin was an old, gruff revolutionary from western China, hard as nails, and with little subtlety. He came in and did all of the talking. Ji just sat there. I remember that after this meeting President Reagan turned to Ed Meese and said: "I told you so. I told you what kind of people they were." So this effort to introduce Reagan to a real Chinese communist didn't work out very well. That was in the spring of 1982. However, Paul Wolfowitz, Gaston Sigur, and Rich Armitage worked with Ambassador Art Hummel in Beijing to develop this new program to "open up" to China.

Well, they tried to do this on the issue of terminating arms sales to Taiwan. It didn't work. Their people never the less tried to push this proposal through. Then the Chinese communists had the idea of "courting" the Reagan administration. George Shultz, who replaced Haig as Secretary of State, was a very stolid person. He had had big business dealings with Taiwan when he was Chairman of the Board of the Bechtel Corporation. Also, Bechtel had been very much interested in making an opening to China. Shultz had a very balanced approach to this issue of normalization of diplomatic relations with China. He wasn't an "ideologue." He had firm convictions, but he was an American exponent of the business of getting things done.

Schultz had great confidence in Paul Wolfowitz and Gaston Sigur. He knew that they were probably a little more in favor of Taiwan than he was, but he could live with that. Schultz wanted President Reagan to go to China and look at it, because Shultz himself had gone to China. He said to Reagan: "Look, there's a lot that can be done there. They do a lot of things wrong but they're trying to do the right things." He said that the Chinese communists were thinking of moving toward "loosening up" their economy, moving toward bringing in free market forces, focusing on agriculture and then industry, and allowing "joint ventures" with foreign countries. He said that this made sense. The Chinese communists had stopped doing "stupid things." He said that it was time for the U.S. to become more engaged with China. He said that we would handle the issue of Taiwan "judiciously and wisely" and would fulfill our commitments to Taiwan. However, he said that we have to make our relationship with China more stable.

Shultz said that he was not going to listen to a bunch of businessmen crying about limitations on American technology transfers to China and saying that American business opportunities were being ruined. He said: "I don't buy that stuff. I know what's strategic and what isn't. However, I'm going to 'open up' to China. I'm going to help American business. I'm going to have talks with the Chinese communists about the Soviet Union. We have to move that whole process forward."

In the early days of the Reagan administration he had all of these hard-line, anti-Soviet types in various government departments who said: "Look, we'll talk to the Chinese, we'll work against the Soviet Union, and the Taiwan issue doesn't mean a damned thing." They would go over to the Chinese Embassy in Washington, soak up a bunch of "Mao Tai" drinks, and then come back to their offices and write memos saying that the Chinese communists were in our camp. They would say: "Don't worry about Taiwan."

Well, that was not true. Taiwan was a "point" issue on which the Chinese communists had focused. However, many of these hard-line, anti-Soviet types had come into office with the change in administrations in 1981. The very balanced, pragmatic team of Armitage, Sigur, and Wolfowitz also came in. They also had David Greis over in the CIA. He was quite a good guy and was part of their team. They dominated the scene. Gaston Sigur had the confidence of President Reagan, Judge Clark [National Security Adviser], Wolfowitz, and Secretary of State George Shultz. Rich Armitage had the confidence of Secretary of Defense Weinberger.

So there was a whole series of things going on. We started moving ahead on the sale of more sophisticated weapons and making technology transfers to Taiwan, which the Department of State fought hard against. However, we overruled them. At the same time we got the first deals going with communist China. We had negotiations going forward on the "Peace Pearl" program; the F-8 avionics program under discussion, which was a program worth $550 million; we had the ANTPQ artillery radar program; and we had the "large bore" artillery shell and the torpedo program going. All of these issues were under negotiation with communist China to help them against the Soviet Union. We started actively working with China against the Soviet Union in Afghanistan. We developed a real, strategic partnership.

At the same time Taiwan got the indigenous defense fighter with this new APG-67 radar on it. We got frigates, the civilian version of the "BLACKHAWK" helicopter, and the civilian version of the C-130 transport aircraft for Taiwan. These measures took care of several of Taiwan's defense needs, but not in a provocative way. So we really moved ahead on both tracks with Taiwan and China. The issues between them became less noisy because, at that time, we had Paul Wolfowitz, Bill Brown, and myself working with Mike Armacost, who was Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs. We arranged for Taiwan to remain in the Asian Development Bank [ADB] and remain active in it. Communist China was also admitted to the ADB. Here they were, China and Taiwan, sitting side by side in one organization, with ambassadorial level representatives. It was a "breakthrough"! This had taken us two and one-half years to arrange.

I must say that the first cables that came from the Embassy in Beijing said: "The World Bank formula applies. If Beijing comes in, Taiwan is out. There is only one China." We said: "Oh, no. Taiwan stays in, and Beijing comes in." There was a fight, but we won the fight. Then we had to convince Taiwan and Beijing. Fujioka, the Japanese representative in the ADB [Asian Development Bank], helped us on this. He developed a formula which both Taiwan and Beijing would join together to implement. That is, Taiwan would stay in the ADB, and Beijing would come in. The formula was very obvious: China and Taipei. Taiwan would change its name from "the Republic of China" to "Chinese Taipei." Taiwan stayed in the ADB, and then Beijing joined the organization.

This formula led to the APEC [Asia-Pacific Economic Conference] breakthrough and the GATT, which then was in existence. Things were really moving along at that time.

The big development came in 1987, when Taiwan opened its doors to China. The Taiwan authorities revoked martial law, they allowed travel by Taiwan citizens to China, and there was a marked improvement in relations.

Q: Let's talk a bit about Taiwan when you got there in 1982. What was the situation in Taiwan at that time, in terms of political and economic conditions?

LILLEY: Taiwan was on an "upswing," economically. They were developing technologically advanced industries. They had been involved in food processing, textiles, shoes, and that sort of thing. Then they started moving into the production of semi-conductors, transistors, electronic consumer goods, computers, and so forth. Taiwan was in a transition period, moving from labor intensive goods, for example, up to technology intensive industries. The Taiwanese economy was tremendously vibrant.

Politically, Taiwan was still fairly "stiff." The Taiwan government did not allow an opposition party. They called the opposition groups the "dangwat," which means groups outside the party. The government allowed the opposition groups to publish magazines and newspapers, and then closed them down if, in the government's judgment, they went "too far." The government gradually allowed them to express their views and began to allow them to take part in the political process.

A couple of developments occurred at that time which began to change things. The first development affected President Chiang Ching-kuo, a brilliant and visionary man. Early on in this process he had told me, indirectly but authentically, that first he was going to democratize Taiwan. Secondly, democratization was going to become a Taiwanese process. Thirdly, he was going to maintain prosperity, because this was the [gateway to] political reforms. Fourthly, he was going to open up to China. This information was passed to me in 1982. And he did this, making his moves very carefully.

He took his old, hard line mentor, Wang Sheng, who ran the Political Department in the military establishment, and sent him to Paraguay as Ambassador. [Laughter] He brought in an unelected, Taiwanese Governor, Li Teng-hui, as Vice President of the Republic of China in 1984. He made sure that I got to meet Li Teng-hui and to spend some time with him. We got to know each other. No one else was present at our big meeting. Chiang Ching-kuo began to allow more and more Taiwanese to begin to appear at public events, to have meetings, and so forth. He impressed people like Congressman Steve Solarz [Democrat, New York] that he was beginning to release the bonds on his people.

As I arrived in Taiwan in 1982, a Taiwanese independence advocate had been thrown out of a fifth story window and was killed. This was officially described as a "very mysterious death." Three years before this, the wife and two daughters of one of the leaders of the Taiwanese Independence Movement [name indistinct] were murdered. This former leader of the Taiwanese Independence Movement is now the Chairman of the DPP [Democratic Progressive Party] in Taiwan. This was "hard ball" stuff.

However, in 1982 the process of democratization had started. You could see the changes. It was a slow process, but Chiang Ching-kuo allowed Taiwan opposition politicians to begin to appear in public. He had to be sure that American support was firm. I think that by 1986, when David Dean came as the Director of the AIT [American Institute on Taiwan], Chiang Ching-kuo believed that the United States was fairly solidly behind him.

Q: When you arrived in Taiwan in 1982, there must have been considerable apprehension as to what the U.S. was going to do, on arms sales to Taiwan, for example. Arms sales were critical. If we cut off all arms sales, this could have led to a gradual weakening of Taiwan.

LILLEY: The Taiwanese became convinced that that wasn't going to happen. With U.S. support for the development of the IDF [independent, defense fighter] and the sale to Taiwan of U.S. made frigates, helicopters, C-130 transport aircraft, and M-48A5 tanks, there was steady action taken by the United States to provide for Taiwan's defense needs.

Secondly, Taiwan wanted access to U.S. Government officials. They had been largely "frozen out" since the visit to China by President Nixon. The Taiwan leaders thought that when President Reagan came into office, they would immediately be able to walk right into the Department of State and the White House. That didn't happen. However, what we did was discreetly to begin to meet with high level Taiwanese officials. We worked with them. They had appointed a Foreign Minister, Prime Minister, Minister of Finance, Chief of the General Staff, and Minister of Defense. Officials at the highest levels of the U.S. Government met with them.

Q: Was there any trouble about these trips with the Chinese communists. Did they object?

LILLEY: Yes, they would get wind of one of these visits and would throw a fit. However, we could tell that this was rhetoric, and not the real thing. The Chinese communists knew that we were dealing with the Taiwanese at an authoritative level and that they were getting military equipment that they needed. We also said to the Taiwanese: "Look, we've got an agenda with you. You've got security and 'face' problems. We're being 'ripped off' by you on our trade deficit and problems which have emerged in the field of intellectual property rights. You're 'killing us.' You're faking our pharmaceuticals, you've run up a huge trade surplus with us, and you are following protectionist practices against us. Let's focus on this."

When I arrived in Taiwan in 1982, we were spending about 90 percent of our time on security issues. By the time I left, in 1984, we were spending about 40 or 50 percent of the time on "our" issues, which chiefly involved trade matters.

Q: I was thinking of the intellectual property rights issue. As I recall it, people were buying "ripped off..."

LILLEY: Taiwan was the capital of the world for that. Fake patented items were cheap. It was all there. We established a committee of distinguished citizens to look into this problem. And what happened? Then Lilly Drugs would find out that the Taiwanese were "ripping them off." When they explained next, there would be guys with clubs who would come in and beat up their managers in their factory in Taiwan. This was really rough stuff. We brought in various people. I think that Kristoff and Peter Allgeier were involved. Clark Ellis was our economics officer in the AIT [American Institute on Taiwan]. They really pushed hard on trade issues.

We began to see progress. We began to get into the Taiwanese consumer markets and more effectively into their wheat markets. We began to see Taiwanese rice exports reduced. These had been "killing" our exports of rice to the Middle East. We were really beginning to get after these Intellectual Property Rights (IPR) offenses and curtailing them. We threatened to retaliate against some of the unfair trade practices in use in Taiwan and we had the instruments to use on these matters. We began to "drive home" on this issue.

The Prime Minister, was our primary contact. He was an extremely competent guy. He understood the problems and worked with us, while still defending Taiwan's interest. However, he knew that we were being "rooked" by these unfair marketing practices. We faced a huge Taiwanese trade surplus. They were "ripping us off" on IPR and so forth. They said: "Well, if you sold us those F-16 fighters, that ought to take care of the problem." We said: "No, that doesn't get into the question of commercial practices in Taiwan. That is a separate issue." Then they said: "How about selling us all of that Alaska oil?" Well, we have laws which prohibit us from doing that. They said: "Well, you guys aren't really 'serious.'" We said: "We can't take care of trade, if you act that way."

Q: What was the matter with the exports of oil from Alaska?

LILLEY: There was a law on the statute books at that time which provided that Alaska oil had to be sold in the United States. So we could not be flexible on this. They said: "Well, all you have to do is change your stupid law, and you can sell the oil to us. We'll buy your oil. We're buying oil from Indonesia and other places now. We'll buy it from you." We also thought that was just an excuse. What they had to do was to give us access to their markets, which were fairly tightly closed. Once we got into the Taiwanese markets and they gave us access to the "big ticket" items, like the nuclear power plants and the new meter system, we could make up for the trade deficit by their giving us these larger contracts for enterprises such as Taiwan Steel.

Q: By the time you arrived in Taiwan in 1982 and until you left in 1984, the American Institute on Taiwan had gone through its "teething period." Basically, it was an American Embassy.

LILLEY: It was very much of a "teething period" under Chuck Cross, its first, full- fledged Director. I think that Paul Popple was there earlier but as a diplomat. I forget who his deputy was. Chuck Cross had a rough experience. We appreciated what he had done. By the time I arrived in Taiwan, we were through the "shake down cruise." We were getting started. However, the difference between the AIT and a regular American Embassy was that we didn't have a Political Section, as such. Instead, we had a "General Affairs Section." We didn't have an Ambassador. We had a Director. We didn't have a Consular Section. We had a "Travel Services Section." We had no "National Day." We didn't fly the a flag. We had no Marine Security Guards.

Q: In fact, it sounds like an ideal arrangement! [Laughter]

LILLEY: We had the usual people assigned from the Foreign Commercial Service, from the Foreign Agricultural Service, and, of course, from the Foreign Service of the Department of State. All of the latter were FSOs [Foreign Service Officers]. They formally resigned from the Foreign Service and signed a contract with the American Institute on Taiwan for two or three years. Then, at the end of their tour with the AIT, they returned to the Foreign Service and were re-hired. The whole promotion cycle was kept the same. They were not "punished" for this service. So I think that, in many ways, it was an ingenious arrangement. It was legal. Yet we had diplomatic immunity, under an understanding signed with the Republic of China on Taiwan. One of our AIT wives unfortunately killed a Chinese on a road there in Taiwan, and she was protected from lawsuit. This happened while I was there.

Q: How did you find the Taiwanese as far as an observer of the Asian scene was concerned? Did you go to the Taiwanese Foreign Ministry and did their employees visit you in your offices? What did they think about events in Thailand, Indonesia, and so forth? Or did you pretty well concentrate on the American-Taiwanese relationship?

LILLEY: We really didn't have much to do with the situation in other Southeast Asian countries. We were primarily concerned with the American-Taiwanese relationship. I didn't meet Taiwanese officials at the Foreign Ministry. I generally met them at a guest house, although I went to the Foreign Ministry once or twice. I went to the Presidential Office, also, but "sub rosa" and without attracting attention. The Taiwanese officials had a sense that we were inhibited by these rules but that we knew how to "get around them." The Taiwanese officials had a saying that the "more senior people have a policy. The people lower down know how to get around it." They understood that we appreciated that we were going to be like President Li Teng-hui in 1995. We actually "changed gear" in Taiwan when he was Vice President of the Republic of China. I think that when I was DAS [Deputy Assistant Secretary of State], I went up to meet him in New York. State escorted him up to West Point for a VIP visit to the U.S. Military Academy. Then he went on to other places in South and Central America.

Li Teng-hui came to the U.S. in 1995, and the PRC pulled out their Ambassador and started firing missiles in the vicinity of Taiwan. I think that now Taiwanese senior people have to make a prior detailed request to visit the U.S. and it's harder to do. When I was there in 1982-1984, the Taiwanese knew that we were trying to do the "right thing" for them, although there were certain limits on us. It's a question of confidence and displaying that confidence through concrete moves. I don't think that they had that feeling of uncertainty in 1982-1984 that they had during the Carter administration. When they met Paul Wolfowitz, Rich Armitage, or Gaston Sigur, they knew these men, and they understood where they were from. It wasn't a matter of "fraternizing" or "condescending." I met high level Taiwan officials several times in a period of 12 months. There was just a natural flow of conversation between us. There was some very tough bargaining. However, at the same time they knew, for lack of a better term, that "our hearts were in the right place."

Q: I assume that Taiwan was sending a lot of students to the United States and that China was doing the same thing. Did this have any reverberations, with the students comparing their respective situations? Did Chinese and Taiwanese students get together in the U.S.?

LILLEY: Yes. I think that we saw that the whole air of hostility between the two sides was beginning to break down. Taiwanese students were mixing with students from mainland China, especially after 1987, when things began to open up. They saw more of each other, they got along better, they often lived together, and they went to parties together. I think that, to this day, there are, however, separate organizations on the various campuses. However, the former air of bitter hostility was ameliorating. At that time, 1982-1984, there was little direct contact between the two sides of the Strait. However, even when I was in Taiwan, I knew that Jiang Yen-shih had at one time been Secretary general of the KMT and had been President Li Teng-hui's "mentor" in the old JCRR (Joint Committee on Rural Reconstruction) under the Chinese Nationalists. The JCRR, with American aid, in fact rebuilt Taiwan. Y.S. Jiang was in there, running it, and Li Teng-hui was a "bright young man" in the JCRR. When Li Teng-hui became Vice President and later President in Taiwan, Y.S. Jiang came back in and, always interested in agriculture, was handling early exchanges with China on agriculture.

Even at that time we saw the beginning of trade links between China and Taiwan through Hong Kong. We knew that Chinese businessmen from the provinces were in Taiwan, exchanging goods and information. The head of one of the universities at Taichung, in Taiwan, went to mainland China frequently. However, they all had to be very careful until things opened up in 1987. Then contacts just "exploded."

Q: Is there anything else that we should cover in this 1982-1984 period?

LILLEY: I think that this was the period when things turned around in Taiwan. It led directly to the opening of closer relations between Taiwan and mainland China in 1987. Confidence was built on Taiwan, and President Reagan was able to go to mainland China without serious misgivings. Even before Reagan went to China in 1984, I was called back to Washington for consultations. I saw President Reagan, Secretary of State Jim Baker, and Vice President Bush. In short, everybody who was involved in decision-making. In effect, I was the U.S. representative in Taiwan and was important in this regard. I was asked to make the case to President Reagan about expanding our relationship with China. I think that the White House and the Department of State, under Secretary of State George Shultz as well, had a very good appreciation of this. Yes, President Reagan was going to go to China, but we were told not to worry about his attitude towards Taiwan. He knew what he was doing, and he was right. Of course, we wished that Taiwan would "take care" of our trade surplus, as we had taken care of Taiwan's defense needs. I think that, after that point, Taiwan really began to move on some of these issues.

Q: Was there any concern about the future? Yes, Taiwan was moving toward democracy, but at the same time you were trying to keep the "lid" on the whole "two China" system. As Taiwan moved toward democracy, this meant, on the face of it, that eventually people in Taiwan might say: "To hell with this. We're our own nation, and let Taiwan be our nation. This is one of the fruits of democracy." Was this view widespread?

LILLEY: We sensed that we were taking risks. When they actually organized opposition political parties in Taiwan and drafted the platform of the Democratic Progressive Party [DPP], the aim was independence for Taiwan. Those people who had pushed this, like Hsu Hsin-liang and other people, all returned to Taiwan from exile overseas and assumed leading positions in the DPP and other parties. I think that at that point some people became concerned about the direction of events. However, the KMT [Kuomintang, the official government party] was still winning elections by a large margin. Then, gradually, the DPP, the party of the Taiwanese, began to improve its position. They began to win more and more local positions.

At this time also, Chiang Ching-kuo opened up the whole political system. Up to this point a majority of the members of the Legislative Yuan or Parliament were appointed by Chiang. Most of them were holdovers from the mainland of China. Chiang opened up the whole structure to direct elections, in stages. As Chiang opened up the system, more and more of the people in the opposition were getting elected, but they were still a minority of the total membership, although a substantial minority.

President Li Teng-hui began to refer openly to the issues supported by the opposition and to speak out for a separate identity for Taiwan. He would lead the Taiwanese to their promised land, as Moses did to the Jews in Egypt. He said, "I feel strongly toward Japan," and "Taiwan deserves to be independent. We should be in the UN." All of this disturbed the mainland Chinese leaders. However, as they matured, particularly after the crisis in the Taiwan Strait of March, 1996, we were beginning to see a greater understanding by the more civil-minded, mature politicians. They began to appreciate that there were things that they had to be very wary about doing. In their hearts they thought that they deserved independence for Taiwan, they wanted it, and they were prepared to fight for it. However, they knew that this objective was not necessarily good for Taiwan. They knew that they couldn't handle that. They knew that there would be real costs involved in such a course of action.

I'm not saying that we were out of the woods yet, but there seemed to be a much greater degree of political maturity. The issues being fought out in that year's elections were not about independence. They involved corruption, social security, and greater economic development.

MARK S. PRATT
Chief, Taiwan Coordination Office
Washington, DC (1982-1986)

Mr. Pratt was born and raised in Massachusetts and educated at Harvard, Brown, Sorbonne and Georgetown Universities. Entering the Foreign Service in 1956, he studied Chinese and was posted to Hong Kong. Throughout his career Mr. Pratt dealt with Far East and Southeast Asian affairs, serving in Taichung, Hong Kong, Vientiane, Paris, Taipei and Guangzhou (Canto), where he was Consul General. His Washington assignments also concerned Southeast Asian matters. Mr. Pratt was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

Q: Today is February 9th, 2000. Mark, let's talk about the defense aspects, our concerns and issues with the Taiwanese.

PRATT: Fine, but as I said, I would like to revisit just one quick instance later, so let me do the defense side, and then I'll go back and pick up the last bit, because what we were really concerned about was where Taiwan might go. Would it's governmental system collapse? What were the tensions that would cause perhaps even more problems for the U.S.?

Q: Good.

PRATT: But in any case, the immediate one we felt we had to address in 1979 was what we could do to give to the people on Taiwan the feeling that they were not being abandoned, that their security would not be totally impaired, and that they would be facing Peking, a very hostile Peking at that time particularly (although Deng Xiaoping had recently moved in, he still had not been able to put in some of the sensible things that he subsequently did); however the major concern was that we had had to do several things as of January 1 and also within a few months. The first, of course, was to remove our ambassador, and the ambassador, of course, was a bit of a joke because ambassadors in Taiwan had been considered one of the major political ties because often they were chosen because of their influence in Washington and a voice they thought they would use to get through to the top levels, particularly the President of the United States. Then, of course, they had the ending of the Mutual Defense Treaty, and that was to be terminated in accordance with its provisions, which meant one year from notification. But of course just the notification of it was enough, a major problem. Then also, of course, the withdrawal of the Taiwan Defense Command and the Military Assistance Advisory Group, the MAAG. All of these, of course, represented, particularly for the military, but for others as well -

Q: Which military are you talking about?

PRATT: The Taiwan military. The last umbilical ties which they felt tied them in with people who really understood them and what their problems were. The military on Taiwan, of course, were very important politically as well as militarily, and in fact, they of course were one of the key political factors. If you looked at the composition of the standing committee of the KMT when I first arrived, you would see that it's still highly composed of security figures and old military, many of whom, of course, were military who had been given other jobs. In the National Assembly, the legislative then ex-military figures were very important, and of course they also were very closely tied in with the security forces, which were run separately by CCK (Chiang Ching-kuo), but nonetheless the Taiwan Garrison general headquarters was interwoven with other aspects, and military officers were . . . For example, the head of the police was a former marine general when I was there. The investigative bureau of the Ministry of Justice was headed by a military man. So you're dealing with a people who had been accustomed to having very close tie-ins with CINCPAC (Commander in Chief, Pacific), and they had an American admiral there they could deal with, and they had as the head of their military forces an admiral at that time because they thought that would deal better with the admiral in CINCPAC and the admiral at the Taiwan Defense Command.

So one had to provide a certain amount of reassurance. As I think we discussed before, there were security aspects which were very reassuring coming out of the Taiwan Relations Act, and in particular people like Senator Kennedy and Senator Pell and so forth were very anxious to make sure that there was a kind of military guarantee which would not totally replace the Mutual Defense Treaty but nonetheless would be as reassuring. That was the whole purpose of the Taiwan Relations Act in the minds of these people, to be reassuring to Taiwan. That, of course, was not in the mind of Carter. Carter was obviously trying to do things which would placate Peking and fulfill the Peking aspect of the negotiation and then also provide a sort of basis in law for having some kind of moderate office functioning in Taipei. But that was not what we read out of the Taiwan Relations Act, and that's certainly not what the people in Taiwan read out of it, and they were somewhat reassured.

Well, there was a moratorium on approval of new weapons approvals, but that did not mean that one could not continue to provide that which had already been approved. Also it did not mean that one had to stop studying what should be asked for and what should be approved once that moratorium was over. We did establish an office, which I initially somewhat supervised until such a time as people arrived on the ground (I made sure they got into their offices and their houses and all the rest of it), an organization of retired U.S. military, who would have background in the military supply field and in general, so a greater savvy about how you deal with military and how you address military problems, because it was going to be the only office we had staffed by military - ex-military, of course, just as we were temporarily ex-FSOs (Foreign Service Officers). In any case, we had a very gifted and competent person who was the first figure there. He was especially chosen by people in the Defense Department, somebody who had just retired, and that was Larry Ruppert, who did a very, very good job. And one had to sort of hold their hands, the hands of the Taiwan military, and keep them somewhat satisfied. And of course, following on with the arms sales was important, and we had people who could do that, but the thing is that the best aspect was that we had very competent Taiwan military officers who had worked at the MAAG for years, and they knew how to run all this, and they did a very good job as well.

But then, of course, we had to move on to the more conceptual level. We had to begin to consider what would be the kind of scenarios for which they would wish to have new approvals. In other words, you get military equipment to take care of problems. What were the problems which they envisaged? The traditional, old scenario had been one of Peking doing a combined forces landing on the southern plains, narrow plain of Taiwan, and therefore was an invasion force. This of course meant that there was still a very considerable role for the ground army, which, of course, was the major political aspect of the Chinese military, there as well as on the Mainland.

Q: It employs more people, too.

PRATT: It employs more people, it is a major way of having their universal military service, because they believed that it was important to have every person on Taiwan go through their military service because it was the only way to tell them that they should be working to defend the Republic of China. This was the government of their country, and so on. They still were bedeviled by what they considered to be their failure on the Mainland where it was more political propaganda, keeping the troops politically correct, than it was actually having military competence. So they had a political department, which of course is something which the Communists had, both Chinese Communists and the Russians, from whom they all were learning that lesson. And until basically near the end of Chiang Ching-kuo's life, that remained one of the key focal points of the military. The military, of course, had, as I mentioned, a role within the KMT structure at other different levels, and therefore it was important that you had some kind of organization which would be politically functioning in the military, and since they did not have a military commission within the party, it was the party commission within the military which had as its secretariat and operating structure the GPWD, the General Political Warfare Department. So these were elements we had to take care of at the same time that we addressed what they considered to be the new approach to danger, and given the fact that the chief of the General Staff was an admiral, not surprisingly, one of the major threats would be blockade and moving against Taiwan with something short of a full-fledged invasion force. So we then had to address the control over the air as being in the way of trying to prevent even a blockade and the use of navy ships against Taiwan, and therefore the key thing that we had to face up to was how do we continue to produce aircraft which would be up to a proper level? And there again, the proper levels had been circumscribed by what they considered to be the assurances given to Peking, namely that there would be only "defensive" weaponry. And you know that's one of the hardest things to do because, as you know, the National Rifle Association says all guns are merely defensive weapons, it's only offensive people who are the problem.

Q: By this time, though, the whole idea of a "Return to the Mainland" and all that was pretty well dead, wasn't it?

PRATT: Yes. Basically the KMT had to maintain a bit of this so long as Chiang Kai-shek was living. A lot of the people below that never believed it. But by this time already Chiang Ching-kuo had said that return to the Mainland would be 70 percent political and only 30 percent military, and that would mean that there would have to be a major uprising on the Mainland which they would come to support and exploit. "Return to the Mainland" was still something that they had to be concerned about, but how they did it was a difficult matter. By the time I left there, however, there was really no reference to "Return to the Mainland" at all.

Q: Did we have - I'm not sure if the term is "offshore procurement" or something - I know I was in Korea round about this time, and they were beginning to move into this "let the Koreans build parts for F-16s" and that sort of thing. Had we done anything like that in Taiwan before this?

PRATT: Yes, in the first place, we had found that Taiwan had a very, very good work force, and therefore whenever we moved in to arrange something, we found that we could always find a very good pool of people to be used for this purpose, which is why we had them as one of the major support areas for our efforts in Vietnam. We had a facility down-island where we would maintain and do high-level maintenance, which means that replacement and all the rest of that for the F-4s and other aircraft which was being used in Vietnam. And these things were being phased out and turned over pretty much to the Taiwan side. We tried to get them to do more. We had a joint production facility which we were establishing for the Northrop F-5E aircraft. I think this was the reconnaissance model, but I think we just referred to it as the 5E. The next one along, however, was going to be F-5G. So we tried to get them to crank up that, at the same time that they were keeping their old F-104s and F-100s even, which were then pretty long in the tooth. They were able to keep these flying long after any American would be interested in getting behind the wheel. So this was something we knew - they could keep up this maintenance, and we could move rather gradually on the F-5, trying to expand the production both in quantity and in improvement in avionics and radar and so forth and the flier controls. So we were building on that.

We also had to address the question of what we did about submarines. We approved the anti-submarine warfare equipment that had previously been offered, and we felt we could move ahead after the moratorium with an expanded program on that score because we felt that this would be clearly defensive. We had problems, however, with submarine-fighting submarines, and later on, when I was back in Washington, they went to the Dutch for this equipment, and so the Dutch had their troubles with Peking and so on. But all of this was being done in the way of trying to be reassuring, because the whole basic position in the State Department side of things, and to a certain extent a lot of the people who were more savvy about Taiwan and Asia in general did believe that this was primarily a political problem and therefore we had to take care of the political aspects of it, and they had to be equally as important as any kind of, shall we say, purely military examination of the question. So we had to be reassuring to Taiwan, and we had to make Peking believe that this was something they could put up with.

Q: Well, one aspect of a military relationship in a very politically sensitive area is that it implies a certain amount of influence, if not control. If you loosen these defense ties, was there any concern on our part that it might allow the Taiwanese military to maybe go on their own and cause a situation that we wouldn't like?

PRATT: We were not really terribly afraid of that because we felt that in the first place most of the military were pretty savvy, and they looked across there and saw just how big China was. And most of the top leaders were, of course, Mainlanders. And these Mainlanders, in their 50s and 60s, had all been raised on the Mainland, and they had in many cases brothers and sisters even who would keep them well abreast of what was happening on the Mainland. So despite the fact that there was a bit of a blackout by the government, which wanted to propagandize the masses of the people on Taiwan, the elite at the top would have no illusions about what was really going on there, and they knew that to recover the Mainland was for the most part a slogan, a political slogan to use to explain to the people on Taiwan why it was that you had a government primarily devoted to maintaining itself for a return to the Mainland rather than being primarily concerned about the welfare of the people on Taiwan.

Now, Chiang Ching-kuo was the one who made that shift, and he was able, I think, very successfully (and he had a lot of problems along the way) to be able to say, "Yes, fine, the return to the Mainland may take place, it may not, and One China is still our basic policy, but my primary responsibility is to the people whom I govern, and it's the people on Taiwan whom I have to provide for what they need," in other words for a democracy based upon the island only, rather than a system like that of his father, which was, "We are only temporarily here, and I'm exploiting this situation to be able to get back to the Mainland." Well, we knew that this was no longer in the minds of Chiang Ching-kuo himself, nor of most of the top political and military leaders. They were much too savvy for that. We also saw one of the major reasons they wanted to keep the umbilical cord to the United States and the fact that if we said no to something they'd jolly well better accept it, because they felt that this umbilical cord worked two ways. It kept the United States involved in Taiwan as the only guarantor.

Q: Well, now, looking at the other side of the hill, how were we seeing the PRC, its military equipment situation and all, because this was not a time when the Soviets were particularly forthcoming, and I was wondering about their equipment. One does not think of Mainland China as having a very technologically advanced military apparatus at that time.

PRATT: That's right. And in addition to that, as you said, the Soviets had not been giving them the upper levels of their own technology, because after all the clashes along the border were fresh in the mind, and some of them occurred even later. So one should note that, indeed, one's looking at a situation in which we would look at the Peking side and say, "Listen, their aircraft are 1950s type. They're not even up to the level of the F-100s and the F-104s. In addition to that, we've been upgrading avionics and radar in ways which the Soviets have not been doing and the Chinese have not been able to do on their own." So we would say this is what's maintaining a certain balance. And that's why we don't need to go make a big quantum jump. This, of course, was what began to give the concept of balance. Now balance between a nation of 1.3 billion people and 22 or 23 million people is obviously a very difficult one to be talking about, and I never liked that concept, but nonetheless it was one which was used which meant that you had to look at numbers and you had to look at capabilities. So if the Taiwan had smaller numbers but had much better capability, then that could create a kind a balance.

Q: Well, we really had been dealing and continued to deal with this situation in our other major problem area, and that is with Israel and the Arab world. We had a small nation with, at least at the time, a tremendous spirit, at any rate a considerable superiority in both effectiveness of the military and of technology, and was this sort of . . . I mean, you being an Asian type, did you even talk to the Near Eastern types?

PRATT: Oh, yes. There was quite a bit of this, and of course, the Israelis had their own little office in Taipei, and there were indeed . . . there was more, basically, of a feeling between Israel and Taiwan of similarities than later on, when Israel began to see the possibility of a bigger market with China, and China being able to play a different role vis-à-vis the Arab opponents of Israel. As you may be aware, one of the current problems now is how technology goes, they were saying, from the U.S. via Israel to Peking. The Israelis keep saying, no it's only their own technology, not stuff coming from the U.S. which goes there. But the point is that was for a later period, more than 10 years after that.

Q: Were you feeling that the Israelis, in light of the joint cooperation between the American military and Israeli military, were feeding special advanced avionics and all that type of thing, missilery and all, to the Taiwanese?

PRATT: No. Not so much technical exchanges, but the thing is they did talk to the Israelis about the special need of a small force against a big force and the small force having to have a qualitative technological edge, and so that was the only thing which we could see that Israel would do directly. The two sides went back and forth because they both were interested in various things going on in the Arab world as well, because Taiwan, for example, was running air control to Libya. So Taiwan was involved in Israel's back yard, providing technological assistance to the Libyan air force.

Q: Were we concerned about that?

PRATT: No, we weren't. We felt that it might, if anything, be a great advantage because there would be people there who would be able to tell us perhaps what was really going on. And of course all of this is a question of timing, and Libya claimed afterwards that the Taiwans were thrown out, but the basic thing was that Taiwan was trying very hard to get the U.S. as involved as possible and to get as high-quality weaponry as possible and to get what they thought would take care of the real dangers from the Mainland. And they still had not quite gotten up to the level where they'd be today with their concern about missiles and possibly something merging on nuclear warfare.

Q: Well, now, let's move on from the defense side to whither Taiwan and our concerns at the time. You left there when?

PRATT: I left there in September of 1981.

Q: You wanted to talk about that.

PRATT: Yes, I've already mentioned the fact that there was such a thing as the Kaohsiung incident back in December 1979 and is one of the key things which we had to spend a lot of our resources on. I had to mobilize to get people out of the Consular Section to go attend the subsequent trials and so on. But we saw this as an important incident for several reasons, not the least of which is what the impact was on Chiang Ching-kuo's concept of his government. There is a new biography that Jay Taylor . . . I don't know whether you've interviewed him or not, but Jay Taylor is doing a biography of Chiang Ching-kuo, and I think he's gotten a lot of things . . . It's John J. Taylor, and he's half the time in Arlington and half the time down in Florida. [Ed: Jay Taylor, The Generalissimo's Son: Chiang Chingkuo and the Revolutions in China and Taiwan, Harvard University Press, 2000]

Q: He was what, a Foreign Service officer?

PRATT: Yes, he served in the NSC [Ed: National Security Council] as well as in regular State positions. But Chiang Ching-kuo was a very key figure in the changes, and I think I've made it clear that when he started out he had to deal not only the Madam, who is still alive, but also a lot of his father's old buddies, some of whom are also still alive. They're now 101 and 102 and so forth. And he was therefore somebody who had had real problems when he came back from Moscow, and people tried to undermine his position with his father, but in the end he was able to prevail, and one of the key things was that Ch'en Ch'eng, one of his fathers oldest buddies who had been vice-president also, premier and so forth, died just in a timely fashion so that Chiang Kai-shek was faced with having nobody he really could bring in if he didn't bring in his son. So he brought in his son. Maybe he intended to do so anyway. We don't know, but that's always been a very strange relationship and something which I hope Jay Taylor's book is going to clarify. But in any case, he always felt he had to move very slowly, and just as he decided that moving more slowly would be postponing the elections, which were scheduled for December of 1978, he would therefore feel that he had to move the liberalization, delaying it by a year from his original schedule - because I think he intended to have relatively straightforward and honest elections, despite the fact that the KMT controlled much of the apparatus of local government and also of the media and all the rest of it - but nonetheless to let a larger number of people emerge who were independents, which would eventually lead towards a two-party system or a system which was not just purely dominant KMT party.

So this was not, however, moving rapidly enough for the Taiwanese, and so the Taiwanese established a human rights group, and then they had a magazine, and then from that they moved to organizing human rights demonstrations around the island. They were carried away by the fact that they were not greeted with heavy-handed reproach in their first demonstrations. But by the time they got to the Kaohsiung incident, well, in the first place, it was taking place at a time when the KMT was holding its party convention up in Yangminshan, just north of Taipei, and that was just the moment when the old timers could have made the most trouble for Chiang Ching-kuo if he had not dealt with a very heavy hand. So they did deal with it with a very heavy hand, and the Garrison Command forces moved in, and some say they even instigated riots against the troops in order to justify the troops moving in and beating up the demonstrators.

In any case, the KMT government had a trial of the main opposition figures, including the leadership of the Presbyterian Church, which went on for weeks. As I say, it was one of the key things that we had to be following. After all, the trial was a major event on the island, and this was the time of the Carter Administration with its emphasis on human rights. And we made it very clear to the government there that this was really not a very good way to handle this question, especially if it resulted in mobilizing a lot of people in the United States, such as the Congress, the American people, the media, and the scholarly community in a way that feelings about Taiwan were anything but positive. So this is a very negative event for Taiwan, and we, I think, were able to convey that. Ramsey Clark came out, and while they sort of dismissed this as the wild fringe of the Democratic Party, nonetheless, they got enough of a critique from their friends in the Congress and elsewhere that they realized that this had not been a good way to handle the opposition and it was not, therefore, the great victory which some of the old timers thought it was. Coincidental with the trial was the murder of the mother and two of the three daughters of one of the defendants arrested as being the instigator of this when he had not even attended. And this, I think, was a key thing in illustrating to Chiang Ching-kuo that his security services could be very, very damaging to the interests of Taiwan and also that they were not under sufficient control.

One of the things that Jay Taylor I think will be working on is the timing of the medical difficulties that Chiang Ching-kuo had. As a person with fairly severe diabetes, which was not kept under good control when he was younger, he had periods when he had considerable problems, and he would occasionally be in the hospital, but even if not in the hospital would not be functioning at his best. And, I believe, he may have had one of these spells, at about the time that they were murdering, for example, Lin Yi-hsiung's family members. [Ed: Wikipedia article notation "Lin was arrested in December 1979 for his involvement in the Kaohsiung Incident. In February 28, 1980 Lin Yi-hsiung was in detention and beaten severely by the police. His mother saw him in prison and contacted the Amnesty International Osaka office. The next day Lin's mother and twin 7 year old daughters were stabbed to death. Lin's older daughter was badly wounded in his home. The authorities claimed to know nothing about it, even though his house was under 24 hour police surveillance."]

Q: Did the fact that this was an unnecessary, unprovoked murder - was that known at the time?

PRATT: The KMT tried to give the impression that this was probably done by an American, Bruce Jacobs, who was a young American scholar then teaching in Australia and on the island conducting research. The authorities apparently selected him and inferred he might have been the one who went there and killed the mother and the two daughters. Of course, it was ludicrous. Nobody really believed that, but the thing is, it was their only way of trying at least to get plenty of newspaper coverage to distract attention to Jacobs and all the rest of it. But it was at the beginning a pretty shoddy thing, but it made us realize that this event closely implicated the security services, and in the end I finally came to the conclusion that this was probably something which had been encouraged by Chiang Ching-kuo's second son, Alex, who had always been a bit of an unguided missile. In any case, he had many friends within the security services, and he thought of this as a glamorous type of life. The story was that he was drunk at a bar and said, you know, "Really, somebody ought to take care Lin Yi-hsiung's mother and family to teach them a lesson," because the mother was even on the telephone to Taiwanese elements in Japan telling them how her son was being mistreated. Well, Lin Yi-hsiung is now the head of the DPP, the Democratic Progressive Party, and for many years after, however, being imprisoned and with, of course, the great shock of the murder of his mother and two of his three daughters (the third was stabbed but did not die), he somewhat retired from politics, but he's back in again. But in any case, this was something which most of the Taiwanese considered to be part of the nefarious activities of the security services.

And I think that this is something which Chiang Ching-kuo, ever the practical man, felt was, again, a bad thing. It made his job much, much more difficult. There he was; he had come out of these security services, and therefore he had to consider that this was one of the most powerful weapons, because after all they permitted him to get into power, and what if it were used by somebody else? This is where he decided he would cut back on this and try to tame these organizations to prevent the kind of freewheeling which they had felt they could do. Chiang Ching-kuo himself, I'm sure, felt that how could these people do things when I haven't told them to? And he had to realize that the political system was such that that could happen. Now this finally came to a head with the murder of Ch'en Wen-chen from Carnegie Mellon who was thrown off the fire escape of the Taiwan University, and then there was the late 1984 murder of Henry Liu in Daly City, California, which I think finally got him to clamp down and decide that he had to send his son off to Singapore. But that happened later.

Q: But up to this time, up to 1981, were we concerned about the Taiwan security people doing things in the United States?

PRATT: Yes, we knew they were doing them, and we knew that some of them, of course, were here on a declared basis. That was the National Security Bureau. When we got to the Henry Liu case a few years later, I'll mention something about the IDMND [Intelligence Bureau, Ministry of National Defense], which was a different type organization, but we obviously knew that this security organization was something which could create problems, and we always had difficulty in seeing that someone as bright and politically sensitive as Chiang Ching-kuo would permit these things to happen, and therefore how did they happen. Well, we had to figure that his health was one of the things. Secondly, we had to consider that he had decided that he needed to keep a strong hand and to provide a strong hand even if he were suddenly ill and in the hospital and if he were suddenly to die. And this is when he established this special organization which basically depended from his old-time right-hand man, Wang Shen. And this was something which could trump the government and the party, and this looked as though it was the organization that he was going to be putting into place and using to control things, in other words, how he will have an authoritarian system without an authority. In other words, he knew that he was the authority, but how could that system work if he weren't there? He had destroyed, basically, the old Leninist concept of having the party run various things. Because he ran the party, he could do certain things over here. He ran the military directly to do things over there. He ran the security services here, he ran the special committees on the premier and the vice-premier level to run the economy. So he was doing everything himself, but in an ad hoc system which was not limitless and therefore did not provide for an easy way for any person to take over. And this organization, which he set up and was basically set up in late 1980 or early 1981, was able to give instructions to various parties, bypassing the normal pattern. And this I think was basically designed to take effect either when he was incapacitated or if he were suddenly to die.

Q: Who was the designated heir or heir apparent?

PRATT: Well, that's the point. Wang Shen was the head of this organization, but he was considered merely to be the ad interim secretary general, and nobody was quite sure whether he would be the actual heir. And the question was, did his son, Alex Chiang (Chiang Hsiao-wu), did he believe that he could do this? What about would other people try to get him, either Chiang Ching-kuo's brother, Chiang Wei-kuo, or another member of the Chiang dynasty, would they go to meet Wang, who had been his former chief deputy in the non-military side of things? Of course, Wang Shen had been in politico-military and security side, and Lee Huan had been a party man, and would then he be the one who would emerge? And so this was how we were viewing things in 1981. As usual, Chiang Ching-kuo moved more rapidly than one anticipated, and therefore, the basic system that we saw emerging was rather disquieting because it was certainly not democratic. Two, it was not compatible with the electoral approach that Ching-kuo was doing. Third, it did not give adequate role to most of the technocrats, who were so helpful in running the economy and could have done a much better job in running the political system. And it seemed to have also no real structure about either the party or elections or the administration and so forth which would be stable because it was sort of designed to be an ad hoc thing, and could that move in and create a new structure? And if so, was the only reason the structure worked was that CCK was there, to use the other elements of the structure to keep things going?

Given the fact that his health had permitted such a decay of his ability to make sure the security services didn't do the right thing, we were very much afraid that this organization would be another one of those uncontrollable organizations. That was the way in which politics stood when I left in 1981, so we had concern because succession was indeed one of the key things. As you may be aware, there is a little office in the CIA which followed the health of many of the old figures in Asia, starting with Syngman Rhee and Sukarno and Chiang Kai-shek and then Chiang Ching-kuo and so forth, something which was the "'Thanatopsis' school of politics," as Marshall Green called it. We looked at this as something which was a problem, and back in 1985 even, and that's a few years later, the CIA was still saying that Peking was totally stable because Deng Xiaoping had a smooth succession to his two chosen successors, Hu Yaobang and Zhao Ziyang, whereas there would be chaos on Taiwan because Chiang Ching-kuo had not chosen a clear successor. And I took issue with that later, but that was a question, however, back in 1981 because succession was very much in the minds of everyone.

Q: Was there at all the idea that it might be a Mainland-supported Chinese group that might try to seize power, or was this out of the questions by this time?

PRATT: Well, this was not the way in which we viewed it. The old-timers would seize power for their own purposes. Now some of them might indeed be willing to work something out with the Mainland, but those KMT people who were on the Mainland, they did maintain a kind of shadow, what they called the "democratic Kuomintang," on the Mainland, but those figures had had no connection with Taiwan for so long that they were really out of it. The Mainland did not really understand Taiwan very well, any of its politics.

Q: Was there a merchant-industrial, rich-person class that was at all important there. In Iran I would talk about the bazaris. Was there the equivalent to that?

PRATT: In a way, yes. They were mostly Taiwanese because the land reform in Taiwan had resulted in stocks in the Japanese companies being given to landowners in exchange for giving up their lands. In other words, they did give them something, and of course, the bright people were able to parlay this into a developing capitalist economy. These were, therefore, mostly Taiwanese. When I was there, among the top 11 business, I think only two were headed by Mainland groups. The Mainlanders, of course, dominated the government corporations as well as, of course, the government itself. And so they indeed played a very important role because the banks, the power company, and all of these had government corporations in which there was private stockholding as well, and the Mainlanders would dominate this. But the Taiwanese businessmen were almost all kept in line by the KMT. They had to, for example, hire retired officers, colonels often, from the Taiwan Garrison general headquarters, nominally to take care of their security side of things, but really to keep track of the personnel. So whenever some people got to be a little bit too big for their britches, the government would find ways of getting at them. That happened, for example, when I was there with the Cathay Group, a very interesting family which fielded people for the KMT elections and also ran money and so on, and yet they felt that they were getting too big for their britches and not always listening when somebody in the KMT hierarchy told them what they ought to be doing.

But this was emerging, and most of these people, as I say, had to make their peace with the KMT, for example, the head of the Koo family, which is one of the wealthiest. They got their money down in the southern part of Taiwan through the cement corporation of which they were given the stock, the Japanese cement corporation, and they parlayed this into a much, much bigger cement operation, providing cement, for example, for the construction of Hong Kong. So Koo Chen-fu is now the head of the Taiwan office dealing with Wang Daohan, the former mayor of Shanghai on the Mainland. And so he, of course, is somebody, now in his 80s, I'm sure, who has made a great deal of money, was co-opted by the KMT (the KMT made sure he did make money), and then he in turn provides support, including support from the area down in the south where he comes from. So there were indeed businessmen merging, but they were still not a separate power factor the way they are now. Now they are a separate power factor, and many of them are supporting the oppositionists as well as the KMT. They have to be careful still, because a government which controls so much in the way of banking and insurance and approvals for construction and approvals for exports and imports and so on - when you've got a government like that, you have to make sure that you cover your bets. So there are some people who believe they can be very much independent from the KMT, but they don't necessarily try to skewer it.

Q: Well, looking at Mainland China, more today, but it was prevalent before, one of its serious problems is the rot of corruption throughout the military, throughout the political thing, nepotism, payoffs, local power, almost warlord governors and all this - had the KMT, being a smaller group, more under scrutiny, sort of cleaned up the act better than -

PRATT: Somewhat, somewhat. Of course they brought with them the old corruption from Nanjing and from Shanghai. But so much of this was gathered into the hands of the top leadership that they didn't, of course, need any corruption because they could get whatever money they needed. The slush fund for the president, for example, was enormous. And so if, for example, somebody whom he liked, he wanted to please them for one reason or another, he would give them the money so their son could go study abroad. However, one should keep in mind also that there is the corruption of power as well as the corruption of money, and this is when I was in Guangzhou, for example, people resented much more the corruption of power than they did the corruption of money. They didn't mind a bit of money being spent here and there and so forth, but when they found that their kids would be disadvantaged in going to a university because of politics - as those in power created set asides which advantaged high party members' children.

And of course from the Party's point of view, favoritism should go for advantaged party figures. So that system is run just the opposite of our system. And the public resented that. Well, that is true in Taiwan as well. When you look at the early people who came to the United States to study from Taiwan, in the '50s and even up to, well, basically, to the '50s, the Mainlanders were far more numerous than the Taiwanese, despite the fact that the Taiwanese are 85 percent of the population and the Mainlanders 15 percent. That, of course, evens out during the latter part of the '50s, and then of course there was not that much of a variation, even though the perception remained. But, as to money corruption, indeed, people supported themselves through that because they all had this relatively Leninist concept, which is you don't trust people by giving them a decent salary so they can get what they want. You keep control of them by: you are in charge of their housing; you are in charge of the education; you give them a small allowance, the way you would give to a teenager, to buy what a teenager gets; you have the car given to this (when you want them to have a car); you have servants provided; and so forth. So everything is part of the perks. It's not something where they have the money to do this. So anybody who wanted money, because they wanted to buy their own brand of cigarettes instead of taking the cigarette ration, would have to find a way of doing that. And that was true, of course, of customs.

