LESTER MALLORY
Foreign Agricultural Service
Marseille (1931-1934)

Consular Officer
Paris (1934-1939)

Political Officer
Paris (1944-1946)

Ambassador Lester Mallory entered the Foreign Agricultural Service in 1931 and became a Foreign Service officer in 1939. His career included assignments in France, Mexico, Cuba, and Argentina, and ambassadorships to Jordan and Guatemala in 1959. Ambassador Mallory was interviewed by Hank Zivetz in 1988.

MALLORY: And it came to my attention, through the head of the outfit, that the Department of Agriculture, in Washington, was recruiting people for the Foreign Agricultural Service, which was then a small, specialized, rather elite group. So I applied.

I claimed a knowledge of French, because they wanted somebody to go to Marseille. I'd had high school French, and I'd had a couple of years of college French, but my French wasn't very good; anyway, it worked. I got a job, with the stupendous salary of $2,600 a year, to become the Assistant Agricultural Commissioner in Marseille, France, for the Foreign Agricultural Service.

We had a regional operation, which covered Belgium, France, Spain, Italy, Northern Africa, and in some respects we reached out elsewhere. So it was tremendously good training. That lasted until 1934, when we had the bust-up in Washington.

Roosevelt devalued the gold dollar, and some of us were pulled back to Washington. I spent about a year and a half with the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. Then in 1934, I went back to Paris, where we had moved the offices at that time because the French wanted to collect income taxes on people who weren't actually in the consular service – in Marseille. So I spent five years in Paris.

Then Henry Wallace, the Secretary of Agriculture, thought there was much too much emphasis being put onto Europe, and nothing on Latin America.

Q: You were in Paris on the eve of the war. Could you give us some impressions of what was happening at the embassy; what was the reaction to the events that were leading up to the Second World War?

MALLORY: We were stationed in the embassy, but we had no information on policy. We attended the weekly staff meetings, with the ambassador. And we were not aware – embassy wise – of what was going on. Of course, we heard Hitler's speeches on the radio. (I can be confidential about this, I suppose.) I remember one day Ambassador [Bullitt] said, "Look, the French are now finally waking up. They need an air force (inaudible), and they want planes. If you people have something that you want to get out of the French government, now is the time to strike."

Well, Pierre Cot was the minister of aviation at that time, and they'd resisted all this business, but it was by then pretty late. That was the only concrete thing that I remember.

Q: What year was that?

MALLORY: That would be about 1938. But we weren't privy to these things, and it wasn't until much later – after I got here – that I read Bill Bullitt's biography, by his brother; which covered his correspondence to Roosevelt, in which much of this stuff came to light. It's beautifully done; it's very, very interesting, particularly those things which get into some of the nitty gritty, and the internal politics, which aren't very pleasant.

When Joe Kennedy was ambassador to London, and he had been told by Bullitt that the Gray Code had been jeopardized; but Kennedy wouldn't do anything about it. The Germans had our stuff for quite a long time, right from our cables. Bullitt told Roosevelt about this, but I don't know what happened. But Kennedy, as far as the information on the war (inaudible), was just strictly bad news. I don't know that his sons – Jack and Joe at that time – were old enough to appreciate any of this or not, because they were quite junior. But it wasn't a good time, by and large, and our appointments weren't good.

Bullitt was a very dynamic, forthcoming guy, and he operated a lone-wolf sort of operation.

Q: What do you mean by lone-wolf?

MALLORY: He didn't bring a lot of people into his confidence, as far as I know, and a lot of his stuff was done very directly. Many of his things – as you'll see in that book, if you ever get a chance to look at it – were “for the eyes of the President.” And when he had something that he wanted to get off his chest, he stayed up until 2:00 in the morning and got on the telephone; and this happened quite frequently. He called Roosevelt directly.

As I say, in my position, as number two in the agricultural office, we were not aware of what was going on, except what we saw in the newspapers. I was aware of a group of younger Frenchmen, who were quite concerned with relations with Germany; and they were preparing a sort of – not a coup – but a situation where they were going to support the Germans. They didn't come out much in the open, but I do know that at least one or two of them had had their houses searched by the French secret police. Apparently the police were getting on to this. I knew it, in part, from friends of mine in the Associated Press and United Press, who had been friends of mine for years there; and they were getting on to this.

Also, I heard of it because I was a member of a sort of social club, with not much importance, and a lot of these people were in it. And they were people of maybe 35, 40 years old.

Q: This was a French social club?

MALLORY: Yes, a French thing. I don't know why I was in it, just by chance I guess. I think they had to run for cover when things broke, but I have no recollection because I left there in June of '39.

Q: So you left before the war broke out?

MALLORY: Yes.

Q: Was there a sense, in Paris, that things were coming to the edge – that the war was imminent?

MALLORY: Not really. I wasn't privy to enough of the French thinking. But again, I say my close association with the correspondents should have been enough to know what was going on; and I didn't get much of that feeling at all.

Q: I see. Now, interestingly, you came back to Paris after the war. How soon after the war were you back in Paris?

MALLORY: I arrived in Paris during the Battle of the Bulge. As I mentioned, Henry Wallace thought that Latin America ought to have some attention. So they decided the first agricultural attaché should be in Mexico. I came back from Paris in June, of '39. (Somebody in Washington was pretty clever about this, because they were beginning to close down our operation.) I spent five years in Mexico, getting things started, trying to build up a background of information, which we didn't have at all.

Q: A background of information on what?

MALLORY: On agriculture – the food production, needs, and so on. Then the war broke out, and I became terribly involved in the whole business about rubber, and medicinal plants, and strategic things of that nature. But then, in late '44, I heard from Washington, and they asked if I would go back to Paris? I said I would go back for a year, if they would bring me back to Washington afterwards, because I wanted to get married.

The business in Paris was to reestablish the office. The embassy was just opening with a few people. But the important thing was food supplies. The American army needed munitions; the French wanted food stuffs. How much food stuff did they need?

Well, by great good luck when I got back to Paris, after five years, down in the basement I found my complete files! So I had the basis of operations. It wasn't much extra effort to sit down and make a judgment on food production; what was available. Because the French were under rationing at that time, they were screaming, but actually there was plenty of food if it had been distributed. They couldn't get it from the farmer to the town. So the rationing went on, particularly for bread stuffs.

Anyway, I was able to pull things together, and submit some reports to Washington pretty promptly – relatively speaking. It took a little while to catch up. That was my primary job when I got back, to see what the food situation was. I worked on that pretty intensively, and I had a young man with me who was good. We spent a lot of evenings over in the embassy; there wasn't anything else to do around there.

Q: Was this an American or Frenchman?

MALLORY: American.

Q: Who were you dealing with on the French side?

MALLORY: Primarily their Ministry of Agriculture.

Q: And was there the beginnings of the division of the Gaullists, or the communists?

MALLORY: No, not at that time. The people we were dealing with were a few of the older holdover bureaucrats; but primarily, people that had come out of the resistance, and had worked in it and knew it. And we cooperated right across the board with them.

Q: And when the war ended, did things change? Did the relationship between the French and the Americans change after VE Day?

MALLORY: No, it just went on as far as we were concerned.

Q: And you felt it was a cooperative arrangement?

MALLORY: Yes.

Q: Because, as you know, with de Gaulle and so forth the tensions began to arise.

MALLORY: That was later.

Q: Later, okay; that's what I wanted to know.

MALLORY: Yes, I think that was later. As a matter-of-fact, when the war was over, and things broke up, we had tremendous demands for certain things. For example, French agriculture – as far as grains were concerned – was still based on the combine; and the combine needed binder twine. They didn't have binder twine, and we didn't have a lot of stuff to give them because we were using it all up for cordage for the Navy. Well, I had a whole commission of Frenchmen go to Washington for binder twine. This was just after the war was over, you see, and the approach of harvest. So we had things like that come up.

Q: Was there a great deal of hunger in France, at that time?

MALLORY: No. Hunger – not really; a lot of people got thinner, but I wouldn't call it hunger.

Q: Now, you stayed in Paris until when?

MALLORY: Until the end of 1945 – beginning of 1946.

DOUGLAS MACARTHUR, II
Vice Consul
Naples (1937)

Vice Consul
Paris (1937-1942)

Consul
Paris (1951-1953)

Ambassador Douglas MacArthur, II came from a distinguished military family and spent his childhood in various cities. He entered the Foreign Service in 1935. His career included positions in Canada, Italy, and France, and ambassadorships to Japan, Belgium, and Austria. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1986.

Q: When the war started in September of '39, what were you doing? What became your role?

MACARTHUR: I did some liaison work with the French foreign ministry, which had asked us to be the “protecting power” of French interests in Berlin. Woody Wallner, was in Paris on a vacation from Spain and we held him over to work on French interests in Germany. He had come into the Service at the same time I came in and spoke excellent French. He was then in Barcelona, I think, or Valencia. He’s dead now. As for the Embassy, we kept in close touch with the French on their perceptions of what the Germans were going to do. But the whole emphasis of the reporting was not any longer on the domestic political side, but on the international side and the relationships with Italy, which did not come into the war until June of 1940, when France had fallen, the relationships with neutral Belgium, Holland and the like. The emphasis shifted, with everybody in France but the communists rallying behind the government in time of war, from domestic political reporting, to the relationships with France of countries in Europe that were not yet involved in the war, and their positions and the French attitudes toward them, and the like.

Q: We had a really remarkable crew in Paris at the time in the embassy. Bullitt was the ambassador, Robert Murphy as the . . .

MACARTHUR: They had very able men. Bob Murphy was there, but Ed Wilson was there the year before him, and Edwin Wilson was extremely able. Bob took his place. But we did have a very able crew. Maynard Barnes.

Q: Freeman Matthews.

MACARTHUR: Doc Matthews, who was one of the best. I’ll have more to say about him.

Q: Did you feel that there had been a deliberate strengthening of the embassy at the time? Or was this happenstance?

MACARTHUR: This was pure happenstance. Bob Murphy was consul general. Bullitt liked him, he was a very able man, he had never had a diplomatic appointment before. He’d been in the consular branch in Germany, and he headed a consulate general there. But he knew a lot of people and had political savvy. When Edwin Wilson, who was what we now call the DCM (Deputy Chief of Mission) was transferred to become a minister in Latin America – Bullitt selected Bob Murphy to replace him as councilor of the embassy. Doc Matthews; Hugh Fullerton had been there for two or three years; Bob Murphy had been there for two or three years. Doc Matthews came in late '38, I think. It just so happened that there were some extremely capable people there.

Q: Tyler Thompson is another one.

MACARTHUR: Tyler was there. Bill Trimble. We had a good team.

Q: Looking back on it and putting yourself in the position you were then, was there a feeling within the embassy staff that France really was – maybe it's the wrong term, but rotten to the core, as they say, or at least there was something wrong with the spirit of France at the time?

MACARTHUR: I think it was more a question of something wrong with the spirit of France. Bullitt had become an absolute Francophile, and he could not see the weaknesses that France had. I'm speaking primarily of military weakness. We had a very able military attaché, Colonel Horace Fuller, and Horace Fuller told Bullitt that the French Army was a very disorganized, incoherent outfit, in effect. Bullitt wouldn't believe him. When war broke out, we thought Paris might be bombed by the Luftwaffe, so I took a little cottage outside of Paris at a village called Gambais beyond Versailles, for my wife and child, so that if there were bombing, they would be out of the way. To take this house, you had to have a notaire for the contract. The notary in France is like a court officer and other things. This little notaire had been mobilized to a unit in Versailles. He took the train in every morning, came back in the evening, went on with his notarial work. And this was characteristic. When they mobilized, it was a farce. Some of the units that were mobilized were no more capable, were no more battle-worthy or capable of action than children. You know, enlisted men went home for the weekend, they went home at night. There was no training. They'd do a little close-order drill or something during the day, but there was no real training, and there was no readying of the reserves that had been called up and mobilized. It was business as usual. It was the so-called phoney war – drole de guerre.

Bullitt lived with the conviction that the French had, with the Maginot line, and one of the greatest standing armies in the world and that there was no question of a German breakthrough. The French were like ourselves; we slept the same way. Let me cite a the most typical example, I served in the Army for a while under Lieutenant Colonel George S. Patton, who later was the famous General Patton, who was absolutely rabid in the early 1930s about armor. He was a cavalry man. He wanted the cavalry of the future armored, and he was 100% right. There was an American gentleman named Mr. Christie. Mr. Christie developed a tank that had the piece (the gun) in the turret, and the machine guns down below, you could lie behind the crest of a ridge, with just the gun protruding over it, and destroy your enemy. As for others, the French produced a tank that they claimed was the best tank in the world called the B-1-bis. The B-1-bis had the piece, the gun mounted down low between the tracks, and it had to get up on the ridge and silhouette itself to fire. It was a sitting duck. We on the other hand produced the General Grant tank that had a gun in the lefthand corner of the tank, so that if it were immobilized and lost a track or anything happened, the gun had only a 30 degree traverse and was also virtually helpless. Whereas the Germans and the Russians both bought the Christie rights and produced the Christie type of tank with the gun in the turret with a 360 degree traverse.

But again, this is not the first time this sort of thing has happened. There was a gentleman named Browning, who early in this century came up with a machine gun that our Army ordnance people said was no good. So Browning went to Belgium and founded what is now Fabrique National, one of the great arms producers of the world, which, incidentally, also produces Browning shotguns, the Browning revolver, the Browning automatic, the Browning machine gun, we had a chance for them all, but we just turned them down cold, and they went someplace else.

Q: Did you get any direction from the ambassador? One almost hesitates to say the Secretary of State, because one has the feeling that the Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, was pretty much bypassed.

MACARTHUR: He was bypassed.

Q: But did you get any direction both from the embassy and from Washington about what your role was when the war started?

MACARTHUR: I can't recall any specific instruction, but the ambassador certainly made it clear that our role was to do everything we could to build up support for the Allies – that is, the French and the British, who were fighting. I don't recall any specific role. To follow developments with France's relations with the neutral countries, because most countries of Europe were neutral, BENELUX, Scandinavia, Italy, Switzerland, Eastern European countries: this to be abreast of their views and report them in. But I don't recall any indoctrination of any specific kind. I do recall that Bullitt had staff meetings once a week, and in these meetings he would lay out assignments to various officers, saying, "You find out about this or that". But those were details.

Q: Was the pace, I assume, much more hectic? Were you pretty much on a seven-day week?

MACARTHUR: No. We weren't on a seven-day week. The ambassador was sometimes, but not often, in the office on Saturday or a Sunday. But on weekends he operated out of his residence. Telegrams went out and came in, and if he (Ambassador) had something to do, somebody he wanted to see, or some minister he was going to call on during the weekend period, he would do so and then dictate his telegram to Carmel Offie. Carmel Offie was absolutely incredible. He could take shorthand, he could type, he had a memory like this recorder. He was a fantastic person. So Bullitt operated that way. We had duty officers, of course, at the embassy on weekends in all the various sections but except for one at the chancery, the others were just on call.

Q: Were you contacting mostly other embassy people? You say you weren't working with the political parties then.

MACARTHUR: We did maintain close contact with political leaders to have their views on the war and we worked with the foreign office much more closely, also with people in the economic side of the French Government. The economic and financial side was extremely important. We developed excellent relations with Couve de Murville and Gaston Palewski, both inspecteurs d'finance, France's elite, and with some of the other people who later became very prominent in the de Gaulle era. Herve Alphand, who later was ambassador here for some time, and Foreign Office Secretary General Rochat. Financing a war is a big business – trade, economics, the problems of submarine warfare. But we were not in the war. We had sympathies. The President, the American people, they had great sympathy with the French and the British, but we were not in the war. We of course saw people of other embassies to find out their views.

Q: Can you give any reflections on the consular side of the attempts of refugees who fled Germany to try to get out of the country at that time?

MACARTHUR: Certainly, but the big exodus did not come at that time (1939). The big exodus started in May 1940, when the Germans broke through at Sedan. Before that, there were a few people that said, "We'd better get out. War has broken out, and you can't tell what's going to happen." But it was quite manageable. What became unmanageable was when you had about 10 million people on the roads, and you had tens of thousands of Jewish refugees from the low countries and France that were streaming over, trying to get out either through Bordeaux or out over the Pyrenees through Spain and Portugal. The Spanish were not very easy about letting them through, and the Portuguese were not anxious to be inundated by a tremendous group of refugees in Portugal.

Q: This was in May?

MACARTHUR: No, this was later. May was when they started. When the Germans broke through and the refugees started by the end of May, the roads of France, down from the north, if you tried to go north, you couldn't get anywhere. The cars were coming down three abreast on a three-lane highway, where that's all there was. Wagons, people coming through Paris, these big farm wagons, with the dogs tied underneath, trotting along, or walking along, or dragging along, the kids in the wagons, the guy walking, leading the horses, automobiles crammed with kids in the things, and all the rest of it – that came only in May of 1940. You see, until then it was the phoney war, the drole de guerre, where there was a bit of shooting here, a bit of shooting there, a guy might be killed here, a guy might be killed there. But suddenly, when the Germans hit through the Ardennes, which the French had thought defended itself, to use their phrase, and struck through the Sedan, and then drove first to the sea . . .

The Germans broke through at Sedan, and they turned first, quite properly, to the sea, to encircle the British and liquidate that before they knew that there was nothing between them and Paris. Paris didn't fall until the 12th or 15th of June. But on May 20, we were told, "There is absolutely nothing between the German Army and France that can put up even the slightest kind of a defense." The Germans turned to the sea to roll up the British, liquidate them, and then take over the rest of France.

It was in this period, when they broke through at Sedan, that the refugees started streaming down from the BENELUX countries and northern France, and absolutely clogged the roads. I can tell you that as late as June, when I went to join the French Government at Tours, the roads were impossible. I left at 2:00 o'clock in the morning to get a little bit ahead of the business, and by the time of 6:30 or 7:00, it was four abreast. The stukas would come down and bomb the column to create confusion, so the French units couldn't use the road, and get low-flying aircraft to do a bit of strafing and the like. But that was the bad period, from the 20th of May until the armistice.

Q: Were you prepared for this? How did the embassy react?

MACARTHUR: I don't think anybody was prepared for the extent to which the whole damn thing collapsed – literally – in a matter of several days. Call it a week. Actually, on May 10th, I'd been having the duty, weekends, and we were prepared, in case we had to evacuate Paris, each embassy had a place across the Loire, a chateau or something like that, that the owner had made available if the bombings and so forth were such that you wanted to pull back some of your people and have them located in areas that didn't have military targets or objectives. I drove down one afternoon, would spend the night, and the next day drive back and the next night. It was one a two-and-a-half hour drive. It was still business as usual.

I got a call, the morning of the 10th, from Carmel Offie, saying, "The Germans have broken through at Paris. Get the hell back right away, quick." We took off. By the time we got past the airfield at Tours, as we were approaching the airfield at Tours, the sirens went off, and we were within about a mile of it, on one of those typical French tree-lined country roads. All of a sudden, these planes swept over, and we pulled the car under a tree, and jumped into a ditch. They started bombing and strafing the airfield. We got back to Paris all right, and there it was. But the lack of preparedness, you can see. From September 1st until May 20th, there had been this war, where both sides appeared to be stalemated along a fixed line, where no breakthrough, and certainly the Allies, the British and the French, weren't trying to break through; the Germans weren't trying to break through. They seemed to be satisfied that they didn't have the strength. They would suffer too many casualties if they committed themselves into a World War I type of operation, and so there they were.

You recall the drole de guerre, the phoney war. Business went on as usual in Paris, in the life of the French people, and in the life of France. It was business as usual.

Q: What happened to you, then, when the breakthrough came?

MACARTHUR: I came back immediately. Plans were made for evacuating, because it was quite clear that this was it. Plans were made for evacuating wives and family at once. Bullitt did that, very wisely. They were given a choice. The hope was expressed they would return to the United States, but they were also given a choice, if they wanted to, to go to Spain or Portugal. My wife and I decided that staying in Portugal would be the best bet, rather than go back across the Atlantic. So while some of them left on ships that were going out still from Le Havre and particularly from Bordeaux, my wife and daughter were shipped off to Lisbon.

The news got worse every day, and finally, by the beginning of June, it was quite clear that it was just a question of time. Mr. Bullitt asked me to go down. Bullitt decided that he did not – the French Government had to retreat before the advancing Germans, which was quite clear that they had to do – he did not wish to accompany the government, because the government might go on to – although he didn't put it this way, to North Africa, to continue the fight there, and he had strong ambitions to be either Secretary of War or Secretary of the Navy, and he didn't want to be immobilized in North Africa or someplace at that time.

So Mr. Bullitt elected to stay in Paris with Bob Murphy and the majority of the staff. He then decided that there would be a small group, a liaison group, that would have to accompany the French Government, and he selected to head that group from the embassy Doc Matthews, then myself and Woody Wallner, who had been reassigned from Spain to Paris, because we needed him for this liaison work with the French on protection of French interests in Germany. The three of us would go, but Bullitt also decided – and talked the President into saying that Tony Biddle would be ambassador-at-large, sort of. They didn't use that term; I've forgotten. He would be an American ambassador near the French Government. Tony Biddle, when Poland fell in September of '34, had retreated through Poland to Eastern Europe, and then when the Polish Government, in exile, was set up in Angers, France, Tony Biddle was there with the Polish Government in exile. So Bullitt communicated with Tony Biddle, and then he sent me in June down to see Tony Biddle and explain the whole deal, and get back to Paris.

I went down, saw Tony Biddle, then detoured by Bordeaux. Our airplanes had no cannons in those days; they had just machine guns. It was quite clear that what was happening between the Luftwaffe and the British RAF that if you didn't have cannons, you might just as well not get up into the air. So we had gotten the plans of the Hispana-Suiza cannon, 20-millimeter cannon, from Switzerland, and they were to be bundled aboard the America, which was the last ship that was obviously going to leave Bordeaux, an American ship, and this captain was a reserve naval officer. The plans were turned over to him. I did not bring the plans down. Our military attaché, brought them down. I had detoured to Bordeaux to see about the last ship out, and that everything had gone well, and to get a reading, then go back to Paris.

I got back to Paris after a very bad day, when the roads were still congested. I was going the wrong way, and the roads were very, very congested. I had had only about four hours' sleep, because there was no place to sleep. The hotels in Bordeaux, the Royal George, and all the hotels were filled with French parliamentarians and politicians and refugees. I started out at 4:00 o'clock in the morning.

Q: Were you driving a car?

MACARTHUR: Yes, I was driving a car. It was the only way to go. Fighting the four lines of people coming down, we were dive-bombed twice and strafed a couple of times. I got back to Paris at about 6:00 or 7:00 that night, and I was told that the French Government decided to move, and that Doc Matthews and Woody had already left with Raymond Bastianello, a code clerk, and Clarence Palmer, a very capable crew of Foreign Service clerks, who had been with us for many years, of senior intellect quality. I was told to rejoin them. So I left at 7:00 o'clock, with the clothes on my back, going on side roads which I knew well out to Gambais, where I had this house, bypassing Versailles and the main roads that were still clogged and congested, on these little secondary roads, picked up a suitcase, filled a suit in it and some shirts and pajamas and a toothbrush, and left at 3:00 o'clock in the morning for Tours, where the government was.

I got there in the morning, about 11:00 o'clock. Normally it would have taken me two hours. I reported to Tony Biddle, who was there, and Doc and Woody. At this time, the French were working on a message for President Roosevelt, which they had let us know they were working on. Paul Reynaud had replaced Daladier as prime minister. So I went with Tony Biddle, who didn't speak much French, spent the night with him at the Chateau Azay le Rideau, and we left at 4:00 o'clock in the morning, because they were afraid Tours would be bombed, and the French Government was about 100 kilometers up in the Loire at the chateau. We got there at 6:00, Biddle and myself, and Reynaud was in a dressing gown, had this vinyl text. He had the final appeal of the French to the American Government, to President Roosevelt, which was basically a propaganda ploy, to exonerate himself more than anything else, because there was nothing we could do.

Q: Yes. I was going to ask what could they hope that we could do?

MACARTHUR: There was nothing we could do, and it was one of those final appeals. You can say, "Well, you know, I appealed, but our friends didn't help us or wouldn't help us," or whatever it might be.

So we talked about ten minutes, and then Roland de Marjorie, the father of the present French ambassador today, I think, a very capable French diplomat, and I sat down and went over and worked out the English translation of this final appeal from Reynaud to Roosevelt, which was in French. We got an agreement on the English text, that it conveyed all the nuances and the other things. Then I went back to join Doc. Tony Biddle said that he was going to push on toward Bordeaux, because they told us they were moving on from Tours to Bordeaux. So Tony Biddle went directly down to Bordeaux, picked up his wife and went on to Bordeaux, and I went back and met with Doc and joined him where he was located, and then dictated the telegram of this final meeting with Paul Reynaud, the French prime minister, and the text of message. We sent that off. By the time we finished with the PTT, the telegram place, because we had no communications other than the local communications within the community, we left about 7:00 o'clock that night for Bordeaux.

We got down eventually to Bordeaux early in the morning and moved into the house there. The government had arrived. Doc covered the prime minister's office, and Woody and I covered other people that we knew in the foreign ministry with the government there, and some of the ministers, like Georges Mandel, who was later assassinated by the Germans. He was Jewish. We got messages out about what was happening, because this was in the midst of the power business, where Laval and Petain were working to replace Paul Reynaud. This went on until Laval and Petain replaced Prime Minister Paul Reynaud, and in the meantime, the Germans bombed us. To hasten the decision-making process of the French Government with this change, the Germans bombed Bordeaux. We'd hear a bomb drop, and all of a sudden you'd see the columns of debris and smoke coming right towards you. The nearest one hit about 200 meters from us. We took refuge, needless to say, under the desks in the office.

Then the Petain-Reynaud government came in, said they would sign the armistice. The armistice was signed, and it was announced that the government was established in Vichy, and we proceeded from Bordeaux, in our cars, to Vichy.

Q: During this time of change of government, if that's the right term for it, in Bordeaux, your role – really, there was nothing constructive that the United States could do at this point.

MACARTHUR: Absolutely nothing. We were 3,000 miles away, we had no forces mobilized, we had nothing that we could do. There was nothing that we could do. Our voice was absolutely zero. With Laval, you must remember Laval staked everything on a German victory. In fact, you may remember that in '41, after the staff of the Vichy Government had been all set up and established, he made that basic statement, "Je souhaite la victoire allemande" – "I want a German victory." And Laval saw France as Germany's first satellite. With the evil conviction they have of their superiority, Laval was convinced that the French intelligence and everything else would fix everything up if Germany won the war. They would be the first of the satellites, and he had a very special condition by collaborating with the Germans.

Q: So at that point, you moved to Vichy.

MACARTHUR: Yes. We moved, actually, to a little place called La Bourboule, because we had no place to stay in Vichy. Then we got Florence Gould's villa, Villa (Inaudible), in Vichy, as an office. We moved to Vichy. First, Bullitt came out while we were quartered at La Bourboule, which was about 45, 50 minutes away.

Bullitt came out and decided that he wanted to go back to the United States, so without waiting for the President, he took off for Portugal, where he could clipper home. The Germans held him for about three weeks in Paris before they let him go. Bob Murphy stayed in Paris temporarily for about another five days to leave Maynard Barnes in charge there and Tyler Thompson. We still had an establishment there, and we were not at war with Germany. Then Bob came down and took over the Vichy operation from Doc Matthews. Bullitt, when he left, he had three cars. He had a Cadillac. In those days, the government didn't furnish ambassadors with automobiles or chauffeurs. The ambassador furnished himself with automobiles and chauffeurs, and so did everybody else, if they had one. He had a Buick, and he wanted this Buick also, so he asked me if I would drive the Buick down, not to be his chauffeur, but to take the French Minister of Air, Guy la Chambre, across the Spanish frontier into Portugal, because Guy la Chambre, who had been in the Deladier Government and then staunchly anti-German, they were afraid that the Germans would go after him and liquidate him. So Guy la Chambre had been given a false American passport by Bob at the ambassador's written instruction, and his wife, (Inaudible) Madou, had been a famous singer and stage actress. So in a convoy with the ambassador, I drove the ambassador's Buick with the former minister of the air and his wife down. We drove from La Bourboule to Barcelona, and we left at about 7:00 or 8:00 in the morning, and we got to Barcelona about 4:00 in the morning. My companions in the car, the minister of air and his wife, were extremely nervous at the border, but that went all right.

Then we drove across the next day to Madrid, and then we drove the next day from Madrid to Lisbon. They communicated with the President, who was now happy with the departure.

Q: That was sort of the end of Bullitt.

MACARTHUR: That was the end of Bullitt. The President wanted him to stay on with the French Government. He wanted him to not pick up and leave, but to stay, because they were convinced that some kind of a French entity would be set up.

Then I stayed in Lisbon for a month or so, because they had nobody there, and there was an influx of thousands of refugees, many of them Jewish, poor bastards. I say “poor bastards,” because there was no sympathy from the Portuguese authorities under Salazar, and they put them in camps. I used to go up and get these people out of camps and process them.

Then I went back to Vichy, and I was in Vichy until the end.

Q: I was just thinking, it's probably a good time to cut off now. Then we'll continue this at a later date.

MACARTHUR: We can take on the Vichy part, which leads right into the war, because it was the Resistance thing that led me going to Normandy, which led to the other thing.

Q: Mr. Ambassador, on our last session of January 29, 1987, we finished our interview at the time that you had been repatriated to the United States from detention. You were in the Black Forest, was it?

MACARTHUR: We were on the edge of the Black Forest in Baden-Baden. There were three camps in that area, one with British soldiers taken by the Germans in North Africa; another was a mixed bag of various people that had been collected here and there, some of them irresponsible people, or what the Nazis considered irresponsible people from some of the Eastern European countries they had overrun; and I forget what the nature of the third camp was. We were interned in a hotel. Our treatment there was correct, and we had only one extremely painful and disagreeable business when the Gestapo came down and went to work on Thomas Cassidy, our assistant naval attaché in Vichy, their brutal interrogation, and it's no fun to hear someone being interrogated, when the moaning stops, and you know they've passed out. Cassidy was being interrogated probably because he was a contact point with some of our French Resistance people. Actually he worked for Colonel Donovan's OSS organization, and obviously some French contact who had been taken by the Gestapo and tortured had given his name. So the Gestapo came down, and if it had not been for the intervention of a fine young Swiss diplomat who periodically visited us, his name is Kiya Bordier (phonetic), who was later an ambassador, Cassidy might have ended extremely badly, except rather than just being painfully abused for a couple of days.

Q: You were repatriated after we landed in . . .

MACARTHUR: No, we were taken by the Germans after the Allied landings in North Africa at the beginning of November 1942. The Germans burst into our embassy, although we had so-called diplomatic immunity. They burst into our embassy with tommy guns and started removing us, when the dean of the diplomatic corps of Vichy, Mr. Stukey, heard what was happening and went to Laval, and said that this would create a major scandal for the Petain/Laval Government if it wasn't stopped immediately. So Laval called the Germans off and said we would be interned and exchanged with the members of the French diplomatic Vichy mission in Washington, headed by Ambassador Henrier.

Well, they interned us, shipped us down to Lourdes, the shrine city in southern France, of Bernadette fame, but we had been there a very short time when Laval gave the Germans the green light, and a group of SS and German soldiers arrived and bundled us into a train and took us off to Germany to hold as hostages.

We remained in Germany from that time – that's the end of '42 – until March of '44, when, finally, an agreement was negotiated for the exchange of our group plus a few very badly wounded Americans against some Germans that had been taken by us in North Africa during the North African campaign, including Ribbentrop's niece and her husband and some other Germans that we had picked up in this country or in transit between Latin America, where they had been active, and this country.

When the agreement was finally reached in '44 – the end of February, it was reached, I think, if I recall correctly – part of that agreement was that we would be repatriated to Lisbon, and the neutral Swedish vessel Gripsholm – was it Swedish? Yes. It would carry over those exchangees that the Germans wanted from the United States and the others that had been in North Africa, would be brought together in Lisbon, and we would be exchanged there. So we left Germany on a sealed train that went through France, to the French border. There we were held overnight to await the final arrangements with the Spaniards for transit across Spain, and we were put in a sealed train, but no longer with the German guards, and dispatched from Confront, which is just below Biarritz on the French-Spanish border. Maybe it wasn't Confront. It was the border point just below Pau to Lisbon.

In Lisbon, after a couple of days processing, we were placed in the Gripsholm and returned to the United States.

Q: Obviously, you had a lot of catching up to do with your family at that time, but sort of moving beyond that, how did the State Department treat you when you came back?

MACARTHUR: Oh, they treated us very well. I think all of us that came back, the war was going on, and we had missed a good part of it. We were anxious to get back to work. I took – I think it was two and a half weeks' leave with my wife. We went down to visit her family in Kentucky, and then I came back and went to work on the so-called French desk, because they had no one there that had been in France during the period of the occupation from '40 to the end of '42 who knew personally some of the Resistance personalities and other people and had some feeling. I was put on the French desk, because they wanted, at the time of the liberation, to ship me back to Paris to head up the embassy political section in Paris when it would be liberated. I'm speaking about the spring, because then the Allied landings in Normandy had not occurred. So this was a preparatory visit.

Well, in the course of the debriefings I had, including those of the OSS, when the OSS discovered that I had worked personally with people like Dr. Mazze, who was the leading Resistance leader in Brittany, and Laniel, from Normandy, and some of the other people, they proposed that I join with them and be parachuted into France at the appropriate time, about three weeks before our landings, which I did not know, and they didn't reveal, if they knew when those would be. I said that was agreeable to me if it was agreeable to the State Department.

The Department felt that a better use of me could be made by having me go into Normandy after we landed, and then at the liberation of Paris, presume a place in the embassy political section, because obviously when France was liberated, there were going to be all sorts of new political leaders who would emerge from the French Resistance, as French Resistance leaders and heroes, and have somebody that would work personally with a number of them, and had the credentials of not only having worked with them, but having also been deported to Germany and gone through that experience, too, which many Frenchmen had gone and never returned from. They felt that this whole combination of background would make me a useful person in the Paris Embassy.

Q: Sounds like they were using more finesse in their personnel policies, at least from my experiences, than normal.

MACARTHUR: The personnel policy – it wasn't personnel policy at all; it was Doc Matthews.

Q: Ah!

MACARTHUR: Later Ambassador H. Freeman Matthews, who had been in charge of the embassy in Vichy from 1940, really, until Admiral Leahy came, when he went to London. He knew intimately the inside picture of a France that was being occupied, but that would emerge, and he was the deputy director, I think, of the whole European department of the State Department under Jimmy Dunn, who also was extremely interested and sympathetic to the idea. So they simply said, "This is the way it's going to be."

In those days, during the war at that time, when it was a question of personnel in critical spots or spots that might become critical, I don't think the so-called administrative and personnel people of the department had much to do with the assignments, because the people that knew the qualities and experience and background were in some of the active policy-formulating departments of the department, the geographic bureaus, and they knew the capabilities, personalities, experience, and so forth.

Of course, in this plan, the Defense Department's approval had to be concerned for me to go back into Normandy after the landings; that would be before France was liberated. That represented no problem at all. We had a political advisor in General Eisenhower's headquarters in London, before the landings, and then when the time came for the landings and to send somebody into Normandy, he was a very senior diplomatic personality, former ambassador. And they decided that they wanted, in the rigors of a campaign in Normandy, where you never knew quite what was going to happen, they wanted two people, a younger officer to be the so-called POLAD, political advisor, who really was an advisor on international affairs, to work with General Eisenhower's staff, of course, and also particularly with the G-5 people, who had to do with the relationships with the military, the headquarters, the military, and the liberated civilian authorities in the areas as we gradually liberated them.

So I went into Normandy, went to London first for a couple of days' briefing. I was no hero in terms of landing in Normandy; the landings had been accomplished, the headquarters had been set up in Normandy, and I flew over in an old C-47 with some officers, and was in Normandy a relatively short time until it was clear that when General Patton broke out and started the big swing up in the encirclement, it was clear that the Germans were going to have to pull back or risk having very, very substantial numbers of their forces trapped.

I went to Bedell Smith, who was General Eisenhower's chief of staff, and said, "I'd like to go in with the T force into Paris for practical reasons connected with the fact that obviously, when Paris was liberated, the National Council of Resistance members, we would know who they were, and I'd like to establish contact with them immediately."

And Bedell laughed at me and said, "Doug, if you went in with the T force and you were shot, everybody in America would say we were putting civilians in front of our military guys to protect them. But you can go in the next day."

So Paris was liberated on the 25th, and I arrived the morning – we left very early – the morning of the 26th, with two general officers.

Q: This is 26 August 1944.

MACARTHUR: August. Yes. With two general officers. We drove up a road that I knew very well, up through Dreux and Houdan and La Queue-les-Yvelines, Trappes, Versailles, and as we headed in, these two general officers had never been in France before the landings, and I was feeling emotionally very charged up, because I had left Paris around the tenth of June 1940, with the Germans pursuing us. I was one of the three people that went to the French Government, the three American diplomats that went with the French Government as it retreated. And to be entering Paris and to see it for the first time, it was a beautiful day, not a cloud in the sky, the sun was warm, I suggested, as we drove in from Versailles, that we go through the Parc de St.-Cloud, which is a bluff above the Seine, just above the bridge of St.-Cloud, where you can look out and see all of Paris. They thought that was an excellent idea, so we went in with our escort and came to that marvelous sort of platform above the river, a cobblestone platform above the river, and there looked out, and before us was the Seine and the Bois de Boulogne, and the Eiffel Tower, and the dome of Les Invalides, the two towers of Notre Dame, and way off on the left was the glistening spire and dome of Sacre Coeur. I must say I was so emotionally moved that tears started streaming down my face to see this beautiful city totally intact.

So we drove in, and after I got set up in the general officers' hotel that had been taken over for the night, I went down to the embassy, where we found a very faithful French woman who had been in the embassy before, who had been kept on by the Swiss. I went into the embassy, and it was intact, except in several places where the fighting had occurred. Bullets had come through the windows, and one had pierced a portrait of a former ambassador. But there was firing still going on, and there were Germans holed up still in the foreign ministry, right across the Seine from La Place de Concorde, and in other places. You could hear the rat-a-tat-tat of machine gun fire as the forces cleaned them up, our American boys and the French boys in the LeClerc division, which General Eisenhower gave the honor of entering Paris first – quite properly.

Mixed up with all this was the confusion of all these Resistance fellows running around with their armbands, brassards, of different things, saying, "FIFI" or "FTP." Frontier Terre Partisan was the communist one: FIFI was the Free French Forces of the Interior, with (inaudible) guns firing guns into the air in joy. [Laughter] And the people of Paris just absolutely delirious. So it was emotional – still is, when I think of it – highly emotional.

Q: Did you have any instructions? There was this sort of uneasy relationship with General de Gaulle during this entire period. Did you have any instructions how to treat the various Resistance groups, especially those associated with General de Gaulle?

MACARTHUR: No, because by the time we landed, virtually all the Resistance groups, except the communist resistance group, Frontier Terre Partisan, were associated and had pledged allegiance to the Free French of General de Gaulle. There were people that had ambitions to be head of France and one thing or that kind, but there was no problem in dealing with the French Resistance. There was no problem with de Gaulle's people or from the French Resistance people with whom we knew. This was the thing that you had to play by ear. We had no instructions from the department that I recall, other than to establish and maintain contact with all our contacts across the broad spectrum of French political life, including the communists, because we were still allies of the Russians at that time. So that we did, and with the de Gaulle people, there was no problem at all. Some of them were people that immediately were surrounding him, that we had known before, like Gaston Palewski, who became his director of cabinet and sort of eminence, who screened everybody that went in and out, and Couve de Murville, both of whom I had known as inspecteur des finances before the war. There really was no problem at all insofar as the Quai d'Orsay was concerned.

Some of the people that I had worked with in Vichy, including Jean Chauvel, a marvelous man, had escaped and gotten over to London, and he came back and was set up as the secretary general of the French foreign office. So I had access through Jean, whom I knew intimately and whose wife was a great friend of ours, of my wife's. There were really no problems at all.

There was one problem, though, because de Gaulle moved in, but the CNR, the Conseil Nationale de la Resistance, kept its organization intact, kept its leadership, which included people like Bideau, who was later foreign minister and prime minister, Laniel, who was prime minister, and other people. They kept their organization intact and used to have regular meetings, where they felt that they were the people that had gone through the occupation, they knew what the French people wanted and needed, they felt much more than people that had been living in exile in London knew about the requirements of the situation.

So in that autumn, that is, in the early days, end of August, September, right up into October, I think, the Conseil Nationale de la Resistance, the highest Resistance body, they had grabbed a building that belonged to the Earl of Gloucester, a very nice building on the Left Bank, a big palatial residence. The Earl of Gloucester's son being then Lord Forbes, Arthur Forbes, an air commodore in the RAF, they commandeered that building and held regular meetings there, and they used to hold these meetings in the evening. Then I had arrangements with Laniel and a couple of them that I would go over about 10:30 and 11:00, when the meetings broke up. They would brief me on exactly the position they had taken at the meeting, with respect to what they would say to the government, because they did not consider themselves a government; they considered themselves the most knowledgeable advisory body that the de Gaulle people could have. I used to go back to the embassy and write out a telegram in longhand, so that Washington would know. After Mr. Caffery arrived there, with his full approval, I used to go out at 11:30 or 12:00 and let him look at the telegram, and then we'd send it, because that way it would be on the desk of the people here in Washington the next morning at 9:00 o'clock, whereas if we'd waited til the next morning, with the time difference, they wouldn't have gotten it until the following evening or the day after.

Q: Just to backtrack a little, when you arrived, you actually set up the embassy?

MACARTHUR: No. I arrived. I was the only person there. I was the first person into the embassy.

Q: You and the cleaning lady.

MACARTHUR: And the cleaning lady. Well, she was more than that; she was sort of a custodian.

The whole plan had been laid out that the people from North Africa – because we had a mission in North Africa, where General de Gaulle had moved following the successful landings there – Algiers. We had a mission headed by Selden Chapin. He had the rank, I think, of minister counselor. They were to come up that diplomatic representation, NEAR. They called it NEAR – the Free French Government in exile, the so-called Free French Government. They would come up and take over the embassy.

Q: NEAR? You said NEAR.

MACARTHUR: NEAR. You didn't accredit them, too. It was NEAR. Because the whole question – that was one of the thorny questions of the legitimacy of de Gaulle. As long as the de Gaulle government, the Free French, as they called it, was in exile, we had a diplomatic mission. NEAR, I think, was the euphemism they used, rather than accredited to, which would mean that you recognized it as the government before the people of France themselves had had an opportunity to express themselves as to what they wanted in free elections.

Q: I understand.

MACARTHUR: So they were to come up and assume the thing. Well, there was still shooting going on for three or four days after the 25th of August, and they finally, if I recall correctly, arrived up in the first week of September. Then Selden Chapin became chargé d'affaires of the embassy, and he brought up people that had been with him down there. It was a small group – Jerry Drew, there were about five or six officers. I was sort of set up as the political section, because I had had the good fortune to know so many of these people that suddenly had become very prominent.

Q: I want to go back to one thing, though, that you mentioned: your relationships with the various Resistance groups and so forth and de Gaulle people.

MACARTHUR: Our instructions were to keep in touch across the board so that we would be able to assess the situation, including the communist role of the French Communist Party, which, you may recall, when the Molotov-Ribbentrop agreement was signed in August of 1939, which precipitated World War II, because it gave Hitler's Germany a secure rear in Eastern Europe against Russian business, the French Communist Party denounced France and Britain's imperialistic war against Nazi Germany, was declared illegal by the Deladier Government, and it went underground. It just laid doggo and did absolutely nothing during the period of German occupation of the first year – that is, from June 1940 until June 1941. Of course, it was the only group that had in existence a secret cellular organization along classical communist lines, an underground, and it laid doggo until June 25-26, 1941, when Hitler's Germany attacked the Soviet Union. Then suddenly, this organization appeared as the leading resistance group, because it had its secret underground organization all in place, it had weapons, it had means of communication, it had people scattered – not scattered, but people in virtually every urban community, and it was prepared to go. And go it did. It started a campaign of sabotage and assassinations of Germans, sabotage of railway lines and things of that kind the Germans used, one thing and another.

But then as the liberation of France came, it became also clear – during this period, when I was there, after, that is, almost a year and a half between '41 and '42 . . .

Q: This was when you were in Vichy.

MACARTHUR: When I was in Vichy, yes. The FTP, the Frontier Terre Partisan, the communist people, I was in touch with some of them, but all they wanted was weapons from us. They didn't want to cooperate with anybody else or anything else; all they wanted was delivery of weapons. There were some arms drops to them made by the British, because it was in everybody's interest to have them creating problems for the Germans.

But at a time when the original, authentic Resistance was just getting really organized, because when France fell, there was no organization, there was another, it was just a few individuals or people or people with some leadership qualities here and there who said, "What can we do to help Britain? What can we do to make it tough on the Germans?" But there was no organization, nothing at all, and these little groups sprang up in different places. Then some of them came together, and then formed their larger réseaux, and then they had cross-relationships. But the Frontier Terre Partisan, the communist group, wouldn't play with any of those groups; they kept to themselves, and they manifested a tendency for complete authority. So that was the situation that existed when France was liberated.

Then we got disquieting reports as the Germans withdrew from Normandy and Brittany, in some areas where the FTP, the Frontier Terre Partisan, where they were strong, they took out some of the minor Resistance leaders who were known to be anti-communist, and shot them as collaborationists. These reports were disquieting.

So when I arrived in Paris, liberated Paris, at the end of August, in late August, one of the first persons I made contact with was Marcel Cachan, the head of the French Communist Party, who I had met when I worked in the embassy before the war, because I worked for a while with Lawrence Higgins. The embassy was divided into sections; one had the left, and one had the more conservative elements, and another man had primary responsibility for the political thinking of industrial leaders and the like. I worked with him, and I'd met Cachan, had been in his apartment, and Madame Cachan, I think, had been born in Boston, although, I think, of French parents. She spoke accented English. So two days after I arrived in Paris, there were Frontier Terre people all over the place, and I saw a lieutenant of Frontier Terre, and I had prepared a little message to Cachan, saying, "Dear Mr. Cachan, mon cher Monsieur Cachan, I don't know if you . . ." It was in French, of course. ". . . if you remember me or not, but I'm So-and-so, and we met [and so forth]. I'd be happy to see you." I gave it to this lieutenant of Frontier Terre Partisan, who was there and seemed to be in charge of some people that were massed around the Place de la Concorde, some FTP people.

The next morning, I was in the embassy. This was before the people of North Africa had arrived. I was in the embassy, and the next morning a FTP guy – they had a guard. We put a guard at the embassy. He said, "There's something to see you."

I went down, and he said, "Be standing out on the corner of the Place de la Concorde, right at the corner of your embassy, sharply at 12:00 o'clock, and a car will pick you up and take you to see Monsieur Cachan."

So I went out and stood on the corner, and sure enough, promptly at 12:00 o'clock, a car drove up, a little Citroen, with three people in it – a driver and two tommy gunners with tommy guns, one in the back and one in front. When I came up, they put me in front, and the two guys with the tommy guns got in back, and we drove out to the so-called red belt of Paris, and we stopped in front of one of those mass small apartment dwellings that had been built for the French workers, and got out. The two tommy gunners escorted me up to the door, and inside the door there was another man with a tommy gun. He checked me again for weapons. Then they took me to an apartment on the first floor, knocked on the door. It was opened by another guy with a tommy gun. I went in and there embraced my friend Mr. Cachan, who I had not seen. Mr. Cachan then described to me what had happened to him during the war, how he had grown a beard. He showed me a picture. He had a flowing white beard, much more whiskers than Santa Claus. I understand how he was able, with false identities, not to be recognized, because nobody would have recognized him. We had an excellent lunch, aided by a bottle of wine, with his wife, who was very much a part of his political communist life. It was a very interesting conversation.

Then after I'd been with him about two and a half hours, we wound up. I had questioned him about what their plans were for the future, one thing and another, and what the role of the party would be. We had a long back-and-forth about the history of the party in France and what it should be and what its role should be. He made it clear that the French communists were loyal to France, but that it was time for a new era, the people who had been responsible for the war and all the ills of the war should no longer have any role to play, and that the French Communist Party should be the vanguard of a peaceful revolution.

Q: Did the question come up, what would the role of the United States be in the future of France at all?

MACARTHUR: No. They knew that we were deeply engaged and committed. They knew from statements that the government had made that we would do everything we could to alleviate the suffering that was bound to exist in a liberated France that had been deprived of things for so long. But I don't recall any particular probing on his part about our activities or policies, because what everybody wanted in every party, regardless of their own political views, was American aid and assistance to get France back on its feet. So the problem never came up. But I did do a long report which I sent. I used to send these to Doc Matthews in numbered letters, rather than at that particular time, in those first days, we could send telegrams through military channels to the State Department, and we could send things through a form of pouch, which is what I did, because we had no diplomatic pouch. But the military had facilities to get back to the Pentagon, and they shifted the stuff over. So in that first period until we got set up with Selden Chapin and his people and had a code room and our own facilities, and had a diplomatic courier tied in with the one in London, and so forth, I used the military facilities.

Q: You said that Jefferson Caffery came rather soon after.

MACARTHUR: Yes. Jefferson Caffery came in September, the latter part of September. He was obviously Doc Mathew's candidate for the job. Matthews had worked with him as a DCM in Latin America. Caffery had had experience. He had served in France after World War I as an embassy secretary. He spoke some French. But Caffery was not a very articulate man. He was very bright and perceptive, but he was not very articulate; he had sort of a stammer or a stutter. But he was bright and ran an excellent embassy, I must say. He knew how to manage his human resources and get the most out of them very well indeed. He, not having been associated with any of the politicians of pre-war France, that the de Gaullists blamed for France's debacle that had occurred to France, he was, in one respect, as pure as snow insofar as they were concerned. He didn't have any close ties to the old guard that had gone out with the war, but some of whom were trying to make a comeback. He got along extremely well with – I say "extremely well" – he got along well with General de Gaulle. I remember that General de Gaulle had a small dinner not too long after Caffery arrived, at which I think there were ten people – General and Mrs. De Gaulle, George Bideau and Suzy Bideau as foreign minister and his wife – she was a former career diplomat – Ambassador Caffery and his wife, myself and my wife.

Q: Your wife had joined you by this time.

MACARTHUR: She had joined me by this time. This was the end of October, beginning of November. And two of his staff, Colonel Guy, I think, and Palewski. But it was a very intimate dinner. The general was very kind to me because I had helped some of his people who had been parachuted in during the Vichy days. The embassy's relationship with not only de Gaulle, but with these disparate Resistance leaders, who were part of the French system because they were all elected to the Parliament in landslides in the first elections and the like, was really very, very good. There were no problems. The problems, of course, arose for France as the communists made it increasingly clear that they planned, eventually, to run the country.

Q: I was looking through the foreign relations series, and I noted that by January of 1945, Ambassador Caffery was saying that the French were very sensitive about some things, that they felt that the United States was treating German prisoners too well, much better than German POWs would be treated by Germans in Germany, and that the United States wasn't giving enough supplies, and that we weren't clearing out the Germans who were still in the channel fortresses, such as St. Lazare, Brest, and all, and that the Americans were treating the French like children, and also the Americans didn't believe the stories about what the Gestapo had done in France. I mean, it was obviously a time of sensitivity.

MACARTHUR: There were these news reports that we got of ill treatment of German prisoners of war. I was not personally involved in any investigations or anything, because, if I recall correctly, these prisoners were largely being held in northern France or Germany...

Q: Mr. Ambassador, in a tape that we did before, for technical reasons, we didn't really cover your mission as a young officer to General Weygand very well. I wonder if we could go over that once again. Could you explain how that took place?

MACARTHUR: Certainly. You will recall that the Japanese attacked Pearl Harbor on December 7, 1941, which brought us into the war. And shortly after that attack in December, Prime Minister Winston Churchill came to the United States to meet with the President, because that act of the Japanese attack at Pearl Harbor brought us into World War II. They discussed strategy and tactics and all sorts of things, the role of the United States, which is all a matter of history. But they also discussed in some detail the question of a second landing, or a landing, rather, in France. They reached the conclusion that the best way to eventually liberate France was to first go in and move in and take over North Africa, which would provide a springboard for either a second front, a dual attack on German-occupied France, or a springboard up through Italy and the like.

The problem that they faced was that in French North Africa there were elements that were not terribly pro-de Gaulle. They wanted to find a French leader that was respected, who could rally the French military, which had some strength in North Africa, to the Allied cause, as well as the general population. And they came to the conclusion that General Weygand was the person. General Weygand had been in France in French North Africa, and he was known to bitterly oppose any effort by the Germans to take over North Africa, to occupy French North Africa. In fact, he was finally removed from his position of commander of the French forces in North Africa by the Vichy Government at German request.

I might add a personal thought, that the rather difficult personal relationships and feelings that President Roosevelt had for de Gaulle probably played an important part in seeking someone other than de Gaulle to head up the French effort in North Africa.

Q: Do you think President Roosevelt was also looking to the future beyond, to develop a new leader other than de Gaulle to deal with France?

MACARTHUR: Well, he did not personally like General de Gaulle. I mean, that is a matter of record. And I think, basically, he was looking for somebody that the French could rally to other than de Gaulle. I should add, parenthetically, jumping ahead a bit, that at a later date, President Roosevelt also tried to set General Giraud up as an alternative, if you will, to General de Gaulle.

But to go back to the Weygand mission, when this was decided, Doc Matthews, H. Freeman

Matthews, who was consular of the embassy in London, and who had been our chargé d'affaires in Vichy, France, and the Vichy Government until he was assigned to London, after Admiral Leahy had arrived and taken over, and who knew, Doc Matthews knew intimately the atmospherics inside the so-called unoccupied zone of France, he was called to Washington to participate in some of these meetings. And then it was decided by Roosevelt and Churchill that an effort should be made to enlist General Weygand on a contingency basis, that if it was necessary to go into French North Africa, we hoped that he would head up the movement in support of Allied landings.

Doc Matthews then flew to Portugal on his way back to England, and there he contacted Butch Leverich, who was a second secretary, as I recall it.

Q: Butch Leverich?

MACARTHUR: Henry Leverich, I think his name was. He was known as Butch, as his nickname. Doc Matthews got Leverich, and had Leverich memorize, in great detail, the instructions which would be sent to the embassy in Vichy, with respect to contacting General Weygand. The instructions were extremely detailed. And I remember that a message came in – I can't remember if it was from the department or from Doc Matthews – to our embassy in Vichy, saying that Leverich would arrive from Portugal with some extremely important instructions for Admiral Leahy, our ambassador, and myself.

We awaited Leverich's arrival in Vichy with great interest, because we didn't have a clue what this was all about, and when he arrived, he gave us, in great detail, the full message. And what the full message involved was A) a completely innocuous but very nice letter from President Roosevelt to General Weygand, a short, friendly letter. This letter was to serve as the credentials to establish the bona fide of the oral message which would accompany the delivery of this written message. Doc Matthews had suggested that because, obviously, it was impossible for Admiral Leahy, the ambassador, to go anywhere without being followed, and because the admiral did not speak French, that I should be the emissary that carried out this mission, as I was the only officer that had been continuously in France since the fall, since 1940, when the Vichy Government had set up, and knew a great many people, and knew my way around, and had friends in various Resistance organizations and groups. Admiral Leahy concurred in that decision, and I was assigned to carry out the mission.

The first problem was to find out where General Weygand lived. We did not dare go and start asking our French Resistance friends where General Weygand might be found in France, in unoccupied France. We knew he was someplace there after he had been relieved by the Vichy Government of his duties in North Africa. Because we feared that some loose-talking Resistance fellow might say, "Well, I wonder why the American Embassy in Vichy is asking where Weygand is. What's up?" And news could spread swiftly. Secondly, if we asked a Resistance member, who was quite reliable, or we thought was quite reliable, and the Gestapo should pick him up and torture him, and it came out, the mission could be blown also. So all we had heard about General Weygand was that he was living someplace in the south of France, in Provence, someplace near the French Riviera.

So we then developed a cover story, and the cover story was that since I had been in Vichy since the beginning of the Vichy regime, virtually, I was tired, needed a rest, wanted to get away with my wife and daughter from the very ingrown and strange atmosphere of Vichy, which had a collaborationist government, and wanted ten days' rest someplace. And with this cover story, my wife, my daughter, the daughter's nurse, took off in my little Ford car for the south of France, and we proceeded to Cannes, which we had known before the war. And we stayed at a hotel that was open. It was in January by this time. It was cold, damp. There was occasional sleet. But the good life was still going on, and a casino which was open every night for gambling, collaborationists, and people of that sort with money to spend, and so my wife and I decided that the best way – or the only way, really – to try to find out where Weygand lived, without giving away the show, was to go to the casino and have a few drinks of champagne and gamble a bit, strike up acquaintances with some of these people that were there, and then individually, she or I, depending on what personal group we were with, would say something like, "Isn't it a pity that there isn't a single famous well known Frenchman left on the Cote d'Azur, when before the war it was filled with well known personalities like the Windsors and international personalities like the Ali Khan and all sorts of French wealthy people of various classes and the like?"

So for about four nights, we ruined our alimentary canals by going to the casino each night, gambling, having a few drinks, picking up people here and there, chatting with them, and we tried this gambit on them. And nobody came up with anything. They all said, "Yes, it's very sad that there are no longer any French people here." And we got very discouraged.

By this time, I believe it was a Sunday, it was a very rainy day, the casino wasn't open, and we drove over to Juan les Pins for luncheon, which is a small, little Riviera village just before the peninsula that sticks out to the east of Cannes, that houses the Hotel de Pacques and some of the famous properties. We found a delightful little bistro, a French restaurant, and there we ran into two couples who were having drinks before luncheon, attractive young Frenchmen and women, and we started chatting with them. They were interested in the fact that we were Americans but spoke French, and they were also interested that we came from Vichy. So we had a few more glasses of wine and had lunch together, and then my wife tried the gambit about, "Isn't it a pity there are no longer French people?"

And one of these girls who lived in Grasse, about 15 kilometers up in the hills above Cannes, said, "Well, there's one famous Frenchman that is still there, and is still down here, and that's General Weygand, who lives at the Hotel So and So, about a kilometer or two from Grasse."

So with this golden nugget of information, we returned to our hotel and ordered a bottle of champagne, and then got ready for the next day. The next day, I asked carefully about the parfumerie, a factory in Grasse that I asked the concierge of the hotel, said that I wanted to go up to Grasse and visit the famous parfumerie, where they made these marvelous French perfumes. So he gave me instructions, and my wife and daughter and nurse, we all took off and drove up that day, just before lunch, and visited the parfumerie, and found out where the hotel was. Then we had lunch. Bought a bit of perfume at the parfumerie, and then we had lunch.

After lunch, we drove to about a half a kilometer from the hotel, which was on a rather deserted road, and my wife and daughter and the nurse got out under the trees, and I walked to the hotel. I arrived, and I had written out a little card to General Weygand, which said, in effect, “Dear General Weygand, I am the nephew of General MacArthur and served with the French Army, and who knew and respected you. I served in the French Army in World War II under General Giraud, and knew and respected you greatly, and I’d like to pay my respects.” And I had this all ready in an envelope, addressed to General Weygand. I went into the hotel and asked if the letter, without identifying myself, could be delivered to the Weygand apartment, and I would await a reply.

I got word down to please come up to the apartment. I went up, and there was Madame Weygand, who said the general was out for a walk, but would I not come in and have some tea with her. So I went in and had tea, and we chatted inconsequentially about one thing or another, and then the general returned. I then gave him the rather very nice but innocuous letter from President Roosevelt, and said that the letter which I presented him, which he read and asked me if I would thank the President for his good wishes, I said, “The letter is simply to establish my bona fide. I have a very important and personal message for you from President Roosevelt.”

I then started off by saying, which was part of the instructions which I had, which Leverich had memorized and brought from Lisbon, that there had recently been three new international developments of great significance. The first were the serious German military reverses in Russia, which raised questions about a final German victory; the second were the recent British successes, which made it impossible for Hitler to seize the Suez Canal and have control over North Africa and the Middle East; and the third was the entry of the United States into the war as a result of the attack on Pearl Harbor, the entry into the war on the side of the British and the Allies, with this tremendous economic and industrial and military potential, which would greatly increase the strength of the Allies and their ability to successfully prosecute the war against Nazi Germany.

I said that while these developments, in the judgment of our government, meant clearly that Germany could not win the war, they led the American Government, at the same time, to attach particular importance to French North Africa, because what happened in North Africa, French North Africa, could affect the length of the war, the number of people of occupied countries that might die as a result of it, and it could also play an important role, ultimately, in the liberation of metropolitan France.

Knowing, as the President of our government did, of the French sensibilities about being replaced in the French colonies, which the German propaganda had been spreading assiduously throughout France from the moment that France fell, to divide them from the British, saying that the British and later the Americans wanted to take over all French colonies after the war. Knowing this, my instructions included saying to General Weygand that the President wanted him to know that the United States intends to see to it that the integrity of France and her empire is respected after the war, and that the French possessions in North Africa would remain in French hands. The United States had no desire to replace France, nor to see the British or supporters of de Gaulle take over that area, knowing that Weygand, parenthetically, did not appreciate General de Gaulle too much.

I then went on with General Weygand to say that in the light of what was obviously a German objective, which was to seize French North Africa, the President wanted Weygand to know that if there were any indications that the Germans were or might move against North Africa, the United States would be obliged to take protective action to keep French North Africa from falling into German hands. These steps would necessarily include an attack on German forces, should they move into North Africa. In other words, if there was any indication of a change in the status quo of North Africa, we would be obliged to act. And insofar as what changes in the status quo might entail, I listed several, which were: 1) the replacement by the government of Marshal Petain by government until total German domination; that is, simply a completely puppet government; the utilization of the French fleet against America or its Allies; the ceding of African bases by the Vichy Government to the Germans. We knew the Germans had been asking for bases in French North Africa. A military threat against North Africa, such as preparations for a German attack through Spain or from any other direction; and finally, if there were signs of German infiltration into North Africa, which was clearly an indication of a prelude to an attempt to take it over.

I said that the President greatly regretted that General Weygand was no longer in French North Africa to cope with the German endeavors to take over that vital area, and the principal objective of my call was the President's desire to know whether in the event of any of the eventualities leading to a major threat against North Africa, which I had listed, occurred, whether General Weygand would be willing to play a role of leadership in French North Africa. The President, I said, believed that no one was as well-equipped and as knowledgeable and as respected as he was to fulfill that role, and that such a mission could greatly speed the liberation of metropolitan France from the Nazi occupation.

General Weygand replied to me that, in effect, he no longer had any role to play, civil or military. He was retired, he was out of action, and he did not feel that he could play any role in the events of the scenario that I had described.

I then said to him that I had been asked specifically by the President to say that if he could not accept the role which the President had in mind, in the event the Germans attempted to take over North Africa, that he would keep entirely secret and to himself the proposal which I had made to him and outlined to him; it was to go no further. And General Weygand replied that he could not, in honor, do so. He was honor-bound to inform Marshal Petain, and he would inform Marshal Petain.

I said that Marshal Petain lived in the Hotel de Pacques in Vichy, which was riddled with collaborationists, and that if he did so, word would probably get back to the Germans very swiftly. And he looked at me and said, "I have ways of doing this so that the Marshal alone will know, and I know the Marshal will not break the confidence that I impose, and that the knowledge of this will go no further."

So that was the end of a mission which ended in failure. But there is, however, an epilogue. I went back to Vichy, and we reported cryptically, as we'd been instructed to do, the message that the initiative had not succeeded. Admiral Leahy sent a telegram which was for the President's eyes only, through a special communication channel which, I think, has been later released. But there is an epilogue. About a month later, after my return to Vichy, the admiral called on Marshal

Petain, and I went along, as usual, as the interpreter. And the admiral went in and shook hands with the Marshal and said, "I've brought along, as usual, Mr. MacArthur, to interpret for me."

And the Marshal looked at me with a quizzical smile and said, "Monsieur MacArthur, I believe you've been doing a bit of traveling lately." And he smiled again. In fact, he said, "I think you've been visiting with your family in the south of France." And the Marshal never let anyone know, Laval or any of the others, know about this initiative, which indeed he did keep entirely to himself.

Q: Let's start all over again on this part about Yalta.

MACARTHUR: After the Yalta Conference, the date and place had been agreed to by Roosevelt, Churchill, and Stalin, but before the conference was actually held, President Roosevelt sent Harry Hopkins to Europe to meet and consult with various European leaders and with General Eisenhower. He came to Paris, and General Eisenhower put him up at the Brown House, which was a special guesthouse that General Eisenhower had as Supreme Allied Commander. And a little dinner was arranged at Brown House, with General Eisenhower, Bedell Smith, his executive chief of staff, Winston Churchill flew over from London, Duff Cooper, the British ambassador to Paris was there. I've forgotten who Churchill brought with him. Jefferson Caffery, the American ambassador, was there. And I accompanied Ambassador Caffery to this very small, intimate dinner. Harry Hopkins was the star of the occasion. He was the one who was the occasion for the dinner. I recall, without going into all the details of the discussions and the back-and-forths, the fact that the French had felt very, very insulted – or de Gaulle had felt very insulted – about not being included. I remember that Churchill, I believe it was, who asked Harry Hopkins the following question. He said, "Does the President really believe that as a result of our cooperation with Russia, with the Soviet Union, during the war, that after the war Stalin will change in any way his ambitions and the declared intention of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union to see its system triumph throughout the world? Does he really believe there's a good chance or there is a chance of that?"

To which Harry Hopkins replied, "The boss," he said, "feels that after all we've done for the Russians, lend-lease support, cooperation, that there's a good chance, a 50-50 chance that he can turn Stalin into a good Democrat."

I was shocked by this answer, because it was quite clear at that time that the Soviet Union, through the French Communist Party, was doing everything it could to be disruptive inside France and create a situation from which it might – that is, the French Communist Party – might ultimately emerge as the primary influence of any French Government. But there it was.

I should add that we had had, all through that early partial liberation period of France, that is, partial in the sense that the greater part of France had been liberated, sign after sign that the French Communist Party's true intent and certainly there was at that time no Communist Party in the world more totally subservient to Moscow than the French Communist Party. They supported the Ribbentrop-Molotov Pact that brought on the war. Then when the Soviet Union was attacked by Hitler, they turned right around, and in the early liberation period, as some of the towns were liberated, the communists, who were perhaps in that area, who, when they happened to be most powerful, would on a number of occasions take out other Resistance leaders who were known for their anti-communist feeling, but were staunch French Resistance leaders, they were taken out and shot as collaborationists, they also looted banks. When the Germans withdrew, the FTP, the French Communist Resistance organization, would move right in on a bank and loot it, and we had one very serious incident where a convoy of six FTP trucks was challenged by an American sentry group on a road in France. And instead of stopping, they pulled out their guns and started shooting at our guards. We shot back and killed some of them and captured some of them, and the five trucks were loaded with the French currency that they had looted from a small city that had been liberated several days earlier, and the FTP had seized the money in the banks before our forces arrived and took over the town.

So there were all these indications that the French Communist Party was really trying to bring about a situation where eventually it would be the government of France.

Q: In your role in the political section of the embassy, were you able to report this, even in a wartime situation, where the communists are Allies?

MACARTHUR: Yes. We not only reported it, but I still was acting as the liaison with the SHAPE staff. And the military, of course, our military reported it back once through military channels. We reported it through our channels, because we got it through our military. There were people that told us about this incident. But one must remember that after four years of German occupation, when France was liberated, there was a mess in the sense that there were all kinds of splinter groups, splinter Resistance groups of various kinds while de Gaulle had an overall umbrella over the Resistance. There were individual groups, some of leaders who had centrist or center right aspirations; other non-communist leaders of the socialist-left persuasion, and the political situation was extremely fragmented. There was also a situation at that time where, after the liberation, although de Gaulle moved in and established his government, the National Resistance Council, which was the top Resistance body that brought together the Resistance leaders of many groups into the National Resistance Council, the Conseil Nationale de la Resistance, all groups – except the communists, who refused to participate with other groups, kept to themselves – they held meetings. The National Resistance Council held meetings several times a week on policies that the government had decided. And in those meetings, there were frequently very substantial disagreements within the National Council of Resistance on what should be done in that early post-liberation period.

Because of my friendship with several members of the National Council of the Resistance, including Joseph Laniel, the big Resistance leader from Normandy, and Ito, whom I knew, and Tsetjin, I used to go over at 10:30 at night and wait until the meeting broke up, and then I would get from one or two different sources an account of what they had been up to or what they had been discussing.

Q: Go ahead.

MACARTHUR: So later, when we had a rather chaotic domestic political situation, where the Fourth Republic was finally formed, but in the Fourth Republic, if a prime minister lasted a couple of months, it was almost a miracle, it was, in part, a result of this terrific fragmentation of political views, and the resistance of some people to de Gaulle's government – that is, the initial government that was set up there before the elections were held eventually that brought the constitution in the Fourth Republic, which in itself, because of the instability, some of which I've mentioned, was later replaced by the Fifth Republic.

Q: Running the political section at that time, what was your role? Did you report on this? Were there instructions of how to make them move?

MACARTHUR: I don't recall any instructions. Our role was to encourage, to the extent possible, stability in the French political system, but if you know the French as I know them, it's very difficult for a foreigner to offer suggestions to a Frenchman about what he might or might not be doing, without creating a very, very considerable backlash. And our basic effort was concentrated certainly on reporting. I think, because of my background, I was one that had the very large number of contacts with different people in the French military, as well as the French Resistance people who turned out to be future political leaders of one kind or another. But we had a special section that dealt with the communist-left, under Norris Chipman, which reported and followed very closely what the communists were doing, and that section of the embassy reported, at the specific request of the department, that felt certain that we had been infiltrated by Soviet moles, and they were proven right, as the Alger Hiss trial later proved, and Harry Dexter White's suicide.

Q: He was in the Treasury.

MACARTHUR: He was the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury and worked for the Soviet Union, and committed suicide when it all started unraveling. We had a special office in the State Department, to which Norris Chipman's numbered reports went, and then went directly to Doc Matthews and Jimmy Dunn. Jimmy Dunn was the head of the European bureau, and Doc was his deputy. We did not dare trust at that time reporting on communist activity through ordinary channels, for fear that it would be back to Moscow within 36 hours.

Q: How were you informed of this particular problem?

MACARTHUR: Well, we were informed of it through people like Ray Murphy, who headed the special little office in the department that dealt with this problem. I mean, it was no secret what the Russians were up to then, and that's why many of us were so disappointed at the Roosevelt performance at Yalta. The first thing that you know when you deal with the Russians is that if you get an agreement, you have to nail down every single clause in airtight fashion; otherwise, if you just sign some general agreement that you agree in mother love, that you agree with mother love and be kind to animals and that sort of thing, the Soviets will run with that 1,000 miles before you can even see them. Certainly that's what happened at Yalta, when they agreed to free elections. I remember later when we challenged Molotov about that at the Berlin Conference, he said, "But the elections are free."

We said, "Yes, elections are free, but you have to be a member of the Communist Party and you can only vote for the member that the Party sets up a single candidate set up by the Party."

Molotov replied, “Yes, but anybody can vote, or they can vote ‘no’ if they want to, or they can vote for that man or oppose him.” And the performance at Yalta was one for which, at that time, when we had the monopoly of the weapon, and we had a great deal of cards to play, one of which we didn’t do ourselves a great amount of good.

Q: Was this perceived at the time, basically throughout the officers?

MACARTHUR: Well, it was certainly perceived by those of us in the European bureau, and I think there was no mystification, I think, in the minds of people who had responsibility for Soviet affairs in the Foreign Service. Certainly Norris Chipman had served in Moscow, and that was why he was picked to come to Paris, because he knew there were no scales on his eyes about what the Soviet leadership was really up to in terms of the rest of Europe. And while Chip Bohlen was perhaps never as vocal on the subject of what they were up to as Norris Chipman, I’ve talked to Chip, I knew him well, many, many times, and there was certainly not a shadow of a doubt about his understanding of what they were up to. Actually, how we knew that they knew that Hiss and Harry Dexter White were working and passing information to the Soviets, I don’t know. I don’t know what the details are.

Q: But you knew that in the atmosphere . . .

MACARTHUR: But we knew that both of them were passing things on to the Soviet Union, and we knew that in that atmosphere and with what the Soviets were trying to do through the use of the French Communist Party, if it got back to them, it would make the job that much easier for them, if they knew what we knew about what they were trying to do. So we also had some brilliant people who had left the Party. You must remember that when the French Communist Party was formed, it was a split-away from the Socialist Party, after the Socialist Congress of Tours, in 1917 – I think it was 1917; it could have been a little later – the communist wing, there was no French Communist Party then, the ultra Marxist left of the wing splintered away and formed the French Communist Party. And among those people were a number of people who were idealists. One in particular, whose real name I’ve forgotten now, he had a pseudonym, was a member, until the 1930s, was a member of the Politburo of the Party, and he and another member of the Politburo split away, when finally they understood, during the great Stalin purges, that this was not a great social experiment that was designed to lift the well-being of man and make life a better place for all people, in democratic political surroundings; that it was a simple, total power autocracy with expansionist desire. And indeed, these people, who were close to people in the Communist Party, although they’d split from it, were a very, very valuable source of information to Norris Chipman and to myself, when Norris was away. There were a number of them, and they knew exactly what was up. They knew the leadership of the Communist Party intimately; they knew all about them. They knew they had their feelers into the Party, and so they kept us very, very well informed at that time.

Q: Turning away from dealing with the Communist Party, but dealing with the French Government towards the end of the war, you wore two hats. You were both working with Eisenhower’s headquarters and with the embassy. Were there any particular problems?

MACARTHUR: Yes. After I left, after the liberation of Paris, there on General Eisenhower’s staff in Normandy, then I was assigned to the – they had a SHAPE liaison group, and I was assigned to that. Then when I was reassigned to the embassy, my official membership in the SHAPE liaison group was severed, but the informal relationship of working with them continued on. So I continued to work with them and be sort of a channel, if you will, middle-level channel, of information that they wanted passed on to the ambassador in the embassy.

And in the military sphere, we ran into one very serious problem just before the end of the war. I think it was in April. As Germany was beginning to collapse and the eastern front was giving way, and we were advancing on the continent, our intelligence had information that the Germans might try to regroup in an Austrian redoubt in the Alps, and if that happened successfully, it could represent a very difficult target because of the terrain, and we could lose a hell of a lot of Allied lives. So a drive was put on. General Eisenhower mounted a drive which was to kick off and strike – I guess it was across the Rhine and in toward the heartland of the so-called Austrian redoubt, and cut off any connection.

In the Allied forces, of course, the French Army was included in the Allied forces under the overall command of General Eisenhower. The advance led by a French general, was triggered to kick off – I think this was in April of '44, at 5:00 in the morning or something like that. There had been heavy preparation before artillery barrages and things of that kind, and then to the consternation of our forces, of our commander of the Army group of which the French Army was a part, the French Army, instead of advancing in the direction of the line of battle, as indicated in the plans, marched right across the front – I think it was the French Ninth Army or one of the armies – to grab Stuttgart and Hume. In other words, it advanced at a 90-degree angle, directly across the front of the advancing Americans. We either had the choice of shooting our way through the French or holding up the advance. We held up the advance for 36 hours, and this created a real crisis. The answer was that General de Gaulle had given the orders to the French commander, and he so informed our Army group commander to take these places, and this is part of his move to move into this part of Germany, so that France would have a zone of occupation or a larger zone of occupation than it might otherwise have had. This did nothing, of course, to make our government any happier about General de Gaulle. I think President Truman had taken over by that time. President Roosevelt had died.

Q: Yes, I think that final push into Bavaria had taken place after, probably in late March, early April.

MACARTHUR: I think it was early April. And of course, President Truman, one of our great Presidents, it didn't do much to give him much confidence in General de Gaulle, to have a partner in a war, with a world war going on, who, when the plan has been accepted, or you understand has been accepted, and everybody has their orders to march, suddenly disrupts the whole plan because of his own political objectives.

I had one other interesting experience at that time. As we moved forward in April and started liberating these concentration camps, I alerted the T forces every time we passed through the SHAPE liaison group of the . . .

Q: The T forces?

MACARTHUR: The task forces. The T force is the force that goes in first. It's the attack force, the initial point force, that goes into the area of combat, the objective that you're trying to take. I gave to all CORE and Army headquarters a list of people who had worked with us in the Resistance that I knew personally or whom I knew of because their group had worked with us, who were missing. Because during the period '44-'44, there had been a terrible blood-letting of the French Resistance. A lot of the reseaux, the Resistance groups, had been broken, and a great many people disappeared.

From Dachau, I got word that one of the finest contacts that had done a great deal for us in the Vichy days, with two other people that I had worked with, were alive in Bergen-Belsen, had been picked up alive. They all had tuberculosis and were very ill, but they survived. And then I got word from Gaston Palewski, General de Gaulle's director of cabinet, and his sort of imminence grise, that they would like me to go forward when Dachau was liberated, to see if I could find any of the listed Resistance leaders that they would give me still alive, and if so, if I could evacuate them back at once to Paris. So I went forward to General Sandy Patch's headquarters in a little L5, I guess it was called, a little two-passenger liaison open biplane, and got there the day before the liberation, the night before they were going to move in the next morning, and then went forward and stayed with the medical groups behind the T force, until the T force went in and the shooting stopped.

I went into the camp, and the Germans in these PW camps, Dachau then had 32,500 people still in it, they divided them up into national groups, a French group, an Italian group, this group, and Dutch, and they quartered them together, and they had one man who, in French, is known as the chef de fil, the head man, and the Germans would only deal with one man in that national contingent. So I went forward, and it was the most ghastly spectacle I've ever seen in my life. As we advanced toward the camp when the shooting stopped, there was a train on the side with about 50 boxcars, a terrible smell coming from it, but there was a trail of bodies from one of the cars. They'd obviously broken open the doors, and there was a trail of skeletons. I couldn't call them bodies; there was nothing but bones and skin. It went about 100 feet and then stopped, where they simply collapsed and died. The rest were just dead bodies in these boxcars. They'd been moved from another camp, and they had never been let out of the boxcars.

I got into the camp, and there was a mound of bodies outside of what was the crematorium, a mound of bodies 12 feet high, perhaps 150, 200 feet long, something over virtually 8,000, 10,000 bodies. There were people dying. As I came in, a man was sitting against the front, just a skeleton with skin, looked up at me, and he whispered something. I leaned over to listen, and I understood him to say, "Cigarette, cigarette." I pulled out a cigarette and lit it and put it in his mouth, and he gave me a beautiful smile, and then he just fell over dead.

But in any event, I finally found the chef de fil of the French, and to my amazement, he was number three or four on de Gaulle's list. I said to him that I had a plane, and I could take 26 people back, would he designate 26 people, Resistance people, from this list that General de Gaulle had given me to fly back to Paris. And of course, he would be one of them. He looked at me with great pain in his eyes, and he said, "I am the leader of the French group. There are 3,200 Frenchmen here still alive." He said, "They're dying like flies." He said, "I will leave Dachau when the last Frenchman has been repatriated or died, because some of them are never going to make it back.” And he did. He stayed three and a half weeks.

Q: With the French dealing with the problems of peace, I believe there were peace negotiations going on during the time you were there.

MACARTHUR: There were indeed, and the embassy was involved to a certain extent. Jimmy Byrnes, our Secretary of State, former Senator Byrnes, came over with a delegation from Washington, but the people in the embassy were drafted to serve on various subcommittees, working groups, you might call them, international, of the peace council group. I served on a subcommittee of a group that was deliberating the French-Italian border. You remember that after France fell, Italians, who had been neutral until Paris and France fell, stabbed the . . .

Q: The hand that held the dagger in the back.

MACARTHUR: (Laughs) Yes. They stabbed the French in the back, and the French were determined to have a hunk of that Italian territory as a bit of payment for that. I got my first real experience with negotiating with the Soviets. They, of course, were part of the peace . . .

Q: This was about what period are we talking about?

MACARTHUR: We’re talking about ‘46, ‘47. It’s after the war is over and the peace machinery has been set up and so forth. I’ll never forget. The Soviets, if they disagreed with – there was general agreement on the Allied side, the British, French, and American side, but the Soviets, when they disagreed, would go on and on and on and on. I discovered later, when I was responsible as coordinator for some of our negotiations in the post-war period with the Soviets, that it’s a standing tactic. You wear the guy down. You go on, and you go on, and 8:00 comes, and 9:00 comes, and 10:00 comes, and 11:00 comes, and 12:00 comes. I remember once they simply want to wear you down. Once we were there until 5:00 in the morning, and we just sat it out, and eventually, when they saw they weren’t going to get what they were after, they folded up, not then, but the next day, when they saw that we were not going to finally in fatigue or whatever it might be, just sort of say, “Oh, well, what the hell. Let’s give an inch here or there,” or something like that. But one of the tactics, there are two basic tactics. One is to wear the opposite negotiator that’s on the other side down, but the basic tactic is to get language that is so vague and general that it is subject to almost any interpretation that they want to give it, and that is why any negotiation with the Soviets – any negotiation – it’s got to be spelled out to the last word and every “t” crossed and every “I” dotted, or else you’re going to find yourself that you’ve got absolutely nothing, and they’re proceeding ahead and saying, “Well, the agreement says this and this, and that’s what we’re doing within the terms of the agreement.”

Q: How did the negotiations you were involved in work out, between the French and the Italians?

MACARTHUR: I don’t even remember, it was such a small, inconsequential part of the business as a whole. I think there was a section of a small piece of territory, if I recall correctly, but it was not terribly important.

The most serious problem we had with France then, at that time, involved the so-called European Defense Community. Basic to American policy after World War II, with respect to western Europe, had been the question at the very center of our policy, was the problem of Germany. How could you weave Germany into a western European fabric, economically, politically, militarily, so that the German strings would only be part of the strings that composed that fabric? And if at some future time undependable leadership emerged in Germany, it would become extremely difficult for the Germans to unravel their threads of this European fabric and go their own way, floating between east and west or signing up with the wrong side. And, of course, in pursuit of that policy, we ran immediately into the centuries-old animosity between France and Germany and the bitterness that still existed in that early post-war period on the part of the French, because of the German victory and occupation of France, and the suffering they had gone through, and the rest of it. It was quite obvious to us that without Germany in some form of European fabric, the defense of Europe would be extremely difficult. To try to defend Europe on the Rhine would be logistically, and in other ways, against the kind of forces the Soviet Union had, with no cushion, nothing, would be extremely difficult and highly problematic.

So the problem came up of how could you integrate Germany into a European fabric. Economically, we thought by encouraging European economic integration, which developed into the EEC, and militarily, there had to be some way, because we certainly, with all that we were doing, did not have the resources to put men in the other countries of Europe recovering from the devastation of war, didn't have the resources, we certainly needed a German military contribution at some appropriate stage. And as I recall it, a Frenchman first came up with the idea of the European Defense Community.

Q: It was a French proposal.

MACARTHUR: A French proposal which would integrate at low level, about company or battalion . . .

Q: A brigade level.

MACARTHUR: Well, it was below brigade. I think it was regimental level, units of different countries. I was told later by a Frenchman that it was put up because they thought it was so absurd that it would never fly. But to their surprise and chagrin, the British and ourselves both said, "All right, if this is what it takes to weave Germany into the fabric to do it," the French then walked smartly away from the proposal, and the French prime minister at that time refused to go along. This created very considerable stresses and strains on our relationship with the French, but the damage was repaired fairly swiftly at a later date.

Q: Did we feel that this was going to be a workable system, or was it something that we went along with more for European cooperation than military?

MACARTHUR: Our position was that we would do nothing, we would accept nothing that couldn't be made to operate militarily with a degree of effectiveness. The thought was that in extremis, our military said this could be made to work. It was not a preferred solution. In fact, it was just above the borderline of unworkability, but they could make it work, and it would bring the Germans in with all the advantages, and overall, the advantages of bringing them in militarily outweighed the absurdity of the proposal, of trying to integrate forces at that low regimental level.

Q: There must have been quite a few conflicts between you and the State Department and the Defense Department.

MACARTHUR: There are always conflicts between the State Department and the Defense Department because of their perception that their responsibility is military, for military security, whereas the State Department has to take into account infinitely broader considerations. It may be fine militarily, but if your friend and ally, on whom you depend, isn't going to agree to it, it's no good at all. And some of the things that the Defense Department has put forward has been things that manifestly would be unacceptable to friends and allies; they just wouldn't agree to it. And if they wouldn't agree to it, they're a non-starter. So diplomacy, I think, is the art of the possible. You have to do what you can with what you've got to work with, always trying to bring the other people along to your persuasion, but that is not an easy task, and it takes time. You know, we're always going to have a difference between a purely military point of view that disregards all the political, social, psychological, and other aspects of a problem. From a purely military point of view, it may look, you know, super. But when you have to take in the other things, and when you are in the position that we're in, where we do not have the resources to assure our own security by ourselves without friends and allies, then you come into a much broader problem of what can you do to achieve this goal, when you can't do it by this narrow military position, because it's unacceptable. What can you do to move it in that direction?

And our position is compounded, of course, by the fact that we have no constituency. The Foreign Service, the State Department, has no constituency whatsoever. The military have the families of millions of people. I'm talking about politics now. We've got no political constituency; we've got no constituency in the news world. There's nothing the news world likes better than to talk about striped pants diplomats and cookie pushers and the like.

Information Officer, the Marshall Plan
Paris (1949-1952)

Thomas W. Wilson was born in Baltimore in 1912. After Graduating from Princeton University, he worked as a reporter for the Baltimore Evening Sun and later the Paris Herald. He served on the National Defense Advisory Commission, the War Production Board and the Economic Warfare Agency in World War II. After the War, he worked as an Information Officer for the Marshall Plan, and would later serve as a Political Advisor to the United Nations. Mr. Wilson was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on October 30 1996.

Q: You say you left the Evening Sun and you went where then?

WILSON: The Paris Herald.

Q: First I'd like to get the dates. When did you go to the Paris Herald?

WILSON: In 1937.

Q: In 1937. And you were with the Paris Herald from when to when?

WILSON: 1937-1938. Then I was hired by the INS, the International News Service in Paris in their bureau. So I was in Paris for two and a half or three years.

Q: How did you get this Paris Herald job. This must have been like going to heaven in a way wasn't it?

WILSON: It was unbelievable. I had been on a story that had a lot to do with a guy, I guess he was the public affairs vice president of the American Express Company in Baltimore. We got to be fairly friendly. He asked me what I wanted to do next, and I told him I wanted to leave Baltimore. I was thinking of a classmate of mine working on a newspaper in Texas and I was thinking of writing him to see if he would like to swap jobs. Texas sounded like a more lively place than Baltimore did. He said he was public relations director of the American Express company in Paris for several years and got to be fairly good friends with Hills, who was publisher of the Paris paper. He happened to know there was a vacancy there. They have had several Baltimore Sun people, and they have always turned out very well. Would you like me to write him and see if he would like to hear from you? I said, "Yes I would." Sometime later I was down at a murder story near Stillville, Maryland and I got a call from my office saying we've got a telegram from Larry Hills offering you a job. "Keep it. I'll be right there." In any event that's what I did. It was just as lucky and as silly as that.

Q: May I add for the record that the Paris Herald in those days and for many years on was the pre-eminent American newspaper in Europe. It was a top job. It was associated with the New York Herald which was a close rival to the New York Times in those days.

WILSON: The Paris Herald was the European edition of the New York Herald. There also was a Paris Tribune which was a European edition of the Chicago Tribune. The Chicago Tribune folded and the Herald bought some part of it, so the old Paris Herald became the Paris Herald-Tribune. Then somewhere along the line the New York Herald bought the... Was there a New York Tribune? I'm not sure. Yes! There was the New York Herald Tribune. So these two things worked together. Anyhow it was the Paris Herald Tribune which was the European edition of the New York Herald Tribune. That's what it was when I went there.

Q: I might say that the New York Herald Tribune had some of the top writers in many fields. I particularly think of the sports writers, but others were extremely... I mean it was a classy paper.

Could you tell me about, I mean here you are a boy from Baltimore and you are in the big city of lights. What was your impression of Paris in the late 1930's?

WILSON: I roomed with Jim Lardner who was one of Ring Lardner's four sons.

Q: Ring Lardner being a pre-eminent writer and columnist of that era.

WILSON: Yes. Jim Lardner and Walter Kerr. There were two Walter Kerrs. This was the one who was head of the Paris Bureau and then head of the European Bureau and head of the Washington Bureau. Not the theater Walter Kerr. The three of us lived together. It was a night job. We went to work at 6:00 to 8:00 for the so called day side of the paper, and then went out to dinner for an hour and a half or two hours and then came back because of the time difference, the US. News was just beginning to come in around 10:00 there so then we worked until 2:00 maybe a little less than that because you could be out at a nightclub if you want at 2:00 and things were still going on in Paris nightclubs. Then you sleep eight hours and get up and have the whole day free. It doesn't work that way now, but it was a great time.

Q: What did the job consist of?

WILSON: It was mainly re-writing. You'd get little one or two sentence or paragraph items from New York. For the follow story, you kept the story in the files and you expanded a one or two sentence lead in to a new lead on an old story.

Q: I can speak as a retired Foreign Service Officer, I was Consul General in Naples, I read it every day. Then it was the Paris Times Herald. It was an amalgamate but essentially it is the same paper. This is where you got your news and it served beautifully.

WILSON: It was very good. I don't know why the New York Times tried to put out a European edition after WW II; it didn't work. It was just a shrunk down New York Times. This was a paper by itself.

Q: Yes it really is unique. It was very influential. How about the French? Were you getting involved with the French while you were there or were they a difficult people to crack?

WILSON: No. I'm afraid that Americans are not much better than other people when they live in other countries. They tend to hang around with their own. The staff of the Paris Herald Tribune at that time was roughly divided into two groups. One were leftovers from WWI and the other were people who had been there a year or less. I fell in with some expatriate American news people who had been there long enough to have had a lot of French friends and French relations. Actually I got married over there.

Q: What about the great political waves going on in France. As Americans were you observing the rise of the United Front and the almost fascist right in French politics. I mean this was all getting very close to WWII. Or were you all sort of focused on what was happening back home?

WILSON: I think when I left the sit down strikes were on in Detroit, but so was the Spanish Civil War, and that's what I sort of grew up on politically. As a matter of fact, I had notions that I could volunteer in the Abraham Lincoln brigade, part of the International Brigade. As a matter of fact, Jim Lardner did and was killed. We were absolutely obsessed with the rise of fascism and the Spanish Civil War and the nonsense in Italy.

Q: You are talking about Mussolini and his thing and the rise of Hitler.

WILSON: Yes the rise of Hitler. That's what we talked about. That was the overwhelming political interest at that time.

Q: What was your impression of the French body politic? Did you have a feeling that this was a country that was going to sort of be the bastion of democracy?

WILSON: France was? I'm really getting into very fuzzy memory. I think Leon Blum was still in when I got there in 1937. But the failure indeed refusal of the French and British before you get to the Americans to do anything for the Spanish was our dominant scandal of the times as far as I was concerned. And certainly some of the people I spent time, I didn't go to the Deux Magots. I went to the Dome. I walked home after the paper and there was always somebody sitting there in the Dome I and you would sit around there and have a few beers and pretty soon the sun's coming up. There goes the day.

Q: You left there when? No you had sat a certain point moved over to the International News Service.

WILSON: Do you remember when the Duke of Windsor was coming to the United States for a trip and there was a big story in the American press. The Duke of Windsor was a great pal of a Frenchman who was supposed to be the originator of a system of industrial production that increases the speed...

Q: We can fill this in later but I know what you mean. It was a time management system.

WILSON: That's right and some Baltimore labor leader made a particularly nasty speech about the Duke of Windsor coming over. Because of his friendship with this dirty guy who was speeding up production on the industrial line, and he canceled his trip. That is to say the Duke of Windsor canceled his trip because of this lack of welcome. It so happened that the INS guy, poor fellow, had been around the Crillon Hotel all day waiting to find out whether the Duke was going to the United States tomorrow or not. And unfortunately the bar was on the same floor and he got drunk up in the course of the day. I wrote the story in the office. He canceled his trip at 11:00 at night which as I say was a big story in the U.S. I wrote the story for the Paris Herald. Unfortunately the INS guy had gotten crocked and missed the story entirely. As a result, the head of the INS Bureau fired him and hired me. So I was with the INS for several years.

Q: What type of work were you doing for the INS?

WILSON: The INS was strictly office writing. Lots of mailboard stuff. Background stories and feature stories. Otherwise just compiling news. We had a very able French journalist who covered Parliament for us. Otherwise we just read the news.

Q: You say Parliament, you mean Chamber of Deputies.

WILSON: Chamber of Deputies, yes.

Q: You were in Paris until when?

WILSON: '49 until '51 or '52.

Q: Could you talk a bit about Averell Harriman. I mean he was a major figure in American diplomacy for many years. During the time you dealt with him in Paris, what was your impression and how did he operate?

WILSON: Well I did know Harriman very well and worked with him several times. I don't know anybody who worked with him, if they could work with him, who didn't love him. He was a man who was absolutely totally committed to what he was doing. He worked like a dog. He expected you to also, but he didn't expect you to do anything he didn't do himself. He was really a wonderfully effective person. Everybody felt they had to respect him. I'm not talking about the non-Americans with which we had to deal. I think quite apart from the fact that sure he was a very welcome man – he was an ambassador, and he was running in this case the Marshall Plan. He was running a program that the Europeans were absolutely dependent on. But I think he was, now that we begin to talk about it, very persuasive in private. He was never a very good speaker. If you are talking about diplomacy, I'm talking about private diplomacy. He always knew what he was talking about. I think he was probably more responsible than any other individual in forcing the Europeans to take the Marshall Plan in a way that I think became ultimately its most important impact. That is to say, I don't know if he's responsible for this but we, the United States Government, refused to deal with the French and the Italians and the rest of them, nation by nation, which they all wanted. They thought they could get more from us I guess. He insisted that it be a European plan, that they put together their requirements subject to our review and approval, but that they do it themselves; but that they not do what all of them tried to start doing which was to face their terrible economic problems on a national basis. All of them wanted to deal with their problems by cutting imports and exports. They wanted to nationalize their currencies, and in any event, I think he had more to do with it than anybody else, insisting on a daily, practical day to day basis that this was a European recovery program. They had to present their combined requirements. We would allocate against it. They would then have to re-divide it among themselves. They could not do it by nationalist priorities

Q: Germany at this time of course was not in it. I mean was Germany in it too?

WILSON: Yes, from the beginning.

Q: Your job again was making sure the European public was aware. Looking at it sort of country by country, we've already looked at England, what about France? Did you find any difficulty getting the message out to the French?

WILSON: Well the Marshall Plan information program in Europe, I believe, probably engaged in the most open, active, large scale propaganda warfare that we've ever had. The Russians were out to ruin the Marshall Plan. You remember they refused to...

Q Yes they made Czechoslovakia withdraw from the Marshall Plan aid and all that.

WILSON: The first ships arrived in Europe in Le Harve with Marshall Plan goods. The dock workers refused to unload them. They had to be unloaded by the French Army. The mine workers not only went on strike but they flooded the coal mines in France and Belgium. Some of the European governments, as I said before, had Communists in them as part of their coalition cabinets. This being a quite understandable reward for having conducted active anti fascist, anti German activity during the occupation. The only people who really fought were the Communists in some of those countries, and they were sometimes taken in to those cabinets and had people in the governments. While they weren't at the top nonetheless, you're in a – I'm thinking of France in the early days – country that is short of paper for example. It turns out there's a Communist in control of paper allocations, and you can believe me the Communist press gets plenty of paper, while the anti-communist press doesn't. The same sort of thing could be said about film stocks and that sort of thing. What's more they had money. They could afford publishing when some other people couldn't. If you've ever walked down a street where the walls only on one side are covered with posters, and they are all the same posters and they are all the same source, they carry a sense of power.

Q: Oh yes I've seen it. The workers with the sickle and hammer. You really feel like they are the movement of the future.

WILSON: Exactly! The Communists had a monopoly on the walls of Paris. So this was a real fight. So we did everything. We put the story in every media. We ran traveling exhibits in trucks and in trains and on barges down the canals of Europe. We had access to the non communist press completely. We could get our stuff in the British newsreels but the newsreels ran, I can't think of the neighborhood of Paris, it was almost completely communist. It didn't run in those theaters because if it did they'd get bricks through the screen. I remember every now and then getting a call from a French mayor from some town saying the local communists tried to bust up your exhibit this afternoon. We've got them arrested. Do you want to charge them? We never did; that's not the point. I remember we published a paper for French unionists. It used to get thrown off the train sometimes as the train went over the river somewhere. So it was a good fight.

Q: How did you find the French bureaucracy at that time? Was it difficult to, I mean the ones with whom you would have contact. Were the ones who were not Communist sympathetic to the Communists or not?

WILSON: No. They were trying to get France back on its feet, back in business so they could tell us they didn't like us. They were very active allies.

Q: By this time it was quite clear to everyone who was involved that the Soviet Union was the enemy and these were their surrogate warriors in a way. Was there any doubt in anyone's mind what the battle was about?

WILSON: No. Well of course there was. There were always left wing French intellectuals to worry about, but they were also hard to deal with. In due course even the French got into it. They didn't like us. We gave all of these things to the program in France, but they didn't have much choice, and they put up with it when it was easy to do so. We would rather have their name on it than ours anyhow. You know sometimes we'd want to do some things they just didn't know how to do. That was embarrassing. The French were also curious about things. This was probably about half way through the Marshall Plan and emphasis was starting to shift, I think Paul Hoffman had a thing about productivity; that was the key to manufacturing and industrial success. I remember we sent a group of journalists over once to the U.S. to visit some high productivity plants in the U.S. They came back and all wrote the same set of columns. I'm sure this is not true, they all had the same title, at least a number had the same title, "Quest que c'est la productivitee?" They were intrigued. They hadn't thought of productivity. It was a strange idea to them. So it had a kind of intellectual level to it.

Q: Did you find there was any sort of approach you could make to the left wing intellectuals or did you almost write them off as somebody you couldn't make any impression on? I'm not talking about the hard line Communists; I mean the...

WILSON: Well, some of our most active help came from the Socialists. They knew the Communists. They knew you couldn't work with them. By this time there was an anti communist free trade union.

Q: Yes. There were two trade unions. One was dominated by the Communists and the other was not. I forget the name. We had a representative, I don't know if you knew him, Irving Brown. Did you work with Irving Brown at all?

WILSON: Yes. I don't think I did personally but I remember the French had something called the Quai Liberte. They were anti Communist. This is when I thought about the walls. And they did some wonderful things. There would be these huge Communist posters up. They would invent a little piece to go across it to paste over it. I remember the French, no doubt with some encouragement from us, were about to extend their military service from 12 months to 18 months. Of course the Communists took a battle against this. They had posters all over the place "Down with the 18 months." The Quai Liberte people made a little banner kind of thing that would go across these things and it said, "We want 36 months like they have in Russia." This killed it. They just couldn't get anywhere with it. Who was the famous head of the French Communist Party for many years?

Q: Maurice Thorez?

WILSON: Thorez. Of course. Thorez became very ill, or apparently very ill. The Russians sent a special plane to Cairo to pick him up and take him to a hospital presumably on the theory that he couldn't get competent treatment in France. You also know how any time any communist would get put in jail they would slap the posters all over the place "Liberee whatever the guy's name was." So as soon as the Russians took Thorez to Russia, they plastered France with things saying "Liberee Thorez." So they had some real competition. The French were active too.

Q: You finished up in 1953?

WILSON: '52.

Q: '52. How did you feel about it when you left? Sort of you had done your bit and as far as you were concerned people in France and all pretty well knew what we were doing?

WILSON: Yes. I'd like to think a job well done. I thought like most of us, there would be a United states of Europe within a decade. That was 40 years ago and they haven't made it yet. I'm not sure they are ever going to make it. Yes, thoroughly convinced that it had been a very wise policy and a very effective program, and it was on the right course.

Now I think the Marshall Plan was actually kind of deceptive for many Americans. Because when we went over there the continent was a mess, and we fixed it in a few years. It didn't really occur to us we didn't do it. All we really did was provide the one thing that was missing from their point of view. The industrial revolution had started there. They knew how to build factories and bridges, things like that. They had just been bombed out, and they needed steel etc. etc. which you could only get from one place in the world, and it took dollars to buy it. We provided them with the dollars, that's all. That they didn't have and couldn't get anywhere else. They made the recovery plans. We provided them with the money to buy the stuff they needed, and so it worked perfectly. But it gave some of us I'm afraid, the notion that we know how to fix a country if they're in trouble. I think a good deal of our foreign aid program probably was driven by that myth. That's not quite the same thing as going to a country that has no experience and in some cases effectively no government that knows how to work. I think we had that illusion that we knew how to do things and in Asia, Africa, Latin America, the same thing doesn't apply. But I think we also failed to understand the significance of forcing them to decide what it was they wanted and what they needed. I think when it came around to running the, what did they call that in the Kennedy administration?

Q: The Alliance for Progress.

WILSON: The Alliance for Progress, we stuck to a country to country basis. I think it was because our people probably liked to do it that way. We were used to running those countries.

WILLIAM C. TRIMBLE
Consular Officer
Paris (1939-1940)

Ambassador William C. Trimble was born in Baltimore, Maryland. He entered the Foreign Service in 1931. His career included assignments in Seville, Buenos Aires, Estonia, Paris, Mexico City, London, the Hague, Rio de Janeiro, and Bonn, and an ambassadorship to Cambodia. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1990.

Q: Well, now, then you were really thrown into a hot spot. Could you tell where you went and what you were doing?

TRIMBLE: Because of my work in graduate school, the courses there in economics and finance, I was transferred to Paris.

Q: This was in 1939.

TRIMBLE: We arrived four weeks before war broke out.

Q: As I say, it's a vintage 1939.

TRIMBLE: Yes, it was. My wife and I went over leaving the children. We were hoping to get an apartment somewhere in Paris. Of course, they never got there. I was meant to be working on financial matters, but then when I got there, there was such a rush of people – immigrants, refugees, the German Jewish refugees wanting to get into the United States – that I was put on the visa desk, as also were several other officers. And we did that until war was declared.

Q: Could I ask you a question? Because this is really a very crucial part of American policy in this period. What was our attitude? I mean, you know, there you were on the visa desk, and you had people trying to get out, particularly the Jews. And, of course, we know now what was waiting for those that didn't get out and that was the gas ovens for many.

TRIMBLE: We didn't know that.

Q: We didn't know it then.

TRIMBLE: No.

Q: And it's been claimed that the State Department was indifferent and all. What was your feeling? And what were your instructions at that time in dealing with that situation?

TRIMBLE: Well, we knew about Kristallnacht and having served in Europe. –

Q: Kristallnacht being – would you explain what it was?

TRIMBLE: Kristallnacht was when Hitler's Brownshirts attacked and burnt synagogues and broke the windows of Jewish stores in Germany. And that was the beginning, really, of the persecution of the Jews and the Jewish population in Germany. Many of them had gotten out mainly to France, but most of them remained in Germany.

Our job was do everything we could to help them get out. Immigration law was bent. Regulations were bent. For example, there used to be a provision of the law that said that skilled agriculturists had a preference. Jewish groups in this country formed a school in Paris where in three months refugees studied agriculture. Well, that school was a subterfuge and we knew it.

But we overlooked that.

There was also an institution called the New School For Scientific Research in New York, and people would come to join it. I gave so many visas to so-called “professors” that I’m sure the number of people on the staff of the New School For Research was far greater than the number of students. Yes, we leaned over backwards. Indeed I was criticized several times, by the Immigration Service for being overly lenient. And the rest of us were doing it, too. We were doing everything we could to get the refugees out.

Q: I come from a basic consular background, and often you get people at the top who get very consistent on the regulations within an embassy, but down below the vice consuls who are dealing with the problem, see what the problem is and do everything they can to help.

TRIMBLE: Yes.

Q: How about in the Embassy? Were you getting any sort of pressure from above, say, “What are you doing?” Or even from Washington?

TRIMBLE: Well, the Ambassador, Mr. Bullitt, William Bullitt, was very much in favor with what we were doing. Actually, he had Jewish blood, but that had nothing to do with it. But he believed strongly in what we were trying to do. He gave us all the support he could. Washington wouldn’t tell us directly. But, yes, it was unwritten that you do all you can.

Q: You had that feeling?

TRIMBLE: And we twisted regulations. We really twisted regulations, and we got an awful lot of people out. And I’m sure it was done in other posts, too. Then war was declared.

Q: This was September 1, 1939.

TRIMBLE: Yes. By that time, we knew that war was coming. There was no question about that. People would come down from the Embassy in Berlin who told us about it, and we realized that the Ribbentrop-Molotov Agreement meant the Russians would not help the Allies. Yes, we knew that war was imminent.

And so the visa work practically ended for there were no more ships to carry refugees, except for those who got to go through Portugal and for a few to Holland. I then worked on trying to get the American tourists out. And that was quite a job. There were thousands of American tourists. Practically no ships! How are we going to get them out? The Department arranged to have River Line boats sent over.

Q: Fall river-line boats? These were coastal cruisers.

TRIMBLE: Yes, but they put some planking on the side to make them a little bit more seaworthy. After all, it wasn’t a bad season of the year for the passage to the U.S. A couple of American liners were still running, the Washington and Manhattan.

Q: What was this?

TRIMBLE: The U.S. Line ships, the Washington and Manhattan.

Q: Oh, yes.

TRIMBLE: But then the French issued a regulation that you had to have special visas to get out of the country, and the French red tape can be something. So I was put in charge of that work, getting people out, American tourists out. I was assisted by a young naval officer who had been over studying naval architecture in France, and a young Marine officer who had been attending some military school. We worked out a system to get them out – special trains, group exit, etc. And we did get them out, except for a few who refused to leave. But that's another matter. It was quite a job, and ships were awfully crowded.

Then came the "Sitzkreig" period.

Q: This was the so-called "phoney" war, the sitzkreig, the sitting war.

TRIMBLE: This was the winter of 1939-40 and the time of the Soviet attack on Finland. Next the Germans invaded Norway, followed by Denmark, Holland and Belgium and the war really heated up again. During that winter we had, under Washington's instructions, worked very hard to get all resident Americans, to leave, requiring that their passports be validated to remain in France. Unless they had a very good reason, they had to go home. The reasons some gave to remain in France were really absurd. But we did get most American residents out. Unfortunately a few refused to leave.

Then came the invasion of France. In preparation for that period – we knew it might happen – the Embassy had been divided into two sections. In anticipation that Paris might be bombed or gassed and so forth, most of the Embassy personnel would move to southern France, and only a small staff remain in Paris. Actually things moved so fast that the two became three, one followed the French government to Bordeaux, one went to a place in southern France, and a nucleus remained in Paris. Since I knew some German – my wife spoke it quite well, but nevertheless was evacuated – I stayed on in Paris along with Bob Murphy and Ambassador Bullitt and not more than six or seven others. So I saw the Germans arrive, which was really pretty awesome.

Q: But to go back a little, did you see Ambassador Bullitt operating prior to the sort of collapse, the breakthrough and all, but before that?

TRIMBLE: I'd worked with Ambassador Bullitt. Some people criticize him. I know he had enemies. But he was very able, particularly for that job. He spoke French fluently, and he was a great speaker. I remember when we were doing visa work, he would come down almost every day and see how we were doing, hurrying us to get –

Q: I might say this is quite interesting. I speak as a consular officer. It's usually a cold day in hell when an ambassador gets close to a visa line, even in a case of emergency.

TRIMBLE: Oh, he did. He was very good at that. However he and Sumner Welles did not get along well together. That was one of the difficulties we had. Welles was Under Secretary when he was there and a great friend of President Roosevelt. I never knew all the inside details. That wasn't my business. But I thought he was a very good ambassador.

Q: Looking at this as things developed, what was the Embassy doing during, say, this period outside of the visa issue, during the sitzkreig? I mean, were we going out?

TRIMBLE: We had to get Americans out.

Q: So really we were concerned with day-to-day immediate operations, not looking at the greater picture or something. You were just busy.

TRIMBLE: I was not in the political side of it, you know. I was assigned to the Embassy for financial and economic work. And trying to get Americans out, that was my big job after the immigration stopped, and then doing economic financial reporting as well. Reporting on political matters was done by others. Except I do know when the Germans finally arrived, just before they arrived, we had to burn all the archives. In those days in the Foreign Service reports or dispatches were always bound in books. Well, to take those damn bindings off, and put them in the furnace was quite an operation. But we did it and burned all the codes. The process left the Place de la Concorde covered with ashes.

Q: Well, how did we feel? I mean, after all, we were not at war at the time. How did you all feel?

TRIMBLE: We were probably going to war. I certainly did and I remember telling Mr. Bullitt that having been in the ROTC at college and given a 2nd Lieutenant's commission in the Reserve, I felt I should rejoin my unit in Maryland.

This was in 1940, early 1940. He said, "I think you're more useful to your country as a consul in Paris than you would be a second lieutenant, field artillery, horse-drawn reserve division in Maryland," which was quite true. But we all felt that way. We knew it was going to happen.

Q: In the Foreign Service the feeling was, "It's coming!"

TRIMBLE: Oh, yes. Oh, yes. There's no question about it. At least, it certainly was in Paris and I should think elsewhere, too. Yes, we knew we would enter the war. But we didn't know when. Isolation was so strong. After all Senator Borah, who was chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, said there won't be a war and if there was one, we must stay out. But we in the field knew that the war was coming, and also believed that we would get in it sooner or later.

Q: Well, now, then we come to the point, if you would describe, please, how you felt and what you saw when the Germans came in and how the Embassy reacted at that point.

TRIMBLE: Only a skeleton staff was left. Beforehand, we had seen the poor refugees from Holland, particularly Belgium, passing through. It was a pathetic sight. These poor people pushing baby carriages, dogs running around, and then, of course, French refugees from the north. There's nothing we could do for them. The Norwegians, I will say, had it organized – although Norway had already been occupied. The Norwegians in Paris organized soup kitchens, and that helped. However, the French government was not prepared for it.

And so then after the Germans came, or just before the Germans came, the Embassy took over interests, foreign interests, of England, Belgium, Canada, Egypt, one or two other countries, which meant that I was given that job in addition to the financial matters. We put up signs in German, English and French, "This building, is under the protection of the United States of America." We put them on every apartment, every house where staff members of those diplomatic missions had lived.

I also arranged to have all the furniture and belongings of U.K. staff members moved to the British Embassy. We had truckloads, horse-drawn vehicles, bring the stuff in. When Goering wanted to take over the British Embassy as his headquarters, it was full of furniture. The British said when they went back after Paris was liberated, the floors were falling in. [Laughter] It was one of those funny situations.

Let's see, what was I talking about – oh, yes – getting the Americans out and the Germans came in, and they tried to – Mr. Bullitt felt strongly that an American ambassador or an American minister always remained in Paris at the time of the French Revolution, the Napoleonic wars and –

Q: Particularly during the commune and all that. The famous thing during the siege of Paris.

TRIMBLE: Yes, during the War of 1870 and aftermath.

Q: The Ambassador stayed on.

TRIMBLE: The American Ambassador must stay there, which he did. He was later recalled when the French government was established in Vichy and Bob Murphy was temporarily in charge. So we got nearly all of the Americans out and we helped the British and other foreigners to do so.

Just before the Germans arrived, I remember, Italy entered the war and kicked all the English out of Italy, civilians, officials, etc. and they all came in trains to France. This was just in early June – Paris fell on June 14, 1940, and this was about a week before. Those poor English people didn't know what to do. They couldn't speak French, and the British Embassy had gone, the Consulate had gone and we must look after them. Just before leaving, the Consul informed me that arrangements had been made for special trains to take them from Paris to Brest and thence by boat to England. Most managed to find their way to the Consulate where I instructed them to go to the Gare de l'Ouest. There I found thousands of people milling around the station including several hundreds of English. One was standing on top a pissoir holding an umbrella shouting "Britishers here!" [Laughter]

And then when I went inside to see the Stationmaster, he said, “All trains are stopped. The Germans are Stuka-bombing all the trains.”

Q: Stuka being a type of dive-bomber.

TRIMBLE: Yes. So it was pretty awful, these poor people. But they finally got out somehow or other.

Q: Were you there when the Germans came to our Embassy?

TRIMBLE: Absolutely.

Q: This was a rather tricky period. We didn't quite know what was going to happen.

TRIMBLE: Well, the 13th of June, I think it was, Paris was declared an open city. The French government was gone. The Germans were outside, hadn't come in. They were waiting to come in the next day. They were shaving and getting their uniforms pressed to make a great impression, which they did, on the population.

Mr. Bullitt thought there would be rioting in the streets, so he made all of us – his small staff – spend the night in the Embassy. My room, where I had a cot, faced on the Plâce de la Concorde. It was a beautiful night. I remember the stars and moon shining, and we all were upset, of course. I looked about 4:00 in the morning, 5:00 maybe, because the sun was coming up, and you could see German helmets behind the bec-de-gas, the street lights, in the Plâce and then more poured in, hundreds and hundreds filling the entire square.

We had heard the German soldiers were in pretty poor shape physically because of malnutrition after the First World War. They weren't. They were well-fed and husky, tough-looking and able. No question about it. And they poured in all that day. And then afterward came the reserve groups, the German reserves, and they were rather older men who composed a military garrison. But they were also able and almost as well disciplined. We also saw many of the fifth column people who had been paid by the Germans.

Q: These are the French.

TRIMBLE: French. And, of course, many of them were Communists, because Germany and Russia had reached an agreement in 1939, and the Communist Party in France had helped the Nazis. There's no question about that. It was pretty awful.

Q: In the first place, were you around when the first meeting between somebody official from the German side and –

TRIMBLE: Yes. Mr. Bullitt left shortly thereafter on instructions from Washington. He was told to get out. Bob Murphy was left in charge, and he spoke German quite well – he was Ambassador Murphy afterwards. He met with the Germans, and they wanted to take over the British Embassy. We stopped them. I remember seeing one German soldier putting up a telephone line on the – tying it on to the gates of our Embassy running over to the hotel next door where they had their headquarters. We stopped that, of course, but we had to deal with the Germans.

I had to – that's another long story. I had to deal with one German who was an officer in the German Army intelligence service, who had been a Rhodes Scholar after WWI. He spoke excellent English but claimed to hate the British because of his experience there. However, he was in charge of dealing with all the British still in Paris and all the Americans, a nasty little type, but he had lots of guts. On returning to Paris in 1949, I found out that he'd been a British agent the whole time! His mother had been part Jewish. He was actually very anti-Nazi, secretly working the whole time for the British until finally caught and shot. In my mind he was a nasty person but tough and very able. We saw all sorts of strange things like that.

But then France had surrendered. The government at Bordeaux had been forced to agree to a demarcation between north and south. Germans occupied all the northern part of France and the coastal area on the Southwest. The capital was moved to Vichy with Marshal Petain as Head of State. There, as you know, we had a small Embassy.

Q: At Vichy, yes?

TRIMBLE: Yes, Vichy. I remained in Paris until September, 1940 and then transferred to the Embassy at Vichy.

Q: Well, during this period of time from June 14th until September what were you doing in our sort of "rump" Embassy in Paris?

TRIMBLE: I was trying to do whatever I could on financial reporting, which was my job. The Germans were flooding the country with their occupation Marks with bad effects on the economy – a recourse to barter, black marketing, etc. As the codes had been destroyed, we had to rely on couriers to get reports out. Once in a while one would come down from Germany, and he'd carry the pouch back to Berlin and from there forward it on. But it was hard communicating with Washington, very difficult. So much of my work was helping such Americans that still remained to get out some how or other, and protection of foreign interests, seeing that the Germans did not steal – which they did – things.

Oh, there's one more story which I'd forgotten. Well, four days before the Germans arrived, the French Minister of Finance, urgently called concerning the French gold reserves. They had been shipped to Casablanca, and the Government wanted them carried by an American ship, the USS Pittsburgh, to the United States.

Q: The American naval cruiser.

TRIMBLE: Well, so Bob Murphy, and I together with an American secretary went to the Ministry to draw up the transfer document in both French and English. As you know, in French, where we put a period, $1,000.75, they put a comma instead of that. And when we put a comma,

$10,000, they'd put a period, and more trouble over that. [Laughter]

Q: Oh, yes. Because we're talking about millions and millions of dollars worth of gold there, and you have to get it just right.

TRIMBLE: And it was really something. All this back and forth, "How are we going to reconcile this in a legal document?" But we finally did, and the gold arrived in the U.S.

Q: Robert Murphy, of course, was one of the great figures in American diplomacy in this period, and you were working with him. How did you see him operating, and what sort of a person was he to work with?

TRIMBLE: He had great charm, very Irish charm, very able, people liked him, a very smooth operator, and intelligent. He was very – I wouldn't say he was an intellectual type. I don't think he was as bright as Mr. Bullitt, but he had more stability than Mr. Bullitt who was emotional, and Bob Murphy wasn't. He was a very, very able officer.

There's one nice story about Bob Murphy. He had been consul in Munich before the war, just the time when Hitler was coming on the scene. And one of his great friends was the Papal Nuncio. Do you know this story?

Q: No, I don't know the story, but I know the Papal Nuncio because he later became Pius XII.

TRIMBLE: That's right. One day when they were meeting together Bob said, "I'm worried about this man, Hitler, and what he may do" to which the Nuncio replied, "it's nothing, just one of those passing things." When many years later, Bob asked his old friend, "How about that?" to which the Pope responded, "Well then I didn't have papal infallibility." [Laughter]

Q: Well, then how did Murphy deal with the Germans?

TRIMBLE: He spoke German well. Yes, and he stood up for our rights, everything, and they respected him. At that period, yes, he was very good with them. Later he was assigned to Vichy and then to Washington, but returned on a short visit in the Spring of 1941. By then Admiral Leahy had been appointed Ambassador there, an excellent choice.

Q: There was North Africa.

TRIMBLE: That came afterwards.

Q: Yes.

How did he deal with the Germans? I mean, what was the relationship with the Germans?

TRIMBLE: Bob Murphy?

Q: Yes.

TRIMBLE: At what time?

Q: After they came in. Was it sort of a very standoffish situation?

TRIMBLE: No, because Bob was not that type of person. He stood up for our rights and made sure the Germans respected our rights as neutral. But he wasn't antagonistic. He said, in a sense, "You can't do this!" He'd tell them very firmly what our situation was, and they had to acknowledge, and they did, by and large. But then he was moved shortly afterwards down to Vichy. And so just a small group of us remained, a skeleton force.

Q: And what did you do then? I mean, again, I'm interested in this relationship with the Germans.

TRIMBLE: Since I had to handle the British interests and Americans living there, I had to deal with this one German, as I told you.

Q: The nasty type.

TRIMBLE: Yes.

Q: Who was a secret agent.

TRIMBLE: A fellow whose name –

Q: You can fill it in later, because you'll get a transcript.

TRIMBLE: I can't remember his name. I have it in notes somewhere. [Rostin] I had to deal with him when the Germans would try to arrest the Americans for alleged spying or some other charge. And that took a lot of time. Then also seeing that they respected buildings under our protection, homes of people, and did not interfere with the movements of household effects to the British Embassy, and so on. So it was a standoffish type of thing, but I had to deal with him, because we were neutral, and he was responsible for matters concerning American civilians and British civilians. And, as I said, tough as hell.

Also I was doing what financial reporting I could, what was happening to the French finances as we saw it in Paris and with the Germans flooding the market with their occupation marks.

Q: Wasn't this a peculiar thing, because this was an Embassy sitting where an ambassador and all had moved, the French government had left there. You must have felt that you were dealing on borrowed time.

TRIMBLE: We were, in a sense, but we kept on. Actually, the Embassy remained on until Pearl Harbor. We kept it on an even smaller staff but then it was interned, of course.

Q: Well, you were transferred down to Vichy.

TRIMBLE: To Vichy.

Q: What were you doing down in Vichy and what was the situation there?

TRIMBLE: Doc Matthews, H. Freeman Matthews, was the Chargé. Bob Murphy had already left for Washington and Mr. Bullitt had resigned. It was a very small Embassy. We had a military attaché and a naval attaché in Paris, and, let's see, three 3rd Secretaries – Douglas MacArthur, Woodruff Wallner and me, and a couple of American clerks. We had cable communications and a code room and thus sent and received messages in code with Washington.

Doug and Wallner worked with Doc Matthews on political matters. Mine were largely financial and economic. I dealt with representatives of the Bank of France and Ministry of Finance and was able to work out an arrangement to help the British civilians living in southern France. The French owed the British quite a bit of money from the period where they were fighting together before the fall of France. So to pay that off an arrangement was worked out that the French would give me so much, transfer to me so much – or rather to the Embassy – a sum of money, hundreds of thousands of francs, of which, in turn, went through the Consulate General in Marseille and Lyon Consulate to provide a small monthly stipend to each English subject.

And then we tried to work – I worked very hard with Ted Achilles, who was then the third secretary in London, through cable, to have a ship come over from England which would take back to France a number of the French soldiers who had been evacuated from Dunkerque, and wanted to come home – France was then out of the war – and return with British who were stuck in France. We had to get permission, of course, clearance for the ship from the Germans, the Italians, the British and so forth.

We finally worked the thing out. It was called Djenne. But then the British didn't want to leave. I remember once I got so angry when one of them said: "Well, can we have – we always play bridge together – our friends in the next cabin?" Another said: "I don't want to go back to England. It's cold, and I'm used to living in Italy and so I must have a warm climate. If you get me down to South Africa it would be different."

Q: Wasn't P.G. Wodehouse one of those then?

TRIMBLE: If he was one, I don't remember him. It was the darnedest. Anyway, the French came back, but very few British went home.

Again on the subject of foreign interests protection, a number of British soldiers had been hidden in northern France after Dunkerque and in French peasant homes. The French underground was very, very good. It smuggled many out across the demarcation line, which was the line between where the French Vichy government controlled and the Germans occupied zone, and some came to the Embassy for help. As they were not civilians, all I could do was give them enough francs to reach an internment camp the French had set up for British soldiers who had managed to escape to unoccupied France and where under the terms of the Armistice Agreement to be held until the end of the war. The site chosen happened to be on the coast near Marseille, and it also happened that the guarding was relaxed on nights when a British submarine would anchor offshore. [Laughter] So it was quite a transient camp.

Most of the people in the French government – not most, I won't say most, but the ones I was working with, were pro-British or rather very anti-German, I'll put it that way. What they would do in the daytime was something different at night. And there was some fascinating stories.

I remember one time we received a note from the Papal Nuncio in Vichy that he had been called on for assistance by a young Canadian student seminarian and since we had Canadian interests under our protection, would we handle the matter. So I arranged to receive him. He was dressed in a soutane, one of those flat hats worn by French priests, black shoes with buckles on the top and having a tonsure. And he was obviously Canadian which I could tell from his accent which was French-Canadian, not French. He said that he had been in Paris and studying at a seminary when the war broke out and then after the Germans came they said, "You get out. You're non-combatant. We don't want to feed you here. Go south." So he came to Vichy, and went to the Papal Nuncio who told him to see us. Under questioning, however, I found he was actually a Canadian Army officer who had been hidden by a French family in northern France. He later had gotten to Paris where the French equivalent of our Army's G2 had provided him with priest's clothing to get into the unoccupied zone. He had also fooled the Nuncio. The French can be very clever.

Q: I think Canada should be spelled out, that here we were, we were neutral, but we were doing everything we could. I mean, there was no doubt in our minds of not trying to help the British at that point.

TRIMBLE: We were anti-German, but after all this country was still neutral. The President knew that we would probably get into war, but the Congress didn't want us to get entangled. We had gotten into the First World War and we mustn't do so again was a strong neutrality feeling in this country. So we were –

Q: But within the Embassy in Vichy, I mean, you knew what we were supposed to do and you were doing it.

TRIMBLE: We did a lot of things we shouldn't have done.

Q: But this is almost instinctive then?

TRIMBLE: Surreptitiously, yes. Instinctively, I suppose. Yet we felt that the people in the Department knew, what we were doing and the President also knew. But we had to do it very carefully.

Then I had another kind of job. The Red Cross was sending over some shiploads of wheat flour to be given free to French school children because of malnutrition. It was pretty bad. The Red Cross representative sent to arrange the details was a nice fellow, but he couldn't speak French, so I worked with him. And the French ministry with whom we dealt said: "How were we going to fit this free wheat flour for children alone into our bread rationing system? Maybe you shouldn't send it at all." You know, the bureaucratic attitude, "You can't do this! It's against the regulations." Well, we got it all worked out. But it was quite a lot of work.

At times I would go to see the former governor of the Bank of France, Jacques Rueff, who was Jewish or half Jewish, I think, and while retired or forced out of the Bank was living in southern France under the protection of Marshal Petain for his wife had been Mme. Petain's goddaughter. We would discuss financial matters, and I would tell him about news not reported in the controlled press. A very good man as were many in the Foreign Ministry, younger officers, I knew and in the Finance and Agriculture Ministries. Very anti-Hitler, very patriotic and some pro-British.

Q: Well, at that time, de Gaulle was not much of a figure, was he?

TRIMBLE: He was broadcasting, but he hadn't been, no. There was the feeling in France at the time of pouriture, meaning rottenness, that that had caused France's defeat. It had been rotten in the Popular Front Governments of the 1930s and further weakened by pacifism and Communist infiltration. But the military, by and large, were very French – not pro-English but anti-German.

Q: I suppose the French Navy was, of course, always anti-British.

TRIMBLE: Yes. And Admiral Darlan was very anti. He was jealous. That's traditional of the French Navy.

Speaking of that inspires an interesting story. The French before the Second World War had developed naval architecture to a very high degree. The British had many ships, but the French hadn't, and so were able to concentrate on a few. The Jean- Bart was one of them.

Q: Yes. As a battleship, the Richelieu.

TRIMBLE: Yes, the Richelieu and Jean-Bart.

Q: Dunkerque.

TRIMBLE: And they were very advanced in naval architecture. As I mentioned earlier, one of the young officers who helped me in 1939 had been a student of the subject in Paris. Well, in early 1941 the French Navy Ministry in Paris gave to our naval attaché, Hillencotter, who became afterwards head of the CIA –

Q: Hillencotter, Roscoe Hillencotter.

TRIMBLE: Gave him 10 or 15 large bags of blueprints for the Jean-Bart which, of course, was completely against the armistice terms.

Q: Oh, yes. Yes.

TRIMBLE: We were able to get them down – I never knew exactly how – from Paris to Vichy:

It was all very secret. There Doc Matthews said: “Bill, I want you to take the pouch – it’s a rather large pouch – over to Switzerland. And I can’t tell you what’s in it, but there are 15 or 20 bags.”

I was naturally suspicious but asked no questions only replying: “Yes, sir.”

So I took the train from Vichy to Lyon where you had to transfer to another one. Fortunately, there were porters to carry all this stuff to the second train where it filled my compartment. I was scared that something awful might happen, for the train passed through the German occupied zone. Regulations required that the window curtains be pulled down, lights turned off, and there I was in the compartment sitting on top of these bags for what seemed hours. Finally I raised a shade a little and seeing the lights of Switzerland thought, “Thank God!” I delivered the bags to the Consulate in Geneva where a regular courier would take them from there to Washington. But if the Germans had known, that train would have been stopped, and I would have disappeared. It was a scary thing.

Q: Oh! Well, you left there before our invasion of North Africa.

TRIMBLE: Yes.

Q: We ended the whole Vichy period for us because then the Germans came in and took over all of France.

TRIMBLE: After Pearl Harbor.

Q: When did you leave? Well, even with Pearl Harbor, they didn’t come into Vichy. They didn’t come into Vichy until we landed in November of 1942.

TRIMBLE: That’s right. You’re quite right. Doc Matthews had left then, and the Vichy staff had been cut even further down. My wife had been evacuated in June, 1940. All the wives had to leave for the United States. I hadn’t seen my children in two years. I hadn’t had any home leave for three or four. So I asked to have home leave, and it was approved by the Department. This, I think, was June 1941 – maybe May or June, I don’t remember which month.

As Doc Matthews’ wife, who had joined him in Vichy, had to go back and see her children who were in school in this country, the Department said, “Both of you can go back together.” So we drove south – I spoke Spanish as well as French – in my car and got enough gasoline to get to the Spanish border and then on to Madrid, and finally to Lisbon where we both took the PanAm clipper back. So I got home.

Q: This is when?

TRIMBLE: June 1940.

Q: Well, now, before we go to that, we were mentioning at lunch – you mentioned there was an episode going way back about Eleanor Roosevelt.

TRIMBLE: Oh, yes.

Q: I wonder if we can put that in now?

TRIMBLE: Yes. In 1940, the Spanish Civil War was just over. A number of Spanish refugees who had fled to France were put in camps, internment camps, in Southern France – Gurs, Septfonds, Argeles and one or two others. At this time, as you recall, the Ribbentrop-Molotov Agreement had been signed.

Q: This was about August of '39.

TRIMBLE: No, this was around March – well, they signed in August, 1939. This was January or February of 1940, before the French pulled out and France fell. The Russians were backing the Germans, and the Communist Party was very strong in Paris, still strong in France then, although the Russian influence was weakening. And they put out rumors about harsh treatment the French were giving to the Spanish refugees in these camps. Now, Mrs. Roosevelt had a very big, great heart, and thought about the refugees and so forth, was quite upset about it.

So she had the State Department instruct Mr. Bullitt that he send out somebody to inspect the camps to see whether the allegation was true or not. Since I spoke both Spanish and French, I was assigned to make this trip. And Nancy and I – our children were not here, still hadn't joined us and actually never did – went down and saw each of the camps. And I could talk freely to the refugees. Only in one camp did the French have people watching me, listening to me. I found that they were, by and large, well treated depending on the commandant, some were very good. The food was just as good as the French had at that time. I saw the meals, saw what they had. And at one camp I remember seeing the French soldiers, guards, and the Spanish having a snowball fight together, laughing and playing together. I wrote back and reported on each camp. I said one camp was bad. And that's where the military guards were Senegalese.

Q: These were French colonial troops in Senegal.

TRIMBLE: Yes. They were pretty nasty. And the commandant wasn't much good. But in the rest of them, the French were doing a very good job and this when there was war. They were helping these people. They really were doing the best they could. And so I wrote the report, and it went back to Mrs. Roosevelt, because she was worried about the propaganda against the French as affecting our policy towards the Allies.

Q: Well, this, of course, was coming particularly from the left wing.

TRIMBLE: Oh, yes, very much.

ELLA DeSCHAUB
Personal Assistant to the Biddles
Angers and Paris, France (1939-1940)

Ella DeSchaub describes her life as personal assistant to Ambassador and Mrs. Anthony Biddle in Poland, France and Norway. She describes vividly wartime life in those countries with Ambassador and Mrs. Biddle. A biographical sketch is included as addendum. The interview was conducted in 1991 by Randolph W. Baxter

Q: Was your loyalty ever questioned by any of the Poles, because you were Swiss?

DeSCHAUB: No, no -- I must say, on the contrary, I stayed very friendly with people -- the ones we saw later on found houses for me, in Angers [France, where the Embassy relocated after reaching Paris]. That was my main duty. I was sent to this place, Angers -- I'd never been there before, but I knew where it was -- and Mrs. Biddle said, "You go find us a nice house." By that time, we had been in France for quite a few weeks or months, maybe, and everybody had found a house, already. So I had to -- what do you call it, when a country is allowed to take it --

Q: Lease an estate -- or requisition it?

DeSCHAUB: Requisition. They had a requisition for them in a chateau which I have pictures of because I had become friendly with the proprietor and his wife, two elderly people. They were there all alone in that big chateau -- a chateau-fort really -- which had a moat around it, and they had those old caves [for wine storage] just like at Fontainebleau. They were very nice people, and I would see him go out to the gate, and clean, and go about their other things. The Biddles had part of the castle, [but] not entirely [all of it] -- they didn't have the library, which was quite big, and the chapel, and then there were those poor proprietors had one wing. But they seemed quite resigned to it, because, you know, it was war[time]. I went to see them quite often to see if everything was in order.

But it was too primitive for Mrs. Biddle. They had very little heat -they had those big faillances - heat, what do you call it? -- faillances des poiles --

Q: Grates?

DeSCHAUB: Grates. They all had the doorway heated with the grates, and you had to throw in coal -- all along the couloir [hallway], and they had these long couloirs. Every morning, probably at seven or before, the man came and put in the coal in all the [grates] all along. So it wasn't warm, but it was better than outside. That still existed in all those castles. They had towers -- it was a chateau-fort, really -- an old, old castle. The little -- restroom, or whatever you call it - was in one of those, and there, of course, there was no heat at all! That was also something the Biddles didn't quite understand. I suppose he did, but Mrs. Biddle didn't.

Q: The toilet room didn't have any heat at all?

DeSCHAUB: Oh, no! It was that round place, you know, and it was freezing cold! That was one of the dark sides of life in a chateau. But the proprietors were very nice and accepted everything we said or did. Of course, we kind of turned the whole place upside down. Mrs. Biddle said she wouldn't stay there because it was quite a distance from the town, so Mr. Biddle had to go out very early. He couldn't come for lunch, and he'd be out quite late -- and she didn't like that. So finally, they told me, "Find us a house -- in town." By now, everything was taken -- it was true, there was hardly any room! They had 40,000 more inhabitants by that time during that time, with the Americans and foreign people. We had the French Ambassador to Poland was there -- it was such stupid, stupid thing to have a French Ambassador in France, because he came with a whole court -- he had to stay! I had to find a house, first for the Turks -- why I forgot -- and then [for] Mrs. Biddle with her request, "Something in town." I said, "Mrs. Biddle, I don't know Angers, number one. [When] I came here, it was my first visit to this city. I don't know a soul." "Oh," she said, "you'll meet people." [laughs] So I went first to the bishop and asked him for help, if he would know [of anyplace]. He was very pleasant, but he didn't know. Then I went to the prefecture [police station], to the Prefect [Police Chief], and he was much better. He understood. I said, "You must give me some leads, someplace I [can] go and see." It was very difficult, but he was good. He was very good; he gave me some addresses of people who might have a house - - nearby -- not in the city.

I set out, until at last, there was a Madame de Pimodan [phonetically: pee-moh-DAH-N], who had a little castle outside [Angers], and she had a house in town like practically all the wealthy people had. I went to her and said, "Oh, please!" But she said, "I have to have a place in town." I said, "Oh, but you can't refuse, because Mrs. Biddle can't stay in that castle. You know which one. It's cold, and impractical." She said [demonstrating a despairing sigh] "Will you let me have my room?" [laughs] It [turned out to be] a big house with three stories, and I said, "Of course, certainly, we'll do all we can to make you --" and she said, "But you must come and see my little castle outside." I said, "All right, I'll come and see the little castle. We went -- we had a car, of course, so it wasn't difficult -- and we arrived the day they were killing the pig! You know how they scream -- but she talked to the people, and they seemed very friendly. She called them all by their first name, all of them. We looked at the place, and it was all right for Angers people. But the first thing I saw, there was a mouse in the -- baignoir, what do you call it?

Q: Bathroom? [meaning "salle de baigne" or room with the bathtub; different in French from the "w.c." or room with the toilet]

DeSCHAU: Bathroom, that's it, yes. A big mouse -- she didn't pay any attention. I said, "No, I don't think that's for us." Anyway, we came back, and we settled for the town house with the room for her. She could leave all her things in that room, and we locked it -- she was satisfied.

In that house -- Mr., or Mrs. Biddle's son [who] was in the Red Cross -- he and his sister, both, gave several ambulances to the Poles [wounded Free Polish soldiers]. While we were there, the war [May 1940 German invasion of France] was on -- and those poor Poles had such miserable equipment, and were at the end of their lives. Three or four men came one night, Poles, uniformed, tattered, looking like death! And they sat there in the hall, and I said to Ted, "Who are they?" He said, "That's all they have left of their regiment." It was ghastly.

Q: This was in Angers?

DeSCHAU: In Angers, yes.

Q: The house you stayed at in Warsaw, was that more luxurious than the one in Angers?

DeSCHAUB: By then, we were out of Poland. We had to get out, after they bombed it! They bombed that castle that was [unintelligible] to the Biddles in town, and they bombed it thoroughly, and it was -- I always find [the word] in French -- the Military Attaché of the Germans, who had been there for several dinners, directed the bombing. It was completely flat. [It had been] a beautiful place [with] a beautiful library.

Q: Right. How did you get to Paris earlier? Did you have a mission that you had to go with?

DeSCHAUB: I had to do something for Mrs. Biddle or the children - I don't remember. Anyway, she told me, "Stay - don't come - don't come." I would have gone to Warsaw to be with them, but they said no. So I stayed there, and there they arrived. It was marvelous to see them again. You don't know, in a war, what happens. They had a hard time. Probably Genie told you, they were reported wherever they stopped for the night. Any little village -- a few hours later, they were bombarded. They were reported -- they [the Germans] knew all the numbers of their cars -- they knew everything -- German or Russian, I don't know which ones. It was a very bad time.

Q: Then, did you leave with the Biddles back to the United States, fleeing through Spain and Portugal?

DeSCHAUB: Yes, yes. But that was when Genie went -- it was Mr. Biddle's idea -- Genie was sent with him to England; that's when she went to England. "Oh," Mrs. Biddle said, "You can't go, you can't go." I said, "Why?" She said no, because Peggy was expecting her first baby. "I wouldn't have any news, maybe, and it's better that you stay with her -- she'll be very lost, you know, without her family." And so [cut off]

Q: That was in Washington, you stayed?

DeSCHAUB: No. She stayed -- Mrs. Biddle bought a little place for her, very nice -- in Maryland. That's where she was, though she had the baby in Washington, of course. That was her first one.

Q: Mrs. Biddle had gone on with her husband?

DeSCHAUB: Yes, yes, she had gone to London. But all the time we had communications. I was never lost -- if she wanted this or if she wanted that. Genie told you, of course, London was a terrible place at the time. They didn't get good food -- they didn't get this, they didn't get that -- so I had to send all that, as much as I could. Cocoanut, and [unintelligible] was very, very big. And writing -- it was all right [that] it was censored -- we knew that we shouldn't say anything political. Genie probably didn't tell you: by chance, I once had sent little tubes of onion, or some type of condiment. So I sent one of those [unintelligible] that was all. And the cook at the Ritz was so enchanted to hear about me [that] he said, "Could you have some more sent? 'Cause I have a client, he would just [be] in heaven if he could have some of it.” They didn’t have any of it! So I sent some of them [unintelligible] -- and he took them and gave them to the client. It’s strange what takes value at some time, when nothing else counts.

But in France, it wasn’t bad. It was cold -- it was very cold in winter. It was exceptionally cold because, I remember that one night, I was coming home -- I had had a little supper, I don’t know where -- and [when] I came home, I had to hold on to the side of the houses because it was so slippery [since] it was all ice!

Q: This was in Angers?

DeSCHAUB: No, Paris. By then, I was in Paris. Mrs. Biddle had this house there, still, and guardians, and one dog. [laughs] I was there all alone for quite a while, in that big house on the second floor. But they were very nice, the guardians, both of them -- a husband and a wife. She would often just cook a little soup or something for me. It was not pleasant to go out and walk dark streets, you know! There were no lights! Not so long ago, I heard that they lived somewhere in the south of France, that couple who lived in that house and were the guardians of Mrs. Biddle’s house. They were still alive, I was surprised to hear.

Q: And then you met the Biddles in Paris?

DeSCHAUB: Yes. I had this friend who later she came to Oslo with us, and she was the one who knew the Biddles, she and her sister. She wrote to me -- and I found, the other day in my old papers, the telegram she sent. She’d said, “You could come and stay with the Biddles for a school year, because the children are coming.” Mrs. Biddle was divorced, and she had already obtained the permission to have the children. They were coming, and were by then already twelve, seven and nine -- something like that -- a difficult age, and they were taken away from their father and from their life here [in the U.S.]. She knew it would be difficult, and she was not particularly fond of children. She said, “They are arriving, and would you be willing to stay for a school year? We’ll be half in the States, and half in Paris. You should meet them and see, if you like.”

That’s how it started. I spoke to a very dear aunt I had, who said, “Oh, you must accept -- for a school year, what’s that?” I said, “I don’t think I should go.” Finally, she said, “Do it for a school year,” so I did. I met them and the way it started, I might tell you, it’s so strange and ridiculous. They had rented a house in Paris -- with a garden; it was very nice -- and they said, “Come for tea.” So I came for tea, not knowing what to expect! They both were there, and they said, “Oh, let’s go walk in the garden and walk around and then we’ll have tea.” So that’s what I did, and we talked about this, and that -- and not a word about anything!

[At this point the tape ran out; remainder of DeSchaub’s story taken from Baxter’s notes: The Biddles didn’t mention employment to DeSchaub, who left rather disappointed and thinking she didn’t have the position. DeSchaub later heard from some friends, however, that the Biddles thought she was wonderful and were expecting her to start taking care of the children right away.

DeSchaub never did figure out why the Biddles hadn't mentioned the job during her "interview" but she nonetheless accepted the job, which she would end up holding for a quarter century!]

CONSTANCE RAY HARVEY
Lyon (1941-1942)

Constance Ray Harvey was born in New York in 1904. She received a bachelor's degree from Smith College and a master's degree from Columbia University. Ms. Harvey entered the Foreign Service in 1930. Her career was comprised of mostly consular work in Milan, Basel, Bern, and Lyon. Ms. Harvey received the Medal of Freedom in 1947. She was interviewed by Dr. Milton Colvin in 1988.

HARVEY: There was another period (when I was already interned in Germany in '43) which I don't know much about except by hearing that Switzerland was almost invaded a second time. They had expected that the Germans would try to send troops across to Italy by rail. That didn't happen either. I think I understand why, because in about July or August '42, when I was still in France at that time, I happened to be traveling on the train from Lyon to Berne, and asked a Swiss officer who was riding in the compartment with me what would happen if the army decided to take to the réduit, as they called it, the fortified area in the mountains, if anybody, German or French, should cross the line. I said to him, "You mean to abandon the cities?"

"Oh, yes," he said.

And I said, "Your wife and children in the hands of the enemy?"

And he said, "Of course." So that, of course, was a typical Swiss attitude, and it was why Switzerland was not invaded. It would not be worth that much today.

Well, they didn't get us until the landings in North Africa took place on the seventh of November, a Sunday. We had had a slight indication that we had to be ready to burn documents and possibly to leave perhaps a day before, so I had spent all of the Saturday of the sixth of November and the Sunday morning of the seventh of November, burning everything in the consulate that I could lay my hands on that had the names of anybody who had come in there. How they ever reopened that office afterward, I don't know, but I was determined that no French people or anybody else who had had any contact with the Americans could be traced from the records in that office.

I remember that I went home to get my coffee which I'd left, when the message came over the radio early on the Sunday morning, which made me rush back to the office immediately: "The Americans are landing. No news from Vichy." And we wondered where they were landing. Where? We had no idea! Of course, it was taking place, but we didn't know where! We thought it was undoubtedly the coast of France. I certainly got over there to the office to start my burning as fast as I could.

I remember I had a rather wild Haitian diplomat spend part of the morning with me. He had been up in Paris until the last moment, because Haiti wasn't in the war, but he described to me how his place in the country had flown a Haitian flag, and how the Germans had come in and lowered the flag. He immediately packed up and went right straight to headquarters in the Palais de Versailles, this very insignificant diplomat, I should say, and stamped his foot, and he said, "I'm an independent neutral nation, and this cannot take place. You are occupying my property, and you've pulled down the Haitian flag." They sent somebody out immediately to put it up again, and they only sent a colonel. He said, "Not so! It was pulled down by a general; a general should put it up!" (Laughter) I cannot remember his name, but he was well known in various circles, and he spent that morning with me as we got ready. We knew that we were going to be in serious trouble.

I might tell you what happened on Monday morning. My Belgian clerk that I have told you about, who helped me so much with the Belgian passports and so forth, he had been already arrested and was in Montluc prison, in the hospital part of the prison, because he was ill. He'd been there for about ten days. I got news on Monday that he had disappeared from the prison, and finally, we discovered what had happened. He'd been put on a train to go to the south of France, to an assembly point, where they were getting people ready to send them to concentration camps. I said to my chief, "I'm going to the prefet de police immediately." We couldn't stand this man. I can't remember his name, but we didn't like him a bit. "I'm going to see him."

He said, "It won't do any good."

I said, "I'm going to go anyway." I must say, I was absolutely beside myself. I stayed in that man's office over an hour, an hour and a half, and I wouldn't leave. I think I kicked and screamed and cried, and I said, "Never, never will I go to a diplomatic internment," which we knew we were headed for on Wednesday, "and let this man go to a concentration camp. I went to school in France, France has been my second country for all these years. I will spend the rest of my life fighting against France if this occurs."

Finally, he said, "I'll telephone." And we got him off the train just ten minutes before the train left, and he was put back in an ambulance and rushed back to the hospital. His wife and I trailed after the ambulance, and we got in and sat down on his bed, where he had crawled back, and ate up all his dinner, and laughed and laughed and laughed. We could hardly believe what was going on.

Then after we were interned, everything in that part of France changed. I mean, the day it was occupied. People who had been very reluctant to do very much started to do things they'd never had the courage to do before, really.

Q: That was America coming into the war, a catalyst for that.

HARVEY: It was also the occupation that did it. You see, now they'd lost everything, and now they weren't afraid in the same way. It's the same kind of psychological thing.

So the nuns who were running the hospital in the prison got Jack – that was the day or the day after we left; I think the very day we left – dressed up in some kind of nun's garments, whisked him across to the Archbishop's palace across the road, where he was hidden, I don't know, for not very long, but then friends came and finally smuggled him out of France, also with his wife, I think separately, into Switzerland, where he spent the rest of the war and mostly working for Allen Dulles. So that was the beginning of occupation for me.

Q: Then you were interned? You were picked up and sent to Lourdes?

HARVEY: Yes. We were put on the train. We were taken and put on a train on the very day that the German Army passed through Lyon on the way to the Mediterranean. I really didn't see any of that, because I was being taken in the police car to the train, to leave Lyon. What happened was that we got there and, of course, there were all kinds of people, official guards and everything, to see us off. There were only three of us, the consul general and I and our non-career vice consul, a very elderly gentleman who had just recently joined us. When the time for the train to start came, none of our luggage had arrived. We were allowed a couple of suitcases, and I said, "I will not go into internment without my suitcases. I'll never see them again. I'm going to get off this train."

So they both got off with me, because they hadn't got theirs either, and the train just left without us. And there we were, completely unchaperoned. All the officials had gone away, and all the people who had come to say goodbye to us, of course, had gone away, too. One very crazy man who was the president of the Strasbourg Chamber of Commerce, a Monsieur Jacquel, whom I knew, because so many Alsations on the Chamber of Commerce were 76enefited, as they said (that means they had come to Lyon from occupied Alsace), was there with a great bouquet of flowers for me. I said, "Get Mr. Jacquel and his flowers off this platform and don't let him come near me." It was the craziest thing I had ever heard of, to have these people coming to say goodbye to me.

Q: I think it's a marvelous touch.

HARVEY: It was, really. It was an amazing thing. In any case, the train was gone, there we were, nobody there. I said, "I think we'd better inform the authorities that we're still here. Otherwise, they'll make some trouble."

So we telephoned to the 76enefited76, and they said, "Well, your luggage is on the way. Just take the next train which goes down toward Marseille, and there you can get the train that's coming from Marseille, pick it up and go on the night coach to Lourdes. That will be all right."

We had had nothing to eat, and there was nothing to eat in the restaurant, there were no taxis, nothing running, of course. By this time, the German Army had gone through with their tanks and everything else. So we decided, "Well, we've just got to walk back and see if we can't find some black restaurant somewhere that will give us some food, because it's going to be a great many hours before we see food again."

So we started up the road, along up the Rhone, and we came to a restaurant that we knew about, where you always had to have a reservation at least two days in advance to be given any food. We stuck our heads in, and they said, “No, no, no. No, there’s no food. No place, no place to sit down, no food.”

So I went and put my head behind a curtain or something and said, “Do you really want to have the consul general of the United States and his two officers who are on their way to be interned, do you want to turn them away without feeding us at all?”

And they said, “Come in, come in.” They hid us behind a curtain, and we had a champagne lunch, a perfectly marvelous lunch, and two and three people that we knew for some reason – I don’t know how they found out where we were – came and joined us and stayed with us. Then we turned around and walked back to the station, where we were going to get on the train.

On the way back, just going along back – it was a long walk – we passed two Polish secret service men whom we knew. Of course, we didn’t recognize them, we didn’t say anything or do anything at all, and they looked as if they’d seen ghosts. Well, they sort of had. (Laughter) Then we got on our train and left for internment in Lourdes, with our luggage.

Q: Pick up a little bit, Constance, on the interment in Lourdes and then what happened when you were brought into Germany.

HARVEY: I think we were there about two months and a half. We were interned on the 11th of November, and we left about the tenth or 12th of January, something like that. In any case, we didn’t know about our future; we just thought that we were going to be exchanged and sent out through the Pyrenees to Spain, you see, across to Lisbon. That was what we all expected. We were put in three different hotels.

Lourdes, at that time, didn’t have many visitors in cold weather, and mostly the hotels weren’t open, but they provided us. We had a member of the French Foreign Service, a very young man, a very young officer, staying in one of our hotels. We were guarded, so to speak, in a very gentle sort of fashion. We could go out and go shopping and get various things if we were taken out by somebody. Whoever took us out would just stand in the middle of the square, and we could go in all directions and do our errands, then come join him again and go back to the hotel.

We also had the opportunity occasionally of going and having a meal, a dinner, in one of the three hotels where some of our friends were, instead of always eating in our own hotel. This is important, really. It was in January then when I was with this Frenchman whose name was Pierre Dupuis, sort of like Joe Jones, you see. He had been in the United States and had taught in Smith College for about two years, and he’d married an American girl, but he was a very young widower and he was stationed in the Foreign Service at the government in Vichy. He had been assigned to go with us, wherever we would be, Mr. Dupuis would be with us as a member of the neutral government of Vichy. If you ever really have physical contact with somebody who is scared to death, you never forget it. Because we’d been talking at dinner, at the hotel, with Dupuis at the table, about the possibility of maybe the Germans might come and get us, because we were not being exchanged as we had expected, you see. We sat there for two and a half months. It was kind of spooky.

As we went back home, in theory, Mr. Dupuis took my arm to try to keep me from stumbling in the dark, but he was shaking like an aspen leaf. I practically had to hold up the little man. We got back to the hotel. Then a couple of days later, we were interned by the German Army. I will tell you later what happened to Monsieur Dupuis. That was during internment.

To go back to Lourdes itself, I had a visitor who came. I can't remember exactly when it was, but I think it was sometime perhaps just before Christmas or after Christmas. A woman from one of the Resistance groups was sent to me by a friend of mine, and she came with a carte d'identité with my picture on it and everything, to help me escape. I thought, "Well, this would be very fascinating." But unfortunately, just the night before – yes, this is well before Christmas – "Kippy" Tuck had got everybody together and he said, "Now, no matter what happens, none of you must try to escape. It would be very dangerous for the rest of us. This is very, very important that we stick together. We have old people and children with us, and we can't just put people in jeopardy by somebody trying to do some funny business."

So I had to say to this young woman, "No, I'm sorry. This is impossible. I will not come with you."

She said, "I can arrange everything for you and see that you get railroad tickets and everything."

I said, "No." So I didn't.

And when I got back to Washington, I went in to see Jack Earhardt, talked a little about my experiences, and he said, "Constance, we thought if anybody would escape, you would. Why didn't you escape?" And I was as mad as could be! I thought, "Well!" But I think I probably could have made it into Switzerland. In any case, I didn't. So my life was different because of that.

Q: Yes, but let's pick up on the Frenchman you mentioned who was so terrified.

HARVEY: He went with us, too. He was one of the people who went with us into internment, as a representative of the neutral government of Vichy. We had a Swiss diplomat with us, who was a representative of our protecting power. Then when we got there, we also had a German diplomat who was delighted to be in Baden-Baden looking after us, instead of being bombed in Berlin. (Laughter) He was with us the whole time, and I think his wife was with him, too. We were 150 people altogether, which was quite a collection. But they wanted to get, for us, you see, the German Military Commission in North Africa which had been captured during the landings. They would have been of great assistance if they could have gotten them even some months later, and that's why, for 13 months, the governments haggled about this. But our government never gave them up. That group spent the rest of the war in Texas, and we were finally exchanged in February of '44 for German diplomats held at White Sulphur Springs.

I think that one story which I may have told you off the cuff explains it pretty well. I was very pro-English, pro-British, although I personally never lived or was stationed in England, and I remember saying to one of my close French friends one day, who had been in the Army himself, had been captured and escaped in the very first days of the war, “Why doesn’t France pull itself together and continue to join up with England, to help save England? Why doesn’t France get back into the war?”

And he looked at me and said, “Oh, you don’t know what it was to see men running.” And I felt deeply, deeply ashamed of myself when I realized what the defeat and humiliation had meant to that country. Of course, in a sense, that also explains the power of De Gaulle later.

Q: It just was a wrenching experience for the nation, with this great military history, to essentially be defeated and be humiliated in the process.

HARVEY: Yes, and so rapidly. In World War I, it was a terrible, murderous war, but in a sense, at that time, the country wasn’t overrun, you see, practically overnight, in 1940, in such a short time, a complete collapse. This was really very, very shocking to the French. They weren’t really prepared for that sort of thing at all psychologically. I think a great many of them just had to have a “father figure” to hang onto psychologically, and the general was there.

Q: Was there to some degree an anti-British feeling because Britain had not been defeated, and somehow or other, the British were still in the war when France was out of the war? In other words, was there sort of a mixed feeling of admiration for the British for keeping up, and at the same time a dislike for the British because the French had capitulated and the British had not? Was there a sort of schizophrenia there for the French? Because there was, I know, a strong anti-British feeling among many of the French. Is that the traditional anti-British feeling, going back to the Middle Ages, or is that the French feeling that somehow or other, British should have quit, too?

HARVEY: I think, above all, latently there’s a great deal of anti-British feeling still in France, probably even today. This is something that goes way, way back, and you can find it in England, too, definitely, even before Napoleon. That was reactivated by various things, as you say. The British bombing at Mers el Kébir, of course, had been a shock to them, especially to the French Navy. Of course, of all people, it was the French Navy who hated the British more than anybody else.

You see, we Americans were not frequented by the people who were anti-Anglo-Saxon, so to speak. I mean, we knew that they existed and we knew we had to be careful about this, that, and the other, but there were people who were really our friends. I happened to have some very good friends in Lyon, because I went with one letter of introduction to a prominent family when I arrived there, which was very helpful. They were very pro-British. But you had to know who in a family was pro-Vichy, and who was against it. You couldn’t trust anyone just because he was related to or had a certain position or was the brother or son of somebody. You had to know each individual well, and you had to be very careful what you said. You couldn’t let any cats out of bags just by chatting too much.

Q: Were the French astonished that the British could stay in the war? Did they sort of expect the capitulation of Great Britain shortly after the capitulation of France?

HARVEY: Again, the people I knew kept up their hope that the British were going to hang in there, and they did admire them, even some people that didn't like them that much. That doesn't mean that they necessarily liked De Gaulle. That was quite a different story. Of course, anyone who had anything to do with the Navy was not likely to like the British in any case, but I don't think I ran across many naval people there in the middle of the country.

I had one French friend, this family I knew well, very well indeed. He did business with the Germans right up to the last moment. All the time I was there, he was going up to Paris and further north on business with the Germans. I knew perfectly well he was betting on the British winning the war, but he wasn't giving up his business because of that. They, of course, wanted very much for the Americans to come.

I've never told you about down in the country. I had a house in the country because I couldn't have an apartment or anything in the city; I just had a room in a hotel. But I had a house in the country in the department of the Ain, and there I had people down for weekends to this country house. To get food, you had to go scrounging. I would go around to one place where they sold butter right from where they made it black market, of course, naturally. The man who ran this, the fruitier, as they called the man who does butter and cheese in the country, he would call me aside. He'd say, "Mademoiselle, come, come. Let's have a little drink in the room above the shop. I want to talk to you."

So I would go up with him to this little room above the shop, and he'd put his great hands and arms on the table, lean forward earnestly, and say, "When? When? What should we do in the meantime? When are the Americans coming? Are we supposed to work now?" This was just one of the common people. But there were lots of people who were looking for their real savior, you see, for the Americans.

Q: The United States was the real savior?

HARVEY: Well, there was always a feeling of friendliness, in general, for the Americans, still. You see, the Americans were not just Anglo-Saxons to them; they were the people with whom they'd been involved in our revolution and then we'd taken on theirs and so forth. They remembered that, and they remembered us as friends.

People were divided about the Vichy Government. We couldn't help but see both kinds in a way, but people made little waves. They didn't dare talk too openly, you see, because they never knew when the Gestapo would arrive and scoop you up. We had Gestapo coming into the office constantly. We were very careful not to find out too closely who came into that office. We didn't ask too many questions. We found it better not to know always. Some of them, we knew pretty well were members of the Gestapo, which was quartered right across the street from my hotel, in the hotel where my consul general was lodged.

For instance, people got around things in funny ways. There was nothing to be bought in the shops. It was practically impossible to buy any objects. I had a maid whom I would send to buy anything she could find, and one day she came back with a teapot. She said, "It was the only thing I could buy anywhere.”

I said, “That’s great.” I’m still using it.

But for instance, in a picture shop where they did beautiful picture framing and sold pictures, they had nothing left to offer because no merchandise was created during all this period. But in one window they had a great big picture of Petain, and in another was a great big picture of Laval. Under the picture of Petain was “Epuisé.” And under the picture of Laval was a sign “Vendu.”

Q: That says everything.

HARVEY: Other funny things would happen. One day, a horse came down the main street of Lyon, the Rue de la République, right where our office was, and everybody stopped and clapped. (Laughter) Nobody had seen a horse in they didn’t know how long!

One had to be very careful with whom one spoke, because they might be on one side or the other and go and tell what you said. So before you got into politics of any kind, you had to know the person really well with whom you were speaking. The French are apt to chatter a bit too much. I was traveling on a train from Vichy back to Lyon once, and happened to sit next to one of the rather famous French generals, General De La Laurencie, and he started to talk to me, you see, because he was very anti-Petain. I was terrified with what he was talking about. I thought he was doing the most imprudent thing I’d ever known. People could pick up what he was saying. So we were very careful, you see.

Q: Now we come to one of the questions that fascinates me, and I know of interest to others. That’s what you can tell us about your meeting with, and your knowledge about General Giraud and also under what circumstances you met him and what role he was at that time assuming, or just anything that you want to say about that. And if you want to bring in anybody else, that’s fine, too. We’ll call this a Giraud chapter.

HARVEY: Before I talk to you about Giraud, whom I got to know probably in late July of ‘42, I want to back up a bit and tell you a little bit more about the work I’d been doing regularly for our attaché in Bern, General Legge. I told you about one or two things that I did for him, but I went personally to Switzerland every once in a while, carrying documents to him and reports which we had from the occupied zone and from other places and, of course, from Belgium and so forth.

Once, for instance, I arrived and we met in a field outside of Geneva. I presented him with some documents which I knew what they were, and which had been brought down to me by one of the agents that we had working in the north, who brought information to us. They were the maps of all the emplacements of the anti-aircraft equipment of Germans all in and around Paris. He turned sort of white and said, “Oh, for goodness sake, you just brought this in by hand?”

I said, “Oh, yes, no problem.” And the way I did it: I had a Ford car, and when you crossed the frontier, there was always a member of the Gestapo right at the frontier with a French officer, watching as you went back and forth. I knew all about that. Fortunately, that Ford car had a glove compartment for which there was a separate key, not the key to the rest of the car, the ignition, which is more usual. So when I went in, I very often just locked up papers inside the glove compartment and turned the key down inside my bosom. When I went into the place to check out with the French officer and the Gestapo to go into Switzerland, I left my car open, with the keys just hanging from the ignition. Everybody trusted everybody else, of course, and there wasn't any problem about it. Sometimes people had hidden things in the machinery under the hood, and they sometimes looked under the hood. I thought that was something to avoid. So if a package weren't too bulky, it could get into that glove compartment and often did.

I remember the general said, "I shall remember that, Constance." So later, when he gave me the Medal of Freedom, I guess he remembered.

However, this was just part of the story. So to go back to your more specific question. Toward the end of the summer of 1942, Giraud had arrived in France and having escaped from a German prison east of Dresden. We didn't know much more than that, I had a good friend, Leon de Rosen, a Frenchman working with the American Red Cross, helping distribute milk and other supplies, various things, mostly for children. He got Red Cross parcels and other things to people in the occupied zone. He moved around a good deal, and he was a very patriotic Frenchman. One day he said to me, "Constance, you know Giraud is here in this area, and I've told him about you and he wants to meet you. He's very anxious to have a way of communicating safely with the Americans, and he doesn't see any way in which he can do that." You will remember he was at Vichy, but he left Vichy, I think, for good in May or thereabouts, and never went back. "He is here and staying at the Chateau de Fromente outside of town, and I could take you up there if you would like to meet him."

I said, "Oh, yes, sure, I'd love to. That would be very interesting." As usual, I didn't say anything to anybody. I just went with Leon.

He said, "I will stay outside in the car. You are to go in. Just go in, open the door, go in. Don't stop to ring the bell. Just walk in."

I went in. It was, to me, a memory I shan't forget. It was a beautiful entryway, black and white marble floor, a staircase, and there was no one there but this very tall general, a very elegant-looking gentleman. Apparently there was no one else in the whole building. I think the servants had all been sent away. Then we met and talked, and he said that he was very anxious to try to get in touch with Americans, but didn't see how he could. He couldn't go back to Vichy, wasn't about to go back to Vichy. There had been attempts to assassinate him and rumors of assassination, and he had to be very careful.

I said, "Well, I have a way of doing that."

He said, "My young friend thought maybe you might be able to help me."

I said, "Yes. A good friend of mine is the military attaché in Bern, and I see him, and I could easily take a message if you want to send one. I would be very happy to do it."

So we talked for a little while, and I told him I had gone to school in France, and then he said, "Let's get De Rosen in, and we'll talk together." So De Rosen came in, we strolled in the garden, and had a nice chat about things, and I departed.

I went back once more some weeks later. I guess I got another request to go. I went alone that time, and I didn't take my American car. I had, by that time, also acquired a little old dirty Peugeot for such occasions and thought that was better. So I drove up the hill outside of town to the Château, and went in and saw him once more there.

Then I saw him a third time, a few weeks later, by appointment. He sent word that he wanted to see me. I was to go to a very humble part of Lyon, the working-class quarter, and just go in the door and up to the apartment on the second floor. He told me just where to go, so I did. When I arrived, I found a room with nothing in it but a couple of chairs and a table and an enormous bouquet of carnations on the table. Carnations from a French gentleman for a lady visitor, you see, just to make it look attractive. So we talked again, and both times he gave me papers to take to Legge. One of the times, I don't remember which time, but probably during that third visit, he gave me the papers which were his proposals for the landing in the south of France. He had mapped out exactly how he wanted to have it done and how he would personally take command. I took those papers to Legge. That was the last time I saw Giraud.

One of Giraud's adjutants was Colonel de Limarès. I went to see de Linarès a couple of times, and he always gave me documents to take to Legge. Sometimes I think I had messages from Legge to hand in the other direction.

Then toward the end of October 1942, Giraud left the area and went to join his family near Aix-en-Provence, and I didn't see him again until after the war, when he came to see me in Zurich.

Q: Why don't we just jump that for a moment? How was that meeting after the war, when he came to see you in Switzerland?

HARVEY: Oh, that was fascinating. When he came back to Switzerland, I think it was in '48, my last year at Zurich. Here he is back, seeing friends in Zurich. [Looking at photographs] These are some of them, the people he saw when he was brought through Switzerland, when he escaped from Königstein fortress on the Elbe, which was really quite an episode. It was way off beyond Dresden in what is now East Germany. He spoke German very well, and he got himself across the border out of Germany and first into a part of Switzerland.

Q: He climbed out on a rope or something, didn't he? And here he is, this extremely tall man.

HARVEY: Yes, very tall for a Frenchman. He shaved his moustache off when he escaped. Here he is with his moustache, but this is when he came to see me. He came to my office to see me.

Q: Tell us a little bit about that meeting, when he came to see you. Was it to thank you?

HARVEY: Yes, yes, and to talk to me about lots of things. In any case, that was the last time. He said, "Do come and see me in Paris sometime," but I never did get to that. I was very shortly afterwards transferred to Athens.

I had a letter from him not very long before he died. He died thinking he'd been poisoned. I heard this afterward. But he didn't; he died of internal cancer.

When in 1942 he joined the troops in North Africa, he took one son with him, leaving his wife, a daughter, and another son, I guess, behind. They were taken to Germany. His daughter died in Germany in a concentration camp.

Q: Going back to Eisenhower's memoirs, where he meets Giraud and Giraud says that he is prepared to take charge of the Allied forces, and Eisenhower has to explain to him, no, that's his job. Obviously, that came as a shock to him, in that here he was, in a sense, the ranking general, and he was not going to command that. Did that come up in later discussions, that he was essentially pushed aside? I'm quoting the book, Diplomat Among Warriors, and it's dangerous to quote without the book, but as I remember, basically in that book, they said, "You can command the French forces."

HARVEY: Yes. After the assassination of Darlan, he sort of took charge, in a sense, in Africa. He claimed, I think, to me, and he certainly claimed in his second book, of which I do not have a copy, that he had sent a message to President Roosevelt, and something had come back or something was written about it, "Okay. Roosevelt." I was queried on this by the military historian, but I had never known the answer to that. I think he certainly wanted, before he actually got to Africa, and expected that he would be in charge, in command of any force landing on French soil, because he was the ranking French general. Weygand was too old to do anything, that Giraud would be in charge. But whether he ever got any real acceptance of that, I very much doubt. I knew what Eisenhower did. I knew that, but I didn't go over this with him. I certainly didn't talk it out with him. I have no idea whether there was this document. I don't know. They've never found out. It may be in some archives; I have no idea.

Q: He may very well have gotten a letter from Roosevelt which could be read in several different ways, Roosevelt keeping his hands open to De Gaulle or Giraud.

HARVEY: Yes. I don't think he thought so much about De Gaulle, but the command was to be Eisenhower, obviously. I think that knowing, at least at a distance, a little about Roosevelt, I think his being equivocal was quite possible. And knowing Giraud, I think Giraud interpreted it the way he ardently desired it to be. But that is only, of course, what I deduce.