When I first was going back to Taiwan in 1959, I traveled on the plane with somebody whom I had known in Tokyo for American Cyanamid. At that point they were engaging in the first big venture in Taiwan. And American Cyanamid said it had taken so long to get something going, because they were going to be producing, I believe, insecticides and fertilizers for Taiwan - things which everybody at the top political level, of course, wanted done - but you had to go through all these other offices, each one expecting something for him to make the approval. That's the system, which is not terribly different from what it was and is still on the Mainland: power translates into money, and you need a bit of money, but at the top level, whence you have the power, then of course you can have your access to all the things that money buys. Deng Xiaoping didn't have to take a penny. If he wanted a private train to go south, he'd get a private train to go south. He didn't have to figure out how many first-class tickets he had to get for his wife and entourage.

Q: Alright, well, why don't we move on now? In 1981 you went back to Washington, and you were in Washington from 1981 to '86? When you first went there, what was your job?

PRATT: I was deputy in the Regional Affairs Office of the East Asian Bureau.

Q: You did that how long?

PRATT: A little over a year.

Q: Well, let's talk about that first.

PRATT: There's not much to talk about that, because this is one of the stranger offices in the Bureau. We did have a politico-military officer in it, who was, I think, useful and handled relations with PM (Political-Military Affairs) and handled things of that sort, and yet many of the other things I found very strange and often better handled by individual desks, but they did want to have something, I guess, some people to coordinate and to attend meetings and so forth. One of the few things I did was try to defend the budget of the Asia Foundation, and that was under attack within the State Department. The State Department had odd people who did not wish to go to the Hill to defend the budget. We were, however, able to get around that because we did have Under Secretary Whitehead, who was gotten to by the Asia Foundation people, and they made, I think, a very good case. I've always been rather impressed by the role of the Asia Foundation in the countries I've visited in Asia, certainly in Laos and also in Taiwan, and felt that they did make a considerable contribution.

Q: At that time, what did the Asia Foundation do? What was the Asia Foundation?

PRATT: Well, the Asia Foundation was established with money coming in from various private donors but getting also support from the U.S. Government to manage many programs which were more easily done in countries where there was great suspicion of the U.S. Government and USIA (United States Information Agency) for example. And the Asia Foundation could handle these things and make grants, get people to the United States for study of agricultural economics or something of the sort, and do this in ways which were less offensive to people like Sihanouk. They had a very active and very good program in Cambodia at the time when Sihanouk was very much trying to reduce at least the visibility of the American role, in part because, of course, he wanted to do what his French friends wanted done, but also, of course, to diffuse criticism from leftists in Thailand. They did a very good job in Laos when I was there, and they were just sort of an additional wheel for the Americans and its approach and were more adaptable to the circumstances of a particularly occasionally than USIA could be, because USIA, of course, had much more direct Congressional supervision and all kinds of regulations and so on, whereas the Asia Foundation, once it got its money from Congress and, of course, it got most of its money from private donors, it was able to decide things as they saw fit. We found them basically to be a very good use of U.S. Government money.

Q: What was their tie to the academic community?

PRATT: Very close because they often drew on academics, and some of the professors would go off then to be head of the Asia Foundation in the country in which they had their specialty and then would go back to academia after having lived in this country and after having deepened their understanding of what went on there through actual working with the people in those governments. So we really felt that that was a really good one.

Another thing which was coming up at that time was what they called a Foundation for Democracy, the new organization.

Q: Yes, I can't think of the name. The United States Institute of Peace. No.

PRATT: No, this was a new organization which was being established with U.S. Government funding to support democracy abroad. Now this is what Bill Bradley says, you know, "If we can spend 800 million bucks on this program promoting democracy abroad, then why can't we use a similar amount of money out of the American coffers to pay for democracy back here in the United States?" - in other words, to have all campaigns handled through direct government funds. So as I say, this was in its early stages, and it was being run out of the, I guess, the office of the under secretary for political affairs. And I gather it's functioning pretty actively now, but it's U.S. Government funds plus private funds. The CIO [Ed: Congress of Industrial Organization] was very interested in this, and they were one of the major contributors, both of funds and of personnel and so on. So it's again one of those things which may be effective, but we certainly had plenty of time to see that the Asia Foundation was very effective in the very early years. I mean, it's like several other things. There had been a connection with CIA, and CIA had put up some of the seed money for this many years before, but CIA had been out of that business for so long, it had been direct government funds coming from the Congress.

Q: I can see that things of this nature that concerned you, knowing the activism of the Department of State, the Bureau of Asian and Pacific Affairs and all, everywhere else, I mean, you know, it's what's in the paper today. This is not the sort of thing that seizes the movers and shakers within the Department of State.

PRATT: That's right. This is something which they know they've got to do but it's one of those things which is done after they take care of the latest crisis in Indonesia.

Q: Was there any other issue, or should we move on to your next job?

PRATT: Well, there were a number of other issues, but I don't think they were ones which were of really great moment, and I think we competently handled these serious questions and made a good input, but it was not even like, shall we say, the Youth Committee that Bobby Kennedy had established in the State Department, which poor Chip Bohlen had to handle. That was several years earlier, and I tried very hard to get a program going which I thought would have been very important, but the Defense Department was against it, so of course nobody was going to stand up to Defense. But we didn't have any programs like that, which I think were important, and then the democracy thing, with so much being run, as one would expect, by political appointees for their political reasons - they thought they had to do it because of the Congress and because people had, you know, Reaganomics, you have to have Reagan politics as well - so these things were ones we had to pay attention to, but they certainly, to my mind, were not nearly so interesting as what was going on next door, because my office was right next to the Taiwan office, and this was the time when they were still going through the early stages of Reagan's China-Taiwan policy.

Q: Okay, so in a way there would be a fall back because obviously you were keeping in touch. When did you move to the Taiwan office?

PRATT: That was in 1982, after the August, 1982, communiqué was arrived at, so it would have been September.

Q: And you did that until 1986.

PRATT: That's right.

Q: Okay, let's talk about how you were seeing, at that time and even maybe lapse over into the time when you were doing the regional affairs - the Reagan Administration took office in 1981, so you sort of arrived there in the Reagan Administration.

PRATT: That's right.

Q: There must have been a lot of apprehension about this new crew, because Reagan came out of the right wing of the Republican Party, you think of Senator Knowland and all that, and having been governor of California. He'd made his obligatory trip to Taiwan and all that. There must have been concerns about "Oh, my God, we're going to go back to square one or something like that."

PRATT: Well, as you can see, during the campaign, in 1980, already we were well aware of the various difficulties that could arise, how Reagan, who had a certain tendency to say what he really thought - and sometimes that was good, sometimes it wasn't - one of the visitors we had during the 1980s campaign time was George Shultz, and he of course was then at Bechtel, and we certainly got a very favorable impression of him, and of course we asked him whether he expected to be Secretary of State, and he said, "Oh, no, I don't think so because, after all, there are others who are standing in line ahead of me, and in order to balance things they are going to have to do something else, because Reagan is going to really have to take care of other aspect in the Republican Party. So we saw Allen, and we thought Allen did a very good job pulling Reagan back from-

Q: Allen being?

PRATT: Richard Allen, the Asian advisor who redrafted what Reagan had to say about Peking and Taiwan after Reagan had said that he was going to reestablish relations with Taiwan and send an embassy there; and Allen was able to pull that back, and then he took over as the principal Asian advisor in the White House. And this was at a time when Jim Lilley, for example, went there. And it looked as though they were going to be able to keep things on a good even keel, you know, taking care of Peking over here and Taiwan over there and the Congress behind them and the American military on the side. So it looked as though this might move fairly smoothly, but of course in the State Department we had Al Haig and we had John Holdridge, and we had a number of others who were drawn from a very different wing of the State Department, so to speak. And so we saw very quickly that Allen was not finding it easy to keep control. And then of course he got caught in the watches and money in his safe.

Q: He was the national security advisor.

PRATT: That's right. So he had to resign.

Q: It was a minor scandal which really had very little substance.

PRATT: I think it had very little substance and, knowing him, not well, but knowing him, I knew that this was the last thing that he would have been interested in. He probably just hadn't yet figured out what he was supposed to do with this stuff, and he probably didn't have anybody who came to him and said, "Well, listen." - a secretary who would say, "I'll call security and we'll call in the legal advisor and we'll find out how we handle all this." So this is when, for example, Jim Lilley decided he ought to bail out, because he was the Asian man under Richard Allen, and he bailed out and went to Taiwan because he knew that there was going to be a rough time in the White House at that point.

So Al Haig... Al Haig had been - how should I say it - if we think Brzezinski had been influenced by Kissinger, Al Haig certainly had, so he had great dreams of a big geopolitical thinker. One of my friends, a young chap who worked with me in Taiwan, worked on his staff and basically he sort of said, "Make sure that you don't get Peking screaming about anything. Give them whatever they need to stop them from screaming" - because he wanted to placate Peking. He felt that that was the great geopolitical thing he had to do in order to be able to keep the Soviets in line and all the rest of it.

Q: This has been sort of the major instrument of Mainland China, of protesting and screaming about everything and with considerable effectiveness.

PRATT: Quite true. Now I never was able to get the precise information as to why we'd even started negotiations with them about limitations of arms supplies into Taiwan because we had handled this in the recognition communiqué - in other words, that there would be a gradual... that we would address the arms question. But there was nothing about when and why we should pick this up, and frankly, I believe that it was basically persons who wanted to negotiate with Peking because they felt that this was one way to get them to stop complaining about something. In other words, this is what I feel to be one of the biggest problems we face in dealing with China: we do not analyze what it is they are really trying to get and whether we are going to be prepared to give it to them, and so we go off and talk to them. As we well know, Clinton loves to talk to everybody, but that's not necessarily the best option in dealing with China. If you're not prepared to give them what they want, you know, you face what they call - one we come up with, a verbal formula - "much thunder but no rain." And this was not necessarily helpful. But they were balled in this negotiation, which resulted in the August 1982 communiqué on limitation of arms sales to Taiwan, on which they had persons who did not understand how we gave arms because they weren't permitted to discuss this with the people who did the work. They therefore had to do it on the basis of good, high, lofty principles, and do it with little verbal tricks like "in quantity and quality" et cetera. And it resulted in an agreement with Peking which was basically inoperable.

Q: Did you have the feeling when you were in East Asian and Pacific Affairs - I mean you came hot out of Taiwan, and obviously you were very sensitive to this even when you were in the regional thing - did you feel that Taiwan had been sort of thrust in the background and that you had sort of a team that was thinking only of Mainland China, that was both caught up, you might say, in the glamour of dealing with this and was from your perspective and maybe that of some of the other colleagues more willing to make concessions than you felt was justified regarding Taiwan?

PRATT: The short word is yes. Let me say a bit more, though, because in addition to people being sort of interested in the big question, namely Big China rather than Small China, these were persons for the most part who had been associated with the Kissinger approach to China under the Nixon Administration. And while I think that Kissinger is a little more realistic certainly than Al Haig - Al Haig is more of an ideologue than he is a real realist as I think Kissinger can be. This was a crew which was given a great deal of leeway because of the fact that Richard Allen was out and we did not have a strong group in the White House yet. And they also had, I believe, inattention on the part of Reagan, with nobody to go to Reagan and say, "Do you realize what Al Haig is doing?" Now that finally happened, and that was when Al Haig, of course, was out. But that was a little later, when Judge Clark, who had been deputy secretary, supposedly the one designed to keep an eye on Al Haig for Reagan's purposes, went over to the White House, and then he was able to get the word through that Al Haig was not following through on what Reagan wanted done, particularly in meetings with China.

But I was not involved in the negotiations of the August communiqué. I was not even able to follow them closely because, of course, this was handled very, very tightly, and they wanted to keep any of the persons who knew anything about Taiwan or really were concerned about Taiwan out of it, because they saw this as a somewhat adversarial situation because as on the occasion of the recognition communiqué they felt that if any of this leaked to the Congress the Congress would be very annoyed. We have seen afterwards, as you know, the Congress had said that the Taiwan Relations Act should take precedence over the communiqué. This, of course, is just the sense of the Congress, but the thing is it shows at least that there is a problem they have with these executive agreements, which of course also have the force of law. Obviously the Congress considers that the Taiwan Relations Act, as an act of Congress, wherever the communiqués are in disagreement with the Taiwan Relations Act, it is the Taiwan Relations Act which takes precedence. And I think that that is a defensible position. Then again, you can say that because this agreement took place after the Taiwan Relations Act, and the President was well aware of the existence of the Taiwan Relations Act, this is merely a refinement of the Taiwan Relations Act. But you're going to get all kinds of political struggles, but it is a political problem. And we saw that from the very beginning in the way in which they were doing this communiqué. But even more important that that, when I assumed my position handling the Taiwan Coordination Office, was how we implemented something which was drafted by amateurs.

Q: Who were the drafters? I've interviewed John Holdridge and Chas Freeman, but who were you seeing as the principal drafters?

PRATT: Well, Bill Rope was the head of the China Desk at that time, and he was one of the key persons doing the actual work. I believe he's now in Nanking. But he was however taking guidance of an intellectual basis from Chas Freeman, so Chas, I'm sure, can tell you exactly why they felt they had to do it this way. Chas was out of the loop. I've forgotten whether he was still in Bangkok, but he was very much the . . . Rope was his protégé. He'd gotten Rope into this job by arguing in favor of Rope for getting it, and therefore this was part of that particular combine. And another figure, of course, was Holdridge because Holdridge had to approve all of this, but I don't think he would have been doing most of the drafting. Obviously he would take care of certain little points, just as he felt that he had taken care of certain points for the Shanghai communiqué, but of course good old Marshall Green felt that he's the one who did that. Well, in any case, the major concern was to provide something which would take care of Peking's squawking; however, one of the big problems is that you cannot take care of Peking if what you do is not going to be in line with what they think an agreement means. In the end, of course, we've been doing things which aren't even in accordance with the agreement according to what we think it means - because, of course, it can't be done. But as I said, my principal task there, and it was a very important one, and I had one officer who spent basically all of his time working on this, and he was a very competent chap who subsequently left and went back to the University of Virginia Law School and, I guess, is probably enjoying his life as a lawyer instead, but nonetheless, he was a very shrewd chap. However, we missed out on certain things because, of course, the Department of Defense people were the ones who had to handle this primarily.

Q: It was essentially an arms agreement, wasn't it?

PRATT: It was a very vague statement that the arms would be limited to the quality of what was already in Taiwan's inventory. There would not be an increase in quality. Secondly, there would be no increase in quantity, and in fact there would be a gradual reduction leading to an eventual end of arms sales to Taiwan.

Q: It sounds like a sellout.

PRATT: Of course it sounds like a sellout, and of course double sellout when you say "limit quality" it has nothing to do with the qualities on the other side. And if you take quantity, then of course, given inflation (and arms inflation prices generally go up even more rapidly than regular prices - a loaf of bread), so that just even by keeping it even you are going to be ending up by reducing. So this, of course, went even beyond that. But the big problem was that arms sales to Taiwan are of two sorts. One is FMS (Foreign Military Sales), in which you have agreements to sell something, and that sale is considered to have taken place at the time of the signing of this agreement, not at the time when the goods are actually delivered. Secondly, you have what you call commercial sales. These sales do not take place in accordance with any agreement, and therefore their accounting system was on delivery. Well, something which was sold this year may not be delivered until next year or the year after that, and how are you going to keep track and keep in trade those things which are accounted the minute you approve them right now and those other things which may have delivery from previous years, which you cannot figure out and control when they are going to be. So it meant that the Department of Defense was engaging in various kinds of shenanigans.

We started out also by taking the highest previous years of arms delivery, which were not just the immediately preceding years because there had been a moratorium on arms in 1979 and going through 1980. So we had to then adjust that for inflation, which gave us our base figure. Well, of course, Peking immediately objected to our picking the average of the two highest previous years or the highest previous year, whatever it was, and then adjusting it for inflation and then using that as our base figure. They objected to that, of course, as we expected they would. Then, of course, they wanted to see very rapid reduction. Well, instead of that, because of the previous moratorium, we, if anything, were having even higher figures. But then in addition to that, the commercial sales would occasionally bunch up and come at a time when we had figured that we had plenty of space for these commercial sales, only it turned out that with a given FMS approval, which had to be counted because they were reported to the Congress - and we had also the figures coming in from U.S. Customs about the actual delivery - and you'd go over rather than being under.

So we had some very incensed people at one point. Mike Armacost was furious because he thought that we had let the Department of Defense get away with having commercial sales which we should have stopped. Come on, they had taken place long before we even focused on them, and they weren't trying to make this trouble; it's just that they did come through that way.

Q: Well, coming back to the basic thing, as you describe the communiqué to me, it sounded like the idea was to let Taiwan wither on the vine, which was absolutely opposed to how certainly Congress viewed its relation with Taiwan. And I would have thought that you would look at this, particularly from the Taiwan point of view, and say, Okay, we'll play this game, but this isn't essentially going to work because of the Congress and the American public.

PRATT: That is true after Paul Wolfowitz, or even before Paul, when Gaston Sigur came in to replace Holdridge as the Assistant Secretary in the Asia Pacific Bureau. By that time, Haig was out, and Shultz was in and we were able to get back to a much more stable approach to China and Taiwan and to China as viewed by Congress as well as by the President. I gather that it was Judge Clark who considered that he was responsible for blowing the whistle and telling Reagan just what the communiqué meant and how it was going to be in conflict with the Taiwan Relations Act, and it certainly resulted in a kind of selling out of Taiwan - something which Clark knew that Reagan had not intended to do.

So Reagan himself had been following these various communiqués, and when the final one came through with the notation, drafted by Bill Rope and okayed by Holdridge and so on, to the effect that they thought that Peking was still demanding that there be a time certain for an end to the arms sales (and also they wanted to have something more concrete about gradual reductions), Reagan scribbled on that, apparently, if they won't take this version, then go back to the drawing board because he would not accept these options, because, of course, always these things go through with high option, low option, and so on. And he took the medium option, but the thing is . . . No, I'm sorry, I guess it wasn't the medium option; it was the high option, saying that it had to be what it was and no budge on the dates. And he said if they don't like this, to hell with them. And so what Peking did, preemptively, was accept the version which had been negotiated, and of course many people considered that these American negotiators were basically just trying to present Peking's view to find a way of sneaking it through, believing that the importance of the U.S. relationship with China was so much greater than any of this crap about Taiwan, that the best thing to do was to find out from Peking what they thought would fly. They still thought that it would not fly without a date certain, and so they were a bit surprised when Peking . . . Well, they were surprised when Reagan said no, there's no question of a date certain. And then they were surprised when Peking accepted it. But I think that Peking got the word that they had gotten as much as they were going to get, and they were therefore anxious to take what it is they could get. Deng Xiaoping was a very practical man.

So as I say, we knew this was not done the right way, and it was not really in accord with what Reagan thought, and you'll hear Jim Lilley, for example, saying, "Well, the real meaning of that communiqué is what Reagan said it was, which was, 'This is not just something which is posited on Peking's having a peaceful policy towards resolution of the Taiwan question, but in addition to that it depends upon balance.'" In other words, we must still maintain a balance in the Taiwan Straits, and that this is the message which Reagan basically gave to congressional people who called on him and objected. And it also can be found in what it was that Holdridge said to the Congress when he went up to defend the thing. But we had to take these various threads and try to figure out how we could in action make the communiqué mean something which was acceptable to Taiwan, which would work with the facts in Taiwan - which was, of course, not easy because it did provide for an accounting system which was impossible to use, and we were bound to alienate basically probably everybody by trying to band together apples and oranges. And this was therefore again a big problem: what do we mean by "no increase in quality"?

When Gaston was there and even more when Wolfowitz was there, we were able to get through the concept that "no increase in quality" means that if something which they have in their inventory is no longer available and it's no longer produced, then you can move to the next higher level of quality because that's all there is. It does not mean that you have to artificially create something which is as limited as what it is they already have. This is why we are able to get to the whole question of how they get the new aircraft such as the F-5G.

Q: F-16 - that wasn't -

PRATT: That was disapproved. We had F - 16, we had F-4, and even some F-18. One of the reasons why F-5G was considered a good bet to begin with was that it was made in southern California, and the head of Northrop was a good friend of President Reagan. And he was able to say, "Listen, I've got a great aircraft. We'll call it F-20 for others so it will look like a really advanced one, and we'll call it F-5G for Taiwan so it's only one grade up from what they've already got, the F-5E."

In any case, this was one of the key problems. We were able to move to increase the level of avionics, the fire control, and air-to-air weaponry, and so forth, which therefore would maintain a qualitative edge for Taiwan to give them the continuing increase in numbers.

Q: You're figuring all the time, okay, these agreements are going on by people who maybe don't understand what it is, but - we're talking about this 1982-86 period - you were looking at this with the bench line of saying we want to make sure that the Taiwanese don't lose their technological edge.

PRATT: That's right. Also, of course, we still considered it within the political framework and therefore, one, we had to try to make sure that we could at least provide an explanation to Peking why we were doing this. So we had to work that out. Secondly, we had to try to be reassuring by showing that there was still a pipeline and the pipeline would not be something which was useless. It would give them things which would take care of their needs. Now obviously Taiwan always wanted a good deal more than we considered were their actual needs. They of course want something up here; we suggested something down there. When this came to quality, as I say, we had to crank it up, make a meaningful increase, but something which could be presented still to China as not being a breaking of the technological provisions of the 1982 communiqué.

Then when it came to ships, we were going to provide design; they were going to send experts here to study what it is that we produced, and then they were going to build the ships themselves. And this, in the end, I guess they really didn't do. They have since bought some frigates from elsewhere. But some of the persons hewing to the Peking line would say we violated the agreement by providing technological information and other things in order to get around the fact that we weren't going to make the actual sales. Well, we don't agree with that, and we didn't defend it that way to Peking. We defended these approvals to Peking as being ones which were, indeed, just one cut above what it was the Taiwan already had, and about as low as you actually could produce given the state of the art of the day. So we didn't try that particular way to get around the 1982 agreement.

We then went, of course, to defense, radar, and radar control and so forth, and we got that basically sort state-of-the-art, because it's so purely defensive that we felt that a defensive thing would trump the fact that you don't give somebody an old vacuum tube radio when you've got microchips and all the rest of it. And then for the tank, we did a rather bad hybrid because they already had the M-48 tank, and we combined the M-48 turret with the M-61 (whatever it was) chassis, and that would keep the tank production in the United States going, because remember, we had also considerable contacts with the American arms producers for whom Taiwan was a very good market. They paid hard cash. This was not something where you would wait 10 years maybe to get the money back, and so everybody was of course anxious to sell to Taiwan, and they would come and talk to us and talk to the Department of Defense and try to convince people that the Taiwan should get whatever American companies were producing.

So this was the major point how you give through actions a definition to what is a very vague and, shall we say, political communiqué and have it mean something in economic and military matters.

Q: Well, you were helped to some extent during this particular period in that the Mainland Chinese were not still moving up the ladder technologically, particular in military things.

PRATT: That's right; however, it was a time when also the U.S. military were trying to get their camel's nose under the tent, and they indeed were beginning to move on some of these matters, and the same office in DOD which was handling the Peking side of things was handling the Taiwan side of things. So you indeed did have a dynamism there which... Fortunately, we had there at that time a very good team with Gaston Sigur and then Paul Wolfowitz, both of whom I think are very bright and very, very balanced. And over in the Defense Department - what's his name - he's emerging now as one of the special advisors to George W. Bush - it will come to us. In any case, he was the ISA chap, very helpful.

Q: Today is the 23rd of February, 2000. Mark, first let's talk a bit about during this 1982-86 period just plain straight relations with Taiwan. Any great problems, or was it all tied up with our relations with China?

PRATT: Well, obviously the relations with China were what influenced what the major problems we had dealing with Taiwan, mainly military equipment. So much of the time was spent on handling what the Taiwan side was requesting in the way of arms and what it is we would be prepared to do and how we could get it through the various aspects of the government, including ones which were, of course, very, very much, shall we say, feeling that they had a vested stake in the 1982 communiqué, more so than in finding ways of living with it. So this leads into your question about adversarial relations.

For the most part, the people in the Defense Department had officers who were dealing with both China Mainland and Taiwan, in ISA [Ed: International Security Affairs] and other key policy making areas. And of course they were anxious to keep a good balance, but they were not, shall we say, very anxious to push the most restrictive interpretations of the 1982 communiqué because they had been so little involved in negotiating it. That was a political document which they considered had been worked on around them even though they in the end were expected to pick up the pieces of it. Therefore, from their point of view, they had a bit of an adversarial relationship with some of those in the Department of State who were leaning over backwards to do whatever Peking wanted. However, the major focus, the major, shall we say, strength of the pro-Peking side in the Department of State was basically reduced when Al Haig left, because Al Haig had been very much himself personally in favor of doing whatever he thought would be best received in Peking. He of course held what he considered to be the view of Henry Kissinger of great politics, which meant China was important, Taiwan was only an irritant. And there were a number of people who also believed that China was in the future the most important relationship we would have, eclipsing Japan; and they themselves felt personally involved in arriving at the text of that 1982 communiqué, and they therefore wished it to be as much a reflection in implementation of Peking's view of that document as possible, whereas of course once Haig was out and Shultz came in and we had a group in both the National Security Council and in the State Department which was anxious to do what they considered to be what Reagan wanted (and this group, of course, was basically in the ascendancy), therefore while starting out when I first moved over to Taiwan from Regional Affairs, the basic flavor, with Holdridge and Haig and so forth, was one of trying to just say that a small amount of the prestige of Taiwan and concern about Taiwan that we had earlier, afterwards we really then had to make sure that we did not go overboard with Taiwan, either. And from a relatively hostile head of the China Desk, we acquired someone who was basically very, very well balanced - that was Don Anderson - and very much aware of the fact that we had our own U.S. interest in this.

Q: Who was the first head of the China Desk?

PRATT: This was Bill Rope, who was very much in the Chas Freeman group. And as I mentioned earlier, Mike Armacost and Mort Abramowitz, who was up in INR-[ED; Bureau of Intelligence and Research] there were persons who were also considered to be part of this group which felt that they had to defend China. We have always felt that China was pretty good at defending itself. But in any case, there were, and someone like Jim Lilley was even more sharply critical of this group and very frequently identified them as being either a Peking lobby or else occasionally sort of suggesting that some of them were indeed trying to get their instructions from Peking before they tried to find out what the State Department wanted. I know that Jim knew that this was carrying it a little bit to extremes, but nonetheless, it was something which went back some 20 years and therefore was not unusual.

Q: There was very much this feeling of division there between the - I won't say - pro-PRC, but the basic feeling that this is what counts, and Taiwan frankly doesn't count. These are sort of the great picture people as opposed to one who are taking a different course.

PRATT: That's true, and as I mentioned, even earlier part of this came about because some of the persons who were leaning so much towards China's position were persons who really disliked the KMT and disliked it so much they had read in their history books in the '40s and '50s, and from what they experienced when they either studied in Taiwan or served in Taiwan, and they were very much opposed, therefore, to the KMT rule on Taiwan and they were also of the opinion that once the U.S. indicated that it was headed out, as indeed recognition from their point of view was meant to signal, that the KMT would invoke its "One China" policy and turn the place over to Peking and therefore that would solve our problem for us. The other people, of course, did not feel that Taiwan was going to go down the drain nearly so easily as these others both though it would and hoped it would. You can find a number of documents which report the view that Taiwan would not be with us very long. But we, of course, who had been involved with Taiwan for a while, knew full well they were far more resilient. We also knew that it was far more complex than just a small group of old men from the Shanghai area who controlled the Kuomintang. So indeed, there was a very different appraisal of what Taiwan was.

There was also a very different appraisal of what Peking was. I'm sure you have read about the enthusiasm which Kissinger had for Mao and for Zhou Enlai, and then of course I gather Kissinger really had a rather low opinion of Deng Xiaoping, whereas of course most of us who had worked very hard on China over many years, as Kissinger never did, were well aware of the fact that Mao was, indeed, sui generis and being gradually exposed for the rather monstrous figure that he was. And Zhou Enlai was not always so perfect and effective under the shadow of Mao as he might well have been had he outlived Mao. Therefore, our view was more, shall we say, concerned about doing what really had to be done to take care of China but giving China time to move ahead from what continued to be, and was certainly even in the early '80's, certainly a highly authoritarian society, where Deng Xiaoping's reforms were just beginning. And there were no assurances that if Deng had died in 1981 or '82 that anybody that could have maintained his programs, because others who were still there - like Chung Yin and P'eng Chen and Bo Yibo and so forth - that they might well have turned it back into something far more retrograde from the U.S. point of view, including retrograde from the point of view of being open to the United States. So we felt that we had to spend a good deal of our time trying to defend U.S. interests rather than just trying to find out what China wanted done.

Q: Were you able at that time to make the argument, that look at Taiwan and if you draw a line about where it's going, it looks pretty good, I mean as far as American values go, and China, it doesn't look good? Was this in this 1982-86 period a valid argument or used or was this a little premature?

PRATT: No, I'd say at that time it was already fairly clear. In the first place, one had the whole concept of the economic liberalization and what that would inevitably do for politics and, of course, what it actually did do in Taiwan and has done elsewhere: that is, when you get an authoritarian government relinquishing many of the areas in which it exercises authority directly and turns it over to capitalism and government-regulated and then regulating less and less, you're getting a society which is going to be far more free. And whether all the elections are going to be as free and whether it's going to have, shall we say, an election which results in throwing the scoundrels out . . . which of course is one of the principal things which elections can serve as. Whether it's turning them out for the right reason or not, it doesn't matter; at least it provides for a succession including a hostile succession, which keeps people on their toes - and Taiwan was certainly headed in that direction. And we also knew that while the people who were in the Communist movement had gotten involved in what was a forward-looking movement in the nineteen-teens, namely Leninism, they also went through the period of Stalinism, and that's not necessarily the best education - whereas the Kuomintang, which had also had considerable Leninist tendencies. Chiang Kai-shek came out of a basically Leninist and militarist era.

Nonetheless, everything else had been handled very differently. Most of the top figures had studied economics and studied in the United States. They were basically persons who were liberalizers, first of the economy and then eventually of such things as even elections. But greater freedom of the press and so forth happened before that. Admittedly there were pockets which were very retrograde such as the security services in Taiwan, as I mentioned the last time in my appraisal of where Chiang Ching-kuo was going. We weren't quite sure just how he was going to end up doing it. This was a time, however, when things were becoming clearer - that is, after I had left Taiwan they became clearer. But nonetheless, the basic tendencies and the basic aspects were far more favorable. In the first place, during a time when China had one of its most unpleasant and not terribly well-organized periods, 1895-1945 - this was a time when Taiwan had been ruled by Japan, which despite its war in the Pacific had nonetheless been far more advanced in its appraisal of science and technology and economics from the West. So Taiwan had benefited from not having gone through the historical troubles of the war between the Communists and the Nationalists on the Mainland from the 1920s and '30s and '40s. It also, of course, having been occupied by Japan much earlier, had a friendly period from 1931, when Japan started its attack on China, starting in Manchuria and then moving down to Peking and so forth, so 1931-1945 were times of deep trouble in China from the Japanese, and Taiwan did not have that. Now admittedly, it was run as a colony and therefore somewhat of a backwater, but nonetheless, a lot of the top leaders, like the current president [Ed: Lee Teng-hui] and like the person handling foreign relations, were studying in Japan at a time when the Japanese universities were among the best in the world. Japanese education, from the Meiji period on, had been very a remarkable institution. But in any case, we know that the basic background for Taiwan provided many, many factors which were more favorable than those which the Communists had on the Mainland. So our position was that, yes, indeed, they're moving very rapidly, and the only question is when an authoritarian figure with a great deal of power, like, President Chiang, when he decides that something is going to happen, he has a means of making sure it does happen because he can calculate all of the opposition and override it, something which couldn't be done in Peking.

Q: Well, there was real difference in the type of government. I mean, the Taiwan had a government where if the leader decided things had to be done, he could sort of say it could be done, whereas the Politburo in China, I mean, this was not a monolithic organization. I mean, it was basically a committee of geriatrics, wasn't it?

PRATT: Quite true, and in addition to that, their party system, while giving full central control to the party in almost all the areas, nonetheless, their concept of collective leadership meant that any one of the top leaders could have a very powerful role, particularly in some of the areas of their special concern, so that some of them such as Deng Xiaoping had a lot more power than, say, Hua Guofang, his immediate predecessor, had had. But nonetheless, he had to share this with a number of others because he was there because he was the one most accessible to these various top leaders. This was not the case by the time Chiang really made himself. He of course had full power after the death of his own father, when he was really only vice-president. But he could tell the president what to do, and the president knew that he ought to do it. So he was somebody who had had really power such as nobody had had on the Mainland. Even Mao had greater problems. And therefore, he was able to get through many things over the objections of others. However, as a person who did not like to jam things through, because CCK felt that the repercussions would often be worse than trying to produce the same effect more slowly and to get it done after you can get more people on board. This meant that he was making sure that there would not be a reversal of anything which he was able to get done. And he therefore moved very slowly. He was indeed, I think, too confident of his ability to pull it all off, and therefore could do it at his convenience, when he thought it would be most easily done. What he did not initially take adequately into account was his own health, because his own health, which had several periods of failure, was what reminded him that he had to move more rapidly because he might not be there. And he therefore did create the major changes there which were needed for Taiwan to become politically speaking what it is today.

Q: Did you see almost a difference in background, experience, or approach between the people who were dealing with Taiwan in the State Department and those dealing with the Mainland?

PRATT: Well, within the Foreign Service, we of course knew all of these persons, and we had been to school with many of them and often had studied before they had and therefore could follow what they were doing in their studies and then follow what they were doing when they got their first assignments following language training. However, some of these, indeed, got an initial push-up because they were among the first group to go to Peking and develop the new relationship. I believe that group contained some who turned out to be sort of prepared to do everything according to Peking, and others like Don Anderson, to whom at times we had to say, listen, what they wanted is not necessarily what we should want. So we had a group of each, and it was very hard to figure out what would be the qualities of mind or temperament which would have them go more in one direction or the other. And the only thread which appeared to be there was those who felt that they got their initial real push forward from being involved in the early stages of Normalization and of being able to push policies through which they then would be associated with. And of course in the early time, there was more of a problem to overcome some of the reluctance, true of course even during the Kissinger period, when they of course were so concerned about Kissinger's own relationship with the Secretary of State and then later with the Congress and so on, and then of course with the Carter and the Carter effort, and then the Taiwan Relations Act, which indeed was a bit of a rebuke to the President, including a rebuke coming from some of his staunchest supporters in the Congress. So these persons, however, continued, and that includes as much Brzezinski as it does Kissinger, persons who felt that they were the ones who were responsible for getting things done, and therefore they had to defend their own work. I think this is a very common thing, of people trying to defend ...

Q: Well, now, who on the Taiwan side in Congress . . . whom did you look upon to be your strongest supporters?

PRATT: Well, we found them in both parties, and we found there again, they were persons who also made themselves good, effective figures in getting the Taiwan Relations Act through. They were also persons who began to know more about Asia, and so of course, we certainly felt that the old team with Zablocki and Lester Wolf - they were great figures, of course, and then they vanish from the scene. And obviously in the Senate, from the early period on, there were two figures - Pell and Kennedy - both of whom had very strong staff, and the staff of both of them were very interested in what was going on in Taiwan, and they were very interested in human rights, and they were very much able to see that, although there were little snafus occasionally, the basic tendency in Taiwan was far more compatible to U.S. concerns about human rights, and then of course political rights and democracy, than anything in Peking was. So I'm trying to think also of the - name will come to me later - but he's the chap who was the head of the subcommittee in the House on foreign relations.

Q: It was Solarz.

PRATT: Yes, Steve Solarz. Steve Solarz was a very powerful and important figure because he was interested in both Peking and Taipei and he had a very, very good staunch figure, Richard Bush, now head of the American Institute in Taiwan, who was one of Solarz' key figures in making sure that people kept track of, shall we say, the important things which were happening in Taiwan and how they should be put into perspective. So we had persons who were often incensed by some of the stupidity and the horrible things which occasionally could be done in Taiwan, but they were as well aware of the fact that this was something which was not even necessarily supported by the president, and in any case something which would not be going on for long.

Q: I would have thought that you would also have a problem, although times have changed, with the equivalent of the old China Lobby, the very strongly anti-Communist, almost know-nothing types in Congress - no subtlety or real knowledge except "It's them Communists over there and these guys are not Communists, therefore they're our people." And this is not a very helpful group in foreign policy.

PRATT: No, because some of them - and there are still a few around, and every now and then I had to share a platform with one - but they are really so supportive of the KMT on Taiwan that they will find that even the Taiwan Government does not become as shrill in tooting its own horn as they think it ought to, and they consider the U.S. Government to be basically hostile, that the executive branch basically is much too inclined to listen to Peking and not pay attention to what really ought to be done for Taiwan and does not tell Peking to go to hell. Now occasionally we would get that even from, shall we say, Senator Helms's side, where occasionally, when we'd go up and try to tell them how much we were providing for Taiwan in the way of military equipment and how this would take care of so many of their needs, and obviously we knew we were going to have some problems with Peking, but this was how we intended to handle it, they would then go to Helms and they'd get messages back saying, you know, to "tell Peking to go to hell," and they ought to do more, et cetera et cetera. Now we were getting so we sought what was going to be feasible, but this group of people, of course, had never been concerned with what was feasible.

Q: Did events in the Soviet Union, as Gorbachev began to start his reforms and all - this is before the Soviet Union split up and all - were we looking at that and saying, I wonder if this is going to happen to China, and were we thinking along those terms?

PRATT: Well, we certainly considered that Gorbachev, while many were initially saying, how different can he be from his two predecessors, who of course weren't there very long - you're looking at almost like a succession in the Papacy in that by the time they got to power you couldn't be sure how long they'd be there and whether everything would be overturned and so forth - and since he was the protégé of persons who were very old and very much in the party apparatus, there was a considerable suspicion that we had, and that of course Peking had, over what this really could mean. Is he going to be able to stick around? Is he really going to be able to make that much of a change? Then, of course, when Maggie Thatcher was able to tell Reagan we can do business with this man, then, of course, people began to revise their views that maybe he would be around long enough at least to do business for a time.

We saw this as being one of the things which we hoped would reduce the earlier concern that Kissinger had, which was that we must make up with Peking as a weapon against Moscow, because we felt that was very misguided. I mean, those of us in the Foreign Service who worked on Asia, said that the Chinese, for their own reasons, are against the Russians, and the Russians have always been afraid of the Chinese anyway, because there are very vulnerable parts of their own territory so close to a much, much larger China, so we really don't have to take the Soviet Union as a justification for doing what we ought to do about China, and we certainly hope that if it can show that there was no longer a strategic triangle between Washington, Peking, and Moscow, but rather something where we had to have good bilateral relations with both Peking and Moscow, that we could begin to address all of the China questions on their own merits, because many of the persons who were arguing for us to dump Taiwan were saying we need China so much because it ties down all these divisions of the Soviets in Central Asia and therefore we need China so much for our real concerns about the Soviet Union. Well, it turned out, of course, that we shouldn't have had nearly so much of an anxiety about the Soviet Union, that economically, and therefore eventually militarily, they weren't the great power which they had been portrayed as being. None of that, of course, was able to trickle through to us in the East Asian side, but since very clearly it emerged that they did not have the strength which we had used to justify doing so many things with Peking. We should be able, therefore, to approach everything we're doing with Peking on the basis of what was important from the point of view of U.S. interests and U.S. concerns about East Asia. And that, of course, should make it far easier to see that we don't have to sacrifice Taiwan - or Japan or Korea or any other place - just to be able to have China be anti-Soviet. So we considered that this, insofar as we were given much information about it - we'd gotten a little more than what we'd get out of the American press, which is, I think, very, very negligent in handling this, just as I think the CIA was.

Q: Well, now, back to sort of the nitty-gritty. I can't remember if we covered it before, but what about the Taiwanese security services and their activities in the United States during this 1982-86 period? Did they cause you any headaches?

PRATT: Very much so because, although I had very good relations with the formal head of the organization which was sort of openly declared here in the United States - the National Security Bureau - and used to have periodic meetings with him, nonetheless, we were aware that things were still going on back in Taiwan which were made for novels. The security services back there were not all as intelligent and as open as the office was here in Washington. They were, of course, required to be because they knew they had to get along both with the CIA and with the State Department and so on. So these people were by far the most, shall we say, enlightened. But the previous head, one whom I overlapped with only slightly, when he went back was taken out of the National Security Bureau system, which was foreign intelligence, and put in to the intelligence bureau of the Ministry of National Defense, which has a foreign section basically aimed at Mainland China but also had certain undeclared offices in the United States. This is where, eventually, the trouble came from.

We had had enough trouble with Americans being harassed and killed, permanent residents from the United States having their troubles back in Taiwan, but for the first time we had the Henry Liu case, which was an assassination of a person of Mainland origin but raised and educated in Taiwan, and he was killed by elements of what was called the "Bamboo Gang," which is apparently still functioning in Taiwan, one of the big problems Taiwan still has, and the reason why it is such a problem is that these gangs were often intermixed with the security services. They were not, therefore, a target of the security systems. They were adjuncts. They were elements which they felt they could use and whose mentality they had confidence in and so on. And this is something that still is a problem in Taiwan, because they have not been rooted out. And as I'm sure you have heard also, that the old Triads from Hong Kong and branches of them in Guangdong Province, means that the Triads and therefore gang elements in south China and in Hong Kong remain a big problem for Peking. They have not been able to root it out. In many cases, of course, the governments have felt that these are good adjuncts for their own power, and that goes back to the time when the Green Gang was one of the big supporters of Chiang Kai-shek in Shanghai, in the '30s and so forth. So this was something where we eventually had very considerable problems.

Q: On your watch did you have it then?

PRATT: Yes, that was on my watch.

Q: Can you talk about what happened and what we did?

PRATT: There is a whole book written by a chap in San Francisco on the subject. Henry Liu was assassinated in Daly City, and it was therefore an event of some importance. [Ed: see David Kaplan, Fires of the Dragon: Politics, Murder and the Kuomintang]

Q: Daly City is in -

PRATT: Just south of San Francisco. And I have not read the book because I felt that I had my own ideas and I would hate to sit there and get annoyed by what he maybe said wrong. He called me many times, and so we had long chats, and I know I mentioned before the book, and I hope that he got me down correctly, but that's one of the big problems in dealing with many authors, that you will find that they have their own thesis which goes beyond what I think to be justifiable. But in any case, this was a case which caused problems between the State Department and the Justice Department and particularly the FBI in the beginning because apparently there was far more of a role in the FBI in this event than they were ever willing to tell us, because you know they have a sense of "need to know" which is very different from that even of the CIA's. And from their point of view, if they could bamboozle us to get us to do what they want us to do, then that's much, much better than trying to tell us exactly what went wrong and what they would like to have us do to help them out. In the end, we did get to, I think, a very highly principled figure in the Department of Justice who was able to make sure that we got all the . . . he was limited in what he could tell us about what the FBI role had actually been, but nonetheless he was very frank with us about what he was doing, because we had to facilitate several trips for these teams from the Justice Department to go to Taiwan and interview persons who were involved in the events surrounding the murder.

This apparently, this Bamboo Gang group was, as usual, trying to have better relations with the security services in Taiwan because that meant that their own activities would therefore not be looked askance at by the security services, the only ones they were really afraid of. So they thought that they were being given encouragement to get rid of this Henry Liu, to kill him, and there were two factors. One, Henry Liu was considered to be disloyal to the KMT, even though he was a Mainlander, he had been raised in Taiwan and gone to school there, because of alleged dealings with Peking. That perhaps was one of the more important things in the minds of the Bamboo Gang. But secondly, they thought that they could curry personal favor with President Chiang because Henry Liu was coming out with a biography of President Chiang which would be rather unfavorable with, quote, a lot of the worst and most scurrilous gossip, unquote, which they and a broad range of Mainlanders on Taiwan knew. So they would gain favor not only with the anti-Communist security services but then also personally with the family of President Chiang, and what they were not so much aware of (which I think was still one of the principal reasons why the security services facilitated their assassination attempt and its success) was that Henry Liu had himself been involved with Taiwan intelligence from the very beginning of his career. He was trained at one of the universities where the role of the security services in curriculum and teaching and so on was very prominent, and he therefore was expected to be an agent for them whenever they called upon him, even though he functioned as a journalist, first in Washington and then out in San Francisco. Nonetheless, the key thing was that they figured that he should still be under their discipline as an agent. And if they felt that an agent had been turned by Peking, and there was indication that this might have been somewhat what Henry Liu was doing - mainly he was telling Peking more about what he learned about Taiwan than he was telling Taiwan about what he learned about Peking, and at the same time he also apparently was an agent for the FBI and I guess they wondered which one he was telling most to, Peking, Taipei, or Washington. In any case, a rather dangerous game for anyone to play. Double agent is bad enough, but triple agent is often even more dangerous.

In any case, this Bamboo Gang team came to the United States, and apparently they were involved with some of the people whom the FBI was involved with. Now whether these were people who reported also to FBI or whether these were people whom they had identified as problem people and they were listening in to their phones and all the rest, I don't know. In any case, the FBI was on to what happened far too rapidly. It appeared that they had indeed been able to intercept a telephone call that the Bamboo people made right after the killing to the people whom they were reporting to in Taipei. So what actually the FBI role is we were never told, but it looked as though they had been involved with him, despite the fact that he had volunteered his service primarily to the CIA and the CIA had declined to have any contact with him. So then he went to the FBI and volunteered to be of assistance to them. Apparently he just liked, he had grown up, I guess, with the idea of being involved with security services, and more is better than less. So if you can get three services you're working with, then you're better off. In any case, he was not, I guess, a terribly pleasant chap. I knew a lot of the journalists here who had known him earlier, and they told me a great deal about him. He could be cantankerous and difficult, but nonetheless he was an American citizen, and obviously we were not very happy to have Taiwan feel they could use a criminal gang to assassinate people in our country with the connivance of and encouragement from the security services in Taiwan.

Q: Well, how did it play out?

PRATT: Well, in the end, the Bamboo Gang, which was also a group which had branches in Hong Kong and in Bangkok and was involved in drug trafficking, had one person who was involved in their team who went from San Francisco to New York and then went down to Latin America, and this was when we, of course, were able to get the name, able to try to get him extradited from I think it was Brazil. And of course, then we ran into Rudy Giuliani. He was then the attorney for the southern district of New York, and of course, he wanted him first for a drug trial in New York, which meant we had to postpone things for the murder trial in San Francisco.

So we of course were involved with all of these things, but particularly the effort of the Justice Department to get evidence through testimony in Taipei. They did talk to most of the key figures; however, they did want to talk to the president because they felt that his role in both condoning it or giving the green light or the role of his son in giving such a green light would probably explain why it is the security services, were supporting them to make sure that they could get the proper kind of passport so they could then get visas to come to the United States. So I thought that they did a really very good job. We didn't get a complete report, but we got pretty full reports of what they were doing, and they did a pretty good job of trying to get as much information as they could. It was indeed I think sort of the last straw for President Chiang because he afterwards sent his son off to Singapore and asked Lee Kuan Yew to try to keep him in line. He also dropped from his entourage Y. F. Chiang, who had been one of his closest friends for years, but he had asked Y. F. Chiang to try to take his son in hand, and Y. F. Chiang in the end said, "I'm sorry, I don't think there's anything I can do. He's not that interested in what I have to tell him. He won't listen to my advice." He was just too taken with the concept of being involved with the security services and other things, which were much sexier to him than, say, Y. F. Chiang, who was very good in education and foreign affairs and the good stable administration and so on. So we could see that President Chiang had been very much shaken by this and realized that some of his people had gone too far, although he had to admit that indirectly he had some responsibility for this because it was probably his son who led people to believe that this would be looked upon favorably by the old man himself, and yet of course, this was the last thing he would want.

Q: Well, then, was there anything else we should talk about during this period, up to 1986, or did we get the -

PRATT: I think I'll say a few words about the divided establishment we had between the State Department and the American Institute in Taiwan (AIT). As you are I'm sure aware, David Dean was brought into this at the very beginning, in fact asked to retire early in order to take over the leadership of the AIT itself. And he worked as head of that first when I was in Taiwan, and then he was still at it when I came and worked on the Desk here - in fact, almost to the end of my stay here in the Taiwan Coordination Office. And he provided therefore both continuity and I think very strong leadership in trying to make sure that this unusual relationship, of having a State Department office which had to be considered merely a coordination advisor attached to the regional affairs office and an AIT office, which is across the water in Rosslyn, could function together and have a cohesive operation with the various tasks sort of portioned out, so that I would be the one who would deal with the Defense Department on much of the military stuff. They would have a military man over at AIT as well, retired military, and they would host military meetings over there, and yet within the State Department I would have to make sure that everything was coordinated and all the people in PM and elsewhere in the building and also the Defense Department, to make sure on the policy level that we were handling things properly. Then, of course, we both had to deal with the Taiwan office here. We had the good luck to have a person who was rather cantankerous and difficult in some ways but very intelligent and very knowledgeable about the United States, who was Fred Chien, who later became foreign minister, but he was the head of the office here, and a very competent person although occasionally very abrasive. But he also was very, very good in wooing the Congress, and therefore, if we could sort of get to him and say, now, don't try to push the Congress to do something which they shouldn't do because we won't be able to back it up and it will look therefore more of a humiliation if something comes over and we then we have to say, Sorry, but we will pay no attention to it.

So I think during those early years we established very well several basic principles, and that is you can conduct these affairs through at least what is a nominally independent, non-official office. Admittedly, it's incorporated in the State of Delaware, but the sole stockholder is the Secretary of State, and therefore, sure, it's independent, but it's not that independent if it's wholly owned. Secondly, of course, you can figure out which side does what, and you don't have to have the one person being the one who handles all of these matters for Taiwan if you can farm it out so that David Dean would do his job and I would do mine, and we would coordinate and make sure that things worked smoothly. We later on had a different head of that office who wanted to have the State Department abandoned. He wanted to privatize the -

Q: This was a political appointee, wasn't it?