Then there is one other mystery about the whole thing. After I met Giraud the first time – this is in his first book, Mes Evasions, his daughter got a message that somebody should go and talk to somebody at Vichy. A young woman went up and talked to somebody else, and came back and said that, "There is somebody in the American Embassy who wants to talk with some representative of Giraud, wants to get in touch with him." Giraud sent one of his officers, General Baurès. I didn't know about that. Giraud never told me about it. Whom Baurès saw in the forest outside of Vichy, no one seems to know. No one. I never knew, never heard about it until after the war. They apparently have talked to Admiral Leahy, to Doug MacArthur II. In a sense, you would have thought it would have been the military attaché in Vichy, who was Bob Schow, with whom I was interned for 13 months. But as I never spoke about these matters to anyone when I was interned, or at any other time, I have no idea about that. I don't know who it could possibly have been. I don't know who it was. I don't know who would know, because nobody seems to be living except possibly Schow. I don't know if somebody could find out if Schow is still living and ask him.

Q: Somebody in the State Department could probably track that.

Let me ask you this indelicate question, and you answer it as you wish. In any meetings with Giraud, including the post-war meeting, did he ever express any opinion about General De Gaulle?

HARVEY: I don't remember any kind of comment about de Gaulle. He expressed He said to me often an idea which was virtually the title of his second book, Un Seul But: La Victoire. Translated, "My Only Objective: Victory." I think it expresses him and his attitude very strongly. He was a soldier, and he wasn't interested in, nor had a real concept of the political future of France. Of course, that is the difference between him and De Gaulle, the real difference.

Q: I'm glad that you said that, because you had told me that once, and I thought that was very important, that essentially De Gaulle had the concept.

HARVEY: Oh, yes, and he had it all worked out in his mind what he was going to do with France. There's no doubt about it.

Q: And Giraud was the soldier who would bring about the victory and then retire.

HARVEY: Oh, yes. I don't think he had any real political ambition in that sense whatsoever. I don't think it occurred to him. I think he thought that he had the right and station to be the general, you see. When I saw him after the war, I don't think that he ever mentioned De Gaulle to me. I don't remember that. Nothing striking.

Q: In Bob Paxton's book on the French Army, a very interesting book, how the French – Juin, for instance, as an example – were first with Vichy, then against Vichy. There was no unity in terms of the French Army, in terms of supporting, until after the North African landing. Am I right on that?

HARVEY: Supporting De Gaulle?

Q: Yes.

HARVEY: He wasn't that popular, as I gathered it, when I was there, with the leading officers in the French Army. This is something that I was interested in myself. I think our government understood this, and that's one reason they were perhaps interested a bit in Giraud, because they were not entirely against him, you see. He made a trip to the United States, you know, before De Gaulle did. I don't know which year it was, but during the war while I was still in captivity, I guess. It was in '43 sometime when he made a trip to the United States. He was received, of course, by Roosevelt. I think that they felt that many French officers in France would follow Giraud rather than De Gaulle, and I think that that was possible. The ones who wanted to follow De Gaulle had already gone to London.

Q: They'd gone to England, yes.

HARVEY: They'd gone to England, and also there was a certain jealousy among the people who hadn't gone, I think. It wasn't quite the same thing. Masses of people and the younger people were perhaps attracted to De Gaulle. Of course, there were people who were De Gaullists. One of them was the young daughter of the subsequent ambassador to Washington, whom I knew well. She was only 17 years old at that time, Violaine Hoppenot, a very, very brave girl. She was working for the Belgian underground. Afterwards, she went back to Paris, I don't know just when, but after we were interned.

Q: You mentioned one thing I'd like to come back to in a moment. Giraud was one of the very senior officers, a five-star general in the French Army. So was Weygand.

HARVEY: So was Weygand.

Q: Was there any liaison between Giraud and Weygand?

HARVEY: Giraud would go down to talk with Weygand. He did that, I think, a few times. I didn't know much about this, but I gathered that was the case. But Weygand always said, "I'm too old." He was old at that time. "I'm too old to really play any part." I think that was part of the story. Of course, there were a number of people who felt that Petain was secretly in favor of what was going on, but nobody knew that.

Q: Does anybody really know that to this day? It's sort of a mystery point, isn't it? It was not brought up when Petain went on trial. There was some sort of attempt, as I remember it, to bring this up, and nothing came of it. It made Petain, in that sense, a mystery man, didn't it?

HARVEY: I think the trouble really with Petain was that he was really too old. I think I've said in various places. It was generally known while I was in Lyon that one of the tricks was to get him to sign papers late in the afternoon when he was vague, that they didn't give him important documents in the morning when he was more alert. This became a sort of practice. He was surrounded by a bunch of people who . . .

Q: Psychopaths?

HARVEY: Oh, no. People who were really playing the German game. Quite a few of them. After all, the country was divided. One forgets this, that there were people who were afraid of communism, and there were the extreme right who existed in France, and a good many of them were really virtually pro-German and thought that, after all, they could work things out with Germany.

Q: There was that wonderful book and movie that was made some years ago, which brought this out, when we heard that young aristocrat talking about how he was educated to hate the Jews. "The Sorrow and the Pity" is the movie. That came out very strongly that there was that element.

HARVEY: Oh, yes. There was always the group which was the far right. They were, as always, interested in their positions. They were sure the Germans were going to win, and they didn't want to be on the losing side. I think it's as simple as that.

Then there were these other people, like my industrial friend, who would talk with and do business with the Germans, who told me once, while I was still there, that he had been in a conference in Alsace. This was sometime in '42, before I was interned. He said, "One of those Germans said, 'We know what's going on with the Jews. Even if we lose the war, we should have gained the annihilation of the Jews.'" And this chap came back and told me, and various other people.

Another thing I just couldn't believe my ears: in about August of '42, a woman from the Swiss Red Cross came to my office and said that their group, the Red Cross, sometimes got permission to go in to see the really sick people in some of the German concentration camps, as well as the prisoner of war camps. She said, "We have learned that they're actually taking their victims and making soap of Jews." We talked it over. Of course, it was literally true, it really was. I remember this woman. Actually, the Swiss Red Cross got out quite a number of elderly people into Switzerland just a little bit toward the end of the war. One of them had been my dressmaker, the most important dress maker outside of Paris. I had known her for years, and I didn't know, of course, that she'd been captured. She was almost 60, and she went through an awful business, being in a camp. They brought her out, dying of tuberculosis. She finally recovered, and I saw her before she went to the hospital. I saw her in St. Gallen, and she told me about some other people, what had gone on in the camps. I knew what had happened. I had eight people I knew who went to concentration camps. Two of them that went were clerks at the consulate in Lyon.

Q: Did they come back?

HARVEY: The woman died in Ravensbrück, and the man was finally liberated by our troops at Buchenwald. He came back, and I had long talks with him afterward, but he didn't live very long. He died young. But he told me about what it was like to be sent there.

Also, I must say just a few words about one of our Canadian friends, a young man, Frank Pickersgill. He stayed in my house out in the country for a number of weeks, quite a while in 1942. He had been studying for the Canadian Diplomatic in Paris, had overstayed his time and been picked up by the invaders and taken to the prison at St. Denis. There's a big prison there just north of Paris. He and another Canadian boy were there for a year and a half, and they escaped. Frank, you couldn't have told he wasn't a Frenchman; he spoke absolutely flawless French. My French friends couldn't believe he wasn't French. He didn't have a drop of French blood. He'd been brought up, I think, in Manitoba, and he had learned French from a French governess. He didn't have French blood, but he sure knew how to talk French, and he knew Frenchmen all over the country, all over France.

He stayed at my place quite a while because he had escaped, and we picked him up and said he was not to try to go out on one of those “lines” that people had rigged up for people to go out, that we’d get him out with a passport. We were pretty sure we could, with a proper passport and a permit, because he was deaf in one ear and therefore a non-combatant. Very unfortunately, he’d had a gun go off near his ear. So after a number of weeks, we did get him off to go through Spain to Portugal, and on to England. He showed up again in England. After intelligence and communications training, he was parachuted back into France by the English, with a number of other people. I’ve heard that about 20 were parachuted at the same time. That was probably sometime in ‘43, after I was interned. They were all picked up almost immediately, and put in prison again in Paris. He almost liberated the whole bunch of them, but he fell and broke his leg, and that didn’t help any, so they got him again. They finally took him to Buchenwald, the concentration camp, where he was hanged as a spy. The man who was our consular clerk, and who also had been in that camp, told me later, “When he walked in, he was just the same old chap we had known before in Lyon. He was just as cheerful as anything, and he acted in a perfectly normal way.” That was our last news of him. He was a brave guy.

Q: About the possibility of Spain entering into World War II on the side of Germany and Italy. You mentioned that you had an interesting story to tell in relation to that.

HARVEY: It concerns an American who was very well known to our service, but not in our service, Royal Tyler, who lived in Geneva and had a chateau in Burgundy, and went back and forth occasionally between the two residences. I got to know him. He had lived a life in his youth in constant connections with Spain. He had done his undergraduate studies and, I think, some graduate studies, entirely at the University of Salamanca, and he knew all of the Spanish nobility and everybody of consequence in Spain, and had gone back and forth and seen a lot of them over the years. He told me, when this was discussed occasionally, when I was in Lyon, that he just knew that Franco and the Spaniards would never, never join the war with Hitler, that they were going to stay out of it, they weren’t going to do it, and there was no use thinking that they would.

A great deal of our policy was based on the belief Spain would join the Axis, especially efforts to get people as fast as they could through France and into Switzerland before something like that happened. Of course, that is one thing that the Department did soon after Pearl Harbor. They kept sending people into Bern, so that they’d have as many people at listening posts as possible before the frontiers all closed.

I myself was sent up with two other people from our office in Lyon, just before Christmas of ‘41. Finally, after demonstrations on my part, I was sent back in January of ‘42, to Lyon, where the staff of Americans had been considerably reduced.

Q: When you were sent back there, Constance, in the meantime, Pearl Harbor had happened.

HARVEY: That’s right.

Q: So when you arrived back there, we were no longer a neutral nation, but we were an enemy of the Axis powers. How long did it take before they got hold of you and took you to Germany for internment?

HARVEY: It was a good many months that we were still there. Of course, our French friends and the people that really were our friends were delighted that America was in the war. They'd been waiting for this moment as their real hope of salvation. During the summer of '42, that was a very interesting period. Some information together about the result of British bombings. There were no American bombings yet, you see. It was all British. And Dupuis was taking this out, and the girl was sending the messages in some way or other. That is what has happened to Dupuis. We went through the rest of our internment without him.

Then there is a sequel to this grizzly story. I don't know, perhaps six or eight months after the war had ended, our embassy was back and working in Paris, and in walked Monsieur Dupuis! He had been this timid little man. I didn't see him. I wasn't there, of course; I was then stationed in Switzerland. But I talked with the people I'd been interned with, several of them that were in the Paris embassy, and they said, "Constance, he is a changed man. You can't imagine how he has changed. You remember what a Mr. Milktoast he was, scared of his shadow and everything, so timid? Well, he's calm and collected."

He was taken to the Alexander Platz prison in Berlin under sentence of execution, put in solitary confinement, and he was there until Berlin was liberated. They probably forgot about him. He even survived the bombing. Instead of breaking him, he had become a man. It was absolutely unbelievable!

Q: A transformation of character.

HARVEY: A transformation. He had faced up to it, whatever it was, and he lived through it. He really had a different personality.

Then later on, quite a few years later, when I was stationed in the embassy in Bonn, and I knew the people in the French Embassy well, one of the top people there said to me, "We told him, when he got back, we'd give him any position he wanted. We would send him back to Washington." He'd been in Washington and knew America well. "We'd make him cultural attaché, and he said, 'Oh, I don't think I could do that.' We said, 'Nonsense, of course you can do that. We'll send somebody to teach you just how to do it. Anything you want, anything we can do for you, we will do.'" So he did. He went to Washington, where he was cultural attaché, and then he married another American girl. Some friends fixed up a cocktail party for him to come to see me with just one or two other people, but at the last moment, he called and said he had something else, he couldn't come. I think he just didn't feel he could see somebody from those days. He didn't live very long. He was really the greatest man I've known, because he was scared to death, but he went ahead with it. When Tom asked him to help, he helped.

Q: That's true bravery. That's right.

HARVEY: That's true bravery.

Q: It's the scared man that did the right thing.

HARVEY: Who really did the right thing, and it transformed him. The fact that he had done that, you see, made him a different person.

Q: Constance, picking back up on this, you were then exchanged.

HARVEY: I must tell you just one or two things.

Q: Yes, please.

HARVEY: About my life there. Everything was more or less all right, and we were taken on these walks and so forth. Then when we knew we were going to be exchanged, we knew ahead of time, things began to get kind of – I don't know, go in every direction. People who had been quite fond of each other began to quarrel, one thing and another, and people were emotionally upset. Then one day, it was snowy weather and people had gone out for their walk with the Gestapo, about eight men had gone out. I don't think there were any women in the group. Sometimes these Gestapo took us up to a little wine place, a weinstube, up in the hills, and we had a drink of some kind of odd wine or something or other with them, and then they brought you back. It was all quite friendly.

The group came back, and one of the Americans was missing. Oh, my! Well, the Gestapo were not very much worried. The German diplomat wasn't that worried, but the person who absolutely couldn't stand it was the U.P. correspondent, because the man that was missing was the A.P. correspondent! He said, "That so and so, if he isn't back in half an hour, I'm making a break for the frontier. That's where he's gone. He's on his way to Switzerland."

Q: With all the news!

HARVEY: With all the news! (Laughter) We tried to calm him down. Poor McHenry finally did appear. I think he had perhaps stopped behind a tree or something and lost the rest of them, followed the lights in town and was glad to get back into the hotel again, you see. About the correspondents, when they got to the frontier of Spain, there was a terrific rush for the telephones. All the lions and lambs who had been lying down together were clawing each other at the telephones once again.

Then we were taken to Lisbon, and we were there about three days or so in the Lisbon Triangle. We were put on the Gripsholm and came back to the United States.

JAMES COWLES HART BONBRIGHT
France Desk Officer
Washington, DC (1942-1949)

Ambassador James Cowles Hart Bonbright was born in 1903. He entered the Foreign Service in 1928. His career included positions in China, Yugoslavia, and France. Ambassador Bonbright was interviewed by Peter Jessup on February 26, 1986.

Q: I'd just keep it rolling chrono-wise. Reber was in Fort de France, and you were "French-desking it."

BONBRIGHT: Yes. Of course, the big problem at that time with the French and a long time after was our relations with de Gaulle and his Free French. We got off on a very bad start. This was before my time; I think it was around Christmas of '41. Without consulting us, General de Gaulle ordered an admiral, who was loyal to him, to take the two French islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, two ratty little places off the coast of Newfoundland, of no importance except they'd been a thorn in our sides all through the Prohibition era, a haven for jolly boating. This infuriated FDR and Mr. Hull, on reflection a little bit more than it should have, but it did, and caused Mr. Hull, I think, to refer to the takeover as "by a group of so-called Free French." That, really, we never recovered from.

Q: That slur.

BONBRIGHT: I'm not sure that it was meant with quite the sense that it sounds. The name "Free French" hadn't been in use all that long. I think he was using it more as a descriptive, and not in the sense as "so-called but not really Free." But who knows?

Q: Yes.

BONBRIGHT: He may not have. But this upset things. We were upset fundamentally, I think, because we still had maintained relations with the French Government in unoccupied France, in Vichy, and we didn't want that upset. Of course, it was a very unpopular policy at home. All the papers practically were all for de Gaulle, and people like Walter Lippmann went around basting the President and the Department for keeping on this connection. But we thought it was important to have people still in unoccupied France and keep an eye on Petain and try to keep him from going overboard, and also as a sign that those French were loyal and hopeful, and at no time did it ever allow it to appear that we approved or loved them, the Vichy government.

Q: Keeping channels open.

BONBRIGHT: Keeping channels open, I think very valid. Of course, that blew up when we invaded North Africa. The Vichy crowd broke diplomatic relations with us. The French fleet, too, had all scuttled, which we would have preferred to get it intact, as indeed we should have; I mean, before the fall of France. That fleet should have been ordered to sail the hell out of there. It wasn't. But it was better sunk than in the hands of the Germans.

Q: Didn't the British bombard?

BONBRIGHT: They had hit them at one time, yes.

Q: In North Africa.

BONBRIGHT: Yes.

Q: Was Ambassador Murphy operating out of the Department or secretly for FDR? I mean, with his maneuverings around Europe.

BONBRIGHT: He did go through the Department. I'm not too clear about the details of the preparations for the landing. There was a special group that was formed with military and State Department people to do that. So that was separated from the normal work of the French desk. I was aware of a lot of it, the work of the vice consuls that we had in North Africa had helped make preparations for the landing, but not in detail. Murphy had carried a good deal of clout when he reported in those days. Of course, the big fight was over Admiral Darlan, whom we sort of recognized as the controller. It became enormously unpopular in our press, but it was designed to save American lives and cut down the military opposition to our landing, and which I think was pretty successful.

Q: Casualties were minimal.

BONBRIGHT: Yes. Then he, of course, was assassinated shortly thereafter. Of course, the Gaullists all wanted to move right in on that, but we had brought out this General Giraud in France, who had been a prisoner of war in Germany, I think, a fine man with a good military reputation. He was dating a civilian, Ruth. Actually, I don't know who picked him. It turned out to be a pretty poor choice. He had no political savvy, he had no stomach for the end-fighting. In fact, finally he just threw in the sponge. He wasn't a viable opponent for de Gaulle; he wouldn't have lasted one round with him and didn't. Of course, we were all criticized then for not being more forthcoming with de Gaulle, for whom there was great sympathy. Everybody appreciated what he'd done. His stand at the independence and to keep on fighting and so on were all very noble and appreciated everywhere. But after things like the St. Pierre and Miquelon episode, they refused to commit themselves to having this man going to France as the French Government without the French people having a chance to express their opinions of what they wanted after the war, because while there were all sorts of rumors coming out, de Gaulle claimed that he had enormous support. It was hard to judge.

Q: You couldn't take a poll.

BONBRIGHT: Yes, you couldn't take a poll. So basically, I think our Vichy policy and our holding off on running 100% out for de Gaulle was sound. What wrecked it was the public relations job. Even when we did something for de Gaulle – and we did many things – we seemed to do it reluctantly.

Q: Or it was painted reluctantly.

BONBRIGHT: Yes. Or under pressure, or it really didn't mean anything, anyway. Some of us in the lower ranks of the Department were bothered by this, and we tried to push the vine further up, but if you're going to do something, for God's sake, let's do it gracefully and try to see if we can't get a little credit for it. But that didn't work with the President and Mr. Hull.

Q: Wasn't there a factor also in there that General de Gaulle was not an unbending back-slapping type; he was a very arch-imperious person?

BONBRIGHT: Indeed he was. First, the British, you see, agreed with us privately. That was the difference. They agreed privately. In fact, Churchill used to say that, “The cross of Lorraine (which was de Gaulle’s logo, so to speak) is the heaviest cross that I have to bear.” But he didn’t say it out loud, publicly. Everyone had heard it, I suppose de Gaulle himself, but it wasn’t the public sphere. So the British got away with much more just by that attitude than we did.

Fundamentally, too, the French group that was allowed to set up business in London, they were just too damned unreliable. There was a sieve. We all found, the British, too, by bitter experience, that you couldn’t pass on anything of a confidential nature to the French in London that didn’t go back to Vichy and eventually to the Germans. Any military planning was out; you just couldn’t do it. That’s really, I think, why de Gaulle was not drawn into any of the planning for the invasion. I don’t think he even knew about it until maybe the boats were already on the way. Anyway, it was last minute. They were taking no chances, and they had to, no question about it. I’ve often wondered, and many people have, if things might have been better after the war if we had treated de Gaulle differently. Surely, I think, in our own interests we could have done some things a little bit differently, but I honestly don’t think it would have made any difference. I think he was a great man, no question about it, but he wasn’t on the same wavelength with us. I mean, he got plenty of support from us once he was accepted by the French. We did all sorts of things for him, like letting French troops lead the way into Paris at the time of liberation, when they had had nothing to do with liberating whatsoever.

Q: They let General LeClerc or somebody move in with the division.

BONBRIGHT: Yes. Of course, the French in the town, the underground, was not without its importance in the liberation and turnover. Then at other times de Gaulle would go right against direct orders and move his troops sometimes right in front of where we were going, things of that sort, just for political reasons. When NATO came along, he supported it all right, but then he wouldn’t let his troops serve under the NATO command. Always the grandeur of France. I think this attitude, particularly during the war, was important in helping to maintain French morale after the disaster, and up to the point of getting them back on their feet after the liberation. But I think he overdid it; I think maybe he got the French to feel that they were stronger than they really were. Anyway, we had trouble with him always to the day he died.

Q: Was his French in writing and oratory superb?

BONBRIGHT: Yes, yes.

Q: An American general in English couldn’t match his eloquence?

BONBRIGHT: I don’t think so. He was very, very intelligent. He was something, great contradictions. Of course, he had that enormous height up above most people.

Q: Would you say one of his great accomplishments was fighting all those right-wing generals and everything and getting Algeria to be independent? I mean, realizing the handwriting on the wall.

BONBRIGHT: Yes, I think so. He's the only one who could do it. I don't think anybody else would have got away with it. I don't know. That's a pretty messy place still, I think. I look back with some nostalgia to the days of the French and British empires, I confess. They were galling at times, and a servant of British crown colony in the old days could be personally very humiliating, they were so patronizing and arrogant, but it was a far, far better world when they were top dogs. They ran pretty tight ships.

Q: Africa, with all its multiple little countries, was pretty much a disaster area as far as not being able to manage things themselves economically.

BONBRIGHT: No. Perhaps they can work themselves out.

Some time in 1943, I think it was, we gave a form of recognition to the French Committee of National Liberation, the de Gaullist group. It agreed to certain powers that we would deal with them, but it was, of course, short of their ultimate goal, which always was that they wanted to be recognized as the future government of France; nothing else was good enough. But when this recognition took place, it was carefully worded, and we thought it was doing them a pretty big favor. Mr. Hull had a press conference after the announcement of this recognition. I give this as an example of Mr. Hull's ability to obfuscate a question.

"Mr. Secretary, when the Allies reconquer France, will the administration of the recaptured territory be turned over to the French Committee or the Allied military government?"

Mr. Hull: "You mean metropolitan France?"

"Yes, sir."

Mr. Hull: "If you will read these terms of recognition, you will find where those phases will be taken up and dealt with as each comes up or as they come to them, or if they should do so earlier, they may do that."

I don't often sympathize with gentlemen of the press; I think they're spoiled brats, a lot of them. But I did feel pity for the man who was covering this press conference and how to write about that announcement.

Q: There must have been similar obfuscation.

BONBRIGHT: Yes.

Q: About some of the others in the Department that helped with the problems or didn't help.

BONBRIGHT: My real boss through all this period was H. Freeman Matthews, known as "Doc," who was head of the European office. He himself had been in Vichy, I think, and had been a French hand for some time. He also worked in South America. He was a wonderful man.

Q: He still lives in Washington, doesn't he?

BONBRIGHT: Yes, I believe so. He sits in a chair all day long and doesn't recognize anybody. But then he had a mind like a steel trap and a tenacity that a bulldog would admire. If he once got his teeth into an opponent, he never, never let go. I owe a great deal to him. He really got me started by arranging for me to go as number two in Paris at the end of my time in the Department. I remember the day he called me in and put this before me. I was greatly flattered. I was only a Class 3 officer at the time, pretty far down still. Of course, the end of the war saw an explosion in the number of people. Everybody who was already in was apt to go up pretty fast because they needed bodies in all directions. I had not particularly looked forward to being in any really big embassies, and I told this to Doc that I'd like to think about it. I could feel his cold eye on me as I left the room.

The next morning he called me in again and looked at me coldly, and said, "With regard to what you said to me yesterday, if you don't want to go to Paris, if you prefer a small post, I'm sure I can arrange to have you sent to Bulgaria."

At which I said, "Doc, I'd be pleased and honored to go to Paris." So he laughed, and we talked about it often afterwards. He was a great friend and a pillar of strength in that department, I always thought.

Another that I worked with not too long was Woody Wallner. He had been in Vichy, too, and Doug MacArthur, the general's nephew, was also a Vichy veteran, both very good officers. I always held it in Doug's favor that he leaned over backwards to ignore the relationship with his famous uncle. He wanted to do it on his own, and he did.

Q: He wasn't like Warren Delano Robbins, waving "Delano"?

BONBRIGHT: No, no, not in the least, which was pretty good. His wife was the daughter of the veep, Senator Alben Barkley, and that didn't do him any harm either. But the thing that really rocketed him up was that after being in the Paris Embassy for a while, he was sent to SHAPE as political advisor to General Eisenhower, who got to depend on him greatly. When he came home after this tour with Eisenhower, when he first became President, Doug was slated to go to Saigon as consul or something, and Eisenhower refused to let him go, and kept him in the State Department as counselor, which is an old slot of many years standing and has no exact place in the hierarchy, but it had always been influential. You could make anything out of it that you could. So he served in that.

Q: It isn't correct to say that as there are so-called Kremlinologists in the Department who devote much of their lives to the Soviet problem, there was not a similar corps of French specialists, were there? They kept shifting around?

BONBRIGHT: No, but there were several of them who did different tours of duty in that area. Wallner, I thought, of all the officers I ran into, knew more about France than any of them. He had the ultimate fate of being number two to Mr. Kennedy's brother-in-law Shriver, who didn't like to have people around who knew more than he did and made life pretty miserable for Woody. So I think Woody pretty much retired after that; he never got another mission, which he richly deserved.

Q: But there wasn't a "Mr. France" as Hickerson was "Mr. Canada"?

BONBRIGHT: No. We regarded Matthews as our guiding light. Of course, Murphy in a way had his own entourage. Basically he was, to me, an Irish Catholic politician.

Q: An operator?

BONBRIGHT: Yes. He got his start under Bullitt in Paris. He was a consul general in Paris at the outbreak of the war. He hadn't had anything to do with the political side before that. He knew how to cut the butter. He was very highly regarded and had a good reputation, but I wouldn't put him in the same room as Bob Matthews.

I'll talk a little about that later when I come back to my last assignment with the Department. Perhaps I can comment about the Russian boss.

Q: So you had a laugh with Freeman Matthews and accepted that assignment.

BONBRIGHT: Yes. Before going to the embassy, I was assigned to the Peace Conference, which took place in Paris in the spring of 1946. I went over first for that. Mr. James Byrnes was Secretary of State at that time and head of the delegation. Those of us from the Department, career people, were scattered around in different jobs, but Matthews was the guy who pulled our strings. We all lived in the Hotel Meurice, which was comfortable but not gaudy. The food was not up to our standards at that time right after the war, as you can imagine.

My particular assignment was on a couple of the peace treaties with the Balkans, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia. My boss was General Bedell Smith, who I had never met before, a very impressive officer and strong-willed, and had, unfortunately, one of the worst tempers I ever saw.

Q: That was purportedly induced by ulcers from which he suffered during his life.

BONBRIGHT: Yes, he did. He did have bad ulcers. I'll describe my run-in with him later back at the Department. Here everything went all right. Everybody helped with the difficult job of negotiations. I fought a little bit with the general. He thought he could win points with these ardent communists by small gestures. He used to hand out fountain pens, things of that sort. I remember when the Czechs sent him back a case of Czech beer; he thought he had it made with these fellows. I found that I. I guess he got over it when he went as ambassador to Moscow at that time and felt that you could maneuver these things on a personal basis, which you couldn't, nobody could.

At the end of the conference, then I moved over to the embassy. My boss there was Jefferson Caffery, who had a long and distinguished career mostly in South America, Cuba, Brazil. He was a very strange man. He worked with only a handful of people. Although I was his number two and I got on all right with him, I was never his favorite. His favorites were Douglas MacArthur, who he had worked with him, and in his whole outer office he had a man named Elim O'Shaughnessy, a Foreign Service officer.

To digress a little bit, Elim's history is amusing. He was the son of a Foreign Service officer, educated abroad, and he had acquired very British mannerisms and accent, wore his pocket handkerchief in his sleeve, like Mr. Roosevelt, smoked a long cigarette. He gave the impression of being a real striped pants-lah-de-dah, which the press would love. Actually, he had a very tough mind and a good one. He took exams for the Foreign Service and two or three times he passed the written, and every time they turned him down on the orals.

Q: Too effete or what?

BONBRIGHT: Finally, he went to somebody on the board and said, "What's the matter?" He was told very frankly that his manners and everything were too European and too un-American, and there wasn't room in the Service for all of this. This fellow suggested to him that he take the orals once more, but that before doing so, he go out in the Middle West somewhere and spend six months in any old job, sort of rubbing elbows with the great American people. So he went out to St. Louis, actually, where he got a job in a gas station, and he worked there for almost the required six months, I think, and never a peep of complaint from him. Finally, an officer from the Department who was going out west to give some exams out there stopped off. He had been instructed to stop off and see O'Shaughnessy.

Q: Was he on a leave without pay or a sabbatical, or what?

BONBRIGHT: No, he wasn't even in the Service then.

Q: Oh, I see. He hadn't been accepted yet.

BONBRIGHT: No, he hadn't been accepted. So this fellow stopped off to have a look and see if O'Shaughnessy had really tried to do as had been suggested to him. When he got back to the Department after this trip, they said to this fellow, "Now how about O'Shaughnessy? Has he changed?"

He said, "I'm sorry to have to report that O'Shaughnessy hasn't changed in the slightest, but everybody else who worked in that gas station was walking around smoking cigarettes out of a long amber cigarette holder."

Q: That's a wonderful story.

BONBRIGHT: A nice fellow. They took him, of course, and never regretted it. He was very good.

Q: Mr. Caffery also had been in Egypt, hadn't he, in Cairo?

BONBRIGHT: He went there afterwards.

Q: He could be described as an eccentric, couldn't he?

BONBRIGHT: Very much so. He was a bachelor for most of his life and married just before he came to Paris. She was a nice woman, his wife, but on the mousy side. He treated her without any consideration whatsoever. I think she had money and that helped. He was a stickler for protocol. I have seen him walk into somebody else's dining room and go up to where he thought he should have sat and see that his name card was somebody else's, take it up and tear it apart and throw it on the floor. Talk about arrogant.

He had a large supply of these little tiny pads on his desk, and he'd write these messages all day to different people. I once got a letter from a congressman or something, he had sent for me to draft a reply, and five minutes later I got a second follow-up: "Mr. Bonbright, how about that letter?" Well, hell, I hadn't had it for five minutes. I finally went in and said, "I'll do my best for you, but I really can't do it this fast." He started laughing. He'd write you three or four at a time and then just feed them into the "out" basket and his secretary would get these.

I remember he was a devout Catholic and used to go to church every morning and read all the papers at home. He got to the office at about 10:00 o'clock, and then he'd stay all through the day. He never ate lunch. He'd go home and run in his garden. But one day he came up to the office at 10:00 with Elim O'Shaughnessy, and he didn't say anything to Elim. A few minutes later after Elim got to his office, he found a note from the ambassador, saying, "Mr. O'Shaughnessy, don't you think that you are exaggerating when you get to the office as late as I do?" He wasn't a man who was greatly loved, I mean, like old Herrick, they said, who couldn't speak a word of French but who was greatly loved there. He was all business.

Q: What did the diplomatic corps think of him? Did they get along with him?

BONBRIGHT: His relations with the British were poor, I think. The British were much more sociable. Duff Cooper was there at the time and Caffery didn't care for him much. O'Shaughnessy and some of the boys used to see a lot of the British but they didn't talk about it in front of Caffery. They had to be a little careful. On important matters, his instincts were good, nothing frivolous about his approach. A strange, strange man.

Q: You've mentioned a number of people who had certain odd quirks and so forth, as all of us do, but time and again you have found career Foreign Service people, when you get right down to it, they really were extremely intelligent and able. Do you attribute that to picking the best of the best in the selection process or to training within the Department and just the learning process as you go from post to post?

BONBRIGHT: I think it was that.

Q: And serving under other good people.

BONBRIGHT: Good men pick good people, as a rule. I think that's how the better officers got ahead. God knows the Foreign Service had lots of people that are not what you would call top-notch. Others have certain qualities that are good, some that are not so good. But it's how the machinery works in contacts. When you're in a job with a bunch of people under you, you instinctively seek the ones who you think can deliver and see that those people move up. One result of that is, I'd say, a lot of people who didn't serve in the Department were at a disadvantage because they never served under the people who were in positions of influence. A lot of them didn't want to be in the Department, but I think they suffered on that account.

Q: I thought of all places, somewhat like the Army, a general will get maybe a couple of people he asks for, but the rest will just come out of the computer or what existed before, and in the Department, an ambassador might get the DCM he wants but the others are just assigned there.

BONBRIGHT: Absolutely. That happens a lot, particularly in the smaller posts. By chance, for instance, I had what I consider a good staff in Lisbon, and what I consider a good staff in Stockholm. I had nothing to do with picking any of them.

Q: I see. That makes it difficult.

BONBRIGHT: Except my counselor in Stockholm, Liv Merchant was in the top slot in those days, I got a letter from him saying that I could have my choice of three men, and he suggested strongly that I choose this fellow. Well, if I had really known any of them well and thought one was really much better than the other, I wouldn't have hesitated to, though contrary to his recommendation, but I didn't. In fact, the one he named was the one that I knew most about and would have picked anyway. Otherwise, I had nothing to do with that.

Q: There's no such thing as surrounding yourself with the eight people you know best?

BONBRIGHT: Everybody tries. They try, and they're lucky if they can get one or two good ones.

I'd like to quote here from a letter which my friend Woody Wallner sent me as I was taking off for Paris.

"Dear Jamie,

This is to say Bon Voyage and to add a word on a threadbare subject, one worn thin by self-appointed Panegyrist from Transylvania, Rosario, and Nebraska. Paris is Paris, has a life and being of its own and a beauty that quite apart from what can be captured on a photographic plate, grows out of that almost autonomous life and being. It doesn't seep in all at once, but it seeps and stays quite independently of the quantity or quality, success or failure of the things one does while living in Paris."

Q: That's very nice.

BONBRIGHT: I always kept that. It was very true. I liked it.

Q: Very nice. You were about to say something more about Elim O'Shaughnessy?

BONBRIGHT: Yes, there was one other rather nice story about him, I think. When he was through with the present assignment in Paris, he was assigned back to the State Department, and he shipped all of his belongings home ahead of him. What was unusual was that among these belongings that he shipped were 20 cases of champagne, a drink of which he was very, very fond. The high figure, however, caught the notice of the customs officials in Washington, who eventually asked him to come in and either explain or be charged rather heavy duties. He then came up with the explanation that under the present Paris law, a worker entering the United States is allowed to bring in, free of duty, the tools of his trade. This so enchanted the customs people that they let him have all the champagne and charged him nothing, but they did give him a warning not to try it again.

He and a Lieutenant Commander John Williams worked in Mr. Caffery's outer office. Williams was his sort of social secretary, and O'Shaughnessy did more substantive jobs for him, as a rule.

I have before me, however, a copy of a memorandum which was addressed to Mr. O'Shaughnessy and Lieutenant Commander Williams, April 1947, which reads as follows:

"As I was accompanied on my Alsace trip by only one secretary, one aide de camp, two Marines, and two chauffeurs, it will be necessary on the next trip to take someone along, especially to see that my luggage does not get lost."

Q: Incredible! And that was in dead seriousness.

BONBRIGHT: He was joking, but he usually had a barb in it.

Another of the best officers was Doug MacArthur. I think I might have spoken about him. I think I did.

Q: Being married to Alben Barkley's daughter.

BONBRIGHT: That's correct.

The other principal officers that I thought well of were Norris Chipman, who was a Russian hand and had an encyclopedic memory about members of Communist Parties in France and elsewhere. He and Richard Eldridge, the labor attaché were very helpful in combating communists who were in control of the labor unions pretty much at that time.

Q: Is Norris Chipman the officer who many years later went back and was fired on by some terrorists in recent years?

BONBRIGHT: No, I don't think so. Norris died not too long after this time.

One officer who, frankly, I didn't care for was Graham Martin, who was the chief administrative officer, very able, ambitious, as slippery as a cold basket of eels. He was intimately acquainted with all the laws and regulations which administrative officers are left to play with, and he was able to turn them to his own use and the use of anyone who was working for him particularly. He was always trying to ingratiate himself with the ambassadors and also getting his own position in the embassy raised. This was pretty well stopped by Caffery, but I'm sorry to say that when David Bruce took over, as much as I admired him and his father, he let down the bars and helped Martin, gave him almost anything that he wanted. This boost eventually started him up the ladder to being ambassador to Italy, I think, at first.

Q: And also he had the rank of ambassador at Geneva to the European office of the United Nations. He didn't lack self-confidence, did he?

BONBRIGHT: No. I thought he was a particularly bad choice for Italy. The Italians liked sophistication, and Martin had no social graces at all. I thought he was a miserable appointment just on those grounds alone. I don't know enough about his handling of things in Saigon to know that he was just the victim of the inevitable. I can't say whether he was good or bad out there, but he certainly was there when the curtain came down.

Q: I understand that he's an embittered retired person in Virginia or North Carolina now. He hasn't written a book, I don't think.

BONBRIGHT: After the war, our government had purchased a number of houses with so-called counterpart funds. One of these was set aside for the deputy chief of mission, a nice house near the Champs de Mars. But I had already rented a nice house which suited me perfectly; it had belonged to the Count Charles de Noailles on Rue Nitot, just off the Place des Etats Unis, not far from the Etoile. It was a charming place, and I preferred it to any of the government housing properties I saw. I was glad that I stayed there. My only objection to it came later, in accordance with the habit of the French of continually changing the names of the streets, and after a while they changed Nitot, which was simple and easy, to Rue de l'Admiral D'Estaing, which I had trouble pronouncing and trouble spelling.

Q: As in Giscard d'Estaing?

BONBRIGHT: Yes. It was the admiral who fought in our revolution in support of the French troops.

Q: What is the origin of that switching names? When somebody sort of becomes obscure? Who was Nitot – a person?

BONBRIGHT: I don't know. I don't remember. I don't know that I ever knew. They like to pay the compliment to somebody who has just done something for them, and then after he's been dead long enough, if they want to honor somebody else, they ditch him. I mean, one of the bigger streets there in Paris was named for Roosevelt – I forget what the name had been before, but it must have been a fairly prominent name because it was one of the big avenues.

Q: That would cause havoc here, wouldn't it?

BONBRIGHT: Absolutely! Perfectly terrible.

Q: You would not be living at 4200 Massachusetts Avenue, but Avenue Cordell Hull or something.

BONBRIGHT: Yes, quite possibly.

The foreign minister at the time when I first got there was Robert Schuman, an Alsatian, a tall, homely man, but a man of great character and strength. He was really a good one. He and Jean Monnet were more or less the fathers, from the French side, of the coal and steel community, which led to the other steps pointing toward greater European integration. We were all sorry when he stepped down.

He was succeeded, I think, by Georges Bidault, who for all of my time there was in and out of the government as either prime minister or foreign minister. He was an unattractive man and he had gotten his reputation for having done great things during the Resistance. But I confess I never saw any evidence of either moral or physical courage. Maybe he did, but you can't prove it by me. Actually, it was a very hard time, because everybody, whether they were collaborators or whether they were loyal, or whether they were working actively for the Resistance or just sitting out the days of the occupation, everybody was trying to get on the bandwagon after the liberation. It's understandable, but there were really no records to go by, and you had to rely on word of mouth and reports from different people, which weren't always unbiased.

I know I inherited from Doc Matthews a loathing for one particular Frenchman named Rene de Chambrun. His father, General de Chambrun, was a fine old gentleman, and everybody liked him. He had a fine career in life. He was a direct descendent of Lafayette, and Rene, his son, tried to get into the United States on the basis that at the time of the revolution, the state of Maryland had voted Maryland citizenship for the direct descendants of Lafayette. Of course, the state of Maryland is not the United States of America. But on the other side, Rene "the rat," as we called him, had married one of the daughters of Pierre Laval, the arch-collaborator, who was prime minister under Petain. The bad thing that he did was fairly well documented. In fact, I think they tried him, and I think they hanged him.

Doc Matthews had this fellow blocked, and he couldn't get a visa. They tried again when I was in the position to carry on the blockade, which I was happy to do. I think eventually he did get in.

Q: Permanently or temporarily?

BONBRIGHT: I don't know how long he lasted, to tell you the truth. I think they finally gave him a visa. The Chambruns had connections to the White House, and he pulled out all the stops on this side of the water as well as France.

Q: Were those connections to Truman?

BONBRIGHT: No, to FDR. He was the worst of the cases. Of course, some of them were pretty good people.

I forgot to mention one of the advantages of my location in our house was that it was just about two miles from the embassy, which allowed me to keep on with the practice which I had started in Washington, walking to work, which was healthy and very pleasant. I enjoyed it always.

Q: In Brussels, you used a bicycle. That was a longer ride?

BONBRIGHT: That was longer; that was 13 kilometers.

Again, not to do anything official, but in Paris I was able to indulge for the first time my growing love for French wines. I had become briefly acquainted with some of them when I was in Brussels. The Belgians always imported the very best French wines. In Paris, I got to know, I think through Ridgway Knight, a man named Raymond Beaudois, who was head of the Academie de Vins de France, who had a marvelous palate and was in the business. He was a wine merchant, a very nice man. I got to know him well. He took some of us in the embassy under his wing just to choose good wines and buy cases for us, and we'd distribute it around. I was always very grateful to him for this and never got a bad steer.

I was also sensible enough while I was in Paris that every case of wine that I bought – and in my position there, I had to buy quite a few – I would remove four bottles and put them aside, so that by the time I left Paris about four years later, I had the foundations of a very nice little cellar, which the original inhabitants of that cellar have long since been consumed. I kept filling up their places and still have quite a number of lovely French wines.

Q: How does it work with wine if you have a particular brand of burgundy which has been known to be superb for years? That doesn't mean it will always be superb?

BONBRIGHT: No, no.

Q: Do you buy only the year that you previously tasted and know is so good? Or do you take a risk?

BONBRIGHT: Of course, there is always some risk. The experts will have a pretty good starting idea of what a wine is going to do within the first year or two, and that's the time when you can buy them the cheapest, is before they have a great reputation. It doesn't always work out, but actually, as I recall it, I don't think I ever paid more than $7 a bottle for even the finest. I have some Chateau Petrus 1961 in my cellar today that sells for $300 or $400 a bottle; it's just fantastic. I can assure you that I didn't pay anything like that when I got it. I'm a fool not to sell them.

Q: What about wines like Chateau Petrus? Are they at their best served with a certain dish, or sipped separately instead of a cocktail? How do you most enjoy good wine?

BONBRIGHT: Good red wines, I think, should be drunk pretty much with food. The old business of having red wine with meat, I think is a pretty good rule of thumb, and white wine with fish, although a good white burgundy, I think, will go with just about anything. Myself, my tastes have shifted pretty much and Letitia's, too. We drink very little red wine anymore. We drink mostly white. As I say, you don't have to worry too much if it's a good vintage and if it goes well with many things.

Q: People who booze a lot and drink rather heavily, their taste buds are not as sensitive as people who refrain?

BONBRIGHT: I suppose so. My palate isn't good enough. I'm not an expert. I was never in the class with Ridgway Knight, although I wasn't bad. There used to be certain rules – I don't know if they still follow. The French were adamant against the drinking of whiskey, Scotch, cocktails before dinner, if you're going to have wine. They would tolerate a dry martini or vodka, something of that sort. I think that's fair enough, although people have whiskey and then go ahead and enjoy their wine, too. But that's not the French way I was taught.

Q: These people who endorse wines – Alexis Lichine and Frank Schoonmaker and Peter Sichel and so forth – is that strictly commercial, or do they really like what they're recommending?

BONBRIGHT: Probably a combination of both. Schoonmaker, I think, was rather well regarded – he wasn't that from the French. But my friend Beaudois couldn't stand Alexis Lichine, couldn't stand him. In Beaudois's view, Lichine did the unpardonable thing: he owned a vineyard of his own that he bought there, and he would unmercifully advertise his own wares. A wine fellow is supposed to be unbiased and let only his taste buds tell him what was good and what wasn't, and he should act accordingly. So Beaudois and his friends thought Lichine was just commercial, I think, in an unacceptable way.

I haven't talked much about the substantive matters, and I don't think I want to get into that too much. Of course, this was a time of some very important developments – the Marshall Plan, and then we had all sorts of problems in connection with Indochina starting up, colonial problems, generally.

Q: Did you visit any of the French colonies?

BONBRIGHT: No. I had a trip laid out once with Mr. Bruce to go down to Morocco, but something came up and we never went. I just never left France while I was there.

The colonial problem was a terrible sore point, and one which I personally felt was not well played by us. FDR was obsessed with it; he was determined that the French would never get anything. He felt about the same, but not quite as strongly, I guess, in regard to the British empire, that great stabilizing force of the last century.

Q: That they would have to give up India?

BONBRIGHT: Yes. I think that movement was inevitable, but what bothered me about it was that I didn't think we should give it a push. As far as I could see, it never created any gratitude on the part of the recipients for support. Take a look at Africa today: many places that we helped gain their independence, they all hate us. So we got the worst of both worlds. The new people didn't appreciate it. We earned the distrust and intense annoyance, to put it mildly, of our allies, who still had some colonial possessions. It was all too fast. Practically none of them were ready for it. We had no chance to break them in gently. The best chance, of course, was the British effort, which to some extent prepared the way.

Q: Were you in Paris during Dien Bien Phu?

BONBRIGHT: I don't remember if I was there or whether I was back in the Department. I forget the date of it. I think it was in the Fifties, wasn't it?

Q: Early Fifties.

BONBRIGHT: I was back in Washington then. When I left Paris, things were still and not hotted up. The French were still coping, with difficulty.

Q: I remember then that they asked President Eisenhower for air support from the carriers in the Pacific, and Admiral Radford, who was in charge, recommended it, but the White House turned it down.

BONBRIGHT: That came later, but I remember I attended a meeting with Radford. Mr. Dulles was Secretary then. Top military people were at Dulles's house one Sunday afternoon, and I took notes and wrote the minutes of the meeting. This thing was debated. As I remember it, none of us wanted to do it.

Q: Because of the impracticality of it, or because of lack of sympathy with the French?

BONBRIGHT: We didn't want the possible involvement, plus lack of sympathy with the French, too. Of course, we took over from them and tried to do the same job that they failed to do, and equally failed.

BONBRIGHT: I stayed there until '49 sometime, I think.

Q: He went off to Egypt?

BONBRIGHT: He went off to Egypt. He was offered a choice of Egypt or Czechoslovakia. He felt – and I think he was right – that they were trying to get him to retire. In fact, he had been interested in things Egyptian for a long time and was enchanted with it, so he accepted with alacrity. I think that was his last post.

Q: He could have a somewhat similar lifestyle there but not in Prague.

BONBRIGHT: Oh, no. He would have retired if faced with just that one. If they wanted to get rid of him, they made the wrong move.

Q: Bruce and his wife made a good couple, didn't they?

BONBRIGHT: Oh, yes, superb. Of course, he'd been in France for a year or more. He was head of the French ECA mission, which in turn was under the Southeast group, led by Averell Harriman.

By that time, I confess, the place was overrun with Americans. I think we had 300 or 400 people in the embassy proper and God knows how many in the ECA. At one time, I think there were five Americans with a personal rank of ambassador. It was just hopeless, you know. Part of my time, I didn't see many French people; I was too busy being in this tangled web of scratching Americans. That part I didn't like.

Actually, I could have – and perhaps I should have, but I didn't – leave in the fall of '49 after Caffery did. It was decided that up to then the top officer in any of our missions was the counselor who, as in my case and many others, was given the personal rank of minister. He was also called the minister counselor. They decided that they wanted a full-time minister as number two in London and Paris and so on. There was a scramble for these choice positions, and Paris was allotted Chip Bohlen, an old friend of mine. I'd known him for years. He had a brilliant Russian career, had been to Yalta, been close to FDR and his interpreter. This, of course, meant that he would be technically between me and the ambassador, and I would no longer be deputy chief of mission. Normally in those circumstances, the fellow that was squeezed, like I was there, would be transferred, lest he lose face or something. But I never felt that way about it. As it turned out, I went on just about as I had before, never had any problems of being cut off of David Bruce. There were so many international, multinational problems floating around which was the kind of thing that Bohlen found he was good at, and he concentrated more on that sort of thing. So I just said I'd move if they wanted me to, but otherwise I was quite happy to stay on, and I did for another eight months, I guess.

One amusing little thing I'd forgotten. In 1948, the time of the election, John Foster Dulles was in Paris in connection with some international meeting. The Philippine ambassador to Paris got the bright idea of having a dinner for Dulles two days after the election, just at the time that Truman was going to get beaten and that Dulles would be Secretary of State very soon. So we all had to laugh when the day after the election, here is the Filipino stuck with his guest of honor with egg on his face. I rather thought – although I didn't know him well at the time – that Dulles would tell him, "Let's forget it," but he didn't. They had the dinner, and Dulles went to it. I'm told – I wasn't there – that he joked about it and took it all in very good form. I don't think back of him as having too light a touch. I thought he did very well.

Q: Who came in then?

BONBRIGHT: Truman was reelected. He beat Dewey.

Q: Dewey was elected in the papers for a few hours.

BONBRIGHT: Yes. That happened once before, you know. Remember Charles Evans Hughes was announced in the paper as the winner over Wilson. I forget whether it was the first or second term.

Q: And that proved to be false.

BONBRIGHT: Yes.

Q: So then Truman brought in Dean Acheson, didn't he?

BONBRIGHT: Marshall was in there somewhere, at the time of the Marshall thing. Marshall came in. In November of '44, Hull retired. Then came Byrnes, who went to the peace conference, and then came General Marshall. He wasn't there too long, I don't think, more than a year. Then Acheson, who, in my opinion, was the best Secretary of State that I ever worked with. Of course, before him I'd been too junior to see or have too close a contact with such an exalted person. But I've known them. He served in the Department for different stints; he'd been an Assistant Secretary for Congressional Relations, Assistant Secretary for Economic Affairs. He had several jobs. I got to know him and his wife. We were friends, and I was a great admirer of his.

Q: Was he a good choice for Assistant Secretary for Congressional Relations?

BONBRIGHT: I would have thought it would be the reverse. He was haughty, you know, and they thought that he was talking down to congressmen, who weren't as bright as he was.

Q: And he dressed so much better than they did.

BONBRIGHT: Yes. It was a funny thing, but he worked hard at it. He was a charming man. I think when he tried, he could overcome a lot of this feeling about it. He was great.

Q: He worked well with Truman, didn't he?

BONBRIGHT: Perfect.

Q: Completely opposite types.

BONBRIGHT: Absolutely. Couldn't have been more different. He never tried to upstage Truman. Always Truman was the boss, and he was his servant, if you would. He never, never tried to push, as so many secretaries have, to get the limelight for themselves at the expense of their boss. Truman, of course, saw this very clearly. Of course, he'd had no foreign experience at all, and he knew a good thing when he saw it. He got his money's worth from Dean Acheson.

I have a couple more things about Acheson. Acheson was not an admirer of the United Nations. Of course, Stettinius had been Secretary of State at the time of the San Francisco Conference and the United Nations was born.

This is from a personal letter which Acheson wrote me in October 1960, right after the meeting in New York at which Khrushchev had taken off his shoes and pounded the desk and raised perfect hell:

“The performance in New York was incredible. Nothing could have more perfectly vindicated the judgment of those of us who strongly objected to the United Nations being in New York. It was the three masterminds of Ed Stettinius, Nelson Rockefeller, and Warren Austin that put it there. Can you imagine how much more amusing history would be had Attila the Hun been able to appear with immunity in Rome and tell off the ruling Caesar, or if Napoleon could have taken (inaudible) across the channel and told the younger Pitt and the prince regent and perhaps the Iron Duke himself how he was going to bury them?

“I saw Harold MacMillan last Saturday afternoon, who told me that even his experience in Moscow had not prepared him for the violent effrontery of Khrushchev’s performance at the United Nations. I did not say it to him, but I believed that Mr. K could not have picked a more useful man to insult than the honorable Harold himself. It really shook him out of the pipe dream which he has found so useful for political purposes in England. I did observe to him that when the United States, the British Commonwealth and NATO found themselves fortunate to be saved by a Swede, the world had come to a pretty pass.”

Q: Meaning Hammarskjold or Trygve Lie?

BONBRIGHT: Hammarskjold.

Q: That’s a pungent letter.

BONBRIGHT: One other little tidbit that was passed on to me by my friend William Tyler, who later became the Assistant Secretary for Europe and later ambassador to the Hague, a charming man and a superb officer. He was in Bonn when he wrote this letter, written April 1961.

“I must relate the following to you. Last Sunday I was with Mr. Acheson, who came here to see the chancellor. He told me that while things in Washington were, on the whole, going well, there were issues on which he disagreed violently with the administration’s policies, e.g., Angola. ‘The other day,’ he said, ‘I was in a car with Dean Rusk and that funny little man Waldron, or whatever his name is.’

“‘Waldron,’ I asked, ‘who is he?’

“‘He works in the U.N. liaison office,’ said D.A.

“‘Oh, do you mean Wallner?’

“‘Yes, that’s it. Wallner.’

“‘Anyway, when I objected to our vote on the inscription of Angola, he said, ‘Well, you see, that is what we call higher realism.’

“And I said to him, ‘Look here, if you don’t want me to throw up into the Secretary of State’s lap, don't talk like that again in my presence.”

Poor Woody, my old friend. Wallner, who had been a great officer on the French thing, he'd gone to work for the U.N. division for a while, and that's where he picked up this “higher realism.”

I can probably work this one in, but while I'm at it, I might as well put it in. This is another letter from Acheson dated June 23, 1958. This had to do with George Kennan:

“While I was in England, I stayed with Wally Barbour, and one day going into his office at the embassy, I met George Kennan coming out. We had a well-behaved, indeed, affectionate reunion, and then went off in an empty office to talk for half an hour. I thought George looked badly. He said he was still suffering from sinus trouble, which he had had all winter. I think he had found his year at Oxford somewhat disappointing and certainly very uncomfortable. He was in one of his melancholy moods, and he appeared to regard all the troubles of the world as punishments for sin. He was going on to give some lectures in Warsaw and expected to go back to Princeton in the autumn, although he was not yet sure he would persevere in the third volume of his trilogy or devote himself to lecturing and writing on current affairs. I devoutly hope that he will take the former course.” Wonderful man!

BONBRIGHT: I might go back to Paris for a few minutes and finish up there. Sometime in 1949 – I forget exactly when – George W. Perkins was appointed Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs. He was then attached to the ECA France mission and was head of the industry section. He was a very fine man, and everybody seemed pleased at the appointment. Like some of the rest of the embassy staff, we had met him but didn't know too much about him. Before he left for Washington, I gave a small lunch for him at my house, to which I invited several of the embassy people like Bohlen and Wallner, Ridgway Knight, and Tyler. We had an interesting time, but after lunch, we were sitting around having coffee, and George asked us to speak about what each of us thought were the most important issues of the day. As I recall it, we all spoke either about relations with the Soviet Union or the French recovery, some European thing. At the end, we asked George what he thought, and, to my surprise, he replied without hesitation, “The world population explosion.” That's the kind of man he was; he was thinking beyond the small, immediate problems. Looking at the world today, I think his remark is as true now as it was then, even more so. This was 35 years ago.

PAUL F. DUVIVIER
Consular Officer
Marseille (1942)

Deputy Commercial Attaché
Paris (1958-1961)

Commercial Relations
Bordeaux (1961-1962)

Principal Officer
Nice/Monaco (1962-1965)

Paul Du Vivier entered the Foreign Service in 1940. His career included posts in Accra, Ottawa, Stockholm, Berlin, Edinburgh, and Frankfurt, as well as the French cities of in Marseille, Paris, Bordeaux, and Nice. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1990.

DUVIVIER: But afterwards, of course, we heard quite a bit about it. And because I performed satisfactorily there, after a year's probation I was brought back to a very intellectual man called G. Howland Shaw who was Chief of Personnel. He sort of sized me up and said, "You seem to know French very well," and I said, "Yes," and he said, "The Consul General in Marseille has just come home and he needs a replacement for George McMurtrie Godley," whom I'd known in college, and "Would you like to go to Marseille?" and I said, "Fine," knowing nothing about it. So I had thirty days leave and met my wife, incidentally, and then I went off on the China clipper, or the equivalent, Pan-American clipper, that took a day and a half of continuous flight from Laguardia airport.

Q: You went to the Azores.

DUVIVIER: From Laguardia to Bermuda for refueling to the Azores for breakfast and then to Lisbon. And once again, with practically no briefing in the Department.

Q: This was when?

DUVIVIER: This was August 1942.

Q: So by that time Germany had occupied up to the Vichy Line...

DUVIVIER: Correct. They had done so two years earlier.

Q: We're talking about a truncated France under Marshal Petain.

DUVIVIER: Yes, yes.

Q: Marseille was within that district.

DUVIVIER: Exactly. And on the plane were seventeen members of the American Red Cross who became close friends, and they were doing food relief work in France. The Quakers had about a dozen men there too, and they were giving out milk and chocolate and so on to underfed French children, and incidentally helping some Jewish refugees to slip out with fake passports and US visas through Lisbon and get to this country. So there was a great deal going on there, but once again, before going to my post, I didn't get any shots, I wasn't told what to buy or what to say, I had access to very low classified dispatches as they were then called, and I made a few handshakes...James Bonbright, who was the French desk officer, said, "Do what you're told and we'll watch what you come up with." And when I got there, I found in Marseille that I was in a maelstrom of activity. That was a large consulate of 12 Americans and 25 French "locals." We'd taken over the office of the British consulate general, which was slightly more protected from eavesdropping than our own facing the Prefecture in the main square.

Q: I'd like to just stop for one minute. How did you get there? I mean, we were at war with Germany by this time, and how did you get through over to Marseille, because you'd have to go through German-occupied territory.

DUVIVIER: No. From Lisbon, where I spent six days, I went by train with two Foreign Service stenographers to Madrid where a friend met me. And after a day there by train we proceeded to Barcelona where we spent another two nights, and then we went by train into unoccupied France at Cerbere to Narbonne, and, strangely enough, when I got there, a train station master was curious about me, since I had a huge suitcase – seventy-two pounds – full of clothes, cigarettes, and coffee beans. He was fascinated about what I was doing, and of course I wasn't going to talk, and he said, "What are the movies like in America?" And we spent about twenty minutes on the windy platform talking about Betty Grable and Charles Boyer and Mickey Mouse and all of these heroes we love. Then a French couple came up and said, "Where's the next train to so-and-so?" The chef de gare hated to be interrupted, and said, "Let me see your tickets," and so he took the tickets like that and he said, "These tickets are no good," and he tore them in half like that and he says, "Go to booth window number 3 and get a new set of tickets. You ought to know better than to interrupt when I'm having a serious conversation." And then he went back to talk about what were our best planes, and when are we coming over, and what are we going to do and all that. And then I, after a night trip in a private compartment, landed at Marseille at daybreak and was met by a consular clerk. I stayed with an American consul general in his very comfortable home for about five days until I moved into the big hotel on the main city street.

Q: What was the staffing of the consulate like?

DUVIVIER: The staffing was an FSO-2, Jay Webb Benton – a bachelor who traveled with his mother, a Romanian maid, and a couple of dachshunds; an FSO-4 consul, Bill Peck, who had been in the Marine Corps for about fifteen years, and he had a Russian-born wife; and then, in rank, myself; and then came three auxiliary vice-consuls, Betts, Crook, and Bradford. The auxiliary vice-consuls did the bulk of the consular work. There was no visa work or commercial invoices to speak of. There was a fair amount of passports, and there was a tremendous amount of intelligence-gathering. Because of my French nose and name, I was whisked into doing underground work with various groups. One of the Maquis clubs was called Comete, "shooting star," and another was Colbert, and I got to know them very well because one of their members was married to a...

Q: Maquis being the...

DUVIVIER: Underground network of anti-German resistance fighters.

Q: M-a-q-u-i-s.

DUVIVIER: And they, for instance, were monitoring the German radio signals that were flooding the place. There were a lot of Gestapo agents undercover throughout the area. Patriotic Frenchmen were listening to the BBC nightly radio broadcasts and picking up the London Times airmail edition dropped on the hillsides and distributing it. They were also passing on information to our embassy in Vichy. I didn't know what the OSS was. I never heard of it until the end of the war, but I was called upon to collect detailed information for it on the repair or non-repair of four large French warships, including the Strasbourg, and 12 other crippled cruisers and destroyers who had escaped the Royal Navy at Mers-el-Kebir in Algeria. (July 3, 1940)

Q: Jean Bart? Was that there?

DUVIVIER: Jean Bart was unfinished and lay at Casablanca.

Q: Maybe it was in Dakar.

DUVIVIER: No, the Richelieu also unfinished was at Dakar. But Toulon had also the Algerie and Colbert were two heavy cruisers. The Toulon shipyards were deliberately dragging their feet on repairing them so that they wouldn't be of service to the Nazis when they came or determined to scuttle them, as indeed they did.

Q: These were in Toulon.

DUVIVIER: They were in Toulon, and I had three bright young Franco-American men who were clerks at the consulate and who went to the naval base every week to feed this information back to me and then I would feed it up to the assistant naval attaché at Vichy who was called Lt. Commander Thomas B. Cassidy. And he was OSS, but I learned that only later.

Q: Well now, Bill Donovan starting this OSS, had flooded French North Africa, with so-called vice-consuls who were running all over the place, and I understand were actually OSS people.

DUVIVIER: Yes, under Bob Murphy.

Q: How about your auxiliaries? Were they, I mean, this was not part of their organization?

DUVIVIER: Not at all. We were under orders from "Kippy" Tuck, the Charge d'Affaires in charge of our Embassy in Vichy.

Q: But you were doing their work.

DUVIVIER: I was doing their work, and we were not told who they were. One day a Frenchman came in and he was referred to me, a great big tall man, he must have been six feet four or five, and he used a cover name which I didn't know, and it turned out that he was the brother of Henri Giraud, the escaped four-star French general. He was negotiating to get his brother out of France over to Gibraltar where he was to meet Eisenhower and eventually to set up a Free French government in North Africa.

Q: He was taken out by a British submarine commanded by an American naval officer.

DUVIVIER: I think it was an American submarine.

Q: Well, I have the story on another tape of the interview with Admiral...he had been a consul to China.

DUVIVIER: Jerauld Wright, now a retired admiral in town.

Q: But he was a captain at the time. They didn't have an American submarine. Giraud wouldn't go on an English one, so he appeared on the bridge of the submarine in full American uniform and said it was his submarine. It was a British submarine.

DUVIVIER: Is that right? It's interesting. Well, I negotiated that meeting but I didn't go to the meeting place which was near Cassis...I've forgotten the little peninsula, but I got the various people – they were called passeurs, which meant the people passing prisoners or escapees from one man to the other, and it was very successful. I never met the general, but I dealt with the brother, and we were under the impression that Giraud would be the future head of France. In fact, De Gaulle was largely discredited in France as a traitor at that time and quite ignored. This is hard for Americans to appreciate.

Q: Allow me, were you able to talk to a lot of the French, and were they saying this at the time?

DUVIVIER: Yes, yes. De Gaulle was a renegade in their eyes. He had run out of his country. He'd gotten on board the airplane of General Spears, the British military attaché in Paris, and he'd fled to London and they didn't listen to his broadcasts, and he was a has-been. It was interesting to see that the French lacked a leader. There was a lot of fighting between the Communist cells of the Maquis and the conservative cells of the Maquis, and they were bickering for territory, and this went on 'til the day of the Liberation, and I was with the conservative cells and one of my good friends, Leon Baneal, was the editor of the main newspaper there called Le Petit Provençal, and he wrote a very touching editorial which I've kept entitled "Goodbye Mickey Mouse," and for that he was questioned and tortured and incarcerated during the Occupation. Then eventually he was released, and at the Liberation he came out with a new editorial in the same newspaper, entitled "Good Morning, Mickey." Now we can talk and laugh and we can be free again, and those funny green leaves...green leaves were a synonym for German soldiers because of their green uniforms...now the green leaves are gone and we can just be ourselves again. It was perfectly charming, and I went back to see him twenty years later at the end of his life, and he was a delightful man. And there were some very warm, human people like that. We ate extremely well on the black market in exchange for coffee beans or cigarettes or just plain spam (from our Red Cross friends).

Q: First, you were reporting on...there were no German troops per se...

DUVIVIER: No.

Q: But you were reporting on the status of the French fleet...

DUVIVIER: Yes.

Q: ...because this was a major component, these were very modern battleships.

DUVIVIER: Exactly. France after Britain had the greatest navy in Europe.

Q: It could have changed the whole balance.

DUVIVIER: It might have, yes, it might have intercepted the American landings in North Africa had they come under German control. And then when Eisenhower landed in North Africa, we knew what was coming imminently, and at the moment it happened, I was coming back from Aix-en-Provence and I hitchhiked a ride back to Marseille at midnight and immediately the other consuls were there and we began burning all our archives and for two days we destroyed everything including a few blank passports and passports of friends of mine so that when we were ordered to go into internment at Lourdes five days later to join Doug MacArthur and Constance Harvey and Woody Wallner – all people that you may have heard about.

Q: I've interviewed Douglas MacArthur and somebody else has interviewed Constance Harvey.

DUVIVIER: Well we got to know them extremely well as you can imagine during internment, but they were working at other posts. My main job turned out to be contact with the French Underground and keeping their hopes alive and telling them not to give up hope. I never gave them any money, but I gave them hope and laughter.

Q: How did the French Underground view you? By that time we were at war with Germany.

DUVIVIER: Yes.

Q: But things weren't going terribly well, I mean, we were just building up in Europe, and we were doing rather poorly in the Far East in 1942.

DUVIVIER: Correct.

Q: Did you find they felt that we had the potential, or were they feeling that they were almost discounting us, the United States?

DUVIVIER: On the contrary, they knew that we were coming, they knew that we would “sweep out” the Germans, they had utter contempt for the Germans and their patriotism was extraordinary, the daring things they did. One contact Prosinos, who came to see me under the cover name, “Berini,” was caught by a crossfire of radio monitoring cars of the Germans and he was tortured, and apparently died without revealing his contacts. His wife had been in Paris, the secretary of my father, and his daughter in 1965 gave me the gold watch of my late brother. And there were other cases of people who were persecuted and showed extreme courage. But there was an enthusiasm. I never felt afraid, I never worried about where I would get my food, and I felt a certain exhilaration at being able to do something for my country.

Q: Although you weren't dealing with them directly, what about refugees? I mean, obviously the Jewish refugees, but other people who were caught there in this area. We knew that the Germans would probably come in at some point. What were we doing?

DUVIVIER: They usually were picked up and herded by the Quaker movement from outlying areas, whether it was Lyon or the Pyrenees or Nice and so on and shepherded to our visa section, and either we would give them a visa or we would give them a false American passport. We did some of that in 1941 in order to get them over into Spain where they were picked up by contacts. I had very little contact with the Jews or the Quakers. I probably wrote the first report on a shipment of so-called labor volunteers to Germany, and I think that only one-third of that trainload of 600 people were Jews. This was in October 1942. Later on it changed, but the Jews we knew were then harassed not persecuted. The overblown role given to the Holocaust by people like Herman Wouk, whom I know personally. I helped him in his last book: War and Remembrance. In that book he used my notes, impressions, in order to rewrite his plot because he didn't realize that there were no commercial planes going into Germany or France. He rewrote it to conform more or less to the truth.

To recap, the people I met were journalists, students, professors, a few businessmen. There was a very nice couple, called Goudchoux. He was a marine insurance broker, and his wife was a great cook. They would talk freely, usually in their home rather than in the consulate because the consulate was being surveyed constantly and we knew it. One morning I went to the office on foot from the hotel, and I found a strange group of seventeen English types conspicuous by their short blond hair and gray turtleneck sweaters. They turned out to be downed pilots of the RAF who had escaped. The problem was, how do we get these people to Spain? And with two hours of phone calling, my colleagues and I got them out of our consulate and disguised them, told them to stop talking English and try to smoke Gauloises instead of Craven A's, and they eventually were slipped out by cars or trucks across France to Pau. There was a very interesting ex-honorary British consul called the Marquis de Guidelmina there. He was binational – and he had a wonderful scheme whereby he would disguise these people as drivers and stokers on locomotives and on the night train over to Pamplona these people were all smuggled out in a few days. So there were twice as many stokers on their way south as there were on the way north, and it worked like a dream, and these young kids – typical college boy types – went back to Britain and presumably manned planes again and continued their fighting. But it was that sort of an experience. Courage and fun!

Q: But you know, there's another side to this, and that is, a lot of French were not that unhappy with Petain particularly from the conservative, from the right wing. Did you run across many of these?

DUVIVIER: No.

Q: You must have, didn't you?

DUVIVIER: No. They avoided me and vice-versa.

Q: I would have thought that they would have, you know, been fairly prominent in the Vichy government.

DUVIVIER: Mostly they must have been at Vichy. I went to Vichy three times as a courier or something, on the overnight train, once sharing space with 2 young wives, but the people we dealt with were quite sophisticated. Some of them were wives or widows of prominent ship owners, maritime brokers, or oil people, or merchants and bankers, and those people were crippled economically, and they knew that we were coming, and they knew that it was only a matter of time, and they gave us their wholehearted attention. To one of them I gave eleven pounds of honey because he had two small kids, and a wrapped-up landscape painting which is upstairs in our living room, and I said, "Jackie" – that was his code name – "Would you please keep this painting for me, and one day I'll come back and claim it. Good luck," and he said, "Good luck," and then two years later, I went down to Accra, Ghana, Gold Coast then, and the Air France manager one day said, "Paul, I'm going to Marseille. Do you have any messages?" I said, "Yes. Look up "Jackie" and try to recover my painting," and he came back two months later with this landscape all wrapped up in a newspaper faded but still charming. It was a warm, personal relationship in almost every case.

Q: So in Marseille you really weren't up against the extreme right wing...

DUVIVIER: No.

Q: ...the French fascists.

DUVIVIER: No. There were some, but I never saw them. I traveled on a train once with a Prefect of Nice from Marseille to Nice, and we talked about the war to some extent, and from the start, I knew his opinion and he knew mine, and I remember we deliberated on whether after World War II, America would have compulsory military service, and he said no and I said yes, and we skimmed around the subject of the invasion, knowing where we stood.

Q: You were saying that after the landings in North Africa, that was in November...

DUVIVIER: No, a month before November 8, 1942. The Prefect knew it was coming.

Q: You knew that your mission was over, that the Germans would be coming in.

DUVIVIER: Yes.

Q: And you say you burned, you really had a couple of days to take care of things.

DUVIVIER: Yes.

Q: The French weren't anticipating you, the French authorities, or were they just going to...

DUVIVIER: The French knew we were going to do it, and they didn't interfere, and we had a good system – wish they used it now – of never keeping our files. Every two months one of these auxiliary vice-consuls would go by car to Geneva and take with him the office copies of anything we had written – telegrams or dispatches – and so we worked from memory as to what we reported instead of referring to telegram number so-and-so, “As reported previously,” and then we'd take on from there, and a lot of time was saved that way. The last time Bradford was held up at the border, he broke the border gate with his Buick, crashed into Switzerland, and got away with it, and he delivered the goods and stayed in Switzerland until the end of the war.

Q: Well now, how did the internment process work in your case? What happened to you?

DUVIVIER: We went by train...

Q: Were you just ordered there...

DUVIVIER: We were ordered.

Q: ...or did the Germans come and...

DUVIVIER: No, we never saw the Germans until we'd been in internment for ten weeks. We were ordered to meet on a Sunday afternoon, at the Marseille suburban station. We boarded a train which already had the consulate staff in Nice on board, which consisted of six people, and we went overnight in a sealed train to Lourdes. There we got off the train and went to one of four hotels where we were allowed the privilege of moving around the town and countryside freely without escort at first. Then, little by little, they insisted on having a French police inspector on our bicycle rides as escort. Later on we were confined to the hotel except for specific things like playing soccer or going to church or shopping walks.

Q: This was all run by the French?

DUVIVIER: It was run by the French national police (Surete).

Q: Was France, I mean Vichy France, at war with us at that time, had they declared...

DUVIVIER: We had broken diplomatic relations, but we were not at war, and it remained that way. There was a dramatic scene told to me later by Kippy (S. Pinckney) Tuck, the Chargé d'affaires in Vichy, that when he went as instructed by Sumner Welles to call on Marshal Petain and explain that we had landed in French North Africa, Marshal Petain, very alert, said, “I know.” Kippy added as a result, we can no longer have diplomatic relations, and Marshal Petain said, “I know.” And then Marshal Petain got up...he was 86 at the time...and turned over to the window and looked out the window of his office at the Hotel du Parc and began whistling to himself, “It's a long way to Tipperary.” He whistled that World War One tune soulfully to himself, and then he came back and he said, “I consider the interview closed.” They did not shake hands, and Kippy Tuck withdrew. Kippy believed it was a signal he believed in our victory. Thereafter it was handled not by Admiral Darlan in power at that time – but by various civil servants in the foreign office. But Kippy, whom I knew very well, said that that signal showed Petain was secretly hoping for an Anglo-American victory and he was delighted that the break in relations would be a prelude to the liberation of France. He was a very patriotic man, and I think quite misunderstood at home and over here. My father felt the same way and wrote about it at the time.

Q: Well now, how did the internment go? Did you go up to the Black Forest later with the Germans?

DUVIVIER: Yes, two months later.

Q: Because I know Douglas MacArthur mentioned this. The whole group went up.

DUVIVIER: The whole group went up, and there's a very good report which you should look up if you don't have it, written by Woody Wallner and published in The Foreign Service Journal, issues of May, June and August, 1944.

To my knowledge this is the official report. It is detailed and it's correct and I can only add my recollections. But at Lourdes we did next to nothing except walk and keep healthy. Ate well on the black market, even oysters and lamb chops. There was an abundance of cognac available at a high price from a bar called St. Lawrence O'Toole. The bootlegger there would drink a toast to the image of the sacred heart of Jesus which was a peculiar thing to have in a bar. Then we'd start chatting and bargaining over what we would have to pay for a supply of liquor. But we were cut off as far as newspapers and people were concerned. One or two people slipped in and invited me to walk over the Pyrenees into Spain. Others from Paris or Vichy...and brought messages. I had two chances to escape on foot, one with a very good friend from Marseille, but he never spoke to me again because he thought I was chicken not to go with him. He escaped safely, and I think in retrospect, I made a mistake, but I felt that I was ordered to stay because there had been a telegram earlier signed Sumner Welles saying Walter Orabaugh will be dispatched from Nice to Monaco to open a consular post and "DuVivier will remain at Marseille." I felt that was like a direct order, and I thought it was a dirty trick, but I never met Mr. Welles. (Laughter) And so I stayed at my job and did not escape. I think if I had, I would have been picked up by the embassy in Madrid and put to work, and I wouldn't have been dismissed from the Foreign Service, which is what I feared at the time.

After about six weeks there, the Germans came in abruptly, four days after New Year's 1943, took charge of the inmates at the four hotels. We were then confined to our bedrooms, and they used the large stock of sleeping cars at Lourdes...all the Wagon-Lits in France were stored there. They put us in one sealed train directly from Lourdes to Baden-Baden circling around Paris by La Grand Ceinture belt line. We proceeded via Nancy on to Strasbourg to Baden-Baden. There we were much better heated and much worse fed than in Lourdes. We were kept under the custody of eight German police. Four or five were clearly Gestapo in civilian clothes. The others were state and foreign office police – Statspolizei. Our official "host" was a career foreign service embassy counselor from the Wilhelm-Strasse, Dr. Schlehman. He, his wife and pretty secretary were very correct. He made sure that everybody knew their place and didn't fraternize. We could not go outside the hotel and the hotel grounds without one or two guards. But, aside from shopping and churches, which was a good escape to get out of the confinement, we partook of a great many hikes and walks. There were the fast walkers, the medium walkers, the slow walkers. I walked up to about twelve miles a day with the eight “fast walkers,” taking picnics but no photographs. Tyler Thompson was a great walker, and Dr. Harold Stuart and Gilbert White, later Gil Stewart a famous geographer at Aspen, and myself, a few others of that kind, were just indefatigable as far as walking through the Black Forest. And we sometimes would look down over the Siegfried Line on the German-French frontier, or we would go into a little inn. And one time at the inn, this was, I think, at the very end of 1943, we went in from the snow to eat our sandwiches, and the innkeeper was delighted to see us, and said, “Would you like to buy a little white wine?” and we said, “Ja Wohl.” We had some marks, I think, or cigarettes for currency, and then after a while he said, “My daughter sings very well,” and so the daughter came out and she began singing “Lorelei” and a few German Lieder, and then somebody produced an accordion and we all got pretty drunk, especially the Gestapo guard. Then they began playing war songs, Lily Marlene. After awhile they played something Ah-na-na na na (humming to “Roll out the Barrels”).

Q: It's “Roll out the Barrels.”

DUVIVIER: I said, “I think I’ve heard that.” The innkeeper said, “Oh, yes, it’s a very famous German song.” And I said, “It must be very well-known,” and he said, “Oh, yes. It’s called ‘Marshal Rommel’s Victory March.’” (Laughter) So they’d simply taken it over, you know, and rechristened it. And then at the end, I think it was the same session, Henry J. Taylor, the Associate Press correspondent in Vichy, disappeared in the woods – I think he was really three sheets to the wind – and it was rather pathetic to see the poor Gestapo – the two Gestapo calling out, “Herr Heinrich, Herr Heinrich, 119enefi du den? Bitte, kommen sie mal zuruck.” And we never did find Henry-Henry, but he somehow managed to stagger back to the hotel alone. He knew enough to know that he would be starved to death if he stayed out overnight in the snow. So there were some interesting episodes of that kind, but really, on the whole, we were very disciplined, we wasted a lot of time giving each other courses...I gave a course on geopolitics which I knew nothing about, but we gave each other exams and diplomas. We also put on dramatic shows, and I read three daily German newspapers because my German was fluent. Furthermore, we would listen very carefully to a monitored radio set in the big lounge (guarded night and day) to the Oberkommandor der Wehrmacht Communique at 2 p.m. followed by the news interpretation by Dr. Goebbels’ Propaganda Ministry. We took notes and lists. The second broadcast was elaborate, fanciful and totally misleading. Afterwards with Attachés Bob Scow, the army colonel, and Abel Sabelot, the navy captain, and Kippy Tuck and sometimes Tyler, Doug, Woody and myself, if I could get in the caucus, we would discuss the news. Since we had excellent German maps we’d bought locally – I still have one or two – we would find that when they wanted to announce the evacuation of a big city they justified it as a shortening of their lines of communications. Or else it was to reinforce their lines ready for the spring offensive. And actually the little hamlet or mentioned village was about five or ten miles west of the big city on the Russian front (like Orel or Smolensk) which they would only mention days later. But we kept tabs, I kept my map marked up properly by crayons behind my coat closet and it was never disturbed. I brought it home and then I checked the dates with people in the Pentagon and found we were within four or five days of the actual changes in the Russian front. The same was true with the Pacific theater about which we had little knowledge.

Q: Well, how did you get out, how did it work, getting out of there?

DUVIVIER: Getting out of Baden-Baden?

Q: When were you repatriated?

DUVIVIER: All 145 of us were released on Saturday February 19, 1944 after 478 days. I'm trying to write my memoirs...

We were told to have breakfast at 3:30 a.m. at the hotel, so we did, and then the women and children were taken – there were about fifteen children – by bus to the railroad station two miles across town. I walked, with or without my suitcase, I can't remember, it weighed sixty pounds. We left at daybreak on the train, and it took about six hours to go from Baden-Baden to Paris via Strasbourg. And there was a tussle with the police because some relatives of our group – French relatives – tried to break the police cordon on the outskirts of Paris. One young boy did greet his grandmother before the police drew him back on board. But with pistols and truncheons they made sure that there was no contact. And then from the beltway of Paris, it took us forever (eleven hours) to go to Bordeaux and then to Biarritz where we spent four days waiting. The trip across France took us twenty-four hours, almost exactly, and it was very cold. Years later, in Ottawa, I learned from an assistant air attaché that he had been ordered not to bomb a certain train leaving at daybreak on a certain day, and he watched this little train zigzagging across all the byways of France because eighty percent of the bridges were blown up. And he said it would have been a perfect target. He said, "I really had my X right there on the bomb release and I just hated not to pull the lever." Thank God he didn't. So we made it, and we got to Biarritz where we spent four days because of a hitch in the exchange schedule. Finally when the Germans heard that their own people had landed safely in Lisbon from the SS Gripsholm, we were allowed to go over the frontier into Spain, again at daybreak. Somebody waved the Gestapo goodbye. I didn't want to see them again.

In retrospect my two greatest personal hardships were the lack of a date for sixteen months and the paucity of mail. For the first six months none of us received or were able to send out a letter. After that mail came once a month, heavily censored by three governments and only after taking six weeks in transit. It is a miracle my girl in Baltimore waited so long for my return. All the 14 packages of food she sent me were confiscated.

Three hours into Spain somebody staggered down the railway cars, they were not sleepers, and came back after an hour to say, "We've had deviled eggs," and we said, "Oh, go away," like this, and they said, "No, we've really had eggs." We'd had two eggs in two years. We were craving for anything like cream and butter. So we all went tearing down to the dining car, and we ate this delicious stuff – eggs Benedict or something, and we got sick as dogs because it took us a long time to get our stomach back to normal. I was fifteen pounds underweight and weighed 130 or so when I went in, so I was skinny. When we got to Lisbon, we got a chance to spend ten days or so getting readjusted and picking up on news and exchanging mail and the embassy, legation, excuse me, in Lisbon under Henry Norweb, and people like Bill Boswell and Merritt Cootes were there to help us, treated us very nicely. By the time we got on shipboard we were practically back to normal.

Q: You went to Paris, from 1958 to 1961...

DUVIVIER: Correct.

Q: ...as Deputy Commercial Attaché, is that right?

DUVIVIER: Yes.

Q: How was France at this time? It must have been a considerable change from when you'd been there before.

DUVIVIER: It was an enormous change, since 1942. But there was a great deal of work again to promote French exports to America, and we were pushing the old standard trade opportunity forms and the world trade directory reports as well as US investment opportunities in France. That was my principal responsibility. Gradually the emphasis changed from helping France to helping US business interests. Today we only do the latter as best we can overseas.

Q: I started to say, it must have been about that time when all of a sudden you began to say, "Hey, wait a minute."

DUVIVIER: Exactly and we did. It was a fascinating seven years in one country. One big project in 1960 was the month's trip by a large Commerce Department trade mission to find outlets outside of Paris. It was led by Bradley Nash, who had been an Assistant Secretary of Commerce. I planned for months an elaborate tour in four to ten different provincial cities throughout north and western France. We interviewed 200 people and they came with concrete proposals. Thanks to our work, they planted a factory of Goodyear tire at Amiens, and a food processing plant in Brittany. When we drove south to Bourges and went all the way out to Brest for boat building and sailing. There we were trying to get them to buy our equipment, our nautical equipment and adopt our standards after centuries of ignoring us. It was an exhausting trip. But I was accompanied by a French male clerk – an older man, of fifty plus, and he was the official interpreter while I was the public relations man. We stayed in run down hotels but were wined and dined extensively by corporate presidents and chambers of commerce.

Q: Well tell me, I mean, here you were at a critical place at a critical time, because there really was a change. I mean, we'd said, "OK, Europe, you've recovered. Now we've got our own commercial interests to be concerned about."

DUVIVIER: Yes.

Q: Did you find resistance on the part of the French government which has always seemed to resent outside interference? I suppose they were delighted at our helping them find markets, but when we came in, how about this? Was this a problem?

DUVIVIER: It was a big problem in Paris but not much in the provinces. The equivalent of the National Association of Manufacturers and all mayors were very helpful at the beginning. Then after two years, they wrote and published a series of articles stressing US trade barriers to French exports. We got them to vent their draft articles with us before they were published, but they were quite bitter on our agricultural and FDA regulations as well as tariff classifications which you know are very rigid over here, the Buy America Act and definitions of Camembert cheese, etc.

Q: Food...

DUVIVIER: Pharmaceuticals.

Q: ...drug screening. You have to pass certain tests and all that sort of thing.

DUVIVIER: Oh yes, and selling wines in France called Champagne, Chablis or Burgundy...they were bitter about our success in making good wines. Many sarcastic remarks were made, and it was uphill. There was a big US pavilion at the Paris Trade Fair, where we spent a lot of money on a pavilion, with a motto I came up featuring Jules Verne's story of a Submarine to say that oceans drew countries closer. His novel, Twenty Thousand Leagues under the Sea, was elaborated into the idea that we didn't have any land barriers between us and therefore there was no obstacle between America and France. It created a bit of surprise in Washington but the French love whimsy so they played along and it flew, and was very well attended and featured in the press.

Q: Well now, the trade side, the economic side, are absolutely vital, yet the Foreign Service often isn't very, I mean, I'm speaking about the ruling group, are usually political reporters. They're more interested in what's happening.

DUVIVIER: That's true.

Q: How about, we had a political ambassador, a non-career ambassador, Amory Houghton most of the time you were there.

DUVIVIER: Yes. There's his picture on my bookcase.

Q: How did he feel about the commercial side? Did he bring any different perspective, or was he caught up in the politics?

DUVIVIER: He was caught up in the politics, so he sort of had open hands on the economic. He entertained the bankers and the countesses, but he was fascinated by the turmoil within the French foreign office. Being the past chairman of Corning Glass he neglected the descendants of Lafayette and Rochambeau to support our economic goals. He was extraordinary in having us on the inner circle of his staff night and day – and weekends.

Q: What was his background? Where was his money from?

DUVIVIER: His grandfather founded the Corning Glassworks in upstate New York.

Q: Say no more.

DUVIVIER: And he still ran it, and his father had been the German minister to the Kaiser around 1910. So he, out of duty I think, wanted to do what his daddy had done, and he came, although he had had cancer of the throat and had a vocal cord removed, but you couldn't really see any scar, and he spoke with a very funny voice, as you can imagine, but he struggled to learn French, and as a French foreign office man told me afterwards, he said, "Mr. Houghton was a hard man to know, but he always came to us beautifully prepared." And he was so meticulous and thorough with his briefs that he really came right to the point. The French respected his courage and his effort to be as good as our best ambassadors. Jimmy Gavin, who was a charming man and succeeded him, was picked out because, being a general, Kennedy thought that general to general he'd get along with de Gaulle.

Q: He was the first general officer to jump into France...

DUVIVIER: Exactly. But I must say that he was the only ambassador that I knew to whom General de Gaulle spoke in English. De Gaulle spoke much better English than he is given credit for, and man to man they spoke in English and got along, but other than that, General Gavin was a workaholic who didn't know anything really about the fundamental problems, about the disintegration of Algeria, about our commercial trade efforts, about the investment resistance, and the growing OECD, the Common Market.

Q: I have had other interviews with people who served at the embassy, which was a huge embassy at the time, who said, these were people mainly who were involved in the political reform, but saying that the embassy was sort of divided up into Gaullists and anti-Gaullists. Out of personal feelings from the various officers and everybody marched to the same drum, but if their leader who happened to be on one side or the other was gone, they would immediately pick up their particular standard. Did you find this to be the case?

DUVIVIER: Two-headed?

Q: Two-headed as far as de Gaulle who was a person...

DUVIVIER: There was no leader of the anti-Gaullist faction. Cecil Lyon, the DCM, was overwhelmingly Gaullist, I think to an embarrassing extent, and his political reporting which I seldom read, although I could have if I had wanted to, reflected an intimate collaboration with the Quai d'Orsay, but I dealt with the manufacturing people, the Chambers of Commerce – I was very close to them – and they were very outspoken, especially after a few good wines at my table. At one dinner party I remember, in our funny little house we had in Auteuil on the edge of the city – a Victorian house, but it was a house – I had a pro-Gaullist couple and an anti-Gaullist couple and I didn't realize it when I invited them. We barely got through the dinner, and after the dessert had been served, the pro-Gaullist, I think it was, said, "Oh, I'm terribly sorry, but my wife isn't feeling well," and he begged off, he skipped the coffee and brandy and disappeared like that. It really was a total fiasco. There was a lot of feeling, usually over the future of Algeria.

Q: Those of you who were involved in commerce – did you feel that de Gaulle represented a problem to you, I mean, as far as pushing commerce because of his...I don't know about the economic side, but it would appear that he was a very strong nationalist, and did this spill over into commercial relations?

DUVIVIER: To some extent on the investment projects, but not very much. I stayed out of political discussions. We had much better experts in that field, but there were things, like oil exports from Algeria, which ran across the political mainstream. Since I was experienced in petroleum reporting, one of my jobs in Paris was to report not only on the few little oil fields in metropolitan France, like the gas field at Lacq which were discovered when I was there and which I visited, but also the oil fields in Algeria where I spent five days with a French Board of Trade mission. They gave me room number 1 at one hotel, which was very flattering. These Parisians were desperately trying to accelerate the industrialization of Algeria. There was a large plan called the Plan de Constantine which was intended to set up steel mills and shipyards around Constantine in eastern Algeria in order to make Algeria a commercial and industrial force even while the civil war was going on. Our trip to Algeria was dangerous, because they were shooting in the streets. I remember a few bombs went off near the Hotel St. Georges while I was sleeping. But it was an exciting time, and the French had done an astonishing job of building up oil drilling camps, roads and refineries with little or no American advice. Where they got their advice, I don't know, Jacques Soustelle was proud of avoiding the riggers and the equipment from Texas and Oklahoma. They were building a gas pipeline which was finished from the desert to Oran which exported a lot of methane gas that was shipped as far as Boston. They also had another from the Edjelah in Tunisia to the Libyan frontier for export to Italy, Greece and Egypt as well as to Marseille. It was really a shame that all of this stack of cards collapsed so abruptly with independence right after I left Paris when I was in Bordeaux. Now Bordeaux...and maybe we, can we switch to that now?

Q: Yes we can. Just one question...You were there at the time when the Kennedy administration came in. How did the...this was quite a change from the Eisenhower one, a young man and all...How did the French commercial industrial people feel about Kennedy at the beginning?

DUVIVIER: I'd left Paris when that happened.

Q: We won't talk about that then.

DUVIVIER: We'll talk about that when we get down to Nice.

Q: Okay, well then you were then in Bordeaux?

DUVIVIER: In Bordeaux for only about a year. The man in charge was Aubrey Lippincott, whom I frankly disliked because he didn't trust me, and I think he did everything he could to have me transferred or worse, but I survived and he was retired. I was his number two, and then there were two or three vice-consuls under him doing a lot of immigration visa work. The Basque shepherds are in great demand in Montana.

Q: Oh, yes. And also to Nevada because Senator McCarran was pushing Basque shepherds.

DUVIVIER: Yes, Basque shepherds, well they're the best apparently. I didn't get into that but there was a lot of other activities. My job in Bordeaux was, again, commerce and trade promotion, both ways, and I got to know very well not only the wine merchants including a namesake but also the shipping brokers.

Q: You were there from '61 to '62.

DUVIVIER: A little over a year, and during that time I used my wine pedigree very well because my grandfather had been a wine merchant on Park Avenue in New York at the turn of the century, and he dealt exclusively with Barton et Guestier, so I looked up their office, and their descendants made a big fuss, and they couldn't have been more generous and helpful in entertaining our visiting delegations such as the Coast Guard ship Eagle. Now you may think, what was the American interest in Bordeaux? Other than the historic interest – it was one of the five original consulates of the Foreign Service opened in 1790. It also has a long tradition of slave trade, which we don't talk about anymore, and of airplane manufacturing. And I've looked up in the National Archives some of the old invoices of 1790-94 which are very interesting. And so I was busy there doing a variety of things, running the office for half the time. Mr. Lippincott was on home leave and then he was on vacation, and I didn't mind that a bit.

Q: I'd just like to ask something. What happens, I mean in a small post, there you are, and you and the principal officer, you're number two, don't get along. I mean, is the best thing to do did you find was to try to get away, I mean both to separate...

DUVIVIER: Well, yes. I knew that I could never persuade him that I wasn't trying to undermine his authority, but I had a lot of trump cards. I had a French name and a French fluency and surely a more attractive wife, and so it was very hard for him to refer things to me if he could do them himself, and I think that he would have done anything to get me out, but Perry Culley, a very nice inspector came for two weeks and took drastic steps for my promotion and rapid transfer. I had almost lost hope.

Q: He inspected me, too.

DUVIVIER: Well, you know.

Q: Yes, I know.

DUVIVIER: And then after he'd been there for about four or five days, he took me aside like that and says, "This has got to change." And he got in touch with Herb Fales, the counselor for consular affairs in Paris, and they rewrote my efficiency report between them, and he said, "I'll have you transferred." And it's because of his intervention as an inspector that I went overnight to Nice.

Q: This is, for somebody who's not familiar with the Service, the inspectors, particularly in those days, much less now, played a role in sorting out these things when there were real conflicts that the Embassy cannot understand.

DUVIVIER: Who does it now? Does anybody do it?

Q: Well, I don't think it's done that well now. It almost ends up in the laps of lawyers.

DUVIVIER: Oh yeah, yeah, understood.

Q: This is one of the things about you might say the old boy network did sort of smooth things over without turning it into a big deal, but now it's much more difficult because if you're moved to another post, then you might be taking it away from somebody else or something like that.

DUVIVIER: That's right.

Q: Well, then you went to Nice and Monaco from '62 to '65.

DUVIVIER: Yes, yes.

Q: That sounds like a dream assignment. Was it or wasn't it? Sometimes these things are not quite as good as they seem.

DUVIVIER: Well, it was because we were successful, but we worked like dogs, leading a double life. It was a two-man post, which meant that every other weekend you had to stay at home and be near the telephone. You had to be up much of the nights because a great deal of entertaining was done which you could never pay back, this is embarrassing, as you know, after a few weeks. And then, I had this little girl who had to be at the nuns' day school at eight o'clock every morning, and I usually had to be sure that she got there at eight o'clock before I went and opened the consulate. Sometimes I strung up the flag myself before the chauffeur or the seven locals had arrived. But we loved it because, once again, I had the advantage of having been brought up as a little boy in France, and I had photographs to show the olive mill my father had bought in 1923 and restored, and I could speak some of the local patois, (dialect). They responded to that. When I returned to Nice with my daughter about ten years ago, they gave me that handsome bronze medal on the shelf, "for conspicuous services to Franco-American relations."

Q: Oh yes, I see.

DUVIVIER: We cannot accept decorations, but this is as far as they could go. Last but not least, I really was fascinated by the Princess of Monaco.

Q: Grace Kelly.

DUVIVIER: Grace Kelly. And this is the passport picture of her, in April 1956, when she traveled by sea to marry the Prince in Monaco. The other is a picture of myself with her when Winston Churchill upstairs had a cold and couldn't come down, so I had her all to myself. It's very difficult to dance with a woman like that because she's so perfect that you sort of don't dare squeeze or lead. And I felt like a dumb fool. But I've seen her in every mood by day or by night, even at three o'clock in the morning when she still wore her emerald jewels in her hair and decided that a swim at the palace was the thing to do. From any angle her classic features perfectly symmetrical made her possibly the most beautiful woman when we knew her at her peak, in the early sixties. The one advantage of Grace in Hollywood was that the left side of her face was exactly like the right side, and therefore Hitchcock and Darryl Zanuck could photograph her from either side, and it always came out perfectly in the first “take.”

Q: Well now, what was our interest in Monaco at the time?

DUVIVIER: Our interest was that Prince Rainier like his grandfather had married a prominent Philadelphia woman, and there were strong cultural ties since the 1880's when the casino of Monte Carlo started. Rainier is a sovereign prince with the right of life or death over his subjects. He had, just before I arrived, hired away from our embassy in Paris, a bright vice-consul called Martin Dale to benefit foreign investment opportunities in the Principality.

Q: I know Marty Dale very well. We came into...

DUVIVIER: Do you?!

Q: ...the Foreign Service together.

DUVIVIER: Well, he worked with me in Paris.

Q: He was in my class.

DUVIVIER: Really! How interesting! Well, Martin Dale was lured away, and was set up as investment counselor in the Palace. I have a copy of his brochure. Maybe you do. “Come to tax-free Monaco and you'll have all the benefits.” And then his wife Joan looked so much like the Princess that sometimes they'd be sitting in the royal box at the opera and you'd wonder which was which. It was incredible. Thanks to Marty Dale, who gave me a lot of information, and others, I was able to report in detail on the trade embargo that de Gaulle placed on Monaco six months after I got there. Nothing manufactured in Monaco or Monte Carlo, was allowed to go into France, such as motor boats, electronics, textiles and sports' goods. There were customs guards at the border and a few soldiers in order to enforce the embargo. On my first call on the Prince he said, “What can you do for us?” And I said, “Well Your Highness, I don't know. I'm only a reporter.” And then later one of the artists painted a picture of the frontier in reverse showing Monaco charging duty on goods coming from France, and after awhile the French relented. But one day in 1963 when Ambassador Chip Bohlen was playing golf with Foreign Minister Couve de Murville the Frenchman remarked: “We each have our flights in fancy; in America you have Disneyland, in France we have Monaco.”

Monaco has a great postage stamp industry; they make more revenue from stamps than they do from the five casinos, strangely enough. The interest also came from the fact that Princess Grace, being an American, expected her consul in Nice to get a catalog from Sears Roebuck or GE and to be on hand when she received distinguished American admirals or other visitors usually at a moment's notice. One morning at ten I was summoned to the Palace and had to borrow a clean suit from the day cleaners to look my best. The Prince never noticed...

Q: Well now, in Nice and Monaco, as chief of consular section, did you have many protection problems there, and how were they dealt with if you did?

DUVIVIER: We had a unique system which I inherited, and it's never been written up. I think it was called the American Association of the Cote d'Azur. The honorary president was the American consul. The work was done by the Protective Services clerk, who had been a British major in World War II, and quite an extraordinary "operator," who knew everybody and collected butterflies, as well as being a very amusing man besides. The finances were managed by the manager of the American Express office. Every year for some twenty years they had passed the hat to the two thousand American residents, collected a large amount of money, carefully invested in French bonds, I can't remember. And from that they would make loans to a great many people who fell destitute, were incapacitated at the end of their lives – one man died at the age of a hundred after we had supported him for about a year. A pretty and pregnant young girl who wanted to be out of sight of her parents until it was safely over. Through the Rotary Club, which I joined for the first time, I was able sometimes to get free hotel lodging for some of these people, or find them clothes when they had been swimming and it cost the government not a penny. I think the State Department was unaware of it except when the F.S. Inspectors came in 1965, and we...

Q: This was true at a number of posts abroad. I'm sure they have something of this nature in Athens, too. It's a very useful thing because it takes care of the problem at the site without having to refer it back to Washington.

DUVIVIER: Exactly.

Q: What about, how were the police there? You must have had US sailors or people coming off either yachts or cruise ships and getting into trouble.

DUVIVIER: Yes, quite a bit. Well, we had the Sixth Fleet, and that's why I have Admiral David McDonald at the top and three aircraft carriers on which I've slept, all on the wall. I'd say a third of my time at Nice was spent with Navy problems. I would brief the incoming Navy captains and make official calls with them. I gave at least one big cocktail party for each successive vice-admiral who came to take command of the Sixth Fleet. I would sometimes induce local mayors and VIP's to go on board for a cruise on shipboard around the Riviera. There was a British-American hospital on the board of which I was and we would accept from the Navy hospital beds, supplies, and you name it. And there was a great deal of intimate relationships. I had three vice admirals in the three years there.

Maybe the strangest case of all was the unfortunate Rear Admiral Lee. After a three day visit off the beach at Cannes his aircraft carrier discharged by mistake 45,000 tons of diesel oil (instead of steam) as he was sailing away. The prefect, mayor and population was outraged and ordered the Sixth Fleet navy to come back. For days the sailors worked night and day to remove the muck from the Croisette Beach. One night all the hookers and sailors' girl friends sat on the beach to give the boys coffee and sing song encouragement. When the carrier finally departed a tall blond told the press, "I've never worked so hard in all my life, and without pay." Naturally fraternization resumed when the Navy was authorized to resume visits to Cannes two years later.

Q: Well, then, what was the impact of the Algerian crisis? Was there any on your operations?

DUVIVIER: Yes, in many ways. More in Bordeaux than in Nice. In Bordeaux the counter-Gaullist revolution was started by General Salan. I had met some of his political friends in Paris before in connection with oil exploration. Salan, Soustelle and the Mayor of Nice were right-wing, felt that de Gaulle was selling out to the local population, which indeed he was. A French cousin in Oran was forced out of his job as a judge and lost all his property when he had to flee to Nice for his life in 1963. There were 3,000,000 other Frenchmen who also had to flee. Their parents had been born in Algeria so they had a right to be permanently guaranteed a livelihood. In Bordeaux, where there was a lot of bombing of banks and warehouses and like incidents all the time, you couldn't mention plastique, which was sometimes mistaken for mastique, the French word for putty. There was some people killed, and the French commanding general there, another distant cousin, resigned from the French Armed Forces as a three-star general rather than continue for de Gaulle at his three hour retreat ceremony, everybody cried but admired him because he wouldn't serve with de Gaulle. He was denied his pension and his seven children were unable to attend government schools in France. Yes, there was a tremendous emotional impact there. We were really torn because Chaban-Delmas, the mayor of Bordeaux, was the right-hand man of de Gaulle since the liberation of Paris in 1944, and he later became Prime Minister of France. When he invited de Gaulle to come and give speeches twice in the year we served there I had the chance to meet de Gaulle. His great big clammy hand had no squeeze to it, it was like a giant Teddy bear, and he said, "Bonjour, monsieur, le consul general des Etats Unis," and I moved on. There was no sign of recognition, or friendship. I never felt any sympathy for him but I was curious to meet him. I think all my sympathies were on the opposite side. In Nice, the son of the mayor (the present mayor) published a weekly anti-Gaullist gazette. He was very active in sheltering and harboring people from Algeria who were destitute. In my view de Gaulle was very undemocratic and did a lot of permanent harm to France. It was hard for me to find contacts who openly admired de Gaulle unless they were Americans! But then Napoleon did a lot of harm to France and he wasn't very broad-minded either.

Q: Were we under strict instructions to stay out of this thing, I'm talking about the American staff.

DUVIVIER: No, I never got any briefing on it, but you could feel it, and being out of the political section, I felt that it wasn't really something to discuss. I think the direction came straight to the ambassador. What he did with it, I don't know. I have heard French people referred to Chip Bohlen as the "Wailing Wall" because he never betrayed their anti-Gaullist views.

Q: But I mean, nobody was going out and saying, OK, just don't talk about this.

DUVIVIER: No, no. It was just understood that it was better simply to avoid the whole subject.

Q: Well then, we move on to Scotland in July of 1965.

DUVIVIER: Yes, but before that I'd like to relate two very touching stories.

The murder of John F. Kennedy shocked deeply everyone living along the Riviera partly because he had sojourned there many times with his parents and was considered the world leader of a new era of peace and prosperity. The consulate overnight had to find guest books and photographs for the lines of mourners, some of whom brought flowers and food offerings. My own bilingual secretary who had served Joseph Kennedy senior for ten years was so upset she required a week's leave at home.

Eleven memorial services demanded my formal presence in one week, ranging from the cathedrals at Nice and Monaco to the replica of Moscow's St. Basil's church and a synagogue to which I wore my hat!

Several months later Jean Pessione, an elderly stone mason, came from Vence to ask my assistance in dedicating a monument he had created single-handed atop the sheer cliff of the mountain of 2205 feet dominating Vence. It consisted of a marble slab, a framed photograph, two flags and a six foot olive tree (symbol of peace) which he watered with a bucket of water he took himself to the top of the "Baou des Blancs" once a week.

The date of Saturday, June 15, 1965 was set and I mobilized my cohorts for support in the American Legion Post No. 1, the Rotary Club, and the American Church. At high noon on a sparkling day in many cars, the press, the mayor and two chartered busses parked half-way up the mountain and banners flying almost two hundred strong, we trudged along the goat path, past a prehistoric Vence cave, to the iron cross at the top. As our daughter and dachshund wistfully watched, a number of self-appointed orators extolled the glorious "martyr of peace" and Lancelot of Camelot in two languages. The mayor of Vence and a retired senator gave us a civic reception with champagne afterwards in the town hall at, with more speeches.

The second story about JFK occurred barely three months before when the State Department transmitted a request from the family for a "sealed tape recording" of the true feelings of Princess Grace for the deceased president. The ideal choice for this confidential interview was Paul Gallico the author of The Snow Goose and Flowers for Mrs. Harris. We had the Gallicos meet Rainier and Grace at our house for lunch and the interview, taped at the Palace, was transmitted to Washington by diplomatic pouch. The contents at Boston's Kennedy Memorial Library will be revealed to the Public and possibly to my wife and my children, only in the year 2014 – if she should miraculously live that long. Probably the attraction was once very strong but unlike Marilyn Monroe she didn't succumb!

ROBERT C. HANEY
XVIII Airborne, US Army
(1943-1945)

Journalist, Paris Herald
(1945-1949)

Press Officer

Paris (1951-1955)

Robert Haney was born in Iowa in 1921. After attending from the University of Iowa in 1943, he fought in World War II in the U.S. Army. After the end of the War, he worked in France with the Paris Herald. He later graduated from the University of Iowa with a Bachelor's in French. Since joining the Foreign Service in 1951, his career has included positions in Paris, Washington, Belgrade, Mali, Saigon and Warsaw. Mr. Haney was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on September 21, 2001.

Q: Did you go to France?

HANEY: Yes, eventually. We waited about three or four weeks at Broadway for an assignment to a unit. We had left Camp Ritchie as a team, headed by a captain whose name was Zing, an Alsatian name. Captain Zing had been a trumpet player in a jazz band. A lieutenant was second in command. We had a staff sergeant. I was a master sergeant. We had two corporals. There were six of us on the team altogether. One day, the captain got orders, in a sealed envelope for reasons that escape me. He was told to take the two jeeps assigned to us and all of our equipment and get on the road. When we had proceeded several kilometers, the captain took a look in the envelope, and we followed the instructions it contained. We ended up at a place called Ogbourne St. George. I was dismayed to see that at the gate of the military headquarters in that small town there was a soldier on guard wearing airborne insignia. We had been assigned to an airborne unit, the XVIII Airborne Corps, Major General Matthew B. Ridgway commanding. His headquarters didn't have any need for a French-speaking team right then, so I was assigned as the ranking noncom in the military intelligence (G-2) section. I worked directly for the G-2, Colonel Whitfield Jack, a former West Pointer who had resigned his commission and gone to law school. When the war came along he went back into service. He was from Shreveport, Louisiana, and a former associate of Huey Long. Colonel Jack was my boss throughout the war.

Q: What were you doing?

HANEY: Once we got into combat, in the Battle of the Bulge, I was in charge of nightly production of the G-2 report compiled from G-2 reports from headquarters of the three American divisions under corps command. Those were the 17th Airborne Division, the 82nd Airborne Division, and the 101st Airborne Division. Intelligence officers on our staff wrote the Corps G-2 report, which we had to produce by early morning. It was typed on stencils and mimeographed. Often, there would also be map overlays on clear acetate. Colonel Jack would occasionally send an officer out with a jeep and driver to round up as much acetate as he could find at division headquarters. Thanks to Colonel Jack's zeal, the G-2 section lugged heavy chests of acetate through France, Belgium, Holland and Germany. At the height of the Battle of the Bulge, we were putting out a 31-page G-2 report with six overlays, if you can imagine that. My job was to produce the report, see to it that everything was proofread, that it was run off and assembled properly, and ready for the colonel in the morning. Colonel Jack would arrive at our field headquarters around 7:00 a.m. His first words were always, "What's the 131enef in the repoht this moanin', Sahjint?"

Q: How did the Battle of the Bulge hit you?

HANEY: As I've mentioned, I was with the XVIII Airborne Corps. We had the 82nd, 101st, and 17th American airborne divisions under our command.

Q: What happened? The 101st and 82nd are well known, and they had both taken part in the Market Garden campaign in the Netherlands.

HANEY: Oh, yes – “A Bridge too Far.”

Q: Were you involved in that?

HANEY: Yes, at an early stage and only peripherally. It was Monty's [Field Marshal Montgomery's] show. The XVIII Airborne Corps was still in England. Three airborne divisions were to be deployed – the British 1st and the American 82nd and 101st divisions. The Americans weren't too happy about that because they had fought in North Africa, Sicily and Italy, and then in the Normandy landings. They were hoping to get a little bit of a rest. But they were told, “It's just for three days. The British forces will finish it off.” Of course, you know what happened.

Then we moved to France. Our first headquarters was at Reims in what had been a boys' school. It was a big quadrangle with a courtyard in the middle. On the second story looking out on the courtyard was a balcony. I was responsible for nighttime security in the map room on that floor. I used to sleep there on a cot at night, my loaded carbine on the floor beside the cot, and a bottle of Mumm champagne hung out the exterior window on a stout cord. A late fall chill accompanied the sunset, and we didn't have other means of cooling that most famous product of Champagne Province, of which Reims was a principal city.

The school was quite comfortable because it had its own dormitory, dining room and kitchen – and squat toilets. In all, the best quarters I had seen since I was inducted. But one day, as I was coming out of the map room onto the balcony, I bumped into an officer, which in itself was not unusual. But this officer was a general. It was General Bedell Smith, Eisenhower's chief of staff. I asked myself, “What the hell is he doing here?” A couple of weeks later, I looked out in the courtyard, and down there were a couple of six-by-six Army trucks. They were loaded with toilet bowls. I knew that we were not long for those comfortable digs. The school became SHAEF headquarters. That is where the German capitulation was signed on May 7, 1945.

I have not been back to Reims, but I can't help wondering whether that fateful event took place in the map room where I had slept. News correspondents writing at the time about SHAEF headquarters and VE Day frequently called the boys' school “the little red schoolhouse.” It wasn't little, and the brick walls were not markedly red. But the description made good copy.

SHAEF displaced the XVIII Airborne Corps headquarters to Epernay, on the Marne River south of Reims. The 101st and 82nd airborne divisions were pulled out of Market Garden in the Netherlands after weeks, not days, as they had been promised. They were moved to the area around Reims, expecting some well-earned downtime. The 17th Airborne, which had been assigned to the XVIII Airborne Corps, was a brand new airborne division with no combat experience. In December 1944 it was still training in England. General Ridgway had flown to England to observe the training exercises.

XVIII Corps headquarters got word in Epernay on the 16th of December 1944 that the Germans had attacked Belgium and Luxembourg. Soon thereafter, we learned that XVIII Corps was being sent to the front, if the higher echelons could figure out where that was. I was detailed to go with the advance headquarters group, traveling without winter gear in one staff car, one jeep and one six-by-six truck. Thus for me began the Battle of the Bulge.

From Epernay we headed northeast into Belgium, the only American convoy moving in that direction. Most U.S. units had cleared out earlier. At about midday we arrived in Bastogne, where American VIII Corps headquarters was supposed to be. It had already pulled up stakes and left; only a quartermaster baking company remained in town, and they were packing their ovens. So we continued on toward Houffalize, about 25 km. to the north, where we were to meet General Ridgway, who was flying over from England to resume command of the corps. When we got within a few kilometers of Houffalize the staff car received a radio message saying, "Don't go into Houffalize, the Germans have taken it. Meet Ridgway in Bastogne." We hastily turned around and headed back, hoping not to run into German troops. Fortunately, we didn't, because they were advancing on east-west roads, and we were traveling south. We didn't dally at the intersections.

When we got back to Bastogne it was turning dark, and a heavy mist covered the hills like a shroud. We took turns walking around our vehicles, which we had put in a large shed open at both ends. There were no other American troops in Bastogne that night. It was very eerie. We could hear the clank of German armor muffled in the mist. And we could see the blurred halos from German signal flares. At about 4:30 a.m., in came General Ridgway in a jeep. He had flown over to an airfield nearby. At first light, we headed west on the only road left open in and out of Bastogne. As we pulled out of town, we met the 101st Airborne troops walking in on both sides of the road to be surrounded. We went up north to Werbomont, with the 82nd Airborne division. We remained committed throughout the Battle of the Bulge, went into Germany and through Aachen, and then returned to our headquarters in Epernay.

Q: Were you more or less doing staff support work by this time rather than language work?

HANEY: I was doing some interpreting when we were in Belgium. But my main job was seeing to it that that damned G-2 report was ready for distribution by 7:00 a.m. I was the equivalent of the production editor on a daily paper.

Q: What was your impression of the Battle of the Bulge? Were things pretty chaotic?

HANEY: They were chaotic at the beginning. When we had made our way in the staff car, jeep and truck up to meet the general, the few American vehicles we passed were going in the other direction. The Belgians were glad to see us heading toward the front and brought out fresh eggs to give us when we stopped to check our bearings. I hadn't seen a fresh egg in more than a year. We didn't have any company at Bastogne until the 101st started to trek in.

The Germans pushed very hard. They were launching hundreds of the V-1 “flying bombs” propelled by a ram-jet engine. They had used them earlier in England. Their target was the port of Antwerp. One of our first field headquarters in Belgium was in a chateau fairly high on a hill. The V-1s were launched from the Eifel, a plateau region in West Germany northeast of Luxembourg. So many of the “flying bombs” failed off the launchpad that the German civilians called them the “Eifel-Schreck” (“Eifel terror”). We used to get 40 or 50 V-1s overhead every day on their way to Liège and Antwerp. They flew so low you could easily see them. When they came over, you hoped you would keep hearing the flatulent sound of the ram jet when the V-1 had passed. If the sound stopped, you knew that it was coming down. The V-1s were designed to power-dive onto the target, but that never worked. They came down when they ran out of fuel.

Q: What happened after the Battle of the Bulge?

HANEY: We returned to Epernay and began preparing to participate in a Montgomery “set piece” (as airborne General Gavin called it). It was to be a major assault across the Rhine in late March 1945. On the night of March 23-24, British troops of the 30 Corps crossed to the right bank within minutes of entering the river near the small town of Rees. At 10:00 a.m. on March 24, paratroopers and gliders of the British 6th Airborne and the American 17th Airborne began landing across the Rhine near Wesel, Germany, in an assault that lasted two-and-a-half hours.

For a week before the drop, I had been in Xanten, a small town in the Netherlands across the Rhine from Wesel, as part of the advance headquarters of XVIII Airborne Corps. From the ground near the left bank of the Rhine, we watched the seemingly endless train of troop carriers and C-47s towing gliders pass low overhead. I later learned that we were in good company: Somewhere nearby, Prime Minister Churchill and General Eisenhower also observed that awesome spectacle. Then our headquarters personnel waddled across the Rhine in a “Duck,” an amphibious vehicle that could carry a jeep and a trailer as well as troops. Not very spectacular, but less scary than a glider (for which I was qualified after declining to practice something you have to do perfect the first time – bail out of a C-47 with a parachute).

A few days after the Rhine crossing, we were flown back to corps base headquarters in Epernay. Then we were committed to the Rhineland campaign. Patton was moving at such a pace it was hard to keep up with him. Our forces encircled and took thousands of German prisoners. A typical sign placed by advancing troops on the side of a road would be, “Mines Cleared to Shoulders Only.” Patton’s troops planted signs that read, “Krauts Cleared to Shoulders Only.”

Q: How did you get your connection to the wire service?

HANEY: In Paris the newspaper business was in upheaval because the postwar French had purged anybody suspected of dealings with the enemy during the occupation. New publications seemed to spring up like weeds. When I got to Paris as a new employee of the French wire service there were 35 to 40 daily newspapers in the city, few of them run by an experienced professional.

On my way from Biarritz to Namur, I had stopped briefly in Paris, as I mentioned. I found my way to the Paris bureau of the London Sunday Times, where I met the bureau chief. He didn’t have a job for me, but he told me, “There’s a new wire service in town called the Agence Européenne de Presse. I think they want to start an English section.” So I went down to the AEP offices near the Opéra and talked my way in to see one of the editors. He had been a schoolteacher and apparently didn’t know much about newspaper work. I told him, “Look, I’m here only on leave. I’m going to be discharged shortly.” He said, “Fine. As soon as you come back, you have a job.”

My job was to take AEP’s French copy and translate and adapt it for transmission in English. AEP was a favored agency because it was socialist. It was in their offices that I met Léon Blum, the great man of French socialism. The president of France, Vincent Auriol, was a socialist. AEP was then in the position now occupied by the Agence France-Presse (AFP). My most interesting assignment at AEP was helping to cover the peace conference with the German satellite powers, held at the Luxembourg Palace in the summer of 1946. Jimmy Byrnes, the U.S. secretary of state, was our chief delegate.

The socialists in France began to run into difficulties that summer, and the ripple effect was felt at AEP. I was told I could stay on, but I would have to shift to reporting in French. It was much more of a chore, because French is not my native language. So I went to the European edition of the New York Herald Tribune, and they hired me.

Q: What job did you have with them?

HANEY: I started out doing cable rewrite. Most of the Paris Herald copy that we received from our correspondents came in a form called “cablese.” You leave out all the articles, shorten things and run words together to lower the word count, which was the basis of cost. It was akin to reconstituting mashed potatoes from the dried and powdered Army rations still available on the Paris black market. Somebody had to take the cablese and reconstitute it into proper English.

After cable rewrite, I did reporting. And I did translating. An elegant Frenchman who followed the races would come back from Longchamp and write his racing report in longhand. I would translate that for our sports page. I also translated speeches by de Gaulle. That is not so easy. It’s said that French is “the diplomatic language” because it is so precise. My experience has been that it’s a diplomatic language because it’s so fuzzy. Just try to pin down in English what de Gaulle meant exactly when he used grand language, accompanied by equally grand gestures.

Q: Wasn’t it, “Algerians, I understand you,” which was a famous saying that everybody interpreted different ways?

HANEY: Yes. After cable rewrite, translating racing news and deciphering de Gaulle, I became a full-time reporter. Four of us and the two-man Paris bureau of the New York edition did the reporting. Some of the stories by the local staff would be picked up by the bureau for use in New York. The local newsman from New York who was the chief reporter for the European edition was David Perlman (in later years science editor at The San Francisco Chronicle). When he went back home to the New York edition, I took his place. If I wanted to make a good impression, I could always tell outsiders that I was “city editor” of the European edition, although there were only four of us doing the reporting. I stayed with the Paris Herald for three years. It was an interesting time.

Q: What was your impression of the Fourth Republic, how it worked?

HANEY: Structured Gallic chaos. Because of the war – so much damage, so much loss, so much dislocation, so much ambivalence about how to be French in a France occupied by a foreign power – the national psychological landscape was not the kind of territory that favors obvious, easy answers. Charges of treating with the enemy during the occupation were being made recklessly. Most industries had been disrupted. The newspaper business didn't know where it was going, because so many of the people running it, from top to bottom, were inexperienced. The winter of 1946-'47 was very bad, very cold. In Paris, the outdoor, street-side urinals ("Vespasiennes," named for the emperor who established them in Rome) froze up and coated parts of the street with ice. The garbage wasn't picked up; it piled up frozen on the streets.

There was a shortage of food. The extreme cold had killed the winter wheat, and that French staple – the baguette – was in extremely short supply or even not available. That's about as close as you can get to a state of emergency in France without calling out the troops. French, British and American representatives met in England to seek a remedy. The Americans were generous. We offered to provide what the British interpreter called "corn," which in British English means any kind of bread grain. The Americans who heard "corn" thought of Iowa. When the American contribution arrived by the shipload, it was maize – "corn" as in "Iowa."

As a result, during most of 1947, the French had to eat bread made from corn, which has no gluten. Without gluten, it will rise from the yeast in the dough, but there's nothing elastic (gluten) to hold the bubbles. The French insisted that if it was bread it had to be a baguette. France's "yellow bread" was baked into baguettes about as long and hard as a gendarme's billy club and not much thicker. It caused great furor (and much indigestion) that year. To write a feature about it for the Paris Herald, I visited a laboratory of the National Center for Scientific Research that was testing the "yellow bread" on rats. Some rats were getting regular bread made from wheat. A second cage was served wheat baguettes with a little bit of corn. The third cage got only "yellow bread" – no wheat. According to the scientist in charge of the experiments, a rat in the third cage stuck his nose out between the top and side of the cage, let go with his feet, and was hanged. The scientist said it was an accident.

Yellow bread aside, American assistance was enormously valuable to the French during that period. Regional headquarters for aid to Europe was located in our embassy in Paris.

Q: Did you have any dealings with the embassy while you were in Paris?

HANEY: Yes. The embassy was, of course, the source of the official American view on stories relating to the United States. I went there more regularly also because, with my discharge papers, I could still use the commissary and the PX. Food and American cigarettes were hard to come by, and I was living on the French economy.

And often, when I was down near the Place de la Concorde, I would stop by the embassy to brush up my Russian. One of the elevator operators was a Russian who had fled the revolution and immigrated to France. I'd ride in the elevator with him, we would stop between floors and chat in Russian until people began buzzing insistently for the elevator.

Some years later I was assigned to the embassy as a Foreign Service Reserve Officer, my first post.

Q: Did you run into Art Buchwald?

HANEY: You might say that Art ran into me. As the "city editor" of the Paris Herald, it was my job on behalf of the editor, Geoff Parsons, Jr., to say "No" to the hopeful young Americans who sought to emulate Hemingway and Elliot Paul, who went to Paris after the First World War and ended up as famous writers. Art Buchwald had served in the Marines in the Pacific. He was a Brooklyn lad. After his discharge, he got on a ship and sailed for France. In Paris, he came straight to the Herald Tribune. That was almost always the first place where a newly arrived wannabe would show up. I was the first American connected with the paper that Art met, because I was the designated naysayer.

I used to get two or three young job-seekers a month, and I tried not to discourage them, even though we might not have any opening at the time. After listening to their pitch, I would tell them, "Look, I don't know anybody who has come here and spent several months methodically checking all the possibilities – AP, UP, INS, the Chicago Tribune bureau, the New York Times bureau, and so on – who has not found some kind of an entry job."

So I told Art, "I think that if you stick with it and make the rounds, something will turn up. That's what happened to me. But there's nothing at the Trib right now."

But Art kept coming back. I would say, "I'm sorry, nothing new today, Art. Have you tried some of the other places?" No, he hadn't. He carried a letter from Variety magazine, which he showed me. The gist of it was, "If this young man ever writes anything that is of interest to us, we might print it." Not the sort of thing you could take to the bank. It was clear to me that he didn't have any meaningful backing from Variety, because I knew the Frenchman who was the magazine's stringer in Paris.

Art was so persistent that I thought, "This guy deserves to get the 'No' from Geoff Parsons himself." I went to Geoff and said, "Another young man has been coming around looking for a job. I don't think he knows how to write. But he is so persistent and so nice, I really think that you should tell him 'No' yourself." Geoff didn't like that. But I insisted, so Geoff made the appointment to see Art.

The day after Art's interview with Geoff, I turned up in the city room at 2:00 p.m., the usual check-in time for editorial staff on a morning newspaper. To my surprise, there was Art Buchwald busily occupied at the long table by the switchboard at one end of the city room. He was bent over the table with a ruler and "chopping copy" – tearing off the separate "takes" of wire service copy and sorting them by story. Puzzled, I asked, "What are you doing here, Art?" He replied, "Well, I had a nice talk with Geoff Parsons yesterday, and he told me I could start today."

Geoff was congenitally incapable of saying “No.” Getting him to make up his mind was like trying to nail Jell-O to a wall. He had hired Art and started him off chopping copy. Geoff was interested in getting a regular column started, but he didn’t have the time himself. In my view, he was too busy on the social circuit. Art thus became our only English-speaking copy boy (the rest of the staff at that level were all French). In addition to those duties, Geoff then asked Art to try writing a column on Parisian restaurants. That meant free meals, which I think he needed. Art would write a piece about the restaurant that had just fed him, the copy desk would clean it up, and the copy would go down the tube to the composing room for the next day’s edition.

Little by little, Art’s writing got better, more interesting, proving all of us except Geoff Parsons wrong. I think to this day Art has no analytical notion of what he’s doing. He just instinctively knows what will go. When I went back to Paris in 1951 to begin my job at the embassy, Art was still at the Paris Herald. By then, he was a well-established columnist, and his pieces were appearing in the New York edition as well as in Paris.

Q: And he’s still going.

HANEY: Yes.

Q: Was there the equivalent of a USIS or an OWI in Paris?

HANEY: When I got to the Paris embassy in 1951, the information and cultural function was carried out by the United States Information Service (USIS). The Office of War Information (OWI) had been phased out. The United States Information Agency (USIA, no longer extant, alas!) was not created until 1953, after John Foster Dulles became Secretary of State. I think Dulles wanted to unload USIA because the most visible part of it in the United States was the Voice of America (VOA). That was the McCarthy era, and VOA, seeking foreign language skills, had hired many employees who were emigrants from Europe. The VOA was a soft target.

Q: But while you were working for The Herald Tribune, how did the American embassy handle its press relations?

HANEY: Through the press attaché.

Q: He was a Foreign Service officer?

HANEY: Initially, yes. Then it was a New England newspaperman who, I think, got the job because his congressman pulled strings in Washington. He was a Foreign Service Reserve Officer (as I was at the beginning). Within a year or two, Ben Bradlee arrived to occupy the position of assistant press attaché, eventually press attaché.

Q: We’re moving up toward the time when you were making an application to get into the State Department, aren’t we?

HANEY: Not quite. In 1949, I had been with the Paris Herald for three years and in Europe for five, counting my time in the Army and with the French wire service. At that point I was feeling restless at The Herald Tribune. I had been sent on assignments to Belgium once and to Switzerland twice to do the interviews and collect the material to support advertising supplements relating to those two countries. Coordinating my coverage with the advertising department, I wrote every story in an eight-page supplement, followed the copy down to the composing room, adjusted the makeup as needed for space, watched the typesetters lock the page into the form, and finally checked the proofs on the stone. From the flat form holding the type the impression was made on a flexible material the French called “flan” (“custard”), which was then rolled into a cylinder for the rotary presses. The flan was also sent to New York, where The Herald Tribune would use the same copy already set in type for a New York supplement on Belgium or Switzerland.

For all my extra work on a supplement, I would get a byline on the front-page lead. I told Geoff Parsons and Eric Hawkins, the managing editor, that I thought I should get some additional compensation for my editorial work on advertising supplements. My appeal fell on deaf ears. I got tired of what had become an annual supplement drill and thought, “Maybe I’ll go back home and finish my college degree before I get too old.”

So I left the Paris Herald in the summer of 1949 with an option to return if I wished. I traveled to New York from Le Havre on the old Queen Elizabeth with Maggie Higgins, a foreign correspondent for the New York edition. She was heading from her post in Berlin to Asia to cover the Korean War.

You went back to Paris again. You were there from ‘51 to when?

HANEY: Late ‘55.

Q: When you came into the Foreign Service in ‘51, was there any training? Or did they just figure you knew what to do?

HANEY: The Foreign Service Institute had a course that ran for a few weeks. We had general exposure to what faces someone abroad serving the U.S. in the Foreign Service. There was also language training. They didn’t give me any because I knew French already.

Q: When you arrived in Paris in 1951, who was our ambassador?

HANEY: David K. E. Bruce.

Q: Did you have much to do with the main part of the embassy, or were you off in a separate area?

HANEY: We were in a very distinguished area. If you walk down the Rue du Faubourg St.-Honoré, which goes past one side of the embassy, you come to what is now the ambassador’s residence, at number 41. That’s where the U.S. Information Service (USIS) was located at the time. The vast garden behind number 41 extends to the Champs-Élysées.

Q: What was the French government like? This was the Fourth Republic. How were relations with the United States?

HANEY: Relations were good, although I think that Mr. Dulles, who was then our Secretary of State, overestimated the eagerness of the French to get together with the other European powers that had been allies to form the European Defense Community, a precursor to NATO. Georges Bidault, who had been premier and was president briefly and then premier again, had given the impression to Mr. Dulles and his aides that the Assemblée Nationale was going to agree to join its European allies in approving the new European body – no problem. It dragged on and on in the Assemblée Nationale for about four years. It was finally accepted, but the French weren't very happy about it. And their eventual connection with NATO was a tenuous one.

Q: What part of the action did you have in the Press Office?

HANEY: We really had two functions with respect to the press. One was the press attache's office in the embassy on the mezzanine floor. That was the office that managed the spokesman role, answered queries to the embassy, and accompanied the ambassador at press conferences. Then USIS had a press section. It was aimed at a French audience. It received material that was prepared in Washington and sent out by wireless file overnight. That file was translated and packaged as a press report, which was circulated to newspapers or to anybody interested in the U.S. view of things. The press office at USIS was also called on to do things like speechwriting. The USIS audience was exclusively French. The press attaché was at the elbow of the ambassador and other embassy officers who would occasionally have contact with the press. Ben Bradlee became the assistant press attaché, then press attaché while I was stationed at the embassy.

Q: He later won fame with The Washington Post as its editor.

HANEY: And in the Watergate movie, too.

Q: How receptive did you find the French press to what we were putting out?

HANEY: I would say that they were about as receptive as our press is to press releases from embassies here in Washington. In Paris, if it was big news, the announcement would come from Washington, or the ambassador would announce it through the press attaché's office. The USIS wireless file would, of course, carry the gist of big news, but scoops were not our preoccupation. The USIS supporting role was to carry on one part of a dialogue with the French public.

Q: Did we have any contact with the communist press?

HANEY: We read it carefully, but we didn't have any association with it. We certainly did not try to use it as an outlet.

Q: I imagine you had your old colleagues who were still in place. What about the socialist press? How receptive were they? Were they beginning to distance themselves from the U.S. more and more?

HANEY: I don't recall that that was the case. Of course, I had a rather unusual position, because I had worked in the French press earlier. As a reporter for the Agence Européenne de Presse, I had covered the peace conference with the former German satellite powers. We had an AEP team at the Luxembourg Palace. Molotov headed the Soviet delegation at that conference. Our Secretary of State, Jimmy Byrnes, was head of the U.S. delegation. At his elbow was Chip Bohlen.

I knew the French press well. My boss at AEP was a Russian Jew who had emigrated to France and had been editor of Le Populaire, organ of the French Socialist Party. He was in charge of AEP operations at the Luxembourg Palace. As I have recounted earlier, many press people in the immediate postwar period had little knowledge of the profession. But there was one AEP old-timer who was an accomplished newspaper man. He was trying to get me to join the CGT, the Confédération Générale du Travail, the big French trade union.

Q: Was this communist?

HANEY: No, not at that time. But communists had infiltrated it to the point that many Americans thought of it as a commie outfit. I am grateful that I did not follow up on my French colleague's suggestion. I joined the newspaper Guild later when I went to The Herald Tribune. I ordinarily support labor unions, and I had no reason not to be in favor of the CGT. But if I had been obliged to put that down on my record when I applied to become a Foreign Service officer, I probably wouldn't be sitting here now.

Q: Did you run across McCarthyism, either you or people around you? This was the height of McCarthyism.

HANEY: Cohn and Schein came to visit when I was stationed in Paris.

Q: Infamous.

HANEY: I was present at one of the sessions down the street at the Rue du Faubourg St.-Honoré. The cultural attaché, a distinguished American professor, was to be interrogated by that pair working for Senator McCarthy. Cohn took over the cultural attaché's desk. Schein sat next to him. While Cohn fired questions, Schein was going through the professor's desk, opening the drawers and looking to see what was in them. It was a most disgraceful performance. So I could say that we were painfully aware of McCarthyism. Some of our colleagues in USIA were fingered by Cohn and lost their jobs on the basis of alleged guilt by association.

Q: Were there people who were saying, "Maybe you'd better not say this or do that or have contact with so and so," because of McCarthyism? Did you feel it was an inhibiting time?

HANEY: I really didn't feel inhibited. We would not ask ourselves, "What would McCarthy say about this?" We would just do what we thought was the best thing given our mission.

Q: What about the Indochinese war? This was the time of Dien Bien Phu. How was that playing from your perspective?

HANEY: As you know, the American government did consider giving the French aid – not just financial aid, but supplies and perhaps more, I don't know. That possibility was rejected. But living in Paris, you could not help following rather closely what was happening at Dien Bien Phu. Later, I knew a French liaison officer who worked with one of the embassy missions. He had been with French forces at Dien Bien Phu, and I had several interesting talks with him about his experience. We followed it closely. But I was not aware that there was ever a real possibility that the United States might intervene.

Q: Dien Bien Phu fell in early 1954. I was an enlisted man in the Air Force getting ready to get out of the military. All of a sudden, the rumor went around that we might all be kept in, which was not pleasing to us at all.

HANEY: You probably knew more about the possibility than we did.

Q: I was just in the barracks. But it was of concern. Did Algeria play much of a role in your contacts with the French?

HANEY: At that point, Algeria was still considered by the French to be part of the Métropole, like a province, a part of European France. Of course, as time went on and the colonies became more restive, voices were heard in France advocating independence, and strong voices opposed it.

In 1952, the U.N. General Assembly met in Paris, in one of the wings of the Palais de Chaillot. Dean Acheson was Secretary of State at the time. I was detached from the embassy to join the U.S. delegation for the duration of the GA meeting because they needed a French speaker familiar with the French press. I worked for Porter McKeever, head of the U.S. delegation's public information section.

I remember that when the subject came up of independence for the French colonies in North Africa – Tunisia, Morocco, Algeria – the U.N. decided that "We won't discuss that in Paris because that would be offensive to our hosts." But in his opening speech to the political committee, Acheson made a reference to the desires of the French colonies, in Africa particularly, for independence. I can remember what he said, because I was sitting in the U.S. delegation offices working with the staffer who transcribed speeches. He would pass his transcription to me, and I would clean it up as necessary. Acheson had said, "If you're standing on a railroad track and you see an express train coming toward you, get off the track." He was talking about the drive for independence among the colonies. I thought that was an apt description of what was happening. The next day, the wireless file that was compiled in Washington daily by USIA and sent out worldwide gave a lot of space to Acheson's speech. The "express train" reference had been removed, however, apparently because somebody felt it would be offensive to the French.

Subsequently, when the General Assembly returned to the United States for a rump session in New York, the ministers for foreign affairs of the French colonies in North Africa applied for visas at our embassy in Paris. They held French diplomatic passports, and they wished to be present when the GA discussed the colonial question, which had been kept off the agenda in Paris. Our embassy denied them visas. I never did find out why.

Q: There was something that became known in the State Department as the “Battle of North Africa” or the “Battle of Africa,” between the European bureaus – i.e., France and all—and officers who were dealing with the Near East and Africa. The European side was thinking in terms of “We don’t want to get the French riled up because we want them to join NATO. So, let’s just forget about this.” People who dealt with the Near East and Africa were saying, “This express train is coming along. We’re going to catch it.” This was a battle that was really being waged in Washington.

HANEY: That’s what I sensed.

Q: What was your impression of French politics at this time? There were so many changes in government. Did you feel that this was the sign of a very weak state, or did you see this as something that really wasn’t as bad as it looked from the outside?

HANEY: It was a matter of concern to most Frenchmen because they certainly didn’t have a stable government for some years following the Second World War. Bidault, the prime minister, got caught between pressure from the United States to sign on to the European Defense Community and the feeling on the part of most Frenchmen that they didn’t want to give away any part of their sovereignty, that they didn’t want their military power, for example, subjected to scrutiny or orders from any other part of Europe. If they got into EDC and NATO, they feared that a French military unit might fall under the command of, who knows? A German unit.

Q: With your connections with France, how did you find the social life and the professional melded together? How receptive did you find the French?

HANEY: I had no problem whatsoever. My own view was that very often we in USIA who had immediate contact with the French press on a working basis and more contact with ordinary people, not just other diplomats, sometimes had a better sense of what was in the works than an embassy political officer who might pick up much of what he learned at diplomatic cocktail parties.

Q: It gets quite incestuous within the diplomatic community.

HANEY: Yes. We saw that particularly later in India where, because of the language problem among other things, the embassy political section was not really on top of what was happening. My wife, Mary, was doing work with Indian women, which gave her valuable insight into the minds, if not the hearts, of the Indians.

Q: Let’s stick to France. What was your wife doing at that time?

HANEY: In Paris she was taking care of our first child.

Q: That kept her hands full.

HANEY: Yes. We had met in Paris when she was a staff member of the U.S. delegation to the General Assembly, which met there in 1952.

Q: Did you find that there was much difference between what was happening in Paris and elsewhere in France? Was the real political life concentrated in Paris?

HANEY: Political life on an international scale was of course concentrated in Paris. But French internal politics had plenty to do with the provinces. The agricultural sector, for example, was very important to any French politician. But with respect to the international scene, Paris had its view much as Washington inside the Beltway has its view of what's going on, not just in the country but in the world.

Q: What about radio and television? Was television much of a factor in those days?

HANEY: Television was just beginning. I became the radio and television officer when the radio officer who had been clinging to the job for six years was finally told he was being transferred to Africa. I think he quit. After a stint as a press officer, then temporary duty with our U.N. delegation at the Palais de Chaillot in 1952, and finally a year as an assistant in the office of the Public Affairs Officer (PAO), I was shifted to the radio officer slot. Television was added to my responsibilities when French TV finally took off.

Q: Was the activity different with radio and television? Was it an important factor in molding French opinion? How did we get to it?

HANEY: Yes, I think radio – and then TV – was important because in many parts of France, radio was how you got your news. The Voice of America (VOA) had a half hour every night on the French Chaîne Nationale network, a slot that had been used by the OWI until the VOA came along. I inherited that half hour. The first 15 minutes I filled with American music – performers that were American, American works, American opera. I even tossed in some Kurt Weill, for example his “Down in the Valley,” from the folksong expanded into a musical. I spent every Wednesday afternoon in a small Radiodiffusion Française (RDF) studio in the rue Vernet, near the Étoile, recording in French on large platters a week's worth of comments on the music. Day by day at the appointed hour throughout the following week, the French technicians in the studio alternated my comments with the works I had chosen on commercial records, and the whole recorded segment was broadcast on the Chaîne Nationale. In short, I was a disk jockey (except that I never had to lift or plant a tone arm).

The second segment of my half hour was 15 minutes of news and commentary broadcast shortwave from VOA and picked up by RDF for relay by medium wave in France. The signal was crackly and sometimes weak – it reminded me of listening to the BBC in Europe on shortwave during the war. I would introduce the Stateside segment with, “Ici, New York!” Because that galvanizing introduction had been recorded the week before, I could head home from my downtown office every evening and listen to myself and my New York colleagues on the Chaîne Nationale before dinner.

Probably more significant in terms of reaching a French audience with a radio program serving our policy objectives was the work I did with Radio Luxembourg, a commercial station with its main studios in Paris. The French radio was nationalized, an instrument of whatever government was in power. Radio Luxembourg had no such ties, was independent, and could broadcast what it thought would appeal most to listeners. Polls showed consistently that Radio Luxembourg's listenership in France was greater and its programs more favorably regarded than any of the RDF channels. Luxembourg broadcast by long wave and could be heard on ordinary radios throughout France. Its evening news came on in prime time, 6:00 or 7:00 p.m., as I recall.

Radio Luxembourg didn't have the staff to cover much of Europe. I employed a stringer who had earlier worked as an RDF correspondent. So I suggested to Radio Luxembourg that I furnish them coverage, using my stringer, of events in Vienna, London, Rome. My man could send his report and any useful sound effects (for example, crowd noises) by wire to the large and well-equipped Marshall Plan studio on the Boulevard Haussman, not far from l'Étoile. As a courtesy to the embassy (and the VOA), I was allowed to use a modern (1954) recording studio and the services of a top-notch engineer. He recorded on tape (I said we were up-to-date) at 30 inches per second. That speed allowed him to remove a hiccup or a syllable, no one the wiser.

Luxembourg accepted my offer. I would propose stories to be covered, and, with their agreement, I would send my stringer to report the story, furnish the sound elements, and we would put it in Luxembourg's hands as a tape ready to go in time for their evening newscast. Although Radio Luxembourg didn't say so, the listener was left to believe that my stringer was one of Luxembourg's correspondents.

American radio was so wedded to authenticity that if you covered a fatal leap from the Empire State Building, you would have to have someone on the sidewalk with a mike to catch the sickening sound of the impact. Not so in France. With imagination, the requisite recorded sound elements, a brief narrative and a good engineer you could put together a coherent story that would nicely fill a two-minute spot.

This is the way it worked for coverage of the signing of the Austrian State Treaty in Vienna: My stringer was dispatched to Vienna with detailed instructions. On the day of the signing he recorded the sound of bands and crowd noises and the beginning of the principal speech in German. A separate recorded chunk provided his translation in French of salient elements of the speech. When we had received all these recorded bits in the studio, I worked with the engineer to meld the separate parts into a coherent and smoothly flowing two-minute spot. My engineer then copied the finished product on a fresh tape as a seamless package. And at 6:00 p.m., a "cycliste" from Radio Luxembourg came to the studio to pick up the edited tape. Then I went home to listen to it on Radio Luxembourg evening news, which identified my stringer by name but not by affiliation.

Q: They wouldn't identify you as . . .

HANEY: Oh, no. The tape I provided was broadcast as part of a Radio Luxembourg newscast. I once figured out that I was spending about $3,000 a year in transportation and expenses for my stringer, plus his hourly compensation for time spent on assignment. And we were getting about $65,000 worth of airtime. Our spots were carried in prime time, and Luxembourg was a commercial station.

Q: Of course, at that time, Radio Luxembourg was the authoritative and most popular station around.

HANEY: Right. Independent polls showed that Radio Luxembourg was way ahead of any French station.

Q: How did the Soviet Union play? Did you get involved in showing the depths of depravity in the Soviet Union, the “Evil Empire” and all that, or was that not part of your business?

HANEY: We usually didn’t get into that. It would have taken up manpower and time that could be used more effectively for positive and more interesting subjects for a French audience. The whole business of the Cold War – who’s the good guy, and who’s the bad guy – was a theme with variations played ad nauseam by the French Communist Party.

When the U.N. General Assembly met in Paris in 1952, Eleanor Roosevelt was a member of the U.S. delegation. Warren Austin was the head of the delegation. When Austin had to return to the States early, Eleanor Roosevelt replaced him. During the GA meeting, she was doing a weekly program on the French radio in French. The temporary RDF studio installed in the Palais de Chaillot was a cubicle half a story up in one of the high-ceilinged halls. You had to climb up to it on rickety wooden stairs. I remember ushering Mrs. Roosevelt up there every week for her ten-minute program.

Throughout the GA meeting we were besieged by French communist delegations coming from as far away as Marseilles to protest the alleged American use of germ warfare in Korea. These groups would arrive on the steps of the Palais de Chaillot seeking an audience. One of my jobs was to receive these guys, try to identify the leader, and agree to take one or two representatives of the group to see Mrs. Roosevelt. I don’t believe she changed any minds, but she might have opened some.

Q: I might add that this germ warfare accusation was as far as anyone knows pure propaganda put out by the communist side.

HANEY: Yes.

Q: You left there before de Gaulle came in?

HANEY: De Gaulle was president from ‘44 to ‘46 under the provisional government. I began work at the Paris Herald while he was still in the Élysée Palace. Then he was president again in ‘59 and ‘69. I was transferred from the Paris embassy back to Washington for a home assignment toward the end of ‘55. But de Gaulle remained very much a part of the French political scene even out of office.

Q: Did you have any contact with de Gaulle at that time? Did he sort of appear and make pronouncements and then go back home?

HANEY: Yes, you would see him on French TV, in newsreels and in the press. He appealed to a part of the French psyche that had not quite lost its grip on the glory that was France in Napoleonic times. It would be interesting to check the texts of his public speeches to see just how often he would invoke “la gloire française.” When he spoke those words, you’d swear you could hear trumpets in the background.

De Gaulle’s speeches did strike a cord in the French people. France was in pretty bad shape at the end of the war. I had lived there as a civilian on the French economy until 1949, so I knew first-hand what a struggle it was. In 1952, France was fighting to maintain its colonial power in Vietnam. Its African colonies were restive. “La gloire française” rang a bit hollow, even when intoned by de Gaulle.

During the ‘52 GA meetings, the offices of the U.S. delegation were in the Astoria Hotel, on the Champs-Élysées not far from the Étoile. Our windows looked out on that grand boulevard. While we occupied those offices, General de Lattre de Tassigny died. He had commanded the French 1st Army in World War II and was subsequently named high commissioner and military commander in French Indochina. In Paris, “la gloire française” shone once more, briefly, to mark his passing. De Lattre was posthumously given the rank of “Maréchal.” And from an upper floor of the Astoria we watched the elaborate funeral cortege make its stately way from the Étoile down the Champs-Élysées to the Place de la Concorde. For one day, the pomp matched the circumstance. “La gloire française” had made a brief apparition, then faded quickly into memory again.

Q: During the time you were there both as a plain citizen and as a member of the diplomatic corps, what were you noticing about the division within France of those who collaborated and those who didn’t? Was there almost a tacit “Let’s not talk about that?”

HANEY: In the immediate wake of the war, as cities and towns were liberated, rough street justice was sometimes meted out to known collaborators. This punishment was more psychological than physical – nobody that I know of was taken out and shot. Frenchmen believed to have been cozy with “les Boches” were subjected to insult and innuendo rather than injury. Prostitutes who had associated with the occupiers were rounded up, their heads shaved bald, and herded down the street.

There was not a clear-cut line between Frenchmen who collaborated for personal benefit and those who simply tried to get along with the Germans because times were tough. I think you’re right about the inclination “not to talk about that.” There has never been a clear definition in the public mind of “collaboration.”

I’ve mentioned the chaotic state of the French press in the immediate wake of the war. When all the professionals who – rightly or wrongly – had been accused of “collaboration” were flushed out, the technical, political and intellectual task of publishing a daily paper often fell to neophytes. The press perhaps suffered more postwar upheaval than other sectors because it had left a “paper trail.” Many French men and women saw the disarray of the press as a great opportunity and promptly joined the fray. As I have pointed out, in Paris this led to a large turnover in the press corps and the publication of something like 40 dailies in the first years after the war.

I sense that now, a half-century and several generations later, the French are more disposed to look more searchingly, more realistically at how they reacted to the occupation. The film, “Le Chagrin et la Pitié” (“The Sorrow and the Pity”) is an example of the more clear-eyed view that the current generation is beginning to cast on the trying years of German occupation.

Q: When you were moving with your contacts, did people say, “Oh, yes, So and So, he or she was very much dealing with the Nazis?”

HANEY: I never saw or heard of anybody fingered as a collaborator except prostitutes who were marched down the street.

Q: You left the Paris embassy in 1955. Where to?

HANEY: I returned to Washington on a home assignment. I became chief of the Soviet and Satellites Branch of USIA Intelligence and Research.

RIDGWAY B. KNIGHT
Special Assistant to the Ambassador
Paris (1944-1950)

Ambassador Ridgway B. Knight was born in Paris of American parents. He became a Foreign Service officer in 1946 under the Manpower Act. His career included positions in France and Pakistan, and ambassadorships to Syria, Belgium, and Portugal. Ambassador Knight was interviewed by Kirstin Hamblin in 1993.

KNIGHT: You asked me how I came into the Foreign Service, that wasn't the reason. Actually, after the North African landings I went into the Army, and after landing in Italy at Salerno, seeing duty on the Anzio beachhead and working as liaison officer between General Clark commanding the Fifth Army, and General Juin commanding the French Expeditionary Corps, I was, as a favor, assigned to an outfit which was to land in southern France on August 15, 1944. Strange as it may seem, that is how I came into the Foreign Service! As we made our way up through southern France, politically interested as I was, I wrote a memorandum on political conditions as I observed them. By a miracle of efficiency, which I'm sure has not been often repeated, my memo was amongst the papers given to Ambassador Caffery when he took his plane in October of 1944 to join his post in Paris. My paper happened to be the only paper written on conditions south of the Loire, and he said, “I want that Major on my staff.” And that is how I came into the Foreign Service.

Q: And so you were then?

KNIGHT: Then I became a special assistant to the Ambassador, and also of his successor Ambassador David Bruce until I went back to Washington in January of '50. Finally, in 1946, I was integrated into the Foreign Service as a Class 4 officer under the Manpower Act.

Q: And what specifically did you do as special assistant to both of these ambassadors?

KNIGHT: I had two titles, I was special assistant to the Ambassador, and I was a full-fledged member of the Political Section. I was responsible for dealing with several of the French political parties, and I reported on the French colonies.

Q: What sort of involvement did you have in post World War II negotiations?

KNIGHT: I was one of the two American Commissioners handling the rectification of the Franco-Italian border. The other one was Freddie Reinhardt.

RICHARD FUNKHOUSER

Petroleum Attaché
Paris (1945-1947)

Political Counselor
Paris (1965-1968)

Richard Funkhouser was born and raised in Trenton, New Jersey. He graduated from Princeton University with a Degree in the Liberal Arts. He began working for Standard Oil but eventually moved on to Foreign Service in 1945. During his active duty he has served in Paris, Syria, Lebanon, Iraq, Moscow, Gabon, Vietnam, and Scotland. This interview was conducted on February 2, 1988 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

FUNKHOUSER: I went down there and, believe it or not, a classmate of mine, Findley Burns, whom you undoubtedly know, was the young Personnel Officer. He said, "You're an oil expert, aren't you?"

I said, "No."

He said, "You worked for an oil company, didn't you?"

I said, "Yes."

He said, "You're an oil expert to the State Department."

I said, "Okay."

He said, "We and the British are both trying to get the oil industry back on its feet. Not only the industry, but get oil moving to all the destroyed countries of Western Europe."

Q: We're talking about what, 1945?

FUNKHOUSER: We're talking about 1945 in September. And Findley told me that both the Americans and the British Foreign Service were trying to get a few people to go to key oil industry centers such as Paris with responsibilities for Western Europe and French North Africa, London and the empire as it was, Cairo and all of the Middle East, and Tokyo for the Pacific area. What we were assigned to do was to be contact with government officials who worked on oil problems and energy (they didn't have departments of energy then), Foreign Office people who were trying to handle political problems in oil-producing countries, and/or Treasury reps. We were having great problems with what was called then and became the "dollar-sterling oil problem," wherein the British would produce oil from the Middle East and sell it for sterling to countries that had built up great pound debts during World War II. The British would sell them "sterling oil" which they could get at a much cheaper price than with American dollars. No one had dollars, everyone had sterling. And so these were problems which had to be worked out in Western Europe.

Let's take, for example, tank cars. The Germans stole the French tank cars, then the Russians stole the German tank cars. And what a Petroleum Attache had to do was try to get the tank cars back from wherever they were. Many were destroyed, but tank cars are pretty tough, too.

And pipelines; we had a lot of pipelines in Europe such as were laid down during the war from Marseille up the Rhone Valley. The problem was to dispose of those pipelines. They weren't meant to last very long: they were above the ground and the one from Marseille had so many holes in it from French peasants trying to get gasoline for their tractors that they weren't worth a great deal. But there were problems of negotiation which even as a junior Foreign Service officer Class Six I handled. I became the focal point in the embassy for trying to get the flow of oil moving. This was my first job. I had the title of Acting Regional Petroleum Attache until I took the exams and became a Third Secretary. A secondary but significant responsibility for me was to allocate and distribute to the Americans in France coupons issued by the French government for rationed gasoline. I sometimes wondered why we as a naive, young couple seemed to be so popular and so often invited by businessmen to the best black market restaurants?!

In retrospect, I am also struck by how lucky I was to learn my first diplomatic ropes from such outstanding officers as Douglas MacArthur and Livingston Merchant. Coming from three years in the oil fields and two years piloting a plane over the Hump, I was unable to draft reports or speak in meetings effectively. Doug redrafted my diplomatic notes; Livy was a model chairman of staff meetings where he could brilliantly summarize disparate views so as to make each participant believe his contribution was included. No one in my career could match him. This was undoubtedly why our Ambassador, Jefferson Caffery, who strangely enough was embarrassingly inarticulate in large meetings, sent Livy to Washington to sell the $500 million aid package for France which preceded and probably inspired the Marshall Plan.

Q: During your time there you were there during a time when DeGaulle was really reasserting what he would say was the rightful role of France in the world, and also were you there during the May of 1968, too?

FUNKHOUSER: I was, yes, during the student riots.

Q: During the riots. So in a way he got his come-uppance. But as a Political Counselor, how did you deal with these really sort of cataclysmic effects in our policy within France and with France itself?

FUNKHOUSER: Well, the worst crisis, of course, was the student uprising. This was May 1968. And my role, for which Dean Rusk sent me a special congratulatory telegram, was basically to organize all of the resources in the Embassy to report on a daily basis, immediate telegrams, what was going on. Jack Perry would go down and talk to the Communist party leaders and go mingle with the crowds. John Dean would cover the Asians, and Oakley others; they were all out and around town. My job was to go to the Quai d'Orsay and get their information. I got the Economic/Commercial Section to report what was happening to the franc and USIA to cover the media.

We didn't really work, unfortunately, with the CIA. They did their own reporting. We gave them all of our stuff, but I rarely saw any of theirs. They had some very fine contacts.

The military we worked with, but not too closely. And Dick Walters had excellent sources. The crisis came to a head when DeGaulle disappeared. Sarge Shriver was Ambassador then. Perhaps unfortunately he was a new boy. I'd been there three years, and it was pretty hard to go from Bohlen, who knew everything about the French to Shriver. But Shriver depended more on the staff, and after all, it was a crisis.

We, I think, reported it, all of the developments as well as we could, extremely fast. That was my role. Unfortunately, the Quai d'Orsay diplomats, when Charles DeGaulle disappeared, weren't very useful. The Military Attaché, Dick Walters, and perhaps to a lesser extent, the Agency, Locke Campbell, who were both very good, had the best information. And to prove that, Sarge Shriver called a rare meeting of all the heads. "Where is DeGaulle?"

Woody Wallner, who took Bob McBride's place, had inside information from Andre Fontaine, the Le Monde correspondent, and some of the best sources in town.

Q: He had been there during the war.

FUNKHOUSER: Yes. He knew everything. He knew with whom everyone was sleeping, male or female. But he and Shriver never got along. Woody was sort of a caricature of a Europeanized Foreign Service Officer... long cigarette holder, and sort of a sophisticated Elim O'Shaughnessy, laid back, perfect French, totally un-American in Shriver's way. Shriver even put a trampoline in the Residence garden and everybody coming to cocktail parties would jump on the trampoline, most unsophisticated. They reacted very badly to each other. Unfortunately, Woody got the wrong advice from his best contacts saying that DeGaulle was going to either quit or be thrown out. And Shriver, in a very important incident in my diplomatic career, called all of the heads of section together and said, "Where is the General? We have to get into print on that. Katzenbach and others, including Ball, are calling for it. Where is he?"

Walters said, "He's in Germany talking to the top Generals, finding out if they will support him if it comes to civil strife." Walters didn't know whether the military would support him, but he assumed that they would. And that was absolutely correct as later history showed. When the General moved secretly, he moved very well.

Locke Campbell's Central Intelligence Agency deputy at the meeting was more ambivalent than Walters, but took the position that the General would stay in office. Woody, my boss, took the position that the General was out. "Whether he will fight or whether he doesn't fight, he's out." I took the position that my Quai d'Orsay contacts and the Political Section's contacts did not know where he had disappeared to.

At the end of the meeting Shriver said to Woody Wallner, "Write it up." And Woody, unbeknownst to anyone, sent in a telegram which unfortunately said exactly what he thought, rather than what Dick Walters and the Agency thought. No one really knew how it would come out. After all, he had quit back in 1946 when he became disgusted with the political scene. His expression for the student revolt was "chier au lit:" "I will take student and popular opposition, but I won't take chier au lit," literally "shit in the bed." It's an old barracks term. I didn't know what it meant, I had to look it up. He could have, in Woody Wallner's view and others, followed precedent and resigned. But he didn't, and came back. And this was a very interesting exercise in foreign policy. But [neither] Shriver nor anyone else in our Embassy saw Woody's telegram. And that caused a great embarrassment in Washington, because Katzenbach immediately had a press conference and said welcome to Charles DeGaulle's successor. It wasn't quite that dramatic, but this was a very interesting exercise in "country team" action.

The DeGaulle incident exposed a curious example of errors in diplomacy made and compounded by both political appointees and career diplomats at home and abroad. Serious Error #1 was for political-appointee Shriver to demand a categorical message to Washington to show the Embassy knew without question what DeGaulle was up to! Error #2 was the equally positive and equally erroneous information provided to the Ambassador by a most experienced career diplomat in the face of conflicting, interagency intelligence. Error #3 was the impulsive decision of political-appointee Under Secretary Katzenbach to announce prematurely and erroneously to the world that the USG welcomed the new head of state Pompidou, and, Error #4, without his career diplomatic staff in State checking the facts directly with all intelligence sources, including the CIA and Pentagon in Washington with their "back-channel" reports. The irony of the incident was that DeGaulle must have been immensely delighted to have fooled and embarrassed the U.S. once again!

Under Bohlen I don't think that could have ever happened. Bohlen would have known or would not have given a categorical answer. He would have talked to the General, and he wouldn't have sent out such a telegram unless he had confidence in it. Shriver, being new, wanted a simple conclusion. He was running for Vice President at the time and was only in Paris on a sabbatical. I'm overstating the problem. Ten years later I had occasion to ask Fontaine where he got the inaccurate information that DeGaulle was resigning. His answer, "Pompidou himself!" Whether the Prime Minister wished to prime the pump for his succession of DeGaulle or whether he too had been duped by the General hopefully will be resolved by historians.

HAROLD KAPLAN
Information Officer, USIS
Paris (1945-1950)

Information Officer, USIS
Paris (1952-1957)

Harold Kaplan was born in 1918 and raised in New Jersey. His career included positions in France, Germany, Vietnam, and Brussels (NATO). He was interviewed by G. Lewis Schmidt in 1990.

KAPLAN: I found myself part of a little team that was being readied to accompany the landing in North Africa, which was our first big military action, as you recall. On that team was the man I mentioned, Bill Tyler, and Mike Bessey. There were a number of very seasoned old journalists who had worked a great deal in Europe, like Joe Ravoto.

Q: Oh, yes. I remember him.

KAPLAN: He was head of the UPI, I believe, for quite a while. And there was Gene Speck. There was a fellow named Clark. It was quite a good group. Above all, for me, because he sort of took me under his wing, there was an old Parisian journalist who had arrived well before World War I and had been the correspondent of the old New York World for years and years. [Laughter] His name was Bill Byrd. He lived through the '20s in Paris and knew all that period of the "lost generation," knew [Ernest] Hemingway and all those people and so forth, and was for me, of course, an object of great veneration. I thought he was the old man of the mountain, and he was very nice to me and helped me a great deal.

I was the youngest and stupidest, I should think, of that crowd, because they were all very knowledgeable about Europe, but I did have a gift for the language, which was appreciated. The odd thing is, there were members of that group who had worked in Europe for years and hardly could speak a word of French, you see. [Laughter]

Q: Not uncommon for Americans.

KAPLAN: Not uncommon for Americans. I remember there was a fellow named Jules France – I forget which outfit he was – also a newspaper type, whose French was extremely rudimentary, and so was Gene Speck's. So they had me.

We were on this huge convoy going to North Africa. We didn't know where we were going at first. There were 120 ships in that convoy holed up on this thing, sailing off to the war. We would have daily language seminars. That was the one place where I could sponsor. They got the young professor. Because Bill Byrd, who, God knows, knew the French language perfectly – his hobby was sort of language and grammar, and he was a walking dictionary. Nobody knew the language better than he, but he still spoke with an accent, an extraordinary American accent, you see, whereas my professors back in Chicago had worked very hard to smooth out mine, so I was able to help in that way.

Anyway, we landed in North Africa, and in the fullness of time, landed near Oran and spread out. I was sent to Algiers; most of us were. Algiers was where we set up the headquarters. I had a period working in the OWI of real practical work in the midst of war.

We had destroyed our own transmitter accidentally, because we put it at the bottom of a cruiser. Off the coast of Oran, there was a little sporadic bit of fighting at the beginning, and I think it fired one salvo and destroyed the whole transmitter. [Laughter] So we needed to use the French facilities, which were capable of reaching France and beyond, well into Europe, and since I was quite fluent in the language very quickly – even though it was rather, as I say, classical French I had begun with, I picked it up very quickly – and they made me a liaison officer with the outfit they called Radio France, which had the transmitter that we needed to do our broadcasting. We set up the first Voice of America broadcast from Allied Force Headquarters in Algiers.

Q: Did you run into any difficulty with the French? Because, of course, the Vichy French were in North Africa at that time. Did you have any trouble getting the transmitters?

KAPLAN: Yes, we had a lot of trouble. We had great, daily troubles, even once they had officially come over to our side, even before [Charles] De Gaulle arrived. De Gaulle was always very sticky to deal with, but even before he arrived. He didn't arrive until August, and I'm talking about the period – we landed in November, you recall – and there's the period before August of the next year in which we were dealing with the Vichy French essentially, but who had come over to our side. Our arrival had triggered the end of the Free Zone in France, the occupation of the entire country, which was now our target in our broadcasts, so that the Vichy officers, those who had family and all the rest back there, most of them swung over very suddenly to our side. But they remained very independent and frequently politically very opposed to a lot of our points of view, so we had a constant problem. So we had a constant problem with them.

When the problems got the least bit sticky, they had to go well above my head. I was a very junior officer. I was in my twenties, just out of school. So when we got into trouble, it was people like Bill Tyler and C.D. Jackson and our British counter- parts, because we formed a thing that was called the Psychological Warfare Branch, of which the OWI was the American component, the OWI and a few other American elements, and the British supplied another component.

The head of the British effort was a man named Richard Crossman, a very brilliant, sarcastic, funny, interesting man who later became a backbencher in the Labor government and then finally very much a front-bencher and even a member of the Cabinet. You must remember Dick Crossman.

Q: I remember the name, yes.

KAPLAN: He and C.D. Jackson were the two civilian heads, and we had military heads, as well, because we were integrated into the Allied Force Headquarters at the Hotel St. George under Eisenhower at the very beginning.

Q: To the States?

KAPLAN: To the States, just at the time when they moved into Sicily, so I missed that. We had the most extraordinary improvised sort of war effort. The American way of making war was always very plethoric. We just piled everything into big warehouses and then when we had to move, we moved, and everything was left there.

So I came back, the very junior officer that I was, and found that all the important people had left and I was in charge. I had this extraordinary period of being in charge of a vast operation, the inventory of which was not in my hands. I didn't even know! There was a senatorial investigation group that came on the scene after the departure of all my colleagues, who sat me down. They had set up a consulate there, a civilian consulate. They sat me down for a full day and put me through the worst day of my life, I think, saying, "Well, Mr. Kaplan, will you tell us about your warehouse at Blida?" I'd never heard of it. "Well, it's in this warehouse." They said, "You mean you are in charge here, and you don't even know how many transmitters you have?" They kept, in short, asking questions which, on the record, must show me to be the worst idiot that has ever served the American Government, because I had no answers to all their questions. [Laughter] And somewhere that's preserved. God knows I hope it's turned to dust by now.

Q: I'm surprised it didn't become congressional report. Maybe it did.

KAPLAN: Oh, it did! It did. A senator from Maryland, the father of another senator.

Q: I know who you mean. Tydings, I think.

KAPLAN: Yes, the senior Tydings. He was the head of that, and he gave his name to the group. And they just made mincemeat, not only of us. They didn't blame the OWI more than the whole establishment which had left the North African countryside from Casablanca to Tunis – that is to say, an area as great as from Paris to Moscow – strewn with warehouses, inventories, material, so forth and so on, and hardly turned its back to look and see what was there. I've never forgotten that experience. It was a real shocker for me because I felt terrible about it. The highest ranking naval type was a young Captain Morris – I remember his name – from New York, very top drawer, I think of the family of Governor Morris, who went through something of the same thing. He was the highest ranking, and we had all these port installations and all the rest. Really, he didn't have the answers either, and everybody felt very bad about this. [Laughter] So I was kept on quite long.

Q: You were still broadcasting to France?

KAPLAN: Yes. We still had a broadcasting thing going, but it was tapering off a great deal and we were turning things over more and more to the French, De Gaulle, by that time having come and taken over. They had a provisional government established there.

Q: You were personally voicing some of these broadcasts?

KAPLAN: Yes. I actually wrote them, spoke them, got up at four o'clock in the morning sometimes to put them on the air. I sometimes wondered, because although my French by that time was quite good, I sometimes wondered what horrors I perpetrated against the French language. [Laughter] Because there was, by that time, very little way of controlling, you know. But anyway, it was an interesting experience and a very good learning experience for me. I learned a great deal and got very fascinated by the whole thing.

Then in the fullness of time, I was sent to Paris, intending, as a matter of fact, to join what was no longer the Psychological Warfare Branch, but the Psychological Warfare Division, I think it was.

Q: In other words, you remained in North Africa then until after the Normandy invasion?

KAPLAN: Yes. I didn't get sent to Paris until the winter of '45, the invasion having taken place in '44 and Paris falling in August. Of course, I was dying to go up there and chafing at the bit and bombarding everybody with requests, and being stiff-armed by everybody. They decided to create a permanent structure in North Africa, and they sent a Colonel Sedley Peck and various other people to organize that, but they needed somebody to make the transition, so they said, "Just wait a little while, and you'll join your old colleagues in a little while." The "little while" got longer and longer and longer.

This was all fulsomely documented in my complaining letters to my wife, which went up in flames for the most part in that little accident I told you about that happened in 1972 in Creteil. [Incident was described off the record, and never got on tape.] No, I guess I haven't told you about it on tape, anyway.

Q: It isn't on tape. We'll get to it later.

KAPLAN: Anyway, I lost all those papers. But as I say, I bombarded Washington and anybody who would listen to me, and my poor wife, of course, had to listen to me, with complaints about being held over there when all the action was in Italy and General Patch was beginning to move up from the south.

I had a lot of French colleagues, because this one function I had for years with Radio France remained all through my work there, doing the broadcasting and so forth, but I was left, also, to do the diplomatic liaison with them. Bill Tyler and Mike Bessey and C.D. Jackson, of course, and all the top people had gone off to London or somewhere else, you see, and I was left to do that, too. So I got to be very friendly with a lot of the French.

When we invaded in the south and they moved the Seventh Army up the Rhône, a lot of my French types that I was liaising with, went. That was a final humiliation, you see.

Q: They all went off to Italy.

KAPLAN: They had been back and forth to Italy, but then they went up, and they would still use Algiers as a base for some of them. I remember one very good friend named Pistor, who worked for the France Combatante, it was called, the Fighting French, but he was a correspondent, basically. He was one of the unfortunate very few casualties that they took. When they landed on the beach near Marseille, some sniper got him. He was standing in a jeep and he got killed.