PRATT: Well, David Dean, of course, was a retired Foreign Service officer, but the one who was making for the problems later on was a real political appointee. He was just a lawyer from Little Rock. And so it made it very clear, however, that if you have people both of whom come from the same background and know what you're doing, you don't feel quarrels of face or prestige, but instead are mainly concerned with getting the job done - that this sort of thing can work. Secondly, we had tried to convince Taiwan that this informal mechanism could work adequately, that if Chinese are very much concerned with face, and of course we found the American politicians were very much concerned with their own face. And therefore if a political appointee wanted very much to deal with the top political figure from Taiwan, you're not very happy to see this be done by AIT, which is an unofficial representative et cetera, and so we had as much problem in trying to curtail visits to Taiwan and grandstanding by a cabinet member as we did from the Taiwan side, which was constantly trying to augment the official nature of their contacts by having top political figures in Taiwan meet with top American political figures. We did, of course, arrange for this to happen on certain occasions, and often we tried to get it done on neutral grounds, as in Singapore or in the context of meetings at APEC (Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation) or something of the sort.

But the constant pressure was there for people who felt that once they had gotten into an exalted position then they alone were capable of really doing anything that handles Taiwan. So that's why you have pressure up on the Hill and a certain amount of pressure from political appointees who want to be able to do these things because they have their concept that once they get to a high position then they alone have the real authority and clout to get anything accomplished. And all of these "hired hands," of course, should get out of the way. We have this, of course, particularly with the American military. The American military finds it very difficult to feel that even their own subordinates can do things when, of course, if you're going to have a high-ranking general then you have to have a high-ranking general on our side to deal with him. So this is what we have also with some of the military contacts with Peking, and they don't realize, really, that regardless of whom they come in contact with from Peking, they're dealing with the same organization. They seem to think they can make personal friends and that alters the whole way in which Peking is going to react. And the ego trips of a lot of the political figures - and of course when military generals get pretty high up they begin to consider themselves to have quite an ego as well: MacArthur wasn't the first or the last. So one did have always that problem, by saying, Listen, we can do this, and we'll load two bases, but you had people on the American side as well as people on the Taiwan side not wanting to load two bases - Taiwan, because of course their own culture is very much a question of face, and therefore they wanted to have all of their figures deal with people who looked as though they were as prominent as they were. You could say, well, listen, you're only the smallest province of China. And that, of course, would get them really set off because Taiwan had to be considered a good deal differently than just the smallest province of China when you're dealing with the United States.

But then, of course, as I say, the system, which was an unofficial one, worked really very well. One did not need to have high-level political contacts, high-level political visits, all the rest of that accoutrement, provided you got people who knew what they were doing and got clear instructions as to what one desired to have from the top leadership. I mean the biggest failure, I think, was the renegotiation of the August 1982 communiqué, and that was not something which was done on the Taiwan side. It was done on the American side, and they were dealing with fairly low level, and yet they did not get something which served U.S. interests well and they did not do something which was sufficiently coordinated so that the document and the agreements which they concluded would reflect what could be accomplished.

So I think one of the key things is that, indeed, it's a bit anomalous to have Taiwan, which satisfies so many of the criteria for the United Nations membership, be a place where we cannot have formal diplomatic relations, when we have formal diplomatic relations with a lot of countries we get along with a lot less well and who have far less of the attributes of a full state. I mean, when you consider the population of some of the mini-states, the island states and so on, it really is rather silly, because after all Taiwan with 22 million is a fairly large country by the standards of the United Nations. In addition to that, as a sort of 10th largest trading nation, just in economic terms it's a pretty large spot. So nonetheless, although it's anomalous, other arrangements can be made to make sure that all of this works, and I think the key thing was that President Chiang directed his people, who were very competent, to make it work. And although he was very much annoyed, as I discussed earlier when we did change recognition, and felt we were making a big mistake that we would live to regret, and on and on, nonetheless, he did direct that once we got something going, there was a make-it-work and not to throw in a monkey wrench every time, even though they could always find ways of doing it. He told them, Don't try to get the Congress to block what it is the American administration is going to be doing because while the Congress can help, and particularly in the broad framework of the law and the Taiwan Relations Act, it's the American executive branch which is going to give us the approvals for military equipment and get to us the things we need for both symbolic and real purposes.

So I think that that was another very, very good and important example. The fact also I mentioned earlier that the Taiwan Relations Act, as a domestic law designed to handle foreign relations, was something which was also unprecedented, and that has worked very well despite the views of many lawyers that various consulates would be called into question, really perhaps even as being unconstitutional. Nonetheless, that's not happened. So I think that the Taiwan handling has to be considered as a relative success and really one of the more interesting successes which is deserving, I think, of a full book to look at this from legal and other aspects.

And yet at the same time, we have this continuing conflict with Peking over how Taiwan is handled. But at least we have avoided, from the Shanghai communiqué on, any real battle. The closest we came was in 1996 with the two aircraft battle groups sailing in the vicinity of Taiwan, but that, I don't think, really at any point came close to being a real conflict. So I think that despite the fact that we had that - yesterday or the day before - 11 thousandth white paper on Taiwan, we have to consider that if all we get are white papers, then we're doing something right.

Q: This is from Mainland China?

PRATT: From Mainland China, yes. So, as I say, Taiwan has remained a key problem, despite the fact that many persons thought that it would just plain go away. Those of us who knew Taiwan knew it wouldn't go away. The only question was how do you keep it from coming to a real flashpoint? As you know, we in the Foreign Service often have considered that what we are trying to do is not to solve problems but to manage situations, and I think if there is anything which was a real situation to be managed, it was Taiwan and Taiwan vis-à-vis Peking. And therefore, so long as your constant instructions are to manage it - and that's what the people in Taiwan gave their emissaries, and for most part what we got here in Washington - you can keep it from being a disaster. And again, most of us in the Foreign Service know the major thing is make sure you avoid the worst; don't expect to accomplish the best. I think by both these measures Taiwan has been really a success; however, it's one that requires constant attention, and this is what the problem [is] with, shall we say, and American problem-solving President who wants to go barging in, solve this problem, and then move on to the next one.

WILLIAM ANDREAS BROWN
Assistant Secretary, East Asia and Pacific Affairs
Washington, DC (1983-1985)

Ambassador William Andreas Brown was born in Winchester, Massachusetts in 1930. He joined the "Holloway Program" which was part of the Naval Reserve Officers Training Program and went to Harvard University, graduating with a Magna cum Laude degree. In 1950 he went to Marine Corps basic training in Virginia and later served in Korea. His Foreign Service career took him to a multitude of places including Honk Kong, Taiwan, Singapore, Malaysia, USSR, India, the UK, and Israel. His career includes an ambassadorship to Israel as well as several positions in the State Department, Environmental Protection Agency. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in November of 1998.

BROWN: You go back to the terms and understandings, written and oral, of the Taiwan Relations Act. You get into our mood, at the time the Taiwan Relations Act was passed in 1979, and the mood under President Reagan, above all. We were determined to develop good relations with China on a strategic basis, involving the great game with the Soviet Union. We wanted increased trade with China and cultural and educational exchange, on the one hand. At the same time, within the context of Reagan's philosophy and the spirit as well as the letter of the Taiwan Relations Act, we were determined to maintain and enhance our unofficial relationship with Taiwan. We sought to ensure that confidence would be maintained on Taiwan, trade and commerce with us and with other countries would expand, and the people of Taiwan would feel secure.

This was opposed to Beijing's determination that, sooner or later, Taiwan was to be liberated by one means or another and rejoined to the embrace of the great motherland of China. Throughout this whole period you have a clash between U.S. and Beijing interests. One of the focal points of many of the Chinese complaints was that the U.S. was violating the spirit of the Shanghai Communique and the whole relationship with China by selling arms to Taiwan of significant, technical quality, in large amounts. Meanwhile, the Chinese failed to see adequate progress being made in bringing the Taiwanese to heel.

This situation escalated into a crisis in 1981, the outcome of which was United States-China Joint Communique (on Arms Sales), August 17, 1982. [For the text see John Holdridge, Crossing the Divide, Appendix C, pp. 277-279.] This was the period when John Holdridge was Assistant Secretary of EAP and Al Haig was Secretary of State, until his departure in June, 1982. This communique was a very important development. We stated in the communique that "arms sales to Taiwan will not exceed, either in qualitative or in quantitative terms, the level or those supplied in recent years since the establishment of diplomatic relations between the United States and China.” The Chinese took this as immediately capping our arms sales to Taiwan quantitatively and qualitatively. There was no limit expressed in dollars and cents, but it was expressed in terms of a U.S. intention “to reduce gradually its sales of arms to Taiwan, leading over a period of time to a final resolution.”

Beijing then pocketed this communique and pressed for the most rigorous implementation of it. As I arrived in the Bureau of East Asian and Pacific Affairs [EAP], we were faced with this problem. Taiwan in its view needed a great deal in terms of arms, both in quantity and in quality. For, during this period, we were seeing the beginnings of the significant modernization of the People's Liberation Army [PLA] of China, including the Chinese Air Force and Navy as well. We saw China, which had gone through the primitive stages of nuclear weaponry and so forth, pushing to develop these weapons further. It had a long way to go, but it was determined to go that way. So this was a policy dilemma. As I arrived in EAP, it was apparent that the trio of Wolfowitz, Armitage and Sigur was basically very unhappy with the deal set out in the communique of August, 1982. They were determined that it be managed properly. The Chinese were constantly pressing us for statements, facts, and figures, and complaining about the implementation of the communique.

Meanwhile, our team in EAP canvassed the needs of Taiwan, stripping away the rhetoric of Taiwan and Beijing. In our national interest we determined that Taiwan still needed a very significant amount of arms, both in quantity as well as in quality. Of course, Taiwan had the means to pay for all of this and would have been delighted to pay for more.

At the working bureaucratic level we had inherited strict guidelines on these arms sales to Taiwan. For instance, “Thou shalt not sell an upgraded aircraft to Taiwan.” It was during the period when John Holdridge was Assistant Secretary of EAP that we decided that we would not sell to Taiwan the F-X or the F-20, upgraded versions of the Northrop F-5-E fighter planes which they already had. The F-5E was a lighter aircraft which had now been significantly superseded by F-15s and F-16s. However, various aircraft manufacturers were marketing something called the F-X or the F-20, and Taiwan was keenly interested in them. As I arrived in EAP, Taiwan had been told: “Sorry, you're not going to get it.” So this posed a big problem, because Beijing was clearly working to upgrade the capabilities of its Air Force, Navy, and Army. The indications were that these improvements were intended to make it possible to strike Taiwan.

So we considered this matter further, and tremendous debates raged within the Washington agencies on this subject. At these Monday afternoon sessions, of which I have already spoken, we knew that we were right. However, other elements of the State Department thought that we were wrong and were strongly opposed to our views. They had the right to present their positions to the Secretary of State and they did. The same debate was taking place elsewhere in Washington, including in Congress and in the academic communities.

However, on a few occasions while the debate was particularly hot, Gaston Sigur would within the Monday Informal meeting context refer to a piece of paper. I saw but never read this piece of paper. He never passed it over to me to read the text of it. Gaston would read from this piece of paper, which was supposedly President Reagan's interpretation of the guidelines on the meaning of the August, 1982, Communique. This piece of paper contained a statement President Reagan had decided that a balance between Beijing and Taiwan would be maintained. If Beijing's forces, in terms of quantity and quality, pulled ahead of Taiwan's forces, the U.S. would do what was necessary to maintain a suitable balance in terms of Taiwan's ability to defend itself.

As I say, Gaston never passed out the text of this piece of paper. I can't remember whether it was typed or hand-written. I rather suspect that he had sat down, one on one, with President Reagan, or in a very small group with the President, and had taken down, after debate in White House circles, what the President had decided. So while the debate raged elsewhere on the benefits, pros and cons of this issue, we knew, in this core group, what the President had decided. We knew that we were doing the right thing. Now, this terminology had to be dressed up, massaged, and looked at very carefully, because there were other views to be considered here, including the overall relationship with Beijing. [Addendum: See James Mann, About Face, pp. 127-128 wherein the author, based on interviews with Armitage, Lilley and Carl Ford, states that shortly after the August 17 Communique, Reagan dictated a one-page memo stating that the U.S. would restrict arms sales to Taiwan so long as the balance of military power between China and Taiwan was preserved. If China upgraded its military capabilities, the United states would help Taiwan to match those improvements.]

In that same connection, there were other issues which were very secret at the time, but which are now out in print. If you'll refer to public remarks on the record by Jim Lilley, Jim was then the Director of AIT [American Institute on Taiwan]. He had a CIA background. He later succeeded me in EAP. He was a close friend of George Bush, the elder. I think that he retired from CIA did some work in the private sector and then became the Director of AIT, Taipei. As of 1981 he was the man who had to deliver the message to Taiwan: "Sorry, you're not going to get the F-X or the F-20." In recent years Jim has written his memoirs and has spoken and written in public on numerous occasions. He has spoken of the fact that we had special monitoring stations covering Soviet missile launches in China. These were very secret at the time. They were jointly manned by our specialists and Chinese specialists.

You should remember that in the background to all of this the Chinese still had a phobia about the "Great Bear" [that is, the Soviet Union]. We are talking now about the early 1980s. The Soviet Union still looked mighty powerful and threatening from a Chinese perspective. Therefore, playing on this circuit, we were dangling before the Chinese the possibility of limited arms arrangements with them. For instance, the Chinese had a fighter-bomber deployed up in Manchuria which was largely grounded and needed a very significant upgrade. In discussions with the Chinese we conveyed that we would be willing, on a limited basis, to look into the upgrading of these Chinese aircraft within limits. Naturally, the Chinese were plugging for the highest limits, but we were looking at the matter very carefully.

Another issue was this or that artillery shell, or this or that type of Navy equipment, such as a torpedo, or naval armaments of one kind or another. So we were engaged in discussions with the Chinese, in light of the fact that we were discussing equipment for Taiwan. Eventually, out of this came the first visits of senior Chinese military officers to the U.S. This included, later on, the visit of Jiang Aiping, the Chinese Minister of Defense. He was an older man who had a limp.

Another visitor was the commander of the Chinese Navy. These were startling visits, after the Korean War. They were startling in view of the fact that these gentlemen visited the U.S. at all. They carried a tremendous amount of baggage with them as they came to the United States.

I can remember being in a very small group with Secretary of Defense Casper Weinberger and Chinese Defense Minister Jiang Aiping as Weinberger was laying out our missile programs and tests and the fact that the Soviets were monitoring our missile launchings near Kwajalein and elsewhere in the Pacific Ocean area. Weinberger was letting the Chinese in on very significant developments and prospects for mutual cooperation. And Jiang Aiping and his associates were lapping this up.

So the whole China question was a major issue, and this was part of my portfolio. Academically, I already had not only a Chinese background, but a Japanese background as well. For a while I carried China and Japan but shunted responsibility for Japan as Paul Wolfowitz got a new deputy assistant secretary for Japan. So I shed responsibility for Japan and had another one added, which was to cover Australia, New Zealand, and the Pacific Islands.

Q: I'd like to ask you something. I think that I've alluded to it before on China. Here you were, sort of at the heart of the machine. It's come up today, when we're having trouble with China. It seems to me that on the American political scene, both in Congress, the media, and all of that, somehow we end up by allowing the Chinese still to appear to be the Middle Kingdom. We always seem to go to them. This grates on me, frankly, and I'd like to get your impression of this.

BROWN: Well, we'll finish this section shortly because of time considerations. However, let me address that issue head on because, I can assure you, that this team, this trio [Wolfowitz, Armitage, and Sigur] was determined that we weren't going to play that game with China. We were going to play with China but we weren't going to play the kow tow, on your knees, Middle Kingdom, Lord Macartney visit to Beijing of 1690 or something like that. We were going to go into this matter of relations with China clear eyed and with a very clear, conceptual approach to this. You have to remember that other people within the Reagan administration were “ga ga” about China.

Q: It's like being tossed into Hollywood. They were awash with...

BROWN: You have to remember that, in this regard, as part of the background, when I made the first or second visit to East Asia with Michael Deaver, he had in his mind an extension of the Reagan itinerary that I've laid out. Under this program, President Reagan would go to China, in addition to the other destinations I have mentioned.

Now, Judge Clark, after the first visit to East Asia with Michael Deaver, heard about this possibility from me. Somehow, in the White House, I was intercepted as I was moving from one place to another. I think that it was Dick Childress who hauled me into Judge Clark's office. Dick was a Colonel on the White House staff. This was at the height of the Clark-Deaver controversy.

Clark asked me: “Where are you going” on this visit with President Reagan. I said this and that place, “and maybe to China.” Clark went through the roof, picked up the phone and shouted on it to Deaver: "You're not going to China! This hasn't been cleared with me!"] I was in the middle of fierce, White House rivalries. I tell you, it's unbelievable how hot these can get at times.

So very clearly in Deaver's mind was the very real idea that he was going to propose that President Reagan make a great, "earth shaking, melodramatic visit to China." Whether this was going to come as an add on to the itinerary that I've already mentioned or separate from it was another question. In the end, other matters intervened.

However, it is true that there were elements in Washington who were going "ga ga," feeling the "Middle Kingdom syndrome," and so forth. However, this team of Wolfowitz, Armitage and Sigur was determined to keep this whole relationship with China on a more nearly normal, balanced basis, bearing in mind that China needed us more than we needed China in the great game with the Soviet Union. It was a very tricky operation to do this, at times.

BEATRICE CAMP
Junior Officer Trainee, USIA
Beijing (1984-1985)

Beatrice Camp was born in Montgomery, Alabama in 1950. She has a BA from Oberlin College and joined USIA in 1983. Her overseas assignments included Beijing, Bangkok, Stockholm, Budapest, Chiang Mai, And Shanghai. Her brother, Donald Camp, and husband, David Summers, are also Foreign Service Officers. Mrs. Camp was interviewed by Mark Tauber in 2016.

Q: So '84 begins your Foreign Service career in Beijing. And you are what USIA called a junior officer trainee at that point, a JOT, which meant rotating through a lot of sections. What was the embassy like?

CAMP: The embassy had a major real estate problem. When the communists took over they allotted embassy location based on who recognized China. The Russians still had a huge piece of land, even though their presence had shrunk when relations deteriorated. The Czechoslovakian embassy was a whole city block, as was the Polish embassy.

As for us, the Ambassador's residence, along with the political and econ sections, were in Yiban, Building #1. Before we arrived the embassy had acquired a second building, known as Erban, where I worked. Just before we left post, the embassy opened a third building, Sanban. Everyone doubled up; for a while I shared an office with the Deputy Public Affairs Officer. One colleague was working out of a former bathroom.

All the Chinese local employees worked in one room, which also housed the Xerox machine and the long distance phone line. To make phone calls we would crouch under the table to shield from the noise, just to talk to someone in Shanghai.

After so many years of the country being closed off, lots of Americans were eager to visit or work in China. American Citizen Services had their hands full dealing with elderly tourists who fell to the strains of China travel – we morbidly called it “death by duck” – and the young people who jumped at opportunities to come as teachers. Many signed on to deals in which Chinese institutions would promise air fare, lodging, and other benefits that sometimes didn’t materialize. When the eager American teachers got to China and found themselves stuck with the flight bill, or in housing with no heat, they would come to the Embassy for help.

They also came to the Embassy looking for teaching materials. I’d be in the office on Saturday morning trying to deal with unfinished work when an American teacher would show up asking for a map, which I would have to fetch from a dust-ridden crawl space under the stairs.

Q: So the housing and working conditions were rough, but there was still so much excitement to be able to go.

CAMP: It was exciting even though we lived under a lot of restrictions. Diplomats weren’t allowed to drive more than 25 kilometers from the center of Beijing and we needed permission to travel outside the city.

A year in Taiwan had immersed us in slogans about retaking the Mainland and exhibits demonstrating poor living conditions in the PRC. We were particularly struck by one exhibit caption noting that “people living in the Mainland are very happy to have even a black and white TV”, as we had yet to own a color TV ourselves.

With no direct flights between Taiwan and the Mainland, we spent several days in Hong Kong, where we were reunited with our diplomatic passports. From there we flew to Beijing, feeling as though we were going to an alien world. Reinforcing our initial nervousness was the dark road from the airport. China had a law against using your headlights at night, apparently on the theory that the lights would blind the oncoming bicyclers. We had our first demonstration of this driving into the city.

The two-lane road from the airport on that hot August night was impeded by people, mostly elderly men, crouched on the street playing cards under the streetlights. They’d move for our car to pass, then return to the weak street lights and the relative coolness of an outside breeze.

Bicycles were still the main mode of transportation in Beijing. David and I brought from Taipei two pale blue 10 speeds made by a new Taiwan company called Giant. These drew great attention in Beijing, where all the bikes were black, one speed, and heavy.

Q: Like the old Model T you can have any color you want as long as it’s black.

CAMP: My brother’s decision to wait until Beijing to buy a bike became a standing family joke when we learned that purchasing a bike in China required a letter of authorization from the buyer’s work unit. In Donald’s case, he had to get the U.S. embassy to authorize his purchase. Meanwhile, we were commuting from the Huadu Hotel to the embassy on our blue 10 speeds, fielding questions about our eye-catching bikes from curious Beijingers. Although we were initially reluctant to reveal our bikes were from Taiwan, our questioners reacted positively. They were excited that these super-modern machines were made in China.

Q: Was the air already as polluted as everyone now knows?

CAMP: When the wind blew we could see the western hills. But in the winter everyone burned soft coal; whenever I encounter that distinctive soft coal smell I think of Beijing. We were warned not to take anything white to China. I had a pair of white ice skates that I hung on a peg in the apartment; when we left the skates were black; the soot seeped in everywhere.

While the embassy was well heated, Chinese offices were not. On a day you planned to go to a Chinese office you had to dress warmly. We would be taken to a meeting room and served tea, which we would drink for the warmth. When your bladder couldn't take any more, it was time to leave. The Chinese were still wearing blue Mao suits but underneath many had pink silk long underwear, visible at the cuffs. We all bought silk long underwear in Beijing.

Q: And this was the '80s when China had begun down the road of changing the economy.

CAMP: Yes, socialism with capitalist characteristics. Change was becoming visible, often just in small ways. One day bananas appeared for the first time; word spread like wildfire and we all rushed out to buy this previously unseen commodity. Three months later another banana boat arrived, sparking the same rush. By the time we left Beijing, bananas had become regularly available.

In 1985 we attended the first Western pop concert in China, featuring WHAM! with George Michael. The Great Wall Sheraton opened in 1984 as the first international hotel in China and hosted the first Western banquet for President Reagan's visit. The Open Door Policy announced by Deng Xiaoping in 1978 was beginning to take effect.

My JOT rotation took me not only to the commercial, econ, and consular sections, but provided a stint in Shanghai. True to its reputation, Shanghai was several years ahead of Beijing, with some women even wearing dresses.

Q: So you're a junior officer with USIA officer; what was the make up of the embassy and what were your main responsibilities?

CAMP: We were lucky to have two strong China hands at the top. Ambassador Arthur Hummel was born in China, Shanxi province, son of a missionary who later went on to head the Oriental Division at the Library of Congress. Deputy Chief of Mission (DCM) Chas Freeman was already legendary in our circle because our teachers held him up as a paragon among language learners; he interpreted for Richard Nixon during his 1972 visit to China.

In those days one of USIA's core products was the daily Wireless File, produced in Washington to deliver U.S. government official texts as well as news stories of direct regional or local interest to USIS posts. For decades it was the most accessible source overseas embassies had for current guidance on U.S. policy.

Sent by shortwave around close of business in Washington, the File reached Beijing in the morning, spewed out on a teletype printer. One of my jobs was to skim through the 30-40 pages to make sure there was no mention of the “Republic of China”, a political no-no that the Washington writers couldn’t seem to shake. Once or twice this formulation slipped past my eyes as well, only to be caught by the ever-vigilant Chas Freeman.

I also helped edit articles for our one-country magazine Jiaoliu. Published in Chinese, the magazine supplemented the Wireless File and VOA as USIA efforts to promote information about the United States on the Mainland in the pre-digital age.

Q: Were there any high level visits while you were in Beijing?

CAMP: President Reagan visited China in 1984, traveling to Beijing, Xian, and Shanghai. It was a huge deal with an enormous entourage – Bill Brown’s ADST account describes the incredulous reaction of Ambassador Hummel on hearing that the president’s party numbered over 800. For a politician like Reagan who had blasted China in his presidential campaign, it was a bold move. For the Chinese, it was a very welcome symbol of acceptance.

I helped prepare briefing materials – including details such as the correct length of a Chinese cubit as used to describe the height of the terra cotta warriors in Xian – and worked in the press center in Shanghai. In Beijing, one of my responsibilities was making sure that The Wall Street Journal got delivered to each of the rooms at the Diaoyutai State Guest House every morning, a task I had no control over as it was totally dependent on whether the plane arrived from Hong Kong with the newspapers.

As with all presidential visits to China, but especially for the first since the normalization of relations, every detail was a negotiation. One of these involved the return banquet. The Chinese system for state visits dictated that the hosts gave a welcome banquet at the Great Hall of the People on the first night; the second night the guest hosted a return banquet, also at the Great Hall of the People. Well the White House, which is to say Nancy Reagan, wanted to feature Western food. With a new hotel, the Great Wall Sheraton, about to open, the White House decided to use it for the Reagan return banquet.

Word arrived that Nancy Reagan wanted to serve turkey. Now we had been taught by our Chinese teachers at FSI that Chinese don’t like turkey – the meat is unappetizingly dry; having knives at the table is barbaric – so we sensed trouble even before the press got wind of the plans. At that time Beijing hosted just over a dozen American journalists, who were pretty much always in a cantankerous mood from their struggles with Chinese stonewalling. When they picked up the hot news story that Nancy Reagan, who already had a reputation for extravagance, was flying in turkeys from California, this small press corps turned on the embassy. We became the ones doing the stone walling, under strict orders from the front office: “don’t say anything about the turkeys”.

The embassy held a practice banquet with some Chinese diplomats to test the menu that had been developed by James Rosebush, Nancy Reagan’s chief of staff. The first dish was the cutely named Panda Salad, which featured raw bean sprouts to provide an Asian touch to the Western menu. When a senior Chinese diplomat observed in polite, British-accented English, that “when we Chinese eat raw bean sprouts we vomit”, the menu was quickly reworked to replace bean sprouts with hearts of palm.

The banquet went more or less as planned, served Western style with the turkey and the potatoes and vegetables all on one plate. The Chinese guests at my table didn’t know what to do with the plated food; they were used to sharing central dishes.

They were probably also disappointed at not getting to enjoy a second state banquet at the Great Hall of the People, with sea slugs and all the exotic foods reserved for festivities. They’d been deprived of that and were picking at the strange food on their plates. When the Panda Salad course arrived, featuring soft brown hearts of palm, the guest at my right confessed it was the first time he’d eaten panda meat.

I would love to see an account from a Chinese official at that dinner; we got a small taste of the reaction a month later when David and I stood in for the Ambassador at a banquet that the mayor of Beijing was giving for middle school students from Greenwich, Connecticut on an art exchange program. As we worked our way through the many course all-duck meal, a very polite girl asked us to “please tell the mayor it’s not that I don’t like duck tongue it’s just that I’m not very hungry.” We took the opportunity to chat with the Chinese officials about the Reagan banquet, and as they loosened up the mayor allowed as how he had never had food like that before. “You know,” he said, “the problem with Western food is that an hour after you eat it you’re hungry again.”

That was my first presidential visit and it was a memorable one.

Q: Wonderful. That is sort of the quintessential junior officer experience.

CAMP: Yes. And the JOT rotation, which entry level officers don’t get anymore, was great. In addition to working in the commercial, econ, and consular sections in Beijing, I spent time in Shanghai. The Branch Public Affairs Officer there was Lloyd Neighbors, a long-time China expert. During my two weeks we had the opportunity to meet a distinguished group of American writers who visited as guests of the Chinese Writers Association.

The American group included Toni Morrison, Francine du Plessix Gray, Leslie Marmon Silko, William Least Heat Moon, Maxine Hong Kingston, Gary Snyder, Allen Ginsberg, William Gass, Robert Rees, and Harrison Salisbury. Watching these famous writers holding a conversation with Chinese writers was an extraordinary experience. I’ll never forget hearing Gary Snyder proclaim – to a group of people who had suffered through the Cultural Revolution not many years earlier – that “the true oppressed of the earth are the grass and the trees”.

Another memorable USIS-sponsored visitor was historian John Toland, whose program at the Chinese Institute of History might have been the first exchange between Chinese and U.S. historians about the Korean War. The Chinese call it the War to Resist U.S. Aggression and Aid Korea; we had very different views on this subject.

Q: Where else did you travel?

CAMP: On work assignments I went to the consulates in Shanghai, Guangzhou and Shenyang. Tourism was never easy, but we managed to visit Qufu, the home of Confucius; to climb Huangshan; to see the terra cotta warriors in Xian; and to take a train to the beach at Beidaihe. Road travel to Tianjin for foreigners was opened during our time in Beijing, so we jumped in the car to drive there mainly for the fun of hitting the road.

As a former Oberlin Shansi fellow in Thailand, I very much wanted to visit the original Oberlin-funded school in Taigu, Shanxi, now the Shanxi Agricultural University. In 1980 the Oberlin connection had been reestablished there and every year we invited the four Oberlin fellows to Beijing for Thanksgiving dinner.

Despite a denial from the relevant authorities for travel to Taigu, we were able to get on a train to the provincial capital of Taiyuan. One-year-old William, who drew crowds wherever we took him, was a big hit on the train. In Taiyuan, we were met by a car sent by the university in Taigu, and taken to campus an hour's drive away. Our official hosts deposited us with the resident Oberlin fellows, who were living in one of the little brick cottages built with Oberlin funds after 1908.

Although we could have been in trouble from both the Chinese authorities and the embassy for traveling without official permission, the whole weekend played out like a commedia dell'arte plot. It was only after we went to bed that the foreign affairs office showed up to register us. Our American hosts explained that we had turned in for the night; the foreign affairs office said they didn't want to disturb us and left. I figured they waited until they saw the lights go out in the bedroom to knock on the door. The whole thing was choreographed by the university -- our Oberlin connection earned us protection. So we got away with our unauthorized trip. We weren't busted by the Chinese, we weren't busted by the embassy, and I got to visit the old Ming Hsien campus.

Q: Very interesting. Now you're reaching the end of your time in Beijing. Anything unusual about the end of tour?

CAMP: The market economy was developing under Deng Xiaoping's policy of reform and opening. We had personal experience with this when a the mother-in-law of one of our FSI Chinese teachers asked us to sell our car to her son so he could profit from the new law permitting private ownership of cars. Mrs. Tien, a doctor, had suffered greatly in the Cultural Revolution because she had lived in the U.S. before 1949 while her husband attended university. After the establishment of diplomatic relations, her American-born daughter was able to immigrate to the U.S., but her two sons left behind didn't get an education and were washing dishes in restaurants.

Mrs. Tien proposed we sell her our car, to be reimbursed by her son-in-law, our teacher in the United States, so her son could start a taxi service and make money. We agreed to give it a try, which led to my husband having several meetings on dark street corners. In the end we were denied permission, on the grounds that the gap between our rank and Mrs. Tien's son was too great for the transaction.

We felt obligated to our teacher and we liked Mrs. Tien, who had one of those heart-rending Cultural Revolution stories, but the transaction just wasn't possible. When the denial came we had barely a week left in country and still had a car to get rid of. Fortunately, an Egyptian navy officer wanted it, although he refused to pay the full asking price. When David pointed out that $4,000 was a bargain, the navy officer remonstrated: "I am Egyptian; I can't pay the asking price." So we went down a few dollars and he handed over a wad of cash just before we got on the plane.

RUSSELL SVEDA
China Desk Officer
Washington, DC (1984-1986)

Mr. Sveda was born in New Jersey in 1945. After serving with the Peace Corps in Korea he joined the Foreign Service in 1975. His overseas posts with the State Department include Korea, where he served as Staff Aide to the Ambassador and in Moscow, as Science Officer. In Washington, Mr. Sveda was assigned as China Desk Officer and subsequently as Watch Officer in the Department's Operations Center. He also served as volunteer in the Sinai Field Mission. Mr. Sveda was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in June, 2000.

SVEDA: But my career counselor, who was a friend of mine, suggested that I might be well to come back to Washington at this point in my career. He suggested the China desk. Well, the China Desk was a wonderful place to be assigned, I recognized that. But it was not the European Bureau. I was really quite crestfallen that I would never get to serve in Europe because it would take me a long time to crawl there from East Asia again. But I went to the China Desk and I enjoyed the two years there very much.

Q: So, 1984-1986, you were on the China Desk.

SVEDA: Yes. I was monitoring China's external relations with the focus on China's relationship with the Soviet Union. So, I was forever going back and forth with the Soviet Desk.

Q: Who was the head of the China Desk and who was the head of East Asian Affairs during this 1984-'86 period?

SVEDA: East Asian Affairs' assistant secretary was Paul Wolfowitz. He had been in the Department of Defense and had been one of the protégés of Senator Henry "Scoop" Jackson. Richard Perle was another protégé of Senator Jackson. Wolfowitz was an amiable man, very conservative, unfortunately sometimes he presented problems that we had to get around, but was altogether a nice person.

There were two heads of the China Desk that I worked with. One was a man named Anderson. Oddly enough, I can't remember his first name right now. A very nice man. Then the second year was a very good friend of mine, Ambassador Dick Williams. He is currently our non-resident ambassador to Mongolia.

I greatly enjoyed working on the China Desk. We had important visits that had to be managed. Ronald Reagan thought that China was potentially the most important relationship that the United States had or could have. He was extremely interested in anything that we did on the China Desk or with China. One of the trips that I managed was a visit of the president of China, President Li Xiannian. Li Xiannian was about to visit when we learned that the President was going to have an operation on his colon for cancer. We simply did not know whether the visit would come off or not. These visits are planned meticulously. The rule that we had for China was Washington plus four cities. We did that for the biggies like him. Li Xiannian first touched down in Canada and the question was whether he would get to meet with Reagan because while he was in Canada, Reagan was literally being operated on. So, the Saturday before Li Xiannian was to arrive and the Saturday that President Reagan was being operated on, I was in the Protocol Office at State with a woman who was deputy chief of Protocol, Bonnie Murdock, a very lovely person and we were making our final arrangements with the Chinese embassy. There were two Chinese embassy people there. It was early Saturday morning. It must have been 8:00 am. I arrived at the State Department. Bonnie has a portable TV at her feet and it's on. The two Chinese arrive and she explains to the Chinese that normally she does not work with a portable TV at her feet but her president was having surgery and she was very concerned not only on a personal level because she wanted the surgery to go well, as we all did, but because we had the visit of President Li Xiannian coming and we didn't know honestly whether it would be possible to do this or not. So, we would go on and make the final preparations as though the visit was coming off. While we're doing this, at around 10:00 that morning, Bonnie gets a call and she is saying to the phone, "Yes, yes. Oh, yes, yes. Absolutely. Yes." She puts down the phone and turns to the Chinese and says, "That was the White House. The White House called to tell us that the operation was a success and that as soon as the President came out of the anesthetic, he wanted us to tell the Chinese embassy that the trip was on, although the White House requested that we reduce the amount of standing at ceremonies and maybe have a lot more sitting because the President would be recovering. If you will watch the TV, the doctors are about to come on and announce this publicly, announce the results publicly." So, the Chinese who were looking at her rather surprised looked down at her feet and "We interrupt this program to bring you a special announcement." There were these doctors and they're saying that the operation was a success and so forth. The Chinese, their jaws had just dropped down to their knees. When the announcement was over, Bonnie turned off the TV and said, "Now, I'm sure you would like to call your embassy and you would like to call Canada and if you wish to call Beijing, this is how you can do it. The phones are over there." They happily went up.

The visit was a great success. President Li Xiannian, who was a few years Reagan's senior, was so touched that the President would be so solicitous about this visit – first of all, not to cancel it, but second, the moment he came out of the anesthetic, at least according to our story, he had asked that the Chinese be assured that the visit was on – he just was so bowled over by this that the visit went extremely well.

One of the things about the President which people don't appreciate is that, contrary to popular belief, he really did make key decisions. So, after the welcoming ceremony at 10:30 am, the President and the president of China went to the Oval Office at 11:00 for an hour's discussion, after which there would be the formal lunch at the State Department. Here I was, in charge of the visit, not knowing whether we would have a treaty to sign with the Chinese later that afternoon. We were talking about a treaty on energy cooperation and everything was ready except for the final approval, but we had no idea. This was one of the topics that the President wanted to raise with the Chinese at that meeting at 11:00. At about 11:50, we find out that the meeting had ended and that President Reagan had decided to sign the treaty. We honestly did not know which way he would decide. He did decide to sign that. Then it was left up to me to scrounge around for a room at the State Department where we could have a treaty signing. We managed to convince the Vice President, Bush, to show up. I say "managed to convince him" because I found the only room that we could use was on the 8th floor and it was one of the rooms attached to the big dining room there. The big dining room we couldn't use because there would be a swearing in of our new ambassador to France, a big cocktail party, which the Vice President would attend at 4:00 pm. So, I had the treaty signing for 3:00 or 3:30 so I could get the Vice President to be there. We used one of the side rooms, the Franklin Room or something, with a lot of furniture, the desk that the Declaration of Independence was signed on. So, Secretary Shultz agreed to show up, thank goodness, and the Vice President was there, and the president of China. We decided to use one of those desks. I forget which desk we were using, but it wasn't the Declaration of Independence desk because at one point, Secretary Shultz was explaining to the Chinese president that there were many important artifacts in this room and one of them is the desk on which Thomas Jefferson composed the Declaration of Independence. He indicated where it was in the room and then Shultz, who had a very sharp temper, suddenly yelled out an expletive because the media people who were there were sitting on the desk, the photographers, and he just suddenly lost it for a second. But we managed to get to the treaty signing and everything went well. I had nothing better to do, so I decided to crash the reception for the new ambassador to France. What fascinated me was that he was some sort of major contributor from Tennessee. I think he owned some kind of chicken farm. I think his name was Brown and he owned Kentucky Fried Chicken. The minister at the beginning of the ceremony asked everybody to bow our heads. People from the China Desk were there. We did as well. The minister prayed and he asked God to bring peace to the people of America and the Republic of France. Of course, the State Department people sort of darted eyes at each other, wondering if we had missed something, that perhaps we were at war with France and didn't know it.

I also had a visit of a vice premier of China, Yao Yilin. I took him to San Francisco, Dallas, New York, and Washington. We were able to get the Vice President's plane and on that trip to Dallas – and this was really an amazing thing – we set up a visit with H. Ross Perot at H. Ross Perot's request. I only had the vaguest idea of who H. Ross Perot was. One of the White House people said, no, no, we absolutely had to do this because he was a major figure in EDS, which was a major company doing computer software and he sprung his people out of prison in Iran when the Shah fell and had I not read the book and seen the movie? Well, no, I had not read the book and I had not seen the movie. I vaguely knew who this person was. We go there and H. Ross Perot has this little ceremony where he presents this box about the size of a very large cigar box to the Chinese vice premier and he says, "This is a token of appreciation from the American people for the help that the Chinese gave us in the past at a time when we desperately needed it and in the hopes that China might help America again.” That was the gist of the speech. The China crowd from the State Department were looking at each other wondering what was this help that China had given us in the past. Then Ross Perot opens up the box replica of the golden spike that joined the Union Pacific and the other railroad together in Utah in 1869. It was in Provo, Utah, where the golden spike was driven. Basically, he was referring to the Chinese coolie labor that had come over and built the first transcontinental railroad. Luckily, the Chinese vice premier didn’t have the faintest idea of what this man was talking about and accepted this with gratitude. Then Ross Perot wanted to go and talk to the man separately. We insisted that there had to be a State Department official present because it was an official visit. Ross perot objected, but he agreed to this condition. He asked the Chinese vice premier for China’s help on finding POWs and MIAs in Vietnam. The Chinese vice premier listened politely and basically was non-committal. When we heard about this later, we were upset because if anybody had been reading the newspapers, China at that time was fighting Vietnam in a border dispute. China was not at all likely to help anybody with Vietnam simply because they were at war with it. So, it was one of those examples of interference in American foreign policy with the best of motives by somebody who really would have done better to have asked somebody what the situation was, but he just went off on his own.

Q: You say your prime concern was relations with the Soviet Union.

SVEDA: Yes.

Q: This was the beginning of Gorbachev’s coming on the scene.

SVEDA: Yes.

Q: When you got there in ’84 and through ’86, how would you characterize the relations between the Soviet Union and the Republic of China?

SVEDA: Not good. They were not good but they were not particularly bad. The Chinese were trying to develop a better relationship with Russia because they didn’t want to be on the short end of the triangular relationship with the U.S., China, and the Soviet Union. There really wasn’t that much we could say about the relationship because the Chinese themselves were watching the changes within the Soviet Union with some interest and maybe even a little bit of consternation. They weren’t quite sure what was going on at the time.

Q: There are mixed feelings. They were a strong communist state and the Soviet Union was a strong communist state. Watching one communist state – i.e., the Soviet Union – beginning to start on a course of relaxation would not have sat well with the Chinese, but at the same time, the Chinese would have seen this menacing power from the north maybe getting pretty self-absorbed.

SVEDA: I think that’s more or less what was going on there. The Chinese at the time were under the leadership of Deng Xiao-ping. He was intent on changing China economically, loosening things up economically, though not politically. The Russians took exactly the opposite path, which was to loosen things up politically in the hopes that this would improve things economically. In retrospect, probably the Chinese were right, but at the time, it seemed as though Gorbachev in unleashing the political liberty and creativity would perhaps turn things around economically. It was seen by some to be a possibility, but not by us.

Q: Were you able to talk to people at the Chinese embassy and say, "Hey, what do you think is going on in the Soviet Union?"

SVEDA: No. In fact, there were very few worthwhile contacts at my level with the Chinese embassy. They were all relatively formal contacts. I guess the head of the desk had more to say with the ambassador, but not at my level.

Q: As you were working with China, did you feel that there was a cooler relationship with China at the bureaucratic State Department/embassy level than there was with the Soviets at this point?

SVEDA: Our relationship with China was very good. It was really excellent. In fact, we took our cue from the Reagan administration. The President personally wanted good relations with China and so we were very intent on having good relations with China. The problems that we had were more from people within his administration who were wary of the Chinese than from any other forces because the American people were very enthusiastic about better relations with China as far as we could see. One example of this is on the day that the President was reelected, our political counselor in Beijing was approached at an election night party at the Great Wall Hotel by a Chinese official who said that the Chinese government would be interested in receiving Peace Corps volunteers. Well, this was really rather revolutionary, the idea of a communist country having Peace Corps volunteers. I saw the cable that morning come in. Having been a former Peace Corps volunteer, I grabbed the cable from the cable traffic and went to the head of the desk, Dick Williams. I said, "Dick, if we ever have Peace Corps in China, could I be in charge of that?" He said with a smile, "Yes, of course. Why not?" Then I handed him the cable. He said, "Okay, good. You're in charge of that." What I also got later in the day was something that was a very valuable piece of paper. Secretary of State Shultz had been a professor at Stanford and he had a professorial habit of making marks on papers that were given to him. He would make little marginal comments, question marks, exclamation points, underlinings, sometimes he would write a word. Whenever he did and it seemed to be at all meaningful, then his staff was under instructions to Xerox this and give it to the office in question. So, Secretary Shultz saw the same cable that I grabbed. On his copy, he had underlined certain things and written in the margin "Good" or "Great" or "Wonderful" or something like that. He was very happy about this. It was extremely valuable to know what the Secretary's thinking was on something like this, especially because Paul Wolfowitz, the assistant secretary, was deadset against the idea. But when I went to Paul Wolfowitz and I showed him the Xerox of the cable with the Secretary's comments, all of his objections to Peace Corps in China evaporated. So, we worked on a project. I worked with a friend of mine, John Keeton. He had been a Peace Corps official in Thailand and Korea, which is where I first knew him when I was at the embassy there, and then he became a deputy director of the Peace Corps, a regional director of the Peace Corps, and he worked with me on getting Peace Corps into China. We worked on a lot of other things as well. A very good person. But we worked very closely with Sergeant Shriver, who was very interested in this. Paulette Ruppe, who has since died, was the head of Peace Corps at that time and was very excited by this. We decided that the Peace Corps volunteers who would go to China would be the best trained and the most carefully selected in the history of Peace Corps because they would be in such a sensitive position, being the first Peace Corps volunteers in a communist country. Since then, we've had Peace Corps in all the former countries of the Soviet Union and I think we may even have them in China now.

Q: Did the Peace Corps go into China?

SVEDA: What happened was that just as the first group was finishing their training, the Tiananmen Square incident occurred. This was June of '89. No Peace Corps group ever actually went there at that time. I don't know if they went later.

Q: How did our relations with Taiwan affect what you were doing?

SVEDA: We had an office that dealt with Taiwan affairs but not in Washington. It was in Rosslyn, Virginia, just across the river. The American Institute on Taiwan had an office that was very pointedly not in the capital. The people, the government on Taiwan, had an office actually in Washington, although they really shouldn't have. So, we didn't have very much to do with them. The one thing that I found a bit annoying was that Taiwan newspaper people would try to ingratiate themselves with me and talk with me, mostly about staffing patterns within the State Department. To them, it was extremely important who was going to be the head of this desk and who was going to this position and where people were going after serving on the China Desk and so forth. I found it annoying because I didn't think it was very important. The level of detail that they were interested in was not the level of detail that I either was in command of or cared about.

Q: At one time when Kissinger and Nixon opened up relations with China, there was a so-called "China card" as a counter to the Soviet Union. Did you have a feeling that by this time things had developed so our relations with China no longer really were as a counter... This was a relation that stood on its own merits as opposed to being just a counter to the Soviets.

SVEDA: Oh, absolutely, the relationship stood on its own merits. It was not seen by us as a counter to the Soviet Union. It was really quite important to us in a number of other respects. It was important to us in part because China is a very big country with 1.1 billion people and it had at that point already a large amount of trade with the U.S. and since then the trade has become far larger. So, the interest of the United States in the good relations with China was very strong. The arguments that we advanced for the importance of China are equally applicable to India, but we don't advance those arguments. India has as many people as China almost. India is a regional power of some importance and we have a lot of trade with India, but for some reason, we do as a people have a greater interest in our relationship with China than we do with India. That's just the way things are.

Q: I've done some historical research and written a book about our consular relations. It's interesting. Right from the beginning of the Republic, after the actual confederation, we made special arrangements to open up relations with China. China has always had almost a mystique in American foreign relations.

SVEDA: Yes, very much so. President Reagan was very much affected by this mystique that China had. He really thought that China was an extremely important country to the United States. Of course, having been the governor of California, he had a certain Pacific perspective on things.

Q: How were we seeing the mass arrival of Chinese graduate students to the U.S.?

SVEDA: At the time on the China Desk, we were encouraging all kinds of contacts with China. Our belief was that the more contact with China, the better. I think that that really summed that up. Later on when the Tiananmen incident occurred and I was on detail to the National Science Foundation, it was my job to figure out for the U.S. government how many students there were in the U.S. because we wanted to give them some kind of special visa status which would allow them to stay in the U.S. and not have to go back to China. We didn't know how many there were in the U.S. because the U.S. visa system can tell you how many people have entered the U.S. but it cannot tell you how many have stayed or have left. We have no idea. I think we came up with the number of 4,000, but that seems rather low. I will have to think about that. It was a time of great change, a time when being Chinese was something of a novelty and you sort of expected them to be somewhat and to dress in a Maoist way. When I went to Beijing in 1985, I saw people swishing down the main avenues on their bicycles by the thousands. There were very few cars. People were not wearing Mao jackets. The older people were but some of the younger people were, but not very many. You could see changes occurring in China rather rapidly. To look back on that world of 15 years ago from the perspective of China today, it's an entirely different country. I had a houseguest for about a week, a young Chinese student who I had met on the Internet, who would be starting at GW getting a master's. His family is very highly placed in the government, I believe in the communication ministry. He has been extremely free on the Internet with contacting myself and other people in America and having very free and open discussions about everything to the extent that he's interested. It just is an entirely different window into China than I would have expected five years ago. China is changing very rapidly.

RUTH KURZBAUER
Assistant Press Officer, USIS
Beijing (1984-1986)

Branch Public Affairs Officer, USIS
Shenyang (1990)

Ruth Kurzbaauer was a Foreign Service Officer, serving with USIA from 1979 to 1991. She was interviewed by Chen Xiaohong on January 16, 1994.

Q: When were you in China?

KURZBAUER: I first came in August 1984 to work at the US embassy as the assistant press officer. That is a USIA function, as your know, under the larger embassy mission. And I have to tell you that prior to that time I served in Yugoslavia, my first post, first as a JOT and then as what they call the ACAO, assistant cultural affairs officer. My own background had somewhat prepared me for a European assignment. I had studied European art and literature and come from a European born mother and father. I was a music major at university, stressing European classical music. So I wasn't necessarily Eurocentric, but I was comfortable in a European setting, and ended up being very comfortable in Yugoslavia, and we can talk about that later.

But I have to confess that I knew almost nothing about China. I will tell you what I knew before my training, and I will talk about that too. I was born and raised in Cleveland, Ohio and we have a wonderful museum there, which is famous for its Oriental art collection. So as a young girl or student I used to wander through and just looked the way you look at great art and paintings anywhere. Then, when I was an undergraduate at Yale University, I worked as the secretary to two very famous American scholars of China, but that was a chance assignment. I worked for Arthur Wright, who is the great scholar of classical and ancient Chinese history, and an expert on the Sui dynasty. Then I worked for Jonathan Spence, the famous scholar of modern China who was Arthur Wright's student. Then the academic dynasty passed to Spence when Arthur Wright unfortunately died.

So I had some exposure to China by typing papers and doing library index research and meeting the Ph.D. students in the Chinese History program. But that was the extent of my professional exposure. The rest I knew about China was what anybody who is interested in the world around them learns from reading newspaper headlines and occasional books and stories. But I had no other preparation than that.

Q: I understand that you speak Chinese to an extent and the Chinese you speak from my point of view is very fluent and very understandable. How did you acquire that?

KURZBAUER: This is thanks to the Foreign Service Institute, which is the training school for American diplomats. I got my assignment through the bidding process that goes on in the Foreign Service. My first choices after Yugoslavia were either in the Balkans, Eastern Europe or somewhere around the Mediterranean, which at that time was my area of interest. But I had put Beijing down somewhere at the bottom of the list because I thought it would be exotic and we were required to distribute our bids among posts that are considered to be hardship posts. So I had to put one hardship post down and at that point Beijing was a greater hardship designated post. I am not sure that it is today -- it probably shouldn't be because of the comfort and diversity of life now possible there. But in those days, 1982-83, China was not the China of today.

So I put Beijing down, and lo and behold I got a cable back saying this is going to be your next assignment. Then USIA officers and State officers, but I think USIA officer even more so, despite junior or middle rank, and I was not a high ranking officer, were allotted a full course in Mandarin Chinese through the Foreign Service Institute. It consisted of one year in Washington, language training and area studies, and almost a year at the extension school in Taipei, Taiwan. So in 1983, I spent about ten months in Washington going to language class every day, four or five hours a day. Also attending the East Asia lecture series given by academics from the Washington area and elsewhere at the Department of State once a week. And then, following that and passing the exam for that year, I was sent with my colleagues to Taiwan for follow up training.

As you know, in the Foreign Service not everyone gets full course language training. It depends on your home agency, on the function you will be doing. For example, the assumption is that as a press officer, a public affairs officer, the network of persons that you will encounter and will have to reach is somewhat broader in number than those working in the administrative function. Your mandate is to go out and make contacts and discuss and learn, etc. with a broad sector of local society, so that the ability to communicate in a foreign language is perceived as being an absolute requirement. So, even though I was of a more junior rank, as a USIA officer, because of our agency's policy, I usually received full language training. I am not sure I can speak for State, but I think junior officers in consular work, although the encounter with the local population is intense and daily, is not necessarily always given a full course, so I was lucky that USIA's policy supported the full course. By the time I got to the People's Republic I had more than a year and a half of Chinese language study.

Q: And I guess that was very helpful.

KURZBAUER: It worked well. I had gone through the Foreign Service Institute once before and that was before my tour to the former Yugoslavia. It pains me to say "the former Yugoslavia," but we are speaking now in 1993. Anyway that was my very first tour of duty, my junior officer tour and following on in Belgrade with cultural officer duties. I was given eleven months of Serbo-Croatian at the same Institute. Then I and two other colleagues, both from the State Department, were sent out on kind of an experimental language intensification program to live on the land, as it were, with Yugoslav families for three months. We were the first ever selected, I believe, and I am not sure if the program ever continued. After our formal training in Washington, FSI picked three of us to go out and find a Yugoslav family and just live with them and interact for several weeks in the hope that that would intensify our language use before we actually got into the embassy and began our diplomatic work.

Q: You didn't do that in Taiwan, did you?

KURZBAUER: No, not in Taiwan.

Q: How did you get your training in Taiwan?

KURZBAUER: There is the AIT, American Institute in Taiwan, a language school extension, if you will, of the Foreign Service Institute. It is a formal school attached to the diplomatic training process. It used to be in T'aichung and then moved to Taipei.

Q: So you were again going to classes over there further learning the language.

KURZBAUER: Right. Of course, the purpose of sending us abroad was the hope that after 6 hours at language school every working day and lots of homework, that living in Taipei we would get out and do things in the community and use Chinese in the process. And I think to a certain degree that happened. We were a group of between 20 and 40 students from various US government departments doing the advanced Chinese program. We developed strong group rapport and friendships, so we had a nucleus of friends and used to do a lot of things together in Taipei city. But we also took off on our own.

For example, I was trained as a musician before I went into my adult work, so I hung out with the Taiwanese classical musicians. I went to art galleries and met artistic types. In many cases the common language was Chinese, although the younger Taiwanese speak English very well, so it was sometimes a hard pull to speak in my limited Chinese and not have my Taiwanese friends break out into perfect English. But it worked. You just lived a normal life. I had no car there so I took buses. My living quarters were up in the suburb of Taipei, which is up on a hill above the city, so in order to get down into Taipei City I had to take local buses and find my way around. It worked very well.

Q: There is always a prejudice in society against women when we talk about a certain kind of work. I think at your time when you made your decision to get into diplomatic service, was that a challenge, or how did you make your decision that you were going to get into the Foreign Service?

KURZBAUER: Well, it is interesting, because I have to confess that for me the decision was on one hand, I think, deep, but in a way unconscious and on the other hand serendipitous. I have always been interested in international things. Most everything I did as a student or as a person on my own had some international link. I was playing European music when I was a student, or assisting foreign students in adjusting to university life. I was just always interested in the world in a broad dilettantish way.

Q: Since I come from China I am most interested in your years in China. After your training in Taiwan, you got an assignment to work in Beijing.

KURZBAUER: Right. The assignment predated the training.

Q: You knew the assignment and took the training in order to fulfill the assignment.

KURZBAUER: Exactly. And it was training not in the PRC but training outside the PRC. Most of the diplomats being trained in that group were destined for Mainland assignments at that point, although others were going to Hong Kong and Taiwan. The thinking was, and I think it was true for all three agencies that feed into the Foreign Service, by and large that if you have training in a language you do some of your tours of duty in one region of the world and other assignments would be in another region entirely, unlike foreign services of some other countries where they have deep specialists. I remember the former Soviet Union diplomatic service. I met quite a number of USSR diplomats when I was in Yugoslavia and they were actually area specialists. They were in a way like you, Ph.D. level or intensely trained geographical specialists and they would stay much of their diplomatic career in the area of their geographic specialty. Many of us in the U.S. service are more general and taken from here and put there and taken from there and put here. But the chances of going back to an area, especially like the Chinese speaking area, once you have received hard language training, are high. In fact many of my colleagues have gone from Beijing to posts outside China and then back to another China post or related post. So there is some long term continuity.

Q: Yes, because when one acquires the language ability, it is easier to use that person in a way.

KURZBAUER: But I, myself, had never been to Mainland China and as I mentioned before and except for the training that I received at the Foreign Service Institute I had no academic or professional background in China.

Q: Yes, so my next question is besides the language you learned about the history and culture of China...

KURZBAUER: Yes, we had an area studies series that Dr. Howard Spendelow from Georgetown University was the coordinator of, a professional US academic Chinese specialist. These were weekly lectures, two or three hours a week on various aspects of Asian history, economics, politics and then more intensely focused on China during the second half. So it was almost like a graduate survey course. The participants were diplomats, including high ranking ones and junior officers and other agency personnel, but it was basically a survey. I learned a great deal, but it wasn't an intensive Ph.D. seminar with specialists all together investigating deeply a certain topic; it was to give a broad background introduction to the area.

Q: What you learned from the training program in that regard did you find out that was exactly what China was when you arrived?

KURZBAUER: I will tell you about stepping into China, I remember this vividly. One of the things I remember vividly is reading...you have to realize at that time, we were in training in 1982-83...I left Yugoslavia in August of 1982 and then went into the first half of the language program in Washington, 1982-83, and then the second half in 1983 in Taiwan. I imagine you were in China at that time, but looking back relations had barely been established and barely at a cordial level. There was not much interaction, travel, movement back and forth. You can't compare it to the situation today at all. There were very few general books on contemporary China that had any roots in contemporary reality. There were views of China by experts who had been outside the country for many years, but there were very few people who had actually been there. Some Canadian specialists, some folks from countries who had had longer diplomatic relations with the PRC than we had, but not very much. Nothing to equal the wealth of articles and periodicals and books and popular magazines that you have today, even articles in the general press. So one book that had just come out was Fox Butterfield's book on China, which I think is called, "Alive In The Bitter Sea."

Q: That was very controversial in China.

KURZBAUER: I will be interested to hear your reactions to it because I read it knowing only general things about China. I read Fox Butterfield's book about his own experiences as a journalist in early reformist China, if you will. I am sure that he wrote them exactly as he experienced China. Some of the incidents that have to do with surveillance and caution and the difficulty of interaction between foreigners and the Chinese I am sure happened. But the image from that...if he published it in 1982 then the material was gathered in 1980-81...I think back to China 1981 just in a very anecdotal and not very deep image, but in China then the Beijing Hotel was the landmark and the most comfortable and most luxurious hotel in Beijing and that is where foreigners would hang out when, you know, you needed to kind of group together and get a perspective on your new experiences in China. And it was from what I read, and from what I remember even going to the Beijing Hotel, it was very Chinese in many ways.

Now, today, you go back and there is some symbolic contrast here; think of the China World, the Sheraton, the Jonglun, which is no longer even a major hotel. One luxury hotel after the other! Obviously that is not all of China and not a symbol of a nation, but it is a symbol of changes, evolution and prosperity of society. In my time, in luxury hotels Chinese nationals could not easily enter unless they were accompanied by a foreigner or had an official reason to be there.

Q: We had to show our ID.

KURZBAUER: Now that has disappeared. If you have the bucks you go! That was not Fox Butterfield's China. I think he had a great affection for the Chinese, but his time was both challenging, exciting and stressful, which I think is probably a very realistic way of describing experiences in China as it was unfolding from cultural revolution to the period we are in now. So my image of China from his book and others was darker. I had just read about the cultural revolution and the great dislocations and the terrible traumas. You look back twenty years before then, the Great Leap Forward, and then you look back again to war-time to Japanese invasion and then you look back again beyond that and there is civil war. So the imagery to me was one of turmoil and darkness. If somebody asked me how I imagined China, I would have said regimented, everybody in lock-step, everybody wearing the same clothes, everybody reading the same book -- or turmoil or anarchy! These two kinds of extremes.

I know that is an emotional image, not a scholarly or professional image, but that was my view. So at first when I was assigned to Beijing, I didn't know what to expect and I didn't think it was going to be an easy assignment. I thought it would be isolated, difficult materially, but more importantly emotionally isolated. There would be foreigners, officials, China and a kind of gap in between, only bridged occasionally by formal interactions. So my view, I think, was cautious, nervous and uncertain. It was very interesting, when I got there...again this was maybe an extreme, but for me it sort of sums up how unexpected things really turned out for me, at least personally. I got to the Beijing airport in August 1984, got off the plane and the embassy always sends an officer or staff member already residing in the country to meet the new arrival regardless of the rank or function the new arrival holds. I think it is an important custom. Well, there waiting for me was a member of our USIA section and the embassy driver. We got through customs without a problem, through the diplomatic entrance. I tried out my Chinese for the first time in the PRC when I said, "Hello" to the custom official who was looking at my passport. I got in the car and the first thing I noticed, and that was when my imagine began to turn a little bit...in Fox Butterfield's book he talks a little bit about how the trees had been cut down in Beijing under Mao because of the anti-sparrow and anti-pest campaigns. But as you know along the road from the airport into town, which takes about 40 minutes, are willow trees and it was all green. I found that interesting.

Okay, then we get to the Jianguo Hotel, as you know, which was at that time the only international joint venture hotel. I had expected, gee, I knew I was going to be living in a hotel because there was not enough space in the diplomatic compound. Relations were expanding and the embassy was growing and, as you know, diplomatic personnel in Beijing lived in Chinese built diplomatic compounds either in Jianguomenwai or Sanlitun, so you have nations' diplomatic corps plus most of the journalists living there. It is kind of a canton system, sort of like keep the barbarians all together! Anyway there was not enough space because relations were improving and officers and staff were being added, more programs and interaction. So many of us newcomers, especially those of us who were single, were housed in hotels for a couple of months. So I was housed in this new joint venture hotel, the Jianguo, which was my beloved home for eight months.

Another image of China that started to turn my mind even more was as we pulled up to the Jianguo, there outside were staff members, probably from the hotel, getting on bicycles and bicycling off home. But there inside, as I walked in, was this beautiful Chinese musician in the lobby of the hotel in a white satin gown! I will never forget that. My image of China was Fox Butterfield, Mao revolutionary oppression, regulation wear of green, green, green, blue, blue, blue, everybody in high necked tunics. But I walked into the hotel and there is this beautiful young musician wearing this silk gown with sequins, sitting at a grand piano playing Brahms. And I thought, "Well, this is not quite the way I imagined it." Again I realize this was not all of China, but it was a small piece of another part of China.

Q: At least you are in China.

KURZBAUER: I think then this was "foreigner's China," if you will, but it has expanded now. Just a few weeks ago I got a New Year's card from the Shenyang Conservatory of Music, which is the major Chinese music academy of Northeast China -- Manchuria. We had many cordial and successful cultural exchange type programs between our U.S. Consulate in Manchuria -- my section -- and the Shenyang Conservatory. On the New Year's card I just got from the Conservatory director is a picture of the brand new Shenyang concert hall. As you know, Shenyang is not the culture capital of China, but the people have invested in a cultural center which is aimed at presenting classical, Western and well as other kinds of music, and it has become a popular place to be! You wouldn't have seen that in 1976 or imagined that the mayor of Shenyang would be opening the Shenyang Conservatory of Music's new concert hall with a Beethoven symphony. It would have been unthinkable under Mao.

Q: That is what we say is the opening up of China.

KURZBAUER: Or that "Farewell My Concubine" is a best selling film in the United States. These interactions are growing and the world is being enriched. I think I was there at a wonderful time because 1984-85, as you know, was a time of expanding relations. New excitement.

Q: Right.

KURZBAUER: So the Jianguo and Great Wall were the two major international business type hotels in Beijing in 1984. The USIA section and the embassy rented the ball room and had an election party where beamed in by satellite were the election returns from the US. And for the first time since 1949 we were able to invite whole classes from China's number-one university, Beijing University, political science classes and international studies classes of Chinese students who came with their instructors to an American embassy function at the time of election. This was new. It had not been possible before. So there was a lot of excitement in these kinds of first encounters. So I came at a very auspicious time.

Of course there were restrictions and there were difficulties and there also was the "spiritual pollution" campaign. Relations would go up and down. But the overall contact possibilities were expanding at that point. So it was really exciting for me to be there then.

Q: Yes, I think you were actually in that country at the right time if you wanted to see the development of relations between two countries. China and the United States had had a relationship before, but there was a long time cut off, and it was really picking up speed at the time you were there.

KURZBAUER: One of the interesting things for me was to meet some of the older Chinese academics, some in government institutions, probably some in your own institution, who had gotten their early training at US universities before the Second World War and then had either been caught up in the war in China or here in the United States and had not been able to get back to China during the Japanese occupation, and then came back to China in the late forties to help build the new China. Of those I met there was a great deal of joy in the ability to be able to communicate again with Americans scholars or bridge the gap that had existed for the last 40-50 years. So someone who had spent his or her youth training in Oberlin College or Harvard and then had gone through all the series of events in China that we know about and had been cut off from broader world ties, now able to reach back out...it was a very moving thing. People like me, American officials, not because of our own personal worth, but because of the function that we held and what we represented, were recipients of that joy. And there was a special emotional quality to some of the encounters and some of the programming that we were able to initiate or promote or extend. Because of that it was like friends finding each other after a long, long separation.

Now, obviously that group of Chinese scholars had not known me, but I represented, or my colleagues represented, that other world for which they had affection also. It was a very moving thing.

Q: Yes, and moving also not only because they were separated from a country where they spent their youth, but also because of the time period they had just gone through. Remember, if they had training or education in the United States, most of them suffered one way or another during the Great Leap Forward or the cultural revolution, which lasted more than ten years.

KURZBAUER: Some would tell me their experiences and some would gloss over them by saying "that that was then and now I am still alive and am here." But you are absolutely right.

Q: So in a lot of ways, their joy reflected not only their personal feelings, but really on behalf of the whole country. The country was changing from an entirely isolated radical phase into a phase which was hopeful at least.

KURZBAUER: Towards great normalcy and stability. It is interesting because if I compare interactions in China to interactions in another Communist country...actually I served all my tours in countries that were Communist politically. People used to tease me that Personnel must have thought I was a Communist because every assignment I got had something to do with Communism.

But in Yugoslavia it is interesting, the personal interactions...of course, as you know, Yugoslavian Communism had a different face.

Q: Tito Communism.

KURZBAUER: Although there was certainly surveillance of certain personnel, no question about it, we couldn't feel it but it was understood. We just couldn't run around and not be observed by some aspect of security or some aspect of the Party. But there was no overt restraint in personal relationships in Yugoslavia then. So, for example, I sang in a Yugoslav choir. I had Yugoslav friends as I have friends here in Salt Lake City, perhaps more! I went to their homes; I went to their weddings; stayed up all night and drank tea and brandy in the kind of Latin Quarter, the Bohemia cabaret district of Belgrade called Skadarlija. In those days (unfortunately I am sure there have been massive change after all that has happened there now), but it was a kind of live and let live city with a lot of drinking and sitting around with friends in cafes. Kind of an old style European cafe life in a way. A lot of hanging out and window-shopping and socializing. Group social activities were very strong in those days. And there was no constraint for me as an American official to do all that with Yugoslav friends.

Now in China in 1984-86 it was still different. No matter the curiosity, the interest, and in fact, indeed in many cases, the friendship and the affection, I think that our Chinese official colleagues and unofficial friends, let's say students or musicians, had to be cautious and were. So going to someone's home was extremely rare. At the end of my tour of duty, I was invited to private homes, but then I was "safe" because I was leaving.

Q: When was this?

KURZBAUER: I left in August 1986.

I went to the homes of several mid-ranking government cadres, but...part of it may be that people live in small quarters and it is very hard to invite somebody to such cramped spaces. I think there was a perception that we can't invite a Westerner who comes from a pretty luxurious style of life into our one-room apartments! Maybe there is some "saving face" involved. But I think there was also political caution. That you know probably better than I. Certain interactions were authorized by a work unit because they were professionally necessary. But in this new period when the rules were changing within Chinese society, but were not clear, people most often, I think, needed to be cautious so that they wouldn't over-step some kind of unwritten rule that they might not know about! Are my perceptions accurate?

Q: Exactly. Especially when you are talking about a certain section of people. I am afraid that even if they wanted personally to invite you or felt there was no constraint on them in terms of inviting an American friend, they still have to tell their boss or authority that that is what they were going to do and is that all right. Sometimes they will get an easy okay, sometimes they would say that it has to be reported somewhere and will get an okay afterwards.

KURZBAUER: I think it affected some of our Chinese colleagues in terms of professional programs, they had to receive professional approval in order to participate in the various USIA programs. Now when I was in Shenyang, five years later...of course you know that Liaoning is a pretty conservative province, it is a military district headquarters, etc....I found a great deal of possibility in official programs that we did which were somewhat new or fairly new. We were able to expand in a number of cultural and educational and press exchange areas which surprised me. A lot of it, I think, was due to our staff. I would like to say a word about them if I can. And there were, I think, real professional and personal likings which developed. Not only with me but with my consulate colleagues as well. But still that caution prevailed. When I left I had a whole slew of invitations. Not only banquets from institutions and work units which are par for the course, but from individuals with whom I had worked and who then told me that they sort of needed to wait until I left in order to go that extra step. If they had been too friendly on a personal level with me or American colleagues during the course of our stay, it would have been a little too much, maybe too risky. They were welcome to participate in official doings, but not to extend that too much into a more personal interaction.

For example, a professor at a university. We had a number of programs for professors of English or American literature which we had established in the consulate. We invited both American teachers of English who lived in China at the time and Chinese professors of English and American literature from various universities in Northeast China. And we had a number attend our regular monthly "Literary Salon" that I and my staff established. But those same professors who were able to come to the consulate for those events, which was quite unusual actually, would not feel comfortable enough to say, "Well, come over to my apartment on campus."

Now in 1994 I understand that as far as the American business and academic communities it is pretty much an open door. Whether or not there is still caution towards an American official, it probably exists among some, but if you are a non-official foreigner there is very little that you can't do and very few places you can't go in China.

Q: Talking about the fact that you were in Shenyang and there at that period of time which was six months after Tiananmen Square...

KURZBAUER: Actually it was almost nine to ten months after Tiananmen. I arrived at a time when our political relations were still not all that cordial.

Q: So as a representative of the United States government, did you feel anything that had something to do with the Tiananmen Square incident?

KURZBAUER: Well, that is an interesting question because as an officer in the public affairs, public diplomacy section of an embassy, namely the USIS mission...we have a twofold mission: one is to present the vast spectrum of American society, culture, politics, intellectual life, etc. to the foreign public, whichever country that may be, and two, to help bridge the knowledge gap between our own American public and a foreign culture and society. That is the overall mandate.

We do it through a variety of programmatic means. One way might be assisting a school like the University of Utah that wants to expand an academic program with China, in making contacts with local Chinese universities that might be appropriate partners. Others are formal programs which are mandated by Congress like the supervision of the Fulbright Scholar Exchange program or the international visitor program that brings leading younger professionals from a foreign country to the United States for a month to meet American counterparts in the hope that they will establish an ongoing intellectual and professional dialogue. This has nothing to do with the government, but we are the facilitators of that introduction.

Other things are social science and cultural and educational types of programs that basically bring both sides, protagonists and professionals, together. The media function, of course, is presenting the American foreign policy point of view, distributing material on issues that might be difficult between the US and China, for example, trade imbalance, MFN. Part of my job was to talk to the local journalists and people who could spread information in the Northeast about why does America have this particular position, what are the trade issues, and explain to government officials of those provinces and also to media people, our positions and viewpoints, etc. So, a variety of activities and tasks.

But the bottom line is presenting America. Now presenting America, obviously, was not the most popular thing to do from the point of view of an official Chinese government ministry at that particular time.

Q: That is exactly so. Your feeling about what the government was supposed to do....

KURZBAUER: Of course we also had an understanding that we were supposed to go out there...that all diplomats are learners as well as doers. We are there to learn and understand as best as we can in a limited way. What is the thinking in that local society? What are the problems and goals? What are the issues from the point of view of that country, its population, its society? So it is a two way mission.

Q: So you have to feedback to the government so that they would make appropriate...

KURZBAUER: Yes, diplomats in many ways send reports back to Washington that are then reviewed by the policy makers and hopefully are factored into the next policy stage. So we promote and listen. But the promotion function, you are right, how do you do it when officially your host country is not all that encouraging of your method and mission? And I think what happened in my section was that I was lucky because I dealt in some aspects with less controversial issues. I had in some ways in some programs "goodies" to hand out. Some of the things we were interested in doing dovetailed with China's own stated political goals of education development... development in science, development in economics, development in industry...so that as a representative of the cultural and educational side of the USG, I think that some of our programs or contacts were encouraging of Chinese development and that made it a little bit easier to get in the door.

For example, the Northeast universities want to train more of their faculty in English. So I think they were more likely to respond to the kind of programming that we were able to initiate and to continue, both what we designed on the spot in our consulate and what we got from Washington and then presented, because it agreed with Chinese orientation and development.

But, not all. Sometimes there was the problem of how do you work it. A lot of times you had to go through the "back door" and then through the front door. Every provincial government, as you know, has a "waiban," a foreign affairs office that is suppose to facilitate and assist foreign activity in that area, but also keep an eye on it and make sure that what is being done is not contrary to the perceived interests of China or the provincial government. I believe that most of the cultural and educational and scientific and media institutions in Northeast China with whom our consulate had either existing relationships or expanded relationships had to report to their provincial government or at least their institutional foreign affairs office the contacts they might have with us, or the plans that they might have to do some program with the American consulate.

So I decided with the help of my staff, who were fantastic..as you know the American embassy and consulates are directed by the American officer and American professional staffs that come through the American diplomatic service, but the work really rests on the foundation of local national employees. This is the case in all of the countries in which we have diplomatic missions, not just China. You will have, for example, cultural advisors, economic advisors, media assistants who are nationals of the host country, as well as the janitors, the drivers and administrative staff. So really you have a small layer of American diplomatic personnel supervising and working with a larger group of host country nationals. There have been arguments and I have read in our newspapers and in Congress about the wisdom of that. Shouldn't a diplomatic mission be run by Americans?. Isn't that safer, more secure? It keeps our policies done and executed by Americans. Frankly I think it would be impossible to do the most effective work without the assistance and cooperation of Foreign Service Nationals. They provide a window of understanding into the culture and even are vital in pragmatic things. In some countries you just can't go to the counter and buy a train ticket, you need to know how to maneuver and where to go to get the most efficient service and whom to butter up! No American flying in for two years is going to know that.

In the case of China, I think the foreign national employees were in a difficult position, but they gave outstanding service to the development of bilateral relations and I will tell you why if I can be frank. They were assigned to the American consulates and embassy by the Chinese government's Diplomatic Service Bureau. In France, for example, if the US embassy needs a cultural advisor or an education assistant, you advertise in the French newspaper and look at the resumes. It is just like you would hire in the U.S. If your desiderata is somebody with a Ph.D. in American Studies who has worked in academic exchange programs, then you look at the resumes that come in and hire, just as you would if you were running an American business or big US institution.

Q: Without any institutional censorship.

KURZBAUER: Exactly. But in China the government selects people to fill the function on a two, three, four, five year contract as necessary, not only in our diplomatic mission, but all foreign missions that rely on foreign nationals. Now, for example, the Soviet mission did not hire any Chinese local staff. They were staffed completely by Soviet employees from drivers all the way up to the senior adviser. But most western missions have a mixed diplomatic supervision and local staff, which I think all in all works quite well.

So the staff we received was staff from the Chinese government. Now, obviously at a time of political tension or political disagreement or differences, foreign national employees are caught between two masters. On the one hand the job is to help bridge the gap and help. If I the officer am doing a program to promote American music or to promote understanding in new developments in American environmental science, my staff member is trying to get an audience or get the appropriate format or create the right atmosphere to promote these ideas and this information. At the same time there is probably a certain amount of pressure on that person from his other supervisor, meaning the Chinese Diplomatic Service Bureau, not to go too far to push a positive American program. I'm speculating, obviously none of my Chinese staff sat down and told me that, but I think it is pretty obvious.

Q: I think we are talking about the right period of time, because if we both think about the primary reason for the Tiananmen Square incident from the point of view of the Beijing government, the explanation or interpretation was the students had had too much Western ideas or had too much Western influence and that is why they were demanding democracy and brought the country into chaos in 1989. So there was some kind of a measure after that to try to reduce it. From your point of view the program is to promote understanding, from the Chinese point of view it is to expand contact.

KURZBAUER: So it is a difficult task for the American officer, but I think even more of a difficult task for the Chinese employee of an American or other foreign mission who has to really look at two missions, one is the mission of his own political society and the other is the mission of the foreign consulate which, to simplify greatly, is to expand contact and understanding.

Maybe because I had exceptionable people on my staff, or they were genuinely dedicated to...I think they genuinely believed that China and America are two great countries and there is a lot that can be shared. That may have inspired some of their really outstanding efforts.

Q: So you didn't personally encounter any difficulties?

KURZBAUER: Oh, there were difficulties but my staff always advised me how to get around them.

Q: So you were able to get around them.

KURZBAUER: But had I not had the staff...that is probably my point and I want to emphasize the value of the Foreign Service National to diplomatic work. At least the diplomatic work we do in many countries. Because without these employees I could be the same person with the same mission with the same diplomatic training from Washington and with the same intermediate Chinese language fluency, but I would not have known whom to go to for "permission," or to invite so-and-so because that will help promote the program among the provincial government officials, etc. So it was a very extensive personal network that the staff was able to advise me on.

And in China, as you know, that helps to get things done. Now, maybe it would make no difference if I was in New Zealand. If my staff member says to me...let's say I want to do work with the New Zealand Institute of Animal Technology (I am making that up). So as a diplomatic representative I have my staff call up the director of the university or the vice president for external relations and say, "We have this really interesting program between American animal technologists and we have some scholarships or we have some dialogue possible, would you like to look into cooperation or would you like to be introduced," I don't think there would be any... For them it would be a matter of do they have the interest in the topic, the time or resource to invest in it, is it productive for them intellectually. But in China at the time it was more than is it productive intellectually. Is it political correct, is it useful in local terms, is it politically suspect? There were many, many other levels. Many people in the Northeast had not had extensive contact with the outside world, unlike institutions in Beijing or institutions in Shanghai or institutions in Canton, the great centers. Northeast China, except for Russia and Japan, was not the center of great external relations with the rest of the world. Manchuria was off there, cold and remote. There were many institutions who had little or no external contacts, not only with Americans but with other countries. And we were just beginning to build. So there was caution, hesitation and uncertainty: was it okay to proceed this way, was it useful. The advice that I got from the staff on personal connections, who is important, what key institutions might be interested and which might not be, what did it mean if somebody said, "no." Were they offended or were they just politically unable to respond? Or did I just phrase my program in a way that was incomprehensible? What were all the meanings and results of actions. That was invaluable.

Q: The staff you are talking about is the Chinese?

KURZBAUER: That's right. My cultural assistant, my press assistant, my administrative secretary, they were all involved as a team in our programs and I think without them those programs would not have been done.

Q: I have another question. As a representative of the United States government and as a diplomatic official who is supposed to carry out the American policy of that period towards that country and in this case the PRC, in both period when you were in Beijing and in Shenyang, did you personally experience any kind of conflict? In order to implement your official policy this is what you need to do, but in reality you really found that is not a very smart idea to do it in China.

KURZBAUER: That is a third element that I did not experience personally, but that is an experience in the Foreign Service, and that is what happens if the individual officer fundamentally disagrees with his own country's policy on a particular issue, and I am thinking about having recently read about the resignation of a couple of our Yugoslav policy officers who resigned on principle because they disagreed with current American position in Yugoslavia. And, of course, having served there I have an emotional attachment to the issues and very much respect the decisions of the four promising young men, who made their own decision to leave government service (even though it is a wonderful career and maybe a unique career), because they could not agree with their own government's policies. That may be rare, but that is a third element. At the time I was in US government service I was not faced with a moral conflict between what I personally believed and what the policy was of my government towards a particular situation in the country I was serving in. So I was spared that.

Your question also points to a pragmatic issue of here's your mission but can you really do it. I have to say again I was pretty fortunate: in Shenyang I think given the overall political differences at the time between China and the US, the programmatic expectation was that not much would be able to be accomplished in that period. So I was not burdened with over expectation on the part of superiors or our program people back in Washington. In fact, it was the reverse.

But, from what I have seen in my service experience, there is a fair amount of latitude given to individual officers in the execution of their duties. I found that especially in a small post like Shenyang...we had five Americans and everybody else was family or Chinese nationals. And in the compound next door to us were five Japanese diplomats. So it is a very entrepreneurial and very collegial setting. Now in a large embassy obviously the division of labor is much stricter and the hierarchy may be a little more severe. We in Shenyang were almost like a new joint venture; we were out there at a frontier post! We were given a lot of latitude. And that is helpful, because if you can do something constructive you are one step ahead.

Q: And also I think it has something to do with the United States government's understanding of the post-Tiananmen Square situation in China so they were not expecting the embassy people to do a lot.

KURZBAUER: I understand the people in Beijing, especially after Tiananmen happened had a very difficult time starting the more programmatic aspects of our work up again. I came after Tiananmen and it may be that it was harder to operate in the capital than out in the provinces.

Q: Especially the Tiananmen incident had a strong effect on Beijing and even in Shanghai you felt the difference.

KURZBAUER: I was Branch Public Affairs Officer in Shenyang, so, head of section. That sounds very grandiose, but I was the only American USIA officer in my section. So I was head of myself and my Chinese staff. I reported to the Public Affairs Officer who was the Minister-Counselor for Public Affairs in Beijing. He was the senior USIA officer for all of us stationed in China and there were quite a few of us since every consulate had USIA officers. I also reported to the Consul General of my own consulate in Shenyang, who was kind of a mini ambassador of that. Over all was the ambassador who was the supervisor of the entire U.S. diplomatic mission in China, regardless of the agency you represented. Then you also had your own agency bosses back in Washington. It sounds like a lot of reporting and hierarchy, but there was also a considerable amount of latitude.

I think I found that, interestingly enough, as I went further north, the looser things were politically. Heilongjiang province, at the time, I found probably the easiest in terms of initiating some new contact with some new program activity. Jiein, as it is geographically, was kind of in the middle, and of course we were based in Liaoning. I think the provincial government's foreign affairs office looked more closely at us there then they would obviously when we went off to Heilongjiang. But even in Liaoning, with the right relationships, in programs that were not perceived to be too threatening to China, there was a lot that was possible to initiate. But I noticed going up to Heilongjiang, which is the Russian/Chinese border, that there was a kind of frontier independence. As you know a hundred years ago it was the frontier. There was gold mining, there were wild native tribes. The railroads helped open up that area just like it did in the West. I think there are a lot of similarities between parts of Manchuria and the American West. Underpopulated until recently, depending on mining extraction, fur industry, developed by outside powers...in the States it was easterners coming west and developing western mining industries, etc. and in Manchuria it was Russians and Japanese coming in. But there is a frontier mentality there of "we are our own bosses." I found of all the provincial interactions that the Heilongjiangers were kind of like the American Westerners here in the U.S. Southwest. Beijing was important, but it was far away somewhere else and the Heilongjiangers didn't have to look over their shoulder for every permission. Whereas the Shenyang authorities were much more cautious and not terribly open, very careful, very considering of every proposal and taking a long time to coming around to certain decisions. Of course the provincial government of Heilongjiang had to do the same thing but I think they were more ready to say, "Our goal is making Heilongjiang a wealthy province and if that means bringing in American business, fine; if that means sending our folks to America for training and bringing some Americans in, fine; whatever it takes to get us moving, that is what we want."

Q: You know, China is a large country and we have a saying that is carried down from centuries ago which says...The sky is high and far away and the king is remote from me...and means that I can do whatever I want. That in a way explains the rapid development in Canton, Guangzhou. I have heard Cantonese people say that if we want to do something we still do it whether it is after the Tiananmen incident or before that. See, it did not have such an impact on them as it did especially on the intellectuals in Beijing or on the general public of Beijing. So I think being stationed in Shenyang would make a difference then if you had been stationed in Beijing.

KURZBAUER: Oh, I am sure. If you draw a spectrum and talk about north China, and this is really speculation on my part, really not deep knowledge, you would have Beijing on one end of the spectrum and Harbin or Heilongjiang on the other. Liaoning, Shenyang would be closer in terms of caution and political supervision to Beijing. One incident, for example, was that the president of the major university in Liaoning, who was apparently a well known reformist economist...again this is a secondhand story I heard in China...kept his students out of trouble during Tiananmen Square, but he didn't prevent them from going off, down to Beijing if that is what they chose to do. He is still president, he maintained his presidency, but he was kind of under wraps for foreigners. It took a year for him to be able to attend a US consulate function after Tiananmen. Whereas, his staff like the vice president and department heads, could under certain circumstances and did participate and respond to our invitations to various academic and professional programming. But although the president was invited each time (he normally would be the one to receive the new Consul General and section chief, like me). was kind of under wraps for foreigners. I remember the first time he was "out" was in the spring of 1991. That was when he felt able to accept an invitation from the consulate to attend a consulate function. So that was 1989-91, two years during which he had to maintain a cautious position.

Now, others did not. Usually the economic officials had the most latitude.

Q: Because he was president of the university and we understand the Tiananmen incident had most to do with universities, and if he was in that capacity, whatever position he took would have a great impact on him afterwards for a while. It was good to hear that finally he did appear.

KURZBAUER: He appeared at a dinner that we hosted for the visit of the head of USIA's East Asia Bureau. But there are many interesting vignettes.

Q: One last question. In China we use the term "peaceful evolution," that is the strategy of the United States.

KURZBAUER: Well, that is what Chinese political commentators say is the strategy of the United States.

Q: That was the official Chinese line and they said to watch out for the "peaceful occupation"...

KURZBAUER: In a sense it implies that our real hidden agenda is intellectual occupation by peaceful means.

Q: Right, or intellectual invasion of China. Now, as a USIS official, as you were laying out the objectives and everything, that if something of that kind is behind all those, then you are the one who is doing something which would contribute to that so-called strategy of the United States diplomacy in China. Now what I am trying to get from you is, how would you interpret the so-called "peaceful evolution" as a strategy in China?

KURZBAUER: Are you using the term, "peaceful evolution" in the way that the Chinese political commentators would use it?

Q: Yes, I am using it within quotations. I am saying you worked for that section and generally you worked as a diplomatic official...

KURZBAUER: Is somebody going to be thinking that my real purpose is undermining the Chinese present system by the introduction of or the exposure to a variety of American alternatives.

Q: How could you persuade Chinese officials in Beijing that that is not what you are doing?

KURZBAUER: This reminds me of a question when I was in Beijing in 1984-86 as assistant press officer and I was asked to give a series of talks about American culture and policy to the New China News Agency's English language group of journalists. It was among the early times that foreign diplomats were allowed to go to Xinhua headquarters. Probably now it happens all the time, but this was in 1985. I had a fabulous time. These were young journalists being trained under the Thompson Foundation program. The British press magnate, Lord Thompson, had given money to Xinhua to develop professional journalism standards and training. So this was a special group of Xinhua journalists who were English speaking and would be working in foreign posts. You know how it is in China, audience people did not easily ask questions openly. A lecturer finished lecturing and that's that. (I know in Europe in the old days my father told me he never would ask questions in a German-Austrian high school or college.) The professor lectured and the students took notes, you didn't raise your hand and challenge, etc. So I think part of that in China comes from another sort of academic tradition and part of it is also social and political caution. So I went to lecture and didn't expect really very many questions. Instead, I got a whole wealth of questions. One of the young journalists said, "Well, isn't it true that all diplomats are spies?"!! So, they asked me about being a spy, so I had to answer them, but no one ever asked me about "peace evolution" so I never had to answer it. But it was obviously in the back of the minds of the people who were looking at the programs we were doing.

My answer would be that I am a representative of my country and my culture. This is how my country and culture operate. We have had successes, we have had failures. We have challenges, we have many problems that we have not overcome and we are struggling with. And we have had things that we think work. I am here to present the reality as best as any one small program can or any one section can of the vast diversity that is the United States. Openness is a hallmark, so we are open or try to be. Disagreement and critique is part of our cultural way so we have to be this way. The adjustment in a China-aimed program has to be in approach, but the fundamental values cannot be adjusted or otherwise we betray who we are. At the same time we are here to look at China as best as we can and understand it from a Chinese perspective. I am not here to tell you what to do. I may believe that a certain way of doing something is the best, but I am not presumptuous enough to tell you that you must do it that way. I can only present that aspect to you and have you see if this is appropriate. There are some areas where there are obvious benefits of working together in a collegial way. There are environmental problems, narcotic transfer problems, AIDs problems, medical problems that both of our countries face. We can bring together our best experts and our best methods to solve these problems. And I think one can agree that there obviously are political and social differences because you have 5,000 years of history and we have 200 plus. China is not really an ethnocentric state, but I think in many ways you can say there still is a dominant Han culture and at the same time a lot of diversity within that Han culture. But if you want to over simplify, there is a core that over thousands of years Han Chinese have seen themselves as related and united at least culturally if not politically or geographically. We are very different. Our whole history is serendipitous, diverse, and so naturally that history affects our values. So I am here to be as best as I can be an honest representative of what I perceive or what our programs help us to try to perceive about who we are. I am here also to honestly listen to you and all of what you are. We have to be honest representatives of who we are. And that is how I would answer it.

If I am an American diplomat serving in Jordan where there is a constitutional monarchy, I would be lying and betraying who I am and what I represent to say to you to make you feel comfortable that monarchy is obviously the best political system. Maybe it is appropriate for Jordan. But this is not what I represent, I am presenting you with the alternatives that the American experience has generated. No political official in China has ever asked me that directly. I mean, they asked me the spy question and that was a journalist. I remember that answer because I was so shocked for a moment I didn't know what to say. Obviously I don't know much about spying but from what I read the purpose is basically to gather information. I would say, "Well, you know an embassy gathers information. How do we gather information? We gather it by talking to you. We gather it by reading your newspapers. We gather it by reading your literature. And your diplomats and your journalists are doing the same thing in the United States. Now is that bad? I don't think it is bad because if we don't read your literature and your newspapers our perceptions of you are stereotypical, just as mine were of China...everybody running around China dressed in green and blue. Even as an educated woman and as an American official, before I went to China I knew I had a stereotype, but it was there unconsciously inside of me. 'China is grim, the Chinese are regimented, the Chinese don't think for themselves.' All kinds of things. If I hadn't been to China, if I hadn't seen, if I hadn't gathered information that stereotype would prevail. So I think the information aspect comes through reading, talking, programs and interactions and I think it is very important for both countries." And that is the answer I would give.

Q: That is wonderful. I purposely asked this question in order to provide some material for a future researcher because I think there ought to be somebody who gets into that to do research to explain what "peaceful evolution" is in terms of relations between countries, what ought to be and why this is perceived as "peaceful evolution." I mean, I just felt like it needs to be answered because it is very one sided and the Chinese government says it and tells people that way what do you mean by that..

KURZBAUER: That's interesting too because I think there is a perception among...I am not really a deep expert in broad policy formulation, as an officer I have been much more the implementer than the policy designer. That is both my background and functional assignments and probably what I do better. I think I am probably a better facilitator than I would be a staffer at the National Security Council creating the right policy we hope for the right moment. But still the general thinking is, I would think, that obviously relationships with nations, states or countries, that have similar perceptions and values are easier. Obviously we relate to Great Britain in an easy way although we have our differences and problems as well. We have them with France, as you just saw in the GATT negotiations and agricultural subsidies. Every nation is going to look out for its own self-interest, and that is the way it should be, even if they are closely related by history or political system. But overall the relationships tend to be easier with those whose systems are similar. So there is a presumption that in the best of all possible worlds, most nation's political and social systems will be organized somewhat akin to ours. But you know, the US society is changing and evolving. Our social criteria change. Our social problems are changing. Our issues are changing. So no society is ever in this ideal state. And there is no such thing as the ideal republic or the ideal democracy. We kind of strive towards it but it is going to take a different form. Even the British democracy's working out of social practice or political relationships are not like ours entirely. I think there are some basic assumptions that are similar and we might want to consider as universal. But the working out of those universals and those values differs even among politically akin nations. And in the end, I am sure scholars are going to say, it will have to be China that decides somehow for itself, and it is a very difficult process. America has been evolving for 200 years. We were not born as we are now.

Q: Personally as a student of diplomacy and diplomatic relations, my deep belief is that we ought to do everything as a person to promote understanding between and among countries. The more we understand each other the less we will fight against each other.

KURZBAUER: I would want to believe that also. Some people say that it is like personal relations, if you know too much about somebody, you wind up hating them. But I am still an optimistic and have that same personal belief as you do.

Q: I think it is based on the recent history. If you look at the kind of things that the United States foreign policy was based on or the Chinese foreign policy, or the Soviet foreign policy, was based on during the Cold War years. Now in retrospect we have a great number of books that we can read which tell us that there were a lot of misconceptions, especially between China and the United States. There were literally no contacts at all and so each of them were trying to understand the other by their own bias or prejudice and that created a lot of problems. So from the recent history I feel that the more we understand each other...

KURZBAUER: I am taking a course over in the political science department now in administrative theory. We have been assigned to read a book called "Group Think," which you may have heard of. It is by a social psychiatrist at Yale. He analyzes foreign policy decision making in certain key episodes. One of them was the decision to cross the 38th parallel during the Korean War. He goes into the long discussion bringing in the historical and diplomatic and scholarly literature on U.S. misperceptions not only of the Chinese resolve, but of China itself. We did not see China as a proud new revolutionary state with its own perception of its own self-interests. It sounds like from just reading secondary sources in this "Group Think" book that our policy makers saw China through a very stereotypical lens and that was as a tool of the Soviet Union. That is just a small anecdotal example, but it points right to your point.

Q: And to add to it quickly, what happened in Vietnam. It turned out that the perception was that Vietnam was operated from Beijing and Moscow, but we now know it is not all that true.

KURZBAUER: All you Commies are the same!

Q: That's right and that is how the United States jumped right into it. That is the period that I concentrate on in my studies and that is how I come to this sort of conclusion that the more we understand the less we will fight against each other. I think to promote understanding between countries is everybody's task.

KURZBAUER: You know it is strange because you look at that and you see how our two nations have had a history of close alliance, the World War II history, and positive mutual perceptions. And then a great divide of mutual hostility and mutual misperceptions and so forth. But we can approach that and can find congruence at least on many levels.

And then there is Yugoslavia and I am still trying to figure it out, even having worked and lived there for two years and probably having gotten more deeply into ordinary society than I did in China, to be honest. Trying to understand how the same people are fighting each other stem from the same nation, if you will, the Slavic nation. They speak basically the same languages: Croatian and Serbian linguistic differences are minute. It is analogous to British and American English. The people are Slavic by original ancestry but history for a variety of reasons has divided them into the Catholic, Orthodox Christian, and Muslim segments. Empires from the outside came in and changed histories. People found themselves on different sides of imperial lines, the Ottoman and Austrian. It is like saying the Shandong and the Hebei people who both stem, at least according to legend, from the Great Yellow Emperor, are now fighting each other to the death. And yet not only are the Slavs originally from the same stock way back, they have had the experience of living, working and intermarrying with each other in many cases for at least the last fifty years. And yet that nationhood was not able to sustain itself.

So you have the optimist and pessimist. On one hand you have two nations like the US and China who are so diverse and have both a bitter and a sweet history, who are somehow making more and more approaches towards each other. And you have peoples who are interrelated but are separating. I will leave it to the historians and the academics to answer that questions. But we belong on the hopeful side, I guess.

Q: Let's hope so.

JON M. HUNTSMAN, JR.
Advance Work, White House Staff
Beijing (1984)

Ambassador Jon M. Huntsman, Jr. was born in 1960. He is a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania. He served as the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Commerce in International Trade Administration and in East Asian and Pacific Affairs from 1989 to 1991. He was ambassador to Singapore from 1992 to 1993. Ambassador Huntsman was interviewed by: Dr. Chung and Ruth Kurzbauer on February 25, 1994.

Q: Good afternoon, it is February 25, 1994, and this is an oral history interview for the Department of State's diplomatic history archives with Ambassador Jon M. Huntsman, Jr. We are delighted that the Ambassador could take the time to meet with us today. The interviewers will be Dr. Chung, a specialist in US diplomatic history at the University of Utah and Ruth Kurzbauer, a former FSO with USIA.

Mr. Ambassador if you would just outline briefly for us and for any future listener or participant, what led you into interest in Asia, into government service and maybe just the broad biographical outlines of your own background up until now.

HUNTSMAN: My interest in international politics, international affairs, really was a result of living abroad. In high school I was sent over to Germany and spent a little time living and working in Germany right after high school, working as a shipping manager. I developed kind of a view that was a little larger than what one would develop simply living in a fairly isolated city in a sometimes isolated country. That really is what opened up my mind, first to the people of Germany and the culture of Germany and the language. I became enamored with all of them. Shortly thereafter, when I was 19 years old, I was sent as a missionary to Taiwan for a couple of years. Had I not been forced to go over there I don't think I would have had the opportunity or developed at a very young impressionable age a view of people in the Pacific rim, specially the Chinese, those who lived in Taiwan.

Q: Recalling back to that period, did you have some prior stereotypes of Asians or Chinese or Chinese culture, and if so, were any of those changed by your two year residence?

HUNTSMAN: I hadn't been exposed to much that was Asian. My parents had been to Mainland China in the late 1970s. They had been some of the first people to the Mainland from the United States as part of a delegation. They came back with some very interesting stories. I, at that point in life, started to develop a very keen interest in Asia, specially China. I didn't know much about it. I knew it was a very mysterious part of the world, but I knew I wanted to learn more about it. So when I received an assignment to live over there for a couple of years, selfishly I wanted to go back to Germany because I was able to speak a little bit of German, I was familiar with the culture and the territory, but I was sent to just the opposite side of the world. I went to Taiwan with little knowledge of the language. We had an intensive language program, two months, so I was able to exchange pleasantries beforehand, but I found as soon as I got there even the pleasantries that I tried to articulate weren't necessarily understood by the local people. Many of them spoke Taiwanese.

I spent two years there teaching English and doing a lot of humanitarian things and in short learning the language, learning the culture and getting to understand the people. It was very much a function of how willing one was to get in and make it an exercise in self-education, more than anything else. I had to teach myself the language. I had to learn about the culture. There were no organized classes that helped us to understand what we were living within, the context of the Chinese experience. Taiwan is a very unique chapter within the whole book of China. I wish now that there would have been some sort of organized academic experience there where we would have been able to make better sense out of what we were doing on a day-to-day basis. We were really thrown into this difficult milieu and we all hoped to make some sense out of it. So the first objective was learning the language so we could get by. And that I worked extremely diligently on.

Through all of the things one does as a missionary, mostly humanitarian work, you can't help develop a fondness for the people and an appreciation for the culture and the history. I became so taken by the history of Taiwan, particularly as it went back to the Mainland and the revolution that took place in 1949. How did the people in Taiwan get to where they are? Why do they have the kind of government they do today? Why was Chiang Kai-shek such a revered person, at least in Taiwan? All of these things were questions I spent a lot of time investigating.

So during that two year period I learned a great deal about the Taiwan experience and the whole ethos of the Chinese world view. Following my return from that experience, during which I continued the study of the language, continued learning as much as I possibly could about not only Taiwan, but I tried to broaden it to Mainland China, and shortly thereafter the entire Pacific rim. I couldn't get enough of it. I took classes at the university.

Q: When you returned, where did you go?

HUNTSMAN: I started here at the University of Utah and ended at the University of Pennsylvania where they have a very good Chinese language program. They also have a very good Asians Studies program. I took advantage of both.

During those years I also took some time out to work in the White House for President Reagan. I was the one who would organize his trips, his travels with him. For example, if he went outside of Washington to visit someone in California or New York, it always took a team of people to organize it...the security, the communications, the political aspects, the policy aspects. I was what you call an advance man who basically went out ahead of the President to help organize all these different facets of a Presidential trip. I was able to travel internationally with the President and to almost all 50 states with him. It was a great experience and a great education for a young man. I left the White House in late 1983 and was called back out of retirement in 1984 when the President went to China. I had many friends there, including the deputy chief of staff, Mike Deavers, who hired me. They knew of my fondness and affection for China. When they found out that the President was going to go against everything that he had said during his two or three years in office and actually visit Beijing, I guess it dawned on them that they could call their old friend, the advance man, who had some experience in that part of the world, who spoke the language. So I was called out of retirement to travel over to China. This was what we call a pre-advance...