There was practically no German rear-guard action there when we landed in the south. They moved back with very little. There were a few places on the way up where they had some very sharp little engagements, but fundamentally the Germans were under orders to make an orderly retreat. They were probably the best army in the entire world. In that whole war, I don't think there was anything like the German Army, and they did their retreat very well.

The movement up the Rhône, once it started, just about took the last of my French, vis-à-vis, and then I really felt bad about being left. At last, they sent me up to Paris. That was very early, I think somewhere about March 1, in Paris, landing in Marseille. Marseille was another disaster, I must say, from the point of view of my papers. I seem to have some sort of fate that has pursued me and will ensure that the world will not be burdened by memoirs of this period, because I had a footlocker full of papers which was lost in Marseille. I also had a draft – this is significant – of a Ph.D. thesis that I had brought from Paris in the early days and I'd done nothing with, but nevertheless was sort of laid out and agreed with Professor Vigneron, who was going to be my thesis person. Because the assumption was always that the war would be over, and I'd go back to Chicago. I think in some unconscious way I got the idea that God was telling me something when He did away with the draft of my Ph.D. thesis, because I never went back to Chicago, as you know.

I got to Paris, and then did not move forward into Germany for another reason, because I got scarlet fever, and they kept me there for a month in isolation, along with a lot of other guys. There was a little mini-epidemic. I can't remember whether at that point it was scarlet fever or hepatitis. One or the other, because I remember having them both at the American Hospital at different times. But I think this first one was scarlet fever.

Meanwhile, some of my old colleagues, including Bill Tyler, who was our greatest French expert, and Mike Bessey, who was also very, very learned and had much pre-war experience in France and so forth, were organizing, with Cass Canfield, the publisher of Harper's, and a few other distinguished gents, what would later turn out to be the USIS France. The term "USIA" did not yet exist.

Q: No, it didn't. USIS existed long before USIA existed.

KAPLAN: Exactly. We called it the USIS then, although the home office was still the OWI until about '47, wasn't it?

Q: Yes, about that time. Then things died for about a year, and then they came back with the Smith-Mundt Act.

KAPLAN: That's right. So they were organizing USIS in the embassy. The embassy was being put together in a way that was probably unique in the sense that in the years to come, you would never do the kind of recruitment that occurred then. The embassy people were desperate for help. So a young American who was being shipped back to the States and decided he would like to stay in Europe for a while, or almost anybody who was literate and had the proper background, had a chance to get at least a temporary job at the embassy. I'm not talking really about the proper diplomatic work and the people in the Foreign Service, but all the ancillary services that we were putting together, such as our cultural and information services. They just couldn't get people over from the States fast enough, so people were hired right there on the spot.

Q: Probably didn't have enough of them with French, either.

KAPLAN: That's right. This was later, of course, maybe a year or two later, I worked in the press office when the war had come to an end. I was helping out there and doing all sorts of odd jobs there, and a young Marine, who had been demobilized, came over and came to see me. His name was Art Buchwald, and he said, "How about a job?" [Laughter] Art Buchwald was out of the Marines, adventurous, and wanted to stay in Europe for a while.

It just happened that at that particular point, when Congress did away with the OWI there was a short period where they just threw everything out. This coincided more or less with that period, if I recall correctly. I'm probably mixing the dates up. But in any event, I asked around. There was nothing for Art there. He seemed to be very amusing and prepossessing, a good guy, you know, and I said, "Well, God, here's a man we could surely use." I said, "Why don't you go over and see Jeff Parsons?" who was running a resuscitated New York Herald Tribune.

Q: Was that the same Jeff Parsons who stayed on in the diplomatic service, or is this a different Jeff Parsons? I had a Jeff Parsons who was my DCM in Japan in about '53 to '56. I'm not sure it's the same Jeff Parsons.

KAPLAN: No, I don't think it could be. It might have been. About what age would he have been?

Q: He would have been in his late forties or early fifties at that time.

KAPLAN: Well, my Jeff Parsons would have been a little younger then, and he was a side of the Parsons family that had owned the Herald Tribune.

Q: I don't think it's the same one.

KAPLAN: After he left, he was the man who set the Herald Tribune going again and ran it for a good many years. Then he joined a big aircraft company.

Q: Northrop?

KAPLAN: Northrop it was. But he was in charge of the Herald Tribune when I sent Art Buchwald over there, and he was in the same situation the embassy was in. They needed anybody who could push a pencil, you know, and spell a word correctly. He said, "You're going to cover the restaurants," because Art was a pudgy fellow and looked like a man who liked food, and he did a marvelous job.

Q: He started his column over there, as a matter of fact, during that time.

KAPLAN: That's right. He started his column covering restaurants. You know, there were other examples of people who were temporarily taken on and put in the Foreign Service Reserve, but very shortly, Washington clamped down on that and said, "No. We're in the process of working out an orderly system."

Everybody was beginning to realize, or had already realized, in Washington, that the Foreign Service establishment could not even remotely resemble the pre-war affair, that we now had taken over responsibility for the reconstruction of all of Europe, we had Japan on our hands, we had the whole world on our hands, and nothing from the former great powers but ruins and needs and very few resources. So it was dawning on people at home that we would have to have services that we had never had before, and one of the them was our kind of thing.

It took a while, some backing and filling. I remember when they abolished the OWI and replaced it with nothing at first, leaving the embassy high and dry, and gutting USIS. My wife said, "Well, now it's time to do what you intended doing all your life. Go back and become a professor of literature at the University of Chicago."

Q: Before you discuss that, you said you didn't want to bore me with the UNESCO experience, but that it was a very frustrating one. I can understand it, because I had some exposure to UNESCO a number of years later. In what sense was it frustrating? What were you trying to do for UNESCO, and in UNESCO, that you felt you were being frustrated in attempting to accomplish?

KAPLAN: The Cold War crept into UNESCO very early on. It was impossible, really, to project a program for the organization without every single national representative of one of the member states having a say about it. Consequently, any kind of movement in UNESCO, it was impossible to say anything without having eighteen censors on your back. That was one thing.

Another thing was that the program itself was already being tilted in a way that I found absolutely indigestible towards some of the – we were still an organization of basically Western orientation during the period I'm talking about. The real influx of the former colonial countries and, consequently, the Third World and "non-aligned" element that came in, and by supporting the Soviet communist thrust in there, made the place politically unbreathable, hadn't quite happened yet. So my frustration was not comparable to what happened in the '50s.

Q: When it became quite a leftist organization.

KAPLAN: When it really became leftist. It was, rather, just being stuck and unable to say anything or do anything without everybody looking over your shoulder. I found that the substantive achievements of the organization, which I was intended to tell the world about, were also stymied in that way.

The frustration of having thirty-six bosses, of having to cope, if you wish, with the diplomatic sensibilities of everybody every time you said anything about what UNESCO did or wanted to do, was perhaps secondary to the general feeling that the organization itself was going deeper and deeper into a mire of bureaucracy and inaction because the various bureaucracies of the member states absorbed the overwhelming majority of the organization's funds in endless palaver and meetings and discussions and so forth.

We were constantly talking about increasing the availability of mass communications. We were constantly talking about doing something to increase literacy and so forth. We had a worldwide literacy campaign. We were talking about programs of scientific exchange and so forth. But the real work was always done outside of UNESCO, and it was very hard to identify any areas where significant and useful exchanges in the fields of education or science or culture were taking place because UNESCO existed.

These were all channels that were knitting together from before the war, in any event, where people had an intrinsic interest in exchanging materials and working together and so forth, and it was very difficult to see how the organization, even when it satisfied all the diplomatic problems and were sure not to raise the hackles of anybody on the east or west side, even when it was being very careful and feathered back from that point of view, managed to do anything really substantive.

Later on, I can't say. Now, I'm rather exaggerating the picture in a sense that special funds within the UNESCO purview, if not actually part of the UNESCO budget, were finally raised in order to do substantive things, so that some, at least, pump-priming money was provided to save the great temples of Dendur, for example, in Egypt, or to do one or another of the great things that we wanted to do. But in almost every case, the best we could point to and say, "Well, we held a meeting which got people started" – you must remember that our budget in the first years was really a very tiny budget. As I recall, the first budget of UNESCO was something on the order of $7 million. We were talking about things that really cost immensely more money than that, even if you think of dollars in the terms of the 1945, '46, '47 range, which, of course, you'd have to multiply that by at least ten to get to what that dollar represented. But even so, the funds were manifestly insufficient to do much in a substantive way. This was frustrating, too.

My last big job in UNESCO was going to Beirut, spending several months there to organize an annual conference, which was, I believe, the third. After the one in Paris, they went to Mexico City. The practice at UNESCO was to hold one general conference out of two at the headquarters in Paris, and the other one would be held in one of the member states. There was an interest in holding them in member states that were not European, so we went to Mexico City and then we went to Beirut.

I had a great deal to do with the organization of the one in Beirut, and that was interesting simply from a logistical point of view. I'm not an administrative type and I'm not very good at these sort of things, but I had to learn a lot about it, and I discovered that there was a great deal of substance in administrative work, if you wish.

Q: There is.

KAPLAN: Yes. So it was interesting. That was an interesting job, and I came back with a sort of glow about that and I thought, "Well, at least I've done something useful in UNESCO."

It was at that point that embassy people came after me and said, "Look, that's all very well, your UNESCO thing, but we need" – they were setting up a huge organization branch, which I didn't realize. Governor [Averell] Harriman came over to oversee this from a European-wide basis. But on the French side, they put somebody in charge. I think the first one was General Parkman, wasn't he? Or was that Barry Bingman? I can't remember.

Q: I don't remember, because I was in the Far East and not in the European picture at all.

KAPLAN: Whoever did the first French mission had a person in charge of their public information, which was a very important part of the Marshall Plan, for obvious reasons, because we were doing an enormous effort in Europe, against what was the beginning of a great deal of Cold War propaganda. The Russians were throwing out all the stops, and we were being vilified and denounced everywhere.

It seems, in retrospect, it's going to be very difficult to explain to our children that we had a problem when we were in the process of giving the Europeans the wherewithal to start their economies up, and we were making these enormous sacrifices and having this extremely forward-looking economic policy, and yet we had to argue with the Europeans and explain it.

Q: To persuade them to take it.

KAPLAN: You know, it seems, on the face of it, a very difficult thing to understand. But if you put yourself back in that era, if you look at 1952, for example, about the time I'm talking, all of Paris, the walls were covered with these great whitewash slogans, "Ridgeway, la peste!" La peste was the bubonic plague. The Korean War had come and the Berlin blockade had happened, and there was a terrible shudder of apprehension throughout all Europe. The communists had broken with their erstwhile partners that had come back to restore the [French] Republic after the liberation and were engaged in an all-out war against the Republic, and we were in it up to our ears.

So, hastily, the United States Government reacted to all this by undoing what they had done in the suppression of the OWI, building a new organization, trying to put things together again. My entry back into all that was through the Marshall Plan, because General Parkman (I think it was Parkman), our first director, and Barry Bingman fought hard upon him, hired as the chief information person in the French mission Helen Kirkpatrick, who had been one of the younger correspondents, with Bill Stoneman as the boss, of the – which 162enefited162 paper? I’ve forgotten now. Stoneman’s paper was the Chicago –

Q: The Chicago Tribune?

KAPLAN: No.

Q: The Chicago Daily News?

KAPLAN: For goodness sake, to think I’ve forgotten which paper he represented! Anyway, Stoneman had on his staff this young, tall, intelligent, energetic woman named Helen Kirkpatrick, and she left the paper in order to join the government then as the information officer of the first head of the French mission, and she built a staff. She’s the one who came to me and said, “You’ve got to come back to the government.”

So I went back and entered as an FSR, and I can’t recall whether I was then relayed straight back to the OWI or stayed with the –

Q: It would have been by that time, probably, a State Department FSR. What later became USIA was still in the State Department at that time.

KAPLAN: Yes. I’ve sort of forgotten that side of things. In any event, my work was there on the ground. In France all through those years, they maintained something called the USIS, whatever there was at home, and I did not, of course, as a member of the Marshall Plan, belong to the USIS, but I was, of course, working very closely with them.

Q: Was either Bill Cody or Lee Brady in Paris at that time, do you recall? They were over there very early in USIS.

KAPLAN: Yes. I’m just trying to remember which came when and so forth. Cody is the one who took me back into the embassy, so that must have been around ‘53 or ‘54 – ‘53, maybe ‘52.

Q: It might have been even a little earlier than that.

KAPLAN: Maybe you’re right. Yes, it would have been earlier.

Q: He went back over to France, I think in late ‘51 or early ‘52, right around Christmas time. Of course, he might have been there a year before he took you back in.

KAPLAN: Yes. Had Brady been there a brief time before him?

Q: Brady, I think, had had some experience in France before.

KAPLAN: Yes, he had some experience. It seems to me he was working under Tyler for a while as the cultural officer, then left. Then he had a very brief period, I think, in charge.

Q: Yes, I think he did.

KAPLAN: Then Cody replaced him. I joined the USIS, properly speaking, left the Marshall Plan thing, with Cody.

Q: Let's go back to your Marshall Plan experience. What was your position in the Marshall Plan program? How long were you in it, and what were you trying to get across? I think you've given us some advance information, an idea about that before.

KAPLAN: I was Helen Kirkpatrick's general deputy in the Marshall Plan, and we had an organization that helped the substantive people, mainly economists, in their work with the interministerial commission that the French set up in order to whack up the sums of money that were allotted to France by the overall European setup.

The structure, you will recall, generally involved a European setup, which was the OECD, that whacked out the large sums for France, Britain, Germany, Italy, and so forth. Then within each country, there was a country plan worked out by the inter-ministerial committee. There was a great deal of haggling about that, about how to do it. Our young economists had studied the French economy and had their idea of what was needed, the priorities and so forth and so on, but generally they worked in relative harmony about allocating the French needs to fill the so-called dollar gap, which were clear enough and there was not a great deal of argument about that.

There came to be a good deal more argument about the so-called counterpart funds, because the system involved giving the French the dollars to import what they needed to prime the pump of their industry and get things started. Those dollars were then transformed by selling them to private industry – you know, raw materials, machines, whatever – they were paid for in francs. The francs were put in escrow, and that was called the counterpart fund.

Q: The U.S. controlled the counterpart, more or less.

KAPLAN: The U.S. controlled it with the help of the interministerial committee. In fact, you could say we had a veto power on the use of the counterpart. I think it's probably a bit too much to say we just controlled them, because the French had a commissariat, which sat over on the Rue Martigny, under Monnet in those first years, which was called the Commissariat Du Plan, and which really had the initiative in deciding where those counterpart funds were going to go. Our people would horn in and look over their plan and say, "No, you shouldn't do this, you ought not do this." I was on the information side and not deeply involved in all this, except they used everybody for everything in that we were a small group and we all sat in a country team. It was interesting to me because I wasn't just being an information and press guy; I was involved in some of the substantive discussions. The impression I've come away with is that it was a cooperative effort, where the French were the instigators and initiators and we were the control group.

Now, in those counterpart funds, of course, there was a percentage put aside for information work, which gave us a very generous budget, you might say. My feeling now, in retrospect, is that we had more money than we needed, that we did a lot of things we wouldn't have done otherwise that were extremely expensive, simply because we had so much money.

Q: Did you have any contact with Al Hemsing and Larry Hall and maybe Mickey Boerner and Ned Nordness at that time?

KAPLAN: Well, we did from time to time, but they were in other countries and I was on the French mission.

Q: Yes. I think they were on the European level and you were in the French mission.

KAPLAN: I was in the French mission. On the European level, they would come and look over our shoulders from time to time. I would attend meetings. I once went to Germany for one, I remember, where we'd compare notes. But the European level worked quite separately. They were the source for us. In addition to the funds we got out of our counterpart fund, they were the source of a great deal. That's another reason why I thought we had more money than we needed, frankly.

There was an extremely dynamic exhibits program, for example. Herndon was a very brilliant fellow in this field, and he created these very razzle-dazzle big exhibits that he paraded all over Europe.

Meanwhile, Mickey Boerner was with the High Commission, along with Shep Stone and people like that in Germany. Hemsing, I think, worked out of the European office. We knew all these people, but we were sort of maniacally intent on the French, who were a terrific psychological challenge, you might say, and they absorbed all my waking moments. I used to talk to myself and I'd be arguing with the French all the time, because they were so ornery. They were so difficult.

Q: So what's new? [Laughter]

KAPLAN: That's right. [Laughter] After all, we were in a country that was giving 25 percent of the popular vote in every election to the communists. And along with the communists, there were all these fellow travelers and so forth, so we sometimes felt there was nobody on our side. Because on the right, you had the Gaullists, who were often anti- American. So the French were a very absorbing problem, and I spent a lot of time thinking and worrying about them.

When I say that the Marshall Plan gave us more funds than we needed, I think of some of the programs that we did, probably we would never have undertaken if there weren't any counterpart funds and Congress never would have funded. I, for example, edited for a couple of years a magazine that was distributed almost up to a million copies free.

Q: Do you think it was generally used and read?

KAPLAN: It was loved! The French just loved it. It was an illustrated magazine. It was the first contact that the French had with something like what we call photojournalism. After that, they had their commercial things. They began to create them along. As a matter of fact, when we put Rapport, it was called, to bed, a lot of people came around and wanted to buy it. They thought it was tremendously valuable, and I had mountains of mail every day to prove to me that it was read. But it was a very expensive thing to produce, and we gave it to people. All they had to pay was the postage stamp. We insisted that they write to us and ask for it, but that's all.

Periodically we would have these discussions with the administrative people about some way of charging for this magazine, and for one reason or another, the idea was always turned down. So we spent an incredible amount of money on this thing, because it was in four colors and lavishly illustrated. It was a photo magazine, essentially, and it cost a lot of money.

Q: Were you using just general themes in it, or were you actually, in subtle or unsubtle terms, trying to counter some of the communist type of left-wingism that was getting into France at that time?

KAPLAN: Yes. I couldn't state it better than you just have what we were doing on the magazine. We were doing general themes, but general themes meant things of hope and optimism for the rebirth of French industry, telling the French that they could come back, because we had analyzed the situation there and decided that a great deal of the communist appeal was an appeal to despair.

People said, "This system won't work anymore. We can't really ever build a modern industry. We can't ever do it this way. It has to be done in some other way." They had this bizarre idea that it could be done by government planning and socialism, in short. We know how bizarre it is now, but in those days, it didn't seem so bizarre to a lot of people. There's an old tradition in France of socialist thinking.

Then we had the direct business of dealing with the communists. Lies that were being told, that we dealt with very gently in the magazine. As I say, the two themes that you've just defined were basically what we were trying to do in the magazine.

Q: Would you say that this was your chief vehicle of getting those ideas across, or did you have a widespread press utilization and also cultural activities that promoted the same themes?

KAPLAN: In the Marshall Plan mission, this was our biggest single project, but we also had a fairly extensive exhibits program.

Q: You just mentioned that a while ago.

KAPLAN: Largely exhibits created by Herndon. He was very good at this. He was very lavish. He, too, was dealing with counterpart funds from all over Europe, and so he would make these really knock-out exhibits that we would take from Lyon to Marseille, to Nice and so forth, and would require big hauls. The effect of them was something I had some reservations about, but they certainly attracted crowds. We got a lot of visitation. We had a lecture program. We had a normal press program, in the sense of press releases. Our principals were encouraged and helped to give press conferences or interviews, because newsmen would come over. That was, of course, of great use, particularly at home. But the newsmen would come over and say, "How are we doing over here? How's the French economy doing?" and so forth and so on. We helped in that respect, too.

We also tried to get into the French press. We did all the things that you, as a professional, can imagine. For example, the counterpart funds' investment program would open a new hydroelectric station down near Foix and, say, in the mountain region near the Spanish border. So that was done with hundreds of millions of francs that came out of our fund. It was Marshall Plan funds. Counterpart funds were always ticketed as Marshall Plan funds. We made a great point of that, putting the American stamp on all the stuff that went out. So when the hydroelectric station, which would provide a whole area with electricity which the French desperately needed down there, was opened up, we would parade our chief of mission down there. We'd do the things that public relations organizations always do. Helen Kirkpatrick or I would make a speech, and the local prefect would make a speech, and everybody would say nice things about the Marshall Plan. You do the things that obviously you do when you're trying.

You've got a big substantive program which is rebuilding the country. It is relatively easy to say, "Look, fellows, this is what we are doing, and we're not asking you to get down on your knees and thank the great American people, but we want you to know that we're doing these things."

Q: You have gone into this to some extent before, but the reason I'm going to ask the question is that, of course, as we went on in the years after the Marshall Plan and later through the Cold War era, we were often accused of being far too anticommunist to the point of being almost paranoid about it.

Although you've already said some things about the extent to which you faced an extremely serious problem in France at this time, I think perhaps more almost than you did in any European country that did not actually go under the communist domination. Did you think that you were getting across your message fairly well, and did you get a lot of counter propaganda from the Soviet side, the communist side, trying to combat what you were doing?

KAPLAN: Well, you know, France had a communist party that emerged from the war as the biggest single party in the country. In the election statistics, I think at the high water mark, they pushed close to 27 percent. That was in one election. But generally, you could find them in a range between 20 percent and 25 percent for the first post-war years.

That in itself is very considerable when you think that behind that vote, there is a corps of activists who have created an entire communist infrastructure. They've got sports clubs and they've got theater groups and they've got insurance to bury the elderly, the old people, with. There was a whole communist culture in France. It was deeply engraved, and the communists did an enormous job at organizing that.

When you think, after all, they've been through the war forced to act clandestinely, they'd been smashed several times as an apparatus and so forth and so on, and, that before the war, the biggest single party on the left was not the communists, but the socialists, to emerge from the war that way and build this kind of organization required an incredible effort on the communists'

It also required – this is something I cannot prove to this day; I don't know if anybody can; I'm sure somebody in the CIA could – an enormous amount of money, which they got from the East. [From the USSR] I'm sure they got it. I know they got it. I could see the effects of it and so forth, but it was very difficult to persuade, even the French who were on our side, that the Soviet Union was actually the source.

They said, "Well, Moscow gold." That's nonsense. You don't need that in any way to explain, because you've got such a large following of the communists here, anyway. But I am absolutely sure that the Russians poured millions and millions of dollars.

Q: I'm sure they did.

KAPLAN: I had good friends on the extreme right, you might say, who were considered on the extreme right, like Barry Souverin, ex-Russian, author of the first big biography of Stalin, who had been a member of the first communist international. I knew people of that kind who really could cite it chapter and verse. They said, "I know that So-and-so is Moscow's current treasury man." And, of course, in our embassy, we had very knowledgeable people who followed this very closely. I remember there was a fellow named Chapman. I think he was a Foreign Service officer, but I think he worked with the CIA.

So we knew that we had an opposition that was extremely well implanted in the country, practically without limit to its financial resources, because the Russians considered the French thing very important, had every conceivable sort of advantage over us because they had all these French agents, you see. So this was a tremendous battle for us, and we thought about it night and day and how best to counter it. We countered it, you know, in terms of substance, of argument and so forth. We wanted to counter it organizationally, too. It's on the second score that I think we didn't do so well.

We would establish libraries, but they had to be libraries of our type. We were not propagandists of the communist nature. In short, "to thine own self be true" was also something that applied to us. You couldn't set up widely propagandistic things that were somehow not representative of the sort of people we were.

Q: You were inhibited by the truth.

KAPLAN: That's right. So we had these reading rooms and we had these rather genteel things. We had lectures and we'd bring over cultural people. It was a way of keeping above water the heads of all the French who were not poisoned by the other side. That was the best we could do, you might say, in that respect.

There were also people doing sharp political work, but they had to do that clandestinely. So the CIA, I'm sure, had programs of one kind. Of course, at a certain moment, the CIA had, I think, the idea of genius for France, anyway, an idea of genius which was the Cultural Freedom Congress. But, obviously, we in the official services stayed very far away from all that, because the CIA was doing this clandestinely for a while.

I think those things were extraordinarily effective in France. It's very hard to measure, but simply the provision of rallying grounds to which people who were resistant to the communist thing were immensely important.

Q: Had to have some material base on which to argue their point.

KAPLAN: Exactly. Somewhere to go, somewhere to print their prose, some publishing houses that were not infested by communists and so forth. Just to provide that was very, very important. So you might say the Cold War thing, through the middle '50s, well into the '60s, was really the essence of our work there.

Meanwhile, a lot of people were doing cultural programs of a much more genteel nature and so forth. I think that that was extremely important. But it's the long-term stuff that, as I say, keeps people's heads above water, gives them the feeling that the country is going to survive, and that reason is going to prevail, but does not address the immediate problem. The immediate problem our noses were rubbed in it frequently by these damn congressional people who would come over, look at the statistics, and say, "Well, if we keep you here a few years more, maybe the communists will get to 30 percent, 35 percent." You know, they'd be constantly needling us, as if the work we were doing were to be judged by the immediate electoral statistics. I remember Senator Allen Ellender from Louisiana, and there were others, who would come over and rub our noses in all this and say, "Well, you guys are . . ." and so forth and so on. Sometimes someone would say, "Senator, I'd like you to get a notion of what it would be if we weren't here." But in the end, those people did support us year in and year out. They did continue to vote our funds, so you have to say that even though they were frequently nasty to us when they came to see us, in the end they supported us.

Q: Well, Ellender did his best not to support us, but he had enough counterparts in the Senate committees so that he didn't get away with it.

KAPLAN: I didn't realize that.

Q: He was bitterly against us. I want to go off the record here and tell you more about my experience with him. He just fought USIA tooth and nail. In every hearing, he took it upon himself to say, "You know, I don't believe in your program. I think it's just a bunch of poppycock and you don't accomplish a thing. Don't try to tell me that you're doing any kind of work over there that has any effect on the European population. They have their media. They're doing everything that's necessary. You guys aren't responsible for anything."

KAPLAN: Oh, really? It was as bad as that? I always thought he just said those things to us.

Q: He said it for the record in press conferences and everywhere else. He was a bitter man.

KAPLAN: Well, anyway, we worked our way in God's vineyard, and I think did a lot of extremely useful work. It's very difficult to measure now, but if we had not been there, I feel that there are elements in the French cultural, political, sociological situation that might have fought their way through, anyway, somehow survived, but would have been, it seems to me, much weaker and much slower to make their points. I think of single individuals who have emerged as the most influential in the French intellectual situation after the [Jean-Paul] Sartrean period, after the period of fellow traveling, of people of that kind – Raymond Aron.

Now, Raymond was a genius and a great man. I've got a shelf full of his books. He would have done his work anyway, but we did a great deal to facilitate his work and made it easier for him and for the second layer of people around him who attended his seminars and then wanted to go off to the United States to follow a particular point at Harvard or at this or that other university. If our cultural people hadn't made that possible for them, everything would have been more difficult and much more slow to take its course.

And I feel that we carried the torch until we got the great reinforcement from the East when the Russian dissidents began getting out and confirming what we had been saying, that their confirmation of information was the thing that finally really turned the French around so that the French became as anti-communist, or more, so, than we are.

Q: And their Communist Party virtually died.

KAPLAN: Virtually died, yes. It was the [Aleksandr] Solzhenitsyns and the Plyusches and the people of that kind who came out. But we laid the basis for their confirmation in the early years by supporting such things as David Rousset's commission against the concentration camp. Now, I think the CIA did most of that. They provided funds. The trial that was held with Kravchenko [phonetic], I think there were a certain number of stepping stones over the years. If you were in France all those years, you realize that there were great moments when French awareness of what we were really dealing with in the East was ratcheted up a bit. And I think of those moments in terms of the trial that Rousset had to sustain against Les Lettres Francaises, the Kravchenko trial.

Then the arrival in France of the first of the dissidents who were vilified and so forth, but in each case we would try to help these people and give them platforms. Now, in the case of Kravchenko and David Rousset's effort on the concentration camps – you may have forgotten that, but that was a very big show trial in France. Rousset was an author of books about his experience in the German concentration camps. He was very famous in France, a friend and neighbor of mine. He was an ex-communist. He began saying, "The same experience we've been through still exists in the Soviet Union. There are concentration camps there, and this is intolerable." He had created a tremendous effect with his study of the concentration camps in Germany, and he created an international commission which was headquartered in Brussels, I believe, with a great many, very distinguished French people. It was called the International Commission Against the Concentration Camp.

At a given point, he published a statement of a woman who had come out of the extreme north of the Soviet Union. She somehow had been able to work her way out of there. He was denounced as a liar and a thief and a crook by a communist literary journal called Les Lettres Francaises. This led to a big public trial. Now, that trial was the page- one headline in France for weeks and weeks and weeks. It was a tremendous thing. And Rousset was able to parade a succession of absolutely authentic witnesses that nobody could possibly deny, to show the existence of what years later Solzhenitsyn called the gulag. But that time, they didn't use that term and they didn't know what it was, and even for an ordinary French communist voter who had these extraordinary illusions about Russia, who thought it was the land of milk and honey, for him it was an unbelievable idea that you could have something like Dachau and Buchenwald and Auschwitz in this great land of the workers' and peasants' paradise. And Rousset was able to prove that over and over again in the most gruesome testimony you got from these people.

Well, I mentioned the CIA, who financed the Congress for Cultural Freedom, published a magazine, did all these wonderful things that I think were very useful. I also believe the CIA must have helped. I don't know how it happened.

Q: They probably did.

KAPLAN: Because this commission, his international commission, had enormous expenses. They had to find these people and bring them to France. The CIA was enormously effective in stuff of this sort, and it's been vilified in our country so much that it's time somebody really stood up and said, "They did a tremendous job in the Cold War in Europe." There's no question about it.

Q: The CIA has gotten a very bad name for its black activities, and, of course, they have bumbled terribly in a number of these cases. I'm very glad, therefore, that you have put on tape what you think their effectiveness was in the information and cultural field, which was more in the white areas, even though they were doing them clandestinely.

KAPLAN: The other thing that you have already said, on which I simply want to put a period, is that it was almost impossible in the years that it was going on, to prove that the long-range cultural and informational activities you were performing were laying a groundwork, a climate of receptivity, for what ultimately the French came to believe. I agree with you, and I think you have made the point marvelously well, that France might have turned in a completely different direction or been much longer coming back to normality had it not been for those long-range practices and programmings which we could not prove at the time were worth anything. You were trying to tell the congressmen visiting you what your specific effects as of yesterday and today are, whereas, the long-term effects were a decade down the line.

Of course. There were all these people who came back from their American experience, disciples of Raymond Aron, for example, who, when they went to Bordeaux or went to Lyon, went to one of the universities. They began to turn out students of their own and created in the country an atmosphere which, when the great revelations came and the country swung politically, meant that there was a reception of it. There were people who said, "Of course, we know about this," and so were able to come out and assert themselves.

That is why when the communists began to go in France, when they began to decline, it was catastrophic, because the terrain had been very thoroughly prepared. Once you remove the fear element, which played a considerable role, by the way, in the early years, in some cases it wasn't just conviction on the part of all the people who fought, they really frightened people, and they said, "These are people who are going to win."

Q: "If they win, we're in the doghouse."

KAPLAN: That's right, so we better be careful. And there was a great deal of that in the early years. I think when history looks back at that whole period, the whole so-called Cold War period, it will be recognized that this fear existed until the time when the Russians finally threw in the towel and said, "Look, we can't run this anymore. We can't even feed our people anymore, and we can't keep up this pretense anymore," we held the fort during that period. It was terribly important that we did. You might say, in retrospect, "We made too much of it. They [the Communists] never had a chance. They never had the economy of a world program. They couldn't have done it anyway even if we had just sat back." But the fact is that during the Stalin period and immediately after, if you look at what they did in the way of taxing themselves and bleeding themselves to build a military installation, and what they did in terms of their propaganda work outside, the amount of money they spent, you have to believe that there was a very important party, perhaps the dominant party amongst them, that said, "We can't do this thing at home. We can't create the kind of society we've promised. The world revolution is the only answer for us. We've got to break through. If we won Europe, with the resources of the Germans and all the rest –"

Q: "Then we could do it."

KAPLAN: "Then we can do it." So they had to be contained. According to the original analysis of containment, they had to be contained and shown that they couldn't do it, until finally they said, "No, it's impossible. We can't go on taking a quarter of our GNP and putting it in these missiles that are never going to be used when we can't even feed our own people or produce a bar of soap for our miners." And they finally gave up.

Q: If they had converted France and Germany and the Western world generally to their view –

KAPLAN: Just imagine!

Q: -- you would have had stolen resources which would have disguised the impossibility and impudence for probably another quarter of a century.

KAPLAN: Exactly. We would have really been pushed back into Fortress America, and it's hard to imagine what you would have had. It's an extraordinary thing. I feel that we played our little part in that. Obviously, the military forces that we set up in NATO, finally, and the economic bulwark that we created were the first things that really saved Europe, but along with that had to go the kind of cultural and informational effort that we were making. And we did it. I just don't see how anybody can quarrel with that anymore.

Q: Well, there are still people who will quarrel with it, but nevertheless, I agree with you. At what point in this effort did you move back from the Marshall Plan into the regular embassy operations, and how long did you stay in the embassy thereafter in France?

KAPLAN: I'm afraid the dates are rather hazy, and as I've said, I've lost all my papers and I'd have to go back and do some research. But it seems to me that I was back with Bill Cody in the embassy by about '52, '53, and I even seem to recall going somewhere, I think it was Bad Godesberg, and taking the Foreign Service exams.

Q: They were giving it then, so it probably was about that time.

KAPLAN: There will be a record of that somewhere at home, because I entered the Foreign Service, in short. I left the Marshall Plan setup and became a FSIO. That must have been about '52, '53. I worked with Bill, who was a very effective, dictatorial, difficult PAO. He was a difficult guy to work with if I ever saw one, but he really left his imprint on that operation. I stayed with Bill until about '57, when I was transferred home for a tour of duty.

JACQUES REINSTEIN
Foreign Ministers' Peace Conference
Paris (1946)

Jacques Reinstein was born in 1911 in Savannah, Georgia. He attended the University of Basel, Switzerland, the Alliance Francaise, Paris, Georgetown University, and American University. He then joined the Department of State in 1936 as an Economic Analyst and Assistant to the Secretary of State. After a long career in the Department of State, he was sent to France as Minister Counselor for Economic Affairs. He was interviewed by Willis Armstrong in 1989.

REINSTEIN: We went to Paris and we started to get further into the substance of some of the issues, particularly the reparation issue. Reparation became a major stumbling block. And the foreign ministers went home and we sat around there trying to get things started. At this point, we put in complete drafts of treaties. And what this did was make us have to deal with all the technical problems, copyrights, the return of property that had been sequestered, the liquid property. We sat in my office in Number 5 Grosvenor Square.

As I said, you had a meeting of foreign ministers in the spring without results, wheel-spinning, really, in between with the deputies and the committees. Because of the fact that we had submitted the text of agreements, we didn't have the text to discuss. While many issues didn't get solved, we began to put the pieces together, in a way, in committee structure. And so we got a fair amount of technical work done but we didn't get at the major stumbling blocks.

The foreign ministers came back to Paris the second time in June and July. Byrnes said, "Look, let's sit here until we solve two questions: the Soviet claims for reparations from Italy and the opening date of the peace conference. And we just sit until we settle those." And we did settle both points. I was the representative from the Italian reparations committee, which the second deputy foreign minister was my Soviet opposite number. Hervé Alphand was the French representative, and a U.K. Treasury official, Sir David Laly. And I tried out several things in the way of gimmicks to sort of give them some kind of satisfaction so they could say they had gotten something that they wouldn't buy.

We came up with another solution which was to have the Soviets deliver raw materials to the Italians who would then custom manufacture them for Soviet use, which seemed to us would enable us to respond to Congressional criticism that we were financing the Italian reparations. We putting money in and the Soviets taking things out. This really worked out between me and Byrnes and we were sitting there and were negotiating language right there at the table.

And he finally handed me a text which he had written down to try and express this idea. The language was subject to negotiation and, of course, the language barrier. And he finally handed me this piece of paper and said, "Jacques, what do you think of this?" I looked at it very carefully and didn't think there was anything fishy about it. I handed it back to him and said, "Mr. Secretary, I think we can buy that." And he turned to Molotov and said, "The United States agrees."

So we settled that and we settled the date of the peace conference. And then the next day the Soviets were busily obstructing that. Molotov had, apparently, gotten his lines crossed with Moscow and had gone further than they thought he should have or something, and so they hung everything up on procedural grounds for about three days until they sorted things out among themselves. And then we went on to the peace conference.

Now in that time period we had, for the second time, a discussion of Germany. By that time things were really a mess in Germany. We were not getting anywhere in setting up a governmental administration of the kind we expected, a government of technicians who would operate under Allied direction. We couldn't get anything of that kind and we weren't getting any cooperation from the Allied Control Council. And the discussions with the Soviets indicated quite clearly that they weren't going to cooperate. I don't recall the exact date in July, but it's all in the records.

Those records were very carefully put together. I kept all of my files and I had an excellent secretary in Washington who later put them in first rate order. They were all transferred to the Archives in quite good shape.

Two things happened at that stage. I don't know how much discussion there had been about this. Like I say, we never had any delegation meetings. But it was at that point that Byrnes said, "Well, if we can't get everybody to cooperate, we'll cooperate with anybody else who will cooperate with us." This was read by the British as an invitation to get together and did result in their offering to do this and the negotiation of the Bizone Infusion Agreement, which was worked on in Washington and in Germany over the coming months, and finally concluded in December.

Q: December of 1946?

REINSTEIN: December of 1946. Substantive decisions being worked between Washington and New York.

Q: When did the French zone get to be part of it?

REINSTEIN: The French zone came in bit by bit. As I say, they kind of waffled. They had communists in the government and they were trying to play a position of being intermediaries between the U.S., and the U.K., and the Soviets. Although as we proceeded with the technical drafting, we increasingly found the French sliding over to our direction, particularly when we got the Marshall Plan stage. They had to come along. Although, you know, in the Marshall Plan we had bilateral agreements between the three military governors and the United States. The U.S. one was signed by General Clay on the German side, and Bob Murphy, his political advisor, for the U.S. side.

Q: Perfectly reasonable.

REINSTEIN: Until the establishment of the Federal Republic in 1949 there were still, technically, some separate organizations. For instance, we had a joint export-import agency in my zone. The French had an organization to perform the same functions in their zone. In fact, though, we had a working arrangement. As I say, it was the Marshall Plan that really crystallized it. They had to cooperate at that point. Otherwise, they wouldn't have gotten any help in their zone.

Q: Or themselves, or not as much.

REINSTEIN: Well, just what we would have done in that case, I'm not quite sure. That problem, I don't think, arose.

Well, going back to 1946. We went through the peace conference with a repetition of all the same things. You know, we settled a few things, but a repetition of all the same record-playing. You just had a larger cast of characters in the peace conference. It dragged on to the point that it was up against the starting date for the first United Nations General Assembly, so they asked the General Assembly to postpone its meeting. We still didn't get anywhere and, finally, they decided this was really getting to be a scandal. It was holding up the creation of a world organization. So they just gave instructions to committees to wind up their work by a certain time and we just sat night and day until we went through all the process of getting out committee reports with disagreements, and then going up to general conference and holding the same positions in the general conference without a final solution.

You asked a question at some point about when did we get the Italian Treaty. We finally got it, and the others, in December. I think Mr. Byrnes finally told Molotov that he was tired of discussion. So at that point, they decided to come along and we got instructions, "Wind the thing up." So then we went into the hectic final negotiations. They tried tricks on us.

Q: Was there any other treaty agreed to at that time?

REINSTEIN: Yes, all the treaties.

Q: All except Germany's?

REINSTEIN: No. Germany, Austria, and Japan. I think this is very important, the concept which Byrnes and, I think Ben Cole, had, whether Foster Dulles at one stage. Foster was at the London conference in 1945. But in 1946 it was Tom Connally and Vandenberg who were the advisors. We had bipartisan advice. In September there was a big uproar when Wallace made a speech which was widely construed as beginning a willingness to deal with the Soviets. [Transcribers note: This paragraph was very difficult to make out due to low volume on the tape, but I tried to catch part of it.]

Q: He was still Secretary of Commerce, wasn't he?

REINSTEIN: I'm trying to remember. He was Vice President at one time.

Q: He was Vice President under Roosevelt in his third term. Then when Harry Truman became President, he was in one term. But Harry Truman became President in 1944.

REINSTEIN: There were no vice presidents in this particular time period.

Q: Not in 1944, no.

REINSTEIN: 1946.

Q: 1946, he was Secretary of Commerce because I used to have meetings with him and I remember.

REINSTEIN: He made this speech.

Q: I remember his speech.

REINSTEIN: Byrnes, Connally and Vandenberg decided to get on the phone and tell Truman that he had to disavow this, so Harry Truman fired Wallace. But they threatened to come home. And at that point, I was sitting as a U.S. representative with Vandenberg as my political advisor in this meeting. And he left that meeting to go back to the Maurice Hotel. I guess that's where they made the telephone call from, where our delegation was housed. Anyhow, they went and had it out with Truman on the telephone because they felt they had been completely undercut by the revelation in Paris. And so we had that thing going on.

As I say, we finally got to New York where we met at the Waldorf Astoria. The American delegation lived there.

Q: Your next venue was New York so you wouldn't interfere with the functioning of the U.N.?

REINSTEIN: It was New York so we could deal with both of these things at the same time. And in the case of the Soviets, they had to use the same personnel. They had a hell of time running back and forth between Lake Success and the Waldorf Astoria. They finally caved in to Byrnes pressure and the treaties were all agreed to and the final drafting and tidying up had to be done. I was left with the team in New York to do that.

PETER J. SKOUFIS
Veteran Affairs Officer
Paris (1947-1950)

Peter J. Skoufis was born and raised in Bangor, Maine. He entered the Foreign Service in 1947. His career included assignments in France, Italy, South Africa, the Netherlands, and the United Kingdom (England). Mr. Skoufis was interviewed by Thomas Stern in 1992.

SKOUFIS: One day, a flier came across my desk which announced that the VA was going to open offices in Paris, London, Rome, Mexico City, Manila and elsewhere to service the many ex-Gis who had decided to reside abroad. The VA was looking for candidates to fill these new offices. I was getting pretty tired by this time of waiting for the law school to admit me; I rationalized that I had spent the war years on one island after another, including 13 months in Honolulu at Hickam Field; the rest of the time I was on Guam, Okinawa, Saipan, etc. I debated the opportunity to go to Paris. You had to be able to speak French. That happened to be fine with me because if you come from Maine, you speak French as a second language. It wasn't exactly Parisian French; it was Canadian French. I had also had French in college; that had been my foreign language at the University of Maine, which was the customary thing to do. So I decided to throw my hat in for Paris although with some trepidation because I realized that I was not a fluent French speaker. Harry McKee, who was then heading a unit very near me, decided to apply for a job in London.

Both of us were called by some people in the central office who were staffing these foreign posts. Both of us were accepted and slated to be sent to Europe. I had never been in Europe; my ideas of Paris came from travelogues, fantasies and ex-Gis who had served in Europe and were now working for the VA. While sitting in Okinawa with little to do, I had expressed an interest in military governments which were being established all over the world. I thought that if I had been accepted, I might have served in Europe, which would have exposed me to a part of the world I had not seen.

We were then instructed to report to the State Department for indoctrination and to become a member of the United States Foreign Service. An agreement had been reached between the VA and the State Department which was known as the "Bradley-Byrnes" agreement (Omar Bradley having been the head of the VA and Jimmy Byrnes the Secretary of State). That agreement stipulated that the VA would supply the technical personnel and the Foreign Service would supply the administrative support necessary to establish and maintain these new veterans' offices. The team would consist of a senior VA officer, who would then become the Veterans' Attaché. These teams would take care not only of screening the applications for educational grants, but also administer the claims programs – insurance, death, pensions, etc – which were necessary to support the widows of dead veterans. Many of these women were foreigners and many had children who were also eligible for certain benefits.

My senior officer, Mr. Share, had been a claims officer in the VA after World War I (he was a World War I veteran). I headed a group, consisting of four people and I also was the Registration person who determined eligibility under the school programs. We had two counselors to help veterans select programs and we had a budget and fiscal officer. The latter was there because the State Department was not able to handle the greatly increased workload of payments for substance or tuition and books. The Embassies and consulates were just collecting the filled out forms and sending them back to Washington to the International Affairs office of the VA. State didn't have either enough people or sufficiently trained people to handle the workload.

In my case, my Foreign Service appointment was to the Foreign Service Staff (FSS) Corps. My boss, Mr. Share, was given an Foreign Service Reserve (FSR) appointment. All the VA field office directors got FSR appointments. The staff members were given FSS appointments. My payment for accumulated annual leave – six or seven days – was given to me by the VA and then I was separated from the Civil Service. I was sworn into the Foreign Service. I had been earning $4,500 per annum at the VA; that was probably the salary of a GS-11 at the time. The FSS-8 level, which I was given provided roughly the same pay, but in fact my earnings almost doubled because in addition to salary, the Foreign Service give allowances to its employees. Those allowances were primarily to pay for rent in Paris and maybe for a cost-of-living differential. So that when I went to Paris, my gross income was $9,000. I thought I had made a great career change. Going to Paris with that kind of income seemed to be the most that the world could offer me. I took the Paris job and left for France soon thereafter. I actually entered the Foreign Service in March, 1947.

Paris was a great experience. I went to France by ship – a converted troop ship. On the same ship, was a VA team that was going to open the Geneva office – John Hays, Randy Dickens and Frank Harris. The Paris office had already opened several months earlier. Share, his secretary and others were already in place. We sailed at the end of April. Hays had been in the Army's military government – G-5 – and had been in France and Paris from right after the invasion. He was coming from the Richmond, VA office as did his whole team. He had with him a convertible Cadillac which was unloaded at Le Havre. He was going to drive to Geneva through Paris and asked me if I wanted to go along. That was a trip! Every town we went to brought back some memories to John of his war campaigns. He would visit a French family here and one there; he would see mayors with whom he had worked. Everywhere we went he was greeted like a long lost friend who was returning home. We got our fill of Calvados. It took us three days to get from Le Havre to Paris.

When I got to Paris, Share wanted to know where the hell I had been. He said that the Embassy had been looking for me. So I went there and found that it was the Budget and Fiscal section who was looking for me because I was on their payroll. That section was run by Larry Daimond; Joe Dagenhart was the Finance Officer – he was the one who signed the checks. The Veterans Program was actually a part of the Consular Section because it had been determined that our functions were more akin to that of the Consular section than any other embassy office. So we reported to the chief Consular officer. Physically, we had separate offices in the Hotel D'Iena off the Champs-Élysées. We shared space with the Office of the Foreign Liquidation Commission, which was an Army operation aimed at getting rid of all of the Army's surplus equipment in Europe. Paris was the headquarters. We ate in the Embassy cafeteria. The Embassy assigned us an old Chrysler for transportation purposes which we used to go to the Embassy for lunch. There were no other restaurants in Paris at the time – food rationing was still in effect.

I also remember a long May weekend. My birthday was May 7 and on this particular year, it fell on a French holiday which made it a long weekend. During the next week there was another holiday – the day the Allied troops liberated Paris in 1945. The following week, we had another holiday. So it seemed to me that for the first few weeks I was in Paris, we only worked four day weeks. I just couldn't get over that. I thought it was a great deal. That of course was sheer coincidence, but I won't forget that introduction to French work habits. We had a lot of work to do because we found that the French schools – primarily the University of Paris – had not been paid at all even though it had accepted ex-Gis as students. They had sent bills to the Embassy for tuition and books and wanted reimbursement. There were about 2,000 American students who had taken their discharges abroad and were attending universities in France. Then there were another approximately 1,500 claims, mostly coming from French dependents of soldiers who had been killed in the war. We also had to work on claims by World War I veterans whose benefits had been interrupted by the war and who wished to be reinstated. So the office's workload was heavy.

My primary function was to get the veterans on a payroll so that their benefits would begin to flow. Some because they had not been paid were already beginning to become involved in illegal activities so that they could make enough to live on. The black market was rampant in Paris and in Europe in general, especially in currency dealings and cigarettes. The ex-Gis were getting packages from home, or were buying goods from friends who had commissary and the PX privileges – there were still in existence – and selling the goods on the black market. There were still all sorts of small military units all around Paris cleaning up after the war. There was very unsavory business being conducted at the time. Both the VA and the State Department were anxious to get some money to these veterans so that they would not need to survive from illegal operations.

We finally got straightened out and money began to flow to the veterans. We worked out a system which permitted the checks to be written in Paris rather than in Washington. Our finance man, Bob Griggs, who had worked in the VA's Buffalo office, set up a system with Joe Dagenhart which permitted Joe to issue monthly checks to a list of people that Bob would provide with the amounts of their entitlement. I certified that list which was time consuming because I had to check to make sure that all of the people on the list were eligible.

At the end of the month, the check would be ready for the veterans or other beneficiaries. The big problem was how to get these checks to the recipients. The veterans were living in rooming and boarding houses all over Paris and were constantly moving. So we decided that they would have to come to our offices to pick up the checks. That meant that on the first of the month there would be long line of people waiting for his or her check. It was useful to us because it also meant that we knew that the intended recipient was still alive and that the checks were getting to the right person. We asked the recipients to certify at the time he or she picked up the check that they were in fact still going to school and benefited eligible for their benefits. That satisfied the GAO requirements. The system was somewhat cumbersome, but it worked well. After about six months in Paris, we moved from the Hotel D'Iena to the Embassy and were co-located with the Consular Section. The Embassy had vacated the space by moving out the regional courier office. So the grantees came to the Embassy on the first day of every month. Of course, the Consular section was well known to many of the ex-Gis because that is where they had to go whenever they lost or had stolen their passports. That happened frequently. The Consular officer was Agnes Schneider who was a real legend in the Foreign Service; she was in charge of the Passport section. The ex-Gis had quickly learned that their passports were valuable commodities; that increased the issuances of new passports considerably. I found veterans to be pretty good guys, but many acquired unsavory reputations in the Consular section.

A lot of the veterans were artists who were going to art schools in Paris. Because of their temperament they were difficult to deal with; some were nearly impossible. A lot studied French; others just stayed there because Paris was just a nice place to be after the war. They all needed the $50 per month subsistence allowance. There were a number of future distinguished people among the beneficiaries – people like Art Buchwald, who had been a Marine who stayed to study French at the Alliance Frances because he enjoyed the place and he had a chance to write. I would say that 60-70% were serious students; the others were there for the thrill of being in Paris.

For most of our substantive work, we dealt directly with the VA in Washington. We started to send material through the State Department, but then found out that headquarters was not receiving our mail. There was no special office in the Department that was concerned with our operations so that much of our mail seemed to disappear. There was a woman in the Department that was supposed to act as the liaison with the VA, but she became overwhelmed by the workload. So we began to send most of our reports – fiscal, etc – directly to the VA. We were spending its appropriations and it had to have these reports to maintain accountability. So we worked closely with the VA on the technical aspects of our work.

I got to Paris in 1947 and stayed for four years. As we gained experience, we developed a modus operandi with State Department – the Paris Embassy and the VA Office. The system worked very well; the Embassy became much more responsive to our problems in terms of space and administrative support in general. One indication of that was the fact that we were permitted to move into the Embassy. After my first year in Paris, the Embassy improved greatly in the administrative area with the arrival of Graham Martin as the chief administrative officer. He brought with him a team of administrative people who greatly improved the Embassy's operations and made it much more responsive to its clients' need including our own. We got space and people when we needed them. We were quite happy with Martin, Eddie Crouch, Seaborn Foster, Harvey Bufallo, Jack Herford – a whole succession of administrative types who were complete professionals. The administrative support became first rate and our relationships with the Embassy became very good. Although we were, as were all Staff Corps personnel, responsible for finding our own housing, but we were given lots of help.

Ambassador Bruce became Ambassador. He used to walk around the Embassy from time to time just to see how things went. He was not an infrequent visitor to our offices. He would say that he was a veteran and would ask about his insurance program. We would brief him on how it operated and that if he wanted to keep up his insurance, he had to pay premiums. Then he would ask about the programs for which he was eligible. He took an interest in us and made us feel a part of the Embassy. It really gave our morale a boost. That was also true of the Consul General, who was Joe Gray. We were all included in the Embassy-wide parties, like 4th of July. We really felt part of the Embassy and of the Consular Section especially. There weren't many men officers in the Consular Section, so were very welcomed. The women officers used to call on us if they ever encountered a male problem, e.g. some obstreperous American young man who was getting out of line. We were sitting close by and would come to the rescue of the woman consular officer. In general, the Embassy was very forthcoming, both work-wise and socially.

However, one problem developed. As I mentioned earlier, we had all entered the Foreign Service in the Staff Corps except for the head man, who was an FSR. We became part of the Department's promotion system; the Inspectors reviewed our work; we were subject to the performance evaluation system – we were full fledged members of the Foreign Service for personnel administration purposes. But no one performing VA work was getting promotions. As I was an FSS-8 as was Harry McKee in London; Columbo in Rome was at the same grade and none of us were getting promoted. The staff corps was being reviewed yearly and yearly some were being promoted, but none of us. So after three years, I went in to talk to the administrative people. I was delegated by my boss to talk to the Embassy on behalf of all of us doing veterans' work. I was told that the VA people didn't really work for the State Department; we were working, in their eyes, for the VA. We were viewed as temporary employees of the Foreign Service who were in the Foreign Service for administrative convenience, but whose career was in the VA. I pointed out that we had been separated from the VA and that we were no longer a part of the Civil Service. We believed that we were full fledged members of the State Department. I finally convinced the Embassy that we were indeed members of the Foreign Service.

The Embassy referred the matter back to Washington. And there we found the same problem; our names had not been considered by the promotion panels because we were not considered part of the Foreign Service. We were viewed essentially as temporary adjuncts. We became very discouraged because we had really fallen into a crack. I was the Consular Section's duty officer when North Korea invaded the South – I thought we were back in the Civil War (although the Department did not consider us as full fledged members of the Foreign Service, the we were fully integrated in the Consular Section and took our turns as duty officers) I got a call in French from a representative of the Press Francais wanting to know what the Embassy's views were and what we were doing about this development. I told him that I would call back and ran upstairs to the Ambassador's office. There were several people there following developments. As time passed, we realized that the U.S. would join the conflict. All of us in the VA saw a repeat of previous experiences – another GI bill, another cycle of support.

I went to see Graham Martin and told him that I didn't want to stay in the VA operation. I wanted out and was prepared to return to the U.S. He asked whether I would be interested in working for the Embassy. I told him that I had been in Paris for four years and that I thought it was time to move on. I had been recently married and I thought it was time to get back home. Then I got a cable from the VA informing me that Tom Quinnen in Rome was about to retire and that I had been assigned to replace him. I thought that that job sounded interesting; I wanted to get back to Italy and I would be in charge of the office. Tom had been an FSR and an Attaché – diplomatic passport and status. The VA promised that I would given the same rank and privileges that Tom had had.

So at the end of 1950, Helen and I embarked for Rome; we were anxious to do a tour there.

FREDERICK W. FLOTT
Consular/Political Officer
Paris (1947-1952)

Frederick W. Flott was born in Chicago, Illinois in 1921. He entered the Foreign Service in 1946. His career included assignments in France, Iran, Germany, Switzerland, Vietnam, and Indonesia. Mr. Flott was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1992.

FLOTT: I went into the Foreign Service the day after I got my MA. After a few months in training, I was assigned to Paris, where I stayed for five and a half years. The reason behind this happy first assignment was that since I had been with the French Army during the war and had had some exposure to the French Resistance, the State Department personnel people felt I could be helpful to the Labor Attaché because of all my possible access to Communist trade-union types. Actually, these people would have gladly cut my throat, but if Personnel decided that was a good reason to send me to Paris, I certainly didn't argue with them.

Q: Did you work at all with Irving Brown?

FLOTT: Oh yes, I knew Irving Brown. He had other people working more directly with him, but I certainly tried to be helpful to him in any way I could.

Q: He was a major figure in the post World War American/French labor relations.

FLOTT: Yes.

Q: You were there from '47 – '52 in Paris. What was your impression of the political situation at that time?

FLOTT: The French, of course, were very divided, as they had indeed been during the war. They were perhaps in some danger of going Communist. I wouldn't say they were on the very brink, but it was, in some respects, touch and go. If we had not carried out the Marshall Plan as we did, there certainly would have been considerable disorder, probably some fighting, and the whole recovery of Europe would have been much delayed. But I wouldn't go quite so far as to say that they were all that close to the brink of going Communist. There were a lot of conservative forces at work in France that would probably have pulled them back from the brink in good time. But it was worrisome. In a nutshell, the Marshall Plan did a wonderful job. In the Embassy in Paris, I had a ringside seat on that and knew the people who were running it – David Bruce, Averell Harriman, Henry Tasca, Paul Porter, and all those good people.

Q: What was your impression of David Bruce as the Ambassador? How did he run things?

FLOTT: First rate. First rate in every way. Personally, substantively. He had run the OSS Mission in London during the War and was, of course, a hands-on solver of problems – inclined that way. Whenever there was a rumor of some hidden Nazi, like Martin Bormann, for example – rumors that he was in Spain or France. David Bruce pursued the matter with more direct involvement than you would expect from an Ambassador to a large country. And he very much encouraged his boys who were looking after these things. He was also a very gracious gentleman. I served later under him in Germany as well, and he was just first rate. As was Averell Harriman.

Q: Averell Harriman was a different type wasn't he? How did you find him? He was running the aid...the Marshall Plan?

FLOTT: What was it called? The Economic Cooperation...Administration, I think. It went through various names. Averell Harriman was perhaps more directly connected to the political administration in Washington. But Bruce was also a very distinguished Democrat and had good ties in Washington, too.

Q: Can you give an idea, a feel for how we viewed the French government at that time. I mean it was the beginning of these series of governments that kept changing, wasn't it?

FLOTT: Yes, they changed a lot. They had some good people in it who were individually bright. Their collective efforts were often subject to divisions determined by French politics and French social structure and other factors. But looking back on it and taking into account where they came from in terms of just having been through the initial defeat by Germany, the rest of the war, and the rather spotty Liberation period, I would give them credit for being pretty broad gauge and reasonably willing to be able to forgive and forget, at least to work constructively with the Germans and others in Europe. "Forgive and forget" would be overstating it, but they were willing to take an objective view of where their interests lay, and to pursue these interests intelligently.

Q: Were we having to be careful or not, not to rake over the coals of the occupation time. There were all sorts of people who were tainted in one way or another by collaboration. How did we treat that?

FLOTT: First of all, there was not a policy laid down. There was the case by case action, by people of stature and experience, and the normal exercise of good sense. There was perhaps a feeling that you catch more flies with molasses than you do with vinegar and that, at a certain point, you have to let bygones be bygones in favor of producing results. The French government was very generous about overstating, if anything, the importance of the Resistance movement, partly because it got France off the hook of having been so largely collaborationist. The French political scene during the war was pretty much collaborationist. The extent to which this was the case is still coming out in the latest writings on the subject in France.

So the best way to expunge some of that from the record was to talk about how magnificent the Resistance had been. The U.S. government, of course, let the French run their internal affairs.

I don't remember any formal or hard positions we took on the subject.

Q: This was a very critical period from '47-51. Things were beginning to harden into the Cold War. What were our relations with the different labor movements – the Communists on one side and the Socialist on the other?

FLOTT: The largest trade union movement, the most broadly based one, was the C.G.T. While leftist, it was, of course, not totally Communist. Although obviously heavily infiltrated and influenced by Communists, C.G.T. leaders would deal in a civil way with their American trade unionist brothers, which was why the work of people like Irving Brown was so important. Irving Brown and other American labor people over there were good patriots who were willing to hear what the Embassy had to say on the subjects. So we felt, as an Embassy we felt, we had enough input into the process. On the other hand, the extreme Communists, the ones who went even beyond the trade union movement, criticized anything the Americans did. We made food deliveries under the Marshall Plan. They criticized that. They'd say that powdered eggs from America are bad for you. The French had had a bad harvest in 1947, and the Marshall Plan sent massive quantities of cornmeal as a substitute for flour. Cornmeal was new to them, and the Communists said that this is fed only to pigs. I remember in "L'Humanité", the French Communist newspaper, they ran a large cartoon criticizing the Marshall Plan. It showed a ship being unloaded and they included in the cartoon what they claimed were the three worst things the Americans were shipping to France – the three things the Communists wanted to criticize most. One was armament – showed a cannon being off-loaded; then big barrels of powdered eggs coming off, which would give any Frenchman indigestion just seeing it; and the third worst thing were cases marked Champagne from California – "Champagne de California"!

But the Communists couldn't go too far out; they could play on popular frames of reference and prejudices and things of that sort, but they couldn't get too directly anti-American, because the French people did regard the Americans as their liberators.

Q: Did you have any contact with Maurice Thorez, the head of the French Communist Party?

FLOTT: I certainly didn't deal with him directly. I may have met him at some reception, but I doubt it. He was not working the Embassies circuit! He was, after all, a foreign agent who had deserted from the French Army at the time of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact, when Moscow was attacking French mobilization against the Nazis.

Q: Did we consider the French Communist Party, with Thorez as its head, the absolute tool of the Comintern or of the Soviets, or not at that time?

FLOTT: A tool of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union? Oh, absolutely, no doubt about it. Now that doesn't mean that every single Frenchman who voted Communist, was equally in their pocket, but the leadership – there's no doubt about it. That's been proven – there’s documentation of it both from defectors from the French and from the Soviet Communist parties. But the French Communists did get a substantial protest vote from some otherwise patriotic French people, especially right after the war.

Q: They’ve always been known as the most disciplined as far as their ties to the Soviets in Europe, I think.

FLOTT: Yes, I guess they were. Maurice Thorez is a complicated story. In 1939 the reason the Germans felt secure in invading Poland was that they were hand-in-glove with the Russians in doing so. At that point, when France went to war, along with Great Britain in September ‘39; Thorez first deserted from the French Army and secondly announced that this was a bourgeois, capitalistic war that the people should have no part of. But, needless to say, on June 22 of ‘41, when the Germans invaded the Soviet Union, Thorez changed his tune immediately. But there’s no doubt that once the Germans invaded the Soviet Union, the French Communists became the most militant elements in the Resistance. They were willing to do anything to kill a handful of Germans, even if it meant the destruction of whole French villages and everything else. They went all out, which made them attractive in some ways to people around them who planned operations against the Germans. But the French, the bourgeois middle class French, were basically suspicious of the Communists, and with good reason. But it would be hard to deny that among the forces fighting in the Resistance, the Communists were the most all-out and militant – of late date, of course, after the invasion of Russia.

Q: Were there other Labor Officers?

FLOTT: It was basically Irving Brown’s people who came and went and there would be Foreign Service Officers in the labor attaché business. From where I sat, first at a very modest level in the Consular Section, and later in the Economic Section; we talked with them. All the people there at that time – we had a collegial relation with them – and anything we learned that might be helpful to them, we passed on to Irving Brown and his people.

Q: You left Paris in 1952?

FLOTT: Yes, September, 1952.

JOHN BERG
Locally Hired Employee
Paris (1947-present (1998))

John Berg was born and raised in Berlin, Germany. After living illegally in Nazi Germany for 28 months, he left for Paris in 1945. Since then, he has worked with the U.S. Army, the Marshall Plan, and at the U.S. Embassy in Paris. He obtained United States citizenship in 1980. Mr. Berg was interviewed by Richard L. Jackson on December 30, 1998.

Q: This is the oral history interview with John Berg conducted December 30, 1998 at the American embassy in Paris by Richard L. Jackson. Mr. Berg, as we were talking over lunch, could you begin by telling us a little bit about where you grew up and what the formative experiences were that drew you into this line of work?

BERG: Yes, indeed. John Berg came from Germany as a displaced person at the end of May 1945. Due to racial Nazi persecution, we lived illegally in Germany for 28 months, were liberated by the Soviets, and then came to France in the company of our friend's French prisoners of war. So, here we are in Paris, France. It's beautiful.

BERG: Mother and I then lived illegally for 28 months in Nazi Germany.

Q: Was that in Berlin?

BERG: It was mainly in Berlin. Sometimes, we went to other locations, other small cities, but I will say, if this ever happens to anyone, it is a lot better to do it in a large city than in a small location where you are instantly identified. So, about three months prior to the end of the war, some of our good friends, who had a house out in the country approximately 100 kilometers northwest of Berlin, had told us that if we could get there, we may live in that house, but should not leave it - just stay inside the house. Mother did go out now and then hoping and managing to get a little bit of food. She managed to do that. We had good friends there, French prisoners of war, who supplied a little bit of food, a little bit of bread, a little bit of this and that now and then.

Just about the end of April or beginning May of 1945, our friends came up to see us and said, "It's time to move out. The Soviets are coming." As far as we were concerned, we didn't care if it was the Soviets or not. Just anybody would have been better than the Nazis. Well, I listened to a detector radio, a small radio installation with headphones. I had a long antenna. I was aware of the different movements of the Allied troops, but sure enough, the Russians were the first. Their frontline troops were not very funny either. However, we did manage after liberation by them to see their commanding officer. The commanding officer gave us a free choice. He said, "We, the Soviets, could move you to the Soviet Union, or we could bring you back to the city of Berlin where you originated from, or, as your friends, the French prisoners of war, were being repatriated to their home country, France, you may join them." We preferred that option because the emblem for France has always been "Liberté, Egalité, Fraternité" and that was a good symbol. So, we decided to move with them to France. It took a month to get there. It was quite an experience. There were lots of transit camps. But all that was fair. Then we arrived in Paris, the beautiful city, even so quite different in May of 1945, but it was definitely liberté, égalité, fraternité. It was paradise.

So, our first thought was to see if we have any indication of what happened to my father. The Russians and everybody else said that they had lists, but whatever research we had done didn't lead to anything. There was no trace left. So, at that point, I told my mother, "Now that Dad is not to return, it will be up to me to support you." Because of being grateful to the U.S., my ideal was to work for Uncle Sam. Over and above it all, my highest admiration was for the U.S.

forces. So, I tried very, very hard to get a job for the U.S. Army. One problem was, I was too young. But then, due to the help of some friendly people, to whom I talked about it... I wanted to see the Jewish chaplain of Western Base Section, U.S. Army, in Paris. I explained the situation. The chaplain had been kind. He had once received a package that came from relatives in the USA. There was no postal service, so they had sent it APO to the Jewish chaplain, who forwarded it to us. He at that time said, "Mrs. Berg, if ever there is anything that I can do for you, don't hesitate to call on me." I did remember these words, went back to see the chaplain, and he in no time managed to get me a job with the U.S. Army in 1946. That is where I started. I worked for the Western Base Section, U.S. Army.

Q: Picking up English and French in the process?

BERG: French little by little. My parents had sent me to English language lessons since we had desperately tried to immigrate to Australia. So, by that time, my English wasn't all that bad. But you do forget it, of course, when you don't speak it during the war. But it all came back pretty rapidly. So, here we were, Western Base Section, U.S. Army.

I had a very small job. I was a supply clerk. But so what? It meant a job and it meant a salary. When the Western Base Section had accomplished its mission, there was one U.S. Army unit left here. I will forever be proud of having served that unit. It was the Corps of Engineers. The American Graves Registration Command, our command, established monuments, but mainly World War II cemeteries for our fallen comrades in arms. The ones who remained in Europe are approximately 40%. Sixty percent were shipped out through Carentan in Normandy to Cherbourg, France, where they were returned to the United States as per request of next of kin. The remaining 40% will remain forever in U.S. military cemeteries throughout Europe. One more time, I feel totally proud having served that unit because I did feel that I repaid my debt.

So, from 1947 until 1949, I worked for that unit. Then, their mission was accomplished. At that moment, I served as a passport and visa clerk, mainly getting visas which were required throughout Europe for the members of our command who had to travel to other European countries. So, at that time, when that mission was accomplished, the European Cooperation Administration under directions of the late Ambassador Averell Harriman, opened their office in Paris, commonly known as the Marshall Plan. It was the Economic Cooperation Administration.

I was fortunate enough to get a job there of similar kind. I became a passport and visa clerk for that organization. This job eventually brought me into the transportation field - passenger transportation, VIP receptions, whatever logistical support has to be given to VIPs. There, I served until October of 1953. The Marshall Plan had accomplished their mission and closed down. The administration had found that I was a worthwhile employee and integrated me into the Administrative Section of the American embassy in Paris. So, here I was. I had a relatively good job. I had a salary. I was able to support my mother. I was relatively happy under the circumstances.

The problem that remained was that, due to the fact that the Germans way back in 1937 deprived us of our original German citizenship, I served as a local employee at the embassy while my colleagues were French subjects, or British, or whatever else. I was stateless. I had no citizenship. I had approached the Consular Service of our embassy to see what I could do to get a U.S. naturalization. That wasn't possible from this end.

Q: The Germans would have given you citizenship, but you, of course, would not have wanted that.

BERG: That is correct. They offered to return our original German citizenship at their embassy, but due to what they had done for moral reasons, I told whoever was concerned, "I can never stand again for Germany." I feel very strongly that whoever takes a citizenship has to stand for that country and that flag. I could not for Germany. Consequently, Mother and I remained stateless.

During my job at the embassy, the section was called the "conference attache for congressional relations." I had the good pleasure and honor to meet, assist, and accompany just about every congressman or senator coming or leaving France. Being that this was a good service to them, they all took an interest in me. The first reaction was, "John, where do you come from?" It wasn't all that funny, but I told them the story every time. So, they did mention at one point, "John, there must be something that can be done about it." My reaction was, "No" because through a legal way, I could not. It would have meant to give up my job, immigrate to the States, then work for four or five years, then become naturalized, and then hopeful and possibly get another government job.

Q: You have your mother here.

BERG: I was the only support for my mom. Consequently, I did not have the courage to tear out of the little I had gotten to start off with nothing. This I could not do. So, at that point, some of the congressional visitors... And I will say it right now: the first one who started it was the late Senator Jacob Javits, who proposed to introduce a bill in the House. He did that. The bill dragged along. After one year, my superiors at the embassy said, "John, the bill is going to die if nothing happens now, so you had better call Senator Javits and tell him to please reactivate." I didn't have the courage at first to do that, but being that they insisted very strongly, I did call the senator. The Senator told me he would reactivate the bill. I believe he did, but nothing ever happened. Meanwhile, the person, Senator Tom Harkin from Iowa... In those days, the congressman told me that "If Senator Javits introduced the bill on the Senate side, I will be happy to introduce it on the House side." So, with the private bill being on the Hill on the House and the Senate side, I think on the Senate side, it didn't get much beyond that point. But Tom Harkin defended it to the maximum extent. He has my thanks and my recognition for outstanding action for the rest of my life. He defended my case to an unbelievable extent. Then, believe it or not, after four years, in 1980, the bill was approved first on the Congress and then on the Senate side and then finally signed off by the President of the United States. So, here this outstanding accomplishment happened: John Berg was no longer stateless. He became the forever proud citizen of the United States of America.

Q: What a wonderful story. During these years as that was going forward, you continued to work at the embassy in Paris dealing with more and more volume of high level visitors. You had the Paris Peace Talks over Vietnam. You had almost every President, probably not only once, but many times.

BERG: That is correct.

Q: Could you talk a little bit about the highlights of that?

BERG: The very important meetings here are the Vietnam Peace Talks with Phil Habib and many others which were held here in our embassy. This meant many, many important visits and lots of activities. But there again, I am proud to say that, it may be only one little part of it, but I did participate. So on that went through many meetings here. Henry Kissinger, who came and traveled incognito to negotiate, was in the Paris area. Many of the visits... Like you said, there were a lot of presidential visits and vice presidential visits, Secretary of State visits, unlimited. Again, I was proud to participate. As the years went on, I continued in the same field to work on the same activities. We just finished the latest Secretary of State visit here at the beginning of December of this year.

Q: That was Mrs. Albright's visit.

BERG: Yes. That was a brief visit, but it usually entails many details, a large support staff, traveling press, communications, and whatever goes with it. It is all fascinating. We're just ready for the next one.

Q: What makes a visit go well? I am sure that your long-term contacts throughout Paris, at the airport, with French officialdom, have got a lot to do with it.

BERG: That is correct. I think in the long run (This may sound funny to you.) that if they're not planned too far ahead of time, short notice is usually best. If not, we just have repeated and repeated advance meetings. They all boil down to more or less the same thing. There are very minor little divergencies like the plane is not going to come in at 1700 but at 1730. The number is usually identical. They're very numerous. The important part here is to have good contacts with our host government friends, mainly at the French Foreign Office, police authorities, customs, airport authorities, and take it from there. Glue it all together with a capable staff that we have at this embassy from the point of view of the chief of mission, deputy chief of mission, Political Section, Administrative Section, and the entire workforce. If they all work hand in hand, we can accomplish a very satisfactory visit.

Q: U.S.-French relations come and go. Sometimes, they are very strained. Other times, they are very close. Is that reflected at the working level when you're doing visits? Do you notice the difference?

BERG: To tell you the truth, not very much. They are, like we are, technical experts in a specific field as functionaries. If you have an opposition or if you have a leading support from protocol at the French Foreign Office, that can open unlimited doors. That is one of the reasons why the government keeps me in the present position. From the point of view of airport police, immigration, customs relations, that is based a lot on a long-lasting friendships among the people in that position, my own, and my colleagues. If you know how to handle their habits and their preferences, you may give them a little here and they will give a little on their side. So, that is when you can do a lot of things. I am proud to say that I have a good number of friends on the French side who will continue to be as helpful. That is a very good feeling.

Q: Thinking back on all the visits that you've had, which ones stand out? What were the crisis moments for you? There have been some that must have kept you awake nights.

BERG: Yes, that is true. I think at the moment of the liberation of our colleagues from Iran who were then flown to the Wiesbaden Military Hospital, we had a very important visit here. I trust it was presidential. Our ambassador then flew out in the evening to greet our colleagues on their arrival in Germany. They then returned during the very early morning hours from Wiesbaden back to Paris. I remember spending the entire night at the airport. I will very proudly say it: airport and police authorities told me, "John, the installation is at your disposal for as long as you need them." This included their protective troops alongside from the airport all the way to the ambassador's residence. So, that is a good feeling. They were all available just to cover that very important event.

Q: The returnees from Wiesbaden were the ambassador and the President or the hostages?

BERG: Just the ambassador and the President.

Q: That was President Reagan.

BERG: Right.

Q: You have seen so many presidents come through. Do any details stick in your mind of your interaction? Your wall is covered with commendations from the White House from presidents and secretaries.

BERG: I am very proud of that, but I have been and will continue to be very devoted to every one of them. I have enjoyed every one of them. There are many, many events that can mark your memory. For instance, when Princess Grace of Monaco died in an automobile accident, Nancy Reagan was the White House lead to be present for the funeral in Monaco. A support delegation from our embassy went down to Nice and then on to Monaco to receive the First Lady and whatever officials who came in on the U.S. side for that funeral. The world's monarchy was represented there. It was a very outstanding event that I will never forget. For instance, after the end of the ceremonies, the First Lady had a Monegasque motorcycle escort to their close-by national border and then was picked up by French gendarmes from Monaco to Nice airport, where Air Force One was waiting for her and her delegation. On arrival, I usually tell the Secret Service that as a tradition in this country, the leading personality thanks, if possible by handshake, the commanding officer of the motorbike escort. Nancy Reagan not only did that to the commanding officer, but she shook hands with every one of the officers by number of 24. As each one of them were taking a picture at the end of this, that was myself where Nancy Reagan shook hands with me and thanked me for my action in Monaco. It was something to be very proud of. I was embarrassed because I left here in a hurry with no notice. I had curls on the back of my head because I didn't have time for a haircut. It was still a very, very, very impressive picture for me, which I am very proud to have.

Q: As word of your efficiency began to get out in the U.S. Foreign Service, I am very well aware that ambassadors all over the place who transited Paris were calling you and asking for help. How did you field all the requests, establish priorities, and go out to meet some, but you can't meet them all? How did you make those calls?

BERG: I have a deputy and, if needed, we'll split it. He does one and I do the other. It is a decision of the front office here of who gets the top notch assistance and who may be in a secondary line. We can always manage with other officers from the embassy simply to go out and, on a courtesy basis, greet them and bring them into town. For me, it's usually a bit more because you eliminate immigration delays, you walk them straight through, and do it to the maximum extent. So, there you are. I am very pleased to say that, now having served the United States Government for over 50 years, I have received recognition for 50 years of active service to the U.S. Government. Again, this is something that I am very proud of. Ambassador Felix Rohatyn had set up a very pleasant reception in my honor for my 50 years. That was certainly very impressive. I received a very nice letter of congratulations on this occasion from President Bill Clinton. I am proud to have that letter. After a long career, I was pleased to have that recognition.

Q: One of your important clients is the U.S. ambassador in Paris, of whom you have seen many. You must have to adapt to very sudden changes of style and request. How has that work been over the years, thinking of the many ambassadors you have served with distinction: Harriman, Walter Curley, Joe Rodgers, all strong individuals with very different operating styles, I would assume?

BERG: You're right. They're all different. I've found every one of them most pleasant. When I think back to Charles Bohlen a long time ago, he was a great career ambassador. We did not have too many career ambassadors. Arthur Hartman was another one. I was pleased to serve him and his family. Other than that, they were all political appointees. I will say they were most friendly. Obviously, you have to adapt yourself to their demands and their style, but for as long as you do that, you are coming out alright.

Q: Which was the most challenging ambassador to work with in the sense of the demands?

BERG: It's hard to say. It was more or less identical. Obviously, the ambassador will ask you with a smile. If you then accomplish and do it with a smile, then that comes out identical, more or less.

Q: Making things go smoothly in an embassy like Paris, the largest - nearly 50 agencies, the team of ambassador and DCM and how well they mesh is very important. I'm sure your relations with each of the DCMs has been very important in setting the priorities on the big visits.

BERG: Absolutely.

Q: Has the division of work differed from different teams as far as you have observed or is it fairly standard here?

BERG: It is fairly standard. The only difference is that we may have based on directions as they come in from the Department. Rules may be tighter now or less tight. This is based on politics and the financial situation of our budget, which imposes a difference now.

Q: Speaking of budget, you have lived through a period of unlimited post-war resources, reconstruction and building up the embassy and then in recent years, draconian cuts. We have closed most of the consulates in France. The staff of the embassy, American and Foreign Service national, has dropped off sharply. How was it to live through all of that and what has been the impact in terms of getting the job done?

BERG: That's number one: the job must be done. Obviously, at moments of budgetary crises, it becomes more difficult. We had periods where there was a question of being suspended because of a non-existing budget. But in actual fact, we had some of our people out... That we closed down the Consular Section for a while, which was more than embarrassing. But no budget - what can you do? Personally, I have never been affected. Yes, there was a salary check that wouldn't come in that followed shortly afterwards. So, I really can't complain. I think that if the budget situation is tight, everybody around the table has to do their maximum to economize. I have always tried to do that.

Q: You mentioned the Consular Section shut down briefly. Didn't most of the embassy itself shut during the closure of government in 1995?

BERG: Not the essential parts of the embassy. The Political Section, the Administrative Section, and the Economic Section continued to work, maybe on a reduced manpower, but we did continue to operate. It was mainly the Consular Section.

Q: Could you talk a little bit about security and the increasing impact of it on your life and the embassy's life? You had in Paris the assassination attempt against the chargé then, Chris Chapman. There was a military attaché killed in Paris.

BERG: Yes, that is correct. Sadly enough, one of our assistant army attachés was shot to death. There is a plaque in his memory here at the lobby of our embassy. Ever since, we have constant warnings to use different routes and different times to come to work. That is a nice theory, but how do you do that in actual practice? You necessarily come out of the building that you live in, you work at the same time, so that is difficult to do. But I think what needs to be done and hopeful that works is use common sense, look around, don't leave your name, don't leave an indication of where you are and who you are, use common sense. Obviously, we have severe warnings. The guards in front of this embassy have been reinforced. We have our own private guards. We have the gendarmerie out in front. I think that is about the best you can do. We no longer use official diplomatic plates. The maximum of our fleet runs with regular Paris license plates. That is about all you can do.

Q: In gaining that kind of change from the French authorities, do you have a lot of discussion with them of reciprocity - they give us this and we must get that in Washington, that kind of thing?

BERG: Basically, I believe that is the case, but I am not personally involved in that. I have the good privilege of enjoying what has been negotiated. I will frankly say I take advantage of it.

Q: But this focus on security must have affected your job as you deal with so many VIP visitors from the presidents on down, getting them in and out of airports. How has it impacted?

BERG: We use the most secure routes. We vary our routes. We do not use the same at all times. I will say that the protection on the French side and adapting themselves to that security problem is very satisfactory.

ROBERT G. CLEVELAND
Economic Officer
Paris (1948-1952)

Robert G. Cleveland grew up in a family that traveled extensively abroad, spoke French at home, and had many European friends. He was appointed to the Foreign Service in 1946. His career included assignments in Bucharest, Paris, Sydney, Bangkok, and Belgrade. He was interviewed by Horace G. Torbert in 1990.

CLEVELAND: Needless to say, Paris was very different, very large, and very exciting. As a sidelight, when we left Bucharest on the Orient Express, nearly the entire Western diplomatic colony saw us off. In Paris, only an Embassy driver met us. The contrast between the warm collegial atmosphere of Bucharest, and the rather frenetic environment of a huge Embassy was striking.

Great things were happening; the Marshall Plan was beginning; the Cold War was developing apace, NATO was on the drawing board, the Coal and Steel Community began, and Paris seemed to be the center of it all.

I was peripherally involved in much of this; I started as number two in the Embassy Economic Section, with many routine duties, reporting on various aspects of the French economy, working rather closely with the Marshall Plan Mission to France, and sometimes with the Harriman Mission. One particular responsibility was transport and communications, which involved me in civil aviation and telecommunications very actively. For example I helped negotiate an agreement permitting Pan American to operate in France.

Q: Your biographic data mentions your involvement in the Central Rhine Commission.

CLEVELAND: That was an aspect of transportation assigned to me. “Le Commission Central Pour le Navigation du Rhin” was established in the early 19th Century by the riparian states to establish “rules of the road” for shipping on the Rhine, and to act as an appeals court for tort cases. Germany, of course, had been a founding member, but during the early post-war years, the occupying powers acted for her. Thus the British and the United States had seats on the Commission, and I acted for the U.S. From the U. S. standpoint, it was not a very crucial concern, but it gave me an experience in multilateral diplomacy which was valuable and interesting. It was a small group, very collegial and friendly; it gave me the privilege of knowing a group of great people, and enjoying the delights, culinary and otherwise, of Strasbourg. It was good to get away from Paris once in a while!

1949-52 was the period when the cold war began to take hold, and much of our work was related to it. For example, I accompanied David Bruce to the French Foreign Office to propose the establishment of what later became COCOM; its purpose was to control exports of strategic items to Soviet bloc countries.

This international body became active very soon, and continued right down to the present.

Q: Did COCOM actually issue export licenses, or just regulate?

CLEVELAND: Its purpose was to reach agreement among the Western democracies on lists of items whose export to the Soviet bloc would be controlled or prohibited. Member countries were bound by its rules, but they issued their own licenses. While COCOM may not be as important with respect to the Soviet bloc as it was, I hope it will concern itself with other areas, having in mind Iraq, for example. Personally, I was glad to let others in the Embassy take on that work, as I preferred to be involved in more constructive activities.

Q: Does COCOM still have influence today?

CLEVELAND: It hasn't been dissolved; I hope it continues with the terms of reference I just suggested – slowing international arms traffic.

Toward the end of my tour, I was reassigned as the Ambassador's special assistant for MDAP.

Q: This was still Bruce?

CLEVELAND: By then, no. My first Ambassador was Caffery. He was succeeded by Bruce for two years, and then followed by James Clement Dunn. All three were great men; they had different styles, but they were real pro's and I admired them all.

Q: Well, they were certainly all famous men of their generation, or of any generation. This is a good place to put in any special comments on their techniques or other memories you may have.

CLEVELAND: I remember all of them. My main first impressions of Caffery were two: First was his insistence on a certain pomp and ceremony surrounding the Ambassador's office. But professionally, he was absolutely marvelous. For example, my immediate boss told me to write a long telegram on some subject, the substance of which I forget. When I brought the message to Caffery, he read it and asked why it was being sent.

He saw instantly that it wasn't worth a telegram, and I had to agree with him. He was the professional's professional, who could always separate the wheat from the chaff.

David Bruce was a man of great stature and impeccable judgment. He had enormous charm and warmth. He always seemed to know what to say and not to say in every circumstance. I remember one time in his office with a congressman, I made a rather tactless remark, and he was able to correct it gently, and got me out of the hole. I admired him for his leadership, judgment and kindness.

It was during Bruce's watch that French Foreign Minister, Robert Schuman, proposed the Coal and Steel Community. David Bruce, with the advice of the then Treasury Attaché, had the imagination to see that this was an important and desirable political development. He convinced Washington that the United States should support the concept. This was despite a suspicion held by some in the Embassy that the Community would likely be some kind of European cartel, contrary to our interests. Tomlinson the Treasury Attaché, a brilliant man, had Bruce's full confidence, and this left our economic shop a little in the shadow where policy issues were concerned.

Q: Could you touch briefly on Dunn?

CLEVELAND: Personally, Dunn was a very experienced Foreign Service Officer of the old school. I wouldn't say he was as brilliant as the other two, but his judgment was sound, he was well-liked by the French, and he had a very successful tour. My job as his Special Assistant for MDAP was liaison with the Military Assistance Mission on supply matters. The French needs were for material to assist them in their fight against the Communist insurgency in Indochina. You may remember that in those days, the U.S. was unenthusiastic about continued French colonialism in Indochina, but we did give them military hardware based on broader policy considerations.

Q: Was this grant aid or loans at that time?

CLEVELAND: I think it was grant aid. It was during the period of the European Recovery Program (ERP), also called the Marshall Plan, helping France and other European countries recover from the effects of World War II. As I mentioned before, I was also involved in the ERP French Mission, and was lucky enough to become acquainted with many fine people in that work, including Livingston Merchant, Henry Labouisse. Barry Bingham and Francis Parkman. That was a great privilege.

Q: Was that the period when there were five American Ambassadors in Paris?

CLEVELAND: Paris was crowded with American brass. The Harriman Mission included two persons, including Governor Harriman himself, with the rank of Ambassador. There were also two other people with Ambassadorial rank connected with negotiating military base rights. This was in addition to Ambassador Dunn, who was the American Ambassador. It drove Jimmy Dunn up the wall. It was a strange arrangement. I particularly remember an engraved invitation to a charity event issued in the name of "The American Ambassadors in Paris." Mr. Dunn was outraged, and took strong exception. Those were weird times. There were certainly too many high level people around, and this created plenty of personal conflict. For example, the general in charge of our military aid mission was an extremely difficult man, heartily disliked by the Ambassador and the economic aid mission director. Evidently, one of the reasons I was given my special assistant assignment was to keep the peace. Those were the days!

A few more points: The Embassy was grossly inflated with personnel. This was almost entirely Washington's fault. There was no coordination between Departments, or discipline by the State Department. The various Departments would send all sorts of requests for information or action, presumably cleared by State. Many of these were marginal, and some were impossible to comply with, even with our large staff. A horrible example, which I'll never forget, was a request for a list, including a technical description, of every telephone switchboard in France. The French themselves had no list of the thousands of such units. It looked as though some people in Washington didn't have enough to do.

Q: These weren't private commercial interests you were serving?

CLEVELAND: No. This particular matter was for intelligence purposes. While we're on the subject of coordination, there were so many U. S. agencies represented in Paris that there was overlapping, conflicts and confusion. Executive Orders establishing the Ambassador's overall authority were issued, and then ignored!

This was nearly forty years ago, but I hear that things haven't changed in that respect.

Q: Wasn't there an intelligence coordinator for the Embassy who was supposed to coordinate intelligence operations?

CLEVELAND: There was the CIA Station Chief, but I'm not sure he did much coordinating.

Q: But nobody on the Embassy staff? I had filled that function in Vienna.

CLEVELAND: I'm not certain.

Q: Let's talk briefly, so we'll have your slant, about French Governments during your stay there. It was a chaotic period, and the single thread, I guess, was Robert Schuman, wasn't it who was the element of continuity in the French Government?

CLEVELAND: The chief feature to remember about France at the time was that the French Communist Party was an important player in internal politics, and the perceived menace of Communism was the most important feature of our policy toward France. Internal French politics were not part of my assignment, but of course I was very much aware of the constant changes in government, caused primarily by shifting alliances among the many parties in the Assembly. On the other hand, in my constant dealings with the Government, including the Foreign Office and economic ministries, there were very few changes among the faces that I saw. Schuman was Foreign Minister, and Jean Monnet was in the background. Herve Alphand was at the Foreign Office, and Giscard was also active. De Gaulle came long after I left.

Q: Do you have any snapshots of those days in Paris?

CLEVELAND: One or two: A high level conference in Bruce's office with Secretary Acheson; it was attended by all sorts of brass from both Washington and Paris; its purpose was to brief Acheson for a meeting with Robert Schuman; the Secretary asked for suggestions and received many. He then made a brilliant statement of what he was going to say to Schuman. It was so clear and so right that I've never forgotten it. It put Acheson in my pantheon.

We met at the Gare de l'Est an American security guard from Bucharest and his wife on their way for home leave. Driving from the station to our home by way of the Champs-Élysées we encountered a Communist demonstration against the newspaper Le Figaro. Seeing our diplomatic plates, some of them broke our windows, and started to drag me out of the car until told to stop by a cadre. The security guard and his wife dropped to the floor of the car. Later, they said they wanted to get back to Bucharest, where things were safer!

Q: You left in 1952, after about four years.

CLEVELAND: Right. In the summer of 1952.

ARTHUR A. HARTMAN
Economic Officer
Paris (1948-1953)

Ambassador Arthur A. Hartman was born in New York in 1926. He entered the Foreign Service in 1948. His career included assignments in Vietnam, the United Kingdom (England), Belgium, and ambassadorships to France and the Soviet Union. He was interviewed by William Miller in 1987.

HARTMAN: Before I knew it I was beginning to think about what was going on and the plans for the Marshall Plan and by the end of that first year in Law school I got a call from a friend in Washington. He said, "How would you like to go to Paris?" Well that was a lot more appealing than continuing on in Law school, so I went and David Bruce was my first boss. I was hired as a young economist in the mission to France and I stayed there for between six and seven years and I entered the Foreign Service during that period.

Q: Was this the time of the Monnet Plan and all the great changes in Europe were taking place?

HARTMAN: Absolutely, in the mission to France we had a very unusual group of people; I would say, under David Bruce. We were headed, the team was headed by the treasury attaché who was a very young man who died rather tragically in his early thirties from a heart condition. He was then in his twenties, a brilliant economist and monetarist – monetary theorist and he was the head of our team. Then we had a Foreign Service Officer, Stan Cleveland who was the Foreign Service Representative and then several of us from the Marshall Plan mission.

It was during that period that we actually worked very closely with Jean Monnet because he was head of the plan in France and it was through him that the American foreign assistance was used; and despite the fact that the forth republic politicians were going in and out of office, Monnet was always there and kept his money going in the directions that he wanted. Also in 1950; this was the beginning of 1948 when I began there, but in 1950 we helped Monnet. I had a very minor part in that I must say, but David Bruce and Bill Tomlinson, the Treasury attaché had a big part in helping to draft the Schuman Plan Declaration. This was the first proposal for forming a united Europe and we were kind of a team at that point that included some of our distinguished colleagues from Bonn. It was a way of trying to integrate the former occupied territories of Germany into Europe and to once again establish a state in Germany and begin the process of movement away from a war-time organization. That whole period was very exciting right up through 1952 when the Coal and Steel Community was created. Of course then, we moved on because during this period other things had been happening in the world and we had to look at the defense side of things partially because what had happened in Greece and Turkey, some moves that had been made in Eastern Europe, and finally the invasion of Korea led the American government to think about creating an organization for the purpose of promoting the defense of Europe; NATO.

With it, what would happen to Germany? The French came up with the idea that they did not want them as full members of NATO but perhaps through a European defense organization, they could bring the Germans into this rather large task; they realized they had to as the Germans were right there in the center of a divided Europe.

So I was on the delegation to the European Army Conference, so you see my career sorted of melded into the Foreign Service and I left the Marshall Plan strictly speaking which indeed in France was virtually over in the four years that it was promised in 1952.

Q: How did that take place? Here you were, you're out of Harvard and you're working as Special Assistant to a very distinguished ad hoc group and you're not in the Foreign Service at that point. What was it that made you decide to go into the Foreign Service? Did you, was it a motivation that you had previously that you thought this was something you might like to do or did it happen because you saw the current action in Europe?

HARTMAN: No frankly not, you know a lot of things were going on at this time. You had the regular Foreign Service, you had this sort of ad hoc group of people who came in, some of them at very high levels. At the head of the European unit of the Marshall Plan you had Averell Harriman and Ambassador Katz and people like that, and David Bruce who not only began as Head of the Marshall Plan, but moved over to be Ambassador to France and then he was succeeded by Henry Labouisse and there were just a whole series of people who came in at time. In a sense, I suppose you could say that the more traditional Foreign Service began to be slightly overwhelmed and I remember having long discussions with people like Teddy Kellise and others who were in the embassy who belonged to the old Foreign Service who had come in before the war and I think its fair to say they were probably a little resentful of all these youngsters wandering around dealing in high policy, which we were. In any case, what happened was that with our world responsibilities growing and a feeling that the United States was going to continue to play a role in world affairs, the expansion of the Foreign Service was very much in view.

Along came something called the Wriston Plan and I'm really a Wristonee. That is I came in; well there were two great waves I guess of people who came into the Foreign Service who had not started with the Foreign Service. In the immediate post-war period there were a lot of people who dealt with German affairs and who had been in, whatever they call it, Regional Directors in the occupation and people who had worked in the war effort in Washington. These people were brought in to the Foreign Service and that was kind of the first wave that took the Foreign Service beyond its core group.

The second wave occurred in the fifties, the early fifties when people like me and others who had an interest in foreign affairs got a taste of it and they said, "Well maybe I would like to stay in this work."

Q: At that point were you aware of the restructuring that was going on in the World order, not to mention the Foreign Service with Wristonization?

HARTMAN: Well I think we were all aware of it, whether we had correctly assessed what was going on or not is a hard question, one in fact that I have to answer this spring because I've got a speech to make on the fortieth anniversary of Marshall's speech at Harvard which is also my fortieth reunion time; and also I'm reviewing the fourth volume of the Marshall memoirs that are just coming out for the New Republic. You begin to think, "What was this then? Was this sort of a naivete' that suddenly struck a rather I country in terms of world affairs because really there was this burgeoning of relationships that took place in the post-war period and a lot of people like me who had no great experience in these things came in and began to see what the possibilities were. I must say that the one thing that struck me in that period were the international cooperation aspects. I think we were all very idealistic and some remarkable things were happening. Just the very fact that the way the Marshall Plan was put to Europe as a proposal and the way it was picked up by Bevin and others and played back to us, and then the way that the Europeans sat down and organized the response to us. We didn't participate, we had observers there and one of the little fascinating bits of history that I found out when I went as Ambassador to France in that house on Forty-one Faubourg Saint Honore]. A friend of mine from England came there and he said, "You know the last time I was in this house was in 1948," and he said "I was working for Lord Franks who was the head of the British delegation to this European Conference to respond to the United States and its' offer of aid." He said, "I can remember working all night in this big room down on the ground floor," where he said "we were stapling together our report because we had to issue it the next day." This was Eric Roll who has now gone on to become head of Wolberry's Bank and a few other things, but he was a figure for many years in the whole movement to create the OEC in Europe, the Economic Cooperation Organization, and finally to bring Britain into the more regularized and governmentalized forms of cooperation in the European community.

Q: Let me take you back to pick up on two points that you've raised already. The first point really is motivation. You were at Harvard, the war takes place and you serve in the Far East – the "Hump" carrying material to China and you witness the end of a colonial period, a terrible war with horrible devastation, a breaking of every previous mold; and then you go back to Harvard and finish and the career that seems to be before you is one of looking inward. The legal practice seemed to be what you were headed for, what was your sense of the world at that time as a veteran from the war, a terrible war with horrible experiences and a desire to come home and forget all of that. What was it that drove you out again to look at the world?

HARTMAN: By the way on that, on the latter point I had a very minor part in the war. I got in at seventeen and it was virtually at the end of the war when I got over there. So I didn't see any, I wasn't in any of the tough fighting or came back with all kinds of psychological scars. For me it was almost a lark. I spent time in India, I flew from something called DumDum airport to Chung King and Kung Ming. I came home, it was more a sense of adventure I think. The more I sat around that Law school, the less I thought of spending my life doing that kind of thing and when the offer came to go to Paris I jumped at it. I went over there and really – for me I had never really traveled outside the country, I was very young. It was more in the nature of the kind of experience where you could influence events, where you could be a part of history and it seemed so much more important and so much more interesting as a life then the other life which you could have which seemed kind of hum drum to me. I think there is a psychological thing too, you have to look at yourself.

My father was a businessman and I was clearly heading away from what he had done all his life so I think you have to add that in. There is always a personal element in anything like this. We were very close as a family, but the thought of being in that business which was paper making didn't strike me as something that would be very fulfilling so I was already going toward the law. I was heading away from that and then I guess France was even better and further away.

Q: Did you speak French when you went over there?

HARTMAN: I didn't. I had seven years of Spanish among other things which I never used in the entire Foreign Service. I landed there and sort of learned it on the ground and it was a lot easier than the language where I've just come from; which I also didn't have before I went either. I think basically my career spans the attitudes and reaction of Americans generally because a little later I went from France to Vietnam just after the Geneva Agreements. Here was another experience, seeing that the problems weren't as easy as they seemed to be in Europe. I mean Europe was, I think treated by Americans as a kind of a test case and it was probably the wrong lesson that we all learned.

Q: What do you mean by that?

HARTMAN: In the sense that when you, there was a devastated Europe and it needed what America could give. That was hope, enthusiasm, and money. It had the trained, skilled people, it had the basis and experience; it had all of the things that would make that American contribution a successful tool in an effort to rebuild and reinvigorate an industrial area.

Q: It had the ability to use it quickly?

HARTMAN: The ability to use it quickly, political leadership and even in the confused state that some of those places were, there were vigorous people who had experience in the political process. I must say the more I think about this whole history, its that element of political leadership and skills that those people show that makes situations work or not work and result in disasters or successes.

Q: Turning to that point about political leadership. When you went to Paris, you were working under the tutelage of a very great Ambassador and skillful one, David Bruce and there were many others of great insight and intelligence. In a sense you had a leadership that was given to you on the European scene, you didn't have to seek it out to discover it. Was this a difference when you went to Vietnam, that you did not know the landscape or Americans in general did not know the political landscape?

HARTMAN: Well, I would say if you look at the French experience, with the exception of the Foreign Service Officers; I mean people like Woody Wallner who had been practically the last fellow out of our embassy in Paris before the war. When the Vichy government was set up, I think he went from Paris to Vichy and continued operating our mission there. You had that core of people who knew a lot about France and about the politics of France, and people like Martin Hertz who was in the political section. All of these people were very intense political animals and they threw themselves into trying to understand Fourth Republic politics which were kind of exciting, but a little bit of the sameness as these parting people turned over.

Then you had us, the sort of technicians on the other side of the house who would approach the problem mainly as an economic one and working again with Monnet through his connections with Schuman and Quai, and Pinet – the people who were running the economy. We kind of looked at the problem as one of “if you can get economic success, all this politics will work itself out.” There was a little tension I would say among the staff in the embassy between those who felt that more attention ought be paid to politics and that the United States ought to have more traditional relationships with France, and those of us who were “activists” saying, “Why don't we back this fellow he's got a good plan,” or they want to do something in this ministry, why don't we do that?” Let the politics follow this if I successful venture, if the infrastructure gets rebuilt, if the coal mines get going. That's going to change the political coloration of those parts of France that may be tending towards Communism or whatever else we were concerned about in those days.

Q: Describe the embassy when you arrived?

HARTMAN: When I arrived there we in the old building so to speak; Number Two Avenue Gabriel, I can't remember now who the first DCM was. It could have been Ted Achilles, I'm not sure. There were a whole series of distinguished deputies beginning first with David Bruce, then when Douglas Dillon came along, and then Amory Houghton and other Ambassadors came while I was still there and still working in the Marshall Plan mission to France which was in “B” building which was the next building up Avenue Gabrielle. We worked as a team primarily because this financial attaché who had his big office in the main building, as did the Director of the Marshall Plan mission.

Q: Was this a country team in the Eisenhower mode?

HARTMAN: It began to be a country team in the Eisenhower mode, it very much began to be a country team operation and indeed when we got further into the fifties and a military assistance group was established it had all the aspects of a country team. It had military representation, it had economic; the Head of the Marshall Plan mission. In many places, I can't remember now, I think in France as well, the Head of the Marshall Plan mission became the Economic Minister so that there was a complete integration of the embassy staff and the Marshall Plan mission.

Q: So the title in fact matched the power?

HARTMAN: The title matched the power and for awhile they tried it with the Economic Minister separate and there was just dog fighting all the time as he tried to establish his authority and of course he didn't have any money and of course he didn't have any way of dealing with the French in a position of power where he had nothing to give. So it was always the Marshall Plan mission chief who really had the authority. Of course David Bruce came in under another Ambassador; actually Jefferson Caffery was still Ambassador when I arrived. That was one of the treats of the day if you arrived when he did and watched him being sort of; what do you call it dog-stepped or something by the Marines up the main stair case.

Q: He was an old-style ambassador?

HARTMAN: He was absolutely an old-style Ambassador and I think very uncomfortable with what was going on.

Q: What was the size of the mission? Did you have the sense that the Embassy was groaning at the seams because of the post-war reconstruction?

HARTMAN: It was big, I can't remember how many we had. We must have had three or four of us. I started out in the trade division, but there was a finance division, a trade division, there was an overseas territories division with a couple of very interesting people in it who worked with the French despite this sort of basic American anti-colonial feelings, but worked with the French to reestablish ties with their African territories and Vietnamese. The aid programs had a kind of indirect affect through the time when finally Harry Truman proposed the Point Four program. The idea was that France needed these resources and those countries also needed to be developed and this was a way to do it. We kind of put aside a little bit some of our colonial feelings, although I think the French always felt that we were trying to get them out of these places. It was very tricky for any American to be working the French Overseas Territories Ministry as it was in those days. There was one man particularly; Bert Jolis was head of the division, he later went on to become one of the big diamond merchants of the world in Africa. Joe Sacks was a very unusual young man, he was my age and Joe went into this overseas territories work with a real vigor and got into French bureaucracy so well that years later he was actually working in the Ministry of Overseas Territories when de Gaulle came to power. De Gaulle found out that there was this American over there who was actually sort of running the finances of North Africa. Joe was out of there very quickly and went to Oxford and wrote his Ph.D.

There were a lot of experiences like that where things were really quite permeable and you had Americans working in French ministries and Frenchmen; Robert Marshall was the head of the office that received the aid and later went on to become the head of the Organization for Economic Cooperation in Europe. There were a succession of people who were our interface and I remember a few years ago when I came as Ambassador to France finding that these people were all head of big banks, my life was much easier as they were old friends. It was really remarkable with the way they as young people also, slightly older than we were because they had been through the war most of them and their careers had been delayed by that as they had been off doing other things. They were a little more mature and I think they treated us as students, useful students because we usually could produce some money occasionally to do the tasks that they had. The real difference I think going; Freddy Reinhardt was one of our advisors in Paris and he went as Ambassador to Vietnam and he asked for me to come out there with him.

Q: You had worked closely together?

HARTMAN: We had worked somewhat closely together, he more as an advisor to Eisenhower when he had his first job as Supreme Commander and I was working on the European Army and then later helping to get the Federal Republic into NATO and so I worked very closely with Freddy at that time and he asked me to come out to Vietnam and work in an Economic job and I was in the Embassy, but also in the aid mission there and we had a combined mission. Actually the Embassy officers were in the aid mission building, we were not in the main embassy downtown in Saigon. My job gradually got on to the area of advising the Central Bank and there were quite a few things going on, they had a negotiation with the French and so I was a little bit on the other side, they were newly independent and also they had to negotiate with the French, and therefore we were with Lao and Cambodian and Vietnamese governors as well as they were trying to divide up a pot of money that clearly belonged to them. In any case, that was a tremendous change because there I was back in the Far East and I must say my ideas when I was first in the Far East were that; and particularly some stories I heard as we flew. After the war we touched down in Hanoi and that was a confusing period when the Nationalist Chinese were coming in there and the French were coming back and there was a lot of suspicion that we were trying to get them out and my first brush with that area, I must say I understood very little about it. While I was in Paris I read more about it and it was a time of ferment and the political debates were beginning in France as to what the policy should be.

Q: Is this in reference to their colonial possessions including Vietnam?

HARTMAN: Yes and one of the interesting things at that time is that the socialists were red hot colonialists and I can remember Guy Mollet; one of his governments, as a leading socialist took probably took one of the strongest positions against giving greater independence to Indochina and broke off the negotiations that had been going on in France for the independence of those three areas.

Q: What was the view of the French that you were working with in Paris towards Vietnam, your next assignment?

HARTMAN: Well, there was; I went there just after the Geneva agreements and of course there was a lot of resentment, that Dulles had really twisted arms to get those agreements through then Dulles didn't like the agreement and sort of threw it over. I would say there was a basic suspicion among a great majority of Frenchmen that we were doing them in the eye. The thought that; I can even remember at the end of my period in France; the French saying "Well you know, yes you have helped us but you've given us only about as much money as we in turn have had to put into Vietnam to keep it from going Communist." It was a, we were beginning at that time I think to come into the realities of world politics and some of that was driven home. The history of France's relations with these territories became much more dominant. We after all had been dealing with the people who were willing to forget most of that and concentrate on building a modern state in France and felt that these were things that were just going to drag them down and be obligations. That struggle in France didn't straighten out until de Gaulle came to power and finally; although he may have mislead the French people at first, led them out of Algeria.

Q: Describe something of the life of a Diplomat in that time? When you were in Paris, you're as a junior person, but you are in a very heady position. You've got a great job, a very interesting one and you are working at the top. How did you live in Paris?

HARTMAN: We shifted apartments seven times.

Q: Was this before the war?

HARTMAN: This begins when we arrive there. I think my first salary was something like twenty-eight hundred dollars a year and went to thirty-three shortly thereafter. We had a housing allowance, but it was a modest one and France was still; this was 1948 – 1949 France was still – there was rationing when I first arrived. Buildings hadn't been rebuilt and it was kind of a mess. So we started off in a one room apartment then we had a child and on to two rooms and so forth. We moved in the six years or so I was in France, I think we moved about seven times, slightly up market each time I would say, even sampling a little bit of country life. We made many French friends, not many I would say personal friends – people we worked with; although kept them as friends over the years, and when I went back as Ambassador they became personal friends. The personal friends that we made at that time were much more in the sort of bowels of society and in the arts. They were young people like ourselves, sometimes in the neighborhoods where we settled.

Q: Some painters and sculptors?

HARTMAN: Yes, things like that and actually one went on to become a big banker, but he was our neighbor in one of the buildings that we lived in. He is probably my oldest and closest friend, he became head of one of the big banks. That kind of relationship you know sort of looking back on my recent experience in the Soviet Union where you come out with well maybe a couple of people that you can say you are acquaintances, or a Refusenik or two that you've gotten very fond of and terribly close to. No one in the society is really close to you. In France despite the fact that they have the reputation for standoffishness and cultural pride and all those kinds of things, really we have I think some very fast and close friends.

Q: What was the nature of Diplomatic life for you in Paris at that time? Did you have a strict routine with an old-style Ambassador like Jefferson Caffery?

HARTMAN: Well, I think that was another source of the resentment around; well not resentment, but differentiation. We basically didn't participate in the diplomatic life as such. I think all the time I was working on the economic problems of France as distinct from moving over to the problem of getting Germany into NATO or into a defense organization which started in 1952. All the time just working on France, I don't think I ever went to a diplomatic party. The ministries that we were dealing with, there wasn't a whole lot of socialization between us and; this is due to the fact that of course that we were very junior officers. The only exception to this is of course is David Bruce who had a great social life and was known. He was a remarkable man. I mean there he was, he could focus on the most mundane kinds of problems in the office and then turn around and go to some big ball out in Versailles dressed up in some eighteenth century costume. He and Vangelina were just absolutely marvelous that way and they were good for us as young people and I remember this and so does my wife all these years. What we learned from them going to parties at their house, seeing how they entertained, seeing the use they put entertaining to in terms of opening up closed areas of society – getting contact with people in a much more relaxed way. That stayed with us, so although we didn't really use it when we had kind of left bank parties that we went to in our home; but it was not in anyway a kind of diplomatic life, that was kind of reserved for the people in the "Embassy" part of things.

Q: Then you came back as Ambassador?

HARTMAN: I came back as Ambassador quite a number of years later and I had a strange combination of friends, many of them from this sort of left-bank life who used to come and see us and we'd go to see them not with my chauffeur driven car though or I'd be thrown out of the neighborhood. Then we had people who we became friendly with as Ambassadors, quite a different strata of society.

EDGAR J. BEIGEL
French Affairs, Bureau of European Affairs
Washington, DC (1948-1970)

Edgar J. Beigel began working for the State Department in the Economic Division in 1948. In 1950, he joined the Bureau of European affairs, where he remained until 1970. Mr. Beigel was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1990.

BEIGEL: At the end of that time I published an extracurricular paper on the Monnet Plan.

Q: Will you explain what the Monnet Plan was?

BEIGEL: The Monnet Plan was devised at the beginning of 1946, headed by Jean Monnet who gave his name to it, to break the bottlenecks in the French economy in five or six critical sectors, determine what they were and devise ways of breaking them; to survey the French economy, to measure where it was in 1945 as compared with 1929; and to try to project for four or five years.

I was interested not in the economics of this but in the political science of it. Was there planning in France before the war? What did it amount to? What happened during the war? What was the Monnet Plan all about? The French Information Service was very good in New York then and had a large office in Rockefeller Center and an extensive library of French documentation. So I wrote about the organization of all this and ended up having it published in the Political Science Quarterly, which is sort of a house organ at Columbia.

I showed reprints of that in the State Department when I came down in the summer of 1948, and the division chief in what was then the Division of Economic Development in the E area, said, "That's the kind of thing we are doing in this division." They hired me.

Q: Had you pointed yourself towards the State Department?

BEIGEL: Well, I had a notion about that. In any case, I had once taken the Foreign Service exam when I was still in the army in 1945, and actually took the oral. As I had passed the written exam they said, "You didn't really pass the oral, but you can come back in a year and take the oral again without having to take the written again." But I didn't go back as I was at Columbia. So I went into the civil service, in the E area.

Q: E being the economic area at State Department.

BEIGEL: Yes, it is now called EB.

For about a year or two I served in the Western European section of this division, which was organized on a global basis. The Marshall Plan had been invented in 1948 and we were very much involved in global allocations: how to cut up the pie, dividing appropriations among the European participants in the Marshall Plan. I developed a close relationship with the political desks in the Western European Division and in 1950 there was a Department reorganization and part of the E area moved into the geographic area. I moved over and joined the Bureau of European Affairs.

Q: I would like to move back to the 1948-50 period. In allocating the pie to the various countries, how was it done and what was the interrelationships? Did some countries have better presenters than others?

BEIGEL: I think we were smart about how to do this. We told the Europeans that they must form an organization, the predecessor of what is now the OECD in Paris, because we were advocating European cooperation leading up to "unification." Paul Hoffman, the Director of Economic Cooperation, ECA, which administered the Marshall Plan, gave many speeches on European unity. We said to them; you have this organization, tell us what your needs are. Great studies were made projecting for four years what they anticipated their overall balance of payments deficit would be. Each country tried to develop its own development plan.

The French, of course, were in the forefront having already invented the Monnet Plan. It was very simple in the French case in administering funds. In any case to divide up the pot of dollars which went for balance of payments assistance, the Europeans were told, "We are going in for a $5 billion appropriation for the coming year. We would like your recommendations of how that should be divided among you in terms of your respective national balance of payments projections.” They did that. They came in with the recommended division of the pot. Then the question was of adjusting these numbers depending upon what we knew about the programs of each country.

Q: The Eisenhower Administration came in 1953.

BEIGEL: Yes, the beginning of 1953. I was in EUR working on France, Spain and Portugal, mostly economic work on those countries, sitting with the desk officers. Then I became more involved with the military side, on the French side, beginning in 1950, because the NATO program started. The NATO treaty was signed in 1949. The big appropriation to build up European armies came after the Korean war began. I always sensed that there was a fear at the top here, in the White House, that something mischievous was going to happen in Europe. There was a great impulse that was shared with the Congress to build up the NATO forces, so that there was a massive 1950 appropriation. At the same time there was an impetus from the Joint Chiefs of Staff to the rest of the government that we needed to mobilize more manpower in Europe for the NATO armies. We must mobilize West German manpower. That was anathema to the French. Acheson had to confront the French and British because there was that group of the three Western Foreign Ministers which was a residue from the war. He met with them and pressed to bring in German manpower. We had been secretly stockpiling equipment on our own – unilaterally – out of the appropriations to build up NATO forces. There was a famous stockpile for the potential German army if and when it was formed and that was when the French invented the European Defense Community proposal which after two years of negotiation failed.

Q: Let me ask a bit, because I want to bring you back...

BEIGEL: I was getting on to the Indochina part. In 1953 it was decided that what we should do in the case of France is change the way we attribute the local currency that accrued to the recipient government from Marshall Plan balance of payments assistance. In the beginning part of this aid was on a loan basis, but for the three or four years thereafter the aid was mostly grants to the recipient governments who sold the dollars to their importers and the local currency that the importers paid into the central bank became a resource for each national budget. The U.S. had a say in how they would spend that. With some governments there were great debates on what their national economic program was.

In the French case it was more or less cut and dried because the French had the Monnet plan calling for investments in critical sectors, and proposed to attribute the counterparts funds to these programs. Then Dulles said that what we really want to do now is to attribute these funds to the French military budget for their Expeditionary Force in Indochina and in addition, to their support of the three national armies in Indochina.

Q: The three national armies being the Cambodian, Laos and the Vietnam.

BEIGEL: Which the French always called supplétifs to their own forces. They always had natives in support of their army. But the idea was to create national armies because we were promoting nationhood for those countries. The French gave support to the creation of national armies but they had their own interests, cultural and economic, in those states since they gained control of them in the 19th century. And of course they had been overwhelmed there by the invading Japanese forces. This was true throughout southeast Asia, British and French, the white man had lost face. Ho Chi Minh emerged at the end of the war with Japan and there is the famous history of all that. And then insurgency started. There was what I call the first Indochina war from 1945. By 1953 it was necessary to find out from the French the detail of the military budgets for French forces and for the national armies. There wasn't anyone in the U.S. Government who had a clue. I went to Paris and collected this information and focused attention on that.

Q: How did you get this information and how cooperative were the French?

BEIGEL: I first began to get the information through telex exchanges from the code room in the State Department in the old building on the 5th floor in those days. One could write a message to Paris and hand it in at the code room where it would be transmitted and shown on a screen in a small room off the code room. Paris received it through a military circuit through Frankfurt and, I imagine they had a similar screen in their code room. The people I was talking to, the Economic Minister, the head of the ECA mission, the financial specialist, were sitting in a room receiving this questionnaire. They would go around to the French and hand in the questionnaire. The French were very cooperative. They had a special Ministry for the Associated States which had a defense element in it that was backstopping the French Expeditionary Force in Indochina. I eventually went over and spent a week interrogating the French colonels dealing with this budget. I guess they were fascinated that this pipsqueak American could come over and ask them questions about their budget and argue with them, etc. The purpose was to find out where the water was in the budget and squeeze it. At the outset, however, that was not true. The first year it was simply a matter of attribution, but when it came around for the second year a great review exercise took place. I spent five weeks in Paris helping collect information early in 1954.

By then the Defense Department had a comptroller for the European theater who had his headquarters a block away from the embassy in Paris. I had an office with the comptroller's staff and in effect advised them on how to move things. This was considered a priority project for the NSC. And we collected this information and wrote a thick report. It came back and was submitted to the NSC with a covering political explanation and justification written by a superb member of the Policy Planning Staff who was a great Far Eastern specialist – Charlie Stelle, I believe it was. That was submitted to the NSC as a proposal from the Secretary of State who was very much concerned about getting it approved within the Administration. He didn't have any problems about the President. He had problems with George Humphrey, the Secretary of the Treasury who had a steely eye on all kinds of expenditures. In a certain sense, it may be fair to say, this presentation was designed to convince George Humphrey that we knew what we were doing.

The French had come to us in 1953, to our Embassy in Paris. Mr. Laniel, the Prime Minister, told the young American Ambassador, Mr. Dillon, "I'm taking a leaf out of Mr. Eisenhower's book. I'm trying to balance the French budget too. One of the things I am thinking of doing is dumping our $300-400 million support (in francs) for the national armies of the three associated states."

This is the real reason I spent the five weeks early in 1954 collecting detail on their own budget projections. They were in effect paying for and administering those national armies. The Laniel statement was found to be incredible back here. Did he really mean that? Did Dillon really understand him? The Secretary's counselor, Douglas MacArthur II, had been in the Embassy in Paris in 1939, and at Vichy before our invasion of North Africa. He had known Laniel as a member of parliament. Now Mr. Laniel was Prime Minister. It was decided to send Mr. MacArthur over to speak to him. He went and the telegrams came back saying yes, Mr. Dillon had heard it right to begin with. So then it was a question of really fleshing out the justification to cover the subsequent year's funding.

The French would pay out expenditures on their own forces and on these national armies and give us a voucher and we in effect reimbursed them for the voucher. This was the mechanics of transferring that assistance to the French. The first year of the combined program amounted to $785 million overall.

Q: When Laniel was proposing this was he proposing getting out..

BEIGEL: It wasn't a withdrawal; he was in effect saying that the French Expeditionary Force is staying there but I am going to stop paying for the national armies, would you like to pick up the additional bill? We said yes.

Q: But in a way it sounds like if you don't pick up the bill we are ready in the long run to get out of here.

BEIGEL: That was the implication. And of course there was always the question of the sticking power of the French. But in 1953 they were sticking. In fact their Supreme Commander, General Navarre, had devised what was known as the Navarre Plan. The spring of 1954 came around and all of this material had all been approved for a second year and was submitted to the Congress. Mr. Dulles went up to testify. This was the spring of 1954. Great presentation of the Navarre Plan- -in two years they were going to mop up Viet Minh and bring peace to Indochina, etc. Well, of course, the battle of Dien Bien Phu began early in the spring of 1954 and was going on when Dulles went up to testify. Not too much time went by when we realized what was happening. First thing we knew in the summer of 1954 there was a Geneva Conference. That whole second-year presentation came to naught. However, we were very interested that the French Expeditionary Corps not just leave. When the country was divided at the 17th parallel we were anxious the French remain there so that the Viet Minh not take over the entire country. We offered special $100 million program of support for the French.

In any case I had been heavily involved in writing a very elaborate procedural agreement in the summer of 1953 to transfer a very significant – and these were big numbers in those days – amount of aid to the French relating to the Indochina war. At the same time, my colleagues across the hall were completing negotiations of the first Spanish defense agreement.

Q: Your colleagues across the hall were...

BEIGEL: The Spanish Desk. Having gotten very much involved in the French military budget, from 1950 on, I became the resident expert on the French NATO program and particularly their budget and how it was related to what they were doing and what we wanted them to do and what our aid program would be, both on the military assistance side and the economic assistance side. And this went on for a number of years.

I had to choose whether I would work on Spain and Portugal, which became its own country directorate, or stay with France and the Benelux which were put together with France. John Leddy was then assistant secretary. It was important to him that I continue doing France, because by that time we were leading up to be evicted from France by Charles de Gaulle.

Q: What period?

BEIGEL: This is now up to 1965-1966. It was necessary to negotiate an orderly withdrawal of our military presence from France which became a major activity, for a year or more, of instructing Ambassador Bohlen in Paris on what he should be raising with the French and getting, on an overnight basis, clearances out of the Pentagon for all this which was another unique experience and operation.

Q: I would like to talk about this. John Leddy in an interview with Willis Armstrong discusses your coming in with this handwritten note from General de Gaulle for the President. Do you recall this?

BEIGEL: Oh, yes, what happened was when de Gaulle, who gave us some hints and we also had sources inside the French government so that we realized that what was about to hit the fan. When it did hit the fan it took the form of a handwritten letter that General de Gaulle sent to the President. He sent one to Adenauer, and I guess he sent one to Harold Macmillan which he considered his three principal allies. I think the General had asked the Foreign Ministry to draft such a piece of correspondence and he got it in due course. He saw what they had to suggest but wrote his own note which became a collector's item. There we had a handwritten note, a rather old-fashion way of doing inter- governmental business at the head of government level. That may be the handwritten letter referred to.

Q: We can come back and do this another time. Can we now talk about the phenomena of de Gaulle and how we dealt with him through the Department?

BEIGEL: Well, when de Gaulle left office in 1946, crossed the political wilderness as the French called it, and stayed there, there was a Gaullist party which other parties considered threatening; they got a lot of votes in some elections in parliament; there was a question of whether we would keep in touch with de Gaulle through our ambassador or DCM in Paris. I think Dillon, for example, would see de Gaulle every once in a while, just to maintain contact. When the crunch came in Algeria on the 13th of May, 1958 the Fourth Republic had diverted most of its ground forces from France and Germany down to North Africa. We had been giving various forms of support to the French forces while at the same time people such as Jack Kennedy, U.S. Senator, were speaking out very strongly about the need for self-government in Algeria. The government's problem was to behave in such a manner as to maintain a supportive relationship with France. When the crunch came, and the politicians of the Fourth Republic agreed that some very serious step had to be taken, General de Gaulle was invited by most of the parties and political leaders to come back to Paris and become Prime Minister. He met with all the political leaders and the only one who gave him a hard time was a man named Francois Mitterrand.

Q: The Socialist candidate...

BEIGEL: Well, Mitterrand wasn't exactly a Socialist, but he moved into the Socialist Party later on. He was one of the center parties then. Conservative party, if anything. In any case, de Gaulle comes into office in 1958 and the first thing that happens is that Foster Dulles knows that here is a formidable figure. Dulles knew his history and knew how difficult de Gaulle was among the allies during World War II. Eisenhower, of course, was in a fortunate position of having been the Allied Commander in Algiers and then in the invasion of France, so he had lots of relations with de Gaulle. He had a special advantage that during the World War II period he had always maintained a good relationship with de Gaulle. De Gaulle understood that Eisenhower was subject to direction by the Combined Chiefs of Staff and by the President of the United States, so that the U.S. positions on whatever the subject was weren't invented by Eisenhower. They had a good relationship, in a personal sense. The first thing that happened was that Dulles went to Paris after de Gaulle was in office a month or two and talked to him about various things around the world. As I recall, without getting into the detail of this which is all very well known, he talked about nuclear submarine cooperation and de Gaulle said that he had agreed that the French should go on with their nuclear weapons program that had begun some years before he came back into power. While we wouldn't cooperate on the nuclear weapons program maybe something could be done about developing their nuclear submarines because we had already helped the British in that respect. That was all right with de Gaulle. He said they would be exploding their first nuclear test weapon sometime in 1960, his scientists had told him. We began a negotiation. I remember Dulles went back to see him at the end of 1958.

In the interval a very important event had taken place. We had landed forces in Lebanon in the summer of 1958 and the British had landed paratroop forces in Jordan. Also in 1958 there was in the Straits of Formosa a great to-do going on between the Chinese from Taiwan, who were implanted in the offshore islands of Quemoy and Matsu and the Chinese communists on the mainland. An artillery duel. We were anxious that the Chinese communists not invade Quemoy and Matsu and take them over, etc., etc. What later became known as brinkmanship was practiced. We made public statements to deter the Chinese. In the Lebanese operation I remember a French cruiser was sent out to the eastern Mediterranean and asked for some fuel from one of our oilers in the area. Our attitude can be generalized as, "please go away." We did not really want to associate France in this venture since the French had bad relationships with the Arabs in those days.

Q: Particularly the Lebanon-Syria relationship where they had been the mandated power.

BEIGEL: Well, and notwithstanding their historic interest in Lebanon going back to the Crusades. They had been the mandated country for Lebanon and Syria and they had fought with the British during World War II over that; they had given up the mandates, etc., etc. General de Gaulle by September 1958 – who had been doing a slow burn I'm sure – formulated a letter to Eisenhower, it may have been typewritten this time, and an identical letter which he sent to Macmillan, saying that he was very disturbed by all of our unilateral behavior in the Far East and Lebanon. As you reflect on it: what if we had gotten into a war with Communist China which had then invoked its then existing alliance with the Soviet Union, then we had gotten into a tense situation with the Soviet Union and wanted in turn to invoke the North Atlantic Treaty. We could drag France into something that it had nothing to do with, etc., etc. So therefore he, General de Gaulle, was enclosing a little memorandum to suggest some new arrangements which amounted to having a council of the big three at the head of state level. They would meet to consider events all around the world. This was given its name by others, not de Gaulle as the Tripartite Directorate Proposal, which was not directed at NATO, it was global. (Later on, not at that time, de Gaulle made some speeches in France indicating among other things he wanted to have a say in the employment of nuclear weapons by the United States. Of course that had been something that the British Government had wanted and sort of got on a bilateral basis. That was an understandable interest of de Gaulle's.) This was something, of course, that the U.S. Government couldn't deliver on. The U.S. Government had mutual security treaties in a number of places – we had the Rio Treaty in the Western Hemisphere, we had several treaties in the Far East...

Q: We had SEATO and CENTO...

BEIGEL: So the answer Eisenhower gave was, well, General de Gaulle we have treaty relationships around the globe which you France do not have, and we are not elevating ourselves with several other self-selected governments above all these treaty partners, we are dealing with each set of treaty partners in its own right. Therefore we are very sorry we cannot accommodate you in that respect, but we will be very happy to have consultations with you. Dulles went back to Paris towards the end of 1958 and tried to consult with de Gaulle; we had elaborate talks at the ambassadorial level, but it all came to nothing in terms of what de Gaulle had been asking for. De Gaulle would periodically raise this with Eisenhower and he even raised it with Kennedy when he came into office. It finally petered out. One of the things that de Gaulle said at the end of his memorandum was: And by the way I will subordinate my future behavior in NATO to your giving me satisfaction on my proposal. At that time, no one knew quite what that meant.

We were conducting a negotiation with the French admirals who came over about nuclear submarines cooperation. Lo and behold we discover that General de Gaulle had announced that the French Mediterranean fleet, operating out of Toulon, which had been earmarked for wartime assignment to NATO command (just a paper transaction) he had withdrawn from that earmark. That was the first unraveling of French participation in NATO. Except this first unraveling only took the form of a statement; nothing happened in the real world.

Q: Well let me ask, this is the overall view, how were you and Western Europe looking at this and responding to it – the period from '58 up to about '65?

BEIGEL: We first learned about this from a press ticker. We used to have the French press ticker in WE – Agence France-Presse – for many years until it was discontinued. We learned about what was happening in France very quickly that way, it was a great advantage, but the price of paper made it impossible eventually. The first thing we had to do was alert the Assistant Secretary that this was what de Gaulle had just done. This was critically important because he was either on his way or on the Hill giving testimony to the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy about this agreement we were going to enter into to assist the French in developing a nuclear submarine. One of the things you have to do in such circumstances is the President has to make a determination under the Atomic Energy Act that the recipient country is fully participating in a mutual security arrangement. If General de Gaulle is beginning to withdraw forces from their NATO earmark, he is no longer fully participating, particularly on the Navy side. The whole project of going ahead with that agreement was dropped there and then. The French, even years later under new leadership, never quite understood why all that happened. But it was all the working of the Atomic Energy Act.

In 1963, four years later, the NATO commander for the Atlantic was being changed so he went to all the countries to say goodbye. He called on General de Gaulle and told him that he was very happy that all the French units in the Atlantic were kept under their NATO earmark. General de Gaulle, some people believe, may not have realized that he hadn't removed all of them in 1959 and very promptly we got notice that the rest of the units were removed. So, the French Navy was no longer earmarked. But still all the other arrangements remained in place and, of course, by 1965...

Oh, very important...in 1962 the Algerian war wound up and General de Gaulle made speeches that people mostly didn't pay attention to; however it was one of my tasks to follow these things very closely. I must say that at that time we had a unique situation in which the Deputy Secretary of State, George Ball, seemed to have a special interest in French affairs.

Q: Well he was Monnet's man wasn't he?

BEIGEL: It's true he had a personal relationship with Monnet but he did have a very keen interest in France. He fully appreciated the significance of de Gaulle as President of France. When it was announced that de Gaulle was having a press conference, and this was always announced ahead of time with a great to-do, he was vitally interested in knowing that and knowing how many days it was since the last press conference. He wanted to know right away off the ticker what it is that de Gaulle said because these were important things covering a variety of subjects. This was no longer the case. This is part of the charm of being in WE during that period. In any case, we had hints that something was going to happen about France and NATO and noises began to be made about the command relationship. I remember doing a great research on the command relationship in World War II and getting help from a colleague who was working under the exchange program with Defense, a Foreign Service officer who was working in the Joint Staff. He got the Joint Staff historical section to prepare material for me on the command relationships in World War II involving French forces.

Q: At the very end of the war there were some real problems the French were following in their area...

BEIGEL: Well that is right, there were French forces in central and then in northern Italy and then at Belfort, and then eventually at Stuttgart. There were confrontations with de Gaulle at each place.

Q: They were following their own agenda, in a way.

BEIGEL: Yes. The French military did what de Gaulle wanted. He was the French commander-in-chief and not your allied super structure. There were certain problems which were not insuperable and were worked out. In any case, this was an element that was going on then. The time came when George Ball went over and saw de Gaulle and got some hints but still couldn't figure things out. Then in the winter of 1965- '66 we got an inkling of what was coming and it happened. We had to negotiate our way out of there. It was left that we then had in EUR, and had ever since 1950, an office dealing with NATO affairs across the board. One of the bureaucratic problems and questions that had arisen within EUR, back in the 1950s was how do the geographic offices and the desks relate to the NATO office in dealing with the NATO countries on military questions. In terms of the French relationship we never had problems, partly because I had been there from the outset and remained there and went out of my way to have good relations with the colleagues in the regional office. They had confidence that I knew what I was doing. When this drama came along it was really a country problem, but it had to be dealt with both in NATO and bilaterally, but of course getting out of France was in a sense a housekeeping question. All of the instructions originated at the WE level and would get the blessing of the Assistant Secretary or his deputy. We went through 1955, 1956, and then we had long interminable discussions with France about what would happen after that.

We did negotiate, strangely enough, continued use of the pipeline that the French had built across France from the Atlantic taking U.S. aviation and other fuel into Germany. The French had built it and were operating it under contract to the Defense Department. They said well, we want that to continue. There were also what were called NATO pipelines the French had built up into Germany.

We had five airfields used by U.S. fighter planes in eastern France, and other fields used by transports, lots of ammunition depots, and we had hospital facilities. Back 1964, during the Johnson-Goldwater campaign, the Pentagon wanted to deal with the continuing balance of payments deficit with Europe – things had turned around from the 1940s. (McNamara had earlier said to Kennedy that he would try to contribute a billion dollars a year to the reduction of the balance of payments deficit, by reducing net U.S. military expenditures abroad without denigrating our missions abroad.) So one question was to go to all the principal countries in Western Europe in the summer of 1964 with survey teams. The team I was associated with was headed by a Joint Staff officer who picked service officers from real estate offices in the European Commands to form a small team. They invited the State Department to send an observer and counselor with each team and go around and visit all the military facilities – one team per country. I spent six weeks in the fall of 1964 visiting all of our facilities in France. In our final report I was asked to write the section on our relations with the French and could say honestly that everything we wanted from the French from 1950 on, although lots of hemming and hawing and problems on the French side, but eventually all of our requirements were fulfilled; and it was only a year and a half later that General de Gaulle said there would no longer be any foreign forces or installations in France.

Q: When you got this handwritten letter in WE, what was the response for there is basically two ways of doing it – one was sticking it to them the dirty bastards or two, lets take the long view.

BEIGEL: I might say that a lot of people have forgotten but Foster Dulles once gave a very important speech, which he then put into a Foreign Affairs article, as Secretary of State saying we have bases available to us around the world, but we only operate with the consent of the host governments. I think that philosophy remained. There have been a lot of people who try to strong-arm governments in more recent years, but that wasn't the attitude in the 50s and 60s. When de Gaulle said that's it, there wasn't any doubt about that. The only national forces in France were ourselves and the Canadians. The Canadians had some facilities in France. The NATO military headquarters were also in France. One of Mr. Spaak's contributions...

Q: That was Paul Henri Spaak of Belgium...

BEIGEL: Was to get his government, which reluctantly went along, to offer to receive the NATO Headquarters in Brussels. That move was made. We had in anticipation of something going to happen, the Joint Staff and European commands had already made vast studies about relocation of our facilities. Also our military supply concepts were changing and if they had to do it over again they wouldn't have built the French line of communications the way it then existed. When we were invited to leave, the government agreed to that and preparations were made. We negotiated with the French the terms and we got out in two years (instead of one) in a very orderly way. I think de Gaulle once said to Bohlen that he was very pleased that we had been as cooperative about fulfilling what he wanted to take place. But we recognized French sovereignty fully.

Q: Going back a bit, in '54 and all how were you and others looking at the colonial situation of these powers? Did you see that France and the other countries were going to be able to hold on to this at that time?

BEIGEL: Well, if people thought about it at all they could see that this was going to be a very difficult situation. By 1956 the French protectorates in Tunisia and Morocco were coming to an end. The political situation being different in Algeria, the French thought they could pacify and hold on to what they had there. That turned out to be historically incorrect. Things, in fact, got worse. There was a lot of terrorist bombing in Algiers, for example. There was a need to pacify the city of Algiers. This was actually done by 1958, 1959. I went there in the spring of 1960, the negotiations were still proceeding, the secret talks that were sort of secret, no one knew really what was going on. It was somewhat like what we were doing with the Vietnamese in Paris for a number of years. The public wasn't really informed about the contact what was going on. I can recall in the spring of 1960 that the city of Algiers was pacified. We flew down into the desert to look at the oil wells. Meanwhile, while all this was going on, down in the Sahara the French were exploring for oil and finding it, and building pipelines, building macadam road down to take supplies. This was extraordinary, the French had developed an additional economic interest in Algeria that hadn't existed in 1954. I think it is fair to say people simply adjusted to the situation. It did not come as a great surprise.

Meanwhile in 1956, 1957, 1958, the French were doing things in tropical Africa, winding up their colonial regimes. I guess 1958 must have been the big year for independence to be declared throughout tropical Africa. The French pioneered this so that it had a very serious impact on the Belgians in the Congo. What was happening in French Africa around the Congo is what led to the independence of the Belgian Congo. This in turn had an impact, by 1960, 1961 in Angola. The colonial war began then in Angola. I can remember reading interrogations or testimonies given by missionaries. One could see how the pattern developed. How the word got from one tribe to another despite language differences. In the French area of tropical Africa this really began, in that period, while they were still fighting to pacify Algeria...

Q: How did this speech, I can't recall the date, but everyone talks about the Speech Senator Kennedy made on the floor concerning support of Algeria. How was this viewed from within the EUR Bureau?

BEIGEL: Oh well, I think in the EUR Bureau, and within the Administration, certain materials were prepared at the request of Senator Saltonstall, the senior senator from Massachusetts at that time. I think it was Saltonstall who may have gotten up and made a counter-speech to the speech of the junior senator from Massachusetts. Saltonstall presented the Administration's line.

Q: Which was...

BEIGEL: Which was not Senator Kennedy's line which I would guess was that the French must wake up and grant immediate independence to the Northern Departments of Algeria, etc., etc. I can't remember what year that would have been – 1956 or 1957, somewhere in there. The French effort, which was a major effort, probably did not compare in its lethal effect to what we later were to do in Vietnam because the French simply did not have the kind of firepower deployed. They had a lot of units down there but it was small unit operations. I don't think they used the kind of bombing and artillery, and napalm that we used in Vietnam. We really beat up the Vietnam jungle much more than the French did. The helicopter, I might say, was a special thing because in the mountainous areas in Algeria, one way of living there was in caves and people would go into caves to seek refuge from French army units that were crawling around the mountains. They invented the gun ship approach of flying the helicopter and being able to shoot into the caves with automatic weapons. Of course, none of that resolved the situation. The Third World warfare that Bobby Kennedy was later to be a great proponent of was all a failure.

Q: Yes, the special forces and all...

BEIGEL: I think that continues to be a failure around the world wherever we employ it. But we continue to employ it. It is almost as if our professional forces need to be employed or they may wither on the vine in terms of appropriations and otherwise. This is a perverse aspect. It is frequently the case that a country's intentions are modified in accordance with its capabilities. When it is often said that the important thing about a power is to look at its intentions, not its capabilities, I think more people are discovering that that is false. At the time I recall wondering if the great build-up of our helicopter force when the Kennedy Administration came into office, McNamara came into office, great orders were pushed, we developed capabilities that we would then eventually employ in Vietnam. If we didn't have all that equipment, including the build-up of Navy sealift, if we didn't have that we wouldn't have engaged as extensively as we did in Vietnam. So the French were confronted with a similar situation. They engaged to the extent of their capabilities. Their intentions were beyond their capabilities.

Q: I wonder if we could go back to 1958 when de Gaulle came into power. This was not the revolt of the generals; that came a little later didn't it?

BEIGEL: Well that is right. The revolt of the generals was a more localized affair, just in Algiers, in the spring of 1961. It was soon brought under control by loyal generals.

Q: But how did we view the 1958 situation with de Gaulle coming in? What was being talked about in EUR at that time? Did we see de Gaulle coming back, did we feel it was a good thing or not? How did we feel?

BEIGEL: I suppose the fairest thing to say is that we were trying to keep up with what was probably happening as the rest of the world was. We didn't have any pipeline inside, that I can recall, the French Government or the Gaullist movement, we were strictly outside watching what was happening. An embassy has good contacts, of course, to learn what is happening, but it was seen that this was a situation as is always the case in a country like France that was going to be resolved by the French in some way. The really significant aspect of the developing political situation in a major western European country that foreign governments have any relation to is the international financial position of that country. If that country has a run on its currency, or wants to close its international markets, then other countries are concerned. There was, on a later occasion, in 1968, which was a strictly domestic development in France when the French to their surprise ended up with a general strike and their currency was under great pressure; at that time, for example, the Johnson Administration told the French Government that if they needed some standby credit to bolster their currency that we were prepared to get to that. While that helps bolster the self-confidence of a government that is under domestic pressure it's only in ways like that that other governments can really have any great impact in a country like France.

Q: Most of the time we are there reporting but try to stay out of the cross fire.

BEIGEL: We are concerned about the safety of our nationals that are in the country. If anything is happening in the country that would make it less safe for them. Of course, before 1958 came along that was not really the case. This was a quick couple of weeks, but the fuss was mostly in the churning around in the parliamentary scene, the political scene. It did not involve violence, mobilization, what have you. There was a case in 1961, the so-called revolt of the generals when we learned later there were in fact some units down at Pau; in the southwest, for example, where there was an airborne training center. There were some air force generals who were thinking about the possible mobilization of those forces. They would take paratroops up, drop them on the airports in Paris and other key places. That was at a time when they looked ludicrous at first. The then Prime Minister was calling on the public to get their hunting rifles and go out to the airport, or drive their trucks on the runways, or what have you. But clearly the French domestic intelligence service, the police intelligence service, had wind of all these things going on. The French have a very good civil, domestic intelligence service which works closely with their security service, which is the equivalent of our FBI.

EUR was bracing for what would happen. Our mission chief or DCM in Paris had talked with General de Gaulle every so often, as a kind of courtesy call. One keeps a benign contact with a person like that who is extensively out in the political desert, but you never know and this, of course, was an example when the person crossed the desert and came back into power. And into much more power than he had immediately after the war in 1945. The important thing about de Gaulle was knowing him. The leadership here which had experience since the Second World War was in office and knew that de Gaulle was a difficult person to deal with and behaved accordingly. The Secretary of State, within a month or so after de Gaulle returned to power, was making a visit to see him, an official visit. He offered certain kinds of special cooperation to him in the military field, which I think we discussed before, which ended up collapsing partly because General de Gaulle gave the first indications, which were largely not appreciated, exactly what it was leading up to in this country, but were sufficient to put cold water on the development of some special cooperation that really called for his full participation in the NATO arrangements and planning. As he began to withdraw from that the response here recognized that, and certain things that could have happened did not happen. There was public confusion about all this, but the Administrations in office were quite conscious of what they were doing and why, even though they did not always articulate this. But this is always the case, even today the press will tell us our real policy is this but the Administration is not articulating it very well and sometimes for deliberate political reasons. That was the case with France during the whole Gaullist period.

Q: It seems that even looking back on history, and I would appreciate your point of view, that in foreign relations, particularly, there has been the impression in the United States that in crisis France is there, but in other times they play kind of the spoiler as far as we are concerned. Is there anything to this or....

BEIGEL: When you talk about crisis, they are crisis in our eyes.

Q: Well, I'm thinking of the Cuban missile crisis.

BEIGEL: So we take the Cuban missile crisis. This was a bilateral confrontation between ourselves and the Soviets. The resolution of that crisis came about with the mobilization of our conventional armed forces, air force, army and navy, to close in on Cuba. I think the Soviets were aware of this. Any military attaché in Washington who was paying attention was probably aware of what was happening, although on much of public opinion here the conventional mobilization was lost. In any event, it was the beginning of a naval blockade, the quarantine as it was called. And what would proceed from that with our conventional forces I believe convinced the Soviets that the show was over. People like Dean Rusk talked about nuclear confrontation which people like General Taylor, who was in a very critical position as military advisor to the President at that time, has since written was nonsense. It struck me as nonsense, but Dean Rusk used to make lots of nonsense about a lot of things. In any case, a belief that it was such a confrontation was mythology, but it did get around. This was enough to scare a lot of Europeans. After all if we had a confrontation with the Soviets and they were engaged in a defense treaty relationship with us where would that leave them. Well, they only had to think about that and not for very long as it was all over in a few weeks. There was then the famous episode which was subsequently written up in which Dean Acheson was mobilized to...

Q: This was after he was out of office.

BEIGEL: Oh, he was out of office, yes. He was just taken on by Kennedy as a special emissary. He was a lawyer on 15th street then. He was sent as a special emissary with some types from Langley, Virginia, with the aerial photographs to show them to General de Gaulle who, the story is, after looking at the photographs through the stereoscopic devices that would give him a three-dimensional affect, said, "Tell your President we are with you." One could say to himself, what the hell does that mean? I don't know that it meant anything in particular. It was a nice gesture, a nice statement.

That was in October 1962. It is interesting that in early 1963 when he was reminded that part of the French fleet was still earmarked for NATO commitment in wartime, de Gaulle immediately took steps to withdraw that paper commitment. He also in 1962, before the Cuban missile crisis, was already redeploying French forces from Algeria, but we already knew that he had made clear internally that they were not going back to Germany from whence they had been withdrawn. And from speeches that he made, to which people didn't pay much attention here, it was quite apparent that he didn't have any intention of rebuilding the French ground and air commitment to NATO. Once he had redeployed French forces from Algeria he was going to demobilize a lot of those forces, which he did.

When was the next crisis? We had already had some crisis before Kennedy came into office. There was the crises back in 1958 which I have talked about before, in the Far East and in the Middle East, which General de Gaulle told us he was very concerned about in terms of their implications for French security and invoking our security alliances with France to get them involved in something they were not really involved in. This just added, I thought, to de Gaulle's appreciation along those lines. And despite the statement that he made to Acheson, I don't think that fit into de Gaulle's pattern of thinking. The crisis in Czechoslovakia was in August 1968. At that time, of course, we made very clear, mostly by Dean Rusk talking on background so that public opinion didn't know who was talking, but he made quite clear to the press, in some extraordinary background press conferences, that we were not going to do anything about the Warsaw Pact invasion of Czechoslovakia. That was on their side of the line. The NATO treaty was to defend NATO Europe. The President then came out and made some statements that were not written in the State Department, but were written by his Security Counselor, Mr. Rostow, a kind of warning to the Soviet Union that they should not pull a similar operation in Yugoslavia. There was a feeling then, a concern that that might happen. [I can recall looking up the minutes of the summit meetings between Chamberlain and Daladier, the summer of 1938, all of which were subsequently published. Reading the minutes of the French/British summits were rather interesting. It was apparent that Chamberlain did the same thing in 1938 as Johnson did in 1968. He made some statements warning Hitler not to move into other countries at that moment.] Well, that didn't turn out to be a Soviet plan. But at that time the French reaction – the French reaction?...Perhaps our relationship with General de Gaulle was sufficiently cool by then. For example, on the night of the operation...

Q: This was the invasion of Czechoslovakia?

BEIGEL: In August 20, 1968, the American Ambassador in London was invited to come to a cabinet meeting at Downing Street, which to my mind epitomized what was called the special relationship. The first thing the British cabinet thought of was consulting with the United States.

That is a measure of whether or not you have a special relationship. Now, what was the reaction in Paris? None whatsoever. Whatever the French were saying to each other inside their own government that night they were not talking to us. The Chargé in Bonn was invited to come around, if not to a German cabinet meeting, to the Chancellor's office. We were mobilized back here within the State Department that night.

The French reaction led to the what I would describe as a public confrontation. It was a personal thing with General de Gaulle who was of course at that time on vacation at his estate in eastern France. He deliberately called for a special French cabinet meeting to take place in Paris soon thereafter. The purpose of this, which became apparent after the fact, was so that he could issue a long 219enefited219 that he undoubtedly wrote himself saying well, what do you expect as the consequence of the Yalta Agreement the Americans made with the Russians. This was another manifestation of General de Gaulle's perverse interpretation of what the Yalta Agreement was all about.

Q: Was it perverse of the Yalta Agreement or perverse from at least our point of view of wanting to make France something special. One couldn't do much about the Soviet Union but he could certainly make sure that he was staking out...

BEIGEL: I don't know.

Q: But did you have this impression?

BEIGEL: One never knows what his motivations were unless he told somebody, wrote them down himself, and this never happened. His whole attitude about the Yalta Agreement, which was a very simple declaration on liberated Europe that called freely-elected governments in all the liberated countries in Europe. It is obvious that Stalin had no intentions of abiding by any such undertaking and that our side may have been naively idealistic in promoting such a declaration and making something of it. In any event that's all the Yalta Agreement that was germane to the Czechoslovakia situation called for. Self-government in Czechoslovakia as a liberated country. The Russians didn't have any intention of following that. So this had nothing to do with the Yalta Agreement. Nonetheless, General de Gaulle put out this great blast directed at the Americans as being responsible at Yalta for what was happening in 1968 in Czechoslovakia. It so happened that a participant at the conference at Yalta, and former American Ambassador in France, was the Under Secretary for Political Affairs for a year or so before he retired, namely Chip Bohlen. Dean Rusk asked Bohlen to prepare a counter-blast that was issued as a statement by the U.S. Government recalling what the Yalta Agreement was about, what the declaration was about. I can remember one afternoon, Bohlen's secretary frantically calling down to me, as a source of documentation over the years, please bring the Yalta Agreement to Mr. Bohlen's office immediately. I had to go down to get it out of the library and take it up. He figured I had all of this right at my finger tips.

The whole issue of spheres of influence, as if they had been agreed upon at Yalta, etc. which was all mythology, was all knocked down in this public blast. Although the leading paper in Paris had a two-page spread, by its foreign editor, explaining why de Gaulle was wrong about this and the Americans were right, it didn't affect most French politicians' thinking. Nor has it in the 20 years since then. This mythology that de Gaulle implanted is really set in the French political mind, believe it or not. It was in this country as well because it did become an article of faith to the GOP that this was another nefarious action by Franklin Roosevelt; and that did not stop being a Republic Party position until, for some curious reason, Ronald Reagan made a public statement that it was all wrong.

In any case later that year it was decided that the NATO Foreign Ministers should meet at the United Nations. This was probably in October, two months after the Czech affair. The French Foreign Minister, Mr. Debré, came (this was a closed session and in effect a meeting of the North Atlantic Council in New York) and characterized the invasion, and I think he also did so publicly, as just an accident on the highway of history. At one time General de Gaulle even made reference to nefarious broadcast by German radio stations that may have encouraged the Czechs in their Prague Spring approach to life. The Czechs needed no encouragement from foreign radios. This gave the flavor of how de Gaulle approached this. Of course, the real significance of all of this was that it brought down, like a house of cards, an endeavor that de Gaulle had undertaken as part of his own eastern policy, if you want to call it that. He had made visits to Poland and the Soviet Union and there was apprehension here as to what this would lead to. People like the Alsops, Joe Alsop in his column, even wondered if de Gaulle intended to reverse his alliances. Nothing like that happened, but it indicates how anxious some people were as to what de Gaulle had up his sleeve. As a matter of fact he was trying to create a new atmosphere with Moscow. France would play a role of bridging East-West differences, etc. All this collapsed with the invasion of Czechoslovakia. De Gaulle never publicly admitted it and never got to write about it in his second series of memoirs which ended just after the first volume was completed – he died with only the beginning of the second volume. That event in the fall of 1968 along with what had happened in the spring of 1968 domestically, I think, was very discouraging to de Gaulle. There is some reason to believe that in the spring of 1969, when he called for another referendum on the reformation of the French Senate and local government, he realized that he was going to lose that referendum. When he did he promptly announced his retirement from public life. He resigned as President. I believe that these events of 1968 he may have found very discouraging both domestically and for his foreign policy. So this was the real effect of those events even though in terms of French-American relations they certainly stirred up a lot of dust.

Q: Did you have the feeling that we were trying to mend fences with France and that de Gaulle didn't want those fences mended for his own personal or political reasons?

BEIGEL: No, I think he was convinced of his own policies and what he was doing. The fence-mending part refers to a number of people in this government, and we are now talking about the end of 1968. But from the period of 1964 on, when Lyndon Johnson succeeded to the Presidency (at the end of 1963 he gave an anonymous interview to a columnist of the Washington Evening Star, who was well-known in Washington as being close to Johnson, about relations with de Gaulle). The attitude here was that General de Gaulle had pushed himself away from the table and whenever he wants to come back to the table we would be perfectly delighted to resume the relationship. But it was up to General de Gaulle. I consider that that was a very significant statement and characterized the entire Johnson Administration's relationship with de Gaulle. I don't think de Gaulle and Johnson saw each other at all except at a memorial service for Chancellor Adenauer.

Q: ...the Kennedy funeral.

BEIGEL: They met at the Kennedy funeral, but at that time, Johnson had been briefed that Kennedy had been arranging for de Gaulle to make a visit to the U.S. possibly an informal visit to Hyannis Port and/or Palm Beach. It was ostensibly projected for the spring of 1964, so Johnson, knowing that, made some allusion to that and de Gaulle made it clear, not to the President, but before he left town he had the word passed that anything about a meeting would be arranged through the usual diplomatic channels. Well, that turned out to be a signal that de Gaulle had no intention of going through with a visit. It turned out that the only time that they did see each other was in Germany. It is interesting that a French satirical paper characterized that meeting in a cartoon showing a photograph of the two men standing at a table greeting each other; under the table the cartoon had them kicking each other in the shins. The French understood that that was the relationship, which was perfectly suitable to General de Gaulle who seemed to want to have an arms-length relationship.

He of course was heavily involved in Vietnam. He had already had his summit meeting with Kennedy in the spring of 1961 when he warned Kennedy that France had been through all this in Indochina and his only advice was: don't you go through it. Kennedy didn't pay any attention to that – Laos was the issue at that moment. Kennedy began building up the forces and I never knew what the full motivation was, whether there was any religious interest in the back of Kennedy's mind with the strong Catholic regime in Vietnam. Nothing was ever said about that or even suggested. We had this great military build-up in our capabilities that were quite suitable to use in that part of the world. When you have them you frequently use them. In any case, we got involved and General de Gaulle in fact, I think it was in 1966, went out to Phnom Penh and made a big speech which was interpreted as an attack on American interventionist policy in that part of the world. We weren't going to resolve this situation in that part of the world through military intervention, he kept telling us, and we kept not believing it until we convinced ourselves.

So there was that tension in our relationship which became increasingly polemical throughout the Johnson Administration, particularly after 1965. De Gaulle was watching this in Paris and not giving much support. There were Frenchmen involved in some of our negotiations, but that, I think, all came after Johnson and de Gaulle both left office.

Q: From your vantage point did you see a return to mending fences after the departure of de Gaulle between the United States and France?

BEIGEL: Well, when you mend fences you have to find which fences. Basic relationships between the two countries were in no way affected by these foreign policy differences. The basic economic relationship between the two countries, all the commercial, trade, travel relationships, were developing rapidly. There was a steady expansion in the economic relationship which is the fundamental relationship between the two countries. Then we had a very special and somewhat artificial situation, namely the military relationship. That was a relationship between governments. The public read about things in the newspapers. There were certain numbers of military personnel involved, but this was a very special thing. Of course as long as we had a presence in France, which went on until 1967, the French public in those parts of the country where we were implanted, were aware of our presence. But that again was a rather special thing affecting a limited part of the French population. It affected practically none of the American population except some thousands of troops who were present there. Otherwise when de Gaulle, for example, invited us to leave, well this became a public event, a media event. There was interest in Congress but for the vast part of public opinion there was little overall impact, although there was more reporting on France in the newspapers. Bohlen in his memories said this was certainly the most traumatic event in French-American diplomatic relations since the end of the war. Certainly the most traumatic event during the Johnson Administration and during Bohlen's tour in Paris which covered most of the Kennedy and Johnson Administrations. This was a very significant diplomatic event. But it was a diplomatic event at the government level. When you talk about fence-mending there is the question of well, what about that military relationship? Well, that relationship was defined by the French; we weren't withdrawing anything. It was the French who were withdrawing. It was General de Gaulle, himself, who agreed very promptly to a publicly-known but classified agreement that he made through his chief of staff with the NATO military command, which was approved by the NATO governments. That is an agreement that for the last 23 years has, I guess you might say, governed French relationships with NATO under which all kinds of contingency planning takes place...

Q: It's basically a de Gaulle agreement with NATO which took immediate effect, we didn't have to wait for de Gaulle's...?

BEIGEL: That all happened right away. It was announced on the floor of the French parliament. The agreement wasn't revealed but it was announced that there was such an agreement and that has governed the French Government's approach ever since. The extent that you have contingency planning and exactly how it develops is up to each French Government to define, but the institutional framework was established then and has never changed. No French Government has ever contemplated the notion of simply restoring the paper commitment of their forces. All French Governments say well, you see all of these contingency arrangements come into affect only if the French Government agrees in the time of a crisis.

The historic fact is that participation by any NATO government in coalition warfare takes place only when that national government decides; there is nothing automatic about NATO going to war as a coalition of governments. The governments must all agree as national governments. That is the basic fallacy of all de Gaulle policy I NATO, in pretending that in some way the Supreme Commander, an American general, could order French forces into action contrary to the wishes of the French Government. I think it was General Lemnitzer, the Supreme Commander, who came back to a series of Congressional investigations, there were at least three separate Congressional investigations, in the spring of 1966, about the whole situation in NATO. He said at one of these hearings, "I cannot order a French soldier to cross the street without the concurrence of his own government."

There were some members of the French parliament who opposed de Gaulle's decision. There was a debate in the spring of 1966, in the French parliament, and a vote, but of course the opponents of this policy were in the minority and the subject has never been discussed since. One or two maverick generals have said or written that France made a mistake and ought to correct it, but nothing has ever come of it.

Q: But also there has been the underlying cooperation between joint military maneuvers, the whole thing, so that the structure is still there.

BEIGEL: That's right. In 1960 the first French nuclear device exploded over the Sahara desert. This had been a program which had been in effect some years before General de Gaulle returned to office. He simply reconfirmed that it should go on. The French began developing nuclear weapons all on their own. They began developing a bomber that would carry bombs, land-based missiles that could carry a nuclear warhead, and nuclear submarines. They were doing all of this on their own. When they had achieved their bombers (the French were superb in aeronautical design historically), we started talking about coordinating their nuclear force with allied, meaning U.S. and UK, forces.

The French said no, after we develop our various generations of nuclear weapons we will think about it. And that continued to be their view during the Gaullist period, and after de Gaulle departed that continued to be the French view. Other than whatever contingency arrangements exist about the use of the French tactical nuclear weapons with allied weapons, mostly ours, as far as the bombers and missiles are concerned they are all on their own. This coordination to my knowledge never existed while I was in the Department.

There was concern here that if you have strategic weapons that you are going to fire you want to coordinate them with someone else who is firing them, but that's mostly a matter of convenience and economy and not having your own missile suddenly knocked down by someone else's missile exploding...

Well, I always considered all of this, which was looked on with utmost of importance in our own National Security Staff to be a great charade. Mr. McNamara, who had a lot to do with developing this, has only since he left office come around to this view himself. Heavens, he said, don't ever think you are going to use any of these weapons. This is all a deterrent. We haven't really gotten over that. That historic period in our military armament is winding down but all so slowly. With the French it is very curious because the French decided that they would develop their systems. The Gaullist party, headed by Mr. Chirac, was hell bent to increase the number of nuclear submarines they would build, far beyond the number they actually built. Mr. Chirac was of the school that thinks you must have a huge panoply of nuclear weapons. The Socialists, before they returned to office in 1981, after something like 23 years, didn't know much about what was going on and were rather anti all of this. They sorted themselves out and endorsed the nuclear weapons program and have contributed to its further development. They have developed multiple-warhead missiles for their submarines so that the actual number of vectors, as I call them, or warheads that they could employ is up in the hundreds, far greater in number than the British ever dreamed of having, even with their nuclear warheads that are coming along.

So the question arises: if the Americans and Soviets reduce nuclear weapons and restrain themselves, where do the British and French fit into that? President Mitterrand, has articulated a position on all this. He considers that we and the Soviets are involved in over-armament by far and that the two super-powers would have to vastly reduce the number of their arms before they would get anywhere down to the dimensions of where the French would seriously consider participating. I think the British have now elucidated a similar line. This is where we now stand.

You might ask whether there are disagreements and tensions as a consequences of all this. I don't think so. One of the very interesting things that we did in these so-called disarmament negotiations with the Soviets, was that when the Soviets talked about the French and British nuclear forces we took very explicit exception to their statements and said no way would what we were doing affect the British and French. And the British and French appreciated that position. In 1963 the French negotiated with Henry Kissinger a statement that was put out as a NATO Council statement recognizing that the British and French had their independent nuclear forces which contribute to the over-all NATO deterrent. That was a phrase which I think the French Foreign Minister invented but which we embraced. So the French were very grateful and have frequently referred to that phrase as the American acceptance, after many years, of the legitimacy and the valid contribution of the French nuclear forces to the over-all deterrent.

Of course Mitterrand has steadily said that French defense doctrine in Europe is one of strategic deterrence; that that is the salvation of French national security. He does not subscribe anymore than the French Government under de Gaulle did to what was developing then as the so-called graduated response of the NATO nuclear forces which was adopted as NATO doctrine. It had to be adopted unanimously and was only adopted after France withdrew from the integrated command and from those bodies that would adopt such doctrine. That doctrine, the current NATO nuclear doctrine, was adopted only in 1967 once the French withdrew. Mitterrand has said, and he said only a month ago, that in his view the NATO doctrine must change in the coming period. I foresee that we may have new tensions with France.

A. LINCOLN GORDON
North Atlantic Treaty Organization
Paris (1949-1950)

Ambassador A. Lincoln Gordon taught at Harvard University and then held a variety of positions in the United States Government, specifically as an economic expert dealing with the Marshall Plan and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in Europe in the 1940s and 1950s. He was appointed ambassador to Brazil by President Kennedy in 1961 and held that position until 1966, when he became Assistant Secretary for Inter-American Affairs in the State Department. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1987.

GORDON: In 1949 I went to join Harriman's staff in Paris as head of the Program Division. I had an immense amount of business to do with Richard Bissell, who was the third ranking man in the Washington setup after Hoffman and Foster, and was the key man in the presentation of the program each year to the Congress. He used to say that the year was divided into two parts: the Congressional presentation half and the working half. So we had all kinds of overlapping interests in various policy matters. And most of our correspondence was done either by Airgrams, did we call them Airgrams in those days?

Q: Yes, we did.

GORDON: . . . or by telegrams, cables.

Q: And the cables I think you might want to comment. The cables at that point were, although they were administered by the State Department, . . .

GORDON: They were signed by . . .

Q: . . . by Harriman and here in Washington by Hoffman.

GORDON: That's right. It was because they were the special series for the ECA, for the Marshall Plan. Yes, and then, of course, we had five-letter codes to indicate that. The ones to Harriman's office were called Torep. And the ones from Harriman's office to Washington were REPTO. Those from Harriman's office to the country mission were also called REPTO. The ones to the country missions were called TOECA, or was it ECATO?

Q: ECATO?

GORDON: Yes, TOECA, that meant Washington. That was the headquarters, and ECATO was from Washington to individual country missions. So those messages were signed by the heads respectively, just as in a State Department series they'd be signed by the ambassador at that end. But the telephoning was by shortwave radio, and it would fade in and out. We lived in a wonderful eighteenth century house in Versailles built by one of Louis XIV's courtiers. There was only one telephone in the house, and it was in a little cabinet, as if it were a public telephone. It was a very primitive instrument in a long and rather drafty hall. We were six hours ahead of Washington, and Bissell often had the notion of calling me about four or five o'clock in the afternoon Washington time, which is ten or eleven o'clock in Paris. Sometimes I would have already gone to bed and I'd be called down to this cold drafty hall and have to shout. My wife used to say, "You're shouting so loud you can be heard directly all the way to Washington." It would fade in and out. We often said, "Oh, let's put into a cable whatever it is you're trying to say." But the cable part of it did work smoothly. I suppose the cabling was also done by radio, come to think of it . . . No, I suppose most of the cabling was done literally by under-water cable.

Q: I'm sure. Linc, I'd like you to speak to the flexibility the organization had. I don't know whether you recall this, but at one time, I think just before you were returning to Washington directly for Mr. Harriman. You had made a trip to all of the missions, and you were appalled, as I recall, at the fact that very mission was organized like every other mission.

GORDON: Um hum.

Q: And I was in a meeting, I was then the head of the organization and management office, and you said, "Why should this be so?" Do you recall that?

GORDON: Yes I do, I do.

Q: That was a very important event in our organization.

GORDON: That I didn't know, but the logic of it seemed to me to be quite contrary to that. Take for example the business of the counterpart funds, which were a very important part of each mission's responsibility.

Counterpart meant the local currency equivalent when we provided a European government, let us say the Dutch government, with money with which to buy some sort of imports from the United States. In the case of farm machinery, for example, they would receive this money in dollars. The dollars would be spent to buy the farm machinery, but the government didn't use the farm machinery itself and it would acquire as a result some guilders, the local Dutch currency, from the farmers or the farm machinery distributors. Basically, the actual commercial transaction would be between some American manufacturer of farm machinery and some Dutch importers. So the Dutch government ended up with what we called the local currency counterpart of the original dollar grant. Six percent of it – was it six? Was reserved . . .

Q: I think so, at first.

GORDON: . . . to the United States government and was used basically for administrative expenses. Although it turned out in some countries that that was much larger than necessary, and I think we gave a lot of it back, didn't we? Most of it was in the hands of the European government concerned, but the statute provided that the use of it required the consent of the United States government. That responsibility was normally delegated to the country mission.

The purpose was partly to exercise some restraint on excessive government expenditures in inflationary situations – in France, for example, with a rather weak government under their then constitution, the Fourth Republic. There was always a tendency to do what we in the United States do now, to run very large government fiscal deficits. And they were not as successful at controlling inflation as we seem to have been in recent years, so that there was a constant battle to try to exercise some influence over the French to reduce those deficits. Control over the use of counterpart turned out to be a rather effective instrument, because we simply wouldn't release the counterpart unless there was restraint in the rest of the government budget.

JACK B. KUBISCH
Junior Assistant to the Ambassador
Paris (1949-1950)

Ambassador Jack B. Kubisch was born in Missouri in 1921. He joined the Foreign Service in 1947. His career included positions in Brazil, France, Mexico, and Washington, DC, and an ambassadorship to Greece. Ambassador Kubisch was interviewed by Dr. Henry E. Mattox in 1989.

Q: One of you two early posts was Paris, as part of the Marshall Plan operation, and you were an assistant to Averell Harriman?

KUBISCH: That's correct, in a sense. I was a very junior assistant.

Q: But you were with, or near, or around Averell Harriman?

KUBISCH: To some extent, yes.

Q: Your impressions of him, please?

KUBISCH: Well, my impressions of Governor Harriman, as he like to be called later, were always very favorable. He was a very dedicated and hard-working man, and I think he served his country admirably in his posts abroad.

Not to his knowledge at the time, we used to refer to him as "Honest Ave the Hairsplitter," because he was very meticulous about what he did and how he did it and very thorough.

I should add that my assignment was basically in organizational and management matters and in helping to establish ECA or Marshall Plan missions in several countries. I had been transferred to Paris to do this work because of some related work I had done earlier in my first assignment in Brazil.

Q: What did you do exactly? What did you do precisely to carry out this responsibility?

KUBISCH: In Paris?

Q: Yes.

KUBISCH: Well, I worked with the Administrative Division of OSR, the Office of the Special Representative, as it was called.

Q: Who was Harriman?

KUBISCH: That's correct. Ambassador Harriman. And I worked with the Administrative Division's personnel and others in setting up certain jobs and positions as the organization was being established.

I had several co-lateral assignments. I was sent to the Marshall Plan mission in Paris, which was really just a couple of blocks away to fill in when an administrative officer was absent from that mission for some weeks.

Q: Before we get away from that, there is one thing that interests me. The reputation of Harriman. As I recall, he had a rather fierce reputation, did he not, of biting people's heads off and things of that sort?

KUBISCH: Well, possibly. I think that there are probably others that are being interviewed who worked much more closely with Ambassador Harriman than I did, who would be better qualified to comment on it.

But I do remember one occasion, in Paris, and I saw examples of it later, in Washington and in Brazil, when he came to Brazil once when I was there the second time in the early '60's, where he could come down on people pretty hard. I remember one meeting, he was present and presiding, and some of the senior officers, I was not one of them in Paris at the time, but some of the senior officers were saying they had had a meeting with representatives of other governments and countries in Europe. They were discussing a certain issue. They were planning to pursue this discussion with these representatives of other governments several days later.

Harriman said something to the effect about, "Well, have you worked out the United States position and do you have a draft of it prepared to table?"