Q: This was in 1984?

HUNTSMAN: This was February, 1984. He actually made the trip in April and May of 1984.

Han Xu, who was later Chinese Ambassador here in the United States, then was the Vice Minister in the Foreign Ministry over North American Affairs, was our counterpart. We worked with him along with Ambassador Art Hummel, who had been over there I think for a year or two by then. He had previously been the Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs. He was a terrific, terrific diplomat.

There wasn't much in the way of a bilateral relationship back then since President Reagan had been such a hard liner on US/China policy. So this was a real chance to build a relationship from scratch between the two countries. So I went over there on the pre-advance, got to know a lot of new friends in China, helped to arrange all the aspects of what the President would do in China...take him out to the Great Wall, take him to the Forbidden City, meetings with Deng Xiaoping, meetings with Zhao Ziyang and meetings with Hu Yaobang. It was a terrific experience for me, at 23 or 24 years old, or whatever it was at the time. I got to meet all of these people too: dinner with Liu Shao Chi and Hu Yaobang and a lot of our favorites.

I am trying to think of when Zhao Ziyang came here to the United States, because that was also an important part of my education. I was put in charge of his trip here to the United States. I think it was right before the President went to China, late 1983.

Q: I am trying to think. I came here in May, 1984 and he had been here already.

HUNTSMAN: Yes, then it was late 1983, because he extended the invitation to President Reagan to make a reciprocal visit.

I was also taken out of retirement to help organize his trip, Zhao Ziyang's trip to California. So I spent some time with people in the State Department, the Protocol Officer, people in Zhao Ziyang's entourage and spent a couple of weeks in the Bay area organizing his visit there. And then I was with Zhao Ziyang when he went through his trip, from step to step, event to event. So when I went back to Beijing and got to see Zhao Ziyang for the second or third time, it was like a reunion.

Q: Did you play golf?

HUNTSMAN: No, he wasn't much into golf then, he was too busy with other things.

Q: At the time you were working with the White House, you came to Beijing with an advance team and interacted with an embassy. At that time you probably didn't know that one day you would be an ambassador yourself. Do you have any recollection of your impressions of the embassy's external operation, or how federal agencies work with each other?

HUNTSMAN: The first thing that I was tasked to do when we got to Beijing...we went right to Art Hummel's home, the Residence of the ambassador...and we had in tow the head of the Secret Service detail, who were the people protecting the President; military people, who would be responsible for putting phones in all the rooms and out to the Great Wall where the President would travel...they had to put telephones out to the Great Wall not only for the President for national security reasons, but for the media who would have to phone in and file their stories right after the President went out there. I remember sitting in Art Hummel's living room with some of the other advance people and being put on the spot, having to stand up in front of all these people, including Art Hummel; his DCM, Chas Freeman; and Dick Hart, who was number three, the political counselor, and describing to these people...I was just a young man and having to describe for them what we hoped to accomplish over our week or two pre-advance. What we hoped to accomplish in terms of arranging the schedule for the President and then melding into that all the political implications of each visit. You should go here because there is a good political reason, or you should not go there because the political implications are ominous. Everything had to be weighed and evaluated very carefully.

But I remember sitting in Art Hummel's living room thinking, "That is what I want to do some day." From that point on my goal was to some day be able to serve in a capacity like that where you could make a real contribution to a relationship, important relationship, bilateral relationships. And Art Hummel was such a dynamic figure and such a pro in the field in China relations. He was born in China, the son of missionaries. He even fought with the revolutionaries during the late forties. He had a very rich history in recent history of China. He so impressed me during that visit that he really became a role model of sorts, almost idol, if you will. You have to set goals for yourself and I thought it was something completely out of reach, would never happen. But nonetheless, I thought that that would be something to which I should aspire. In a good way, not that it is going to bring you any more, but because it might put you in a position to effect change, to help people. To help people on the US side better understand China, and to help the people in China better understand those from the United States. To help ameliorate problems when they arise. I thought he was very good at it.

So that really was a baptism by fire, shall we say. Sitting in Art Hummel's living room, watching him in action, and having to stand before all these very dignified people from the embassy...all of whom were of great help and assistance in putting this whole trip together. They gave us anything we needed. I was so impressed by the level of professionalism, the quality people that this organization attracted, this embassy behind cameras, guards and gates. In this building sat some extremely talented people. I was absolutely struck by that. I had spent some time in the White House in a very rarified atmosphere for a young man and was impressed by the people coming and going, but it wasn't until I got out into the field where I was extremely taken by the level of professionalism, the level of talent that existed in these embassy buildings. And I traveled with the President to South America, to Mexico and to Asia, and in each case I had the chance to interact with the ambassador and with the senior staff people and I was never let down. I always saw a consistent level of professionalism and it always struck me as being quite unusual that the United States could organize the State Department and within the State Department there was the Foreign Service organization which consistently put out a very, as they say in the business world, high quality product. A constant high quality product.

Q: Did you notice or hear of any changes in the President's perception of China or his own thinking about the relationship as a result of the week in the country? Or did he still hold to a vision of China as a hard line country to be watched?

HUNTSMAN: The President had never been to China before that. He had been to Taipei and when you visit the Chiang Kai-shek Memorial it is a museum. There is a picture of Chiang Kai-shek with Governor Reagan. It hangs very prominently there. So he was always very much allied with the Taipei world view. He had always been very harsh. If you remember doing the campaign in 1980 when it came to how were we going to handle the relationship of Beijing, he would say, "Well, essentially I am not going to give them any credibility. I am going to help the people in Taipei because they came out of what we deeply believe in, democracy, civil rights." Even though the democracy and civil rights were far from the truth in the Taipei experience, he used to point out those difference in the 1980 campaign.

But during his two or three years in office before going to Beijing he became educated. He began to understand the importance of that bilateral relationship that President Nixon and Henry Kissinger were instrumental in establishing. I think when he started taking a look at the world as President of the United States opposed to being governor of a state, he probably came to the conclusion that the United States couldn't go on without having a healthy relationship with Beijing from a commercial standpoint, economic and trade standpoint, political standpoint. And I think Reagan being an ideologue during the 1980 campaign became more pragmatist and I think developed a very healthy world view where it wasn't simply based on ideological lines but rather real politics.

He enjoyed his trip to Beijing a great deal. I think I was with him for each stop along the way in Beijing, Shenyang and Shanghai. It was a terrific education for him and throughout it all I think he developed a greater appreciation for the importance of that bilateral relationship.

HERBERT E. HOROWITZ
Deputy Chief of Mission
Beijing (1984-1986)

Ambassador Herbert E. Horowitz was born in New York in 1930. He received his bachelor's degree from Brooklyn College in 1952. He received a master's degree from Columbia University in 1964 and from the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy in 1965. He served in the US Army from 1953-1955. His overseas posts include Taipei, Hong Kong, Peking, and Sydney. He was ambassador to the Gambia from 1986 to 1989. Ambassador Horowitz was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on December 9, 1992.

Q: Then you went back to China?

HOROWITZ: Then I went back. I was asked by Art Hummel to go back to Peking...

Q: He was Ambassador.

HOROWITZ: He was Ambassador...and be his deputy. His deputy at that time, finishing his tour, was Chas Freeman. For me, with a long interest in China, I was thrilled at the opportunity. I was in Peking for a year and a half or two years. Hummel's tour came to an end and there was a gap before Winston Lord came because he had trouble getting Congressional approval, so I was Chargé for several months in between. And then I stayed with Winston for several months until he got his feet on the ground.

Q: What was the political situation like when you were there in Peking this time?

HOROWITZ: Totally different.

Q: This was basically 1984 to 1986?

HOROWITZ: Yes. Totally different from '73 to '75. In 1977 to 1978 the radicals lost out and were purged, tried and put in jail; the pragmatists really came back in; Deng Xiaoping rose to be the principal character; the Chinese were fully involved in the program of economic reform. There was more openness; it was easier to travel. Chinese officials had titles and they had calling cards; in 1973 to 1975 an official might be identified as "a responsible person"; they had no phone books, no rosters. Now, they would speak more openly; we just had a lot more contact all up and down the line. We had a full slate of officers; it was a full-fledged embassy with even a Science and Technology Counselor, a very big S&T exchange program -- lots of students were in the U.S. and Americans were coming to China to teach and study there.

Q: Was there a full consular network?

HOROWITZ: We had consulates in various cities; it was a very, very different kind of picture. And China seemed to be doing okay. There was no question that the economy was improving, compared to the seventies there was much more food in the market, more clothing and things to buy. They were making good strides, but there was still a certain amount of political reaction from time to time. The Tiananmen affair of 1989 was not the first effort on the part of some Chinese to pull back and reassert controls. But the main point was that they were making a lot of progress.

Q: Were there any great problems that you had to deal with at that time?

HOROWITZ: No, nothing that was out of the general range of issues. On the management side there was sometimes a problem in trying to keep things under control. Some of our people had become very enthusiastic on the military exchange program, "we want more exchanges," or "the S&T is terrific, let's go all out." People become committed to those issues and I felt one of our problems was to try keep things measured, under control, to know what we were doing and why we were doing it.

Q: It has always seemed to me, from a historical point of view, that this inordinate enthusiasm about China has permeated our history. In 1790 we had a hell of a time getting consuls anywhere -- it took years to get a consul established in, say, Madrid, or other cities -- yet Congress voted within two weeks to send two to Canton. It has gone on ever since.

HOROWITZ: Yes, but also periods of disenchantment. For the most part since 1989 we have been in a period of disenchantment and suspicion. There is a tendency to go overboard. Over these years, from the seventies, even while I was in INR and the Treasury, I participated in delegations that visited China as an escort officer and I was just amazed at how people would fall all over themselves when they were now in China. "This is the greatest thing that ever happened." "This is the most fantastic place I have ever gone to."

Q: These great bursts of enthusiasm. Even during the worst of times, one would see these pictures of small Chinese children and everyone would fall in love with little Chinese children whereas we didn't do the same for children in other countries.

HOROWITZ: That is true; there is still a certain infatuation with China and things Chinese.

Q: Did you find the Chinese the same as to American things or were they more reserved?

HOROWITZ: Yes, I think there is a lot of interest in the United States, in part because we are a big power, a great power, a strong country, also because they know about its economic opportunity. That is why you still read about boat loads of Chinese trying to get into the country one way or the other. They are all aware of America. There was a lot of interest in VOA, listening to Voice of American broadcasts, even back in the seventies when we were there. Sometimes you would meet a Chinese who spoke some English and you would ask him how he learned it, "Oh, I listen to Voice of America."

Q: I was talking to the head of the Voice of America and am still conducting an interview with him, Richard Carlson, and he was saying that even at the height of the cold war there was still an implicit sort of cooperation between the Voice of America and the Chinese. The Chinese were reproducing our English broadcasts and publishing papers, instructional sheets for this. This was going on even at this very peculiar time.

HOROWITZ: Yes, I think there is a lot of interest in the United States. Probably in South China even a greater awareness because so many of the early Chinese in this country came from there.

Q: At this time there was a very large group of Chinese students in the United States studying. At the embassy were you looking at this and saying "when all these people come back this will be not just an exchange program but a real revolutionary thing"? Was this of concern?

HOROWITZ: To me it has not been a concern because I think in the long run it is going to have a beneficial impact. I can't see how it will not in a country like China with the amount of trade, the amount of travel to and from abroad, the students studying abroad coming back sooner or later, have some political impact. You can't do all that and maintain a totalitarian regime forever and ever. It is not something that worries me, I think it is good.

Q: Were we concerned though at the time that maybe we were introducing a revolutionary element? Did we know what we were doing by encouraging this?

HOROWITZ: No, I don't think we were worried about it.

That was not a concern; that we would be creating the basis for change was not something that we were worried about.

Q: You were there during the Reagan administration. How did you feel that administration handled China policy? After all Reagan came up when China was the great enemy.

HOROWITZ: I felt all through that period that we were, as a government, determined to continue the process of normal relations, of wanting to bring China into the world political and economic community. I don't think there was any reluctance about that. I think when Reagan first came into office and talked about Taiwan he created some ripples of concern, but I think there was a commitment on the part of the administration to continue the process.

Q: How about the Soviets at this time -- were they trying to find out what we were up to, still feeling frozen out, or were things beginning to relax for them?

HOROWITZ: By the mid-eighties the Chinese had moved to a situation where they had a more independent foreign policy -- not lining up again with the Soviets but trying to have more normal relations with the Soviets and a more normal range of contacts with them. They were interested in the changes that were beginning to take place there; they were watching it closely. They were not anymore so much worried about imminent Soviet attack as they had been in the seventies when they imagined the Soviets might attack them at any moment. That had all disappeared -- back in the seventies they would show you the air raid shelters they had been digging in the villages.

Q: Are there any more areas that we might cover on this particular period?

HOROWITZ: No, for the most part U.S. relations with China were on course, only little problems here and there. There was interest in U.S. investment coming in, a lot of exchange students going to the United States, people coming back and forth, a much more open kind of situation than we had experienced there before. One thing worth mentioning, I think, is that that was a period, the mid-eighties, of considerable growth in Chinese agriculture, the rural sector, and in the small towns and medium size cities -- they just really took off. As part of the reform efforts one of the first things that the Chinese did was to try to remove some of the stringent controls in the rural areas. The communes in effect had been taken apart; it became possible for people, not to own land, but at least have land that was theirs. Incentives were built in and agricultural production went up, and along with that a tremendous growth in small-scale local industry. I think this is important because it is one of the things that is different about China from Russia and East Europe; when there is food in the market and clothing to be bought and there is not a serious inflation situation in the economy, then you can begin to experiment with other reforms.

Q: As an economist looking at this, it seems that the Soviets destroyed all the infrastructure that would support the individual farmer -- maybe it was because the countries and climate are different -- so that when you removed the restrictions Soviet agriculture didn't blossom. If you had cows you couldn't feed the cows or get fertilizer or anything else, whereas in China when they let go...

HOROWITZ: The villages were intact. When the Great Leap Forward failed in the late fifties and they had to retreat from the advanced idea of communes with communal kitchens, they made what in the commune they called the production team as the basic accounting unit and the production team was basically the old village -- or there might be two production teams in one village. Also, during the communist period agricultural production was not stagnant, it did continue to improve. They introduced more and more chemical fertilizer and other ideas; they improved the infrastructure, communication and roads to rural areas. There was a better situation in China for the reforms. Now of course in China they still say they have socialism, socialism with Chinese characteristics. They won't call it anything else but in fact it is a very vibrant, semi-free market economy.

Q: Just a last question: Could you comment on Art Hummel as Ambassador and Winston Lord as Ambassador; what you saw of their effectiveness, how they worked in China? Both of these men had roots in China, Winston Lord was married to a woman from China and Art Hummel had served with the partisans as a young kid who grew up in China.

HOROWITZ: Art Hummel knew, and knows, a lot more about China than Winston Lord did at that time. Winston was interested in China and as an aide to Kissinger had played some role in those early days but was not a China expert; he has become knowledgeable about China because of his work experience over the years, whereas Hummel has a better feel for the country and the culture and society. I know Hummel a lot better than I know Winston Lord because I was only with Winston Lord a few months to help him get settled. Hummel down deep had a great love for China but I also think he was a very tough diplomat. He was very rigorous in defining the issues and understanding what the issues were and could be a tough negotiator with the Chinese. Winston Lord was more cerebral; he certainly was extremely intelligent with a very good analytical mind. He was always analyzing, trying to see what was happening in China, to understand, to get a feel for it. Very different personalities. I really can't comment on Winston's period as Ambassador because I was not there long enough.

Q: You left in 1986 and then what?

HOROWITZ: I went to West Africa and became Ambassador to The Gambia.

HARRY E.T. THAYER
Director, American Institute in Taiwan
Taipei, Taiwan (1984-1986)

Dean, Language Studies, Foreign Service Institute
Washington, DC (1986-1989)

Ambassador Harry E. T. Thayer was born in Massachusetts in 1927. He received his bachelor's degree from Yale University in 1951. He served in the US Navy from 1945-1946. His overseas posts include Hong Kong, Taipei, and Beijing. He was ambassador to Singapore from 1980 to 1984. Ambassador Thayer was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1990.

THAYER: My job immediately after Singapore was director of the American Institute in Taiwan (AIT). The American Institute in Taiwan is and was the quasi-embassy, non- governmental, non-official entity that we established as of January 1, 1979 when we normalized relations with the PRC and broke government-to-government diplomatic relations with the former Republic of China, which is Taiwan. The American Institute in Taiwan is a contract organization headquartered in Rosslyn, Virginia, across the river, on contract to the State Department to carry out the people-to-people relationships -- that is, commercial, cultural, and other relations -- between the people of Taiwan and the people of the United States.

None of the AIT staff is legally an official employee of the American government. All of us who were Foreign Service officers were legally separated from the State Department for the duration of our employment by the American Institute in Taiwan. Under the Taiwan Relations Act we were separated without losing the various emoluments we would have accumulated if we had remained Foreign Service officers during that period and gone on to serve in some country with which we had formal diplomatic relations.

But the American Institute in Taiwan, which is modeled after the Japanese equivalent entity that they established when they broke relations with the PRC, is set up to conduct relations with Taiwan in very much the same way as an embassy conducts relations. We were broken down into the same kind of sections -- political, economic, and so forth. But we called them by different names. The political section was called the General Affairs Section (GAS), for example. The consular section -- what we usually know as the "Consular Section" -- was called the Travel Service Section (TSS), etc.

The point being that we wanted to remove all the symbols of government-to-government relations and all the symbols of an embassy, while still being able to carry out the substantive work. We had no American flag flying in Taiwan. I was not known as Ambassador; I was known as Director. I did not call on officials of Taiwan in their -- I never went to the foreign ministry, did not go into the offices of ministers. Generally speaking, I went to no government offices. There were some exceptions, but we kept the visibility and the symbols of the government-to-government relationship down. If I wanted to complain to the Minister of Economic Affairs, as I did more than once, to get some trade problem straightened out, I would have to ask him to meet me either in a hotel room or a restaurant room which we would hire for the occasion, or in one of our buildings or in one of the Taiwan guest houses. In other words, an unofficial locus for an unofficial meeting between the representatives of two peoples rather than an official place where the representatives of two governments met.

This was an awkward way to do business. Having been on part of the team that helped establish the relationship with Beijing and dis-established the relationship with the government of the Republic of China (when I was head of the PRC desk 1976-79), I entirely approved of this anomaly that we created. But working on it day-to-day, which is one of the things that attracted me to the job, turned out to be a lot more complicated than I had anticipated. There wasn't a day that went by without having some decision about modalities, which would have come quickly and easily if AIT were an embassy, made in a way to maintain the unofficial aspect of the relationship. For example, making a demarche on a given subject required a decision about where -- not automatically the traditional host government building -- to use it.

Q: Would you explain what a demarche is?

THAYER: A demarche, at least as I use the term, is if we have a message to give another government asking them to do something or complaining about their not doing something, we would speak to a representative of the other government trying to get the government to take or not take certain actions.

I will say that the Taiwan authorities have their counterpart organization established at the same time as we established AIT. They had their counterpart organization in Washington, which is called the Coordination Council for North American Affairs (CCNAA), and they operate here in the same way as we operate there. In Taiwan, I technically didn't deal with the Foreign Ministry. I dealt with the head office of the Coordination Council for North American Affairs, which was my counterpart. Things that we did were always under the rubric of that relationship between the AIT and CCNAA. We did have some direct contact with government officials, but they were in an unofficial setting or at a lower level.

Q: I would think that just this sort of diplomatic dance would get a little bit annoying for both of you, because it was a time-waster, wasn't it, to get to places? The only comparable place I can think of at all is the trip our people have to make to go from Tel Aviv up to Jerusalem to do any business at the foreign ministry because we won't put our embassy in Jerusalem.

THAYER: It did take time. It was also awkward. And it is a difficult arrangement for the Taiwan authorities. For a government -- that using in lower case, as I must -- the "Republic of China" had a great pride in itself. The government servants, particularly in the Foreign Ministry but also throughout the Government, had a pride in serving the "Republic of China". The formal diplomatic relationship with the United States was very important to them for reasons we're all familiar with. To suddenly be told, "We're going to pretend that you're not a real government, and you're going to need to deal with us on this basis," was hard for them to take. It was a matter of bitter contention, as we have talked about, in the United States Congress at the time and between the Taiwan authorities and ourselves at the time of normalization. And it continued to rankle not just the authorities in Taiwan, but also people around the government, senior businessmen and others, to be treated like a second-class country. In fact, we treated them as not a country but as a political entity which was part of China and an entity with which we did not have official relations.

So there was the awkwardness. It's a time-waster. Whatever the realities of the situation required, one cannot help but empathize with the members of the Taiwan organizations responsible for dealing with the Americans, empathize with their feeling of insult when we did not treat them as a sovereign entity. I agree entirely with the policy, which I worked hard on myself, but from a human point of view, it's easy to understand why it would be difficult for a senior official, somebody who is an official in the "Government of the Republic of China" for twenty-five years, to suddenly be treated as if he were not an official of a government in good standing.

Q: This was about five years after the AIT had been set up, wasn't it? Were you the third director?

THAYER: I was the third director.

Q: Had a real modus vivendi been worked out so that you could pick up the phone and settle a lot of things this way, or did you just say, "Oh, just meet me out in front of the building and let's get this over with," or were they still being very prickly?

THAYER: We didn't quite get to the point of, "Meet me out in front of the building." But you're quite right in raising this question, because when the relationship was first established, there was little confidence, or certainly not full confidence, on the part of our friends in Taiwan that we could have an unofficial relationship that really worked. By the time I got there, thanks in part to not only those who preceded me in the job, Chuck Cross and Jim Lilley, but also because of the conduct of the whole of the American government in working out the relationship, by the time I got there, there was general acceptance that this relationship was a workable one, that the non-official relationship could adequately handle the substantive affairs that needed to be handled in the interests of both, as we say, the people of the United States and the people of Taiwan.

So we'd gotten past that period of serious doubts that it was workable. We were into a period where, nevertheless, some of the detailed activities rankled, and that continues to this day. While I was there, I was often bearded by counterparts or friends among the Taiwan authorities who would say, "Why can't you guys put up a flag? Why can't you at least give us the dignity of having an American flag in here?" And other questions of that sort. And we always discussed very frankly what we felt our interests were; that is to say that if we were going to recognize the PRC as the legal government of China, certain things were corollary to that, and our interest was in making the most of the substantive relationship with Taiwan and making sure that worked, and that's what we should concentrate our efforts toward. By and large, I think our friends in Taiwan also saw substance as the important thing. The relationship today is, I think, a very friendly one. But we've been very careful from the very beginning to adhere to the undertakings made to Beijing in the normalization agreement by the statements of President Carter about conducting our relations with the people of Taiwan on an unofficial basis.

Q: Harry, to get to the substance of this thing, in a way we're watching this peculiar relationship and we have made the statement that, "Oh, yes, there's one China, and eventually this will be settled." From somebody who's an outsider, I mean, it seems so apparent that Taiwan and mainland China have gone separate ways, separate systems, and eventually they're going to be two countries. I find it very difficult to see a melding, but this is from the outsider. Is the Chineseness of both sides such that they will coalesce? What was the feeling when you were there at that time? Where was this going to go?

THAYER: Well, there's no unanimity of feeling. As you know, there have been for decades people advocating an independent Taiwan. But the current arrangement and relationship to each other could continue, more or less, this way indefinitely for decades and decades without any substantive formal change in the relationship but simply a more relaxed intercourse between them. It's easy to see this current situation continuing indefinitely.

I think our interest is not in having it settled in any particular way, but in a peaceful solution, and that's been our interest since the 1950s, and that continues to be our interest today. We're not tied to a particular solution of the differences. We're just tied to a peaceful solution. We're not in the business of expediting that, and that wasn't my business when I was director of AIT, certainly. Our desire is to conduct a healthy relationship with both sides of the China equation and let them figure out how to sort out their own relationships.

Q: Speaking of when you were in Singapore, did you have any problem with congressional visits and other visits like that -- of having particularly congressmen or congresswomen coming in, sounding off on their own, particularly those who didn't like the relationship and getting headlines and all, and there you were, having to deal with that?

THAYER: We did have some. There are a lot of congressmen who were very friendly for a long time with the former Republic of China, now Taiwan, and who made their views clear, particularly when they were in Taiwan on visits. There were lots of "friends of the ROC" -- people formerly from the Hill -- who visited Taiwan when I was there, for a notable example, Senator [Barry] Goldwater, whose views haven't changed much on the issue. And these people are lionized. They are given plenty of attention in the press, and they say their thing and we say, or more likely don't say, our thing, since we keep a fairly low profile out there. That simply is understood to be part of the game. I never made any attempt to tell a senator or a representative what he should or shouldn't say. Sometimes we'd be asked for our view, and I would give it frankly. But for the most part, whatever was said, it didn't embarrass us because we, as contractors for the administration, were doing our people-to-people job and not attempting to tell the Congress what to do.

Q: You could do a certain amount of ducking, too, couldn't you? Because if you were an embassy, you'd have a USIS office that would be having to respond to everything that concerned America. But being where you were, you could kind of duck things that normally a full-blown embassy would have to respond to.

THAYER: I guess that's true. We did, however, consider it part of our job, being conscientious contractors to the United States Government, to have the government's viewpoint well known, and, therefore, our Cultural Information Service, which would be called USIS at another post, did issue reports about events in America, purveying the American government's viewpoint on given issues. There were certain things we didn't do in that respect. I can't remember what they were offhand, but we were very careful to continue to wear our non-governmental colors.

Q: Were there any major issues that you had to deal with in this time between the United States and Taiwan?

THAYER: The major issues we had that I can discuss here were in the trade area. Taiwan was targeted by the USTR, United States Trade Representative's office, for a number of negotiations -- and Section 301 actions were threatened more than once. We had some very heated times with the authorities in Taiwan over trade matters, and some of them got to be quite unpleasant. The most unpleasant was, for me, the American effort to get Taiwan to open its market to American cigarettes. Taiwan wasn't the only place where we've done that. This was an issue in Korea, too, and also elsewhere, Thailand and so forth. Because of a combination of circumstances, the tone of this debate on cigarettes got to be quite nasty and made me extremely uncomfortable. The press was very hard on us. We brought a lot of pressure. This pressure on Taiwan provoked statements by the Taiwan tobacco people and others that were unhelpful. The trade issue thus became a big political issue, with overtones of pushing opium on the Chinese -- this kind of thing.

Q: This goes back to the 1840s.

THAYER: That's right.

Q: The opium wars in China.

THAYER: So it was really quite nasty. It was bad enough so that I took the initiative to have meetings with the major publishers and/or editorial boards of some of the newspapers in Taiwan, the key ones, in which I and the economic counselors and others involved in these tobacco negotiations sought to make sure they understood where we were coming from and so that we would reduce the acrimonious press treatment of this tobacco issue, which was souring the atmosphere on other issues.

Let me say that the fact is that Taiwan has a tobacco monopoly bureau and Taiwan makes its own cigarettes, and a good deal of revenue was earned by this. Their market was closed, relatively speaking, to American cigarettes, closed to American cigarette advertising, but open to Taiwan advertising. There's no question about where the equities were. Taiwan being an otherwise very mature player in international trade -- and a very effective player -- was, for various reasons we're familiar with (a lot of them domestic reasons) -- not opening up its cigarette market, and we wanted it open. Of course, the American tobacco companies wanted it open.

We handled it in a way that was not the best. USTR had the responsibility but we at AIT failed to anticipate what should have been obvious: if we didn't orchestrate carefully, the "P.R." could be harmful. We -- I -- failed to caution USTR adequately, and that was our job. One set of negotiations I remember in particular was held in Taiwan for a week or so. The way we allowed our presence to be characterized was faulty. We had a whole bunch of American negotiators in a downtown hotel. The press -- the local press, which can be very aggressive on such things -- had very easy access to the Americans. And so we had the papers just flooded with reports about what the Americans were doing and how many there were and all of them bringing this huge pressure on poor innocent Taiwan, Americans pushing poison, cancer-inducing substances, on the people of Taiwan. It was a very, very unpleasant business.

I, myself, continue to have deep misgivings about this aspect of our trade policy, that is, the tobacco aspect. It's not a new idea, but it made me damn uncomfortable to see us bringing such government resources to bear to ensure that we were able to sell to other countries what is in fact our cancer-inducing product.

If AIT simply had warned of the potential problems, we could have avoided much of them, perhaps, by insisting the negotiations not be conducted in Taiwan, but rather in the U.S. or even elsewhere.

Q: To put this into context, in today's Washington Post, February the first, the Center for Disease Control announced that approximately a half a million Americans died last year because of tobacco-related diseases. This has been well known for at least the last decade or so.

THAYER: Yes. And one can do one's professional thing by treating the trade as a matter of principle. This trade issue, like intellectual property rights, or anything else, is a matter of principle. But there is this human side, and as a Foreign Service professional, I did my professional thing. But I continue to have real doubts about where my moral obligations lie in such a situation.

Q: In all the communications and the people you talked to, was there an unease in both the communications from Washington and the people about this? Nobody today can pretend that this is not an extremely addictive, extremely dangerous form of indulgence.

THAYER: No, I think that the people involved in these kinds of negotiations (it's natural) it's natural, have long since gone past the dilemmas that some people have the time for. These people -- and we -- had their job to do. It was to open up the world trading system. Tobacco was one obvious place where it wasn't opened, and it should be treated like everything else. I never detected much misgivings on the part of the people involved in these negotiations, including those in my own staff, because the Taiwan restrictions did not give, as we say, a level playing field. And for the high moral postures of the Taiwan press on this matter, the fact is that the Taiwan monopoly was pushing their cigarettes as hard as they could. So a lot of this was, of course, hypocritical posturing on the part of our Taiwan interlocutors.

Nevertheless, as a personal matter, I felt -- and I still feel -- deep regret that I was involved in this. This is not to exaggerate my role. These trade things go on. Chiefs of missions do their modest thing, but they're not very important to it. Although I did make a number of representations on this subject and tried very hard to explain the American position. I did this publicly and privately, as I did on many economic matters. But still, tobacco was special, and I didn't like it.

Q: Did anything come out of this while you were there?

THAYER: I'm not quite sure where we stand now. There has been a lot of progress, I believe, on the tobacco front and on a lot of fronts for that matter. I think we now have reached a higher level of understanding with Taiwan on a range of issues that are in USTR's purview. I think the relationship is going quite well.

Q: Any other major issues that you had to deal with when you were there?

THAYER: Another very unpleasant issue was the murder of Henry Liu, who was a Chinese-American resident in California. The responsibility for this murder lay with one of the intelligence branches of the Taiwan government.

Q: Where was he murdered?

THAYER: He was murdered in California. There were a lot of discussions between us and our friends in Taiwan, a lot of American outrage about the murders. It eventually surfaced that these were connected to officially connected people, and three of them were, in fact, convicted in Taiwan court and jailed. They have, I believe, recently been released, having served a number of years. But that was a very unpleasant episode in relations between us and Taiwan. In many ways it cast a pall over a lot of the other things that were going on during my time.

Q: What was your reading of something like this? Nothing could hurt relations more than to do this type of thing, and here you have the Taiwan government, which is a very knowledgeable government and understands the United States. Was this sort of a rogue elephant operation or what?

THAYER: The responsibility was at a fairly high level in the intelligence branch, and the key guy, as far as we know, was convicted; and justice, as far as we know, was done. So in the end, it was an issue that was taken care of, but it went on for a while, and it was a difficult one, because it was murder on American soil and obviously something that the Americans had to take very seriously. But, ultimately, the Chinese courts handled the thing appropriately, and, as I say, justice seemed to have been done. But we had to express our outrage -- forcefully and at high levels -- before action was taken.

Q: So you feel it was caught at the appropriate level. This was not a scapegoat thrown to protect a major government policy?

THAYER: I don't think there's anything more that I can say about it. As far as I know, justice was done. We wanted to see it done as fast as possible and have our concerns respected.

Q: You left Taiwan in '86?

THAYER: I left Taiwan in '86.

Q: Then you were the dean of the language school at the Foreign Service Institute.

THAYER: Right. I had decided that after Taiwan I wanted to come back home, and I was very much interested in the whole training operation. We still have a Chinese language training school in Taiwan, very important to the State Department and other agencies concerned with a China specialty. But I have an interest in the training in general, the development of the professional cadre. So I sought this job, if it came open. I asked to have it after Taiwan, and it came open at just the right time. So I served as dean of the language school, and I saw that as kind of a transition to my retirement which I saw coming up in the next few years.

Q: Looking at the language training, what would you say were the strengths and weaknesses of the Foreign Service Institute's approach to it?

THAYER: There are many strengths, and one of them is we pioneered in training adults how to speak foreign languages. Some of it was done during the Second World War at Yale and other places, Cornell, I guess. But we began to do it in the State Department in a fairly well-budgeted way and developed our own texts and our own teaching methods and our own testing methods. We did so very effectively, although we still have our critics...

In the language school we have a score or more of M.A. and Ph.D.-level scientific linguists who are the core of our training effort, who I found to be intellectually very high class. These are the people who run the language programs. These were a very creative and devoted and professional group in whose presence I found myself enormously stimulated. I had a lot of fun with these people, learning what they were doing, helping get the money to help them do it better. My job, in part, also was to be sure that what these professional language trainers were doing was conforming with the very special needs of the Foreign Service. Under these linguists, we have all native speakers actually teaching our students, as you know.

The weakness of the Foreign Service language program, I believe, as do many others, is that we focus on training a mass of people, but we don't have enough money to train many of them deeply. That is to say we train people to a 3-2 level, but don't train enough to a 4-4 level.

Q: 3-3 being speaking and reading on a rating of 5 as highest.

THAYER: Right. A level of so-called professional fluency, reading and speaking. But, in fact, it would be better if we had the money to train more people to a higher level. In fact, we are putting a little bit more money in training to a higher level, and we are doing other things. We were, before I got there and we still are after I left, doing things to train certain people to a higher level than the standard 3-3. But the effort to train a mass of people well involves also constantly developing new materials, up-to-date materials. Languages evolve like anything else, and unless you have money to do that, you can't do it. Unless you have money to be able to pay for the man hours involved, you can't train your teaching cadre adequately or develop adequate new materials.

The language training operation, when I was there, was vastly underfunded. It still is underfunded, and it's a great shame that more money cannot be put into the language training operation. I think we do very well with what we've got, but it could be a lot better.

Q: Did you find that universities more or less fed off of the Foreign Service operation and language training?

THAYER: Well, there are not many universities that train in the spoken language the way we do. Georgetown, Middlebury, Monterey Institute -- not the Army, but the private institute -- Cornell, there are institutions which do train in the spoken. But we train for particular purposes and for very directly practical purposes and are unique in the mass of training that we do, as well as the number of languages that we do. We do forty-plus languages. So we're able to attract to the Ph.D. linguist level, very high-class people from the universities. And the Ph.D.s who came to us are interested in the challenge and the rewards of training people -- adults -- to go right to work in a language. The process of developing textual material and teaching methods in an atmosphere that encourages creativity, to develop systems to produce people who can go into a foreign country and use the language, that is a very rewarding thing for many people who are professional linguists, and that was very important to us.

Middlebury, for example, has an extremely good program, and they have a total immersion program that I visited, their summer program. It is very good. In some respects, universities have questions about what the Foreign Service Institute does, and in some respects they are all praise for what we do. So it's a mixed bag, but my impression is generally that the prestige of the Foreign Service Institute language operation is really very high.

Q: You retired in 1989?

THAYER: I retired in 1989.

Q: Looking back on it, what do you feel about your career in the Foreign Service?

THAYER: I'm very happy with my career. I left the newspaper work, came into the Foreign Service, in part, because I wanted to have a piece of history, play a part in history, as I conceived it at the time, with a particular interest in Chinese affairs; and I have been able to do that. Obviously, one plays a very modest role in history, but one is at least a part of things that are worth being a part of, and for that reason, it was very satisfactory.

JOAN M. PLAISTED
China Desk, Economic Affairs
Washington, DC (1985-1987)

Ambassador Joan M. Plaisted was born in 1958 in Minnesota. She attended America University and received both her Bachelor's and Master's Degree. Her postings abroad include Paris, Hong Kong, Geneva, Rabat and Marshall Island as Ambassador. Ambassador Plaisted was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on July 30, 2001.

Q: You graduated in '63 from high school. Did you have any idea about where you wanted to go or what you wanted to do?

PLAISTED: Yes, I did. It was at age 16 that I decided what I wanted to do. This was rather strange for growing up in this small community. When I was 16, I decided I wanted to be a foreign service officer.

Q: Good heavens, how did you hear about it?

PLAISTED: Part of it was when I was seven, we took a family vacation to New York and visited the UN. My parents were showing me the General Assembly. I was just so impressed by the whole scene at the UN. You know, in Minnesota in those days everyone sort of looked alike, ruddy red slightly chubby faces. Here I was a seven year old hauled to the UN seeing the Chinese, the Sikhs with their turbans, the Africans with their colorful robes. I thought this place is fascinating. My parents pointed up to the interpreters' booths at the General Assembly and said, "Now maybe someday when you grow up, you could be an interpreter here." I still remember my reaction, I was thrilled to think that I could do that. Little did my parents know I was linguistically challenged. It was such an epiphany. I could do something here. I could work for my country here at the UN. So that gave me the idea as a seven year old, this is something I could really do. I became interested in foreign affairs, I wanted to join the foreign service. I read in a Methodist church bulletin about a university that would train you to be a foreign service officer. The university was the School of International Service at American University, in Washington. I went off my senior year to take a look at the university and to interview with them, and ended up as a freshman at the School of International Service. The first day of school Dean Griffith addressed the 90 of us in the freshman class and said, "Now most of you are here because you want to be foreign service officers when you graduate, but I should tell you that out of the 90, on the law of average, two of you will become foreign service officers. I never felt so shocked and disappointed. But I was determined to be one of those two. It was a long roundabout route until I eventually joined the foreign service. But that is exactly what happened. Today two of us from our class ended up in the foreign service.

Q: And your job in Hong Kong...

PLAISTED: I was in Hong Kong from '80 to '83. I had the job that was described as the best

FSO-2 job for an econ officer in the Foreign Service because it had so much policy content. I was the Hong Kong watcher in the economic section - a 14 person econ section. I was the only Hong Kong watcher among all the China watchers. In those days we did a lot of China watching from Hong Kong. This eventually gave me some credentials in the China group. It was also considered such a good job because it was the only non Mandarin language designated job in the economic section. I was the Hong Kong watcher. I had a very interesting time in Hong Kong. This was when the crisis in confidence in Hong Kong's future first came up. What was going to happen in 1997 when the lease on the new territories in Hong Kong ran out? It became an issue that early because many of the land leases in Hong Kong were for 25 years, it was a question how are you going to renew these land leases. I was there at the time of the Hong Kong crisis in confidence which happened in '82-'83. Also I was in charge of all of the economic policy issues with Hong Kong. The main one, of course, was textiles. I helped to renegotiate the bilateral textile agreement with Hong Kong in 1981.

Q: Let's talk about the crisis in confidence. I mean it had been agreed that Hong Kong would be turned back to China. The lease was up; the British had accepted the fact that it would go back.

PLAISTED: Well, it wasn't that simple. There was a 99 year lease on the new territories, but Hong Kong island itself was leased in perpetuity. But you can't really separate one from the other. What do you do? Do you recognize Chinese sovereignty over the whole area and turn the whole area back to China? Most people agreed that you couldn't keep Hong Kong as an island by itself, as Hong Kong island, and not have it adjoined to the new territories which is where all the food came in from and where some food was grown. In '82-'83, there was a world recession, economic problems made it more difficult for the Hong Kong businessmen. I remember writing a cable on Hong Kong's future, how actions speak louder than words, because what we were seeing were government officials, and particularly the top businessmen, making very optimistic speeches about the future of Hong Kong - how everything was going to be fine; there was no need to worry. Then if you looked at what they were doing themselves, with their own private investments, they were diversifying overseas as fast as they possibly could, investing more, many of them, in the United States. It was a bit of a mini boom for Hong Kong investment in the U.S. Later a number of the middle class in Hong Kong started resettling in Canada.

Q: Vancouver.

PLAISTED: In Vancouver, yes. My former secretary to this day lives in Vancouver. It was the middle level in Hong Kong who decided to get out. Your top businessmen, many of them had green cards or had other options, so they could remain in Hong Kong. If worst came to worst, they would leave. But they were very busy pulling money out of Hong Kong while making these optimistic speeches. The property prices, which have always been something of a yo-yo in Hong Kong, they go up, they go down, the property prices were falling precipitously at that time. There was real uncertainty about the future. It did take several years before it was finally resolved with Maggie Thatcher and the negotiations over Hong Kong's future which occurred after I had departed Hong Kong.

Q: How did you get information? I mean information is fairly easy to get wasn't it in Hong Kong?

PLAISTED: People were usually fairly willing to talk to you, but they were also terribly busy. You couldn't call on these top businessmen in their offices for any length of time. I got most of my information over the dinner table. I was quite popular on the social circuit. The good news, being a woman, you can always sit next to the principals who were the men. I could sit next to the men whereas my boss, the Consul General, couldn't. He would be sitting next to their jewel-laden wives. So I really was collecting most of my information on the dinner circuit, or socially when you could get involved in more relaxed conversations. I did have close relations with the political advisors and the assistant political advisors in the Governor's office. On trade issues, I had very close contacts with my Hong Kong counterparts. In fact, it wasn't a situation that pleased me very much, but they would hear what Washington was doing on trade issues long before I would. The Brit who was my counterpart, who was in charge of the U.S. office the way I was in charge of the Hong Kong office for the consulate, would take great glee in calling me up and saying "Joan, did you know..." And of course I didn't. When I later became the economic director on the China desk in Washington, one of the first things I did was to make certain we kept our embassies in China and in Hong Kong informed to the extent we possibly could on what was happening in Washington on the issues.

Q: I have heard the Brits have been faulted for getting religion quite late as far as really turning over power to the Chinese residents of Hong Kong. It was British run until very late in the '80s. I am talking about real democracy. What was your impression at that time?

PLAISTED: Some were saying that they acted too precipitously in calling attention to 1997 and agreeing to sit down and negotiate with the Chinese. But on the issue of democracy, in those days Hong Kong really wasn't that actively prepared to run its own affairs, no one was calling for democratic elections. The common wisdom in Hong Kong was as long as everyone is making money, everything is fine. Democracy isn't really an issue. No one was really demonstrating for democracy in those days and the British certainly were not preparing the people of Hong Kong to rule themselves. Most of the business people were really more concerned about the world recession. What did it mean for their exports to Europe, to the U.S. So there wasn't any great progress in those days toward democratization. That all came later, and then in a rushed atmosphere. I would give the British very high marks for establishing the rule of law in Hong Kong. That was something that was always very much respected. It was from my observations a very just legal system, and that is a terribly valuable legacy to leave for Hong Kong, something that Hong Kong is trying to guard today, and one can only wish them well.

Q: I would imagine many of your Chinese contacts there would be continually looking over their shoulder, saying what do you think I should do and all this, preparing a way to get out. Was this something that people were trying to engage you on?

PLAISTED: The mass exodus came a little later after I had departed in '83, but people were starting to look at their options at this time. Hong Kong in the early '80s was largely a Cantonese speaking area, I was studying Cantonese. Well, suddenly a few years later, you could see the signs on the wall, everyone was studying Mandarin to prepare for the future. Now if I were there today, I would be studying Mandarin.

Q: Did the mainland Chinese play a role in Hong Kong at that time, having offices and all that sort of thing?

PLAISTED: There was a Mainland Chinese office in Hong Kong called CITIC, but it was a much smaller office at that point. The Bank of China, which in later years built the tallest skyscraper with bad feng shui, supposedly because of the spiked towers at the top, that all came later when mainland Chinese businesses began moving into Hong Kong. The most visible links with China in those days were economic. Hong Kong was the principal port and still is to some extent for the whole southern China area. My theory was we were looking at the wrong issue, the mainlanders taking over Hong Kong. What was actually happening economically was Hong Kong was taking over China. Hong Kong businessmen were moving their higher priced textile, footwear, and toy factories, things that had become too expensive to produce in Hong Kong, to China. There was a shortage of labor in Hong Kong, so businesses started moving into the area in Guangdong Province right across the border from Hong Kong. I have seen this development from my early days of traveling to the special economic zone of Shenzhen. When I first went over there, Shenzhen was just brown barren land with a few bulldozers. Today it looks like Hong Kong. You see all these Hong Kong investors slowly taking over the southern part of China. Then I watched them over the years move up the river, getting closer and closer to Guangdong and Canton itself. That whole Pearl River delta area developed with Hong Kong money. Now it continues developing up towards Shanghai. Economically you could argue that these overseas Chinese businessmen in both Hong Kong and Taiwan were actually taking over the mainland of China economically, particularly in the area closest to Hong Kong and in Fujian province right across from Taiwan.

Q: From your contacts, what were you hearing from people running textile factories and the like in mainland China? How did they find communist Chinese rule? I mean regulations, getting along, did they find it relatively easy?

PLAISTED: We might get into that more when I am on the China desk and really helped the American business community with all their problems of investing in China. You may want to go into textiles or...

Q: How do you characterize the Hong Kong Chinese, were they British we were talking to mainly or Chinese?

PLAISTED: It was always something of a mixed delegation. The top negotiator for the Hong Kong delegation in those days was Chinese, Peter Chou. My counterpart at my level was a Brit, Mike Cartland, someone I stayed in contact with over the years. I always had the highest respect for the Hong Kong negotiators. The Hong Kong administrators would always look for the best person for the job. I think there was a conscious effort later to see that more local Hong Kong Chinese were in these positions in the trade ministry.

Q: Could you characterize the negotiating techniques of the Hong Kong side?

PLAISTED: Hong Kong was always exceedingly well prepared. In almost all the negotiations I have ever been in with dozens of countries, Hong Kong negotiators were among the best. They knew their dossiers very well, had all the facts, had all the figures. I think they were sort of arguing from a perspective of righteousness: We are a poor developing country. This is our lifeblood, which it was certainly to some extent. We are a righteous little free market economy here. Please help us. You don't want to see us all go broke do you big bad west. You in the U.S. have a dying industry. Market forces would declare that you should move into something else, and let our workers work. You don't want to be responsible for the economic downfall of Hong Kong. They had their facts and figures to make this argument. On our side with Mike Smith, I would always try to start catching up on my sleep days before the negotiations began. There were times when we would negotiate for 48 hours straight. I always thought Mike's tactic because he had so much stamina was simply to wear down the other side. When they weren't looking he would slip in a good argument. We would just wear down the other side by being very persuasive and very persistent in the arguments on our U.S. side. This is what the U.S. needs. Our big, bad U.S. textile industry won't settle for anything less.

Q: Well much has been made recently in the training of foreign service officers to bring them up to professional standards to train them in negotiations. Where did you get your negotiating training?

PLAISTED: The same way I got most of my other training in the Foreign Service. I think it is rather hard to train negotiators, but we should certainly try. I got it by doing it for better or for worse. Over the years I got more negotiating experience than almost any other foreign service officer. I just learned it from sitting behind the microphone and from watching. At the OECD I used to watch the people I thought were the really good negotiators. I had a lot of respect for Chuck Meissner. He would lead our delegations on the financial side. I thought he was one of the finer U.S. negotiators I ever saw, so I would observe him and learn and ask him, how do you do it. He would go and take cat naps sometimes in the corner of the negotiating room. If it was 10:00 PM he would go and take a little nap for ten minutes and get his stamina back to keep on negotiating for the U.S. So watching others was key.

Also, I always had a lot of problems with public speaking. When I was first in the Foreign Service I remember making a speech on computer equipment at a Paris Trade Center show. Not only would my voice shake, but my whole body was shaking. I was wearing a little mini skirt, and my colleagues sitting behind me were just laughing, laughing. I was scared to death. So I knew I had to do something about my speaking skills and took the Dale Carnegie course on public speaking in French in Paris. I still had problems with my public speaking skills. I still was afraid to speak in public when I arrived in Hong Kong. What I did to help my speaking and negotiating skills was I went back and retook the Dale Carnegie course in Hong Kong. Thank goodness the course wasn't in Chinese. I was one of two westerners in the class. It was great. I took the entire course again and ended up helping to teach it for awhile, so I could really get over my fear of public speaking to be able to be behind the microphone to represent the U.S. It took a real conscientious effort.

Q: Well now with textiles, all these things eventually keep moving and textiles have moved certainly out there. Were you sensing the beginning of the electronics movement coming into Hong Kong?

PLAISTED: Yes, this was all happening because the labor costs were going up in Hong Kong. So many of the textile plants, the lower end of textile manufacturing, were moving offshore, mainly to China or other developing countries. Footwear was also moving out of Hong Kong. They had to get into the marketing niche where they were competitive and moved up market into electronics, the higher end of the market. At the same time, one of Hong Kong's major themes in our negotiations was Hong Kong is a poor developing country, you should treat us as a developing area. This was particularly important to Hong Kong because the U.S. was cutting trade preferences for the generalized scheme of preferences in those days. When Hong Kong got to be too successful in exporting a certain product to the U.S. like rattan, we would cut it from our GSP list. Of course it was in Hong Kong's interest to argue that they were a developing country. We had one of the top officials from USTR, an assistant USTR by the name of Doral Cooper, come out to take an overview of the trade issues between the U.S. and Hong Kong. My counterpart in the Hong Kong government, Mike Cartland, took great pride in lining up this tour for us. He lined up what I called the less developed country, the LDC tour, of Hong Kong. He found, and I gave him full credit, he found the only unairconditioned car in the entire Hong Kong government fleet. I didn't even know they had them. He had the driver take us out to some of the worst public housing projects. I had toured many Hong Kong public housing projects. I have never seen public housing so bad. The bathrooms shared by many families were as stinky as can be. He found unpaved roads, which is hard to do in Hong Kong. Most of Hong Kong is paved three times over, a highway on top of a highway on top of a highway. We were driving around out in the new territories on the back roads, unpaved roads, where the driver takes us to a rattan factory. Mike had arranged for the owner of this small shop to tell us of his trials and tribulations because the U.S. had just pulled the GSP, his preferences, for his rattan exports which he was no longer able to export to the U.S., and he and his family were going to starve. So it was an absolutely brilliant tour. This was on Saturday. Monday morning Mike Cartland calls me up at the office and says with a bit of a smirk, "Did you enjoy your tour on Saturday?" I said, "It was quite informative, and certainly Doral Cooper was quite impressed." He said, "Well what did you do with her on Sunday?" I said, "I was invited out on the yacht of Fung King Hey," a hundred some foot yacht. Fung King Hey was one of the richest men in Hong Kong. There were headlines in the Wall Street Journal at one point when he was going to buy 10% of Merrill Lynch that read, "Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner and Fung?" He had sizable wealth. I said, "I took her out on Fung King Hey's yacht, he served us caviar, lobsters, and champagne as we sailed around Hong Kong's skyscraper lined harbor, we had this fabulous time so that she could see the other side to your less developed country - to see how the very top lives." Mike was just furious that I had undercut his arguments for Hong Kong as a less developed country. I think this points up what a very complex place Hong Kong really is even to this day. When I first arrived one of the top businessmen that I was seated beside at dinner said to me, "Joan, throw out your economic textbooks. You just have to look at Hong Kong as it is." He was right. Hong Kong is not a free market economy at all. It is very complex. You have a large percentage of the people living in public housing in what was supposed to be the freest of the Milton Friedman free market economies. So it was unique. You have to just look at Hong Kong on its own.