One of the responsible senior officers, I forget who it was at the moment, said, "Well, no, we were going to go and see what the other governments thought."

Harriman did sort of have a semi-blow up saying, "You know, don't ever go into a meeting without your own draft to put on the table that you can show to others. Then you can get their suggestions and comments on it. And you can adjust it or negotiate it. But if you wait for them to put their draft on the table first, you are at a disadvantage." Words to that effect.

MELBOURNE L. SPECTOR

Deputy Personnel Officer for European Region, Economic Cooperation Administration
Paris (1949-1951)

Melbourne L. Spector was born in Colorado in 1918. He received a bachelor's degree in political science from the University of New Mexico. After college, Spector worked for the United Pueblos Agency, as a teaching fellow. From 1945-1948, Mr. he served in the U.S. Army. His Foreign Service career included positions in France, Mexico, Latin America, India. This interview was conducted by W. Haven North on September 12, 1996.

Q: They were people on the G.I. Bill, getting college benefits to study abroad.

SPECTOR: Yes, we got some of our very best people that way. In order to delegate that personnel authority, we had to have a personnel manual with all the rules and regulations. So I was put in charge of getting, as quickly as I could, a manual out. I had two very good people working for me, two ladies, and we got a manual out in about 60 days. Then with that, authorized the ambassador to Paris, the head of the office of the special representative, to have personnel authority.

I went back to the State Department towards the end of the year, because I did not intend to make my career with the Marshall Plan at that point. I was really not invited to make myself through the Marshall Plan. I was married in November of '48, working happily in the Office of Personnel at State, and now in recruitment and handling our work on the logistics for the selection boards.

Then early in 1949, I got a letter from the Director of Personnel in Paris, whom I knew and had worked for previously in the War Relocation Administration during the war, asking me if I'd like to come to Paris as the Deputy Director of Personnel of the Marshall Plan in Europe. Needless to say, I jumped at the chance, and my wife and I went to Paris in April of 1948.

Paris was a wonderful place to be in those days because of, one, it being Paris, but two, the whole ferment around the Marshall Plan, and we all thought we were doing an important job for an important cause. Everybody was new. I like to quote Charles Mee in his book, The Marshall Plan. He says, "To be young, to be American were wonderful things in the late forties. To be one of Averell Harriman's aides or an aide to one of his aides was transcendental." Well, I was an aide to an aide to an aide, but I can tell you, it was transcendental. I think we did some very, very good things in the Marshall Plan.

In the personnel office, our problem there was really to, again, speed up actions and not take an interminable time to process things. After I'd been there two or three months, the Director of Personnel asked me to do a study in the personnel office. We had about 40 employees. The Marshall Plan in Paris had about 800 employees, and as you know, we had missions in all of the European countries of Western Europe, Greece, and Turkey. So I did what was an organization and management study of the personnel office, and I did it knowing all the people, and I did it with them. I didn't come in as an outsider. Being new, I knew them and they knew me. Instead of really coming out with a study that I laid on the desk and said, "Do this," we worked out the procedures and processes as we went along, which is the best way to do an organization study.

As a part of the administrative office in Paris, there was an Office of Organization and Management. The head of that was a man named Jack Kubisch, who left the Marshall Plan to make his way in the private sector, with a plan, he said, to come back at a higher level, which he did much later.

Q: When he was Ambassador to Greece.

SPECTOR: To Greece, that's right. He came back in as a deputy AID director. So they assigned me to the Organization and Management section, where I tried to put into effect what I considered to be a kind of sensitive way of doing management reform.

At the end of 1950, I came down with a bad case of hepatitis. I was out for about six weeks, and somebody gave me a book to read by Stewart Chase called The Proper Study of Mankind. That's a part of a quote from Alexander Pope, "The proper study of mankind is man." It turned me on to the whole subject of really a personal psychology as the basis of personnel, as the basis of organization. I resolved then to learn a lot more about psychology and about people in organizations if I were going to be a better personnel person or organization person. I actually went into some kind of psychotherapy with an American psychiatrist who was with the U.S. Public Health Service in Paris named Mottram Torre.

I had Dr. Torre meet with our whole organization and method staff in a kind of sensitivity-training session, although we weren't calling it that in those days. What I was really trying to get them to do, and myself to do, was to be aware of the problems that the other people had in their organization. So when you went in, you weren't just coming in with all your brilliance and brains and finding brave new wonderful ways of doing things, but you were working with the people in the offices to find a better and more efficient way of doing it. I think we were partially successful in that. That's a philosophy I've carried down to this present day.

Q: What sort of direction were you getting when you were in Paris? Averell Harriman was in charge of the mission at that time, is that correct?

SPECTOR: Yes.

Q: What were the manifestations of his direction that you yourself were getting?

SPECTOR: To tell you the truth, Harriman did not care very much about organization or administration. I think he took it as kind of a necessity; it was there. He didn't care much about it. So we didn't get much direction from Harriman. Harriman was concerned, and I think he had to be, really, with the relationships with the Marshall Plan countries, the way they were organizing themselves to deal with the problem, which I think was his greatest contribution.

As Lincoln Gordon has said in his oral history interview, Harriman, General Marshall, and Paul Hoffman said, "You European countries decide what you want to do and how you want to go about it, and you organize yourselves into a group. We'll deal with that group, and that group will help everyone decide how the resources should be allocated to each country." Harriman worked out things like that.

Down at my level, I really did not get much from Mr. Harriman, although I had the greatest admiration for him. I think when I was working in Organization and Management, where I really worked more closely with the program was with Lincoln Gordon, who was then the head of program for the ambassador. By that time, Harriman had gone back to Washington to be the Coordinator of Mutual Security, and I think William Foster was the head of the Marshall Plan in Europe. Lincoln Gordon had just come from a trip to most of the missions, and he said, "I don't understand why every mission should be organized like every other mission and have more or less the same administrative resources to do their job. Why does every mission have to have an industry officer? Why does every mission have to have a tourism officer?" I'll never forget, he said, "That's like saying that a size 38 coat will fit every man."

So under the direction of my new boss, a man named Harry Fite, he brought over from the Bureau of the Budget in Washington a couple of budget persons, and the three of us tried to work out a new kind of budgeting of administrative resources to be more in line with our policies and goals that we had in consort with each country. This, I really think, was the predecessor to much later in the State Department, you may have heard about the comprehensive country program system that was tried in the early sixties, and went on even later in the PARA, Policy Analysis and Resource Allocation, which was run by Policy Planning and Coordination staff of the Department in the late sixties and early seventies.

We didn't get too far with it. Then the Korean War came along. The Korean War just changed all of our objectives in Europe. I'm not sure quite when NATO was being set up, but NATO was a big thing. Eisenhower was made the head of the military part of NATO. We gave some help to the NATO people in setting up their offices in Paris. Especially I remember meeting with General Gruenther on General Eisenhower's staff to help him set up a system for hiring of Foreign Service nationals, and giving him a general briefing on the salaries and so on that he could expect to pay for Foreign Service nationals.

But in 1951, I was asked to come back to Washington to become the Deputy Director of the Economic Cooperation Administration's personnel office in Washington.

Q: Before we move there, as you were hiring people, was there a concern that organizations like to get bigger? Particularly when you're hiring in a hurry and trying to put something together, I would think this would be a wonderful playground for people who wanted to build up empires and really have a lot more people or even tasks that maybe were inappropriate for what you were doing. Was there some control over this?

SPECTOR: Yes, we tried. For example, you couldn't set up a new position without having to go through at least two controls. One was the budget control, and we had a very good budget office run by a lady named Gladys Parson, who much later became a Foreign Service officer and started a women's program in the Department of State many years later. She was a very tough budget officer.

Then they had to pass muster of my organization section which we had to set up the job, and we had to satisfy ourselves that job was really needed. So we did have some kind of a control. It wasn't the firmest control in the world, because, frankly, we had a lot of money. As compared with the poor Department of State, we had all the money in the world, and we could do, so money was really not an object. It was just whether or not you had good management. Luckily, we did.

At the top of administration was Leland Barrows, who later became a Foreign Service officer and ambassador. He was a career public servant who had run many other organizations, and his deputy was Everett Bellows, another career administrative man. None of us were in there to build up big bureaucracies, frankly. But it could have happened.

Q: How did you deal with the various AID directors in different countries? Did they become their own little dukedoms?

SPECTOR: Yes, they were little dukes. One of the things that made them little dukes was that by law, they ranked second to the ambassador – by law – which, by the way, didn't make the deputy chiefs of missions very happy around the circuit. These were powerful men, men like David Bruce, Tom Finletter, former Secretary of the Navy, Zellerbach, of Zellerbach Paper, who was our mission director in Italy. So these were men who had run big organizations and thought they knew what they were doing.

I would like to get on this money question for just a second, because there built up a kind of envy, I think, on the part of the regular Foreign Service to the people who were in the Marshall Plan, and I think, probably, for good reason. I think our jobs were probably graded a little higher, whereas the rank in the Foreign Service was in the person. They had to wait for their promotion by the selection boards, and State Department was perennially underfunded and probably cut down the number of promotions based on the funds available. In that Marshall Plan people could also travel. I'm talking now about traveling for business purposes. But there was lots of money for travel. We had the counterpart funds to be used for that, whereas the State – then and now – and I'm talking in 1988, probably still doesn't have the necessary funds for the travel it ought to be allowing its officers to use.

Q: You might explain counterpart funds.

SPECTOR: When grants were made to these Marshall Plan nations, they were supposed to match the grants with their own local currencies, which then were to be put into a fund and to be used jointly under the command of the Marshall Plan people and the country itself. Ten percent of those funds, I believe was the amount, was set aside to be used for administrative purposes by the Marshall Plan people. That was a great deal of money, and the first few months was used pretty wildly. We were always having meetings in Paris of the industry officers or the agriculture officers or the labor officers. The champagne flowed very freely.

A man who showed up at every one of those parties was Art Buchwald, who was the local food editor for the Paris edition of the New York Herald Tribune. That's how we all got to know Art Buchwald. He had a very small salary of $200 or $300 a month that came out of the Army Stars and Stripes, and Art used to come and freeload.

On the other hand, I think the Marshall Plan was good for the Foreign Service in that because it had this kind of money, it was able to take a more liberal interpretation of the rules and regulations of the Foreign Service. For example, in 1948, when you were accumulating time toward your home leave, if for any reason when you were at post you had to return to the United States for compassionate leave, say a death in the family or whatever, the Foreign Service made you start your home leave all over again from the time you got back to post. You could be 18 months toward your 24 months of home leave, and if you came back with the approval of the Department, your home leave began all over again. That was strictly because of trying to save money. The Department then was badly, badly managed of what financial funds that it did have.

We said, "This is ridiculous. If somebody returns from compassionate leave or any leave approved by his or her superiors, there's no reason to begin again." So we got them to change the regulations. State didn't want to do it because of their "lack of funds," but we did it, and they had to do it because of equity. I think from that standpoint, we were a good influence on the Department, because then the Department budget people could go to the Congress the next year and say, "Look, we just have to have more funds because we can't allow our people not to have the same things that the people in the Marshall Plan have." So we were always a step ahead, and the State Department came up behind us. I think from that standpoint, we did good things.

We used to use the Marshall Plan Act to amend the Foreign Service Act. Later we were able to get through much better medical care for dependents and medical travel, using the Foreign Assistance Act, and therefore amend the Foreign Service Act.

Q: When you were in Europe and working on personnel, were you getting suggestions or examples that came from the various missions that you had then put into practice? Was this a constantly evolving situation as far as personnel management?

SPECTOR: I think we got ideas about better recruitment. I don't remember getting any real ideas, frankly. Maybe we were just numb to them; I'm not sure.

I would like to talk about one thing, Stu, that I did in my job in organization. There were two foreign information programs going on in Europe. The Marshall Plan had its own large information program. Of course, as I told you, having all this money, both dollars and counterpart, they were able to issue magazines, able to have fairs of all kinds of information, able to start scholarships sending people back to the United States for training, and you also had the Department of State's cultural information program as part of the Department of State. So you had, really, two information programs going in all of your diplomatic missions. You had the Marshall Plan's information program, and you had the State Department's cultural and information program.

I was sent on a trip to Turkey and worked out with the ambassador there a trial run at combining those two information operations into one and under one head, staffed both by Marshall Plan and State Department people. I think this was really a forerunner to the United States Information Agency's operation, because it was fairly clear that you didn't need two or three different information programs going.

I think that's about all I can say about my sojourns in Europe.

Q: You were going to talk about the problem of communists in personnel. We are talking about the beginning of the Cold War and the start of the McCarthy era and all that.

SPECTOR: Yes. You're talking about early 1948, late '47, when they were talking about the Marshall Plan Act. One of the ways that I believe the administration felt that it could get the Marshall Plan Act through was to impose a very, very severe security clearance test for anyone that was hired by the Marshall Plan. It was probably the most severe of any in government at that time. No one could work for the Marshall Plan who had ever been a member of an organization that advocated the overthrow of the government, and that meant that the Attorney General had a list of such organizations, and some of them were pretty far-fetched.

Q: The Black Dragon Society was one of them.

SPECTOR: Right. There was the famous Washington bookshop which caught an awful lot of people.

Q: It was a cooperative, really, on the liberal left.

SPECTOR: Right. But it was on the Attorney General's list. Actually, I had been a member of that shop, so you can make exceptions. I joined it because it was in the building where I worked, and I went in there to buy books. By signing a card, you'd get ten percent off on buying a book.

But what we did, though, which was very interesting, is that we hired people on a very quick security clearance. There were already files being built up by the House Un-American Activities Committee. There were also files by the FBI. We did what was called a quick name check, and if those people did not show up on those name checks, we hired them and sent them overseas. Later was the full FBI check. These were by the FBI, not by anyone else. As you know, a security clearance can be made by many other than the FBI. The Civil Service Commission and many departments had their own, but ours were done by the Federal Bureau of Investigation. They could take three or four months to come over. I think we had a fraction, a tenth of one percent, maybe less than that, that ever were turned out by the full security clearance.

Only much later, in 1964, did AID put in the idea that they had to get a full security clearance before anybody was hired by the AID agency, which has held up an awful lot of people.

I would like to speak to that for just a moment. I think one of the bad things that have happened in the last 30 or 40 years is that we have confused a security clearance with a qualifications check. In the old days, probably before World War II, personnel officers had personnel investigators. These were people that weren't checking security; they were checking on your references, checking on your qualifications for the position. They weren't checking on your honesty, about whether or not you had filled out your forms correctly. But later that became a security check, on whether or not you were a security risk, whether or not you were going to harm the federal government. So you had this job taken over by investigators, rather than by personnel officers. I think that's still a mistake that we make. When you're looking to a background today of a John Tower, to be Secretary of Defense, they're concentrating on whether or not he was a womanizer or whether he drank too much, but I think it would be more apt to concentrate on what kind of philosophy he brings to his position of Secretary of Defense. What are the requirements of the job of Secretary of Defense? That's how you begin this thing. Then what kind of qualifications and experience should he have?

Q: Before we go back to Washington, were you involved in the recruitment of foreign nationals, too?

SPECTOR: Oh, yes. We recruited quite a number.

Q: Where were they coming from? What type of people were they?

SPECTOR: I must say, in those days, it was mostly secretaries, messengers, because we did consider our work classified. I don't think we used very much the higher qualified people. We did use them in the information program. There we could use artists, performers, writers, and you weren't dealing with classified information. They were recruited out of the usual places, out of academia, out of newspapers, magazines, motion picture studios, and so on. So we had Foreign Service nationals working for the Marshall Plan. Probably some are still working around the world that started back then.

Q: What were the people that you were hiring doing for the most part? You said that the Marshall Plan was essentially getting the Europeans together to figure out how to help themselves, and we would supply the wherewithal. So what were we doing?

SPECTOR: In a country such as Turkey, we would help them with their agriculture, even though all of the wherewithal came through the Marshall Plan. But we based it on recommendations from the European group itself. But you helped them in agriculture, gave them ideas on industry, on labor relations. You tried to influence them as best you could. You couldn't tell them what to do, obviously, but you'd influence them. Of course, if you had a little bit of leverage behind you of the money, because you had something to say about how much money they got, you could make some influence on them.

Q: You say you couldn't tell them what to do, but if we were in a position to say, "Okay, we'll give you the money if you do this, but we won't give you the money to do that," that's telling them what to do, isn't it?

SPECTOR: Yes, yes. It was a little bit of both. You tried to work back through the European community, too. You'd try to speak with the same voice. They were probably getting the same advice out of Paris from the overall European group as the mission director or his people were getting in Ankara. That's why you needed coordination back in Paris. The people in Paris coordinated in two different ways. One, they were coordinating the work of their missions, but they were also working with the European Economic Community.

Actually, dealing with the Marshall Plan countries, the advanced countries, you have to make a distinction between the United Kingdom, France, Germany on the one side, and dealing with Greece and Turkey or Ireland on the other side. Even today, Greece, Turkey, and Ireland are developing countries, whereas the other countries didn't need an awful lot of advice. They already had institutions and they had the human resources, and all they needed really was the capital, some coordination, and some help with directing resources, timbers for coal mines, as Lincoln Gordon said. But really, to some of those countries, maybe the biggest thing was just the financial resources. But Greece and Turkey were something else, and Southern Italy, as distinct from Northern Italy.

Q: Did our staffing reflect this?

SPECTOR: Yes.

Q: Because sometimes the largest staffs tend to end up in London and Paris, and not in Ankara and Athens.

SPECTOR: See, that was the point about the thing with Lincoln Gordon. We began to cut staff in places where there was really no need for that. I remember we cut Belgium badly, we cut France, but we did not cut Greece, we did not cut Turkey, because they needed the people. Now, whether we did it as well as we could have done it, that is something else. It depends an awful lot on the mission director, as it still does.

To jump to 1973 when I was working for the State Department on staffing the whole world, that was my job working under Bill Macomber, I found out that Italy had 15 officers in its economic and commercial section, whereas Germany had about six. You compare our relations with Italy and Germany. The difference was that in Italy, you had an ambassador named Graham Martin, and Graham knew how to get people, and he liked to build up big staffs. (Laughs)

ELIZABETH A. BURTON
Statistician – Marshall Plan
Paris (1949-1952)

Statistician – NATO
Paris (1952-1954)

Elizabeth Burton grew up in Washington, DC. After graduating from Sarah Lawrence College in 1941, she worked for the Board of Economic Warfare until the end of World War II. She then worked as a statistician for the Marshall Plan in France. Throughout her career she also worked for AID, NATO and OPIC. She was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1998.

Q: How about in France, was that different? Paris was eating better?

BURTON: Yes, it was perfectly all right. There were no cars, because gasoline was in short supply. So the French were awfully nice to us, because we had everything. We had the silk stockings and the hooch and the gasoline and the cars.

Q: How were you able to tap into this?

BURTON: After I started to work, which was in the fall of '49, I had access... I bought a car, which the French couldn't do. I bought it in dollars, so I had a car and gasoline, and stockings.

Q: In '49, what were you doing?

BURTON: I wasn't doing anything to begin with. Then I realized I would run out of money eventually, and if I wanted to stay in Paris, I'd have to get a job. So I sniffed around through friends and connections. They were recruiting for the Marshall Plan at the Talleyrand at that time, and I went in there and got a job as a statistician in the Central Programming Office.

Q: It was the Hotel Talleyrand, wasn't it?

BURTON: Yes.

Q: Which was the center of American activity, or was it the center of the Marshall Plan?

BURTON: It was the center of the Marshall Plan, and gradually became the center for all of the international diplomatic operations, not to be confused with the embassy, which was on the other side of the square.

Q: Who was the head of the Marshall Plan when you started in '49?

BURTON: I can't remember, but I think it was Lincoln Gordon.

Q: What did they hire you for?

BURTON: As a statistician.

Q: This goes back to your finding out about the sewers of Antwerp?

BURTON: I don't know what it was. I don't know why they hired me, but they did. Maybe it was just that they had three slots to fill, and I was one of them, fortunately. Once I got in there, I could sniff around and find other things as need be.

Q: What were the sort of things that a statistician was working on?

BURTON: I can't remember. I remember editing papers that they gave me. This was a small office, and I think that anything you were equipped to do, you did.

Q: What was the work? Was it assembling statistics on various things?

BURTON: I'm sorry, I can't tell you. I simply don't remember. I was very new. I was getting used to things and trying to figure out how the cable system worked, things like that. I was working for a very brilliant man whose name was Ostrander, who was handling the German distributions of the Marshall Plan stuff. So I just did whatever he told me, I guess.

Q: Can you characterize the spirit of the people working on the Marshall Plan?

BURTON: Yes, they were very excited with what they were doing. There was a very competent woman there named Mary Painter, who was apparently famous in the economic field. She died only about three years ago. She had constructed a new system for something in economics. But they were young, and they were enthusiastic. I worked with Tom Shelling, later of Harvard. He taught me how to use a slide rule. It was almost like a post-graduate group. A lot of very bright, attractive, young people.

Q: As you traveled about France, what was your impression of where France was?

BURTON: Looking back on it now, I realize that France was still in a pre-World War II state. And by that I mean it was in a medieval state as well. Anytime you got to a small village in the country, there wasn't much difference between it and the Middle Ages. If you went into a house, plumbing, everything else like that. But I didn't realize it at the time. I do now, because of the vast difference between then and now. But it had remained absolutely untouched, I would say, since the early 19th Century, the Proustian days almost.

Q: Did you have any contact with the international community while you were doing this first job? The French, the British.

BURTON: Not professionally. Certainly socially, yes. I knew quite a few French people from the French Embassy here, and they were very nice to me. I had entrée in France that was, at that point, spectacular. But even then I didn't realize that. They were just old friends and they would ask me for lunch, that kind of thing. So I had a view of Proustian Paris that I didn't realize I was having.

Q: This office basically was serving more or less the same way, I take it, that your economic warfare office was, supplying statistics or information on demand.

BURTON: Oh, I think not. No, no, I think it was far more than that. The Programming Office was the hub of where and what they were distributing to the Marshall Plan countries. Everything that was allocated to the Marshall Plan was siphoned through the Paris office, so that it was an extremely important hub of what was going out. But I was just too young and too inexperienced to have much part in that.

Q: When you were back in Paris, your job was NATO. You were doing that from when to when?

BURTON: I think it was probably from around 1952 to maybe 1954. There, I really did take care of the statistics. All of the statistics that came in from Washington for all of the NATO countries, like off-shore procurement and military assistance and defense budgets, all of that came over my desk. And I stashed it away and kept it, so that if anybody came into the Marshall Plan office there and wanted to know what we were doing for Turkey, or if the defense minister from Turkey came to see the head of the NATO staff, they would have to come to me to get the latest figures.

Q: Did you find this a form of power?

BURTON: No, not particularly. It was just a service. But I cornered the market. Oddly enough, I've made most of my jobs in my life. It's a question of getting in and sniffing around to see what needs to be done and doing it. Then, usually, if you propose it right, they'll accept it. This has happened to me two or three times.

Q: Were there any particular problems in early NATO that you saw?

BURTON: No, not at all. There were the great NATO meetings in Paris twice a year, which meant that we were literally working 24 hours a day. The big noises would go in the front offices, the officers and whatnot, and they'd come out at 7 o'clock in the morning, in deciding what they were going to do, how much money they were going to give to this, that, and the other thing. They were just, at that point, rearming Germany. And it was very exciting.

Q: Did the French play much of a role, from your perspective, or were you pretty much tied to the Americans?

BURTON: I had nothing to do with the French, as such. France wasn't any more important than Turkey or Austria or any of the others. We just happened to be located there. Of course, the French kicked us out later and sent NATO to Brussels.

VIRGINIA HAMILL BIDDLE
Passport Clerk
Paris (1949-1954)

Mrs. Biddle was born in Nebraska and raised in Missouri. She was educated at Briarcliff Manor Finishing School in Westchester County, New York. In 1930 she was married to Charles W. Biddle. Joining the Foreign Service in 1946, she began her long and interesting career as Clerk/Typist at the US Consulate in Bermuda. Subsequent foreign postings include Tangier, Paris, Bangkok, Palermo and Rome. Mrs. Biddle conducted her self interview in 1994.

BIDDLE: It was February when I arrived in Paris, grey, damp and drizzly. My room at the Louiemont, where reservations were made for me, was cold, but I was reluctant to move because there was something about the shabby charm of the place that appealed to me. I liked the friendly staff, the cherry chambermaid, Marie Louise, and the little chubby cherub faced, beribboned war veteran who ran the lift so dexterously with his one arm, and even the sad eyed but obliging concierge. And it was so convenient to the embassy.

At first I was temporarily assigned to USIS, United States Information Service, known in State Department jargon as the long arm of the embassy, where my immediate supervisor was Anita Lauve. The offices were then in the annex. It was just a short stroll up the Champs Elysees from our embassy and only cobblestones away from the Elysees Palace and the British embassy. An American Baroness Pontalba from Louisiana, then a French colony, had it built in 1842 and it was called the Porta La Belle Hotel. Her architect, Ludwig Visconti also constructed Napoleon's Tomb. In 1876 Edmond de Rothschild bought the house and added a glass canopy which was considered the dernier cry of architectural fashion at that time. He died in 1934 when his son, Maurice, moved in, but only shortly. During the Nazi occupation it housed the Luftwaffe Club, and after the Liberation, the British Forces Club until 1948 when it was bought by our United States government. The offices retained a certain by-gone grandeur which I like. But I was not to be there long.

My assignment was to be in charge of the files under Miss Agnes Snyder in the passport division of the consular section of the embassy. Miss Snyder, who had once studied to be an opera singer, was a handsome woman with aquiline features and always beautifully coiffed grayish white, and sometimes blue, hair. She was a vibrant and vivid person no one ever forgot, and well known for being a hard taskmaster and the perfect classroom was the passport section. But she often displayed a very generous nature, especially at Christmas giving us all lovely little treasures found in the flea market she haunted on holidays.

In due time the note of introduction, South Trimble, Jr., my sister's brother-in-law, had given me was presented to his friend, David Bruce, who was then ambassador at the embassy. Within a few days an invitation was received to a reception at the embassy's residence, then at No. 2 Place Iena. As the Bruces were both collectors, the residence was beautifully furnished with choice pieces arranged with distinction. David Kirkpatrick Este Bruce was tall, silvered haired and distinguished. He greeted me graciously and asked about South. I replied that he was indeed very well. We both agreed what a highly regarded and fine man he was, especially for his fine legal matter, so much so that all who knew him, even those who did not, were stunned and shocked when he became an innocent victim of the violent crime wave in Washington on New Year's Eve in 1974. When I mentioned to the ambassador how pleased I was to be assigned to the embassy he smiled and in his soft southern accent said, "Well, just let me know if anything goes wrong." He had a reputation of always being very considerate of his staff. Many of his friends compared him to Thomas Jefferson, one of his own heroes. His wide knowledge ranged from fine wines to 18th century antiques to history and international politics. The man most young diplomats cared to resemble. He became one of the most outstanding diplomats of our country. And as everyone knows, the only one who eventually ever handled the so-called triple crown to the prestige posts of France, Germany and Great Britain. His wife, Evangeline Bruce, was tall, slender, willowy and chic. She was dressed in black that evening with a long rope of pearls tied in a knot. She had a delicate oval face, amber eyes, a cloud of luxurious chestnut hair. Everyone was struck by her beauty. When a child in China where her father was a Foreign Service officer in Peking, she could have been one of the beauties of the tale of the Ganges. She was erudite and elegant and so punctilious that her friends said they felt her thank you notes were written as she drove away from their functions in the car.

Peeking out from under the buffet table were their lovable floppy eared and sole eyed spaniels who played an enormous part in their lives. Their children, Sasha and David, appeared with their nanny, meticulously dressed in French and English clothes. Looking then at that lovely little child, Sasha, who but God would know that while still in her twenties she would chose to end her own earthly life in 1976. Tish Baldridge, the social secretary to Mrs. Bruce was here and there introducing and chatting with guests. It had been a pleasant occasion and I enjoyed myself very much.

Jacque de Marquet. a French born, naturalized American, to whom the Duke de Richelieu had given me a note when I was assigned to Tangier, had just returned to Paris from his lecture tour in Belgium and invited me to a concert one Sunday afternoon. It was held in a small, two-hundred year old concert hall where our seats were just above where Napoleon sat. Chopin and Liszt used to play here and the acoustics were said to be marvelous. Before M. de Marquet returned to Tangier, we went out to Neuilly for lunch and again for dinner. He was very fond of Neuilly.

At long last my effects arrived. They had presumably been held up by strikes. Argeti who packed them in Tangier was so concerned he wanted me to let him know at once and in what condition they were. So I spent my weekend unpacking and getting settled. Of the apartments I had seen, none seemed satisfactory. Strikes occurred frequently, especially in winter, to complicate the transportation situation. As the Louiemont was just behind the embassy, I could be at my desk in five minutes without being confronted with the problem. Not being skillful with the skillet, I was not eager for domesticity. In every corner of Paris there were tucked away numerous small restaurants which were fun to explore. Eventually I joined a club on Rue du Faubourg Saint Honoré where I frequently had meals. I found it a pleasant place to entertain friends. Or there was always the American embassy restaurant to go to when funds were low. Therefore, I decided to stay at the Louiemont. When arranged with a few pieces of my furniture, my small coca cola ice box tucked under a dressing table in the bathroom, became a boom. Antoine from the valet would bring up a hunk of ice for it about twice a week and in the hot weather and the bedroom became a little salon. I kept cool drinks and tin things in the ice box and planted some drawf ivy to grow over the old wrought iron balustrade and I was quite happy there for my entire duty in Paris, for four years.

Margaret McCollough, who I had known in Bermuda, invited me to visit her at Monte Carlo over the Easter holidays. I was to stay at her hotel, the Monte Carlo Palace and we were to take an excursion from there to Nice, Cannes and ancient Aires. I was very much looking forward to the trip and the pleasure of seeing her again. Margaret and her friend, Gladys von Hessenstein, met me upon arrival which happened to be my birthday, April 5. My room looked out over a lovely park with the famous casino beyond and had been made gay with fruit, flowers and birthday gifts. After lunch we took a bus to Nice which has the supreme advantage of being able to go anywhere from it by any route on 101 agreeable and delightful excursions. At Cannes I was interested to learn it had been discovered by an Englishman, Lord Erdman, who gave his name to a carriage. He fell in love with the place, lived there for 30 years and there he sleeps for all eternity.

We arrived back to Monte Carlo in time to quickly change for the champagne dinner I gave to celebrate my birthday. Margaret had tickets for a Monte Carlo ballet afterwards. The next day we drove to Menton, the peaceful town on the border of Italy. Here it seems the curve of the coast is gentler and the colors of the landscape softer than elsewhere. It has long been a favorite resort for the English escaping the rigors of winter and Queen Victoria pointed the way.

Another day we drove up into the thyme scented hills behind Monaco to see the impressive trophy of Latrube, the allegorical statues. This memorial intended to endure for all time, was a hundred years afterwards destroyed by wars that raged. Aires was an astonishing little village on a rocky pinnacle rising up to the void. It presented a picture of silent desolation amidst the chaotic mountains. The Prince of Sweden had his home here with his mistress during the war.

On Easter Sunday we went to the Principality of Monaco. A tiny kingdom enclosed by mountains in a theatrical setting. It was like a scene from a Gilbert and Sullivan opera. Moored in a little port below were palatial yachts. A whole forest of masts rose out of the quay. Sentries were like toy soldiers dressed in their colorful uniforms with white and red feathers coming out of shiny helmets glistening in the sun. Flags were flying everywhere for Prince Rainier, the 31st ruler of Monaco with 142 titles, was to have his coronation the following week. Margaret, who had lived there with her husband before the war, knew the Aide to the Prince so was invited to his reception. The event of 1956 was his marriage to Grace Kelly, one of the most glittering stars in the Hollywood firmament. The general atmosphere of Monte Carlo was one of great refinement and elegance. It is considered the neatest and cleanest city in Europe and appealed to me more than any other place on the Riviera. It was pleasant to have a lazy aperitif on the flowery terrace of the casino, listen to the music and recall the days when foreign visitors wore crown jewels instead of cameras.

The next morning I rose at 5:00 to catch an early train back to Paris. Through sleepy eyes I watched through the window the Province landscape unfolding. The countryside was a blaze with apple blossoms in full bloom and there were lovely stretches of pine forests and groves of twisted, silver gray olive trees that Renoir loved to paint. Perched on the heights in the distance were visages of old forts and crumbling ramparts. I dozed, and when I woke it was midnight and we were in Paris. It had been a glorious Easter and a very happy birthday with delightful friends who had done so much to give me an unforgettable glimpse of the French Riviera.

When I was back at my desk in the embassy, shortly after this trip, a cousin of my brother-in-law dropped in to see me, General Edgar Hume. His name had been legend in the family for a long time. One of his chief claims to fame was the fact that he had heroically rescued the famous works of art in Italy and hid them during the war. In our brief chat I mentioned how much Mildred enjoyed going to President Truman's inaugural ball with him and how much I had enjoyed reading his article on Italy in the National Geographic. And he informed me that he was having another article in the same magazine. That night he left for Japan and by coincidence via Monte Carlo.

Jacqueline Cramer, my Swiss friend, suddenly appeared in Paris with her daughter one day. Over a drink at the Crillon, she invited me to visit her at her home at Celigny on Lake Geneva when we have a holiday the end of May.

In early May I received a letter from Andre Trealay asking if I would like to join him at Biarritz. He was going there to attend a pony fair. But I sent word that I could not come before my next holiday, the 18th. So he telegraphed that he would wait there until then. He wanted me to see the coast along Biarritz which he said he preferred to the Riviera.

When the date arrived, he met my train at Dax and showed me where the parents of the pony he was giving me were breed. In a pretty meadow under water where some horses were grazing. He, himself, had the slim figure of a fine horseman and rode on horses whose pedigrees were as undoubted as his own. We lunched together in a quiet rustic inn on the regional dishes of the country. The pate was made on the place. He saw the goose killed. I learned a lot about the pate that comes from France and is a luxury item in America. The delicious duck, also from the same place, was a cross between a wild and tame one. This was followed by pound cake topped with strawberries and served with champagne. Voltaire called it a civilizing drink and said it reflected the brilliant soul of France. Someone once said that gastronomical dining of the past was one of the few pleasures left in modern life.

After lunch we drove to Bayonne where we entered the Basque country. It had a wonderful 13th century cathedral. Was the city of the English and French queen, Eleanor of Aquitaine and known for its chocolates, ham and bull fights. Then a little passed Bayonne, was Biarritz. It was the fashionable spa of the 19th century made famous by Empress Eugenie, Queen Victoria and Edward VII, and still retains the baroque atmosphere of the second empire.

After a few miles down the coast, we came to St. Jean de Luz. Here was the true Basque. A fishing village, peaceful, picturesque and languorous that had retained all of its Basque characters, the strange baffling language and simple local pleasures. They had their own cuisine, paella, and their own sports, palota, played by the world's best players including priests. Louis XIV and Marie Theresa of Spain were married here.

An old friend, Robert Gillmore, we affectionately call Gilly, had a villa near and invited us to luncheon. I loved watching the waves constantly breaking over the rocks of the scenic coast line and felt fresh and exhilarated by the sea breeze. Now I could understand why Andre preferred all this to the Riviera.

In a recent edition of the New York Herald, I noticed a photo of Mrs. John Hubbard, nee Helen von Stadt, with whom I had met and became friends with on board a ship to Tahiti. She was being decorated by the French consul in New York with the highest honor of the French government. She had told me that she had been made Commodore, having already received the Legion de Merit, then the rosette. Only one other woman in America received the same honor. It was a tribute for devoting so much to the restoration of Moi Maison. My French friend, Yvonne St. Leger, drove me out there one Saturday afternoon. I so enjoyed seeing all Mrs. Hubbard had so generously contributed towards this charming and historical place.

The work at the embassy was becoming terrific. When the war in Korea first started, the newspaper bannered alarming headlines. People were coming each day to inquire what to do. One day, Mrs. Woolf, whom I had met on the Mauritania, came in quite upset. I explained that we had received no instructions from the Department and finally calmed her over lunch at Rumplemeyer's. For about ten days during this episode I was just quickly having a coke and sandwich at noon and rushing back to the office and staying until 8:00 at night. Fortunately, it all eventually subsided.

On the Fourth of July, the ambassador gave his usual reception in the gardens of the lovely old mansion at 41 Rue du Faubourg Saint Honoré, originally bought for use by the ambassador but now used by USIS. Anyone who could present an American passport could come, so there were masses of people. We were asked not to bother to shake hands with the Bruces as they would have so many hands outside the family to shake, so we didn't. The Converse Hettingers had just been transferred to Paris from Tangier so we went together. A steady stream marched up to shake hands, warmly beam and march to a long buffet table where the food is waiting and enormous trays of alcoholic beverages. Only hats are seen on this occasion as it is too crowded to show off a dress or suit.

Although I was very much enjoying my work at the embassy, it had become exhausting during the hot summer months when so many people come to Paris. A quiet get away from it all holiday in a cool spot was all I wanted at that moment. So over Bastille Day, July 14, weekend, I went to Fontainebleau. As many officers were given training here during the First World War, I thought my brother Harold may have been here. So I wrote him from the grand hotel, the Aigle Noir, where I stayed. Here I am able to enjoy the miraculous and marvelously healing attractions of the country. Robert Lewis Stevenson has left us one of the most moving tributes to Fontainebleau in the English language--"The vigorous forest air, the silence, the wilderness, the tumbled boulders, the great age and dignity, a certain grasp the air, the light, the shapes accord in happy harmony" all is very true. He had been one of my favorite writers since childhood. I had grown up with the "Child's Garden of Verses" a dear friend had given me when I was very young. He died in Samoa and wrote his own epitaph, now in every anthology of English poetry. Eloquent in his untroubled acceptance of the end of physical life and his ardent faith in the world to come.

My life was different in Paris than Tangier. I was fulfilling myself with other things. I joined the American library and began reading the history of France by Andre Morua, which became my bible. French lessons were resumed twice a week with Madame Marshorn, who also taught at the Sorbonne. We were both delighted one day to discover we had lived in Japan at the same time. As I had been wanting to know more about French art, literature and music the British embassy sent me Andre Michelle, who had taught French literature in French at Harvard. Part of my course in culture endeavor was to go on ventures in the countryside's historic sights with only French speaking people and a French guide. There was a vast difference between a tourist staying in a Ritz Hotel suite and what a young person who lives there sees of that same country. The two perspectives are totally different. To know the language, the customs, the habits, to seek out the hidden spots and to taste the simple pleasure of local life is to come to love a country. Above all it means understanding the people and true familiarity with a foreign country and its people in such a precious personal and emotional experience one carries it deep in the heart all through life. One of the advantages of the Foreign Service is that one remains long enough at each post to acquire a more thorough knowledge than a visitor can.

One of the most ingrained French habits is holiday en mass in August. They virtually close down their country for a month in a single minded effort to get away from it all. If the Parisian who stays behind locks himself out of his house on August 1, chances are he will not be able to get back in until September. And locksmiths are not the only absent tradesmen. But for me, this was the best time to enjoy Paris when one could really feel the heartbeat of the city. Nothing is dead here, least of all the past which forms an integral part of the present. On Sundays, Andre Trealay was showing me something of his Paris and the surrounding country. Being with Andre was a liberal education. He told me so much that enhanced my appreciation. One Sunday we followed the narrow streets up to Montmartre, the once artistic quarter where young Utrillo and Picasso and so many other painters and poets lived and created. From here was a breathtaking view over the whole of Paris. Another Sunday, to admire the infinite and beautiful detail of Gothic architecture of the famous religious edifice, Notre Dame. They say one should really see it first from a small point coming under the Pont De La Tournelle or from this bridge early in the morning when there is a direct light on the flying buttresses or late in the dying day when it is so illuminated against a flaming sunset. Then we wandered around the La Cite, the oldest quarter in Paris, founded before the Christians and retaining much of its old charm.

A Sunday was spent at Chantilly, famed for its chateau, forests and great stables. There was so much to admire in the museum of this chateau that it could be visited and revisited. I lingered longest over the superb illuminations of the world famous book known as the Duc de Berry. Afterwards roamed through the forest. Andre loved to walk and so did I.

The next Sunday we went to Compiègne which evoked memories of Bonaparte. Napoleon met Marie Louise here in 1810 and chose it as a residence after his second marriage. It enjoyed its most brilliant days during the second empire and its royal residence is more ancient than any other. Louise XVI, when Dauphin, came here in 1770 to meet his fiancée and bride, Marie Antoinette of Austria. The most visited part of the forest is the Armistice clearing where there is a monument commemorating the signing of the armistice on November 11, 1918.

On September 6, 1950, I wrote home: My ponies have arrived. Offspring of the ponies Andre had shown me near Dax where they had been breed. They were being kept in a small ménage near the Bois by M. Gager, who at one time had been in charge of Cote's stable. It proved to be easier to find a place for ponies in Paris than myself. They were a handsome pair. Half brothers and so well matched. One had a list and one had a star on his forehead. Both had a pair of white socks and their tails were cropped which made them look very smart. I called them Fussy and Frisky, appropriate names, I thought because each one was just that. Gager was training them and giving me driving lessons in French. He spoke no English, so obviously I had language lessons as well. Although I was learning to handle the reins properly, I never could learn to roll my "r's" convincingly. The two seated trap was yellow and black. On the harness over the leather shades of the horses eyes in little brass letters were my initials, VHB. The equipage was terribly chic.

Every Saturday and Sunday morning at 11:00, I was driving along the quiet roads of the Bois. It was great fun. Eventually when I gained more confidence and became more proficient in handling the ponies, the groom, Albert, accompanied me. He was an endearing little old man, actually fitted into this small trap more comfortably than Gager who with ruddy red cheeks from his native Normandy was rather rotund and robust, but always cheery and chatty. This rare recreation was one of my greatest pleasures in Paris.

On one Saturday when I went driving, I noticed all of the buildings and buses along the Champs Elysees had the familiar Moroccan flag flying in honor of the visit of the Sultan. All the traffic was stopped to allow his grand entourage to pass as he was going out to Bagatelle to stay with his son, Mouli Hassem, his official visit over. Also from Morocco one day came Bill Chase, the tall, good looking chap who with another American, Jay Hazelwood, ran the Paradise, a rendezvous for every one in Tangier. It was like a ray of sunshine to see him and hear all the news from my former post. He said Jay would be going to Egypt with Countess LeFay, she takes him everywhere.

One evening I invited my French friend, Yvonne St. Leger, to Pruniers for dinner. It had become my favorite for seafood. Afterward I had tickets booked a week in advance, it was so popular, to hear Maurice Chevalier. I had always adored him. Now 62, but like an ageless aperitif, light and zestful with the same magnetic smile. He had a love of life and romance. "Louise" was the only song he sang in English and his mangled English became more of his charm. The day of his death--he was buried January 5, 1972--seemed a little less gay because he was gone. He was more than an addition to the theater, he was an addition to life. When I was describing his performance to Gager in French on my drive through the Bois the next morning, he said he knew him quite well. In fact Chevalier had given him his photograph.

About mid-October, Miss Synder, my supervisor in the passport section sailed for home leave on the America with her great friend, Miss Shipley, then head of the Passport Division in the State Department. She would not be back until after Christmas so she left us all her usual lovely little gifts. The news of the attempted assassination of President Truman at Blair House which reached me in early November, was a terrible shock but so great that he escaped.

Mario Sinwa, who lived in Marrakech, I met for tea one Sunday afternoon at the George Cinque, always gay with Americans. She wanted me to take her to lunch at the Marshall Plan cafeteria. It was very simple, but everything American interested her. It was just across the street from Patue and where a woman I knew there, Odette, said she couldn't find an inexpensive place in the neighborhood for lunch. I suggest that we go there and she loved it too.

Then we went to the Folies Bergeres together one evening. Always a spectacle. Exquisite sets and nudes parading around with gorgeous accessories. The real bit of the entire show was the three Peters sisters, enormous colored girls appearing in costumes which accentuated their enormity. Their performance dressed in ballet skirts on a trapeze and again in toreador pants fighting a bull and finally in the voluminous djellabas the Arabs wear, was hilarious. They did a perfect takeoff of Maurice Chevalier with his usual rakish straw hat singing, "Savoir, savoir, savoir." That was wildly applauded.

The Countess Dabars, who arranged parties and receptions at USIS, invited me to her home for cocktails one Sunday afternoon. She said she would like me to meet some of her French friends and relatives who had homes in the country. I thought it was very kind of her. She was of Japanese origin and like many women of her race gentle and refined and elegant in her simplicity, pale and fragile as a flower. In mutual admiration of her oriental country gave me an immediate rapport and we became very fond of each other.

Christmas was approaching and I had some accumulated leave to take. Yvonne St. Leger was going to her daughter in Tunis and wanted me to join her. Then Mr. Davies, the old padre in Tangier who had been on a brief holiday in Paris, invited me to spend Christmas in England where he was now living with his married daughter, whose husband was with the British government in Lagos. A telegram came followed by a note from Sheila Green who I had known in Bermuda and was also back in England and asked me to come there saying it would be just like Bermuda all over again where we had such a happy time together. I more than appreciated these kind friends thinking of me at this special time, but I really wanted just a rest somewhere in the sun. Our consul in Tenerife, the Canary Islands, wrote it had a delightful climate and one could swim at Christmas and it was very quiet, just what I wanted. But, alas, all my efforts to get there were in vain. I did manage to get as far as Madrid but the planes were all booked and though I went to the airport and waited in the pouring rain for a last minute cancellation, no luck. Then I decided to go to Malaga where my friends the George Palmers were on post. They made reservations for me at the Minermar Hotel and after an all day train ride arrived there at midnight. The next day I drove out to Torremolinos to the Santa Clara Hotel which I had heard was so charming, operated by Mr. and Mrs. Saunders. He was English and she was Danish. They were completely booked, but kindly tucked me in a room for the night. I changed to another the next day. The food was excellent and it had a cozy atmosphere, mostly English guests. Much to my surprise and delight, I found Gilly Gillmore there with his French companion, Madame Dorne. And it was heavenly to find blue skies and bright sun. When Madame Dorne heard I was unable to get to the Canaries where Andre Trealay was vacationing, she exclaimed, "Why you can't leave Andre there alone over Christmas, you must telephone." So I got a telephone call through to him on the 23rd and we finally spoke together on Christmas morning. He said he would join me as soon as he could get reservations, but it was a week before we heard on New Year's Day that he would be arriving January 3. Such was the communication and transportation service in Spain in those days.

On Christmas Day the Palmers gave an eggnog party. A lot of the guests at the Santa Clara were invited as they had lived there before finding a house and knew the Saunders well. They asked me to stay on for lunch with their house guests, the Morrisons I had known in Tangier, and the consulate staff, including a courier in for the day who made a priceless remark a propos to making his plane that "the mail must go through, come rain, hail or olive oil." It was a cherry party as we gathered around the Christmas tree with the Palmers' two young children. Then we all drove back to the Santa Clara for the party the Saunders have every Christmas night. The British Consul gave the traditional toast. The New Year's Eve party was equally gay. I was doing the Lambeth walk way into the wee small hours of the morning. After that I slept until noon every day until Andre came on January 3, his birthday. That evening I gave a birthday party for him. There were nine of us, including the Palmers. Champagne and a beautiful birthday cake and all sang happy birthday to him. We were able to have a few walks along the beach together and a drive with Gilly up the Costa del Sol before I had to leave two days later. This time the little Santa Clara Hotel was the only one there and Torremolinos was just a tiny village asleep in the sun on the main road between Malaga and Marbella and La Linsa. But now, like others caught in the touristic boom, it has swept head long to the present and one of the fastest growing resorts in Spain and the charming little Santa Clara is no longer there. And dear George Palmer died in the summer of 1976.

When I returned to the embassy, my desk, of course, was covered with work. Also Christmas cards had accumulated. One from the Duke of Tervare from Tangier asking me to let him know if I ever went to Seville. He would give me a note of introduction to his friends the two DeCasso sisters. I was sorry to hear from the Duchess of Richelieu that her husband had been desperately ill while in Paris last May and had taken him to Geneva where he had been in hospital twice and now home in New York with double pneumonia. A friend of Andre's to whom he had introduced me, Count Robert Dillon was in Paris for a few days from his chateau near Toulouse. He was interested in the breeding of my ponies. I took him for a long drive one Sunday. It was getting nippy now so I wore a newspaper around my chest under my heaviest sweater and coat to cut the wind. But regardless of the weather I was always in the Bois with my ponies at 11:00 every Saturday and Sunday morning. They say the Bois is one of the places in the world "en souffler esprit," where the spirit breathes. It warmed my heart to hear the little children clap their hands with joy when they heard the clip-clop of my ponies coming.

I was very distressed to receive news that my dear brother, Harold, was in hospital with TB. I wrote him that every time I went to the Madeleine for flowers, which was often for no matter how deep the winter it was always spring among those scented stalls, I wished I could be placing them by his bedside and hoped he was faithful to his communions as there was so much power in prayer. Besides my regular communions at 8:30 on Sunday, I tripped around the corner to the little British embassy church on Wednesdays at the same time. These brief devotions helped sustain me all day long at my desk.

Count Dillon invited me to dinner one evening and was very anxious that I see the film, "Gone With The Wind," with him. Even though I had seen it over ten years ago in Honolulu, I shared his enthusiasm in watching again this romantic epic, probably the most legendary production in Hollywood history. It has remained one of the most popular and successful pictures ever made.

Whenever Dillon came to Paris we often lunched and dined together. I found him quite delightful. Although his English was limited and so was my French, it was no bar to a fluent conversation. He had a good looking serious face and was very courteous and conservative. A country loving man who walked with the erect grace of the aristocracy he represented. He was of Irish origin and came from one of the oldest families of France. He always appeared deeply concerned about something and one evening spoke to me with great earnestness and enthusiasm of his desire to go to South America on a mission for the French government. And he did eventually, to Quito, Ecuador. One of his reasons was that he felt that the Russians would be here within a year and he wanted to close his enormous chateau because he said he would never sell it. If the Russians came, he advised me to escape with my ponies to his chateau and said I could be there in ten days. I thanked him for wishing to rescue a damsel in distress, but laughingly said, "I could just see myself with my possessions on the back seat of my pony trap flying over the border like Scarlet O'Hara in "Gone With The Wind."

Mildred had been in Seville then came to Paris for a brief visit before we went to Luxembourg for Easter weekend. Mrs. Truman had given her a note of introduction to Perle Mesta, who was then our minister. Madame Mesta was not there at that time, she was spending her Easter holiday in another part of Europe. However, her colored butler with true southern hospitality had invited us into the residence for a cup of tea. It was then that I saw her fabulous collection of Mason porcelain birds which were perfectly exquisite. She very kindly sent an invitation for my sister to return the following week again. Luxembourg had a fairy-like charm with its cobblestone streets, medieval castles, ruins of fortress walls, watch towers and turrets. During the war the Grand Duchess Charlotte, by will of her people, went to the United States for the duration. When she met President Roosevelt he said to her, "Don't worry my child, I will take you home again." Those words appeared across the face of a special commemorative stamp of Luxembourg printed below the likeness of the Grand Duchess and her benefactor, the late President. For many Americans, Luxembourg is a place of pilgrimage. About three miles from the city is Hamm. There on a gently sloping valley is a field which is forever America. Below the serene town lies over 5,000 servicemen, each with a marker. One cross by itself is inscribed: "General S. Patton, Jr., General Third Army, California, December 21, 1945." This is where he was laid at the head of his men following his death in a car accident after the war was over.

It was a great shock to receive the very sad news of the death of Mr. Clay Merrill after a short illness in Bermuda on May 8 and saddened me deeply. I felt I had lost my best friend in the Foreign Service. I immediately wrote to dear Mrs. Merrill because I knew what this great loss would mean for her.

One evening a French friend, Robert Jevey, and I went to see the "Consul" a play I could very well appreciate.

As Paris was celebrating its 2000 years celebration at this time, 1951, there were a lot of interesting events going on. Alice Poole, a long time friend which whom I had lived in a little Japanese house in Honolulu and former keeper of the prints at the Art Academy there, paid a visit. We went to the Louvre together to hear a concert of early French music.

In June I was promoted to receptionist in the passport section and was so happy. No more lifting of dossiers, pushing and pulling of drawers, looking at a desk piled high with files. I was still kept busy, but now there was an occasional lull where there never was before. Now my job was to answer inquiries and pull the cards and files on people who needed passports or renewals or any other service our section gave; type letters to be given to other embassies for visas; and I was also beginning to take a few applications. So I was learning bit by bit more citizenship work.

The Consul General, Mr. Grey, called all those who had been promoted to his office to congratulate them as soon as he had returned from his holiday. The inspector had arrived and asked the usual questions--how we lived, who are our friends, how we get our exercise, etc. To one question, "What is your goal in the Foreign Service?" I answered, "To become a vice consul," which he duly noted. I also mentioned I should like to be considered for a post where I could save some money. I thought Paris very expensive. I spoke of Bangkok. He said that Colombo, Ceylon was also a delightful post and a differential, meaning more money was allowed for living there.

Edgar Hume paid me another surprise visit at the embassy, this time in uniform emblazoned with ribbons and medals and looked so handsome and young. He said he was spending most of his time now in Korea, but was in Paris for a medical conference. He needed letters to obtain visas for Syria and Lebanon. I was glad I could be of this small service to him.

Count Dillon was also back in Paris, too. We dined one evening around the corner from my hotel at la Truite in the picturesque Cite de Retourro entered by a grilled gateway. It became one of our favorite restaurants where we often went with Andre who was now having the cure at Vichy. He wanted Andre to bring me to his chateau and show me his country in September.

On the Fourth of July the Bruces gave the usual reception for the Americans. Princess Pignatelli, whom I had met, asked to go with me. She was a Biddle from Philadelphia. Her first husband was a Spanish grandee and her early life with the court in Madrid sounded glamorous. She divorced him and married a Frenchman who she also divorced. Then she retrieved the title of the first husband.

Mrs. Merrill was leaving Bermuda on July 18 as she had been appointed assistant conference officer at our embassy in Geneva. In early August I made reservations at the Louiemont for her and her two colored servants who were accompanying her. She was to arrive on the America due just as I had planned to take my holiday to Dillon's place, but I realized I could not leave while she was here, nor, of course, wanted to for I was anxious to see her and more especially as she was bereaved. I met her at the boat train in an embassy car and we were together the entire time she was in Paris. We both shed tears when we spoke of Mr. Merrill. She wanted to revisit all the little places where they had been together here in 1949. For diversion I took her up Faubourg

Saint Honoré to enjoy the shop windows created by Madame Baumel for Hermes. They always had an incomparable charm and fantasy of their own. Parisians go to see a new Baumel window as they go to see a new play.

I introduced her to Miss Synder and they had a very long conversation. She told her what a good job I had done under Clay in Bermuda. I hoped it bore some weight. When I mentioned that they both had astrology in common, Mrs. Merrill immediately drew Miss Synder's horoscope and that was a bond at once.

For years I had wanted to go to the Balearic Islands and at last I was to have my dream holiday to Majorca. At Brentano's I was delighted to find a book, "Polonaise" on the life of Chopin which I read on the four hour Air France flight to Palma. An attractive American woman, Mrs. Chamberlain, had a car and chauffeur waiting for her when we arrived at the airport in Palma and kindly offered to drive me to my hotel, the Victoria. There I had a room and full pension for 150 pesetas plus 17 percent tax, about $3.75 in those days and considered an extremely modest price even then.

Mrs. Chamberlain had mentioned that she had rented this furnished villa with five bedrooms and two baths for ten dollars a month and also had the services of a maid and a gardener.

The hotel was perfectly situated where one could watch the life on the Mediterranean from spacious terraces bordered by flowers and shaded by pine trees. During the day it was a gorgeous sight to see the colors change on the cathedral which loomed up in the distant. One of the four famous gothic ones in the world. And at night enchanting while dining on the terrace to watch the boats going to Barcelona brilliantly lighted. Palma reminded me a little of Tangier with its Spanish influence and slightly Moorish flavor.

The day after my arrival, I took an all day excursion to Valldemosa and Soller. Valldemosa had been immortalized by George Sand, the romantic French authoress and Frederick Chopin, the great Polish pianist and composer ever since their historic winter there in 1838-39. Majorca had made a virtual shrine of their quarters which they occupied in a deserted monastery in which the monks had been evicted in 1935. Their three cells opened on to charming little garden patios where they contemplated the rustic panorama and drew inspiration for their greatest works. Here George Sand wrote "Spiridon" and later published "Un Hiver a Majorque" in which were the finest descriptive writing of her whole career. She was the first writer to adequately succeed in conveying the charms of the Majorca countryside most vividly.

Another who came many years later, also enamored of the beauties of the island, was His Imperial Highness the Archduke of Austria, Louie Salvador, but known in all of Majorca simply as S. Arduc. His exhaustive knowledge was revealed in the wealth of impressions since he did not sell his publications but gave them away as presents to his family and other chosen people, they have a special value in their rareness.

Chopin, although in fading health, with the aid of a pitiful Majorcan piano was composing his most dramatic and exquisite inspired by the wonderful atmosphere of the monastery. There was still a trace of the monastic life within the walls. The smell of incense and solitary silence.

Among the compositions created there were his famous preludes.

After leaving Valldemosa the stretch of coast line to Dael was magnificent. Beautiful vistas of the sea on one side and hills covered with pine and ancient olive trees on the other. It was no wonder that Gustave Durer was inspired by the Majorcan olive trees to illustrate one of the best traditions Dante's Divine Comedy. For him Majorca was a corner blessed by heaven. Dael attracted many writers and artists including the well known writer Robert Graves who for 47 years has been voluntarily exiled in his home Canelluno, the house far away, and has done so much to help preserve the place from becoming spoiled.

We drove on over the craggy mountainside to Soller, a picturesque little village in a rich valley of fragrant orange and lemon trees surrounded by high mountains. An amusing Toonerville type of tram clanks its way to the nearby puerto. On the return to Palma we stopped to visit one of the old historic Majorcan country mansions.

The next day I climbed up through the pine woods to the famous 14th century castle of Bellvere that overlooks Palma. It is a rare type of construction in Spain, a circular design with simple lines descended from the gothic. As there were still many Arabs here at the time, Moorish slaves who were skilled artisans were employed in the construction of the castle giving it a Moorish influence. The archaeological museum in side was of great interest.

One day I took a bus trip to Formentor. The zigzag road was perilous in places, but with fantastic views of majestic beauty and absolutely unforgettable. There was a luxurious hotel on the white sandy beach with extensive gardens and circled by mountains with the great panorama of the Bay of Pollensa. It was a perfect setting for a vacation retreat where one could enjoy the peace and tranquility for which the island has always been renown.

Sitting beside me on the bus was a most interesting English girl, Machin Goodall, who breeds, trains, sells and shows her own jumpers. She had won a thousand prizes since the age of eight and her grandfather had been huntsman to the Queen. Of course, I spoke of my precious pair of ponies in Paris. So we found much to talk about.

The only sign of Americanization that I saw were two little sweat shirts on two little Spanish boys which had blazed across the front, "New York Giants." The island then was relatively unspoiled. I had never enjoyed a holiday so much for so little money. After a smooth flight with champagne and lunch, I arrived back in Paris to find the sun shining. It was the first time I had returned to Paris from a holiday when it wasn't pouring with rain.

The Richelieus were back in Paris and in early October they invited me to lunch at the Cert Enter Ala. I enjoyed seeing them very much, but was distressed to hear that the Duke has had leukemia since 1948. The Duchess came up to my hotel room to look through my "Vogues" to find some models for having some clothes made here. She said she was getting too fat to order from Bloomingdale any more. They will be returning to the States in the ship they always sailed in, the Mauritania and asked me to look them up when I came to New York in the spring. My home leave was due March 15.

George and Ruth Palmer were also in Paris about this time and we had a good get together over cocktails at the Crillon. George invited me to come to Malaga and said he would send me to Granada where the Good Friday celebrations were really worth seeing. George's parents gave a delightful party on Avenue Foch to which I was invited. Ambassador Palmer and George both served at our embassy in Afghanistan together. The only time father and son have ever served at the same post at the same time.

One of the French employees at the embassy and her husband drove me to Bourg St. Leonard one Saturday where there was a chateau that Count Dillon very much admired and wanted me to see. Madame de Forcefeel received us for about an hour and said she had seen me driving my ponies in the Bois.

One day in early December I happened to see Mr. Plitt, who had been our minister at the legation in Tangier, as I was going to lunch with a friend and went up to speak to him. "How do you do, Mr. Plitt? Do you remember me?" I said. When he replied, "Yes, sure. Virginia Biddle," my friend remarked, "You have a good memory." Then with a smile he said to her, "Yes, I always remember the outstanding members of my staff." The sudden unexpected compliment slightly embarrassed me and I blushed a little as I walked away. I never thought that I had been particularly outstanding, but it was evident that he was still in the diplomatic service, though he was then in Paris with NATO and staying at the Crillon.

My English friends, Muriel and Reg Cope I had met at a coffee at Bishop Chambers invited me to a cocktail party that the St. George's Society gave at the Cert Enter Ala. Among the guests was Lady Diana Cooper. I had seen her as the Madonna in "The Miracle" when I was in boarding school, and she hadn't changed a bit since then. The same beautiful blue eyes, exquisite skin, tall and graceful and very feminine with every movement so effortless. She was simply dressed and wrapped in a gorgeous sable coat. I could hardly take my admiring eyes off of her.

Christmas 1951 in Paris was quite active. Ambassador and Mrs. Bruce gave a huge cocktail party for 1500 Americans. Mr. Grey, the consul general, gave a beautiful party at his home for all the consular sections. Young 14 year old Hugh Cope was home from school, Tonbridge in England, for the holidays, and we often went clapping through the leafy Bois in my trap. He adored my ponies. On Christmas Eve, Muriel, Reg and Hugh and I attended midnight services at the British embassy church. Then they all came up to my room at the Louismont for fruitcake and eggnog and helped to light the teeny weenie candles I had tied with ribbons to my teeny weenie Christmas tree. The next day they invited me to tea and to hear King George give his first speech over the wireless since his illness, and I stayed on for dinner.

JOHN GUNTHER DEAN
Economic Analyst, Economic Cooperative Administration
Paris (1950-1951)

Ambassador John Gunther Dean was born in Germany in 1926. He came to the United States by way of Holland in 1938. After serving with the OSS during World War II, he graduated from Harvard in 1947. Since joining the Foreign Service in 1951, his career has included positions in Saigon, Phnom Penh, Bamako, Paris and Laos.

DEAN: I got one offer from the CIA, and one job from Mr. Harriman, with the Economic Cooperation Agency in Paris. Mr. Harriman had in pre-war days been owner of a mine in Silesia where my father was on the Board of Directors. I was interviewed by Lincoln Gordon, who became later Assistant Secretary of State. He was a Harvard Professor and worked with Mr. Harriman. He said: "Why don't you come to Paris, to the headquarters of the European Marshall Plan? We'll put you in the Program Division. That is where economists are working on some very exciting ideas." My father urged me to accept the job offer in Paris. As for the offer to work in the CIA, my dad thought I was not cut out for it: "John, as a human being, you need applause. When you work for the CIA, you can't get applause. If something works, they will never admit it. If it fails, you might get the blame. It's a "marshy" atmosphere. Since the job in Paris has been offered, why don't you take it?" I took the assignment in Paris. It was one of the best learning experiences one can ever have.

Q: It was a very exciting time, too.

DEAN: It was a terribly exciting time. They needed people who had ideas. I worked with brilliant people: Tom Shelling of Harvard and his model building. He was one of the officers in that section. I was assigned as Program Officer for Greece and Turkey in the European Headquarters of the Marshall Plan. Jimmy Houghting, who became Professor at Pennsylvania University, was in charge of Italy. John Lindeman was Director of the Division. Henry Tasca was in charge of Finance. He was one of the people starting the European Payments Union, which was the forerunner of the European Currency (EURO). The European Payments Union was a step toward the convertibility of the European currencies. Every country had a line of credit which it could draw on. These increments were known as "tranches." Settlement of debts was in dollars. This mechanism permitted multilateral trade. Greece and Turkey were heavy borrowers and I spent quite some time in visiting specific projects for which requests for funding had been made. I went several times to Greece and Turkey.

Q: What dates were you there?

DEAN: September 1950 through December 1951. John Craig, who is still very much alive, was my buddy. He is a very intelligent man and made his entire career in the Economic Aid business. I learned much at the ECA European headquarters. Our office was located next to La Concorde in Paris, in what was known as the home of the great French diplomat Talleyrand. In 1950, Averell Harriman had been replaced by Abe Katz, as the chief in Paris. The people working in that office included some of the best academics and leading business people. Many of my colleagues and bosses were bright and brilliant. I learned something about economics, about business projects, finance, politics, central planning, and different cultures. The Marshall Plan was market oriented and promoted free enterprise. We in the U.S. benefited from obtaining new markets for our products, and Europeans profited from U.S. dollar credits to buy needed commodities and food to reconstruct their countries after 6 years of war. It was probably one of the finest periods in American diplomacy.

Q: I have been Interviewing Arthur Hartman.

DEAN: He was working with Ambassador Bruce on the bilateral side of the Marshall Plan for France.

Q: Yes. Did you have the feeling you were all true believers? Jean Monnet was sort of the guy...

DEAN: I went over once to Jean Monnet. He spoke English and never needed an interpreter, a role I often was asked to play. I went to his house on Avenue Foch, as a notetaker. The people who worked on the Marshall Plan, whether it was Arthur Hartman on the French side of the Marshall Plan, or in the European Headquarters side which I was on, were mostly believers in the need to build up Europe and maintain a close link between the two sides of the Atlantic. We all thought we were doing something useful and important. We were building a new world. There was no doubt that part of our job was to help Europe maintain some form of capitalism, a free enterprise system, and above all, democratic rule. One has to remember the spirit of the times. In the post-war period, the governments in France had included communists. There were also communists in other countries' governments. Governments in Europe were debating whether they were going to follow an authoritarian form of ruling with significant central government interference, or maintain a more democratic way of building up Europe. By 1950, Europe was already divided by the Iron Curtain. You remember what happened to Masarik in Czechoslovakia?

Q: A coup which really turned the...

DEAN: It was a big change. The Czechs at one point had said "Yes" to the Marshall Plan. The Marshall Plan provided the essential foreign exchange for these countries to feed themselves and to get their industries started again. Was it altruistic on our part? It was good common sense. We, at this point, helped to make Western Europe choose a path which is similar to ours. As far as Greece and Turkey were concerned, the Marshall Plan also brought about some painful changes. Why? Because they were the largest exporters of tobacco to Central Europe. In many part of Europe, people smoked Greek and Turkish tobacco. During the Second World War Gis handed out American cigarettes – Maryland and Virginia blends. People got accustomed to smoking American-type tobacco. They preferred it and bought American cigarettes. But the Marshall Plan helped Greece and Turkey to rebuild their economies. We suggested new ways for the Greeks and the Turks to earn foreign exchange by exporting or by substituting domestic production for foreign imports. For example, we helped the Greeks to export and sell their grapes on foreign markets. In Turkey, we built a steel mill in Zanguldak, replacing some of the imports they could make cheaper themselves. In certain parts of Europe, without U.S.-provided foreign exchange and the Marshall Plan, people still did not have enough to eat. The U.S. provided badly needed wheat and corn to feed Western Europeans who did not grow enough grain immediately after the war. The Marshall Plan also provided modern technology. The concept of productivity was pushed by the Marshall Plan and it took hold all over the world. All of us who were involved in ECA felt we were doing something useful and it made our lives worthwhile.

Q: Oh, yes. I mean, what are you here for?

DEAN: You have to give a purpose to your existence. When I accepted the job in Paris, I had not yet passed the Foreign Service Examination. I was not part of the U.S. Foreign Service. It was more of a contractual arrangement. Yes, Paris was not only a wonderful professional assignment, but I also met my wife there. To be precise, I met her on the ninth of February 1951 and it was one of the luckiest moments in my life. We have now been married 50 years.

Q: What was she doing?

DEAN: She was working pro bona at the French Foreign Office, what is called the “Quai d’Orsay.” At the time, I had an old aunt who died in the States and she had left me $5,000 in her will. With that money, I bought a car and it gave me a nest egg.

Q: You could get a pretty good car for $1,000.

DEAN: It was a brand new Ford. In those days, I could park near my office. One day, I found on the windshield, a paper with “Yankee, go home.” I said: “These French are a bunch of unfriendly people who are ungrateful for what we are doing.” Soon thereafter, I was invited to the home of the president of what is the equivalent in France of our Supreme Court. They gave a party and I was invited. The friend who got me the invitation had been a school mate of mine in Paris. At that party I met my wife. That was the luckiest moment of my entire life. But I was suddenly transferred to Brussels, Belgium and I was not going to see my future wife for a while. The job was with the Marshall Plan to Belgium and I was assigned as industrial analyst. It was also the first time that I came across corruption in government. My immediate boss accepted a bribe in order to give a contract to a certain Belgian company. A colonel in the Army Judge Advocate Corps came to Brussels to investigate. I was queried. What was my relationship with my boss? I replied: “Why are you here?” The Colonel claimed that my boss had deposited $15,000 in an American bank which was equivalent to what the Belgian company had paid him for getting the contract. It had never occurred to me that somebody who served his country could accept a bribe. One of the redeeming features of the Brussels assignment was on occasion to see one of America’s great ambassadors at work: Robert Murphy.

Q: He was a major figure, particularly in World War II.

DEAN: In 1951-52, he was the U.S. Ambassador to Brussels. He was truly a role model for an aspiring young Foreign Service Officer.

Q: I want to capture one thing. You were talking about currency and economics. Did you have the feeling that behind whoever was coming out ahead industrially, the basic thing that you were trying to do was to integrate a Europe so that basically the Germans and French would not go at each other again?

DEAN: I think this was part of it. I also believe that the immediate post-war period threw up these great leaders in Europe who realized that Europe has to work together if Europe is to play a role again on the world scene. Roosevelt had never got along too well with De Gaulle, but De Gaulle knew how to lead his nation. He understood that France could never be a major player without the full cooperation of Germany. De Gaulle started his rapprochement with Germany for strictly national reasons. On the German side, Adenauer fully understood that Germany, after World War II, needed to work closely with the rest of democratic Europeans to become “acceptable” and this meant in the first place an alliance with France.

In Italy, the U.S. helped the Christian Democrats to pursue a pro-European policy, and the Treaty of Rome is the corner stone of today’s European Union.

Q: Particularly in the elections of 1948.

DEAN: Yes, there was discreet advice given to the Italians to join the fledgling European Community. This brings me to an important point. In the immediate post-war period, U.S. foreign policy seemed to me primarily oriented toward mutual benefits. We were interested in helping Europe to get back on its feet because only one country had won the war: the United States. While the British were among the victors, Britain was basically exhausted. The Russians had won the war but their country was partially destroyed and they had had 26 million casualties. So, the only ones who emerged as the great victor from the war was the United States. By pursuing a policy of mutual interest toward Europe, our policies became highly acceptable to the Europeans. Americans were perceived as friends, in some countries as liberators. The Germans found out that while we had fought the war under the slogan of “unconditional surrender,” once the war was over, we behaved with a great deal of understanding for Germany’s problems. We held out our hand in friendship to the Germans. We provided funds under the Marshall Plan to build up and reconstruct Germany. But the U.S. also benefited from the reconstruction of Europe. American firms established branches in Europe and we invested in new industries in Europe. We helped to feed Europe and at the same time increased our market share for U.S. agricultural exports. It was a great period for U.S.-European cooperation in the mutual interest of both parties.

Q: Could you talk a little bit about how – we are talking about 1950-1952 – the Soviet Union was perceived? At that time, the coup in Czechoslovakia had happened. We were fighting the Korean War, which we felt had been inspired by Stalin and all. How did we feel about the Soviet Union?

DEAN: Let me be very frank. I am not a Soviet expert. My knowledge of the Soviet Union comes from my very interesting two years in military intelligence.

Q: We are talking about this particular period.

DEAN: The impression I get – and I did not voice it a great deal at the time but I felt it then and still feel it’s true today – is that there was a certain amount of fear and distrust of each other. That fear was magnified when in the immediate post-war period, some European governments had to include communists in their government. In the Resistance movement of some nations, the communists had been in the lead fighting the Germans. In France, De Gaulle asked Maurice Thorez to come back from Moscow and he put him in the French Government. In the areas under Russian occupation or control, the Russians shipped back to their country whatever they needed and was still standing. They helped themselves without any real pangs of conscience. As a result, while the governments in the areas under Russian influence may have been imposed by the Russians, they did not make that many friends in the local population. The distrust of the West of the Communist world and vice-versa may have undermined certain wartime agreements. Distrust and fear existed on both sides of the Iron Curtain. The Europeans had a different problem. Part of the population was communist. Sometimes, as much as a third of the population was. For example, in order to avoid civil conflict, De Gaulle had no option but to put communists in the government and later on remove them. The best example of a European statesman who managed to “balance” the West and the communists was Marshal Tito of Yugoslavia. He did not want to be under Soviet control, so he worked with the West and ended up as one of the leaders of the Non-Aligned world. In the European Headquarters of the Marshall Plan we quickly started a Yugoslav section which helped Tito to remain independent while still following a number of Marxist policies. But they were national Marxist policies!

Q: This was again 1948-1949.

DEAN: Yes. Not everybody perceived in that particular period of time – and I’m talking about the period of 1946-1951- that there was national Marxism, and then there was communism with nations subservient to another power, i.e. the Soviet Union. I want to open a parenthesis, because my name is very much attached to Southeast Asia. In the summer of 1947, Ho Chi Minh came to Fontainebleau, France. He wanted to be part of the French Union, which was comparable to the British Commonwealth. That process would eventually lead to independence. There were some key people in France who favored that process for Vietnam. It must be recalled that the United States had worked with Ho Chi Minh during the Second World War. Major Patty of the OSS helped the Vietnamese to fight the Japanese military. The French were politically too weak in 1947 to grant Vietnam membership in the French Union which would lead to independence. Instead of fighting, Ho Chi Minh wanted support to create an independent state with some linkage to France. He also represented national Marxism. Maybe some of the great scholars in our country will contradict me, but we in the U.S. have a tendency to equate communism usually with subservience to the Soviet Union. Many communists were also ardent nationalists. The Chinese are a good example.

Q: You were in the Program Office. What were you doing? Were you basically trying to figure out ways to get more money out of the system to go to “your” country, as opposed to one of the other countries?

DEAN: We tried to explain to much higher ranking people, both Americans and Europeans, what projects in the countries for which we had responsibility made sense. For example, in Turkey, the Turks imported steel though they had both coal and iron in ample supply. ECA helped to find them financing to build a modern steel mill at Zanguldak. That was one of the projects I worked on. In Greece, I searched for markets for their grapes and how to package them and transport them to new markets. When I worked with representatives of the European Payments Union in Paris, I would submit papers to justify the granting of credit, if needed, for the balance of payments of specific projects. My colleagues did the same for the countries they represented in the Program Office. The Program Office was a kind of planning staff. Decisions were made on a much higher level.

Q: When other people were saying “Belgium needs this” or “France needs this,” did you say “You’ve got to think about Turkey and Greece?”

DEAN: No, not really. We were just one section in this European Headquarters of ECA. There were many other sections: a financial section, a political adviser’s office, etc. We were something like the geographic bureau in the State Department. Obviously, we hoped that our program would also contribute to building democracy. Greeks and Turks have different ways of negotiating. When a Turk says: “Yes,” it’s yes. When it’s “No,” it’s no. In reply to a leading question, Greeks have a tendency to waffle. But it’s easier to strike a deal with the Greeks. They are more flexible and are quite compromise-oriented. Our role basically was to help these countries to move economically forward so that politically, they would shun the extremes. We were more sensitive to potential threats from the extreme left and perhaps, at times, more permissive on the dangers of the extreme right, i.e. the Colonels in Greece.

WILLIAM J. CUNNINGHAM
Clerk – Typist
Paris (1950)

William J. Cunningham was born in California in 1926. After serving in the Navy from 1944-1947, he received his Bachelor’s degree from the University of New Mexico in 1948 and his Master’s in 1950. He joined the Foreign Service in 1949 and his career has include positions in Prague, Paris, Tokyo, Taipei, Phnom Penh Saigon. Mr. Cunningham was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on March 17, 1997.

Q: You were in Paris from 1950 to when?

CUNNINGHAM: I was in Paris from May of 1950 to November of 1950. I was first assigned to the budget section of the embassy and worked for a man by the name of Nicholas Fortucci, at the time I believe a local American hire of the Embassy. Nick was a very good boss, had a sparkling sense of humor, and was a good mentor to a young guy like me. Nick’s supervisor was a man by the name of Arthur Scharff, the Embassy Budget Officer. Scharff was an opera buff and a wine connoisseur, always going off to some wine tasting experience in the South of France.

After a couple of months I was shifted from the budget section to the accounting section of the embassy where my boss was a woman by the name of Jessie Hairnet. We were under the general supervision of Joseph A. Dagenhart who was the chief disbursing officer at the embassy at that time, and also the chief disbursing officer for all U.S. Foreign Service posts in Western Europe.

During the time that I was in Paris the war broke out in Korea and the embassy in Seoul of course was evacuated, but in great disarray. The government fled to Pusan. MacArthur staged his landing on the west coast at Inchon in September of 1950. A short time later the government moved back to Seoul after it was retaken, and the embassy moved back with it.

That led to my transfer two months later from Paris to Seoul.

JOHN C. LEARY
Cherbourg (1950-1953)

John C. Leary was born in Connecticut in 1924. After receiving both his bachelor's degree and master's degree from Yale University in 1947 and 1959, respectively, he served in the United States Army from 1943-1945. His career has included positions in Cherbourg, Dusseldorf, Istanbul, Tokyo, Ottawa, Vienna, Sao Paulo, and St. George's. Mr. Leary was interviewed by Raymond Ewing in November 1998.

Q: Cherbourg is a post that doesn't exist any more.

LEARY: That's correct. It was a small consulate post and it existed then because Cherbourg was quite an important port. In particular, we were shipping most of our military cargo that was going to Europe through the port of Cherbourg. The French had a military unit there acting as the receiving depot and we had daily two or three merchant ships coming in unloading tanks and different types of equipment.

Q: This was the period not long after the Korean War had began and the Cold war was very much a reality in Europe.

LEARY: In fact, the Korean War actually began shortly after I had arrived in Cherbourg.

Q: And France was a very important and loyal member of NATO. The headquarters was in Paris.

LEARY: That's correct. One of my more interesting experiences in Cherbourg was the arrival of General Eisenhower to take over command of NATO that had been established with its headquarters in Paris. Many American officials traveled on the Queen Mary and Queen Elizabeth in those days and they would arrive in Cherbourg and get on a boat train to Paris. At 7:30 one morning, my wife and I and the consul and his wife and the Mayor and the Super and all the local officials went down to the docks to meet General Eisenhower. So we drank champagne with him at 7:30 in the morning.

Q: That's some return to Europe. This was in the days also before there were flights and the people would routinely take the ships.

LEARY: Right. Later on I became very much involved in HICOG policy matters and I used to read the reports of the negotiations for our delegations, the GATT negotiations for example, who traveled by ship to Europe.

Q: So you were the number two. There were two officers at the post.

LEARY: Yes, the post had been a one man post before I had arrived. Actually, a young woman had been assigned as vice consul about three months before my assignment and she found the small provincial town of Cherbourg rather difficult and requested a transfer and was sent to Paris. So I was appointed as the next vice consul and for the first time we had two officers at the post.

Q: And I suppose that on occasion you were in charge while the consul was away?

LEARY: Yes, somewhat to my surprise, the day we arrived happened to be a Sunday and the consul met me at the dock and informed me that the next day he was starting a long delayed leave. So, I would be in charge. And I didn't have any orientation training at FSI so I was kind of perplexed, but fortunately we had a very good local staff, including one gentleman that I recall very fondly, named Paul Barbet, who was the senior local. He knew the consular work backwards and forwards and he held my hand and got me through that rather nervous period.

Q: Had we had a post in Cherbourg for awhile?

LEARY: My impression was that it was a post-War thing and it actually closed in 1956. At that time we shipped most of our NATO supplies to the West coast of France, through Bordeaux and the amount of American shipping coming in to Cherbourg was declining drastically. So, as an economy measure, the post was closed.

Q: But while you were there it was a busy post.

LEARY: Yes, it was quite busy. It was busy in some ways. I must say that having joined the Foreign Service expecting to be involved in matters of high policy, being assigned to a small provincial town was something of a come down. We enjoyed our life there but the work was mostly involved with shipping and seamen, and dealing with ships that came into port.

Q: Both American flag vessels and foreign flag?

LEARY: Well, the only foreign flag vessels that we really became involved with were those that were carrying American official travelers. The Queen Mary and Queen Elizabeth principally and in addition a few others that had occasion to come to port. It's my recollection that we did have on the books legislation, as far as typical travel was concerned, the requirement to travel on American vessels. This being a post-war period, there were waivers which enabled most of our World War II allies to carry passengers as well.

Q: Later on, I guess it was the United States that was on a kind of North Atlantic run.

LEARY: Yes, in fact when we came home from Cherbourg we traveled on the United States from The Hague. And then they were beginning to reinforce the requirement that American travelers travel on American ships.

Q: Did we have a consulate there in The Hague?

LEARY: Yes. That was a much bigger and more active post. Cherbourg was a small town with about a 35,000 population. A very good big deep water port which was why the Queens came in there. And they could come in at any time of the day or night. Whereas in the home port of South Hampton they had to arrive at particular tides, so they had to time their arrival at South Hampton. But they didn't have a specific time to drop off their passengers in Cherbourg. Furthermore there was a regular boat-train service between Cherbourg and Paris. It in fact met the ships at the dock and passengers left directly from the ships to the train. Of course, the process worked in the opposite direction as well. Our little consulate was there to facilitate the travelers and occasionally deal with any visa problems or lost passport problems and so forth and then make sure that official travelers made the proper connections.

Q: Did the consulate in Cherbourg have a consular district as well in the town itself?

LEARY: Oh, yes. It covered most of Normandy and Brittany. It was of course very much involved in the D-Day Landing on June 6, 1944.

Q: The commemoration of those Landings.

LEARY: And the Cherbourg was at one end of those landings. It was quite a battle before we were able to secure the port of Cherbourg after the landings. During that period, there were a number of commemorations of the D-Day landing and dedication of monuments, etcetera. We usually had American VIPs, including General Eisenhower and General Ridgeway, come down for those. In a small post the consul and the vice consul were usually included in those events. One in particular, a very moving experience, was to attend the dedication of the U.S. military cemetery on Omaha Beach, at St. Laurent sur Mer. It was beautiful and moving experience.

Q: The period that you were there was less than ten years after the landing at Normandy, so they were still getting organized in terms of the cemeteries and...

LEARY: That's right. We still had the wooden crosses in the cemetery at the time. Now there are stone crosses. I was back there in 1979 and saw the large monument with dioramas of the landings and descriptions of the battles that took place.

Q: Besides the two of you at the American consulate, were there other American officials or facilities in your consular district?

LEARY: We had about, ten miles outside of Cherbourg, a small U.S. Army detachment, a signal corps detachment manning what was known as the cable head. During World War II the Trans-Atlantic cables had been cut and one of them, which had run from New York and ended in Germany was picked up after the War and the end of the cable was brought into Cherbourg where it connected with land lines. We had a signal corps detachment of about four officers and 40 enlisted people who were in the service there to make sure that the cable was operating properly. That became one of the principal communication lines for U.S. federal government communications with Europe, including State Department. So that gave us the opportunity to associate with the members of the military. That was the only Americans presence that we had, except for some American Battle Monuments, people who were at the cemeteries. We had cemeteries at Omaha Beach and another one in Brittany.

Q: They were basically responsible for the graves and were beginning to organize memorial installations.

LEARY: Right. The maintenance of the property.

Q: Okay. Anything else that we should say about your first post at Cherbourg?

LEARY: One thing that might be interesting although it's not about me, it's about the consul who was in charge at the time that I arrived. His history was interesting and perhaps typical of some of our long-time, what we called staff corps employees. His name was Leslie Weisenberg and he had gone to Europe in World War I with the Army. At the end of the War, he, and I suppose the General, had the opportunity to take their discharge in France and he decided to do so. He had been there for several months and had never seen Paris or any other sights. He went to Paris and he told me that he enjoyed himself for a few weeks, then he ran out of money. At that time the Versailles Peace Commission was beginning to work and he applied for and obtained a job as a clerk with the American delegation. After that ended, he managed to sign on with the embassy in Paris and worked in the embassy in Paris until World War II. In the meantime, he had become a Foreign Service Staff officer. First a vice consul and then a consul. When France fell, he was interned with other staff members of the American embassy in Paris and was eventually returned to the United States. In 1944, when we liberated Paris, he was one of the first people to go back to work in the embassy. In about 1948 he was assigned to Cherbourg as the officer in charge of the consulate.

Q: What did he do after Cherbourg?

LEARY: Well, he was not anxious to leave France. He was married to a French woman and had property in France and so on. He did do a couple of other posts, as I recall, one was in Switzerland, and if I'm not mistaken he might have been assigned to a French-Canadian post as well. But he used to tell a lot of stories about the inter-war period. Including the time when due to budget problems and the staff was asked to go for a month without pay. That wouldn't happen any more.

Q: Well, when Congress doesn't act when it's supposed to act. So he had something like a 30 year or 30 plus year career almost all of which was in France.

LEARY: That's right. There were several other people at the embassy at that time who had similar experiences. A fellow that I didn't know too well, but decided on our budgets and a lot of the senior consular officers in Paris, some of whom had been there for decades.

Q: And home leave wasn't routinely taken every two years.

LEARY: That's right.

Q: Particularly in the inter-war period.

LEARY: Right.

LAURENT E. MORIN

Economic Officer

Le Havre (1949-1952)

Economic/Commercial Officer

Paris (1952-1954)

Laurent E. Morin was born in Augusta, Maine in 1920. He joined the Foreign Service in 1948. His career included assignments in Algeria, France, Japan, Iraq, and Washington, DC. Mr. Morin was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1992.

MORIN: With that, there was no question of returning to Algiers, and the Department sent me to Le Havre, France, where I was economic officer. Le Havre was a small consulate, there were four Americans. It was basically a maritime post. We had ships coming in all the time, seaman hanging around the office, American tourists stranded there, that sort of thing. Our lives revolved around the ships. Although I wasn't suppose to be the consular officer, we all were. I spent time at the jails, hospitals, etc.

One of the most demanding jobs was the meeting and greeting of the big liners. That was before American officials were required to travel on American flagships and before people used planes to any extent. So every ship that came into Le Havre had somebody on board. We had all the Cunard ships, the French liners, the American liners, and the Dutch liners. Invariably there would be somebody on board we had to meet. Our job was to go aboard, find them, tell where they were to be housed in Paris, pass on messages, help them get their cars off, get through customs, etc. You would have the sort of problem where an army family would have adopted a German baby, gone home and come back without a visa for France for the kid...visas were not required for Americans but were required for Germans. You got into that sort of problem.

Often these ships got in early in the morning so often we had to be there at 6 in the morning. We would sit behind the custom lines and watch for diplomatic and official passports and nail the people afterwards. But we didn't have a sign saying "American Consulate," that would have been lethal. Every tourist on the ship would have been after us.

Everybody went by ship in those days. I remember meeting Mrs. Roosevelt, Philip Jessup, Perle Mesta, and all kinds of people coming through. As another example of the kind of problems you get into, a young lady was coming in. Her husband, a military officer, was to meet her. He had sent a message to us saying to tell his wife that he was on maneuvers and she would have to drive across all of France and half of Germany by herself. I told her that and she nearly passed out. She said she didn't even know what side of the road they drove on. Well, I found somebody, some other army type, who was going out that way and he agreed to lead her all the way across to where she was going.

And the seamen, of course, were a horrible problem. In those days American flag ships were running from the Persian Gulf to Le Havre to deliver oil to the refineries in Le Havre. It was an 18-month hitch for these sailors. It was terrible because the ships would turn around in Le Havre in 24 hours. In Saudi Arabia, the Saudis would not let them ashore. So they were caught on the ship for 18 months, and they had all these problems. As a ship started coming near we would get a notice that there were so many people on board who were sick. A doctor was needed to examine them to make sure they were sick and not just trying to get out of their contracts. Some of them would skip ship and go to Paris and live on their pay for a month or two and then come back trying to get a job. This created all sorts of problems. In France if you break a seamen's contract you can go to jail. They don't mess around. We favored the seamen by saying that the shipping agent was responsible for them even though they had deserted their ship for extended periods.

Not only did we help people coming into France, we also helped people leaving France. We would have the hitchhikers, the destitute, the American tourists, seamen, etc. Le Havre was the nearest port to the US so they would all gravitate down to that point thinking they could get some job on the ships. Well, that is not allowed anymore, the unions put a stop to it. In the pre-war days that was the way our Foreign Service people used to get across as the government didn't pay passage for home leave.

One day I had a call from a woman who said that she and her friend were running out of money and didn't know what to do and wanted to come to see us. My boss, the consul, Sabin J. Dalferes, was a Cajun, an old FSS consul from World War I, a real colorful character from Lafayette, Louisiana. He and I received these two women and it was pretty obvious to me when I took a look at them that they were lesbians...one was very butchy in her dress and the other was very feminine.

They started talking. The very female one had had a job in Germany with the US Army. When her friend showed up the Army fired her on the spot. They were now running out of money. Their families would have very little to do with them. The family of the feminine one offered to give her a one way ticket but nothing else. They were just really hard up. They didn't know what to do. They were in Le Havre and broke.

Then they started telling us she had lost her job because the Army thought they were lesbians. Dalferes got very uncomfortable with this and asked if this had something to do with the Well of Loneliness.

Q: The Well of Loneliness was a novel in the 1930's which treated lesbianism in a very discreet way.

MORIN: The more masculine one got up and said, "Absolutely not, I am not a lesbian, I'm a hermaphrodite" She paused, "Do you want me to prove it?" She started undoing her clothes and Dalferes almost fell out of his chair. "Oh no, no," he said. She continued, "Now look, I'm in love with this woman. She is the only person in my whole life who has ever given me the time of day. I am not going to be separated from her. We need help."

Both of us were very sympathetic to them. We managed to find them very cheap lodgings in Le Havre, and later I found out that Dalferes had paid for them. Eventually we made arrangements with US Lines to give them passage with the one ticket the family would pay for. We went aboard ship and saw them off. Dalferes gave them some pocket money.

About three or four months later we get a letter from the masculine one which said, "I have been operated on and now we are married. I want you, Mr. Dalferes and your junior consul, to know that you were the only people who ever were nice to us and we really appreciated it. We can't give you enough of our thanks."

Anyway, that was the kind of work I did in Le Havre. I was there for a while and then the Department decided to change the consular district and transfer the northern departments of France to Paris. I then went to Paris with them.

Q: You served in Paris from 1952 to 1954.

MORIN: Right. My wife was quite ill. Those times we didn't have much in the way of support from the Department, no medical support for dependents, no education allowances. My wife fell ill and had a very difficult pregnancy in Le Havre, and I had to send her home at my own expense. By the time she got back six months later with the baby, son Lee, I was in Paris.

Q: You had two Ambassadors while you were in Paris. James Dunn, who was one of the old hands of the Foreign Service and Douglas Dillon who was more of a contemporary figure. Did you have any contact or observe how they operated and managed?

MORIN: No, I never saw them. This was such a huge operation in Paris. I didn't know the Ambassadors. Everybody was invited once to the DCM's house. That was about the extent of that kind of activity for my level.

Q: What were you doing in Paris?

MORIN: I was in the economic section. I started off with straight economic reporting. That was not a very well run operation. I wasn't very happy there...nor were a lot of other people. It was large and our boss, who was a fine reporter on his own, just didn't administer anything. He did all the work, working until 7 or 8 every night. But there was no feedback, instructions or anything.

After a time I was transferred to the commercial section. I was the assistant commercial attaché and I enjoyed that a great deal. It was a very nice operation with a wonderful boss, Patton Allen. Among other things, I was the one who received all the visitors that no one knew what to do with. When the receptionist at the main lobby would get a nut of some kind they would be sent to the commercial section. But it was a fine job and I enjoyed it. Paris was terribly expensive for us in addition to my wife's trip to the States and coming back at my own expense. For instance, at the Embassy commissary you could only buy things on account...you couldn't use cash... that was to control things. If you didn't settle your bill at the end of the month, you were red-lined and then you couldn't buy anything else there. This was a very common occurrence for me...not being able to settle at the end of the month. So we ended up buying on the local market a lot more than we needed to if we had had more capital.

For instance, coal was a real problem. We had a coal burning furnace in our house. Coal on the open market was sold by the five kilo bag which worked out to over a $100 a ton. You could buy coal for $50 a ton from the Embassy if you bought two tons at a time. I was never able to put $100 together.

Also, we were obliged at a great disadvantage to buy our francs at the official rate of 350 to the dollar while the black market rate was over 500. The embassy was very strict about this, although the military and others accommodated their people.

Q: What you are saying here is something that I empathize with completely because I went through it too. Americans in certain places were living very splendidly but in other places they really were hurting. The gay diplomatic life was not that fancy when you were trying to support yourself. This really inhibited our ability to get around.

MORIN: Exactly, and in Paris particularly where you had such a large operation, so much brass and high level officers...that upper class in the Embassy was a world by itself. We had very little contact with it in the ranks. It was like being in the Department, there were so many people. Also that was a very trying time in the Foreign Service anyway. This was during the McCarthy years and while that affected the senior officers more than it did us, we still felt it. We had the visit of Cohn and Schine coming through Paris.

Q: These were two aides of Senator McCarthy who made, in diplomatic terms, absolute horses asses out of themselves by running around looking at what they considered subversive books. These were two young kids with lots of ego and no intelligence.

MORIN: Right. And they were made the laughing stock because all of their stories were picked up in the press all the time.

It was also the time of the RIF, the reduction in force of the Eisenhower administration. That affected the FSS officers of which I was still one then. Notices would come out periodically, listing the names of people who would be dropped. You had three weeks to get home if you wanted to get your way paid! Of course this news would come into the communications center and the secretaries down there would pass the word around. You had this going on all the time, people on edge not knowing what they were going to do if they got fired, which was what it was. So it was a very trying time for most of us.

But being in Paris, itself, was such a delight to me so I was able to enjoy it, but the Embassy was not that great a place to be in. It was a horrible place for secretaries, for instance. Because as the girls told me, "It is fine to go to museums for a while, but after that what do we do the rest of the time?" The American males all went out with French girls. The American girls were left on their own and unless they were real extroverts, of which there were a few, they just didn't get around much. It got to be terrible for them; lots of tears.

Q: Although you were somewhat removed, did you get a feeling of how the Embassy was responding to the Vietnam situation?

MORIN: This was 1952-54. Vietnam was just barely starting.

Q: I am talking about the French side.

MORIN: The French were having their problems. We had a desk for Vietnam...for those three countries. So it was a concern to people and the Dien Bien Phu battle was during that period.

Q: Yes, that was in 1954.

MORIN: The thing that struck me about that was the French soldiers coming back from that area and from Korea earlier, would not be well received by the French population. I used to say to myself, "Well, that is just terrible, Americans would never react that way." And of course they acted the same way when our own soldiers came back from Vietnam. That used to shock me in those days.

We had other things too. There was the Rosenberg trial. Remember that?

Q: Yes, Jules and Ethel Rosenberg were accused and convicted of spying for the Soviet Union on nuclear matters. They were executed.

MORIN: There were lots of protests. The Embassy would be ringed by these police vans. There were signs everywhere of "Americans Go Home" and that kind of stuff.

Then I was assigned to Kobe, Japan. There the treatment was absolutely different. We had complete support. We could use all the military commissaries, PXs, schools, etc. and nice houses were available.

In Paris, my daughter went to a French school, which was all right because she was fluent in French and accustomed to French schools in Algeria, but for kids who were older they couldn't fit in. In French schools one had difficulty if you didn't speak good French. The French system, as explained to us by French teachers, was to favor the upper 10 or 20% of the children and not bother with the rest. The American school in Paris was quite expensive, and since the government didn't pay for it, people at our level just couldn't afford to send kids there.

LEONARD L. BACON

Strasbourg (1950-1954)

Leonard L. Bacon was born in Rochester, New York in 1907. He received his bachelors degree from Yale in 1928 and graduated from Harvard Law in 1931. He enlisted in the army in 1942 and joined the Foreign Service in 1945 and served in Switzerland, China, Germany, Laos, and Washington, DC. Mr. Bacon was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1990.

Q: Can we talk about your next assignment because it sounds quite interesting. You were sent to Strasbourg, is that correct? And what were you doing there? This was from 1950 to '54(?).

BACON: Yes. This was in the late summer of 1950. I was sent there to be a number two, but actually to spend all my time in the Saar. The Saar is a part of the very old French-German combination of iron ore in Lorraine, and coal in the Saar basin. Since the time of Louis XIV they've always been under one administration, in effect. Louis XIV captured part of the Saar and built forts in there. Of course, he didn't have much in the way of steam power at that time but the local French steel industry, and the German Saar coal mines would be sunk without access to either the raw material on either side. And after the war the French thought there was a chance to get the Saar back again under French control and they set up a special district which would be in economic union with France under the same French customs, French taxation, but would still have a cultural autonomy of its own. Although they did their best to make French attractive to Saarlanders, sent the Comédie Française there for performances, and so on, rebuilt the opera house. This worked pretty well for a while, partly because they benefited by the French repopulation law, which gave huge benefits to parents who had a certain number of children, at a certain rate of speed, and Saarlanders needed no encouragement that way, they'd have had them anyway, but they got the benefits. Eventually all of this began to pall, and Germany after the restoration of its economy, and its currency, began to look better and better. Long after I left a plebiscite was held, and as expected they voted to rejoin Germany and the French took it in good order. There was nothing much they could do about it anyway.

That was a project for which we had really no responsibility and we didn't have to do anything except to indicate our general support of French position on the matter, but a position which our support was not absolutely unbreakable. After about three years of that, I was sent to the NATO Defense College in Paris, the easiest transfer I ever made—just get in the car and drive. That has a course of about five months and I was directed to remain there as a member of the faculty for another three courses, back to Washington for career development unit in Personnel, and after a year of that to Laos as number two in the Vientiane embassy.

JAMES McCARGAR Political Officer Paris (1950-1954)

James McCargar was born and raised in San Francisco, California in 1920. He received a bachelor's degree in political science from Stanford University in 1941. Mr. McCargar entered the Foreign Service in 1942. His career included positions in Paris, Kuibyshev, Moscow, Vladivostok, Santo Domingo, Budapest, Genoa, and Washington, DC. This interview was conducted by Charles Stuart Kennedy on April 18, 1995.

Q: AFL-CIO was very much involved.

MCCARGAR: It was still AFL in 1950-51, before the merger, although the CIO had earlier joined the AFL in breaking out of the Communist-dominated WFTU, and forming the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU).

Wisner put Offie in as a contract agent (i.e. undercover) with Lovestone. Then there was a break between Wisner and Offie. I've never known what brought it on. I have seen photocopies from Lovestone's papers (he sold his papers well before his death to the Hoover Institution) of letters to Lovestone from Offie, which were patently subversive of Wisner's efforts to control the relationship with Lovestone. Perhaps Wisner caught onto what was going on in his regard. Or perhaps Bedell Smith, who had been looking into the case, and had been in touch with the FBI about it, simply ordered Frank to get rid of Offie. So Wisner fired him. Offie's first move on being fired was to go to Wisner's house. He went into the kitchen, he took the cook by the arm, and he led the man out of the house, then and there. Leaving Polly without a cook. Typical Offie. Thereafter he was exceedingly, publicly, and scurrilously bitter about Polly, possibly because he blamed her for the break with Frank.

Offie then went off and formed something called Global Enterprises, which had to do with Italian oil and German steel. (Remember, this was the heyday of "offshore procurement" and the buildup of NATO.) Offie had an office in the Corning Glass building of Fifth Avenue in New York. By that time Bob Murphy had become Vice President of Corning Glass International; his office was on a high floor of that lovely building; Global Enterprises was just around the corner from Bob Murphy. Again, it's one of those things that I've simply never understood. As is known, Offie subsequently died in an air crash on the London to Brussels Sunday night flight. By that time, NATO had already moved to Brussels. Offie was late and called to have the plane held for him. They held it for him. So he got on the plane. The plane took off, it went straight up and then straight down. Everybody on board was killed, including Offie who now has, in the Foreign Service area of Rock Creek Park cemetery, a great big block that says OFFIE on it. So ended that story.

I must say Offie did a very peculiar thing. After my Vienna assignment fell apart, I made a mistake. I should have stayed with OPC, if we're speaking of career moves (though the CIA at that stage had no pension rights), but I felt very loyal to the Foreign Service. I really was very proud to be a Foreign Service Officer. I was admiring of the men that I had known in it. I had a lot of friends in it. And I enjoyed the work, most of the time. So I went back to the Foreign Service. With Wisner's help, I was assigned to the Paris Embassy on East European affairs. When Offie heard that I had been assigned to Paris, he called me and invited me and my wife to lunch and dinner on the same day, with whatever other guests we would like. We went to lunch (I had a tooth extracted that morning so I didn't eat very much), and then we went to dinner. He asked what else we would like to do, and I said, "I'd like to go to the circus." So we all went to the circus. Then he said, "I have an apartment in the Rue de Ponthieu in Paris. You can have it for $100 dollars a month for a while, until you get fully located." I took it and paid the $100 dollars to some clerk in the Embassy, which I assume went to Bullitt.

And there I was in Paris. End of the great adventures. I had enjoyed my time at the OPC. The work was fascinating. I had a large staff. I had a budget of as many millions as I wanted to spend, and I couldn't spend it all. Even with the Albanian operation. I did plant officers in Greece and in Austria in hopes of later using them to in those areas. I had one amusing experience which should be recorded. I had a young man come in to see me who was to be a potential recruit. I had an idea of putting him in a shipping office in Piraeus in Greece. I mentioned this to him and he firmly rejected it. His explanation: "You've got to give a man a cover he can be proud of!" I realized we were up against a different view of things.

But those plants and the Albanian operation were the end of my OPC service. I went to Paris, to the East European Desk of the Political Section, with great pleasure – only to find that it was a bad move. Here I'd just been in charge of all of these very important matters, and I'd moved at a responsible level. Suddenly I found myself under a man for whom I developed very little respect, who was devious, and pathologically secretive. He wouldn't let me see any of the papers in the office –

Q: Who was this?

MCCARGAR: Landreth Harrison. He gave me minimal assignments and then complained that I wasn't doing anything. But besides exploring the exile communities in France, I did turn out a compendium on the Hungarian immigration in France and one on the Romanian. (These have since been declassified, and are available in the U.S. Archives; one who recently made use of the Romanian report, coincidentally enough, was Frank Wisner's daughter, as she prepared her doctoral dissertation for Boston University on Romania 1944-48.)

After the first year, Harrison had turned in reports on me which meant that I obviously had to go somewhere else in the Embassy. So I was sent over to COCOM, the Allied Coordinating Committee. I think it has just recently been abolished. COCOM was a Western European and U.S. committee concerned with the export of strategic arms to the Soviet Bloc. Sid Jacques, who was later killed in a air crash in Nepal, was the Chief Delegate, in succession to Nate King. Bob Brandin was part of that group, as was Gardner Ainsworth. Who died last year. The French had temporary buildings at that time spilling down from the Trocadero almost to the Pont d'Iena. Thank God they ultimately removed them. They were an eyesore. They were worse than the ones we had here on Constitution Avenue and around the Reflecting Pool.

Q: I remember seeing them. They really turned our stomachs.

MCCARGAR: Exactly. Anyway, we would meet there almost every day and go over these detailed lists: what do we do about left-threaded widgets, and what about right-handed earphones. This item and that item.

Q: This was basically trying to keep strategic material out of the hands of the Communist states and armed forces?

MCCARGAR: Yes. I respected the purpose of it all.

Meanwhile – this all came out later – I started getting official letters from FP, from Foreign Service Personnel. For example, I was advised that for the period when I was in Hungary I was placed in the lowest 30 percent of my class. Then came a letter from Durbrow, then Chief of Personnel, saying that I was in the lower 10% of my class – this for the period when I was at OPC.

Later I found out what had happened. I should add that Bob Miner, who later became an Ambassador, was then in the Embassy in Paris. Having been in the Embassy at Athens during the Albanian operation, he was one of those who was witting as to what I was doing at OPC. He was assigned to my Selection Board in 1952. I had been promoted in June of 1947, thanks to Arthur Schoenfeld (i.e., before my Pond work). Thereafter, I learned, my record was a blank until I got to Paris. There, after my first year, Harrison had slaughtered me with the support of Phil Bonsal, the Counselor for Political Affairs, who didn't know what I was doing anyway. But Bonsal's way of doing things was automatically to support the section chiefs under him. Here I was, as I say, having done all these very important things, having had this great authority, being a clerk in the office of someone for whom I had no respect. And since I still felt that the assignment was – if only minus Harrison – one that called on my experience, and one that I had requested via Wisner, I didn't feel that I could ask for another one.

Selden Chapin, by that time Ambassador to the Netherlands, invited me up to The Hague. He wanted me to join his staff there. With my genius for doing a strange mixture of right and wrong things, I refused on the grounds, which I held private to myself, that it was not sensible to tie your career to one man too much. I knew that it was also possible that Selden would get into some trouble, which he did eventually. So I refused it. I stayed on in Paris and suffered there – an oxymoron if there ever was one.

Miner was called to my Selection Board, and he told me what had happened. The Boards all had public members. These public members were not cleared for Top Secret and Secret materials – nor were any of the officials members of the Boards cleared for such matters as the Pond or OPC. So all these people would look at my record which said nothing about what I had done for the Pond in Hungary, or what I had done at OPC.

What Bob Miner didn't know was that Chapin had written a letter in 1948 (to Durbrow) noting that I had not been promoted, and saying in effect, "Something's wrong here. This man did things that were thoroughly authorized". A memo was sent to EUR and Randy Higgs, who I thought was a friend of mine, replied that EUR had no objection to honors being bestowed upon me, or whatever. But EUR thought the people who had authorized these secret actions should step forward and say that they were responsible. As it happened, the Pond had turned in a magnificent letter of commendation, which to this day I have never seen because, as I found out years later, from a memorandum to Secretary of State Cy Vance, signed by Ben Read as Under Secretary for Management, that commendation "was withheld from my personnel file." No explanation was given by the Under Secretary for this action, and none was asked for by the Secretary of State. My questions about this over the years have simply been ignored by the Department of State.

So there was this long blank in my record, followed by damnation from Harrison (which I had contested, but my reply was not in the file) and a “doing well” from Sid Jacques for my brief period at COCOM. According to Miner, the public members kept saying, “But what does this man do? What has he been doing for these years here? There are four years here that aren’t really covered”. Obviously my few months in Genoa hadn’t contributed to my record at all. The Government members – most of whom, except for Miner, didn’t themselves know, as I have mentioned (only that my work was highly classified), said “We can’t tell you.” The situation became so bad that Jerry Drew, by then Director General of the Foreign Service (and who not only had known me in Budapest, but was witting of both the Pond and OPC) took the extraordinary step of appearing before my Selection Board in his official capacity. A very unusual thing. He spoke to my Board, and said, “You cannot do this to this man. He has done things that we can’t tell you about, but they’re of great value for the country,” and so forth. The result was that I was in the lowest 10 percent of my class for two years running.

I had a cable from Bill Boswell, a friend who was in FP at that time (his brother, an Army officer, and I had been in Moscow together), saying he needed to see me in Washington before a certain date. So I got on a plane. I knew my Paris assignment was almost over. So I flew back and I saw Bill. He said, “You have one more year to regain your standing in the Service, and you can’t do it. It’s not possible. You can’t get from the lowest 10% up into something that won’t select you out in one year.” So I resigned. Presumably I blotted my copy book again, because I resigned in February or March, but I made it effective in October, taking advantage of all my accumulated leave – as you could do in those days. Personnel kept writing me letters saying “Please make it effective now,” and describing their budgetary and other difficulties. My feeling was, “You’re kicking me around. Why should I do you a favor?” I let it go to October, when my leave and pay ran out, and that was the end of it. So ended my Foreign Service career. To my sorrow and chagrin, I must say.

JACOB J. KAPLAN
Board of European Payments Union
Paris (1950-1959)

Jacob Kaplan was born in Massachusetts in 1920. After graduating from Harvard, he served in the Office of Strategic Services during World War II. He went on to work as the head of the economic section on Southern Europe and contributed to the beginnings of the Marshall Plan. He worked with the ECA and the Board of the European Payments Union, and later was the head of the International Development Organization Staff in AID. Mr. Kaplan was interviewed by W. Haven North on March 22, 1999.

KAPLAN: Well, after two years at Yale I decided that I really did not want to remain an academic. I had grown up thinking I wanted to be an academic but as a result of my war time and post war experiences, I began to realize that my real interests were in the application of economic analysis to real world policy problems. Hence, I went back to ECA in 1950. I soon found myself a member of a new staff that had been established to deal with European regional problems. Primarily, the staff served to backstop the OEEC. It also dealt with NATO, which had by then come into existence, and which became very important once the Korean war broke out in June 1950. Also, we provided some backstopping and support for the European coal and steel community which had just come into existence. It was a group of people, all of whom believed in the importance of European economic integration. We wanted to promote it and Dick Bissell, the ECA Deputy Administrator, set the staff up for exactly that purpose.

Q: Which was in the State Department?

KAPLAN: Within the ECA, a European regional staff. Its first head was John Hulley, who had been a major contributor to the European Payments Union concept. He shortly resigned and I succeeded him as chief of that Division.

Q: What were you trying to bring about?

KAPLAN: We were trying to promote economic integration through specific moves. That had actually begun with the European Payments Union Agreement. The OEEC was a forum that conducted discussions and meetings on all sorts of issues, but its major decision making role had been in the division of aid. By 1950 that was no longer practicable. The real problem was that although European production was well above prewar levels, trade within Europe was still 15% below and European dollar balance of payments was still in serious deficits. Neither the Europeans nor we in ECA had any great confidence that the need for aid was going to end by 1952. It was important for the Europeans to get rid of their bilateral trade agreements, to learn to be competitive with each other. Maybe that would increase productivity sufficiently to give them enough confidence to free their restrictions on trade with the dollar area. That was the purpose of the EPU to which we were giving strong support. ECA had provided the capital to get it started. In 1954, I went to Paris as the U.S. Representative to the Managing Board and stayed there for five years. It was probably the best work experience of my life.

Q: This was mainly putting together the Payment Union?

KAPLAN: Well, the Payments Union was together by then; it had functioned for several years, quite effectively. At the time, there were two issues. First, how was Europe going to get ready for convertibility and second, when were they going to reach the point when they could make their currencies convertible. The British were pushing for an early move to a very limited kind of convertibility. They wanted to reestablish the London financial and gold markets, which had been dormant because of trade and payments restrictions and because the British balance of payments itself was so weak. They had some hope they could reestablish those markets if the EPU were abolished. Most of their permanent officials had opposed its formation in the first place. Hugh Gaitskell, their Minister of State for Economic Affairs and later the Chancellor, overruled them. He was an economist by training and was persuaded by our very able staff in Paris that the Union would indeed be in Britain's interest, and so it turned out to be. The Bank of England and the Treasury civil servants were very unhappy about the whole affair and did not cooperate terribly well.

The Germans were also restless, particularly Mr. Erhard, the Economics Minister, who preached convertibility at any audience who would listen, though he had not succeeded in persuading his own government that Germany should move to convertibility before the rest of Europe was ready to move. The OEEC convened a Ministerial Conference on Convertibility. Harold Stassen, by then the head of the foreign aid agency, MSA, brought me along as his principal advisor. We were trying to figure out a way to hold Europe together, hold European integration together, and to promote European integration at least until such point as they really were able to become convertible together successfully. The Conference was able to agree that the EPLI should be changed to provide more flexibility.

When I came to Paris, the first issue was negotiating changes in the EPU Agreement to establish the conditions under which a move to convertibility could be made. The British were given a veto power, the power to move when they were ready. By late 1954, their situation had deteriorated to a point that they put off any such move to convertibility. Then the EPU went on.

The Managing Board was the place where the most intensive economic policy coordination took place that had ever occurred up to that time. Country's situations were reviewed regularly. Every member of the Union had accepted an implicit commitment to keep its payments with the rest of the members in balance over time and the Board supervised that commitment. It reviewed a country's position when it was getting out of balance. It made recommendations, both to the surplus countries and the deficit countries and they were accepted and proved successful. It had become a very prestigious and influential body because it had dealt with several crises in its early days very effectively. It had thus acquired a great deal of clout. In 1957, the Board was finally able to get the French government to accept conditions that required economic policy changes in return for a special credit. The EPU incidentally did impose conditions on its credits. It invented the idea of conditionality, which the IMF later took over.

Q: These were conditions associated with...?

KAPLAN: They were fiscal and monetary conditions designed to help countries get their payments back into balance. In some cases, recommendations were made to surplus countries. They didn't get credits, but they had to give credit. They would get recommendations to remove trade restrictions that affected countries in difficulties.

Q: Were there other issues you addressed in that role?

KAPLAN: The Board had two major crises. One was with France, which had fallen out of step with EPU Agreement. The Agreement not only involved keeping one's payments in balance but also reducing quantitative restrictions on trade with each other. A companion European Code of Trade Liberalization required countries to free at least 75 percent of their trade in each of three major categories. The French had done so, fell back, later conformed and then fell back again. They were in economic and financial difficulties all through the '50s. The U.S. had provided them with a lot of aid and urged that they bring their economy into better balance. However, the governments changed every few months and none of them was willing to do anything unpopular.

So the problems just rolled on. They got involved in fighting in Vietnam and later pulled out. We paid most of their bills, including retroactive payments for bills for their Vietnam expenditures before they moved out.

Q: I gather we were supporting...?

KAPLAN: They were in trouble and we were still generous. But by 1957, the U.S. government had had it. The French had run through the very large reserves accumulated from our earlier aid and they were desperate for further help. We told them to go to the other Europeans, who were in a position to help. The other Europeans were willing but they insisted that there be conditions. Finally in the fall of '57 a new French government put together a program that seemed to be acceptable. The EPU was willing to provide them with some credit, and the IMF offered a little more credit. The Germans offered a substantial credit and the French sent a mission to Washington to seek some more aid from the U.S. The German Chairman of the Board pleaded with me to persuade Washington to provide something. It would be politically embarrassing if Germany were the only bilateral contributor. It would be embarrassing for the French as well as for the Germans. I did go to Washington and passed this message along. The U.S. did make a modest contribution to the package and the program worked fabulously well. De Gaulle took over shortly thereafter. After a lot of debate he decided to honor the EPU's conditions and the French economy and balance of payments thrived thereafter. All of this is told in a book about the EPU that I co-authored with Gunther Schleiminger. It appeared in 1989.

Q: It was called the European Payments Union: Financial Diplomacy in the 1950s by Jacob J. Kaplan and Gunther Schleiminger, Clarendon Press, Oxford, 1989. Were there other issues?

KAPLAN: Then we had Turkey. Turkey had been a member of the Union from the very beginning, but it never removed quantitative restrictions on its imports. It kept asking for credit all the time, and none of the Board's members was responsive. Finally, in 1958, things had really gotten desperate. The U.S. had been providing substantial aid to Turkey for years and we were certainly not interested in increasing it. Turkey was then in real trouble and had huge debts. The Europeans had been letting them buy goods with export credit guarantees and the debts were enormous. An IMF staff member, a former Czech national named Ernest Sturc, had developed a relationship with the senior people in the Turkish bureaucracy. He went to Ankara and persuaded them to introduce a decent stabilization program. Mangoldt, the German chairman of the EPU Board, also went there. Thereafter, I got a telephone call from Washington saying that the stabilization program looked very good but that Turkey would need a financial package of X amount. The U.S. and the IMF can provide some, but how about the Europeans? Can you get them to fill the gap? Knowing the European attitude toward the Turks and their behavior up to that point I was very skeptical but said I'd try. I invited Mangoldt to lunch at one of his favorite restaurants in Paris and fearfully explained the need to finalize the operation quickly. To my surprise, he thought the stabilization program could succeed. This was a chance to bring Turkey back into being a full-scale member of the OEEC and thus to fill out the last gap in the European Community. So we wrote some numbers down, put together a package, and agreed to recommend all its components to our governments.

I guess there is no point in my now not telling tales out of the school. In Paris at that point a Treasury representative held the rank of Minister in the U.S. delegation, of which I was a member. He was a retired banker who had little to do except exchange gossip and views with anybody who would talk to him. A friend of the Ambassador, he saw my reporting cables. I had reported my conversation with Mangoldt in an “eyes only” telegram. My Treasury colleague promptly drove to Frankfurt and related its contents to Emminger, then the key international person in the German Central Bank. Emminger had been angling for Mangoldt’s job for sometime and he proceeded to put the kibosh on the proposal before Mangoldt had a chance to approach Bonn. And so we had to recover, as we did. The Germans contributed a little less than we had suggested, and the other Europeans more. It was amazing that small countries like Belgium and even the French offered money. France had just been given a package itself. It offered a small sum if the others would agree. We thus were able to put together a package that was approved at an OEEC Ministerial Meeting and it all worked. We also set up a group to deal with Turkey’s debts. The European debts were almost all government guaranteed, while our debts were all private, some substantial, some very small. I remember 10 dollars owed to a bookseller in Philadelphia.

Q: Put together a rescheduling of the debts?

KAPLAN: We put together a rescheduling of the debts. The Europeans wanted them repaid as soon as possible. We were providing aid and didn’t want our aid money to be used to pay off European government debts. I was a thorn in the Europeans’ side, but after awhile we reached an agreement and it was successful. In fact, the debts were cleared off on schedule.

Q: Were there economic policy conditions?

KAPLAN: Very tight conditions that the Turks adhered to for awhile. They got into trouble again later on.

Q: Were there other issues?

KAPLAN: The other issue was the timing of convertibility. The British senior civil servants and the Bank of England had been recommending such a move for a long time. Finally, they had a new Chancellor of the Exchequer, previously the Minister of Agriculture, and persuaded him on the idea of moving fast. At the same time, the U.S. had just appointed a new Secretary of the Treasury, a former Secretary of the Navy, whose understanding of these matters was not yet very profound. The Governor of the Bank came to Washington, met with the Secretary, and told him what Britain proposed to do. Convertibility sounded wonderful to the Secretary. The Governor asked him not to tell anybody or it would all fall apart. The Secretary asked if he could tell the President. The reply was yes, but nobody else. None of the U.S. officials who had been involved in convertibility discussions for years knew about the move until the British told their European colleagues that they would act in a few weeks. It was all agreed. Despite the fact that they acted prematurely, it worked. However, the British ran into serious balance of payments trouble and had to be rescued by the IMF a couple years later.

Q: And you were in a very pivotal role in that location, weren’t you?

KAPLAN: It was a great role working with a great Board. Almost all of my colleagues except Mangoldt held key positions in their governments. They came to Paris for meetings once a month or more, if necessary, but otherwise had full-time jobs in key international financial policy roles in their governments. They were a sophisticated group, very committed to European integration and to making the Payments Union work. It was a great job, the most educational work experience of my life. I learned much more there than I did in graduate school. I also established valuable friendships.

Q: I'm sure you were learning in a very practical way.

KAPLAN: In a very practical way from wise men, with very good judgement and real commitment to getting constructive things done.

Q: So, from that you moved to what?

WILLIAM A. CRAWFORD

First Secretary
Paris (1950-1954)

Special Assistant for International Affairs
Paris (1965-1967)

Ambassador William A. Crawford was born in New York and educated in France. He received a bachelor's degree from Haverford College in 1936 and entered the Foreign Service in 1941. His career included positions in Havana, Moscow, Paris, and Prague, and an ambassadorship to Romania. Ambassador Crawford was interviewed by H.G. Torbert on March 23, 1989.

Q: Did you go to Paris when you left there?

CRAWFORD: I went to Paris.

Q: Did you do the eastern European job in Paris?

CRAWFORD: Yes. That's right. I did. I succeeded Norris Chipman in Paris. He had been in charge of liaison with the Foreign Office on Russian matters since 1946 and was responsible for following communist activities there. That's what I carried on with.

Q: It really didn't hurt your feelings to be back in Paris again?

CRAWFORD: No it didn't as a matter of fact. My mother was still living, but she died while I was there.

Q: It was comforting to be there at that time.

CRAWFORD: It was.

Q: Were there any great events that happened during that particular tour in the international field? Who was the ambassador?

CRAWFORD: I started out with David Bruce and then Jimmy Dunn, who was followed by Doug Dillon. So I was there with three of them. The Korean war broke out shortly after I arrived and the main question for a while was the setting up of the European defense community. That did not however, involve redirecting my reporting which was mainly on communist activities.

There had been in the late '40's a certain amount of strikes and other problems that created a communist treat there. While I was there however, the communist party was strong, but it was kept under control and didn't get out of hand. My job was to gain as wide an understanding of what was going on with the Soviet Union at the time.

JAMES M. WILSON
Air Force Representative
Paris (1951-1952)

USRO
Paris (1953-1954)

James M. Wilson, Jr. was born in China to American parents in 1918. He received a BA from Swarthmore College in 1939, graduated from the Geneva School of International Studies in 1939, the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy in 1940, and Harvard Law School in 1948. He also served as a lieutenant colonel overseas in the US Army from 1941-44. Mr. Wilson has served abroad in Paris, Madrid, Bangkok and Manila. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

Q: When you are working on these bases in Morocco, I've heard from people who were involved sort of from the Department of State side and they say that supposedly these negotiations would be between the United States government and Morocco for example, but the real negotiations were with the Pentagon lawyers they would say, which would be you and the Department of State. Did you find that?

WILSON: Well, no, I didn't in those early days. I've forgotten who our consul general was in Casablanca, but our consul in Rabat was Bob McBride. It was the first time I had got to know Bob. He was extremely helpful and became a good personal friend. In Paris, we worked as part of the embassy. Actually, I had two hats. I was "defense advisor" in the embassy and also had my hat in USRO. We worked very closely throughout Europe with a number of stalwart embassy types. Later, I got a third hat as "defense advisor" in Bonn.

There was a stellar group of FSOs [Foreign Service officers] in Paris. David Bruce was ambassador to start out with, Philip Bonsal as DCM [Deputy Chief of Mission], then James Dunn and then Douglas Dillon. On the USRO side, we had Harriman and then Bill Draper. Bill Draper's principal deputy was Ambassador Livy Merchant, and the political counselor/minister was Ed Martin. On the embassy side, Ted Achilles took over as DCM, and Chip Bohlen made a couple of cameo appearances. At the working level, Mac Godley, Matt Looram, and Dean Hinton. On the economic side, Harry Labouisse, Bill Timmons. In Rome, there were Ellsworth Bunker, Durbrow, Outer Horsey, and Tony Freeman. The list goes on. That's quite an array.

Q: I was going to say, absolutely. These are sort of the stars of the post-war American diplomacy.

WILSON: Exactly. In addition, of course, we had the SHAPE [Supreme Headquarters, Allied Powers, Europe] with Doug MacArthur first and then Freddie Reinhardt as political advisor. We had to work with all these people, not to mention the U.S. military forces themselves, our principal clients.

At time there were sharp differences between USRO and the embassies concerned, which had to be brokered, not to mention problems with the growing NATO bureaucracy. I remember my introduction to the word "infrastructure." A word taken from the French, meaning the bed on which railroad tracks rest. What was then a new word is now, of course, in much wider use with a broader definition. About all of our base construction became "infrastructure" and now "infrastructure" seems to include anything underlying something else.

Q: How did you find dealing with the French?

WILSON: The French are never easy, but we had some outstanding French representatives to deal with. The principal one was a gentleman by the name of François Le Duc. He was a career foreign service officer and also an expert in North African affairs. Later, he was an under secretary of foreign affairs and French ambassador to Austria and Canada.

I should back up a bit to your earlier question. There was a difference of opinion on the subject of whether we should be negotiating with Morocco or with France. I guess the chief proponent of "with France only" was Doug MacArthur. Pete Hamilton and I were of the opinion that we should at least consult the Moroccans under the circumstances. But we were overruled. Of course, three years later came full independence for Morocco, and the result was that we had to renegotiate the whole business all over again. There was an interesting cast of characters on the earlier negotiation. One of the guys we were dealing with on the French Ministry of Defense side was General Maurice Challe, who later on was one of the three general officers, who led the military revolt in Algeria. That was a very interesting series of negotiations... Where were we?

Q: You had gone back but let's talk about Libya and Tunisia. Did we get involved there?

WILSON: Tunisia, no; Libya, yes.

Q: Wheelus Air Force Base?

WILSON: Not during that time. Wheelus had been negotiated earlier. We took over, as I recall, from the Brits who had worked out arrangements with the Libyans after the liberation of Libya. It was not until later on when we had to renegotiate that I personally got involved in it. Morocco remained a problem until the Air Force finally decided that it didn't need the bases anymore.

Q: What was the problem with Morocco?

WILSON: The agreement hadn't been negotiated with the Moroccans.

Q: Morocco was considered a fallback place for what was it, B-47s, I think?

WILSON: B-47s, but it wasn't a fallback. This was a forward deployment. It was before we got into B-52s and before we got into IRBMs (intermediate range ballistic missiles).

Q: When you were working with this was it was very much a cooperative effort with the State Department, the people you were working with and the Pentagon?

WILSON: Oh, yes, most definitely.

Q: I was just wondering whether you were getting anything from the people back at the Pentagon saying these wimps are not...

WILSON: In Paris, we were always fighting with the Pentagon and the State Department. I can remember a number of times when we had a combined assault on Washington from Paris. On one occasion (I don't remember what the issue was.), Larry Norstad, who was the air deputy commander of SHAPE at the time, decided that the issue needed a little personal massage in addition to a cable we had just sent. He called me in and said, "Come, get on my airplane." We took off and flew to Washington. We drafted and cleared the answer to our Paris cable and flew back to Paris, where everything was fine until the next dustup.

Q: Was there a feeling of we've really got to get this done in a hurry because the Soviets are up to something?

WILSON: Oh, yes, a real sense of urgency. We got an agreement with the French to establish seven or eight airbases in France, plus a major Army installation. Then some years later, of course, DeGaulle decided that he didn't want any of them anymore and invited us out along with USRO and SHAPE. By that time, the Cold War was well underway.

Q: Were you in Europe in 1956?

WILSON: No. About the last thing I did from Europe was the West German agreements in late 1954 after the EDF failed (the European Defense Force)...

Q: This was where it was...

WILSON: The EDF was David Bruce's baby, but the French vetoed it. Specifically, Mendes France came in as the new prime minister, as you may remember, and there had to be a major switch of signals. We ended up with something called the London and Paris Agreements which ended the official state of war with the western powers, which restored West German sovereignty and brought Germany into the Brussels Pact and NATO. I was very much involved in one of these at the working level. Right after that, I came back here, went to ISA, and set up the first worldwide base rights negotiating office there. It is still there [entitled Foreign Military Relations Affairs – FMRA].

ALBERT E. HEMSING
Marshall Plan Film Division
Paris (1951-1958)

Albert E. Hemsing was born in Germany and raised in the United States. He began working for the Economic Cooperation Administration, which administered the Marshall Plan in 1951 and entered the USIA in 1953. His career included positions in France, the United Kingdom (England), Germany, and India. Mr. Hemsing was interviewed by Robert Amerson in 1989.

HEMSING: Actually, I was co-opted into USIA, as were most of us working in the information program at the Marshall Plan's European headquarters in Paris. I had gone to work for ECA, the Economic Cooperation Administration, which administered the Marshall Plan, in 1951.

In 1953, two things happened. ECA became MSA, the Mutual Security Agency; reflecting the change from economic aid to Europe to military aid, under the pressures of the Cold War. Also, that year, the U.S. Information Agency was born. It took over, among other programs, responsibility for the information activities of MSA.

My first encounter with USIA, aside from noting that I had a new paymaster, came in the person of the Agency's first director Ted Streibert and that was a kind of 281enefi-comedy.

Shortly after taking office, Streibert announced a trip to Europe. Rumors reached us that his purpose in Paris would be to shut the entire MSA information operation down. Our information chief was Waldemar Nielsen. His deputies were Eugene Rachlis and Hugh Sutherland. Peter Handen, a cracker-jack architect, headed exhibits. Lemuel Graves ran press; Dick Driscoll was in charge of radio. Our executive officer was Jim West, who later married Mary McCarthy, the writer. Nils Nilson was in charge of motion pictures and I was his deputy. It was a great shop, not least because we had assembled a very able, dedicated European staff. We were housed in what had been a nightclub at 5 Avenue Gabriel, opposite the embassy.

Our strategy for the Streibert visit was to convince him that, in us, he had inherited a unique asset, one that could serve USIA well. Specifically, we would concentrate on our media accomplishments in support of NATO and the common defense of the Atlantic Community.

Not ten minutes into the briefing, Streibert began to fidget. He asked, “What is NATO anyway, and why should we be supporting it?” [Laughs] You can imagine how that took the wind out of our sails.

It was soon clear that our odd-ball operation did not fit into his concept of USIA’s country-by-country mode of operation, and we were finished.

So we asked Streibert to break the news to our European staff himself. This was to be done next morning, when we would assemble our 100-or-so employees in the only room large enough – the exhibits workshop. Though we had stressed that our “locals” were by no means all French, but came from some 10-12 nations, that point somehow got lost overnight.

So, next morning, Streibert eased into the bad news by starting off with: “Our two nations have been tied together by bonds of friendship since the days of Lafayette,” and on and on. Well, at the end of his remarks what finally broke the tense silence was a little Englishwoman. She adjusted the monocle she always sported, jumped onto a drafting table at the rear of the crowd, and sputtered: “Sir, I want you to know just one thing, one thing, I am British!”

And so ended our glorious adventure with what was the largest and, I believe, most effective information program America ever undertook in Europe.

My own work in Paris would, however, last another two years. Within a few weeks of Streibert’s visit, Nils Nilson was summoned to Washington. After his first dismal meeting with USIA’s film chief Turner Shelton, he quit. He went on to become a successful film and TV executive in Europe. That left me to finish the large number of films already in the pipeline. Chief among these were the 15 films of the Atlantic Community Series – one film on each of the NATO countries. Like most of our films, the series was designed for theatrical distribution. Its purpose was to introduce the peoples of the Alliance to one another.

In October 1955 I shipped off to Washington the original negatives of the 260 films ECA/MSA had produced since 1947, closed the shop, and left for Washington myself to work for IMS, the motion picture service of USIA.

Some years later, in Berlin, I got to know Ted Streibert better, when he made several trips there on behalf of the General Mills Company. I not only came to appreciate his prowess at the piano, but found that he had learned a good deal about the world since the days when he had been catapulted into USIA, fresh from the Mutual Broadcasting Company. I told him then how I thought he missed a bet in 1953. A smaller version of our ECA/MSA information shop would have served USIA well. We could have become the Agency’s media service center in Europe. Our group had learned how to communicate with Europeans on their own terms, something the Agency’s Washington-tied media staffs never quite got the hang of.

My four years in Paris have remained for me a unique and rewarding experience, even after 28 years in the Foreign Service.

Winston Churchill called the Marshall Plan “the most unselfish act in history.” So it was, one that redounded to our immense credit and, of course, one that also promoted our own prosperity. Unfortunately, in the years that followed, our policy-makers drew many a false conclusion from the experience. The Marshall Plan was very much a success of a given time and place, a success that depended as much on the Europeans as on ourselves. Failure to grasp that fact, and our subsequent Cold War emphasis on military aid, led us into many a blind alley around the world.

Q: This means that when you were drafted into USIA, you were already an experienced overseas information officer, in effect. What took you to that point? How did you get from New York City, where you were born, into the overseas information business?

HEMSING: Actually, I had not yet learned what a regular USIS information officer does. I did know that the USIS officers I met around Europe during my Paris assignment had nothing like 5 million dollars a year at their disposal. That was the size of our film budget. These were counterpart funds, of course, local currency which the aid recipients put up to match our aid dollars.

Anyway, Harry was in Paris at that time, early 1951, on leave from the Guild to work with the Marshall Plan. He headed the rather ambitious ECA labor information program directed to Europe's huge trade union membership.

My first inkling of all this was a telephone call from Washington: did I "want to go to Paris to make labor films for the Marshall Plan?" My answer was something like "thanks, but no thanks." I felt that my four years in government had been enough.

But, when I reported the phone call to Esther that evening, guess what she said: "What, you turned down Paris!" So, we went to Paris. I remembered whom to call back in Washington only because he had the wonderful name of Ward Melody. To go to Paris, Esther gave up what might have developed into a real career at the New York Times. We did not foresee it at the time, but this was to be the first of several such sacrifices on her part.

We left for Paris in August 1951, on the Ile de France, first class. The Marshall Plan believed in supporting the use of "foreign bottoms." Esther's mother was quite inconsolable at the shipboard farewell. Having fled the Ukraine at age 15, alone, she could not imagine why any sane person would want to go back "there." My parents probably shared that sentiment, but left it unspoken. Also unspoken was the fact that my mother's heart was giving out, and that ours might be a final farewell.

I really should not take us to Paris without describing the job interview that got me there. Harry Martin came to New York to look me over, accompanied by Stuart Schulberg, head of the Marshall Plan's motion picture unit. Stu, I knew, was the son of B.P. Schulberg, the pioneer Hollywood producer, and brother of Budd, the writer. Later on, incidentally, Stu would become the long-time producer of NBC's Today Show.

We met at the Park Avenue apartment of Stu's mother. They offered me an FSS-3 position in the Foreign Service. Quickly calculating that at OWI the grades got better as the numbers went up, I allowed that I thought I was worth at least a 4 or a 5. While Harry choked on his bourbon, Stu stage-whispered, "It goes the other way".

Q: I'm glad the Melody lingered on, so to speak. You went, then, to Paris, where you switched to the rolls of USIA, stayed there another two years, and then came to the Washington headquarters of the new USIA.

JAMES G. LOWENSTEIN
Administrative Officer, ECA/Mutual Cooperation Administration
Paris (1952)

Ambassador James G. Lowenstein was born in New Jersey in 1927. He entered the Foreign Service in 1950. His career included positions in France, Sri Lanka (Ceylon), and Yugoslavia, and an ambassadorship to Luxembourg. Ambassador Lowenstein was interviewed by Ambassador Dennis Kux in 1994.

LOWENSTEIN: There wasn't any room for me in Washington so they were going to send me to Paris where they needed some extra bodies.

So, a week later I found myself on a plane going to Paris and I was sitting next to a fellow who struck up a conversation and said to me, "Where are you going?" I said, "Paris." He said, "Why?" I said, "Well, I work for the government." "Oh, really? What do you do?" I said, "Well, you really wouldn't understand." He said, "Well, I might." So I explained to him in very simple terms. And then I said, "Well, where are you going?" He said, "I am going to Paris but then I'm going to Lisbon." I said, "What do you do?" He said, "Well, actually, I am the American Ambassador to Portugal." That was the tactful way I began my Foreign Service career.

Anyway, I arrived in Paris and was originally assigned to the lowest form of life there, in what was called the administrative services section -- specifically to the warehouse which took care of handling all requisitions for furniture for all ECA missions. While this was not very taxing intellectually, it was a wonderful introduction because the working hours were very unsupervised and the fellow who ran the warehouse, an American local employee, was a master at going around the bureaucracy and getting what he wanted. Hence I learned a lot. I also decided I would start life in Paris by living with a French family in order to perfect my French.

Q: How was your French before you got there?

LOWENSTEIN: Not too good, despite 6 years of study. But by the time I left it was quite acceptable, and my accent turned out to be particularly good.

Q: Did they give you any training?

LOWENSTEIN: No, no training of any sort. Anyway in Paris, in 1950 on $3200, I was rich. I later rented an apartment that had been one of Randolph Churchill's pieds-a-terres for which I paid $85 a month. I also had a car and really lived very well.

After about two months in the warehouse, the head of this administrative services section decided that I had had enough house breaking and began to move me around.

Q: Who was your boss?

LOWENSTEIN: My boss was a man named Malcolm Pitts, a very experienced civil servant of the old school. He had been a depression baby and had gotten a job in the civil service, worked his way up, working most of the time in Denver, Colorado with the property management agency. He decided I was a spoiled brat when I arrived, which was absolutely right, and for that reason had stuck me in the warehouse. Then he relented, and he and I soon became very close friends.

He decided to take me a little more seriously and began to move me around through the other parts of this operation one of which was called organization and management. It was run by a fellow who seemed very old and wise to me. I think he was thirty. He seemed wise because he had gone to Harvard Business School and wore a homburg. His name was Jack Kubisch. He later became a Foreign Service Officer and was Ambassador to Greece among other things.

Q: Wasn't he Assistant Secretary for Latin America?

LOWENSTEIN: Yes.

Q: And he was the head of AID.

LOWENSTEIN: No, he wasn't head of AID, but he had been head of an AID mission. Actually he was head of the AID mission in Ceylon when I was there.

Q: He was a career AID officer.

LOWENSTEIN: He was a career AID officer who transferred over to the Foreign Service.

Then all of this came to a head when Malcolm Pitts said...and this must have been late June, 1950, about a week before the Korean War started, "Okay, the training is fine and now we are prepared to let you be administrative officer of the ECA mission in Iceland." At that time, the last thing I wanted to be was an administrative officer in an ECA mission. So I decided that I would rather just stay in Paris and keep training and see what developed and maybe my number would come up in the Foreign Service.

Well, the following week the Korean War started. Having escaped World War II, I knew that military service was inevitable and something I really didn't want to escape anyway. So I took two weeks off, came back to the United States, applied for various officer candidate programs with a first preference for the Navy, and then went back to Paris to wait for the call. By this time it must have been August because the next thing that happened was in late November. After Tito's break with Stalin, the US had decided to give economic assistance for the first time to a communist country, namely Yugoslavia. There had been a lot of congressional resistance to this, so long negotiations ensued between the executive and legislative branches. Finally it was decided to give food aid to Yugoslavia, which had had a drought the year before. When the conditions were all agreed on between the two branches of the government, the food aid program was to be administered through the Marshall Plan but was not going to be called a Marshall Plan mission because Tito did not want to become a member of the Marshall Plan. He had turned it down on Stalin's orders in 1948. So it was called the US Special Mission to Yugoslavia. Instead of being given to someone from ECA to head, a former president of the American Red Cross, Richard Allen, was recruited. He collected a group of experienced ex-UNRRA observers. I am not sure what they were all doing at this point, but most of them had been with UNRRA during the war and had done this kind of work in Eastern Europe. In addition, there was one Foreign Service officer, Elmer Yelton, and a couple of ECA experienced accountant comptroller types. They came to Paris for a week of orientation before going on to Yugoslavia. During their time in Paris, about half way through, one of these men died of a heart attack. Mr. Allen called up, I think it was Everett Bellows, who was the executive director of OSR, the European Headquarters of the Marshall Plan, and said that he had authority to arrive with so many bodies and he was going to arrive with that number of people and not one less. He, therefore, needed a body and asked Bellows to find a body and get that body down to the station on Saturday night. This was Thursday morning, as I recall.

So I got the call. I said, "Well, first of all thanks very much but I really don't want to go, and secondly, I have this Navy problem." So about five hours later, Everett Bellows called me back and said, "We don't care what you want. This is not a request, this is an order and I will take care of the Navy. This thing is only going to last six months or so and we will get you deferred. You be at the station Saturday afternoon at 5:00."

So, I arrived at the station and found all the other members of the mission. I was at that point 22 and I think the next youngest was about 36 and most were in their mid-forties. They were a very experienced group. They knew that there would be two people in Zagreb, three people in Belgrade, and one person in each of the Yugoslav republics. There were two particularly bad republics for climatic and isolation reasons. One was Montenegro and the other was Bosnia-Herzegovina. A third was Macedonia, but the person in Macedonia could easily drive down to Salonika for the weekend. Then it turned out that the fellow who was in Montenegro was only an hour from the coast, so the least desirable, it was decided was Sarajevo. When I arrived, the decision had already been made by unanimous consent of the others: I was going to Sarajevo.

Finally I was told that my officer candidate class would start in early January, 1952. I was asked whether in the interim I would like to stay in Paris and be assigned to something called the Temporary Council Committee of NATO which, of course, delighted me. This Committee was known colloquially as "The Three Wise Men." The three wise men were Harriman, for the United States, Monnet for France and Lord Plowden for Britain.

Q: Who was Plowden?

LOWENSTEIN: Lord Plowden had been...I can't remember what he had been before then. He was later the author of the Plowden Report on organizing the British Foreign Service. I think he had been Permanent Under Secretary of the Foreign Office, or he might have been Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Anyway, he was one of the great wise men in Britain in the field of foreign relations and at the same level as Harriman and Monnet.

The task of these three men was to figure out how to get NATO to divide its resources. What came out of this was first of all what are called the Lisbon goals, which were goals set for the various countries at the Lisbon meeting in December, 1951 or January, 1952, I can't remember exactly when. And so something called the Annual Review was born. It existed as long as I have known anything about NATO affairs. All of this was hammered out at what is now the OECD headquarters at the Chateau de la Muette, which was then headquarters for the OECD. The U.S. delegation to this committee was very high powered. I still have the list at home. Henry Tasca, Lincoln Gordon, Charles Bonasteel, Harriman, Milton Katz and two young aides. One was Fred Chapin (later Ambassador to several countries) and I was the other. It was really a sort of glorified messenger boy operation -- collating papers, running back and forth to the Chateau with stuff for Harriman, proof reading, the executive secretary of a delegation kind of job. But you were hanging around with the great men, and Fred and I became very close friends. In the evenings we would go about together with our group. There was a huge group of young Americans around ECA headquarters in Paris in those days. A lot of them were messengers, some of them were junior executives, and some of them worked in the ECA Mission to France. Among those who worked in the mission to France was Arthur Hartman, which is how I first met him. Another was Paul Douglas, the son of the Senator from Illinois. I still see some of this group. Some went into government after that but many didn't stay very long. The after hours activities were a lot of fun. Fred and I had something to do almost every evening, although we usually didn't finish work until 8:30 or 9:00.

Q: What were your impressions of the operation and the three wise men?

LOWENSTEIN: My impression, not only of this particular operation but also of the ECA mission to France and OSR (the European headquarters of the Marshall Plan) was that this was the most competent group of people I had ever seen. The trouble is that this remains true. It is still the most competent group of people I have ever seen. I thought the US government was going to be like this throughout. Sad to say, it hasn't been quite that way. It was a tremendous agglomeration of talent. All of these people seemed to be devoted to getting done what they had to do. I didn't see any bureaucratic backbiting. That is what struck me at the time.

Q: How do you account for that?

LOWENSTEIN: I don't know. Maybe I was too far away from it being so junior. But the atmosphere was totally different from any other organization that I have ever seen. Everyone was highly motivated. It just seemed to me that nobody was paying any attention to regulations and directives, or their next jobs. They were conducting themselves as though the "bureaucracy" didn't exist. I remember when I was finally leaving to come back and go into the Navy, it was just before Christmas, and someone on Harriman's immediate staff said, "Look, since you are going back anyway, would you mind taking this package of documents?" I said, "Sure, what is it?" He said, "Well, it is the US part of the NATO Annual Review." It was highly classified, but nobody paid any attention to it. It was stuck in an envelope and given to me to be turned in when I arrived in Washington, which I did. So it was that kind of operation.

I left Paris a couple of days before Christmas, went to Washington to check out, and then spent Christmas at home.

Q: Did you have much to do with Harriman directly?

LOWENSTEIN: No, very little. He would bark at me occasionally, "Where is that envelope I told you to get?"

Q: How big was the delegation?

LOWENSTEIN: Well, the delegation must have had ten people on it, plus Fred and me. The other representatives had delegations of the same size. We never saw them because we were staffed out of the OSR building.

It is true, I think he was devious. He did a lot of things that sometimes didn't make any sense. I remember once I was in Europe, I can't remember where Kissinger was but he was off somewhere with the President, and I was visiting some friends in the French countryside for the weekend between two meetings. I got a call from Sonnenfeldt. It was a Saturday night. He said, "Henry wants you to arrange a private meeting with Oliver Chevrillon, who was then the editor of a magazine called Le Point. And he wants to have dinner with him Monday night in Paris and doesn't want anybody to know about it. He wants you to pick a quiet restaurant where he won't be seen. And you can't tell anybody in the embassy about it. So you had better get it done right away and send me a cable at such-and-such a place."

So, I thought this might be a bit of a problem. I managed to get to Paris on Sunday on a train that got in about 11:00 at night. I was staying at the Travelers Club and they had a phone book, so I looked up the address of the magazine and walked over to the office at 8:30 in the morning and waited for somebody to open the door. I went in and asked for Mr. Chevrillon, who later became a friend of mine. At that time I didn't know him. He came out and I said, "I need to see you alone." He said, "Why?" And I said, "I can't tell you until I see you alone." So I saw him alone and conveyed the message. I said, "Now the problem is how are you going to know that I am for real? Here is my card, but under the ground rules here you can't call the embassy and confirm all this. What you can do is call Mr. X [the political counselor whom we both knew] and he will tell you that indeed I am who I represent myself to be and indeed I am in Paris. But you can't say anything else." And so that is the way it went and the dinner took place. But all of this was totally unnecessary. He could have called the DCM in Paris and said that he just wanted a private dinner, but this had to be done this way without anyone in the embassy being told and all that nonsense. Now, I assume that this was really Kissinger's idea and not something Sonnenfeldt dreamt up or put words into his mouth. But, anyway, that is one of those incidents that seemed very curious at the time.

I remember a couple of years later when I was involved in starting a foundation in the French-American field, one of the first French who was involved in this project was Chevrillon. So later on we had many chuckles about this first meeting and about this strange character showing up at his office at 8:30 in the morning and going through this routine.

STANLEY D. SCHIFF
Consular Officer
Strasbourg (1952-1954)

Stanley D. Schiff was born in New Jersey in 1925. He received his Bachelor's degree from Rutgers University in 1948, and his Master's Degree from Columbia University the following year. He served as a First Lieutenant overseas in the US Army from 1943 to 1946. Entering the Foreign Service in 1949, his postings include Baden, Strasbourg, Liverpool, Trinidad, Pakistan, and Brussels. Schiff was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on November 9, 2000.

Q: You left there in '52. Whither?

SCHIFF: Strasbourg.

Q: That was a regular Foreign Service assignment?

SCHIFF: Yes, at the consulate.

Q: You were in Strasbourg from when to when?

SCHIFF: '52 to '54. Then the Department had two things going. One was, legislation that the Department had to administer, a change in the Seaman's Visa Program. Individual seamen were going to have to be issued visas. This meant that certain parts of the world – and they thought that Liverpool, England would be one – would be just overwhelmed with new visa activity. Strasbourg was not a terribly active post at that time. I think there were only five of us there. Our only claim to fame was that the Council of Europe was there. So, the decision was made to cut our staff by one and I was the one. So, I was sent off to Liverpool to run the Seaman's Visa Program. When I got to Liverpool, the U.S. Congress had to back off this initiative.

Other governments were about to do unto us what we proposed doing to them– namely, impose obligations on individual seamen to get their own visas instead of doing them en masse – so there was a backtracking on that and that program never saw the light of day. Consequently my assignment when I got to Liverpool changed. Instead of doing visas, I was fortunate and I got to do a variety of things, including economics and labor reporting.

Q: Let's go back to Strasbourg first. What sort of work were you doing there?

SCHIFF: I did the consular work. We issued non-immigrant visas. There was a considerable number of American troops stationed in the area not too far away. They generated a demand for consular services of various kinds. That was part of my task.

Q: Strasbourg was French. How French was it?

SCHIFF: It was French.

Q: How did the French treat you at the time?

SCHIFF: The relationship with the French was fine. It was a period when relations between Alsace and the rest of France were very strained. There had been volunteers from It was alleged that some Alsatian had volunteered for the S.S.. There had also been Alsations who had been pressed into the German military. There was a trial in France during that period of people who had been involved in a massacre in another part of France. There were Alsations who were accused of having been participants in that. So, there was an intense animosity between other parts of France and the Alsations. There were stories we heard about Alsations going to Paris where their tires would be slashed or their car would be covered with graffiti. But in our own relationship, there were no problems. The language that they spoke, many of them, amongst each other, was more Germanic than French, but certainly the educated ones spoke French and spoke French with us.

Q: Who was your consul there?

SCHIFF: George Andrews.

Q: Were you doing any political or economic reporting there?

SCHIFF: No, it was strictly consular work. We had two other people doing political and economic work.

Q: Your consular work was concerned mainly with GIs stationed nearby?

SCHIFF: Yes. Marriages, births, renewing passports, etc. Then the non-immigrant visa business. I also did some commercial work, but there was not much of that.

Q: There wasn't much non-immigrant business, was there?

SCHIFF: There was some. Of course, you had to be careful at the time. There was concern about people using a non-immigrant visa as a means of immigrating. Also, of course, there were people who were being screened for their participation – whether they were French or in some cases at that time we covered the Saar as well, so we were getting Germans – in Nazi activities. But it wasn't a voluminous business by any means.

Q: Did you have the feeling that there was a lot of sorting out between the Germans and the French at the time?

SCHIFF: Yes. This became a remarkable period in European history. You had the first of the European Union initiatives – the Schumann Plan, the Coal and Steel Community, the Atomic Energy Community... I still think in retrospect that Europe was fortunate in having had a coincidence of five or six unusually gifted statesmen in office at the same time during this period – people like Adenauer, Schumann, de Gasperi, Paul Henri Spaak. It was a remarkable collection. Then there was Churchill, of course, in England. Europe benefited from that.

Q: Was that area involved in French politics?

SCHIFF: There were a couple of things. One thing which was going on that we were interested in was the French reaction to McCarthyism. We had the same interest in my next assignment, which was in England. Of course, the left in particular was very vocal on the subject, but it was not confined to the left. We're talking nationally. Then there was the relationship between France and a European movement in general but particularly at that time the French attitude towards German rearmament. We were pushing hard for it and the French were very reluctant to see it happen, of course. So, that was a big issue at the time. And the role of communists in the government.

Q: How about the communists, this being a working area, the Saar and all?

SCHIFF: I don't think there was a significant communist membership. Alsace was largely agricultural at the time. There were pockets of industry, but I don't recall that the communists in that part of the country were a particularly important factor. They were there, but were not terribly important. There is a major university in Strasbourg. I don't remember hearing a great deal about communist activity there either.

JOHN W. McDONALD
Staff Secretary, Office of the Special Representative in Europe
Paris (1952-1954)

John W. McDonald was born in North Dakota in 1929. He graduated from the University of North Dakota in 1953 and served in the U.S. Army from 1951 to 1952. His postings abroad have included Berlin, Bonn, Paris, Ankara and Cairo. Mr. McDonald was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1997.

Q: What happened in '52 to you?

MCDONALD: A new institutional framework was created in Paris as a result of the Marshall Plan. It was called the SRE, Office of the Special Representative for Europe. Bill Draper, who had been General Bill Draper, became Ambassador William Draper. It was the U.S. first effort at regional structures in the bureaucracy in the sense that he, in setting up this new office in central Paris, next to the U.S. Embassy, had more power than anybody else in Europe did. More power than anybody outside of Washington and much more power than most people in Washington.

He was the U.S. Ambassador to NATO. He was the U.S. Ambassador to the OEEC, Organization for European Economic Cooperation, which was created at the request of General Marshall to be basically the structure that the Marshall funds would flow into, and he was responsible for all Marshall Plan money and the allocation of it. There were aid missions in Western Europe and embassies in Western Europe but all the money went to him, all the power resided in him. It was rather a unique structure.

My boss in Bonn was asked by General Draper to be his Executive Secretary for this new institution and my boss took me along with him. So I moved to Paris for two and a half years.

Q: This would be '52 to '54?

MCDONALD: Yes.

Q: And Draper's organization was called?

MCDONALD: SRE, Special Representative in Europe.

That eventually, a year and a half or so later, became something called USRO, which is the U.S. Regional Organization. The membership in NATO and the OEEC remained with that office. Draper left, but the regional responsibility for the money was passed to the missions. That was just too much for Washington to stand, they just couldn't stand adding that to the missions, to have all this power in one man. Draper had two people working for him at the ambassadorial level, Livingston Merchant, a famed American diplomat, and Ed Martin, I think, was the other Ambassador.

So there were three Ambassadors in one office, which is structurally rather unique, aside from the U.S. Ambassador to France. So there was a lot of power there.

I was a part of Draper's office, basically, as a Staff Secretary.

Q: You were Staff Secretary to him? Let's talk about this time. Draper was there, what, for about two years?

MCDONALD: Less than two years.

Q: Well, '52 to '53, probably?

MCDONALD: Something like that.

Q: Can you describe your impression of Draper and how he operated?

MCDONALD: He was a fabulous guy. I was a great admirer of his, a great admirer. It was a real privilege and honor to be working for him, and this was of course a very exciting period. These new institutions were just beginning to come on line and the Marshall funds were flowing. Just put this in perspective. In 1952, 3.25 percent of our Gross National Product went to the Marshall Plan. Now just think about that, 3.25 percent to Europe. Today, it is one percent for the world. So, I mean, that was a major U.S. commitment to Western Europe.

His office, basically, was responsible initially for the allocation of those monies with the governments, and so forth. He was visited by everybody in Europe to plead their particular case about their particular needs. So it was a very action oriented office because he had the power in his own hands. He didn't have to go back to Washington for everything. That is the key difference than in later structures. He had the authority, he had the ear of the President, and he did it.

Q: Did you see how he distributed the funds? Was there something liked 30 percent to Great Britain, 30 percent here....

MCDONALD: No. It was needs based. In other words, people would come in and make a plea, we'd look for facts and figures, the staff would gather together a lot of information on their own. I was not a part of that process; I was paper shuffling with papers passing through and that sort of thing. But his staff came up with recommendations based on many interactions and contacts, and then a decision would be made, and it was non-appealable. It was just done. So it was a lot of power in one office. I think that is why it didn't last that long.

I thought it was extraordinarily efficient. There was never any whisper of fraud or misuse or diversion of funds. None of that existed. It was a very clean and a very pure operation as far as I was concerned.

Q: Did you have any contact with, say, our Embassy in Paris?

MCDONALD: No, none. This was regional. We had a regional viewpoint; we were working with regional organizations.

Q: '52, of course, was an election year and Eisenhower came in, who had been the first head of NATO.

MCDONALD: That is probably why Draper got the job, I would guess there may be some correlation there, because they were friends.

Q: Was there any concern about senatorial oversight and that sort of thing?

MCDONALD: Nope, nope. Now during that process something else happened, which one doesn't usually talk about. The agency changed. Mr. Stassen came in. He became head of, what was it, the Mutual Security Administration? And the verb "stassenation" came into being.

I was in Paris, this was in '52 under the McCarthy period, '53, when Cohn and Schine came to Paris.

Q: You might explain who Cohn and Schine were.

MCDONALD: They were two cohorts and hatchet men for Senator McCarthy.

Q: They were very young.

MCDONALD: Very inexperienced.

Q: Very inexperienced.

MCDONALD: And vicious.

Everybody in Paris was a Communist. They started out with that mindset. Everybody working for the U.S. Government in Paris, in USRO, was a Communist, and you had to prove you weren't. But they came through, and they made recommendations.

Then the Congress did a remarkable thing. Congress passed a law that said Mr. Stassen, personally, had a 30-day window in which he could fire anybody in this organization without appeal, and without giving a reason for that firing. Now that has never happened before in our democratic history, total power over everybody on his staff. And the word was, and I'm sure that it is correct, that every night he would take home a bunch of files, read through them, and come back the next day with red checkmarks and pass the word, "Out." No explanation to anybody, just "Out." I was there in Paris during that period. And my boss, the man who brought me to Paris for Draper, was on that list. His principal deputy, who was my next boss, who was responsible for implementing all this, on the 30th day, got axed.

Q: Do you have any knowledge, were there any rumors, of why these people ended up on that list?

MCDONALD: Well, in the case of both of these men I commiserated with, because I was very close to them, one, it turned out, had gone to UC-Berkeley, and had attended a couple of rallies in the late '30s or early '40s, that had some Communists in attendance. That was the only thing he could figure out, that somehow that had appeared on his record and that was enough.

The other man didn't have a clue. He had been District Attorney in New York City, had a very distinguished career, and he still, to his death, couldn't figure it out. It was pretty terrible.

Q: It really is incredible. And Stassen was supposed to have come from the more liberal side. What was he, Governor of Minnesota, or something, he was part of that, you might say, liberal North Central movement there.

MCDONALD: And nobody has ever, before or since to my knowledge, been given that kind of power for where all Government rules and regulations were out the window, no appeal, no nothing. They just destroyed them. Out.

Q: What did that do to the morale of your organization?

MCDONALD: It was terrible, it was terrible. And Draper, personally, fought for both of these men. Went to the President, went to the Secretary of State, no appeal, nothing. Not one was ever changed. So that is pretty sad.

Q: With the Cohn and Schine episode, did you get any feel for how that was viewed by other parties, I mean, non-Americans?

MCDONALD: They thought we were crazy, absolutely crazy, they couldn't understand what in the hell was going on, in Paris or in Washington. And you know the double irony is, that you may have followed with Mr. Cohn, it turns out that before he died a couple of years ago, it turns out he was a homosexual.

Q: Well, actually, Schine was, too. It was pretty apparent at the time and these were considered, at that time, to be supreme risks for the McCarthy period and all that. And yet their behavior was almost flaunting their proclivities. I mean, looking at it.

MCDONALD: So it was really bizarre in that sense of the word. He didn't seem to be aware of it, so that was that.

Q: Did you have any impression of France at the time, or were you pretty well tied up in your office?

MCDONALD: Well, one story comes to mind. When I returned to Washington at the end of November '54, after eight years in Europe, I was given a new security examination, investigation. The McCarthy shadow was still there and one of the crimes I had committed that they unearthed was that when I was in Paris, I was living in the Communist sector. Now it turns out that the Communist sector of Paris is more than half of Paris, at that particular point in time. But I was living in an apartment that the Embassy, or the SRE had assigned to me. The Labor Attaché had formerly occupied it at the Embassy. It just happened to be opened when my family and I arrived, so they sent me there. I had no choice, I just went there. I said it was ridiculous, that the Government had put me in that apartment and they could not now accuse me of being a Communist because I happened to go where the Government sent me. But that is the level of concern they had in this security investigation.

So that is again the shadow of the kind of mentality that was taking place and this was in early 1955 at the State Department in Washington, DC.

FREDERICK H. SACKSTEDER
Senior Vice Consul
Lyon (1952-1955)

Frederick H. Sacksteder was born in New York in 1924. He received his bachelor's degree at Amherst College and served in the US Navy during World War II. His career included positions in Germany, France, Spain, Tunisia, and Mexico. Mr. Sacksteder was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1997.

Q: He nixed the assignment so what happened?

SACKSTEDER: I was on home leave at my in-laws in New York state, when I asked to come down to Washington “because we had to go back to the drawing board.” I pleaded to be allowed to go, and was told that this was impossible because they could not over-rule the Medical Director. I was offered a couple of assignments, including the post of senior vice consul at the American Consulate in Lyon, France, then a four-officer post. I chose the Lyon assignment, where I was to report in September 1952.

Q: You were in Lyon from when to when?

SACKSTEDER: From September of 1952 to September of 1955. Exactly three years. The principal officer was Claude Haines Hall, a formidable bridge player, as I was soon to learn. He was a very good boss, in the sense that he gave me a lot of responsibility. He also knew the ins and outs of consular work and post administration. And, insecure about his command of the French language and, by nature, not out-going, he gave me responsibility for the Consulate’s “out-reach” work, i.e. traveling the district, public speaking, representation. I usually represented the Consulate at ribbon-cuttings, fair openings, and similar events which normally ended with a banquet (known locally as a “gueuleton”). These types of events attracted prominent national figures from Paris. It was quite normal for French politicians to hold both national and local offices simultaneously. I like to tell the story of my initial call on the Mayor of Lyon, Edouard Herriot, a man well up in years, since he was a contemporary and political colleague of my grandfather. Herriot had held numerous high offices, which included Prime Minister, and was at the time President of the National Assembly, the approximate equivalent of our Speaker. I said to him Mr. President (you always use the highest title an individual has held), I am the grandson of Alexandre Dorin. Poor Herriot simply shook his head. How could his friend Dorin’s grandson be the American Vice Consul in Lyon? Eventually, he got the idea, but he was puzzled, whenever we met. Another example of this dual office-holding: One Saturday morning I was at the Consulate going through the mail when the phone rang. A very soft voice on the other end said, “Mr. Consul?” “Yes, sir.” “Mr. Consul, this is the Mayor of Saint Chamond. Could I ask you a favor?” The Mayor of Saint Chamond happened to be the Prime Minister of France, Antoine Pinay, doing a service to a constituent.

Q: What was the political situation in your area of France and what district did Lyon cover at that time?

SACKSTEDER: The Lyon consular district included between one fourth and one fifth of France. It extended, north to south, from north of Dijon to south of Valence on the Rhone river, and east to west from the Massif Central (the mountainous region in south-central France) to the Swiss and Italian borders, a lot of territory. Because very few American citizens lived in our district, we had a very light citizen services (registration, passport, notarial, protection) work load. With one exception, which was a U.S. Army depot and maintenance base at Moulins, in the Allier Department and about half-way between Lyon and Paris. We trained an American civilian employee at the base to supervise the preparation of passport applications and similar forms, and could provide services there largely by mail.

Antoine Pinay, who, incidentally, died recently at the age of 101, was not the only Prime Minister from the Lyon area while I was there. Rene Mayer was another, and a very prominent politician. I got to know him through a daughter of his who was married to a Lyonnais. We became good social friends of the couple, and got to know the Prime Minister on his visits to his daughter. George Bidault was Foreign Minister during those years, and was also from the region. The American Vice Consul, representing the United States, was thus given the opportunity to talk at length with national figures at the receptions and banquets that invariable accompanied official events.

Q: This was the fourth republic?

SACKSTEDER: Yes, and a period of frequent changes of government but basically, political stability with the center of power hovering between left-of-center to right-of-center. A French saying of the time which translates as “The more it changes, the more it remains the same,” is appropriate.

Q: What was the political situation in France in general and then in your particular area, and what were our concerns?

SACKSTEDER: The industrial centers in our area, which included Lyon and its surroundings, Clermont Ferrand, and a couple of smaller cities such as Grenoble, had fairly large communist minorities. The rest of the district was generally conservative or “middle of the road.” The majority was markedly pro-American. People remembered the “liberation” by the U.S. Seventh Army, back in 1944. French organizations and authorities often staged events to commemorate wartime actions involving Americans, such as an annual ceremony at a memorial near Lyon recalling the death of an American air corps plane crew that crashed while flying supplies to the French underground forces. Let me add, at this point, that the Philip Chadbourn who served with me at Lyon in 1952-53 had been with the OSS and had parachuted into occupied France not far from Lyon, to help organize the “Resistance.” For this, he had been decorated in person by General De Gaulle.

A good example of the pro-American attitude in Lyon was the celebration of our national holiday. On July 4th, the French authorities, military and civilian, would gather in front of our Consulate. A detachment of soldiers would “present arms” as our flag was raised, while the military band played a pretty good version of our National Anthem, followed by the “Marseillaise,” and by a march-past of the troops. The reception, or “Vin d’honneur” which followed, was the occasion for speeches which always included mention that the Fourth of July was also a French Holiday! I have never had such an experience at another post or country, and it was symptomatic of the attitude of the French in Lyon at the time.

On the other hand, I remember the Communist-inspired protest in front of the consulate after the execution of the Rosenbergs...

Q: This was for espionage in the United States.

SACKSTEDER: Yes. The French Communist Party staged demonstrations, including a big one in front of our Consulate. The police turned out in force to make sure that nothing untoward happened, but the local authorities told us, “Let them vent their supposed anger- everyone knows that these people were executed for wartime espionage for the Soviets.” This, for me, was yet another unique experience.

Q: What was the Consulate's main activity?

SACKSTEDER: Commercial work. This included regular reports on certain commodities and manufactured goods, i.e. briar pipes (for smokers); textiles; walnuts (grown in quantity in the Isere river valley near Grenoble). Because shipments to the U.S. were still covered by consular invoices, I had to sign hundreds every week. The fees collected from this activity would have been sufficient to pay the cost of operating the Consulate. But, of course, these were remitted to the U.S. Treasury.

Political reporting, for which we were well placed because of the opportunity to meet with major political figures when they "came home" from Paris was through Embassy. Largely by means of informal correspondence with the officer covering internal political affairs in the political section, Martin Hertz. Occasionally he would ask us to look into a specific topic, which we would do by contacting local politicians, the officials in various Prefectures with whom we were in regular touch, or friends and acquaintances in the business world. The Prefet in each department is the top-ranked authority, and is a member of career service. He (they were all male then) represents "The Government," although administratively he is under the Ministry of the Interior. Each Prefet has a Secretary General and a Chief of Cabinet, themselves aspiring prefets, and it was with the latter that I, as Vice Consul, had the closest contact. As they and their families lived in the Prefecture palace (and some were indeed palaces), I could reach them, in case of need, day or night. I made some fine friends among them. Indeed, for many years I was in touch with one whom I met shortly after arriving in Lyon. Jean Taulelle was a little older than I, had been an officer in the Army taken prisoner in 1940. He was a POW for five years. When he was assigned to Villefranche, in the Beaujolais wine region in 1953, he was the best friend the U.S. could have. He later had a brilliant career in his chosen field ending in Paris as, first, Prefet of Police, then Prefet of the Seine (Paris) and simultaneously Mayor of Greater Paris. This post became an elected post only later when Jacques Chirac was elected Mayor.

Q: Did you run across in Lyon the French intellectual establishment, so well known in Paris, and recognized as having great influence, and, also, well, known as left-leaning in thought and looking down on the U.S.

SACKSTEDER: There was virtually none of that in Lyon. Perhaps because Parisians, and other French, looked down upon the Lyonnais. They said Lyon society was "closed" and "unfriendly," and I found that this was the case with respect to the French from other parts of the country. It was far from the case for us or other's in the Consular corps. And the Lyonnais did not apologize for their lack of intellectual pretensions.