Q: What about relations with our embassy in Beijing? This is always a tricky thing. At one time Hong Kong was the hub of our China watching expertise and everything else. You know time had gone on, at least eight or nine years by the time you got out there. What was your experience with what you were getting out of Beijing?

PLAISTED: I was the sole Hong Kong watcher. Everyone else in the section, all my colleagues, were all China watchers. In those days, there was a very complementary relationship between what we were doing out of Hong Kong, and what reporting was being done out of Beijing. Of course, over the years, more reporting was moving to Beijing. What we had in Hong Kong, the real strength of China reporting, and the reason we had so many China watchers in Hong Kong in the early '80s, was the mainland Chinese would talk to us when they were in Hong Kong. You just couldn't get that access in China. Nobody would talk to you in those days in Beijing. They were afraid to, so it was very hard to do your duty as a reporting officer if you didn't have anyone you could engage with in Beijing. The reporting targets all seemed to be in Hong Kong. The Hong Kong Chinese of course would talk to you. They were going over to the mainland to set up businesses and to visit their relatives, and they were very perceptive in terms of what was happening. They were always willing to talk with the embassy reporting officers. It was a lot easier to get news of what was happening on the mainland in press reports in Hong Kong. There was a real argument that here is where you get access to information. By '85, when I was working on the China desk, the consulate in Guangdong really wasn't doing much reporting. It was either coming out of Beijing or coming out of Hong Kong.

Q: Did you get any feel about the, I don't know what you call it, but the military complex and party complex owning factories and being very much engaged in the commercial world in mainland China? I have heard reports the red army - the People's Liberation Army - owned a lot of factories. Was that a factor in those days?

PLAISTED: No, it wasn't something I was hearing about in '80-'83.

Q: Did you find, you wanted to be an Asian hand, did you find that you were up against in foreign service terms the Chinese Mafia, people who learned the language and all and that you were an outsider or was it more welcoming?

PLAISTED: Something of a combination of the two. Here's how I always saw my role, and they always joked about it. My role was to keep the China hands honest, because I was the one non Mandarin speaker, not having devoted my entire career to China. There were times when I thought my colleagues were getting a little too close to the subject or were getting too down in the weeds about who is going to get this or that low position at the next party congress. I was always asking what does it mean for U.S. interests? That is what I wanted to know. That is what the Washington policy makers needed to know. Most didn't really care who got the 20th position in the ranking politburo picture, which is what China watchers get hung up on. The number two position in the economic section came open during my time. The argument came up in the office, who should be the deputy. Should it be Joan? She is only slightly more senior, but she is not a full fledged China watcher. We are all China watchers, shouldn't it be a China watcher? The decision had to go up the ladder to the Consul General. I became deputy of the econ section. So that was something of an issue for awhile.

Q: While you were there, was Taiwan a factor in things you were thinking about, working on?

PLAISTED: No, not really. I think the feeling was everyone was focusing on Hong Kong, on Hong Kong's future. What is going to happen in Hong Kong. There were times I thought we were too narrowly focused. I did a lot of traveling on my own around Asia because I just love Asia. I would go to all these other countries and explore what was happening in Japan, Thailand, the Philippines, Taiwan, Indonesia, Singapore, and Burma. The first thing I noticed when I would get off the plane is hey they are not all totally obsessed by what is going to happen to Hong Kong in 1997. I don't think most people outside Hong Kong were even very aware of this issue when it was so all encompassing for those of us in Hong Kong. It was good to get off island every once in awhile just to realize there were other issues out there in the world. The rest of the world was not worrying about this and had its own concerns.

Q: Kicking that island complex is always a problem. From the economic side, were you all looking at the growth of these little tigers, or was that even an expression at the time? I am thinking of particularly Korea, Singapore, Malaysia to a certain extent, Thailand, which now could turn into real economic powers.

PLAISTED: We were looking at them more from the perspective of Hong Kong. How much competition would say Singapore be to Hong Kong - the world's third largest financial center. I remember doing reports comparing the competitive positions of Hong Kong and Singapore. Your U.S. businessman is able to invest anywhere in the area. Does Singapore have more to offer than Hong Kong from a competitive position?

Q: Did you find yourself caught up in promoting Hong Kong as a place to invest vis-a-vis say South Korea or Singapore or something like that?

PLAISTED: It wasn't really my job to say this is better than that. I wasn't really promoting Hong Kong by saying come here and invest. In Hong Kong it was pretty easy to explain the regulations for U.S. businesses interested in coming to Hong Kong. It was very easy to brief Americans to tell them here is what you are going to face. Hong Kong certainly wasn't that bureaucratic. The tax regulations were very clear. Corruption wasn't as much of an issue as it was in other Asian countries. It was very clear cut. You want to set up here, well your property prices are going to be very high, but your work force is going to be very well educated. You are probably going to pay relatively high labor costs. So it was easy for U.S. business to get a sense of potential costs.

Q: You are not going to have hidden payments.

PLAISTED: You are not going to experience to the extent you are in other countries these hidden costs. You didn't need 20 chops from 20 different bureaucracies.

Q: A chop being equivalent to a seal for approval.

PLAISTED: A seal. No, I wasn't trying to get the government to set up one-stop investment shops as I did in other places. It wasn't an issue in Hong Kong. It was so straightforward. It was an easy place to know the regulations and to grasp the cost figures to set up an office. Of course, many companies in those days were setting up in Hong Kong to serve the China region because it was so much easier to do so out of Hong Kong.

Q: Was it the Hong Kong Financial Times or what was the major economic paper that was published in Hong Kong, or was it Singapore? I can't remember.

PLAISTED: The South China Morning Post was the major newspaper. The major economic paper out of Hong Kong was The Asian Wall Street Journal. The editorial staff of the journal was based in Hong Kong. This was another reason for doing so much reporting on China in those days out of Hong Kong. We could talk to all the journalists who were covering China. They were all based in Hong Kong in those days. Of course they aren't today, but they were then. You could share ideas with journalists running around the mainland.

Q: Did you take Chinese cooking and all that while you were there?

PLAISTED: Goodness, no. I am never going to make it as a chef in life. I did enjoy some of the finest restaurants in the world in Paris and in Hong Kong. Your finest Chinese cuisine is in Hong Kong and Taipei. At least it was in those days. I would go out and sample all these little restaurants. With a good friend of mine, we would take turns each Tuesday night selecting a restaurant. We would go and try some little unknown restaurant. The other person didn't know where we were taking them. It would have to be one that neither one of us had been to before, so we were always looking for new little restaurants. They were all holes in the wall, quite inexpensive, and absolutely delicious. So that was a great way to explore the culinary life in Hong Kong. To give you a little bit of the atmospherics: when I lived in Paris for Christmas eve, I managed to get tickets for midnight mass at Notre Dame. Normally only the ambassador and his wife get tickets. I managed to negotiate 10 tickets as a junior diplomat. Well, I did that for six Christmases with my friends in Paris. So when I got to Hong Kong, the big question was, what am I going to do for a Christmas tradition here? What we did, we had access to a junk - an old Chinese wooden boat - through a friend of mine who worked for one of the major banks. We would sail out to a little restaurant area in an older, more traditional part of Hong Kong where they had live fish swimming around in fish tanks. We would pick out our live fish for dinner, and, with the fish flopping in its plastic bag, walk down a narrow path to pick out a restaurant to cook our fish on Christmas Eve. This became something of a Christmas tradition for me in Hong Kong.

Q: Why don't we stop here, and we'll pick this up in '85? Where did you go?

PLAISTED: All right. I go to China. I was on the China desk in Washington from '85-'87. Then I attended the National War College. You are really doing all this in great detail.

***

Q: Today is August 1, 2001. Joan, China desk, you were there from '85-'87. When you say China desk, did you have the economic slice of the pie?

PLAISTED: Yes. There was the director of the China desk. I was the deputy for economic affairs on the China desk.

Q: Who was the director?

PLAISTED: The director was Dick Williams. There was a deputy director, too, Chris Szymansky. I was the head of the economic side and a colleague of mine, Gene Martin, was the head of the political side.

Q: Now, how did we view China when you arrived on the desk? Whither China at that point; how did we look at it?

PLAISTED: China was just really beginning to open up. Economic reforms were underway. The Chinese were at least giving lip service to wanting to attract more U.S. investment. We were starting to formalize more of our economic relationship, trying to conclude a tax treaty with the PRC. We had negotiated a civil aviation agreement, but it wasn't being carried out correctly from the U.S. perspective. At issue were landing rights. The U.S. wanted to carry forward some of the agreements that we had begun to negotiate with the Chinese. It was also the time when China wanted to join the Asian Development Bank. Taiwan was already a member, so we needed to figure out how China could become a member of the ADB without ejecting Taiwan. It was the beginning of China's application to join the World Trade Organization which only today is being finalized some 16 years later.

Q: At the desk level was it an optimistic time as far as the China was concerned with China entering the world and all that?

PLAISTED: I always saw my role as not being 100% optimistic. My role was more to inject a healthy realism into the relationship with China. I did see in a number of American VIPs and congressmen going to China and almost kowtowing to the central kingdom, whereas to me tribute, the concept of bringing tribute to the Chinese emperor, was supposed to have ended with the Ching dynasty. I don't know if it was because the Americans drank too many maotais, a terribly strong liqueur served at the banquets, or if it was the tradition of being very polite with the Chinese, but we seemed to let the Chinese really beat up on us. The Chinese would complain loudly about U.S. protectionism, about China wanting to export more to the U.S. No one on the U.S. side really defended U.S. interests with the Chinese. I considered it as my role on the desk to see that our top officials visiting China not only listened to the Chinese perspective with great respect and replied to what we could to meet any just complaints, but also emphasized the need for China to open up its markets to point out that there were problems on both sides. We needed to defend more firmly U.S. interests at that time.

Q: Well, Americans, including official Americans, tend to go overboard on this. There is something about China, and this goes back throughout history. We tend to get entranced with China, not always to our advantage. Did you find yourself being somewhat at odds when the people on the desk beat that around and were you always the person who said yes, but?

PLAISTED: No, I think my boss at the time, Dick Williams, was certainly very receptive to this and to my making certain that our top people visiting China were armed to defend U.S. interests. Vice President Bush visited China in October '95 when I was on the desk. Secretary of State Shultz visited. I accompanied the Secretary of Commerce Malcolm Baldrige when he visited China for the Joint Commission on Commerce and Trade. Secretary James Baker who was then

Secretary of the Treasury went to China where I joined him in '86 for the Joint Economic Committee, to be certain he was fully briefed for these meetings. I often briefed the principals. They had all the information so when China started accusing the U.S. of not having balanced trade or not allowing China to export more textiles to the U.S., the U.S. side could bring up the fact that China's market was anything but open. The U.S. has one of the freest markets in the world. Just try and get foreign exchange to export textiles to China. There was a need for China to really open up its market, too.

Q: How did the Chinese reply to this?

PLAISTED: I have negotiated with the Hong Kong Chinese, mainland Chinese, and people on Taiwan. The mainland PRC Chinese always had a script, and in those days they were very afraid to deviate from their script. They would have opening statements that would sometimes go on for an hour, and would say almost nothing. Occasionally my Chinese counterparts would engage in fairly hard headed attacks on our economic policy. But it was very difficult to get a real good give and take with the mainland Chinese. You couldn't have a spontaneous exchange at the negotiating table the way you always could with the people from Hong Kong or from Taiwan. The PRC representatives were speaking on instructions and were very afraid to deviate from their text.

Q: Well if something came up would they say excuse us and let's meet tomorrow, and then go back and send off to ask for instructions? Was it that sort of thing?

PLAISTED: Things usually didn't happen that quickly. It was a very slow painful process. When someone would call for a break to get new instructions they would want to meet much later at some future date. One way to deal with them that I discovered was to try not to surprise the Chinese, to let them know ahead of time what issues we were going to raise to the extent possible.

Q: How would you do that?

PLAISTED: Let's say we were preparing for the annual Joint Economic Committee meeting to be headed by Secretary of the Treasury Jim Baker. I would go into detail with the economic officials at the Chinese embassy. I would outline for them what the U.S. was going to raise. Here is what we are going to ask you to do on this item or that, so you can prepare. They could do all their interagency paper clearing processes before the U.S. delegation arrived in Beijing.

Q: I am told that one of the problems, one of the weaknesses of American delegations, was a certain amount of impatience. They want to get something done. Did that play to our disadvantage?

PLAISTED: I think it always does with the Chinese because they had been around for many millennia, they know they are always going to be there, and they take a very long term view of the world. I remember going to Beijing on the initial GATT negotiations. We were trying to make some progress. I don't think any of us would have guessed at that point it was going to take 16 years, and negotiations today are still not completely concluded. It is in the American nature to say let's move forward and try to resolve this issue which certainly wasn't the Chinese mindset.

Q: When you were dealing with them, what were some of the basic issues that were foremost on your plate when you got there in '85?

PLAISTED: One of the really main issues was trying to improve the investment climate for American firms in China and for new firms that would be coming to China. The Chinese were always making general pleas, please give us more American investment, when what they really wanted was please bring the money to China and don't insist on repatriating any profits if anyone is lucky enough to make a profit. Something I always emphasized with them was that the first thing an American businessperson is going to do, someone who is interested in the China market, is to talk to the investors who are already there, so you had better treat the investors who are already in China well because they are going to determine whether or not new firms come into the China market. I was on a presidential aircraft with the Secretary of Commerce, Malcolm Baldrige, flying to Beijing for the Commerce Ministers Meeting. Baldrige was great, he mixed with all of us, he knew his experts were in the back of the plane. He would sit down with each one of us to pick our brains. The idea I had with him was for the United States to present to the Chinese a comparison of the investment climate in all of Asia. What was the tax treatment for foreign firms? How many steps did a foreign firm have to make to get an investment approved? How difficult was it? What were the land and labor costs? The Secretary of Commerce quickly grasped this concept and thought this was a good idea. We did make a presentation together. Actually China turned out on paper a little better than I thought they might. But we did manage to make the point to the Chinese, I think they got it to some extent, that you are not the only country in the world where foreign investors can invest, they can invest any place in the world, so you have to make the climate very attractive in China to attract them. One of the problems that our firms were having in China that we were working on at the time was price gouging that was going on. The cost of office space was going up precipitously. In those days many of our business people had to live in hotels. The hotels were trying to get as much as they could out of the foreigners. The cost of laborers would go up say 20% in no time. Businessmen always want to know what the regulations are going to be. They want certainty. Instead, there was a lot of uncertainty, there were a lot of changes in the regulations. At one point China put new taxes on representative offices. How much control you had over hiring workers for your plant varied by company. Some companies were able to go out and hire workers directly. Others had to work through the labor bureau, and they would be sent workers from the labor bureau to interview and to hire. The question was do you have the right to fire workers once you have hired them. It was very difficult to fire workers at times in China. In those days there weren't many U.S. firms that were making a profit, but if you were so lucky as to make a profit, the whole question of being able to repatriate your profits was an issue. So I spent a lot of my time trying to improve the investment climate for the firms that were already on the ground in Beijing and in Shanghai.

Q: Did you find that with these problems the Chinese authorities finally came around to realize that they were screwing up the works by price gouging or putting on too many regulations and that sort of thing?

PLAISTED: They are never going to come out and say, hey, we are not doing it right here, but I think they had to realize they had a problem. You could see a big chart that shows you Singapore, Hong Kong, Korea, what the comparative investment climate is presented to them by the Secretary of Commerce. China had to realize there were other options for U.S. firms to locate elsewhere in Asia. But the Chinese were not going to make changes overnight.

Q: Say a middle sized firm came to you and said what do you think about putting up a factory or selling our product here, what would you, how would you respond?

PLAISTED: I would outline the pros and cons of investing in China, and then tell them, of course most of the firms were savvy enough to know it, to get in touch, too, with the American Chamber of Commerce in Beijing that was very active. The AmCham members were willing to talk to businesspeople who were considering the China market. I would also tell them to talk to some of the major firms in similar industries and would suggest certain people to talk with to see what their experiences had been, and to warn them about pitfalls. Most American firms at that time were going into the market for the long term. They knew they were going to have great difficulties in the short term, but they were looking at the long term potential.

Q: This is really mainly the name of the game.

PLAISTED: Yes, see we are talking about '85 - '87, just when China was really opening up economically.

Q: How about the American Chamber of Commerce? I would think that they would have almost a stake in presenting a slightly rosy picture of investment because they are there, and it would make the Chinese authorities mad if they gave too pessimistic a view and all that, but maybe it didn't work that way.

PLAISTED: The problem with U.S. chambers of commerce the world over is they usually don't want to be openly critical of the foreign government at least not in public conversations. Many of these businessmen who have been living in these countries for some time start adopting themselves the country's view. However, speaking privately, they go off and have tea with the newly arrived businessperson, then they can be much more open in their assessment of the market in China. The chamber itself can be more conservative. When there were issues that were really important for the business community, they could take a unified stance.

Q: Were you seeing a problem with the cadres of local provinces? I understand that one of the big problems, maybe it is more now than it was then, was the cadres of communist officials in the county had to generate their own money so they were coming out with all sorts of self-generated taxes. They have a light bulb tax or something like that just to get money to support the cadres. Was this a problem?

PLAISTED: It always has been a problem in China. If you could convince the central authorities to liberalize a regulation and they issued the decree, it is often not carried out at the local level. It never infiltrates down to the local level, and, even if it does, you have all the vested interests. As you say, local cadres are interested in raising their own foreign exchange by their own methods, so yes, that is a problem in China.

Q: How about intellectual property?

PLAISTED: Intellectual property rights were very much an issue at that point. The Motion Picture Association of America, Jack Valenti, was very active. There was a lot of computer software pirating, a lot of pirating of music and videos. We were working very closely with the Chinese at that point to conclude an intellectual property rights agreement. But then again, once we concluded an agreement, the real problem with the Chinese was enforcement. Okay, you have an agreement on paper but now you actually have to enforce what has been signed to crack down on some of these pirates who were particularly active in the area around Guangdong province because of the ability to export pirated goods to Hong Kong. So it was also a question of being able to enforce the agreements that we had.

Q: One has the feeling that in China today, and maybe then, the old plague of China was warlords. Now it is market lords. But I mean the writ of Peking doesn't weigh very heavily out in the hinterland.

PLAISTED: Then there is also the issue, I think, of the U.S. being a very legalistic society. If we sign an agreement, we usually take that agreement very seriously. American businessmen would say, ah, it is concluded now. The American thinks it is over because the negotiations are over. For the Chinese, now it is time to really begin the negotiations now that you have signed the agreement. Another trade issue I got deeply involved in was our civil aviation agreement with China. Northwest Airlines wanted to fly cargo flights to Beijing, and they needed a permit from Beijing to do that. This was allowed under our civil air agreement. We spent many months trying to and eventually getting the cargo flights approved for Northwest to fly into Beijing, but it wasn't easy. Also U.S. airlines wanted to fly passengers directly to Beijing, not to have to stop in Shanghai. That was a major issue that dragged on for some time. But after many demarches the Chinese finally overturned their refusal to allow U.S. cargo and passenger flights to fly into Beijing. We really were opening up the market at that time.

Q: Were members of Congress weighing in, you know people from the state of Washington saying Boeing isn't getting enough market or what have you?

PLAISTED: I was dealing with the airline representatives directly. I don't remember letters coming in to the Secretary of State urging us to do more, that would usually be if Northwest wasn't satisfied. Northwest knew we were absolutely fully engaged, as they were, trying to open up the China market. The thing that was interesting in those days was that Congress was not at all involved in the issue of most favored nation treatment for China - an issue that later became a major one. It was not so much a political issue then. MFN had to be renewed every year, and it was not something that went to Congress in those days. It was such a routine. I actually drafted the renewal document on the China desk and sent it up to the Secretary of State to approve most favored nation treatment for China. It was so routine that I had to write myself a reminder to do it again in May or June the next year. When I met with my successor, I had to brief him to remember to renew this - to get the documents up to the Secretary of State. I assure you in later years, when this issue became entangled with human rights, no one had to draft reminders on the issue of should we renew most favored nation treatment for China.

Q: Well, 1989, of course, was Tiananmen Square. That changed the whole landscape, didn't it?

PLAISTED: Yes.

Q: Prior to that, correct me if I am wrong, we were looking upon China as developing into a healthier relationship and things were maybe moving slowly, but things were moving along. Were we concerned about human rights or did this intrude into economics?

PLAISTED: At that point, it was the Bush administration, but human rights were always part of the agenda to one degree or another. When you talk about views on China, well China is such a complex area that it gets very difficult to sort out. You get as many views on China as you have China watchers in the U.S. government, of which there were many. I think there were always people all over the spectrum on China. Maybe after Tiananmen everyone saw China with eyes slightly more wide open than before. There were certainly pre-Tiananmen many people in the U.S. government who knew the pros and cons of China and understood its history quite well. China's history consists of a whole series of swings from opening up to cracking down, from power flowing from the central government in Beijing or wherever it is located to the provinces in the south of China.

Q: Were there other issues you were working on at the time with China?

PLAISTED: Yes. The U.S. Senate was blocking a tax treaty the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the business community really wanted concluded with China. We on the U.S. side drafted an amended protocol to the tax treaty, an amendment addressing expropriation that Jessie Helms was insisting upon. Then we had to convince the Chinese that for U.S. domestic political reasons, if we were ever going to get a tax treaty concluded between our two countries, China had to sign on to this protocol on expropriation. It was a pretty technical issue. Jim Baker was then Secretary of the Treasury. I accompanied him to the Joint Economic Committee meeting in Beijing. Baker did a masterful job of explaining to the Chinese the U.S. political realities and where Jesse Helms was coming from, and that for our larger interests would the Chinese kindly sign this protocol, which they did. So we were able finally to get the tax treaty implemented. The Senate ceased blocking it. The treaty passed the U.S. Senate and was ratified. Another issue that came up in my time was China's membership in the Asian Development Bank. How do you identify Taiwan so Taiwan doesn't have to be kicked out of the ADB when China was anxious to come in as a member? I was working out language very closely at that point with Treasury and with the economic policy side of the State Department, with EB. We were able to come up with language that allowed China to come into the Asian Development Bank and for Taiwan to retain its membership.

Q: What was the problem?

PLAISTED: It was a question of what you list as the main name and what you put in parentheses, or with a comma afterward. It was all a question of how closely you tie Taiwan to China. Is it China Taipei? The name finally agreed upon was Taipei, China. This involved quite a bit of technical negotiating. Another issue that came up was technology transfers to China.

Various controls existed on sophisticated equipment being exported to China. U.S. exporters were rightly irked because there was a heck of a long backlog particularly in the Commerce Department that needed to review their requests to export technology to Beijing. At the same time China was arguing they shouldn't be subject to any controls at all. Of course we thought they should be subject to some controls. At that point we were working very closely with our partners in COCOM, the coordinating committee on export controls in Paris, and came up with a list of items subject to control and were able to speed the approval of non-strategic technology transfer cases to China.

Q: Were there any people who were dealing with policy when you were going through, saying we had to be careful about China because, while everything is fine now, China may be a major adversary of ours at some point or other. Were people thinking that way?

PLAISTED: There were some forecasts that China would surpass us - if you take their growth rate and multiply it by so many years, China is going to surpass the U.S. in such and such a year. They are going to become a major economic competitor. That was always something that came up in very optimistic articles on China's economic potential. Most economists, however, realize one has quite a challenge in developing all of China to the point where it truly becomes a highly competitive economic power.

Q: Moving away from just trade relations, we were also looking or was somebody looking at China as an economic creature itself and how it was coming along? I mean whither China economically?

PLAISTED: Yes. We were looking at China's economic reforms, and looking at the whole state of China's economy. This is something that both the U.S. and China started to do, especially looking at China's application to join the world's main trade body, the GATT. You had to do an overview of the Chinese economy. It was so hard in those days. It still can be difficult today to get anything like reliable trade statistics or economic statistics. We always had a running argument with the Chinese. They would argue they were running a huge trade deficit with the U.S. which was very interesting because our figures always showed no such thing. Our figures showed China was running quite a healthy surplus, healthy from their perspective, with the U.S. They weren't counting trade that was going through the port in Hong Kong. One of the things I did in those days was to get the Chinese to agree to have their statisticians sit down with our statisticians and at least figure out what each side was counting. So, yes, we were focusing on the overall economy, but even for the Chinese I think it was difficult for them to get a grasp on what was happening. But you could see it visually. Driving through China, waiting a year or two, going back through the same area again, visually you see enormous progress, the number of new little factories that were being set up, more cars as opposed to bicycles on the streets of Beijing, a real increase in pollution. Whether that is a sign of advancement or not, you could visually see dramatic change.

Q: Were you seeing an increase and increasing Chinese influence of Chinese who let's say were involved in economic business management coming to the United States and getting degrees and then going back? Was there an American educated economic cadre developing?

PLAISTED: There was. It was very much the thing to do if you could possibly afford it - for the Chinese to come to the U.S. at that point. But many of them were staying, and the Chinese government would complain. Of course, the U.S. government had very little control. We were hardly going to be able to track down all these Chinese students and send them back to China. But what you would find is many of the Chinese students came to the U.S. to study medicine, and said I really don't think I want to go back and be a barefoot doctor in the provinces. That was the problem. They were coming to the U.S. to be educated but many of them were staying here in the U.S. for the professional opportunities afterwards.

Q: While you were dealing with this, did you find yourself in the whole China operation in the State Department? You mentioned before in Hong Kong that the China watchers got into who is number 14 in the picture showing the politburo and how things are going. Did you find that the China watchers were sort of up in the air looking at who is doing what in the political sphere whereas you had the feeling that this is all very cute, but what does that mean for major relations which were economic?

PLAISTED: Yes, very much so. I think in Washington we were all more focused on the policy process whereas, out in the field, you are not quite as focused on doing things that are going to get results. But, yes, there was always someone who was saying what does this really mean and what can we do with it? Also I remember discussing, arguing to some extent with my Chinese colleagues. I had been in China and had met Li Peng who was then Energy Minister. This was the U.S. Secretary of Energy's trip to Beijing where he met with his counterpart. Li Peng had made a point of saying he really wanted to visit the U.S. He had been in the U.S. only once before. When we looked into it, he had been very critical of the U.S. when he first visited. So I was arguing with my bosses that we should arrange a USIA-type sponsored trip for Li Peng because I really think he has a great future, or he may have. It is a worthwhile investment just to bring him here, give him a three week trip, show him whatever cities he wants to see so he would understand the U.S. a little better. If he wants to criticize us, fine, but he should do so from an educated basis. Let's pay some more attention to Li Peng. I remember really arguing with the China hands. They said no to any trip, they were not thinking at that point he had much of a future. He truly did.

Q: Where is Li Peng now?

PLAISTED: He rose to become premier in China and Chairman of the National People's Congress.

Q: Did you get the trip for him?

PLAISTED: No, I never did. The real China experts thought someone with a brighter future should get the trip.

Q: While you were again with the China watchers, was there concern or consideration to the fact that you are getting a lot of students and other people who really...? Was there concern you have a very elderly central committee in China at that time and growing aspirations of many of the people? Revolutions usually don't start when everybody is poor; they start when aspirations go up, and there might be another revolution and the aging central government might not be able to cope with it. Was this part of the discussion while you were there?

PLAISTED: Yes, it was an issue that was raised particularly at China conferences where we had some time to reflect on what's happening and also on what are the political views of the new generation in China. How educated are they? How free are they to express their views, and how would that new generation seize power? I don't think anyone had any real answers on how the transition is going to take place, and also how quickly is China going to be able to democratize or open up - whatever you want to call it. That was something that was very interesting during the time of Tiananmen. There was an embargo at the top in China that no information was to get out to the news media, but they didn't turn off the fax machines. There were any number of fax machines in large businesses, and news reports on what was happening at Tiananmen, the deaths, the brutality, were being faxed out of China at that point. You get to a point of westernization or modernization with the Internet, with mobile phones, where it is very hard for the top cadre to cut off all communications.

Q: Was it an article of faith, maybe I am overstating it, but among the people in the State Department who were dealing with China that as economic policy liberalized this would eventually bring democratization in government? Would economic opening work down to political liberalization?

PLAISTED: No, I don't think that was an absolute. There was always an expectation once their economic policy liberalized it would open up the country more. There were also many discussions in policy circles that what is really predominant in China is political. You know when push comes to shove what you see is political control. Once Tiananmen started getting out of hand, from the perspective of the aging Chinese leadership, they really had to crack down to maintain political control. They weren't concerned about all these western contracts. They were not asking, "What impact is this going to have on China's economy? Will there suddenly be export controls that are going to be placed on us? Is the U.S. going to block our ADB loans?" No, it comes down in the final analysis to we are losing control of the country. It is time to crack down.

Q: What about the People's Liberation Army, the PLA, as far as its control over sources of economic machinery? Was that anything we were looking at at that time?

PLAISTED: It wasn't that much of a political/economic issue then. I know subsequently it became an issue of what the PLA was selling, what goods are being manufactured in jails, what's being manufactured by free or forced labor. The labor unions in the U.S. later became active. I don't remember that as being a really major issue in the mid-1980s.

Q: How about trade complaints? Did there seem to be a disparity about how trade complaints were settled in the United States? I am talking about say a Chinese who was having trouble with Sears Roebuck or something like that. We have our courts and it is fairly routine, but what about if Sears had a complaint about its supplier in China and wanted to do something about it. Was that a problem?

PLAISTED: It was always an issue of how you deal with problems. For example, McDonald's had a great location near Tiananmen Square; the Chinese wanted to take the land. McDonald's had the legal right, I believe, but that can mean little. In the final analysis what we did and what I tried to do was to have the next secretary or cabinet level official going to China raise it at the highest level. Ultimately the best way to deal with the Chinese we always found was to raise issues at the highest level. You really need to bring it up to the highest level to get attention. You might take something to the Chinese court system, but that is a losing battle. It wasn't the way to go. If it is a major issue that happens, a big trade complaint, you have to go in and make a demarche at the very highest level.

Q: That must have meant that our cabinet officials when they went to China were handed a huge pile of situations. They must have said oh my God.

PLAISTED: It's true. We just had the Secretary of State's visit to China. He raised human rights issues at the very highest level. My point is you have to make a demarche at the very highest level to get China's attention. I'll give you another example of how we handled big problems. The China desk was about a 14 person desk. There was a major conference taking place in another agency. Someone had to stay behind on the desk to be in charge if anything came up. So all my colleagues, all the true China hands who spoke Mandarin, went off to the conference, and I volunteered to stay behind, to be the one to handle anything that came up. The New York Times journalist, John Burns, was arrested in Beijing on my watch. I got a call from the editor of The New York Times, A.M. Rosenthal, to call this to our urgent attention. Of course we immediately got on it. I called in the middle of the night to our political counselor in Beijing who confirmed that yes indeed this had happened. I called the Chinese embassy in Washington to alert them to what had happened. I alerted the op center and called my bosses at the conference. But by the time they came back, I had already drafted a demarche, knowing this should be raised at the highest levels. I drafted a demarche so that we could start the process to protest and to free the journalist.

Q: What happened?

PLAISTED: It was a time consuming process. This went on for many days after we were notified of the arrest. But John Burns eventually was released.

Q: What was the problem? What did he do?

PLAISTED: It was a general charge that the journalist was spying. He may have been a little too close to what was a military facility. From our perspective there was never any thought that this New York Times journalist was out there spying on the Chinese.

Q: As you were observing the Chinese, the mainland Chinese, how were they treating the Taiwanese, because China, I believe, had opened up by that time to investment from Taiwan?

PLAISTED: Yes, Taiwan investment at this point was really beginning to flow into southern China and into Fujian province. It was a time when you couldn't trade directly, you still can't, between Taiwan and China, but there was a lot of trade flowing indirectly through Hong Kong.

Taiwan investors were going into China because this was the time where from Taiwan's perspective their dollar had appreciated so much it really made economic sense for them to relocate their factories just right across the Taiwan Strait to China. So it was a time of a real boom in southern China with investment flowing in from Taiwan.

Q: You know we have this peculiar relationship, American interests, with the Taiwan people - I mean our own Americans dealing with Taiwan. Would you compare and contrast and all that? They were located where? What was it called then?

PLAISTED: The American Institute in Taiwan, in Rosslyn, Virginia, and in Taipei. We would see reporting on the China desk from the American Institute in Taiwan in Taipei, and, of course, the American Institute in Taipei would always see reporting coming out of Beijing and Hong Kong. There's always in the State Department someone who follows Taiwan from the policy perspective. There was a Taiwan section in State to follow the policy issues. The relationship with AIT in Rosslyn depended on who the director was - whether it was more than an administrative function on staffing issues with AIT in Taipei. There was a hall connecting the China desk and the Taiwan section in the State Department. We always referred to that little narrow corridor as the Taiwan Strait. They were there. They were there to consult with if there was some issue with Taiwan.

Q: I think our people in Taipei, for example, I am talking about your particular bailiwick, the economic side, would be getting some very good information because here were people who were much more open. I am talking about the Taiwanese going in and investing and coming back and telling our people, so in many ways it would be a very solid source of information about how economics were working from this particular source.

PLAISTED: That is very true, and, as I was mentioning earlier, too, we were getting the same type of information in Hong Kong. This is why we have China watchers in Hong Kong because it is a much more open place to get information. People are willing to talk to you, and you can pick up a lot of atmospherics.

Q: Did you find that our economic people in Beijing were somewhat inhibited about getting out and around and being able to have good talks?

PLAISTED: It was very difficult for them to get information. I think the Chinese at times were hesitant to talk with them on anything other than a real formal basis and to engage in a give and take with U.S. government officials. Once the Chinese got beyond their instructions they were a little lost for words. So it was difficult to get that same type of exchange. Of course language was always an issue. The Americans had to speak good Mandarin because once you get down to the middle level of the Chinese government not everyone is speaking English in Beijing or has an interpreter.

Q: What about the academic world? People in the academic world are looking at China, and at other countries in the world but particularly China, and writing things, whither China? The political scientists and economists are looking at China. Were you able to sample much of this?

PLAISTED: The academics would come in sometimes and talk to us on the China desk and we would sometimes go out to lunch. But frankly we were so busy pursuing all the day-to-day policy issues on what was happening. We didn't have much time to reflect. It was always a great luxury to be able to sit down with China scholars and enjoy an intellectual discussion on whither China, which of course we are still debating today. There were often China conferences at Brookings and other institutions taking place in the area. It was great if you could break away and attend them which we were always quite welcome to do if we had the time to do it.

Q: This is one of the things, with this oral history project. We are supplying some ammunition for the academics of the future. But I have always been struck by the fact, and this goes back to when I was in the Foreign Service, too, of how little time there is. Academics are writing about this or that, but the people who are actually dealing with policy, usually there is not much of a connect because they don't have time, and after awhile, they haven't found what the academic is writing that useful. I mean it would be nice, but it is almost a luxury.

PLAISTED: It depends on your academic. There are always some I have a lot of respect for. If they would write something, they would send it to me and I would read it on my own time depending on the academic. But there wasn't always the luxury of taking off to go to a China conference. I was always quite professionally free to do so and my staff was, too, but we had to get our briefing papers up to the seventh floor for the next cabinet meeting or to go brief someone who was going off to China. Alas there was always something more urgent to do.

Q: Did you get any feel for Secretary Shultz and his interest in economics of China?

PLAISTED: It was our office director who accompanied Shultz on his trip, so he had more of a feeling for the Secretary of State. I accompanied the Secretary of Commerce, Matt Baldridge, and the then Secretary of the Treasury, James Baker. We also backstopped Vice President Bush's trip to China in October 1985 and briefed him before his trip. I was impressed by a question Bush asked about what the U.S. would do if Taiwan sought independence from China - a very foresighted question.

Q: How did that trip go?

PLAISTED: It went quite well. Of course the Chinese treated Bush royally as they always do. It was his return to China after having opened up the mission in Beijing, so it was quite a historic return.

Q: Is there anything else you think we should cover here? In '87 you went to the War College. Which war college?

PLAISTED: The National War College at Fort McNair, the top military academy.

Q: So that would be '87 to '88. How did you find your experience there?

PLAISTED: Well it was very interesting on a couple of fronts. When I was first assigned to the War College, my reaction was Great! I am going to have a year off, and I can pursue my own interests. There are no grades at the War College. No one really checks on you. You do have to attend classes, but this is going to give me time to do what I want to do. I really was very interested at that point in reading a lot of history and trying to integrate what was happening in western civilization with what was happening in the eastern world. I don't think anyone had ever written a book really integrating eastern and western civilization. How could Kenneth Clarke entitle his book Civilization and not say a thing about China? That was going to be my personal project during this year of freedom. Well, once I started attending the War College, sitting in the auditorium, I was absolutely enthralled by the quality of the speakers we were hearing. We would have a session on the Presidency and every chief of staff going back to Ed Meese, in Nixon's days, and even the Eisenhower administration would come and speak to us. Every 45 minutes here comes another chief of staff for the former President of the United States to talk to us. We just had such top exposure. We would go to the Supreme Court and talk to some of the justices. I started getting really involved in the academic program at the War College. You could take elective courses in the afternoon. Everyone took three electives. I asked why can't you take four? They said well you could. No one has ever done that. Well the price was right. I wasn't paying for this and the courses were fascinating, so I was adding an extra course each semester because it was just such a fascinating place to study. Some of the professors were superb, including Mel Goodman on the Soviet Union. The professor who handled the Middle East taught me a lot about what I knew about the Arab world before my tour in Morocco. Academically I took full advantage of the War College. I went on almost all of the voluntary trips. I crawled around the back of a B-52 bomber when we visited the SAC, the Strategic Air Command, in Omaha. I went to Colorado Springs where we visited NORAD and Spacecom. I visited the scenic Coast Guard facilities in San Francisco. I descended down into the missile silos in Minot, North Dakota, at the Minot air force base. So academically it was a fascinating place. As a woman, all of a sudden at the War College, my antenna was sort of raised, because of the things that were happening all the time. Little things. I was always getting Mr. placed on my name tags. There were 14 women at the War College at that time, but they just didn't seem to be prepared to deal with women. It would come up in very small ways. At one point, I probably could have made a name for myself at the War College, I was going to write to the commandant who is in charge of the War College and tell him how delighted I was with his policy of topless bathing at the swimming pool, that I felt right at home just as if I were on the French Riviera again. I wanted to congratulate him on his liberalism that I would not have expected to find at the National War College. The student handbook read, "upper garments must be worn at all times except at the swimming pool." I would have made quite a name for myself at the National War College testing the commandant's policy. But those are the type of things that I was running into all the time at the War College.

Q: Well, it is a very important project I think.

PLAISTED: Oh, yes, it was just a fabulous experience, a very useful year. I feel very fortunate to have had that year at the National War College. There were field trips. Everyone was bidding on China. You know, you bid on trips. Everyone's first choice was China. Well I don't know how many times I had been to China in the last year. I had ranked it as number 13. The last place in the world I wanted to go to was China. I had never been to Central America or Latin America. I ended up going to Central America.

Q: Okay. Then you went to Taiwan in 1988 and you were there from '88 to when?

PLAISTED: To '91.

Q: What was your job?

PLAISTED: I was the head of what was one of the very few combined economic commercial sections that were still left, because most of the Foreign Commercial Service had been set up, most commercial sections had been split off at that point. So I headed about a 40 person economic commercial section. We had a trade center in Taipei putting on exhibitions, with a large commercial staff. Taiwan was our second largest trade deficit after Japan in those days. It was very clear Taiwan's market had to be opened up. Even Taiwan was starting to realize it. I headed all the trade negotiations, and there were endless trade negotiations, to really open up Taiwan's market. I was very pleased that by the time I left Taiwan had fallen from number two place to number five. It wasn't completely due to our hard work at the American Institute in Taiwan, but Taiwan had fallen to fifth place in terms of our trade deficit, behind Japan, China, and others.

Q: Before we go into that, could you explain because I think it needs explaining what you and everyone who serves there had to go through and your official status when you went to Taiwan?

PLAISTED: This is the American Institute in Taiwan. To serve there, you have to resign from the Foreign Service. We only have economic, commercial, cultural and other relations with Taiwan. After we recognized mainland China, we ruptured relations quite precipitously and quite rudely with Taiwan. So I had to resign from the Foreign Service, to turn in my resignation. I think it actually appeared in the State Department magazine that I had resigned because I was getting letters from friends saying, Joan, what happened? They knew I really loved my career. I think they thought I had a terminal illness to resign. But then about three years later I miraculously reappear on the rolls of the State Department. You continue your retirement benefits although those got a little messed up. You continue the same benefits, the same health benefits, but you do formally resign from the Foreign Service to serve in Taiwan.

Q: Well then who was the head of the institute?

PLAISTED: David Dean was the director of the American Institute in Taiwan in my day, and Scott Hallford was the deputy director. Since we do not have official relations, we do not have an ambassador.

Q: So basically you were a regular embassy with an economic commercial counselor.

PLAISTED: Yes, but because of the importance of our economic work there, I was the number three, the third ranking person in AIT.

Q: Who was the top economic person?

PLAISTED: I was.

Q: Oh, you were. Now you were number three...

PLAISTED: After Scott Hallford, the deputy, or the DCM.

Q: Well now, you go out there. I am sure in your portfolio you are saying look at this deficit, do something. How do you go about doing this?

PLAISTED: Look there are so many different areas where you can start opening up the Taiwan market. I think one of the first messages we had to get across to Taiwan was to really make them realize it was in their own interest. The time had come. They always wanted to be a more active member of the world community. My message was, it is in your own interest to open up, to liberalize. Then you start attacking the deficit in every way possible from negotiating with them on reducing very high tariffs to endorsing intellectual property rights. We signed a copyright agreement, renegotiated a textile agreement, concluded agreements on strategic trade controls, steel, machine tools, opened up the banking, insurance, and securities markets, negotiated a drift net fishing agreement, several agreements on nuclear cooperation, and a beer, wine, and cigarettes accord. These are all negotiations that I was heading. We would often have delegations coming from Washington. I think one of the most important things that happened during that time is Taiwan's action in response to U.S. pressure because the omnibus trade act was coming up. Taiwan's president announced, and put his personal imprimatur on it, the President's trade action plan, a Taiwan initiative to liberalize trade, which is something that we really supported. He left out intellectual property rights, a most important area. I very quickly called up my then counterpart, who was Vincent Siew who later went on to be the premier of Taiwan, and said, "Vincent, this is really great. This is a good Taiwan initiative. Obviously you are targeting this at the U.S. Don't you think you want to include intellectual property rights?" He knew the atmosphere and very quickly realized this was quite an omission.

Q: This has been sort of a hallmark. Everybody who thinks of Taiwan in the old days thinks of it as being the source of cheap books and all that. That is what they focus on.

PLAISTED: So Vincent very quickly grasped the problem and said, "Well, let me discuss this and see if it could be part of the President's trade action plan." Of course it was added. So my main thrust is trying to get Taiwan to realize it is in its own interest to open up and then to say let's work together.

Q: Well, had they sort of picked up old habits from their mainland days, or was this a revenue issue? Were they thinking in terms of infant industries and trying to develop them and maintaining all these various barriers?

PLAISTED: Well they did in those days have the world's second largest foreign exchange holdings. So they were a very wealthy area. I think a lot of these barriers were just left over, too, and they had gone through very hard times right after the war. I think now they realize it is very much in their interest to export more globally, and they were going to have to open up their markets, too.

Q: Did you find that in China, I mean in Taiwan, that when something came out of the ministry it was more likely to be enforced than when you were dealing with mainland China?

PLAISTED: Oh yes, very much so. And Taiwan had the means to enforce it, too. So if an agreement was concluded with Taiwan, we never had to really worry that it would not be enforced. We could quickly go over and make a demarche. Taiwan would know if there was some political reason an agreement was not being enforced, would figure out why, and identify the problem. There was always a real exchange of views.

Q: Did you find for example that as you sat down and were negotiating, you were close enough to the seat of power that you didn't have to wait forever in order to notify them, to get instructions and all. Were they more flexible?

PLAISTED: Very much so. They were always exceedingly well prepared. Something I initiated that helped us, I think, to make progress in all these negotiations with Taiwan was something I had done with textiles in Hong Kong. Before the talks, if it was at all possible, we would exchange papers with them or at least give them a one or two page paper saying this is the U.S. position, this is what we are asking you to do, here is why we think it is important. So Taiwan would know in advance what we were going to say at the negotiating table and where we wanted to come out. So that gave them before the talks the ability to go and do their interagency clearance processes. Also I'd always send a cable to Washington before the talks. My staff who handled each of these areas would draft a cable explaining what we thought we should try to get out of the talks and what we thought Taiwan's position was going to be. So that really speeded things along. And again Taiwan didn't like surprises, so it helped them prepare. And they had some brilliant people on their side. I remember there was one lawyer who was so good who took part in almost all of their trade talks. We always wanted him to come and join our side of the table.

Q: Did you find a lot of Taiwanese students went to the United States? At that point were they beginning to come back?

PLAISTED: Yes. The Taiwan students did go back in general. Of course I am speaking in generalities, but the Taiwan students seemed to go back. It was also very important to the people on Taiwan to go to top name U.S. universities. Their calling cards would often note the school they had attended if it was prestigious. When someone would present me with his calling card, it would often give the name of the person and then underneath his name, not his job title so much as where he graduated from - which university. They always liked it to be a recognizable name. So if you received a calling card, you could see where the person went to school, thus emphasizing the importance of education which I have always highly respected. I think it accounts for some of the success of Taiwan and Hong Kong, the importance of education.

Q: Korea, too, and obviously Japan. Did we ever use that sort of not as a policy instrument but to have the University of Chicago alumni group, I mean university and college alumni groups, getting together in Taiwan and the embassy sponsoring them?

PLAISTED: I remember getting together with my best Taiwan girlfriend who graduated from Wellesley, getting together with the Wellesley University group and meeting with the president of Wellesley. But it was done informally, more informally than through the American Institute in Taiwan.

Q: Did you find once you settled in there that being an institute rather than an embassy, did that really change things at all? Was it a delicate relationship with Taiwan?

PLAISTED: Yes, you had to be really careful about the terminology. We were never to refer to Taiwan as a country since we recognized Taiwan as a part of China. We did not meet in government officials' offices. This led to frequent lunches and dinners. We had to be certain that someone wasn't going to go running off to call on the president of Taiwan in his office. There were things that just weren't allowed that visiting U.S. government officials just were not meant to do. I remember we would have top level congressional visitors and Taiwan would always try to get more recognition. We would always want congressional members and USG officials to start with a briefing at the American Institute in Taiwan. Part of it was I would brief them on the substance of where we stood in terms of trade liberalization, always telling them the glass was half full or half empty. It depends on how you look at it. But at the same time we wanted to brief them very early on in their visit to Taiwan on the do's and don'ts, on just how one goes about business in this very strange set up we have on Taiwan where we don't have government-to-government relations.

Q: How about the service industries? I am thinking of insurance, banking, advertising, you name it, legal firms. Was there much of an opening for these in Taiwan at that time?

PLAISTED: It was a section that did have to be opened up. Taiwan's service section wasn't that open to U.S. firms. So it was an area where we were negotiating to really open up the banking market, the securities market, and the insurance market. This was all very much in the vanguard in those days.

Q: Did they see that by opening up that would open things up for them, too?

PLAISTED: Yes, and they were always looking for ways to ally themselves closer, to establish a closer relationship with the United States. I think Taiwan realized that if they could get more U.S. firms to locate in Taipei that could lead to a lobby promoting closer ties.

Q: Were we seeing their surplus as a target to get them to invest in the United States?

PLAISTED: We weren't asking them to invest in the U.S. We were seeing their surplus as a need to appreciate their currency, the NT, the new Taiwan dollar. We were often writing reports on exchange rates for Treasury, and Treasury was pressuring them to appreciate the new Taiwan dollar. I talk about this great success in getting Taiwan to drop from number two in terms of the U.S. trade deficit after Japan to number five. If you want to know the real secret of our great success, it really wasn't all these great trade negotiations I headed across the board. You get Taiwan to reduce their tariffs, open up services, crack down on copyright violations - that takes a long time before it shows up in trade statistics.

So the real secret of how we dropped, how Taiwan dropped to fifth place, was not my great, brilliant negotiating. It was that the new Taiwan dollar through various means appreciated so much it became uncompetitive for Taiwan firms to continue manufacturing and exporting from Taiwan, so they all moved over to China, Fujian province, and started setting up textile plants, footwear plants, light electronics goods factories, and exporting to the U.S. from China. We no longer had a Taiwan problem, we now had a China problem with our trade deficit, but it was no longer my problem.

Q: As a consular officer, if there is an accident, and you ask very carefully just where did it happen, and if it is somebody else's district, well I will tell my colleague to take care of it. You really have been in the field of negotiating for a long time, and the United States in the beginning was sort of benevolent in negotiations and not very insistent. You came early on the scene when all of a sudden we discovered this is costing us money. Did you find that by the time you got to Taiwan they kind of had book on you and knew who you were and were familiar with your negotiating technique. "Oh, my God, here comes the iron lady..."

PLAISTED: No, I don't think I came to Taiwan with a pre-established reputation as a really tough negotiator. I had not worked with Taiwan in the GATT, UNCTAD, or the OECD. They weren't members. The Americans in the American Institute of Taiwan had heard of me by reputation, but the Taiwan negotiators, I don't think they had gone out there and actually studied my tactics and battle plan.

Q: Well, you were there in '88-'91, and of course there was the whole Asian thing particularly in '89 in June with the Tiananmen Square incident. How did that hit you all? When you all were watching it, particularly China watchers, what were they saying as they saw this, because this went on for some time. The demonstrations weren't a short term thing. It took quite a while to develop. Was there concern or what was the feeling?

PLAISTED: I remember watching this slowly build up and the demonstrations became larger and larger. I just remember myself about two weeks before the Tiananmen crackdown thinking and mentioning to some of my China colleagues that China was going to crack down. Others weren't too certain if Beijing was going to crack down or not. I sensed they would. It is just not in the Chinese nature in Beijing to let things get so much out of control. Unfortunately, they did as I had predicted and cracked down hard. I remember I had gone outside of Taipei for the weekend. We had a little guest house up in the mountains. The worst part about living in Taipei is the horrible pollution downtown, so I would flee on weekends to get a bit of fresh air on the top of the little mountain up in our director's guest house. He would kindly open it up to the embassy staff when he wasn't using it. Coming back into Taipei, there were suddenly armed guards at almost every intersection. We hadn't heard what happened over the radio. We had been rather isolated. I don't know if anyone had yet heard over the news what had happened, but it was obvious something was going on with the stepped up security. It only lasted for a day or two. I think at that point Taiwan was a little concerned about a possible spillover to Taiwan when the mainlanders cracked down in Beijing.

Q: You had this peculiar thing when the mainland Chinese were looking very carefully at who visited the United States and vice versa, Taiwan. Were there any difficulties? You want to get the economic ministers together. How did that work out on your side, particularly with the Secretary of Treasury or the Secretary of Commerce? Could they come there and talk?

PLAISTED: No, they couldn't, not in my day. We really did not have cabinet level exchanges. You are not going to have U.S.-Taiwan commerce ministers meetings. We didn't have that high level of exchange. If we were going to meet with them we would meet more informally in Washington. We would always meet outside of the State Department on some neutral ground such as in a restaurant.

Q: You have American departmental secretaries who have over time been able to call on their colleagues as they met them in these international meetings. This whole line of communication, was it dead or was there sort of an informal way of doing this?

PLAISTED: In my days, the top levels in the State Department were not getting engaged with their Taiwan counterparts. The American Institute in Taiwan in Washington, the director of the American Institute, would come through Taipei a couple times a year. Of course he was a non-State Department person, and he could go and call on various people, the Taiwan authorities. But you certainly were not going to have a Taiwan official meeting even informally with the Secretary of State or the Under Secretary.

Q: I would think that in the long run you might say the mainland policy of monitoring this very closely would have a certain effect because it was cutting down on the contacts between high officials. You know they get together a lot more than they used to, and they talk to each other, and that is the way a lot of business gets done. Did you notice this?

PLAISTED: Certainly on the political level it is an inhibiting factor which China has meant it to be.

Q: How about on the economic level?

PLAISTED: Economically it was inhibiting to some degree. We can have economic relations but we were very careful to some extent about not letting it spill over to the political realm.

Q: You know when you are doing this, you are negotiating, you are really looking at State, Treasury and Commerce these are sort of your...

PLAISTED: And USTR.

Q: USTR yes because I was thinking of the White House. Was there a filter or basically were you talking to them? How did you work this for your instructions?

PLAISTED: We have economic relations, we have commercial relations with Taiwan. My instructions were coming from the Washington interagency clearance process. Everyone had signed on and, you know, I would often have a say. I would cable Washington and say this is what I think the instructions should be. They were very much cleared interagency U.S. government instructions.

Q: So in a way...

PLAISTED: That was the normal economic relationship, commercial relationship that we did have with Taiwan. I would head all the trade negotiations as the AIT representative.

Q: Who could you deal with on the Taiwanese side?

PLAISTED: With our counterparts across the table. Their chief trade negotiator was Vincent Siew who became their economic minister and later the premier. We dealt with the people from their Ministry of Trade and their Economic Planning Commission. We dealt with all of their economic people.

Q: One always sees lists of the ten most wealthy people in the world, and there are usually a couple of Taiwanese on it. Were there big, would you call them shoguns or the equivalent?

PLAISTED: Yes absolutely. One is the Chairman of Far Eastern Textiles, Douglas Hsu. I think he still shows up on the Fortune 500 list. Another is Formosa Plastics, the Wang family, who are very wealthy and very well established in Taiwan, Asia, and the United States. I developed close friendships with some of these people.

Q: I assume they were closely tied to the government at least I mean on economic matters.

PLAISTED: Most of your top people in Taiwan are very politically savvy, economically savvy, but they weren't always very political. Some were apolitical at times.

Q: On to politics, we didn't have a political section, was there a cultural section? How did we cover the politics of Taiwan?

PLAISTED: There was a political section, a relatively small section that would report on what was going on politically. In those days, our deputy director (the equivalent of the DCM) was Scott Hallford. He was a great golfer, still is to this day, and it was a fabulous talent to have. There was a long period of time when we didn't have a director. I was acting deputy director in Scott's job, and he was acting as director. If he wanted to find out what was happening politically, he would take the afternoon off and go off to the golf course, and the next day he would come back and write a great cable about what he picked up on the golf course. He didn't report where he picked up his information, but that was the best place to find Taiwan's movers and shakers.

Q: Did you feel under any particular threat or anything like that when you were there, or was it pretty tight control?

PLAISTED: I didn't. I did feel relatively safe in Taiwan. It was the time of the Gulf War. I had a house in downtown Taipei with some red gates. I remember walking out of my red gates one morning, and some guy in the neighborhood points his fingers at me like guns and goes, "Pow, pow, Gulf War," shooting me. I sort of looked at him, but I knew I wasn't under any great threat.

Q: I understand from people who were in African countries during the Gulf War, they practically shut down. Everyone was watching the war on TV.

PLAISTED: Oh, absolutely. It was what I was doing to the extent I possibly could. We had the TV on in the cafeteria which was around the corner from my office at the AIT. I announced at a staff meeting that the place to find me if I am not in my office is the cafeteria. I will sign cables or if you need me I will break away from the Gulf War. And please feel free to watch the war yourselves. This is a pretty exciting moment in history. We all need to get our work done, but you can do it whenever you want to. You know what you are responsible for. You are professionals, and if you want to sit there and watch the Gulf War, go ahead. It was a fascinating time. If we weren't watching for awhile, we would ask our colleagues in the hall or the cafeteria for an update. So we were absolutely glued to the TV as much as possible. I was absolutely stunned when President Bush suddenly called off operations.

Q: I think most of us were. I feel it was a day too soon.

PLAISTED: I was trying to understand what happened here.

Q: What about the Gulf War? I mean we were running around trying to get money, get support and all. Did you get involved in that? Did Taiwan get melded into that at all?

PLAISTED: I certainly didn't get involved in it.

Q: Because we were sort of passing the hat among a lot of countries, but Taiwan was maybe somewhat off limits. Did the Bush administration which came in while you were there, did that change anything, or did you have any feel for a difference in thrust from Reagan to Bush?

PLAISTED: No, it was very much the Bush administration. I don't think the change in administration made any real difference. '88-'91, it would have mainly been the Bush administration.

Q: Is there anything else we should cover on Taiwan? I thought I would wrap it up at this point.

PLAISTED: I think that's done.

Q: Did you get the feeling that the Burmese government gave a damn about what we did?

PLAISTED: They did to some extent because they really did want more support on the counternarcotics side from the U.S. Also I think they were very concerned economically with the power that we had to prohibit new foreign investment or even to have some impact on the U.S. investment that was already there. They were actively putting in a gas pipeline between Burma and Thailand. So I think to some extent, yes, they were concerned about how they were viewed by the United States. At the same time the Burmese government and others would argue that how they viewed the democratic process or how they treated Aung San Suu Kyi and her followers was an internal affair of their government, and we shouldn't interfere. It is the classic Chinese argument, we shouldn't interfere in their internal affairs and sovereignty.

Q: How about China?

PLAISTED: China, it depended on the issue. Sometimes we had like-minded views. I had very good conversations with the Chinese ambassador on our mutual interests at the UN, and, on other issues such as human rights, China had a very different perspective. China, it depended on the issue. Singapore could sometimes see things quite differently. They were very active trying to be contentious at times. So sometimes Singapore would be quite outspoken on issues. We didn't always see eye-to-eye with their permanent representative.

Q: Was there a problem of Japanese and maybe American, Russian, and other boats basically poaching? Were there Marshallese boats?

PLAISTED: Marshallese, no. The Marshalls doesn't do any deep water tuna fishing. There was a rather disastrous time when they did buy some tuna boats and proved they really couldn't operate them and then tried to sell the boats back to the country they had bought them from. Now their emphasis has been more on letting mainly the Chinese and some other nationalities do the fishing. Their hope is to get more revenue from the spin-offs.

Q: At one point in all these Pacific islands, one of our prime objectives was strategic denial, that is to keep the Soviets from putting ships and bases on these islands. Has that completely gone by the board? During your time there, were we looking over our shoulders to see if the Chinese might want to play games on this?

PLAISTED: When the U.S. was in the Marshall Islands at the height of the Cold War, the concept of strategic denial was very important to counter the Russians. It is debatable how valid strategic denial is today. I think the Marshalls is still of strategic significance to the United States. It is a vast ocean space. These are important shipping lanes between Hawaii and spots further west in Australia and Southeast Asia. We do not want to have an adversary control these shipping lanes. Now there is no one today, not the Chinese, not the Russians, who is threatening these open shipping lanes, but it is very important to keep the lanes open. We don't know what the future threats are going to be. I think this area still is of significance strategically, although the Cold War has long ended and relations have certainly changed with the Marshall Islands since the days of the Cold War.

Q: Now on the personal and personnel side, how did you keep from going Island happy? I mean also not just you but...

PLAISTED: The whole embassy team. When I first went out to the Marshall Islands I was so afraid of not having enough to do. I am a very active person and had been posted in Paris, Geneva, Hong Kong, Taiwan, and Rabat, not a series of hardship posts. I shipped out 800 pounds of books. I was buying every classic to either read or re-read. I had two copies of War and Peace in case I wanted to read it in two different translations. The embassy had a tennis court. I bought an automatic tennis ball launching machine, quite an expensive piece of equipment, so I could take up tennis. I bought oil paints and canvasses, just about everything I could think of. I shipped my chessboard out to the Marshall Islands. Coming back 4 ½ years later I shipped back 800 pounds of books, and the canvasses are still white, unpainted. I did use the tennis ball launching machine, and learned how to play tennis to some extent.

What I found personally, and I think it is true for other members of the embassy staff, too, was we were such a small embassy. We were awfully busy. It would have been very difficult to live there without working so intensely. Of course as ambassador I was on call 24 hours a day. I would get calls in the middle of the night that someone in Kiribati had just been bitten by a barracuda and was bleeding profusely and could I please send in the Coast Guard immediately. I think our Embassy staff did save a few lives. The substantive issues really kept me quite busy.

What I did for recreation, what I really enjoyed, was I took up scuba diving. To this day I can't swim very well, and I don't like to get my head under water. But I became quite an avid diver. The Marshalls has some of the loveliest coral in the world, and great fish of almost every tropical variety. What you are almost always guaranteed to see when you are diving are sharks. I can remember quite vividly the first time I ever saw a shark. I was just snorkeling in the Marshall Islands when a shark came swimming by to check out my dive buddy. I quickly learned the different species. The white tipped shark is the shark that is considered less dangerous. The black tipped sharks and your grey reef sharks are very territorial. If they start circling you, you had better swim as fast as you can to get out of their territory. They are telling you that you are in the shark's living room, you had better get out as quickly as you can. Very often, particularly when I was first there, I would spend my weekends under water to get away from the land sharks. I was up on Bikini professionally and was pleased to be able to dive there. I wanted to see the experiments that the Department of Energy is conducting to show how you can grow indigenous plants on Bikini that aren't dangerous to eat.

Q: What about Kiribati where you were also our Ambassador?

PLAISTED: Kiribati was a British protectorate until they became independent in 1979. The president today is President Tito, who was reelected during my time, too. I got to know him quite well. When I went over to present my credentials, I discovered that his father had been employed by the U.S. army right after W.W.II where he learned all these American folk songs which he had passed on to his son who subsequently became the president of the country. One of my foremost memories of the president is of the reception he hosted after I presented my credentials. The Peace Corps volunteers and American missionaries were there. He suggested he and I sing "Home on the Range" together. I gave quite a good representation of the United States until he turned to me and said, "Joan, you know the second verse don't you?" Of course I didn't. The president knew the second verse. I didn't even know "Home on the Range" had a second verse. Actually it has five verses I learned subsequently.

The major U.S. presence in Kiribati is the Peace Corps. I have the highest respect for the volunteers who are often on these very isolated outer atolls doing very good work that is highly appreciated by the local people. When I was first named Ambassador, we had 20 Peace Corps volunteers in Kiribati, and they were all in the educational field. The President met his wife through the Peace Corps. She was helping to train some of the Peace Corps volunteers when he was asked to give a lecture and they fell in love. Of course they both have fond memories of the Peace Corps. He was always asking me for more Peace Corps volunteers, saying this is the way the U.S. can really help. We did manage to more than double the number of volunteers to 40 some in my time. Now about half of them are working on health projects. The Chinese have a mission in Kiribati. The Australians and New Zealanders have high commissioners, since Kiribati is a commonwealth member. The Chinese have built a satellite tracking station.

The president has done a lot to try and protect the local culture – to preserve the dancing traditions. After I presented my credentials, one of their schools put on a dance ceremony. I was absolutely fascinated for about the first 10-15 minutes. It was the next two hours and 45 minutes that were hard to sit through as the VIP. But the dancers are really superb.

Q: Well, are there any other issues we should cover at this time? Other embassies to mention?

PLAISTED: During my time, the Marshall Islands shifted their relations from China to Taiwan. Now they are receiving substantial economic assistance from Taiwan.

Q: I would imagine it makes good sense. They have nothing else to bargain with.

PLAISTED: Taiwan is very active in courting a number of the Pacific islands, and most successful in getting some of them to change their recognition from China to Taiwan.

Q: What were you doing there in 2000?

PLAISTED: I again served as the Asia advisor, the senior advisor for Asia. I remember being in Secretary of State Albright's meeting with President Wahid of Indonesia who was less than dynamic and in meetings with the Korean and the Chinese foreign ministers. There were a number of high level meetings because the heads of state and the ministers of foreign affairs were all there for the millennium summit. The major UN issue that session was UN reform. We needed to work out something so the U.S. would be able to pay our back assessments we owed to the United Nations. That agreement fell into place at the final hours at the end of the General Assembly's main session thanks to the efforts of Dick Holbrook and the administrative counselor at the U.S. Mission to the UN and many other people. There were various votes where I lobbied the Asian Ambassadors particularly on the issue of which countries to elect for two year rotating Security Council seats. The vote probably went the right way because of the support of the Pacific islands and some of the smaller Asian countries, including Mongolia. I or one of my colleagues would sit down with the Mongolian ambassador for awhile and present the U.S. perspective in such a way that he realized this is really the position Mongolia should be taking, too. We often could find an ally in Mongolia which was quite a pleasant surprise.

MARIE THERESE HUHTALA
Political Officer (China Watcher)
Hong Kong (1985-1987)

Ambassador Huhtala was born and raised in California and Graduated from Santa Clara University. Joining the Foreign Service in 1972, she studied Thai and Chinese languages and became a specialist in East Asian and Pacific Affairs. Her overseas postings include Paris, Quebec, Hong Kong and Chiang Mai (Thailand). In Washington, she dealt primarily with East Asia and Pacific Affairs. From 2001 to 2004 she served as US ambassador to Malaysia and, from 2004 to 2005, as Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs. Ambassador Huhtala is a graduate of the National War College and the State Department's Senior Seminar. Ambassador Huhtala was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2005.

Q: How did you find Chinese?

HUHTALA: In some respects it's very similar to Thai. It's got the same kind of tones and a monosyllabic word structure, and word order rules rather than declinations and conjugations as far as grammar goes. Yet I found it a lot harder than Thai. For one thing the characters just killed me. Thai has an alphabet. It has 42 consonants but you can learn 42 consonants. And if you can learn those, you can read Thai. To get your 3-3 in Chinese, on the other hand, you have to memorize 3,000 characters. That's hard. And a truly educated Chinese speaker knows 10,000 characters. When you got through the FSI program, you have to learn both the traditional characters and the simplified ones that are used on the mainland. And, whereas conversational Thai will get you through almost anywhere, for Chinese we had to learn several levels of the language, including very elevated Chinese, with quotes from old proverbs going back to Confucius' time. Learning Chinese represented two solid years of serious application.

Q: How did you find Taiwan?

HUHTALA: Interesting and a little strange. Taiwan had a parliament that was made up of people who were representing various constituencies in old China, places like Shanghai and Hunan and Fujian. They retained this fiction of representing all of China even though a lot of the seats were empty because the last time they had an election was in 1949 and the legislators were dropping one by one. There we learned an awful lot about Chinese culture, about the mainland as our teachers understood it. There hadn't been a lot of contact between the two up to that time so their understanding of it was a little bit outdated. They did have a lot of written material to teach from that had been sent in by our Embassy in Beijing. This material was written in the simplified characters and it used all of the communist formulations for political discussions. It was very interesting.

Q: Where you able to get a hold of mainland newspapers and things like that?

HUHTALA: Yes, we did, as we had them in Hong Kong when I got there. We read articles from Peoples Daily, both at FSI in Washington and in Taiwan. They were brought in to us by diplomatic pouch and they were carefully controlled. For example, we were warned not to leave them in our cars, visible through the windows, as that might get us in trouble.

Q: How did you come out of that course?

HUHTALA: I got a 3/3+ in Mandarin Chinese, and I also took a couple months of Cantonese because I was going to Hong Kong. This was an interesting experiment because Cantonese is about as different from Mandarin as French is from Spanish. They clearly have the same origin but they're different languages. So I did all right on the language study. We also had some interesting experiences traveling around the island.

Q: Who else was in the class with you?

HUHTALA: Joe Donovan was in my class. He is now our DCM in Tokyo. Keith Powell, a consular officer, and his wife Janet; plus a lot of people who were not from State and who are no longer around.

Q: You went to Hong Kong, how long were you in Hong Kong?

HUHTALA: Only two years, unfortunately.

Q: This is from when to when?

HUHTALA: From 1985 to 1987.

Q: What were you doing?

HUHTALA: I was in the political section, doing China mainland reporting. At that time we still had a very active China reporting unit in Hong Kong to supplement the work of the Embassy in Beijing and the Consulates in other parts of China.

Q: In many ways you could get around more?

HUHTALA: We had access to different contacts. There was a large refugee class because everybody in Hong Kong seemed to have fled the mainland at some point or other. They had a real refugee mentality too -- very insecure, very much trying to enrich themselves and make the most of the time they had. There were also political dissidents there. We met with professional China watchers, including some of the academics in the universities. There were members of the clergy who were in touch with the underground church in China. And there were China-inspired newspapers that got all of their direction from Beijing but published in Chinese for the Hong Kong population. There was often a lot of really interesting information leaked in those papers and in some of the political magazines that were being published in Hong Kong; things that one wouldn't dare publish in China but could in Hong Kong, with the full understanding that people in China would eventually get to see them.

Q: Who was the Consul General at that time?

HUHTALA: First it was Bert Levin and then it was Don Anderson.

Q: By that time we had full diplomatic relations.

HUHTALA: Oh we had had for a while, since the late 70s.

Q: Under Carter we opened up.

HUHTALA: In fact, when I went to Taiwan we did not have diplomatic relations there. We operated through the American Institute in Taiwan.

Q: Did you have much contact; was there much contact between Beijing and Hong Kong?

HUHTALA: Yes, there was. We visited back and forth. Sometimes we'd coordinate a reporting project. In the past there had been some tension between the two because Hong Kong was or was seen as a rival source of information for Beijing. The ambassador there rightly objected to that, I mean who wouldn't? By the time I got there it was a more collegial kind of relationship. We were coordinating and helping each other out. Particularly we were collaborating with the Consulate in Guangzhou because at that time the whole Pearl River delta was beginning to emerge as a powerhouse of its own. So there was a lot of really interesting economic reporting that we could do.

Q: Did you end up looking at any particular aspect of China?

HUHTALA: Yes, I was pretty much slated to look at social aspects, like religion and youth. It was a very sort of vague portfolio, I'm afraid. I did do some work on the leadership dynamics. In fact, I was very proud of the fact that I wrote a cable predicting that Li Peng, one of five or six vice premiers, would make it to the top. When I came back on consultations to Washington the folks in INR were quite intrigued, asking how did I know that, why did I say that? I kind of took them through my reasoning, which was based on some of the Chinese political journals that were circulating in Hong Kong (I think I was the only person in the Consulate who was reading them), and also my discussions with contacts. I was right, by the way; Li did become prime minister eventually. I got to travel around the mainland a lot, sometimes on my own, other times with people from the China posts. Once there was an interesting diplomatic tour arranged by the China news agency in Hong Kong which at that time was China's de-facto diplomatic representation there. They arranged an interesting 10-day tour of Fujian province for Hong Kong-based diplomats. That was really interesting.

Q: What were you seeing?

HUHTALA: Well we saw the things they wanted us to see, of course, like factories and tea plantations, but they didn't keep an iron hand on us. An awful lot of migrants to Southeast Asia and to the United States have come from Fujian, so the local culture there fascinated me.

Q: That's a major, a couple of villages practically, populated California.

HUHTALA: Oh yes. They had this special economic zone on the coast called Xiamen, right near a place that use to be called Amoy in the imperial era. From the coast there you can see the islands of Quemoy and Matsu that were an important political issue in the 1950's. So we saw this sparkling economic zone with all its new factories, and then we toured the beautiful old brick town behind it. In the middle of that town was an old former U.S. consulate. Before 1949 the U.S. must have had 15 consulates in China. I was told that the caretaker there had stayed on after '49 because the last consular officer told him, "Here's the keys, you watch this place." He did, he watched it for 30 years. After our diplomats returned to China in the 1970s we finally discovered him and gave him some back pay.

Q: Were you seeing, if you're looking at the social things, the division between, was it becoming apparent between sort of the back country and the coast?

HUHTALA: Yeah, this was starting to emerge. This was during the first decade of Deng Xiaoping's rule, when he was saying to get rich is glorious; it was okay again to make money. It was the beginning of the proto-capitalism we see in China today. On my trips to the interior, for instance, I saw an awful lot of collectives and farm areas banding together to make factories to produce orange soda or something like that and start getting cash for it. They proudly showed me the refrigerators in their homes that they were able to buy now, and the TV set in the village that everybody would watch. It was really the beginning of China's startling economic boom which we now have to deal with. Twenty years ago it started at that very local level.

Q: Were you looking at the old women in China? How was this going at that time?

HUHTALA: Well, you know officially women in China have always been equal. "Women hold up half the sky," said Mao. What I saw was that there were a lot more women doctors than in the West, and more women professionals, though they still had child care responsibilities just like they do everywhere else. In some ways their lot was significantly better than in the past, but a lot of this was rhetoric, not action.

Q: Were you seeing any results of the one child policy?

HUHTALA: Yes, we were beginning to see that, in the presence of a lot of little boys. We were worried at the time that the numbers were not looking so good for the little girls.

Q: They were still able at this point, were they using the ultra sound to determine if it was a boy or a girl or were they just getting rid of the girls?

HUHTALA: No, they were killing the girl babies. A lot of times that was what was happening. People were having clandestine babies. There was forced sterilization going on. At that time, I believe, they were a little bit more lenient on rural dwellers than they were on city folks. City folks were absolutely held to the One Child policy. In the countryside if your first child was a girl you could try for a boy. You could have one more but then that was it. Of course the tradition in China was to have as many kids as you could possibly squeeze out, so this was causing a lot of bitterness, a lot of unhappiness.

Q: I was talking to a friend of mine who served in China, he was saying China was producing any awful lot of spoiled kids. In a way I suppose they are well in their teens and twenties even early thirties now.

HUHTALA: Even then you saw a lot of chubby kids. They were being given as many sweets as they wanted. They were just totally spoiled. We visited kindergartens and they would be just gorgeously decked out; obviously very doted upon, these single kids.

Q: How were we feeling about China at this point? Was this a future giant and a menace or was this moving in the right direction?

HUHTALA: Remember this was before Tiananmen.

Q: Tiananmen was in '89.

HUHTALA: Yes, and this was a few years before that. This was when Hu Yaobang was in power. We were seeing a big upswing in student visa applications to the United States and we were taking them happily but we were also hoping that they were going to go back. We figured this would be a liberalizing influence on China. We thought that the trend towards capitalism was a good thing and something to be encouraged. Our companies were beginning to invest, though still not too many. I remember General Motors was in Shanghai. A few far-sighted companies were looking long term and seeing great opportunities. It was made very clear, you had to be an “old friend” – a company had to be established as a friend of China to get anywhere. One can’t come in today and expect to have a big concession tomorrow; maybe 10 years from now if you’ve been a good corporate citizen then you’ll get that chance. The smart companies were investing for the long term.

There was a phenomenon that we noted in Hong Kong and we called it the cadre kids; a lot of the twenty-something children of the leadership, like children of Politburo members or military leaders were emerging with special privileges and lots of money to invest. The parents were called cadres, so we called these young entrepreneurs cadre kids. This was a generation removed from the old communist leadership, many of whom were on the Long March still and were supposedly ideological purists. Their kids, on the other hand, were heavily into business. They had huge company’s flashy cars and all the accouterments, and were involved in a lot of corruption as well. This phenomenon, we thought, I believe accurately, was presaging a significant change in direction for the whole country.

Q: Corruption is endemic there.

HUHTALA: Especially a country like China that had endured so many tragedies, like the Great Leap Forward which just impoverished the whole country, leading to terrible famine in the late ‘50s. Then of course the Cultural Revolution of the 1960s, which was an absolute disaster. All that was in living memory. I remember once I was riding on an overnight train in the middle of China, from Jiangsu to Guangzhou, or something like that. I struck up a conversation with a woman conductor who was really surprised that I could speak Chinese. (She gestured to everybody around and said, “Look at that, she talks.” I felt like I was a talking dog or something.) But we did speak for awhile. I was in my 30s then and I thought she was probably in her 50s, from the look of her face, all the lines and everything. She was telling me about the Cultural Revolution and what had happened to her. Then I found out that her age: she was 38. It was just so sad, the things those people had to endure. So naturally when economic prosperity begins to occur in the '80s they went for it with gusto. It's understandable that there would be huge imbalances, that there would be corruption, that there would be people streaming in from the countryside, and indeed all of this has been the story for the last 20 years.

Q: Were we seeing a change in people who were coming out of China and Hong Kong at this point, were there fewer economic refugees, were they political refugees?

HUHTALA: There was still a fair amount of repression. We still had political refugees coming out. And there were very tight controls on migration. Hong Kong had very tight controls, and wouldn't let mainlanders just come in at will. What was more interesting to me, I think, was what was going on with the people who were in China. Especially Guangzhou (Canton), it's so close, just 50 miles or so from Hong Kong and they're the same people ethnically, all speaking Cantonese. Throughout that region there was a real stirring, a real dynamism and a real interest in making money. There was the new town of Shenzhen, which was built right on the border of the New Territories of Hong Kong and set up as a special economic zone. I visited it in 1985. It was just a skeleton then, just a few buildings going up. Now it's a major metropolis and they're minting money -- big hotels, big businesses.

Q: One of your portfolios was religion. What was happening religion wise in China?

HUHTALA: I was interested in both Protestant Christians and Catholics.

Q: How about, what's this other so called cult or something?

HUHTALA: Falun Gong. That did not exist yet. This was before Falun Gong arose and came to be viewed as such a threat by Beijing. Just parenthetically, I've seen this in other parts of the world too. If you try and have a society based on a total absence of religion it doesn't work. People need something. People will make it up if you don't give them something. You have to have something to organize your life around, at least most people do. In Hong Kong, we were very interested in the Catholic Church and the Protestants inside China. There was an official Catholic Church and an official Protestant Church run by the state. In the case of the Catholic Church it was divorced from Rome. They were not in communion with Rome; they weren't taking any advice on appointing bishops or anything else. But there was also a thriving culture of underground churches meeting in people's homes and trying to carry on their true religion as they saw it. There were some very senior priests and bishops who had been in prison for 20, 30 years. I was very interested in that and did some work through the church in Hong Kong. I got to talk to some of the people there and got in communication with Bishop Aloysius Jin of Shanghai who had just been released from prison after 25 years of hard labor on condition that he would not speak out against the Chinese authorities. Like several of them, he would eventually speak out and then get put back in prison, let out again and all of that. A very brave man, and a very holy man, probably.

Q: Is there anything else we should probably talk about your Hong Kong experience?

HUHTALA: You know I came away from that with a very strong conviction that China is going to be the big story for the next 50 years. At that time Deng Xiaoping was promising to quadruple the economy by the year 2000. In fact he did it by 1992. He just set off this chain of events that is just increasing geometrically. I still think what has been happening in China is the story of our lifetime, fascinating and very, very important. It is having profound effects on all the rest of Asia, which I dealt with in my last couple of years in the Service, and towards the United States as well. Even then there was a tendency in the United States to view China as an emerging opponent. That worried me then and it worries me even now.

G. EUGENE MARTIN
Deputy Director for Political Affairs, China
Washington, DC (1985-1987)

A Specialist in Chinese Affairs and a speaker of Chinese, Mr. Martin spent the major part of his career dealing with matters relating to China, both in Washington and abroad. His overseas assignments included Hong Kong, Taipei, Huangzhou (formerly Canton), Beijing, Manila and Rangoon. His Washington assignments also concerned China and the Far East. Mr. Martin was born in Indiana of Missionary parents and was raised in the US. and India. He is a graduate of Kalamazoo College and Syracuse University.

Q: What were the political issues?

MARTIN: The issues have changed considerably in recent years, but some remain the same – Taiwan, human rights. Trade was less of an issue than it is now, because we didn't have as much trade. We obviously had the annual MFN discussion and debate in Congress, but even at that early stage it pretty much went well. It was before Tiananmen, so the yearly determination and Congressional response under the Jackson-Vanik bill was not nearly as contentious. MFN went through quickly. The major difference, I think, was that at that point, the U.S. had a security relationship with China in a sense. Since the cold war was still "on," we were still playing China off against the Soviet Union. We actually had military-military relations. We had agreed to sell avionics components for the F-5 fighter that was very much in the works. So there were a number of politico-military relationships to manage.

Q: What sort of information were you getting from CIA, military, and from our own embassy and all about what's going on in China?

MARTIN: China is always opaque. It's difficult to get information about China. At that point, it was beginning to change. Hong Kong traditionally was the window on China, and it was easier to get more information on China in Hong Kong than one ever could in the mainland because people would come out of China and feel more comfortable meeting with foreigners. Even Party cadre, government officials would come out to Hong Kong occasionally, and if you could meet with them, they would tell you more than they would tell you back home. But by the mid-1980s things were beginning to open up in China. The good relations with the U.S., I think, helped people feel more confident about talking to us to explain the situation after the change, explain decision making, explain factions within the government, to give us a little bit more of an insight on how decisions are reached, what different interest groups were pushing. A lot of it was economics because the reforms were focused on agricultural and industrial reform. The military was still the fourth modernization. They were the ones at the bottom of the heap, and so the military was not getting a lot of attention or resources from the government. And the Taiwan issue was not a very live one. It was there, there was no question about it, but it was not in the forefront.

There was a general feeling that things were getting better in China, that they were making slow progress to a more open society. There was more of a dialogue with the foreign ministry and diplomats abroad in terms of things that we were doing. The relations with the Chinese embassy here were good. The desk had close relations with them, and we dealt with them on an amicable way. So in a sense, there was a sense that things were improving, things were getting better, and so forth.

Q: How did you find the Chinese embassy dealing, say, with the Washington political system? In many ways the State Department's not the real player; it's more Congress and the media.

MARTIN: Oh, it's disastrous. It's always been disastrous. Their idea of congressional relations is to go up and hammer on the table and say, "You can't do that because it would hurt the feelings of the Chinese people." The usual answer, in substance if not words, was, "Yea? Get out of my house!" I also think they did not fully understand how the system works. They thought the State Department and President determined U.S. policy and could bring Congress into line. So Congressional resolutions were seen as evidence the U.S. government (i.e., the executive branch) was not being honest with them and really wanted to double deal, especially on Taiwan. But they've improved recently. They are certainly more active, and more knowledgeable, but I still think that they have difficulty understanding the USG is not a monolithic system. That is what they are used to at home as the National People's Congress (NPC) is still essentially a rubber stamp for what the Party and government want. But even their system is changing and the NPC is somewhat more autonomous of the Party and government than before.

Q: How did the Chinese embassy compare with the Taiwanese ability to operate in Washington?

MARTIN: They're masters! The Israelis and the Taiwanese are probably the unsurpassed masters at this. The mainland Chinese have never been able to match Taiwan's representatives. So I think they had a problem. But again, the public attitude on China in those days was still positive, the good feelings from normalization of relations and the growing trade, business dealings and academic exchanges affected policy. So the embassy was able to have a pretty good PR program.

Q: Were you seeing the massive influx of Chinese students, coming to the United States at graduate level and many of them returning, as making a change? Was this positive? How were we viewing this?

MARTIN: Oh, it was, very much so. Starting about 1981 – 82, they began to send a lot of scholars, government students, government sponsored students to the U.S. for graduate work. By '85 – 86, they were beginning to allow more and more students come privately, at their own expense, not sponsored by the state. When the state sponsored students here, it had a pretty good tight lease on them, and most of them returned. Not all did, but most went back, because of family, the bond they had put down as a surety, their old job waiting for them, etc. Subsequently, many found their return to their old jobs didn't work out, because once they'd been overseas, many were unwilling or unable to fit back into the old bureaucracy. Once you've been to Boston or San Francisco and studied at the best universities in the world, how do you go home again?

There were many frustrations for these scholars who went back to China, back into their old state sector jobs. They returned with new ideas, which were not welcomed by the people who didn't go to overseas; they came back with expectations and an awareness of how you can do things in the States; and even in those days, had learned to use computers, and many Chinese offices had little electricity, much less computers! And so there was a great deal of dissatisfaction among returned students but generally, the idea of people coming and studying in the States and then going back was a very positive one.

Q: Did you run across any of these? Early on there were always people who sought asylum - I always think of the tennis star. I would think this would have been a burr under your saddle all the time.

MARTIN: Oh, we had these hiccups. Hu Na, the tennis star who defected on the West Coast, caused heartburn. But these things were just bumps in the road and generally didn't last long. I think the Chinese realized the risk they were taking sending people out of China but decided the payoff was worth it.

Q: Was there concern about the Mainland Chinese, their operatives, intelligence operatives working in the United States?

MARTIN: The one that really got everybody's attention was Larry Wu-tai Chin, a FBIS and CIA translator for many years, who turned out to be a long-term mole. He was arrested but hung himself in jail before trial. That obviously caused a big stir so everybody was immediately looking around for other spies. I remember having met with Larry when he came to the desk. I talked to him a number of times. He was very effective. The Chin case put everybody's teeth on edge. We spent a great deal of time with the FBI counterintelligence office, talking with them, dealing with them, looking at various Chinese that had come on trips, come on delegations, and so forth. Yes, so there was obviously considerable attention to intelligence issues

Q: What about Taiwan? In your work, what was happening in Taiwan?

MARTIN: Taiwan, again, was continuing to loosen up, continuing to democratize its system. Chiang Ching-kuo died about that time and a new generation of leadership moved in. My office was situated in a short hall between the China desk suite of offices and the Taiwan coordination office, part of the bureau's regional affairs office. As these two offices were side by side and my office was in between, I considered myself as being in the Taiwan Strait, the guard between the two sides. We had a lot to do with the Taiwan coordinating staff, making sure that we coordinated with them and with AIT's Washington office across the river in Arlington.

Q: Was there concern about the growing democratization of Taiwan? As long as you have a nice solid authoritarian regime on Taiwan, it's fairly easy to dismiss them and to say, "Well, you know, we got one here and one there, and now one's bigger than the other, so we'll pick the bigger one as our thing." But when you have one who's all a sudden becoming more like us, it's hard.

MARTIN: That was a dilemma! It's become more of a dilemma. In those days, it was still at the early stages, so there wasn't quite as much democracy to brag about. But the trend was evident. There was, I think, a lot of discomfort in the mainland about this because they saw this change, but still, the KMT was in power. The KMT had been in power since Chang Kai-shek came to power in the late '20s. So there wasn't a lot of change, but there was a liberalization, a general relaxation of the political system in Taiwan. We saw this as a potential problem for the future, but it was not an issue at that point.

Q: Yes. Were you feeling pressure from... say Texas and all to sell more planes? I mean congressional pressure on, you know, arm sales, particularly to Taiwan, but also to Mainland China now?

MARTIN: Well, the Mainland China sale was basically the avionic upgrade of the F-5, which never really got very far, but it did go through. We dealt with the Rolls Royce Spey Engine, which the British were selling. We had lots of discussions about how it would be used, whether or not it could be reverse engineered and then they could start manufacturing it themselves, and what it would do for the fighters that they were going to put it in. The Chinese had a lot of problems with that. That engine had a lot of potential, but the problems were even greater because the engine was of a configuration that they would have to basically modify the entire fuselage to be able to fit the engine into it. Basically, they would have had to rebuild the plane! So, even though on the outside there were occasionally potshots by the Washington Times and conservatives who were worried about this sort of thing, in reality, the more you got into it, the more problems they had. Frankly, looking at the Chinese arms industry, defense industry, in terms of their technology, their machine tools, their metallurgy, and so forth, they were no where near a level that could have manufactured that engine. They've improved a lot since those days, but this was early on. You must remember, this was only a decade after the end of the Cultural Revolution. They had to rebuild their manufacturing base in those ten years. In the last ten, fifteen years, they have certainly progressed much faster.

I think the issue with Taiwan really was an issue on arms sales. It always was an issue even after the '82 Communiqué. The bucket, which we said was not going to expand, didn't expand, but it was very elastic. The bucket tended to grow, even though it may not have expanded. The main issue at the time was the agreement to let Taiwan build an IDF (Indigenous Defense Fighter), which, some people, said was essentially an F-16. General Dynamics gave Taiwan considerable assistance with plans, designs, and so forth, but we insisted the IDF was Taiwan's own fighter. Again, you play the show game.

WINSTON LORD

Ambassador
China (1985-1989)

Ambassador Lord was born and raised in New York City and earned degrees at Yale University and the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy. He entered the Foreign Service in 1961. After serving in Washington and Geneva, Mr. Lord was assigned to the Department of Defense before joining the National Security Council, where he was involved in China and Indonesia matters. He subsequently served on State's Policy Planning Staff. In 1985 Mr. Lord was named US Ambassador to China, where he served until 1989. From 1993 to 1997 the Ambassador held the position of Assistant Secretary of State dealing with Far Eastern Affairs. Ambassador Lord was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kenned in 1998.

Q: We are still carrying on the China theme and we're going back a little bit. This session will be devoted to your time as Ambassador to China. You were Ambassador to China from when to when?

LORD: From November, 1985, to April, 1989. That April is an important date. Bette and I were very fortunate to be in China during the most positive period in Sino-U.S. relations since 1949.

Q: That's right. We touched on it before, but let's go back again. Where were you when this job came out?

LORD: I can give you a little background; I've taken some notes. First let me just let me give you a brief paragraph on an amusing incident that took place back in June, 1972. We can insert that in the proper place if that is all right. It's amusing, but it depressed me at the time. I'll double check the date; I think it was June, 1972. The Kissinger trip to China was as National Security Advisor. At the welcoming tea at the guest house, Zhou En-lai was sitting with Kissinger, and Kissinger in the course of their small talk, mentioned that I was a very good ping pong player. I was aghast to have him say this because actually while I was fairly decent, to say that you are a good ping pong player in China is a bit like saying you are a good chess player in Russia. This came back to haunt me.

A few days later at the end of our visit, we were visiting a sports complex outside of Beijing, and we saw volleyball players, and we saw swimmers, and we saw gymnasts. I thought we were about to leave, and the escort said no we have one more stop. We went into a gymnasium packed with a couple of thousand Chinese students, and they brought out a ping pong table and announced to the crowd that Winston Lord, expert ping pong player, accompanied by Dick Solomon who was with me on that trip, would now play ping pong with Chang Tse Tung, who was three times champion of the world, not just China but of the world, plus the current Chinese champion. In any event we got out there and even though it was friendship first and competition second, I wanted to show I was a decent player. I was absolutely horrible, a combination of nerves plus big light balls that we are not used to and funny racquets. I just absolutely disgraced myself and was very depressed by this whole affair. When I got home from the trip, my wife couldn't understand why I was so downcast because things had gone well substantively and it was because of this event.

Q: Just out of curiosity, do the Chinese use a different type ball?

LORD: Apparently they do. I'd always played with American balls, maybe this was international standards. The ball kept sailing off my racquet because it was so light. It also turns out that the player, the three time world champion, was a lover of Madame Mao as I found out later.

I left the State Department in 1977 when President Carter came in, to take a break, to recharge my batteries. After eight months in the Colorado mountains, I went to New York to become president of the Council on Foreign Relations in September 1977. Since we were on China, I will just say how I kept up with China during those intervening years until I was appointed. I generally kept reading about China because of my interest and my background. I kept up my contacts with the Chinese in Washington and New York. When the Carter administration first came in I worked closely with Mike Oksenberg who was the China expert for Zbig Brzezinski (National Security Advisor) going over our China policy and the various records and transcripts. Throughout this period, I kept in touch with him and Dick Holbrooke at State and others involved with China policy.

In 1979 I took a trip to China with Kissinger; in addition to Beijing where we had talks with Deng Xiaoping and others, we went to Xian and Xinjiang in the northwest. This is in a period where Deng had just made his final comeback and was beginning to launch his final reforms. A lot of our talks centered on his plans for China's economy, as well as Soviet relations and the usual international topics.

In 1983 I went back on my own and got a warm reception from various Chinese officials, and by then Deng's reforms and opening were beginning to pick up steam. There was one other contact during this period, to go back to early 1979 when Deng Xiaoping visited the United States just after the announcement of the normalization of relations on December 15; the normalization itself took place on January 1. This, of course, was just before China invaded Vietnam. I participated in a very small breakfast with Kissinger, just the two of us plus Deng and probably the Chinese Liaison Chief. I don't recall. We could see then that Deng Xiaoping was growing in self confidence which we also saw in our later trip that year back to China. I also testified early that year on normalization, supporting what the Carter Administration had done.

Q: This is 1979.

LORD: 1979. Why I favored moving ahead and thought that we could still maintain security and friendship ties with Taiwan at the same time. In 1982 I testified backing the Reagan administration on the third communiqué that was negotiated with respect to arms sales to Taiwan. Here I made the basic point that although it was difficult because it envisaged a lowering over time of our arms sales to Taiwan, I felt this was sufficiently linked to a peaceful resolution of the crisis, that it would provide for Taiwan's security, and the Chinese made a very forthcoming statement in the Communiqué that their fundamental policy was to seek a peaceful resolution. We couldn't actually get them to renounce force, but we felt that was a strong enough indication along with our commitment and arms sales in the same communiqué to give us sufficient linkage and therefore we could always provide for Taiwan's defense as long as they had a security problem. We would only reduce arms sales as the situation got more peaceful.

Now with respect to how I got the nomination in 1985, I think this was based on first a general reputation on foreign affairs and of course, what I did on China with Kissinger and Nixon and Ford. With respect to the Reagan administration, I think we first met the Reagans in the fall of 1981 when Bette and I went to a small White House dinner in honor of Isaac Stern, and his new movie called Mao to Mozart. I had known George Shultz, the Secretary of State from the Council on Foreign Relations where he was one of my directors. He asked me to lead a Saturday all day seminar in January of 1983, fairly soon after he became Secretary of State, on China with a lot of government officials there and outside experts including Kissinger and others. That went well and increased Shultz's confidence in me. I also knew Bud McFarland, the National Security Advisor, from the Kissinger-Nixon-Ford days at the NSC. We were also invited to the White House in January, 1984 for a dinner for the visiting Prime Minister Zhao Ziyang. My wife, Bette, sat at the head table with the Prime Minister.

Then Reagan, just before his trip to China in the spring of 1984 had a small lunch of five outside advisors which included Scowcroft, Scalapino, Solomon, and Bette, my wife, and myself. The five of us with the President and Mrs. Reagan, and several cabinet level officials. This, I think, went very well again with the President. Mrs. Reagan loved my wife's book Spring Moon, and we are told that in August, 1984, Mrs. Reagan in a conversation with her husband, actually made the suggestion that he appoint me as Ambassador and get two for the price of one in effect. Not only would I be going to China but my wife, Bette, with her unique background would be going along as well.

So, in the fall of 1984, I believe it was October, McFarland was at a Council on Foreign Relations dinner in New York. He sat next to me; I was President then. He mentioned that the Administration wanted me to serve. Would I be interested? Both he and subsequently someone from State suggested Ambassador to China. Almost inexplicably and in retrospect somewhat foolishly, I said no I'd rather serve in Washington for a variety of reasons. My father was quite sick. I wanted to be near my son who was in his final year of high school and other personal reasons. But the more I thought about it and talked about it with Bette, we decided this was not as exciting as being Ambassador to China. By then Shultz had already tried to get me an Undersecretary job at State but was running into some delays at the White House. Anyway, I went back and said no, the other option the ambassadorship, in fact, was our preferred one.

Q: Excuse me. During the time you were in the Council of Foreign Relations and dealing with these China. What sort of impressions were you getting, first of the late Carter period of the people you were talking to, because you know, there is this back and forth conversation? Then with the Reaganites about China. Was it a realistic one?

LORD:: Basically, I kept in close touch with the Carter Administration. I met with Brzezinski, the National Security Advisor, a couple of times privately, including just before he went to China in the summer of 1978 on one of his trips which turned out to be very important. I felt they got off to a fairly rocky start as I recall. They seemed to be emphasizing the Soviet Union, which I have no problem with, but not moving on China. My impression was there was some tension between Vance who was more interested in emphasizing Russia and Brzezinski who was more interested in pursuing China. So, early on they were having some difficulties, but by 1978 they moved toward normalization. Vance's initial trip went badly, and meanwhile they were moving ahead with the Russians, so the first year or so of the Carter Administration, things were not going very well. I kept in touch with both State and the White House after the Brzezinski trip, but, by the end of '78 they moved to normalization; they announced it in mid-December while Congress was out of session, during the holiday season, knowing it would be controversial. They announced that normalization would actually take place on January 1. I felt that the normalization agreement was about the best they could do vis a vis Taiwan, given the realities, and I along with Kissinger and people who worked on this issue supported it, plus the Taiwan Relations Act was passed which strengthened the Taiwan side of the equation. I supported that as well and I actually testified on it.

Then the China connection was pretty well maintained until Reagan came in, and there was a great deal of apprehension by the Chinese and others about what would happen to our China policy as President Reagan took office. He had after all been very pro-Taiwan and very tough on the Chinese political system. It generally looked like he might change the bipartisan policies that had been pursued. I remember distinctly on various occasions with the Chinese in New York and Washington, reassuring them saying that any President when he gets into the oval office tends to have a different view of geo-politics. I thought this President would be no exception; he would see the geo-political and other benefits of moving ahead with China, but he wouldn't sell out his friends in Taiwan and he would be respected for that as a reliable ally. I thought he would essentially pursue the policy of his predecessors, particularly because among other reasons, he had chosen Al Haig as Secretary of State who had been heavily involved in the China opening and was very pro engagement with China. Haig would be working on him as well as other advisors. So I told the Chinese to hold their fire, with respect to Reagan, and give him some time to be worked on by his associates and to gain a greater perception and appreciation from the oval office. I recall that Bush went there - I guess it was between the election and the inauguration in the fall - and he had a fairly tough trip over the Taiwan issue.

Q: [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]. Because Reagan said some things during the campaign while Bush was in Beijing that the Chinese didn't like.

LORD: During the campaign he was there?

Q: [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]. Yes, during the campaign.

LORD: Okay. There were some rocky things at the beginning of the Reagan Administration. The tension persisted as the Chinese ratcheted up the pressure over the Taiwanese arms sales to the point where the Administration made the choice, and Al Haig was very influential in this, to do a third communiqué, the first having been the Shanghai communiqué during Nixon's trip in '72, the second one on normalization in '79. This was a very difficult negotiation. Leonard Woodcock was at the other end doing good work, and one of the people helping him became my deputy in China, Peter Tomsen. They were working hard on it back at home in the White House and the State Department. For reasons I have already mentioned I believe the 1982 communiqué was justifiable because of the implicit linkage to a peaceful resolution, and this eased the tension between Beijing and Washington.

Q: By the way, I just want to insert that this is not only Stuart Kennedy here but also Nancy Bernkopf Tucker who is the other interrogator.

Q: [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]. In response to the answer you just gave to Stu's question, one of the things that you mentioned was the normalization agreement that established relations and you basically supported that. You thought it was the best they could have gotten. I think that's probably true, but it was less than the Nixon people thought they could get. Nixon and Kissinger had anticipated for at least a long time that they could maintain some sort of official relationship, a liaison office or something like that with Taipei. The historians at least have looked at what the Carter administration did and said he took less. Do you think that is a fair judgment? Was the Nixon period estimate wrong?