I mentioned that I had the opportunity to take on a good deal of responsibility while at Lyon. This came about for the following reason: at this time the U.S. had a small one-officer post at Nice, where the work load was light and, and the official residences very comfortable. The supervising Consul General at Paris, who at that time, was Frederick B. Lyon, a very senior officer, asked Consul Hall to take over the post at Nice when the incumbent had to be away, sometimes for many weeks at a time. This left me in charge at Lyon. Although still an FSO-6, I was the senior among the juniors. And in due course I was entitled to draw "Charge pay," which was half of the difference between my modest salary and that of my Consul, a senior FSO-3; a very welcome, if well-earned, bonus. During these extended periods in charge at Lyon I could tailor my agenda to what I was most interested in, namely reporting, representation, and outreach. A friend of good friends was a senator by the name of Michel Debre, a strong supporter of De Gaulle, who was later Prime Minister. A hotly debated issue at the time was the formation of a European Army, which might include a German contribution. The Gaullists were strongly opposed. I believed that this would be good for Europe and a step in the direction of European integration. My friends asked me to debate the issue with Senator Debre before an invited audience. I cannot say that I made too many points against this very skilled debater, but I did convince some of the audience of the advantages of such a move. And, of course, history eventually proved me right.

These three years at Lyon were not only most pleasant, but also very instructive. It was my first real foreign service post, following the unusual and far from routine assignment as a Kreis Resident Officer in Germany. Let us close this chapter on a gastronomic note. The year 1953 proved to be one of France's finest wine years of the century; Lyon and its surrounding area was host to numerous great three-star restaurants, including the so-called "Field Marshal of French gastronomy" Ferdinand Point, of "La Pyramide" in Vienne. The annual Lyon International Fair was usually the occasion for a U.S. Department of Commerce official exhibit, and an influx of American visitors. One such was "Punch" Sulzberger of the N.Y. Times publishing family, and then attached to the paper's Paris bureau. He seemed more interested in Lyon's restaurants than in the trade fair pavilion, so we had some pretty memorable meals. On his last day with us, we had a three-star lunch "Chez La Mere Brazier" and a dinner at Vienne at "La Pyramide." Not long after, I was among the many mourners at Point's funeral. He had "given his liver for his country."

In August 1955, I was again in charge. A new Principal Officer had arrived, and was enjoying his first detached duty at Nice. Lyon was hit by a violent thunder/hail storm, an unusual occurrence in the city itself. The worst hit area was a section called "Croix- Rousse" just upstream from the point where the Rhone and Saone rivers joined, and the site of some of Lyon's most renowned silk mills. Acres and acres of glass sky-lights were smashed by the hail, exposing extremely valuable machinery to the elements. The Prefet called, told me there was urgent need of tarpaulins, and asked if the U.S. military could supplement what the French had on hand. Several phone calls to the Embassy and to the depot at Moulins, and the first of several plane loads were being loaded and flown to the Lyon airport where the French Army had trucks waiting. This prompt response doubtless saved millions in potential damage. Prefet Massenet asked me to accompany him to meet the arriving U.S. Air Force transports, insuring voluminous press coverage of the event. As this was taking place, my household effects were packed in lift-vans that were at the railroad freight terminal on a platform and not covered by tarps. When these finally reached Washington and were unpacked several months later, we found humidity and mold had damaged most of the contents beyond repair. I was not as fortunate as the Lyon silk mills.

HERBERT DANIEL BREWSTER
Political Officer, North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO)
Paris (1952-1955)

Herbert Daniel Brewster was born in Greece to missionary parents on December 4, 1917. He received a bachelor's degree from Wesleyan University in 1939. His Foreign Service career included positions in Athens, Ankara, Istanbul, Beirut, Berlin, Naples, and Paris. This interview was conducted by Charles Stuart Kennedy on December 11, 1991.

Q: Let's go back to Paris; you were in NATO from 1952 to 1955. What was the relationship between Greece and Turkey that you were dealing with?

BREWSTER: Greece and Turkey were both admitted to NATO in November of 1951. That was the time when NATO was set up in Paris; Lord Ismay, the NATO Council, the whole shebang. We had nine officers who worked with Burke Elbrick and Edwin M. Martin: Martin Hillenbrand was "Mr. Germany;" Joe Scott, Mr. Italy, and so on. I was assigned to the two newest members that came in. The significant part was that they were new boys on the block and not very welcome. The Danes had voted against them, they had to be pulled around. What you were basically doing was having two-thirds of GTI suddenly a part of Europe.

Q: GTI being Greece, Turkey and Iran?

BREWSTER: Which is what we were a part of. It was like saying "You are now Europeans." They had a time adjusting. They both sent in first class teams to make the best impression on others; it was their first multi-lateral venture. Frequently they would come to us and say, "Well how are you going to vote on this?" "Tell us what that meant." "How do you see this as an issue that will affect us?" We were the listening "colleagues" where we could sit down with them and say, "Come on now, don't hold this one up just because of that word. This is what's being achieved." It was breaking them in. I was assigned primarily because I had been in Turkey and Greece and it made good sense, and I spoke the one language.

Q: I remember many years later I was in Naples talking to a man, in the position you later became political advisor to, saying that really the Greek-Turkish combination was strictly that they were both keeping their eye on the other and that the Soviets were not the prime concern of either. What was the attitude here in the early '50s; how did our Greek and Turkish representatives look at the mission of NATO?

BREWSTER: They liked it; it was bringing them into a new club and the club was influential countries where you could see people -- foreign ministers would come by. It was bringing them in from the outposts. And they weren't mad at each other; they were both as good as they could be but they didn't have bilateral problems. They didn't have overflight problems and things of that sort in any major way. They sent in their best teams in an effort to impress the other teams, the donor countries, that "we're deserving."

Q: So they weren't at each other. But this was at the height of the Cold War, the Korean War was not yet over; how did they feel about the Soviet threat?

BREWSTER: The Turks never spoke about it that I can think of, and the others -- I think it was just a reflection of their own guerilla war. I don't think they were worried about a Soviet thrust, but they were glad to follow what was being designed for Europe even though they were on the periphery of it: the strengthening that was being done in Germany, the role of Germany, the role of France in it. They were tag-Enders; perhaps 10% of the effort was devoted to Greece and Turkey, the big issues were amongst the big countries involved.

Q: Things had not settled down at that time; NATO was still growing, still in its early development stages.

BREWSTER: There were big issues between the Germans and the French, in the rearming of the Germans. That was key.

Q: How did you find your role? You had your two clients there; did you find yourself spending a lot of time with other Americans, and maybe other NATO representatives, acting as the friend in court for the Turks and the Greeks? Explaining their interests and desires to people maybe looking askance at these people from the periphery coming in?

BREWSTER: No, I didn't sense that. In my contacts with them I didn't want to be interpreting what I thought the Greeks wanted. I didn't want to be in the role of an advocate because with a Greek or Turk you never know whether what they are saying is the position or whether they are going to go back and revise it. And then the boss says, "You never should have told them that." Bingo! There is so much in play on that side. But I was there at their beck and call; had they not come in I wouldn't have been there, that job would not have had to be filled. It came at a very good time and led in to the Turkish desk officer job.

Q: Did you get any feel about how the American circle at NATO felt about France and France's role in NATO?

BREWSTER: I don't have enough...

JOSEPH F. DONELAN, JR.
Consular Officer
Paris (1952-1955)

Joseph F. Donelan was born and raised in New York City. After serving in the U.S. Army during World War II he attended Georgetown University's School of Foreign Service. He joined the Foreign Service in 1955 and served in France, Japan, India, as well as Assistant Secretary for Budget and Finance and later Assistant State Secretary for Administration. Mr. Donelan was interviewed in 1989 by Charles Stuart Kennedy

DONELAN: As you know the Department had a central Budget Office which consisted of two arms; one for the Departmental and Foreign Service budget and the other one for Finance. The finance people were the bookkeepers and accountants for the Department of State and the Foreign Service. Finance administered all fiscal and accounting regulations; updated and revised systems and devised new systems of funds management and accountability. It was the technical fiscal operation of the Department. I came back as Director of that office after having been Budget & Management Officer in Paris for four and a half years. The Paris job had been a great experience, and while I would have preferred another overseas assignment, this Finance job really offered opportunity to make changes in the Department's operation. In fact my first initiative was looking back overseas in the direction of fiscal operations in the European embassies. And the idea was predicated on the fact that the PTT (Post, Telegraph & Telephone) government monopolies in the European and North African countries were extremely efficient in moving the mail, in fact a letter could be mailed one day in Paris and be received in anyone of the other countries by the next day, and the French were particularly efficient as I recall - you could mail a letter in downtown Paris in the morning and be quite certain that it would be received at a suburban address that same afternoon. The second major consideration that Paris was in itself a large operation, for a long time the largest Embassy in Europe, it had an available skilled and educated population, and the French nationals already employed by the Embassy were very able and clever people.

The idea was very simple, instead of all these embassies and offices in Europe madly writing checks, paying bills, and engaging in foreign exchange transactions with local banks, centralize the operation in Paris and get the benefit of the economy of scale and the skilled workers available. I assigned Dennis Collins, who had worked with me in the Paris budget and fiscal operation, to the project. Denny who was fluent in French and had served in several European countries was a natural for the job, visiting a number of the posts, confirming the efficacy of the PTT systems in the various countries, and discussing the possibilities with our colleagues in Europe. As a result of his work we decided we could set up a regional finance center in Paris.

Q: Well, in your making the decision, I'm a little interested, there must have been some turf battles or crockery broken when you move an office from one place to another. How did this sit?

DONELAN: In all my years in the Foreign Service whenever there was a squeeze on resources, the first place Ambassadors and senior personnel in the Department looked to take cuts, was in the administrative area. It was natural to protect the so called "substantive" side of foreign operations, and since the raison d'etre of "administration" is to support program operations, it's hard to fault that approach, even if you happen to be in charge of administration. In fact I always considered it a basic responsibility of administration to press constantly for the most economical and efficient methods of operation.

In this case we were coming up with very substantial personnel reductions for all the posts in Europe and north Africa, probably an average of one or two American positions and three or four foreign national positions.

Q: And that's about it.

DONELAN: Yes, and there were very substantial initial net savings, for a very modest investment of people and equipment in Paris, and more over the years.

RFC maintained bank accounts in all the currencies of the serviced countries; issued salary checks for Americans and foreign national employees - all types of allowance payments for American employees - paid all recurring bills for the missions themselves and the employees - rent, light, heat, power, local country purchases, etc. All of this for starters. Denny went back to Paris and ran the operation. He was inventive and innovative. Over the years he developed the system and operation far beyond my original concept. And you will recognize how unusual this is, but the Department finally came to understand the uniqueness of Denny's position and gave up trying to transfer elsewhere. Denny finished his career in Paris.

Q: Did you have any particular difficulties in the Department, in your office? Or did you find that what you were doing was not fairly routine work?

DONELAN: The routines of the operation pretty much took care of themselves, regulations were written and changed, the systems people were pretty good about coming up with improvements and from time to time the office came up with real advances. Another facet of my job was liaison for the Department with the Office of the Comptroller General which as "the watchdog of the treasury" was responsible to the Congress, and the Treasury Department which of course was the source of all funds appropriated by the Congress.

People were funny of course, and whether we recognize it in ourselves or not all of us resist change almost automatically. There was always some selling to be done before launching something new and different. You won some and you lost some. I had informal discussions with some banks about the idea of setting up a totally free checking accounts for all American employees in the Foreign Service; we in Washington would then write all American salary checks and automatically deposit the funds in a selected bank, splitting up the business among banks interested in providing free service. Would have been a great saving for the Dept., I always kept a checking account myself in Washington, the banks thought it was a great idea, but it bombed out. People in those days just wanted to receive their checks in their little hot hands and that was that. This type of thing is now commonplace. Another thing whose time had not quite come.

and this idea was several years later was to use an "exception" method of fiscal reporting. In other words instead of sending in voluminous accounts to the Department through the pouch which was the custom, taking forever....would be to cable short excerpts which simply gave pluses or minuses against the one or more allotment accounts which the posts had available. Actually about a half dozen or so Foreign Service posts, the large ones, given their size and staffing, expended most of the funds...so if you got wire reports from these posts you knew where you stood financially...most of the other posts were so small, even if you didn't hear from them it wouldn't matter all that much. The communications system couldn't handle the load...nowadays it would be a piece of cake. But it was fun, even so dry an area as fiscal reporting.

But, and I think this has been part of my satisfaction, generally when you came up with something new and something different people would accept it and work with it.

Q: So the innovation was usually accepted if it was demonstrated?

DONELAN: That's right, and actually it was a great time to be in the Department and the Foreign Service. This was reasonably in the post WWII period and you remember that prior to WW II the Department of State and the Foreign Service, was a very small organization. We owned practically no real estate abroad, very few embassies, and several of the first ambassadorial residences abroad were gifts from American citizens, I think Doris Duke gave us the old ambassadorial residence in Paris. WW II triggered a great many US government operations abroad, the operation of the Marshall plan alone brought at first hundreds and then several thousand American and foreign national employees onto the payroll; then came USIA, the information program which became integral to overseas operations. ...and pretty soon, Treasury and Customs people were abroad, Agricultural, etc. ... You know when I was in Paris, I believe twenty some US government agencies were represented...of the Embassy population, only 1 in 5 was a State Department employee, but the Department of State was charged with providing administrative support to most of these agencies.

So it was in this period that the Foreign Service had to learn all about administration. The Department actively recruited experienced administrative personnel; that's why people like Graham Martin came to work for the Department of State. Graham had been a Colonel in the Air Force and previously with the Public Health Service at the National Institutes of Health.

I mentioned Henry Ford earlier. Henry had worked for the Bureau of the Budget before the war, but was recruited by the Department after service in the Air Force. When I came in in '49 not the, you know the tail end, but close to the tail end of recruiting, the Department was learning the hard way about administering large groups of people in many strange places. Again, a long way round, but yes, innovation was accepted.

Q: So you weren't having to, in a way, beat down an entrenched administrative bureaucracy? There really wasn't one there?

DONELAN: You're absolutely right, and quite candidly a lot of free wheeling was possible, and you got into funny positions sometimes but there weren't a lot of people breathing down your neck when you were in charge of something. They came later particularly when and if something went awry! And sometimes the things you ran into were fascinating; I remember the then head of the Passport Office, the famous old lady.

Q: Ruth Shipley.

DONELAN: Yes, Ma Shipley. As Director of Finance, I watched the flow of things pretty carefully, like for instance the flow of checks from some offices which normally received payment for services. A funny thing had happened. The flow of checks from the Passport office had stopped. No answers. We finally got someone to look in her desk. She had stacks and stacks of checks that had come in. They had been addressed to her, and delivered to her, and she stuck them in her desk drawer. And, of course the fundamental rule in government (as in any good business) when you get a check deposit it right away. Well, she had some checks, some of them were as I remember several months old, and perhaps one or two several years old. But anyway that's beside the point. You found little pockets like this once in a while but generally speaking, I feel that the Department was an exciting place to work because if you came up with something good, people were really quite willing to try it.

RICHARD T. DAVIES
NATO Staff
Paris (1953-1955)

After graduating from Columbia college in 1942, Ambassador Richard T. Davies served in the U.S. Army in World War II. Since joining the Foreign Service in 1947, Ambassador Davies has held positions in Moscow, Paris, Kabul, Calcutta and Warsaw. He was interviewed by Peter Jessup on November 9 1979.

DAVIES: And we got to Paris and...

Q: Was the NATO commander (Alfred) Gruenther then?

DAVIES: I guess it was Gruenther. But I didn't have anything to do with the NATO command per se. Yes, it was Al Gruenther, it must have been. It was only later that the Air Force general came.

Q: Norstad.

DAVIES: Yes, Lauris Norstad. But I was working there for Hugh Cumming, who in turn was working for...I can't remember the name of that very nice Italian Ambassador who was the Deputy Secretary of Political Affairs, and Lord Ismay - "Pug" Ismay - was the Secretary General, a wonderful old gentleman. I don't know whether you were ever there or not, in the Palais de Chaillot, where NATO has offices.

Q: Once or twice.

DAVIES: It was one of those temporary buildings which I guess like the temporary buildings that we used to have down here on the Mall had been built many, many years earlier, and there is nothing so permanent as a temporary building.

Q: And that Ambassador to the governments-in-exile during the war was on active duty was General Anthony Biddle Duke wasn't he?

DAVIES: Yes.

Q: As a liaison?

DAVIES: He was, yes. I can't remember now what his title was, but he was around there. Well, it was a very active place at that point. NATO was really getting cranked up.

What they wanted us to do was, they wanted us to set up a section there to analyze what was going on in the Soviet Union and in Eastern Europe. There were two of us: Frank Meehan, who is now our Ambassador in Czechoslovakia, and I, working for an English international civil servant, Bill (William) Newton, a former BBC correspondent here in Washington, who is now retired and still as far as I am aware living in Portugal.

Well, no sooner had we gotten there to do this than Hugh Cumming, whose idea this was, was transferred. I can't remember now whether he went to Indonesia at that point as Ambassador, or whether he came back to head I & R [INR] (Intelligence & Research in the Department of State). It was one of the two, but I think it was the former, and then later he came back to head I & R, as I remember it.

Well, he left, and (Ambassador) Vinton Chapin - one of the many Chapins that have adorned our service - came to replace him. A very fine man.

But the whole idea was ridiculous - to try to set up inside NATO, with three officers, a section which would do research on the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe at a time when the member states - first and foremost the United States, but also Great Britain, France and others - were in a position to provide massive amounts of information. However, the position was that this was an international body, and they weren't going to give us their information. That of course rested on the very accurate perception that the International Staff of NATO was not a safe place to store any classified information.

Q: Was your particular product for American eyes only, or...

DAVIES: No, this was for...

You know, there was an International Staff composed of representatives of all the member countries.

Q: So your product was for everybody?

DAVIES: For everybody, yes. It was turned out as I say by... The head of the section was an Englishman, and then there were these two American Foreign Service officers. But it went to everybody, and it was recognized by the Americans and the British and the French and the other national foreign offices that you just couldn't trust NATO to keep a secret.

JOHN A. LINEHAN, JR.
Visa Officer
Paris (1952-1956)

Ambassador John A. Linehan, Jr. was born in Gloucester, Massachusetts in 1924. He entered the Foreign Service in 1952. His career included positions in France, Canada, Australia, Liberia, Accra, and Washington, DC, and an ambassador to Sierra Leone. Ambassador Linehan was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1993.

LINEHAN: We left Washington and arrived in Paris, where we were not met on arrival. The next day I called on the consul general, having been assigned to the Visa Section. He was Freddy Lyon, a very nice person, whose wife, a lovely lady, I still see occasionally. He said, "I don't know whether you have a private income or not. But if you don't, you'll find it very difficult to live in Paris." I went home and told my wife, "Maybe we should just go back to the U. S. and forget it." But we didn't.

Q: Could you talk a little bit about the visa work you were doing there?

LINEHAN: It was rather interesting because I arrived in Paris in January, 1953. That was just before the inauguration of President Eisenhower, bringing the Republicans in after many years of Democratic administrations. They decided to improve and streamline things. Among other things they sent a team to Paris which decided that the Visa Section could be reduced in size from 66 employees -- most of whom were French, of course -- to 26. This was a major change. I might add that at that time the consul general, who was in charge of the whole Consular Section, and I, who was at the bottom, were the only Foreign Service Officers. The others were Foreign Service Staff Officers, about 22 of them.

We never quite achieved the level of 26 employees in the Visa Section because the Ambassador discovered, not too long after, that some of his French business friends had to wait as much as two weeks to get a visa for the States. We had to do something to improve that situation. There were many problems which came up, and people demanded to see the consul. Two of us were assigned to handle this problem. One was the officer in charge of security problems (French Communists, or whatever). I was the other who was appointed to play the role of the consul. You know, I was pretty new but when people demanded to see the consul, they saw me. The reason that the two of us had those jobs was that we spoke French, which few of the staff officers did.

That was a great job. I met all kinds of people. I issued visas to Christian Dior; to Elsa Schiaparelli, who was a famous hatmaker; and to Barbara Hutton, the Woolworth heiress, among others.

Q: Hadn't Barbara Hutton lost her citizenship?

LINEHAN: She'd given it up. She was carrying a Danish passport. I should tell you that after I'd been at post two weeks, my boss called me in and said, "OK, I guess it's time for you to start issuing visas. You can issue one today." I said, "What am I going to do?" He said, "Well, you have a business visa applicant. He has an appointment. You come in and talk with him and see if you feel that he's a bona fide visitor." So the guy came in. He was not too tall and rather swarthy looking. He had an Argentine passport. We chatted. He seemed legitimate to me. So I issued him the visa. Well, a few days later my boss called me in and said, "You know that first visa you issued? Well, you signed the visa stamp in the passport but you forgot to sign the form that goes along with it." So Mr. Onassis had to come all the way back from Nice to Paris to have this corrected. I didn't have a clue who Aristotle Onassis was but I found out quickly enough. That was the first visa I ever issued.

Anyway, I handled all kinds of visas for two years, both immigrant and non-immigrant. Then I spent about eight months handling passports with a woman who was rather famous at the time -- Agnes Schneider. "The lady with the blue hair," as she was called.

Q: She was sort of the doyenne of the Consulate in Paris. She was there for many years.

LINEHAN: Correct. I met a lot of people in the passport section whom I enjoyed meeting. My favorite was Olivia De Havilland, the actress, who had married a Frenchman and had a son named Mark, the same as my son's name. We compared notes about the difficulties of dealing with French pediatricians. Then I did general consular work. Certainly, I had a good grounding in consular activities. When the consul in charge of other consular duties, consular invoices, deaths, estates, and what have you, went on leave, I replaced him. He, by the way -- if Agnes Schneider was the doyenne -- was the doyen of the male officers, having been there since he got out of the U. S. Army in 1919. Except for two years, he was still there in 1956. Anyway, that office had been working on an agreement with the French Government under which the French gave us the title to our World War II cemeteries located in France. They had done so earlier for our World War I cemeteries. When the day came to sign the treaty, since I was in that office at the time, I went with Ambassador Douglas Dillon to the Quai d'Orsay [French Ministry of Foreign Affairs]. He was a stiff, not very communicative type. But on the way he said to me, "What are we doing today?" I explained to him that he was going to sign this particular agreement with the French. When we arrived at the Quai d'Orsay, I was interested to see the way he turned on the charm. We went up to the office of the Minister of Foreign Affairs, then Christian Pineau. The Ambassador introduced me, and the Minister turned to his aide and asked, "Qu'est-ce qu'on va faire aujourd'hui?" [What are we going to do today?]. I thought to myself, "Aha. This is how high diplomacy is carried on." [Laughter] We signed the agreement and all was well.

Q: What was the atmosphere in the Embassy at the time?

LINEHAN: It was an enormous Embassy. I think that, at the time, it was probably our largest Embassy in the world. To give you an example, there were four Americans in Paris with the rank of Ambassador: to France, NATO, the Marshall Plan, and the OECD [Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development]. In addition, there were two ministers, about 11 first secretaries, 22 second secretaries, but only one third secretary -- me. I was the only one with that title. If you were down at the bottom, as I was, you led your own life. We had very little to do with the diplomatic community.

Q: While you were doing the consular work, do you have any feel for the political situation at the time? What was happening?

LINEHAN: In 1954 the French were defeated at Dien Bien Phu in Vietnam. As was typical of French politics at that time, there were frequent changes of government and a great deal of political unrest, if you want to call it that. This was also the time of the conviction and execution of the Rosenberg's in the United States.

Q: You're referring to Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, who were convicted of passing nuclear secrets to the Soviet Union, a cause celebre around the world, particularly for the political Left, which was very critical of the United States.

LINEHAN: That's right. We had found a house after some difficulty -- housing was hard to find in France at the time -- in the suburban town of Nanterre, which also was known as a Communist working class town. First of all, when Joe Stalin died in 1953, the town was draped in mourning. Secondly, when the Rosenberg's were executed, there were posters all over the place, with President Eisenhower pictured with teeth in the shape of the electric chairs. I have to say, however, that nobody ever bothered us in that town. We stayed there until May, 1956. I've never forgotten the little merchants around town who sold us bread, wine -- whatever. They had never said anything more than "Good morning" or "Good afternoon." All of a sudden, they were saying, "Are you leaving us?" -- as if it were a real tragedy. When we stopped at the store of the lady who sold wine -- the marchande de vin -- she said that she was sorry that we were leaving and asked where we were going. I said that we were going to Quebec, Canada, very near where we come from in the United States. She said, in true French fashion, "But it's so far from Paris."

Q: What was our view at the time of the Soviets and the French Communist Party?

LINEHAN: To give you a bit of the atmosphere, my wife went to the gate of our house one day. Somebody was soliciting contributions for something that sounded pretty legitimate. It turned out that she had made a contribution to a quasi-communist women's affair. Of course, I had a big fit about that. In the atmosphere of the time anything to do with communist organizations was something we were all afraid of. It was, after all, the time of Senator Joe McCarthy, a "Red Scare" period. The Soviets were regarded as the enemy. The French Communists, or communist organizations, or quasi-communist organizations were things that we were concerned about. That's why we had an officer [in the Visa Section] who dealt solely with this problem.

Q: Did you feel -- perhaps not you particularly -- but did the Embassy feel any of the heat of McCarthyism at all?

LINEHAN: Only indirectly. While I was in Paris, we had a visit from a fellow named Roy Cohn, who had a partner named David Schine. They made a visit. They objected, as I recall, to some of the American magazines we had on display for visitors in the Embassy waiting rooms. This was pretty stupid, I thought, but it was that sort of thing. But I did not feel any heat directly.

Q: I recall Cohn and Schine's visit to Europe. It was just awful. Here were two -- to use modern terminology -- "gay" boys bouncing around, spoiled brats, having a wonderful time. And everyone was kowtowing to them.

LINEHAN: And accusing people right and left of things that simply weren't real.

Q: They were very nasty people.

LINEHAN: Well, it was the time, and I'm sure that you remember, that you wouldn't be caught dead wearing a pink shirt or a pink tie.

Q: Of course, people nowadays do that right and left. Even wear lavender. Well, at that time did anyone talk about De Gaulle, or was he just sort of a presence over the horizon?

LINEHAN: He was very much a presence in France, but still, at that time, in seclusion. We had a very happy relationship with our landlady, from whom we rented our house, and her family. We saw each other regularly. In part this was because we paid the rent in cash, because they were getting more money than they were supposed to get [under the rent control system]. So usually we went to their house at the end of the month for "une soiree" or they'd come to our house. I've never forgotten the husband saying -- he was director of the storage and refrigeration section of the famous French fur company, Revillons Freres. He said, "We need a strong man. We need to get rid of this constant bickering and change." I must say that I was quite surprised at the strength of his remark. Consequently, it didn't surprise me particularly when De Gaulle came in.

WILLIAM J. GALLOWAY
Special Assistant, North Atlantic Treaty Organization
Paris (1952-1956)

William J. Galloway was born in Texas in 1922. He received a BS from Texas A & M University and served in the U.S. Army as a captain overseas from 1943 to 1948. His postings abroad have included London, Paris, and Vienna. Mr. Galloway was interviewed in 1999 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: I am trying to keep this focused on this time you were there.

GALLOWAY: The time I was there. In Paris I was special assistant to Livy Merchant. Moving from London to Paris, we had a change of scene, change of characters and change of organization. The organizational changes sought to consolidate U.S. regional activities in Europe. The new permanent North Atlantic Council, the continuation of U.S. military aid programs as well as economic aid programs, and U S representation to the European regional economic organization, first the OEEC and later the OECD. Retired general William Draper was designated to head all U.S. elements in those areas. We had our offices in the Hotel Talleyrand. Under Draper was a Deputy, a retired air force general Anderson, and then Livy Merchant. All three had the rank of Ambassador. Draper was the U.S. member of the permanent North Atlantic Council which had been given the Palais de Chaillot for its new headquarters; de facto, Merchant was the working permanent representative.

Lord Ismay arrived on the scene and began the establishment of a permanent staff and secretariat for the Council. In one of his earlier meetings, Ismay noted that he was not yet fluent in French, but rather had a command of the language somewhat like that of his old boss, Prime Minister Churchill, which he described as English words with French endings. He promised to improve his own fluency. I should have mentioned earlier that from the beginning of the establishment of NATO, it had been agreed that all of its meetings and discussions would be carried on in English and French without interpretation; however, documents would be published in both languages. Subordinate committees were formed under the Council, including a Political Committee. This was where I did most of my work, serving as the U.S. member or alternate. By the time I left in '53, the Council and its staff were well established. Their authority was recognized and accepted in a manner that focused member governments attention more than had the earlier Council Deputies. They gained more influence as time went on, and there was evidently the reality of political authority over the military. Eisenhower had served his term as supreme commander and then was persuaded to come back and accept the presidency of Columbia. That must have been '53. He was succeeded by, who was the airborne commander?

Q: Vandenberg?

GALLOWAY: Vandenberg. No not Hoyt Vandenberg. No it was, he later went out to Korea. He was famous for carrying a grenade.

Q: Oh, yes, Ridgeway.

GALLOWAY: He succeeded Eisenhower. There had been speculation that Gruenther would take over, but I think that in the hierarchy of the army there may have been an inclination to show that there were competent senior officers other than Eisenhower and his followers who had grown up in NATO. Ridgeway was certainly a senior four star general following Eisenhower's five stars.

I have neglected to record that Doug MacArthur II had been Political Adviser to Eisenhower throughout his tour as SACEUR, where he became, along with Gruenther, the third member of the inner cabinet.

It was only natural that he would be named from the State Department to that post. So, both he and I profited in the long run from George Perkins' moves back in 1950. I went with Spofford and MacArthur with Ike. That pretty well blew away the cloud Wahwee had cast over me when I had recommended MacArthur for the assignment as Deputy of Regional Affairs when he was already Director of Western Europe his long held goal.

Q: Now during this time, in June 1950, the Korean War started. You know people you were working with, how much was the Soviet threat perceived to be imminent?

GALLOWAY: I don't think it had much effect on European perception of the imminence of the Soviet threat. Certainly the other NATO governments fully supported the United States in its decision under the UN to help preserve South Korea. I remember the working group meeting following the U.S. decision. The UK representative, Derek Hoyer-Millar, his voice choking with emotion, made a brief but powerful statement complimenting the U.S. for acting the way a great power should. That was warmly received by the others. Indeed, several NATO countries were able to send forces under UN auspices to join with the U.S. They were in fact token forces for the most part, but they did emphasize the policy of their governments. I don't think that event in itself affected to any considerable degree the attitude toward the Soviet Union. Some of my colleagues speculated that the Soviet Union was beginning to learn how to work and act internationally. It was involved in the four power occupation of Germany. It was involved in the four power occupation of Austria. It had the satellite countries under military occupation. It had its hands full. There were no serious Soviet threats, moves or announcements to raise the threshold in Korea, except for Krushchev's blandishment later on.

Q: That's not now.

GALLOWAY: In this early period, the NATO powers just held to a steady course. The fact that Soviet forces and the Allied forces were cheek to jowl in Germany and Austria was a state of affairs that existed, and it stayed pretty much that way until a later time when the first opportunity suddenly came on the Austrian treaty.

Q: In '54-'55. Was there concern on the part of the people of particularly the French Communist party, the Italian Communist Party?

GALLOWAY: Not after that one election.

Q: The '48 election in Italy.

GALLOWAY: That was the height of concern. I think the way that election came out removed many of the undercurrents that had been running around in western Europe. Moreover, that event had the ancillary effect of encouraging other political parties in the various countries to reinforce themselves and assume more prominent roles in the political swim. In France it worked to such an extent that everybody wanted to organize a party and take part in the government. Of course, they had a succession of prime ministers and new governments during the fourth republic. They were just being French; however, the French civil service is an excellent bureaucratic administrative body. Our experience through NATO contacts with the French at the diplomatic levels was solid and continuous. We had very few disputes per se with the French. Frequently they wanted to add some petty little thing or some cache that would make a passage more French in tone.

Q: Use of the language, something of that nature.

GALLOWAY: Yes, but those things were soon understood by everybody, and we were able to deal with them without difficulty.

Q: Well then, in '53 where did you go?

GALLOWAY: In '53 I was there in Paris in the Hotel Talleyrand, our headquarters, and MacArthur had gone back earlier. Let' see. Did he go back or did he stay? I guess he stayed until a little later. When was the election, in '52?

Q: '52. Eisenhower came in January of '53.

GALLOWAY: Well, that's when MacArthur came back, when Dulles was named Secretary of State. One of the first things he did was to position somebody at his elbow who had a very good relationship with Eisenhower and his immediate staff, and that was MacArthur. He had built that kind of relationship during those years in Paris.

Q: MacArthur had the job of counselor of the Department of State which depended on what the Secretary of State wanted it to be. I mean every administration the job changes, but the title stays the same.

GALLOWAY: Yes. It is sort of like the Lord Privy Seal in the British cabinet. It can be given any responsibility wanted. In fact, when MacArthur was Counselor, it probably wielded more power in the State Department than any of the geographic or functional bureaus. That was because his relationship with the Secretary of State very quickly became close and cordial, and the Secretary fully trusted him and depended on him to help with the White House. General Andy Goodpastor was Eisenhower's main chief of staff, and he and MacArthur had grown up together in SHAPE. Well, anyway, MacArthur sent a message to Livy Merchant asking if he would let me come back to be his special assistant. I was a bit reluctant, although I never told him that. Anyway, we formed a very good working relationship. I had become accustomed to having all kinds of new and unfamiliar things thrown at me that I somehow managed to muddle through, and I got along with people pretty well. I guess being a general's aide for a period of time in the army helped prepare me for this kind of thing because I got to be very comfortable in the position of special assistant or aide or whatever.

Q: Let's get this at the beginning. You were doing that from '53 until when?

GALLOWAY: '53 until '56 or '57 I guess.

Q: All right. Well now, when you were there, how did Douglas MacArthur work? How did he use you? How did he operate with the department from your perspective?

GALLOWAY: It became obvious to the other high level officials in the department soon after Mr. Dulles took over, that MacArthur was going to be one of his primary actors and agents. When I came back to be his special assistant, there were just he and I and three secretaries in the office. It was probably best that there were no more players than that because we could move from one thing to another without trampling on any institutional lines or activities. MacArthur handled himself very well with Dulles and the White House. The other two who came to be the principal advisors on the staff of Dulles were Livy Merchant who had been brought back as Assistant Secretary for European affairs and Bob Bowie who was head of the Policy Planning Staff, fresh from Harvard..

Q: Also part of that is the legal advisor, too.

GALLOWAY: Herman Fleger had a special tie with the Secretary though long friendship and the legal profession. So, whenever anything legal was involved, the secretary would say let's get Herman in and see what he thinks. Herman would join in, and he would usually go along with whatever these other three fellows cooked up. I don't think he was a lawyer of great international renown or experience, but he was a fine man, and he wanted to do anything and everything he could to help. He was not overly active, but when asked to do something, he was always available to help. These other three, MacArthur, Merchant, and Bowie were the main actors in that period. In fact, somebody, I think it was somebody in the secretariat had coined a name "Macmerbo." For two or three years when the question arose as to who was handling something for the Secretary, the answer was, "Macmerbo."

The Secretary had so much trust and respect for these fellows that he would hand them just about anything. When it came time, and this is digressing, for the SEATO treaty to be negotiated, instead of assigning it to Walter Robertson who was Assistant Secretary for the Far East, he asked MacArthur to take it on.

Q: Did you get any feel for Walter Robertson? He was very much a creature of the right wing of the Senate. I have heard that it was explained that you do whatever you want in Europe but don't mess with, particularly don't play around with China, or anything else like that.

GALLOWAY: That was essentially what happened in fact. Walter Robertson, if you cut it to bare bones, was the Congressional protection of Chiang Kai-shek. That's about what it amounted to. He was a Virginia patrician. He was very closely tied to the conservative elements in the Senate and the House. He was a fine gentleman with enough ego to enable him to operate pretty well at that level, but also without unnecessary or undue sensitivity. For example, when the Secretary gave MacArthur the job of negotiating the SEATO treaty, it did not seem to disturb Robertson at all.

Q: Yes. Well, his concern again was Chiang Kai-shek.

GALLOWAY: I was there with MacArthur from '53 until '56, and it was one of the most active jobs I have ever had. It covered as broad a horizon of activities as I have ever been called on to handle. As things worked out, I think the first time he went off on a visit, the Secretary asked MacArthur to pull things together for him which led to or established the precedent that whenever the Secretary was going off for a four power meeting or any other kind of meeting whatever, MacArthur would be the man to get all the preparations done.

Q: Often sitting at his elbow too. I have seen pictures.

GALLOWAY: Yes, that's right. It did not seem to cause a problem with other senior career foreign service people or other high level officials in the department. Even senior people like Chip Bohlen and George Kennan were somewhat left on the sideline. Kennan was even more left out. With Chip it didn't seem to matter too much because he had his own reputation. He had his own group of people, including me from my desk officer days. He confided with me about his outlook. He said, "Galloway, when you get into a high position in government, once you get in, one quality which will give you considerable help is to be a little lazy." Chip followed that axiom pretty well. He paced himself. He was a brilliant man, and his background and experience had traveled with him. He was about as authoritative on the Soviet Union and what was going on generally as any person around in those years. He spoke Russian and served as interpreter for the President or the Secretary whenever they were meeting directly with the Russians. He was at Yalta. His credentials were such that he didn't feel threatened by latter day activities.

Q: Kennan felt that he had won the policy planning and I think he felt sort of left out to pasture, didn't he? When the Dulles administration came in he didn't...

GALLOWAY: Well, even before that. I don't know that to be absolutely true, but that was what I picked up in the halls. As I mentioned to you about the negotiation of the North Atlantic Treaty, Jack Hickerson and Ted Achilles worked directly with the Secretary. If either George or Chip heard about something and asked what it was all about, the Secretary would smooth things over or just ignore it. That was in what is now the old state building. We were up on the sixth floor. The Secretary's office and the office of Kennan had a connecting door. Kennan mentioned that from time to time. I think Acheson had the door locked, but he treated Kennan such that, I think, made Kennan feel that his position and his contributions were appreciated. In fact, Acheson just listened and then did what he, himself, decided. He did not ask Kennan to take on any special role in the department. That was perhaps the thing, I suppose, that irked Kennan in those days. As you know, even under General Marshall, Kennan was there as head of the policy planning staff, and then Dean Acheson became Secretary.. I was titular head of the Swiss desk at that point. Socially, I was on the roster for the Swiss, the Belgians, Luxembourg, and a lot of the NATO people as well, so I was having quite a high old time in my social activities. I remember dinner at the home of the Swiss Minister, who, incidentally, was married to the sister of Henry Wallace. I don't remember all of the guests other than George Kennan and his wife. After dinner the break came for men to have brandy and cigars while the ladies repaired elsewhere. Kennan more or less dominated the conversation. Anything that came up, he had an opinion. He got to talking about the State Department, speaking along these lines, "You know it has been very difficult, very hard." He went on, "You know, it has been very difficult in the State Department for some time now because of the people there, Bob (Lovett was Under Secretary under Marshall) and I are the only two with general competence." From the standpoint of a practitioner of diplomatic activities, one could sense the ego of the speaker and his flawed judgment in making such a remark openly. Talleyrand certainly would not have condoned such a statement in the circumstances; moreover, it was so patently untrue. As the department operated in those days, he did various things but did not exercise any general authority. I remember he conducted a few seminars, got people in from the outside to talk about issues. He made one contribution on the actual wording of one of the articles of the North Atlantic Treaty. Ted gave him credit for that. Otherwise, Ted and Jack bypassed him to work directly with the secretary which suited the secretary. George Kennan was obliged to endure a bruised ego.

Q: Yes. Well, I think it got in his way from a career point of view too. I served with him in Belgrade near the end of his diplomatic career. I felt he took things too personally. I was way down below a chief of the consular section. He saw things in terms of rebuff to George Kennan rather than policy.

GALLOWAY: He was that way with the planning staff, too.

Q: Well, he has been there, in his way, he was probably where he belonged at Princeton...

GALLOWAY: As a historian. I don't know how good a historian he is.

Q: Well, he was a commentator and acting as sort of one of a number of academics who made, I mean not necessarily correct, but strew out the diplomatic plant as far as discussion goes.

GALLOWAY: Something I noted during my period there in the department with MacArthur was that Kennan seemed to enjoy little respect from his contemporaries.

Q: He was not... I mean this comes through very clearly from the interviews. He obviously was a powerful person and he had a distinguished career, but you don't get eyes lighting up. When they talk about MacArthur or when they Bohlen, or George Kennan. Did you have problems? I mean MacArthur was one of the sort of the old line of the foreign service of the imperial ambassadors. Was that a feature while you were dealing with that?

GALLOWAY: Yes. And MacArthur had probably twice as much adrenaline as anybody else. When the Secretary asked him to do something, he didn't hesitate to use whatever means was necessary. He tried to be cooperative and helpful, and generally it went that way for people who worked with him. He never tried to steal other people's ideas. He never tried to put anybody down or anything like that. He wasn't playing politics with his fellow workers, but he was darn well going to get done what the Secretary asked him to get done. I became imbued with sort of the same idea. I was working with him for about four years. He led the way and I followed in his footsteps. I suppose I didn't make or gain a huge host of comrades myself. On the other hand, I tried to make him available to all levels of the department. I tried to make it possible for anybody who had something being blocked or held up by somebody up the line to look to us for help. I tried to help them out and sometimes got MacArthur to take a hand. I did try to keep in touch with all of the echelons.

Q: Did you find yourself trying to smooth things over sometimes?

GALLOWAY: Not very often. Not as much as you might think. Doug's colleagues, particularly those serving in senior positions, could observe in meetings with the Secretary when he, Merchant, Bowie and others were there, how discussions were conducted. It was not very formal. Usually, there were three or four participants doing most of the talking, going back and forth, with the Secretary chiming in from time to time. He, or one of the others would contribute most of the substance of what emerged as the decision, and, more often than not, it was left for MacArthur to carry it out. It was during this stage of implementation that I learned about a strong trait of his character -- I found him to be very loyal, very loyal indeed. I did not find him to be standoffish to other people in the department. He respected the integrity of the institution and the people working there; he understood generally that they were working institutionally, and not personally. So, he was always willing to help out when a worthy cause came along. I think that because we sometimes moved like a whirlwind and were involved in so many things, the impression was that we were running and stomping over everybody. We did that only rarely, but for the most part our work was carried out and in a manner which bruised few people.

RUDOLPH AGGREY
Information Officer, USIS
Strasbourg/Lille (1953-1954)

Youth Activities Officer, USIS
Paris (1954-1960)

Ambassador Rudolph Aggrey, whose father immigrated to the United States from Ghana in the early 1900s, entered the USIA in 1951. His career included positions in Nigeria, France, Zaire, and ambassadorships to Senegal, the Gambia, and Romania. Ambassador Aggrey was interviewed by Jack O'Brien in 1990.

AGGREY: After Lagos I was assigned, first, to Strasbourg, and then to Lille, in France, as a part of the very important United States Information Office Agency operation in France at that time. And I had the pleasure of working for three different country PAOs, first for Bill Koren, then for Lee Brady, and finally for Bill Cody. And I think that each of them, in their own way, contributed a great deal to my growth and development. And I must say that each of them allowed me to do what I was able to do. And I had wonderful experiences and keep very, very fond memories of the days in Paris and in France.

Q: At some point, was there a question about your fluency in French?

AGGREY: In Nigeria there was a question about my ability to serve in France, when I applied to go to France. When I came back after the Nigerian assignment, I didn't know exactly where I was going. I was told, "Well, you want to go to Europe but you don't speak French." And I asked that I be tested because I had had an interesting experience.

When I was in graduate school, my master's degree was held up for six months because, reportedly, I had not passed a French reading examination. I vowed that I would never fail another French examination, and I spent six months preparing for that exam. And while I was in Lagos, I studied French with a tutor. Before I came into the Foreign Service, I took special conversational French courses at Brooklyn College.

Q: Now while you were in France, you were -- I don't know whether you were established -- but you were director of the youth affairs office there.

AGGREY: Yes.

Q: And that was unusual. I don't think we had such an office in most posts. I know we didn't. How did that come about?

AGGREY: Well, it was the first of several offices. And I think they were established in London, and perhaps in Beirut, and one or two other posts thereafter. It came about because Lee Brady, who was country public affairs officer in France while I served in Lille, visiting the post, saw that I paid particular attention to students and youth in the program that we carried out there. And he felt that was a public USIA should address especially and with more thought and programming.

So when an opportunity came, he appointed me as the first youth activities officer in Paris. And in 1954 I began that program there.

Q: Well, that must have brought you a lot of satisfaction.

AGGREY: It brought me a great deal of satisfaction. It enabled me to travel throughout France. I made contacts with every French university, every French youth organization, the whole spectrum. And we developed special programs of seminars, lectures, exchanges. And the program grew and developed to the point where, in addition to contacts with French youth, we began contacts with youth of other countries, for which France, and particularly Paris, was a cultural sort of homeland, for Francophone Africans, for Asians, for Middle Easterners, for persons from Latin America, as well.

And then that led to the development of a cultural center in the Latin Quarter, on the Rue du Dragon, which developed a reputation for the quality of its programs and its outreach.

Q: And you were director of that?

AGGREY: And I was founding director of that center, between 1957 and 1960. While in Paris, I went on temporary detail to Vienna on one occasion, and I spent three months in Morocco, helping that post with some programs and projects.

CARL F. NORDEN
Economic Officer, North Atlantic Treaty Organization
Paris (1953-1956)

Carl F. Norden entered the Foreign Service in 1938. His career included positions in Germany, Czechoslovakia, Suriname, Cuba, Chile, Yugoslavia, Argentina, Spain, Iran, France, and Venezuela. Mr. Norden was interviewed by Horace G. Torbert in 1991.

NORDEN: But I didn't go back. At that point, personnel, Bob Woodward or somebody, took pity on me and said, "Listen, this guy is just getting married, don't send him someplace like that." ...what happened. So instead of that, I was sent to NATO in Paris.

Q: And this was again a financial job?

NORDEN: Yes, pretty much. An economic job. A difficult job. My boss was an Englishman; his boss was a Frenchman. The Englishman, I remember, was very brilliant, but he had some peculiarities. He once broke up a staff meeting, walked to the window, and said, "Oh, what a beautiful boy!" But I did some special jobs there. I got into a quasi-financial job, an economic job. I did a study in spare time. We had a lot of spare time there, you see. The annual review took a lot of time and it was hard work, but when you weren't on the annual review, you had time for projects. And I got into a project comparing the growth rates in Russia and the NATO area. Other people did the same thing later, but I did the first one. And I came to the conclusion that the Russian growth rate was going to slow markedly. And it did. But it wasn't a very popular paper, because the British, for some reason, didn't like it. If the British didn't like something, you might as well forget it.

Q: Well,... I suppose... or not. Well, you were there about two and a half years, weren't you?

NORDEN: NATO?

Q: In Paris, yes.

NORDEN: Two years. I had three children born there, twins.

Q: I had twin grandchildren, so I wasn't quite so...

NORDEN: It was very interesting. It was very tricky. You had to be very careful about taking a position on anything, because you stepped on the Greeks' toes or the Turks' toes or, you know, that kind of thing. But they were very nice, nice people, very nice people.

JEAN MARY WILKOWSKI
Assistant Commercial Attaché
Paris (1953-1956)

Ambassador Jean Mary Wilkowski was born in Wisconsin in 1919. She received a bachelor's degree from St. Mary of Woods College in 1941 and a master's degree from the University of Wisconsin in 1944. Her Foreign Service career included positions in Trinidad, Colombia, Italy, Chile, Switzerland, and Honduras, and an ambassadorship to Zambia. The interview was conducted by Willis Armstrong on August 23, 1989.

Q: Fifty, fifty-one. This was after the Marshall Plan and after that election?

WILKOWSKI: Not quite, AID was still operating there. There wasn't anything major going on in Italy which was trying to get back on its feet economically. It was before the "Miracle" of the sixties." You remember that Norman Armour's daughter was married to Ambassador James Dunn. He headed our Rome mission. The big thing in Milan was the annual Trade Fair and the Ambassador always brought up a big delegation from the Embassy. Dunn was a good Ambassador. His wife Mary was very gracious and had a good sense of humor. She agreed to have the Italian Garden Club name a rose for her. They told her, "it did well in beds!" The Zellerbachs came after Dunn. Different people -- very political and less Foreign Service oriented.

Milan was Europe for the first time. It was a wonderful introduction and made me decide in favor of taking the Foreign Service exam. I was assigned to Paris, took the exam there and then came in. I was Assistant Commercial Attaché in Paris.

Q: This was about '52, '53?

WILKOWSKI: Fifty-three to fifty-six. Then I was sent on TDY from Paris over to Geneva to the GATT Tariff negotiations. Our Ambassador in Paris was Douglas Dillon.

Q: Yes. I know him, as a matter of fact.

WILKOWSKI: Graham Martin was our administrative / consular officer there. I got to know him well, in fact, did some cost of living work for him.

Q: What did you think of Graham Martin?

WILKOWSKI: He was a very controversial figure and a secretive man, as you probably know. He was last living in North Carolina.

Q: I think he is.

WILKOWSKI: I think he used very bad judgment in that case of the classified papers left in the back of his car.

Q: Very intense man, I thought.

WILKOWSKI: Very intense man. Former newspaperman. Not a bad Ambassador, I don't think, but he made strange friends, like Michele Sindona in Italy. I don't believe he ever learned a foreign language, but he did know how to use people -- staff and outsiders -- and he relied heavily on them for information. I think he was a good collector of facts, a good analyst. There was something mysterious but likable about him. I felt kindly toward him. It was he who later asked me in the early '70s, if I wanted to become an Ambassador. If I did, Washington was asking him what he thought of me. [Chuckle] He would recommend me if I wanted to be an Ambassador, he said.

Q: Well, he did have good judgment.

WILKOWSKI: Thank you. Strange, he always acted as though he was playing a CIA game. He had that inclination to clandestine kinds of operation, secretive, so you never really knew the whole Graham Martin. But he had a soft spot, and he was always very good to me and quite frankly I tried to please him and merit his approval and respect.

Q: I knew him. I found him a very decent guy, really.

WILKOWSKI: Indeed. That's what I want to say. He was very much interested in other human beings. When he was retired and would come wandering into the Department, he would always make a point of looking you up. And it wasn't just for old times sake. It's because he was genuinely interested in others and their work in the Foreign Service.

Q: He was a warmer person than he ever got credit for being, I think.

WILKOWSKI: Oh, yes, he was. He was, and his wife, Dottie, was a lot of fun.

Q: I didn't know her.

WILKOWSKI: In sum, Graham Martin was a mysterious, unfathomable character, who seemed to delight in this image. He seemed more off-putting to men than women.

Q: He was a strange man, more strange than a lot of CIA people. [Laughter]

WILKOWSKI: He dealt with Foreign Service people very fairly, I believe.

Q: Yes, within the Service on a career basis, he was very fair and reasonable.

WILKOWSKI: I think so. He wouldn't hesitate to recommend people. For example, there was a young man working for me. He called me down and asked me what I thought of him. He wanted to recommend him as a Consul General, and I said, "Yes, I thought he could do a good job, but..." and as we were trained to do, listed the positive and the negative with emphasis on the former. Well, he got this consular post, and then almost immediately pursued a negative trait. It set Graham's teeth on edge. The man was a long time getting his ambassadorship. Indeed, he was a DCM for a very long time.

Q: You had acquired Italian. How about other languages? Did you have Spanish when you were in Bogota, and Italian later, and French?

WILKOWSKI: Well, I was a French minor in college. Indeed, that's one of the projects I'm working on now is trying to encourage exchange scholarships between France and the U.S. When I left college, I had no French-speaking ability though I knew Cornielle, Racine and Moliere. My first speaking language was learned in Bogota. I had to transact business in the Embassy economic section in Spanish. I worked with the coffee producers, exporters and shippers, and so I had to learn Spanish to get the trade trends and statistics. I acquired Spanish, Italian and French. During my tours in the Foreign Service I was interested in languages, and I think I have some facility with them.

Q: You did that as you went along. That was sort of part of your job to learn the local language so you could make it go.

WILKOWSKI: Yes, part of my self-education.

Q: Did you take special language training while you were in those posts?

WILKOWSKI: Yes. I always went in for the course at post in Bogota, on my own in Milan, and in Embassy classes in Rome and Paris, also at the Foreign Service Institute. I took intensive Spanish before I went to Chile, and a refresher before Honduras. I think the greatest lessons I had in Italian came from buying a farm with another Foreign Service Officer in Tuscany. I had to deal with the plumbers and the carpenters and the electricians and the real estate people.

ELDEN B. ERICKSON
Industry Reporting Officer
Paris (1954-1956)

Elden B. Erickson was born in Kansas in 1919. He served in the U.S. Air Force and the U.S. Army in World War II before joining the Foreign Service in 1946. His Foreign Service career included positions in China, Algeria, France, Laos, Japan, Lebanon, the Netherlands, Canada, and Germany. Mr. Erickson was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1992.

Q: You served in Paris from 1954-56. What were you doing there.

ERICKSON: I was industry reporting officer which was the best job in the Embassy.

Q: What does an industry reporting officer do?

ERICKSON: I reported on ship building, automobiles, motion picture industry, and all phases of industry, which at that time was still recovering after the war.

Q: Did you feel a bit like a country cousin coming into the big city or did you always maintain your view that these people were a bit precious?

ERICKSON: No, I think I have always maintained my country view, no matter what. But it was such an exciting city and exciting life. For me it was an exciting job. I went to ship launchings all the time. I represented the Ambassador at the Cannes Festival one year. I had a new convertible and I was asked to escort Kim Novak from her hotel to the casino. Burt Lancaster invited me to Maximes for dinner. For a young person it was rather exciting.

Oh, Mrs. Clark (Lewis Clark was Consul General), was one of a number of Vassar girls of the same class who married Foreign Service Officers. I think there were six of them. I don't remember who they were now, except one of them was Marian Achilles. Ted Achilles was at that time Minister in Paris. Mrs. Clark wrote to Marian Achilles and said, "Erickson is coming to Paris and I want you to take care of him. If you need any fill in for a black tie dinner, for a party, for anything in French, you just call on Eric and he will be there." So what could I do? It turned out I was often called, maybe an hour before dinner or something. But not just for emergencies, they invited me to other things too.

Q: What were American-French relations like at the time?

ERICKSON: I think de Gaulle was out by that time. He was, because in Algiers he came down to give a speech at the Place du Gouvernement. I went to it and walked out. It was so anti-American I couldn't stand it even to listen to the whole thing and then report it. It just made me boil and I left. So I know he was not in when I went from there to Paris.

Also, one of our employees at the Embassy...her father was the concierge at the Parliament...got me a pass so that I could attend all the sessions of Parliament. It was a period of unsettlement for France.

Q: There was the Geneva Conference and the settlement with the Vietnamese and all that.

ERICKSON: I was at the National Assembly the night that Mendes-France submitted his resignation. He said to his fellow deputies that they would live to regret it. It was an interesting period too.

Q: At your meeting with French officials and industry people how did you find their feelings towards the Americans?

ERICKSON: It was generally very good at that time, I think. There were always the French who were not all that friendly towards Americans. But I think basically our relations were quite good. Ambassador Dillon was the ambassador at the time. I think he certainly was well respected and did a lot for our relations as well.

Q: What was your impression of the French intellectuals? It seems to be in no other country that you have such a so-called class of intellectuals that seems to be important? Did you find that it was important?

ERICKSON: Yes, in France it is important.

Q: He was editor of Le Monde?

ERICKSON: I'm not sure. I had met him and should know, but I don't remember.

Again, the Ambassador had a party every Thursday night and we took turns going and got to meet and know people in those days. I have a feeling today you are so security minded that you don't get to meet the people that you used to.

Q: Was the impression you got that the French intellectuals were viscerally from the Left and that the Americans were just culturally a wasteland?

ERICKSON: Yes, that was the impression. But I don't think we took that all too much to heart. That was just the way it was. Maybe we should have.

Q: I think it comes with the territory.

ERICKSON: I had landed in Normandy and I spoke French at that time. When we went through the countryside they brought flowers, Calvados, etc. I had such a warm feeling for the French that I probably always leaned to the pro-French side.

Q: Were there any major political developments during your tour?

ERICKSON: I think Mendes-France...it was more internal France...well not entirely. But internal France was more important at that time than France-US it seems to me. They were really going through a difficult time.

Q: It was sort of the last gasp of the Fourth Republic. What were your impression of Douglas Dillon as Ambassador?

ERICKSON: I thought he was just super in just every respect. I think I probably felt that because he read every word of my industry reports and often called me in to ask about them.

Q: He was an economist wasn't he?

ERICKSON: Yes. This was the time that they had the Wriston program to convert FSS to FSO simply by writing why you thought you should be one. I was converted from an FSS-8 to an FSO-6. When they called me in I originally said that I was happy the way I was and didn't really plan on staying in. So there was no point in converting. They said that I probably wouldn't be able to do economic work if I didn't convert. So I went ahead and did it for that reason, not because I was desperate to become an officer. I still was not planning to make it a career. I just kind of drifted on and since I enjoyed it all the time I didn't leave.

Q: As an industry officer, what was your impression of the possibility of integrating Europe?

ERICKSON: I think we all felt that that was part of our mission. Not to just integrate Europe, but to integrate us with Europe as well. But it had to start with their integration.

Q: Did you feel that it would work?

ERICKSON: Yes, there was a great feeling at that time...they had just started up at Strasbourg, the beginnings of the integration. And the coal, steel community, the three European communities were formed, it seems to me, at that time.

Q: What about de Gaulle? Was he seen sort of hovering in the wings?

ERICKSON: As far as I remember, he was seen as totally finished by that time. Especially when the Algerian Rightists turned against him.

Q: So people weren't waiting for him to reappear?

ERICKSON: No.

Q: Also I take it from what you said he didn't seem to be somebody who was going to be helpful to the situation, at least as far as we were concerned?

ERICKSON: To the contrary as far as the U.S.

C. DOUGLAS DILLON

Ambassador
France (1953-1957)

Ambassador Dillon was born in Switzerland and raised in Europe and New Jersey. He was educated at Harvard University and served in the US Navy in World War II. He established the Wall Street Investment firm Dillon Reed and Company, becoming its Vice President and Director. A member of the Republican Party, he was appointed to senior positions including; Ambassador to France (1953-1957); Undersecretary of State for Economic Affairs (1959-1961); and Secretary of the Treasury (1961-1965). He died in 2003. Ambassador Dillon was interviewed by Robert D. Schulzinger in 1987.

DILLON: No, because Eisenhower did not call on Dulles, the way Dewey had. Dulles had nothing directly to do with the campaign--although Eisenhower knew he was very good. After Eisenhower was elected, very early on, he turned to Dulles and asked him to be Secretary of State. That was in mid-November. I think it was early December when I got a telephone call from Mr. Dulles, who was working at the Commodore Hotel. I went there and had lunch with him, and he asked me if I would be interested in being ambassador to France. He told me at that time-- that the President-elect had, in effect, given him the right to nominate-- to suggest-- one person for one of the major embassies. The President had reserved for himself the other two or three major posts. Foster Dulles was always particularly interested in France, because he had studied there as a youth, and his wife had been there, and they had gotten together there, and he had a real understanding and love of France. So he was interested in that, and he thought I could do the job. This was a surprise for me because I was so young for that-- at that time I was 42 years old. He did say that there was one problem-- that it was very delicate-- it was a major thing that was very close to this heart, and that was the European Defense Community-- the EDC. He was going to appoint David Bruce, who had been in Paris before as ambassador, to head a special mission which would be located in Paris, but would be assigned the whole of Europe, the members of the Coal and Steel Community. Its primary and really sole purpose would be to try and help with ratification of the EDC in all the European countries. So, that was how I came to get my first assignment.

Q: And this came as a surprise, you say?

DILLON: Yes, because I hadn't asked, hadn't expected anything like that. When he did call me, I thought that he wanted to talk to me about something, but I didn't think it would be anything like that. I thought it might be a special job within the State Department or something of that nature, which would not be surprising, but this thing was quite a surprise.

Q: Was there anything that happened while you were being confirmed that was noteworthy, or was that a pro forma process?

DILLON: Well, except for one thing--it was very pro forma.

Q: Did you testify before the Foreign Relations Committee?

DILLON: Yes, I did. There were two things that may be of some interest. One was that at the convention the governor of New Jersey still tried to play all sides against the middle-- he has very close to Taft, and he established some relations with him, and so the Eisenhower people were not very pleased with the governor. And so when this appointment came up, they neglected to tell the governor that I was going to be nominated, and like all things, it was leaked in the press before it was announced. At the end of December it was in a column by Joe Alsop, who was an old friend of mine in boarding school and college. I hadn't seen much of him since then-- but he got this story from somewhere and wrote a column about it. The governor blew up because he hadn't been properly taken care of, but nobody paid much attention to that. The confirmation proceeding was more or less pro forma. I found it interesting, because I got up there and was put in a little anteroom next to the room where the Foreign Relations Committee met.

Q: Was this in January?

DILLON: It was announced in January; this must have been-- maybe the end of January or early February, something like that. I found a very good looking and attractive lady there, surrounded by all sorts of photographers. It turned out to be Clare Luce, who was also waiting to be confirmed, so no one was terribly interested in me. They wanted to take our picture together-- they got a sofa and we were sitting properly on the sofa. She said "that's not the way to sit-- you've got to put your knees across like this, otherwise nothing will show in the picture but your legs!" So, I got my first indoctrination on how to behave in front of the camera from Clare Luce. And she went in and came out in two minutes flat, everything was fine, then I went in. I can't really remember what happened, I had one really good friend on the Foreign Relations Committee, whom we'd known-- not closely, but we visited back and forth - Senator Fulbright, who was not the chairman then; he was a young fellow. He was a very good friend. Anyway, I was confirmed, and studied diligently in Washington to get more caught up on the details of the French political situation.

Q: Tell me a little bit about that, the preparations for this.

DILLON: Well, there were just a lot of briefing papers at that time, there was nothing very detailed, just briefing papers, and we did have evenings with the Bruces who were at their Washington house, and they tried to tell us, including my wife, about problems and about what we could expect in Paris. It was about this time that my wife started to study French. She wasn't very good in French. I could read French: I could understand it when it was spoken to me by one person speaking directly to me but I was very rusty in speaking it myself. I had an accent, but I could get along. So I didn't have to do much special studying at first, I did what I could. We took a fellow with us when we went across on the boat. We went on the America--the last time we went on a ship, and we took lessons every day for a week. We got to Paris about the 10th of March.

Q: I see. Tell me about your relations with the rest of the Embassy staff. Did you know them before? How did you work with them?

DILLON: I knew a fellow before who was there-- he left shortly afterwards. He as the CIA station chief, a fellow by the name of Robert Thayer. I didn't know any of the others. A whole group of them came up to Cherbourg or Le Havre, I've forgotten which. They had a special car on the train, and we all rode back together. That's where I first met them-- it was very pleasant and very nice. The deputy chief of mission had been there a brief time, four or five months, I think, to be ready for the turnover, which they knew would take place whether a Republican or Democrat was elected, because there was an interim appointee serving. That turned out to be, from my point of view, quite helpful. My immediate predecessor was a very eminent professional Foreign Service Officer. He was quite put out at being sent to Paris on an interim basis like this, and he let everybody know it, including the French. So they were glad to have me come as a person who was really interested. That was Ambassador James Dunn, who had been a very successful ambassador in Italy, which he loved. When David Bruce was called back in February of '52 to be Under Secretary of State, he had been pulled out of Italy and sent to Paris, which he didn't like at all.

Q: I see.

DILLON: He brought up his Italian residential staff, and even some Italian wines. After Paris he went to Spain, which he liked, and did very well.

Q: Who was the deputy that you spoke of?

DILLON: The deputy was a fellow named Theodore Achilles. He did very well there, and later-- he left during my final year-- he was ambassador to Peru. He was active for a long time since then-- he was a very fine Foreign Service Officer and he did very well.

Q: Tell me how you organized your days in the early days.

DILLON: In the early days I found, right away, that nothing started very early. We found a girl who was sort of a failed actress of the Comédie Française, a very good, intellectual, single woman who spoke beautiful French. She came to the house every morning, and I would take half an hour with her reading the French newspapers and talking about them in French with her, which helped my accent and my vocabulary.

Q: And that time was this?

DILLON: About 9:00 or 9:30, and then after that she would take on my wife. I would get things together and go down to the office, and get to work about quarter to 10 or 10.

Q: Was your residence in the same building as the Chancery Office?

DILLON: Oh, no, it was a long way, well not a long way, it was about a 10 minute drive. The residence at that time was a building at No. 2, avenue d'Iena, which was just across the Seine from the Eiffel Tower, and the Chancery, of course, was on the Place de la Concorde. I would come down and read the cable traffic, which was the first thing I did-- both incoming and outgoing. The procedure was, that all outgoing cables were signed by the ambassador though he doesn't usually see them. In a big embassy like Paris there would be a large stock of cables every day. Unless they were important they wouldn't get to the ambassador before going out. All the important political messages, and very important economic ones did get to me in advance, but they were a small part of the overall traffic. After I would finish with the cable traffic, I would probably meet for a few minutes with the Deputy Chief of Mission, whose office was nearby, and see what was up, and we just took it from there. It was a kind of a new life for me, because I'd been more on my own before, but here I found that there were lots of things to do that were representational. I had to go and be present at the laying of a wreath, or the opening of this or that, so generally I was very busy. The other thing that changed was that the French at the Quai d'Orsay worked late, and if I had to go to see them, which I did quite frequently, my appointment would generally be for something like seven o'clock in the evening.

Q: There are even references in the Foreign Relations volumes that have been published of your meeting with people in their apartments as late as 10 and 11.

DILLON: That was really special, I guess!

Q: You met with Mendes-France at 10 at night during EDC ?

DILLON: But I do remember that just as a standard thing, that after I'd come back, I'd dictate my cable report to Washington on what happened, and I'd get home about 8:00 --8:15. Dinner in France was never before 8:30, and sometimes you'd be a little late. There was a slack period of a couple of hours at lunchtime. If I did not have something special, I generally went home for lunch, and had lunch with my wife, and that would take an hour and a half to rest and eat something, because nothing happened, everything sort of stopped. But then the French continued, just normal, without anything special, until 8:00 PM. The entire Embassy didn't stay that late but my part of it did, because the people there, my immediate staff, had to do the same thing I did.

One of the things that made my job interesting, particularly in those years, was that for one reason or another, the State Department at that time, probably on account of Secretary Dulles, with his interest and knowledge where French statesmen were concerned, such as Bidault, liked to carry on the major relationship-- through the American Embassy in Paris, rather than through the French Embassy in Washington. Now, that changed later, and they now do most of it through the French Embassy in Washington - where the State Department - where the Assistant Secretary who'd be handling matters could talk directly to the ambassador, and say himself what he wanted to say. But during my time, for one reason or another, they handled it more the other way, so we had more to do. When they handle matters in Washington, the Assistant Secretary or the Secretary if he's doing it, could talk directly to the ambassador and know what he said but he has no way of knowing what the ambassador reports to the Quai d'Orsay. If you do it the other way they can't know exactly what I said, but I have to report what I said, so they have a pretty good idea, and they know exactly what the top fellow in France, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, was told and what he said, verbatim. They happened to like it that way, and followed that procedure during the four years that I was there.

Q: Describe what would happen when the Secretary of State or a high American delegation would come to France. How would that change the routine of the Embassy?

DILLON: Well, the only high delegation or person who ever came when I was there was the Secretary of State. The President went to Geneva but didn't come to Paris. It wasn't like it is now, when they have so many special envoys, and of course in those days, they didn't have jet planes, so it took much longer to go back and forth. Communications just weren't as rapid. When the Secretary of State came, he stayed with me in the residence, and he had his assistant there, and everything revolved around him, because he was there for a purpose, which usually was for a NATO [North Atlantic Treaty Organization] meeting. Or like the time he was trying to deal with Suez, it just revolved around him and around that meeting, and so the bilateral things with France were put on hold unless they had some special thing that had to be done, other than just attend meetings. We would put all our facilities at the Secretary's disposal, it would take two, three, four days before he completed his work and left Paris.

Q: Let's talk about the substantive issues of your time in France and if that you can reflect on some of the personalities. In reading the record the first thing that came up was the French intense interest in the Rosenberg case. The Rosenbergs were set to be executed and were executed in June of 1953, just a few months after you arrived. How did that affect your work, and what did you do with that?

DILLON: Well, it didn't affect my work. It was not a very pleasant experience, because, as it was coming up to the time that they were to be executed, the communists and their supporters stirred up a tremendous amount of excitement over there. I don't think it was probably a very popular thing anywhere, but certainly not among the intellectuals in France. At the actual time of the executions, there as a tremendous sort of a riot, I guess you'd call it --demonstrations, maybe, that's a better word-- in the Place de la Concorde, and the French had to turn out all sorts of police of different types. It was like a battlefield. They advised me to not be there. We went out to the country, and they sent someone with us to be at the house-- some security people-- for a couple of days, and nothing ever happened out there.

Q: Who actually advised you --the Foreign Ministry?

DILLON: I think it was either that or the Ministry of Justice; that as it was going to be a difficult thing, it would be just as good not to be around. There as a certain amount of rock throwing, and what-else throwing, and there were about 10 or 15 police that were injured and in the hospital. I remember when I came in the next week, I went to the hospital, and thanked them, and some French police officials there liked that very much, and we never had any trouble after that. It didn't drag on. I don't recall anything much after the big initial demonstration.

Q: Did the French government officially want the American government not to execute the Rosenbergs?

DILLON: No, nothing from the French government officially over that.

Q: There are some letters from you in foreign relations of the United States, saying how much of a problem it was causing in France.

DILLON: Well, it was, at the time. It was in all the papers, and everything like that. Of course, looking at these letters that have been published now, you're way ahead of me-- because I haven't seen them!

Q: Well, as you say, maybe you didn't write them.

DILLON: Well, no...

Q: They were signed by you.

DILLON: Well, I did--I think so-- anything that's serious. There's one very interesting thing that I found out that's probably appropriate to say here which developed quite often, during my spell there. The Embassy staff in Paris felt differently from the Bureau of European Affairs [EUR] of the State Department. There were a number of people in EUR who were basically rather unfriendly to France and things French, and liked-- were very taken with-- the Germans. That was the period when McCloy had just left and Conant had just gone there, and Germany had just come on with Adenauer, as the big wonderful place. EUR still remembered the French from the Vichy days, as a lot of them had served there, and they were not friendly at all, so we often had differences of opinion. When the time came to send a telegram back that differed with the view of the State Department, (as indicated by) the telegrams we'd received, Achilles or my people from the political department, which was headed by a man named Bob Joyce, who was also very good, always would come to me for approval of their reply. They would come and say-- "this is what we feel, and we want to write a telegram, but would you please send it under your name?" What they meant by that was to send it personally-- you would write in the telegram, "I." The use of the word "I" always meant it came from the ambassador personally. If there was a "we" in it, it came from the Embassy over the ambassador's signature: "we think this," "we do this," "we do that,"-- that was a sort of code way of doing it. They wanted me to say "I" because they wanted to protect their own hides, back in Washington, because where they went for their next post depended on what the people in Washington thought of them. If they could blame an ambassador for telling the State Department to go to hell, that was all right, so many times they would ask me to do it in this way. I was glad to. It was just a sort of protection for the staff that made me aware of the advantages of a non-career, politically-appointed ambassador. When you get that sort of a relationship between career people on an Embassy staff and the Department, they are often scared to say what they really think, if the people in Washington don't like it. And so it was an advantage to be a political appointee. There may be some disadvantages, too, but this was a very real advantage, and we made full use of it.

There was another thing that I would do. Secretary Dulles, as I have said earlier, was very interested in France and had a very good understanding of some of the French political figures. Sometimes I would get a directive from Washington to do something. The Embassy should tell the French this or that, something that we did not agree with. I would in those cases, send back to Washington a telegram addressed to the Secretary. That would say "eyes only--Secretary," but that didn't mean only him. It went to about 20 people in the department, but not to 200. But I would say in it: "re: Your so and so," which was the one that we had received from the Bureau of European Affairs-- I don't agree for this reason or that. I don't intend to carry out the order unless you specifically tell me to." That happened three or four times, maybe five or six times, and I don't think he ever told me to carry out the original directive.

Q: Can you recall some examples?

DILLON: It's hard, but it was usually-- probably having to do with the EDC. We, the Embassy staff and I, had a running disagreement, from the time I got there until the final National Assembly vote, with the Bruce Mission on our appreciation of the prospects for EDC in France.

Q: Why don't we talk about that for a while.

DILLON: And, so we were constantly getting these: "can't you do this?" or "can't you do that?" and we'd say "No, we can't do this, it would be counterproductive."

Q: What did the Embassy try to do regarding EDC?

DILLON: What we tried to do was to carry out American policy, which was to favor the enactment of it. But very early on, we decided that, after checking with all the people-- we had much broader contacts in France than the Bruce mission did; they were talking primarily to the Monnet-type people, who were very interested in EDC and they took their evaluation at face value. We had much broader contacts, and we came rather quickly to the conclusion that the EDC would never be ratified in the French Assembly. So we were always trying to advise Washington to prepare a fall back or at least to have a thought out position for when that happened. It turned out at the end that we were right, and that the French, when they did turn it down, wanted immediately to make amends and be friendly, and that's when Mendes-France said they would join the Common Market, and they relaxed the objections they had to German rearmament and German admission to NATO, and so forth.

Q: What was your opinion of the way Mendes-France behaved in that EDC controversy?

DILLON: I think it was perfectly all right because he did just what we knew was going to happen.

Q: I see.

DILLON: When I'd been in Paris about two or three months, and I'd met all sorts of people and people from different parties, I said to Achilles and the people in our political division that I wanted to meet General de Gaulle. He replied: "That would be a good idea but it just hasn't been done-- the American ambassador just doesn't talk to General de Gaulle." And I said: "How come?" "Well, he said," "ever since Ambassador Caffery, who had a fight with him, no American ambassador has had any connection with General de Gaulle." So I asked him how we could get in touch with him, and he said, "We don't know. But we think that the station chief here might, because they have some contacts with him that might help." So, I got over the local head of the CIA, who was a different person from the man who was there at the time when I arrived a couple of months before.

The new station chief happened to be a man I had known since my college days, a fellow New Yorker, a fellow by the name of James Hunt. So I said, "I want to meet de Gaulle," and he said, "Sure! That would be wonderful-- that's just right. We have good friends on his staff, that we talk to all the time." So they arranged that the next time de Gaulle came to Paris I would meet de Gaulle. The reason why the American ambassador had no contact was that Caffery had insisted that, after de Gaulle resigned and was out as prime minister or whatever he had been after the war, if they were to see each other, it was up to de Gaulle to come and call on the American ambassador at his Chancery; and de Gaulle said "No, if the American ambassador wants to see me, he comes to see me." And so that was a total break, and it had continued ever since. I thought that was nonsense and said, "Well, I'll go see him." So I went up and saw him during the summer of '53, at the Hotel La Perouse, and met in his small sitting room. He gave me a time about 9:00 at night, so I went after a light supper and we talked until about 10:30 or 11:00. He was very interested. He liked the opportunity to talk very much; he wanted to explain; and he talked about the war and how he'd been a great burden to President Roosevelt. He said that he felt very badly about that because Roosevelt was carrying all the burdens of the world on his shoulder, but he, de Gaulle, was responsible for France, and he had to think of France first, and let Roosevelt think about the world. And that made some difficulties, and he said he felt Roosevelt was a great fellow.

We talked about what was going to happen in the future of France, and he was rather glum about it, because the French were feeling pretty terrible at that time, and he had no idea then that he'd ever come back! We had a very nice talk and I said I'd like to keep in touch with him, and would he permit me to see him when he came to Paris, which was about every six months, and he said certainly. At these times we only talked for about 20 minutes, because it was usually just general conversation.

So we started a relationship then, and then the Embassy staff people expanded their relationship with the Gaullist representatives in the Assembly and the Senate. --Senator Debré is the one I think of. We had a pretty good relationship there, and we knew what they were thinking, and what they felt, and we knew where they were going. That was one of the main reason for our thinking on EDC-- we felt that with the combination of the Gaullists on the right and the communists on the left, there could be not be a majority for the EDC. I also had a very good friend in France who went back to Haut-Brion days, and that was the mayor of Bordeaux, Chaban-Delmas. During that period he was a member of the Gaullist party and was Deputy. Later he headed the government a couple of times and also served as Minister of Defense and as Minister of State. We always talked very frankly, because I'd known him in Bordeaux, and he liked me and liked Americans and so often-- well, not too often, but maybe twice a year - he would come and have lunch with me at the Residence, or we would have supper with him and his wife, which was unusual with French people. So I had a very close relationship with him and he has a very knowledgeable and important member of the Assembly.

One other thing, also, which I think is interesting: from day one, when I got to Paris, and I went to call on people at the Quai d'Orsay, or any other ministry, I never took a note-taker or an interpreter with me. I was always on my own.

Q: Did you then write up your recollections immediately afterwards?

DILLON: Yes, which made me very busy. It had an advantage. In the beginning my French wasn't all that brilliant, but in the Quai d'Orsay, most of the people there understood enough English, so that if I had difficulty I could say what I wanted in English and they could understand it. I could understand their French, so we had perfect communication. But the advantage of that, I think, was very great, since I didn't have a note-taker, then they didn't-- maybe they felt that just wasn't cricket. I don't know if they would do that now, but that was the way it was then. I'd see Bidault and it would be one-on-one, and he'd tell me things he never would have said if he'd had his own note-taker with him and certainly not if I'd have had mine. I think that was very helpful in developing a good and useful relationship.

Q: Getting back to the question of German rearmament. After EDC was defeated, the French had a very close vote on allowing German accession to NATO. Did you have any role in that?

DILLON: Well, we were very strong for it, because of the fact that the turning down of the EDC made this essential. And, it was, we did whatever we could. They knew we felt very strongly about it, at least the leaders. Most of them felt we were right.

Q: There's some evidence in the written record of your thanking Secretary of State Dulles for not commenting on it, immediately before. Had you told him before, to lie low?

DILLON: Well, the French, as one knows, don't like to be told what to do, most people don't. The French react a little more violently to someone telling them publicly what to do, and they're perfectly capable of, even if they want to do something, changing it and doing the opposite if someone tries to tell them what they should do. So I think that probably figures in with that, and I think that Dulles understood that about the French, so if I mentioned that to him, he would have understood. I don't remember that particular thing now, but it sounds reasonable. He would have recognized that. From the United States domestic political point of view it might have been a good thing to tell the French what to do, to show you were doing your job, that you were doing something, but in getting the task done, it was more important to lie low.

Q: The other big issue of the first year you were there, of course, was Vietnam. In 1953/54 came the climax of the French war in Vietnam. What was your role and the Embassy's role in American aid to Vietnam and American participation in the Geneva conference?

DILLON: Not much on the Geneva conference. We hadn't really any role. I think the main thing, where we came in, was telling the French that we wouldn't do some of the things they wanted us to do. The thing I particularly remember is Dien Bien Phu. The French had an idea, that, if we wanted to, we could send half a dozen B-52's from Clark Field, and in one day - one night - they could destroy the encircling Vietnamese forces and the siege would be over. And, of course, I don't know - we hadn't had much experience then, but we've seen pretty clearly since then, that it doesn't work that way. They did ask for help, and we did tell them no. Eisenhower decided not to do it, I guess partly because he thought it would be ineffective.

Q: Did you remember, in the Embassy's view, whether that was the right thing to do, or did that make it more difficult?

DILLON: Well, it made it more difficult for us, but we had no particular military expertise. We did talk to the military people about NATO things, but I don't recall ever asking them about Indochina. We just reported the French requests to Washington, and got the answers and reported then to the French. What I recall most vividly about Dien Bien Phu was the French reaction afterward. Particularly with the more conservative people, there were people that wouldn't talk to us. It was at times unpleasant. It didn't last too long, but for awhile, you'd go to dinner and get in an elevator to go to some apartment, and other people in the elevator would turn their back!

Q: How long did that last?

DILLON: Well, I remember that one occasion That was two days after Dien Bien Phu. I think we felt it for a month or so, and then it died down, but it was very strong, particularly in the more conservative area, with ones who had Army connections, something of that nature. The French felt it very deeply. There were many in France who felt that they had been let down, that we'd had it in our power to very easily prevent this humiliating occurrence. It was just that France felt terribly humiliated.

Q: And what about the Geneva Conference?

DILLON: We didn't have any, as I remember, input in that. I don't even remember anyone at the Embassy being there except possibly someone from the political section.

Q: There's a reference in the documents to your being recommended as an advisor to the Conference, but it doesn't indicate that you were there.

DILLON: No, I didn't go for some reason.

Q: Do you recall being recommended as a member?

DILLON: No, maybe it was in Washington.

Q: Yes, it is in Washington.

DILLON: Yes, because it would seem natural, but for some reason I wasn't asked.

Q: After Geneva, or course, the United States supported the government of Diem, while the French, for a while were still supportive of the Emperor Bao Dai. Did the Embassy in Paris take part in those discussions?

DILLON: I'm sure they did, but not on a very high level. We had an extraordinary Embassy staff, particularly in the political section-- Robert Joyce was the head of it. The number-two fellow in the political section was a man by the name of Bob McBride, who had been in Morocco, but he eventually wound up as our ambassador to Mexico, and did a very good job. And we had another fellow by the name of Martin Herz, who was more of a specialist in labor, but also in the Far East. He later served in an important capacity in one of the Indochina countries and ended as ambassador to Bulgaria. There was another one, Mac Godley, who was ambassador to the Congo and later in Indochina, these were all junior career officers who later rose to top. They made a very capable staff. They had relations with their opposite members, which would be like the head of the Asian Affairs section at the Quai d'Orsay. I, personally only met with the foreign minister or deputy foreign minister and maybe once or twice, with the director general of the foreign office, that was all. I didn't have relations at the lower level.

Q: So you were not a participant in any of these discussion about Diem or Bao Dai?

DILLON: No. I do remember that they went on, but I wasn't directly involved, I remember seeing cables about them. I didn't feel strongly about it myself because I didn't know anything about it.

Q: I see. Maybe we'll talk about this a little later when you were Under Secretary, because there's also some evidence from the documentation, especially with the background you had in economics, of leaning on the Diem government in '59 and '60, to enact some reforms. I wonder if, at that time, could you recall the arguments between the United States and France over Diem?

DILLON: No, I didn't.

Q: Why don't we talk about Suez now, because that was the next big episode of Franco-American dispute. When did you learn of what was happening with the French and Israel?

DILLON: Well, I'd learned ahead of time, because Chaban-Delmas, who was in the government then-- I don't know just what his position was-- came and had lunch with me at the Embassy residence, and told me that this was a very serious situation.

Q: Do you know about when that was?

DILLON: That was, I would say, about the 20th of October, something like that. It was about 10 days or two weeks before our elections.

Q: Yes. The invasion was on the 29th.

DILLON: Yes, if the invasion was on the 29th, it was probably a week before. And he told me that there as going to be an attack if President Eisenhower didn't come out strongly and force Nasser to do whatever it was they wanted at the time. I don't remember exactly what the details were that we were supposed to do, but the effect was to adopt the Anglo-French position rather than the position we had had. He didn't say who would make the attack first, but did say that there was going to be a joint operation with the English.

Q: But if it was going to be with the British, he did not mention the Israeli connection?

DILLON: I don't recall, I am quite sure he did not. He did mention the British, he might have mentioned the Israelis, but I don't really recall that-- if so, it would be in the telegram regarding our meeting. But, this was not going to take place until after the election. And it would take place within two or three days after the election. unless the President, immediately after the election, did what they wanted, made the sort of statement about Egypt that they wanted. So I felt this was something that had to be reported back, on a very private basis. So I sent a telegram, reporting it in detail, to Secretary Dulles through the back channel, which was the CIA channel, and just for him and Allen Dulles. He took it seriously, but not entirely seriously, because Chaban-Delmas was not the head of the government, just a part of it. The action which the government of the United States took as a result of my report was to instruct Ambassador Aldrich to go and see Eden, and ask him directly if any military action was being planned.

Q: Yes.

DILLON: And, of course, the British said "nothing." So then our government had the French saying "yes," the British saying "no," and having been closer, being good friends, they believed the British. That was one reason for the very violent reaction against the British on Dulles' part. But, we did have that one warning which should have prepared us a little more, but I don't think it did.

Q: Did you tell anyone else at the time-- beside Mr. Dulles--was there anyone else in the Embassy, who knew?

DILLON: I'm not sure. I think I probably must have told Achilles, since I always told him everything. I think I would have, and of course I told the CIA station chief there, Jimmy Hunt, who sent the telegram for me, but no more than that.

No one else in the whole Embassy political staff knew; and the same thing in Washington. It would not have circulated in the State Department, except to people Dulles may have personally asked to look at it. He may have shown it to others, but I just don't know. So we did have that advance notice. The next big difference came after it was all over were, when the British were still maintaining that they'd gone in there to separate the Israelis from the Egyptians. In two days, I guess, after it was over, Pineau, then Foreign Minister of France, called me to the Quai d'Orsay and told me the whole story of the French-British operation. So I reported that back home. That could be reported by regular channel. And that made the Department eight times as mad at the British, because the British were still saying "no" and not telling us the truth.

Q: Were you aware at the time of the meeting at Sèvres with Ben-Gurion? You learned about it when it became public, with everyone else?

DILLON: Yes. that is when I learned. Well, and also the British coming back and forth. The top

British government people were meeting with the French, and I wasn't aware of those meetings at all. You got the feeling that something was going on, maybe, but the only real thing was when Chaban-Delmas spoke to me. I never have found out whether he gave me a wrong date on purpose to put us off, thinking we'd find out about it, or whether the date was changed, or whether he didn't know the date.

Q: He may have not known the date, and also.....

DILLON: Well, one of those three things.

Q: The French and British coordination, militarily, apparently was very bad before the war. They were supposed to go in some days after the Israelis went in, but they kept changing their plans. He either didn't know, or was aware of a different plan.

DILLON: I think that probably was what it was. The next thing of interest in the Suez operation was, that while this was going on, when they were in there, moving ahead, I got a call from Mollet, the Prime Minister, from his office, "would I come over right away?" It was about midnight, I guess, maybe later, one o'clock in the morning, when I got there. They had the whole French cabinet in the room, and I was in a sort of reception room outside it, and the prime minister's office was on the other side of the reception room. Mollet came out of the cabinet meeting and showed me a tickertape. It was a Tass announcement that they would use rockets on the British and the French if they didn't behave. It was very threatening and the French took it pretty seriously. They were in contact by phone with the British government, and Mollet asked me "What about the United States government, what would you do, if this happens?" And I said, "Of course, that violates the NATO treaty, we'd be at your side." But he said "Can you get someone in Washington to confirm that right away?", because Washington has been very unfriendly". And I said: "No, I don't see how I can." I don't remember what the time difference was, it was eight or nine o'clock at night in Washington, and there was no way I could see that I could get someone in any quick time in Washington to answer a thing like that. So I said: "We always live up to our treaty obligation, and here it is". Mollet went back in to talk some more to the cabinet members. Then there was a phone call for Mollet. He took the telephone in this anteroom where I was sitting. There were just the two of us there, and he was talking to Eden in London and arguing with him. Eden told him he had decided to stop the operation, and Mollet didn't want him to stop. But the British were in command and Eden said they'd made the decision they were going to stop. Mollet was very discouraged, and I asked him "Where are your forces?" and he said "They're down here almost all the way to (naming some big town) right down in the middle of the Canal. They are just entering that town, Ismailia, or something like that". And I recall very well that in the next day or two we found that the British-French forces weren't within 25 miles of where they thought they were. It was the fog of war, I guess, and the lack of communications, they were just nowhere near there, which has always impressed me a great deal. It seems, since the British shared the same information, that Eden was making his decisions on information that was totally wrong.

Q: Yes. What about the aftermath of Suez? How did that affect U.S.-French relations?

DILLON: Well, I was quite active in it. It was upsetting. As you know, the United States put on an embargo on oil, and it was getting cold at that time of year in France. The oil embargo hit very hard, because there was no fuel and no coal. There was no heat in the Quai d'Orsay. In the foreign minister's office there was a little electric heater, right by his chair like that, so he could get a little warmer, wearing a coat or something like that to keep warm. It was really quite, quite difficult. You'd wear a coat in your office, and it was no fun at all. The French were feeling great resentment. They told us that they'd come clean on this thing immediately, but said we've agreed to get out and we're on our way, but we can't do it overnight. There were just wild to get these damn people off the beach and stop this embargo.

Unfortunately, at the time, Secretary Dulles had taken to his bed for his first cancer operation, and so he was not functioning. The State Department was being run by Herbert Hoover, Jr., and I don't think he had the same judgment.

They were very tough on this and we were urging them to drop this embargo and they wouldn't. Finally I sent a telegram asking if I could come back and see the President, because I thought it was so important. I got word back that yes, the President would see me in Augusta, so I got on a plane and flew back. When I landed in New York and picked up the paper, I found that the embargo was over! I don't know if my coming back had something to do with it, but I've always felt it did. But anyway, I talked to Eisenhower about a number of things, nothing unusual about that, but it was the first time I'd had a one-to-one meeting with him, so it was quite daunting.

Q: Did you bring someone with you to that?

DILLON: No. At that time we had a new Deputy Chief of Mission who was getting ready for the next ambassador-- that's a good habit they have on replacing the DCM six months or so before the arrival of a new political appointee. This fellow was Charlie Yost. I was debriefed when I was in Washington for a little while, and someone from the State Department came around and said: "Would you go on a radio talk show about France and the U.S., and say what's happening?" I said "Do I have to?" and he said it would be good, so I went on the talk show. The questioner asked me there whether the French and the British were pressed into stopping because of the opinion of mankind, or if they were frightened in some way because of the Russians. I said "It's quite clear to me from the conversation with Mollet the night the operation was stopped that they were scared by the official Tass report threatening the use of rockets. They never showed much interest in the opinion of mankind." That was the fact of the matter. I went back to France, and at that time, Mr. Dulles was recovered somewhat, enough to come over. He came over for the December meeting of NATO. The first day he got there, the very next morning in the Paris Herald, there was the headline on front page "Ambassador Dillon Says Suez Was Ended Because of the Russian Threats," not because of the American pressure in the UN. Oh! was he mad. I'd never had anyone quite so mad at me in my life!

Q: What did he say?

DILLON: He said, "Ah, why did you talk like that?" I had no excuse. I shouldn't have said this; it was the truth, but I shouldn't have said the truth. At times, it's best not to talk to the media but just say you don't know anything-- I learned that later, but that was my first lesson, and a very rough one.

We always used to have dinner for the Secretary when he was there, at the Embassy, and we'd toast the different people, and he would say "thank you" to the ambassador, but this time when we had the dinner he never mentioned me or thanked us. It was terrible and most embarrassing for everyone at the dinner. But it didn't last very long-- I don't know, it was maybe 10 days to two weeks later-- I got a telegram from Secretary Dulles asking me if I'd come to Washington to run the economic side of the State Department.

Q: Let's talk about that in a little bit, but I want to talk about Algeria, and then maybe some overall impressions of your career in France. The Algerian War began in '54. What was the Embassy's role in reporting, and your reaction to it?

DILLON: We reported on it as it went, but I had never been there myself. I had gone to Morocco when the French gave them independence, which they did in '55 or '56, while I was still there. They were working toward independence for Tunis and Morocco, and I felt they were trying to behave in pretty responsible way. I think the Embassy as a whole, in the early stages of the troubles in Algeria, was favorable to the French government position, and felt that they should try to work out something, maybe not total independence, but some sort of association or something. We tried to support them, I made some sort of speech in '56 over there that the French took to be very supportive. The French press thought I was crushed pineapple or something, after that! I think it got more difficult in later years. There were some advantages after de Gaulle came in, because he was able to handle that. I don't remember if we ever sent anyone down to Algeria during the time I was there. We were pretty supportive of the French.

Q: Were there other major issues in the four years you were there, other than the ones we've discussed so far?

DILLON: No, I don't think so. One thing I did while I was in France which is probably of some interest: I made a real effort to visit different parts of France, and I found that they were very interested in receiving the American ambassador on an official, local basis. I thought it was very helpful, because you could prepare some sort of a speech which I did with the help of this girl who came to help me with my French. She also worked on speeches. The Embassy would help prepare a French speech, but no matter how good they were, they didn't know how to put it in really good French, and this girl did. She would do that, so that the speeches I delivered were more colloquial, more proper French than a translation from English to French. So they were quite good, and they worked very well. By doing that, in my four years I managed to visit and spend the night in some 65 of the 90 departments of France. I felt that you build up certain understanding and good will that way.

In one particular case, I remember going to visit southwest France, and we went to Toulouse and called on the former president, Auriol, and had a fine visit with him, and then went on Carcassonne, where we were received by and stayed with the prefect of that department. When we got there in the afternoon, he said: "Do you mind if they have a reception for you at the hotel de ville?" Since that was usual, I say, "Well, fine." And then on the way, he said, "By the way, I think you ought to know the entire conseil municipal is communist." So, I was sort of scared. And he said, "Well, that won't make any difference, that's something else again, but they will be very glad to see you and very happy to see you." It was one of the nicest visits I had. The conseil municipal thanked America for helping them during the war, because that was still the thinking of that in those days. We talked with them and had champagne the way they do and then departed. It was totally friendly, and that was the first time they had seen official Americans in God knows when. So, in that way, I think it is helpful to get around the country. It is one of the jobs that an ambassador can do, and I think-- to get more up to date now-- I think it's more important now, because ambassadors have less to do of the actual diplomatic work in the capital wherever that may be, because more of the diplomatic work is done in Washington or by special people that they put on jet planes and send over to do important jobs.

Q: There is one other issue, maybe, that's relevant to the time, and that's the origin of the Common Market. Did your office have anything to do with that, did you?

DILLON: Yes, we were strongly for that. That again was at the time of Mendes, and he agreed to go ahead with it, and of course that was, I think, also certainly one of the fallouts of turning down EDC and ending the war in Indochina in a way that didn't make us very happy. The French wanted to help in other ways they could, and they decided that the Common Market was an alternative. They already had the Coal and Steel Community. That had worked, and the Common Market was an alternative to the EDC. Joining it showed that they were good Europeans.

Q: Did you personally do anything to encourage them?

DILLON: Oh, yes, all the time. I met numerous times with Monnet on that. We didn't talk to him early about the EDC much, but did talk a great deal about the Common Market, and that sort of thing. Of course the lines were pretty well drawn. In the opposition were Gaullists and communists but they were alone and unless they could get some other support it would pass, and it did.

Q: What do you think was your most significant accomplishment as ambassador?

DILLON: I think creating in France and in the French people--government people-- a better understanding of the United States and of American policy, and in setting up a working relationship that was really quite effective and quite good. There's one minor thing that I wouldn't like to call a great occasion, but it was indicative of the fact that in those days the ambassador could do more things that he can now. We had for a long time wanted very badly to get permission to put atomic weapons in Morocco, and the French had to say yes, before we could go ahead. I wish I could remember exactly what it was that the French wanted, but I remember going over and seeing Maurice Schumann in his office at the Quai d'Orsay at his request. He had some request for us, which was something I knew we could do. So I said, "Fine, but how about you helping us out?" He said, "What's that?" and I said, "As you know, we'd like to get atomic bombs into our bases in Morocco." He thought about it a minute or two. They must have talked about it before, because he said, "Okay." I then went back to the Embassy and called General Norstad the Commander of NATO, and of our forces in Europe. I asked him "How quick can you do it?" and he said, "We can do it today." I said, "Go ahead, you have French permission." Since he was the NATO commander, he could do it in no time flat. I sent my report back to the State Department thinking I had made quite a coup, getting what we had wanted for so long. And would you believe it, they blew up all over --everywhere! They said I had no authority to do this, even though it was what they wanted! But it was sort of fun, to be able to accomplish something overnight. It did show that, if you were willing to, at that time an ambassador could do some things that would be inconceivable now.

Q: What was your greatest frustration as ambassador?

DILLON: I think that could be that we were continually having scraps of one sort or another with the Bureau of European Affairs. It wasn't really frustrations, it was a nuisance all the time. I was not frustrated by failing to get the EDC, because I felt that was unrealistic at the time to pin all our hopes on it. When it got turned down, it was terrible, but the end result was getting EEC, the Common Market, and getting Germany into NATO. I'd say another frustration was when I felt so strongly that I came back to see the President about the oil embargo.

Q: Anything you would have done differently?

DILLON: I'd like to make clear that what we did in Paris was a team effort, and I had a very fine team, and we worked together. No one person accomplished this. If you have a good team, you have to work with it. I was glad to be able to, and the Foreign Service team seemed to like working with me.

Q: Would you recommend the Foreign Service career to someone in your family, or recommend it in general?

DILLON: At that time, which was the late '50s --all through the '50s-- I would say, certainly, yes. Today things are a little different and I would hesitate to offer anything. One problem is the terrorist situation, which has totally changed the life of Foreign Service people in many parts of the world.

Q: You had children with you when you were in France? How old were your children?

DILLON: No, they were grown up. But I have a daughter who as married the first year I was there, the summer of '53. She had a child, and then came over there with the child; the grandchild was born in '54 and came to live with us in early '55, so she had a couple years with us.

Q: Let's go back a little bit about U.S.-French relations. Charles de Gaulle returned to power in 1958. Did you have anything to do with advising the President about how that would characterize American-French relations?

DILLON: Yes, because Eisenhower never liked him very much during the war. He'd been a nuisance to Eisenhower, and a nuisance to Roosevelt. Eisenhower had a memory of him as a difficult fellow, but we were perfectly ready to work with him. There were some great advantages, because, almost immediately, he made clear that he was going to settle the Algerian situation and all the other colonial problems of France, which was very good. But the problem arose-- I can't remember exact dates, but not very long after, no more than the next year-- that he proposed the idea of a Triumvirate: France, England and the United States were going to run the world. It would be sort of a private triumvirate. He believed we had a special relationship with England. At the beginning he just wanted to be part of that. We knew in the State Department that that just wouldn't work. You just don't have a triumvirate, and there wasn't any duumvirate, even though the British often talked of a special relationship. We were very friendly with the British but the effects were exaggerated. We were friendly with them, but we certainly didn't try to run things with them. So we turned de Gaulle down, and that was the end. As soon as we did that, he said "Okay, I'll show you." And he proceeded to do so; he pulled out of the NATO command to keep us out of France. There could be no American bases in France, and so forth. But that was his reaction. He was either going to be part of the group that ran the world, or he was going to be by himself.

Q: Did you personally have a view of what would happen when de Gaulle became President in '58?

DILLON: I didn't think he'd ask for this triumvirate, but I was convinced when I came back--that was one of the things I reported-- that the Fourth Republic was very shaky and the chances were that there'd be trouble and some sort of an upheaval which would change the Constitution and the electoral system so they'd have a different kind of government in France. So when De Gaulle came back, it wasn't exactly the way I thought it was going to be, but it didn't surprise me. That was when they came out with the Fifth Republic, which was quite different from the regime at the time of my stay in Paris.

EDWIN MCCAMMON MARTIN
Marshall Plan
Paris (1953-1957)

Director of Development Assistance Committee, OECD
Paris (1968)

Ambassador Edwin McCammon Martin held a variety of positions during his long and distinguished career at the State Department, serving as Assistant Secretary of the Economic Area, Assistant Secretary of the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs, and as ambassador to Argentina. Ambassador Martin was interviewed by Melbourne Spector in 1990.

Q: I'm still not clear about the organization. What was your relation to the Marshall Plan then, when you were in Paris?

MARTIN: It was beginning to phase out by '53. It was pretty much phased down, but there were still aid programs, and we did have a substantial staff under me that represented the U.S. there and was working on the aid programs, and the OECD was an active organization for leadership and coordination of the program. Then we had a substantial defense staff that was working on defense programs. But they did not replace the two ambassadors under the overall ambassador. They just had me as a deputy with the personal rank of minister. I was also, for the first two years, head of the political section. Then when George Perkins replaced Hughes in '55, he thought we ought to have somebody else head the political section, and I was just his deputy.

I think the working relationships everywhere there in this period were quite good. Two of the young people I had on the political staff were, as I mentioned before, Bob Fearey, also a young fellow named Bob Miller, whom we've been close with ever since. He, later on, became ambassador to Malaysia -- we stayed with them when visiting there -- and ambassador to Ivory Coast, and Deputy Chief of the Office of Management at the State Department, and now is vice president of the National Defense Colleges. But there were some really able people there working with us.

I did want to mention a couple of incidents. One of the most important things that I think needs correction is the situation at the time of the Suez crisis. This was '56. Dulles made some unfortunate comments about the British and the French for their intervention in the UAR-Israel war. It was a mistake, what they did, but he publicly denounced them in rather unfortunate language. It was a press hurrah. The general press comment was, "Is NATO collapsing?" From the way the three countries were talking to each other, you might have thought so.

But in that period, we did three things. One, we had two or three times a week what are called informal meetings, at which there are no minutes, and we just talked about the Soviet invasion of Hungary and what our reaction should be. We agreed in that period for the first time on how nuclear missiles could be launched, what the instruction channel was for NATO to launch nuclear missiles, a fairly important subject.

Q: Fairly.

MARTIN: We agreed on a much enlarged additional -- I think to $3 billion infrastructure program, building NATO airfields, NATO communications systems and networks, that sort of thing. So in terms of concrete results, NATO had never been working together at its level more smoothly and effectively.

A second point that I want to make is that in this period, about this time, the French finally rejected the idea of a European Defense Community. This incensed Dulles, who had been since the middle Forties a great protagonist of European unity, before he ever got involved in international affairs, really. There was to be a NATO ministerial meeting, which we had two or three times a year, but this was the big and long one, the December one.

I was called back to work on the speech he was to make there, and met for several hours with him on a Saturday afternoon at his office, and for several hours in his home on Sunday. Each time he took a book from his bookshelf to get a quote to use to persuade the French they should change their minds or else it was a disaster, and the quote was from the same book, The Federalist. The idea that the uniting of the 13 colonies, described in The Federalist in 1780 was comparable to the unification of the independent countries of Europe, struck me as total lack of reality.

There are two other side stories, one which I forgot to mention, but I'll mention it here. One, the difficulty Americans have understanding the French is considerable. During this period of the Suez crisis, the French attitude was as exemplified by a story I heard from a wealthy American woman who had lived in Paris for 15 years, thought she was more French than the French, they wouldn't deliver her a newspaper; if she got in a cab, and the driver found she was an American, he'd force to get her out. They wouldn't deliver coal. She got her best French friend and said, "What is this? I'm more French than the French. Why are they treating me this way?"

"Ah," she said, "you must understand. We French think the English are tradesmen, the Italians are wops, the Germans are Huns, the Spanish are beneath contempt. We don't even like each other. Why should we love Americans?"

My second story is, that shortly after the Germans were admitted to NATO, Ambassador Hughes had one of his luncheon parties, which he had many of and beautifully. My main problem was conveying what he learned from his French friends to the embassy at these social affairs, because he had lots of them and learned quite a bit. I sat next to an American woman of a similar sort, who had lived there a long time, and was wealthy. She had, on her right, the just-arrived German General who was commander of European ground forces based in Fontainebleau, to show that they were really integrated. After the luncheon, she said, "I can never remember names unless I can see them. What is on your card?" So she read it, and then turned to the person on her right, "Oh, he took his card. Who was he?" I told her who he was. "Oh," she said, "that explains it." She had been telling him about a trip she was about to make to visit the antiquities of Egypt, and she had asked him -- I had heard her do this -- did he know Egypt. His reply, very quickly and quietly she said, was, "Only from the maps." He had been Rommel's chief of staff when Rommel was preparing to invade Egypt and never got there. (Laughs) Just very blandly, "Only from the maps."

Q: Speaking of Americans in Paris, when you were there, did you ever know an Ambrose Chambers, "Brose" Chambers?

MARTIN: Yes. He was one of the people I had to fire when I was cutting the staff from 800 to 400, and many of them took it unkindly.

Q: "Brose" was a very good friend of Averell Harriman.

MARTIN: Was he?

Q: Yes, a charming man. Did you ever go to his home?

MARTIN: I don't remember it.

Q: He was in Cole Porter's home.

MARTIN: Yes, I do remember that. I think I was there.

Q: He was Cole Porter's lawyer. When the war was over, Cole never wanted to go back to Paris, and he said, "Please sell my home." So "Brose" said, "Well, I'll buy it," and bought it for $50,000, a beautiful house with a garden and gold bathroom fixtures.

MARTIN: Yes, I think I do remember that. We had a lovely apartment bought with Marshall Plan counterpart at 89 Avenue Kleber, a lovely location, and four or five bedrooms, staff rooms up above on the top floor, and we could give a cocktail party for a couple hundred people, seat 40 people in the dining room. It was very luxurious.

Q: Where was your office located then, in the Talleyrand?

MARTIN: The office was in the Talleyrand, looking out over the Place de la Concorde. But, NATO was quartered then in the old temporary U.N. buildings right at the Place de la Trocadero, just half a block away from an apartment, and that was where the meetings were.

Q: I may have mislead you when I said Trocadero.

MARTIN: Yes, overlooking the Eiffel Tower, right there in sort of temporary buildings. We did decide, before I left, to build a building for ourselves. Security was not easy to maintain there.

I'll just mention one other thing. I haven't mentioned this, I believe. When I had a full FBI clearance for getting the personal rank of minister, as deputy to Ambassador Hughes and Minister to NATO, they checked out a book I had written in 1948 on The Allied Occupation of Japan. I had been asked to do a paper for a conference for the Institute of Pacific Relations. Then they asked me to enlarge it to a book, and it was published by MacMillan and Stanford, relatively short. Bob Fearey wrote the subsequent one carrying it through the peace treaty later on. Mine was first phase; his was second phase.

Well, because it had been published by the Institute of Pacific Relations, which were suspicious, they said, "Secretary Dulles will have to read and agree that you may have the title of Minister."

Time went on and time went on, without Dulles finding time to read the book. Hermann Pollack was the administrative officer for the Bureau of European Affairs and was responsible for personnel reasons. He suggested that I just give up having the personal rank of minister, and I said, "No thank you, I will not." It wasn't until '55, after two years in Paris and several years in Washington, handling top-secret NATO military matters, that I got word that he had approved it.

Q: You had to wait how long?

MARTIN: Two years. Two years in the job. Also, in '55, I was Wristonized and became a Foreign Service officer. At that time, I had been a reserve officer in Paris, and came into the Foreign Service as a Class I officer. So that legitimized things.

MARTIN: Now we get off to Paris. In late '67, the head of AID, Bill Gaud, called me to know if I'd be interested in taking the job of Chairman of DAC (Development Assistance Committee) in Paris. [Gaud was Chairman of the PCC Board in the late '70s.] I had had no contact with DAC at all since helping to set it up, and I didn't know what it was doing, how it was functioning. But I made some calls, got some documents sent down to me, and decided that it was an active affair, and that I would be willing to be nominated. The nomination went in, and I was elected in January of '68. The elections were in January of each year by the governments of the 14 donor countries which were members of DAC. Having been elected Chairman of it in early January, I went to Paris on the 7th to check out the professional and personal situation for our move there, attending a DAC meeting to make a statement about my background and objectives, and then returning to Buenos Aires.

We went to Washington on January 20 for 4 weeks of personal and official business, including a visit to Ottawa to meet their aid staff dealing with DAC. We left on February 18 for Paris "by direct transfer from Buenos Aires" but actually going via Los Angeles, Honolulu, Tokyo, Manila, Sydney, Canberra and Bangkok for get-acquainted visits with both donor and recipients of aid, and to New Delhi for the UNCTAD meeting, the major UN forum for developed-developing country confrontations. We got to Paris March 23.

I don't know that it's necessary to go into a lot of detail about DAC, but I would say that it was, in many respects, the most fun job I had, and a very unique one. [1968 was very much a "getting your feet wet" year. So long as the chairman was a U.S. citizen he received the salary and other benefits--house, staff, car and chauffeur, entertainment allowance--of a Chief of AID Mission in a Class 1 Embassy. The U.S. also paid for a secretary. The OECD paid for the staff of 15-20 professionals.]

Although I had a staff of 15-20 professionals provided by OECD I did not report to the Secretary-General of the OECD in any way. However, I always sought to have a good personal relationship with him and keep him informed of important developments. Sometimes the Secretary-General was unhappy about this independence.

Although I had been a founder of DAC, I had lost touch entirely with it for six years, the transition was facilitated by the fact that my predecessor was Willard Thorp with whom I had, as noted, worked closely when he was head of the E Bureau in the late '40s and early '50s. He gave me lots of good advice.

As a bureaucrat, there were several special advantages. One, my job was to be as critical as I could of the participating governments in order to improve their performance with major help from the professional staff, for which I had no administrative responsibilities. It had a staff director, whose office was next to mine and whose secretary shared an office with my secretary. He was responsible for all administrative matters. I had brought Louise Hughes, my secretary from the E Bureau to ARA to Buenos Aires, then to Paris, but shortly she had family problems and had to leave, but a very good secretary from the OAS succeeded her.

The OECD published each year a 200- 300-page report on the development effort by donors over the Chairman's name, a draft of which the governments could comment on. Although the staff drafted most of it I was responsible for every word in it. It was published in two or three languages and parts translated into a couple more, widely distributed.

I was expected to travel and visit the battlefields which were in the developing world, and the capitals of the DAC members to persuade them to do a better job. The OECD paid my travel expenses, first class, everywhere I went. My wife had to go on my salary, often tourist class, in which she thought the people were more interesting than first class. (Laughs)

RALPH E. LINDSTROM
Economic Financial Officer
Paris (1954-1957)

Ralph E. Lindstrom was born in Minnesota in 1925. Following high school, he entered the U.S. Army, serving in the Office of Naval Intelligence. He received a bachelor's degree in political science from Harvard University in 1950 and entered the Foreign Service in 1952. His career included positions in Kabul, Hong Kong, Oberammergau, Moscow, Nairobi, and Dhahran. This interview was conducted by Charles Stuart Kennedy on October 28, 1994.

LINDSTROM: Then I went to Paris, which was my first choice, and I guess they felt I should be rewarded after that hardship post, and really got a very nice assignment as an economic financial officer in the office of the Treasury attaché. The Treasury rep, Don McGrew, who was famous for his skills in that area, and for being a good training officer. So I worked for him for three years, a very interesting assignment, and my main contacts were in the Ministry of Finance. These were the post-Marshall Plan days, so the French were still somewhat beholden to us and very willing to give out confidential information on the state of their balance of payments, etc., which is one of our higher priorities. At that point, I had never really studied economics to speak of. I had taken one course at Harvard. It was a rather badly taught course in those days and I barely passed the thing, and had no further interest in it. But I learned a lot about the balance of payments from this reporting, and from Don McGrew. So it turned out to be a rather rewarding assignment. I got good ratings on that. And one of the other persons I worked for, and more directly, was Dean Hinton. Both Dean and I were the two FSOs who worked for McGrew and he was quite an able person obviously in his own right, and I got along well with him. He only recently retired, I believe. There were other people around, Harry Bell, who was very good in the economic field too. And Jack Tuthill came in as economic counselor and took a liking to me. We had just had the Wristonization program and we had to take on three very senior people in various parts of the economic section. Jack was getting very annoyed and I didn't like being used as sort of his private spy or anything like that, but sometimes people do that. He said, "You know, I can't understand, what is so-and-so doing, and so-and-so doing? I don't see any written work, or anything like that, why don't you nose around and find out." So I did talk to these people, and they said, "Well, we're still busy unpacking, and getting my wife settled and that kind of thing." So it was quite apparent they weren't doing much of anything that was of any value. He managed to get one of them transferred down to a consulate, I guess it was either Nice or Cannes. I can't remember which one. I guess it was in Nice, and he turned out to be a disaster there. He and his wife got into all sorts of sexual affairs and that kind of thing, and were an embarrassment to the United States. By and large we had a pretty good embassy and Amory Houghton came in as ambassador. He was a political appointee but quite sympathetic, and interested in what we were doing in the economic-financial side, as well as in the political side. In the political side, of course, we were already beginning to have troubles with the French. de Gaulle was in the background and some of our officers were able to talk to him, or his people, from time to time. The NATO relationship was getting somewhat strained, but that hadn't broken apart yet while we were there.

Q: What was your impression of the French bureaucracy in the financial field?

LINDSTROM: First rate. They're the best in the whole world.

Q: Yes, that's the reputation.

LINDSTROM: Again I learned something by dealing with people like Ash Stuart(?), who later rose to the top in the World Bank. That's one of their elite services. They really are marvelous.

Q: How did they treat you as an American, although they might be beholden. I mean you're neophyte to this field and here you are up against world class...

LINDSTROM: They treated me very well. I always had to speak French. My French was by then fairly good, but I know these people spoke English better than I spoke French. But it was always in French which was good practice for me, and enabled me to keep my self respect in dealing with them. That was a very positive experience.

Q: What was the embassy like?

LINDSTROM: It was a huge embassy, and I guess still is, but generally a very supportive and friendly embassy. We had many friends there. Our first couple of years there we were not eligible for embassy housing so we lived out on the open market up in Montmartre, which was very nice and we enjoyed it. Later for financial reasons primarily, we moved to embassy housing on the other side of Paris, because the housing allowance wouldn't really cover too much when you're living outside. McGrew, the Treasury man as I said before, was really top notch, and to his credit they always allowed me as a third secretary to maintain these high level contacts with the French financial officials. They thought my reporting on this was very good, so that was a morale builder too. So often more senior officials try to do it all themselves.

Q: So you didn't feel, as sometimes one does, lost in the embassy?

LINDSTROM: No, I don't think I did at all looking back on it now.

Q: There's this traditional thing about saying the French are very unfriendly. Did you find that speaking French?

LINDSTROM: No, I never did, and never have. I never found this to be a problem. But the French do like to use their own language certainly in the diplomatic level, and I don't see anything wrong with that. We tend to use English on the diplomatic level in our country.

ROBERT H. MILLER
U.S. Delegation to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization
Paris (1954-1957)

Paris Peace Talks (Vietnam)
Paris (1968-1971)

Ambassador Robert H. Miller was born in Port Angeles, Washington in 1927. He joined the Foreign Service in 1956. His career included positions in France and Vietnam, and ambassadorships to Malaysia and the Ivory Coast. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1990.

Q: You then moved over to Paris still in NATO affairs.

MILLER: That's right. I went on a Foreign Service Reserve appointment to the US Delegation to NATO, which in those days was still in Paris, and was low man on the totem pole -- 3rd Secretary -- in the political section there.

Q: This was from 1954 to 1957.

MILLER: Yes. And it was while I was there in that Delegation that I was "Wristonized", the next career uncertainty I -- and many colleagues -- faced.

Q: Wristonized being the program...

MILLER: Henry Wriston, a former president of Brown University, had been asked by President Eisenhower to study the State Department -- the first of a number of such studies after the war -- to ensure that its organization and personnel systems were adequate to the immense challenges of the post-war world and the unprecedented position of leadership in which the United States found itself. Among other things, the Wriston Committee found that Foreign Service officers' long service abroad caused them to lose touch with the country they represented, while the civil servants in the Department were making policy analyses and recommendations without having any contact with foreign governments and societies. Wriston thus found that both services were working in their respective vacuums. He therefore recommended their amalgamation into one Foreign Service in which officers would be required to serve both at home and abroad.

As you might imagine, the recommendation, which was accepted by the Administration, caused great uncertainty and dislocation for both the Foreign Service and the Civil Service -- in my own case, the third time in the first five years of my career. Foreign Service officers, who regarded themselves as members of an elite service selected by a rigorous examination process, resented opening the floodgates to the "hoi polloi" of the Civil Service. Many civil servants, who by personal choice or family situation preferred working in Washington, faced the major disruption of overseas service if they wanted to continue their careers with the State Department.

Q: What were the issues facing NATO at the time you were there?

MILLER: Well, two big issues were hot in NATO while I was in Paris. One was how West Germany was going to be integrated. When I arrived in Paris in the summer of 1954, the French National Assembly had just turned down the European Defense Community concept. That was the point at which John Foster Dulles threatened an agonizing reappraisal of all of our policy. But very quickly the idea was developed, and I don't recall whether it was a French idea, German or British idea or our own, but it was one that we accepted very quickly, which was to bring West Germany actually into NATO as a full member under certain safeguards: that it would not have nuclear weapons, it would not have the so-called ABC weapons -- atomic, biological or chemical weapons, and that it would have a force ceiling of twelve divisions or something like that. But that was the one big issue -- how to get West Germany integrated into the NATO structure. After the fall of the EDC idea everybody rapidly coalesced around the idea of actually bringing Germany in as a member of NATO.

The other big issue, and that was the issue I was working on, was the NATO annual review of defense programs. Every NATO member was questioned by its peers on why it couldn't do more in terms of contributing forces to the NATO military structure -- the Supreme Headquarters, Allied Powers Europe (SHAPE).

It was the buildup of NATO forces and the integration of Germany into NATO that were the two big issues of NATO at the time.

Q: Again from your point of view, were there any countries that seemed to be quite delinquent or very difficult to deal with from the American delegation point of view?

MILLER: France was always difficult to deal with. It was winding down its war in Indochina and getting deeply involved in the Algerian conflict. So it had a lot of problems which created issues within NATO, both with respect to its force contribution and kind of strings it was insisting on with respect to force contributions. For example, it was demanding that we provide it military and economic assistance in Indochina as a price for its cooperation and force buildup in NATO. It also was very prickly on the subject of the use of French territory by foreign (US) forces. NATO Headquarters, both military and civilian, were on French territory at the time. But also the logistics lines of communications and oil pipelines were being built across French territory. France was insisting on much more unilateral control over those multilateral structures than most of the rest of us felt they should have in a multilateral alliance. So, I think France was probably the most difficult.

ELIZABETH A. BURTON
Coordinating Committee (COCOM)

Paris (1954-1958)

Elizabeth Burton grew up in Washington, DC. After graduating from Sarah Lawrence College in 1941, she worked for the Board of Economic Warfare until the end of World War II. She then worked as a statistician for the Marshall Plan in France. Throughout her career she also worked for AID, NATO and OPIC. She was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1998.

BURTON: I think around '54, yes. If they needed a job done, they would look around in Paris. It was less expensive, I guess, to get somebody in Paris, if they could find them, than it was to recruit from the United States. Then I had an offer of a very good job over in the Coordinating Committee, which was a secret committee at that point. It was located in an old hotel off the Faubourg Saint-Honoré, with a very small staff. It was a committee of the war allies to keep strategic materials from getting to the Sino-Soviet bloc. We set up a system of licenses and checkpoints and got the other governments to cooperate with us. So that if we had a notice of a shipment coming in that might have been transshipped in Rotterdam or Godinya, we'd notify the Dutch government and warn them about it, and maybe they'd catch it, and maybe they wouldn't. We acted as the regional center to disseminate this information to the embassies, and they, in turn, would notify the cooperating governments to stop these shipments if they could. They would go down and check the ships and check their manifests, and sometimes they stopped them, and sometimes they'd already gone.

Q: When you're talking about stopping shipments, what are we talking about?

BURTON: Ball bearings, for instance, or copper rod, at that point, and theodolites were another one. I had a couple of CIA people working for me that were quite remarkable. One of them could read Russian upside down about nine feet away. He had perfect eyesight. I'd say, "There's a report of some ball bearings coming in to Rotterdam headed for diversion. Why don't you go out and see what you can find?" And he'd come back the next day and say, "They're gone; they're already off."

Q: These were efforts by the Soviet Union to get these things.

BURTON: Yes, they wanted the things they were missing. There were people, just like the drug trade, that were in diversion activities. We worked very closely with the drug people, actually, because usually people that are in one underhanded business are in the other, too.

Q: Was there much in the way of enforcement, if they would catch them?

BURTON: Yes, yes, a lot, but it was done by the local governments. For instance, I can remember my boss, Colonel Brown, going to Switzerland and intercepting a railroad shipment of uranium sulfate, the stuff you make bombs out of. He came back with a little vial of this "curry powder," and he said, "Betty, you're going back to Washington for Christmas. Will you take this with you and turn it over to X, Y, and Z." I said, "Sure," and I popped it into my pocketbook. I didn't think anything about it, and came home and turned it over to the people. Apparently, when they got it, the Geiger counter went through the ceiling. They never caught me at all coming into the United States through Customs. They caught someone else with some radium on their watch, but they didn't catch me.

Q: Were there any particular areas where the system was particularly good at cutting out things, and other ones where you felt that there was considerable leakage?

BURTON: That's hard to remember. The leakage was through Rotterdam and Godinya, mainly, the shipments there. And then there were leakages in Switzerland, shipments that were headed for Austria. I don't know whether it was leakage, I wouldn't say that. I'd just say that they would get through Switzerland to Austria. And if they got into the Soviet bloc in Austria, they were gone, too. We had to catch it before they got there. So we had to have this advice ahead of time. It was a very elaborate check system of intelligence coming in.

Q: What was it called, the apparatus? Was it COCOM?

BURTON: Yes. It was short for Coordinating Committee. That's all it was called. And then there was the section that dealt with the committee itself, who sat in the sessions and decided, for instance, what would be banned from going and what would be on the forbidden lists. And then they would turn it over to us in the enforcement operation to see that it didn't get diverted.

Q: What was the secrecy about this?

BURTON: This was right after the war, after all, and I think they just didn't want the Soviets to know that they were getting together and keeping them from getting this stuff (not officially, anyway), and that they were cooperating so successfully, particularly with countries like Sweden and Austria that had supplied the Soviets with ball bearings. After all those years, suddenly they were not cooperating. Later on, we found that they ruined their markets and caused the Soviet Bloc to become self-sufficient, so this wasn't a very good idea.

Q: How did you get your intelligence? Where was it coming from?

BURTON: It's hard for me to remember. I just remember we used to get cables in. I would dare say it was CIA that was informing us. Also, the drug people, who were mainly operating out of Italy. We worked together; they would give us information, and we'd give them ours. There were, for instance, big operations in Vaduz, Liechtenstein, and places like that. There were groups of people that we knew were doing this, so that if they applied for an export license, let's say, out of New York, to ship copper, it would probably go automatically to CIA. The CIA would check up, and if these people were the people from Vaduz, they'd probably let us know, and say it's on its way, better watch out. I think that's probably how it worked, because we worked very closely with CIA.

Q: What was the feeling about Sweden? This was a major producer of things, and it was neutral.

BURTON: I can't remember any particular feeling about it. I do know that we ruined their ball-bearing export market to the Soviets, which was unfortunate for them.

Q: You were doing this until about when?

BURTON: Until 1958, I think. Then I decided I should come home. I'd missed too many boats, and I decided I needed to come home.

Q: In 1956, did the Hungarian Revolution intrude at all?

BURTON: Not in the slightest. The Suez situation certainly intruded on us personally, because everybody was scared to death. The only other big scare was the blockade of Berlin. General Rea O'Hare, who was the U.S. military attaché in Paris, was a close personal friend, and he was giving me instructions what to do and where to go to get out right away.

Q: The Hungarian Revolution and Suez were both around October.

BURTON: Suez made a lot of difference.

Q: What was the feeling, that Suez might be the beginning of something?

BURTON: Yes, Suez was a big business. Everyone was scared of the Suez situation. It was really scary. There was a threat of oil being cut off and all that, for France, England, everywhere.

Q: Were you noticing, as time was moving on during the '50s, a less-than-cordial reception of our efforts by the French?

BURTON: Life became more difficult and more expensive during the 10 years I was there. I suddenly realized what I was paying for lunch every day. It wasn't a question of getting a little snack somewhere. It was $10 to go out and have a little of this and that and the other thing. And the parking became unspeakable. You had to have special arrangements for parking. Before that, you could park anywhere. The availability of everything became easier. Living there was very cheap. I had wonderful, wonderful apartments to live in, and I paid $60 a month. And I had maid service for nothing that pleated my nightgowns and one thing and another. We lived high on the hog for nothing, nothing. I was living on a very small salary, and I didn't get any help from home. I was living very well, indeed.

Of some interest, the ready-to-wear (prêt-à-porter) was prohibitively expensive or did not fit Americans. Thus, everything that went on your back had to be made to order: garments, shoes, hats, lingerie. Imagine today fitting a nightgown! Stockings were available from the PX. My copiest made me a dress per season from the current collections. The Maisons de Couture (fashion houses) would lend you a dress overnight to wear to a party.

Q: You decided to go home when?

BURTON: About '58, I think it was. My parents came over, and I came home with them in the fall.

Q: In '58, what were you up to?

BURTON: Nothing. I didn't know what I was going to do. I just came back here with the idea of transferring over to something here in Washington, which is what I did.

Q: You mentioned that you'd been brought in to the Foreign Service under the Wriston program.

BURTON: Yes, that was by accident. I really didn't know what was happening to me. I was just living from day to day and enjoying myself, enjoying my work and my life. Paris in the '50s was an enchantment. It was just marvelous living there.

Q: Were you picking up any impressions, towards the end when you left, of De Gaulle?

BURTON: None. No. I wasn't much concerned. I never could understand French politics, to begin with. Just the surface repercussions. He was concerned with the glory of France and keeping it there. One can't blame him. He was a tremendous unifying element.

LUCIUS D. BATTLE
Deputy Executive Director, North Atlantic Treaty Organization
Paris (1955-1956)

Ambassador Lucius D. Battle was born in Georgia in 1909. He received a bachelor's degree from the University of Florida in 1939 and then served in the Navy until the end of World War II. Ambassador Battle's Foreign Service career included positions in Denmark, France, and Washington, DC, and an ambassadorship to Egypt. This interview was conducted by Dayton Mak in 1990.

BATTLE: Then I went to Paris for a year as part of the NATO staff. We had a lovely apartment overlooking the Eiffel Tower. But I had the same problem in NATO as I had in Denmark. I was the Deputy Executive Director, but I didn't have enough to do. I had known Lord Ismay slightly; he wanted a senior American in NATO. Bob Barnes was moving on; he had been the senior American on his staff. I had been requested twice for some jobs in the Department, but personnel had insisted in each occasions that it be approved by Dulles because I had been so close to Acheson. That infuriated me when I heard about these events. I never felt that I had any partisan political connections. I was a Democrat, but that never had anything to do with my appointments. I worked for Acheson as a Civil Servant and I considered myself as a career appointee.

After a while in Paris, I got a letter from Carl Humelsine, who by then had become the President of the Williamsburg Foundation saying that he was going to London for an award ceremony for Churchill -- the Williamsburg Award. So I went to London and told them that I didn't really have a job and that I wouldn't stay in Paris just to be in Paris. Just before this event, Dean and Alice Acheson had come to Paris and stayed with us in our apartment for five days. We had a marvelous time. We gave a cocktail party in their honor to which Lord Ismay and others came. I had told Acheson that I was not occupied. So Dean asked Lord Ismay how I was getting along. Lord Ismay replied that I was absolutely indispensable. He was impressed by the fact that I was in the office before he came in and was there when he left at night. He thought that I worked too hard. So Acheson came back to me and said: "I don't understand what you are complaining about". So I said: "Dean, in the first place, Lord Ismay comes to work at 10:30 in the morning, then goes out to lunch a one, then has a little snooze, returns to the office about 4:30 and then stays another half an hour. So I am there before him and don't leave until after he does. That is why Lord Ismay thinks I work so hard, but I don't really!".

That really became a problem. So I left the Service and went to work for the Williamsburg Foundation for four and half years. It was a big change, but a very pleasant one. But I was too young to be doing that. I was only in my mid-thirties at that point. I had a few chances to leave and do other things, but I enjoyed Williamsburg. I became very fond of the Rockefellers -- Winthrop, for example. I used to go to stay at his estate in Little Rock. I was not totally unhappy, but I still thought I was not at the center of action. Nothing much was happening in my life and I didn't like that. I was in Williamsburg until the Kennedy era started.

I forgot exactly what started the next career move. I returned to the Department as Executive Secretary in 1961 and promised to stay there for at least a year. I was pledged to get Dean Rusk going and then I planned to move to something else. I re-Wristonized back into the Foreign Service. I had decided that I was going to stay in the Service. So George Ball asked me what job I would be interested in. I told him I would like to be the Assistant Secretary for Cultural Affairs which was then being vacated. That was the only job which I requested in all my years. Ball said I could have Morocco as ambassador, but I didn't want to leave Washington at that time. He asked whether I would be interested in the Deputy Administrator job in AID or the Deputy Under Secretary for Management job in State (that is now the Under Secretary for Management position). Ball told me that I could have any of the ones he mentioned. I told him that I would prefer Cultural Affairs. He thought I was a little wacky. It was more than just culture; Jack Kennedy was the President and it looked very exciting. So I went to CU and stayed there for two years.

ALAN FISHER
Motion Picture Officer, USIS
Paris (1955-1957)

Alan Fisher was born in Brooklyn, New York in 1913. He served as a photographer for Nelson Rockefeller's Inter-American Affairs program and as a war correspondent in Italy and Brazil. While most of Mr. Fisher's career was spent in Brazil, he also served in France and Vietnam. He was interviewed by G. Lewis Schmidt in 1989.

Q: Was Bill Clark by that time head of the European operation?

FISHER: Yes.

Q: So he transferred you to Paris when he became head of the European operation.

FISHER: Yes, with Bill Cody. I never did collect the ten bucks. (Laughs) But I was all set to go. We were all going by ship when I got a call. It was a direct transfer. I got a call from Turner Shelton, saying he wanted to see me in Washington first, so I had to fly up. Then I spent a couple of days in Washington, then flew over and met Florence and Stephanie when they arrived by boat train from Nice.

I had a problem in Paris, in that Bill O'Brien -- do you remember Bill O'Brien? Bill O'Brien was a wonderful Boston Irishman who was Jack Conolly's assistant in New York. Jack Conolly was a wonderful, wonderful person. I worked for Jack in New York during the time that we had a RIF. I left that out, I guess, didn't I?

Q: Let's fix the date on which you transferred to Paris.

FISHER: I transferred to Paris in June of 1955.

Q: Just as the other side of this tape ended, you made a couple of remarks that I think were probably cut off. Would you repeat them now so that we can pick up the sequence?

FISHER: Turner wanted me to go to Paris as motion picture officer because he had problems there. It seems that Bill O'Brien had been motion picture officer there, and Bill was a wonderful, burly type. He had worked with Jack Conolly, who had been head of -- I guess it was Pathe Newsreel in Paris, when talkies first came in. Jack was a wonderful, wonderful person. Bill O'Brien had been one of his contact men. A newsreel contact man was personality plus, always, they all were. Bill O'Brien had been motion picture officer, and they had a pretty sophisticated staff in Paris that really were very snobbish. Bill tried to cut through it and they cut him down. So Bill left and I arrived.

Turner said to me, "When you get to Paris, you look over that situation and you do whatever you think you have to do. Talk to Bill Cody about it, he knows all about it." So I talked with Bill Cody, who was PAO then.

Q: Was this the American staff?

FISHER: The American staff was cutting him [Bill O'Brien] down. They could be very snobbish. They were all Francophiles, and they all spoke French well. If someone came along who didn't speak it well, they really had it in for him. All their staff meetings were conducted in French.

Q: This was the part of the thing that enraged Tom Sorensen when he was taking off after the European contingent.

FISHER: Yes. Hal Kaplan was there. He was information officer. Keith Bowman was deputy. Then John Mowinckel -- I can't remember whether it was Keith Bowman or John Mowinckel followed, but at any rate, I talked with Bill Cody, and he said, "There's a mess here." I'll just repeat, in effect, "You do whatever you think you have to do, that's all."

I found the situation whereby they had a contract with a French film distributor who was paid $40,000 a year to distribute USIS 16-millimeter films in French, and he distributed them very much the same as we distributed them in Latin America, only he charged for them. So he was getting money from us, and he was charging admission from the French farmers and rural people, where they were showing the films, something like 50 cents admission to these things. It went against everything that I had ever learned about how to distribute our informational films. I couldn't understand why we were paying him $40,000 a year for a contract. The reports that came in were very inflated, I could see that by looking at them. Finally, after six months or so, I just said, "I'm going to cancel your contract." The guy was devastated. I said, "I don't see why we should pay you." Well, he agreed with me and still kept using the films, and we just saved 40,000 bucks a year. But that's the way they operated, because they still had the old ECA mentality, where they paid for everything. It was a very interesting situation.

This was a Frenchman who happened to be cutting off the rind of his Camembert cheese at the time I told him of this decision, and he was so agitated, he ate the rest of it with the rind and all. (Laughs)

In Paris, it was pretty much of a set operation, distribution. I did meet a couple of film producers there. One, a member of my staff, was Philippe de Fels, who was my chief local. He brought in a friend of his one day and he said, "Monsieur Fisher, I would like you to meet my friend Jean Claude Bourdier."

So I said, "Oh, very nice to meet you, Jean Claude."

And he said, "Monsieur Fisher, you will have to excuse me because I do not speak English very well."

So my assistant then said, "No, Jean Claude does not speak English very well."

So Jean Claude said, "I do not speak English very well." (Laughs) I'll never forget that one! He stood corrected, wrongly.

Then I met an American film producer by the name of Tom Rowe, Thomas L. Rowe, who proposed that we do a film on the American Ballet which was coming to Paris. I made a proposal which Turner Shelton bought, and Tom and Florence and I went to Berlin to see the American Ballet Theater there and set up the arrangements for Paris, came back, and when they came to Paris, Tom was all set. We had a contract with them, and did a very nice film on the American Ballet Theater's Western Symphony.

Mrs. Fisher: The music was by Hershey Kaye.

FISHER: Hershey Kaye. A very, very good film which I'm sure is still in the library. We did another film in Paris on Kid Orry, a wonderful old-time trombone player in the early days. It was a very sensitive film that Tom did, and that then became a good film within the Agency. We had an awful lot of films in the Agency that were pretty dull.

Q: Yes, we did.

FISHER: And these two films really were entertainment films. Kid Orry was a black that went way back to, I guess, Kid Oliver and the old New Orleans days. A very interesting film.

Q: After you canceled the contract with this Frenchman who was distributing your films, did you then operate your own mobile units, or how did you get your stuff out into the countryside?

FISHER: He operated mobile units. He still continued. He took our films free.

Q: I see.

FISHER: He did it without pay.

Q: Without being paid, and just got his money by charging the people who saw the pictures.

FISHER: Sure. It was a very interesting situation. We had been paying and hadn't needed that.

After I'd been there about a year or so, 1956, then in '57, I guess it was, Bill Cody asked me whether I would take over the supervision of the print shop and the photography operation. We were doing a lot of work in both. We had a big print shop. I had had a little experience in it because Florence's father, my father-in-law, had an offset printing plant in Los Angeles, and we used to go back there on leave. It had always interested me. I had just a smattering of experience, and Bill asked me if I would take it over. I said, "Yeah, but I'll have to learn a lot about it." That was in addition to my regular duties.

So just about that time, Turner sent a telegram saying I was needed in Saigon because Charlie Mertz was leaving Saigon and they needed someone to come in and work that end of it.

JAMES F. LEONARD
Consular Officer, North Atlantic Treaty Organization
Paris (1955-1957)

James F. Leonard was born in Pennsylvania in 1920. He received a bachelor's degree from Princeton University and served in the U.S. Army from 1942-1946. Mr. Leonard entered the Foreign Service in 1948. His career included positions in China (Taiwan), France, Russia, and Syria. This interview was conducted by Warren Unna on March 10, 1993.

Q: Now this is the period that US troops were sent to stay in Europe when you were in NATO in Paris then?

LEONARD: You know, I think they must already have been there, because by '55 when I got to Paris because I don't recall any debate over that. I'm pretty sure. When I arrived in NATO they had just had their fifth anniversary, but I don't think US troops, in fact, ever completely left Europe.

Q: I see.

LEONARD: I think they remained there in Germany and they simply changed roles from being occupation forces to being NATO forces as Germany became independent.

Q: Now, you mentioned the Germans, and I once was told that the one person John Foster Dulles feared was Franz Joseph Strauss. He really distrusted him. Did he come into the picture when you were in Paris in NATO then?

LEONARD: Not at all. I came to have a very similar feeling about him much later when I was doing arms control or even actually even before that when I was working on related matters in the State Department. But by that time we were into the '60s. In this period in the '50s, I don't think I understood anything of German politics. It consisted of Mr. Adenauer, and that was that. I doubt if I could have identified Franz Joseph Strauss for anybody.

Q: He became Defense Minister eventually, didn't he?

LEONARD: He did. But my focus was really very much on the Soviet Union, and to a lesser degree on Eastern Europe. We had the Hungarian revolt in '56, while I was in NATO. We had the double crisis of Hungary and Suez. You know meetings around the clock and all that sort of thing, but of course no action of any kind.

Q: Was there within the US contingent dismay with Eden and dismay with France at this time, and feeling that ...?

LEONARD: One of my most vivid memories is the dismay with Mr. Eden on the part of the senior Brit in the Secretariat. He was a British Naval Captain, Lord Coleridge who was given to extremely strong language, British Naval language. He talked about the British government. He was after all an international civil servant. He was not a British representative there, but he, like all Brits in NATO thought that the Suez thing was just the most awful disaster and that the conniving with the French and the Israelis over that was utterly unprincipled and sick even. So we realized it was a controversial question. But NATO was not the focus of that, and in fact NATO was not a focus on Hungary either. There was every effort made to simply keep everything calm and business as usual and not show any signs of panic or any intention to make a move of any kind.

Q: So the annoyance on the part of the US vis a vis France and Israel and Britain didn't disturb NATO. That alliance stuck?

LEONARD: That stuck, yes. Our normal working relationships went right on, and I really don't know whether the ... I'm sure the British Ambassador kept a very straight face on all of this. You know I have no idea whether he would in talking with the American Ambassador acknowledge that this was a pretty dumb thing that they had done. But it was so evident that this whole action had simply infuriated President Eisenhower that further comment was unnecessary. It was just a disastrous miscalculation on the part of the British and compounded of course by the fact that it gave the Russians cover for what they were doing in Hungary.

ALBERT STOFFEL
Economic Officer
Paris (1955-1957)

Albert Stoffel was born and raised in Rochester, New York. He joined the Foreign Service in 1947. His career included positions in Vietnam, Canada, Germany, and France. Mr. Stoffel was interviewed by Thomas Dunnigan in 1994.

Q: You've already mentioned that your next post was Paris where you were engaged in export control. Were you assigned to the embassy or to another one of our organizations there?

STOFFEL: To the embassy. The COCOM people, who were nearby, I forget the name of their building, they ran the United States membership in COCOM, the coordinating committee. The purpose of which was to prevent strategic goods from getting to the other side of the Iron Curtain.

My particular job was export controls in France. In other words, to make sure that American goods going to France were not diverted.

Q: Re-exported.

STOFFEL: What I decided to do, more than react to just what was called to my attention in that field. I arranged to get manifests for American shipping lines from the United States to France.

On one occasion I recognized some initials. There were two sets of initials on a case of automobile truck parts. I recognized one set of initials as belonging to an American owned company in Paris. I didn't know what the other initials were so I found out.

I called the American that I knew who had the parts business. He told me who the other initials were. And to make a long story short, we discovered that these truck parts were being diverted to communist China.

That's the kind of work I did there.

Q: Did the French resent your being there?

STOFFEL: No, I don't think so. I had very good relations with the Quai D'Orsay. There was a man by the name of Noel Maier, who was their representative on COCOM. We became good friends. Our relations -- I know of no difficulties arising.

Q: Presumably, you worked closely with our mission to COCOM.

STOFFEL: Oh yes, absolutely.

Another thing I did. In this case, I once took this embassy car up to this American company and took all their records back to the embassy to go through them. In the course of that, we discovered the extent to which this diversion was taking place.

MANUEL ABRAMS
USRO Director of Economic Affairs
Paris (1955-1958)

Manuel Abrams was born in Pennsylvania in 1919, and graduated from the City College of New York in 1939. His career has included postings in Frankfurt, Paris, The Hague, Rome, Brussels and Geneva. Mr. Abrams was interviewed in 1990 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: I have you going to going to Paris, the USRO Director of the Economic Division, from 1955-58.

ABRAMS: That's right.

Q: What was USRO and what was it doing and what were you doing?

ABRAMS: USRO had originally been OSR. It was the regional organization based in Paris, for the Marshall Plan. USRO was the mission to the OEEC, the Office of European Economic Cooperation, later transformed to the OECD. In the OEEC, we were an associate member, in the OECD, we are full members. My job was to review the economies of the member countries and to report on developments in the U.S. economy.

Q: Which at that time were

ABRAMS: All the Western European countries were members of the OEEC, as well as Greece and Turkey. At the present time in the OECD, there are countries from outside Europe, but the only countries from outside Europe at the OEEC, were two associate members, Canada and the US.

Q: Who was the head of this program in Paris?

ABRAMS: At that time we had the tradition of political appointees, generally very short term. There were two directors in the period 1955-8: Fred Payne, an investment banker from New York, and John McCarthy, a businessman.

Q: When you were there did these political appointees play much of a role or were they just sort of birds of passing by?

ABRAMS: No, not a great role. When I first arrived there, the deputy, who was also non-career but a professional economist, played a big role.

Q: Who was that?

ABRAMS: Warren Shearer, professor from Indiana.

Q: How did you see Europe at this time?

ABRAMS: I was there from 1955 to 1958. It was a period when Europe was progressing very well economically except for a brief but sharp setback, the Suez Crisis. Its political significance, which I think has not been fully appreciated, was much greater.

Q: What were the repercussions on Europe?

ABRAMS: Interestingly, it split Britain down the middle, whereas it united France. There was no significant opposition in France to the French government's role in Suez. The US, after its initial highly negative reaction, played the role of faithful ally and agreed to supply the petroleum deficiencies. We made a commitment and we carried it through.

The important effect was on the French, particularly Gallist, thinking about NATO. Our public disapproved of our allies' (Britain and France) action was, in my view, a major factor in de Gaulle's later decision to withdraw from NATO's military army and to expel NATO institutions from France.

Q: It was the first of the petroleum shocks.

ABRAMS: This was a small petroleum shock, because it came at a time when we had a surplus of petroleum.

Q: Were you part of an international group?

ABRAMS: Yes, the Economic Committee where I was the US representative. This is where we discussed the economic effects of Suez. Every European representative made the most dire predictions. Initially we were without instructions but we tried to convince them that they were exaggerating the problem. Then, as I indicated earlier, we came to their assistance.

Q: Did you see different splits in the committee, political ones?

ABRAMS: No. The Europeans all sounded pretty much alike on that. It is not surprising that after the trauma of 1939-45, pessimism remained.

There was a study done at the time by a British economist named Mac Dougall which predicted that there would be a dollar shortage to the end of time. It happened to appear at the time of the Suez crisis and was widely accepted in Europe for a while. We still had a balance of payments surplus when the study appeared, but, as is well known, have run a deficit since 1957 or '58.

Q: Economists are like psychologists, you just pick the kind of answer you want and you can get it. Looking at it, your situation, you were paid by State or AID, how did you view Treasury?

ABRAMS: The Treasury had of course different interests from the Department of State or AID. The Treasury was more concerned with the US economy than the State Department was. The Treasury role I became more conscious of when I came back to Washington.

As far as the instructions went, I was not all that aware of what the problems with Treasury were.

Q: So Treasury wasn't something to get around?

ABRAMS: Not at the time, though it was true later on. Certainly.

Q: How was the backing from Washington?

ABRAMS: It was rather uncomfortable during the brief period when there were no instructions immediately after Suez. On the whole, Washington did very well in providing us with guidance.

Q: Did you feel any push for American trade then or did we have different goals?

ABRAMS: We didn't share the extreme views of the British economist I mentioned. We were not aware that we were about to be in deficit on our balance of payments. We even wanted to restrain our exports in order to allow the European countries to develop theirs. To some extent, we also overstated the dollar problem, and we were not actively pushing our commercial interests. Except in specific items where there was great political pressure from Washington. For example, we always pushed agriculture and we were always competitive in agriculture. But we agreed to permit the European countries to discriminate against US exports, something that would seem unthinkable now. We did that in the interest of the development of the European economies. Discriminate in the sense that they could have lower tariff barriers for trade within Europe but not for exports from outside Europe, including the US. Again there was the usual lag in thinking. It finally became clear in the latter part of the fifties that there was no longer justification for this discrimination, nor a justification for the inconvertibility of the European currencies. It required as much effort to convince the Europeans to make their currencies convertible as to convince them that they no longer needed US aid.

Q: How was the Soviet menace used in economic terms?

ABRAMS: In terms of the Europeans having to provide the resources for their own military buildup as part of NATO.

Q: What was the overriding principle. Did you see the development of the European economy as the best thing or was it the European economy in order to keep the Soviets out?

ABRAMS: The policy underpinning what we were doing was the belief that European unity, which began with the Coal-Steel Community would provide the basis for the resistance to possible Soviet encroachment. At the same time, this was very important in the thinking at the time in the early post war period, was that it would tie Germany to the West. There was still the memory of what had happened after the first world war, when the Germans made deals with the Soviets. So those two aspects, the defense of the West against the Soviets and the German question have played a big role in our support for European unity. While all this was going on, we had the start of European Coal-Steel Community and the negotiations which led in 1958 to the formation of the EEC.

Q: Anything else in the Paris period?

ABRAMS: No, the EEC was the last of the important economic events in the Paris period.

Q: As an economist, how did you feel about the EEC.

ABRAMS: I largely saw it as a good thing. Now I would be a little more qualified about it. This is where agencies like Treasury didn't fully agree. They were concerned about setting up an organization that would free trade among the member countries but maintain barriers against outside countries. They were concerned about the effect on the US. We in the State Department agreed that this was the case, but we considered the economic price was worth paying for the political and military advantages. I think we should have been a little more wary about the effect this would have on the US. Although I don't think it would have made any great difference as a matter of fact.

Q: Were the people in the mission pretty much agreed to it or were they doing it under instructions?

ABRAMS: Here too, the degree of enthusiasm depended on where you were located. This has always been true. In USRO there was somewhat less enthusiasm for the EEC than you would have found in some other organizations. We were in part influenced by the views of the countries who were not going to be members of the EEC.

At the start there was just six members and a number of the other European countries formed another organization, EFTA, for which we in USRO had more sympathy than the State Department in Washington did. But it was a small difference really.

L. DEAN BROWN
Internal Affairs
Paris (1955-1958)

Ambassador L. Dean Brown entered the Foreign Service in 1946 after serving in the Army during World War II. His career has included positions in the Belgian Congo, Canada, France, Morocco, Senegal and Jordan. He was interviewed by Horace G. Torbert on May 17, 1989.

Q: Then you moved on to a place, I guess, where I first laid eyes on you, and that was Paris, wasn't it?

BROWN: Yes.

Q: And there you were very active in the most chaotic political situation that I ever encountered.

BROWN: You know, a new government every week, and sometimes twice a week--the collapse of the Fourth Republic, the inability of the parties to govern; all the disadvantages that proportional representation gives to parliament, since anybody with five per cent of the vote gets people put in. All that disadvantage--a general corruption and malaise all through the Army. Don't forget, you are in the aftermath of their Vietnam, and in the beginning of their loss of North Africa. First in Tunisia and Morocco, and then the real sticky one of what to do about Algeria, which led to the end of the Fourth Republic. I left at the end of the Fourth Republic.

Q: And supervised it from Washington, more or less.

BROWN: Yes.

Q: Supervised the decay of empire. Do you want to say a little about your operations there (in Paris)? Because I think that was, to my knowledge, a very interesting job you did there.

BROWN: What I did was, I did the internal politics, minus the Communist Party, which we weren't allowed to associate with. It was handled by Walter Stoessel doing the liaison with other people, mostly the foreign office and the minister of interior.

No, I did the internal stuff, which meant that I went to the parliament just about every day, and talked to the deputies. But I guess the most interesting factor of it, when one thinks of how diplomatic history is made, with it was the role of Sir Gladwyn Jebb, a long-time British diplomat in guiding US policies. Our ambassador, Amory Haughton, after listening to Sir Gladwyn, decided that De Gaulle was not going to come back. The senior staff had been assured by various people that no, the Fourth Republic would go on and there wouldn't be anything even remotely like a coup or military takeover.

One of the problems was how, at the very end, to put De Gaulle in legally. That is, was how to get the assembly to vote for him. That was extremely difficult because all of the non-communist left was united against him, and the socialists were the key.

My boss was Bob Murphy (understanding in the Department). I got my instructions at home by telephone and often reported by phone; Matt Loomer (later Ambassador for Somalia) was the key figure on the French desk. I told the Socialists: "I have a message to you from Bob Murphy.

He wants to make sure that the Socialist Party at least splits in half in the vote on De Gaulle. Those who are adamant against him can vote against him, but everybody else really has to vote for." And they did.

Q: For De Gaulle.

BROWN: Yes. The French desk back in Washington knew all about what I was doing; it often passed on Mr. Murphy's orders. The embassy or at least part, did not.

I also did telegrams on what was going on; for instance, that the police had just had a national strike, and a prominent French political official had said had said; "This is the end of the Fourth Republic."

It was a very dramatic excerpt to witness a police raid at the National Assembly, and the assault of deputies in their offices. That's the least of it.

The military attaché, didn't believe anything that I said, or cabled. He sent a full colonel to sit in the office to watch me type, so that the attaché office could write a cable denying immediately what I was dispatching. The attaché kept asking me after; "Who are your sources in the French military?"

I said, "I'm not telling you my sources, any more than you could get the CIA to tell you their sources. That's one thing we don't do, because all you'd do is probably turn them in and get them arrested."

And another fine officer, Russ Fessenden, was doing our military liaison there. He told me what his French sources were saying; it was about the same.

Q: Considering the trouble that we later had with General De Gaulle, people today might wonder why we were so anxious to get him in. You've alluded to this.

BROWN: Well, we were trying to avoid violent confrontations in the streets. There was already a lot of violence in Paris; I was gassed many a time going out. We didn't want complete chaos from which the communists could profit.

Q: And there was nobody to do business with, or almost. I mean, you couldn't do business with anybody because they wouldn't be there tomorrow.

BROWN: They wouldn't be there, or they wouldn't have our policy. Their policies were idiotic; economic, political, and international; the country was starting to fall apart. I mean, everybody knew, who had ever read anything of De Gaulle, what he would do as president. He said it in book after book after book of what France has to be: an independent country with its own Army and its own power. So everybody would know that there would never be a European army or, really, that American officers would have control over French officers, which is what the French thought NATO was. So you had to expect that. But on the other hand, you needed order again. There is an old Arab proverb that says, "Twenty years of tyranny is better than a day of disorder."

Q: That's a very interesting point. You've probably forgotten it, but I'll never forget I happened to be in Paris that first week in May '58, when De Gaulle was coming in. I was assigned to Washington at this time, but I was there temporarily, and I would see you come in to the Embassy from the Assembly every night, nervous as a cat and shaking, practically.

BROWN: I had a great couple of companions. My British opposite was Michael Palliser, who later became their permanent Under Secretary of State, the highest job in the British foreign office, and was knighted. My Israeli companion later took over the African department of the Israeli foreign office, headed the radio and is a professor now at Haifa University. I see him about every two years or so. We had some other ones, a good Dutchman. A small group.

We met regularly, about once a week, about six or seven of us, and this is where the prominent politicians of the Fourth Republic came for lunch. They were smart, and they wanted to deal with the people who were going to write political cables. They dealt with ambassadors, but here was a group whose good talks were held with no holds barred. We had Mendes France, Guy Mollet, and Mitterrand. We dined them all. It was a fascinating experience.

Q: Great! This is the kind of thing we're trying to get at in this oral history. You left Paris. Incidentally, who were some of the other people in the embassy? Bob McBride was there.

BROWN: Bob McBride was there most of the time I was there. Bob was the deputy political counselor who reported directly to Douglas Dillon, the ambassador. The political counselor was Bob Joyce, a nice man, but Bob was really in charge. The other officers there were Frank Meloy, later killed in Beirut. Frank was handling the Far East. Walter Stoessel was handling the Soviet affairs.

Q: Who was the minister?

BROWN: Well, several. Cecil Lyon came in later. Charlie Yost was there for a while. So these were all very good people.

Q: Yes. Then back to Washington after you got Mr. De Gaulle well installed.

BROWN: Yes. I was very briefly in RA, but only for about two or three weeks, and then transferred to Western Europe, to what was called French Iberian Affairs at that time.

Q: Interesting thing. There you were again still presiding over the liquidation of empire in all of Europe.

BROWN: Then, of course, Kennedy came in and we had the paratrooper, Jim Gavin, as ambassador. Jim had one idea that he was going to carry out, and that was that he was going to give the nuclear knowledge to the French, including submarine technology and the bomb. So this is what he aspired most of the time he was there. Of course, President Kennedy would have nothing to do with it. He liked Gavin, but he stopped it cold.

We did have a series of meetings with the French on nuclear submarines, in which our people couldn't say anything. But nothing came of that.

We did have, of course, De Gaulle's decision to get out of Algeria, which led to the coup of the generals, which almost succeeded, except that the conscripts in North Africa and Algeria refused to obey the orders of their officers; the result failed.

There's another little vignette of what goes on in the world, because where I was sitting in the State Department was two offices down from Bill Porter, who was in charge of North Africa. Bill was, of course, later ambassador to Algeria and later Saudi Arabia. Bill Porter was a great radio ham. He listened to short-wave radio, especially to the French military--Paris, Pau, and Algiers--we were ahead of the curve as a fast moving situation because of what Bill had heard.

Q: This was news broadcasts?

BROWN: No, no, no. These are the people chatting to each other on short-wave, one general calling the other, with mysterious words. "Are you ready to do this?" It was very clandestine. It was not the news, no. The news was all censored at that time.

Q: This was the State Department's NSA.

BROWN: Exactly. That's what it was. Instant NSA. Thank God for it.

Q: Absolutely. I worked with Bill. Of course, Bill was there when I was there. I remember I had to make a routine of coming in at 3:00 every Sunday afternoon to see if they had the cables going out, because if not, they would say they couldn't find me to clear them! [Laughter]

BROWN: Then, of course, you had the creation of the OSS, which led to a lot of killing in Paris.

Q: Creation of the OSS.

BROWN: It was a secret organization. Disaffected Army officers said that even if they had failed in the coup, they were going to carry terrorism into France. At that time, there was wide use of plastic explosives. Every police station had sand bags piled up about eight feet high around it. The police wore flak jackets and helmets; a lot were killed. De Gaulle's people organized a counter-terrorist organization which ran around and killed many OSS terrorists.

Q: This was almost Lebanon.

BROWN: Almost Lebanon. Yes. In the end, it broke the OSS. I met De Gaulle only a couple of times. I know who he was and what he is. I'd read his books. I was impressed by him. I mean, this was a man who had some idea of leadership, certainly a patriot, with a vision of where he wanted to see France go. He wanted it to be a modern country. He was the guy who said, "How can you run a country that has 400 kinds of cheese?" He was kind of right that way.

Q: You put in nearly four years, didn't you, in WE?

BROWN: Yes.

HERMAN J. COHEN
Consular Officer
Paris (1955-1958)

Political Counselor
Paris (1974-1977)

Ambassador Herman J. Cohen was born in New York City. After graduating from The City College of New York, he joined the Foreign Service in 1955. His career has included positions in France, Uganda, Zambia, Zaire, Senegal and Rhodesia. Ambassador Cohen was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on August 15, 1996.

Q: You were in Paris from when to when?

COHEN: I arrived in November, '55, and stayed until about August '58.

Q: What type of consular work were you doing?

COHEN: I did visas for three years, but it was such a big visa section that I rotated around. I had the very important job for one year of dealing with refusable cases that could be very delicate. I also had one year of refugee relief.

Q: Do you recall any cases that were particularly difficult on the refusing side?

COHEN: We had two types of cases. In those days the French Communist Party was very big. Of course we were going through the post McCarthy anticommunism.

Q: Oh yes, the McCarran-Walters Act.

COHEN: McCarran-Walters. So for a lot of French people being a member of the Communist Party was perfectly legitimate and normal. They would come to us for a visa for tourist, business, immigration, and suddenly find themselves ineligible. We had to apply for waivers if we felt like it. These waivers were fairly routine, but we had a few tough cases. One was the famous French actor Yves Montand. Here I was a junior officer, pretty naive, wet behind the ears, and this case comes across my desk. I had better talk to somebody about this. He was not a covert member of the party; he was overt. It was public knowledge. So, I went to the political section. There was a gentleman there who was head of what we called communist affairs, Walter Stoessel, the famous Walter Stoessel. He was very nice, and he said, "No, we would be the laughingstock of the world if we refuse this guy a visa." He was one of the most prominent actors, singers, he was very popular. We can't just be refusing visas to people like this. He impressed me because he said, "Okay, we'll take care of this. I want you to draft a message to Washington explaining why it would be very silly to refuse this visa." He put this responsibility on me right away, so I sent my very first despatch to Washington. Of course I showed it to him before it went out, and he thought it was good. So, it went out and we thought how could they refuse this. But a couple of weeks later, they said no, we don't want Yves Montand in the United States, and they turned him down. Then I had the very interesting experience of trying to explain this to him. He was married to an equally prominent film star Simone Signoret. She was also a communist. I didn't know what to do. I found out there was a lady in USIA who worked with film people. Her name was Cynthia Grenier. She said, "I'll tell you what. I know them personally. We will go over to their house and give them a full explanation." So, we went over. They were not angry or anything, they were just very concerned. Montand was very worried because he had a Hollywood contract to make a film with Marilyn Monroe. He said, "Look, I have got to get out of this problem. Can you explain how to do it?" So I explained defector status and all these things. Then a year later, he was able to get his visa. I had a few cases like that.

Q: That really tests the mettle. I don't think most young people would agree with the government, because the law wasn't really that popular or didn't make much sense in many practical cases.

COHEN: We also had the U.S. Army that was also still in France in those days before they got kicked out by DeGaulle. Of course, GIs were frequently getting married to local girls. A small percentage married women who ended up being ineligible for immigration because they had convictions for being prostitutes, that sort of thing. Those were the heart rendering cases.

Q: Yes, it was also difficult to ask the questions. Have you ever taken money for the act of love or something like that? It wasn't that easy. One had to steel oneself.

COHEN: I had one who had a conviction on her record for what they call violation of public decency. It was a felony. I said, "Now this can't be true; we can't stop this woman from going with her husband." So, I asked for the details. Apparently she was caught in the back seat of a car with a guy in a compromising position. The French convicted her on this. I wrote back to Washington and said, "Look, this is not a crime in the United States." They said, "I'm sorry but it goes on the basis of their law if it is a felony under their law." I guess they got her a private Congressional bill, and she was able to get into the US eventually.

Q: Well, particularly in those days, young officers learned everything about everything. More than you wanted to know.

COHEN: That is right. So, I found that job very interesting.

Q: During that time, did you get any feel about how the French, their attitude toward the United States in the perspective of developments within France at that time?

COHEN: This was 1955-1958, I found them kind of resentful of the United States for a couple of reasons. One is we hadn't suffered so much through the war, and they were still recovering. Secondly, it was the Marshall Plan days and we were really pushing them too much in telling them what to do, taking charge of some of their economic ministries. They really resented this because they needed our money and yet they didn't like all the advice we were giving them. Also we had the Algerian problem.

Q: Yes, and Dien Bien Phu was in '54, and '55 was sort of near.

COHEN: I remember on the Algerian problem, we were sympathetic to the Algerian rebels because we were anti-colonial. The French didn't like that, so frequently we would have demonstrations around the embassy.

Q: It was a good entree into the Foreign Service. Did you have any feel because later you are going to end up having a lot of responsibility in Francophone Africa, did Africa cross your radar at all in your experiences or in talking to the French or something like that?

COHEN: Not in that particular time, it was strictly consular matters. I didn't get too much involved in foreign policy except for things like the Yves Montand case.

BERTHA POTTS
Assistant Public Affairs Officer, USIS
Lyon (1955-1959)

Bertha Potts was born in California in 1915. After receiving her degree from San Jose State College, she became a member of the WACS. Her career has included positions in Bangkok, Saigon, Lyon, Algiers, Vientiane, and Rabat. Ms. Potts was interviewed by Howell S. Teeple on February 19, 1999.

POTTS: I was assigned to Lyon in southeastern France.

Q: Ah, Lyon, the gourmet center of France.

POTTS: Yes, it was a gourmet center.

Q: That is a branch post?

POTTS: Yes, of Paris.

Q: There was a consulate there, I suppose?

POTTS: A consulate general. The consul general and his consul couldn't stand us. They didn't like the PAO and didn't like me.

Q: Who was the PAO, if I may ask?

POTTS: The PAO was Edward Murphy who was the most wonderful man and dear friend of mine, who died a few years ago.

Q: What did you do in Lyon?

POTTS: I was simply an assistant to the PAO.

Q: A two man post, was it?

POTTS: Yes. For a while we did have a Foreign Service junior officer trainee. We also had for a very short time when I was first there a kind of cultural assistant, but she wasn't there very long. Nor was the trainee there very long.

It was getting along to the end of that tour, which was a bit more than two years, and I had to go up to Paris for some reason or other. When I got there the special assistant to Mr. Cody, who was the PAO at that time in Paris, told me I was going to lunch with him today and I should go buy myself a hat. Mr. Cody refused to take women to lunch who were not wearing hats.

Q: This was 1955-56?

POTTS: This is virtually 1959, we are almost at the end of my Lyon tour. Ladies wore a hat to lunch, especially when they went with Mr. Cody.

He said, "I have heard some good things about your work down there, Bert. Where would you like to go next?" I said, "Oh, if I had my druthers, Mr. Cody, I want to go to Algiers." He said he thought that could be set up. The next thing I knew I had orders to Algiers.

Q: Was Algiers then under our embassy in France?

POTTS: It was technically part of USIS Paris, but it was so isolated that we felt ourselves more a part of the consulate general.

Q: This was before Algiers was independent?

POTTS: Oh, yes.

PHILIP H. VALDES
Political Officer
Paris (1955-1959)

Philip H. Valdes entered the Foreign Service in 1947. His career included assignments in China, Korea, the Soviet Union, Germany, France, and Thailand. Mr. Valdes was interviewed by William Knight in 1994.

VALDES: Although I didn't know it at the time, I'd been selected for a job in [the Embassy in]

Paris.

Q: As a peripheral reporting officer?

VALDES: As part of the Political Section, dealing with the French Communist Party and contacts with the Quai d'Orsay [French Foreign Ministry] on Eastern Europe, generally.

Q: You were not a "Russia watcher" in Paris, then? There were peripheral reporting assignments in other posts which were supposed to be focusing on Russian matters.

VALDES: Yes. This assignment partly involved [peripheral reporting on the Soviet Union] and partly involved following French Communist affairs.

Q: I guess that Norris Chipman would have been there [in the Embassy in Paris], wasn't he?

VALDES: He had been there.

Q: Perhaps he was already in [the Embassy in Rome]. Excuse me for interrupting.

VALDES: There had been two officers dealing with Eastern Europe and Soviet affairs generally. How they split up the work I don't know because the two positions had been merged into one by the time I got there. In any case, this assignment to Paris came through while I was still in Frankfurt. I left Frankfurt in July, 1955, to go to Paris.

I was in Paris for four years and then went back to the Department of State [June, 1959], where I was French Desk Officer for two years.

Q: After that assignment, unless you have something else...

VALDES: No. After that I went to [the Embassy in] Paris and, as I said, followed French Communist Party affairs. This was interesting, because it got me into French politics generally, covering elections and so forth.

Q: You obviously already spoke French, then.

VALDES: Yes. French was probably my best language. I also dealt with the French Foreign Ministry on Eastern European affairs. They had posts in Bulgaria and Albania, which we didn't have. The French were very helpful with us on those matters. We exchanged ideas on...

Q: Any particularly clamorous issues that you dealt with in that role?

VALDES: Well, yes, there was the Hungarian Revolution of 1956. We were trying to keep in touch with the French on that issue. This was all rather tricky, because we were opposing the French on [the Anglo-French expedition to] Suez, [which happened at about the same time].

Q: Was De Gaulle in power at that time?

VALDES: I seem to pick good times to go to countries. De Gaulle came to power when I was in Paris, in May, 1958. That was a very exciting time.

Q: Also frustrating, as I recall, because he really wouldn't have much to do with the Americans.

VALDES: That attitude began to appear during the last year I was there. [For example, there were] his request for tripartite consultations and a reorganization of NATO [North Atlantic Treaty Organization] to give France a greater voice and the withdrawal from French participation in the NATO Mediterranean Fleet. That happened during the last year that I was there. It did make things very difficult. I noticed it, particularly later, when I was French desk officer, much sooner than we had two years earlier when the French National Assembly defeated EDC, the European Defense Community that the French themselves had proposed as a means of making West German rearmament palatable. (Dulles had predicted world catastrophe if the French didn't ratify EDC and felt that Mendes-France had betrayed us by not supporting it vigorously enough. As it turned out, the world didn't end, and the French came up with the more practical solution of proposing German rearmament with the entire German armed forces under NATO command).

After being French desk officer for two years [1959-1960] I moved to Soviet affairs and was really pretty much astounded at how much kinder people in the Department of State took to my new "clients," the Soviets, than they had to my old "clients," the French.

Q: The State Department considered the French a pain in the neck.

VALDES: That's right. They accepted what they considered bad behavior from the Soviets -- that was normal. It was all right.

Q: Do you remember when Matt Loomer got an award for handling the "difficult" French, and the French [Embassy] went to the Department and protested officially? [Laughter] I guess that was after your time. Maybe it was before.

VALDES: It was before. I replaced him.

Q: We got into hassles with the French over the Trieste negotiations because they had the Santa Margherita agreement with the Italians under which they would exchange information. So they were always trying to change the negotiating posture around, as the Italians wanted. We finally said [to the French]: "We understand that you have relations with Italy that make this role difficult for you. If you prefer, we'll continue on without you." Then they started to play ball. [Laughter]

When were you in Paris, Phil?

VALDES: 1955-1959.

Q: 1955-1959 -- that was the period which included the Suez Crisis [of 1956]. Any substantive or operational comments you would like to make about that period?

VALDES: It was a difficult period for French-U. S. relations, obviously, because we opposed the French and the British on it [their joint expedition to take the Suez Canal]. But the harmful effects didn't last very long, I must say. Once the Suez Crisis was over, we got back to business as usual, and when de Gaulle was pushing far more vigorously than the Fourth Republic had for an independent French nuclear force. While de Gaulle recognized that only the U.S. had the power to block any Soviet aggression, he was not convinced we would always have the willpower to do it. He didn't believe we would automatically risk nuclear destruction of American cities to save French ones. He also didn't believe U.S. policy decisions, or those of a European collective body, would necessarily be better for France than French decisions.

Q: So you were basically concerned with what you might call "diplomatic problems," focused more on external French issues than internal issues.

VALDES: Except for following French Communist Party developments.

Q: Anything else on that period?

VALDES: I can't think of anything.

Q: What came after that?

VALDES: I was on the French desk [in the Department of State]. That was sort of an extension of being in Paris, except, as I've said, I was surprised, when I got there [Washington, D. C.] to see the chilliness with which a lot of people [in the Department] regarded France -- mostly because of De Gaulle's attitudes and positions on things.

EDMUND MURPHY
Branch Public Affairs Officer, USIS
Lyon (1956-1958)

Edmund Murphy began his government career in the Office of the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs in 1942. He held a number of senior positions in the Foreign Service, including Policy Officer for Latin America on two occasions, Cultural Attaché in Argentina, and Director of USIS Operations in Haiti, Colombia, and Finland, after which he was Senior Inspector for the Agency. Mr. Murphy was interviewed by Allen Hansen in 1990.

Q: This was still fairly early in your career. In January of '56 you went overseas again, this time to be the Branch Public Affairs Officer in Lyon, France?

MURPHY: That's right.

Q: What can you tell us about that assignment? That must have been a very nice place to be.

MURPHY: Well, Lyon itself is a rather cold and foggy place. It doesn't have a very attractive climate, but it was an interesting place to be. I still have contacts with people there. It was the second largest city in France, and it had in early times been famous as a center of silk cloth manufacture. It was the silk center of Europe, but that industry had declined a lot in favor of more heavy industry and it had become a rather smog-ridden town as the industry blackened the buildings and took some of the sheen off of the beauty of the place.

Q: It was really an industrial city.

MURPHY: Yes, it was an industrial city, but it was a challenging assignment because we had such a large part of France to cover. We worked north to Dijon, east to Switzerland, south to St. Etienne and west to Clermont- Ferrand. I was on the road a great deal of the time when I was in Lyon because we developed and sponsored programs in most of the major cities of that whole area of France.

Q: What kind of programs did you have at that time?

MURPHY: Well, one of the programs that we ran in all these places where there was a university was an America days program once a year. So we organized a program of several days consisting of musical or other performing events and lectures and seminars and social events involving all the faculty and administration of the universities in Dijon and Grenoble, Clermont- Ferrand and Lyon.

Q: How much staff did you have for all this activity?

MURPHY: I had an American secretary part of the time and one American assistant. Then later USIA added a trainee. During my stay there I had two different American trainees who had not previously been on an assignment.

Q: So breaking those trainees in, and then covering that vast area really kept you going.

MURPHY: Oh, that was a busy time, and it was not easy in those years. For one thing, France still had a critical housing shortage as a result of the war and we couldn't find a place to live. We ended renting a crumbling, drafty chateau 14 kilometers out of town.

But another thing was that the communist party was fairly strong in that part of France, and frequently we had to deal with municipal officials who were communists and who, needless to say, were not very friendly. When we made protocol calls, they used to try to show us where Americans had bombed hospitals, schools, nurseries, churches and the like, never mentioning which of them might have been bombed by Germans or referring to the fact that American intervention had helped to save France.

Q: Yeah.

MURPHY: But anyway, we put up with quite a lot of stuff to work some of those cities. And France wasn't having too easy a time.

One of her major problems was that North Africa was falling apart -- specifically Algeria. There was a strong nationalistic movement through most of that country. It was very closely tied to France economically, and France had a lot of internal problems with that. There were a lot of incidents of terrorism by Arabs, who eventually, of course, succeeded in throwing off the yoke of France, partly because the United States supported the nationalist movements in Africa.

I think one of the things I remember was the Hungarian attempted revolt against Russia which was crushed ruthlessly. Refugees streamed out of Hungary and a lot of them landed in France. The agency sent us a Hungarian- speaking assistant at that time to try to take care of some of that overflow out of Hungary.

And the other event was the Suez crisis. I don't know whether you remember that, but because Nasser was very threatening about the Canal, England and France got together and decided they would try to provoke an incident that would justify intervention on their part, and they arranged with Israel to create an incident. Israel bombed the Egyptian Army in the Gaza strip and as a result President Abdel Gamal Nasser nationalized and closed down the Canal. This was terribly serious because France was dependent on oil from the Middle East which was shipped through the Suez Canal. But that incident was what England and France wanted and it justified their intervention. They were moving towards intervention when President Eisenhower stepped in and stopped the whole thing.

Q: So they had another reason for loving the Americans?

MURPHY: The French were absolutely irate and I will never forget that I gave a party sometime during that event and I got rude notes from Frenchman who said they didn't come to the party because American policy prevented them from getting gasoline. I still hear from one of those Frenchmen, who was at the Sorbonne for several years afterwards and a prominent literary professor in France, specialist in American literature. Now he's quite friendly.

Q: Was that period also when the French insisted that the NATO troops leave France? Or was that before or after?

MURPHY: I think that was after. To return to the subject of my experiences in France, like any USIS post, we have "cultural presentations" to program in our area, e.g., military orchestras, American performing artists (Andre Wat, an American concert pianist, was one), and distinguished visitors like then Senator William Fulbright, who came to receive an honorary degree from the University of Dijon. One of our "out of routine" programs was participation in the annual gastronomic fair in Dijon. Each country had to present some typical dish at the various receptions given when the French Foreign Minister (Maurice Couve de Murville) visited the fair. Bertha Potts, who was my assistant at that time, and I decided we would do an American Thanksgiving feast, preceded by old-fashioned (American bourbon being considered typical despite the French name) and popcorn. We were able to get American turkeys from the commissary. Bert supervised the roasting of turkeys and dressing and she made the popcorn, while I prepared the old-fashioned and some cocktail snacks and helped to serve. It looked as if the French appreciated our efforts and even our food, thanks perhaps to the generous supply of bourbon.

While I was in Lyon, the city celebrated its 2,000th anniversary, and the 200th anniversary of the birth of Lafayette. We participated in these events, as we did in the funeral of Mayor Edouard Herriot (a former President of France) in a mass ceremony in Place Bellecour in the center of Lyon, a magnificent public spectacle of unforgettable mourning for one of France's heroes.

WILLIAM D. MORGAN
Staff Aide, USRO
Paris (1956-1958)

Consul General
Paris (1978-1981)

William D. Morgan was born in New York in 1925. He received a bachelor's degree from the University of Rochester in 1949 and a master's degree from the University of Maryland in 1953. He served in the U.S. Army from 1943-1946. Mr. Morgan's Foreign Service career included positions in Lebanon, Paris, and Montreal. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1988.

Q: After your acceptance in the Foreign Service what happened to you immediately?

MORGAN: You won't believe it. I got a call from Washington. I was told that I was being assigned to Paris. My wife went through the ceiling. She said, "We're joining the Foreign Service, aren't we? We just came from Paris. You're a French major. They're not going to assign you to Paris." Well, I said, I had been fully accepted into the Foreign Service, and that was it.

Q: How did you feel about that assignment to Paris, since you had just returned from Paris?

MORGAN: I more or less felt the same way that my wife did. I thought that I would rather go to Africa, Tokyo, or some place else. My wife and I arrived in Paris as a just-married student couple. At the end of our first month there in 1949, we didn't have a penny in our pockets. We had just cashed our last Travelers Cheque for $10. She had no job. So we lived a student's life. You know, France was wonderful in 1949 and 1950. The French were not what they are today. They were really defeated. The country was in a state of chaos. They had lost a war, not only psychologically, but physically as well. But the Marshall Plan was operational and my wife got a job working for it -- the ECA (Economic Community Assistance?). She made $2,500 a year, and that took us very nicely through the rest of that year and paid our way home. I think that we came out a couple of hundred dollars ahead and managed to travel all over Europe. I don't mean to say that hamburgers cost five cents, but things were easier to do then on such an income.

My assignment as an FSO to Paris 1956, was a matter of going back to that world, in part. However, in those few years Paris had changed considerably. The country was certainly on its way up. It had benefitted a great deal from the Marshall Plan. My assignment was as Staff Aide to the Ambassador to USRO (United States delegation to Regional Organizations). These were NATO [North Atlantic Treaty Organization], OECD [Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development], and COCOM [Coordinating Committee of trade with Communist countries]. We had a number of ambassadors assigned to Paris in one capacity or another at the time. I think that there were seven of them in Paris at the time, including our Ambassador to France, of course.

Not far from where the American Embassy on the Place de la Concorde, is, was, and hopefully always will be, the Hotel Talleyrand. It is called a hotel -- in French, a private home for the rich -- and was built at the end of the 18th century. It was named for Talleyrand, a subsequent owner who was then French Foreign Minister. It is a magnificent place. Ironically, my wife had worked on top floor for ECA in 1949-50. I was assigned there in 1956-8 to USRO, during my very first tour of duty in the Foreign Service. It was headed by Ambassador Burgess, a former Secretary of the Treasury. NATO Headquarters were in Paris then [1956], at the Palais de Chaillot, in the shadow of the Eiffel Tower. That is where all of the NATO meetings took place. I was the official liaison officer with the Secretariat of NATO. I only focused on the NATO part. There was another officer who handled [liaison] duties similar to mine with OECD. We had little to do with COCOM, a term you may never have heard of. Until very recently COCOM controlled trade with communist countries. But you were particularly concerned with our relations with NATO.

Q: Yes, let's talk about that.

MORGAN: The job I had was Staff Aide to Ambassador Burgess. As a lot of people know, whatever the Ambassador wants [his staff aide] to do, I did. More specifically, I more or less "managed his desk," made sure that the right telegrams got there, and ensured that they were acted on. I did that sort of typical, secretarial work. I also had a job of liaison with the NATO secretariat, which kept me very close to the Secretary General and Executive Director of NATO, concerning meetings, agendas, and that sort of thing. I would then report back to the State Department. We had an office back in the Bureau of European Affairs in Washington which followed NATO affairs, OECD, and so on for USRO. This office gave us our instructions. The [NATO] agenda items covered an enormous range of subjects. They were military and political and often were very complex.

It was not at all unusual for the weekly meeting of the NAC, or North Atlantic Council, which was attended by the ambassadors of each member state of NATO, to cover 15 or 20 agenda items. Some of these were minor issues,, but others were of great consequence in our emerging military and political struggle with the U.S.S.R. Obviously, NATO was formed as a military organization, the North Atlantic Alliance, to combat the threat as perceived from the growing Eastern European and Soviet military forces.. The military aspect of the alliance was the first and foremost consideration. Anyhow, agenda issues, for example, were the common standards of the caliber of the guns and the inter-operability" of weapons systems. NATO had a large, military staff. Our own Delegation was like an Embassy. It had Political, Economic, Administrative, and Military Sections. The Military Section was particularly large. Military matters usually accounted for a good part of the agenda at meetings of the NAC. Remember, of course, that the heart of the military element of NATO was SHAPE (Supreme Headquarters Armed Forces Europe). NATO was the political, government-to-government base to whom the different Armed Forces ultimately reported.

Q: What about the size and composition of the USRO staff in terms of numbers?

MORGAN: The State Department element of USRO amounted to 40 or 50 employees. Our files were enormous, because we had NATO documents classified COSMIC, TOP SECRET, and lower, as well as our own U.S. similarly classified. Remember we were government bureaucracies. We had rooms filled with documents like that. As an anecdote of the things I did,, once I left two of these rooms open during a weekend when I'd been called in by the Ambassador when the Soviets invaded Hungary. I got a nice fist-full of "pink slips" [security violation reports] showing violations for that.

The Military Section probably had about 30 people. We also had representatives from the Treasury Department. Our OECD responsibilities were handled separately. However, we had economic issues with NATO. I even sat on the International Staff (of NATO) Budget Committee. There were a lot of financial issues that were dealt with by our Economic Section.

Remember, those were the days when NATO was mainly a security entity protecting Europe and North Americas. The United Nations had begun a few years earlier but really, in my mind, hadn't defined itself practically and certainly had to separate itself from military alliances, although the UN Charter authorized them.. It hadn't gotten into some of the issues in which it is involved today. NATO was the major "power" organization.

Q: What about the internal situation in our Delegation to NATO?

MORGAN: Well, there are always personality and policy conflicts in any large organization. However, I must say that most people that I dealt with--that is to say, within the USRO Political and Administrative Sections--were very reasonable. They had a job to do. You really didn't think in terms of personality differences complicating what we were doing--fighting over "turf" and things like that. We had more than enough to do. We were there every night until 6:00, 7:00, or 8:00 PM, and often on weekends, constantly taking on the next issue. Bob Miller, for example, was a junior officer colleague in the Political Section. We remain good friends to this day. There was also John Stutesman. These people were all good friends.

The only issue which comes to mind where there were differences brings a smile to my face. This involved the military. I think that it was hard for our military to handle an assignment to what amounts to a diplomatic mission. I think that some of the colonels assigned to USRO tended to think that it was still World War II and that we were about to attack the Soviets, who, in many ways, were the new Nazi enemy. . Therefore, they had trouble appreciating some of the evolving--what shall we call them?--different approaches to issues which were emerging with the changes taking place in the Soviet Union. Stalin was no longer around, so it was no longer the "old" and as directly threatening militarily Soviet Union. The Soviets were scientifically becoming more significant and, most serious of all, had near or perceived nuclear parity. Also, I don't think that we had a person on that Delegation who really knew very much, first-hand, about the Soviet Union, and I wasn't one of them...yet.

Our military were also having a lot of bureaucratic trouble with these questions when translated to turf. I remember one officer who asked me one day, "Bill, I do not understand the difference between the State Department's ranks and the military. Can you tell me whether I 'rank' that State guy or not? Now, I'm a lieutenant colonel, and he is a second secretary. How would you compare the two?" And I, being compulsively friendly -- he was a fine colleague and friend -- but probably not giving him the answer he wanted, said: "Actually, colonel, they are incomparable." He looked at me, laughed, and said: "I know what you mean." It was an attempt really to compare two historically different "families," if you will. Of course, this was soon after the end of World War II, and I still well remembered that I was a lowly enlisted man. It wasn't that long after a really wonderful, military victory. The soldiers were heroes, and these officers were heroes. The military were assigned to Paris in a diplomatic not military setting and all of what goes with it. It was often a case of trying to fight battles, if you will, when there wasn't any clear definition of the ground on which they were fighting. They were facing an "enemy", sometimes, who turned out to be fellow Americans. State Department people can be "arrogant," "difficult," taken with their own power or perceived authority at times. This could be difficult for our military colleagues to understand or tolerate.

I must say that most of the American military assigned to USRO were very skilled and professional at doing their jobs, although there was this little competition problem. Ambassador Burgess' rule, if there was any question about it, was to get rid of incompetent staff as he made clear when they left. But that is the only issue I can remember. I don't recall any other "personality: strains.

Q: Can you recall any specific instances where the diplomats opposed the military over a particular issue?

MORGAN: The short answer is, "No." The longer answer is that some things were rather "technical." For example, we had a discussion which probably continues to this day on what kind and size of airplanes NATO should have. What tactics should we have? Should Belgium or the UK do this, or that in using its air force assets?. There were questions like that. An example of a non-military one involved Iceland, which at the time had a communist government or, rather, a coalition government in which the communists participated. Iceland was not permitted to attend the meetings of the North Atlantic Council. Of course, they received all of the documents. But I had to make sure that the Icelandic Delegation received no documents from our Delegation that were classified above, I think, LIMITED OFFICIAL USE, or something like that.

That's not really an answer to your question about issues that divided the State Department from the U. S. military. However, this is an example of some of the realities affecting what we were doing in NATO in those days.

I think that most of the "problem" issues involved the size of NATO forces, their status in the various host countries, and how much we could or should share with our allied, for example, in terms of our own military intelligence or classified documents. In other words, to what extent were the NATO countries really our allies and what U.S. laws limited our sharing of information? The French were our allies but, if you remember, about that time they pulled out of the military structure of NATO. They just said, "goodbye." (or said goodbye to us!) This was after I left, but not too.

Q: As a matter of record, could you tell us who the members of NATO were at that time?

MORGAN: Gracious. There were 15 members. They included the United Kingdom, France, Canada, West Germany, Portugal, Italy, Norway, Denmark, Iceland, Belgium, the Netherlands, and Luxembourg, Turkey and Greece. Because the last two were constantly squabbling over Cyprus, we were forever going to NAC meetings on Saturday (at least I remembering it interrupting my weekends) over the Cyprus conflict.

Q: Inside NATO, what was the perception of the Soviet threat during your time in USRO?

MORGAN: In NATO? The organization as a whole?

Q: Yes, and especially the U. S. Delegation.

MORGAN: Within NATO as a whole, the Soviet Union was perceived as a threat to the security of its members. That perception was part of an ongoing tension that continued until the fall of the Soviet Union. But still one nation perceives such tensions and threats differently. France, for example, looked at NATO as an ideological, Anglo-controlled entity. Germany saw the Soviet threat as directly on its border. Germany considered itself -- most realistically -- to be the potential battlefield. And it was. That's where the Warsaw Pact troops were amassed. That's where the battle lines were drawn. That's where the "trip wires" were. Norway and Turkey bordered directly territorially on the Soviet Union. Denmark and Greece bordered on the Soviet Union by water. Maybe that's the answer to your question. Those closer to the Soviet threat felt it with greater immediacy. Britain was always very sophisticated in its approach and was just getting over losing its empire.

Much of the answer to your question relates to the United States as the leading world power. We had the money, we had the forces, we had the resources and the will to face down the Soviets. Every one of the NATO countries, Canada included, had its own bilateral issues with the United States. Some of these were and perhaps always will be emotionally based: Jealousy and envy. I've always considered foreign policy to be driven by emotional considerations -- often cultural, and religious, and historical, but from the "heart and the gut". Britain, for example, was going through historic agonies at this time. There was the Suez crisis in 1956, following Egyptian nationalization of the Suez Canal. There was a perception in Britain that we were no longer their "friends," if you will, and could not be trusted as we were allies in World War II. Also, there was that feeling, and so much of this is feeling, that the British were dependent on us under the Marshall Plan, although they handled this matter very admirably--and most of the British were able to accept this. There was this feeling of "National pride," and it continued to manifest itself in NATO.

Now, we were together and were united in one particular cause: the defense of Western Europe and the tradition of Western Culture. But that didn't mean that other causes or questions were not out there at the same time. There was a comparable feeling among the French, for example, it was called by the French the "Coca Colonizing" of France. Namely, the U.S. was in France to overwhelm French culture with American. In fact, we were -- intentionally or not -- proceeding to do this very thing, by example and strength and influence of our way of life.

All of those things were issues. Whenever the Soviets "behaved themselves," so to speak, or at least didn't "bark out loud" in antagonistic attacks against us, these issues would come up. On the other hand, when the Hungarian Revolt of 1956 occurred that really brought NATO together, just as failing marriages are often brought back together by tragedy. That sort of thing focused the attention of the NATO members. Otherwise, we bickered. We had to do an awful lot of bilateral "fence mending."

Then there was something else I would like to interject here which, to me, was very important. I remember about half way through my tour at USRO in Paris -- and that would have been about 1957--a fellow by the name of Joe Wolf arrived. He was the new Political Counselor replacing Jack Tuthill. Joe was a very vigorous, driving, overwhelming, arrogant, and all of those wonderful words: a powerful, self-confident, intelligent FSO. He met with the Ambassador, of course, but eventually he met with the more junior officers, including myself and others in other parts of the Mission who were part of our Delegation to NATO. He made it clear that he was there for one, simple reason. The State Department and the President wanted a new definition for our NATO relationship. NATO had been founded as a military, security/defense organization, to confront the military threat posed by the Soviet Union. However, we had some internal differences, and there were the realities of an evolving Europe, and an evolving Soviet Union to consider. Now, when did Stalin die?

Q: 1953.

MORGAN: Right. So Stalin was already dead, but the Soviet Union still had not become a more open, less threatening society under Malenkov and then under Khrushchev. However, the Soviet threat was becoming more "political" and "ideological," if you will. And the Soviets, of course, were extremely good in claiming bilaterally and in other relationships that they were just "one of the boys"; "Peace loving," as was their favorite word. They suggested that now that they had gotten rid of Stalin, things were much better and that the Soviet Union was no longer a threat. All of this was going on. So Joe Wolf said that he had come to USRO to present our new policy toward NATO. That is, in addition to being a strong, military alliance, NATO was also a political force and that our Delegation would take the lead and be part of expanding NATO's role as a political body. That would, for example, involve culture, anti-KGB (Soviet secret police) efforts such as using ballet performers as intelligence operators -- such efforts would be more complex, sophisticated penetration of NATO efforts at resisting the communist thrusts at Western security and unity. The KGB was proving itself to be much more clever, politically. In other words, they were using forces as effective as arms and military threats. That was the significance of Joe Wolf's arrival message.

Q: You mean that Joe Wolf addressed such issues as infiltration as a communist "soft" invasion?

MORGAN: Yes, but I would say that he was more particularly addressing the issue of unity within NATO. He indicated that we should not "back away" from issues. We should "face up to them." Avoiding political discussion within NATO would be dangerous. It would result in fulfilling Soviet ambitions to destroy NATO or at least weaken it from within. This could be prevented only through "political" unity or increased cooperation, understanding, and discussion. So then the agenda for the NAC meetings became much more "political." We didn't have an "anti-KGB" section, but we did discuss what kind of relations we should have with the Soviet Union, because most of the NATO countries had bilateral relations with the Soviet Union. So there was an examination of some of the things that the Soviets were doing and how we would react to them, how we could counter them, what we anticipated from them, and how we could defend ourselves as a group of countries. Really, NATO was the only practical, evolving, strong, Western group which could ensure that the Soviet and communist threat would not become a reality.

Q: Could you give us some concrete examples of the threat as perceived?

MORGAN: Yes. One of the best examples which sticks in my mind is the Soviet Army Chorus. What a threat they were! [Laughter] They sang loud and they were honorable members of the Red Army. But could we let them into our countries? This kind of question went on for many years--an artistic expression, if you will. Now, what other examples are there? The arts come first to mind, because the Soviets are very good in such fields. In fact, when I returned to the U. S. from Moscow--I'm jumping ahead a little bit--I was involved in negotiating cultural exchanges, such as film, theater ("Hello Dolly"), and other efforts of impresario Sol Hurok. This was about the only positive expression of the control of cultural exchanges. "Ideology" is probably the word that best describes this question]. There were issues involving the press, the concept of "disinformation" information deliberately falsified to serve a political purpose programs which the Soviets engaged in very successfully. The question was how the NATO countries as a group could react to such developments.

Q: How about our own efforts in the U. S. Delegation in engaging in propaganda?

MORGAN: Well, we had an Information Office, headed by a PAO, or Public Affairs Officer, with a staff, including press officers, and so on. I'm sure that they were fine and did their work. However, maybe they engaged in the more traditional, public affairs types of activities. They didn't engage in "propaganda," per se. It was largely a press office. They had no "cultural" program at that time, except on a bilateral level in our embassy. But that was only involved in activities in France. At the same time, how proper would it be for us to be engaged in all of these things when we had an Embassy in each of our NATO countries doing the same thing in a bilateral context? As I recall it, I remember issuing press notices to counter something which had appeared [in the media]. We would do something in consultation with our other information people.

NATO had an enormous and very effective information section. Our people would work with them. I guess that the real answer to your question is that NATO, of course, engaged in a lot of press activity, informing each country, in turn, through its own government, what NATO was and why we belonged to the organization. The question might be asked, why are we dumping all this money down a rat hole? We really didn't have that problem, because it wasn't a rat hole.

"The enemy", and its efforts were as clear as a bell. I don't remember that money was a problem for public affairs activities information. .

Q: How did you feel personally about the NATO presence in Europe and how did you perceive the threat of the Warsaw Pact in real terms?

MORGAN: This was probably affected by my age. I was young, at the time. Secondly, there was the fact of Soviet behavior. They were undoubtedly and measurably a threat. This was easily documented by their very actions constantly and consistently. The Soviet threat was also big--bigger than we thought, as we discovered. So I never personally gave the matter a second thought. I was sure that we were on the right track.

Q: Did anybody question it?

MORGAN: No. I don't think that anybody, to this day, has questioned it. One could argue that it really wasn't so much of a threat, especially now that the USSR and its allies have collapsed. I think that it actually was a threat at the time, though perhaps not as great as we thought. Certainly, we were right to evaluate their growing weaknesses, especially economic. In the late 1950s, when I was in USRO, the Soviet threat brought our allies together, after a very devastating war. It gave the United States a definably honorable role to play. We had to be careful, however, about being the big, too strong partner--as we were, and at times acted as if we were.

However, there was so much contact with the NATO countries. American Congressmen traveled all over these countries. NATO was--and is--an alliance. It provided another, tangential prop or support to our world leadership role.. It helped us to assist a lot of other countries--Greece and Turkey, for example, on the Cyprus issue. Events in Iceland, Italy. Our activities in NATO gave strength to countries building on a democratic base. We were all forced, all the time, to remember that we were Western countries with a certain tradition which had just gone through, in some cases, a devastating war. Look what World War II did to Germany in that regard. NATO, OECD, and the Marshall Plan turned a severely damaged country around. This provided a means, a setting for them to get their stability, democratic institutions and honor back. It provided us a means to restore the French. In a negative sense, NATO gave France an opportunity to be French again--by kicking us all out! It permitted De Gaulle to be De Gaulle.

Q: Could you talk about some of the other delegations to NATO, your personal interaction with them, and your impressions of them.

MORGAN: Well, first and foremost is Great Britain. We tend to be looked at by many as their allies, or at least a country very close to them. This is based on a common language, background, and so forth. I think that I knew more of the people in the British Delegation [than in any other]. I think that we had the best relations with them, despite the Suez Crisis of 1956.

In terms of France, I had no particular reactions to the French whatsoever. I had virtually no contact with them at all. They were getting progressively more difficult and separated from NATO, at least the military part. .

Scandinavia. I went to high level NATO meetings attended by the presidents and prime ministers of all the countries. There were meetings of this kind, I think, twice a year--once where the Heads of Government came. President Eisenhower represented the United States on one occasion. There were also regular meetings of foreign ministers. One of the foreign ministers' meetings was held in Copenhagen, which I had the great pleasure of attending. I had a great time. I hadn't been to Copenhagen before. It happened that I had worked with the Danish foreign minister, Per Hækkerup, who had come to New York as a grantee when I was assigned there. He had come to the U. S. under a leader exchange grant. Imagine, little me alone with the Foreign Minister, his wife and family, for the day at their small unpretentious home outside the capital. I have a lot of nice memories of dealing with the Norwegians and the Danes.

However, it was different with the Icelanders. I remember one time calling the Icelandic Delegation. They were considered to be "communists." In that sense, I was in a somewhat false position. I remember the Icelandic Ambassador saying, "Oh, Mr. Morgan. It's good to hear you." I said, "Well, you know, sir, I can't call you or speak to you." He said, "I don't speak to you, either. It's OK." So we went on. I had something important to tell him. He wasn't supposed to talk to me, nor I to him, but we had to talk. I can't remember what the issue was. However, there were those little memories of "impossible" situations solved by a nice ambassador on the other end of the phone.

The Italians. They were in a state of constant confusion. They were delightful people, but you never could get anything out of them. I'd call and try to get some information from the Italian Ambassador. I was never sure whether it was going to be correct or if the position was going to be undone by somebody else in the Delegation. I don't mean to be trivial about it. They were fine and wonderful colleagues, but I remember never being certain if the little piece of information that I had obtained from them would prove correct.

Most of the others I dealt with on business. For example, I was responsible for following all of the heads of government meetings--about security issues, passes, follow-up documents and so forth. I can remember stopping at the entrance to the Palais de Chaillot with President Eisenhower on one side of me and Secretary of State Dulles on the other. We all had our identity badges hanging from our lapels, except President Eisenhower. The guard stopped him. He said, "You have to have a badge." It was all very embarrassing to have the President of the United States stopped. Finally, they turned to me and said, "Mr. Morgan, will you authorize the President of the United States to come in?" I said, "Of course I will." The President seemed somewhat annoyed. There were little things like that. I presume that you wanted me to make these remarks personal. Maybe they are not up to the higher level of your question.

Q: It's extraordinary that the guard would not let the President of the United States in. What did the President have to say about this?

MORGAN: He was furious with his staff aide because the staff aide had left the pass back at the Ambassador's residence.

Q: Let's go to some more "saucy" parts. You were in USRO from 1956 to 1958. The Warsaw Pact invaded Hungary in 1956. What happened inside the U. S. Delegation?

MORGAN: Well, it really was something. I received a phone call at home from the Ambassador, asking me to come into the office. He told me what had happened. There were just the two of us at the Delegation office for the rest of the day. He called me at around 11:00 AM, and we left there at 7:00 PM that night. I remember because the office was dark: that's how I got a security violation. During the day it had been nice and bright in the secure rooms. I didn't have to turn any lights on.

I remember the Ambassador talking over the phone many times in the course of the day to the Secretary General of NATO and to other ambassadors.

Q: Who was the Secretary General?

MORGAN: Lord Ismay, a retired British general. However, let's get everything in its proper-- my-- perspective. I spent most of the day running back and forth to the file room, finding telegrams and looking up various things. We didn't talk to the State Department in Washington over the phone in those days the way we do today. Well, a lot of this stuff could not be discussed over the phone. Clearly, the Embassy communications people had been called in. Our USRO communications were handled at the Embassy. I would run back and forth to the Embassy to pick up telegrams and other communications and bring them back to our office. The regular telegraphic "take" was obviously coming in.

The substantive answer to your question of what the U. S. Delegation did in response to the Hungarian invasion is that we went through a period of incredible frustration on everybody's part. What could we do--what could NATO and the United States do? A lot of the answers to such questions we discussed at great length. What were the intentions of NATO and the United States? As I remember it, we didn't get any answers. "We", was of course telegraphically between our embassies and the Department. But "we" were the Ambassador and I at times. We were there alone a great deal of the time. "I" was a sounding board, but it felt good.

However, I think that it was near the end of that day. The Ambassador was almost weeping in total frustration. We had the Political Counselor, Joe Wolf, in the office, as well as our Deputy Chief of Mission, Frederick E. ("Fritz") Nolting. Other people drifted in and out of the office. I mostly remember the Ambassador and me. He wondered what we could do. Obviously, he wasn't asking me for real advice!.

Let's go back to a much more important question. What was really happening? What were the Soviets really doing? What were their intentions? What was the Hungarian reaction? What was the Hungarian Government doing? What were the forces involved? I remember calling in the senior military man in our Delegation and getting what you might expect from him. He said, "Sir, I don't know. I can tell you where our troops are. I can tell you where our forces are in Germany." And that sums it up and I don't blame him. He gave what he knew..

I might be confusing my stories here, but it's not that important. I found out very soon--I don't know whether it was that day or very shortly thereafter, maybe the next day. The Ambassador said: "Well, the bottom line is, there is a country between us in NATO and Hungary. It's called Austria. The real question is whether we are prepared to invade Austria. Or, an equally serious question is, what are the Austrians prepared to do about it?" I don't remember factually what it was, but I seem to remember that the Austrians just said, "No." If I remember my history correctly, they were still waiting to implement the peace treaty of 1955, the four-power agreement on Austria's position. That treaty provided that Austria was a neutral country and certainly not a member of NATO.

So it was not a simple matter of invading Hungary. How could you get to help whom and against whom?

Q: Do you remember considering an option to move military forces into Austria?

MORGAN: Oh, yes.

Q: Who would the players have been in that scenario?

MORGAN: I don't remember it all, but obviously that was an option. However, when you consider options like that, the decisions then are very clear--invasion. I think that the real answer to your question is that this whole question was resolved quickly. Or, somebody else might say, we "surrendered," or the Soviets "won," or whatever. As I remember it, the event was over with. The young Hungarians who climbed up on Soviet tanks were killed. I think that this happened at the end of that first day. It was all over. Then it became almost academic. You don't invade any place, any time. You don't invade under those circumstances, unless a war is going on, unless you are there to help or support a government or a very large force which had risen up in opposition to the Soviets.

Q: There also must have been a lot of confusion during that day, and then it ended before a major decision could have been taken.

MORGAN: Yes. You could use the word, "fortunately" in this connection.

Q: How did you feel about it?

MORGAN: At the time I felt very frustrated. What the hell do we have NATO for if we can't do something?

Q: How did you feel when it ended?

MORGAN: Well, I don't exactly remember. I probably felt relieved. That is a bureaucratic answer. I might have wondered how many more Sundays I would have to come into the office. More seriously, as I reflect back, this was all very disheartening. I didn't consider that it had been a "failure" of NATO. I think that it became a reality. Did we want to go to war with the Soviet Union? That was the bottom line question. Were the Soviets prepared? They were talking about atomic bombs flying back and forth. That has always been behind most "hand wringing" decisions over the past 35 or 40 years.

Q: Do you remember the reaction of the military people in our Delegation?

MORGAN: No, I don't remember. I don't remember any strain after the fact or any internal tensions. What were the odds? What were we dealing with? Also, there was a definition. Brezhnev, with his Doctrine, hadn't come into power yet in the Soviet Union. But there was a definition of what the sphere of influence of the Soviet Union was. The Hungarian uprising happened in "their" sphere. If the Soviets had come into Germany, it would have been very easy to answer the question of what to do. Or if they had gone into Greece. But they went into a country in "their" area. I hate to use the term, "sphere of influence." I'm certainly not going to blame Presidents Roosevelt and Truman or anyone else. There was a general agreement that things that happened on "that" side of the line were a Soviet responsibility.

Q: Well, certainly, Hungary was a Warsaw Pact country.

MORGAN: All right--there's the real answer to your question. It's as accurate as any other.

Q: How about the Suez crisis of 1956?

MORGAN: I arrived in Paris in June, 1956. If I was in Paris at the time, I don't remember any direct involvement in this matter. I remember very well the years involved to get the British and French...

Q: If you arrived after the Suez incident, you must have noticed the wedge that came between certain NATO countries.

MORGAN: Between us, on the one hand, and Britain and France on the other. I certainly remember the British and the French squawking like crazy about the "duplicitous" nature of the United States. They said that we couldn't be trusted, that we were a horrible country, and so forth. I don't remember any particular feeling within NATO. I went on to the United Kingdom for my next tour. There, of course, the memory of U. S. behavior at the time of the Suez Crisis lingered on. However, this usually came from the very conservative, older people who still resented Britain's losing her Empire. But there was no such feeling in NATO, that I recall. Maybe a few words here and there.

Q: Can you think of any other memorable experience during your time at USRO? Then you also worked for a time under Ambassador Amory Houghton?

MORGAN: The most memorable thing was that my wife and I found ourselves once more in Paris. This time we had two children. Our son was just a couple of months old, but our daughter went to kindergarten and first grade in Paris. That was a very happy experience. We lived right on the Champ de Mars, under the Eiffel Tower. We had a little Dauphine car--our very first. We lived a very lovely, personal life. We had good friends, we did a lot of traveling around. My wife had friends in the American community. The French weren't terribly welcoming, but we learned that--or she learned it. Also, and far more important, it answered the question in her mind--and in the minds of many wives and mothers--as to whether children could get along in the Foreign Service. She had wondered what she could do, how she could live--especially in a country where what is spoken is not your first language, and things are "different." Living under the Eiffel Tower was an aspect commented on by all kinds of friends and relatives. That was a very "plus" part of the assignment. Another "plus" part--and maybe you sensed this from my answers to your questions about NATO--was that the Ambassador and my colleagues were pleasant, professional people.

However, Mike Rives, who was Staff Aide to our Ambassador to France, Amory Houghton--a very distinguished, wonderful man--went on home leave. Then his father died, and he was gone from Paris for about three or four months. So I was designated to replace him, temporarily. I think that this was the "off" season in NATO, the "mois d'août," or the "month of August," when most French take their vacations. We used to say that the biggest secret we had in NATO was that during the month of August, when everyone goes home, the Soviets could take over Western Europe if they set their mind to it.

That job was totally different from my job as Staff Aide to Ambassador Burgess in USRO. It was much more personal, more involved, and much more "traditional Foreign Service," if you will. Amory Houghton was a wonderful man and a complete gentleman. He had been President of Corning Glass and Steuben Glass and all that. He was a very warm person--he trusted me with everything. Fortunately, Charlie Yost was the DCM -- Deputy Chief of Mission, number two in the Embassy. When he was briefing me on my new duties, he said, "Remember, you will know more than anyone in this Embassy about that man. You will know more of his weaknesses. You will know more about things that you can't tell anybody, and you won't want to tell anybody." Not that Amory Houghton was a "dirty old man." Yost said: "The hardest part of your job--and the most important part of your job--is learning the integrity you must show at all times being close to power."

I did, indeed, learn this, but it was also a lot of fun. The job was an active one. I would have the French Foreign Minister on the phone. All kinds of things happened, if you want me to describe associations with powerful people. There was Ambassador Robert D. Murphy, who had previously been Consul General in Algiers prior to the Allied landings in North Africa in 1942 and who handled negotiations with the French looking toward an orderly Allied takeover of that area. But at the time we're talking about he was deeply involved in the negotiations with the French independence movement in North Africa, which he conducted from his base in Paris. He had an office around the corner from mine. He was "the" U.S. expert on French-North African affairs, and most respected. He went to the highest position in the Foreign Service: Career Ambassador. There were contacts of that kind in my job with Ambassador Houghton.

The NATO experience was interesting, involving the consideration of Soviet behavior and all of that. But there was a far more direct and personal relationship with Ambassador Houghton.

One day Ambassador Houghton buzzed me. I went in. He said, "I've got Secretary of State Dulles on the phone. I want you to hear this." Often that is what staff aides did with Dulles: they transcribed what he said. You could be sure that he had somebody on the phone in the Department listening in and also taking notes.

The subject matter might have involved the Suez Canal or North Africa. I remember that it was a very important issue at the time. Ambassador Houghton said, "No, Foster! It's wrong, Foster. No, it won't work. I can tell you that it won't." Then Ambassador Houghton said, after Dulles had said something, "OK, you're paid to be the boss." The Ambassador hung up and said to me, "Who the hell is running the show around here? That railroad has no one in charge of it." So you got these little, marvelous bits and pieces--unusual for an inexperienced officer.

The other story was far more personal, far more heartening. Ambassador Houghton had cancer of the larynx. He had had an operation for this condition before he came to Paris. He had a box-like affair in his throat. He would exhale air across it in his larynx. That was the way he spoke. He could talk, and it came out all right, but it was a very difficult process, and you obviously had to listen carefully. He had difficulty in talking, as he was blowing air. He had trained himself. Perhaps he had some other device to help him.

On every July 4 we had a routine. Every American Ambassador at the time did this. And I was associated with the routine when I returned as Consul General. You went to the grave of Lafayette, the great French leader who, in effect, "won" the American Revolution for us. The American Ambassador always made a speech on the occasion and deposited a wreath of flowers. The flag was displayed. This was a traditional event. You also had to bow a little bit to the Comte de Somebody, who was Lafayette's heir, supposedly. In my time he was a pompous jerk. The Ambassador asked me to draft a little speech on the occasion. He said, "I want it translated into French." The Ambassador took French lessons every day at the residence. At 6:00 AM every day, if I remember correctly, the French teacher arrived. As the great day approached, the Ambassador said, "I'm going to try to give the speech in French." So I translated it and then had a French speaker do a "real" translation. So the Ambassador had the English and the French versions when we got to the grave side--just he and I in his limo, flag flying--and maybe a military attaché to make the ceremony "look pretty."

I watched the Ambassador at the grave side. He reached into his right pocket, where he had the English version. He looked at it and then reached his hand into his left pocket and took out the French version. Then and there I choked up. I was on the verge of tears at the effort the Ambassador was making. He got about the first line out and then put it back in his pocket. He had memorized the speech in French. That's a personal anecdote, but the memory of it stays with me clearly to this day.

Q: What was your interaction with the "locals" the French?

MORGAN: The "locals"--or Foreign Service Nationals (FSNs), as we call them today--are a very interesting subject. I talked a little bit about this in my previous interview. We had the World War II phenomenon with FSNs who were local employees of the Embassy or the Consulates--people who went to work, in many cases not particularly well trained. They perhaps did not speak English very well. After all, 1956 was only about 10 years after the end of World War II. A lot of the French "local" employees of our Embassy and Consulates were not very competent. I certainly have complete respect for "local" employees who were competent, and I could name them. However, an awful lot of them were getting "desperate." They were in their 50's. Some even recognized that they knew that they had probably exceeded their level of competence. They were going to "hang on" to their jobs for obvious reasons. So we did have some problems.

Now, as far as the Staff Aide to the Ambassador in Paris was concerned, there was no problem whatsoever, because the Staff Aide and the French "locals" get along, by definition. I knew that there were all kinds of things going on, and they reached me. Very properly, they formed a union, but it was very ineffective. I was involved in that. The Administrative Counselor and the DCM were obviously very much involved but I had a piece of the action..

The answer to your question is that this was the beginning of "troubled times." When I was in Paris as Consul General (1978-81), they were reaching their peak. Many of our local employees were then in their 60's and were being "encouraged" or forced to retire. I understand that the Foreign Service Nationals in our posts in Germany were in an even worse position than the French.

Q: For the record, can you explain what "Foreign Service National" means?

MORGAN: We used to call them "Foreign Service Local" employees. That was part of the problem. Understandably, they didn't like to be called "locals," which had a pejorative implication and was used at times in a pejorative sense. The "Foreign Service National," to use a politically more correct term, is usually a citizen of the nation where the post is located. He or she is hired by the American personnel officers and section chiefs to perform essentially clerical or secretarial, unclassified--from a security classification standpoint--functions. The jobs are usually labor intensive--in the Consular Section, for example. However, they have continuity. The FSNs stay on for many years. The American junior officers at the post come and go. The Ambassadors come and go. The Foreign Service National is simply "loaded" with knowledge. Sometimes, he or she has the wrong kind of knowledge. In Beirut, for example, they sometimes gave out misinformation, because egos were involved or there were conspiracies against certain groups, or whatever. So you could have a negative side to Foreign Service Nationals.

However, I would say that the positive side was first and foremost. They were loyal to the United States, with some exceptions. They sometimes were put in jail. However, I'm thinking of France. They were bureaucratic, but that word comes with the language.

In consular work we may have supervised them better. However, we certainly recognized that they were passive in their attitude. Also, remember well that they usually were in direct contact with the public. In the rest of the Embassy, this was not so much the case. Yes, there were receptionists in direct contact with the public. In the Political Section some of them went out and made contacts with certain political parties. For the most part the Administrative Section had the largest number of Foreign Service National employees--budget and fiscal, general services, and all that. They did mainly staff work, if you will.

About this time, or certainly in the 1960s, we reduced significantly the U.S. Foreign Service Staff corps in the Foreign Service. We now have, in consular work, for example, only Foreign Service Officers. Foreign Service secretaries and communications experts are specialists in what continues as a Staff corps. However, a lot of the clerical work at our posts that was formerly done by the Staff Corps is now done by Foreign Service Nationals.

Q: What was special about NATO--your Paris assignment at the time of which we are speaking? What did you learn from it?

MORGAN: Well, hopefully, I learned how to be a Foreign Service Officer. I think that I learned more about the traditional Foreign Service, and from a very important vantage point in Embassy Paris. In USRO I learned a lot about international relations and politics and power. One of the most important things to learn in the Foreign Service is how to be around power--how to be around rank, privilege, snobbism. How to be around an awful lot of things that you were not necessarily taught at home. In French society you would be taught about them. Obviously, lots of Americans are very conversant with power and all that but who don't come from IBM (International Business Machines) and Amory Houghton's background, and the like. Now, that style of operation has to be done well and most professionally -- and above all as a real representative of the United States. Every so often we "lost" a few people who "sank" into the local background, as occasionally happened, for example, at our Consulate in Nice France. Like associating with Grace Kelly, the Princess of Monaco, and David Niven and the glitterati. It goes to their head, if you will.

I think that my wife and I learned that right away. If you're standing next to the President of the United States, so what else is new? More importantly, you learn the techniques of how to get along--how one writes, organizes, defends oneself. If you can't talk on your feet, understand why the other person thinks the way he or she does--differently, because they are from a different culture, you're in trouble professionally. Somehow, you have to relate to those around you, and empathize with them. At the same time you must remember that you are there to protect your own country. Therefore, you're trying to learn how a different culture or political setting works, so that you can better defend your own country and better explain your own society. Those are the American representatives who are the best. You know, there were 15 NATO countries and France by itself. You were exposed to a lot of very important, learning experiences. You also learn how to survive. I learned very, very quickly that good personal relationships are vital. You might be transferred to another post, but maybe that other person will come back and haunt you some day.

JOHN W. TUTHILL
Minister of Economic Affairs
Paris (1956-1959)

Ambassador John W. Tuthill entered the Foreign Service in 1940. He was ambassador to the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development from 1960-1962 and to Brazil from 1966-1969. Ambassador Tuthill was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1987.

TUTHILL: In 1956 I was asked to go to Paris as Minister of Economic Affairs. I protested, saying I didn't know French. I had three years of high school French. I found the German scene something I knew about. But I was ordered to go and I did. That was in 1956, and that was a time when the European Army idea was collapsing.

Q: What did they call it?

TUTHILL: European Defense Community.

Q: European Defense Community. Where it would be one large army with maybe at the brigade level, various national units.

TUTHILL: That's right. And it was lost in the French Parliament under Mendes France. It was probably kind of a naive idea, because they never got over questions about such items as hats, you know. The Italians insisted upon those hats with feathers.

Q: Feathers. The Bersaglieri. [Laughter]

TUTHILL: [Laughter]

Q: I think I was talking to Douglas MacArthur, who was saying that the idea was raised by the French with the idea that nobody would ever accept it, it was so almost absurd. And then it caught fire to a certain extent for a while.

TUTHILL: Conant was in favor of it. Once I got into Paris, I became involved in the role of the French in European unity. For the first time, I met this man.

Q: You're pointing to a picture of Jean Monnet.

TUTHILL: That's right. It's funny. The other day -- well, I've done this a couple of times for the Monnet Foundation, because I had a long relationship with Monnet. Then there's a man in Britain, Francois Duchene, who succeeded -- oh, in any event, he was the second head of the International Institute for Strategic Studies in London. Francois is now writing books and articles. He's writing about Monnet's role in the OECD and the European Community.

When I left the service, I had several boxes of documents, and unlike Kissinger and a lot of other people, I turned mine over to security. I said, "I want you to go through these. I want you to declassify the ones that I can take home and put in my own closet, and you can keep the rest." Of course, they reduced the documents to those in a very small box. I left the service in '69, after all and hadn't time to examine these declassified documents.

But when Francois Dechene, who was an old friend, came and said, "What role did Monnet have in terms of the OECD?" which I had negotiated on the American side, I said, "Really very little." He said, "When did you first meet Monnet?" I said, "I think in 1958. But here are all these documents. Go over and sit down and read them." Well, it just shows how faulty one's memory can be because Duchene started picking up memoranda of conversations of Monnet and myself in '56 and '57 and the whole question of how to establish a new Atlantic relationship between the United States and the unified Europe. [Laughter]

So now this particular interview can be a little more accurate - thanks to Duchene. It's quite clear that after coming to Paris in the summer of '56, through '56 and '57, I was seeing Monnet quite regularly and became a convinced advocate of European unity. I was skeptical at first, but I became convinced that we couldn't have any long-term adequate relationship between the United States on one side and the individual European countries on the other, that technology and developments and everything else had made the idea of a U.S.-French or U.S.-German or even U.S.-British relationship of interest and of some importance, but that this was not a balanced viable long-term relationship.

Q: To develop this a little further, what would technology and all have to do with a relationship, say, with France?

TUTHILL: Well, the fact is that because of technology, the individual European markets were not large enough. We have a market of 240 million people; they have 40 or 50 million people. In many processes in the industrial world, the smaller market had to have access to a larger one.

Secondly, in the military field, it is ridiculous. In the first place, the French and the British are developing their nuclear forces, and there was no country in Europe that could balance the buildup of the Russians in conventional and, ultimately, in nuclear arms. So because of technology, both in economic and industrial field and the need for markets, and in the military field because of the relationship with nuclear to conventional warfare, it seemed to me that the national state was inadequate.

Incidentally, some of us are now talking about what we should do with the 100th anniversary of Monnet's birth, and I've stumbled on the idea that in Monnet's life, the villain of his time was excessive sovereignty. This is the big break between Monnet and De Gaulle. With De Gaulle, the nation was everything, and with Monnet, the nation had to give up sovereignty to have a sensible world wide relationship. And it seems to me that in the commemoration of Monnet, we can combine his fight against excessive sovereignty with one subject which can only be resolved in the international field, and that's environmental issues, especially in Europe, but even in the United States, the United States and Canada and other countries. Speaking in terms of the ecology, the nation state is obviously unable to resolve the issue. Just think of the Rhine in Europe. You cannot resolve it without giving up some of your sovereignty.

Q: Would you call yourself a disciple or a convert because of Monnet, or was this something that came from both your own examination and also from instructions from Washington?

TUTHILL: Well, not instructions from Washington, because they didn't really come through until the Kennedy Administration and George Ball as Under Secretary. Then we did have coherent instructions on that, because Kennedy accepted the idea -- critically at first, but then later he accepted it. No, I think that bit by bit I became convinced that the individual European states, acting separately, did not represent a firm alliance relationship with the United States. They were too small, we could push them around, and a lot of people want to push them around. I heard the other day a lecture by Taft, the Deputy Secretary of Defense.

Q: This is William Howard Taft IV, I believe.

TUTHILL: Something like that. And he said quite explicitly, "We don't really want to deal with a unified European military group; we want to deal with individual states." This is a short-sighted, small approach. It's going to result in a lot of unbalanced bilateral relationships. So that, no, gradually I think that the very force of the problems that confronted us, pushing me towards advocacy of some kind of unification.

No question that Monnet influenced me very much, because Monnet, when he left the Coal and Steel Community in Luxembourg and prepared for the Rome Treaty with the Common Market and Euratom, established an Action Committee for the United States of Europe, and he always said the key word was "action." Monnet was not a great philosopher; he had a great instinct for political power. And on his action committee, he had in all the European countries the two main parties -- the conservative, mostly Christian Democratic parties, and the Socialists or Labor parties and the trade unions. And he said to me, "You know, I'm not going to worry about governments. If I get agreement between the two major political parties in each of these countries and the trade unions, the government has to go along. So I'm not going to worry about the governments. I'm going to deal with the loci of power in country by country." So Monnet took what was a general idea on the part of a certain number of Europeans and a certain number of Americans and was the great do-er or action man.

But in terms of Washington, to come back to that, the Kennedy Administration, once Kennedy came in and George Ball became Under Secretary of State, there was a group -- I called it a conspiracy, but I'm using the word "conspiracy" in kind of a facetious manner. There was a small group of us who were convinced that European unity was definitely in the American long-term interest. With Rusk and with Ball and with Kennedy, then I had instructions from Washington which were consistent with my own convictions. [Laughter]

Q: Under the Eisenhower Administration, did you feel that you were preaching to deaf ears, or were you preaching on this as far as what you were reporting back?

TUTHILL: Well, it was kind of a mixed scene, actually, with Eisenhower, because Eisenhower recognized in the military field the need for increased unity. It was under Eisenhower that I negotiated the OECD agreement. And when the Kennedy Administration came in, George Ball came to me. I had known George when he was a lawyer here in town, and he said, "Look, this thing was negotiated under Eisenhower, and perhaps we ought to start all over again and renegotiate it under Kennedy."

And I said, "That would be very foolish. The way it's been negotiated under Eisenhower, it's open for all sorts of constructive work. It depends entirely on the role of the American government. If we get behind it, we can get the coordination of the economic and financial policies that we're talking about, increased and improved aid to the developing countries and that sort of thing."

I didn't get resistance from the Eisenhower Administration. Towards the end of that administration, I became more involved. John Foster Dulles had died, had been succeeded by Chris Herter. Doug Dillon was the number two man in the State Department. Dillon had been ambassador in Paris when I was there, a good ambassador. Dillon, while not a strong advocate of European unity, wasn't against it either. He was the one that made it possible for us to negotiate to change of the OEEC into the OECD. So I didn't get resistance from the Eisenhower Administration, but I didn't get the clear policy line that I got once Ball and Walter Heller, Bob Roosa and Jim Tobin came in with the Kennedy administration.

Q: Looking back on it, did you feel that your advocacy and belief of our participation in the OECD that you were able to play a role there? You were sort of, in a way, writing some of your own instructions?

TUTHILL: Oh, yes. I think that's always the way in the Foreign Service. Sometimes you pose a question to Washington and then go back to Washington to prepare the reply. That was pretty much possible during the Eisenhower Administration, because Chris Herter, a good man, was Secretary of State but not really interested very much in this. Dillon as number two man, who looked more or less favorably, and Bob Murphy as the number three man in the State Department. So we had people who were serious and devoted, even though they didn't have the conviction that I had as to what should happen, so that once we got the OECD, (if we jump from that to 1961 when the OECD started), these were, for me, really very thrilling days, because we had the new team. In the first place, George Ball was the key one. But the economic advisor, Walter Heller, Jim Tobin, you know, at Yale, the Nobel Prize winner, Kermit Gordon and Bob Roosa.

DANIEL L. HOROWITZ
Labor Attaché
Paris (1956-1960)

Dr. Daniel L. Horowitz graduated from New York University, completing a Master's Degree in Political Science and Labor Economics. He served as the first labor attaché in the American Foreign Service. This interview was conducted in 1994 by Herbert Weiner.

HOROWITZ: So much for the EUR period. Unless you have any further questions, let me move on to my assignment in France in 1956. I should say that for about a year, ten months in 1954 and 1955, I again was on leave of absence, spending most of it in Italy, part of it at Harvard in Cambridge, and continued my research for the book that eventually was written and published, so that I didn't have a continuous period from 1951 to 1956, but had this interrupted by the 10 months of leave. In any event, by late 1955 it had been decided that I would be assigned to Paris.

I succeeded Dick Eldridge, who had been Labor Attaché at the Embassy in Paris from 1944 until his transfer in 1955, more than eleven years. Let me take just a moment to talk about Dick Eldridge. I think he deserves some underscoring as one of the bright stars in the early period of the Labor Attaché Program. Eldridge had known France intimately over half a lifetime by the time he became Labor Attaché. He had been a volunteer in the French Army in the First World War and had served in France for the International Chamber of Commerce for a number of years. During the period when he was Labor Attaché he was intimately associated with the whole range of trade union, employer association, government, and political people. Eldridge was regarded in France as an intimate associate of all those interested in the political-labor situation and was accepted as such by the French. His relations on the American side were extremely good; he was highly respected by American officials in the Embassy, the State Department in Washington, and elsewhere.

He had one ideosyncrasy, which perhaps might be called a limitation and yet didn't limit his influence, and that was that he hated to write reports, and he wrote very little. Part of this was an inhibition against writing; part of it was that he did not trust the distribution system and felt the kind of analysis which he usually embarked on would end up with a lot of people who knew nothing about the French situation and would misuse the information. One of his favorite methods of reporting was to tear a restaurant menu in half, use the half as a post card and scribble comments and insights on the French situation [and send it] in the open mails which he felt were safer frequently than the classified documents. He was well regarded throughout government. A few people, perhaps more interested in form than substance, more concerned with having the reporting requirements fulfilled than the insight and influence which grew out of Eldridge's relationships, were critical, but they were few and had little influence.

In any event, my coming to Paris to replace Eldridge represented an interesting challenge but a rather different one from what had been frequently the case for Labor Attachés assigned in a new post; that is, the Embassy and the State Department recognized labor as a vital and fundamental influence on the stability of the country. Trying to step into Eldridge's shoes was a considerable challenge, but at least it didn't represent the necessity of convincing people that labor was important. In any event, I went about developing my associations on the French scene, trade union, employer association, political, government, and journalists. The latter were useful, from the Agence France Press and some of the important newspapers from Le Monde to others. They were worth cultivating as they followed the labor-political scene intimately and were quite knowledgeable.

In any event, over time my associations were wide and close, and the test of the role that a Labor Attaché can play came dramatically, when in 1958 the French military in Algeria rose up against the French Government. The Government was faced with a rebellion in which de Gaulle eventually came back to power. The background, of course, was that the French had been attempting to hang on in Algeria for years in a military situation where the Algerian nationalists had been attempting to fight free, and increasingly frustrated by the march of events, the military finally revolted. May 13, 1958, then became the crucial date, the date of the uprising, and during the following approximately two weeks, there was utter chaos in the country. Keeping up with events, attempting to report on developments, to analyze what was happening then became a difficult task, because the normal channels were closed for normal operation of government and the political parties. It turned out that the only people in the Embassy who had the kinds of contacts that were meaningful in this situation were myself and one of the young political officers, who had intimate contacts with various political party people. In any event, this period was a rather dramatic one, not only for France, but personally for me in that it meant a lot of chasing about, little sleep, reporting all hours of the night. It became rather dramatic with time that there was no way that the government could gain control of a situation that was rapidly running out of the normal channels of administration, so much so that when de Gaulle announced his availability for return to power, and that he would be the only one who could save the situation for France, there was little that the political parties felt they could do to prevent this.

The one dramatic gesture which was attempted by the Communist CGT was to announce that they would call a general strike throughout the country in order to defend democracy and prevent de Gaulle from coming to power. They made this conditional on the agreement of Force Ouvriere, the Independent Social Democratic Trade Union, and of the Christian Democratic Trade Union, CFTC. It was during that dramatic weekend when the political parties, feeling they could do little to overcome the situation, and the Socialist Party executive committee met during the evening of Saturday to urge that Force Ouvriere go along with the request of the CGT to call the general strike. It turned out that Force Ouvriere played the crucial role of holding the line against the Communist assumption of leadership. The CFTC had decided that it would do, whatever the Force Ouvriere decided to do: It would follow along in the general strike if the Force Ouvriere did; it would oppose it, if Force Ouvriere opposed it.

The Force Ouvriere Executive Bureau met during the night of Saturday to Sunday and Robert Bothereau, who was then the General Secretary, took the position and succeeded in convincing his executive to go along with him, to oppose the general strike. His position was that if a general strike was called, the Communist Party, the CGT and the Communists through them, would then become again the group which would claim to have defended democracy, and that since the workers had no arms, the situation would turn into a Spanish civil war telescoped into 24 hours in that the military first would intervene, and the workers would be overcome with a great deal of violence. Again, the Communists would be able to play the heroes, but the result would be not that de Gaulle would come to power, but the most reactionary and anti-democratic military officials would, in fact, take power, destroying the trade unions as well as democratic institutions.

Bothereau, who had had the reputation, and had been criticized by some Americans, of being too mild-mannered, too introspective to be effective as a leader against the Communists, turned out that night to contradict all of the generalizations that had been made about him. In any event, once the Force Ouvriere decided not to go along with the general strike, to oppose it, the CFTC going along with them, the CGT, the Communists, were forced to pull in their horns, cancel the general strike call, and simply have a demonstration strike of 24 hours in industry. De Gaulle did come to power, of course, with the approval in Parliament of the traditional political parties who felt they had no alternative but to go along.

What was interesting is that there is little reference when this period is discussed by historians to the crucial potential role which this call for a general strike might have played and would have played had Force Ouvriere not played the role it did. At the time, however, it was recognized for what it was, and again labor dramatically became a crucial element in at least not saving the pre-existing democratic institutions, but keeping the situation sufficiently within control to have a transfer of power to de Gaulle within at least the formal institutions of pre-existing government.

Q: Dan, did Irving Brown play a role in these events, and can you describe what his relationships might have been with Bothereau at the time?

HOROWITZ: Well, yes. Irving Brown, as I discussed earlier, had been very much in contact with the anti-Communists in the French trade union scene, during the famous effort of the Communists in the winter of 1947 to 1948 to destroy the French economy and prevent it from recovering through their general strike. During that period when those who were opposed to the Communists left and organized Force Ouvriere, Irving Brown was very much involved with these people whom he had known quite well in the previous year or two, working at that time within the CGT. He continued, of course, to have important relations with the Force Ouvriere people throughout the succeeding period. That he played a particular role that night, no. This was Force Ouvriere alone. This was Bothereau alone, and the decisions made were not influenced particularly by outside elements. They were determined by the Force Ouvriere trade union officials.

What was interesting and useful was that having, as I had by that time, free access through long-time association with trade union leaders in the Force Ouvriere, I could call and did call Bothereau at 12 at night or two in the morning and discuss whatever developments were on the horizon at the time. It should be kept in mind that when this crisis started on May 13, the political parties realized that they were in a situation in which they could no longer function as they normally did. What was required because of the expectation that dramatic developments might call for a drastic response (the landing of the insurgents on the mainland was feared), what was required they felt was that there be contact throughout the country with the masses of people, and the political parties could not serve that function. Only the Communist Party had that kind of structure. What did exist, however, were the trade unions, and here the Socialist Party, in agreement with other parties, called on Force Ouvriere to use its machinery, its structure, to keep in intimate contact with the people throughout the country, and it did this by calling out Force Ouvriere to turn its offices into a 24-hour alert system. All Force Ouvriere offices throughout the country, all local unions, all regional unions, all provincial unions, went on a 24-hour alert. They were the means through which communication could be effected from the center to the country, from Paris throughout the provinces. It dramatized the fact that the machinery of the trade union movement is uniquely structured to serve the kind of political function which normally is not required in a democratic country but which fit the requirements of that emergency situation.

After the advent of de Gaulle to power in May of 1958, there were no dramatic changes on the labor scene for the next following years in that the same kind of competition which existed before continued. De Gaulle did turn things around in Algeria in the sense that he did eventually give Algeria independence, and while it was a slow and painful process for France, nonetheless it was achieved within three years.

As far as my own assignment was concerned, in the period immediately before my transfer in 1960, I was slated to go to the National War College. This assignment was changed when it was urged on me that instead, I accept an assignment to India, where it was felt the situation was tense as a result of the policies of the Nehru Government in playing a third-world role of neutrality leaning toward the Soviet Union. The trade union picture in India became terribly important as the independent trade unions, the trade unions independent of the Congress Party, mainly Socialist unions -- the Hind Mazdoor Sabha trade union organization (HMS) -- could play a crucial role in whether or not the general political scene swung more definitely in the direction of the Soviet Union. The Hind Mazdoor Sabha, being a Socialist-oriented trade union organization and very much a minority, nonetheless had a very vital importance, because its principal strength was in the transportation field -- the longshoremen, stevedores, railroad unions -- and it counted for a great deal as a result.

ALAN W. LUKENS
International Staff, North Atlantic Treaty Organization
Paris (1956-1960)

Political Officer
Paris (1961-1963)

Ambassador Alan W. Lukens was born and raised in Philadelphia. He joined the Foreign Service in 1951. His career included positions in Turkey, Martinique, France, Morocco, South Africa, Senegal, and Kenya, and an ambassadorship to the Congo. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1989.

LUKENS: Then at the end of '57 suddenly a call from PER came asking me if I'd be interested in working on the International Staff of NATO in Paris. So I jumped at that and headed off to Paris at the beginning of '58.

Q: What were you doing in Paris?

LUKENS: I was on the International Staff of NATO, one of a handful of young men who were assistants to the Secretary General, Paul Henri Spaak. I was the only American there and it was a bit of a dog robber, "gofer" job but very interesting. I met lots of people, and Eisenhower came over to the Summit Meeting during that period. We were in the old Palais Chaillot on the Seine River until it finally moved. It was an interesting way to see how multilateral organizations worked, and I think it was worthwhile.

Q: First, could you give me your impression of how Paul Henri Spaak worked, and how effective, or not effective, he was?

LUKENS: Spaak was very much of an European. It was a funny kind of a situation because you remember NATO was first in England and Lord Ismay, the first Secretary General, was very British oriented. And then when NATO moved to Paris and you had Spaak, a Francophone, running it. He had a funny little fellow, whose name slips me, who was a Frenchman, very secretive type, who was his Directeur de Cabinet, and it was very hard to find out what was going on in his office, although that was sort of one of my surreptitious jobs to help out the U.S. delegation from the inside. I worked directly for a wonderful Britisher, Lord Coleridge, a grandson of the famous Samuel Coleridge. He was a retired navy captain, a wonderful man. But his world and what he did there were totally different from Spaak's. Spaak was Mr. Europe. He had the original idea of European integration and so on and he tried to put that into effect. But he ran into resistance from the Anglophones -- pretty much from us, from the Canadians, from the Brits, although the Germans, French, and Italians, kind of hopped on board with him. I think in the long run he had the future spirit of Europe, and he was probably a good man for the position at that point.

Q: But the way he was running this, as you saw it, was really for European integration rather than a military organization?

LUKENS: In those days the Americans were so dominant, we were so dominant on the military side that the Europeans chose to pretty much use the political side, the civilian side, for their purposes. I'm not sure you can blame them, but that's kind of what happened. So Spaak used the International Staff of NATO to begin to develop European unity and work on those channels. Sort of let the military side to the Americans which was the way it had originally been set up.

Q: Did you see any problems, that you were dealing with at the professional level, going off in different directions?

LUKENS: Some of it was a little esoteric. I was Secretary for a bunch of committees that were planning for the great days of disaster, petroleum planning, overseas shipping, internal European transport. We had meetings every couple of months, or twice a year, of all the NATO countries. All of the civil servants from their respective areas would come in and we'd develop these papers, argue over moot points, and all of this was a little remote because nobody really thought if another war came that anybody would be sitting around a table figuring out how NATO should organize train transport in Europe, for example. I think, hopefully, since then it's become a little more realistic than it was at that time.

Q: Talk about realism. Right now we're talking in November of 1989 and tremendous things are happening in Eastern Europe, and in the Soviet Union, and we're really re-thinking the whole NATO structure, will Germany unite. It's a time of great ferment as we're talking, but one of the questions that I think future historians will ask, and that is, how seriously did we think of the Soviet Union as a threat? And how realistic was that threat?

LUKENS: Well, I think we took the threat very seriously. How realistic it was is perhaps another question. I think one of the problems with NATO, and problems with the whole European structure with SHAPE and everything, is that the conventional wisdom kind of gets handed down from generation to generation. Perhaps that's going too far, but each turnover pretty much continues the same thing. When we were there, they developed nuclear planning committees and there were various developments on weapons and this and that, but basically the focus of NATO was on the Soviet threat. There was very little advance thinking, or wondering what might happen if the threat changed. The threat was taken as a given and everybody worked on that rather than thinking how change could be brought about in the Soviet Union, or what we would do for contingency planning if something happened; as it has now.

Q: Well, how about the thinking about a integrated Europe? As you say, Paul Henri Spaak was really putting his interest here, and you were acting, I assume, although you were attached to his staff, obviously you had your liaison with the United States. How interested were our people at that time in '58 to '60 on the American side in the integration? How realistic did they think it was?

LUKENS: I don't think they were that interested. Of course, during that period de Gaulle came in and became the great leader in France and then eventually showed his antipathy toward the UK and the US, but balanced that with his rapport with Adenauer and trying to build up the esprit de corps of Western Europe which he considered, of course, to be France and Germany, with Benelux and Italy sort of trailing behind. I think we didn't give it much thought (European integration), we just considered NATO as more important. I remember arguments going on while the Europeans wanted to do it this way, or they wanted to transfer something to the Western European Unions. This is still happening. And we would block it and say this is a NATO affair, it should be kept in NATO. I think that's pretty much what went on. I don't think we ever came out expressly against European unity, but somehow we didn't want to muddy the works of NATO.

Q: By the way, were you all looking at the French internal situation at the time?

LUKENS: That was all kind of a separate drama. We were right there in the middle of Paris, during the famous 13th of May, '58 when all hell broke loose in Algiers and de Gaulle as a result of that came into power. It was very dramatic, and nobody knew whether there'd be an invasion of North Africa by the right wing or not. So, of course, that was very much the background, even though business went on almost too much as usual right there in the NATO Headquarters.

Q: At least under Spaak he was keeping everybody's eye on a hand on the helm, full-speed ahead, and let's let the French situation take care of itself more or less.

LUKENS: Yes, well I don't think there was much that NATO could do about it, except that basically Spaak and de Gaulle's viewpoints were somewhat similar, with Spaak being more of a diplomat and thinking more of central Europe per se, and de Gaulle obviously fixing on France. But, nevertheless, they were on somewhat the same wave length I would say, and I don't think Spaak was displeased to see de Gaulle come in.

Q: How about on the American side? How did the official Americans feel about de Gaulle?

LUKENS: I'm not so sure in that period. When I went back to Paris -- we'll talk about that later -- I saw a lot more of it at that point about how to deal with de Gaulle. At the beginning I don't think that much had happened, because that was before the Reform of the constitution and so, as you remember, he was just Prime Minister at first before the referendum on the constitution of the Fifth Republic was ever made.

Q: So in Paris you were there...I have it from '61 to '63. Is that right?

LUKENS: Yes. I went there when General Gavin was Ambassador, Kennedy's Ambassador. He'd picked him out. He'd been a hero in the war, the 82nd Airborne.

Q: Yes, one of the first men to jump into France on D-Day.

LUKENS: Yes, and a very nice guy. What had happened...they kind of kept this from me. I was supposed to go and be the African expert in the Embassy, I thought. I got over there at the end of the summer. I went to the Embassy, and called on Ambassador Gavin as I was supposed to do the first day, and he asked me about my war record. And that was all he ever asked. I said, "Thank you, Mr. Ambassador," and went back to my desk. And then I was called back in, a couple of hours later, and I discovered that most of the people in the Embassy had never even met him. And he said, "Okay, you'll do." And I said, "What do you mean, Mr. Ambassador?" Well, it turned out that he had set it up for me to be his Special Assistant, so that I would be so busy with that, that I wouldn't have time to worry about the past. He agreed in principle, but not until he saw me. So that's when I became his Special Assistant and that was a very active time, both personally and for Franco-American relations.

Q: Let's first talk about...more known as General Gavin, and known by many as Jumping Jim Gavin. Could you describe how he dealt in the Embassy, and his style of operation.

LUKENS: His style was military. He looked the part. He was beautifully dressed, lovely wife, nice kids, a beautiful collie. They were very photogenic. All the French papers made a big fuss over them. He didn't speak any French, and that was an enormous amount of work for everybody, trying to prepare speeches. Unfortunately, he didn't take much interest in the Embassy per se. He considered that the things would be done for him, and they were. Fortunately the DCM, Cecil Lyon, was a wonderful person -- is a wonderful person, he's still living. He kept things going, and he was an enormous help to me.

But most of the time was taken up, basically, with doing the movie, The Longest Day.

Q: Darryl Zanuck did a movie, Lyon wrote the book, and...

LUKENS: I forget who did it.

Q: And Zanuck did this movie of the D Day invasion.

LUKENS: And they had the premier of the movie that we all went to, there in Paris, and he was tied up with it. The other mistake that he made, frankly, was that he wouldn't give up Arthur D. Little. He had been chairman of the board, and he went back about once a month for board meetings. I guess they paid for it, it wasn't that, so much, but it was a bit of a distraction. But people liked him. He certainly had the "présence," and we went all around the country and did this and that, to the wine festivals. It was interesting to work for him. But the frustrating thing to him was, that he took the President's representative idea very, very much to heart. He came up with the idea, for example, that the way to win the hearts of the French was to give them a nuclear submarine, and he sent a private cable to Kennedy asking for this. And about a month later, he got back a kind of blah answer from the Desk Officer, saying the idea was sort of stupid. And that made him absolutely furious. He said he was the President's Personal Representative; he should have direct access, and he shouldn't be answered by some minion in the State Department; and, "Why didn't they take his idea seriously?" And this kind of frustration with the Washington bureaucracy, and the State Department, kind of built up in him. The result was that...I don't think he was really happy, and he didn't really stay very long.

Q: How did you see him dealing with the French? De Gaulle, but also the rest of the French government?

LUKENS: Well, of course, Kennedy's idea was a little naive; and that was, that the only way to deal with de Gaulle was to send another General. Well, when he first saw de Gaulle, de Gaulle kind of knocked him down by saying, "Well, you were just a colonel in those days," and made it clear that the fact that he was another general didn't cut much weight with de Gaulle. That wasn't to say de Gaulle was rude, of course not. But there was a little bit of a put-down there that meant that, "sure they were both generals, and they had both fought in the war, but that really had very little to do with Franco-American relations these days."

Q: What was the situation with Franco-American relations then, as you saw it?

LUKENS: My memory is perhaps a little hazy on this question; there are many more experts than myself. But it was a very tricky period because it was when de Gaulle was getting ready -- I forget exactly when he did it -- to move NATO out of Paris, up to Brussels, and break down the enormous American apparatus which we did have in France -- bases all over, and the headquarters of SHAPE, and even the PXs right in the city of Paris, and so on. I can't remember when he exactly surprised us with that idea but his whole idea of French independence, and France not being a kind of satellite of the United States, permeated de Gaulle's thinking. So we had one kind of rough period after another.

The other problem was a little bit of an internal one, a little touchy, and that was between Gavin and Norstad. Norstad had succeeded in the military better than Gavin had.

Q: Norstad was SHAPE commander -- was Air Force.

LUKENS: He was SHAPE commander, Air Force, and he got his fourth star and Gavin never did. Gavin, as you will recall, quit in '58 or '59 when he didn't get promoted. And then, he was the one to, sort of, take up the refrain that the U.S. was behind the Russians in the sputnik period, and that's what caught Kennedy's fancy. It wasn't that he was a Democrat, but he was complaining about the administration. So there was a little bit of irritation there, between who was responsible in France -- whether it was Norstad or Gavin. I used to see this in my humble position as Special Assistant, about who would call on whom, and the precedents, and the protocol. Norstad was very relaxed about it, but Gavin wasn't.

Q: How long did you hold this Special Assistant job?

LUKENS: I did it until Ambassador Bohlen came, and then he chose Bob Anderson, who had been in the Embassy and I moved over to be the African man in the Political Section.

Q: Could you describe Bohlen, and how he operated?

LUKENS: Well, it was like night and day. He was an old pro, the French liked him, they believed in him. His French was perfect. He knew what he was doing and he knew you weren't going to change de Gaulle overnight and we had to live with it. But there were ways of managing this change so that we would not lose our traditional friendship with the French. Under Bohlen the Embassy opened up to all different areas, it was much less protocolaire. Not that he didn't know what his protocol was -- I don't mean that -- but everybody in the Embassy really began to take off, whether they were the Russian expert, or the African this and that; he let everybody do his thing and the time that had been spent under Gavin -- I hate to use the word wasted -- but organizing his itinerary, writing his speeches, all of that stuff, was not devoted to much more substance.

Q: This is something that sometimes gets lost, and that is, by political appointees and sometimes career appointees too; but an Ambassador, if they come in, can demand a tremendous amount of time in order to give them support, whether writing speeches, arranging things, and all this, which you might say, can be their due, but at the same time it means the Embassy turns internal, and is jumping to the Ambassador's will, and he or she is the front person and much of the rest of the work is inhibited.

LUKENS: That's absolutely right and it's compounded when you've a language problem too. I mean a career Ambassador in France whips through anything in French as quickly as English, whether he's making a speech, reading newspapers, or what. Now you have a political one and you have to have somebody translate absolutely everything for him. Another distinction that I saw, in this case, and that I've seen in others, is that a political Ambassador believes that the USIS operation is to build his own image, and to toot his horn enough to win friends for Uncle Sam. So USIS would be a good example of the difference between how they had to work -- the USIS officers -- under Gavin and under Bohlen; completely focus on a new idea of working with the French and not just building up the Ambassador's image.

Q: This isn't off the course because I hope people who read this will understand how things work. But often a political Ambassador will think in terms that it's very important to get out and meet the people really almost as a political candidate, rather than to further American policy -- that if you meet enough people, shake enough hands, and get a high profile somehow this rebounds to the good of the United States which is really not the case.

LUKENS: That's absolutely right and that is very much the case there. I mean, as Gavin went around, looking very photogenic from town to town, everybody loved it, and he laid lots of wreaths but it had very little to do with the French political internal scene.

Q: What type of work were you doing after you left...

LUKENS: When I was still in Paris?

Q: In Paris, yes.

LUKENS: In the African Section; that was fun, because de Gaulle, at that point, was making a big fuss over the Africans. They had their independence and the French were trying very hard to keep them in their sphere. So there'd be one African state visit after another and I knew some of the people...Bohlen was not very interested, but he was very helpful. He didn't have time to attend all these events. I remember being invited -- I don't know whether it was Bohlen's invitation I got, or mine from the Central Africans -- but when President Dacko of the Central African Republic was in Paris, they held a big fancy gala at the Elysée. I was the American representative and after I went through the line and shook hands with a very austere de Gaulle, I got a big bear hug from President Dacko saying, "Mon-cher ami." And as I walked out the door - they were alone in the room -- I sort of turned around and I saw de Gaulle call a flunkie obviously to ask who I was. And a few minutes later the flunkie came easing up to me, when I was having a glass of champagne, and sort of said, "Who are you?" So that was kind of funny. That whole period was very interesting in Paris, and I got to know people at the Elysée and at the Quai d'Orsay who were working on French Africa. Then my old friend, who had been Governor General in Brazzaville, Yvon Bourges, became the Minister of Defense so that was fun. I enjoyed that period very much.

Q: How did we view the French relationship in Africa? Was it one where we said, "Okay, they're more or less doing the right thing and right-on," and stay out of it, and just monitor what was happening in Africa? Or did we see opportunities?

LUKENS: What I was pushing for then, and I did later as Ambassador in Brazzaville, and I always have, is that there are so many things that we can do that don't require money, only require a gesture. The way the French would handle every African visitor to Paris was just extraordinary. I mean, perhaps going beyond what we would ever do, in setting them up with this and that, but at least the airport arrivals, and the motorcycles, and the things that appeal to them. And we don't seem to be able to handle this kind of a thing, and it doesn't cost any money but it makes people feel good. I remember writing a whole cable about how the French did it, suggesting that this would be helpful if they would learn this kind of a thing in Washington. We could do something for these countries, and maybe this is superficial, but that's the way life was, rather than suddenly an "all or nothing", waiting for a hundred million dollar aid program; but when you didn't get it, give them nothing. There was never any question, and I don't think there still is, of supplanting the French in those areas. But the Africans want another string to their bow. And when the Soviets began to come in in some of those places, we didn't want them to be exclusively French or Soviet. And I think some of the French began to realize this; that they were in a better position if the British and Americans and Germans at least were there also, allowing a little bit more flexibility to the Africans, and reducing the dilemma that faced the African leaders.

Q: Well, at that time, were the French a bit suspicious of American motives in Africa? Because we had made a big deal in Africa, the Kennedy administration. Kennedy, of course, had made that statement, as a Senator, supporting Algeria and so all of this must have concerned the French. What reflections were you getting from the French?

LUKENS: Soapy made the remark, "Africa for the Africans." Oh, well, the French were very suspicious, but you had different gradations. I think in Paris...and that was one of the things I did in my job, was to try to persuade some of the French that basically we were not going to supplant them. That it was in their interests to have an American presence in those countries and not to be so worried about it. I think we made some progress with the French diplomats and the French officials. There was much less progress, and it's still a problem, with the French commercial sector. They had complexes, they were very, very jealous of anybody coming in and they didn't want to break up this good arrangement that they had, and still have in many places. I just came back from a trip to Abidjan, Ivory Coast. It's still very much a problem.

Q: Can you describe a little of the atmosphere within the Embassy about the attitude towards de Gaulle? Here's a dominating figure and one who was controversial then and still is...I'm talking about within the officer staff.

LUKENS: It's hard for me to recall exactly that. I mean he was the dominant figure, you're absolutely right, and nobody knew what to do about him, or how to play with him. I think we all felt that Washington was playing with him -- that's the word. That the Kennedy administration did not realize the depth of French feeling, and they were being a little bit too flippant in their remarks about France in Algeria and in its former colonies. But there were ways of saying these things without hitting the French head on. And these remarks that went on weren't really doing much good. They may have made a few Africans feel good, but were basically more designed for domestic use in the U.S., and therefore there were lots of better ways to handle de Gaulle. I think when Bohlen got there the situation did improve because he was able to manage that problem. It's hard to remember exactly what people thought about de Gaulle because he was so ambiguous and you couldn't think about anything French without thinking about de Gaulle at that time.

W. GARTH THORBURN
Assistant Agricultural Attaché
Paris (1956-1961)

W. Garth Thorburn was born in New York in 1928. Since joining the Foreign Service in 1954, his career has included positions in France, Brazil, Columbia, Nigeria, India and Turkey. He was interviewed by Allan Mustard in 2006.

THORBURN: Horace told me, he said, "I don't think you're ready to go overseas. If I had anything to do with it, you wouldn't go." I said, "Well, do you have anything to do with it?" He said, "No." I said, "Well, would you schedule my program?"

So the program was scheduled, and I left for Paris in June of 1956. I went to Paris and my principal officer was Paul George Minneman. He had a PhD from, I think, Ohio State, the first PhD that Ohio State gave in agricultural economics. He had served with OFAR (Office of Foreign Agricultural Relations) with the State Department and was one of the officers, senior officers, who decided to come to FAS rather than stay with State Department.

He was an excellent leader. I learned a lot from him. He was a good economist, had a good sense of duty. I spent five years there, then I was transferred to Sao Paulo, Brazil, as the agricultural officer in Sao Paulo.

Q: Could we stop in Paris for just a minute, because, of course, you were in Paris at the time when the European Coal and Steel Community was being formed, and there was a lot going on at that time to try to make sure that France and Germany would never go to war again, and the seeds were planted for what later grew into the European Community and then the European Union. Could you talk a little bit about what you were doing at that time and how events were unfolding that led up to the trade disputes we've had since then, since you left, with the European Community and European Union.

THORBURN: Well, my job as the third person, third officer, in the attaché office, was to gather trade statistics and to do reporting. Paul Minneman was basically responsible for policies and working with the Ministry of Agriculture and the foreign office as far as trade programs were concerned. We went through a very difficult transition period, and NATO (North Atlantic Treaty Organization) was headquartered in Paris at that time. General De Gaulle came in as president and didn't like that, so I think NATO was transferred to Brussels.

We had a lot of civil unrest and there were demonstrations on the Champs Elyseés and at the Assemblée nationale at that time. Basically, though, I was not too involved in policies as far as the question that you just posed.

HENRY E. MATTOX
Vice Consul
Paris (1957-1958)

Henry E. Mattox entered the Foreign Service in 1966. His career included positions in Nepal, the Azores, Brazil, Haiti, the United Kingdom (England), Egypt, and France. Mr. Mattox was interviewed by Ambassador William N. Dale in 1993.

Q: Well, Henry, I think except for one question I have. Way back in your career when you were in Paris. I think that concludes the questions which I was thinking about. Back when you were in Paris, which I guess was your first post really.

MATTOX: Yes.

Q: You were there at a time which was a forced retrenchment really in France's imperial holdings. Did the French that you came in contact with, and I realize that at that time you were a Third Secretary, seem to blame the United States appreciably for their forced withdrawals, Vietnam, Morocco, Tunisia, and so on?

MATTOX: When I was there they really hadn't withdrawn from Algeria yet.

Q: No, I didn't mention Algeria.

MATTOX: No, I know, so they still had an empire. They still had one little remnant anyway. I don't remember any agitation against the United States. There used to be a riot a week. It would come right down the Champs-Élysées, and go right by the embassy but nobody ever did anything to the American embassy. They would go riot over against the Chamber of Deputies. French society was split right down the middle over the question of Algeria, in the general sense that you posed, of empire.

As we know, eventually the man who came to power, De Gaulle, on a promise of retaining the empire actually turned right around and shed the nation, to its vast relief, of the empire. I guess I would have to say the number of riots that I saw there, none of which were directed against America, or the American embassy, all of that would indicate that there was no perceptible resentment of the United States in response to the question you have just raised.

THOMAS R. DONAHUE
Program Officer, Free Europe Committee
Paris (1957-1960)

Thomas Donahue grew up in New York City and attended Manhattan College. He received his graduate degree from New York University and a degree in Law from Fordham. Since completing Law School, Mr. Donahue has worked with the Free Europe Committee, the Service Employees International Union, and The Labor Department and has served as President of the AFL-CIO. He was interviewed by James F. Shea and Don R. Kienzle in 1997.

Shea: Good afternoon. I am Jim Shea. It's the afternoon of April 9, 1997, and we are here in the office of Tom Donahue, the former President [and earlier Secretary-Treasurer] of the AFL-CIO [American Federation of Labor-Committee for Industrial Organization], who is now working for the Center for Dispute Resolution. Tom, can we ask you to tell us a little about your background, especially your connections with international labor.

DONAHUE: Sure. I have worked in the labor movement since 1948 and became involved relatively early on with the Labor Attaché Program and with people who worked in international affairs, because I spent three years, from 1957 to 1960, working in Paris. I worked for Radio Free Europe and the Free Europe Committee in Paris and consequently came to have an interest in what was going on in the international labor world and in the Labor Attaché Program.

In my early years in the movement, I knew lots of people, many of them were just names to me but they were names of some reputation, who were going into the labor attaché field in the late 1940s and 1950s. Then, through the years, working for the Service Employees International Union (SEIU) and later for the Federation (AFL-CIO), I had a lot of ongoing contact with people who worked in the Labor Attaché Corps all around the world. I have always been interested in it, and I have always lamented the fact that it has by now become a fully career Foreign Service group of people. I thought that the early concept of the program of drawing from the labor movement people who had experience in labor was a sound concept. I wished always that that system of the Reserve [Foreign Service] Officer could have continued. It is obviously impractical for a lot of other reasons, but it had great virtues in putting into the Labor Attaché Program, as it did in those early years, a group of people who were already knowledgeable about the labor movement in the United States and consequently had some standard or a sense of the mission of the labor movement by which they could judge what was going on in the labor movements of foreign countries.

Kienzle: Were you involved in the early years in assignments of people from the labor movement into the Labor Attaché Program?

DONAHUE: No. I didn't go to the AFL-CIO until 1973, and my early career was with the Service Employees Union. George Meany didn't ask other people outside the AFL-CIO to comment on the assignments. But I knew a number of the labor attachés, and since I was very young when I started working in 1948, these people were largely my heroes. They were people whom I looked up to. In reviewing the list of people you have interviewed, I see a number of names there from the earliest years of the program of people for whom I had enormous respect.

Shea: Who was the Labor Attaché in Paris at that time?

DONAHUE: When I was there in 1957 I think it was Dan Horowitz. At that point he had an assistant. I can't remember what his name was.

Shea: Did you travel to Italy during those years and did you know Tom Lane at that time?

DONAHUE: I did. My role in Radio Free Europe and the Free Europe Committee was as the program officer and liaison officer for the Eastern European and Central European unions in exile. They had a headquarters in Paris. The Force Ouvrière had given them space in their offices on Avenue du Maine in Paris, and the International Center of Free Trade Unionists in Exile, ICFTUE, existed at that point. I worked with all of those Central European exiles and consequently traveled all over Western Europe and was in contact with a number of labor attachés who worked in the area.

Kienzle: Paul Bergman would have been the Assistant Labor Attaché in Paris at that time.

DONAHUE: Paul Bergman, right.

Kienzle: Could you describe in a little more detail your work with Radio Free Europe, because that certainly is relevant to the international labor function.

DONAHUE: The International Center of Free Trade Unionists in Exile had been established, I guess, sometime in the early 1950s, in 1952 or 1953, with the assistance of the ICFTU and Force Ouvrière, and the people who had made it up were the national representatives of each of the countries in exile. It had its headquarters in Paris. The president of it was a man named Franciszek Bialas, who had been the leader of the social security workers in Poland during the pre-war period and immediately after World War II. The Secretary-Treasurer was a man named Arno Heis, who was a Czechoslovak trade unionist living in exile. Essentially the Free Europe Committee provided financial support to the ICFTUE to enable them to publish their national journals, which they did and to publish trade union studies of conditions in their home countries and to publicize those conditions in the West. Consequently, I had ongoing contact every couple of days or every week with these people and with their programs. Additionally, I served as a kind of liaison between the Free Europe Committee and the ICFTU, the exile organizations and the AFL-CIO. So I used to travel up to Brussels frequently and meet with Mr. Oldenbroek at that time and then with his successor.

Shea: Was that Otto Kersten?

DONAHUE: It was before Kersten. It was Oldenbroek, I guess. It was probably Oldenbroek all the while. He and Bialas were great buddies. He had great respect for Bialas. It's funny I just came from the memorial service for Al Shanker, [the late President of the American Federation of Teachers], where I saw Stefan Nejinski and we were talking about those early years. I remember Bialas always used to say to me, "Do you know Stefan Nejinski?" And I said, "No, I don't." Stefan had just then been appointed an Assistant Secretary of the PTTI [Postal, Telegraph and Telephone International]. He said, "He's a splendid man, splendid man." I never see Stefan that I don't think of "splendid man." He drummed it into me. "He was a splendid man." He was a fellow Pole obviously.

Kienzle: Who funded the Free Europe Committee?

DONAHUE: In those years, we said it was funded by "your truth dollars." The advertisement for Radio Free Europe was, "Your dollar buys a minute of truth behind the Iron Curtain." In more recent years, it has been revealed that there was government funding. It was CIA funding—or supplemental funding—for the Free Europe Committee.

Kienzle: Was that a private organization?

DONAHUE: Oh, it was a totally private organization.

Kienzle: It wasn't connected with the ICFTU?

DONAHUE: No. It was a private American organization, which was the official sponsor of Radio Free Europe. It had three divisions: Radio Free Europe, Free Europe Press, which was producing printed materials for dissemination behind the Iron Curtain, and the Free Europe Exile Relations Division, which was where I worked and where we funded and assisted exile organizations to put them in contact with their counterparts in the Western world and to enable them to tell their story in the Western world.

Kienzle: Was Irving Brown involved?

DONAHUE: Irving was in Paris in those days, and of course I went to see Irving quite frequently and chatted with him. It seems to me that during that time, probably sometime in 1958 or 1959, Irving came back to the United States and was in New York setting up the African-American Labor Center and representing the AFL-CIO at the UN. Mel Pitzele's son came over and ran the office in Paris for a year or so. He worked with Irving. But, yes, I used to see Irving frequently and talk with him about the things we were doing. I just finished reading a book, which Ben Rathbun has produced on Irving Brown, called, "The Point Man."

Kienzle: Care to comment on what you think of the book?

DONAHUE: It's a contribution to the literature in the field. Ben is a good friend. I think it's a worthwhile contribution. It will provide some information that was not previously available, since Irving was one of the most secretive of men. And it does give a decent appreciation of his life and his contribution.

Kienzle: Which was?

DONAHUE: Which I think was enormous.

Kienzle: What about your evaluation of the work of the Free Europe Committee in historical perspective?

DONAHUE: I think for that time it was indispensable. Just as I think the work of the Congress of Cultural Freedom and other organizations that operated in that milieu was important for that time. Later revelations that this was somehow CIA financed does not bother me a bit. I think that, as citizens, this was the best money we ever spent. It has become fashionable in later years to somehow be critical of the Cold War. I don't think the United States created the Cold War. World conditions did that for us, and I think that our efforts in that Cold War were obviously successful, so I think we ought to be proud of it instead of debunking continually the people who were variously engaged in what are now dismissed as "anti-Communist initiatives." I think that the creation of the assistance that the AFL and the CIO gave, the assistance that the Free Europe Committee and others gave to the Free Trade Unionists in Exile was critically important in keeping the hopes of workers in those countries alive. I think the contribution of Radio Free Europe to the Cold War, if you will, was enormous and delivered minutes of truth behind the Iron Curtain that kept people informed about what was going on in the Western World, and one of the effects of the work of Trade Unionists in Exile and other groups in exile, the national representations in exile, was to keep alive in the Western World the plight of those nations and to ensure that people growing up in Latin America, in Asia, in Africa, understood what had happened in Central Europe and understood the consequences that had flowed inevitably from a Communist takeover. So I am very proud of the work that our nation did in those years and of all of the various pieces of our national effort.

Kienzle: Did you serve at any other time abroad?

DONAHUE: No.

Kienzle: That was your one living experience abroad?

DONAHUE: Yes, I arrived in Paris in late 1956 and I came home in May 1960.

Kienzle: Could you tell us how you were selected for the position?

DONAHUE: That is interesting. I had worked for seven years in a local union in New York City, Local 32B of the Service Employees [International] Union. I had gone to law school at night while I was in the local. I graduated from law school. The future as I perceived it in the local union was not very promising. By that time, I was the contract director of the union and negotiated the [collective bargaining] agreements, but there were four officers above me, who were about 15 years older than I was and I was about 30. I didn't see that I was going to make any progress staying in that local union.

Shea: Did Dave Sullivan head up the local?

DONAHUE: Dave Sullivan was the President of Local 32B then and was my mentor in the trade union and remains my hero in the trade union movement. He was an Irish immigrant, who came here in 1926 and was an elevator operator at the start and became active in the union. He then led the reform faction in the union to oust a racket dominated leadership in 1940-41. In any case, I had spent seven years in the local and it did not seem to me that there was much of a career path there for me. I was then offered a job in New York by Ed McHale, who was the labor officer of the Free Europe Exile Relations Division of the Free Europe Committee.

Kienzle: Ed McHale later served as Labor Attaché in Australia.

DONAHUE: That's right! He was later a labor attaché and his brother Bill was also a friend of mine. So Ed convinced me I should come to work at the Free Europe Committee. I was there about six months and an opening came up in the Paris office. Jim McCargar, who was then the Director of the Paris office, was in New York; I worked for him a bit there and he asked me if I was interested in going to Paris. It turned out that at that point in my life I was, so I went to Paris. I did the labor [portfolio] in Paris. Ed McHale did it in the New York office.

THOMPSON R. BUCHANAN
Political Officer, North Atlantic Treaty Organization
Paris (1957-1960)

Thompson R. Buchanan was born in California in 1924. He received a bachelor's degree from Yale University in international relations in 1947 and served in the U.S. Navy during World War II. Mr. Buchanan entered the Foreign Service in 1948. His career included positions in Paris, Frankfurt, Moscow, Bujumbura, Libreville, and Leningrad. This interview was conducted by Charles Stuart Kennedy on March 15, 1996.

Q: Then you left Frankfurt in 1957 and went to Paris.

BUCHANAN: I was sent as the so-called Soviet expert on the International Staff in the Political Division in NATO when we were in the old Palais de Chaillot. My boss was Bill Newton who had started with the BBC overseas services and served in the US in World War II. Later Sir Evelyn Shuckburgh was my super boss. We held a biannual exercise on the analysis of Soviet/East European relations, with Soviet experts coming from each of the member states, with the text drawn up in French and English. As "international servants," we were theoretically expected to be independent, but all of us went, of course, to check with our embassies once or twice a week to get the party line. But, generally, we were pretty free to do what we wanted. I wrote a number of papers including one I remember on what we should do in the Middle East. I didn't have any personal experience in the Middle East but nevertheless had strong views. I remember Sir Evelyn Shuckburgh saying with a certain amount of delight, "My God, I didn't know we could do this sort of thing," and the paper was sent around to the 15 nations. I had in those days gone back from Class-4 to Class-5 with all my Class-5 colleagues. If I had been a Class-5 in our huge Paris embassy, I would have been doing the equivalent of cleaning the latrines. So, this was a much better experience.

Q: You were there from 1957 until when?

BUCHANAN: To the end of 1959.

Q: How did we view the Soviet Union at that time?

BUCHANAN: I don't think my ideas had changed that much. I still saw myself in a battle to prevent the communists from taking over the Middle East and the Third World. Not too many of us saw any great opportunity at that time to negotiate agreements with the Soviets. But I was beginning to differentiate the essentially ideological dimension of Soviet policy from the more traditional behavior of the Russian state. What was usually referred to as Soviet expansionism was often, I thought, only the traditional behavior of any great power trying to carve out its own sphere of influence. And where do you find your potential allies? Obviously among the enemies of your major enemy, among the more anti-American states in the Third World.

Q: You mentioned you did a paper on the Middle East. In 1958 when you were there was when we did send our troops into Lebanon at the time there was essentially unrest and Nasser, etc. What was your and NATO's perception of Nasser and things that were happening in the Middle East?

BUCHANAN: Depending on the individual, some, of course, saw Nasser as a communist agent, while for others he was an obstreperous nationalist. But in the eyes of many he was what the communists would have called "objectively an ally of the Soviet Union." A very simplistic view. People who had served in the Middle East, of course, had generally a more sophisticated view of Nasser than those who were Europeanists, who like many French and British officials resented Nasser treading on their imperial toes.

Q: Did the civil war that was going on in Algeria intrude on...

BUCHANAN: It intruded a great deal because de Gaulle was coming to power at that time. You had demonstrations in Paris, you had police on each corner with submachine guns, back-to-back. You had threats against members of the NATO staff by the OAS, the Algerian militants, and some of my friends went into hiding.

Q: Oh, yes, the white settlers...

BUCHANAN: Particularly the right-wing military in Algeria who were determined to hold on to Algeria and prepared to trigger civil war in France. They felt de Gaulle had betrayed them, which he did to some extent when he went to Algeria, and they were determined to bring him down. There were large rival demonstrations, Left against Right, organized in Paris. On one occasion, Phil Valdes, who was our "peripheral reporting officer," in the Embassy, and I went to a large meeting of some 15,000 Communists in the Vel d'Hiver stadium. The crowd clapped on command and marched out singing "The International." Phil and I were standing in the square discussing the event when we suddenly sensed an eerie stillness around us. Looking up we saw that everyone had vanished except for a three-deep phalanx advanced on us of CRS troops, that the French had flown in from Algeria to ensure order. They were the toughest bunch of thugs I had ever seen. They looked like each had swallowed an FLN guerrilla for breakfast. We thought better of holding up our diplomatic passports, and fled with the rest.

On July 14, Bastille day, I remember taking my two kids to the Place de la Concorde to watch the parade, and perhaps see de Gaulle. I pushed then up on the wall near the Orangerie when a policeman came along and began tapping me on the head with his billy club when I tried to explain that I just wanted my kids to have a chance to see the parade. We got down.

When my two years at NATO were drawing to a close, the Embassy wanted me to replace Phil Valdes, and my wife and I were delighted at the idea of extending our stay in Paris. But, as I mentioned earlier, Washington had other ideas, bringing me back to work in the recently established planning unit, with the acronym U/CEA, Communist Economic Affairs, to counter communist infiltration in the Third World.

DAVID A. KORN
Political Officer
Paris (1957-1960)

Ambassador David A. Korn was born and raised in Missouri. He entered the Foreign Service in 1957. His career included positions in France, Lebanon, Mauritania, Israel, and India, and ambassadorships to Ethiopia and Togo. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1990.

KORN: I grew up in Joplin, Missouri and attended the University of Missouri. I served in the army during the Korean War, but I was in Europe -- Germany and France.

Q: What type of work were you doing?

KORN: I was in communications in Paris, actually. I was demobbed from the army in France and stayed on there and went to the Institut de Science Politique in Paris.

Q: Your first assignment was to Paris. You served there from '57 to '60. What were you doing there?

KORN: I was a political officer. There was supposed to be a rotation program at the beginning with junior officers rotating throughout the embassy. I started out in the political section working for Bill Whitman who was in charge of everything beyond Africa -- everything else outside of Europe, African, Latin America and Middle Eastern and so on. Mr. Graham, who was supposed to be doing Africa fell ill so I stayed on and did his job during the entire time I was there.

Q: This was the time when things were really beginning to hop in Africa wasn't it? From '57 to '60. From the viewpoint of the embassy in Paris how was this whole process looked at? Particularly on the French side.

KORN: The Ambassador, who was Amory Houghton, did not look favorably upon it at all. I recall being called in by him once and being asked whether I felt this was a good thing. He obviously hoped I would say it wasn't -- all these countries becoming independent. But we proceeded to do our reporting. The ambassador did not try to interfere. It was clear that the French Territories were moving towards independence. There was no reporting required that would run counter to that.

Q: Was it people saying that we had bigger things to worry about like NATO and this is just going to...or was there a feeling that the African countries were not up to it.

KORN: I am not sure where Ambassador Houghton's attitude came from. I was just a very junior officer, I was given no overview or was aware of the embassy's concerns. My focus was on Africa. I got to know all of the African students, many of whom eventually attained important positions in their countries. I also got to know the African leaders who were in Paris. My reporting was all on Africa and there was no attempts to influence it.

Q: Were you dealing at the lower level with French officials at the Quai d'Orsay?

KORN: I went over to the Foreign Ministry from time to time. The relations there were handled by Whitman or other senior officers.

Q: Give us a little feel for this time. A junior officer in Paris reporting on African affairs would essentially seek out African representatives or...

KORN: Student leaders. There was a large West African student population there as well as some from North Africa. Each of these territories had governments and the heads and other leaders visited periodically. Some of them were members of the French National Assembly. I would present myself and talk to them. I would also try to assess French attitude towards the territories by getting to know the journalists working on Africa.

Q: I guess Algeria was out of your purview, wasn't it? It was part of metropolitan France at that time.

KORN: In Algeria the war was going on but I didn't work on that.

Q: Were you there when the then Senator Kennedy got up in the Senate and talked about looking again at Algeria and all that?

KORN: Possibly, but...

JOHN A. MCKESSON, III
Political Officer
Paris (1957-1960)

Ambassador John A. McKesson, III was born in New York March 29, 1922. He received a bachelor's degree and a master's degree from Columbia University. He then entered the U.S. Navy, where he served for four years. Mr. McKesson entered the Foreign Service in 1947. His career included positions in France, Iceland, Germany, Vietnam, and Senegal, and an ambassadorship to Gabon. This interview was conducted by Arthur Day on May 7, 1990.

Q: After Saigon you went back to Europe?

MCKESSON: Yes, I was assigned to Paris. I was there from 1957 to 1960. My first year there was the last year of the Fourth Republic. My job there was in the internal political affairs section and I got to know a number of deputies in the National Assembly, journalists and so forth. In May '58, the events in Algiers brought the return of General de Gaulle and the general elections a few months later swept out of office an awful lot of people like Mendes France and others, many of the ones I had gotten to know. A whole new wave of Gaullist deputies came in which the embassy then proceeded to cultivate. It was really a very fascinating period.

Q: From your vantage point in Paris in the embassy, what was the impact of the May military mutiny in Algiers?

MCKESSON: It was most interesting because I happened to be at the National Assembly on May 13th when General Massu had formed his Committee of Public Safety and announced that they had taken over power in Algeria. This was coming off the AFP [Agence France Presse] ticker which was right in the lobby of the Assembly and of course all the reporters and diplomats like myself were watching this, and shuttling between the ticker and the Assembly itself where the debate was going on for the investiture of Pflimlin, who was to be the prime minister. Ironically, nobody, none of the deputies, even discussed what was happening in Algiers. They kept talking about Pflimlin, and finally the first person who even mentioned anything that was happening in Algiers was a Communist deputy who got up and said, "Shouldn't we be talking about this Fascist coup d'etat that is taking place in Algiers?"

Eventually, as we know, de Gaulle came back. My recollections of de Gaulle's return might be of interest. A few days before he was actually asked to come back he gave a press conference at the Rue Solferino and I was able to witness it as a representative of the embassy. The room was packed, of course, with correspondents from all over. The striking thing was that where he gave the press conference was just a couple of streets from the National Assembly, the Palais Bourbon, and that on the bridge going from the Place de Concorde, all in front of the National Assembly and all around where he was giving his press conference was filled with tanks, armored cars and riot police, as if de Gaulle was going to attempt a coup, to march out of there and take over the government or something. It was all a bit ridiculous, he was just giving a press conference. At the end of the press conference everyone went home and all this police paraphernalia and tanks and everything was withdrawn.

Q: That was the conference in which he announced his readiness to...?

MCKESSON: That's right, he of course moved like a past master in several statements, moving from one thing to another, to assume the powers of the Republic, and finally when he did meet a few days later or a week or two later with Pflimlin, who had been invested by then, the meeting was an absolute dialogue des sourds as everybody reported. Pflimlin wanted him to disavow everything that was happening in Algiers first, and de Gaulle's position was that it was better to try to solve the situation than to start laying blame. Anyway, after this dialogue of the deaf de Gaulle went home in the wee hours of the morning and the next morning he issued a statement that he had begun the process of assuming power, which of course irritated Pflimlin no end, but there was not much he could do about it.

Q: Do you remember what your impression was at that time, of de Gaulle and the impression in the embassy? Were people gratified to see someone coming along like that?

MCKESSON: It was very interesting. The feeling in the embassy at the lower level, Dean Brown and myself and others, was certainly understanding of de Gaulle and we were willing to be quite open-minded. There was at the higher levels a feeling that traced back to attitudes of Robert Murphy who had his run-ins with de Gaulle in North Africa and the fact that, in later years, as I found out when I went to work in the Executive Secretariat under George Ball and Dean Rusk a couple of years later, there were people in Washington who were very anti-de Gaulle. George Ball was one of the leading advocates of being tough to de Gaulle. I, myself, had gotten to know a number of Gaullist deputies during that period, people like Habib Deloncle, people like Baumel, people like Peyrefitte and Olivier Guichard and a number of others, and without exception all of these deputies, senators or assistants to de Gaulle (Guichard was working in the Elysée as de Gaulle's special assistant, chef de cabinet) were uniformly friendly to the Americans and I never had any problems in getting information from them of a general, normal diplomatic nature, or getting opinions from them; there was never any hostility of any kind.

Q: Did it seem to you that this was really a necessary move in France at that time?

MCKESSON: Oh, I think unquestionably in that respect if de Gaulle had not moved back in peacefully there would have been a military coup of some kind. What would have happened after that would have been hard to say, but it would have been much worse for France. I think most French, other than some diehards, would recognize that de Gaulle's return in 1958 was the only way this situation could be resolved.

Q: France was quite split, I suppose, at that time. Did you detect this?

MCKESSON: The interesting thing was that in May of 1958 there were relatively few Gaullist. The Gaullist Party still existed, but it was certainly a minority party; the majority of politicians, of course, were against any return of de Gaulle for he was opposed to the party system and I would say that the majority of Frenchmen were not particularly interested or in favor of de Gaulle; they sort of saw him as the hero who had saved them during the war, but as the Algerian crisis got worse and worse, and they saw themselves faced with this virtually insoluble position with the Army controlling Algeria, the Army itself was sort of pushed to call for de Gaulle. Most of the generals did not want de Gaulle, Salan did not want de Gaulle. Massu was one of the few Gaullists, and certainly the majority of the colons in Algeria did not want de Gaulle. It was really very ironic that de Gaulle... It is well-known historically that as the crisis got worse and each side saw no other outcome but a civil war with the Army moving in, which nobody wanted, de Gaulle seemed the only alternative. At that point de Gaulle's name was mentioned more and more and was accepted by everyone as really the second choice of almost everybody, the only one who would satisfy both the Algerian and metropolitan French, partly, of course, because nobody knew what de Gaulle's policy in Algeria really was, and everybody was assuming, or wishing, that he favored his or her view. De Gaulle played on this very beautifully and only very slowly revealed his position in the coming months and years.

I might add one detail about de Gaulle, concerning his linguistic abilities. I was at the reception given by President Johnson on the 8th floor of the State Department when all these various chiefs of state came to Washington for the Kennedy state funeral, and I was standing in line close to Johnson (I was in S/S at the time) to help out as needed, and all these various heads of government or state would come by the receiving line and Johnson would shake hands with them and they would move on. When de Gaulle came, Johnson took him apart and they moved away from the receiving line for about five minutes together. I was struck by the fact that they must have spoken English as Johnson did not speak any French. De Gaulle, if he had to, could obviously carry on a conversation in English.

Q: By the time you left Paris, de Gaulle was well-established?

MCKESSON: De Gaulle had been established, during the period the Algerian war was going on. There were two very close calls, the Week of the Barricades which nearly toppled the government and the Putsch of the Generals, two years later. In both cases de Gaulle went on television with his uniform and made a very impassioned speech which was very moving and turned the situation around.

L. MICHAEL RIVES
Ambassador's Aide
Paris (1957-1961)

L. Michael Rives was born in New York, New York in 1921 and raised in New Jersey. He received a bachelor's degree in French from Princeton University in 1947 and entered the Foreign Service in 1948. His career included positions in Frankfurt, Bonn, Hanoi, Vientiane, Guatemala City, Brazzaville, Bujumbura, Phnom Penh, Djakarta, and Montreal. This interview was conducted by Charles Stuart Kennedy on July 25, 1995.

Q: You left there in '57 and went to Paris, at last. You were in Paris from '57 to... ?

RIVES: '61.

Q: When you first went to Paris, what were you up to?

RIVES: For four years I was the Ambassador's aide.

Q: Four years! Good heavens! Who was the ambassador when you first arrived?

RIVES: It was Amory Houghton.

Q: For the whole time?

RIVES: Yes. Ambassador Yost, who was the DCM, put my name out to be the Ambassador's aide, because he knew I spoke French. So I went to Washington and met the Ambassador. I got there just before him. And he gave me what I considered the "two-martini test." He enjoyed his martinis. He always had two before lunch. I barely got to lunch!

Q: Could you describe France in this period?

RIVES: When we got there we were still recovering from the Suez [Crisis]. The French did not...

Q: Which was October of '56.

RIVES: Yes. They did not appreciate what we had done in Suez. The first year I was there, de Gaulle took over. [Before] '58, it was one Prime Minister after another... it was absolutely incredible. The Ambassador said to me once, "I can't remember who's Prime Minister today!" But it was interesting. Very mouvemante, changes of government, a lot of upset. Of course, there was the Tunisian Crisis with the Americans, and Algiers was getting worse and worse...

Q: How did the Ambassador operate?

RIVES: I thought he did a good job, but he was criticized by a lot of people. He had no tongue -- he had lost his tongue to cancer -- so he had difficulty; he spoke with a lisp. He was very self-conscious about that. (You could understand him all right.) And, of course, he didn't speak French fluently. He had been studying it, he'd known it years before, but because of the lisp, his accent wasn't good at all. He would not use it officially, so I went with him everywhere.

The thing that he was criticized for was that he only went to see de Gaulle when he had something to discuss, or when de Gaulle summoned him. For that reason, I think, he made a very good impression on de Gaulle. I think he was the only Ambassador who has ever gotten the Grande Cross of the Legion of Honor, when he retired. A lot of Ambassadors there would try to call every week, which is what we used to do in Indochina. If you did that to de Gaulle, you never saw de Gaulle again.

The Ambassador also believed that he was the Ambassador. Ambassador Yost, the DCM, of course, was very important, because of his knowledge of foreign affairs and the French. And so he used to listen to him very closely for a long time. It was only after about a year that he was confident enough to make his own decisions.

He believed that he was the Ambassador. He didn't like Secretary Dulles at all at first, although they became very good friends. At one point... You may recall, Secretary Dulles used to like to send "special ambassadors" right and left. Every time anything happened, he would send a special ambassador. That happened once too often in Paris, and the Ambassador said, "Mike, get me Mr. Dulles on the phone." He got Mr. Dulles on the phone and (he told me, "Stay where you are.") he said to him, "I was sent here to be Ambassador, and I'm doing my best. If you don't like what I'm doing, please replace me. There will be no hard feelings. But there will be no more special ambassadors. If I'm Ambassador, I'm Ambassador." So that was the end of that.

He was also a good golfing partner of President Eisenhower.

Q: I was going to ask about that. Would he call the Eisenhower connection in?

RIVES: I don't think he ever used it.

Q: But it was known?

RIVES: Oh, I think it was implicit in that telephone conversation. But, as I say, they became very good friends and he got to admire Dulles tremendously.

Q: At that time there was a situation in Paris where you had the Marshall Plan Ambassador and a couple of other Ambassadors... the NATO Ambassador... How did he deal with that?

RIVES: He got along with them very well. He was very easy-going. He didn't like to cause problems. He and the NATO Ambassador at that time were very good friends, anyway. They had known each other in the past. But the NATO Ambassador's wife was extremely ambitious, self-conscious of her position, and there were a few ruffled feathers, occasionally, when she would announce herself as the "wife of the American Ambassador." That didn't go over well with Mrs. Houghton at all. So we had a few ruffled feathers once in a while, but other than that...

Q: As Staff Aide, you must have been with the Ambassador almost all the time, weren't you?

RIVES: Yes. Every ambassador uses his staff aide in a different way. I was with him at all times, but he would almost never ask me to do any work for him. He would call in a political officer, or someone like that, even for speeches, although I was perfectly willing to prepare for him the boiler plate, that kind of stuff. But I took care of him, and when we traveled, I took care of all the finances and that sort of thing. These very rich men, sort of like Harriman, didn't believe very much in carrying money around with them, so I would have to pay for everything, and he would reimburse me when we came back.

Q: How did the Ambassador deal with the rest of his staff, the political and economic counselors, and the others?

RIVES: He was very good. As I say, he felt very strongly about that, and having been head of Corning Glass in the early days, when he had known every person in [the organization], the first thing he did when he came to Paris, was to visit every section of the Embassy, from the garages to the roof, and every outlying building (of course, we had I don't know how many buildings in Paris). The French were very impressed by that. I used to ride up in the elevator and people would say, "C'est la premiere fois. Je n'ai jamais vu un ambassadeur..." They were terribly impressed and pleased.

Within the Embassy itself, his door was pretty much open. He had a small staff meeting every day; he had a large staff meeting once a week, but most of the important officers could walk in any time. But they had to walk in through my office, and I controlled that.

Q: Did the Ambassador ever tell you, don't let so and so in?

RIVES: No, he never said that.

Q: This was before Algeria...

RIVES: It was during Algeria. Our first crisis was what was called the Tunisian Crisis. Some Americans were shipping in arms through Tunisia. That was when Dulles sent one of his special envoys over, but that one was all right, for it was Ambassador Robert Murphy, whom the Ambassador got to admire very much and hired afterwards. He was put in charge of Corning Glass International.

We went from that to Algiers, and things got more and more hectic in town. On a regular basis there would be demonstrations and parades down the Champs-Élysées, which would then swing towards the National Assembly across the Seine, but the French would always have police there to stop them. I would stand in my window next to the Ambassador's office, and as the crowd stopped, every time there was the same thing. There would be a cry of "l'Ambassade Americaine!" And the crowd would just turn around and shoot for the American Embassy, at which point the special police, the CRS, would come out from under the trees where they were hiding, and they would form in front of our Embassy and stop them.

Q: What were they after with us?

RIVES: Just reaction, you know.

Q: What were we doing?

RIVES: We weren't doing anything at that point, just sitting on the sidelines, encouraging them to reach some kind of agreement, but that was about it.

Q: What was the feeling in the Embassy... Paris has struck me, during the de Gaulle period, in other interviews I've done, as at least at other times, a very divided Embassy, under de Gaulle, particularly. Some felt, this is what France needs; others felt he was really taking France down the wrong course. How did you find it at the time you were there under de Gaulle?

RIVES: Well, before de Gaulle took over, the Ambassador went to call on him. After we left de Gaulle that first visit, the Ambassador said, "I will never talk to that man again, he was so rude!" And he really was. It was incredible. Ambassador Yost said to him, "Don't say that, because you're going to be talking to him one of these days." And, of course, he was.

Once de Gaulle became President, he was still de Gaulle, but he was a very impressive person. Obviously, his tone changed... I was very fortunate, because until the very end, I was always the interpreter whenever the Ambassador met with de Gaulle. (Although I am not an interpreter...I can translate, but I am not an interpreter as such.)

I would say that when I was there, the Embassy was almost entirely in favor of de Gaulle.

Q: Well, it had seen what had happened before.

RIVES: Yes. I won't say we missed the boat, but twice just before de Gaulle took over, [we were forewarned]. I went to a big dinner one night, organized by the Station Chief. At that dinner was a General Petit, a huge French General, very handsome, who commanded in Morocco later on. During the course of that dinner (there were ladies present, and servants), he virtually told us that there was going to be a change in government.

So the next day, we all got together in the Ambassador's office, and we reported this. There were the Station Chief, the Political Section Chief, and myself, I guess, who had been at the dinner. We sent a telegram to Washington saying we'd been told de Gaulle is going to take over, but just cannot believe that a General of the French Army at a dinner would give us that kind of [information].

There was no reaction, so two days later, I was called by this General and asked to meet with him. He wouldn't meet with me in the Embassy or publicly, so I invited him to lunch in my apartment, and he told me the same thing all over again. So we sent another telegram. The Ambassador ended it the same way again. He said, "Take this for what it's worth, we can't believe..." It would be like General Marshall saying he was going to overthrow Roosevelt. But that's what happened. I guess they were tipping us off, alerting us.

Q: How did the Embassy react to the takeover of de Gaulle?

RIVES: On the whole we were all pleased. Things were getting so bad it was almost civil war. I think it was partly thanks to President Coty, of course, who made the public gesture and asked him to take over.

Q: What about our relations with the French group that's so important there but in other countries might not be, the intelligentsia? I've always had the feeling there's a certain amount of disdain for the Americans, if not outright hostility.

RIVES: I think that depends on the people at the post there. We had a very good group there, I must say, and the Ambassador and Mrs. Houghton played a tremendous social role. They entertained tremendously, and they were very popular. When you did it in that way, it played into the hands of the intelligentsia, if you want to put it that way.

One thing the Ambassador would never do, and we could never change him, he would not discuss business at a dinner or at a luncheon. The Foreign Service rule for giving luncheons is so you can discuss business, but the Ambassador just would not do it. When we were having cigars after dinner, then he would discuss business. But he would never sit around the table...never. Never. We beat him on the head for that, but he wouldn't do it. Cecil Lyon, who became Minister-Counselor after Charles Yost left, used to do most of the business at luncheons.

Q: How did Ambassador Houghton deal with Cecil Lyon?

RIVES: Oh, very well, they were very good friends. He was a great admirer of Ambassador Yost, and he was very fond of Cecil Lyon. And Randy Kidder was his Political Counselor.

Q: You had a very strong Embassy.

RIVES: Very good. And we had John Emerson there, who was removed, unfortunately, unfairly.

Q: He was hit by the McCarthy times.

RIVES: Yes. He ended up as Consul General in Nigeria. The Ambassador offered to keep him in Paris, but Emerson said it wasn't worth the effort.

Q: Not only this time, but earlier on, could you talk about the McCarthy era, how you saw it at the time.

RIVES: I went through it, and I was not amused by it. It started when I was in Bonn, and in Indochina. Some of the people I admired most -- Sam Reber, who was Number Two in Bonn when I was there, he suffered for it, and, of course, there was Charlie Thayer, whose career was ruined, and the officer who went to Peru for years, he was in Bonn when I was there. Then, when I came back from Indochina, I was called in and accused of being a homosexual. I am told that every bachelor went through this.

Q: This was the standard procedure: if you weren't married, obviously you were a homosexual.

RIVES: Yes, I went through that... I was so mad, I got a lawyer, my father got me a very good lawyer, and the lawyer said to me, "Tell them to put up or shut up." So I did that, and they were so mad. I was alone in the room, and the security man had a witness -- there were two of them and myself -- and they tried the usual thing. I've realized since then that it's the way police do things, you know. They had a file, and they said, "Oh, we've got all this stuff on you!" (which was a lot of nonsense), and I told them to put up or shut up. Then I wrote a letter to the Inspector General of the Foreign Service in which I expressed my outrage and told him that I thought the methods they used were Gestapo methods, and I wouldn't stand for it. And so I was delayed in my assignment to Guatemala for five months while they investigated the investigators.

Q: Which must have put you on somebody's list.

RIVES: Well, anyways, then I was cleared and went to Guatemala. But I was not amused by that.

Q: It was a horrible period, this, and Scott McLeod, I think, was McCarthy's boy. In all this, did you have the feeling that the Foreign Service was worth it and you would persevere...

RIVES: Well, I was enjoying myself. I liked the Foreign Service. Maybe I was naive, but I think most of us who entered it in those days entered it with the feeling we were going to do something for our country, maybe, or try... It wasn't until about '75 that I felt that the atmosphere in the State Department had completely changed.

Q: I came into the Foreign Service in '55, and this was after most of the McCarthy stuff, but particularly Secretary Dulles, we very definitely had that idea that if you came in, that you couldn't really depend on the Secretary of State to stand behind you if you got into trouble.

RIVES: That was true of almost every Secretary of State, I'm sorry to say. But it was particularly true of him, yes. But I don't think you let that kind of thing...

Q: We had a period of both Marshall and Acheson. That was before, and that set a standard that was never reached thereafter.

Well, in France, the opposition to de Gaulle, did the Ambassador make an effort to see people who were on other sides?

RIVES: Oh, yes. Yes. Particularly the other officers did. They had no political sanctions.

Q: What was the view of the Communist Party of France, Maurice Lareze, and all that, at that time?

RIVES: I don't know that we had, and I'm sure that the Ambassador had no dealings with them, probably because they didn't want to deal with us. But the political officers did. I think the Embassy generally felt that the communist vote was more a negative vote of displeasure than a vote for the communists most of the time, because when the crunch came on important questions, de Gaulle always got majorities.

Q: You stayed as the Ambassador's aide the whole time. I would think in a way, career-wise, people would be saying you had better not do this too long.

RIVES: Well, originally, we agreed that I would leave after two years. And then when the two years were up, I forget, there was something going on, the President was coming on a State visit or something, he kept saying, "Do you mind holding on for another ...?" And I kept holding on, holding on, holding on...

GEORGE L. WEST
Political Counselor
Paris (1957-1959)

George L. West was born in Seattle, Washington in 1910. He received a bachelor's degree from Stanford University in 1933. His Foreign Service career included positions in Paris, Godthab, Stockholm, Helsinki, Luxembourg, Frankfurt, and Bonn. This interview was conducted by Charles Stuart Kennedy on February 9, 1990.

Q: That was the fall of 1956.

WEST: Yes, fall and winter. On the one hand we wanted to bring the French and British back into circulation again, because, of course, that had been quite a bone of contention, particularly with the French as far as Eisenhower was concerned. Then on the other, there was the Hungarian thing.

I then went to Paris as a POLAD, and that was a fascinating job.

Before going, I had broken in our Ambassador-designate to France, Amory Houghton. I flew over, he took the boat, and I greeted him at Le Harvre.

My offices were at Camp DesLoges. I was assimilated, Major General, I had my own car and chauffeur, a Navy man, two stars on my license plate, all that military stuff.

But I would nearly always spend the morning out there. I first was with George Decker, a four-star General, who came back to be Vice Chief of Staff of the Army. Then I was with Williston B. Palmer.

I would be at the embassy staff meetings every week. I would meet with a group, and I would be at the USRO staff meetings every week. Then I would meet them, the military political officers in the embassy, there were two, and the political officers of USRO (United States Regional Office), it was the backstop for our NATO delegation and the OEC and all the rest of them.

Then I spent about half of my time away, going all through the European Command area, which was not only all the NATO area, but wherever we had military assistance missions.

I'd be down in Morocco. I'd be in Ethiopia. I'd be in Tehran, Turkey. A lot of it having to do with military assistance. Back in the old business with Morocco about the bases and stuff there.

But it was a very, very rewarding job. I think I got nice recognition from it.

Then I was to go to Cambodia as DCM. Bill Tremble had been named as Ambassador there. But this posed a family problem.

Also in that job in Paris I worked very closely with General Norstad because, technically, I was political advisor to SAC Europe.

Norstad wore two hats: the other being SHAPE, as the Supreme Allied Commander. Also he was the Commander of U.S. Forces in the European Command. Normally, his Deputy in that capacity voted the stock. In other words, he was at Camp DesLoges. And there were these four-star Generals who were Deputy to Norstad in his U.S. command. He did get into the U.S. side of things quite a bit with respect to Germany and Berlin. And there my background... He used me a great deal more than he used his own Political Advisor, although the two of us were together.

I was there with two different guys. We met once a week over at SHAPE. First was Ridgway Knight and then Ray Thurston. With respect to Thurston, Norstad used me primarily to go to Berlin and things like that for him. We did an awful lot of travel.

LEWIS HOFFACKER
Political-Military Officer
Paris (1958-1960)

Ambassador Lewis Hoffacker was born in Pennsylvania in 1923. He received his bachelor's degree from George Washington University in 1948 and then his master's degree from Fletcher's School of Law and Diplomacy in 1949. He then served in the US Army from 1943-1946. His career has included positions in Teheran, Istanbul, Paris, Algiers, and Leopoldville and ambassadorships to both Cameroon and Equatorial Guinea. Ambassador Hoffacker was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on July 17, 1998.

Q: You went to Paris from when to when?

HOFFACKER: '58 to '60. Political-Military Affairs. I don't know how that happened, but it happened, and I was glad to see Paris. That was a great period to go. Political and Military Affairs was fun. The Algerian and NATO crises kept bubbling over.

Q: In Paris in 1958, when you arrived there, had DeGaulle made his announcement? He hadn't made his announcement yet -

HOFFACKER: No, I guess he withdrew...

Q: Because he withdrew in the '60s, under Johnson.

HOFFACKER: I was there when he withdrew the fleet, but I spent most of my time there dealing with our bases. We had bases all over, which bothered DeGaulle, of course. And we had to keep some sort of working relationship with the French authorities. And so I dealt with that side primarily. Bill Connett was my boss, a regular guy. He handled the big stuff. I had a feeling at the time, although I enjoyed Paris and France very much - how could you not like those things? - that I wasn't really cut out for EUR. I was more the Third World type, by instinct. European diplomacy was glacial and very complex and so forth, and I'm not glacial or complex. I'm simple and I like to move around a little bit. Africa coming into its own was exciting. It so happened that while I was in Paris the Department remembered that when I left the African seminar I said I'd like to work in Africa. They took me up on that and sent me to Oxford. I studied African affairs there with one other Foreign Service officer, Bob Hennemeyer.

Q: I've interviewed Bob, too. Let's still talk about Paris, '58-'60. Were you dealing with the Quai d'Orsay?

HOFFACKER: Yes.

Q: How did that fit? I mean, were they difficult to deal with?

HOFFACKER: Yes, but the French are often difficult, and not just because DeGaulle was their boss. It takes a while to get used to them. I got used to them. I spent most of my career working with the French, in Africa certainly, then in Paris. They are by definition tedious and they have a chip on their shoulder as their international clout is diminished. Uncle Sam is something of a threat politically; this fear was manifested in a lot of ways. In their negotiations on base agreements and on incidents, they were a hassle. They were very hard to get into an easy relationship; but that was the job, to have a relationship with them, and we didn't throw up our hands.

Q: While you were there in this '58-'60 period (I think it was around that time or a little before), Senator Kennedy had talked about "the Algerians like independence" and all. Did that happen on your watch?

HOFFACKER: No, I wasn't there at that particular time. I know what you're referring to, and when we get to Algeria I will refer to Teddy Kennedy in that same context.

Q: How about this '58-60 period? Did you find there was rather solid leftist - I think you have universities, intellectuals and all - dislike of the United States?

HOFFACKER: Oh yes, naturally. Not just the commies, but others who didn't like our capitalism, didn't like our heavy weight. And then of course you had the Gaullist prejudice against us, so you had a lot of strong feelings which were not friendly. That's all right. You're not out there to have "localitis," to flip because they want you to flip. You protect your interests, and you hope you can agree with them, but if not, you have to disagree if your interests are not preserved.

Q: Did you find the Embassy at all split in Paris - it was apparent at other times, and I don't know about this period - between those that were sort of almost pro-DeGaulle, by saying that all right, he may be a tough guy, but by God he's holding France together, and those who couldn't stand him?

HOFFACKER: Well, I didn't see anything that sharp. We all accepted, I think, without exception that DeGaulle was good for France. They had so much instability, at least he provided stability, in his own way. He's a rough customer to work with, but at least he was our S.O.B. And in the crunch the feeling was that he would be with us, and it was proven later that he lived up to his word on Cuba. In the Cuba crisis, he was with us. In the big crises, he was with us. That means a great deal because you could count on him. All you have to do is read his speeches. All this was there. If you didn't like his speeches, that's another thing, but you had to read them, and there it was. He was very predictable. So I didn't see any split. In every embassy you have people with localitis, and I hope I never had it, because I fought it all the time. That's a good reason to move people. I never fought that policy of ours of frequent transfers.

Q: You were there from '58 to '60. Who was the ambassador?

HOFFACKER: He was from the Corning Glass Company family. Political ambassador. Why can't I remember?

Q: Well, don't worry about it.

HOFFACKER: But number two was Cecil Lyon. He ran the Embassy.

Q: Yes, I was going to say that Cecil Lyon was a son-in-law of Joseph Drew. He had been an ambassador down in Latin America somewhere.

HOFFACKER: Yes, he was old school. And that's what DCM's in London, Paris and Rome were designed for - to run the embassy while the ambassador did his thing.

THOMAS W. FINA
Economic Officer, United States Regional Office
Paris (1958-1960)

Thomas W. Fina was born in Pennsylvania in 1924. He received a bachelor's degree in 1948 and a master's in 1950 from Harvard University. He served in the U.S. Army from 1943-1946. His Foreign Service career included positions in France, Italy, Belgium, and Brussels. Mr. Fina was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on May 21, 1992.

FINA: I was assigned to Paris, to our delegation to the OECD.

Q: OECD was what?

FINA: The Office of European Economic Cooperation which was an outgrowth of the Marshall Plan in which we had called upon the Europeans to work together to develop coordinated economic plans for the recovery of Europe. We were members of that group. It had evolved a great deal by 1958, of course. But the OECD was a very lively place where countries presented their plans, and we talked about what was going to happen. We had a staff in the American delegation to the OECD which looked at what the various countries said they were doing, and what their economies looked like, and critiqued them. Our job was to look at the Netherlands country report, or the Belgium country report, and say, "Ah hah, their GNP has been growing too slowly. They're not going to put enough into infrastructure, or they're unrealistic about this, or their hard currency reserves are growing too fast, and then in the course of the review of that country's report and plan, the United States as well as other countries would raise these questions. I found that a supreme bore because there were too many people in the delegation and I had nothing to do. It seems to me that I had a couple of countries, I had the Netherlands, maybe I had all of Benelux. But it wasn't a job, and while I liked the substance all right, I felt that I was wasting my time. So I went down to see my boss, and asked if there weren't something else to do? He suggested I go to the library and study up on my countries and told me that in Paris there were a lot of things that I could be doing. Well, that didn't satisfy me. I don't sit around doing nothing very easily. These were nice people, very competent, far better economists than I. They're still my friends. But about that time we had an inspection, and the inspector interviewed all of us peons, and when he got to me, he asked me things inspectors ask, and I said, "Well, I think my job ought to be abolished, because this is a waste of time. We've got too many people here doing this. My job could be merged with two other guys, etc." A couple of weeks later I was summoned into the presence of the Ambassador. "I understand that you said that we were overstaffed." He wasn't too happy. What could I tell him? I thought it was a disgrace to waste taxpayer's money in that way. So I told him that he undoubtedly couldn't know what was going on beneath the stairs, but there were just too many people there. Well, presently my job was abolished, which made me very happy.

But what I wasn't happy with, they transferred me to COCOM. COCOM was the so-called Coordinating Committee. It had a name which was supposed to be completely misleading to everyone. But it was a semi-NATO body, representing all of the NATO states, plus Japan. Its purpose was to maintain an embargo on the shipment of strategic materials to the Soviet Bloc and to China. It was a very busy place. I didn't know much about it, and I was dead set against taking the job, and I resisted. But the Chief of Personnel in Paris said, "You got the job."

So I went around and met my new boss, Hal Levin. He was a very nice and extremely able person whom I hadn't known before. I settled into the job which turned out to be terrific. I had a wonderful time. Not because I was convinced that all of our embargo items made sense. They didn't, but a lot did. But one reason that it was such a good job from my point of view, was that it was so filled with electronic and mechanical technology, all of which interested me very much. And practically no one else knew an electron from a hypoid gear. So I had a fine time. I was fascinated by what we were doing, and it was my first exposure to multilateral negotiation. A lot of language questions were involved too that interested me: what terminology to use in French, because all of our documents were in French and English. What are the proper French terms for the these various English terms? I had a lot of fun with trying to come up with what I thought were really the right French terms because the interpreters were...what shall we say, they were basically liberal arts interpreters. And they really didn't know anything about technology. I found that a very exciting job, and got involved in a very fascinating negotiation about the shipment of communications cable to the Soviet Union, which I guess was the high point of my career in COCOM.

The French were trying to sell some 16 or 32 pair cable to the Russians, and they were maintaining that it couldn't be used for strategic purposes while we maintained that it could. That went on for months and months, and finally I led the negotiation on a French train going down to Dijon, during which the French were going to demonstrate to us that this cable was used in their rail communications.

Q: Talking about you were on a train.

FINA: They brought a bunch of technicians from the railroad, and from the French PTT, the Post and Telegraph. We argued the case all the way down, and we argued the case all the way back. By the time we were approaching Paris they had given in. They agreed to our interpretation of what this communications cable should do, and could do, and what we shouldn't do with it. I think we got in at 3:00 in the morning, and I was absolutely elated because it was a big issue for us and something that I had carried through from the very beginning. As soon as I got home I called Levin at 3:30 in the morning to announce triumphantly that "We won." "Tell me about it in the morning." Anyway, that was a very good experience, I enjoyed that very much.

That assignment came to an end in 1960. Without my having asked, the Department transferred me to Bologna, to the John Hopkins Center of Advanced International Studies. They had a branch there, a school that specialized in European integration affairs, which was run by Professor C. Grove Haines who had been a professor at the School of Advanced International Studies here in Washington. Haines had created this idea of a school that would bring together graduate students from Europe and America in roughly equal numbers together with an international faculty to concentrate on the study of European integration. This was 1960, only two years after the signature of the Treaty of Rome.

Well, I thought going to Bologna was a great idea, but I didn't believe in European integration. I thought that it was highly improbable. The conflict between the French, the Germans, the Italians, the age-old rivalries seemed to me more likely to prevail than some idealistic scheme. It turned out that my experience in Bologna completely changed my views on that. I left Bologna convinced that the new Europeans really had something. The Bologna Center brought political and academic leaders from all over Western Europe, whom Haines had recruited to give regular lectures on what was going on. They excited me and thrilled me, about what they were doing to deal with the problems of post-war Europe. And since I had been very much interested in European history as an under-graduate student, what they were doing just made so much sense in terms of their interests, and the interests of the United States, that I got very excited about it.

After that assignment of an academic year in Bologna, I was transferred to Luxembourg, where the United States had a small mission to the European Coal and Steel Community which had been the first of the three community bodies that eventually became the European Community.

ROBERT E. BARBOUR
Political Officer
Paris (1958-1961)

Robert Barbour was born in Ohio in 1927. He graduated from the University of Tennessee in 1948 and attended The George Washington University. Since joining the Foreign Service in 1949, his career has included positions in Iraq, Japan, Vietnam, France, Italy, England, Spain and Surinam. Mr. Barbour was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1992.

Q: Then back to your time in Paris. How was the return of de Gaulle seen in the Embassy? De Gaulle had been sort of a thorn in our side in World War II and right afterward.

BARBOUR: Our feelings were, as you say, somewhat ambivalent as he was a very difficult person. And Amory Houghton practically never saw him; had seen him only once in his days in his tent and very rarely afterwards. We did, however, have a very good relationship through Cecil Lyon, the DCM, with the Prime Minister, Michel Debré; they got along splendidly and saw a good deal of each other. But attitudes towards de Gaulle were ambivalent. On the one hand there was the personal and personality side, which was very much present on our minds... (phone interruption).

Q: You were talking about de Gaulle. Cecil Lyons was really the man, at that time, wouldn't you say?

BARBOUR: He was the man for most senior level dealings with the French government, but that did not go up to de Gaulle, whom we did not see very often. The Ambassador saw the Foreign Minister, who spoke excellent English, Couve de Murville. Cecil Lyon dealt with people below that level and occasionally got interested, I was happy to see, in things related to the Far East and black Africa. But our attitude toward de Gaulle was colored by the ambivalence I mentioned, on the personal side, the history of difficulty, and on the other hand what he represented for France. What he represented for France at that time we liked very much because France under the Fourth Republic was not much help to anybody. What we wanted was a much stabler, more positive looking ally. That is what de Gaulle offered, indeed brought; little did we realize that he would throw us out some years later.

Q: Was Vernon Walters there as the Military Attaché at that time?

BARBOUR: No, that was much later. He came twice with President Eisenhower as Lieutenant Colonel Walters, the interpreter.

Q: Let us talk then about black Africa. This was the period when black Africa was coming into its own.

BARBOUR: The French were pretty well out of Indochina, although still interested in Cambodia and Laos. Their remaining place in the world was in Africa, North and sub-Saharan. They had given Morocco its independence and Tunisia its independence while remaining in a fairly happy way there. Algeria was a department of France--"from Dunkerque to Tamanrasset, it's all France, never to be alienated." But on November 1, 1954, the Algerian insurrection broke out, and when I was there it was going full steam. Black Africa, then, represented, I guess, a different kind of hope for them because the French had a longer history in black Africa, they were deeply ensconced there and there was no sign of political unrest or anti-French attitudes in their French territories. Shortly after he took office, de Gaulle made a trip through French Africa and proclaimed the Community, the constitution provides for the Community, in which the African territories were to have a more or less independent relationship while still dependent on France in certain ways. As he went through black Africa all the African leaders signed on except one, Sékou Touré of Guinea. In a speech in de Gaulle's presence in Conakry, Sékou Touré said his Guinea would have nothing to do with the Community or any ties to France after that, it was one hundred percent independence. So de Gaulle returned to France and said, "So be it,"; Guinea was cut off. Sékou Touré was a very pronounced leftist Marxist demagogue anyway, and the French pulled out brutally, lock, stock and barrel. What they couldn't take with them they dismantled; it was a brutal departure, intended, of course, to indicate to the rest of the Africans what would be in store for them if they didn't like the Community.

So the Community had its day. I forget how long it lasted, but during the period it lasted General de Gaulle was President of the Republic and of the Community, and on July 14, in another two years, you had the President and the Chiefs of State of the Community. There were a lot of nice perks in it for them, belong to the community and you got your subsidies, you got this, you got that, all kinds of good things. They made it worth while. But then in the fall of 1960, I suppose, de Gaulle went to Dakar--the Senegalese had been restive--and made a speech, a landmark speech, which put all the African states on notice that if they wanted to be independent, they could be independent. He said, "Go, its okay, go," so they went. They all became independent; of course they are still in many way dependent on France, but there are no institutional ties.

Q: Were you getting any reflection of this from your contacts in the Quai d'Orsay? Why did de Gaulle first say you are either in my Community or out in the wilderness, then change to you can leave, we won't be revengeful?

BARBOUR: I think they considered they would maintain the form and let the substance go. The implication, of course, was for Algeria which was the French preoccupation at the time. If we let these states become independent then what does that mean for Algeria. De Gaulle never said, I don't think, that Algeria could never be independent but he gave that impression. So the African states adopted a new identity and became less closely tied to French policies.

Q: How did the French diplomats in the Quai d'Orsay deal with you on these things? Did they think we might go fishing in their waters, or anything like that?

BARBOUR: They were unquestionably ambivalent. On the one hand they thought, quite rightly, that we could never supplant them because of the cultural ties, that we would never really try for economic reasons. They were right on both scores. But they hoped we would be mindful of French interests and I think to a large degree we were. So I don't recall any acrimony or tension over black Africa, over Laos, yes, but not over black Africa.

Q: What was the tension over Laos?

BARBOUR: Various Laotian crises--SEATO, France was a member of SEATO--when it looked as though we were going to get involved in a larger conflict in Laos and the French didn't want to. Remember this was 1961, the beginning of the Kennedy Administration, and there was a lot of muscle flexing and there were various Laotian crises. One of these brought the Secretary and Selwyn Lloyd to Paris for a ministerial meeting on Laos. Can you imagine such a thing today? There used to be a fair number of these things. SEATO saber rattling. The French position was that we were complicating the Laotian crisis and didn't really know what we were doing. Their position was consistently that they understood what we Americans were doing but thought we were wrong; and that was what they maintained. So we had a lot of conversations with them on the subject of Laos. It was not accidental that the people we dealt with in the Foreign Ministry on Southeast Asia and on French Africa were either people who had been integrated into the Quai d'Orsay from other Ministries or, in the case of Africa, were in the other Ministries.

Q: So they brought with them a strong commitment to these areas.

BARBOUR: They did, but I think that for their Minister they represented an annoying distraction. I don't think we had any routine contacts with Couve de Murville on either subject.

Q: Were you there when the Kennedy Administration came in?

BARBOUR: Yes.

Q: This must of made an impact, because Kennedy as a Senator had made at least one speech about how Algeria should be free. During your time there how did you deal with this?

BARBOUR: It was ambivalence in reverse. They knew the Kennedy policy and were very worried about it, but the person was wildly popular. They liked this new President and his wife who spoke French, who knew France and things French. They were very popular, very popular. I think that applied to the government as well. He got on very well with de Gaulle when they came in May of 1961 on a real old-fashioned state visit. My place at that time was in the Quai d'Orsay, where they stayed; I didn't sleep there but I stayed there with them all day in to late night, every day they were there. I was the liaison between the party and the Quai d'Orsay or the security as far as the minutiae of the visit were concerned. It was wild and hectic and interesting. Kennedy and de Gaulle, I think, got along well. De Gaulle thought of him as an interesting young man; I think the chemistry was good. Their concerns were, of course, Europe; I don't recall whether they talked about Southeast Asia, they may have, but it certainly wasn't on the top of the agenda.

DOROTHY A EARDLEY

Special Assistant for Atomic Energy
Paris (1958-1963)

Mrs. Eardley was born in Wisconsin and raised in Wisconsin and Illinois. She attended Rubican Business School before entering the State Department, where in 1951 she was assigned as Clerk-Stenographer at Djakarta, Indonesia. She subsequently was posted to Berlin, Chengmai, Paris, Libreville, Colombo, Ankara, Ottawa, Jeddah and Kigali. She also had temporary duty assignments in Djibouti, Reunion, and Johannesburg. She retired in 1980. Mrs. Eardley was interviewed by T. Frank Crigler in 2008.

Q: Well, why don't we talk about how you got from there to Paris.

EARDLEY: I'll tell you what Washington told me; that since I'd been at a one-man post, I needed to be at a large post. But I didn't want a large post. I went though, and I loved it from the day I arrived. So, never judge a book by its cover.

Well, for one thing, I didn't think I could afford it. I had to go back on base salary. I'd been at a hardship post. Twenty-five percent helps a great deal. I was supporting my parents just then, because all my brothers and sisters were married and had families. I didn't want them to have to give up any of their hard-earned money, so I chose to do it this way. But boy! I gave them ultimatums. I said, "If I ever hear you're not giving them moral support, you're gonna pay." They took care of my parents, all right!

Q: Where in the embassy, then, were you assigned?

EARDLEY: The Special "Asst" for Atomic Energy. That's Special "Assistant" for Atomic Energy. The special assistant to the ambassador for atomic energy. Max Eisenberg, was his name. I liked his wife and daughter. I liked him all right too. He meant well. He just was lazy.

Q: So that meant you didn't have much work to do.

EARDLEY: None. And so he was all in favor of my learning French, and so was I. I had already enrolled in the Alliance Française during my lunch hour. In those days I didn't eat lunch anyway. I was overweight, and I was trying to keep my weight down. So, I went there every lunch hour, on a pass. I rode the Metro. It went a little over my hour, but he wouldn't complain at all. And that's how I learned French, in eight months. I read and write French. Strangely enough, when I got to Gabon, which was right after France, one day one of the locals in the embassy said, "You're not an American." I said, "Oh yes I am." And he said, "But you have a Parisian accent!" I didn't know that. I still don't. I don't sense it. I took that as a great compliment. I'd finally arrived.

Q: How did the atomic energy section or office fit into the embassy? Was it part of the Political Section?

EARDLEY: It was an entity all its own.

Q: Who did it report to in Washington?

EARDLEY: I don't know that it ever reported anything. He would report to the ambassador. That's all.

Q: So you weren't busy typing reports that you had to send in.

EARDLEY: Oh, no. I think that's how (political section chief) Kidder discovered me. He could see that I wasn't doing anything.

Q: Did Mr. Eisenberg have contact with others in the community, outside the embassy?

EARDLEY: Yes, he was interested in music. I don't know whether he himself played an instrument. I don't think so. But his daughter may have.

Q: He didn't have lots of people from other embassies coming to call on him?

EARDLEY: No, no. I don't think they had the equivalent in other embassies. The Atomic Energy Commission, though, used to be stationed in Paris. Then it moved to Vienna. I think it's still in Vienna.

Q: Tell me more about how you worked in the political section with Mr. Kidder.

EARDLEY: I loved it. I was so glad when he asked for me. I can't be idle. I am now, but this is a different kind of idle. I don't think they had anyone in the atomic energy thing after I was moved. But I loved working with Ambassador Kidder.

Q: He was not someone to sit around idle.

EARDLEY: Oh, we worked till eight o'clock every night. Yeah, I got called in after hours too, because the Algerians kept threatening to blow up the Place de la Concorde. And we were right there on it. I'll never forget the last time I was called in. I think it was five in the morning. I drove across there. When I got up to the Champs Elysees, the tanks were all lining both sides of the Champs Elysees with their turrets pointed. And I thought, "Is it going to be safe for me to drive across the Place de la Concorde?" There was a bicyclist going by . . .

Q: This was at five in the morning?

EARDLEY: Well, that's when Algeria would threaten to blow up the place, and evidently there'd been a new threat. That's why I was called in.

Q: When would that have been approximately? Was that in 1961, or . . .

DE: Fifty-nine or sixty-one. Sixty or sixty-one.

Q: I take it that the threat came to nothing, though.

EARDLEY: Yeah. But I asked this bicyclist, I said in French, “Is it gonna be safe for me to drive across there?” He said, “Oh sure.” I got across and got into the embassy, parked my car right inside the embassy entrance, and I got inside. The minister, Mr. Lyon, was waiting for me, and Kidder was waiting for me, and so we got busy.

Q: Doing cables?

EARDLEY: Yeah. That I think was the last really bad threat that they had. That’s when what’s his name, de Gaulle, decided to rid himself of all the countries under French control. He forced independence on all those Sub-Saharan African posts who didn’t want it, they weren’t itching for it, and they weren’t ready for it. Gabon was one of them.

Q: When you were working for the political counselor, how much did you have to do with the front office, the ambassador, and the DCM (Deputy Chief of Mission) at that time? Did you see a lot of them?

EARDLEY: The DCM, yes. That’s how Lyon swiped me from Kidder.

Q: And so you actually went to work for him?

EARDLEY: Yes, my last year there I worked with Ambassador Lyon. Strangely enough, Lyon and Kidder both became ambassadors at about the same time. Kidder was designated for Phnom Penh. He asked for me to come there with him. I said I’d love to. Okay, they cut my orders, they even threw in home leave, which I wasn’t quite entitled to. (I was not in Gabon two full years, but they threw that in.) Kidder got to Bangkok, but he was not permitted to present his credentials in Phnom Penh. So my orders to Phnom Penh were canceled. Oh, I was furious!

Q: But let’s back up to how you worked with Kidder in Paris.

EARDLEY: Kidder and I worked beautifully together. So did Lyon and I. You had to sort of straighten out Lyon once in a while. He knew everyone, Lyon did. Well, I guess Kidder did too. Did you know his wife? Quite a character. She was not pretty, but she was liked by everyone and she was a character. I think she liked me all right. Anyway, I would love to have gone to Phnom Penh.

Q: When you say “they,” the Kidders, knew a lot of people and were liked by everyone, you mean within the embassy or among the French?

EARDLEY: Oh, all the way, yes, yes. I was also borrowed a lot while I was in Kidder’s office. Whenever the secretary of state came to Paris I was borrowed to work with him and anyone else, any other VIP who came. And when, in 1961, John F. Kennedy came, I met all the Kennedys. They were sort of related to Lyon, so they all had to call on him when they came through Paris. First there was John — no, Ted I think was the first one. He was a red-faced, a scared to death guy at that time. He was just married. I’ll never forget when he walked across my desk. This was when I was Cecil's secretary.

Q: Walked across your desk?

EARDLEY: Well, in front of it. He was scared to death. He was out of his league. But they all had to call on the minister. One of the minister's daughters was married to Hugh Auchincloss.

Q: Jackie's family.

EARDLEY: Yeah. And then Robert Kennedy was attorney general when he came to Paris. He worked out of the Crillon Hotel, so I got to see him only once. He sent his dictation over to me with a courier.

Q: You mean on tape?

EARDLEY: No, it was scribbled. He should have brought his secretary with him. Anyway, I guess he made his call on Lyon.

Q: Do you remember what kind of problem or activity they were working on when they visited Paris at that time?

EARDLEY: I have no idea, no idea. I know what John F. Kennedy was working on, because he pulled a surprise on us. We thought we had put him on a plane at Orly — no not Orly — Charles de Gaulle airport, to go back to the United States. He didn't. He went to Vienna and met Khrushchev. That was the time when Khrushchev slammed his shoe on the table. And at three o'clock on a Sunday afternoon, I got a call to come back to the embassy. "The President is coming back!" So, I poured coffee down me. I'd been drinking martinis ever since I got home from church. Another secretary and I went to Georges V Cathedral every Sunday, and then we came back to my apartment and drank martinis the rest of the day. We did it every Sunday. So, I was loading myself with coffee after that telephone call. They told me to be at the embassy by six. I got there by six, sober, and they didn't get there till ten-thirty that night. Now, the President did not come in to the embassy, but his two aides came in. They dictated until seven-thirty in the morning.

Q: And you stayed awake?

EARDLEY: Sure! I loved dictation.

Q: Who were the aides, do you remember?

EARDLEY: Have no idea.

Q: Was the secretary of state along on that trip?

EARDLEY: I think he had already left. He had preceded them.

Q: To Vienna and back?

EARDLEY: No, no, no! No! The secretary of state had nothing to do with this Vienna thing. This was later. The President did this on his own. He was gonna talk turkey to Khrushchev.

Q: Tell me more of your adventures in Paris. Where did you live there?

EARDLEY: I lived on Rue Maspereau [phon.] the first two years. The second two years I lived in Boulevard St. Germain, west -- left bank. Then, the last year, I lived behind the Arc de Triomphe, in Rue des Acacias. I guess that was the name of it. I liked that. I had a one-floor, ground-floor apartment, and I loved it.

Q: What were working conditions like in the embassy? Were the offices ancient?

EARDLEY: What do you mean?

Q: The building was old, wasn't it? Was difficult to work in?

EARDLEY: Heavens, no! I didn't feel it was old. I liked working there. I had no problem.

CECIL B. LYON
Deputy Chief of Mission
Paris (1958-1964)

Cecil B. Lyon was born in New York in 1903. He graduated from Harvard University in 1927. He joined the Foreign Service in 1930 and his overseas postings included Cuba, China (Hong Kong), Japan, China, Chile, Egypt, Poland, Germany, France, and Ceylon. He was interviewed in 1988 by John Bovey.

Q: Now tell me about your assignment to Paris and what was going on there when you arrived. It was a pretty exciting time, '58.

LYON: It certainly was. And I think the nearly six or seven years that we were there, were not only the most interesting but the most stimulating, the happiest years of my whole career.

Just before I leave Chile...I've been reminded of something I think slightly amusing. Secretary Dulles administered the oath when I was made Ambassador to Chile and my father-in-law, Mr. Grew, was present. And Dulles said, "Lyon, a lot of people think you're too young to be an Ambassador but as you've lived in the shadow of your distinguished father-in-law, we think its probably all right. You've gained knowledge from him." And I couldn't resist saying, "Mr. Secretary, to paraphrase Mark Twain, the rumor of my youth is grossly exaggerated." Actually I was 53 years old, which wasn't all that young. When I was in Paris and President Kennedy came upon the scene, and he was appointing all his peers and didn't want old Ambassadors, I suddenly got too old to be an Ambassador again.

I had thought that, when we got back to Chile, Elsie would love it. She hadn't been well, and I thought the change and everything would give her a shot in the arm. But it didn't. She wasn't at all well, so, as often happens when you get the thing you have longed for many times, it wasn't all that gratifying. I was worried about her and after about two years -- she'd gone home to see the doctors -- I got a telephone call from Loy Henderson. He said, "You've always said you'd rather be Minister in London than an Ambassador anywhere." I said, "Yes, and it's still true." And he said, "Well, we can't send you to London but what about Paris?" I said, "Paris! Whoopie! I'd love it." He said, "What about Elsie?" And I said, "I know she'd love it too." He said, "Call her up and call me back tomorrow morning." Well I tried to get Elsie but she was staying with her mother: "Oh, Elsie has gone to bed and we can't disturb her." I told my mother-in-law the important news, but that didn't impress Mrs. Grew, so I never got through to Elsie. But I got Loy, and, naturally, I accepted. I thought Paris would also give Elsie a shot in the arm, with the shops and I knew she loved Paris and getting some nice French clothes, and the music and the opera and everything. It would really cure her. So I came back and we started off. I, of course, consulted with the Secretary on my way through. And I remember his saying to me, "You know, Lyon, I don't know what the ranking thing is, Minister to Paris, or Ambassador in Chile..." I don't remember the word he used but I said, "I don't care, sir. I think, wherever we are, the most important thing is the work, and I think the work in Paris will be terribly interesting and I also love Paris." He said, "So do I." And then he said, "I think we're going to have more problems with France in the next few years than with any country we've had since the war." He was very astute and he also said...

Q: This was still in the period of the Fourth Republic?

LYON: Yes. But he also said, "Keep an eye out for that fellow de Gaulle." Of course, as you know, de Gaulle was then living down in Colombey les-Deux-Eglises, ostensibly out of things. One reason I was sent to Paris was that we had a political appointee there, and Charlie Yost, who was one of the most brilliant Foreign Service Officers, was Minister. He was holding the hand of Amory Houghton, who couldn't have been a nicer man or more intelligent.

Q: What time of year was it, do you remember when you arrived? It was just before the May crisis.

LYON: It was March, 1958 and, if you recall, de Gaulle returned to power in May, 1958. It was still the Fourth Republic; governments were falling after a couple of weeks. I think Churchill made the remark, "Oh, the situation in France was terrible, they had one government after another. It was such a bore I had a stroke." Well anyway, Ambassador Houghton met me at the airport very kindly, and drove me to Paris. He'd never seen me before in his life, he'd taken me on sheer faith and assurances from others. I later learned, many, many years afterwards, that it was David Bruce who'd suggested that I go, and I must say I am eternally grateful to him.

Some people thought, "Oh, my goodness, he must have done something terrible in Chile, from having been Ambassador to go to Minister, No. 2 in Paris." And the Chileans didn't understand it, in fact they were a little bit annoyed. And the Foreign Minister said to me, "We can't understand why you're going to Paris as Minister. We understand that your predecessor there has gone as Ambassador to Syria, a country from which we receive immigrants." And I said to him, "In the Foreign Service you go where you're told. Its like the Army and you just do it." I didn't tell him that secretly I was simply delighted to go. There was also the fact that my salary was going to be reduced by about $7,000 a year. But anyway, I was so happy to be in Paris that I didn't give that a thought. As I say, Mr. Houghton didn't know me from Adam but he was a very nice man. He didn't speak French. He had an impediment with his speech so that even his English was at times difficult to understand. He'd had cancer and he'd had half his tongue removed, but I never did sort of say, "What did you say?" because I knew it was so difficult for him to talk anyway.

He drove me in and dropped me at 10 Emile Deschanel, which was the Minister's official residence, a charming house, and I was really just walking on air. But immediately when I got to Paris, France was all entangled in problems with Tunisia.

Q: The Sakiet incident took place after you got there then?

LYON: I can't remember the exact date, but we were already worrying about it then. It may have happened just as I got there. Algerian rebels were crossing into Tunisia to take refuge, and the French bombed the Tunisian village of Sakiet. Bourguiba was frantic; he thought the French were going to invade Tunisia. He appealed to the U.N., where France was censured. We and the British accepted the French feeler for our good offices. Bob Murphy and a man from the British Foreign Office, Harold Beeley, came over. They shuttled back and forth between Paris and Tunis trying to calm things down.

Q: I was on the receiving end in the Department during that time. I had the Moroccan and Tunisian desk.

LYON: Well, you probably remember more of the details than I do. Of course, we all admired Mr. Murphy -- he was a wonderful Foreign Service Officer -- but it was not a wise selection, because the French remembered him from the wartime days in Algeria and the landings of American troops. De Gaulle and he didn't exactly hit it off.

Q: Yes, I remember all too well. Did you have a feeling that the Murphy-Beeley Good Offices Mission, in effect, served to weaken the Fourth Republic and to diminish its prestige? I've often wondered whether the advent of the Fifth Republic wasn't speeded up by the demonstration that the Fourth couldn't hack it in North Africa without third-party intervention.

LYON: Well, you were closer to that than I was.

Q: I always thought it was a terrible mistake for the Fourth Republic.

LYON: You did? You're probably right, but the Fourth Republic was so darn weak anyway.

Q: Oh, I agree, and in that sense the whole mess led to a good thing. It probably helped bring in the Fifth Republic, which certainly was an improvement for everybody, even though we had our problems with it.

LYON: Then they had trouble with Morocco...

Q: De Gaulle, of course, was disgusted by our mixing in.

LYON: There was one trouble after another in North Africa and France was in a terrible state.

Q: Both Morocco and Tunisia were already independent. But as I remember, the Moroccans caught the fever from the Tunisians and made trouble for the French troops there.

LYON: Yes, they were having troubles with the French.

Q: The French always had problems in Morocco and Tunisia but I don't think they were ever as bad as the war in Algeria.

LYON: But, in any event, in May when de Gaulle came back to power it was really remarkable. We got there in March and he came to power in May. I remember that Dulles came over about a month after he was there to brief -- sent by Eisenhower -- to brief de Gaulle and bring him up-to-date on our relations and problems of the world. Actually it was the only time I'd seen Dulles rather nervous. We were sitting around with the Ambassador; Burke Elbrick was the Western Europe Assistant Secretary of State, he came with Dulles, and Loomer of the French desk. We were going over how Dulles would talk to de Gaulle; and everybody was giving him advice, and I said, "Butter him up, Mr. Secretary." And Dulles gave me a scathing look, as if to say, "Me butter anybody up?"

But then we got to the meeting and General de Gaulle said, "Alors, Monsieur le Secrétaire. Qu'est-ce que vous avez à dire?" Dulles was doodling and there seemed to me to be an interminable silence before he spoke.

Q: He must have inherited this from his uncle. Wasn't it Lansing who was doodling all during the Versailles conference?

LYON: Lansing, his uncle, yes. Well, in any event, he was a great doodler and I thought, "Oh my goodness, won't he start to speak?" and was waiting and waiting. And then he started and he did a tour d'horizon of our foreign policy and it was absolutely superb. I've never known anything like it, without a note, it was just all off the top of his head. It had been agreed that they wouldn't have interpreters because Dulles spoke French and de Gaulle thought he spoke enough English, he wouldn't need it. But it hadn't been going very long when de Gaulle said, "Oh, my English is too rusty," he used a French word, I think its rouille. So Claude Lebel did the interpreting. And I was a note-taker, and the other note-taker for the French side was Charles Lucet, who later ended up as Ambassador in Washington and head of the Western Europe division of the Quai d'Orsay. But anyway de Gaulle sat there. He was very nervous. He kept stretching his neck. And every now and then he'd write a note on a piece of paper, but only, I think, very few times. I think Dulles talked for about three-quarters of an hour. It was terrific. And then he stopped and de Gaulle answered him, absolutely perfectly with just these few notes he'd written. It was a wonderful exchange of views and I was so pleased that it had gone so well.

That night we all dined at the Embassy with the Ambassador, Dulles and his staff or the people who had come with him. The Ambassador made a few nice remarks; then Dulles made some nice remarks and he said, "De Gaulle is an extraordinary man. He's in retirement for years, and, while there, he thinks." You'll remember he had been in retirement, first after 1946 and then again after 1953, in Colombey-les-Deux Eglises. And he said, "When he comes back to power, he puts his thoughts to work, and uses them."

Q: What was the Secretary's emphasis, on the communist menace?

LYON: Yes.

Q: And what about de Gaulle's?

LYON: De Gaulle more or less answered him. But I don't think he said anything about getting out of NATO. I think he supported the North Atlantic Tripartite concept as against the NATO organization.

Q: That all came to a head later but at this point...

LYON: I think he mentioned it even then. He was very worried about Algeria, of course; he talked about Algeria.

Q: Did he say anything, do you remember if he said anything specifically about the U.S., UK, French directorate? You remember the famous memorandum.

LYON: Not yet, not then. But, of course, that all came to a head later and caused us so much trouble.

Q: Did you have the feeling that the Secretary inherited the Rooseveltian detestation of de Gaulle?

LYON: I didn't. And I also had the feeling that de Gaulle himself had mellowed a great deal. He didn't seem to have any resentment vis-a-vis us, although we know he did after reading his book. But that certainly didn't come out. He was very gracious, de Gaulle, and very receptive and thanked the President for sending Dulles, and he hoped that the President would come on a visit. No, I don't think he showed any sort of resentment, or I didn't get the impression of it, even though we know he harbored some resentments from the war.

Q: De Gaulle never unveiled his plans before he was ready to move.

LYON: No, of course he didn't, and he had the ability to cover up with double talk, as with his plans for Algeria.

Q: Actually there were plenty of internal reasons for his holding back, but we'll get back to that after we've talked about the assassination attempt at Petit Clamart.

LYON: Let me say just one thing about tactics. I think a lot of people when they called on de Gaulle and wanted to sell something or get him to do something, they thought he was agreeing with them if he didn't answer them. But often he really wasn't agreeing; he just wasn't making any comment at all. Don't you think that was true?

Q: Absolutely.

LYON: I think a lot of people were fooled by that. On the other hand, some people always said, you know, that once he'd made up his mind, he never changed. But I think we know he did. In the Algerian thing, he changed very considerably. At the beginning it was total surrender for the Algerians and all that, and then he worked it out by getting more lenient.

Q: Yes, maybe, but I've never been able to decide whether he meant all that stuff he told the French and the military in Algiers -- "Je vous ai compris" and all that. I had a feeling that he knew damn well that at the end of the affair, Algerie Francaise just wasn't going to wash.

LYON: Oh, I think he did know, and he was so wise. I think he handled it very well.

Q: Yes, he was very farsighted, and astute too.

LYON: I think Frenchmen, when he came in, thought, "Oh, he has all the answers." I don't think he had all the answers, but I think he knew how to wait and move slowly, and move a little bit here, try an idea and then if it didn't work try out another one. You hadn't got to Paris yet, but people were relieved that he was in power -- we'll leave everything to papa. We'll let him worry about it -- and he was quite prepared to worry about it.

Q: Did you have any echoes of the Debre thesis that what we were out to do was to kick the French out of Algeria so the imperialists could inherit the oil?

LYON: Oh, did I not!

Q: No, no, I mean, do you have any feeling that this was very widely believed in France?

LYON: You know, everybody was saying we wanted to get them out so we could get the oil. And I'd go out to dinner and French people would attack me with this. And in those days I was able to say, "Don't be silly. We've got oil running out of our ears," which we did have then, though we later didn't. And then I'd throw out some remark and one Frenchman would agree and one would disagree and they'd get into a fight, and then I'd back away. I'm glad you mentioned that.

Q: On the left, though where this Debre thesis should have been popular, I always had the feeling that Algeria was more like Vietnam for us with the left wing. I don't know whether they bought the Debre thesis or not.

LYON: I don't know whether they did, but I know that all the bankers and people like that -- the leading upper crust -- had this feeling.

Oh, I'm so glad you mentioned Debre because about a week or two weeks before de Gaulle returned to power, I was invited by a delightful American, a retired diplomat who lived in Paris whom you probably knew, Louis Einstein. Louis Einstein was a widower; he used to give stag luncheons and he very kindly used to invite me to them. One day he called up and said, "Debre is coming to lunch tomorrow and I think you ought to know him." So I went to lunch and we hadn't been there very long when Debre started this attack that we wanted to get the French out because of the oil. And I went back at him hammer and tongs and poor Louis Einstein, the host, kept getting more and more embarrassed and trying to change the subject and talking about Czechoslovakia where he'd been Ambassador, but Debre and I went at it full, full, force. After the luncheon, we came down stairs and I had a car and he didn't. I said, "Can I give you a lift home?" He agreed and then he said, "You know this has been interesting, let's get to know each other." I wasn't going to let that slip. I didn't know he was going to become Prime Minister the next week, but I immediately got him for lunch again and we really became very good friends. And when I used to accompany the Ambassador, when he was Prime Minister, he would sit there, as you mentioned the other night, with that little boyish face and his head slanted to the left, and he'd say the most outrageous things, and I'd think, "This man is Prime Minister. He shouldn't be saying these things about Algeria and everything." Then I would think...and you couldn't tell whether what he was saying was his own idea or whether it was de Gaulle talking. They both talked very much the same, and they both had the same ideas and their thoughts were absolutely linked together.

Q: Its curious, though, isn't it? With Debre the quality of greatness just wasn't there, was it?

LYON: No, but he was a bright man. I remember once when he'd just come back from Algiers, and he was all thrilled. They were putting up a sort of line of defense -- an electric wire defense on the border -- and he was most enthusiastic about it. He turned to the Ambassador and said, "You ought to go to Algeria. Have you ever been to Algiers?" The Ambassador said, "No." "You ought to go." And Mr. Houghton sort of backed away and said, "No, I can't." "Well you ought to go, Lyon." I said, "I'd love to." I thought it was just talk. He said, "I'll arrange it" and I thought he never would. I got back to the office and the telephone was ringing, and the French official said, "The Prime Minister wants us to make arrangements for you to go to Algeria." So I immediately accepted, and I stayed with Paul Delouvrier the Delege General (High Commissioner) for Algeria. I had a most interesting time.

Q: Did you go with French escort?

LYON: Entirely.

Q: We were still going back and forth to Algeria when I was there in 1961. I made the last trip which it was possible to do under French aegis. It was just before independence.

LYON: We had a French plane, and French escort everywhere I went. And I must say I admired those young French officers, the ones who were sort of out in the field running things in the outlying areas.

Q: The Affaires Indigenes people? They were first class.

LYON: First class, and so wonderful for a young man to have such responsibility. I remember thinking how interesting for them.

Q: I shouldn't hog the conversation here, but that was the only French administrative thing, that was really first class in Morocco during the difficult days. The military staffed the Affaires Indigenes and they were wonderful.

LYON: They were wonderful. Sort of a super Peace Corps.

Q: Pure paternalism, but it was very good. Can we go to the Eisenhower visit and the terrible bust-up?

LYON: One more thing first. I think it was on May 13, just before de Gaulle came back to power, that there was a general insurrection of the French military in Algiers. The British Minister in Paris, Jerry Young, had been Third Secretary in Peking when I was Third Secretary there, so we were delighted to work together. I was sitting in my office late at night and he came rushing over. He said, "Cecil, they're going to land in Paris, they're going to take Paris." And I said, "Oh, don't be silly. I've come from Latin America. We have those things in Latin America, but we don't have them in France." He said, "Well they are, they are." He was terribly worried, you see. And just then the telephone rang, Burke Elbrick in Washington on the other end, "How are things in Paris?" They were all excited in Washington. I said, "I'm sitting here in my office, looking out on the Place de la Concorde, the fountains are playing, all the lights are on, everything is fine, don't get worried." They didn't want to hear that, they wanted to hear that some terrible thing was happening.