LORD: I'm not so sure it was the estimate. I would like to go back and talk to Henry and others on that. Clearly we would have preferred, I'm sure the Carter administration would have preferred, a somewhat more elevated tie remaining with Taiwan. I don't think we were under any illusions that we could have maintained an embassy certainly, and whether we thought we could get a liaison office, we hadn't reached that level of concreteness during the Ford Administration. As I said in an earlier transcript, President Ford, because of his domestic travails and worrying about Reagan and renomination and the Chinese, because of the Chinese domestic scene, the ascendancy of the Gang of Four, struggling with Deng Xiao Ping, and then the succumbing of Mao and Zhou, didn't move on Taiwan during the last year of his administration. So, we never got to that point although we played with formulas.

I don't recall now that we felt even privately that Carter had settled for too little. We certainly publicly supported the deal, meaning Nixon, Kissinger, and others. I don't recall that being a collective wisdom that we should have driven a harder bargain. It is not my recollection. Even if I thought that, I might have been bipartisan at the time, but that isn't my recollection of my own view either. The fact that they were going to continue arms sales I felt was an important and significant achievement, arms sales to Taiwan as well as the unofficial ties to Taiwan. I also felt that it was not realistic to maintain a treaty alliance or an embassy, so it seemed to me that it was in the ballpark. Maybe I thought at the time we could have gotten a little bit better here and there, but I, in good conscience, supported the basic deal that was struck. I also was pleased at what the Congress did to strengthen our commitments to Taiwan in the wake of normalization.

Q: I was just wondering, during this period, did the Taiwan government, its representatives in the United States carry much weight. I mean I assume they were trying to disturb this whole situation with normalization.

LORD: Because I was in New York, not in the government, I do not recall having too many contacts with Taiwan during this period although I was always friendly to Taiwan, so I'm not a good judge of that. Obviously, there was some criticism in Congress and elsewhere. This was shown by the passage of the Taiwan Relations Act, and there was some criticism that the Administration announced this during the holiday season while Congress was out of town. It was actually quite wise. It is better to do it during that quiet period despite the flak you take for the timing. In practice it worked out better that way. But, my recollection is there was general support, and that the reaction although quite tough in some quarters was manageable, and that was eased by the Taiwan Relations Act.

Q: I'm ready to go back now.

LORD: Okay. I'll try not to go into too much detail about my nomination. It's pretty bloody. I knew from about February-March, 1985, I don't know exactly when, that they were working on the nomination, so I began to work on the various papers that you had to fill out. It didn't leak for awhile until I finally got a call on March 30 from Rollie Evans, the journalist who had picked up rumors. After that it began to leak. This is while my nomination was still being formalized. You know how these things get out in the papers before they are actually formal, so I had to be careful in my public comments. I told the Council on Foreign Relations and the Chairman, David Rockefeller, that I would leave on June 30. I thought I would be nominated and through the Senate during the course of the summer.

It was one of the happiest times of my life because I thought this was a perfect fit, not only for me and my background, but for Bette and her background. There were many overtones including the fact that our wedding reception was at Twin Oaks, the Chinese Nationalist Embassy, that I had first gone into China in '71 with Kissinger, and all that had happened since that we talked about. I had some concern about leaving my ill father, but you don't get into personal stuff in an interview like this. And I was very sorry that my mother, who had passed away in July 1978, never knew that I became Ambassador to China.

In any event, on July 12, I was told that I would be getting a call from the President officially asking me to serve, but right then he had this operation for a cancerous polyp which delayed things. Finally instead of getting a call, I got a very nice letter which was really personalized. It had shaky handwriting with references to Bette and a word from Nancy. It was clear that it wasn't just a pro forma letter. I spent this time, of course, getting briefings in Washington, getting in touch with academics and business and human rights groups, reading as much as I could whether it was long books or memos, etc., touching base with various constituencies. Li Xiannian, the President of China came during this period, but I still wasn't official yet, so I couldn't sit in on any of the meetings, but I got to the social occasions and Bette sat next to him at lunch that Shultz gave and sat next to President Reagan at the White House along with Liz Taylor and some others for this dinner. I had my hearing on July 30 introduced by my New York Senator. Moynihan, was voted out by the Foreign Relations Committee 16 to 1, but the day before that Helms had sent a message to Lugar saying he couldn't show up for the hearing and he wanted it delayed. What was the rush about such a controversial appointment?

Q: This is Jesse Helms, the conservative Senator of North Carolina.

LORD: Correct. Meanwhile the Chinese had given very fast agrément. Within 48 hours. After three months of my working on paperwork and security and everything else, it came through right about the time of President Li's visit. The reason for Helms' opposition ostensibly turned out to be on the abortion population issue, but he had other reasons not to welcome my appointment. First I was a moderate or liberal Republican which I guess is an oxymoron, but he was suspicious of the Rockefeller New York wing. I had been Henry Kissinger's closest associate, and he at that point (they have gotten friendlier since) thought Kissinger had sold out to the Soviet Union and China and was generally leftist which is quite ironic if you know Henry Kissinger. So, being close to Kissinger was a strike against me. I was a member of the Trilateral Commission which was one of his bête noires. I was President of the Council on Foreign Relations. He and his staff discovered all that. I had written an article in Newsweek a couple years before that argue for a centrist foreign policy, avoiding extremes. I had one sentence in there that I thought was pretty clever. I was taking a crack at McGovern on one side and Jesse Helms on the other. I said, "We should neither McGovern our foreign policy nor have Jesse at the helm." I told myself if I should run into this with Senator Helms at the hearings I would say I'm talking about Jesse Jackson, not you.

In any event there were a lot of reasons why he obviously wouldn't like me plus my whole involvement in the China opening; he didn't like the China opening and so on. I and the Administration were focusing on the need to get this nomination, now being delayed by Helms having been voted on by the committee, through by September so I could be in place for an October visit by Vice President Bush to China which would be a wonderful way for me to begin my tour. It was important to the Vice President as well.

Without going into excruciating details, the next few months while getting ready for my posting, I just pulled out all the stops to try to get the nomination through, to get around Helms, to get through this situation. There are a lot of details I won't go into. I have to say in all candor the Congressional Relations Office of the State Department was totally incompetent. They were somewhat shy about taking on Helms; they were browbeaten. Not only did they not push it very much, they didn't even keep me informed. I had to keep asking where we stood before they would let me know. I got really annoyed at the White House and the Congressional Relations Office. The White House weighed in as we went on and without going in to it blow by blow, at one point the President called Helms in the middle of the Achille Lauro crisis, he called Helms from Air Force One. Another time he wrote him a letter.

I kept telling the Administration as much as I wanted my nomination completed in time for the Vice President, I didn't want them to sell out substance. After all I had overwhelming support in the Committee and in the Senate and I was well qualified and a conservative American president, Reagan, appointed me which ought to reassure Helms. It was not correct on principle to bend on population policy or any other substantive issue just to get my nomination through. As anxious as I was to get this going, I didn't want it to be at the expense of Administration policy. There finally was a letter from the head of AID, Peter McPherson to Helms in the Senate, wishy-washy in language that we would bend our policy somewhat even a little beyond what I would have liked.

Anyway, we finally got it through, but only after Bush had gone to China and come back. I was very upset about that. Then when I saw I was going to miss that in any event, I sort of backed off and just let nature take its course. I was sufficiently exercised to get this through, I thought for the national interest, also my personal interest in getting there on time for Bush, and just generally that I pushed this very hard, even to the point where I thought some of my colleagues in the State Department thought I was overdoing it. So, I sort of laid back. By now the media had paid a lot of attention to this, and there were editorials across the country including lead editorials in the New York Times and the Washington Post and many other areas calling me a hostage and putting pressure on Helms.

There was one particularly painful incident where there was a last gasp try to get me through and out there in time for Bush, and I even made a reservation for a swearing in ceremony for October 8, 1985. My father was very sick in Florida, but he made a major effort to come up for it. We had people invited, thinking the Senate just might do it in time. It didn't work out, and so my father missed my swearing in. He had to go back to Florida. It was another further delay for another month, by which time he couldn't travel. Finally as a result of the media pressure and the McPherson letter generally and as I say the President calling Helms and these other efforts, they finally voted on the evening of November 5. I was voted through 87-7. Helms took a crack at me for having orchestrated a media campaign against him. It wasn't true actually, but I didn't mind the compliment. I remember going down to Florida before we went to China, a few days later and I saw my father and played him a tape of the swearing in ceremony. I had a wonderful swearing in ceremony. Shultz swore me in personally, and there was a tremendous turnout. I made some carefully thought out remarks about U.S.-China relations and other personal dimensions.

Q: Did you have the feeling at the time that these were deep felt feelings of Senator Helms or was this sort of political ego.

LORD: At the time I thought, although I know he felt sincerely about the abortion issue, that if there wasn't the abortion issue, he would have found something else in order to delay me personally because of my background. Put together the Kissinger connection, the Trilateral Commission, the Council on Foreign Relations. You could even throw in Skull and Bones at Yale; he probably wouldn't like that if he knew about it. The whole China involvement, being a liberal Republican, I was anathema to him. He was always courteous as he always is, and he was very courtly toward my wife and very polite toward me, but both he and his staff assistant, a guy named Triplett, who has been around for many years, stonewalled me. In pulling out the stops, I talked to Triplett as well. He kept portraying himself as someone who was trying to help me. He was a new staffer then. In retrospect he was also delaying, so I felt it was personal. But, also it coincided with Helms' tactical approach, which he used on many nominations, of trying to extract substantive concessions on policy in exchange for letting names go forward, which is, I think a terrible distortion of the process. We are living with that even as we speak today. It is a terrible morale blow and a national interest blow to hold up important nominations in this hostage way. So I'm convinced if it wasn't the population issue, he would have held me up on some other reason.

XVIII. AMBASSADOR TO CHINA - VARIOUS ISSUES (1985-1989)

Q: Okay. We might as well just keep going. Then you were able to take off.

LORD: Yes. Now let me make some general points about the years in China, and then there are a few areas where I can get a bit more chronological. I do not have the notes to say this happened this month or that month.

Q: One thing too while we are talking about that. Did you carry in your mental attaché case any things, you had been dealing with China a lot, that you really, did you have your own agenda?

LORD: That is exactly right. I thought I would give you some of my general goals and things in general, and then we can go back into some specifics. I don't have the kind of memory to go into great detail.

A couple of comments about the period I served in China, from November, 1985, to April, 1989. My timing really was quite fortunate. I got there when things were really starting to move forward again. There was some tension in the early Reagan years as I mentioned earlier, particularly over the Taiwan arms sales question. The 1982 communiqué broke that logjam, and therefore China and the United States were beginning to have a more positive relationship. Obviously it wasn't easy, but it was beginning to move forward again after having been tense early in the administration.

Q: Who was the Ambassador?

LORD: Arthur Hummel. I left, we'll look at this later, but I left just before Tiananmen Square erupted. In fact I left just after the first week of the Tiananmen Square demonstrations. Hu Yaobang had died on April 15. His funeral was April 22, and his funeral was the occasion for the first major outpouring of Chinese citizens, roughly 100,000 that day, and of course, our relations took a tailspin after the events of that spring.

So, I was in a period which was probably the most positive period in U.S.-Chinese relations since the opening. Obviously I thought I did a decent job, but I mean it also was very fortunate timing, because if relations go well it is not really thanks to the Ambassador. It is thanks to the overall climate and the leaders in the capitals. I was there during a period where it really did move forward. We had some real tensions as I'll get into, but not the incredible crises, and the general movement was onward and upward. There was a tremendous increase in exchanges and high level visits in both directions and agreements in trade and other areas, and therefore, I felt very fortunate in that sense.

I do want to mention without being overly awkward or self serving the role my wife played there, her background and knowing the language, being Chinese of course, and knowing the culture. Bette was a tremendous advisor to me informally on how to deal with the Chinese culturally, psychologically and even how to interpret their positions that I would talk to her about. She had an instinct no barbarian could have. She had a tremendous circle of contacts for both me and the Embassy as well as herself. There was a whole area of Chinese society that would not have been possible to reach in such width and depth without her, her language and the fact that she was a well-known authoress - academic circles, cultural circles, intellectual circles, artistic circles which I would have in any event tried to cultivate. We had tremendous entree thanks to her, and she was a tremendous hostess both in terms of briefing visitors on Chinese culture and history and on contacts but also in terms of entertainment. She always tried to make our evenings different and interesting and fun, whether it was foreign visitors, American visitors, diplomats or Chinese themselves. We either had an interesting evening and or an entertaining evening. We never just had the typical evening. We either had roundtable discussions of substance, or we'd have Chinese opera singers or Chinese plays in our garden or musicians or other entertaining, both to show off culture, but also to make an interesting evening. This extended to very imaginative July Fourth parties, the anniversary of the Shanghai Communiqué, the anniversary of normalization. Also Bette worked with Charlton Heston to put on a Chinese production of the Caine Mutiny which was an extraordinary success.

Bette would go with me and travel around the country and make a tremendous impact. She was extremely well-known and popular in China. Some of the Chinese leaders probably had some concerns probably because she knew too much. They always liked to think they could fool the barbarians, but they knew they couldn't fool her. She spent the bulk of her time, as she should, with her official and professional contacts, helping me with the government officials, the party officials and so on, as well as with Americans, the American business community, academics and visitors. She spent a great deal of time to promote U.S. interests, and out of her own personal interest too, in dealing with Chinese intellectuals, artists and academics. Many of these were, of course, pushing the envelope in terms of political freedoms in China, and many fell into the grey area of semi or outright dissidents. Many later, of course, got swept up by the events of June fourth (Tiananmen Square). So, among the more conservative leaders, there were probably some suspicions of her, and even me as we'll talk about later, on these contacts. The Chinese officials were tremendously appreciative of her on the one hand, but probably some of the conservatives were suspicious on the other hand.

Bette worked very hard. She got a lot of publicity at the time even back here, media articles, a Barbara Walters Special on 20-20 television, a big Washington Post profile and so on, including on her interaction with Chinese students, intellectuals, scholars, artists, writers and so on. I want to repeat that she spent the bulk of her time promoting official ties. She wasn't shunning the officials and the government, just the opposite in fact. The Foreign Ministry and others were extremely enthusiastic about her, so she kept up her official side very strongly. In the American community I suspect there were some who felt that she spent too much time with the Chinese and not enough time with the American community. She felt that was the proper priority because of American interests in helping to interpret China as well as to expand our contacts and our interests. There were times where the diplomatic community felt that both she and I didn't pay as much attention as we might. I had a clear list of our priorities, and I'll get to that in just a minute. Dealing with my fellow Ambassadors was not high on my list. I would stay in touch if they were particularly good ones who could help me understand what was going on in China. Diplomatic dinners were generally late and boring and not very useful. I certainly was friendly and not rude, but I had to choose my priorities. Spending a lot of time with my fellow Ambassadors was not one of them, and that was true of Bette as well.

Some of the events that Bette produced, either at our residence or elsewhere, were truly imaginative, even spectacular. To take just one example - the party she staged at the Great Wall hotel to celebrate the tenth anniversary of our diplomatic relations. This was in December 1988. It was the biggest Western party for the Chinese since 1949. 1800-2000 guests. 36,000 (five kinds) dumplings. The Chinese Olympic table tennis team. 3000 slides and special movies on ten screens that Bette painstakingly put together after wheedling them from American sources. During this period Bette and I did a major media and speaking blitz.

One last point on Bette. She and I felt strongly that at our July 4th party, we should have Chinese visitors to help celebrate July 4th with us as well as the Chinese employees of the Embassy taking part as a joint celebration. We had a huge block party that we instituted. She lined up McDonalds and other companies to provide free food. We had bands and music and games and booths and parades. Just tremendous what she orchestrated. But the first July 4th party in 1986, we ran into trouble with the some of American community and business who felt that Chinese shouldn't be included.

Bette, justifiably, got extremely high marks for her role. A glowing personal profile in "The Washington Post." A "20/20" special on ABC TV with Barbara Walters. The highest USIA award from Mr. Wick, head of USIA.

Q: You were saying in the American community there were certain racist...

LORD: I don't want to say the whole community, but among some of the business people and some of the Embassy there was a feeling of why are we involving the Chinese in our celebration which I felt was both wrong and stupid. It was a tremendous opportunity to engage the Chinese. But there was a certain amount of racism there, you could tell. In any event, we always included the Chinese, and this proved extremely popular. That was just an example where there was some critical attention by some of the American community, although the great bulk of them and all the visitors were extremely high on Bette, her briefings, and her entertainment for them.

One other amusing incident involving her novel, Spring Moon. As usual in China, they were pirating it and as they did with all authors, putting out unauthorized translations. There was one being done by committee that was incredibly bad. We counted up in just the first chapter alone 101 mistakes, many big mistakes, not just the natural mistranslations. Not only was it inaccurate, but there was no sense of style or elegance. Now, Bette was not concerned about making money or royalties and was not naive about the ability to enforce intellectual property rights, but was concerned that all her Chinese friends and colleagues would understand she could write well, and she didn't want it mangled. So, she went to the Minister and Vice Minister of Culture when this unauthorized edition was about to come out and said that if this was actually published, we would personally, and we were prepared to do this, buy up all the copies, bring them to the Embassy, invite all the foreign journalists, have a bonfire and burn the books in our Embassy courtyard. It sounds like a joke and overly dramatic, but literally we were going to do that. Fortunately, there wasn't total freedom in China at least in this area, and it so happens that this edition was killed. Then Bette worked with the wife of the Vice Minister of Culture, a famous Chinese actor named Ying Ruochen. She did a tremendous translation of Spring Moon. Bette worked with her until the last chapter and then tragically she died of a blood disease. On her death bed, she said she regretted not finishing the last chapter Then Ying himself did the final chapter and it was a very well done translation.

Q: I think you'd better for the record here give the substance of or theme of Spring Moon because it is mentioned.

LORD: I don't know how relevant this is. She's written several books, but this was her first novel, and it turned out to be a huge best seller for eight months in hardback and number one in paperback. Translated all over the world, main selection Literary Guild. It is basically a novel of China; it takes place in the late 19th century up through essentially the 1930s, but it jumps with an epilogue to the opening to China in the early 1970s. It is the story of Spring Moon, this woman and how she grows up and goes through various travails. It is full of the history and culture of China but also Spring Moon's personal story.

On Bette, I just want to make the point that she was a tremendous help to me personally, not only a good marriage but also in terms of advice and all she did in expanding our contacts, projecting America at its best, great imagination and entertainment, and working hard to promote official ties. Therefore it gave an extra dimension to our stewardship together.

Now, with respect to me, I thought very hard during this longer-than-I-wished period of getting ready to go to China while I was waiting for confirmation, reading up and briefings on how I wanted to advance the relationship, how I wanted to conduct the Embassy and my own priorities. I knew that this relationship was going to continue to be mixed sweet and sour if you will. We had too many differences for it to be smooth whether it was human rights or historical and geographic separation. But, I also was firmly convinced there would be great national interests in moving forward with China. Obviously geopolitical interest which existed then, of course, with respect to balancing off Russia, potential trade, cultural, technological and other interests that were beginning to pick up steam. Regional and global security and other matters that we should be working on. So I made, of course, this determination to move this relationship forward.

As for my priorities, and some of these are overlapping. I can't list them in order, but obviously, my first priority was to advance American interests not only with a general engagement with China, but to promote U.S. positions, get Chinese cooperation wherever we could on international and regional issues, as well as to expand our bilateral links both as an end in itself and to develop more constituencies on both sides of the Pacific for a stronger relationship. The more you have various fields interacting, the more you have people both in China and the U.S. arguing for a positive relationship for their own self interest and increasing mutual understanding and linkage between us. So my top priority was advancing our interests, expanding the relationship, relaying U.S. positions, and pushing the Chinese on areas where we wanted their help or restraint. The problems included importantly in the years I was there, their dealings on missiles with Iran and Saudi Arabia for example, as well as on human rights generally and in Tibet in particular. That was clearly my overall priority.

Secondly to report on China, to increase understanding in the U.S. about China. I felt very strongly that Ambassadors in general and I in particular should do this clear-eyed, make sure that people in Washington and other readers would understand what was going on in China. This would include the Chinese point of view, but, emphatically avoid clientitis and localitis. I thought it was very important in order to maintain credibility with your readers, to be firm enough with the Chinese, and to give a clear picture of them, that you could not succumb to being snowed by your hosts. A lot of Ambassadors face this danger. The Chinese are particularly seductive, and so I was determined not to fall into that trap and always to be worried about American interests and tough with the Chinese when it was necessary. I would recommend we be tough when necessary, but also remind Washington and others of the larger stakes in the relationship, not letting one issue upset the whole relationship. Reporting on China was, therefore, a very important priority as well.

Thus, number one was advancing U.S. interests and presenting U.S. positions and negotiating for the U.S., and second was reporting on China. I think the third one was building up all these links that I mentioned earlier. Specifically, we had some clandestine cooperation with the Chinese in the intelligence area that even now I can't go into great detail on. It has become public since so I can mention that this included, on the positive side, working with them on monitoring Soviet missile tests and deployments, working with them to provide arms to the Afghan resistance against the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, and sharing intelligence on other parts of the world. At the same time, of course, it still was a Communist country. There was mutual suspicion on each side, spying like mad on each other, so it was a complex intelligence relationship. This positive side, much of it directed vis a vis Russia, even as we tried to improve relations with Russia, was sort of an anchor in Sino-U.S. relations. We had begun during the Kissinger-Nixon days sharing intelligence with the Chinese, but it really began in earnest under Brzezinski and Carter when we began to monitor Soviet activities and provide joint aid to the Afghan resistance. We maintained that strongly while I was there. Even when there was tension in the relationship on other issues or across the board, this aspect of the relationship was never really affected. We could go forward in good times and bad and build on a solid foundation, not known by the public and only by a few in the Congress. It was important for both sides in times of tension that we had this overall strategic interest to work together as well as we could.

Concretely our CIA people spent a great deal of time working with the Chinese on providing arms through Pakistan to Afghanistan resistance against the Soviets, and monitoring Soviet missile and other activities. Sino-American cooperation on Afghanistan was crucial.

Q: I would think on the intelligence side, you say each side was spying on each other in a normal way, but did you find the Chinese effort was the way it has been my experience with the North Koreans and South Koreans, the Yugoslavs when there was a Yugoslavia, spending a hell of a lot of their time really spying or checking the dissident movements in the United States. In other words were they looking as to what is the United States up to or what were the overseas Chinese up to?

LORD: I was involved really more with their surveillance of us in China. I wasn't all that familiar in detail with what they were doing in the U.S. They didn't have that many students as yet in college in the United States. That began to expand as we went along, and those are people they'd be watching. Clearly they were eavesdropping and doing things on us in the U.S. even as we were doing that in China. I can't get into detail. We had the constant reality that we figured everything was bugged including our entire household, so we were always careful whenever we spoke in the house unless we wanted to make a point like I hope we aren't having sea slugs at the next Great Hall banquet. You felt, obviously, that you and your people were being followed. In my case, they did it out of security reasons among others. They wanted to make sure nothing would happen to me. Of course, you feel more secure ironically, in a Communist controlled society. You won't get hurt by criminals or other elements because the Chinese are always around and they have got things under control. It wasn't pleasant, but I had the feeling that I could walk around or ride around on my bike without any trouble at a time when worldwide at many of our posts we had increasing concerns about security. It was a major concern at that point if you look back, with the whole project of fortifying our Embassies and so on. We beefed up our security. I always felt personally it was one of the pleasures of China that I could ride my bike, walk anywhere without any security concerns. The downside was that you always had to watch what you say except in the bubble in the Embassy. You had to be careful in other parts of the Embassy, even in your office as well as at home. Even in our car which we assumed was bugged. I did feel our security was quite lax. We had been briefed, before going out, in the Ambassadors course about the need for security. Within a day or two of my arrival, I walked around and checked out the security of our Embassy building and other buildings there. We tightened things up. On security, the main point I want to make is one we spent quite a bit of time in this area to strengthen the relationship even as we tried to learn more about what was going on in China. It was a very mixed relationship. While I was there, we had three secret visits from three Directors of CIA.

I also was interested over this period and had some success in expanding our military to military contacts. I felt this was important. We shouldn't rush it because of the differences we had, and we shouldn't do anything to jeopardize national security. The military always had and always would play an important political role in China, so we wanted to reach that constituency. It would give us a chance over time to get a better sense of Chinese strategic and military intentions and capabilities. It would send useful signals to the Soviet Union and other potential adversaries about this relationship with China. Moreover, the military was important with respect to the export of dangerous weapons which we didn't like. If you want to get at non-proliferation, you really have to talk to the military. At this point in the relationship we were getting into a more positive footing after two decades of mutual isolation and hostility, so I thought military contact was useful symbolism.

So, for all these reasons we worked on this. We had some modest arms sales. We had increasing exchanges of visitors. I think while I was there, every Chief of Staff of the services came over and most Chinese went the other direction. There were Secretary of Defense visits and theirs going the other direction. We had the first ship visit, very dramatic, one of the highlights of my stay there in October 1986 in Qingdao. Three American ships came in for the very first time. We worked very hard on this, and this military part of the relationship expanded during this period, but was cut off by Tiananmen Square just after I left in 1989. Similarly on the cultural side...

Q: [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]. Before you go on to culture, on the issue of arms sales, that had long been a very controversial one. It arose initially during the Carter years, and there was that very controversial article by Mike Pillsbury on Foreign Policy recommending this part as a way to get the relationship back on track and move it along. By the time you were Ambassador, was it still controversial?

LORD: It was still controversial but less so as we had moved ahead with China, as we normalized with China. There were some things in the works I believe, certainly by the time I got there, I think by the time Reagan took over from the previous administration. I don't recall precisely how far back some of these had gone. It included working with them on their rather dated but important F-8 fighters, the avionics with that. It included radar for their artillery which was relevant to Vietnam. Some upgrading of some of their ships. These are some of the significant areas. We didn't want to go so fast as to excite controversy in the U.S., but felt obviously that for the Chinese military getting a hold of some of our technology - even if it lagged behind our best - was important in terms of getting their cooperation. We certainly weren't going to do anything that was going to be a threat to Taiwan in our view or to military balances in general. Most of the technology or help we are talking about was 20 years old, give or take a few years. We felt this limited attempt was useful politically and psychologically without causing any undue controversy or upsetting any military balances. I don't recall it being overly controversial at the time. The negotiations with the Chinese always took time. In addition we had these functional exchanges at the National Defense University level for more junior officers. And higher ranking generals and admirals going in both directions, Chiefs of Staff and Secretaries of Defense, and the whole thing was beginning to move forward.

Q: [Nancy Bernkopf Tucker]. How satisfied were you with transparency? More recently there have been complaints that we show the Chinese everything; they don't show us much until a recent breakthrough with Secretary Cohen. But as a general rule there hasn't been a very good balance.

LORD: There hasn't been a particularly good balance. We always tried to get more access to what they were doing and we would have some staged visits to some of their units and facilities. When the Secretary or the Chiefs of Staff would come, they were probably embarrassed by how far behind they were us. So there is no question we consciously knew that in terms of technology, of course, even in terms of transparency and access, that they were getting more than we gave them. You couldn't see this as something you could balance off exactly. For example, if they see more of our bases and capabilities we figured that would impress them about how strong we were militarily and how far behind they were. They had an interest generally in dealing with us as a geopolitical superpower and specifically in terms of our technology, so we thought it was to our advantage to show our capabilities. We thought over time it would be more mutual. We kept pressing them on transparency, but I would grant that we didn't get the kind of reciprocity that one would normally expect or hope for, but we knew what we were doing.

We had the same thing on the intelligence side, as I mentioned in the last session, in sharing intelligence with them. Generally we would tell them more about what was going on than we would get from them. We did so to advance our interests, to make them a little nervous about the Russians or concerned about some of their partners in the Middle East who we thought were not helpful elements to regional stability. We did so partly to try to get more information out of them. Here again, we gave more than we got, as one would expect from a more advanced country, but also we felt it would pay off for us even though it wasn't strict reciprocity. It was sort of the same principle as the military exchanges.

Q: While we are on the military subject. What was the evaluation you were getting from the visits and all? I mean what were our military people saying to you about the capabilities and perhaps the positioning? What were the Chinese using their military for during that period?

LORD: Well, they were way behind us. When you visit their ships or see their aircraft or even their elite ground units, you could see just how far behind they were. They had a major big army but it was not that strong because of all its weaknesses. They were just then beginning to cut down the size of the army. I don't remember the chronology of this. They were trying to begin to modernize, and that is, of course, where they had an interest with us in getting technology. Of course, they asked for a lot more than we were willing to give them. I want to make that clear. We were measured in our approach. They also had an unfortunate experience with Vietnam; when they invaded in 1979, they really got a bloody nose from the Vietnamese. If they couldn't handle the Vietnamese, who could they handle? I just have to go back and read the literature about their strategy at that point. They were beginning to move away from, I think, Mao's mass mobilization where you swallow people up if they invade you; they began to try to have a somewhat leaner and meaner force and more technologically advanced, but they had an awful long way to go.

On nuclear weapons they have evolved a great deal since those days in terms of their attitude. We were concerned about non-proliferation, although most of the issues we had with the Chinese in that period were on missiles, Silkworms to Iran and some other missiles to Saudi Arabia. They did that to earn money for the PLA as well as to gain friendship and influence in other countries. On the nuclear side, they had a fledgling capability then for deterrence purposes, only regional in nature; they certainly couldn't reach us at that point. At the time they were obviously relaxed about proliferation; they were helping Pakistan with its program.

Q: I mean were we seeing during this period, mobilizing toward an invasion of Taiwan? Militarily I assume you were watching this closely.

LORD: No. I want to make sure my memory doesn't play tricks on me. We would always watch their deployments. While I was there, there was no Taiwan military crisis such as we had in the spring of 1996 or we had earlier when we didn't have relations. Their concern was less with Taiwan and more vis a vis the Soviet Union, to a certain extent Vietnam, and they had tensions with India going back to the 1962 war. They had residual historical concerns about Japan and Korea. The Chinese had opened up to us in large measure due to their concern about the Russians. There was a general calculation on their part that the far barbarian, the United States, was less threatening to them in history and geography than the near barbarians. They might not have trusted us or liked us particularly but they felt that since we were not on their borders and since on balance compared to some of their neighbors we had been relatively benign in our history, that they had less to fear from us. We had not invaded them like Japan. We had not taken large parts of their territory - at least as they saw it - like Russia. We had not fought them like Korea or India except in the Korean War. On the whole we were a strong and distant barbarian, and by being in the area and dealing with them, this helped provide geopolitical and security balance as they looked around their borders not only to the Russian threat to the north but these others that I have mentioned. In terms of their deployments and other concerns, it was clearly at that point to the north with the Russians and to a certain extent the south, the Vietnamese, and the Indians. There were not large threatening deployments vis a vis Taiwan.

A more general point. While I was Ambassador, the Taiwan issue was remarkably quiet - probably the calmest phase we've ever had with the PRC. This was partly due to the easing of tensions through the 1982 Communiqué. Partly the general advance of our time. Partly our cooperation against the Soviets, including heavy duty work together on shipping arms through Pakistan to the Afghan resistance.

Q: To put in context, '89 was not only Tiananmen Square but also the beginning of the dissolution of the Soviet Union. We are talking about a time where the Soviets were still involved in Afghanistan and the Soviet Union was the Soviet Union, not Russia.

LORD: That's correct and it was still their primary concern when I was Ambassador. Now they were already easing relations with the Russians during this period. Gorbachev gave a speech in Vladivostok on Asia that I considered very significant at the time. I have to check the date, it must have been about 1987. Clearly that was a pitch for better relations with China. I think the Chinese felt it would help them deal with us, along with their own security concerns, if they could ease relations with Russia, and it would help them in terms of their military deployments and expenditures. They were beginning to move with the Russians - not at an alarming rate - but I thought it was significant, more so than some of my colleagues. In our reporting cables, I emphasized the importance of the Vladivostok speech and their concern about the Russians. They of course - this is jumping forward - were improving relations, and Gorbachev was to come there in May, 1989. They didn't like the political reforms he was instituting. They thought this was dangerous in terms of maintaining party control and maintaining the empire. In a way they were right, given what happened in Russia, but they drew the wrong conclusions about the need for political as well as economic reform. In any event, their main concern was still north and to a certain extent south, not really pressure on Taiwan during this period.

Q: We are talking about this Soviet situation. How in your discussions of your Embassy, did you use the Soviet card or did you let the Chinese figure out what the Soviets were up to themselves?

LORD: We like to think we did it in a somewhat sophisticated fashion. After all this had been going on now since the early 1970s and here we are in the late 1980s. We were trying to improve relations with the Russians at the same time. We made no secret of that with the Chinese. We also kept telling the Chinese we hope you can improve relations. In fact, our view was, and it was sincere, we wanted a Sino-Soviet relationship that was not tense or hostile but certainly wasn't an alliance. The situation that had existed in 1969 for example, the border clashes, we genuinely thought were too dangerous and too tense. It could lead not only to a conflict between then but a wider conflict in the region with others and even perhaps the nuclear dimension. Even if you could crudely say it is nice to have these two guys fighting each other, we didn't want that kind of hostile, tense relationship between these two major powers.

So, to the extent they were improving relations and easing tensions we would favor that. Now, we obviously didn't want them to go all the way back to the 1950s and be solid allies again. We wanted to have better relations with each one than they had with each other. We felt there was a limit on how far the Sino-Soviet rapprochement could go, and therefore we were genuinely relaxed about the progress they were making with Moscow, and conveyed that to the Chinese both out of sincerity and out of tactics. You don't want to make them feel that they are getting you nervous with their relations with the Russians. We felt that the Russians and the Chinese each needed us more than they could possibly use each other. Of course, in economic terms for the Chinese this is a constant theme from the early 1970s to even as we speak today. The Chinese needed us for the number one priority of developing their country, modernizing their economy, lifting the standard of living of their people, and maintaining Communist party control by giving their people a better life, calculating that man or woman lives by rice alone. That is their number one priority, and they need our technology, our marketing skills, our capital investment, our know-how, our trade. In order to do that, they don't want to be dependent on Japan or anyone else. As we speak now, we take a third of their exports and we are still the key investment and technological provider. They needed us for that. The Russians needed many of the same things from us. They couldn't get that from each other given their economies. They both needed us, and we figured that was a constraint on their getting so close that they would engender hostility or nervousness on our part and therefore lose out on the economic connection with us. Similarly on the geopolitical front, yes we had tensions with Russia, the cold war and the nuclear dimension, but we weren't bordering them, unless you count Alaska and Vladivostok, as China was. We didn't have troops facing off against each other, and we didn't have this long history of Sino-Soviet tension. We felt there would always be that constraint between Moscow and Beijing, that no matter how much they patched up their relations, there would be this mutual suspicion.

To make a long story short, we tried better relations with both. Usually we went ahead simultaneously or we fell backward simultaneously. It was not a zero sum gain from our standpoint. We did try to remind the Chinese that even as we hoped they would have better relations, they shouldn't feel secure for all eternity vis a vis Russia, but we tried this in a subtle way. We would keep briefing them on Russian deployments and so on so that they would be reminded of Soviet strength and the need to maintain a relationship with us. We would keep them fully posted on our relations with Russia, again striking a balance to show that we were trying to move ahead with Moscow and we were having some success to make them a little uneasy, but also making it clear that we were tough and not being snowed by the Russians, or overlooking the dangers of falling in love with détente. I'm talking about the '70s as well as when I was there, so we were always trying to strike this kind of balance. I think on balance, and this is true of administrations I didn't serve in, that on the whole we have done this quite well and quite effectively.

Q: What about you in Beijing and our Ambassador in Moscow as well as the European bureau and East Asian bureau? Was this just you sort of working on instinct or was there sort of a controlling hand as to how we were dealing with two superpowers?

LORD: Of course this always has to be integrated from Washington, the White House and the State Department and other agencies. They'd have to balance off our Russian and China policies. I think I had the advantage in my job of not only having the China background, but a general background in policy where I was head of State Department Policy Planning, special assistant to Kissinger, and head of the Council on Foreign Relations. I had a global view which was useful in my talks with the Chinese in terms of my credentials, including having done a lot with the Russians during my NSC period. By the way, I kept up with the Russian Ambassador in Beijing. I forget the first guy's name, but then he was followed by Troyanovsky. We kept in constant touch, working lunches together, even a basketball game which we won, thanks to our Marines.

But, to get to your question, there was not a lot of tension between our Moscow Embassy and our Embassy in Beijing. It was not as if our Ambassadors to India and Pakistan were facing off against each other, which happens a lot. We didn't have that kind of problem at all as I recall.

We'd each of course, send a copy of any cable we'd send to Washington to each other. We'd do this always with Embassies Moscow or Japan or Korea or other key people in Europe on our cables, and they would do the same, so there was coordination that way. I don't recall any incidents or events where there was real bloody battles between us and Embassy Moscow or real disputes about the triangular dimensions. We also were meticulous in debriefing the Chinese if there had been a summit meeting with the Russians, like Reagan at Iceland for example, or arms control agreements or negotiations. Ambassador Rowny, who did a lot of the negotiations, came several times, as did other negotiators to fill them in. I like to think we played this in a relatively sophisticated way.

Q: Because sometimes we had. How about a China hand in Moscow?

LORD: Well, I think there were people in Moscow who had served in China, but I don't recall specifically. We didn't have a slot just assigned for that purpose.

Q: While we are still on the Soviet side, did you sense any concern about the was it the Gorbo mania. Gorbachev was a new type Soviet leader, and he became rather the darling of Europe, the British, and the United States in this period and seemed to have a rapport with Ronald Reagan which was happening during your time. I was wondering whether they were feeling miffed or concerned that we were getting too close to the Soviets?

LORD: Well, first if the Chinese were miffed or concerned, they would not show it. I mean just for tactical reasons, they wouldn't want to show they were concerned. We got a lot of lectures as you recall from earlier sessions from Deng Xiaoping and others in the '70s about being naive about the Soviets, not being tough enough. We didn't hear that in the '80s, probably because they were improving their own relations. With respect to Gorbachev, however, I don't recall that they were all that frank in their discussions with us. Clearly we knew that they were suspicious of what he was doing and had real ambivalence. They liked the fact that he wanted to improve relations with China, and they worked with him on that, but they were very concerned about what Gorbachev was doing on the domestic political front in terms of freeing up that society both because it might have a contagion effect in China and unleash similar currents there and because they felt, and they were correct in a way, that this would lead to lack of control by the Communist Party in Russia and even loss of their empire. So, they were suspicious of Gorbachev, and generally on balance, didn't like him. On the other hand, they were pragmatically dealing with him to improve their bilateral relationship.

We can pick up some of these things again later, to get back to bilateral relations, we spent a lot of time trying to expand educational and cultural affairs with the Chinese. We made some progress here, but there is always some, and it continues to this day, restrictive paranoid quality about Western ideas. Basically the Chinese strategy was to get Western technology and Western money without being subverted by western ideals, culture and ideas. We made some progress in terms of agreements signed and exchanges back and forth. Bette worked extremely hard on this and did a lot to promote groups going back and forth, but we would have reminders of their repression.

I remember one example where we were going to send to China an exhibit from the National Portrait Gallery. Just before it was about to come over, the Chinese said there are two portraits that cannot be included in this. One is Golda Meir from Israel, the other is General MacArthur, I guess because of the Korean War connection. We were very tough. There were some in my USIA section who wanted to bend on this. I thought this was absolutely wrong. I'm not saying everyone in the section, but some elements who sort of wanted to work it out with the Chinese. I said we had to be very tough on this out of principle. Furthermore there was some absurdity here. It is not as if we were putting Hitler there. It was pretty absurd to pick on Golda Meir and even MacArthur. We were prepared to make sure that the texts underneath the pictures wouldn't go out of their way to be insulting to China. We weren't about to remove the pictures. I thought it would be bad both generally as a principle and setting a precedent for future cultural exchanges, and also I thought it would set off an uproar in the United States where there is still understandably great suspicion of China not only on its human rights but its cultural repression. So we hung very tough on this, but the Chinese wouldn't give in and the portrait exhibit didn't take place. This was an example of their idiocy. This took place about 1987, about that time. So, we have continued examples like that. We did manage nevertheless, to have considerable expansion of student and cultural exchange, and science and technology. We worked very hard on all that. Along with other aspects of our growing relationship there was a great increase of exchanges both ways in all these fields, not to mention business activity and tourists in China.

Q: What about with student exchange, I know that it was very evident with any exchange program we had with the Soviet Union. The Soviets were sending people to learn hard science, and we were sending people to learn about icons. It was of this nature and the Soviets were milking us for everything they could scientifically and not allowing people who were might be get infected by studying American poets or something like that. Did you find that balance?

LORD: There was an element of that, although we thought it was to our advantage to let Chinese students come to the U.S. and be exposed to American society no matter what they were studying. We just thought it was a good idea and obviously still feel that way. They heavily loaded up, somewhat understandably, on their practical science, technological and economic needs, steering their student exchanges toward science, engineering, and so on. So, the great bulk in that period were in that area. It doesn't mean they couldn't be exposed to American ideas and views and be another link in strengthening U.S.-Chinese relations. It would have a beneficial impact when they got back to China. From the Chinese standpoint they were taking a certain risk either that they wouldn't return or that they would be semi-subversive when they did return or at least expect things they had gotten used to in the United States for their professional and economic abilities. This was a great transfer of technology from their standpoint, learning a great deal about science and technology, so it was a tradeoff that was in both sides' interests. We tried to get more students to come from the U.S. to China, which was a very small number. We had Fulbright exchange programs which I promoted very heavily. We also worked very hard on the international visitor program of USIA which is very important where you select middle level people of middle age, still with a big future but of rising importance to come and spend a few weeks in the U.S., get exposed to American society, go all over the United States and go back again. It was a constant struggle to get people that were not just politically correct from the Chinese standpoint and were not just cadre or hacks. We had mixed success on that, but it was an important program, so we worked very hard in this whole area.

Another objective I had, of course, was economic, and one of my highest priorities was to promote American trade and investment interests. The culture of the Foreign Service was just beginning to change at this point. You know we have a tradition further back in our history where the average Ambassador in his Embassy was saying this isn't really traditional diplomacy. I think it is fair to say 20-30 years ago American businesses saw American Embassies generally as not being particularly helpful. Trade and investment, of course, were less crucial then in international relations. There was less globalization and less of our economy depended on exports and our presence abroad than it does today. But for all those reasons, the change in the importance of this element, the culture has been changing clearly in the State Department. Today people are rated very heavily on how well they perform economically as Ambassadors and elsewhere and it is high on any Ambassador's list pretty much now.

We were just making that shift generally in the culture then, and I was very much in favor of that shift. I felt that Ambassadors and country teams had a distinct obligation to American businesses. It would help American jobs and exports back home and that was important. It would also help to strengthen the overall relationship with China, so it had that benefit as well. And over time it might loosen up the Chinese system. I think if you divide up my labors and it were possible to quantify it, I think I spent as much time if not more on our economic relationship than any other aspect during my 3 ½ years there. This was in terms of seeing Chinese officials on investment or trade matters, opening exhibits, promoting deals, lobbying for American companies, reporting on economics back home, devising strategies to improve the investment and trade climate. I worked extremely hard on that and spent a lot of time on it. As a result, I had very good relations with the American business community. Some have been critical about me in recent years because of my strong human rights stand, but business interests were a major part of our effort. We had a lot of economic agencies come out there. We had cabinet-level commission meetings with Commerce and Treasury and Science and Technology, and a lot of cabinet and sub-cabinet officials and others went back and forth. We spent a great amount of time on that for the reasons I mentioned, to further our concrete interests but to also strengthen the overall relationship.

Q: I can understand why from strengthening the overall relationship, the more American investment we had in China the better, but what is in it for the United States economically, the United States per se to have a lot of McDonalds?

LORD: Well, it means increased earnings for American companies, increased jobs in America, increased exports from America as well as the effect of loosening up broadly Chinese society, and, over time, including reforms through American business practices and interactions. Over time, it could loosen up the political and cultural restraints in China, but there were these very concrete American economic interests involved.

Q: Were you watching the situation that American jobs were essentially being lost because American firms were using Chinese labor rather than American labor?

LORD: It wasn't that big at that point. In fact, even today it isn't that large compared to say Mexico or some other places where this happens. This was really not an issue at the time. Prison labor hadn't really reared its ugly head at the time although even today it doesn't involve American businesses very much, at least hopefully not. Most of them are very sensitive to that.

Also at that point we even had modest surpluses with the Chinese. The trade was growing strongly while I was there, but it is modest compared to today of course. But, it was growing and we didn't have this tremendous trade imbalance at the time. So this was not at my time there as sensitive issue as it is now. Now it is sensitive because of the tremendous surplus the Chinese have. It has been sensitive, not so much recently, because of prison labor. As for investment, it was a constant battle to get the Chinese to relax their investment climate so that we could get in there. So, that was a large part of our time trying to make it easy for Americans to invest there as well as promoting trade and deals. We had great competition from the Japanese and European businesses. As I said, we launched the joint commissions back and forth, and many high level visits. I spent a lot of time with businessmen briefing them at a weekly happy hour at our commercial section which I would join talking with these people. I went around the country and promoted American business in various places, so this was a large part of my time. Whenever I went, to Shanghai or Guangzhou, even the interior, these other Chinese cities, this would be high on my list with the local authorities.

Q: Well, did you, were you looking over your shoulder at Japan, because in Japan already we were having a tremendous trade deficit with Japan. I think it was already certainly at that time, the latter half of the '80s, and the Japanese had this system where it was almost impossible to penetrate; while the Japanese are selling their goods to the United States, it was very difficult to sell American goods to Japan. Were you looking at that and having problems of that nature because of their system or were you seeing this on the horizon as we moved ahead with the developing trade?

LORD: Well, we kept in mind the Japanese example. We didn't want to end up in China like where the Japanese market was closed and we had this large trade deficit, so that general concern was in our mind. But, as I said, trade was modest compared to today, and we really didn't have a trade imbalance. These concerns were not acute at the time. A good part of our struggle was to get the Chinese to make it easier to do business with less and less red tape and more transparency and so on. Also a major concern was access to the Chinese domestic market. Their emphasis particularly in those days was too narrow; they wanted American technology and investment in China and exports, but they were severely restricting American access to that large Chinese market. It was a constant battle to get more access to China's market for U.S. companies.

Q: In the '30s there was a book called Oil for the Lamps of China and there were millions of customers. Now over a billion customers, and this has always been a theme throughout the history of the United States, if we can only get into that market. It has usually turned out to be not as profitable or as easy as was thought. Can you talk about the attitude of business, the professionalism, the capabilities of American business and any problems or maybe examples of what you had to deal with?

LORD: Well, for American businesspeople, I think, this was still relatively early. The Deng Xiaoping opening and reforms started in '79, so outside investment started after that including American investment. It was only a few years later. Already there were frustrations for American business because some had been there for a few years and weren't getting anywhere, so some were quite frustrated, but on the whole I think there was a feeling, a recognition that they had to have some patience. They were anxious to be in there for the long run; if they got in early and earned some credit with the Chinese they might have the inside track vis a vis their competitors when things got a little looser. So, without being able to generalize, there was a feeling that this was a little frustrating, but we have got to play for the long run. A few got sufficiently frustrated that they actually pulled out while I was there, but most of them stayed or started coming in.

A lot depended also on local leadership. For example, I worked very hard with the mayor and vice mayor of Beijing to get more projects into Beijing. At one point we set a quota for the next year of 15; we got up to 23. I was reminded of this at a banquet, again modest by today's standards, but they were anxious to move ahead. In Tianjin in particular there was very dynamic leadership and a new economic zone promoting foreign investment. Li Ruihan was the dynamic mayor then, and he remains one of the top leaders today. We could make progress there. In Shanghai, there was a tremendous contrast between the two mayors I dealt with. The first was Jiang Zemin, now the leader of China, and he was not very helpful. The climate was not very good for investment in Shanghai when I first went down there in late '85-'86.

Q: He is now the President of China.

LORD: And the American business community was very frustrated about the business climate in Shanghai when I first arrived. Then Zhu Rongji, who is now the Prime Minister of China, took Jiang Zemin's place as mayor and there was an immediate change. For example, rather than have to go to a dozen different places to get permission to start a joint venture or transaction, Zhu started one stop shopping where they were all consolidated in one place. In other ways he encouraged investment, and was very impressive. When I went back to Shanghai in '87-'88 there was a tremendous change. The American businessmen were very pleased at the progress that was being made.

I think American businessmen on the whole, I'm now generalizing, were not naive. Yes there was a huge potential Chinese market, and that is why they wanted to get a foothold there for the future. But they also recognized this would take time; there wouldn't be immediate dividends. Also it depended on what areas you were dealing in. Not only geographic, but in areas where the Chinese needed investment, they would make it easier for you to invest than in other areas. The biggest problems were transparency, red tape, delays, ability to have access to the Chinese market as opposed to being pressured just to export or to provide technology. Also the hiring of the Chinese staff, the ability to get the best Chinese workers and keep them. Often American business would get them, train them well, and then the government would take them back and send them elsewhere. So, there was control by the government over personnel working in American joint ventures and businesses, and there was a constant struggle to allow American business to have access to the best people and to keep them once they had them. So these are some of the problems that American businesses faced, but on the whole, things were moving ahead and there were some success stories.

Q: Was there any instead of sort of a Harvard Business School, a Beijing Business School or someplace that was training to managers, or were they relying on the genetic instinct of the Chinese to be good businessmen?

LORD: The Chinese do have a genetic instinct for great entrepreneurship, but they also had a terrible Communist economic system and state enterprises and all the other elements that were holding back their economy even in those days. We had one specific program in Dalian, an institute where we trained Chinese managers. We brought them over to the United States, That was a very positive force; we worked hard on that. It was run by the Commerce Department. Secretary Shultz on one of his two trips when I was there, went to visit that institute. Obviously, individual American joint ventures and businessmen were helping train Chinese as they worked together with them. The Chinese had an International University of Economics and Business. Which Bette and I both addressed. This was going on as well. But, this was still pretty early compared to where we are now in the 1990s in terms of Chinese learning management skills, developing entrepreneurship, and even loosening up their system and moving it toward a capitalist operation.

Q (Bernkopf Tucker): Did you have any trouble at that time with dual use technologies? Was that an issue yet?