Q: In a way, it was a preview of the thing that happened three years later, the putsch of the Generals -- Challe and company -- in Algiers, April 1961.

LYON: When Ambassador Gavin was there and I had all my trouble about our intelligence gathering. Another thing about Algeria. I never could understand the French insisting that it was a Department of Metropolitan France.

Q: "Partie Integrante de la France."

LYON: Which was crazy because it really wasn't, and you had to have a visa to get in there. Now you didn't have to have a visa to get into Normandy, or Brittany.

Q: Now what about the Eisenhower visit which took place in September 1959?

LYON: That was a great occasion and de Gaulle was insistent that everything should go perfectly and smoothly. I think he wanted to bury the hatchet as far as the troubles they had during the war. And I had charge of making our arrangements so I got to see a lot of his aides. We worked everything out, and everything had to be submitted, every tiny detail, had to be submitted to General de Gaulle himself to approve for that visit. And then he went out to the airport to meet General Eisenhower...

Q: Was this an echo of his wartime relationship, or was he this way with all the visitors?

LYON: I think he wanted to bury the wartime relationship.

Q: Well, the wartime relationship wasn't always bad, you know.

LYON: Well it was with FDR.

Q: I mean the relationship with Eisenhower.

LYON: It wasn't too bad?

Q: No, he said that Eisenhower had given in, don't you remember, on the question of taking Strasbourg and de Gaulle said, "You're a man who recognizes when he's made a mistake."

LYON: Anyway, as they were coming in from the airport there were lots of cheers, and I think de Gaulle said, "You see how much you're loved here, you're respected here." And Eisenhower, with his usual tact said, "Ah, but I think a good deal of this is for you, General de Gaulle." The visit was a tremendous success. I remember going down to one of the receptions at the Hotel de Ville; there were crowds and crowds. I was a little disappointed because I felt de Gaulle was going out of his way to be nice, and sort of reaching out to Eisenhower, which was not in the nature of de Gaulle's character. And it was usually in the nature of Eisenhower to be outgoing, but I felt Eisenhower was sort of holding back a little, that he wasn't going out to be friendly with de Gaulle as much as de Gaulle was going out to be friendly with him. And I remember the last night was spent in Rambouillet, the President, de Gaulle and their respective staffs. I think Eisenhower's son was with him and Scowcroft. I think he was there but I'm not sure.

Q: Oh, Brent Scowcroft.

LYON: And the Ambassador. They all spent the night and they had a dinner at Rambouillet, a stag dinner, and they very kindly invited me to go. I got out there about 15 minutes ahead of time. I was alone and I was waiting in a sitting room, and Debre arrived. Debre and I were having a nice little chat and suddenly the door opened. General de Gaulle walked through, nodded at us, and loomed over the table where he had arranged the gifts that he was going to present. He was giving a Houdon bust of Lafayette, I think, to President Eisenhower and he had a gift for each of the visiting team. And he looked at the card for each, to be sure that everything was correct. I thought this infinite attention to detail was interesting.

Q: Father Christmas.

LYON: Well, yes, but for a busy man! And yet he never seemed busy. He always seemed to have plenty of time for everyone; and calm, and he was never rushed. We were talking, I think, the other night about his blindness. He'd had cataracts and he'd had the operation. He didn't think it was proper or appropriate for the Chief of State to wear glasses. But he couldn't really see without his glasses. I remember once at the dedication of the Place de l'Etoile. It was a circle, and he got out of his car and he started to walk where he thought was straight ahead, but there was a crowd there and he kept bumping into the crowd and the aides kept nudging him because he couldn't see. Also, Pompidou told me that when de Gaulle became president and Coty left the presidency, he and de Gaulle drove together to the Arc de Triomphe and placed flowers on the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier. Then de Gaulle drove back to the Elysée with Pompidou, which was a great mark of respect for Pompidou. Pompidou said the streets were lined with crowds but that sometimes, surprisingly enough, French crowds can be quiet, they don't yell or demonstrate. They often do both but I mean they weren't making any noise and de Gaulle turned to Pompidou and he said, "Pompidou, est que il y a de la foule?" The streets were packed with people But he couldn't see that far. And then at the time of the Kennedy visit, we all went to lunch at the Elysée and de Gaulle gave gifts to the President and Mrs. Kennedy. He suddenly found himself all alone and he grabbed me by the arm and said, "Regardez, Monsieur le Premier Conseiller," as he called me, "Voilà," and he pointed to the ceiling on which were painted three or four scenes. He told me what each scene was, and he didn't have his glasses on so I knew he couldn't see it but he must have memorized it at some point. He had a fantastic memory, as you know. They tell me he'd write a speech, read it over once, and say it without a correction.

Q: I remember the speech he gave about the gold standard.

LYON: Was it wonderful?

Q: Well, it wasn't very sound, I guess, but he had memorized, I suppose, ten pages from Jacques Rueff's book about the gold standard and he just reeled it off as though it was his own stuff.

LYON: Well, you know, they say he could read anything over once, and that was all he needed to give it without a mistake.

Q: Let's get back to the other Eisenhower visit and the collapse of the Summit in May, 1960.

LYON: Do you want me to talk about the Summit?

Q: Yes. Where were you during all this ghastly episode?

LYON: Well, we were there, of course.

Q: Were you present during the meeting?

LYON: No, no, I wasn't at any of the meetings. But Chip and Livy Merchant were both staying with us, so we had a pretty good rundown of it. And Elsie has actually written that up somewhere; she made a very good description of it all. Chip came home one day and said, "Well there's no summit." As you recall, Khrushchev was there and it was just after the U-2 incident when the Russians had shot down the U-2. Eisenhower had taken the blame, but Khrushchev insisted that he apologize. Eisenhower refused. He said he was sorry it happened and, "I take the blame." De Gaulle was a little inept, in that he should have let Eisenhower speak first. But Khrushchev, as you know, rose up and cursed out the United States, and cursed out Eisenhower, and then wouldn't go on with the Summit unless Eisenhower apologized, which he didn't.

But it was at that meeting, as I recall, that de Gaulle proved himself a good ally and said to President Eisenhower, "Well, come what may, we'll be with you all the way."

Q: The incident took place a few days before Eisenhower came to Paris, didn't it?

LYON: Yes, only a few days...

Q: It was in the public domain, though before he arrived?

LYON: Oh, yes. And in the States Eisenhower had said, "It's all my fault, I'm Chief of State."

Q: That's when we had that famous morning with Acheson at the War College that I told you about.

LYON: Oh, really? In any event, this is where I made another gaffe. It's surprising I lasted as long as I did in the Service. We were all dining at the Residence that night with President Eisenhower and his people and everyone was a bit downcast. And I said, "Well, there's one person who will be very happy that this has happened." And the President said, "Who?" And I said, "Eisenhower." He said, "What?" And Bohlen said, "Cecil, what are you talking about, what do you mean?" I said, "My God, I mean Adenauer." So you can see what a successful career I had.

But anyway, the President was supreme. He didn't seem terribly concerned, I mean he was concerned, but he said, "Oh well, you have these things happen, and you've got to take them." He was rather philosophical.

Q: You're talking about Eisenhower?

LYON: Yes, not Adenauer.

Q: Eisenhower was not easy to rattle.

LYON: But Adenauer, you know, was against the Summit and he didn't want it to be held at all, as I recall. That's why I was thinking of Adenauer.

At the dinner Eisenhower made a remark I have never forgotten. He said everyone always says, "You must be under great pressure, and don't feel stress."

Q: MacMillan, I gather, was practically reduced to tears about the thing.

LYON: Who?

Q: MacMillan. He had staked everything on this.

LYON: The German names remind me of when I was head of German affairs. Somebody called up the State Department and they wanted to speak to Mr. Sechsauer. And I was head of German affairs and they thought Sechsauer, Adenauer, Eisenhower, he must be in German affairs. So the call was put through to German affairs, and they said, "Do you have a Sechsauer in German affairs?" And the operator said, "No, since Mr. Lyon has been here we don't even have a coffee break."

Q: Tell us something about the Cuban missile crisis in the autumn of '62, and the Acheson mission.

LYON: Well, you've asked a very pertinent question, because that was one of the most exciting times in my stay in Paris. As I recall, it was an autumn Sunday. I was at home with flu. The telephone rang and Washington told me a very distinguished person would be arriving that night at 12:00 midnight or 1:00 a.m. or some dreadful hour, not at Orly but at an American airfield way out to hell and gone, I don't remember which one.

Q: Evreux maybe?

LYON: It probably was Evreux. And I should meet him. Something must have been said that gave me a hint that it was Acheson because I wasn't surprised when I got out to the airport and Acheson stepped off the plane with a couple of people; one was Sherman Kent. I don't remember who else was with him, but I think there were one or two.

It was very funny, because I was in bed with flu, but things got so exciting, and I was so involved that my flu vanished. Acheson said he had to see de Gaulle right away and it was then 2:00 a.m. in the morning, or 1:00 a.m. in the morning. I said, "I know he's at Colombey- les-Deux Eglises but I'll call the Elysée immediately in the morning," and I did. I explained what it was, and I was able then to explain who it was. I said, "He's been sent by the President on a very special mission and he has to see President de Gaulle as soon as possible." I was told the President would see him the moment he got back from Colombey- les-Deux Eglises, which was about 2:00 p.m. in the afternoon, I think. And I said it must be kept very hush, we don't want anyone to know he's here. So they arranged for us to enter a side door.

Q: Excuse me. Had it already become public before Acheson got there?

LYON: No. The crisis had become public but we wanted to keep his visit absolutely quiet because he was going on to London and Bonn, as I recall. We went in to a sort of side entrance, through the concierge's room, and then we went down through the cellar. I must say, I don't know that we actually went through the cellar, but Acheson in his book describes it, saying that we climbed under water pipes; he embellishes it greatly. Then we went up some back stairs and General de Gaulle greeted us. And they had brought, as I remember, visual aids, so Mr. Kent had the visual equipment set up with a big map to show about the missile emplacements and so on. Acheson explained, and then Kent explained, and they all gave the technicalities of where the missiles were within Cuba. They showed them photographs which had been taken by our planes, or some sort of flying satellite.

De Gaulle was terribly impressed: the old soldier, you see, was coming out. And he got up and looked at the visual aid very carefully, with his glasses, and he said as I recall...Schlesinger describes it a little bit in his book -- he wasn't there, but he evidently read the telegrams which I sent -- and he said, "Well, you told me after the event, but of course, at times independent nations must make their own decision. But whatever happens, France will be with you all the way." And I almost kissed him. And, of course, Acheson was supremely happy. Acheson went on to London and he showed the same things to MacMillan or whoever was Prime Minister and then on to Germany.

I heard later that neither of those leaders came forward so strongly. They didn't say, "We'll be with you all the way." They agreed but they weren't quite as forthcoming. So it was good; even though de Gaulle was a terrible pain in most things for us, in the crisis he did come through and supported us. That's about all I remember of that.

I remember that poor Elsie thought that she had to wake the Secretary -- no, he wasn't the Secretary then, he was just a private individual -- about 10:00 or 11:00 and she did. He was very nice about it. But he didn't have to get up that early, because we didn't go until about 2:00. Elsie was very upset but I think Acheson went back to sleep.

Q: Reading Viansson-Ponte's wonderful history of the République Gaullienne, I'm impressed with the frequency of the assassination attempts on de Gaulle and the political effects of the incident at Petit Clamart -- you remember Bastien-Thierry and all the military fanatics and other gangsters. That business and his miraculous escape seem to have whizzed up the machinery after August 1962 in consolidating the institutions of the Fifth Republic. Do you remember: was there any reaction in Washington, or in the Embassy?

LYON: I think everybody was shocked. We knew there were constant attempts to assassinate him. Pompidou and Olivier Guichard and all those people who were his aides -- Pompidou was de Gaulle's aide before de Gaulle became President, when he was still Prime Minister -- and they all would tell me they couldn't do anything with de Gaulle. Secretly he probably thought it would be a good thing if he were assassinated, that he'd go down in history as even more of a hero. They'd tell him that something was going to happen, or that they'd heard rumors that somebody might try to assassinate him somewhere but he'd go there anyway. He'd insist on going, nothing could put him off. And during that terrible thing at Petit Clamart, which you recall, but people don't remember now, he had to drive through a square and at two corners of the Square they had trucks lined up with machine guns in them. His car had to drive through a stream of bullets, one coming from the right and another stream coming from the left, and the car was pretty well pocked with bullet marks, one just behind where his head would have been. You heard that they got him down on the floor but I heard that when his son-in-law, who was sitting in the front seat, told the General to duck, he sat up even straighter. But who knows, we can't tell those details.

I do remember another attempt when he was motoring down to Colombey-les-Deux-Eglises, which was something like a four or five hours drive if I'm not mistaken. Finally they got him to stop driving and they flew him down. But this time he was driving along and it had been raining, and they saw a little sort of flash on the roadside. They all hopped out to see what it was, and it was a fuse leading back into the woods to a bomb that had sort of fizzled out because of the rain or the wet ground. And de Gaulle looked at it and he said, "Alors, it's either a jest and in very bad humor, or its dangerous. Let's get the hell out of here," and they all rushed to the car and drove off.

Q: Let's backtrack for just a minute. We've mentioned the Tripartite Memorandum but we haven't gone into any great detail about that. That was in '58 as I remember.

LYON: September 24th was the famous memorandum, in which de Gaulle suggested a planning group of the three allies, France, Great Britain, and the United States. We were very concerned about that. I think de Gaulle was aiming to get back on the old wartime footing of the three. I think we thought it would cause trouble in Germany. I'm not sure it would have. I thought maybe Adenauer could have been talked to because he had established such friendly relations with de Gaulle. Of course, in 1958 they hadn't advanced to the point they did later. Then, as a way to avoid getting in too deep, we suggested, as General de Gaulle had been out of things for a long time, that he be given a briefing by the military so he would know the present status of all the atomic bombs, etc., etc. Then they couldn't decide who would give him the briefing. The Commander of NATO wanted to give him...

Q: Where were you at this point? Were you in Paris?

LYON: I was in Paris, yes. And the Commander of SAC also thought he should do it. So they fussed about that for a long time, and then it was suggested that it be done at rather a lower scale. Joxe would go from France and Bob Murphy, who was the Deputy Under Secretary of State would be our man, and the third man would be Lord Hood, who had same job in Washington that I had in Paris. Well, let's make a sort of summary of it. It never worked out. A lot of people claim that we never answered the letter and for some time we had difficulty finding the answer. But we had really answered de Gaulle. I think Chip was the one that dug it out and found that we had because he was convinced that we had.

Q: It was a rather evasive reply.

LYON: It was an evasive letter and de Gaulle was put out by it, and I always felt as I did about the atomic question. De Gaulle wanted to develop his little atomic bomb. He said it would only be enough "to pull off an arm". That was his expression. He knew it couldn't be very much but he wanted to have it, and he wanted us to help him, but we never would. President Eisenhower said to Ambassador Houghton, "I'd like to slip him one under the table." But what was it -- the McMahon Amendment? -- that prevented giving help.

Q: I don't remember. Bombinette, I remember was the French expression for the first French atomic weapon.

LYON: The what?

Q: His bombinette -- de Gaulle's little bomb. I remember one of the indiscreet imps at the Elysée telling me about General de Gaulle's discussion of the bombinette with Vinogradov, the Soviet Ambassador. Nothing can cure the French sweet tooth for indiscretions, especially when there is a victim involved. Vinogradov had been smart enough to keep in touch with General de Gaulle during the "passage of the desert" before 1958, when he was still at Colombey. I think they may have known each other during the war in Algiers. Anyway, he came in sometime in the early '60's, under instructions from Moscow to protest the French atomic experiments in the Sahara and to warn against expanding the French weapons program. Vinogradov took the tone of comradely sorrow instead of the usual Soviet bluster. He told General de Gaulle it was a pity France was wasting vast sums on a program that could serve no purpose. He said, "Let us suppose that with this bombinette you are working on, you were to succeed in destroying one Soviet city -- say Kiev or Odessa -- what would be the result?" De Gaulle waited politely for the Ambassador to answer his own question. "In retaliation," Vinogradov said, "France unhappily would be wiped off the map (La France serait rayée de la carte)."

General de Gaulle thought this over for a minute. "But in that event, my dear Vinogradov," he said, "you and I would die together wouldn't we? Nos mourions ensemble, n'est-ce pas?" I always remember that -- and lots of other remarks -- when people try to tell me that de Gaulle had no sense of humor.

LYON: You are right, he did have a good sense of humor. Guichard told me that once he was talking with Boegner, in de Gaulle's outer office. Someone had blundered and Boegner exclaimed, "That fool. I'd like to liquidate all the fools in the world." At that point le grand Charles entered the room and said, "Un vaste programme."

In any event, I felt we could have been a little more forthcoming. After all, if we considered France worthy to be an ally, why not help them a little with the bomb? But another argument was, if we help them, then we'd have to help Germany, etc., etc. As you know, we never did anything about it.

Q: There are some people who think that de Gaulle never really expected anything from that Memorandum about the Tripartite Directorate..

LYON: I think he was probably too sensible.

Q: He may have been feeling the pulse for the future, and he would have been very surprised if we had gone along with all of it.

LYON: I think that's probably right because he was no fool, in my opinion.

Q: Tell us a little about the Kennedy visit in '62.

LYON: That was the most delightful visit from the point of view of Franco-American relations. I was so proud. I think all Americans were so proud to have that dashing, bright, young President come to France accompanied by the ravishing Jackie Kennedy.

Q: I remember it very well.

LYON: Everybody remembers it. And I remember going to a luncheon which the American press gave for Kennedy, and with his usual wit he got up and said, "You ask who I am? I'm the young man who came to Paris with Jackie Kennedy." De Gaulle gave a wonderful dinner out at Versailles where they really laid on the dog, the table was covered with gold cloths, and beautiful china, and fountains playing, and wonderful music. It was really like the old days of Versailles, and looking over across the table and seeing Jackie sitting on the right hand of President de Gaulle, speaking flawless French, made one awfully proud to be an American. I think the visit was a tremendous success.

Q: Was there any really substantive business?

LYON: I don't think so. I think it was just a sort of state visit.

Q: He was on his way to Vienna, really, wasn't he?

LYON: Yes. As you know, when General Gavin came as Ambassador to Paris, he was convinced that he was going to improve relations with France, that the President wanted to improve them. The President secretly really was a great admirer of de Gaulle. So I have been told by my son-in-law, who was the President's brother-in-law. But it never worked and as you know, Gavin got disillusioned and retired after two years. But I must say that was very early in de Gaulle's return to power and I had a feeling that things were really going to get better. But we had plenty of trouble ahead.

Q: What were the effects in Paris when the OAS (Organization Armee Secrete) went crazy at the end of the Algerian crisis, just before independence.

LYON: Well, we mentioned how de Gaulle was constantly being threatened. He wasn't the only one. I remember there were all sorts of bombs...plastics, weren't they called? -- being set off all over Paris. Beaumarchais at the Foreign Office had the front of his building blown off. Beuve-Mery of LeMonde -- building was plastiqued. I had a terrible scare because Joxe, who was then Minister for Algeria and was handling the negotiations with the Algerians came to dinner one night; and after, he lingered on, talking with me after most of the guests had left. He and his wife went out and there was no car to drive them home. The car hadn't come for them. And he called up some garage, I don't know what it was, I suppose it was some government garage and kept saying, "Joxe, Joxe, the Minister for Algeria." They evidently didn't get his name or didn't know. And then, finally, a car came up and usually they had a policeman sitting in the front seat. This car didn't have any, and I was terrified as he drove off because I was afraid something might happen to him -- kidnapped or something. And I said, "Please telephone me the moment you get to your house." And fortunately, about fifteen minutes later, he did telephone. But that was the sort of nervous state we were all in.

Cy Sulzberger, of the NY Times, was a very good friend, whom I used to see a great deal of. He wrote an article that was pretty critical of the OAS, and I thought, "My God, they'll do something to him." He came in the day he had published the article and I said, "Look, I think you ought to tell the police to give you some protection because you may be plastiqued." He said, "Oh, bull" or something; I mean he used a stronger word than that. And I said, "I think you should." He said, "I wouldn't hear of it." So I got the CIA man, and I said, "I'm worried about Sulzberger." So he arranged with the French police to put some guards on his house, and a few days later Cy came in and he said, "There are a lot of goons around my house. Is it you who did that?" I had to admit it was; he writes about it in The Last of the Giants.

1960 didn't start very well for me. I got a polyp in my right eye and I went to a French doctor, and he said, "This isn't going to hurt," and he stuck something in my eye. I felt that he'd stuck a dagger in it. And then he bandaged it up, and he said I could take the bandage off the next morning which I did and there was still a little bump in my eye but it had moved slightly. And I called him up and I said, "Should there still be a little bump?" "What bump? No, no, there shouldn't." So I rushed down to see him, and he said, "We'll have to give you another operation." I lunched with the Ambassador that day and he said, "You're a fool. You hop on a plane and go home right away," which I did and I saw my own doctor and I had the operation, it was very minor. And then I was starting back for Paris and I got to the airport, and I ran into Raymond LaPorte and I said, "Why are you going back? He said, "I'm going to Paris to have an operation on my eye." And I felt like saying, "You're going in the wrong direction." But I didn't and he looked at my eye and I had a patch on, and he said, "What's that?" "Oh," I said, "I've got a little conjunctivitis or something." I didn't dare tell him and I never told the French that the first doctor had not been successful because I knew it would have been a scandal that they'd all start talking about.

Q: Who was LaPorte?

LYON: Raymond LaPorte, oh, I should have said, Consul General in New York -- the French Consul General, and he was going back to Paris to have the operation that I'd just come to the States for. Well anyway, it was cold, and dreary, and horrible when we got back and I was scheduled to go off on a trip to Africa. It was just before the African French colonies had gained their independence. The Military Attaché was also accredited there or those colonies were under his observation and he used to take a tour of them every year. I went off with him feeling pretty grim with my eye and a cold. We spent the first night in Algiers. Freddy Lyon was the Consul General there but I wasn't able to see him because I was still sick, but I was beginning to feel better and better. The next night, as I remember, we spent in Tamanrasset where I got up early the next morning to go to very early mass. It was pitch black; it was where Pere Foucauld had been. I'd never heard of Pere Foucauld before I went to France but he was quite a character. He'd been an aristocrat, and sort of a playboy, and he traveled disguised as a rabbi all over part of Africa where the French weren't allowed to go.

Q: A rabbi?

LYON: Yes, I don't know why, I've forgotten, but I remember that made an impression on me. In any event, he later became a priest and a very good one, and a missionary, and he had lots of converts. And in this little chapel I've never felt so near to God. It was dark, and slowly it got lighter, and there was only one other person there besides the priest and me. And it was quiet in the desert; it was really terribly impressive.

Amongst other people I saw the famous Abbe Youlou who, you may remember, presented President Eisenhower with a baby elephant. The first one died, and then he got another one called Dumbo. You may not remember, but we had the great problem of getting this little baby elephant from Paris to the States. Because some General had shipped his dog on the plane and got a lot of criticism, we didn't want to have some scandal come out of using the Army plane to transport an elephant to President Eisenhower.

Q: Was it accepted? Did it get to the States?

LYON: It finally got there and the President didn't know what the devil to do with it and he finally gave it to the Washington Zoo. Abbe Youlou was in Brazzaville, wasn't he? I think so. And before I left Paris, Pompidou, with whom I'd become great friends -- I'll talk a little bit about that later -- said, "Oh, when you get to Brazzaville, be sure to go over to Leopoldville because we -- that was the Rothschild Bank -- own the ferry." Did you ever know that? Well anyway, I did go over. I had lunch with the Consul General and I felt that things were very tense. I kept thinking how wonderfully the Belgians had developed that country, except they hadn't educated the people enough to take over really, they'd kept them rather down. But I saw the first reactor I'd ever seen, the first atomic reactor I'd ever seen, I saw in Leopoldville in the University. And when I did get back to Brazzaville that night, they all told me I was very lucky to get back because there'd been riots. I'd seen a few riots but they didn't seem to be serious; but they'd become quite serious and plane connections had been stopped, and apparently the ferry was stopped after I came back.

Q: This was before the period of the massacre at Stanleyville and all that business, wasn't it?

LYON: Yes, it was just before the Belgian Congo got its independence and, oh yes, I think it was about the time of all that trouble. I remember Bill Burden was our Ambassador to Belgium and he was constantly sending wires about it, of which we kept getting copies in Paris.

I talked to Youlou and he was insistent about wanting to be invited to the United States. And I said, "Well, you know, the President is very busy and we'll have to see if we can arrange it." But he evidently thought he'd convinced me, because he invited me to dinner that night. And he never showed up at the dinner -- it was at a restaurant -- but he sent two of his Ministers instead, and they sat one on each side of me, and each one whispered to me at some point that they wanted to go to the United States too.

You can remember that period, just when the colonies all became free. I was very impressed that their leaders seemed to want primarily the symbols of power and strength: and black limousines, and beautiful houses, and trips to the United States. Of course, de Gaulle spoiled them a little bit, by constantly having them come to Paris where he'd treat them in the royal manner. Remember all those visits?

That was an interesting thing about de Gaulle, to watch the way he managed his presidency. You will recall that about every six weeks he'd take a tour around the country -- to a different part of the country -- and he'd make speeches, and he'd dine with the local officials, and he'd try out ideas and if they didn't go down very well he'd try another idea. Then when he got back he'd put these ideas into play. He also used to have a visiting Chief of State come about every month. And for a man his age it was remarkable that he was able to do all this and still run the country because he'd have to have dinner parties for all these people, and he'd have to take them hither and yon. I was always impressed with all that.

And another thing that I was impressed with. Some of those African countries had such wonderful government buildings, and schools, and hospitals, and I thought, "It is quite a thing to just give all this away." Because the French had invested a great deal in Africa.

Q: Where else did you go besides the two Congos?

LYON: Well, I went to about all the French colonies.

Q: Really. Senegal?

LYON: Mali, Niamey, Chad -- is Ouagadougou Chad?

Q: No, Ouagadougou is the capital of Upper Volta. The country is now Burkina Faso.

LYON: But I remember it was one of the grimmest places we'd been in. We spent one night there and we were supposed to leave at 9:00 the next morning or something like that. And usually there'd be stragglers getting out to the plane in most of the places when we were about to take off. There wasn't a straggler the next morning. They were all out at the airport about half an hour ahead of the time we were supposed to take off. Funnily enough, my nephew, Peter Moffat was Ambassador in Chad...

Q: Yes, I know.

LYON: ...and he liked it and he found it interesting. He was an awfully good sport.

Q: Don Norland was heavily involved in the Chad too, still is. That's really a mess.

LYON: Oh, that's Chad, I was talking about Upper Volta, wasn't I.

Q: Yes, that's Ouagadougou, that was Don Dumont, as I remember. Did you go to any of the naughty countries like Guinea which had opted out of the French union. Did you go to Conakry?

LYON: I went to Conakry, yes.

Q: Did you meet Sekou Toure?

LYON: I met Sekou Toure.

Q: Was Nkrumah staying with him then? The longest house guest in history. He fled, you know, from Ghana in 1966 and Sekou Toure took him in and I think he was there for many years until he died.

LYON: No, I don't think he was there. But some of those countries I found fascinating and I also was impressed with what respect most of the leaders had for France still. They were still very loyal to France, and as you know, Houphouet-Boigny...

Q: That's a country I wanted to ask you about, yes, the Ivory Coast.

LYON: Cote d'Ivoire. That was almost like being at a party in France. You'd go to a dinner and the women would all be dressed in French clothes, and they were very pro-French.

Q: Well, I gather that the Ivory Coast is still more or less of a star exhibit among all those declining economies. They're not as well off as they were, but they're pretty good by comparison with the others.

LYON: Well, of course, the French poured a lot of money into those colonies.

Q: They still do.

LYON: I don't know if there is anything very substantive that I can say more about that journey.

Q: We were going to talk about Pompidou then.

LYON: The '62 journey with Guichard.

Q: Oh, Guichard, okay, the trip to Algeria.

LYON: Olivier Guichard, who had been in de Gaulle's cabinet, one of his assistants. I got to know him very well. He later became Minister for Planning National Economic Affairs. He was in charge of the Sahara desert area where the oil was being developed. And he invited me to go on a trip with him, and it was rather fascinating. We've always heard that in the desert there's no water. We got to places where they were drilling and water would be spraying up 20 feet high out of the desert. And I remember in one place, Ghardaia I think, we spent the night there. And we had a lot of the sheiks to dinner and I said, "Don't you hope they find oil here?" And they said, "We'd rather find water," which was very wise.

And then we stopped to visit the man who developed those wonderful tractors that climbed over the dunes, I've forgotten what his name was. It was a very interesting trip.

Q: This was in '62?

LYON: '62.

Q: The Evian Agreements were approved in April, and then in July Algerian independence was approved and became official.

LYON: Another de Gaulle official that I purposely -- its a little awkward to say, that I purposely, specifically cultivated, was Pompidou. Pompidou had been de Gaulle's Chef de Cabinet before de Gaulle became president. I mentioned earlier that when de Gaulle after taking over from Coty, had Pompidou drive down from the Arc de Triomphe with him, I thought, "Now that indicates Pompidou is going to be something more important later." He went back to the Banque Rothschild where he had been before being taken on by de Gaulle. I used to see him; I'd have him for lunch, and see quite a lot of him, and his wife would come. And then, of course, he did become Chef de Cabinet, Prime Minister and it was very useful to be able to see him. He later became president but I wasn't there when he became president.

Q: After that there was a kind of rift with de Gaulle, I think.

LYON: Oh, there was quite a rift by the time de Gaulle resigned. Do you remember, for three or four days de Gaulle disappeared when the troubles were stirring? I think that's when it was. I'd already left Paris, I didn't get into that. Before all this I remember Pompidou once saying to me that it was awful that the United States was dominating Europe. I said, "Come on, we're not dominating Europe, we're not trying to dominate Europe. Why would we have worked so hard to build a united Europe if we wanted to dominate it?" He said, "You can't help but dominate it because you're so rich, and you're so powerful, and you've got all these American companies all over the place." He changed after he became president, he was very friendly to the United States and I think really one of the most outgoing presidents...certainly more outgoing than de Gaulle.

Q: I remember sitting next to him at your house at lunch. I think he was back in the bank or still an aide. He was charming to me. I felt as though I was talking to someone my own age, my own station.

LYON: He was very agreeable. I thought so, and I always talked very frankly with him. And as I say, I was cultivating him on purpose. After he became Prime Minister, Madame Pompidou said to me, "Why don't you ask us for dinner anymore?" I said, "Come on, I'm not the Ambassador. The Ambassador wouldn't like it if I had the Prime Minister to dine, and lunch, and things like that." She said, "Oh, but we'd like it." I didn't say anything to her -- but I must say that whenever the Ambassador left town I scurried over to see Pompidou who became a really good friend. Norman Armour said I invented Pompidou because he came to lunch so frequently when Norman was there.

But I had a terrible let-down with him once. He'd invited us (I think it was when he was in the bank) he'd invited us to dinner and after dinner -- it was small tables and we were all sitting around -- and he said, "Cecil, Francoise Sagan would like to talk to you." And I thought, "Oh, la-la, mes beaux yeux!" He took me over to Francoise Sagan, and all she wanted was to get a visa for some friend of hers who'd been denied a visa because of drugs, as I recall, or something like that. So that was a terrible blow.

Q: Well, I think we've just about done it. I would like, if you have anything to say on the subject, to hear about de Gaulle's attitude toward the United States and Indochina.

LYON: Oh, I can tell you exactly what he said. I accompanied Rusk when he went to see de Gaulle during the Vietnam troubles, and de Gaulle said, "Get out of Vietnam."

Q: Do you remember when this was, approximately?

LYON: Well, it was during the Rusk encounter. But he said, "You get out of Vietnam." He didn't say it quite as bluntly as that, but he said, "Whatever you do, it will be considered a White Man's war against the Oriental, and I can't give you stronger advice," and he kept making it stronger and stronger. So that's what I remember about his attitude about that.

Now would you be amused to know why I stayed so long in Paris?

Q: Sure, go ahead.

LYON: You can either rub this off, or not, but its sort of interesting. I think I had been there about four years when Peter Moffat, our nephew, was assigned to Paris and as you know, they never allow members of a family to stay at the same post. That's why I had to get out of Japan because I married the Ambassador's daughter.

Q: Oh, really, and it extended to the nephews!

LYON: Oh, yes. But they said, "However, as Lyon is going to be transferred shortly, we think it would be all right." So Peter came, Peter stayed two years and went, and I was still there when he left.

Q: Yes. Peter worked for me, of course in the Third World part of the Political Section.

LYON: Anyway, when Gavin came to Paris, immediately, or shortly after he was there, there was one of the usual uprisings in Algiers, riots and things. And he was very concerned because his intelligence hadn't informed him that this was going to happen, and he said it put him in a very embarrassing situation.

Q: Was that the Challe Putsch in Algiers?

LYON: It must have been '60 or '61 when Gavin came. Incidentally, Mrs. Kennedy's mother in her book, says that the reason Jack, as she said, sent Gavin to Paris was he thought that sending a General to work with a General was a good idea. Well you know de Gaulle's feeling about Generals. He couldn't care less. But in any event Gavin was very upset and I...

Q: He and de Gaulle got on very well though, I think.

LYON: Oh, I think so. I was already assigned as Consul General in Hong Kong, and I was supposed to leave six weeks after General Gavin came. But in any event, thinking that my successor Durbrow was going to be there shortly, I said to Gavin -- I tried to say it politely -- that we didn't have any intelligence as the Army had. And I said, "You're the intelligence, and I'm the intelligence, and our staff are the intelligence, and we have very good relations..." Well, to make a long story short, I told him that really we had very good relations with the Foreign Office, and the Deputies, the press and almost everyone else, and that nobody had known it was coming. If they had known it was coming, it wouldn't have come; they would have stopped it. And he just grunted. I thought really, I'd been not rude, but I'd been awfully frank with him, but I did think it would help my successor. And a few days later he asked why I had to go to Hong Kong, and I said, "Well, I've been here quite a while, and we rotate officers, and things like that." He called up Chester Bowles and said, "Why does Lyon have to go?" After a lot of talk, it was decided that I didn't have to go. So I stayed happily on for another three or four years until nearly seven short years had passed.

Q: When I left in '65, Bob McBride was already there, and of course Ambassador Bohlen, who had arrived in the middle of the Cuban missile crisis in 1962.

LYON: I was only two years in Sri Lanka, and then I had about a year kicking around, as I told you. What was the date of Kennedy's death? Have you got it in your head? It isn't very important.

Q: It was in '63. It was just about a year after the Cuban Missile crisis. Okay, would you like to tell something about the Kennedy assassination and the effects of that in Paris?

LYON: Oh, Lord yes, that was something, wasn't it? On November 22nd Elsie and I were scheduled to go to a cocktail party and then go on to dinner with the Joxes at the Jockey Club. We were just getting into the car and the telephone rang, and I've learned over the years not to answer the telephone at moments like that. I was taught by Jimmy Dunn. He said, "It's never anything important. If it is, they will always call you back. It's usually inviting you to a dinner that you don't want to go to, or some such thing, and there's no nicer sound than when it just dies down -- the ringing of the phone." So I said, "Elsie, don't answer it." We went to the cocktail party. We drove up to the Jockey Club, oh, I don't know, an hour or so later. And the door man said, "You're American. Your President has been shot." I dropped Elsie, and I rushed back to the Chancery. I didn't know whether he was dead, or just wounded or what. I got into the Chancery, and rushed to my office, and the telephone was ringing. It was Burin de Roziers telephoning de Gaulle's condolences. It was the first call we had, and it was from de Gaulle, which I thought quite remarkable. Ambassador Bohlen was away, he was on his way somewhere to shoot. We got him off the train at...

Q: He was going to Strasbourg, wasn't he?

LYON: He was going to go hunting with some French friends. Maybe it was Strasbourg. We got him off the train at Nancy. The telephone never stopped ringing. We put a book in the hall, which they do in France, so people can sign condolences. Immediately a line of people went round the block -- you were there, you remember.

Q: Oh, of course. I was in charge of the ceremonial arrangements for Notre Dame. It nearly killed me, 48 hours without sleep, because it had to be synchronized, it had to be exactly the same time as the service in Washington. The seating protocol and invitations were incredibly complex. I tried to beg for time. I said, "Can't we put it off for another day?" Mr. Bohlen said, "No, no. You just get back to your desk."

LYON: Well, anyway, as you know, everybody was crying, every shop window immediately put out a photograph of Kennedy decked with crepe. I've never seen such an outpouring of affection.

I and other members of the staff got hundreds of letters. The Ambassador got thousands of letters. Oh, it was such an outpouring of affection, and I think we all felt absolutely stunned, shocked. I don't remember ever feeling quite so depressed. And then I got angrier. It annoyed me furiously, because this man had given such inspiration especially to the young. Well, that's it. Then, as you say, you arranged the TeDeum at Notre Dame.

Q: I still remember what Ambassador Bohlen said. They stopped the train at Nancy and the station master came on board and he said, "Monsieur l'Ambassadeur, j'ai une chose terrible et solennelle a vous annoncer."

LYON: Did Chip stay for the service, or did I attend?

Q: No, no, the Bohlens were there.

ROBERT BAUER
Media Officer, USIS
Paris (1959-1961)

Mr. Bauer was born in Austria. During the Nazi period he was a devout anti-Nazi, and worked with the French in providing anti-German broadcasts to the world. He came to the United States in 1939, working initially in Cincinnati broadcasting to Europe, and subsequently with the USIA and Voice of America. During his career with USIA Mr. Bauer served in Vienna, Teheran, and Paris, and in Cairo and New Delhi he served as Cultural Affairs Officer. In Washington, he was the first Director of USIA's Foreign Press Center. Mr. Bauer was interviewed by Cliff Groce in 1989.

BAUER: Then they sent me to an absolutely non-job in Paris: media officer, which meant nothing--sort of a radio officer, film officer, and so forth. It was a leftover from the days when it was necessary. When Ed Murrow came through and they made a cut in the West European program I immediately volunteered my job, to the surprise of everybody. People tried to get into Paris. (I speak French very well, you know.) They transferred me to Washington. On the morning of my transfer to Washington I got a phone call--we were on the way to the boat--it was Bill Cody calling from Washington asking if I wanted to go to Bonn as number three officer, because they found out I speak German. (Laughter) I said, "It's a bit too late. I'm on my way. Thank you."

Q: How long were you in Paris?

BAUER: About one year and two months.

Q: So you felt no sense of accomplishment in what you say was a non-job.

BAUER: It was a non-job. Literally. This was literally a waste of taxpayers' money.

Q: Was that because the IO and the CAO did everything?

BAUER: The French had their own radio correspondents here. What could we do for them? And whatever had to be done was done by the IO or the Assistant IO.

Q: So how did you occupy your time?

BAUER: By trying a few things that had nothing to do with reality. It was a shame. In fact, when they assigned me there, Mowinckel was the deputy PAO, and said to me, "You shouldn't take the job." I said, "What can I do? They assigned me here."

HARRIET CURRY
Secretary, OECD
Paris (1959-1961)

Ms. Curry was born in Annapolis, Maryland, daughter of a Marine Corp family. She was raised at military posts throughout the United States. She was educated at The George Washington University, after which she worked with a number of non-governmental organizations. After joining the State Department she served as Secretary and Assistant to United States Ambassadors in Brazil, Senegal, Israel, Jamaica, Ireland, Hungary, Austria, Syria and Pakistan. She also had several assignments in Washington.

CURRY: I was in the Department of State. The arrangements were made for me to transfer to the Department of State, from ICA. I had a job in the Department for nine people, but I was sort of the low girl. I was the lowest of three girls in one office. That wasn't much fun, because even my boss thought I was smarter than that. But, it was the way things had to be worked out.

Q: Then, what happened? You came into the Foreign Service, and wither?

CURRY: Then, I went to Paris. I loved that. I hadn't thought I wanted to go to Paris. I didn't go to Paris on my trip to Europe. I was afraid of the French, for some reason!

Q: Harriet, you were in Paris from when to when?

CURRY: From 1959 to 1961. 1959 was vintage year. It really was. I went in March and the chestnuts were in blossom. Then I worked with AID/ICA people. Again, it wasn't the embassy, but it was a State Department job. I'm trying to think what they called it.

I was stationed in an office in the Hotel Talleyrand. There were four male officers and one lady economic officer. The men all smoked cigars in the office which was a big room with partitions.

The three secretaries complained about their cigars, but it didn't help. They seemed to think we were being unreasonable.

Q: What sort of work were you doing?

CURRY: Nothing very interesting, but I loved being in Paris. I enjoyed it very much.

Q: Do you remember any of the officers, and who they were?

CURRY: George B. Gardner was the head of this office. The others were Ed Hermberg, Robert Brungart, Abraham Katz and I am afraid I forgot the lady's name. All were under John Tuthill.

Q: Tuthill was later ambassador to Brazil. Did you get any feel there for our relations with the French?

CURRY: No, I was too dumb. The only thing I knew was I liked being there, and I liked them. My family and friends couldn't understand why I liked the French, but I had some very nice acquaintances. I had a good landlady, which was unheard of, and a good concierge.

JACQUES J. REINSTEIN
Minister Counselor for Economic Affairs
Paris (1959-1963)

Jacques Reinstein was born in 1911 in Savannah, Georgia. He attended the University of Basel, Switzerland, the Alliance Francaise, Paris, Georgetown University, and American University. He then joined the Department of State in 1936 as an Economic Analyst and Assistant to the Secretary of State. After a long career in the Department of State, he was sent to France as Minister Counselor for Economic Affairs. He was interviewed by Thomas Dunnigan in 2001.

Q: Well at the conclusion of that you received your assignment to Paris then.

REINSTEIN: At the conclusion of that I received my assignment to Paris, much to my surprise. I had been angling for other jobs. They almost had me at one time slated for Iceland. I had asked for Canada because I had kids to start in college and we had two elderly, widowed mothers and we didn't want to get separated too much. Paris was absolutely wonderful. I couldn't have asked for a better assignment.

Q: And there you were minister counselor for economic affairs from '59 to '63.

REINSTEIN: Yes.

Q: Four good years. How many ambassadors did you have then?

REINSTEIN: Three ambassadors. When I went there Eisenhower was still president and the ambassador was Amory Houghton, who is I guess the grandfather of Corning glass. Houghton had had cancer of the tongue and they had to remove part of his tongue, so speech was difficult for him, particularly as the day went on. Toward the end of the day it was hard for him to speak and hard to understand him. One of the effects of this was that some of the public speaking tasks that would normally have fallen to him came to me.

I hadn't been in the habit of doing much public speaking and so my first assignment was to substitute for the ambassador at a dinner of France Amerique on the hundredth anniversary of the birth of General Pershing. This really was the top crust of Paris society. I had two secretaries. I had an American secretary who dealt with classified matters and I had a French secretary. The French secretary was married to what I still call a "white Russian" – a native Russian – white is the difference from red Russian, but her father had been on the staff of the standing group.

Q: Oh. The military standing group.

REINSTEIN: Let me identify the standing group. In principle the NATO military reported to the military committee of NATO. In practice, the matters were run by the standing group, which were the representatives of the three major powers – the British, French, and ourselves – which was located in Washington. One of the things you have to remember is that the NATO organization was at one point spread all over. You had military in Washington, the political part in London, the economic part, essentially, in Paris. The unification of all those different parts in proximity to one another really didn't take place until after the so-called French initiative. So things were really spread out. As a matter of fact, the military committee was still located in Washington when I went to Rome in 1967 some years later. One of the first things I did after being named senior deputy commandant of the NATO Defense College was to call on the chairman of the military committee who was actually an Italian at that point. The standing group were the British, French, and ourselves and they really basically ran the NATO military establishment and they ran it very well, too.

My French secretary's father was on the staff of the standing group and so when he had that job she went to Western high school and then he went back to Paris and he was sent back to Washington as the French representative of the standing group and at that point she went to George Washington University. So she was extraordinarily fluent in English...

Q: And knows this town.

REINSTEIN: And also came from a very fine French family and knew how things were properly done. The embassy, I must say, had a small but extremely effective protocol section. They were locals. When you were giving a dinner it was very important to get people exactly in their right notch.

Q: Because they knew where they belonged and you better know it, too.

REINSTEIN: The fellow who got his "Legion D'Honneur" earlier outranked the one who got it later [laughs] and you had to get that right when you were seating people and things of that matter.

Q: Back to your speech. May I ask you a question?

REINSTEIN: Yes.

Q: Did you speak in French or English then?

REINSTEIN: Oh, I spoke in French. I had to. I worked with my French secretary on that speech. We may have started in English and moved over to French. It was really finally very fine toned and I sat at the table with a charming couple, a delightful couple. I became good friends of theirs. One of the things I must record, incidentally, is a visit that Cecil Lyon and I paid to Lafayette's country home. We had an experience very few people had and I think it's well worth recording, but not at this point. Anyhow, I gave my speech in French without using any notes and it was a resounding success.

Q: Good.

REINSTEIN: I enjoyed it so much that whenever there was the possibility of giving a speech I would give a speech in French. My first wife, Rachel, and I had both studied in Paris and she had worked in Paris, too, for an American law firm office there. So we were fairly close to being bilingual. My French was better than that of anybody else on the American staff of the embassy.

Q: Who was your DCM at the time?

REINSTEIN: Cecil Lyon.

Q: Cecil Lyon, yes.

REINSTEIN: Cecil was the DCM all the time I was there. I had several experiences that I shared with Cecil that I think I should record on the famous visit to the Chateau at Lafayette's place. Also I will record my activities as an agent of the French hierarchy during Vatican Two which might be worth recording.

Q: Okay.

REINSTEIN: As I say, my French was really extremely good. I finally did get to a 5 language rating.

Q: Good.

REINSTEIN: I had an interesting time about that because I had both French and German and I always got rated higher on German than I did on French. This came about – and you've been through this yourself, I'm sure, on this testing – I tested for French and German both at one time. On the French part of the examination they give you a newspaper article which you're supposed to translate and I got caught up on one of those tricky words that looks the same in both languages, but has different meaning, and I flubbed it because it was about an obscure quarrel between the French Wholesale Grocers Association and the French government and it had to do with price fixing. And I missed the point of the article. When they gave me the German exam they gave me an article on nuclear weapons. Well, I worked on nuclear weapons all the time. I had a nuclear weapons security classification, I knew the concepts, and I knew the technical language. I breezed through that so I got a much higher rating in German than in French, although my French was basically better than my German. But I had to use them both. I went to Germany very frequently. When I was director of German Affairs we always had meetings and every time I went to a NATO ministerial meeting I would go over and spend a week or so, and sometimes go for longer, in Germany. Of course I had to go out for dinner every night and the dinner conversations tended to be in three languages and I found that very tiring. Two languages are easy to handle, but to go around switching among three languages I found at the end of the evening I was just absolutely worn out.

Q: Let's talk about some of the big issues you faced in Paris because you were there in quite interesting times, when Europe was being born, actually.

REINSTEIN: That's right. I arrived there just in the first year of the European common market and it was just in the process of sort of settling in and making its first decisions and the British were quarreling with it. That was one of the things that was going on that was very disturbing to the Americans. The second, it was just at the point when they were going through the decision about what to do with the OEEC, whether to have the Americans and the Canadians just join.

Q: The OEEC actually arose from the Marshall Plan, didn't it?

REINSTEIN: That's right. It was a European organization. It sort of developed into an economic coordinating organization with an excellent staff. It didn't make sense to continue with that. There were two possibilities. They didn't pick the one I wanted. One possibility was just to have the Americans and the Canadians join and enlarge it. The other possibility, which was the one I wanted, was to form something like a Group of 7; in other words, to let the Europeans have an organization which could deal with all the technical issues in which they were interested, many of which had no interest to us at all. We were not interested in inland transport. It was a nuisance for us to have to send somebody to a meeting and we didn't particularly care to support that financially. So there was constant pulling and hauling between us and the Europeans as a result. Of course from the viewpoint of the Europeans, what could be nicer than to have a requirement that you have a ministerial meeting once a year in Paris. Whatever specialized ministries there were were delighted to have an organization which required them to go to Paris once a year.

Q: Not in Iceland, but in Paris?

REINSTEIN: That's where the headquarters was, in Paris. Iceland had nothing to do with it. Iceland was a member.

Q: Were they a member of the OEEC? I think so. Go ahead.

REINSTEIN: I always have a little bit of a mental block about Iceland because I remember during World War II President Roosevelt issued a finding that Iceland was part of North America.

Q: We could send our ships up that far then to guard convoys.

REINSTEIN: No, no, no. The thing was that under the Draft Act the draftees were not allowed to serve, except in North America. And we had bases already in Iceland and our forces were mixed regular army and draftees. You didn't want to be forced into a situation where you had to pick people and we had to take out the regular army guys and say, "Well these guys can go to Iceland, but the draftees can't," so he issued a finding that Iceland was part of North America. I have real difficulty thinking of Iceland, which I visited several times, as being European and not North American.

The other possibility which I saw, and which I think would've been the sensible thing to have done, was to set up something like the group of seven – I would've had maybe a couple more members, maybe nine, but left out the smaller countries, the peripheral countries.

Q: How my Dutch friends would have screamed at that.

REINSTEIN: Well, they would've been included. Oh, yes, they would've been included.

Q: They would have insisted on it. [laughs]

REINSTEIN: The Italians would've been in. But we couldn't have a serious economic organization dealing with economic policy in Europe without the participation of the Benelux countries. In terms of their economic clout and their intellectual clout they were really very important. Greece and Turkey. Iceland, no.

Q: Portugal.

REINSTEIN: Portugal, no. The actual idea of the group of seven was first put forward at a much later date by an organization I was later connected with, the Atlantic Council of the United States. They were the first people to put forward the idea of having such an organization. When I went to Paris they insisted that I come over immediately so I would have an overlap with my predecessor, Jack Tuthill – John Elliott Tuthill. And I had to fly over and they only allowed you a very small amount of accompanying luggage in those days and one of the decisions I had to make was to take my white tie. I figured my effects will arrive before I have to wear a white tie. Ha! I hadn't been there very long before I took over the job from Tuthill and lo and behold, what happens? The President of the United States arrives.

Q: Oh this is President Eisenhower?

REINSTEIN: Eisenhower. Eisenhower came twice, in September and again in December – and of course had white tie dinners. I had bought a white tie, which really wasn't necessary – I could've rented one – but anyhow I found myself under the requirement of going to a white tie dinner very shortly. As a matter of fact, I think it was the first white tie dinner I went to. I think it was '62. I was in Paris for meetings while I was still in German Affairs when de Gaulle came into power. It was quite a shock. It was a shock to a lot of the French people. I observed the morning papers being sold this announcement and people were buying the newspapers and looking at them quietly, but there were no sounds of enthusiasm. I was there again on the fourteenth of July [laughs] and that was probably the last time they had Moroccan troops in the fourteenth of July parade. I watched from the Hotel.

Q: Spahis, was it?

REINSTEIN: Spahis, yes. They came along and it broke up. It was quite a scene. Then I found myself at the embassy in Paris when President Eisenhower came over and I sat next at dinner to the man who led the armed revolt in Algeria, General – gosh, I can't remember his name for the moment. I tried to engage him in conversation and I told my wife afterwards it was like trying to bounce a croquet ball. I would say something and try to elicit a response, but I couldn't engage him in conversation. I guess he had to be there but he didn't want to talk to an American.

Q: His mind was on other things, maybe.

REINSTEIN: His mind was on other things and he didn't want to get involved in talking to an American, I guess. Later on, after the fall of the uprising, people were really badly divided in France. You really had to be very careful. You couldn't tell who was on which side. All the people that were in the resistance were opposed to de Gaulle and had been right along; they were his bitterest enemies. Of course they had connections with the OAS because the OAS loaded up with people from the resistance who had stayed in the army and fought in China and then wound up in Algeria. I must say that aspect of life in Paris was a very difficult one. It was the period when the common market was just getting started. It was interesting to be there for that, to follow it, to report to Washington on what was happening. Of course you had the argument that sort of went on between the British and their friends, the seven, and the common market people, the six. The fighting between them got really quite nasty and it was very disturbing to the Americans who didn't want to have the Europeans quarreling among themselves.

Q: Did we stay out of that fight or did we indicate our positions?

REINSTEIN: We were basically pro-six.

Q: No common market.

REINSTEIN: No common market. On the other hand, at one stage we took an initiative in which I became involved. You got to work on all kinds of things in a place like Paris in the job I had. The Americans came up with the idea of having a committee look into the question of what the effects were of setting up the common market on the nonmembers. They came up with an interesting idea of having a committee of experts chaired by a minister, and the minister was a Dutchman who eventually held down every international job there was. I'm trying to remember his name.

Q: Not Joseph Luns?

REINSTEIN: Luns, yes. Luns was the chairman of this committee. Well, the U.S. member was John Leddy, who had gone back to Washington for a while, but John didn't find it convenient to come to all the meetings. The representation should have been through our delegation to the OEEC and NATO. Unfortunately, the principal economic guy in that delegation was pro-seven and so they couldn't trust that delegation to represent the United States effectively [laughs]. So when John couldn't come I was designated to serve in his place and so I in effect carried on functions which really were more appropriate for another delegation than the embassy. We did turn out a report, I think, finally and it rather discounted the British claims that there would be serious adverse trade effects. Of course it was very difficult to make the argument because the first round of tariff cuts were generalized, so all they did was reduce the tariff to everybody; and you could hardly make an argument that that was trade distorting. That was one of the things that I did.

I was involved in the setting up of the OECD.

As a matter of principle, I had managed to refrain from working on Christmas day. I was asked to work on Christmas day once by Harry Hawkins and as much as I loved and respected him, I said no. This is the one day that I give to my family. Well, that got broken.

Q: This had been '58, was this?

REINSTEIN: This would be in '59. See '58, '59 I was in the senior seminar. I went to Paris after the fourth of July. I didn't want to get involved in going to that god-awful fourth of July party they used to have. We were closing up shop and I got a call from the foreign office; the head of the economic and financial division wanted me to come over right away, so I went over. They had had this meeting in December, for which General Eisenhower had come over, at which they had decided to set up the OECD and agreed to have a conference to do that. The conference included about eight or nine countries. It didn't include all the people who were in the OEEC. It was kind of handpicked. There was something like eight or nine countries. That conference was to be held fairly early in January of '60 and when I got to the foreign office Woermser said to me, "We're the host country and so we have to send out the invitations. Since your government has been so responsible for setting this thing up we'd like to make sure that the invitation we send out is something that is acceptable to you. I'd like for you to get the drafts and I'd like for you to have Washington look at it." Well, I can't remember whether it was a handwritten draft or what – it was in French, of course – and we sat and we looked at it and having been through all the background I had, I had pretty good ideas of what American views were on things and there were things in the language which I thought would bother Washington so I redrafted them and finally he and I and his secretary were...

Q: Sitting around and drafting this thing on Christmas Eve.

REINSTEIN: Yes. Nobody else was around very much. The secretary had to type it up. We had had, of course, large plans.

Q: For Christmas Eve, I'm sure.

REINSTEIN: And for Christmas day. Two of my kids were there. Anyhow, he said, "We've got to get this out. Can you get this back to Washington and get them to look at it the day after Christmas and give us some reactions?" So I said, "Yes, sure." I can't remember whether I sent a warning telegram when I got back to the embassy that warned them that this was on the way and that they would have to get a quick response. I may have done a two-sentence telegram, a NIACT, to wind up the troops. Anyhow, I took the draft back to the embassy and then went home. There's an American Catholic chapel in Paris and my kids were still mentally in Washington and they wanted to go there for high mass so we went to midnight mass there.

Q: We went to mass there on our honeymoon. But go ahead.

REINSTEIN: I think that's about the only time I ever set foot in the place. Well then we went home and we had a kind of first celebration. Then we were invited to our French families' dinner, a big Christmas dinner they have after high mass, midnight mass. Well, we arrived there at about the time of the meat course and around about four o'clock in the morning when we were getting around to brandy...

Q: No shortage of wine there.

REINSTEIN: No shortage of wine. Rachel had lived with them when she was a student at the Sorbonne and she lived with them again when she was working in Paris. She was a member of the family. The first time I met them was when we went to Paris for the peace treaties in 1946 with Rachel's brother, John Campbell, who worked in the Department and was for many years associated with the Council on Foreign Relations. He was their top political guy for many years. He had met the family once years before. Anyhow, we were invited around for dinner, and what an experience that was because there were four daughters and they all recounted the liberation of Paris, all talking at the same time.

Q: [laughs]

REINSTEIN: At least one of them, maybe two, were on the Place de la Concorde at the time the fighting took place.

Q: When the bullets were flying.

REINSTEIN: When the bullets were flying. By the way, I don't know how many people know this, but some of those bullets landed in the American embassy. There are two bullets that tore through a portrait in the office of the DCM, which is over on the Concorde side of the building and that's never been repaired. Those bullet holes, the tears, are preserved.

Q: It's fitting. It's very fitting.

REINSTEIN: I must say, having four French girls telling you all of this at the same time, and old Paulette said at one time she was sitting on top of an American tank coming in.

Q: [laughs] Well, back to Christmas dinner now.

REINSTEIN: Finally, at about four o'clock in the morning I said, "I've got to work and I'm afraid I've got to go home." So we left and I went home and got a little bit of sleep and then went down to the embassy and got the duty secretary. Of course the first thing I had to do was translate the French text into English. I got that done up properly and then I discovered that the girl had no plans. They were serving up a meal in the embassy cafeteria, I guess, for the people who had to be working. So I took her out to the house and we had Christmas lunch and went back and I got out two telegrams: one giving the text to which the French wanted agreement, and the second commenting on the changes that I had made which I thought they would've wanted to have made to get them to focus on what I thought the issues were and to tell them to get their answer back pronto on the twenty-sixth; and it came back approved.

Q: It may have ruined your Christmas, but it was a triumph in many ways.

REINSTEIN: You never know in the Foreign Service, at least in the Foreign Service as it was then, what will come along. And in a place like Paris you could get involved in practically any part of the world except maybe Latin America. But we got involved in all kinds of things all over the world. The economic division was kind of a catch-all place.

Q: How large was your staff, by the way?

REINSTEIN: Local and American, sixty people.

Q: That included the commercial officer and agricultural and all these people?

REINSTEIN: The commercial section was about half of it, and of course you had a large number of locals.

Q: Yes.

REINSTEIN: At one point we thought we were going to get a major cut in our appropriations, and do you know what we were going to do? We were going to let all the Americans go. Washington gave you your limits; you then had to figure out how to live with them. As it turned out we didn't have to do this. But our thinking was, if we lost our French personnel we could not replace them. We had investment of years in all of their connections, whereas the Americans came and went. If you sent them home, alright, you may have to work harder but they would eventually send you some more people.

Q: Which brings up another question: were you there when we began to worry about the balance of payments?

REINSTEIN: Oh, we were worrying about the balance of payments before that.

Q: I remember Secretary Dillon, in the beginning of the Kennedy administration, was very strong on balance of payments problems.

REINSTEIN: Well they had been worrying about it before. We had the Secretary of the Treasury in the Eisenhower administration who kept talking about it.

Q: That would've been George Humphrey probably.

REINSTEIN: Yes, it was George Humphrey. Humphrey was regarded as such a stupid fellow that nobody paid any attention to him.

Q: Well I remember you had a good connection with Treasury.

REINSTEIN: Periodically I would go over and have a lunch with them at the Washington Hotel and give them a general view of what we were doing and what we were worrying about and things like that, and just background in case I needed to talk to them about anything. I was in touch with them. I told them once, "We haven't had lunch for a while. I'd like to have lunch with you." I said, "I keep hearing Mr. Humphrey is talking about a balance of payments problem. Can we talk about this at lunch?" My god, these guys came with charts. What the charts demonstrated was that Humphrey was talking through his hat. That's what the experts thought. They were wrong. Humphrey was right.

Q: Humphrey was a smart old codger.

REINSTEIN: He put his finger on what was the reality.

Q: So that was a constant problem with you from then on, I presume, in the back of your mind.

REINSTEIN: Well, I was sensitive to it, of course, as minister of economic affairs. One of my jobs was to push American exports and American investments, too, and protect American investments. We had our problems with the French on some investment problems. There was a series of required reports we were supposed to send in once a year and one was on American investments and on the opportunities and the like. Well, we were having some problems with the French and at that point the minister for finance and economics had a very bright, young guy as his chef de cabinet who also worked part-time in the ministry. They had one part-time guy on financial matters.

Q: Only one?

REINSTEIN: Yes. He held both jobs. I went around to see this guy and I said to him, "We have certain reports we have to make for Washington. I'm just at the point where I have to make a report on American investments and the atmosphere for American investments and I'm puzzled as to what to tell them. I'd like your suggestions." You know, instead of sitting around and drawing up stuff based on newspaper articles and so on.

Q: Just ask his advice.

REINSTEIN: Yes. "What do you think I should tell them?" I got a pretty frank answer. There were problems but they were not that significant. I mean, yes, you'd get noise and stuff like that, but that basically we should not be concerned about investments between the U.S. and France, that the general atmosphere between them would be satisfactory. I don't know that we had a treaty which governed our relations at all. Of course some of these things actually came within the scope of the OECD, I guess, which was one of the most useful international organizations ever dreamed up by the mind of man. Thank heavens they don't demonstrate against that one.

Q: And yet it doesn't get all that great publicity or anything else.

REINSTEIN: That's one thing that makes it effective.

Q: Probably so.

REINSTEIN: Now, where do we go from here?

Q: You were there, of course, when General de Gaulle was smarting over his exclusion from our nuclear arrangements with the British. Did that factor in at all to the French reaction to you or not?

REINSTEIN: No. Jack Tuthill got himself involved in nuclear matters. We had a guy who just recently, in the last month, died, who was the fellow who handled the nuclear matters there. He operated somewhat independently. Tuthill tried to control him. I knew this fellow personally; I had worked with him in Washington on other matters, I think. I decided nuclear matters really don't have anything to do with my job. I've got so many things to work on it's useless for me to spend any time getting involved. Obviously, as a member of the top staff of the embassy you got involved in discussions with the ambassador at regular meetings and things and got exposed to stuff, but there was no spillover. You see on the economics side basically we were pro-six; we were supportive of the common market because the common market was just what we had been looking for, hoping for, and we wanted to get some kind of European political organization. We wanted to get the French and Germans together. We were encouraging all the things that went along that way. Our basic national interest was in supporting the European movement. We had connections with Jean Monnet.

Q: You were in Paris when de Gaulle vetoed the British entry into the common market. What was the reaction among your French friends there?

REINSTEIN: Well, the most frank reaction I got was from the head guy in the Ministry of Economics. He said, "Well, I didn't expect it to go through, but I didn't expect it to wind up this way." It was a shock to people who actually worked on it.

I should put in a little background here. At one point there appeared in my office, without any particular notice, somebody from Washington – Arthur Hartman – who was maybe working for Doug Dillon then.

Q: No, he was working for George Ball.

REINSTEIN: George Ball, yes. He said, "George has persuaded the British to apply for membership in the common market,” and this was going to happen and we were to keep our mouths shut and not criticize it.

Q: I was standing next to George Ball in Bonn in January of '63 when word came in that de Gaulle had vetoed it and he said words that I will not use on this tape, but he was very upset with that.

REINSTEIN: Actually, it was foreseeable.

Q: Yes, I know.

REINSTEIN: It was foreseeable. Despite the injunction that I received from the department after the negotiations, one of the things was that the French told me, and in my absence Don McGrew, a lot about what went in in the negotiations – we were one main source of information – at some point I sat down and I wrote a telegram – I can't remember what date it was, an analysis of the problems in the negotiation, what we saw as being the principal issues standing in the way of an agreement and the possibilities of their being resolved. My conclusion was that it was unlikely that all the major problems could be resolved and the negotiations would not come to a successful conclusion.

Q: So you had already, in your mind, reached that conclusion.

REINSTEIN: And I communicated that to Washington. I took it in to Cecil Lyon down the hall. He hated it. Cecil always liked to be positive and said, “Can't you say something positive?” I said, “Cecil, this is an analysis of what I think may happen and I think it's bad; and I simply owe it to Washington to give an honest appraisal of the way we see it.” Walt Butterworth was our representative in Brussels and I saw Walt a certain time after that and he said, “You know, I used to keep that telegram of yours in my in-box.”

Q: Butterworth was my minister in London for a while. He's an honest man. Maybe a little too much so at times, but he's an honest man, and a very bright one.

REINSTEIN: I met him first when he was a USCC in Spain during the war.

Q: Yes, that was some time ago.

REINSTEIN: A very, very able guy.

ROBERT ANDERSON
Political/Economic Officer
Bordeaux and Paris (1959-1961)

Political Counselor
Paris (1962-1968)

Ambassador Robert Anderson entered the Foreign Service in 1947. His career included posts in Shanghai, Bangkok, New Delhi, Bordeaux, and Paris. In addition, he served as ambassador to Benin, Morocco, and the Dominican Republic. Ambassador Anderson was interviewed by Horace Torbert in 1990.

ANDERSON: Then it came time for me, finally, to go abroad again. And William L. Blue -- dear Bill Blue, with whom I served in India, was in personnel at the time -- this was in '59, when it came time for me to go out -- and I decided that I really ought to learn a foreign language, preferably French. And so we figured that I'd spent ten or eleven years out in the Far East, and I was gradually moving westward, but not fast enough. And so my dear wife said: "Look, let's go to France where you can learn the language."

So Bill Blue found two assignments in Paris. They weren't in the embassy, they were with international organizations. And I said: "No thanks." And he looked at me as if I were half mad. I said: "If you have an opening in one of the consulates, anywhere, that is where I'd like to go, because I would like to learn to speak French and I don't want to be in Paris with 55,000 Americans. I want to be out in the provinces, where I can really come to know France and try to learn the language."

An opening came in Bordeaux and that's where I went. That really changed my whole career. They, frankly, were the two happiest years of my career, in a way. I can say happiest, because I didn't have any earthshaking responsibilities in those two delightful years to try and not only learn the French language and the countryside, but to appreciate the finest wine in the world.

I became very, very close friends with Jacques Chaban-Delmas, still mayor of Bordeaux today, and Prime Minister when I went back years later under Sarge Shriver, which I'll get to when we next meet. Chaban put up with my inability to speak French when I first got there. But after six months, I then gave my first speech in French. I'd had a tutor and worked every day and was determined to learn it and did, finally, which was a tremendous thing for me to focus on. I enjoyed it very much.

Q: You had had, presumably, the standard no-speaking education (inaudible)? [Laughter]

ANDERSON: Yes, I took all the French they had to offer at Yale, and the result of that was you couldn't speak French when you finished it, because you don't learn a language through your eyes, you learn it through your ears; and that's the only way to do it.

Bordeaux was a tremendous experience for me because I learned about France. The people who go to Paris, and stay there for four to five years, don't know anything about France, really. Paris is so different. I had told them in Washington, Bill Blue and others, "If I do well in Bordeaux, and if I learn the language, I would then like to have a crack at Paris, if an opening comes."

Well, an opening came. I spent two years in Bordeaux and then went to Paris in April, 1961 for two exciting years.

Q: Just to clear that up, what did you actually do in Bordeaux?

ANDERSON: As the number-two man in the Consulate General, I was assigned as the political/economic officer. It was a small post of four officers. We had more than enough to do, I can assure you.

I was next assigned as a commercial officer in Paris, working for a very remarkable economic minister in the beginning. He was Jacques Reinstein, a hard taskmaster, but so bright and stimulating.

This was a very active period in the formation of the European community, of its common agricultural policy, of its common commercial policy. We also had our bilateral problems with the French in trade, quotas, you name it.

Right after I arrived, President Kennedy came over for his state visit to General de Gaulle. Jim Gavin was our ambassador. I was assigned to his visit as they needed somebody who spoke French. I was camped out at the Quai d'Orsay in the President's quarters, to take care of anything that came up. My wife, bilingual in French, was assigned to Jackie Kennedy, to do anything she could to be helpful.

Ambassador Gavin saw me during the President's visit and followed a couple of problems I had to deal with. He decided to change his special assistant and decided on me. Jack Reinstein successfully blocked the transfer. When the next special assistant didn't work out, General Gavin went to Cecil Lyon, his deputy, and said: "I'm going back to Jacques Reinstein. And I want Bob Anderson down in this office by December 1." He went to Jacques and said: "That's the end of it; there's no more discussion. Bob is going to move and work in my office."

And Cecil told me, he said: "You've got to save the name of the Service. Two of our members have fallen. You must go and do the job." And he couldn't have been nicer. Basically, what General Gavin wanted was a chief of staff. Well, that is the Minister's job.

It was a very delicate job in terms of my relations with Cecil, whom I liked and respected and with Randy Kidder, the political counselor, with whom I've been so close ever since. They were very senior; I was very junior. They all were 100% behind me and I was able to do the job to satisfy General Gavin.

Here again that shows that if you are given a challenge and can cut the mustard, as we say, you will be given new challenges and move up the ladder.

General Gavin was one of the most amazing men I have ever met. He had mixed reviews as Ambassador to France. A lot of the things that the press wrote were superficial, unfounded and unjust -- they didn't really know what they were talking about. He had the respect of the intellectual community and the scientific community, for example, like no one I have ever met.

Q: What was his background in the military originally? Was he an engineering officer?

ANDERSON: He was a tremendous airborne combat officer, with his last job as head of research and development in the Pentagon. He broke with Eisenhower because he felt that the Administration was not giving enough attention to research and development. He retired and made President of Arthur D. Little and Company. Two months later, Kennedy asked him to go to Paris. The board let him go for 18 months or something like that, and said: "If you don't come back then, that's it," which is why he had to leave; because he had five daughters and needed the A.D. Little income.

One example of his imagination, he called me into his office one day and said: "Bob, I've just been reading some things about the laser beam. You know, we ought to think more about this, all of us. You know, I can envisage that one day the medical profession may be able to use this to save our eyes and the brain." This is unbelievable; we didn't know much about the laser then, mind you; this was 1962. And this man saw this back then.

As far as the Foreign Service was concerned, he considered one of our biggest weaknesses to be our lack of training. He said: "In the military," he said, "people are able to earn advanced degrees because, you know, we're a war-fighting machine, and so when we're not at war these people can spend maybe a third of their career or so in training. You poor people don't have this leeway, because the Foreign Service is always at war, basically, the war of diplomacy."

One other item concerning Paris and the CIA. This is something they do occasionally, and I was up in arms about it. Some of us may have an excellent source, and then without telling us, the Agency will try to recruit the source.

Q: On an exclusive basis?

ANDERSON: Yes, and pay him.

Q: And pay him, sure.

ANDERSON: I think that is the dumbest policy imaginable, and have made myself very clear on a number of occasions, to the Agency. What it did once in my career was to jeopardize an invaluable source, who had been close to us for years. We almost lost him because he felt insulted. The source happened to be a friend of mine of over 20 years. One did not need to pay this source.

Q: Bob McBride had the same observation from being there a little earlier.

ANDERSON: It was an insult to an outstanding gentleman.

Q: Yes.

ANDERSON: When I left George in the summer of 1965, I went to the European Bureau, where John Leddy was Assistant Secretary. I was Acting Director for Western Europe for the first year. When they reorganized the Bureau, I became the Country Director for France and the Benelux for two years. In the summer of '68, I went back to Paris.

A rather momentous event happened at the time in which our Bureau was deeply involved. It was the withdrawal of France from the integrated military structure, the Atlantic Alliance. We faced many challenges working with the Hill to make sure the Hill wouldn't completely destroy our relations with France, which we all felt had to be maintained somehow in the face of de Gaulle's onslaught.

Dean Acheson came in as a Special Assistant to the Secretary, you may remember. And young Larry Eagleburger was assigned as Dean Acheson's Staff Assistant by Ball's office. An excellent choice. Acheson's mission was to focus on: "All right, de Gaulle has done this, now what do we do?" George Ball was the point man on this whole subject.

ANDERSON: No, he stayed on most of the time when I was in the European Bureau.

Q: Well, Nick Katzenbach was there for about the last year or so of the administration.

ANDERSON: Yes.

Q: Or a year and a half.

ANDERSON: Yes, that's right. And Larry moved in as Nick's Special Assistant. He took my old job with Nick Katzenbach, as a matter of fact.

Q: Meanwhile, you had Chip Bohlen in Paris all this time?

ANDERSON: Yes. I should have mentioned, earlier that I worked for Chip Bohlen in Paris.

Q: Well, I thought you probably overlapped with him.

ANDERSON: Yes, and very much so. I was with him for -- October '82 until the summer of '83, when I came back. And I should have mentioned that because our two families couldn't have been closer. When he first came, I was there as Special Assistant. Chip didn't know whether he wanted one, and he didn't know me from Adam. Cecil Lyon stayed on as DCM, and told him: "Look. Use Bob. He'll be fine. You'll like him."

One thing I had to do for General Gavin, was to draft his telegrams of meetings with de Gaulle, Couve de Murville, and others. He would come back, and then unload. In order to have his reports treated in the State Department and elsewhere in Washington, in a logical manner and effective manner, I arranged them subject by subject. It wouldn't, for example, be one telegram of a meeting with de Gaulle on umty-ump subjects.

Q: Separate telegrams?

ANDERSON: Separate telegrams, which Washington liked. So the question was how was this going to be done with Chip Bohlen. You know, he always dictated his own telegrams. He said at the beginning: "I'm not going to have anybody else do that for me." His drafting was not, frankly, the tightest and cleanest in the world. He was a marvelous conceptual thinker, but tended to wander off on occasion. [Laughter] Eventually, he had me mark over his telegrams. He'd dictate a draft of a meeting, I would separate out the subjects, edit his handiwork. It worked out well. He loved it. The Department liked it.

One little sidelight, with Chip Bohlen, which -- I don't know whether it's part of history. He loved to gamble. Maybe this was well known.

Q: I knew it. He and Tommy always had these high stakes poker games running, which I never played in and wouldn't have thought of playing in. [Laughter]

ANDERSON: In France, of course, Chip had to make his calls on various notables. He couldn't wait to go down to the Midi, to make his official visits. And he always took Avis, his wife, and Elena, my wife, and me with him. The next visit was to Nice and Cannes. While there we went to the casino in Cannes. Avis, his wife, was concerned about this, because she was always concerned about the household budget. She refused to go with him to the casino, but she said to me: "All right, Bob, stay with him and make sure he doesn't over spend."

Off we went to Chemin de Fer. He did pretty well and loved it. I did get him to agree to one thing. I said: "It'll make life a lot easier for both of us, Mr. Ambassador, to lessen the pressure from Mrs. Bohlen. Now, you won this amount of money. Will you please give it to me?"

"Why do you want it?"

"Because I'm going to put it in the safe at the embassy and this is going to be your gambling account. When we go out again to gamble, you can use this money without drawing on the household budget. If you keep winning, Mrs. Bohlen won't be so disturbed. So we established "the Bohlen gambling fund," very discreetly. [Laughter] I'm very sorry I forgot about Chip Bohlen. You must prompt me.

Q: You're doing great. You don't need much prompting. Well, we're still, I guess, back as country director.

ANDERSON: Yes. There are two stories I have thought about during that period. One has to do with de Gaulle's withdrawal from the military structure of NATO. You remember the Harmel Plan?

Q: Vaguely.

ANDERSON: Pierre Harmel was the Belgian Foreign Minister. And Stevie Davignon was his Cabinet Director. Harmel had been in the States, and was trying to develop a plan whereby the 14 allies (minus France) could have a doctrine to operate in light of the acts France had taken. We had some thoughts to contribute to the Foreign Minister. He was taking the boat back to Europe to draft the doctrine later known as the Harmel Plan.

Our Assistant Secretary, John Leddy asked me to pass on our thoughts to Harmel in New York before he left for Europe. He was staying at the Pierre Hotel. John didn't give me much notice to get up there, as usual. When I arrived at the Pierre. Harmel and Davignon had just left to catch the ship.

So I flagged a cab, reached the ship just as fast as I could, got on board, found them, and said: "John Leddy has these thoughts."

The Foreign Minister said: "Well, come on. We'll go up in the bar where we can go over them." When the time came for all visitors ashore, we held the ship, in order to give the Belgian Foreign Minister the United States' views on his plan. I can't remember what the specific points were, but they were important and were included in the plan.

ANDERSON: Yes. Now the only other thing I'd like to mention just now for a minute is the student riots in France in May, '68. It's the only time I ever had a difference of view with Chip Bohlen. I was the Country Director for France/Benelux, and the point man on that whole subject as far as the European Bureau was concerned.

When de Gaulle left the Elysée nobody knew where he was going. The President was in Texas. Dean Rusk was home under the weather -- I think it was the only time he was not in the State Department in eight years. Nick Katzenbach, the Under Secretary, was in Texas with the President. The president was going to have a press conference. Larry Eagleburger and I were in my old office, in Katzenbach's Suite, where I used to be with George Ball. Larry was Nick's Special Assistant. We did up the press guidance for the President to use in Texas, and phoned it down to Nick, and the President subsequently used it.

I can't remember where Chip was, and whether he was back as Under Secretary for political affairs or whether he was still in Paris.

Q: He was in Paris until sometime in '68, but I don't know --

ANDERSON: Yes. Then Shriver --

Q: I guess, yes, February, '68 he left Paris.

ANDERSON: Okay. Well, then he was back in Washington. I talked with him about de Gaulle's mysterious departure from Paris. Chip said he felt that de Gaulle had given up, and would resign. That's the only time I ever took issue with him. I said: "That does not sound like General de Gaulle; he just wouldn't do that. He's up to something. He'll be back. Something's going to happen."

Q: You know, I've forgotten this entirely.

ANDERSON: Well, he went to see General Massu, who was the Commander of the French forces in Germany. What he wanted to do was to make sure that Massu was going to stand behind him; because you remember, at the time of Algeria Massu was not exactly a de Gaulle supporter. So that's what he was up to. That was the one time Chip and I didn't agree on something, and I happened to be right on that particular one.

I don't know why Chip felt that, because that was so unlike de Gaulle, you know, to just quit and go off to Colomb   les Deux Eglises.

Q: As I recall, in an earlier conversation we had, you were talking also about a relationship with Rusk and his visit to de Gaulle, in which you and Ed Beigel did a special...

ANDERSON: Thank you for reminding me of that. This was in the spring of '66, right after General de Gaulle withdrew from the military-structure of NATO, which obviously concerned not only us, but the other allies. People really didn't understand a lot of the things going on in this man's mind. A fantastic book, called La Tragedie du General, by a Jean Raymond Tournoux, was published. It was a very thick tome, carefully researched, and its contents never denied by de Gaulle. It was essentially a book of quotations by de Gaulle, of his private and public pronouncements. Most of them were private.

Ed Beigel and I sat up for four nights, just before Secretary Rusk was taking off for the spring NATO ministerial in Paris. We thought that selecting different quotes of de Gaulle might give a better feel of who this man was; what was making him tick. It was about a 25-page paper that we came up with which we finished just before the Secretary boarded his plane.

He sent word back, actually, from the plane, saying, "This is great. I'm learning things." He made the staff traveling with him read it, then later gave a copy to each allied foreign minister, before the NATO ministerial started, suggesting they might want to read it. Anybody who's seriously interested in trying to understand General de Gaulle ought to get this book and study it. Our language people could probably have done a hell of a lot better job than Ed and I did, but time was of the essence. We both felt this was a modest contribution to trying to figure out what was going on in General de Gaulle's mind.

The summer of '68, I returned to Paris this time, as political counselor. Sarge Shriver asked me to join him as one of a number of changes he wished to make in the embassy in reorienting our activities in France.

Sarge Shriver, in my view, was the right man at the right time having come there during the events of the summer of '68 after which General de Gaulle would never be the same again. For example, he finally realized that he could not contain Germany by himself. This led to the very private luncheon with Sir Christopher Soames, the British ambassador in Paris, where de Gaulle threw out, for the first time, the desirability of maybe reinstituting talks to have the United Kingdom enter the Common Market. (The British leaked this. I don't blame them for leaking it after de Gaulle's veto in January, 1963. They wanted to make sure he wasn't going once again to play games with them.)

De Gaulle was infuriated that this luncheon leaked in London. The actual negotiations for the entry of Great Britain into the Common Market did not start until Pompidou succeeded de Gaulle as president. Nevertheless, de Gaulle realized that Germany could not be contained, and that maybe the United Kingdom was just about as antisupranational as France. In my own view, I think the British are more antisupranational than France, if you think of what's going on today in the Common Market.

That being said: I wanted to make a couple of points about how Sarge Shriver reoriented the embassy. He was very imaginative, and totally dedicated. He had more ideas per minute than any man I've ever met. He might have ten ideas. Eight of them might be questionable, but one or two might be superb, and that's great. He was one of the more stimulating personalities I've ever worked with.

Q: Did you have a problem on the ideas that weren't good, quieting him down?

ANDERSON: Absolutely not.

Q: Good. Just did them anyway?

ANDERSON: No. He would knock some of his own ideas down himself. One of the things that we did at the very beginning of Sarge's stay had to do with your favorite sport, tennis. At that time, we were trying to build up a respectable Davis Cup team. We'd been in a disastrous situation for four or five years. Donald Dell, Arthur Ashe, Stan Smith, Charlie Pasarell and Bob Lutz were the top candidates for the Cup team. They came over to France, and we arranged a month-long tour throughout France.

Those of us in the embassy who spoke fluent French went with them to various cities where we'd speak at lunches and dinners and help them out. Needless to say, I volunteered not only because of my love of tennis, but because of the new French friends I found in the provinces.

They did a wonderful job, and were tremendous ambassadors of the United States in the provinces where there had been virtually no contact with Americans since 1958 when de Gaulle came to power. That's the way he wanted it in order to try and give the French people self-respect again. With the Americans all over France in different bases, what he wanted to do was to reduce the French thinking about the United States and Americans, and have them start to think about themselves.

I can't fault him on that, frankly. He did succeed in having the Frenchman regain confidence in himself. I think that was a vital necessity if France was going to continue as a world power, or even an important regional power.

Q: You were also having some military conversations, weren't you?

ANDERSON: Military conversations started before Sarge Shriver arrived in France, and continued between General Lemnitzer, who was the SACEUR, and General Ailleret, who was the equivalent of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff for France. They worked out very confidential arrangements of cooperation between NATO and France in case of a conflict. If France decided to enter a conflict, certain things would happen. But the French insisted -- and this is the main point always at issue -- that they were going to decide unilaterally if they were going to enter the conflict.

If this had been made public, de Gaulle would have complained and nothing would have been done. I think we always have to remember that with our French friends military-to-military relationships have always been easier and more productive than political relationships which really is quite understandable because usually military-to-military relationships, many of which are contingencies, are not cast over the front pages of the newspapers as are political relationships.

Another wonderful program in the embassy was our youth program. I had a youth officer assigned to the political section and gave part of the section's representation allowance to the officer to use as he or she saw fit.

One program we started was an exchange of French Parliamentarians and U.S. Congressmen under 40 years of age. For the first exchange about ten American congressmen and their wives came to France and spent a week or ten days, if you can believe it. We had excellent meetings in Paris and out into the constituencies of their French counterparts. The next year, the same French Deputés came over with their wives to America. A similar program was arranged in Washington, and then they in the constituencies of their U.S. hosts. The speaker of the House of Representatives today, Tom Foley, was one of these people. Because of this experience, Tom thinks that the French are absolutely fantastic. And Don Beigle, then a Republican congressman and now a Democratic Senator from Michigan, was another participant. We had some very wonderful people in this program who came to appreciate France and made their judgments based on knowledge of the country and its people, not on the misinformed, emotional reactions we so often see.

Something happened in this program for which I was almost thrown out of France by some senior Gaullist Deputés who were friends of mine. The young French députés, who came over and went up to Capitol Hill. When they saw the facilities that our congressmen have, such as separate offices, separate telephones, and staffs, their eyes bulged. In Paris, when I was there, the French Deputés had to line up to use about three or four phones in one large salon in the Parliament building. It was very beautiful with gold and red damask curtains, but not very practical as they didn't have separate offices or separate staffs.

I would like you to know that today there is a separate building and each member of the French Parliament has his or her own office and staff, as a result of the first visit of the young Deputés to Washington in the late 1960s.

Some of the old codgers, some of my friends who were in the Parliament then, like General Pierre Billotte, for example said: "You are trying to ruin this country. We can't afford this. These young people don't need all of these facilities. I didn't ever have them when I was a député for 20 years."

I said: "General, I'm sorry. I don't agree with you; they can do a better job this way." Every time I go to Paris some of my friends take me over there, as they consider it a small memorial that I gave them. It's right behind Quai d'Orsay.

Q: It isn't called the Anderson Building yet?

ANDERSON: Hardly.

Another thing that we started -- this started, actually, before I went there with Shriver, but we built on it a little bit. When I came back to join George Ball in 1963, I was concerned over the lack of people at senior levels who really knew anything about France. We had difficulties getting the ideal number twos, political counselors (Randy Kidder was an exception) and economic ministers.

I talked this over with Chip Bohlen and he said: "What we've got to do is build up a cadre of people who gain experience in France at an early age, and know something about France, so that later on the personnel system can dip into the files and find a DCM that at least speaks fluent French." It was unbelievable the lack of senior people who had any real background on France, and it's this way today, not quite as bad, but almost. So what did we try and do?

George Ball got behind this, along with Bill Crockett, who was the number-one administrator of the Department at the time Ball was Under Secretary. We arranged with the École Nationale d'Administration (ENA), which is the elite graduate school formed after the war by Pierre Racine, from which any person aspiring to enter public service had to graduate, to allocate one slot for an American diplomat to go there. And Crockett funded it. It was a one-year program. The point was that we wanted a bright, young FSO already fluent in French to go there and absorb France and things French along side the future leaders of France. I think of the contacts he'd make.

The next step, following one year at ENA, was going to be to assign the class-four or five FSO as Principal Officer at one of our Consulates in France for two years. In this way, we could find out if he could run an office. Put him in Lyon as consul general; if he can't run anything, it doesn't matter anyway, because it's not going to break the bank. Peter Tarnoff was our first man. I just wish he was still in the Service, because he could have been the DCM, and eventually our ambassador to France. He was superb. He went through ENA, and was an excellent consul general in Lyon. The system has not continued the way we wanted it to. It did for four of five years. But this was the idea that we wanted to have work out, so a higher caliber of people who understand France could be available to fill the key jobs.

Q: Strangely enough, your friend Johnny Jones built up a very similar system in Italy, which was functioning when I was young. It's totally destroyed now because of this business of bidding for jobs.

ANDERSON: This is a pity.

Q: It is too bad.

ANDERSON: In recent years we failed to send students to ENA as the State Department says we don't have money. Well, this is inexcusable. For example, the Germans send 40 students every year. Now you think, this has been going on since World War II, practically; think of the number of Germans that are close to the number of French. And at the level they are now, they're Ministers, bank presidents and corporation heads. They pick up the phone, the old-boys club starts to operate. De Gaulle wanted to have this done as another way to try and prevent France and Germany from being at loggerheads. I think it was a wonderful initiative.

Q: Frenchmen would go to Germany, too?

ANDERSON: I don't think the Germans have an ENA, but there are French students who attend other institutions. To continue on with ENA for a minute, which we built on when Sarge Shriver was in Paris. We instituted a graduation present for six students from ENA, to come to the United States after they graduated. They could come for six weeks and visit anywhere they wanted. It was separate from the Leader grant program, but the same idea. We did this for a few years, and then formed an alumni association, so we could stay in touch with these ENA graduates as they moved through their careers. This was an extremely valuable contact for the United States.

Henri Alphanand was French ambassador here, and went back as Secretary General of the foreign office. He never was pro-American, and managed to change with the political climate throughout his career. Charles Lucat, his successor here, was excellent.

When Alphanand heard about this program, he complained: "Oh, here's the United States trying to subvert these young Frenchmen by offering them a trip." This actually happened before Shriver arrived in Paris, because I was still back in Washington, and Charles Lucat was Ambassador. Lucat asked me to come over and see him. We had a drink together and he said: "Bob, I've received this telegram, and I don't think we can continue this program."

I said: "What? This is ridiculous."

He said: "I know." And he showed me the telegram.

I said: "Well, what's the problem? Is it because we pay for it?"

"Well, yes. They think you're bribing these people."

I said: "All right, Charles, do you agree this is a good program?"

"Yes."

I then commented: "I think, too, it's wonderful. It helps U.S.-French relations. So you pay for it. But still let them come. Don't deprive them of this experience, after they've gone through this terribly rigorous course." And that is what happened. So we were able to continue it and the French paid for it. We overcame Alphanand's objection, because we weren't paying for it.

To return to one thing I said on our efforts to try to understand France more, to have officers develop more contacts with the French people in this new atmosphere that I described earlier. We instituted a program, whereby in the Paris consulate district, the members of the political and economic section had to visit specific parts of the district four times a year.

I never heard such bleats out of some members of the political section, all of whom are ambassadors now. That was one of the most star-studded sections in history; Mike Glitman, who just completed the TNF Treaty negotiations; John Gunther Dean; Andy Steigman; and Bob Oakley. We had a whole stable of them. They started to gripe about getting out into the countryside in a staff meeting, saying: "But look at the telegrams that are coming in my in-box."

I said: "Gentlemen, I couldn't care less about your in-box or your telegrams. You are to go out. You're going to learn something about this country. Paris is not France. You're going to meet mayors. You're going to meet members of Parliament out in the provinces. You're going to meet chambers of commerce leaders. I want you to learn about France and profit from this." They really were unhappy with me. And I said: "If you don't, it's going to be reflected in your fitness report. I'm sorry." I was very, very disturbed by their narrow view.

The long and the short of this story is that after they went twice, I couldn't keep them in the office. They loved it. They later came and thanked me, and said: "We now know something about France."

And that reminds me of one thing. When I arrived in Paris on August 15, 1968, Perry Culley, my dear, wonderful friend, was Consul General. He met me at the train station, because I brought my family over by boat and took the train from Le Havre. I had had no vacation, and those five days were going to be my leave. We drove to the front gate of the embassy, and Perry said: "Bob, I'm afraid you have to go into the embassy right now." I wasn't even allowed to go home and drop my family off at the residence, where Randy Kidder lived -- you know, the house with the elevator at Leopold II.

Q: Yes.

ANDERSON: My three children and wife went on with Perry to the house. And I went up and Shriver looked up and said: "It's about time you got here."

I said: "What are you saying?"

"Look, I'm supposed to take off for Sardinia right now, and Eunice and the children are waiting. I've got to go. Good luck." He took off one hour later, and left me virtually in charge.

Q: Woody Wallner had just left ahead of you.

ANDERSON: Woody was there, but winding up as DCM. Ten days later, the Russians went into Czechoslovakia, and I was there in the embassy with Shriver in Sardinia, and Woody's replacement not yet in place.

One of the first things we did was to reduce the political reporting of the American Embassy by 60%. I had been on the receiving end in Washington earlier, and the quantity of telegrams was overwhelming. As often happens, and you know this as well as I do, our political sections like to compete with the newspapers. Newspapers are paid to get the scoops ASAP. We're paid to analyze. I did not want to try and beat the wire services with some minor scoop. Eliminating this type of marginal reporting enabled us to devote more time to go out into the country, to learn more about France and to develop new objectives to improve our relations with France.

There was a cost-cutting effort to close USIS offices in the provinces and operate only out of Paris. We fought that and won, because the USIS offices in France, for the first time now, were going to be able to have some effective contact with the French people. We therefore didn't want to lose this tool.

There are a couple of amusing stories about Sarge and Eunice Shriver. One had to do with a stag lunch at the residence -- the old residence at Number Two Avenue Iena. There were about ten of us. One thing that you would never know as you went into the residence was where the dining table was going to be. It was like a floating crap table; it moved into different rooms, depending upon what the children were doing. There were usually no rugs on the floor because they would impede the mobility of the fire engines, the bicycles and the tricycles.

Two French Cabinet ministers came on this particular day. One was a very dignified, senior Gaullist minister, who always wore a bow tie, he was sitting at Sarge's right. One of the Shriver children came in. I was at an angle where I could see the child, I think it was Anthony. As he came in through the door, I watched his eyes. They were focused on the bow tie of the French minister. He came towards the French minister, and his right hand started to go up. I broke into the conversation, and I said: "Mr. Ambassador, Anthony's on your right. Get his arm, quickly." Sarge saved the day, and the bow tie of the Minister remained tied. [Laughter] That's just one little example.

Another story involves Eunice. She had very definite views on the people she'd like to sit with at dinners. A very large, important dinner was scheduled. Couve de Murville, the Foreign Minister, was going to be there. And Alphand had come back from Washington -- no, at that time he was already the Secretary General of the foreign office. And then Arthur Ashe would be there along with other tennis people. It was a large dinner with a number of round tables in different rooms.

Eunice asked my dear wife, Elena, if she would come over and arrange the seating because she didn't have much confidence in the lady that was hired to do this sort of thing. So Elena did the job and came home to change for the big event. This was one of the few black-tie affairs the Shrivvers had. As a matter of fact, Jackie Kennedy was there with her sister. It was quite an evening.

We returned to the Residence and walked in a little ahead of time. And there was Eunice moving the place cards Elena arranged.

Q: In France, of all places.

ANDERSON: I know. She wanted Arthur Ashe and other friends at her table, not Couve de Murville, the Foreign Minister. And she started to put Couve, the Foreign Minister, someplace. Alphant, who had been placed in the outer regions, nearly walked out.

Elena and I finally persuaded Eunice to place Couve at the number one table, but lost on most other counts. This is the way they were. Sometimes they'd get away with it, sometimes they wouldn't.

Incidentally, a little vignette on Couve de Murville, that comes to mind. It involves Sir Harold Nicholson, whom you know?

Q: Yes.

ANDERSON: Well, Couve de Murville has an Anglophobia the likes of which I've never seen. I'll never forget, for example, after de Gaulle pulled out of the military structure of NATO, there was a U.N. session in New York and Dean Rusk invited Couve and the French delegation, as we always did, to a small bilateral lunch up at the Waldorf Astoria apartment of our Ambassador. Couve refused to speak English; he wouldn't use one word of impeccable English. He just sat there, sulked and spoke French, and insisted that it be translated.

Q: Oh, I've heard Alphant will do this.

ANDERSON: I found out one reason that he's this way. It involves Sir Harold Nicholson, and it's a true story. When Couve was a young man, Sir Harold wanted to have a tennis professional, somebody to come and teach his children tennis. Couve saw the ad Sir Harold placed in the papers. He was accepted and went to Sir Harold Nicholson's to teach tennis and be a companion to the children. He was treated like a servant. He was not considered part of the family, and had a room out in back. Couve never forgot this. This may be an important little footnote to history that explains, in part why Couve feels the way he does about the English. I thought that this might be interesting for somebody to check into this further if one wanted to.

I believe I mentioned to you about Jacques Chaban-Delmas who was Prime Minister when Sarge Shriver was there. I told you before I had become very close to him starting in 1959 when he was Mayor of Bordeaux. I used to see him often as Prime Minister, always of course with Sarge's prior approval. He was delighted to have me see Chaban. I would usually be asked to come to the Matignon, where the prime minister had his office, and would go up the back stairs to see him, whenever he had something he wanted to discuss.

I'll never forget when France sold a number of Mirage aircraft to Libya back in '68 or '69. And you know, we were concerned about this. I went to see Chaban, at his request, and as far as I know, this has never been written. But he said: "Bob, look, please tell your people not to be so worried about this. They can't fly them. We are going to train their pilots. That's going to be in Dijon, France. It's going to take a long time, number one. And number two, they're not really going to ever be able to really fly them. I don't think they will ever become a military factor. And through this, a sale of 100 Mirages, we may be able to exert some political leverage on Libya."

This is so typically French. That is what he told me, and I reported it to Washington. I must say, Washington's temperature lowered. I haven't followed the entire history of the 100 aircraft -- but as far as I know, they have never become a potent military factor for Libya.

Q: They didn't seem to prevent our bombing (inaudible) some years later.

ANDERSON: I agree, but I don't know if any of those aircraft are still operational, because that's a long ago. They bought them in '68 or '69.

One other tidbit about Chaban-Delmas, when my wife and I were transferred -- this jumps up to 1972 when I was going to Africa as Ambassador to Dahomey. I wanted to pay a farewell call on him. And so he and his wife invited Elena and me to his private apartments at the Matignon. The four of us were there alone together. He was thinking about running for the Presidency then, but his new wife didn't want to have anything to do with it; she was the sporting type and just wanted to return to her life in the southwest.

And I was trying to find out his future plans, and asked: "Well, you've been prime minister now for quite a while. How much longer are you going to be here?"

He said: "Yes, I have been. Let's see." He looked up at the calendar on the wall, that had Xs marked for each day. He continued: "I've been here for X years, X months, and 16 hours." [Laughter] He looked at his watch, and said: "I can't wait to get out. Really."

His dear wife, whom I saw a couple of months ago here, had told him: "You'd better just move on." But she did let him make a run at the Presidency. Giscard d'Estaing did not play fair on this one. He falsely accused Chaban of not paying his income tax, which just wasn't correct. That eliminated him as a contender.

Q: Well, is he still mayor of Bordeaux?

ANDERSON: Yes, and still a member of parliament. Michel Jobert. I might say one brief word about him. He was subsequently Foreign Minister, but under Pompidou, he was the secretary general of the Presidency. I came to know him well.

He was born in Morocco. He has an American wife. The son went to the American school, very bright. Yet, he never really liked the United States that much. I think one of the things that became a little difficult was his relations with Henry Kissinger, who was then in the White House. They both had strong personalities, and just couldn't get along very well. I've seen Jobert many times since, and he still has a chip on his shoulder, as far as we're concerned; I don't think that will ever leave.

I remember once he called me over to the Elysée. He said: "The President is very upset by this Newsweek article. Why did you all do this? You didn't tell us this was your policy."

I found it amazing that a man of his intelligence, and Pompidou's intelligence, could focus on a

Newsweek article, and consider it was American policy. But that happened so often. I just had to tell him: "You can tell your President that that is not our policy. We told you what it was last week. And just because Newsweek writes something different, it, doesn't mean our policy has changed."

And then an amazing thing was that he had all the secrets of the state on his desk, and said: "Fine. I'll go in and tell him." He left me sitting there alone with all the papers, commenting as he went in to calm Pompidou down: "He's really angry." He's angry at you, too."

I said: "Well, don't be angry at me; I didn't have anything to do with this. And ask him not to become so upset by Newsweek."

One item, to do with President Nixon's visit, when Sarge Shriver was Ambassador, and General Walters was our Defense Attaché. There was a beautiful dinner at the Elysée palace, that de Gaulle gave for President Nixon. General Walters was the translator for the toasts. When de Gaulle spoke, Walters stood behind President Nixon and did the translation. Then when Nixon spoke, Walters translated Nixon's toast into French. There was a slight difficulty here. General Walters became so enthralled with what de Gaulle and Nixon had to say that his rendition of what was said was horribly translation.

And Henri Alphan and I were sitting near the end of the table and we looked at each other and there was the press and everything else. And we said: "Wait a minute. Dick's enthusiasm had run away with itself." We had to rush out and tell the press: "You can use what de Gaulle said in French, and you can use what Nixon said in English, but translations must be reviewed before release." Dick was such an admirer of General de Gaulle that on that particular evening things just got out of hand a little bit with the dear general. I still consider him one of the most brilliant linguists I have ever known.

Now, on Sarge Shriver and Nixon. Nixon asked Shriver to stay on as Ambassador, and Sarge accepted. Everybody was pleased with the job he was doing, and he stayed on through '69. Two or three young Democrats then came over and really worked on Shriver to run for the governorship of Maryland in 1970. Much to my disappointment, he succumbed, resigned and went back. The reason that I'm even more disappointed is, that these young Democrats hadn't done their homework properly. By the time he returned to Maryland, he was too late to register, and couldn't even run for the governorship.

So he resigned as Ambassador of France and couldn't run as governor for Maryland. I have been very disappointed in that because I think he would have been a tremendous asset to stay on there, rather than have poor Dick Watson represent us, because Dick was a --

Q: Man of complexes.

ANDERSON: He was a very sick man. He had a terrible alcohol problem, as we all know. And it finally did him in. I was very close to him. I can't say too much about distinguished things that happened while he was there. I think the main thing is we were able to persuade the French to cooperate with us on narcotics. Dick worked the Interior Minister, who at first didn't want to have anything to do with it, saying: "That's your problem, not ours."

But we persuaded our French friends, including President Pompidou, that this was, indeed, going to be a French problem, and it was going to affect their youth. You may remember the movies, French Connection I and French Connection II. French Connection I was a direct result of the cooperation we worked out with the French and illustrates the depth of our cooperation.

Q: Who, by this time, was your DCM there?

ANDERSON: Watson wanted a change immediately. Perry Culley came back this time as DCM. His background was more consular and administrative. Perry and I couldn't have been closer, and had worked well together previously. Perry was the one Dick Watson wanted when told by the Service that I couldn't move up from political counselor to DCM. John Burns, who was Director General of the Foreign Service, and a good friend, said: "That's something we don't like to do, if we can avoid it." I wasn't that senior then, and that was fine, because I loved my job as political counselor and knew I would enjoy working with Watson and Perry.

GILBERT H. SHEINBAUM
Economic Officer
Paris (1959-1962)

Gilbert H. Sheinbaum was born in New York on April 20, 1929. He received a bachelor's degree in political science from New York University in 1950 and served in the U.S. military from 1951-1953. Mr. Sheinbaum entered the Foreign Service in 1957. His career included positions in Laos, Vietnam, Denmark, Madagascar, Malawi, the Philippines, and Switzerland. This interview was conducted by Tom Dunnigan on September 6, 1995.

Q: You were next assigned to Paris. That was a reward for your service in Laos or normal?

SHEINBAUM: Well, of course, when I was leaving for Laos in 1957, it seemed like everyone in Personnel, probably not including Pat Byrne (the desk officer, later Ambassador to Mali and Burma), felt sorry that I was being assigned to Laos. I wasn't at all unhappy about being assigned to Laos, as I mentioned before. I was simply unhappy about going into disbursing, but in the end that turned out to be a good thing as a start in the Foreign Service. When I left for Laos, they said, "Oh, don't worry, we'll take care of you the next time." But who would believe that? So when my orders came in for Paris, it took the code room twenty-four hours to convince me that they were legitimate orders because I had seen them play around in the code room dummyping up orders for other people, and I could not believe that I was really going to Paris.

Q: But you had home leave in between, I think.

SHEINBAUM: Home leave, yes.

Q: Good. Now in Paris, you arrived in 1959, you had two ambassadors, Amory Houghton and Jim Gavin, I gather. And you were assigned there as economic officer this time.

SHEINBAUM: I was economic officer; the assistant civil air attaché, and the transportation and telecommunications officer. After I'd been there only a couple of months on the job, my boss, Bert Colclaser, the civil air attaché and a very experienced woman in civil aviation, an aviation lawyer, went on home leave for three months. Well, that made it more interesting for me because of unexpected things I had to do. Like, suddenly, negotiation of an amendment to the Civil Aviation Agreement between France and the United States. That really was demanding in terms of both what I knew about civil aviation and with my French, but it all worked out well. I also did have some things to do with surface transportation. I think the most interesting aspect of my stay there, aside from the social life, was having done a rather lengthy report on the embryonic development of the French SST, supersonic transport, about which the United States knew very little. Even though I was not technically qualified, I was able to use various sources I'd developed for the report, and they put all the details in laymen's terms for me. That report brought to Paris Najeeb Halaby, then head of the FAA. And he came out because nobody knew that the French had progressed so far, as I reported, and the Kennedy Administration was pondering whether or not we should develop an SST, a very costly venture if we went ahead. In the end we didn't. I think that was a wise move because, as we now see, the British-French Concorde, while a remarkable achievement, didn't really do much for the industry's long-term interests. And it never repaid the massive investment. Perhaps, on the technical side, it may have been useful for research, and we probably benefited from that as well. It was a very satisfying experience for me.

Q: And economically, it hasn't paid off.

SHEINBAUM: No, that's what I mean.

Q: Now, when you arrived, in '59, had France recovered from the upheavals of 1958, the student revolt and all the other things that had gone on?

SHEINBAUM: Well, yes, it was fairly calm there - at first. De Gaulle was in full control at that time. It was rather remarkable. I had arrived only a year or so after those events and I was surprised in a way to find France -- only fourteen years after the end of the war -- in such good shape. And spiritually, the arrival of de Gaulle on the scene had brought great relief that they had a strong man running the government. Not everybody agreed with him, but even most who didn't were grateful for the fact that they did have stable government. Then you had the Algerian business the following year, and that was a remarkable development.

Q: I want to refer to that a little later. Who was the economic minister at the embassy at that time?

SHEINBAUM: Jack Reinstein.

Q: Jack Reinstein, oh yes. With a great German background, too -- and French. And de Gaulle had put in an austerity program, as I recall. Was that successful?

SHEINBAUM: To a certain extent, but I don't think I'm equipped really to comment on it because, in retrospect, I haven't studied it in detail. All I know is that the French economy seemed to be very stable during all of the '60s long after I was there.

Q: Well, I would say, from many visits to Paris, is that austerity does not seem to be in the French character very often .

SHEINBAUM: Well, de Gaulle was not in the French character either for that matter. But he lasted for a long period of time, eleven years, not including his first appearance on the scene as the war was ending, but he did provide the stability that was needed and he had some great ideas to make the French, the Fifth Republic, a very stable . . .

Q: I would imagine he will go down as one of the great Frenchmen of the century.

SHEINBAUM: Of course. And his relationship with Adenauer -- not always smooth -- was often tenuous but nonetheless they made remarkable achievements for Europe.

Q: Now you were there in Paris when the French had their first successful nuclear test? What did that do to morale? Did it improve it? Were people unhappy with it?

SHEINBAUM: I don't remember, Tom. I don't have any recollection of reactions.

Q: How about the Common Market, which was then beginning to roll? Were the beneficial effects appreciated by the French?

SHEINBAUM: I think so. I think the French, perhaps more than the other participants in the Common Market, the other five countries at that time, were hesitant about the Common Market. I'm not sure of de Gaulle's substantive views on that himself, but the Common Market agreement had already been signed and he seemed to want to move ahead, feeling that was the way to go, probably as a major element of a strong Franco-German relationship that would obviate the possibility of friction that could lead to hostilities. So it was NATO and the Common Market together.

Q: While you were there, Gil, were American businesses welcome? Could they be established easily and were the French willing to cooperate with them?

SHEINBAUM: The French were particularly interested in our technology and business management abilities. Those were very strong factors. Now I was only involved really in the field of civil aviation and transportation and communications and there was a great deal of interest in American technology and having American companies coming over. Naturally, the French were very protective of their companies. I remember, there was a big story about Machines Bull, the French company that, I think, was partially owned by the Government -- it may have been all state-owned for all I know -- but nonetheless, while they were very protective of their own market, they were also very interested in getting a hold of our technology and being able to compete in the export markets. There was technology that the Americans could provide that they could not. So I could not make an overall judgment in every sector of the economy, but it seemed to me that American businesses were flourishing there even though American goods were - at that time - expensive for Europeans as the dollar was very strong. There were some restrictions, but nonetheless there was great opportunity for American business.

Q: That has been somewhat reversed.

SHEINBAUM: I would say yes.

Q: During the latter part of your tour, the French were deeply involved in the troubles in Algeria with the revolt of the French generals and so forth. What was the reaction of your French contacts to that? Were they happy to see the French out of Algeria? Did they want to stay?

SHEINBAUM: When I arrived in Paris, I didn't know any French people aside from those I knew in Indochina -- what some still call Indochina: Laos, Vietnam and Cambodia -- and had come to live in Paris for the first time in years. So a small group of six or eight French families gave me immediate access to the French social way of life. Of course, they themselves felt like outsiders because most of them had spent so many years in Indochina. But their views were rather ambivalent about Algeria. I think they saw the handwriting on the wall: Algeria, somehow or other, was going to go the way of Vietnam, but not necessarily in an identical fashion.

Q: France couldn't hold on to it.

SHEINBAUM: That's right. And also they resented the attitude of the French military, or rather those in the French military who were defying de Gaulle and were de-stabilizing the country. That they resented. By that time, after six months or more in Paris, I did have other French friends who resented this intrusion by the military into the private lives of the French in France. I remember I didn't think I would ever see Paris the way I saw it for several days when the streets were cleared, when there was nobody on the streets, when buses were lined up to block the bridges, tanks in the streets, the military . . . Despite curfews, I had to make a couple of runs at night down to the embassy - past rows of tanks and other military vehicles - because of commercial aircraft that were scheduled to come in, and we had to get messages to them to divert since the runways were blocked. It was a very spooky feeling, much in the way that Washington was spooky in April 1968, after the assassination of Martin Luther King.

Q: I remember that.

SHEINBAUM: I came back suddenly to Washington in April 1968 from Vietnam with Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker. I was his Staff Assistant. We were here for three days and there was nobody on the streets the first two days. Who would have ever thought there would be a situation like that here in Washington or anywhere in the States. It was a spooky feeling. In France from then on the military, not only in Algeria but throughout France, had a much lower influence on government policy.

MICHAEL E. C. ELY
Treasury Office
Paris (1959-1962)

Michael E. C. Ely was born in Washington, DC on August 26, 1929. He received a bachelor's degree in international affairs from Princeton University in 1952 and a master's degree in public affairs from Harvard University. Following his studies at Princeton, Mr. Ely served in the U.S. military for nearly two years. He entered the Foreign Service in 1955. His career included positions in Kuala Lumpur, Algiers, Mogadishu, Rome, Tokyo and Brussels. Mr. Ely was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1992.

ELY: But Paris, where I arrived on a cold November day in 1959, was very different, and nobody looked after you there. If you didn't speak the language in Paris 1959, you were high and dry. It was much less of an international place than it is now, and the French did not speak English, nor would they.

De Gaulle had come in in '58. This was at the winding down of the great post-war period. The Marshall Plan was phasing out. The OECD ended just shortly after I got there, and we set up the OECD instead. The French were in the European Community, and France was moving toward a more independent, self-confident stance.

But the deep divisions in French society were very apparent, even then. And the relations between France and the United States were very ambivalent. The French were intensely suspicious of our role in Algeria. They were intensely ambivalent about what we did in Indochina. De Gaulle disliked the Atlantic Alliance, which he thought was a tool of American predominance. The French had dreams of 20 years before, when France was considered the most powerful nation in the world. That was nearly gone. It was an illusion, but the French still had it.

And French society was still riven by the very factors that are being purged only today; that is, who did what during the occupation? Nobody was telling the truth. It was a society very much like recent society in the Soviet Union, based on lies. The Communists said that they had started the resistance and won the war. De Gaulle said, no, no the Free French had won the war. And in point of fact, neither did. The Allied forces, primarily American, won the war. But nobody was going to admit this.

On the right, Americans were unpopular because of our open-democracy populism, open culture, and prosperity. And sooner or later, whenever you were talking to a prominent French person, someone would start mentioning the almighty dollar. The almighty dollar...

While on the left, which included not just the Communists and the trade unions, but the entire academic community and almost all the intellectuals, Americans were seen as representatives of a rotten capitalist society. First, you get the Nazis, and then you get the capitalists, and we represented the capitalists.

So, while Americans were personally well treated and well regarded, as a country the United States was very unpopular. In the Foreign Ministry, the nationalists disliked us because France had become too reliant on the United States. The Atlanticists were purged by de Gaulle, which meant the friends of United States were taken out of the Foreign Ministry and even out of the government.

While for me, as a junior officer, it didn't make a lot of difference, this was not an easy period. I had a terrible time finding a place to live and learning the language. Eventually, I got 12 weeks of intensive French. I'd had a year in college, and that's the only formal French I've ever had. But that gave me enough so I was able to get going.

At about that time, de Gaulle, in one of his typically monarchical gestures, decided to free French Africa in 1960. And all of a sudden, these countries were cast loose. Not exactly cast loose, but made formally independent. The embassy had to find somebody to mark on that, and I found myself immersed in the problems of these newly emergent countries, with their commercial and financial ties with France.

Q: It must have been a fascinating time. This was just before the Kennedy administration came in, wasn't it?

ELY: Exactly.

Q: Well, to go back, what were you doing when you first arrived in '59?

ELY: I spent my entire three years working in the treasury office for Donald J. McGrew, himself a subject of considerable oral history. McGrew had been the deputy to Tommy Tomlinson, who had been a very important figure in the Marshall Plan and OECD in the great days of the late '40s and early '50s. Tomlinson died, allegedly of overwork, in 1955, I believe. And when Tommy passed, McGrew replaced him. McGrew had already been there for ten years and stayed on for another 15.

Q: He was subordinate to the Treasury or to the embassy? What was his relationship?

ELY: Well, that requires going back a little bit. The Foreign Service Act of 1946 was framed to make the Foreign Service presidential, not State Department. And the Foreign Service was to represent all departments of the U.S. government -- Agriculture, Treasury, and any other department with overseas functions. Treasury never accepted this division; it would not give up its personnel system and independence to a system that it didn't control, would be dominated by the State Department. Treasury never joined, and Agriculture quickly broke away. Agriculture had its Corn Belt constituency that felt that it really had to control their foreign agricultural service; they couldn't let the State Department run that. So the Treasury attaché in Paris was from another agency. By 1959, it was quite clear that the original concept of the Foreign Service Act of 1946 was forgotten. The White House would have had to give the concept full support. It never got it. So it became a reversion to the State Department, overall, providing the top political or economic people in the embassies, and other agencies putting in their own people for their functions.

McGrew was innovative and unusual. He was the deputy chief of the economic section. And the economic minister in Paris in those days was an important person. And indeed, Jack Tuthill, who's on the board of my Jean Monnet Council, was a close contact of Monnet himself.

Q: He's also the subject of an oral history interview we've done.

ELY: He left just before I arrived, and he saw a great deal of Jean Monnet and all the big actors of the post-war period, like Robert Marjolin.

Anyhow, I worked for McGrew, and he trained me. He had what he called McGrew University. Art Hartman was, I think, two people before me. Very intensive. You had to know French very well, both how to speak it and then all the technical language. Required a great deal of persistence. And you had so much contact work to do. You had to call on and get to know, officials and then do your work by phone, if possible. In those days in particular, the French didn't like telephones very much, and they wanted you to come around. And they insisted on doing everything in French, even if they were bilingual. A phony atmosphere in which to operate, but still exhilarating and interesting.

My work on former French Africa brought me into contact with whole sections of the government where we had never had contact before -- the Ministry of Cooperation, which was the French aid agency; the Ministry of Education, which ran the education system in that area and was paranoid about the English language replacing French, a paranoia that turned out to be misplaced.

Q: Once French gets in, it stays.

ELY: Seems to, doesn't it. Although it was partly mistaken; part of the French deep suspicion of Americans both replacing the French with our economic and financial power and making Africa part of the anti-Communist battlefield, reflecting the way that the United States tended to see the world: It's us and our allies versus the Soviet Union, so let's get in there before the Russians do. Well, it turned out this was heavy-handed but not inaccurate. The Russians were behaving worse than we did, and they quickly moved into Guinea; they moved into everywhere they could.

Q: They tried it in Congo and Brazzaville.

ELY: That's right, and they did get into Angola and other places. The Russians were quite ready to turn Africa into a Cold War battleground.

Q: You were dealing with French agencies that the normal American diplomat doesn't deal with very much. I know nothing about the French political spectrum, but did you find these agencies - - Coordination, Education, and all -- sort of dominated by what I would put sort of to the left of the spectrum? Maybe the Education more the intellectuals, and the Coordination more the technocrats? How did you find it?

ELY: Well, for one thing, France was and remains an intensely elitist society. And the peak of the elite you find in the government, and the peak of the governmental elite you find in the inspecteurs des finances. And I found myself running into these people everywhere I went. The inspecteur des finances is a supertechnocrat, protected, powerful, privileged, overworked, brilliant, and usually quite condescending. Learning to deal with these people was one of the most useful things I acquired.

Q: Let me ask a technical question. Here you were, you had not had much French, and although you had been through Princeton, we don't train people the same way they do in their school systems.

ELY: You mean the one-upmanship and put-downs?

Q: Yes, and all this. How did you deal with these people?

ELY: Well, it took me a while, and I was baffled at first. But, typically, you'd go down to the Direction des Relations Extérieur et Communiqués Extérieur, and there would be a 32-year-old inspecteur des finances, in his miserable back office lit by a single yellow light bulb, wearing an old blazer and a sweater, and smoking a Gauloise, and the ashes are going down the front of his shirt. You sit down and he looks at you and he asks you your business. And then he says, "Well, I'm glad you have that, because...", and he explains it to you, because obviously the Americans have an imperfect understanding. "It's one, two, three, four, and five. And this is the way these all go together."

And after a while, you say, "That's wonderful. I hadn't understood it that way. But don't you think it might be one, two, three, four, five, and six? It's even better that way."

Then he looks at you, and he says, "Aha, I have a worthy antagonist." And he starts dealing with you seriously.

Q: Everything fits into a form, doesn't it? As an enjoyer of French movies, I find that they see systems, where I don't think Americans see systems.

ELY: Yes. It was a revelation of sorts dealing with these people, because they were very good and really smart. They also have an institutional set that is totally different from anything that we do. And a relatively small number of people, working very, very hard, do the work of a much larger number of people in American administrations. We have a resolutely non-elitist view of government service, where we put in political appointees clear down to the assistant secretary level. The French wouldn't dream of that. They have their corps of loyal, protected, and powerful civil servants, who are put through a series of cream separators, weeded out, and then they start at the top and work up. A totally different system, that it makes the American system seem populist, bumbling and top-heavy in comparison.

Over the years, looking back, I find that the systems reflect the cultures. I don't think we could operate with the French system. I think they might do a little better if they had something a little closer to ours, but that's an observation that I can't prove.

Q: At the time, did Treasury sort of have a different view than "the embassy" did about where we were going? A different French policy?

ELY: Not at that time. This was a time when relations between State and Treasury were very close. John Leddy, who had been assistant secretary for European affairs, went over to be assistant secretary of the treasury. We exchanged people quite a bit, and my presence in the Treasury office in Paris was part of an agreement that had been made about ten years earlier. Although there had been very deep divisions between Treasury and State in the early post-war period, where Treasury argued that the Europeans should have gone into massive devaluations and massive trade liberalization (something they were never going to do), by the end of the '40s, this had been patched up and State and Treasury saw eye to eye on lots of things. By the '60s, this had broken down. Treasury views on the international payment system tended to be very conservative. State was becoming more innovative, and the two finally fell away. Now they have reverted warring kingdoms, and cooperate on the basis of mutual advantage, and are basically hostile to each other. They look to different constituencies and speak only when required. Relations between State and Treasury are bad, and I don't see any structural reason why this should improve. Personalities make things better or worse.

There is no overall control of U.S. foreign economic policy anymore. Indeed, there's no longer a willingness to admit that foreign economic policy is foreign policy. The Congress in particular wants to break trade policy away from other aspects of foreign policy. Most-favored-nation for China, the Uruguay round, the primacy of STR, the taking of the commercial function away from State to Commerce. The whole foreign economic policy process is now fragmented and pulls together only at the Cabinet level in the White House.

Q: I want to drag you back to the 1950s, early '60s. We had two ambassadors while you were there, Amory Houghton and James Gavin. I've heard, in other interviews I've done with people who were in the embassy during this time, that the embassy was sort of divided into Gaullists and almost anti-Gaullists. Did you find that there was an ambivalence within the various officers in how they looked at de Gaulle?

ELY: Yes. I wouldn't say there were pro-Gaullists and anti-Gaullists, but there were those that deplored de Gaulle, and those that said, "Look, this is very French, it's necessary, and you've got to take it into account. Don't think that this guy's going to go away, and don't think that by opposing him, you can overcome him. Gaullism speaks to French people in its own way, and we'd better take that into account."

De Gaulle was in the process of making himself very unpopular with Americans, and, indeed, the anti-French feeling began about the time that I got there, and was increasing by the time I left in '62. I guess it reached a peak in '64 when de Gaulle pulled out of NATO. Well, it started to crest then. The French were, of course, playing both sides of the street. They were playing their American cards, their European cards, and their election cards, all the East-West cards, and doing their customary tightrope act in the search for national prestige. This was and is much resented. Mitterrand does the same thing now, where he says he wants the United States in Europe, but the Americans are going to leave anyhow, so he wants to make a special deal with the Germans.

Q: Again, I speak as an outsider, but a retired Foreign Service officer. Looking at this, it all seems like the French are sitting around doing things more to annoy us or to be different. And I'm sure that's not an accurate thing, but is there something, do you think, within this that makes...

ELY: You have a couple of things. The French will maintain that they see things differently from us, that they have a long-term view of Communism, civilization, and all, which is opposed to our ahistorical populace's innocent, unconsciously nationalistic view. So they're wiser. And then, second, the French have a very deep-seated sense of frustration and inferiority, which (as inferiority feelings often do) takes the opposite form; that is, superiority and anxiety, resentment. This is dying off now as the French get their self-confidence back. Many people would argue that de Gaulle was a necessary phase in recovering that self-confidence. They didn't have it in the early '60s. This was one reason that being an American was sometimes an unpleasant business among the French. You have to remember, this was the time of Sartre, and Sartre was a Communist...

Q: He was a philosopher.

ELY: Yes, and a very influential person. The entire Sorbonne, all the universities, were full of Marxists, all of whom had a dislike and contempt for the United States and all it stood for. Even though they might have had some nice personal feelings on the side, institutionally they were anti-American. It was in 1964 that Michel Debré, then prime minister, managed to make a speech celebrating the 20th anniversary of the Normandy landing without mentioning the United States, which took quite a bit of acrobatics. Well, he was a firm Gaullist, and the Gaullist view was that the Free French had won the war; they had liberated Paris and the Americans had come in afterwards, which was total distortion. We got the liberation ready and politically stepped back to let him liberate the city for his own political reasons.

I was chargé d'affaires very briefly in 1984 at the 40th anniversary of D-Day. This was when Ronald Reagan came to the Normandy beaches, with Mrs. Reagan. And my wife, who is an interpreter, went out to Normandy to interpret. I was sitting alone in the DCM's office; our entire embassy was out at the beaches doing administrative support for the president and his party. A French historian was broadcasting over French television, showing scenes where the Allies had landed. He started saying what a bloody business it had been, both the landings and the subsequent fighting, and the very heavy casualties on both sides, and how the Americans had lost 1,000 here, and the British had lost 4,000 there, and the Germans had lost half a division here, and here's where they... the German tanks, and here's where the Germans holed up and 600 of them fought to the last man, and the ones who were about to be captured blew themselves apart. Finally, this was truth, this is what actually happened, told by a French historian to Frenchmen. And I came to the conclusion, that period of French history is over. The French no longer feel that they have to lie to justify themselves. And that now the whole [question of] who collaborated with whom during the occupation was finally coming out when they brought out the first film on that, Le Chagrin et la Pitié, back in the mid-'60s.

Q: The Sorrow and the...

ELY: The Sorrow and the Pity; it was about collaboration. The right wing and the left wing took turns bombing the movie theaters. They both disagreed.

Q: I realize that you were a junior officer there, but did you get any feeling about how the ambassadors, both Houghton and Gavin, were responding to this difficult period? Was there a difference?

ELY: Houghton was a patrician from a nice family, a lot of money, and he was very much of a gentleman. If there were some problem or tragedy in the embassy family, there would be tactful help from the ambassador, in the form of money and support: a very patrician and responsible approach. He had a slight lisp and he spoke French with an accent, and the French made continual fun of him, they denigrated him and ridiculed him, which was quite unfair; he was a prince. And as a result he had little impact on the French, and virtually none in Washington.

Gavin was quite different. Gavin had been a division commander during the Second World War, a very famous paratrooper, and he commanded the 82nd Airborne.

Q: Yes, and he jumped at Normandy.

ELY: He jumped at Normandy, and he jumped again at Arles. And he was decorated. Gavin had been an orphan, a complicated person, very intelligent, rather driven. He was supposed to speak French, but didn't speak it very well. He taught French at West Point. He knew the language, but he didn't speak it. Lots of Americans were that way in those days.

His primary policy preoccupation was whether or not, and if so, to what extent, the United States would cooperate with the French in their independent nuclear-weapon capability. Gavin felt strongly that, since this was going to happen, and since its impact in terms of American interests was ambiguous, that is, certain aspects would be good, and other aspects bad, we should cautiously cooperate with the French, and in particular provide them with computer capacity and either air refueling technology or maybe even the tankers, so they could fly their Mirages to and from the Soviet Union.

This caused a very deep policy division back in Washington, which was poisoned by the deep resentment people felt for Charles de Gaulle and the anti-American policies that he was orchestrating. The resentment went so far as to make, in my view, rational discussion of Gavin's opposition impossible. Eventually, Gavin was overruled and he quit. I think he probably ended up, as many ambassadors do, as a prisoner of his own concepts. He was prepared to go further in defending them than they merited. That independent nuclear strike force was supposed to be, and was, a threat to the Alliance by facilitating an independent French role.

The French eventually did exactly what they wanted, in the sense that they were able to claim the benefits of the Alliance without having to belong to it, and were able to play both sides of the street. And it was to our great credit that we kept the Alliance together, and it was not to their credit at all that Western Europe survived this damned period until the Soviet system finally collapsed.

Anyhow, I never had any culture shock in Kuala Lumpur, but I had plenty in Paris.

Q: One last thing about this French view. You were dealing with these French-speaking African countries, the liberation there. In the middle of this period, the Kennedy administration came in. This was where we were making at least very large gestures and all.

ELY: Was Soapy William our assistant secretary for African affairs?

Q: Oh, yes. Oh, yes.

ELY: And John Gunther Dean flew into independent Mali and established the first embassy there before the Russians could get there.

Q: How did this play, from your perspective, and also with the French? You'd already alluded to it, but let's talk a little more about it.

ELY: Well, we were trying to get both sides to avoid unintended confrontations. For example, we put an AID mission into Cameroon, and the first thing they did was set up an import program and brought in Caterpillar tractors, which they figured were needed, putting the local French Caterpillar tractor dealer out of business.

Q: Oh, God.

ELY: Now this was not very intelligent. Then we sent an educational mission. I grabbed those people and took them around to the Ministry of Education, where the director general of the ministry sat these people down and filleted them, although they didn't understand this at the time. I had to explain afterwards that they were being viewed with intense suspicion by the French Ministry of Education, and since the French Ministry of Education, at least for then, was very much in charge of things down there, they should be very careful in their relationships with them, and be very open, very cooperative, and understand that they were moving onto what these people thought was their turf.

Q: And very sensitive turf, at that.

ELY: Very sensitive.

Q: Anything -- language, culture.

ELY: All these things. La Mission Civilisatrice (the Civilizing Mission of France) was and remains at the heart of every French person. Since they tend to think that their civilization is better than anybody else's, it's extremely important to them.

So I did this sort of honest brokering, which was very cross-cultural; it really got me inside the mind of these French civil servants. They're brilliant, overworked, underpaid, paranoid, suspicious, and always thinking ahead in terms of the interests of France, as defined by them. I found it was fascinating.

Q: Again, this is nuts and boltsish, but I think this was a very interesting time. You had these American educators coming out who must have been up against real cultural shock. How did you prepare them, and how successful was this when they were going to come up against the cultural vehemence of the French?

ELY: I would give them briefings and would try to say, "Well, look, fellows, I'm not speaking for the French government. Because I give you their viewpoint doesn't mean that I believe this. I just want you to know what you're getting into." And then say, "They've been down there for X years. The French looked on Africa back in the '30s as their strategic reserve for the Second World War. They'd put investments in there to grow cotton, to kind of raise rubber, rice, become self-sufficient. This colonial mentality is still alive. They put a lot more into Africa than the British did, in terms of education and infrastructure and all. It hasn't paid very well. And now the area's becoming independent. And there's a lot of sensitivity about it. Be careful of the French; don't consider them your friends."

Well, the Fund back in those days had a much clearer mandate than it has now. We were still on something like fixed rates. This meant that countries were supposed to keep their parities essentially pegged, although nominally, to the gold relationship to the dollar. It was also a time where we were getting more deeply into Vietnam, and the dollar as a reserve currency was coming increasingly under question, where LBJ was trying to fight a war in Vietnam without raising taxes. Inflation was creeping up in the United States, and the collapse of 1970 was being prepared, slowly. And the American administration did not understand very well what was going on. The French were buying gold from us, which put us under pressure. There was a lot of anxiety about the functioning of the international system and the dollar as the centerpiece of it, but not much in the way of consensus on what to do about it.

The State Department E Bureau in those days was quite influential. It was a powerful bureau and had ideas about what might be done. State recognized that the international financial order was under pressure, and that this had profound foreign policy implications, and was looking for some sort of creative international method of getting at this problem. In the end, State was unsuccessful.

The problem was basically Treasury. Treasury should have been doing what State was trying to do, but Treasury was trying to maintain the status quo; that is, to patch up the existing system essentially by exhorting our allies not to rock the boat.

The French were being financially aggressive for essentially political reasons.

Q: What was their motivation, do you think?

ELY: Well, de Gaulle, by this time, was trying to bring down the Anglo-Saxons. He had gotten himself into a psychological, moral set by which he was locked in combat with us for...how should I say, not domination of Europe, that's too simple, to reduce American influence, but particularly to reduce American prominence in Europe. American presence was desirable only up to a certain point. Beyond that, it became inimical to French interests.

Q: Today is July 17, 1992, and this is a continuing interview with Michael E. C. Ely. Mike, on our last tape, we were talking about your time in Paris from '59 to '62 as the financial/economic officer. And there were two things that I found where the tape had jammed. So if you don't mind, we'll go over them again. One was, you mentioned an episode where you were briefing U.S. educators before they were going to French Africa. Could you tell me what transpired on this?

ELY: Yes, well, this was one of the first missions to Francophone Africa after independence in 1960. A group of AID educators was going off on a survey of the area to see what kind of education programs they wanted to put in. I told the Ministry of Cooperation about these people and asked if anybody had anything to say to them. I was referred to the director general of cultural programs in the Ministry of Cooperation, who turned out to be a very senior official from the Ministry of Education who spoke perfect English. And I took these bureaucrats over to see this fine, distinguished, highly educated and intelligent French civil servant, who proceeded to fillet them alive. And he did it so skillfully, they didn't even notice. It was almost a parody. He said, "Well, you know, we've been in this area for a long time, we've worked very hard, we've tried to give the people there a knowledge of French culture and language. This has been a long-term and difficult assignment. We're proud of the job that we've done. And I hope you'll keep this in mind, because really they don't need more languages, they need to learn one language. And the language they need to know is French. If you start competing programs, this is going to cause confusion, and it could cause friction and misunderstanding. So we hope and advise prudence and caution on your part."

So we walked out, and the people said, "Wasn't he nice!"

I said, "Well, he wasn't being nice. There was nothing nice at all about that. He was saying, 'Stay out. We don't want you.'"

He'd also said, "You know, this is Africa entering the Cold War. And we've noticed that where you go, the Russians go, and the other way around. And the last thing we need is to have this area turned into an area of rivalry. Soviet-American rivalry would cause all kinds of problems for them, for you, for us, for the Africans. So keep this in mind," which, in effect, meant, Would you kindly stay out.

Q: Looking at it from an American policy point of view, it sounds like the man was making two very valid points at that time, which was '59 to '62. One was that if the French were putting a big effort there, what was our business trying to move them to the English thing? And the other one was, I'm not sure but whether there wasn't some correctness in the idea that the Soviets and Americans sort of followed each other around like snarling cats or something, in different parts of Africa.

ELY: Well, yes. The French motivation was quite complex. We started off when John Gunther Dean parachuted into Bamako. He was the first person to open a mission there. He got there a couple of days after independence. This was very macho behavior on our part, and this was highly regarded. This was the Kennedy era, and this was considered a really aggressive, straight-forward, patriotic, American staking out of territory. And Mali, after Guinea, was the most leftist and militant of the former French colonies.

The French also were worried that our presence there would dilute their influence. They would say, quietly and aside, "Well, look, we have a lot of domestic political support for our programs in Africa now. It's selective. It's trading companies with some political parties and its ministries. If you guys muck around too much, you're going to undermine that support, and you're going to make it harder for us to keep a presence there, a presence that is favorable for Western interests in general, and yours in particular." This turned out to be a slightly disingenuous argument. French policy toward those areas was being run out of the Élysée Palace by de Gaulle and his people, and not by the flour millers in Bordeaux and the people that were selling surplus French butter and things of that nature to the Africans.

Also, the French had been practicing a kind of regional policy. They had a single currency for West Africa, for Equatorial Africa, and for Madagascar. This was linked to the French franc through a special account in the French treasury. And the operation of this mechanism prevented the kind of catastrophic inflation and overvaluation of currencies that you got in Ghana and in Nigeria, and kept the countries of Francophone Africa in some sort of a loose economic confederation -- they could always trade with each other, and it promoted economic stability and perhaps some political stability in the area as well.

The French were worried about this system, as well they should have, because if you looked at it very closely, you could make an argument that it tied the Africans very closely to France with a mechanism that virtually ensured that their currencies were overvalued. And when they had an overvalued currency, it made it very difficult for them to diversify their outside contacts.

But the judgement was made in Washington that the advantages outweighed the disadvantages. And I think this was correct. In point of fact, Africa's gone its own way, and neither the French nor us have been able to do a great deal affecting its destiny. The Africans are going to have to do that. They have understood that point now, and they're trying themselves to decide what they want to do. The continent is in very bad condition, partly bad luck, partly Africa.

Q: There was another account that you gave that we missed the last time because of a tape problem. Could you tell me your impression at this time of how you dealt with and the importance of the French intellectuals. One always hears of the French intellectuals, which in no other country seem to play a role. But there always seems to be this group that is pronouncing judgment, usually derogatory, on the United States. How did you work with and assess the importance of the French intellectual at that time?

ELY: Well, intellectuals in France have a much different role than they have in the United States, for a whole series of reasons. I once read an account of someone who overheard some disgruntled workers saying, "Let's go get Jean-Paul Sartre and organize a demonstration and march on city hall." The workers and the intellectuals tended to recognize each other. Intellectuals are admired in France. They tend to be literary people, skillful in language.

In those days, and even now in some respects, to a man, they're of the left. In recent years, for various reasons support for Marxism among the French left has diminished, but there's still a residual anti-American flavor that you can find very clearly in Le Monde Diplomatique. If you read that every month, you'll see there's not an article in there that is anything but critical and hostile to the United States. It is written by certified, old-fashioned intellectuals.

The intellectuals have two or three quarrels with the United States.

One is that it's the land of capitalism. First, you defeat fascism, as happened in the Second World War, then you go on and defeat capitalism, as embodied in the Great Satan United States, with its manipulated voting populations, its powerful corporations that dominate the political process, its manipulated media, its exploitative advertising, its crass, materialist values.

In addition to being a crassly materialist capitalist country, the United States is disorderly. It has no common culture. In fact, it has no culture at all.

It is excessively pluralistic, too rough and tumble, nobody is in charge. It's a government not of people or principles, but of laws, and the laws are a facade, and the hollow protections of the U.S. Constitution are a mockery. Basically, Americans lynch blacks, they have race prejudice, they have a repressive society, unfair and unjust.

This was, in the '60s, a virtually unanimous verdict of the French left and the intellectuals, shared, incidentally, by the far right. The far right also found American society populist, untidy, materialistic, dangerously and unpleasantly popular and democratic.

So the far left and the far right, really almost a hundred percent, felt that the United States was a very bad country, full of bad people, and a source of most of the world's ills. As an American, I found this very hard to swallow.

The left talked about exploitation, prejudice, and repression, and the right talked about worshipping the almighty dollar. And both liked to depict Americans as ignorant, materialistic, greedy, selfish, bombastic, obsessed with violence, and quite prepared to carry the Cold War to a pitch that would be dangerous for the entire world. In other words, the Americans would have blown us all up.

Q: How did they see the Soviets?

ELY: The French saw the Soviets as the people who had won the Second World War. We were late in, and we and the British had conspired to turn the force of Hitler's armies on the Russians. After the Russians had blooded the German war machine, the Americans landed late in the war and claimed the victory. The Communist left and the Gaullist left also said that it wasn't the Americans that liberated France, it was the Free French and the unions and the Communists. The Americans came along later while this was all happening and consolidated the victory. Michel Debré, in 1964, managed to make a speech celebrating the 20th anniversary of D-Day without mentioning the United States. Astounding!

Q: These people were important, weren't they, even in the Gaullist government, as always there? How did you, on your part, and others in the embassy deal with these people? Sounds like they were people who weren't going to be tamed by words or deeds or anything else.

ELY: It was difficult. The universities were a hundred percent Marxist in those days, and USIA had to deal with those folks. In the government ministries, by and large, the people that I dealt with were sympathetic; they were friendly enough. Some of them were quite nationalistic and didn't like the United States, but they always treated me reasonably well. There was some tendency to condescension, but that's because these people were inspecteurs des finances, the elite of the elite of the elite, powerful and protected. And here I was, a foreigner not speaking perfect French, trying to deal with them on subjects in which they were masters. So there was some tendency to condescend, but by and large, I was well treated.

De Gaulle did purge all American elements out of the Foreign Ministry. People who were known to be pro-American were either sent off to obscure consulates, summarily retired, or given undesirable assignments of some sort so they would retire, and only people of known nationalist or Gaullist persuasion could be advanced to high ranks. So the ambassador and senior people in the embassy were always dealing with unpleasant people. Couve de Murville, while not a civil servant, was a foreign minister. Couve was an extremely unpleasant man, cold, icy, formal and uncooperative. And his deputies and senior people tended to take their cue from him. So, at the highest level, you seldom got a friendly hearing.

On the other side, however, the French would frequently take you aside and say, "Look, you know, this is temporary. We're your friends. We understand. These things will pass. Our countries have so much in common. Never forget that, deep down, we are with you. When the time comes and we have to be counted, we'll be on your side."

And even de Gaulle would say that sometimes, too. I guess he was sincere, at least he was when he was rational. Toward the end, he became almost irrationally anti-American.

RICHARD B. FINN
Political Officer
Paris (1959-1963)

Richard B. Finn was born in Niagara Falls, New York in 1917. He joined the Foreign Service in 1945. His career included positions in Japan, France, and the Philippines. Mr. Finn was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1991.

Q: You left for a four-year assignment to Paris as a political officer where you served from 1959-63. What were you doing in Paris?

FINN: I had two jobs, two years each. The first one was as POLAD to USCINCEUR -- Political Advisor, United States European Command. General Norstad was SACEUR and CINCEUR, Supreme Allied Command Europe and Commander-in-Chief Europe for American Forces. His American role was carried out 90 percent by a 4-star Army General, in the case of my period there, Charles Palmer. He was a very nice man. The military were a fine group of people to work with. Very receptive of the POLAD idea.

Our main role, really, was military assistance. We didn't make policy -- where to store nuclear weapons and what kind of weapons, etc. But I traveled all around with the General as far to the East as Pakistan, the Khyber Pass, to Ethiopia and North Africa, and to Scandinavia. There weren't all that many problems, but, of course, the governments wanted all the weapons they could get for the best price they could get. They treated us nicely.

We did a lot of work on that kind of thing. I am not sure that my role was all that important, but we got all the State Department cables involving these areas and would show them to the General and his top staff. If they were trying to do something in Turkey, for example, we might tell them that it might not be a good idea to do something in a certain way or at a certain time because our people in the Embassy at Ankara felt the Turks would not react favorably to it.

That was the time too in 1959 when Khrushchev was invited to come to the United States by Eisenhower. I remember going to the General and asking if he had heard the news. Eisenhower had asked Khrushchev to come to the United States. The General said, "There it is, there is not going to be a war in my time in Europe."

Q: How did you view the "Soviet menace" at that time from your position within the NATO Command?

FINN: The Berlin Wall, as you know, went up in 1961. Like you I am a diplomatic creature of the Cold War. The Russian menace and danger was a given and all accepted it and believed it. There was a period of considerable tension, I think, when the Wall went up. But no one was fearful of imminent war, I think. I think the Gary Powers over-flight of the Soviet Union, the U2, came along then too.

Q: A running sore or something like that?

FINN: Yes, a little more than a running sore maybe, but a force that any moment could blow up. The Allied role was to be ready for anything and to keep the pressure on to try to prevent a blow-up without being inflammatory or provocative.

Q: You were there two years and then moved over to the Embassy. What were you doing there?

FINN: I was the Pol/Mil, political/military officer in the Embassy. Most of our embassies had, and probably still do (1992), the big ones anyway, a political/military officer. I had one officer with me. I was separate from the political section but very closely connected with them. My job was really to work with not only the MAAG -- we had a MAAG, the Military Assistance Advisory Group, we had the military attachés and, of course, we did have the huge American and Allied military command right in the suburbs of Paris. So there was a lot of military activity of one kind or another.

I suppose my main problem was dealing with the French on the one hand as a sovereign government and then dealing with the American military on the other hand when there were bilateral problems between them, American warship visits to France for example.

The major problem the French had in my period, both when I was in POLAD and when I was in the Embassy, was the North Africa problem, the independence movement in Algeria. There was a threatened insurrection there. One night when I was at POLAD, the four top generals in the insurrection in Algiers declared they were going to fly into Paris and try to rally the forces against General de Gaulle and throw out the de Gaulle government. That was a very exciting time, although I am not sure I realized it at the time.

Q: What were the American forces there going to do? Sort of sit back to one side? What was the feeling within the NATO Command during this particular period of instability within the French Government?

FINN: I don't think anybody on the official American side felt that General de Gaulle would give in. I don't think that many people felt that the rebellious generals, or the cause of Algeria Francaise were worthy of support or that the generals were going to succeed. But they were top officers, they were like the Chief of Staff of the various armed services. The crisis blew up in a hurry. That they were going to do this was announced in the afternoon and they were to come in that night.

I remember I was rather slow about the whole thing. John Bovey, who was the acting political counselor in the Embassy, called me up about 9:00 P.M. and said that I ought to get in there as we should all get together to see what was going to happen and decide what we should do about it. So we did.

I am trying to remember exactly what happened. I can't recall that the generals flew in.

Q: No, they didn't.

FINN: Whatever it was it blew over. The bulk of the army remained loyal to de Gaulle. So within a matter of hours, certainly within days, there was no great threat of this rebellion taking place. But it was a pretty exciting event.

I remember another time the Russians closed the road from the western zone to Berlin, claiming they had to repair the road. It wasn't a complete blockage. So we had the problem of what to do about it. The Russians after a while caved in and allowed traffic to resume, but they insisted upon examining all the contents of every truck that came in and out of Berlin. We didn't want them to do that. That sort of thing happened from time to time. It was much more a situation of petty harassment than a threat of war.

Q: How did you feel in dealing with the French military at this time? Did you feel that they were somewhat distant from the NATO forces?

FINN: No. A lot of that sensitivity, it seemed to me, was in the higher political echelon, General de Gaulle himself and, of course, the people who succeeded him. The French military, like a lot of military, were very nice people. Bright, pleasant. Military people -- as you probably know, certainly it was my experience as an FSO -- had their own sense of diplomacy and camaraderie. The American military in Japan or France often got along with the foreign military better than they got along with Washington. So I have to answer that I liked the French military. I found them a very pleasant group of people.

Q: The one big thing when you were there would be in October, 1962 during the Cuban Missile Crisis. How did that hit you at that time and what was the reaction in the areas you were dealing with?

FINN: What happened there, Dean Acheson was sent over by Kennedy to talk to de Gaulle. I don't think I knew that he had even come and gone. He flew in in a special plane. He and Bohlen, the Ambassador, went over to see de Gaulle immediately. De Gaulle was the soul of cooperation and understanding. Anything we wanted, any support we needed from him, he would give us. So it was total support.

Bohlen was a superb Ambassador in many ways. He was very bright, probably a genius at languages. He had marvelous French and his Russian was probably equally good. He had a great feel for the French. I think he had served there as a younger man. Perhaps he had studied Russian in France for a while. He and Couve de Murville, the Foreign Minister, were pals -- they played golf together. So, in that context, we in the Embassy did not feel the French prickliness and sensitivity as much as many of the American community did. I found with the Quai d'Orsay people, if you wanted something from them you worked for it. You had to keep pressing them to do it.

This was very different from dealing with the Japanese where the pressures and tension, and policy differences and logic were really very minor. The Japanese were very self-centered about anything they did -- what were they going to lose and what were they going to gain, and always in mind that they had to get along with the Americans.

But you earned your salt if you got deals out of a French diplomat. But the overall atmosphere was always quite good.

ROBERT J. RYAN, SR.
Counselor for Administration
Paris (1959-1964)

Ambassador Robert J. Ryan, Sr. was born in Hatfield, Massachusetts in 1914. He joined the Foreign Service in 1937. His career included positions in Washington, DC and Paris, and an ambassadorship to Niger. Ambassador Ryan was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1991.

Q: Can we move then to Paris?

RYAN: Sure.

Q: You went to the War College from 1958-59. Then you went to Paris where you served from 1959-64 as Counselor for Administration. How did you get this job?

RYAN: It went through the personnel process. Glen Wolfe [ph] was then Counselor for Administration and was being moved. In the personnel process my name was one that was discussed. One day I got a call from the Personnel Office, when I was down at the War College, saying that Ambassador Houghton was in town and they would like to have me talk to him because I was one of the people being considered for the Counselor for Administration job in Paris. So I met with Ambassador Houghton and a few days later I got the word that I was to go to Paris as Counselor for Administration. And not only Counselor for Administration, but as Executive Officer of the US Mission to NATO and the US Mission to the OECD and UNESCO. That was designed to give some focal point in Paris for administrative activities. Each of those other organizations had an administrator officer who worked with and under me. As Executive Officer I was able to sit in on all their staff meetings. I was learning things in those staff meetings and passing them information on what was going on in the Ambassador's staff meetings. This helped to bring about a better integrated American community in Paris.

Q: I am sure because these separate missions were separate.

RYAN: Yes, and the American Ambassador didn't want to trample on them and didn't want to be involved with them at all. But nevertheless there were common problems and they were mostly in the management and administrative field, so it was logical to have one guy in the person of the Counselor for Administration and Executive Officer to do these functions. When I went to Paris it was the largest embassy in the world...there was the great buildup that occurred after the war. One of the things that I knew I was going to get involved in was the cutting back of the size of the Embassy in terms of (a) personnel, (b) such things as automobiles, buildings, etc.

We had some success in doing that. I remember when I got to Paris you had three other chiefs of mission and they had deputy chiefs of missions -- I think there was something like 14 or 15 people with private cars and chauffeurs. That wasn't at all necessary, so we set about, with the help of the inspectors, deciding that only the ambassadors and the deputy chiefs of mission needed individual cars with chauffeurs and that the other officers would be serviced by a pool. We set it up and it worked out fine. It had been a great waste of money because we found for the most part, these officers were just using these cars to go to social events and in a couple of instances the wives were using them for shopping, etc.

We were also able to cut down a couple of buildings. We were able to reconstruct 4 Ave Gabriel in such a way that we actually joined it to 2 Ave Gabriel, the main Embassy building.

This was the time we were moving into the computer age and we had been selected to be the regional finance center for Europe so we were involved in setting up a computer center in Paris that could become the regional finance center for Europe and also Africa. At the same time the Department was dealing in antiquated communication procedures and it was decided that in Paris we would go into a computerized operation so we went about the development of the necessary plans that involved putting the new computer operation in a different section of the Embassy because we had to keep communications going while the new thing was being constructed.

Ultimately the new computerized communications center was inaugurated during the period of Ambassador Jim Gavin. It was the state of the art operation at that particular time.

We also were involved with the Ambassador's Residence. There was a building at 41 Faubourg St. Honore [ph] which is between the home of the President of France and the British Embassy. It had been used by the Germans during the war as a club. We took it over for offices and was used by USIA and a few of the regional functions in Paris when I first got there. But we were developing plans to use that structure as the Residence of the US Ambassador and to do that we had to work closely with John Rooney, who was Chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the State Department, and with Congressman Wayne Hayes, who was Chairman of the European segment of the Foreign Affairs Committee.

That whole operation took a period of two or three years to develop. It involved working on arrangements to sell the existing Residence of the Ambassador on Ave Gabriel, and developing plans for remodeling 41 Faubourg St Honore. With the proceeds from the sale of the original Ambassador's Residence, we were able to get a good portion of the money that was going to be needed to remodel 41 Faubourg St Honore. Then there were some additional contributions made and some other financial arrangements worked out so that ultimately 41 Faubourg St Honore was remodeled and is now the Ambassador's Residence.

But it did not, at the time, require any separately appropriated funds. At one point Rooney was against it. Ambassador Houghton and I talked to him when he came to Paris and finally got him to go along with it so long as we did not have to go before his committee and ask for additional money. We were prepared to do that because Ambassador Houghton had worked out through a couple of sources ways of getting some additional funds that could be transferred from one pot to the other to do this, and then through some public subscription they got money with which to buy the furniture for 41 Faubourg St Honore.

During the time I was in Paris, these various activities took place reflecting the changing scene in Paris as it relates to the American presence there and the work of the American Embassy.

Q: From your point of view in dealing with them, could you compare/contrast the three Ambassadors in Paris during your tour? There was Amory Houghton (1957-61); James Gavin (1961-62); and Charles Bohlen (1962-68).

RYAN: Each Ambassador is different. Ambassador Houghton had been President of Corning Glass and had a very long affiliation with the Republican Party. He was a heavy contributor. He was a very able man; an easy man to work with. He had some handicaps: (1) He had a throat problem causing him to speak with difficulty; (2) He was not able to speak very much in French so that anything that he did with the French had to be done through an interpreter. He delegated a lot of his substantive work to his Deputy Chief of Mission.

I think it reflects the wise policy of the Department of giving a very able career guy to a political appointee as the deputy. If the political guy uses good judgment he will let that career man run the embassy and deal with a lot of the substantive issues. Cecil Lyon was the Deputy Chief of Mission and a very able man -- fluent in French. So Ambassador Houghton and he had a very close working relationship.

Ambassador Houghton also worked on the principal of delegation of authority. He let the various ministers and counselors run their shops. We reported to him and had to give him written reports from time to time and had regular staff meetings. But he pretty much let us run our show. If we needed him we went to him and he would willingly help us. But he and Mrs. Houghton were a joy to work with. In fact, I still maintain contact with Mrs. Houghton.

He, Ambassador Houghton, had the advantage of the political party affiliation with, not only the President, but with others, so that from the standpoint of the Paris Embassy he was one of those people who, if he wanted to, could not only call the Secretary of State, with whom he was on excellent terms, but he could call the President -- and everybody knew that.

Then General Gavin came. He had been a hero in Paris because he had headed up one of the airborne divisions that flew into France on D-Day. He was received in Paris as a hero. I remember Cecil Lyon and I went to Le Havre to meet him. He and his wife and children came over on, I guess the SS United States at that time, and we went up to Le Havre to meet him. He was mobbed at the docks by the media. Then we came down to Paris on the train and when we got into the station in Paris there was a mob again with television and radio. He had to give an interview. He had been taking French lessons and was quite sensitive that his French was not very good, but he had a speech which he gave in French and then he responded to questions.

General Gavin brought a bit of a military gaullist bearing to the Embassy and a military type of organization and operation. But quite frankly, I didn't find him that much different to deal with in my work than I did Ambassador Houghton. I would say about Ambassador Gavin that he was a visionary. He was a man of the future. You could understand how he headed the Arthur D. Little Company because he had that sort of a mind. But I can remember talking with him about things...looking into space, computers, etc....and his whole demeanor would almost take on a different atmosphere as he started to think. You could see his mind jumping ahead. He really was a man of the future and was a joy to deal with.

He, too, recognized his strengths and weaknesses and used the staff. Cecil had a good relationship with him as did the rest of us. We had no problems. There was no backbiting either under Houghton or Gavin. We all worked together as a team.

As a military hero he was well regarded by the French. As a strong supporter of President Kennedy, he had an in at the White House. So, here again, you had an Ambassador who had the ear of the White House and to the extent that we needed things in Washington, if we got the Ambassador involved in them, we generally could get it.

From a money standpoint that was a period when we didn't have all that much trouble getting the appropriations out of the Congress. Sure they might cut us a few $100,000 here and a few $100,000 there, but we had already built that into the budget so we didn't hurt at all. We ran into the problem, and I guess they still do today, that you would come to the end of the fiscal year and scurry to find a way to spend the money.

Ambassador Bohlen was a career diplomat. A real, knowledgeable, savvy guy, who was recognized by the French; who had earlier served in the Embassy in Paris; whose French was flawless; who had served in Moscow (had been one of the original Russian hands in the Department) and knew about communism. He brought, again, very special characteristics to the post of US Ambassador which were: (a) very well received by the French and (b) he knew how to run the Embassy.

I think the principal problem of having an Ambassador like Bohlen is in the political and economic sections because the DCM and the Ambassador were so strong in those fields and tended to take away some of the functions of the Minister for Political Affairs and the Minister for Economic Affairs. But, aside from that, you were dealing with first rate professionals and when you went in with problems you got decisions made and you went on with your business. It worked out very, very well.

For me, it was a pleasure to work under each of the Ambassadors. I think each in his way accomplished an important mission in terms of US-French relations.

Q: You were there during a very photogenic period when President Kennedy and his wife Jacqueline came. There is the story that the President said, "I was the person who escorted Jacqueline to..."

RYAN: Yes, I was there when he said that.

Q: How did that trip go?

RYAN: Again, as the Counselor for Administration and with the conference section, which is under me, we had an important role to plan in planning the visit. We were in on it from the first word with the White House and the State Department with advance people coming over to set up security arrangements, communication arrangements, and to deal with the French on the total program.

When President and Mrs. Kennedy came...the visit was an important one, of course, and was viewed by the French in that way. Mrs. Kennedy, because she spoke French flawlessly, I guess, and because on State occasions it is the wife who sits on the right hand of the Chief of State, she was a big hit with de Gaulle. The President, and I think rightly, played on that and let it run its course.

That visit went off very smoothly. There were a lot of details involved in planning and executing the visit. One little humorous story that I tell...Tish Baldrige was the secretary to Mrs. Kennedy. Tish had earlier been the social secretary to Ambassador Luce in Rome and is now one of the country's foremost experts on etiquette. Well, the Kennedys had a valet and a maid for Mrs. Kennedy. We had made arrangements that the last group coming out of the place where they were staying, the guest house, would be the maid and the valet. We had made arrangements to get them to the airport by a separate route so that they would be there when the Kennedys arrived. Well, unbeknownst to me, Tish Baldrige decided that they should be part of the entourage that was going out to the airport. In doing that, because no one had planned on that, they got separated.

Fortunately we had enough sense to put one of our French speaking employees from the conference section in the car with them. He was able to steer the driver along the route that we had arranged, but they got to the airport after the departure ceremony and after the Kennedys had gotten into the plane, doors had been closed and they were preparing to leave. Out of the corner of my eye I saw a car come up and try to get through the security. Fortunately the French speaking employee with them was able to talk to the people and get them to agree to at least let them get through the barrier to the next one.

Seeing this, through the Secret Service walkie-talkies we passed word to the plane and to the French that this was part of the Presidential entourage. Here you had this car with two Negroes in it with the Kennedys' effects, etc. and the security police were not about to let these people through to get on the Kennedy plane. Anyway we got them through. The door to the plane was opened and up the steps went the maid, valet and baggage. They were going on to Vienna and if they hadn't had the baggage they would have been in trouble. We would have had to arrange to ship that over in another way. Well, that was one of the little stories that developed.

Another one that comes to mind involves President Eisenhower. We had worked with the French for one of his visits. One of the first things that came up was that the White House wanted to bring the bubbletop (car with a plastic top so he could stand up and be seen but still be protected) to use for the President. We discussed it with the Chief of Protocol and the other people on the French side and they all agreed. So over comes the bubbletop. We are at the airport and waiting for President Eisenhower's plane to arrive and get word that it is in the vicinity.

The Chief of Protocol comes to me ashen and says, "Bob, the President just told me that President Eisenhower and he have to ride in his car." I said, "But we have been through this and you people agreed." He said, "Well, the President tells me and we just have to do it." I said, "Well, I can't make that decision." So I went and talked to Jerry Bean [ph] who was then the top Secret Service man. He said, "Hell, no. We haven't had any chance to check that car out or know what is in it. No way." I said, "Jerry, it is the President of France's car and I don't think they have any bombs in it."

I talked to the Secretary of State who was there and to the Ambassador and they felt they couldn't over rule the Secret Service. Finally, the Secretary of State said, "Go talk to Jim Haggerty, who was the President's press secretary." And here the plane is about to land.

I explained it to him and he said, "Well, you have a problem haven't you Bob?" I said, "Yeah." He said, "Let's go talk to Jerry." He said, "Jerry, Bob has just told me about this problem that we got with the French. I have to tell you honestly if it were put to the boss he would say we will use President de Gaulle's car." With that Jerry let out a couple of profanities and said, "But, if we get into any trouble, you guys and the Ambassador and the Secretary of State are all in this with me. If anything happens I am not going to take this rap alone."

So, here is the Chief of Protocol biting his nails. Finally I went over to him...this whole thing probably didn't take longer than five minutes, but it seemed like an eternity...and I said that it was okay to use the President's car. So then we had to get someone to remove the bubbletop from the lead situation and get it away from everything.

So the two Presidents get in de Gaulle's car and de Gaulle had a handle that they could use and President Eisenhower got a tremendous reception in Paris.

That was the time that Khrushchev came to Paris and you had the Gary Powers U-2 incident. But back to the car business...President Eisenhower was going some place in Paris and the Ambassador called me with a chuckle and said, "Bob, you are going to be interested to hear this. The President is wondering if you could make arrangements with the French to let him borrow de Gaulle's car for a couple of hours this afternoon while he goes on this particular visit." I said, "Well, I think that can be arranged, but give me ten minutes." So I call the Chief of Protocol and tell him what is wanted and he thought it would be all right but he would have to talk to the President. About five minutes later he calls me back and says that it is okay.

By the time I got on to the phone to the Ambassador to tell him that it was okay he said, "I know it. The car is out front."

An illustration of some of the little things that can happen at the spur of the moment that one just has to handle. Fortunately in both of these instances it worked out correctly. Had it not, somebody's head might have fallen.

RALPH S. SMITH
Branch Public Affairs Officer, USIS
Lyon (1959)

Assistant Press Attaché/Special Assistant to Ambassador for Public Affairs, USIS
Paris (1960-1964)

Ralph S. Smith was born in Yonkers, New York in 1921. He joined the Foreign Service in 1948, retired in 1953 to pursue a career in journalism, and then joined USIA in 1959. His career included positions in Greece, Belgium, France, and Washington, DC. Mr. Smith was interviewed by G. Lewis Schmidt in 1992.

SMITH: After my wife and I had lived in France for nearly six years, however -- from 1953 to 1958 -- we felt an increasing nostalgia for the U.S. and for the Foreign Service; and while remaining on the best of terms with my father-in-law, we decided we should try to re-join the Foreign Service while we were still young enough to do so.

Q: You were in France at a very interesting time. It included the high point of the Marshall Plan and also the establishment of the NATO operation. So you were there in the early days of both of these programs. In any case, your Paris experience must have pretty much stamped you with a journalist background when you came back into the Service.

SMITH: Yes. In those days it was not possible to re-join the State Department laterally from the outside, in any case, but I was able to join USIA; and that is how I came to do so.

Q: What was your first assignment with USIA? And what year was that?

SMITH: That was in 1959, as Branch Public Affairs Officer (BPAO) in Lyon. I was there for about a year before being transferred to Paris.

Q: What were your accomplishments as BPAO in Lyon?

SMITH: Well, we had an across-the-board sort of program: a press operation, films program, library, visiting American performers, cultural exchanges, and so on. And once a year we put on a really big show at Vichy -- the foremost watering place, where French people went to relax while taking the waters for real or imagined liver conditions. During the Franco-American Journée we put on while I was there we had a lecture on Franco- American relations by André Maurois -- no mean achievement, since he was really the pre-eminent French man-of-letters! We also had the U.S. Seventh Army Symphony Orchestra, over from Germany -- at that time, better than any French orchestra outside of Paris!

Q: I would like to ask you a couple of questions in that connection. The period when you were serving in the private sector and also still in the period when you went back to the government with USIA, was a period when the communist influence in French was really at its peak. The French always, of course, have been very concerned about the intrusion of American cultural techniques and philosophy and therefore the denigration, in their estimation, of French culture. How much of that kind of French snobbery or critical attitude did you run into in the course of your informational efforts?

SMITH: It was there all the time, a constant concern. I remember trying to meet this problem head-on with a book exhibit we put together for Vichy, and which was later shown elsewhere in France. At that time many French people considered there had been a veritable invasion of France by American books -- which were marked "Traduit de l'américain" ("Translated from the American"). So we put together an exhibit we called "Traduit du français" -- a display of paperback books published in the U.S. which had originally been translated from French. I must say we did not have to wait long for an impact. At the inauguration of Traduit du français I overheard the Mayor of Vichy, a man who was friendly to us, saying to another high official who was not so friendly, "Look, here's proof that the Americans aren't barbarians!"

When it was possible to appeal to the French in a cultural vein, we found it was definitely worth the effort. Another example, this time in Lyon: For some reason, Lyon was the capital of French humorists -- including even some who did cartoons for Paris papers. There was a humorists' organization there which I got to be acquainted with because they wanted to hear some American jokes on their radio program. Fortunately, my wife Lilian and I were able to assemble quite a number of translatable items from contemporary jokes which had been provided, on an urgent basis, by our nieces and nephews in the U.S. I recall that shaggy-dogs and ghahtlies were big at that time. Anyway, when I delivered them over the airwaves they were well received by the Lyonnais radio audience -- to the point where we felt encouraged to take a next step and go graphic: Together with our local sponsors, we put on a big exhibit of photo-enlarged cartoons -- half from The New Yorker and half by Lyonnais artists. Naturally, we called it L'HUMOUR DE NEW YORK A LYON. It enjoyed considerable local acclaim, and later we felt doubly rewarded when my colleague Jack Stewart, PAO in nearby Geneva, came by with a van and carted off L'HUMOUR to be shown over there.

Q: How long were you in Lyon?

SMITH: For a year.

Q: Where did you go from there?

SMITH: To Paris.

Q: This was what year now?

SMITH: 1960. I stayed in Paris from 1960 to 1964. First I was assistant press attaché, handling mostly economic matters. Later I was special assistant to the Ambassador for public affairs.

Q: Who was the Ambassador at that time?

SMITH: James Gavin, an Army general who had played a prominent role in the Normandy landings. He started his career as American Ambassador to France with that great advantage. However, he didn't speak much French; his hearing was slightly impaired, which made it difficult for him to learn French. So for that reason and various others, I was assigned to him full-time as a public affairs special assistant. We traveled around France a good deal. We made many trips to different parts of the country. I would write short speeches for him to read, and help out generally with relations.

Q: Did he try to read them in French?

SMITH: Yes, and he succeeded in doing that. Also, he had a very attractive wife, Jean Gavin. I would say that he was very successful as a well-liked public figure in France. In fact we had such a degree of PR success that it sometimes made people smile. I remember one occasion when we went to visit an orphanage. Gavin was photographed holding a baby, and it appeared next day -- a very large photo -- on the front page of France-Soir, which was the largest-circulation paper in the country.

Gavin also was on friendly terms with de Gaulle. His attitude toward de Gaulle was different, I would say, from that of the average American official at the time.

Q: He was more at ease with him?

SMITH: He was more at ease with him; I think he understood de Gaulle a little bit better in view of his own military background. He made it a very deliberate policy to try to get on with him. And I would say he was fairly successful, to the extent that anybody could be.

Q: That in itself is a public relations plus. So you stayed there through to '64. What was your position in Paris in early 1963?

SMITH: I'm not certain of the dates, but after Gavin left there really was no need for the special assistant position, which had been set up to take care of his particular needs. When he left he was replaced by Chip Bohlen. Of course, Bohlen was the consummate skilled, experienced diplomat, fluent in French, and didn't need a special assistant to help him out with public relations. So I was given a different assignment: I became Dick Monsen's deputy, on the Information side, in USIS. [Years later, in the 1970's, I served with Dick again on the editorial board of the Foreign Service Journal.] This was very enjoyable; what I did was to maintain constant liaison with the other sections of the Embassy -- Political, Economic, and Political/Military -- so as to produce a stream of short written and verbal bits of policy guidance. The idea was that each member of USIS would then be able to discuss, supposedly in a knowledgeable way, the main issues between the United States and France.

Q: You indicated earlier that you were rather disturbed about the separation of USIA from the State Department; so why don't you go ahead and say more about that right now?

SMITH: I think the USIS staff had at least as much talent as any other section of the Embassy -- maybe more. They certainly knew better French than most people in the Embassy. And yet, I would say that by belonging to a different organization they remained a breed apart -- almost but not quite the equals of the line officers, and with not quite the same degree of entree. I remember, in this connection, when our colleague the British press attaché was transferred away from Paris. His next assignment was as head of the political section in Moscow -- and I know that at least some of us in USIS thought, "Wow! I wish we could do that."

All the same, we had a really interesting time in Paris, and I don't mean to detract from that in the slightest. One particularly interesting experience for me, I remember -- though sadly, it was in the aftermath of President Kennedy's assassination. Arthur Schlesinger was writing a book about the Kennedy Administration. He came to Paris in this connection, and I was assigned to him as interpreter when he interviewed André Malraux. Malraux was certainly the most prestigious intellectual figure in Gaullist France, and naturally I hung on every word he said -- mostly personal recollections about Kennedy and Jacqueline Kennedy. But I confess that what I particularly remembered afterward was his mannerisms. Malraux moved about compulsively as he spoke, and it seemed to me there were moments, as he sat on the couch, when his feet were actually at a higher level than his head.

WOODWARD ROMINE
Political Officer/Ambassador's Aide
Paris (1959-1965)

Woodward Romine was born and raised in Indiana. He graduated from Wabash College and later pursued studies at the University of Geneva, Switzerland. His primary assignments in the State Department were as Political Officer in Washington and abroad. His foreign assignments, all European, include Warsaw, Paris, Strasbourg, Vienna and four posts in Germany. In Washington, Mr. Romine dealt with French relations as well as Refugee and Management matters. He is a graduate of The Industrial College of the Armed Forces. Mr. Romine was interviewed by Peter Moffat in 1998.

Q: Following Poland you were assigned to Paris. Is that correct?

ROMINE: Right, as a Political Officer.

Q: And that was a fairly large section, so you obviously had an area of specialization within the Political Section.

ROMINE: I came to follow the development of the European Communities from the political side. This had been very much in the domain of the Economic Section up to that particular point.

Q: We should specify 1959.

ROMINE: Yes, right, in 1959. They had just completed the Rome agreements where they had really written the charter of the thing, and the Political Counselor at that time was anxious to have someone in the Political Section who would follow it from that point of view complementary to the real economic things, and I was assigned to do that. It was a fascinating time.

Q: At that time in Paris you had three embassies, major embassies, the bilateral one and the NATO one, but you also had the mission to the European Communities.

ROMINE: That was just beginning. At the time I arrived, as I recall, it was still in the embassy where Jack Tuthill was the Counselor for Economic Affairs; he was the Economic Minister at that time, but he left shortly thereafter and was replaced by Jack Reinstein and then returned to set up the sort of OECD operation, which he did for a year or so. We had a number of these things, but we were interested, of course, in how the French looked at this thing, and the French didn't always look at it the way we thought they ought to look at it.

Q: How did you go about covering the political aspects?

ROMINE: Well, I learned, of course, who was in charge of these things, and he was a fascinating man. His name was Jean Francois Pensé, and he was a young man, and he had worked on the combining of the two communities, the coal and steel and -- what's the other one? He was up in the Western European section of the Foreign Ministry, and it was with him that I made my first contacts and watched the growth of this thing. There was a feeling at that time in the Foreign Ministry--but I think it changed--that the President of France, M. de Gaulle, didn't look on this European Union movement all too favorably. As a matter of fact, he did, and he encouraged the French to do things that many other people.... One of the things that occurred after I arrived: de Gaulle came out and proposed that, in addition to discussing economic developments, the Communities establish what he called a small secretariat which would be based in Paris in which they would discuss not only economic developments but political matters. Well, people were horrified at this. At least, people said they were. Here was a thing that they were trying to promote, a good, growing economic union, and here was someone who was French trying to get in there and influence the thing politically and get these countries to do things in the political field -- it was never really quite defined what it was going to be -- that they weren't supposed to do, because they were to talk only about economic matters. The matter was sort of quietly shelved, but what was interesting about it was that the French were right about this, that they were going to have this union and knew that at sometime they were going to have to have political discussions about it, and they never gave up on this, and this did cause a certain amount of friction, I think particularly with certain parts of the Department at that time which felt themselves very much out of the European Communities but who wanted very much to push it in the direction they wanted it to go. The French understood this, and we had always friendly but animated discussions about that, but they always assured us that this was going to happen. I think they were always very right.

Q: How did this fit in with de Gaulle's famous directorate proposing . . . for the three?

ROMINE: That proposal came somewhat later and, of course, it didn't fit in well with what the smaller members of the Communities saw or the members of NATO. He was going to have the three big NATO members, excluding the Germans, of course, make these decisions about what you were going to do not only just in Europe but, I think, all over the world. Well, the smaller people didn't go for this, and I think they also felt that probably nothing would come of it.

Q: At the time, of course, there were purportedly strong views within Quai d'Orsay and elsewhere in the French government with pro-Gaullist and anti-Gaullist factions and so on and so forth. How did this impact upon your services?

ROMINE: Well, most people were cautious in expressing any views about the President that would be too strongly opposed. A number of my colleagues at that time had different relations and talked to a number of people in the Ministry who were very, very much opposed to the General, particularly in matters of atomic weapons, on the direction that the French government was expected to take, which was nearly always characterized--when I say the French government, I mean the President--as anti-American and anti-British to a certain extent. There were also certain reservations about the efforts made by de Gaulle to create a better relationship with the Federal Republic, that is to say, a bilateral relationship, a Franco-German relationship somewhat outside of the NATO context. The French did a lot of this, and this did cause a certain amount of concern, but at the same time it was also recognized that these were astonishing steps being taken really to reconcile the French with the Germans. So that came into a great deal of our work. Among other things that I followed at that time, I followed a great deal the development of French nuclear power, followed the debates in the National Assembly which was led by Michelle Debray, an extraordinary man, very tough and always knowing exactly what he wanted to do and what he wanted to say. I went to one of the debates where he got up and defended the whole idea of the French building their own nuclear establishment. This came well before they had decided to nuclearize electrical power and that sort of thing in France, and he laid it out very well indeed. First of all, if France is going to be a great power in this world, it's going to have this nuclear capacity. And then he went at great length into the economics. This was the thing where we had criticized them very harshly and, I think, unwisely in many places. We claimed that this was going to bankrupt the French, and we couldn't have done a better thing to urge them on the way more. He, in this whole debate, laid it out very well, why this wasn't going to bankrupt them. It was going to create a whole new industry, it was going to create jobs; and he really carried the whole assembly with him that day except for the Communists. It was an extraordinary performance, and they had laid the groundwork. They had gone all over France to small industries and that sort of thing saying, "You're going to be a subcontractor here for this kind of thing, and look at the jobs this is going to create," and it was an excellent preparation for the decision which, I think, most people wanted anyway to be accepted.

Q: Meanwhile as a background obligato, the events in Algeria were taking place. Did that impinge at all?

ROMINE: Well, this was just a terrible and tragic thing from all points of view. Yes, they did impinge on it, because we saw this growing. I had known a number of officers who had served in the French army and were career people and who, when it became clear what was going to happen in Algeria, finally had to resign. But I always felt that there was no great overwhelming support for staying in Algeria as long as they had to fight that war in France. It seemed to me that de Gaulle recognized this early on, even when he made his famous tour of the officers' clubs in Algeria, but of course there came the moment when the generals in Algeria came into open revolt, and that was a very dramatic moment. They marched the people down to the Ministry of the Interior not far from the Embassy there, and I remember them walking up the street there, and we were sort of hanging out of the windows and they would wave to us. I don't recall whether they were distributing arms to them -- I don't believe so. I remember frantic appeals to them to go out and tell the troops if they came to put down their arms and not to do this, but they never came. It was a sad time that divided a lot of people.

Q: So you continued dealing with Francois Pensé as your main interlocutor?

ROMINE: Yes, until he left and went off to Morocco to take over the French aid program there, and then he was replaced by a man called Sannajay, who was an excellent officer. I think later on he went on as the Ambassador to Chile, but in the meantime he stayed in the Foreign Ministry and then was shifted to de Gaulle's staff where he was sort of his Chef du Cabinet--how do you say that?

Q: Chief of staff?

ROMINE: Well, he was kind of his special assistant for European political developments, a man that you could always talk very frankly with, and he was willing to reply frankly. That was the thing I liked about the French. Don't go to the Foreign Ministry or go to a French official without knowing exactly what you're going to do and what you're going to say, because otherwise they would have you. He drafted at one time a long French paper on how the European Communities should develop and, among other things, once again saying that there must be a political element in this, and you can't just have a union like this. He was very kind and gave us this paper right away, long before it came out. Later when we were talking, he said that the French always appreciated discussions with the Americans because with us they always knew where they stood and that sometimes it was very unpleasant but they never felt that they couldn't be as equally frank and candid. For them this was a valuable thing, because they always felt that they knew where they were and where we stood on these matters. We compared this to certain other of their allies -- and I won't say who.

Q: During much of this time soon after you arrived, it was Ambassador Gavin who came. How would you characterize his service in France? It was preceded by considerable media attention because of the new Kennedy administration and the General's laudable military service.

ROMINE: I would say that he had a pretty good grasp of what the French were going to do, particularly from the point of view of nuclear development. I admired him for that, and he pushed this, and he felt that the United States should be helpful to the French this way rather than being unhelpful, because his view was that they were going to do this. So I think from that point of view, he did well, and I don't think that what he wanted to do was well seen in Washington. That's my recollection of it. I think finally he was ready to depart. He didn't feel that he was getting anywhere on this particular thing. It seemed to me that that preoccupied him as much as anything, what was going on then with Franco-American relations, that we were facing something that they were going to do and that we should be helpful to them, that this would ease things for us. I think he had a hard time. A great deal was expected of him. He was expected to speak French fluently and that sort of thing, and I believe that it always bothered him, that he didn't do this as well as he would have wished.

Q: Then Ambassador Bohlen arrived, and he characterizes in his book, if I recall correctly, that it was the best embassy he had ever served in, that the machinery ticked over very well, and clearly you were a major part of this.

ROMINE: That was a nice remark in his book. I think everyone who served there and who read the book felt pleased about it. But, of course, he gave excellent leadership to the Embassy. He always would let you know where he was going, what he wanted to do, but he was willing to leave the responsibility to his various section heads. I always liked that. Working closely there in his office, you could see this, and he listened to what his officers had to say.

Q: We should point out at this point that he selected you to be his aide, his personal assistant.

ROMINE: Yes, he did.

Q: So you were peculiarly well qualified to see how he operated.

ROMINE: He had, I felt, a great feeling of what he as an ambassador should be doing and, of course, to convey what the United States felt and picked up from the French what they felt. But he had certain very good relationships with people right up at the top, including the President of the Republic and the Foreign Minister, Maurice Couve de Murville. He would then allow his other officers to pursue their work and do the things that they were doing and would review this with care and make comments on it; but they always felt that they had free rein with him to do the things as they saw. I always liked that about him.

Q: During your final three years in Paris where you had a bird's-eye view of what was going on as Assistant to the Ambassador, what wisdom did you derive from all this?

ROMINE: The Ambassador himself was a man who really was at home in the field of foreign affairs. Someone might laugh at this, but he was a man at great ease, and one of the things that impressed me the most about him was that he had for years always been in contact with the leadership of the country, starting way back with Franklin Roosevelt, when he acted as his interpreter. I always felt this gave him a great confidence in himself and put him at ease with nearly anyone that he would meet, and that, of course, helped him a great deal in the things that he did and the relationships that he had. It was always an easy relationship, but he always understood the importance of the formalities that needed to be observed, and he always was able to put everyone at ease and he himself was. That was one thing. I learned that we could disagree, and frequently did disagree, with the French, but that you could disagree in ways that it wasn't taken as a personal thing. I enjoyed that very much.

I want to digress just a little bit and go back to when I first came to Paris during the time of Ambassadors Houghton and Gavin. A wonderful person there whom I enjoyed the most and who I thought was also an excellent diplomat was the DCM, Cecil Lyon. During a time when it was quite unpopular and not done very much to follow what was going on in the Gaullist camp or the right side of the political spectrum in France, Cecil Lyon had been careful to do this. This earned him not only the respect of the people who later took power in government but also a great deal of their affection and regard. I remember this very well. Years later when I was in Washington and we were celebrating the 20th anniversary of NATO, Michelle Debray came -- he was the Minister of Defense then -- to represent France at this meeting. He greeted him at the airport. He got into the car, and the first question he asked us was whatever happened to Cecil Lyon, because there was a man who, regardless of how other people might have looked at it, always kept in touch with us and followed things up. I always remembered him as a man who did things like that, who looked beyond things just outside of what was fashionable to be looking at.

I found mostly people were sympathetic with what de Gaulle was doing, and I do think also that even those who were not in sympathy with him still felt he could stir them in their pride of being French. He was very successful in doing that. There was criticism. I did meet a number of people, but not regularly or officially, who were members of the opposition, either socialists or radicals, that sort of thing, and they were sparing in their criticism of de Gaulle and also sometimes slightly amazed that Americans would speak to them in a way which indicated that they thought that de Gaulle had done certain things that were positive. You could always bring this up with the question of Algeria and that sort of thing, mainly because it had been the left. At the beginning it was very pro-Algerian--not pro-Algerian, but supposedly sympathized more with them--but even before de Gaulle took power had had to govern and begin to preside over the struggle that led eventually to the independence of that country.

HOWARD R. SIMPSON
Regional Public Affairs Officer, USIA

Marseille (1959-1965)

Howard R. Simpson was born in 1925 and raised in Alameda, California. In 1943, he was drafted into the U.S. Army and served in the European Theater. He returned to the United States in 1945 and continued his education in California and Paris, France. Mr. Simpson joined the Foreign Service in 1951, where he served in Vietnam, Nigeria, France, and Algeria. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on January 10, 1994.

Q: This is always a problem and all of us have gone through this, the mind set of trying to think the best about a country and basically we're suppose to be disinterested observers and there are things you'd rather not know about, I mean, talk about or you discount when they're very important. I came out of Yugoslavia, was 5 years there and we tended to discount the nationalities problem. Right now it's become a world problem. So we move to your next assignment which is basically France where you served from '59 to '64, what were you doing there?

SIMPSON: I was the Regional Public Affairs Officer for USIA working out of the American Consulate General in Marseille, that gave us responsibility for the public affairs programs, the information programs and the cultural programs throughout the whole area of Provence from the Italian border to Toulouse and up into the mountains and some of the other provinces including Toulon and Marseille and Montpellier and some of the other cities. The Consulate General was a fairly small operation but even in those early days it had its DEA contingent, I don't think it was called DEA then, the narcotics agency or whatever.

Q: Particularly because Marseille and the Corsican Mafia and that whole business.

SIMPSON: And it was quite a change from Nigeria, because very soon after I got there I was assigned as a member of the official US delegation to the Cannes festival. Which meant I would go over there and be sort of the official working staff for the delegation. Because the delegation was a political appointee who the White House would come up with, someone at the last moment who sometimes knew nothing in particular about films, so it was sort of a pay-off deal. But I'll tell you a strange thing happened on my first assignment to this job, I was not informed by either the Embassy in Paris nor by the Motion Picture Export Association that there was a big freeze in relations between the French government and the Motion Picture Export Association and that the MPEA had blocked all the American films that they controlled, that were going in. Because of this dispute I was thrown into this as a sacrificial lamb. I arrived at the Carlton hotel in Cannes where we were housed courtesy of the French government, with a station wagon full of duty-free liquor for a cocktail party with the intention of making contact immediately with the Motion Picture Export Association representative in Cannes...who was not available. He was part of the freeze out on this thing and he was playing hard to get up in Paris and wasn't going to come down until later in the game. And so innocently, because everybody else was doing something, the Russians, and the Mexicans and the Italians and everybody. I decided to throw a small cocktail party in my room including Van Johnson, who had been invited there, and Tina Louise and a few other Americans and all the American pressmen; people from Variety and all that. Well the amusing thing was the night before I had gone to a film, sat in the official delegation seat and come out of the showing and I'd seen Van Johnson standing on the curb. And I thought, well here's another American and I thought I'd go over and introduce myself and I walked up and I said: Mr. Johnson my name is Simpson, Howard Simpson and I'm one of the official American delegates. He turned to me and said "so what?" Well the reason for his attitude was that he had been invited by the French, and he too was unaware of the freeze that was going on. He had arrived and there'd been no ticket waiting for him and he'd been forced to buy his way into the showing and he'd been totally ignored, hadn't been invited to anything so the two of us went back to the Carlton terrace and had a drink together and discussed our joint misfortune and that's where this idea for this little cocktail party started. And in the middle of this cocktail party up in my room, there was this knock on the door and somebody came in and said there was somebody who wanted to see me. So I went out and it was a representative of the Motion Picture Association of America, Fred Gronich, who later turned out to be a close friend of mine, but he was furious because this is not in the tactical operation that was going on. The Americans were not to give any parties or to show that they were actively involved in the festival. And so it was amusing, we didn't have a clash but he said you shouldn't have done this and I'll explain everything to you tomorrow. And so that was my initiation to the Cannes festival but I ended up going to 6 of them. And believe it or not the last time I was in Paris and the offer came up again and I turned it over to my younger assistant because your liver and the tension and everything else that builds up...the 6th fleet comes in. Every time there's a festival you can be assured that the flagship and a couple of carriers are going to arrive, and your phone will start ringing, the admiral's aide will be asking for tickets, you know all this other sort of thing. But that was just a sidelight of it.

Q: Was this De Gaulle's France at that time?

SIMPSON: No, not quite. I'm not sure I'll have to check the date on that.

Q: Well it'll have to be because '59, De Gaulle was...

SIMPSON: I'm just trying to put it in context with the Algerian war. Yes it was, yes it was. And I'm trying to remember when he pulled France out of NATO, do you remember?

Q: It was during Lyndon Johnson, it might have been a little later.

SIMPSON: But, the whole Marseille, this was the beginning of a long time relationship with Marseille, not only because of future assignments but it came as sort of a favorite spot of mine, of ours. In fact we're going over there in 3 weeks time. And it's a unique city, a lot of people will bypass it because you know it's a tough sort of dirty port town. It's got a lot of guts and a lot of charm.

Q: It reminds me I was Consul General in Naples and it's the same.

SIMPSON: That's right, a lot of people don't appreciate it.

Q: How did you find that area of the French press dealing with them we were getting involved slowly into Vietnam at that time, just getting the American story to the French.

SIMPSON: That was very difficult because number one the French, particularly the regional press in cities like Marseille, don't have that much space to play with. And as far as international news or policy things like that, very little even of their own things, they kept to a minimum. So it wasn't a question much of placement, it was more a question of talking to people and making sure they were exposed to certain visitors if they were interesting and had a certain authority. There was a, you had to be very careful if you didn't realize that you were always considered an official, some people tend to relax and talk more freely with their friends in the media. Only to see it appear the next day as an official statement or something. Marseille being one of the main cities of France, you had the usual visits of the ambassador which would call for a whole new setup and different appointments. And as I say, part of the public relations responsibilities there would be handling the 6th fleet relations with the local press and getting them to visit the ships and all that sort of thing. And, in fact, the local newsmen were very helpful on a number of occasions because at one point, I didn't find out from the Embassy but I found out from a newsman who called me from Nice. He said, Simpson, I don't think you're aware of what's about to happen here. And I said what's that, and this was in August and that's a bad month in France or anywhere else.

Q: Oh yes, everything shuts down.

SIMPSON: You know the beaches are full and I said what's that and he said, from what I hear your 6th fleet Admiral is planning to land marines on the beach at Nice in August as a sign of American readiness for America Day. I knew we had been working on this America Day which was a fairly simple sort of cultural thing but somewhere along the line, after a few drinks I guess, somebody had agreed, or had given the Admiral the idea that they agreed, that it'd be a great thing if the marines came ashore in full regalia on the pebbled beach of Nice as a sign of American readiness to defend Europe and all this sort of thing. You can just imagine, I blanched and immediately called Paris and called the attaché and said what the hell is going on? Well the Admiral wants to do this. I put down the phone and then called Chip Bohlen, who was ambassador at the time, and I got in touch with his office and passed the word of what was going on and I gave my arguments that #1 this was uncalled for in the context of this America Day and #2 it would be a disaster on that beach because the French authorities would have to take everybody off the beach and people had paid their money to come south for their vacations. So, anyway, the upshot of it was that Ambassador Bohlen agreed, the word was flashed to the flagship canceling that. And as luck would have it 3 days later I would have to make an official call on the Admiral in Toulon. To say it was glacial would be an understatement because he wasn't very happy with the beach thing. He knew who was behind it. But as I say that was an example of a French pressman tipping me off to something I hadn't been told. It would have been a major disaster, I'd have been carrying the can on that if it had happened.

THOMAS D. BOWIE
Labor Attaché
Paris, France (1960-1962)

Thomas D. Bowie was born in Minnesota on September 1, 1917. He received his BA and MA from Carleton College in 1938 and 1940 respectively. His career has included positions in Spain, France, Poland, Italy, and Saigon. He was interviewed by James Shea on February 25, 1994.

BOWIE: Well, you know I'm not the best person to answer that because I was a regular foreign service officer brought to do that work, as you can see from our conversation. But I can tell you when I was sent to Paris I saw a real difference right away. I had been Counselor of Embassy for Political Affairs in Saigon and then after going to the Army war college was sent to Paris as labor attaché. Shortly after I arrived and Dan was showing me the ropes, somebody from another organization came up to him and asked indignantly "When is this garbage strike going to be over?" As if Dan were somehow responsible for it. And I could tell the difference. Your standing as a political officer was the same no matter who you were or what your career experience was, so long as you did your work effectively. The labor attaché just didn't come through like that. I got the feeling some officers in the Embassy didn't quite know what to make of labor officers, and the prevalent anti-labor views in the US were broadly shared by individuals in the Foreign Service. "Your Mr. Meany..."

Fortunately for me, the DCM in Paris was an old-time Foreign Service friend--from Warsaw days. It was nice to know he was there.

Some high-ranking FSO's knew perfectly well what to make of the labor function. That should be emphasized. They worked very effectively with it. I'm not going to name names because I might be unfair in leaving out some sterling characters but I have to say that some of the most traditional foreign service officers were the most supportive and the most interested in the labor program.

When I came to Rome in 1962 there was a great deal of dissension over the desirability of the Italians' forming a center-left government, taking the Socialists into the government. The labor aspect was particularly acute because the Socialists had left the question of trade union affiliation of their members unchanged; labor leaders in the Socialist party would remain in the CGIL. Well, I remember thinking that as far as I could see that was an unresolved problem and we were just going to have to recognize that it was going to be there. The international relations department of the AFL-CIO told me the center-left formula was "rubbish." I had been in the economic section in Paris and the DCM, the minister, in Rome, said that they proposed to put me in the political section in Rome. I said that wherever the labor attaché was, whether in the economic section or in the political section or reporting directly to the DCM and Ambassador, I thought the work would be pretty much the same. Of course I would be glad to go wherever they put me. But I had to say that I was going to be the bearer of bad and contradictory news about the center left as far as the labor situation was concerned. There was a possibility that that could be washed out if it were filtered through the political section, obviously in favor of the center left as a political solution. So, I wondered about that before we even got started. In a couple of weeks he told me I should report directly to the DCM and Ambassador but "if you don't get along with the political section, it will be your fault."

That was fair enough and so I tried very hard, using techniques of close consultation and occasional joint drafting. I also was careful not to tread on the vested turf interests of the political people. But there were also pitfalls with some economic specialists who occasionally might be disapproving and complain about my reports, although they would be cleared through the economic section, political section, and the Ambassador. This was during times when the economic policies of the Italian government were being attacked and perhaps sometimes slightly attenuated by local trade union forces and the economic agencies of the US government were especially sensitive. Sometimes, too, congressional delegations would have a special axe to grind over interpretation of local labor statistics. I remember how they seemed to require a lot of explanation. I'm sure I'm not adding anything new, but merely adding a bit of color to the experience we're discussing. Where there were friendly personal relationships and where trust and understanding had developed substantive questions were easier. These varied with the change in individuals throughout my long stay in Rome.

In general the labor function was more appreciated when you could do something helpful, whether for the business people calling having labor problems of one kind or another, the military, and so on. Once there was a huge general strike throughout the whole province of Leghorn over dismissals of local employees of the US military base there. The military called the Ambassador. He and the DCM called me in. I saw that it was the opening steps of the procedure that offended practically all the Italians. What to do? Well, the Ambassador and DCM were the kind of persons who would listen. My idea was that the concept of a fresh start might help things. Tomorrow would be the opening step instead of today. I remember to this day throwing around the imperfect subjunctive in talking with the labor representatives involved. They bought it. The Ambassador persuaded the military. It worked. I suppose it also helped the stature of the labor function.

But I must cut matters short and not begin talking about my boo-boos. We'll draw a veil of charity over them. Maybe some of these problems are eliminated when the labor officer has other reporting responsibilities and is operating cheek-by-jowl in a smaller and close-knit staff.

Q: How long were you in Paris?

BOWIE: Two years.

Q: I see. And how was the feeling in let's say with your contacts with the French trade unionists.

BOWIE: They were very profitable. I dealt with all the non-Communist trade unions. But you remember I was sent there without a lot of preparation so I was trained on the job as labor attaché in Paris which was a great contrast to the experience of my predecessor, Dan Horowitz, who thank goodness stayed on for a good long time to help me get my feet wet.

Q: Ah, . . .

BOWIE: I had the advantage of speaking French well, and having gone to school in France so there was a certain entrée there. And then I had those good contacts whom Dan took great care for me become acquainted with before he left. I had a whole array of contacts not only in the labor movement but in the employer associations and journalists. The biggest thing that happened there was the uprising in Algeria and that was a great crisis.

It is interesting how the Force Ouvrière, the French UIL, to facilitate identification, which was definitely primarily Socialist oriented, was the closest to the AFL-CIO while the Christian oriented union was the one the CIO --UAW--was greatly interested in. But that wasn't a great problem. It was really in Italy where those differences were more marked. There were a couple of secretaries general of the then CFTC. One was Maurice Bouladoux. He was a somewhat touchy person and would take offense rather easily. I remember accompanying him to the airport when he and one of his colleagues was going to the US on a visitors grant. And the airplane was a little late and he was already feeling kind of negative and he said "ça commence mal. . ." (It's starting out badly. . .) I always remember that. It became a kind of family saying in our own family. But Eugene Descamps was the second secretary general. One of his parents was a Socialist and one was a Christian union member. And he's dead now I got to know him well and when I left he gave me a book with his calling card saying, "In the name of the Confederation and en témoignage personnel d'une féconde collaboration et d'une profonde sympathie." I was pleased with that. No value to that gift, just treasured words.

WINGATE LLOYD
Economic Officer
Marseille (1960-1962)

Wingate Lloyd was born and raised in Philadelphia. He attended Princeton, Johns Hopkins (SAIS), and the University of Rangoon. He entered the Foreign Service in 1957 and served in France, Cameroon, Morocco, and Portugal. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2001.

Q: You were there from '59-

LLOYD: After about three or four months of language training, I arrived in Marseille in January of '60, and left in about February of '62.

Q: Yes. What were you doing?

LLOYD: I was the economic officer in a post. There was a consul general; then another fellow older than I who was doing political work; and I was the economic officer; another colleague was doing consular work and there was an admin officer. So there were five of us altogether, five American officers.

Q: Who was consul general?

LLOYD: A man named Donald Edgar who had been consul general in Alexandria. He'd served in the Middle East and in Europe and was, I think, rather disappointed that his last post was going to be as consul general in Marseille. But he was in his probably mid-50s, had a good time, seemed to enjoy himself, and did a good job.

Q: Did we have a consulate in Nice in those days?

LLOYD: We did have a consulate in Nice, yes. It had only the department of Alpes-Maritimes, because of the tremendous number of American visitors. Our consular area had all the rest the southern part of France, all the way to the Spanish border. I had a great time traveling on behalf of American commercial interests.

What I really did in Marseille was to learn French. My friends had been assigned to Paris in their first posts, and I envied them. But the French wouldn't talk to them because the French were bored with Americans. In Marseille I remember an evening where some French friends brought us along to a party. The people at the party said, "You're Americans! How interesting! We don't know any Americans, and you speak some French. How very interesting!" Well, it really gave my wife and me a leg up on understanding in depth the culture and the language. My French improved rapidly as I came to be able to work in the language. I gained a real insight into France, French culture, and the different sides of French culture.

At this time, one interesting aspect of life in France was de Gaulle. Remember the coup was in 1958. He became president on the promise that Algeria will always be French, and he went back on that during the time that we were there. There was outrage in Algeria, outrage in France. De Gaulle was being pilloried by the public as it became increasingly clear that Algeria would someday become independent.

Q: Of course, Kennedy became president at this point, and his one foreign affairs thing was making a speech in the Senate being sympathetic towards freedom for Algeria. Did that have any repercussions or anything?

LLOYD: No, by far the most important repercussion was that there were Bouvier families in southern France. There was a Bouvier family in every village or they turned up a Bouvier trace of some kind, and they all wanted to be part of the Camelot story that was going on in the United States. There was no memory of that speech by Kennedy.

Q: What in economics, I mean later Marseille became known as sort of an area for the drug traffic, but how about-

LLOYD: It was the largest port in France, and it became increasingly important as France's ties with the African countries began to diminish. As a port it was important; as an airport it was important. But the most striking feature was the arrival of the colonial settlers.

Q: From Oran?

LLOYD: The "pieds noirs" (black feet) from North Africa. The OAS (Organisation de l'Armée Secrete, Secret Army Organization) was active, the Organization of the Secret Army as it was called. They were a terrorist organization set up by French right wing forces determined to keep Algeria French. I remember going to people's houses and being warned by someone that "you will meet someone tonight whose name you'll be introduced to him as Pierre. That's not his name. Don't ask him what he does, or where he's been, or why he's here. Just talk to him about everyday events." But they were nervous about having an American official in contact. There was a lot of clandestine movement, I think, between Marseille and Algeria.

Q: Did we have any brief on this? I mean was it just something that was their problem, or did we have a stand on any of this?

LLOYD: I don't think we did. I'm sure that EUR (Bureau of European Affairs) had a policy toward the decolonization of Algeria. The pressure on France from foreign settlers was not really important at that time. There was not yet a wave of Muslim immigrants coming into France. Instead it was a group of dissatisfied, angry Frenchmen who had lived in what they considered to be part of France across the Mediterranean for two, or three, or four generations. I remember talking to many of them, to their wives, about their despair at leaving a life that they'd known, that their grandparents had known, that they thought would always be guaranteed to them. The forces that were in play within France were very strong, but it was very much an internal French issue, I think.

Q: Were we under instructions to keep out of it?

LLOYD: I suspect so. It's something I didn't get into. I don't think the consulate was brought into these issues very much. I was doing some consular work in the area, which I found very interesting, and again, something that was helpful in terms of understanding the people and in building my knowledge of the language.

Q: Did you have any particularly unusual consular cases? The area, the Riviera, and all that, brought a lot of fairly well-to-do Americans, and I would think they would get into trouble.

LLOYD: Yes, they did, and they also died from time to time. There was a normal run. We had American ships calling; we had the Sixth Fleet calling in Marseille. It was a constant area of activity for the consulate, escorting the officers from the ships on calls on the local leaders, and so on. Once when a U.S. embassy officer from Berne died while on vacation in Corsica, I remember going down there to help his family through that process and get him out of there. It's challenging to do consular work when you're not in your office. You don't have a typewriter, and you're carrying seals and documents the best you can.

Q: Yes, yes.

LLOYD: But I found that interesting. As I say, it opened a window on French society. The people in southern France are, as you can imagine, a mix. In Marseille there were a lot of Greeks, Italians, and Corsicans. So it was a cosmopolitan group.

Q: In Paris, of course, at the embassy if you're dealing with matters, you end up having to deal with the intelligentsia. Was there a comparable group in Marseille?

LLOYD: Not really. We didn't know any academics that I can think of. We knew a lot of business people, some who were our age, in their 30s perhaps, a little older than we. We got to know a couple of families, a man who was the president of the chamber of commerce. He was importing spices from Africa. Apparently the standards for importing spices allowed no more than a certain amount of rat excrement to be included in the spices. The people he was exporting to in New York found a higher percentage through a certain size screen. I learned a lot about rat excrement-

Q: (Laughter)

LLOYD: ...and about the screens and the complaints, the classic trade complaints.

Q: Yes.

LLOYD: So his was a family business. They'd been spice importers from Africa for three or four generations. I got to know this family, a very nice family, quite well. They had children who were only slightly younger than we were. I. So we were included in some of their family gatherings, which was very unusual for Americans-

Q: Yes, yes.

LLOYD: ...for a foreigner to be included in a provincial French family.

FREDERICK Z. BROWN
Consular Officer
Nice (1960-1962)

Frederick Z. Brown was born in Bryn Mawr, Pennsylvania in 1928. He joined the Foreign Service in 1958. His career included positions in France, Thailand, the Soviet Union, Vietnam, and Cyprus. Mr. Brown was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1990.

BROWN: I left the congressional relations job in July of 1960 and I was assigned as vice consul, deputy principal officer, shall I say, at the American Consulate in Nice, France. That assignment was actually made the year before, when I was still in personnel. And I will never forget, sitting in personnel, as the assignments were being passed around and a gentleman, Phil Chadbourn, who later was charge in Vientiane, ended his career in Marseille as consul general.

Q: He was there many years.

BROWN: Yes, Phil retired in place. In Marseille. I think he lived in the Riviera.

Phil Chadbourn at that time, in 1959, was head of foreign service training, FST. I remember, Phil Chadbourn coming into my office with someone from Far Eastern Personnel, I can't remember who it was at the time, and sitting down at my desk, and saying, "Fred we have just the assignment for you. We need a couple of bright young fellows to go to a place called Cambodia.

Do you know where it is?" I said, "yes, vaguely." "We need somebody to go into Cambodia and language training. It is a fascinating job. It is a very sleepy place, but interesting people. And would you be interested in spending a year in Cambodia and language training?" Well that was about the last thing in the world that I wanted to do. I wanted to mainstream into the things that were really happening. Of course, in retrospect, had I taken Cambodia and language training, I would have been there from 1960 to 1963/4 and it would have been absolutely fascinating. I would have been lined up to go back in the waning days and maybe get killed.

Anyway, I didn't do it. The job I applied for was Kinshasa or one of the constituent posts in the Congo which was then undergoing a pretty bad time. I said, that's where I want to go. I want to go where the action is. I remember Bill Harrop coming in with the assignment sheets for the paneling session and I said, "Hey, did I get the Congo." He said, "No Fred. You don't want to go to the Congo. Where you want to go, is Nice." They handed me the paper and I said, "Well Nice is kind of uninteresting." He said, "Fred, you want to go to Nice."

One of the reasons why, I learned later, that I was assigned to Nice was that I think I was well regarded by the system at the time and the principal officer in Nice at the time was known as, shall I say, not a strong officer. And I think it was thought that what he needed was an energetic, highly motivated, hard charger to go support him. I think it worked out that way. Because I definitely got those vibrations at the Embassy in Paris. So I ended up going to Nice, against my objections.

Well as it turned out it wasn't a bad place to be.

Q: What were you doing?

BROWN: It was a two man post. I'm not sure if it is still there. It has been opened and closed several times since. I really did all of the work. The principal officer was there for representational purposes only and I was vice consul. I did a great deal of classic consular work. A lot of non-immigrant visas, a lot of processing immigrant visas for Marseille, the consulate general issued the immigrant visas. But I did a lot of non-immigrant visas, including some very distinguished people; Rudolf Nureyev. I did his work when he defected from the Ballet Russe. He joined the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo. A lot of protection work. A lot of notariats, a lot of citizen services. We had 3,000 American citizens living in my district, on the Cote d'Azur. which was the province of Alpes-Maritimes, and I can't remember if we had the province to the north. But we had Alpes-Maritimes which was the main one, which contained from the Italian border all the way over to St. Tropez. So it was a rather glamorous district. We had a lot of very interesting people there. Authors, artists of various sorts, singers, etc. But I was also accredited to the Principality of Monaco and in that capacity had the opportunity to see Princess Grace and Prince Rainier a lot. I was then single and I dated the nanny of Princess Grace who was then having her first or second child. Albie or Stephanie, I can't recall. But I saw a lot of the Rainiers, dinner at the palace. I also did, in addition to the normal consular work of which there was a great deal, the home port of the Sixth Fleet was there. The Naval Support activity was Ville Franche-Sur-Mer and I was charged with the responsibility of working with the Naval Support activity whose office was up on the third floor of the consulate building. So I saw a great deal of the Sixth Fleet, Admiral Donald McDonald and his staff. My closest American friends at that time were the flag rank officers and captains of the Sixth Fleet.

Q: How did you find the naval officers? How was their knowledge of local politics and problems?

BROWN: I found them very enlightened. To be honest with you. There were some people, I guess, who were not so enlightened. But what I liked about Admiral McDonald and his staff was the fact that they relied on me to guide them in protocol matters. And every time there was a new ship in port in Villefranche, or there were port calls at Cannes. And the aircraft carriers used to come into Cannes because that was a bigger, and a wonderful place for shore leave. Much better than Nice, really. Because you couldn't really anchor off Nice, you could anchor off Cannes. I would escort the captains of these vessels or the commanding admiral of the group to calls. I can remember precisely where we would go. If we were in Cannes, we would call on the mayor of Cannes, and the Sub-prefect in Grasse, and if they called in Villefranche, we would call on the mayor of Nice and the Prefect of Alpes-Maritimes, located in Nice. If they called in Antibes or Menton, I would go there, meet the captain and take him ashore and take him to the appropriate people. It was always very meticulously done. Very carefully done. They were very assiduous in their respect for local customs and practices. My recollection is that it worked out very very well.

Q: Your next assignment was somewhat out of this world. You went to Thailand.

BROWN: Something happened on the way to Thailand. At one of my farewell parties, and I can remember exactly just what one it was, in Cap d'Ailles or Menton, it was a lobster. It was a lovely farewell dinner, as only the people in the Cote D'Azur can offer. Champagne and so on. It was either a lobster or a soupe de pistou, a bouillabaisse, which must have been hepatic. Because 21 days after that party, I came down with hepatitis. I spent from July of 1962 until November of 1962 with a very severe case of hepatitis, which delayed my arrival in Bangkok.

JOHN HOWARD BURNS
Political Aide
France (1960-1965)

John Howard Burns was born in Oklahoma in 1913. He received a bachelor's degree from the University of Oklahoma in political science in 1935. Mr. Burns entered the Foreign Service in 1941. His career included positions in Juarez, Rio de Janeiro, Port au Prince, and Frankfurt, and ambassadorships to the Central African Republic and Tanzania. This interview was conducted by Charles Stuart Kennedy on May 1, 1995.

Q: Well, you left there and went to Paris from '63 to '65. What were you doing in Paris?

BURNS: I was the so-called "political aide" to the Supreme Commander, Allied Powers Europe, then General Lyman L. Lemnitzer. Although I was listed as a member of the Embassy staff, my office was at SHAPE headquarters, several miles south of Paris. The Ambassador to NATO, Thomas Finletter, thought that my position should be attached to his Embassy rather than to that of the French government and there may have been some justification for that; not that it really mattered. My "boss" was General Lemnitzer but I enjoyed also being on the staff of Ambassador Bohlen because he was an old friend. I also occupied Embassy living quarters in Paris and was provided an Embassy car and driver.

Q: What did your job consist of?

BURNS: There was an immense amount of cable traffic, incoming that is, from all the NATO capitals. I would sift through that every morning and shortly thereafter see General Lemnitzer, reporting whatever I thought might be of interest to him or important to the military operations of the alliance. I attended his staff meetings and worked closely with his Chief of Staff, General Parker, and his personal aide, General Orwat, with whatever questions a day might bring. It was not a position for which it was easy to write a job description. I followed Walter Stoessel, who was a highly attuned European political officer, which I was not. I frequently seemed to be turning up in jobs for which I felt totally unqualified: Consul General at Frankfurt, Ambassador to the CAR, and this one at SHAPE.

Q: Well, this is what Foreign Service officers do!

BURNS: Yes, adapt.

Q: How did General Lemnitzer use you?

BURNS: I would occasionally write a telegram for him and, as I noted, I worked very closely with his immediate staff, which included his speech writer. There was a collegial atmosphere around General Lemnitzer's office and he was a very engaging individual with a great sense of humor. I think he enjoyed having me around because I did not fit the military mold. I would dare laugh out loud in staff meetings, which no one else would except General Lemnitzer himself. He would! And often. I really enjoyed working for General Lemnitzer. He ranks in my mind with Consul General Blocker for doing, in my opinion, his particular job as nearly perfectly as it would be possible for one to do.

Q: How did the Americans on the staff at NATO look on Greece and Turkey as far as an instrument of NATO?

BURNS: That had ceased to be a topic of discussion before I got there. They had by that time been long in NATO. General Lemnitzer showed a great deal of interest in that wing of the alliance.

Q: How about de Gaulle and NATO at that time?

BURNS: You have touched on something that was of special interest to me. De Gaulle was, of course, jealous of, and actively opposed to, the essentially dominant influence of the United States in Europe and especially in the NATO alliance. He withdrew French military forces from NATO and I began to think a lot about, and study, the idea of moving SHAPE headquarters out of France, before we were told, in so many words, to do so. After a lot of thought I presented the idea to General Lemnitzer and it won his immediate interest as it did that of the US Ambassador to France, Charles Bohlen. But Ambassador to NATO, Thomas Finletter, and his deputy Elbridge Durbrow, were anything but interested and the chief of staff at NATO, General Parker was also opposed. They would not even discuss the subject and consequently it died as neither General Lemnitzer nor Ambassador Bohlen was going to carry any flags for the idea however much it may have interested them. Of course, a year or so later the headquarters were moved to Belgium, whether at the direct request of the French or not I do not recall. It interested me a great deal at the time but thirty years later it seems of no importance whatever, which, I might add, is true of many things. Mr. Blocker's "Rule 7" might be amended to read, "Don't take things (rather than yourself) too seriously".

Q: What was your impression of how Ambassador Bohlen worked?

BURNS: I was not closely enough involved with the work of the Embassy to qualify me to express an opinion. Plus the fact that the Ambassador was a personal friend, and I such an admirer of his, that I would be prejudiced in anything I might say about Ambassador Bohlen.

Q: Well, what was Lemnitzer's view of de Gaulle at that time?

BURNS: I would just term it completely correct. He recognized de Gaulle's lack of real support for NATO, and regretted it. But he accepted it as one of the circumstances with which he had to work. He never expressed personal opinions about political leaders, or questions, of member countries of NATO although his political perceptions were what I would term "razor sharp". He saw de Gaulle from time to time and de Gaulle respected him, decorating him at the time of his retirement.

Q: How did we view the Soviet threat at the time you were there?

BURNS: It was central to everything we thought and did. Almost every aspect of US foreign operations was governed by what was perceived as the Soviet threat. Nevertheless, there were quite a number then who viewed it as having perhaps a disproportionate influence.

Q: Was Berlin...

BURNS: A constant sore, constant. Some sort of crisis was continually arising, usually provoked by some action of the Soviet Union. But certainly the West, and especially the US, was not hard to provoke.

Q: Did you get involved, from your aspect as political adviser to the military commander, on how to play the Berlin situation?

BURNS: No, we didn't use the word "adviser". I was the political assistant. And I might say General Lemnitzer didn't need any advice in the political field. He had excellent political antennae and was an extremely sensitive thinker. I often said, "General Lemnitzer needs a political adviser like General Eisenhower needs a military adviser". And in whatever case, in every Berlin crisis, by the time everyone who felt he had a right to express an opinion had done so the result resembled the finale of "Oklahoma".

Q: At this particular point, what about the Germans? Were there any problems? I'm talking about the West Germans.

BURNS: None whatever. On the contrary they were the most responsive and cooperative of any representatives at SHAPE.

Q: What about the British?

BURNS: Equally so. The only stresses at SHAPE were provided by the French.

Q: Did you get involved in nuclear issues?

BURNS: Not to any extent. The principal question which comes to mind was of France's development of its "force de frappe", which meant, of course, a nuclear capability.

Q: At that time was it sort of the feeling, "Well, we've got military parity and stability and it's probably unlikely that there will be a war?" Or what was the attitude?

BURNS: After the Cuban crisis there had been what might be termed a certain lessening of tension. But Berlin continued explosive, and capable of precipitating a serious crisis at any time. As far as European politics affected the work of SHAPE, Berlin was the leading question.

JAY P. MOFFAT
Aide to Ambassador
Paris (1960-1965)

Ambassador Jay P. Moffat, a third generation Foreign Service Officer, joined the Foreign Service in 1956. His career included positions in Japan, France, Switzerland, Trinidad, and Morocco, and an ambassadorship to Chad. Ambassador Moffat was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1989.

Q: I always thought we should have been more up on things. Keep moving on. You went to Paris as a Political Officer. 1960 to 1965.

MOFFAT: My initial 6 to 8 months was as staff aide to Ambassador Gavin and I moved from there into the Political section.

Q: Ambassador Gavin was an interesting person. He was put in there specifically by President Kennedy because he had been an Army officer -- the youngest paratroop Army General. The first to jump on the morning of D-Day. The idea was both to get away from putting just a rich fat cat in but also somebody who could appeal to the de Gaulle government. Yet, it didn't seem to have been terribly successful. That was my impression. How did you see it?

MOFFAT: I think you have to recreate the ambiance of the time. Anything Kennedy did was terribly exciting and the press was all agog. This nomination was part of that. And maybe more was expected of it than could be carried by any individual. Gavin was a very honorable man, and I think he probably didn't really want to serve in Paris. But he felt it his duty. I know he felt very sensitive about not speaking French. And he would sometimes say that he minded deeply but that he was willing to be humiliated if necessary because it was his duty. But Kennedy and perhaps at the beginning he himself did not realize that de Gaulle was not about to have a special relationship with anyone. He came closest with Bohlen, who followed Gavin. I will talk about that in a minute. We tend to forget now but back then the French government at the direction of General de Gaulle was trying to wean the French people, and by extension French policy, from U.S. influence. And we were under a tremendous barrage of anti-American propaganda. The government-controlled radio and television held our country up to ridicule. They had a weekly program I remember, like Sixty Minutes, called Cinq Colonnes à la une (Five Column Headline) with five vignettes. One time four of the five vignettes on this program were anti-American. Racial problems, this and that. We squawked and the next week they included an item on churches in New England to make up for it. What de Gaulle was up to was essentially distancing France from the United States. Other than the visit by Kennedy and Jackie Kennedy to Paris, which was high theater at that time, lots of emotion and all the rest of it, other than that, we were already started on what took on a more and more strongly anti-American tinge.

Q: There is nothing like being the staff aide to the Ambassador to get a feel of things. You are sort of off to one side that you're there. What was our feeling towards the French? Are these just the French? I've heard this so many times, in the Foreign Service. You sort of shrug your shoulders and say the French are always going to be contrary. Or did you see this as a deliberate campaign?

MOFFAT: I think President Kennedy had an absolute fascination with the French. And felt that perhaps he could personally do a lot in the relationship. I don't think he could, because de Gaulle had made up his mind the way he wanted to go. The Embassy was again in this sort of ambience of the time. We were sent a scholar, Nicholas Wahl. He was a French expert from Academia. He was supposed to straighten the Embassy out. He knew France better than we knew France, etc. although we had some real experts there. There was this absolute fascination with de Gaulle the man, with France the country, and so on from Kennedy on down. And every one was going to try -- the Kennedy visit was quite something in terms of theater and public mood. It was the first trip out of the country for Kennedy, as President. It was the time when Jackie Kennedy was made so much of.

Q: I can shut my eyes and remember that she looked so smashing.

MOFFAT: And there is the famous line that he was the man who came with Jackie. There is an interesting insight to the early Kennedy administration. We were all roped into running the mechanics of the visit, and it was a zoo because the Kennedy people all came and they were all chiefs and no Indians. They were all tossing off dicta and orders but there was no one in their party who took care of any sort of details. I think maybe with time they got that sorted out.

Q: Looking at the early period. Were you the equivalent to the country team just sitting around figuring out how do we do to the French. Or was it a feeling that this was de Gaulle's policy and really we're not going to change it.

MOFFAT: At the beginning I don't think anybody knew. It was still slowly coming to light. I went on to the Political Section which was very large and very subdivided. I was the man for Asia, which quickly translated into the problems of Red China, which the French went ahead and recognized, and of Indochina where first in the case of Laos and later increasingly with Vietnam and Cambodia we got very much involved with the French and did not always have congruent policies.

Q: What were you getting. In the first place were you dealing with French officials at this level.

MOFFAT: I was dealing with French officials and the representatives official and unofficial of the countries involved. A lot also with journalists, scholars and with the resident communities of those countries. The Vietnamese for instance had 20 thousand-odd people in the Paris area. They all wanted to be president. They all wanted to tell you about it.

Q: I was told at one point that there were more Vietnamese doctors in Paris than there were in all of South Vietnam.

MOFFAT: They all had a solution which involved their going back and taking over! I am sure many other people have said it more eloquently, but de Gaulle's policies of distancing himself from the United States and taking an independent role was not entirely shared by a lot of the French officialdom who were still imbued with Atlantic cooperation and a conviction that France could not be entirely independent. So, there were a lot of French officials who did not agree with their government's policy and that made them quite easy to talk to. It removed the méfiance that you got officially. And for instance on North Vietnam, where the French kept a Delegation General, they provided us with information which was of great use to us back then. Dealing with the French officials was tricky but it was fun. Your own energy was the only limiting factor in getting around and talking to people.

Q: De Gaulle's recognition of Communist China, you were in the Political section at that time.

MOFFAT: Yes.

Q: Were people in our Embassy sitting around prior to this saying okay what can de Gaulle do, one that will be startling, that is in the realm of possibility and will be sort of sticking it to us? This must be almost number one because we were spending so much effort to keep Red China unrecognized and out of the UN.

MOFFAT: Your question presupposes that de Gaulle did it to spite us, if you will. In that case I think de Gaulle did it with good and sufficient reason of his own. And I think in the light of history he made the right decision. I don't want to get into that. But I think he read the realpolitik tea leaves and decided that this was a good thing for France. And it was unnatural not to do it.

But on that one we called it somewhat badly for Washington -- until fairly late in the game we thought he wouldn't recognize partially because Chiang Kai-shek was with de Gaulle the last World War II "colleague" still going. But again when French television, which is government controlled, finally had its ten minute children's program going to China for a trip we knew the decision had been made. You often got clues from what the government decreed should be purveyed to the French public.

Q: Were you getting, from the level you were dealing with, from the French officials that was of much interest coming out from China or do you feel that the French had put their initiative in there but it was just sort of there, it was no great opening?

MOFFAT: No, no great opening. And a little bit later you had an absolutely incredible situation where some of the French diplomats were spat on and yelled at by a Chinese crowd egged on by the government. But de Gaulle took it and did not make a case of it. I can assure you that if the Americans had done that or anybody else there would have been a real rumpus. I cite that just to show that the French did not have an easy time. I left in 1965. But they had not come up with anything easy or particular interesting. I think de Gaulle didn't necessarily expect much in the short run but wanted the investment in the new policy of opening to Red China and this was a long haul sort of thing not necessarily to be crowned with any immediate benefits.

Q: What were you getting from your contacts in the French foreign ministry and elsewhere about the situation in Vietnam, Laos, Cambodia?

MOFFAT: Initially after transfer into the political section I was involved in the Laos negotiations. You may remember there were the "three princes" as they were called. Particularly Souvanna Phouma spent a great deal of time in Paris. Governor Harriman and Michael Forrestal of the NSC would shuttle over and we'd go round and round wooing the neutralist Souvanna. We got deeply involved in that and the French were very much involved. Everyone had his own agenda. Souvanna would pull into town and the Russians would wine and dine him and the Americans would wine and dine him and French would wine and dine him -- and then the British would do it. And that took an enormous amount of time and energy. We got some wonderful anecdotes out of it and the Lao are wonderful people and it was great fun. Eventually at least for a while it had a happy result. It was sorted out and agreements reached in Geneva. The French were quite helpful because they had wanted us to play the neutralist card as it was called back in those days and go with Souvanna rather than Phoumi Nosavan, who was our man, or Souphanouvong who was the Communist man. So we were pretty close with the French on that. They had their own agenda but it included cooperation with us. On Vietnam we were quite far apart. It was the time of Nhu and Madam Nhu, and coups were going on and the French were interested in protecting their surviving assets, if you will, in Vietnam their presence and influence in the north and south and their vestigial (but very significant to them) cultural assets, schools and things like that. They thought we were wrong in our policies in Vietnam and they didn't hesitate to tell us. But Vietnam was still very much a political question in France and there were plenty of Frenchmen who thought their own government's policy a bit short-sighted. From both the right and the left we were being bombarded. There were major demonstrations outside the Embassy and it was a very lively time. The French were not happy with our policies.

Q: Did you find that the French officials you were dealing with, were they basically in accord with the French policy or were they doing their duty but you didn't feel they wanted to see someone get involved there or what?

MOFFAT: They had a bureau in the Quai d'Orsay which was our normal vis-a-vis called Asie-Oceanie. Within that there was an office for Indochina. Those people we dealt with were businesslike and not terribly involved in the ideological aspects of the greater picture. There was even Madame de Gaulle's niece in there. It was the sort of relationship you would have with colleagues who are working on problems of interest to you and they were certainly open and friendly. At the top there was a Breton called Manac'h who was head of the entire bureau who was very open very friendly -- but certainly could not be faulted by any side for partiality. He was a real pro, an unsung hero at the time. I remember I had to deal with him just before the recognition of Red China was announced. We had been given one story by Pompidou that they weren't going to do it. Clearly they were going to do it, and there was great confusion. Manac'h just said this is the way it is. A very estimable man. Higher than that in the Foreign Ministry and in other ministries, and in the Presidency itself there were other people for whom the controlling issue was whether French independence and/or Atlantic cooperation and so on. For some of them the merits of the case in Laos or Vietnam or Red China or whatever were subsidiary to the need to keep the Atlantic world together. For some of them it was very tough to be kicking us in the teeth. Even today, however, I hesitate to name names.

Q: When did de Gaulle pull France out of NATO?

MOFFAT: That was in 66, after I left.

Q: There was already a distance in there.

MOFFAT: Yes, the process was well begun.

Q: One other thing that was in your direct realm of responsibility, the decolonization of Africa. How were we seeing what the French were doing it seemed to be almost nasty in some countries that did not agree with France.

MOFFAT: Well it was nasty at times. As an Embassy Paris tended to focus on the big questions of the day. For me on Asia and Alan Lukens and Peter Sebastian on Near East Africa there was a lot of room to play because the rest of the Embassy was preoccupied. (I did Africa when the fellow wasn't there). Algeria was an exception in having the highest levels of Embassy attention. When I got to Paris in January 61, we were expecting the parachutists to drop out of the sky from the revolt of the military down in Algiers. It was near the end of the long tortuous process of Algeria's fight for independence and it really tore the French apart. There were bombings all the time in Paris all through our first six months or so. You could lie in bed at night and hear booms, as the plastiques would go off in the town. I was in the Quai d'Orsay when a plastique that had been hidden in the diplomatic pouch went off in the courtyard killing the poor fellow loading it. It really was very, very traumatic for the French. Algeria had been part of France unlike the rest of Africa. It turned Frenchman against Frenchman. It was highly significant. Kennedy's connection with Algeria and other things played into this.

Q: Kennedy as a Senator had talked about a free Algeria. This was probably the most well known pronouncement Kennedy made as a Senator.

MOFFAT: There was a feeling that we should pay more attention to Black Africa. Indeed the minister at the Embassy went down by military plane and visited most if not all of the francophone countries. Back then there was tremendous suspicion among the French that the United States would try to replace France in Black Africa. France was still running its black African countries. Almost every month there would be a visit with flags up and down the Champs Elysée for yet another black chief of state. de Gaulle had failed a couple of years earlier in his effort to have a French Union. Starting with Guinea, of course, and then the others, the francophone Africans acceded to independence. For the first few years it was a very very qualified independence. So we ran up against the suspicions of the French. That made it fairly tough. Also, French Africa was run out of the Elysée, the presidential palace. Foccart was really in charge of African affairs and he was a very difficult man to get to talk to. In a way he was not entirely of the government. He was an outsider. So it was a period when the U.S. was coming to know black Africa a little better but French black Africa much less well than the other parts. It was a period of great French suspicion of our intentions.

Q: Was there a problem, because one of the things when Kennedy came in was the new broom and the new look and all that, and you had Governor Mennen Williams when he was in charge of African Affairs, someone was much more prominent than any one has been since in charge of that area? Was there a feeling among you in the Embassy that the Kennedy administration and those around it were too big mouth and they were talking about doing things that would certainly arouse the suspicions of the French that we had something else in mind?

MOFFAT: Well it could have been. "Soapy" Williams as he was called was always through Paris because he was constantly visiting in Africa. It was a good and pleasant way to get there. He did a very good job. Not much money and a lot of mirrors and the rest of it. I don't know, that's beyond me. He was put there because they needed a place to put someone who had been a potential candidate for the presidency. They were sticking such people all over the department. I think Soapy Williams may have led the administration -- he wanted to make something of the job -- rather than reflecting the administration's wanting to do something.

Q: Could we go back to Ambassador Bohlen. Compare and contrast how he operated. How you saw him.

MOFFAT: For us as professionals in the Embassy, he was a wonderful boss and if you'll look in his book he cites the Embassy Paris of that time as the best he ever worked in. Everything came together and seemed to click. We had one problem. Oversimplifying, there were Gaullists and anti-Gaullists as we called them in the Embassy. I was in the Anti-Gaullist category but the persuasion of the other levels above me alternated going up. We used to wait until the "Gaullists" were on leave or something to get our cables out ... But anyway that's another story.

Q: Did the Centrists in the Embassy speak a unified language?

MOFFAT: Not necessarily. It was more a way things were cast. There were some people who retained an admiration and fondness for de Gaulle and there were some of us who saw him as the devil incarnate and so of course we phrased our things differently. But Bohlen had a very professional embassy and was a wonderful boss and gave great latitude to people. In response for the most part they did not cause him any grief. He had only one weakness. He could not write the English language, and we all had to rush to get to his own cables before he would send them out. He understood de Gaulle. He was frustrated by the difficulty in dealing with him as anyone would be. He rolled with the punch and knew the limits and I think got the maximum out of that relationship that could be gotten. I know de Gaulle from his side was a great admirer of Bohlen and enjoyed dealing with him but that didn't make him change his policies. It made life a little easier, however, and we got the maximum out of it that we could. As with King Hassan of Morocco, whom we will come to later on, de Gaulle could not have a real and a normal relationship with anybody. Both men transcended normal relationships. They could have warm personal ties but they operated in a different dimension and didn't deal with mortals the way other people do.

Q: Was Vernon Walters there when you were there?

MOFFAT: He came through to interpret but he was not permanently assigned. As you must know he has a lot of anecdotes about de Gaulle from his interpreting days.

Q: I have heard in other interviews being done that that particular Embassy as being the most professional one. An awful lot of people, some you might call stars but more than that these were just a very very professional Embassy at a very difficult time.

MOFFAT: That's true. And we were big enough. We had one fellow who sort of went off his head, a mid-level political officer. We were numerous enough to carry him. Although he still was there, he wasn't functioning as a productive officer. You don't always get such flexibility in a small post. Other than that, yes, you are right.

Q: How well did you feel you were backed up -- this was a difficult time, difficult reporting, that you were backed up by the Department of State, both at the sort of the desk the bureau and Secretary's level?

MOFFAT: Well, I was backed up by a different part of the department, the Far East Bureau. We were I think well treated by that Bureau, but by the time I left we were getting into the phase of "How do we get out of Vietnam -- how do we deal through other than official channels?" That was a little bit hard. We were over in Paris and this sort of thing was not communicated to us through normal channels. Actually when I left I was replaced by an officer who was an old 01. This will mean nothing to an outsider but was four or five grades higher than I was.

Q: The equivalent of a major general or something?

MOFFAT: Not too long after there were negotiations in Paris. Before that there were reportedly preliminary contacts using our personal country house I turned over to another member of the Embassy. Things were beginning to cook. I felt a little out in left field in my last few months. I was already over my time but if I had stayed on that would have had to be sorted out. Not that the US government would necessarily have done so.

G. RICHARD MONSEN
Information Officer/Deputy Public Affairs Officer, USIS
Paris (1960-1966)

G. Richard Monsen was born in Utah in 1921. He entered the Foreign Service in 1951. His career included positions in Paris and New York (the United Nations). Mr. Monsen was interviewed by Hans Tuch in 1988.

MONSEN: While I was the Information Officer there, one incident occurred that sticks in my memory as rather historic and interesting -- the 1960 summit conference.

Q: I am particularly interested in hearing your comments on that because I was in Moscow at that time and preparing for the visit of the President and subsequently the U-2 affair. I think this is when you were in Paris and having your experience there. So please go on.

MONSEN: When the conference first started we knew nothing about the U-2, but it had just barely gotten underway when the news broke that the U-2 had been shot down.

Q: That was May 1, 1960.

MONSEN: I remember it was sometime in May in 1960, but I don't remember the date. But in any event, there were no meetings of all the chiefs of state held during the whole summit. Khrushchev was meeting privately with de Gaulle, and Eisenhower met with de Gaulle and so on. Late that afternoon Khrushchev called a press conference out at the old NATO headquarters at the Palace du Trocadero in Paris. Andrew Berding, who was the Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs, had been my boss in IOP earlier. I rode out to the press conference with him, and we sat in the audience there when Khrushchev came out and in short order denounced the United States and said that the conference was off and he was on his way home with all kinds of dire words about the United States.

Q: And President Eisenhower was uninvited?

MONSEN: Yes, was disinvited you might say.

Q: Disinvited.

MONSEN: This was about 6 o'clock in the afternoon. Although I was the Information Officer in Paris at the time, for the conference I had been designated as the Policy Guidance Officer. That meant giving guidance to our Voice of America and our IPS representative who were covering the conference, and also sending back guidance cables to Washington. Andy Berding told me, "Dick, I'm going to have dinner tonight with Bill Cody" (PAO in Paris). He said, "I'll drop you off at your office in the Embassy, and I want you to write the best damned policy guidance you've ever written." And he said, "After Bill and I have had dinner, we'll come back and I'll look at it." Everything that was sent out had to be cleared through Berding. Needless to say, I went back and worked like hell while Berding and Cody went out to dinner.

I should say parenthetically at this point that I had been in Paris slightly less than a year. At that point I had not been getting along too well with my boss, Bill Cody, even though he had selected me for my job. I had been having a rough time with him. I simply couldn't seem to win his confidence.

In any event, Cody and Andy Berding came back from their dinner. I had just finished writing this guidance cable, so I handed it to Berding. He read it over and said, "Dick, that's absolutely on target. Just what was called for." And he handed it to Cody and said, "Bill, what do you think about this?" Bill was always more of a cultural officer than he was a political officer, but nevertheless he read it and said, "Yep, fine, fine. It's fine."

So the cable was sent off and that became the Agency guidance on that. From that day on Cody was marvelous to work with. I never had another moment's problem with him. Anyway, that's a rather personal side effect of the conference.

Q: That was an interesting period, the period that followed. With the U-2 shot down and our relationship, the Soviet-U.S. relationship, really went into a nosedive.

MONSEN: Oh, yes.

Q: It had been building up through the spirit of Camp David and then we had had Nixon over in the Soviet Union and Khrushchev had been in New York and Washington. This was supposed to be sort of the next step with Eisenhower visiting the Soviet Union, and our preparations had gone forward for several weeks. And then the nosedive similar to the one that the U-2 took, the relationship took.

MONSEN: Yes, we noticed that also in another sense. In the spring, earlier before the summit conference, there was this movement of trying to effect a thaw and improve relations with the Soviet embassy in Paris. We organized an Evening in Paris. We invited a whole group of Soviet officers and their wives, not to the embassy residence but to the old Rothschild mansion. That, by the way, is now the new embassy residence but at that time was where USIA had a lot of offices. We had a big hall there and invited the Soviet diplomats and their wives to come over for a film showing. I remember we showed them the old film Marty, and we had then a short program of jazz and a few other things and afterward drinks and hors d'oeuvre and stuff were served. So it was all a very jolly, congenial sort of a gathering. They were supposed to have reciprocated with a similar one at their embassy, but then after the U-2 they never did. So I never got inside the Soviet embassy.

Q: This really started the cold war again. Let me ask you, there are really three assignments that you've had which are, I would say, unique for USIA career officers to have and they're out of the ordinary. One of them came really right after your Paris assignment. You became the USIA adviser at the United Nations in New York when Arthur Goldberg was the Ambassador to the United Nations. But that particular position in this case encompassed a number of jobs. So I think this is a very interesting thing for you to relate.

WELLS STABLER
Political Officer
Paris (1960-1965)

Ambassador Wells Stabler was born in Boston, Massachusetts in 1919. He entered the Foreign Service in 1941. His career included positions in Palestine, Italy, and France, and an ambassadorship to Spain. Ambassador Stabler was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1991.

Q: ... assigned to Paris where you served for almost five years.

STABLER: I was there from September, 1960 to July, 1965.

Q: How did you get the assignment and what was it?

STABLER: Well, in early '60, the question came up about the replacement of the officer in the Political Section in Paris who dealt with internal political affairs. At that time I was serving in the Office of Western European Affairs and Bob McBride was the Director. One day, out of the blue, he asked me one day if I would be interested in being the head of the Internal Political Unit in the Embassy in Paris. Obviously I thought that would be quite an interesting position and accepted with alacrity.

We then took off in September, my wife and four small children ranging from the ages of 1 to 6, I think it was at the time, for Paris. I then took over as head of the Internal Political Unit which consisted of myself, an assistant, and an officer who did purely biographical work. I had a secretary who was an American who had lived in Paris for years, spoke fluent French and who was really an absolute gem as far as Foreign Service Secretary are concerned.

At the time that I got there Randy Kidder was the Political Counselor and John Bovey was the number two man, who also did African affairs. Amory Houghton was the Ambassador. He was a political appointee of Eisenhower and was only there a few months after I arrived. He left Paris the day before John F. Kennedy was inaugurated as President. Shortly thereafter Kennedy named General James Gavin, the President of Arthur Anderson Associates, as US Ambassador to France.

Q: What was the political situation when you arrived, because this was a very turbulent period. If someone wants to report on French internal politics, you probably picked the greatest period since 1789.

STABLER: Of course, by the time I got there de Gaulle had been firmly entrenched. The Fifth Republic was then underway. So many of the old line political leaders of the Fourth Republic were out of office. About all of them were studying ways and means whereby somehow they could get back into power. The Gaullists, so-called UNR -

Q: That was his party.

STABLER: Well, that was the Gaullist party. I think it was called the Union Nationale de Rassemblement, something of that sort. It was one of these organizations that was put together because of the position of de Gaulle. A great many people rallied around. There were other political parties represented in the Chamber of Deputies, but the Gaullists were by far in the majority.

My job really was to report on what was happening in the internal political picture. I spent quite a lot of time at the outset in establishing contacts with some of the leading Gaullists - not at the governmental level because those Ministers and so forth were dealt with by more senior officers in the Embassy. But I established contact with a group of some of the younger Gaullists who apparently wanted to establish communication with the Embassy. It was interesting because quite a number of these people, although they looked upon the United States with a certain degree of hostility because - my theory has always been that de Gaulle in order to revive the glories of France, etc. had to demonstrate France's total independence from the policies of any other country. But to be credible he had to demonstrate independence from the country which perhaps mattered most to the Western world at that time and that was the United States. So some of de Gaulle's attitude and that which was echoed by his followers was one of putting the United States at arm's length. They were very critical of American policy. I never had any personal problems with them and they seemed to be quite anxious to talk. I met with a lot of them over a period of time. I found particularly interesting that a great many of these, I don't remember the numbers now, had at one time had Leader Grants to the United States. So they were very familiar with the country, basically admired Americans and benefited from their stay in this country. In fact, in some of the political organizations of the Gaullist party they tried to copy some of the things we did in political campaigns - the idea of door-to-door canvassing at the grass root level. Some of these young Gaullists endeavored as time went on to get out amongst the people and establish a much closer identification between the party and the grass roots during campaigns, which was never the case at all in the politicking of the Fourth Republic.

De Gaulle was very much in the ascendancy and one of the reasons that General Gavin was selected as Ambassador was the fact that he had been a young General in World War II, had parachuted into France with his airborne division at some stage during that war, and had replied :Nuts" when at one point, possibly at Bastogne, the Germans demanded surrender. The thought was that as a World War II General he would get along well with General de Gaulle.

Q: I think he came in on D-Day. I think he was one of the first people to land.

STABLER: Maybe so. I think it was the 101st. Although he spoke no French at all and absolutely no previous experience in diplomacy, the theory I assume was, although it was never specifically stated, that here was a General in France that anticipated the liberation of France and you have a General as President of France and the two ought to get along very well. Well, that really didn't prove to be the case since he spoke no French. That, I think limited the ability to have direct, one-on-one conversations with de Gaulle and I just don't think that he was obviously up to the stature of de Gaulle in terms of international relations. In any event he was only there for a little over a year -- I can't remember exactly how long, but it wasn't all that long.

Then Chip Bohlen came and things changed because de Gaulle had very great admiration for Bohlen and Bohlen spoke fluent French and he knew what he wanted.

It was a fascinating period. I got to know many of the leaders of the Fourth Republic -- former Prime Ministers, etc. who were extremely anxious to maintain contact with the United States. They, obviously didn't play the role that they used to and therefore the Ambassador and DCM didn't really have time for them. Therefore, they were not only willing but very happy to have contact with even as modest a figure as a First Secretary. I found it most interesting. I kept the Department informed of some of their thinking, but the fact was that they were by that time completely out of the game and had really no influence whatsoever in what was happening in the Gaullist government.

One of the people that I used to see very regularly was the Secretary General of the Socialist Party, the SFIO, Guy Mollet who had a considerable political career and been Prime Minister at the time of the British-French invasion of Egypt back in 1956.

But as an aside...I always found it a little strange with the way we do business. A lot of these people, such as Guy Mollet, and there were others who were leaders of the Fourth Republic, had what you might call a fiduciary relationship with the United States and they indeed received some financial support from the US government. I would go to visit Guy Mollet and we would have a nice chat. The telephone would then ring and he would look up and smile at me and say, "Well, one of your colleagues is here to see me." We would have this revolving door act between myself and someone of the CIA station in Paris. He wouldn't know that I was there and I wouldn't know that he was coming. I found it quite frankly a rather embarrassing situation that the United States government would do well to avoid.

Q: Was there any discussion about the CIA doing this type of thing...they were still politicians weren't they?

STABLER: Yes, they were. Some of them, if not all of them, were in the National Assembly as the Chamber of Deputies was called in the Fifth Republic. I don't know for a fact whether they were still being kept on the payroll or whether the previous relationship enabled them, the CIA people, to receive perhaps a better degree of information than I had. I really never knew. I am not sure to what extent the Political Counselor in Paris knew all the details. I wouldn't necessarily tell the Political Counselor that I had an appointment with Mollet or former Prime Minister Antoine Pinay or whoever it was I was seeing, even with Francois Mitterrand with whom I had some contact, not much, but some...he was not my favorite in any event. I would go about my business as part of my mandate. But even after this occurred there was no coordination. It was one of those awkward things that I have always thought about because I always felt somehow one could avoid that type of embarrassment, at least not do it on the same morning.

Q: You mentioned Francois Mitterrand was not one of your favorite people. He is now the President of France and has been for some time. How did you feel about him?

STABLER: There was the feeling that he was somewhat of an opportunist; a bit "tricky"; now on this side of the situation, now on the other side. At the time I would see him he was not a Socialist. I think he was what was called a Radical, but certainly not in the Socialist camp. Later on he became a Socialist and their leader. I think the feeling was that his position on matters was never very clear and you were never really entirely sure where he stood on issues. People such as Guy Mollet, a Socialist; Pinay was in Independent; Maurice Faure was a Radical; Jean Lecanuet who was Christian Democrat, people of that sort you knew where they stood because they were what they were and in the political groupings they had been in for a long time. It was always my impression that they were much more solid than Mitterrand. The only difference is, of course, that the other gentlemen I speak of -- Mollet is dead, Pinay may be dead - the last time I saw him he was a very old man, Maurice Faure, I guess, is still around -- only Francois Mitterrand is President of France, so whatever he did, he obviously did quite successfully.

Q: You were there during the very last part of the Eisenhower Administration.

STABLER: Yes.

Q: Did you get a feeling how Amory Houghton and others felt towards the Gaullist government and all at that time and was there a change when Gavin came out?

STABLER: I don't think there was a great deal of change. I was there only the last months of Amory Houghton and he didn't speak French either. He had an extremely able DCM, Cecil Lyon, who spoke very good French. I wouldn't say that there was a great deal of difference in the relationship between the US and France, Eisenhower and de Gaulle, if you will, and the beginnings of the Kennedy-Gavin-de Gaulle relationship. At least it wasn't obvious that there was any change. I think it became somewhat more critical later when de Gaulle marched out of NATO and when he refused the British entry into the Common Market. But then also a very significant point - when, in spite of all the differences we had with de Gaulle, he did stand up and was counted during the Cuban Missile Crisis.

Q: October, 1962.

STABLER: Dean Acheson came over to brief de Gaulle and de Gaulle in effect said, "We are with you." And I think that made a big impression. Also de Gaulle's personal participation in the Memorial Service in Paris for Kennedy and I believe he also came to the United States for the funeral. So in spite of all these major political problems with the French, the basic alliance, this sort of love/hate relationship that has existed between the United States and France was reconfirmed.

Jumping ahead a little to the assassination. It was interesting to see the lack of certainty on the part of the Gaullists as to what they should do. I happened to be in Nice at the time that Kennedy was assassinated attending the Gaullists' - UNR's - National Congress and was at a cocktail party given by some of the UNR members when I got word that Kennedy had been assassinated.

The American Consul in Nice, Paul DuVivier I think it was at the time, and I immediately withdrew from the cocktail party. The next morning I went to a plenary session of the UNR in a huge big hall and as I walked down to my seat it was interesting to me to see who amongst my French Gaullist friends would stop and say something to me and which would somehow look the other way. It was surprising that some of the ones I thought the least friendly turned out to be the warmest in their expressions of sympathy and some who I thought were friends turned out to be rather chicken-livered.

Q: Why would there be a problem?

STABLER: Well, again, it was the whole question of the relationship of the United States. They were mixing up their human sentiments with their belief that somehow the Gaullist party was not all that close to the United States. This was even more apparent on the stage of this hall where there was a flag pole of one sort or another. When I came in the French flag was flying right up at the top. One could see that there was a discussion going on, which seemed to relate to the flag. It was only during the course of the morning that they apparently resolved their problem and brought the flag down to half staff.

Again this was this sort of love/hate relationship. Some obviously said what did this have to do with us, this is the Gaullist party congress and why should the French flag take into account at all what's happened. They did resolve this but it obviously took them some time to do so.

This, I think was not untypical of the dichotomy in their thinking in terms of the Gaullists at different levels. I think in the case of de Gaulle that he would not stoop to be quite so petty about something of this sort. I mean the grand gesture was part of his make up. There was an extraordinarily beautiful Memorial Service for Kennedy in the Cathedral of Notre Dame which my wife and I attended. De Gaulle came and it was really a very emotional moment in which de Gaulle most willingly participated. Of course that was in 1963.

Q: Can we go back then to an earlier period?

STABLER: Yes, I want to go back because it was a very important development. In the fall of 1961...because all during this period, from the time I got there in 1960 and '61, one of the major issues that de Gaulle had to deal with was this problem of Algeria. That had become an amazingly difficult thorn in the French side, the rebellion in Algeria, the inability of the French, in spite of large French forces, to bring it under control. There were very strong feelings on the part of many Frenchmen that it must always be "Algerie Francaise." Finally de Gaulle, recognizing that this was certainly not going to be resolved by force of arms, declared that he was going to leave Algeria for the Algerians. He had gone down to Algeria at some point and had made a speech from a balcony and, of course he was rather good sometimes with conundrums and the famous statement he made as he addressed the crowd, mostly French settlers or "pieds noirs" and said, "Je vous ai compris," -I have understood you. Well no one to this day really ever knew what he meant by that...I have understood that Algeria must remain French or I have understood that we aren't going to win this one and Algeria will become independent?

As a result of all this tension, there was the famous revolt of the generals in Algeria in the early fall of 1961. This was a very serious matter because these five generals and a good many of the units in Algeria turned against de Gaulle and rebelled against the central authority. That night Michel Debre , who was then the French Prime Minister - a Gaullist, of course, and a very faithful servant of de Gaulle - .appeared on television...it was a wild appearance, he was unshaven...and urged the citizens of Paris to go by whatever means, horseback, car, whatever, out to Orly and Le Bourget, the two big airports, to prevent the landing of the aircraft that was expected to bring troops from Algeria to seize power in Paris. It was a very tense moment. I was in the Embassy and we heard noise of tanks coming across the Pont de la Concorde by the Assemblée Nationale on the Place de la Concorde . One really didn't know at that point whether these were tanks of the forces loyal to the generals or what they were.

It turned out that they were tanks and armored cars of the police forces and other forces loyal to General de Gaulle which had simply come into the Place de la Concorde to establish positions there. The night was extremely tense. I will mention one particular incident that I mention because it was perhaps not untypical of what happened.

There was a gentleman by the name of Maurice Ferro whom I had known in Washington when he was a correspondent for the great French newspaper, Le Monde. When I got to Paris I resumed my contact with him. He was an avid Gaullist and he was instrumental in introducing me to many of the younger Gaullists who at that time had no ministerial positions but who were movers and shakers in the UNR and with whom I met many times. A number of them became good friends and some of them became Ministers later on. One of them became Minister of Interior, another a Minister of Posts, I think one of them became Secretary General of the UNR. All of them were dyed-in-the-wool Gaullists.

That night of the generals' revolt, I had a telephone call from Ferro asking if he could urgently meet me. I suggested that we have a drink at the Crillon bar and talk about things there. The thrust of his message was, "I am, of course, a loyal Gaullist; the generals are about to arrive in Paris, they obviously will arrest me and my family and goodness knows what will happen. Could you give me asylum?"

I said that unfortunately the United States had a policy against that, but that I would at least offer him and his wife safety in my house. My wife was away at the time. So they came to my house and spent the night there. By the time I got up at 6:00 the next morning, they had left because by that time it was known that the generals had failed to rally the citizens of France. They had not been able, therefore, to transport their rebellion to the mainland and it was already beginning to peter out even in Algeria.

I mention this only because as a result of this action by Mr. Ferro he was finished. The Gaullists said they wouldn't speak to him again. He had shown lack of faith and the white feather had been exhibited and he had denied his master, in a sense, believing that somehow de Gaulle wouldn't triumph. I don't know how many Gaullists suffered this way, but he certainly was finished. I never saw him again.

Q: From your point of view how did the Embassy react to this situation? How did they see it?

How were they calling it?

STABLER: Well, of course, it was difficult because the only information that we had came really through the French television. I don't remember what was coming out of the Consulate General in Algiers. It was very timely as they knew what was happening. So, all we could do was to report what it was we were seeing and hearing in Paris. I think, if I recall correctly, the general view was that de Gaulle would probably carry the day because of his extreme basic popularity in France. While there were many Frenchmen who probably were - whom they used to call "pieds noirs" in Algeria - or had served in Algeria and had strong feelings in that direction about Algeria, but they didn't represent the majority of the French people. I think most of us probably felt that it was most unlikely that the generals would carry the day and that de Gaulle would be successful in putting this down. I don't recall now and I can't tell you because again the Ambassador was around...

Q: The Ambassador was whom then?

STABLER: Gavin. I don't recall to what extent we really did anything or said anything beyond letting it be known that our support was with de Gaulle. There was no question about that. I don't remember what may have come out of Washington at that time, but I seem to recall that the French government, de Gaulle and Gaullists, were very appreciative of what they considered to be our support for de Gaulle at this particular time.

Q: France was still in NATO at the time.

STABLER: Everything happened very quickly. Everything was over very quickly. The tense moment was that night and once nothing developed there then it was sort of down hill as far as the generals were concerned. The only way they could have imposed their will was by pushing de Gaulle out of office -- by capturing de Gaulle. That didn't happen. Once that failed, then the rebellion, itself, began to peter out as far as Algeria was concerned.

There was no question then that they would have been able to set up a regime in Algeria and have it stick for very long without the support of the Metropole, supplies and what not that would be needed. Plus the fact that there were many units in Algeria that didn't respond to the generals' call. So I don't have any knowledge of what, if anything, our military...or NATO would have done. As I recall the Departments of Algeria were included in the original NATO boundary, because that was one of the things the French demanded.

It was relatively short-lived and you remember the generals were ultimately arrested and put on trial, etc.

This incident of course enormously strengthened de Gaulle's hand. He then was able to carry out domestically a number of things. It seems to me that at this point that there were then certain constitutional developments that took place in France which more or less perfected the Constitution of Fifth Republic in terms of the direct election of the President and things of that sort which, up to that point, had not been enshrined in the Fifth Republic.

Q: After the 1961 night of the generals and all that, the next thing that occurs to me would have been the Cuban missile crisis where the United States and the Soviet Union were nose to nose. It looked like there was a very strong possibility that it might result in a nuclear war. How did we view that from the Embassy at that time?

STABLER: The news coming out of Washington was increasingly threatening in terms of what seemed to be building up. The Embassy role in this at that point became one of being sure that the French were aware of what actually was happening. Of course, this type of situation was handled, obviously, at the very top level and beyond the news reports coming out of what was happening, the recognition in Washington was that it was important that we bring all our allies on board and make them aware of actually what U-2 pictures showed. That, I think, was the mission that Dean Acheson had in coming over.

It seems to me that at the time the missile crisis took place Bohlen was there. I think that was true. He hadn't been there very long. So he then accompanied Acheson on the call on de Gaulle. The object behind this was, again, as I say, to take to de Gaulle the evidence we had. My recollection is that he rather pushed the evidence aside and said that we could be sure that France will stand shoulder to shoulder with the United States in a war situation. I think this was a very important aspect of the US-French relationship to know that in spite of all his varied differences with us and many other areas of the world on how things were being done...the idea of US hegemony and the like, which was part of the reason they left NATO...on major questions of war and peace the French remained our loyal ally. I don't think that anybody had any doubt that what de Gaulle said was what he meant. That was one of the very important milestones in the French-American relations.

Q: In your dealing with the politicians, was this reflected too?

STABLER: Yes, don't forget that the Fourth Republic politicians deplored everything that de Gaulle did. Therefore, they took the view that de Gaulle was mistaken in his attitude on everything. They obviously supported the United States. They probably didn't pay much attention to what Europe would do when he said they were with us. The Gaullists, themselves, I think were guided by what the General said. So some of them may not have been so much with us, but they obviously followed the leader. I think on the whole that you would say that the French political class, in any event, was clearly behind us and were supportive in this particular situation. I am not sure, now that I look back on it, to what extent the French people were really aware of the gravity of the situation.

Again, it came and went with a certain amount of speed -- about a week. Then the horizons cleared again and we got back to business. Then it was after that de Gaulle began taking positions with respect to NATO and keeping the British out of the Common Market. So his major blueprint carried on in spite of these various ups and downs -- the Algerian thing, the missile crisis, the assassination of Kennedy, and the like. One has to draw a distinction here between the Gaullists and their attitude towards the United States and policy followed by de Gaulle and the attitude of the Fourth Republic politicians all of whom were, of course, increasingly frustrated because the years of participation in the goodies of government were gone. They were essentially non-players. De Gaulle paid little attention to them.

In all of this there appeared to be an increasing public dissatisfaction with the somewhat imperial nature of the Gaullist regime. And in spite of at least one assassination attempt on de Gaulle which I recall, which rallied people around a little bit, as the elections approached for the National Assembly in 1964, there was a very strong feeling...because one of my functions was to keep in close touch with the so-called political journalists, many of whom were products of the Fourth Republic...most of these commentators had the feeling that as the elections were approaching the dissatisfaction with de Gaulle was increasing and that there was a good likelihood that the Gaullists would not get a majority in the next Assembly and would have to make some sort of a deal with some of the parties of the Fourth Republic who might begin to show life again.

The Political Section of the Embassy was fairly convinced that the Gaullists would not demonstrate the strength they had before. There was, however, a group which was a public opinion group, IFOP - "Institut Francais d'Opinion Publique" - run by a man named Sadoun, a very nice fellow, whom I knew well. Apparently the Gaullists had commissioned rather secretly a public opinion poll in connection with this election.

Again, it is one of those things that is sort of regrettable, but there we are. At the time that I was preparing messages that would seem to indicate that possibly the Gaullists wouldn't do very well, the CIA station had managed to get a copy of the public opinion poll which they didn't share with anybody, which showed that the Gaullists would really do much better than expected. I wasn't made privy to this, so I went out on a limb somewhat and called it wrong.

The Gaullists really did extremely well which was a great surprise to most of the political commentators. But I will say that most of the political coverage was done by people who were fashioned, brought up in the Fourth Republic and who perhaps didn't have a great deal of love for the Gaullists because they were not as privy to what went on as they were during the Fourth Republic.

So the upshot of all this was that the Gaullists did quite well which was foreseen in this opinion poll. The polling institute was fashioned largely on the model of American public opinion institutes -- Gallup and others -- and introduced a whole new element into French political life because they turned out to be remarkably accurate.

That only demonstrates that the talk that one heard from many who were believed to be well in touch with what was going on reflected a dissatisfaction to what was happening in France...the character of the Fifth Republic. The dissatisfaction with the somewhat patronizing attitude of some of the Gaullist party leaders who were in the saddle and nothing else was riding except that. This irritated people. It cast over the situation the feeling, in any event, that there was growing popular dissatisfaction.

Well, that was 1964. It was so many years after that...I think it was about '66 or '67...when indeed all of this erupted and the students began to demonstrate. So, it was there, but hadn't yet simply come to the surface. I think some of us who dealt with these issues...I found this message I prepared on what I thought might be the outcome of the elections was one obviously which I didn't sign off myself...and I don't mean to say that anybody else shared the lack of vision that perhaps I had... but there wasn't any strong objection on the part of those who read the message - maybe that was misplaced faith in my abilities. But there didn't seem to be any strong sentiment that perhaps that wasn't correct.

But it did again show the unfortunate lack of coordination that exists in embassies between various units. If I had access to the public opinion poll, in light of my recognition that the polling organization was pretty good, I would have been forced to take another look at what I thought was the situation.

Q: How did Ambassador Bohlen operate and how well did he use the Embassy? How effective was he in dealing with de Gaulle and the French government?

STABLER: I think when Gavin left and Bohlen came there was a general feeling that the Embassy was now in the charge of a real professional and would pull together in a much better way. I think that by this time -- I can't remember if Randy Kidder was still there, about to go or had gone -- we had a new Political Counselor, Norman Anschutz who had not had much experience in that particular area. Cecil Lyon was there as DCM with Bohlen for a while. When he left Bob McBride, who was very much a professional, came. The general feeling was that the Embassy would pull together and it operated in a much more coordinated way with some of these institutional imperfections that we don't seem to be able quite ever to deal with.

Bohlen turned to his staff. He knew who they were and used them. He also knew what he was doing. He had good relations with the French government and clearly had the respect of de Gaulle. So, while the circumstances basically didn't change, the ability of the United States to report, to influence to a certain extent, improved. Any foreign government is certainly inclined to deal with an embassy more effectively when it knows it is well lead. When the ambassador is not quite up to task then things begin to fall apart a bit and more is done in Washington, or what ever. One felt that when Bohlen came that things would concentrate more in the embassy. Bohlen was there during the missile crisis, when Kennedy was assassinated, etc. The fact was that he was there was an important factor in the stature of the Embassy vis-a-vis the French government.

We had very good relations with the Foreign Minister, Couve de Murville who was obviously an instrument of de Gaulle, there was no question about that. Eventually, I guess, he became Prime Minister at one point. Michel Debre was a tough character. He was enormously loyal to de Gaulle and carried out de Gaulle's wishes. I met him much later when he was no longer Prime Minister and found him delightful...very intelligent person and at that time no longer in office and able to take a slightly different view of things. I guess he was succeeded by Pompidou who was an enormously intelligent man and later became President of France. [I will go into that later on. I was assigned by the Department to accompany Nixon when he went to the Pompidou funeral in Paris -- he was President and died in office.]

There was not a great deal that the Embassy could do in trying to shift de Gaulle away from certain basic things. De Gaulle decided in order to demonstrate French independence and his position as the glory of France that he would leave NATO. That was a policy that he was going to follow and there was not much that could be done by anybody to keep him from shutting the British out of the Common Market. At that particular time we were still very much in support of the idea of a United Europe and the Common Market was part of that so the extension of the Common Market to include the British would be very much part of our policy line at the time. But those were problems on which de Gaulle was adamant and there was nothing that anybody could do to talk him out of it.

Although there were difficulties created for us by de Gaulle's rule in France, still France became a much more formidable ally and a better country as a result of what he did. After all, France was at the very bottom as a result of the war and their whole behavior and performance of that. De Gaulle brought France back up to a position of certain strength and prominence in world affairs, which I would think would be a much more valuable asset than a France that was totally divided under the Fourth Republic. That France could never make up its mind about anything, and the musical chairs that they played, which in that instance was a great deal more important than, for example, the political games that are played in Italy and haven't made a great deal of difference. In France they were simply wishy-washy and couldn't make a decision about anything.

Q: Within our Embassy, economic and political reporters, maybe even CIA and military, did you find a division? De Gaulle raised a lot of hackles in the United States and people can't help but every once and a while not look at the great good even though they are professional Foreign Service officers, but to personalize these things. Was this a problem of having Gaullists and anti-Gaullists within our Embassy?

STABLER: There was a great deal of frustration and annoyance with de Gaulle over some of the things that he did. No question that the military found it quite exasperating when it came to their efforts to have the same type of relationship with the French military that they had with the British military, for example. It became increasingly difficult as de Gaulle's policy changed. You couldn't find a great many prominent military people who thought that de Gaulle was their idol by any means. And, I think that also on the political-economic side there were certain divisions within the Embassy as to whether this was a good or bad thing. I think those of us in the purely internal side of the Political Section...as far as I was concerned, it was my feeling that what de Gaulle was doing in terms of building up the Fifth Republic was a good thing. Even though de Gaulle caused some problems, still his creation of a system which showed some stability and which was rationalized so that you weren't having these perfectly horrible political games with all these parties and inability to keep a government together, etc. was a very positive development.

His system came closer to our system. The difficulty was that in the French system there was the Gaullist party and then all the other parties. The lack of stability came from the fact that you had no alternating majorities -- which may be the trouble in Spain today, the fact that the Socialists are in power but there really isn't a viable alternative. In the case of France, you had the Gaullists, which didn't have any meaningful opposition - that came later, of course, when the Gaullists unhappily fell apart. Now you have the Socialists in France that are relatively well knit, but you did not have a viable alternative at that moment.

So, for the internal political side of France, I think the Embassy as a whole believed that this was a good development. Those dealing with external affairs would, of course, find considerable frustrations in terms of French position on foreign policy matters which very often didn't coincide with others. We have talked about the military side.

On the economic side, there were problems in French relations towards their colonies in Africa. We had problems with the French concerning economic bilateral relationships. They were perhaps not as serious as the military side. So what went on in the Embassy was a reflection of what was happening in France itself in the different positions that they took on different questions. There were many of us there who had to admire de Gaulle's ability to run an extremely difficult country.

I, of course, had nothing to do with de Gaulle, but just an amusing episode. When the Kennedys came to Paris in 1963 for the State Visit - I had known the President before and had known, perhaps slightly better, Mrs. Kennedy - but this doesn't matter, I think all the diplomatic officers were asked to the huge big white tie reception at the Elysée Palace following the State dinner. My wife and I went through the line and the Kennedys were very nice and greeted us warmly, particularly Mrs. Kennedy. Then we went into the large reception hall. The waters of the Red Sea parted as the two Presidents walked along, stopping every so often to speak to someone. I was standing at the corner where the line had opened up. As they walked down the corridor, Kennedy stopped to talk to somebody and de Gaulle who was a little ahead of him happened to stop where I was standing...we were shoulder to shoulder. So, I said a little something to him. I may have even said something to the effect that it was a little hot in there, which it was. He said he thought it was too and something to the effect that "tout le monde est ici" - everybody in the world is here. That was the extent of our exchange.

Out in the corridor just by the front door as we were leaving you have no idea the number of diplomatic colleagues, foreigners and Americans, who rushed up to me and asked what de Gaulle had said to me. I said, "Well, he said it was quite hot." They obviously thought I was getting the latest and last word on the Common Market or NATO or something. I was sorry to have to disappoint them.

Q: Dealing with internal affairs, what were our standing orders as far as dealing with the Communists?

STABLER: We had, of course, an officer in the political section who handled communist matters which was not only involved French relations with the Soviet Union and the Soviet bloc countries but also reported on what was happening in the French Communist Party. We had somebody with both Soviet Union and Eastern European background. At that time the standing order was no contacts with the diplomats of the Soviet Union. Maurice Thorez was then secretary general of the French Communist Party. As I recall, at that particular time, there was no contact with the Communist Party. I must say that my mandate as head of the internal political situation covered everything but the Communist Party. That was always dealt with by a different officer. So what was reported was what observers said, what Thorez said, and what could be learned from whatever source about the French Communist party.

Q: What was our feeling about the whole communist threat of France? Did we see it as a viable, political threat?

STABLER: No. I think that the days of the communist threat had been years before. By the time the Fifth Republic had come into being and de Gaulle was firmly in power the Communist Party was not a major threat. Of course, the Communist-controlled labor confederation- the CGT- was big and had great influence in the various trade unions. But the whole thrust of the Fifth Republic had been to diminish the position strength of traditional parties and the communist control of the labor movement. The Communist Party was not, at the time I was there, a serious threat. There were strikes, but I don't recall anytime during the five years I was in Paris when one was concerned about the potential of the Communist Party to do any serious damage. The elections results gave them small numbers. They were stronger, of course, than the Socialists at that time. They still were watched with considerable attention because they were clearly a Stalinist party, supported by the Soviet Union and therefore represented potentially a threat. But not a serious threat during that time.

Q:I can remember we had youth officers who were to make contact with the youth of the country because they were considered to be the people who were to come up. And we did this in 1967. How did this kind of approach affect your work?

STABLER: Let me just say one more thing about the Communists. One always has to remember that the entire Communist Party position to take over Western Europe, had been also considerably compromised by the uprising in Budapest. So that still had a considerable effect on the activities and strength of the Communist Party.

There was disillusionment on the part of many who had been in the Communist Party by the Hungarian events. Perhaps a little bit less than in Italy because the French Communist Party was much more Stalinist, much more rigid than the Italians who after Budapest were more disillusioned by Communism.

I don't really recall that in France, at the time I was there, that the Bobby Kennedy syndrome had really much effect on what went on in France. I don't recall, for example, that any youth officers were specifically designated. I had an assistant, Francis de Tarr, a Foreign Service Officer who had studied France in the previous Republics and who had as an undergraduate written a book on the Radical Socialists. He was somewhat younger and kept in touch with some of the younger political people. He was very much affected by his own intimate knowledge of the Radical Socialist leaders of the Fourth Republic. I think he had some trouble in equating with de Gaulle because he had an in depth knowledge of one of the major elements of the Fourth Republic.

I don't recall that he was designated to deal with youth, so-called. We had a very active Leader Grant program. One's efforts always were, of course, to try to identify potential younger leaders we thought would have a future and bring them into the Leader Grant program. The thrust of it all was not to preach to the converted but to find people who had serious misconceptions about the United States. We believed - and this was a principal objective of the Leader Grant Program - that by inviting such people to the US, by letting them travel around and see the country and meet a whole range of Americans, the Grantees might come back with a better appreciation of our country. We aimed at people in their middle 20's and 30's who perhaps would play a leader role in the future in France. I think that on the whole we had considerable success with the Leader Grant Program. I know that several of those Grantees became Ministers in a Government under de Gaulle and that their attitude towards us was much more friendly than if they had never been to the US.

Q: One more thing before we leave France, I never served in France and like other places except even more so in Europe, the intelligentsia, which we don't have in the United States, at least one that plays a role...within Europe everybody knows what/who it is. Could you talk a little about our dealings with it and how they looked upon the United States and how we evaluated this?

STABLER: There was a division within the intelligentsia -- those who supported de Gaulle and those who thought he was an aberration. You would see this reflected in Le Monde, which is an interesting and thoughtful newspaper. The writers had mixed feelings on the subject of how France should be governed. Also mixed feelings in terms of relations with the United States. There was no difference between them and other elements of society with equal levels of education. When I traveled in France I never experienced any degree of hostility about the United States. I think the average citizen looked upon the United States as a friendly country.

The intelligentsia regarded de Gaulle as somewhat of an upstart and not quite in their sort of mold. Bohlen, I think had a certain contact with a lot of these people. But, again, I am not sure to what extent they really influenced the course of events. They wrote an enormous amount of literature, of course, about every subject known to man, but I don't think de Gaulle was to be dissuaded from what he thought was the right course of action by the preaching of some of the intelligentsia who didn't agree with his views at all and others who did. They didn't play a very significant role in terms of what de Gaulle was trying to do. He set his course and on he went.

But I think those five years were very interesting years because of the position that I occupied most of the time that I was there -- head of the internal political unit. Towards the end I was acting political counselor for a short period of time. I left in July, 1965. I didn't sit in the councils of the Ambassador, in terms of being head of a section. Apparently they were satisfied with what I was doing, but it was largely a reporting responsibility and not one of collaborating with the Ambassador and setting or recommending policy. I worked hardly at all with Gavin. I worked more with Bohlen because, again, one was dealing with a professional. And Bohlen was personally responsible for my promotion from FSO-3 to FSO-2. He went to bat for me and I received it.

Q: A very important promotion under the old system. The equivalent of going from a colonel to a brigadier general.

STABLER: Bohlen apparently was amazed when he learned I was not a FSO-2 (I didn't know this until later) and personally went to bat for me. So I think I got FSO-2 just shortly before I left Paris -- then FSO-1 followed fairly quickly there after.

DONALD R. NORLAND

Political Officer, North Atlantic Treaty Organization
Paris (1961-1963)

Ambassador Donald R. Norland was born in Laurens, Iowa in 1924. He joined the Foreign Service in 1952. His career included positions in Morocco, the Ivory Coast, France (NATO), the Netherlands, and Guinea, and ambassadorships to Botswana, Lesotho, Swaziland, and Chad. Ambassador Norland was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1993.

Q: I was just going to ask. From '61 to '63, you were in...

NORLAND: From '61-'63, I was in the U.S. NATO delegation in Paris.

Q: What were you doing?

NORLAND: I was in the Political Division.

Q: By this time, you were what rank?

NORLAND: Well, let me see. I had gotten that promotion. I was a Five. Maybe I was a Four by then.

Q: Captain, major level.

NORLAND: Yes, that's right. In NATO, there was an Economic, a Military and a Political Division. And in NATO there was an institution called the Political Advisors' Committee, POLADS. Do you remember that?

Q: Yes.

NORLAND: Well, a lot of people have been assigned to it.

Q: No, but explain what it is.

NORLAND: It was the weekly meeting of representatives, the so-called political advisors of the permanent representatives of the then-fourteen NATO countries. Their mandate was to talk about non-NATO areas, to coordinate policies and share information. The so-called PermReps, permanent representatives, the ambassadors, talked about the major NATO problems; force structures and armaments, as well as the major political issues and what we were doing to counter the Soviets. But POLADS existed to talk about non-NATO issues and areas. And one of those areas was Africa. But the level of discourse was generally uninformed and there was so little interest except for the French and British, the result was a desultory discussion. There was no particular agenda; we were just comparing notes.

And the most frustrating thing at NATO was that there was little room for individual initiative. I might sit there and say, "My God, we ought to be talking to our allies about a Cuban initiative, or a Chinese visit." I couldn't raise it unless we had instructions from Washington. Everything said in POLADS was of interest only if it was on instruction.

Now you could have some interesting discussions behind the scenes with people, but there was not that much interest in Africa or the Third World generally. Much more interesting, was Eastern Europe or the Middle East. The agenda depended on the person who represented the country in the POLADS. But it was generally boring, almost mechanical. I can remember the language of the weekly telegram: "Request instructions on the following agenda items for the POLADS meeting on Tuesday." And you'd get back a telegram saying, "Here is what you answer; here is what you're authorized to say." And you didn't go beyond that.

Q: A major issue during the time you were there was the Congo.

NORLAND: Well, no, the Congo was a little bit before. I was still in Ivory Coast in the fall of '60, when the Congo really broke. In '61, there was still some effect, it's true, but the most important issue in my time was the Cuban Missile Crisis. And I did hear Dean Rusk when he came over. I guess we were all allowed to sit in, but it wasn't usual that you could sit in and hear the high officials.

And, as you know, the other thing is that the staff was filled with people who were not Foreign Service; they were Washington bureaucrats, who had agreed, very reluctantly in most cases, to have one assignment overseas, in response to the requirements of Wristonization. They were there reluctantly, and they didn't have a sense of unit organization or cohesion. Many of them were not even communicative. (I'll give you names if you'd like; some of them are still living.) And they wanted to treat this like INR or like the PM Bureau.

Intellectually, it was really not very challenging. I had had considerable experience dealing directly with chiefs of state -- with chiefs of small states to be sure. But when the French officials came to Abidjan, they were often of ministerial rank, and I'd dealt with them. In Paris, maybe I'd get a deputy office director as an interlocutor; so it wasn't very exciting.

But we did have a good experience in France. We lived near Versailles. We couldn't afford anything in town; the prices were astronomical, by our standards. I mean, a $600 a month allowance didn't go far and ours would have been close to $300. As a sidelight illustrating the charm of the Foreign Service we looked for housing a little farther from Paris. One day, I stopped at a housing office in the NATO headquarters, and someone had just put in an invitation to people to live in a country house on the edge of Versailles, in a town called Chesnay...a house we would share. We looked into it and it turned out to be a small chateau that had been built by a brother of Louis XVI. It was an historical monument, but the family happened to be in financial straits. It had been the country house of a fairly well-known French painter named Jean-Louis Forain. And the family was willing to divide the chateau in two; we would live in one-half; they the other. This meant improvising a kitchen and a bathroom upstairs. But downstairs was a salon where they had any number of Forain paintings, some of them sitting on easels. So we lived in an artist's former studio. And there was a glorious park behind it. One kilometer down the road was the Porte Saint-Antoine, which leads into the gardens of Versailles, where I sometimes did my jogging. I had the most wonderful sense of getting closely acquainted with Versailles. A couple of other colleagues lived in Versailles, because they couldn't pay these Paris prices. Among them Al Reifman and Abe Katz, economic advisors at OECD; another officer assigned to NATO secretary general Luns, was Pete Van Campen. We would car pool which was always interesting. It was always hard to get to Paris if you didn't car pool, because there was no good public transportation. There was something called the PV, Paris-Versailles, a taxi; you paid a couple of hundred francs, in those days. To have easy access to Paris was very nice.

And so I enjoyed my tour but not because of anything that happened in NATO. NATO was pretty prosaic.

Q: Did you get any feel for how de Gaulle was viewed, sort of in the corridors of NATO at that time?

NORLAND: He was making himself highly unpopular. I may have mentioned this before, but it's a theme in my career: I had gone to school in France, and I was at home in the French language and culture. I did not agree with de Gaulle's extreme nationalism that led him to say in 1966, shortly after I left, "You will remove all American military installations and NATO headquarters from France," including the headquarters in which I was working.

That sentiment was building while I was there. He refused cooperation in the military aspects of NATO, although the French permanent representative, the ambassador, was still there. He just didn't participate in certain aspects of the military deliberations. It was quite extraordinary.

And then there was de Gaulle's military philosophy... Do you remember the two phrases that described that philosophy? One was: "Défense à tous azimuts." It meant defending all 360 degrees of the compass. In the modern world, you had a hard time keeping a straight face. The other was: maintain the force de frappe, his own nuclear force. I could not really see that that was very sensible. There were a lot of differences in the French delegation on this. Socialists, for example, did not agree.

And then we did have a major spy scandal. I knew one of the people accused of having spied for the USSR during this period. He did it, in part, because of the force de frappe and the potential for serious confrontations that could result. That's written up in a recent book.

Q: From what you were getting, how did we view the Soviet threat during this period?

NORLAND: Well, this was the time of the Berlin Wall. No one questioned the need to fully mobilize. I was also representative on the Committee for Information and Cultural Relations (CICR) of NATO. We were trying to combat the Soviets on a psychological plane. I don't think there was any question that they were using every possible means to weaken us. This was the high point of their efforts to penetrate by spying. Their military was really nervous. I had the feeling that they were probing, although not irresponsibly. It turns out they were probably conservative. But we were fairly alarmist. It was a way of life. We focused our intellectual and other resources on how to confront this great danger.

Now the French government, at the same time, was very shaky. There were rumors about French generals in Algeria conducting a coup in Paris.

Q: Yes, with paratroopers. Were you there at the time?

NORLAND: I was there.

Q: How was NATO responding? There were a couple of nights where they expected paratroopers over the thing.

NORLAND: That's right.

Q: From your vantage point, how did you see that?

NORLAND: It was alarming, there's no question about it. We listened to the news, we read the papers. I can remember huge headlines saying the paras were coming. There was an assassination attempt against de Gaulle; he narrowly escaped death at a crossroads south of Paris. One understood what was meant by instability and insecurity.

This family we lived with, by the way, was almost our same age; they had the same number of children, and our children got to know one another. We ended up communicating on many different levels. I think one of the reasons they wanted an American family was because of a sense of insecurity. One host talked about being certain that his children got an American education so they would be able to live abroad during an expected upheaval in France. And he was a strong Gaullist. He had fought with the French resistance and made a remarkable record, I'm sure. But there was a fundamental insecurity. The French were talking about not being able to remain in France. We felt also that the NATO forces, which were right next door to us in Rocquencourt, within a kilometer of the headquarters...It was a formidable military machine, and I can't say that I ever worried personally. I felt that we could always move about without concern about roadblocks or whatever.

We drove to Switzerland for vacations at almost every opportunity, especially at Christmas. I happen to have a Swiss sister-in-law, and her parents had a pension in the province of Vaud, a little village called La Praz. It was a pension, with family cooking -- and a great relief to be able to spend time there. You know the atmosphere of Switzerland. Calm. In spite of any alarms that might be sounded outside, you had a good feeling.

Q: One last question about your time with NATO. What was your impression of the American military there?

NORLAND: Well, I saw General Norstad from time to time.

Q: He was the SHAPE...

NORLAND: I believe he was head of SHAPE at the time. We interacted a little bit with the military, and were in a position to see what they were doing. I never really got deeply involved. I'd had my own military experience, so I was sensitive to what they were trying to do. We were providing the necessary leadership. I felt that the U.S. was doing a good job. One of my most frequent contacts with the military was the PX. It was called Bel Manoir; again, within walking distance of where we were living. And you could see the way they could mobilize warehouses full of goods. That was symbolic of the abundance that we brought to the effort. The U.S. didn't skimp in efforts to make it a going operation. So it was quite a shock to be told, in 1966, that we would have to pick up and leave.

The point I meant to make earlier, which I think is worth reiterating, is that there has been created over the years, partly as a result of our exclusion by resident French officials and civilians in the colonies, by the way the French treated us in NATO (the attitudes toward non-French-speakers, for example), a significant anti-French feeling in the American bureaucracy. We've never really been able to fully understand and to sympathize with or appreciate French policies and motivations. And I feel this has been overdone. I understand, as I have said, that their military policy was often ridiculous. But I do feel that we have a great deal to learn from the French, especially in the Third World. Not in the way that they conduct their bilateral relations, but in their willingness to get to the root of an issue. They studied the culture. They became anthropologists. They became adept linguists. They really did get to know those areas. And in our areas of concern, we've not wanted to consult or to benefit from their knowledge. This is one of the things that I find regrettable: we don't get the most out of them and their experience. We rather look at them as rivals. And that's not the proper approach, it seems to me.

NORLAND: Right.

ROBERT L. FUNSETH
Consular Officer
Bordeaux (1961-1964)

Robert Funseth was born in Minnesota and raised in New York State. He was educated at Hobart College, School of Advanced International Studies (SAIS) and Cornell University. After service in the US Navy, he joined the Foreign Service and was sent initially to Iran, being posted in Teheran and Tabriz. He subsequently served as Political Officer in Lebanon at the time of the US Marine Corps landings in Beirut after which he served in the Department dealing with United Nations Affairs. He also served as Consular Officer in Bordeaux. Mr. Funseth was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1994.

FUNSETH: Never. Never. Then there was a personnel system just about that point in time I was in UNP and my recollection is that Personnel came up with a new requirement that in order to get promoted to almost anything you had to have experience in all cones [skill area, such as political, consular etc.]. I'd been a political officer, I'd had information experience, but I hadn't had consular experience. So I was told in Personnel that before I could go back into a political job, I'd have to be a consular officer. So I wound up being assigned to Bordeaux for that reason.

Q: You were there from '61 to '64.

FUNSETH: I originally went out on a two-year tour to be a vice consul in Bordeaux and then be transferred to Paris as a political Officer. While I was in Bordeaux, they changed the tour. I think a few weeks before I went on home leave, in order to save money, the Department ruled that I wasn't eligible for home leave until after the third year. So I stayed another year in Bordeaux, lost out on a transfer to Paris, and then subsequently was stationed in the department.

Q: What were you doing in Bordeaux?

FUNSETH: Well, in Bordeaux, originally when I arrived there, it was a four-person post: principal officer, deputy principal officer, a vice consul in charge of sort of the citizenship side, and a vice consul in charge of the visa side. I was that number three. The number two position got abolished in some sort of an economy way and again, as always happens, the function to be abolished--the deputy job was the reporting officer. Well, the principal officer said to me, "You're going to do the reporting and do what you've been doing." So I did and, as it turned out in that period, each of the principal officers left the Service after one year. So I was in charge of the post for extended periods. I had three principal officers in three years. It was '61, '62, '63, '64.

So I basically, became the deputy soon after arriving, and had so many changes in the principal officer slot, was acting for a long time. So I really was in charge of the consulate. Interesting post. One of several that lays claim to being the oldest post in the Foreign Service. Dates back to the Continental Congress. Indeed, the first consul was wealthy, came from a prosperous [family], was a ship agent from Georgetown and had enough money to build a very handsome building called the Fenwick House, which was the offices of the French line. Pretty much since then we've had a post. It was closed during World War II.

Kennedy was President; one of the most popular American Presidents since Thomas Jefferson in France. He and Mrs. Kennedy made a big impression on the French people. DeGaulle had come back to power. The mayor of Bordeaux was a speaker of the French parliament--a distinguished French political leader by the name of Jacques Chaban- Delmas, who'd been in the French Underground, had been mayor of Paris during the occupation. The story of "Is Paris Burning?" is tied in with this guy, a real hero.

Our consular district was south of the Loire river, the whole southwest of France including the Basque country to Toulouse, that whole area. We had some American military installations in the area. Bordeaux was an important port. When I arrived, General Gavin was the Ambassador. He was succeeded was Charles Bowen. Cecil Lyon was the Minister under both while I was there.

It was personally interesting for me. I visited La Rochelle, where my ancestors came from, on my mother's side, who had emigrated to Quebec in the 17th Century. At least my grandmother's family were Huguenots. I read recently that in order for a Huguenot to get an exit permit, they had to convert to Catholicism. In my mother's family, they were Catholics, but probably both of them were Huguenot families who were leaving the area, and they emigrated to French Canada in 1628, I think.

I learned a couple of things. I am again reminded of the role a Foreign Service local plays. It was something I commented on in my retirement.

Q: They're called Foreign Service nationals employees now.

FUNSETH: Right. In Tabriz, for example, there was a man there named Mohammed Ali Asouf, who was hired when the post was opened during World War I, and every time we closed it he'd take the seals home and the consular files. Then, when we reopened, he'd come back. I never felt that we were really fair to them as employers. Then in Bordeaux, we had this man; his name was Robert Artisian. He has since died. He had worked for us for many, many years; was our senior commercial employee. I remember the department of Commerce thought he was the best one in the world; he generated more export opportunities. But, again, during the occupation he had taken the seals home and classified papers under great personal risk, buried them under his house, and then when we reopened. He said that after the War, he hadn't heard anything. He finally got a letter and he thought it might be a thank you. It was a letter to inform him that the years when the consulate was closed would be subtracted from his years of service for purposes of retirement. I helped, among others, to get him an honor award to recognize his great service during that period.

Another thing I remember, we had a lot of locals [foreign service nationals] who were on sort of temporary [hire]. I converted all of them to permanent employees. Another thing I first learned that I didn't really grasp the full meaning of until recent years. The first inkling I had--I'm talking about the French occupation then. I was walking with Artisian near the square in front of the opera house and, not using the acronym, but the full words, Artisian points to this prominent Bordelais and says, "That son-of-a-bitch was in the SS during the occupation!" I remember talking to him about it and got the impression that an amount of collaboration and going along was quite prevalent in Bordeaux and there weren't that many people in the Underground. There were people in the Underground. Another time I was with Artisian and he pointed out a little old French lady carrying her baguette of bread going home and he said, "You see that woman? I always had at least one and sometimes three downed American pilots in the basement of her house. She was part of the Underground spiriting American pilots out through Spain." That was the first sort of eye-opener I had. The extent of cooperation with the Nazis was more than I realized.

Q: It's still an issue in France. It's almost one they don't...

FUNSETH: Sure, they're now addressing it! It was a factor. I remember the deputy of Bordeaux was the sort of super [Gestapo ?] in several provinces. He had a deputy who was a very senior officer, and a talented, attractive guy. If you've ever met any of the French civil servants in the prefectural service of the ministry of Interior. They're absolutely top flight and comparable to the Foreign Service. Competitive, it's considered a real plum. But this guy had been associated with the Vichy regime. So he was capped. He wasn't going to go any higher than he had.

There were a couple of things, a lot of things in Bordeaux, but of course there are a lot of things you really remember. I remember DeGaulle running for reelection, meeting Chaban-Delmas. I remember when I was acting principal officer, DeGaulle made this gesture to Germany. It was the first big effort for sort of a Franco/German Entente. He invited Adenauer on a state visit to France, the first German Chancellor. There were mixed feelings in France. He wanted him to go outside of Paris. There was no place that was eager to have this German Chancellor, although it was nothing against Adenauer. But again, it was '61, '62, '63. Chaban offered Bordeaux. It was quite interesting, the lead up to Adenauer's arrival. There was a big debate in Bordeaux. I remember going up to, there was sort of an International Club coming out of the EEC, I suspect. I remember this big debate about welcoming Adenauer to Bordeaux. I'll always remember this young French professor stood up and said, "I can't join in any welcome as a Frenchman to a German chancellor coming to Bordeaux. But I can welcome him as a European welcoming another European."

I remember Artisian telling me he was coming to work and the bus driver--you can just see this bus coming down this narrow street and the German flags on all the flagposts because this was the road out of town to Modesque's residence where Adenauer was going--is shouting to everybody and nobody: "Every time I see one of these flags, I want to drive my bus into the lampposts and knock the goddamn thing down!" And Adenauer arrived. As acting principal officer, I had the honor of meeting him. I was presented to Adenauer and I realized it was a historic occasion, this arrival of an unknown.

Another thing that I'll always remember about Bordeaux. Well, a couple of things. I arrived there in September, and November 11 is a big day. (France doesn't celebrate World War II. They celebrate World War I.) There's a suburb right outside of Bordeaux called Tolerance and I was told by the principal officer that Tolerance always laid a wreath and flowers on the remaining graves of the Americans from World War One, and the American Consulate was represented, since 1918, in this ceremony every year. I was a new arrival, so I would have the honor of representing the United States of America. The reason I had the honor was it usually was a cold and rainy day. I remember going to Tolerance - a little city hall - and we marched through the streets. Cold, drenching rain. We laid a wreath on the American grave, then on the French, and then went back to the city hall, the auditorium. There was a French liqueur, Perneau, or something like that. One of the highlights of the day was it was all you could drink and all the veterans, and I gave my first speech in French. I remember it was a good speech. Talked about how we're still bound together, the fight for freedom, and all that. The mayor of Tolerance was the town doctor. He got up and gave a speech in response to what I said and said he didn't disagree with what I said, but, "We must also remember the sacrifices." He remembered, I think it was his father. But the railroad station was on the other side of the river in Bordeaux. They hadn't built a bridge across it. He said, "I remember seeing my uncle going off to Verdun and he never came back." I think he was the one who said there was a village between Bordeaux and Toulouse. There's a monument. "Every man over 18 was killed at Verdun." It was interesting. First, he was right; remember the sacrifice. But it was also illuminating. Here was this man who had not fought in World War One, but probably in World War Two, and they were defeated in World War Two, but they hadn't forgotten Verdun.

But it also demonstrated to me within a month or two after I arrived there, that there was great affection and admiration in that area towards the United States. On the Fourth of July, spontaneously, not organized, I remember going down--I'd heard about it but no one had really said anything--driving down to hoist a large American flag in front of the consulate on the fourth of July. American flags all over Bordeaux! Ordinary people had faded flags; banks had flags! We were the only foreign flag flown over the city hall at Bordeaux on our National Day! Huge American flag flying over the city. It was affection and admiration and real genuine feelings towards the United States.

Q: How were the American soldiers doing there? This was close to the time when basically DeGaulle . . .

FUNSETH: Very well. Yes, but that was not a popular decision in France.

I suppose one of the things I'll remember forever was when I was in Bordeaux, Kennedy was assassinated. You'd probably never forget it no matter where you were, but here I was in Bordeaux, the American consulate. I remember someone called and I turned on the radio and got the news and went down to the consulate. Thought I oughta be there. You know, the good old Foreign Service regulations tell you what to do when the President dies! Anyway, we were in a lovely old building. There are a lot of these in Bordeaux. Built in the 17th and 18th centuries by people associated with shipping - handsome residences - in which the business would sort of be on the first floor and the negotiation or whatever would be upstairs. Well, this building that we were in, the Barkley's Bank building, occupied the ground floor. We were on the première étage, which had been the living quarters, then on the second floor the bank manager had his apartment. The office I had was registered as 17th Century--a beautiful room! Anyway, I went down there, and as I'm going up the landing, I meet the manager of the bank. Tears in his eyes! Throws his arms around me. Then I remember on Thursday or Friday, it seems to me, I read in the regulations: the black crepe you're supposed to fly on the front. I sent an employee down. All of our employees were in various degrees of emotion. But I remember, I think it was Christianne Lumatay, I sent to the department store to find some black crepe. She came back and told me that when the salesgirl recognized she was from the Consulate, she opened her eyes and said, "Pour le Président?" Christianne said, "Yes." And the girl, tears flowing down her cheeks as she measured out the crepe, in memory of Kennedy. We had a line of people that never ended signing the book--all walks of life. We decided to have a memorial mass at the time of the mass that was taking place here in Washington. The consul general decided he wanted it in the cathedral. So I went over and saw the Archbishop. There's another church in Bordeaux that's a very special church. He thought it ought to be there, and he was afraid the cathedral which seated thousands of people--I think it was to be at five o'clock--that people wouldn't be able to come. Because of work and going home; it was an awkward time. We wanted it at the exact time it was taking place here. So he was afraid it wouldn't be full and this would be mistakenly seen as somehow lack of respect or affection which wasn't the case. Anyway, we decided to have it at the cathedral which, incidentally, is the site where Eleanor of Aquitaine was married, across from Jacques Chaban-Delmas' Hôtel de Ville. If you've ever been in France, the veterans' organizations, I remember they called up and said they wanted to be there and wanted to form a guard of honor and would we review them? So, we drove over, my wife and the consulate general and the other consuls and their wives and we went to the city hall first and there were some of the guys I'd seen in Tolerance all lined up; most of them from World War One. Then we walked over to the Cathedral. It's 300 years old and it's sort of settled several feet below. I don't know where they found the flag because we provided one. All of our flags were borrowed and indeed I provided the flag that had flown in front of our consulate to put over the coffin that they had, as they do in Europe, for the person to be remembered. They had this huge American flag in the entrance and as we walked into it, you could hear this music being played on this organ--like a hymn. At first, I didn't recognize it. I mean it was familiar, but it was the Star Spangled Banner played by the organist like a hymn. The Cathedral was packed. They had this huge flag for a king, to cover the coffin and a 10 foot candelabra and seated next to it. You just felt that Kennedy's body was there. And then that night there was a rural parish outside of town and they were going to have a memorial service at 8:00 in the evening. The priest called and asked if someone from the Consulate would go. I went out. It was as magnificent as the one in the cathedral. Yet here it was just a rural parish with farmers coming in, and it was packed for Kennedy.

Q: It's really very difficult in these days to duplicate this. Kennedy was under the new generation. A new hope for everybody. I mean, as realists in the Foreign Service, I've always been sort of amazed. I was in Belgrade at the time and we had a memorial service at the Catholic cathedral, which was small. It was packed with communist officials. The first time many of them had ever been in church except when they were baptized. Did troops cause a problem for you, or not? I mean, American troops.

FUNSETH: We had no incidents. We took care of their citizenship needs. We had no problems with American military. They were still there when I left. It was the supply line. One of the largest ammunition dumps in Europe was south of Bordeaux. They all come through the port of Bordeaux. It was a logistic lifeline. Then in La Rochelle there was a port.

The other thing I hadn't--I just thought of it--reminding me, I was a Naval officer in World War II. But in both Bordeaux and in La Rochelle were [these bunkers]. I tell you, they really looked ominous when you see them. These huge concrete things. You can't destroy them. They're built so powerfully. I don't know what they do with them in Bordeaux. In La Rochelle they use them as an underground boat marina. But I mean there's just something stealth-like about them.

Q: What about the communist party? Is it very strong in Bordeaux?

FUNSETH: It was strong in Bordeaux. That's a good question, Stu, because I remember this big election I covered. I was the only foreign consul that certainly did it. But, also having been a newspaper reporter, I suppose, I went to all the rallies. They had big rallies and DeGaulle's Party, and the radical socialists, and the socialist's home. And I went to the communist's. It was an open meeting. Very interesting. They were all held in the auditorium in the city hall. Public auditorium. And the communist, I think, was the last one. You know, you'd go in, and it was decorated with the party flags all over the place. And then, whoever they were supporting--DeGaulle or whomever else. But for the communists, they'd taken down the French Flag and the communist flag was flying over. A different group of people. It sort of reminded me of a volunteer fire department. They had the auxiliary. It was very much of a social thing. Husbands and wives and children and the junior auxiliary. "We have to raise money because we don't have the money that the bourgeoisie and the capitalists do", I mean the jargon was all different. But there wasn't much talked about Vive La France. It was mostly vive the people. There was a lot of talk of Marxist/Leninism. You know, that famous head of the French Communist party for decades was still head of it.

I'll always remember at the end of the rally when they were talking about how we need money so our candidates can compete against the capitalists. There were four very attractive young French girls from the Communist Youth League who were collecting the money. They had a hammer and sickle flag and people were giving their money to the Communist party. The communists controlled the labor unions. CGT, the docks and the shipyards. The Marcel Darceau Aviation plant, where DeGaulle was building his nuclear strike force, the "force that flopped", was CGT dominated. They never were a significant voice. The Bordeaux area was pretty strong DeGaullist and radical Socialist.

I have to remark on the difference between General Gavin and Charles Bohlen as ambassador. There was a wine-tasting competition, une tasse de vin, or whatever, at this wine drinking fraternity. It was a trade promotion. At the time of the harvest, they dressed in robes. Like honorary degrees at a distinguished college, people try to bring in distinguished people. Huge luncheons or dinners at a chateaux, 400 people, fantastic wine. When Gavin came down--it was the first year I was there. They give you this glass of wine and you smell it and you're supposed to guess what it is, and unless you give the right answer you cannot become a commandant of the vignerons. But it's all part of a joke. I mean, the guy whispers in your ear what it is and you go through the motions and smell it, and then you say what year it is and what the chateaux is. I remember an unnamed person in Paris called me and said General Gavin's schedule was down to the minute. You know, the ambassador arrives one minute, everything minute by minute. Well, the head of the ceremonies was the owner of the Chateaux Gloria, which was then not marketed in the United States. I remember encouraging him to market it because it's across the street from Beshville. It's a darn good wine, but it doesn't sell for the same price. His name was Henri Martet. He also owned the Bordeaux football team. Anyway, I remember telling the Embassy, "You know, I haven't been here very long but . . . I mean, I have no idea. Tell him not to worry about it! When he gets here, we'll tell him. We probably won't decide until that day." Well, that wasn't good enough for General Gavin. I was so embarrassed. Finally, we bugged them and bugged them and Martet told us what wine it would be and what year, and we conveyed that and the visit was a great success.

Then Bohlen came. Totally relaxed, you know. The question never came up. I sort of told him to stay loose on it and then, I think it was the chateaux where he was staying. (I think Joan Kennedy was there at the same time). Anyway, he was great. We gave him a background of the chateaux. He was fluent in French. He stood up and went through the whole thing. Swirled the glass around, bouquet and the name of the chateau, and the whole works.

Q: I take it the whole time there, there weren't any major issues that the embassy was particularly concerned about in Bordeaux, that they were pressing you on?

FUNSETH: Well, you know, yes, it was the whole period of DeGaulle, this business of Adenauer coming down was a big event. But we were primarily a consulate promoting trade and commerce, protecting American citizens, and issuing visas. We did weekly political reports on developments in Southwest France, which covered quite an area. Basque separatism. I remember we reported on it when the French still didn't recognize they had a problem with the Basques!

And they did. We reported on that, the DeGaulle thing, Adenauer, there were elections in that period. Trade promotion. We were a very good post on trade promotion, protection. We had a lot of American citizens living in the area. I remember the University of California established a junior year abroad at the University of Bordeaux. Very impressive! They had a lot of resources. It was a very interesting

Q: Sounds like you had a good, solid . . .

FUNSETH: Three years. It was a real great, and I've always been very partial on these constituent posts. I remember there was an election there and, because we were closer to what was going on--I can't remember what the outcome was--read all the local papers. We subscribed to every newspaper in the province, primarily probably for trade opportunities, but also just doing your job so you understood what's going on. And absorbing all that. I remember I called the election much closer than the embassy did. We just knew more of what was going on. In Europe you have prominent political figures come back home. I mean Marcel Foureaux, the head of the Socialist Party, was Mayor of a nearby town. Each of these mayors were important political personalities in Paris and they came home a lot. We had more access to Chaban-Delmas than people in Paris did. I thought, in our area, and I'm sure the other consulates did, we certainly promoted trade. We had a good cultural and information program and represented the United States.

Q: We'll stop at this point now and next time we'll pick up when you left Bordeaux.

WILLIAM V.P. NEWLIN
Special Assistant to the Economic Minister
Paris (1961-1964)

Mr. Newlin was born and raised in Pennsylvania. He obtained degrees from Harvard University and the Fletcher School and, after serving a tour with the US Army, joined the Foreign Service in 1960. A generalist, Mr. Newlin's service took him to France, Guatemala and Belgium, where he dealt primarily with European Organizations and NATO. In Washington his assignments concerned Trade, Law of the Sea and other economic matters. Mr. Newlin was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2001.

Q: You were in Paris from 1962 to when?

NEWLIN: To 1964.

Q: What was your job in Paris?

NEWLIN: They had a new system then. Junior officers when they went overseas rotated throughout the embassy. I went to Paris on the Queen Mary at government expense, first class with my three children. We had a lovely trip over. On the boat with us was another guy who had been to Harvard Law as a graduate student. He was unmarried, but he and I were friendly. Here are these two Harvard graduate degree guys arriving in Paris. We are taken in hand by the personnel officer. We both want to know what we're going to do. He said, "Oh, you're not going to do anything. You're here to observe. You're going to be sent around throughout different offices in the mission and you'll observe what they do and learn – except when you're doing visa work. Then you'll be really working. But the rest of the time, you're just supposed to really observe." You can imagine how that struck us. We were at the beginning of our diplomatic careers ready to change the world and we're being told that we're being put on hold. But I had met a guy before I went out who was interested to learn that I was going to Paris. He wrote for "The New York Times." His name was Ed Dale. He wrote economic stuff. He said, "I've got a friend in Paris in the embassy. I'll write him and tell him to look out for you. His name is Jacques Reinstein. He is the economic minister-counselor there." I said to this personnel guy, "Okay, but I'd like to talk to Mr. Reinstein." He said, "You can't talk to Mr. Reinstein. Don't be ridiculous. You're you and he's the third guy in the embassy." Then we went to lunch. I called Reinstein's office. His secretary put me right through to him. He said, "Oh, I've been waiting for you to come. What are you doing for lunch?" I said, "Nothing." We had lunch together. He said, "I want you to work for me. I want you to work very closely in my office as my assistant. When can you start?" I said, "I don't see why I couldn't start now." He said, "That's fabulous." I said, "But I've got this thing with the personnel director." He said, "Don't worry about the personnel director. I'll take care of the personnel director." I guess I called him. I said, "I've just had lunch with Mr. Reinstein and he has told me to report for work at 2:00. He says that he'll arrange details." Pasqual could barely speak, he was so furious. But that's where I started. I started as Jacques Reinstein's flunky in the Economic Section. He needed a flunky. He was very disorganized. He was brilliant. I had great respect for him and was very fond of him, but he was very disorganized. It was very hard to work for him. It wasn't so hard for me to work for him because he took me as his alter ego. The guy who got off the boat with me and I were the most junior persons in the embassy. Therefore, I posed no threat whatsoever to him. I didn't mind when he spoke bluntly to me. I had no ego that I was protecting. So, we got along just fine. I, of course, sat in on all these meetings, which was a very interesting thing to me. I view perhaps that what Pasqual said was going to happen, happened. But in fact, it didn't quite. Reinstein really needed an assistant and I became that assistant. It was a great deal more than just looking over his shoulder. Then I would work closely with all the guys in the Economic Section, who came to see me as an ally working with Reinstein. They'd come to a meeting and Reinstein would say to do a paper one way. The guy would say, "Yes, we could do it that way, but if we did, we'd bump into this problem." He'd say, "Yes, you're right. Do it this way." He'd end up with three or four ways he had said. The guys would come back to me and say, "Alright, Newlin, what in the world does he want?" We'd go through our notes and try to figure it out. If we couldn't figure it out, the guys would say to me, "You're going to see if we can sort this out." I would go back in and say, "I'm thinking about that talk you had with Mike Ely. You guys were talking about a lot of things." From my talk with Ely, I'd know how he wanted to do it. I'd say, "Ely thinks this, this, and this. How would that be?" Reinstein would say, "Yes, except make this this." I could take that back to Ely and it would clarify things. It was an interesting position which clearly put me into the substantive loop, albeit in a peripheral way.

Q: Jacques Reinstein has made quite a name for himself in the Foreign Service. He was responsible for setting up the economic course, which was sort of the pearl of the State Department educational system.

NEWLIN: Yes. He was a very, very bright guy. It was a wonderful experience. He was a lonely sort of a guy who needed to have people around him. He couldn't possibly eat alone. If he didn't have someone to eat with, I kind of had to keep myself free so that he could say, "Come on, Newlin, let's go to lunch."

Q: What were you gathering about the economic situation in France at this time and American interests there?

NEWLIN: The big issue then was the beginning of the Common Market. The French were beginning... We weren't quite sure how the Common Market was going to play out. There was the common agricultural policy. My recollection of it is that Washington did not wish to believe and did not wish to hear that we really were going to be faced with a common tariff and that we were going to be the outsiders in Europe. It was very clear to the embassy that that's exactly what was going to happen. Reinstein would report that that was what was going to happen. Washington would come back and not wish to hear it. Reinstein had good relations with the top economic guy in the foreign office and the top French guy in the economic office. I think he was very well informed. I think that Reinstein kind of made himself a little bit unpopular in Washington. He kept coming back with this bad news.

Q: Who was our ambassador?

NEWLIN: It was Gavin. Kennedy had just come in and he picked Gavin, who had liberated France. 81st Airborne.

Q: What was your impression of the French bureaucracy and how they dealt with the United States? This was high de Gaulle times. De Gaulle was staking out a separate course. Was this reflected at the professional level on the economic side?

NEWLIN: That's precisely what we were dealing with. They were staking out their separate course and they were not listening to us. They had no intention of listening to us. They were going to stake out their course. They were negotiating with Europe and they were negotiating with England. We had views on how they should do this negotiation and they didn't give a damn to hear our views. I think that that's quite what we were dealing with.

Q: One of the interesting things is when a junior officer comes to an embassy, you're the new boy on the block, your antenna are out there. You're picking up emanations that maybe the older hands don't pick up. What was your feeling with Reinstein and others that you were observing about dealing with France? Was France just a pain in the ass? Particularly de Gaulle... Was it a matter of admiration for France and we were going to work things out? How were we coming at it?

NEWLIN: It's all of the above. I don't want to say that France was a pain in the ass and I don't want to say that we had admiration for France and we thought we were going to work all this out. In Washington, there was still the feeling that France was going to do what we wanted them to do, that basically we were so much more powerful than they that we were going to be able to call certain shots.

Q: George Ball was pretty much in control of things. He was a great Europeanist.

NEWLIN: Absolutely. Ball came over several times. I sat in on Reinstein's talks with Ball and had some time with Ball as a fly on the wall. Ball got it, but there were people in Washington who didn't get it.

Q: Did you have any dealings with the French bureaucracy?

NEWLIN: Not very much. I didn't have to arrange Reinstein's representational stuff. Most of the time, it was done in restaurants. I didn't do that kind of thing.

Q: Did you have any feel for the bureaucracy? I'm told that the crème de la crème of the French system is people dealing with economic matters.

NEWLIN: Yes. They had very bright people. They had very bright people who were doing the "chef de cabinet" (office director) job.

Q: That is the aide but more than the aide. It's a professional person who holds the Department together.

NEWLIN: Absolutely. Reinstein liked to think that I was his chef de cabinet. But in fact, the people that I was dealing with, who were the real chefs de cabinet of the people that he wanted me to be dealing with, knew the issues much better than I did. It was hard for me, particularly at the beginning, to see these guys one on one and really have a very intelligent conversation with them about what they were working on. They knew it so well and it was all so new to me. It was new to me when I left, too.

Q: It takes years to build up an expertise in something like that.

Sometimes a junior officer brought in to be the staff assistant to the head of a large section... How did you find dealing with Mike Ely and the other people in the Economic Section? Did you find you had a problem?

NEWLIN: No. They were very nice people. We were very lucky with the people who were there. Tom Smith was there, a lovely man. I posed no threat to any of them. I was in a position to be helpful to them and wanted to be helpful to them, wanted it to work. They wanted it to work and I wanted it to work and Reinstein wanted it to work. Having me there helped make it work. I didn't feel that we had anything but a good relationship.

Q: How long did you keep the job?

NEWLIN: I guess about a year and a half. Finally, they kind of found me and decided they had to do something else with me. They sent me to NATO (North Atlantic Treaty Organization). I worked with John Auchincloss. There, Thomas Finletter was our ambassador.

Q: He at one point was Secretary of the Air Force.

NEWLIN: Yes. The issue there was the multilateral force, an absolutely cockamamie idea. I always thought it was a cockamamie idea. I thought that when I was there. I think it now. That was what we were trying to get everyone to agree with.

Q: Within the NATO and American embassy community, what were you picking up about the view of de Gaulle?

NEWLIN: De Gaulle was very aloof and very stubborn. De Gaulle was going to do it his way. It was just shortly after that that they moved the NATO headquarters. We were still in Paris when I was there. De Gaulle essentially threw NATO out.

Q: Was there a lot of gnashing of teeth?

NEWLIN: Yes. That's my recollection.

Q: Were you there during the assassination of Kennedy?

NEWLIN: Yes.

Q: How did that play out?

NEWLIN: Oh, it was a terrible time. It was the time you could say the French were the closest to us. There was a great deal of sympathy in France for the American loss of Kennedy. They had admired Kennedy. Of course, they admired Mrs. Kennedy. At every level – I can't speak for the de Gaulle level – there was an outpouring of sympathy and understanding in France. In fact, to an extent after this Trade Tower bombing [September 11, 2001], our French friends, many of them, made a big effort to call us, send us notes, send us sympathetic things that had been written about it.

Q: How did you and your wife find Paris?

NEWLIN: We loved it in Paris. We lived right in Paris. We lived in the 16th. We would have rather lived on the Left Bank somewhere, but we had these three kids. We had to have a biggish apartment. The easiest place to find biggish apartments is in the very bourgeois 16th. We early on found quite a good jeune fille au pair who stayed with us the whole time and in fact came back to Washington with us, which had several implications. Of course, she didn't speak any English, so it meant that the kids all learned French very quickly. French became the first language of all three of them. Our oldest son learned to read first in French. My wife and I just loved living in Paris. We had gone to the University of Grenoble in the winter of '55-'56, part of our extended honeymoon. We had gotten to know a lot of young French people there. They were back in Paris when we came back, working in junior jobs in the various ministries. Very shortly after I started working with Reinstein, I gave a cocktail party. We invited all these people. Maybe we had been there four months. We were well settled into our apartment and this was our first big function. I sent Reinstein a list of the people who were coming. I gave a little squib on who they were or who their daddies were. I put them in context. He was quite flabbergasted. He said, "Newlin, what is this? You have just come." Well, I explained that it was just the Grenoble mafia. It turned out that those people who we knew in Grenoble all had come back and their daddies had been interesting people or they now were doing interesting things. It had nothing to do with my having worked very fast in my first four months in Paris. It was just that we had kept in touch with these people. They were there and we had picked back up with them. But we had a lovely time in Paris.

Q: As it comes to all men, in 1964, you had to leave-

NEWLIN: Well, we haven't quite finished my Paris tour. Just before I left, they decided that I had never done any visa work and that everybody had to do some visa work. I had to do some visa work. I'll tell you something that happened when I was in Paris. Twice when I was in Paris, people encouraged us to be interested in consular work. One was when Perry Cully, the consul general, came in. He got all the junior officers together and said, "You guys think you want to be political officers and you don't. Look around you. The best and the brightest all want to be political officers. If some of you will let yourself be consular officers, you'll have interesting work and you will rise in the Foreign Service more quickly. Don't forget that." Also, John Auchincloss said essentially the same thing. He said he had been in a consulate in Italy somewhere. I heard him talking Italian to his maid. He said, "I had a wonderful time. That was very interesting work. You really had things to do." I had this one little brief tour with the consular section and the visa section. I probably made a bigger influence, a bigger change on what went on there than anywhere else. When I came in, I was "framed" by the young officers who were running the Non-Immigrant Visa Section. They told me how to deal with students. They said, "Students are a real problem. They want to go over there and just knock around footloose and fancy free. Of course, you can't let them. You've got to have enough money to live over there. Therefore, you've got to prove they're going to come back. You need this and that and this and that letter to say they're going to come back. You've got to have notarized things from their university that they're coming back. B, you have to show that they're not going to become public charges. $400 is enough to show that they won't become public charges." So, of course, this same wad of $400 got passed from student to student. It was just preposterous. You come in with $400 and you've satisfied the requirement. It's just ridiculous. You come in with all these letters in handwriting from somebody. You've got no idea who it is. It says he's going to come back and therefore he's met the requirements, so you send him off. So, these guys all evacuated. They all left. I was left as the senior American officer in the Non-Immigrant Visa Section. I had been there two weeks longer than the guy who was behind me. So, I got to train a bunch of people. I said, "When students come in - you can recognize a student - your job is to use that as an opportunity to clear out the waiting room. Students don't need to take very long. You want to send them off enthusiastic. So, establish to your satisfaction that they're students and get them out of here. Tell them to have a good time." I didn't make them scrape together $400. I didn't make them get a whole bunch of useless letters. I think that was the way to treat students and I think that was a good thing to do. I don't know how long it lasted after I left.

Q: Of course, you knew the French would come back for the most part. Some of them would get jobs. The present president of France, Jacques Chirac, went to the United States as a student. At one point, he was working in McDonald's or someplace flipping hamburgers.

NEWLIN: That was not something that was in our control. I didn't want to try to fight that losing battle.

Q: In some other countries, you've got real problems with the students because they don't come back. But when you're dealing with the French, they come back. What's the point?

NEWLIN: I just didn't think any of these people were trying to emigrate to the U.S. If they were, they could surely get their wad of $400 and letter saying that they were going to come back. There was nothing that was being done before that would prevent the serious one who wished to emigrate from doing so.

Q: It was also one of these bureaucratic things that gives the officer a feeling of power and makes for ill will.

NEWLIN: That's exactly what I thought. The other good thing that happened to me in the visa section is that I got to give the Beatles their visa for their first tour in the U.S. They came to the office to get their visas.

Q: Were they quite renowned at that time?

NEWLIN: Yes.

Q: Did this cause a lot of stir in the office?

NEWLIN: Yes, absolutely. I decided how we would deal with the... There was another officer there, George Lowe. He took two visas and I took two visas. We had a lottery in the office to see which of the French staff were going to get their autographs signed. One person was going to be allowed to get autographs done. The Beatles were very cute about doing that. We made it quick for them, of course. But I said, "What's it like being a Beatle? What do you like the most?" They said, "The nicest thing about being a Beatle is not having to do things like this. You get people who do stuff for you."

Q: Time moved on. 1964. Whither?

NEWLIN: In '64, I came back to the Department and was assigned to the Trade Agreements Section of the Department in the Economic Office.

ANTHONY GEBER
Development Assistance Advisor, OECD
Paris (1961-1967)

Anthony Geber was born in Budapest, Hungary on February 18, 1919. He immigrated to the United States to attend college and was subsequently, was drafted into the U.S. military. His Foreign Service career included positions in Djakarta, Vienna, and Seoul. This interview was conducted by Thomas Dunnigan on August 24, 1993.

Q: After your interesting time in the Department, it was off to Paris and into the OECD for you, which seems to flow naturally from what you have just been telling us.

GEBER: Yes. Having become a development expert by then, and having worked on the creation of the Development Assistance Committee (DAC), my next assignment was to the OECD in Paris. I became the development assistance advisor to our mission at the OECD.

Q: Were programs coordinated among the donors and the receivers?

GEBER: No, not really. DAC did not coordinate programs of donor countries in individual developing countries. The Secretariat prepared information on the direction of the donors' aid -- by regions, I believe -- but DAC's main preoccupation remained the volume and terms of aid provided by its members. Other topics discussed in DAC related to various aspects of the effectiveness of aid. One of the most important activities of DAC was the periodic examination of each member's aid policies. This was a procedure used in several other committees of the OECD. The Secretariat prepared an analytical paper, in consultation with the given member, on its aid policies. On a set date the member country made an oral presentation of its policies and the other members were invited to comment and critique the policies; usually two or three member delegations were designated as lead questioners. After such a meeting the Secretariat revised its paper in light of the discussions and issued it in its own name. It should not be surprising that the final paper could not include criticism to which the member delegation strenuously objected; still it was a reasonably objective evaluation, and whatever criticism the paper contained was often welcomed by the responsible aid officials for strengthening their hand in their internal battles.

I must tell you an amusing story. It was the day of the examination of the French aid program. The American delegation was designated as one of the lead questioners. We prepared to be rather critical of French policies in the aid field: the overwhelming portion of French aid was directed to the few francophone countries of Africa; much of the aid consisted of the salaries of French civil servants and teachers who, whatever good they did for those countries, they also helped maintain the French infrastructure there.

The French delegation was headed by Andre deLattre, an Assistant Secretary in the Ministry of Finance and an inspecteur des finances, that fabulous breed of French civil servants, who, if they survived their elite and rigorous training, excelled among their peers. M. deLattre made a brilliant presentation of the French aid program, anticipating all critical questions, explaining as best he could why things were as they were, and promising improvements in the future, and all that in the most beautiful and articulate French. So, there was not much point in asking the questions we had prepared, and Sy Rubin, the head of our delegation, asked only why deLattre, explaining the constraints on the French program, used repeatedly the English words, "pressure groups". DeLattre replied that if would have had to use a French expression he would have said, "lobbies".

Sy Rubin, with the rank of Minister, was sent by the foreign aid administration in Washington, which took over the backstopping of DAC from the State Department. I served for a while on the delegation representing State but after three years doing DAC work I switched to become trade advisor to our mission. Not long after that change I was elected chairman of the Trade Committee Working Party, a subordinate group of the OECD Trade Committee. The Trade Committee met twice a year and its members were trade officials from the members' capitals, whereas the Working Party was a standing committee, its members from the resident delegations. Its function was to do the preparatory work for the Trade Committee meetings.

The main agenda of the Trade Committee and its Working Party in my time was two fold. We were working on non-tariff barriers, such as government procurement practices, customs nomenclature, border taxes, etc. with the objective of setting forth guidelines to harmonize members' practices. The other part of the Trade Committee's agenda was to try to coordinate the members' positions on trade issues in relations to developing countries. This became increasingly important after the developing countries, dissatisfied with their role in GATT, created the UN Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD). In the first meeting of that organization in Geneva the developing countries took a highly confrontational attitude toward the developed countries, and the latter found themselves in considerable disarray.

It was not easy to make progress in the Trade Committee, or generally in the OECD. Two examples will illustrate. As I mentioned, eliminating or reducing non-tariff barriers was one of the main topics discussed in the Trade Committee. It was decided to attempt the formulation of a code or set of guidelines for non-discriminatory government procurement practices, such as open bidding procedures. It was not an easy task, most countries, including the United States, having national laws and practices which they were reluctant to modify. The Working Party had numerous meetings, and the Secretariat draft paper was revised several times. Finally, it seemed there was general agreement, and prior sounding suggested that at the next meeting of the Working Party the proposed guidelines would be approved to be forwarded to the Trade Committee and from there to the Council to be issued as an OECD Recommendation to the member governments. At the meeting one representative after another approved the document until we came to the delegate from Portugal who in a long statement declared that his government could not approve the guidelines because there is a great deal of difference between his centrally governed country and the federally constituted United States; therefore these guidelines would have a differential impact in the two countries. No pleading that at least he should abstain, which would have allowed the application of the recommendations to the other members, could persuade him to desist from his objection.

The other illustration occurred in connection with coordinating OECD members' positions on trade issues concerning developing countries. The question before the Working Party was how should OECD members vote in UNCTAD on resolutions pushed by the developing countries against which OECD members have objections; it was understood that UNCTAD resolutions have no legally binding character. The US representative argued that OECD members should stand on principle, and should vote against resolutions to which they object. Other members were more inclined not to aggravate unnecessarily the confrontation with the developing countries, and go along or abstain on objectionable resolution. That point of view was most concisely and perhaps somewhat cynically expressed by the French representative, who very solemnly declared that the French government is prepared to support and will abide by any UN resolution of which it approves.

Still, one should not belittle the usefulness and accomplishments of the OECD. For instance, on the question of granting preferential tariff treatment to developing countries, one of the urgent demands of the Third World, the United States found itself isolated in its opposition. It was in the OECD, in a four member task force, that a scheme for a generalized system of preferences (GSP) was worked out which made it possible for the United States to adopt such a system. Similarly, a dispute between the US and the European maritime countries over the rate setting in maritime trade was resolved in the OECD.

More generally, the reviews of member countries' economic policies, and subsequent publication of the findings, are acclaimed throughout the world by economists in and out of governments. Many important studies, on fiscal policy, on labor, etc. are useful to policy makers and academics. A development research institute, initiated by the Kennedy administration, did excellent work and provided a bridge between the OECD and developing countries. Every once in a while we got together in the US mission to ask ourselves what we have accomplished. Very often the feeling was, "not very much". But when we looked back over a two or three year period, we could see that whereas earlier there were issues which countries considered their sovereign right and could not be subject for discussion in a multilateral forum, they began to realize that an exchange of views was in their interest. Just the fact that the OECD brings economic experts and policy makers from capitals together has its value. I remember a story a very distinguished pre-war president of the Hungarian National Bank, who later was consultant to the German Bundesbank and the World Bank, told me. It was in the 1930's, when all over the world trade barriers were raised, multiple exchange systems were introduced, that a friend asked him what good it does to attend the monthly meetings of central bankers at the Bank of International Settlement, since the bank is completely ineffective and had no enforcement powers. His answer was, that the fact that the central bankers had to look each other in the eye every month prevented them from doing much worse. The OECD has done better than that.

Talking about a former Hungarian bank president, I have one other anecdote I would like to tell. In preparation for an UNCTAD meeting the Trade Committee tasked the Trade Committee Working Party to prepare a study of developing countries' trade policies with a view to demonstrate that their generally practiced protectionism and import substitution policies are hurting them as much, if not more, than any trade policies of the industrialized countries. Such a study would enable the OECD members to take a less defensive position in UNCTAD.

It was clear to me that the OECD Trade Committee Working Party was not qualified to undertake such a study, even with the help of the Secretariat. I was greatly relieved when I found out that the World Bank has engaged a small group of very competent economists to undertake such a study. This I learned from the director of the World Bank's Paris office who also told me that the head of the team will be shortly coming to Paris. I thought that the best way the Working Party could comply with the awkward mandate of the Trade Committee, is to invite the World Bank representative and the distinguished economist charged with the study, have them brief us on how they plan to proceed, and report that to the Trade Committee. I tell this little story because at the meeting I as chairman, flanked by the Paris office director of the World Bank (Mr. Arthur Karasz) and the World Bank economist (Mr. Béla Balassa). We were sitting at the head of the conference table and chatted in Hungarian.

Q: The Hungarians taking over the world!

GEBER: Well, Hungarians were known as nuclear physicists and as orchestra conductors, so now you can add economists.

Q: May I ask a question Tony? During your years there did you notice a developing cooperation among the European countries because the Common Market was beginning to gel at that time? Was there ever a tendency for them to speak together or coordinate their policy ahead of time for meetings?

GEBER: The European Community (EC) was represented by a separate delegation in the OECD which functioned the same way as the country delegations. Furthermore, at least before any major meeting, members of the EC held a coordinating session. Member countries could still speak for themselves. While this arrangement fostered the cohesion among the members of the EC, it allowed less flexibility for its members to speak their own mind. Mind you, this was still in the days when the EC consisted only of the original members of the Rome Treaty and when de Gaulle did everything in his power to keep the British (and others) out of the EC.

One thing that I meant to mention, it was interesting to see the European bureaucracies and how they differed. The French were absolutely magnificent. They were self-assured, they could engage in discussions expressing their personal views, they didn't have to have detailed instructions, etc. The Germans were in the old European tradition mostly not economists but legally trained and had to stick to the letter of their instructions. I think next to the French some of the best people were the Dutch.

May I go back for a moment to my days in Germany.

Q: Of course.

GEBER: I do not want to take away the great merit of such really farsighted Frenchmen as M. Monnet and M. Schuman, but the beginnings of European cooperation, the European Coal and Steel Community, has probably as much to do with US and British policy in Germany, as with Mr. Schuman.

Q: The Schuman Plan.

GEBER: M. Schuman undoubtedly had the vision of Franco-German cooperation in the post-war world, but I had some insight into workings of the French bureaucracy to believe that it somewhat grudgingly accepted the European Coal and Steel Community as a defensive measure. Realizing that dismantling in the Ruhr was coming to an end around 1947 and that the British and US were willing to join forces and build up the German coal and steel industry, the French decided that they had better join the Coal and Steel Community. I suspect that they still had in mind that thereby they can still control German steel capacity. The Maginot line mentality disappeared only slowly.

Q: You were in Paris during the high years of President de Gaulle. Was his imprint noticeable at all on any of the work that you did or any of the attitude of the French?

GEBER: We felt it much more personally in our private lives than in our official life. I cited to you the statement made by the French representative on UNCTAD resolutions. Generally, the French were no great believers in coordinating OECD positions vis-a-vis the developing countries. All that had a de Gaullist flavor. But on the whole they were quite cooperative in the OECD. It was an institution to their liking and they were pleased to have it in their capital. Also quite a few of the French officials who represented France in the various meetings and in the Secretariat had friendly feelings toward the US. Among them I would count Ambassador François Valéry, the head of the French delegation to the OECD and the son of the famous French poet, Paul Valéry. It was a different story with NATO which de Gaulle sent packing to Belgium.

Q: He did while you were there.

RICHARD J. DOLS
Consular Officer
Bordeaux (1962-1963)

Richard J. Dols was born in Minnesota in 1932. He joined the Foreign Service in 1961. His career included positions in France, Canada, New Zealand, and Swaziland. Mr. Dols was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1992.

Q: Your first post was Bordeaux where you served from 1962-3. What were you doing there?

DOLS: Consular work. Remember that was the time when we had a big military establishment in France. We had military bases everywhere. So most of our business was concerned with citizenship problems of one sort or other. Lots of them.

Q: These were American soldiers marrying French women?

DOLS: French women, reports of birth, dual national problems. The soldier who comes in and says, "The French are trying to draft me." "Why are they trying to draft you?" "Oh, my mother is French." "Were you born in France?" "Yes, I was born in France." "How did you get US nationality?" "Oh, my father was an American soldier." "When were you born?" "Nineteen forty three." "Where were you born?" "Lille, northern France." "Nineteen forty three and your father was an American soldier in Lille? Are you sure about that? The invasion didn't take place until 1944, was he a downed flier?" "No, he was an infantry man." A light goes on. "Well, maybe he wasn't my father."

There were many cases like that. What happened is that he wasn't the father, the American soldier who arrived later on and married the French woman with the child and they went to the States and he was derivatively naturalized when his mother became naturalized. So what do you do with the French government? They want him for service. Well the solution was send them to Germany on a quick transfer.

There were constant problems of that sort. A lot of dual national problems.

Q: I was going to ask. This is a little slice of life that we forget about. This was when France was still fully in NATO. What was your impression and those who worked with you on this of dealing with the French authorities on this? Was it difficult?

DOLS: They were cooperative. The Alliance greased the skids for cooperation on everything. Chaban, later the Prime Minister, was the mayor of Bordeaux in those days. He was very friendly. He was an influential politician even at that time. So we got good cooperation on the local level. The police intelligence types helped us with criminal problems.

Q: So you weren't feeling the strains that de Gaulle brought?

DOLS: That really all happened after my time.

Q: One last thing, this was sort of the height of the Kennedy period and all that. Kennedy had made an extra effort on France. Was this reflected even in Bordeaux?

DOLS: It was indeed. John Kennedy was the topic of conversation among all the Bordelaise elite, at least. They loved him. They thought he was absolutely the greatest.

Q: You then came back and they grabbed you for legal work.

DOLS: Yes. We had just completed negotiations on the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations. What they needed was somebody to draft the final report of the delegation because these reports provided almost the only behind the scenes documentation of what happened during the negotiations and was, of course, an aid in interpreting in future years the Convention. The Legal Adviser's Office was naive about this. They realized that if you write the report, you have the only background on negotiations and you can fashion things appropriately to the national interest. So that was the project I worked on. In fact, I did it solely by myself.

Q: This consular convention, which is still basically the governing consular convention...

DOLS: The universal one.

Q: What was the American attitude about this? Did it go the way we wanted? Were there disappointing things in it? Were there compromises in it that we felt weakened it?

DOLS: It was a long, long negotiation on an agreement with hundreds and hundreds of provisions. We were involved with up to 50 other countries in the negotiations. We didn't get our way on everything. I would say this that our position was surprisingly enlightened, it wasn't a narrow national interest position at all. The Legal Adviser's Office realized that on consular law questions you find yourself on one side one day and the other side of the issue the next day. So what you really ought to do is try to fashion an agreement that serves the best interest in the purest sense. Don't let it be driven by current issues, in other words.

Q: Well, it is quite true. There are problems in every category and are constantly changing. For example, like your Frenchman being drafted. We have the same problem in the United States. We get very hot if somebody tries to draft an American citizen, but we draft foreigners ourselves.

DOLS: Indeed.

THOMAS F. CONLON
Consul
Le Havre (1962-1963)

Thomas F. Conlon was born in Illinois in 1924 and received his BS from Georgetown University in 1948. He served overseas in the US Army from 1943-1945. Upon entering the Foreign Service, he was posted in Havana, Surabaya, Singapore, Saigon, Le Havre, Manila, Nice, Canberra, and Bangkok. In 1992 Mr. Conlon was interviewed by Arbor W. Gray.

Q: But, of course, much of the Vietnam controversy lay in the future. You left Saigon in 1962.

CONLON: Yes, I was assigned as Consul at the American Consulate in Le Havre, France. This was a small post--two American officers and five French employees--essentially providing consular service in Northern France. This was an opportunity for me to travel through much of the area involved in the Normandy invasion of 1944 and the subsequent liberation of France. I took advantage of this opportunity. Some six weeks after I had arrived in Le Havre in August, 1962, I was told by Consul General Herb Fales in Paris that, for budgetary reasons, it had been decided to close the Consulate and that I would probably be assigned to the Embassy in Paris. The final decision on closing the Consulate was delayed, however, until May, 1963, largely because of the Cuban Missile Crisis of 1962. It turned out that the Consulate in Le Havre was needed to issue "Navicerts" to French merchant vessels entering the quarantine area the U. S. had proclaimed around Cuba. The French, of course, continued to have regular freight service to Martinique and Guadeloupe in the West Indies. Meanwhile, my wife and I had become concerned over the spotty kind of education our children were getting in French schools and decided to ask for an assignment to Washington.

It was easy to arrange an assignment to the Department of State, where I was posted as Deputy Director of the Vietnam Working Group, as the Vietnam desk was then called. We left Le Havre in late July, 1963, on the SS AMERICA, and arrived in New York in August. From there we went down to Washington, D. C.

NORBERT L. ANSCHUTZ
Political Counselor
Paris (1962-1964)

Norbert L. Anschutz was born in 1915 and raised in Kansas City, Missouri. He entered the Foreign Service in 1946. His career included positions in Greece, Thailand, France, and Egypt. Mr. Anschutz was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on July 13, 1992.

Q: Your next assignment was to Paris from 1962-64. What were you doing and how did you get that assignment?

ANSCHUTZ: With the change of administration there were naturally widespread changes throughout the Service. I was offered the opportunity to come back to Washington as Chief of Foreign Service Personnel, but I wasn't interested in the job. I really wanted to continue in the activities in political work. I wanted to go to Paris, not so much because it was Paris, but to improve my French. So in the course of human events it was decided that I should go to Paris as the Political Counselor with rank of Minister. It was a direct transfer in 1962.

I was in Paris just long enough to go broke but not long enough to achieve a great deal, because I was then requested to go down to Greece to become DCM by Harry Labouisse, who had taken over as ambassador in Greece. So in the spring of 1964, I went with my family back to Athens.

Q: During the time you were in Paris, what was the political situation there -- 1962-64?

ANSCHUTZ: The political situation was in a way quite tense particularly because of the Algerian situation. This was also a period when de Gaulle's policies vis-a-vis NATO led to the removal of the NATO headquarters from Paris to Brussels. That move began about that time.

Q: Had de Gaulle already made his pronouncement regarding NATO before you arrived?

ANSCHUTZ: No, I think it was during the period I was there. I think it was very interesting because one had the whole problem of the Gaullist approach to Algeria and the even more conservative elements of the military who were resisting any kind of change in the Algerian arrangements. It was also a period of activity with regard to the Vietnamese war, because the French were very much beleaguered in Vietnam and it was an issue...

Q: You mean the Algerian war?

ANSCHUTZ: No, the Vietnamese war.

Q: I thought they were basically out of there by 1962.

ANSCHUTZ: Well, they were still lingering and trying to extricate themselves. There were a series of negotiations with regard to Vietnam during that period, some of which were held in Paris.

Q: In regard to Vietnam, in 1962 Kennedy was just beginning to start putting in the special forces and this type of thing. The French were telling us it was a big mistake, they having gone through that. Dien Bien Phu was in 1954. How were we receiving the French advice about Vietnam?

ANSCHUTZ: My recollection is that they didn't strongly discourage us from assisting there. I think they had a view as to personalities in Vietnam, but I think broadly speaking they, as I remember it, did not try to dissuade us from doing something in Vietnam. We had the whole issue not only of Vietnam but China at that time and what the Chinese were doing with regard to Vietnam.

Q: Was this the period when de Gaulle recognized China?

ANSCHUTZ: Yes. I remember talking with various people at the Quai d'Orsay and elsewhere, I coming to the conclusion that de Gaulle was going to recognize China. Chip Bohlen, who was the ambassador at that time...I advanced this view in staff meeting and Bohlen very cavalierly discounted that possibility. I was amused because afterwards Cecil Lyon, the DCM, said, "Well, you know Chip never knows what he is against until he finds out what you are for." Unfortunately I proved to be right about that.

Q: That was a severe jolt to our relations because the recognition of China in those days was a real litmus test as far as we were concerned.

ANSCHUTZ: That was correct.

So, we had the NATO issues, we had China and Algeria, and, to a certain extent, the Middle East. There were an adequate number of issues to justify our presence.

Q: On the NATO issue. When you got there was the severing of the French membership in NATO seem to be something that we just accepted.

ANSCHUTZ: There wasn't much that we could do about it, but the basic factor, of course, was the unwillingness of the French to integrate their commands into the NATO command structure. That led to a fall out with regard to the location of the headquarters and the decision of taken to move to Brussels. The French, as I remember it, were leaning much more to the European Union type of approach to the military. Also the French were very aggressive in their cultivation with the Russians. They were speaking of Europe to the Urals. They were making a great effort to find accommodation with the Russians at that time.

Q: What was the impression that you got from the Embassy when you got there of their feeling about de Gaulle? Was he a good thing as far as America was concerned?

ANSCHUTZ: I think de Gaulle was respected and to a certain extent deplored because of what many considered to be his megalomania. But there was no question but that he was a very able fellow and was respected as such. But our relations with France under the circumstances were always rather delicate.

Q: I have heard that there were times in the Embassy when you had people within the Embassy who were pro-de Gaulle and others were anti-de Gaulle, that the Embassy was sort of split on this from time to time. Did you have any feeling of that?

ANSCHUTZ: I wasn't aware of that, no. As I said, de Gaulle was respected as an extremely able national leader, but one, of course, whose views were frequently antithetical to our own...and to many other people too.

Q: What about Charles Bohlen as ambassador? He was always considered as one of the great stars of the Foreign Service. How did he run the Embassy?

ANSCHUTZ: He was certainly one of the stars of the Foreign Service. He had served in Paris before and was certainly well known and highly regarded. He was, I always thought, among other things, one of our foremost ambassadors in terms of dealing with the public and third parties. He was a handsome, personable, intelligent man and as such was an excellent ambassador. He had a tendency to be rather opinionated, in my opinion, but he had the vast background and experience. I think his period as ambassador in the Soviet Union and his tours in the Soviet Union and his participation in various types of negotiations involving the United States and the Soviet Union had given him a great deal of prestige. So that all things considered he was, in my opinion, a very fine ambassador. I found him at my level sometimes to be a little bit top heavy, but nevertheless, I certainly felt he was an excellent ambassador.

Q: I had the impression talking to people who served with him in the Soviet Union who said that he harked back to an earlier time when he had had relations earlier on with almost all the heads of the Soviet Government and when he moved into a period where Kremlinology was a little harder to penetrate and you examined it in a different way, his impressions were based on his personal relationships. I would have thought that this might have carried over from what you have said in a way to figuring out the way things were going because he would not be using the political section the way a less prestigious ambassador would.

ANSCHUTZ: I think I would agree with that. I think that was probably true. They say that he had a great deal of confidence in his own opinion. Because he had great professional, personal prestige, he had relatively easy access to senior people in the French context which other perhaps might have had. Armed with that access, he was able to form opinions which owed much less to his staff than another ambassador might have done.

Q: Were you there during the Cuban missile crisis?

ANSCHUTZ: Yes, I was.

Q: What was the atmosphere early on when this thing was developing?

ANSCHUTZ: The attitude of the French press to these stories?

Q: This had been in October, 1962 and de Gaulle was one of the first people to give us very strong support in this. Was this sort of a surprise?

ANSCHUTZ: I don't know if it was a surprise. It certainly was welcomed because gestures of sincere collaboration with the French were never likely to be rejected. So I think that one was pleased about that. I remember that Acheson came over as a personal emissary of the President and was received by de Gaulle and was assured that the French would do what they could under the circumstances.

Q: What was your impression of French politics that was going on underneath de Gaulle? Were you able to get good access to the various French political parties?

ANSCHUTZ: Yes, we did have access to the French political parties. I remember, among others, we had access to people like Francois Mitterrand, Jacques Chirac, etc. We did have reasonably good contact with French political leaders.

Q: Were we able to talk with the French Communist Party at the time or was this out of bounds?

ANSCHUTZ: I think it was pretty much out of bounds. To a certain degree we had some insights into the French Communist Party as a result of the work of the Labor Attaché. But in terms of sort of an ongoing dialogue, I don't remember that.

Q: Were you there when Sargent Shriver became ambassador?

ANSCHUTZ: No. Bohlen was there when I left.

Q: How about the Algerian crisis? How were we viewing the situation there? Did we think it was going to be resolved in the French favor or did we feel they were fighting a rearguard action?

ANSCHUTZ: I think we felt they were fighting a rearguard action. I think Bill Porter was our consul general in Algiers at that time. He was a very able officer. I think that we felt that the French position ultimately was untenable and that we welcomed evidence of compromise or softening of the French position at that time.

MARGARET J. BARNHART
Consular Officer
Paris (1962-1964)

Margaret Barnhart was born in 1928 in Greensburg Pennsylvania. She graduated from Goucher College in 1950 with a major in international relations. Since joining the Foreign Service in 1961, her career has included positions in France, Japan, Israel, Thailand and Brazil. Ms. Barnhart was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1998.

BARNHART: I was in Personnel briefly, because there was a travel freeze in 1962, and for all of us who were planning to leave in February or anytime up to July, travel was frozen. By then I knew I was going to Paris. I had already turned it down once, since I really wanted to go to somewhere exotic, but I went to Paris as a consular officer in 1962.

Q: How did Taylor Thompson operate as Director General from your perspective?

BARNHART: Well, I didn't see too much of him I was more staff aide for Joe Satterthwaite.

Q: You were in Paris from when to when?

BARNHART: I was there from July 14, Bastille Day, '62 to November, October or November of '64.

Q: What type of work were you doing?

BARNHART: I was first assigned to the Visa Office over in the Talleyrand Building. I stayed there for a year, and then I wanted to do Welfare Whereabouts work, but they didn't like women to do that. However, they let me do it, and so then I spent the second year doing, first, Deaths and Estates. Three of us handled Deaths and Estates. Then, I moved into the straight Welfare Whereabouts, visiting jails. They didn't think women could do that. I think Mary Cabarini went later and said she was the first. I've been to all those jails.

Q: Let's start with the visa type. Were there mostly French, or were there other people who were in jail?

BARNHART: They were mostly French. I did immigrant visa work to begin with. I spoke some French by then, learning it through the FSI. I had an excellent staff of French nationals who were of great assistance.

Q: NATO, we had troops in France in those days?

BARNHART: Yes, we did, but we didn't have access. Eventually we had access to PX but basically we didn't see much of the military there.

Q: I was just thinking that this would generate a certain amount of visas.

BARNHART: Didn't really. There were a few, but nothing like some of the other posts I went to, at that particular time.

Q: What about Welfare and Whereabouts? In the first place, Deaths and Estates. What sort of things, any particular cases or problems?

BARNHART: We cleaned out estates. I mean, we went through everything, and tried to get it before the local authorities. You would get a call, for example, that someone died in a hotel room. You go there immediately, console the widow or kick out the masseuse girl, if there is one, and collect the valuables. Those were just temporary chores. But there were a lot of Americans living in Paris and quite a bit of estates. Oh, there were different types of deaths. There was an American 21-year-old who was killed when someone jumped off the top of Notre Dame. We had to go right away and contact the family and so forth. It was a little messy. Essentially, we pick up all the effects that we can of these people, unless there is a next of kin right there. Also, we tracked down people. I can't remember all the things, but it was just very, very busy. I was there at the tail-end of the Orly airplane crash, so we were still settling some of those effects.

Q: This was a plane from the United States?

BARNHART: Yes, it was the Atlanta Group.

Q: It was the Atlanta Group, yes.

BARNHART: And it had crashed just before I arrived, so there were a lot of unclaimed things there still, and I dealt with that. They were not identified. There was a lot of jewelry and some money that Treasury - the burnt pieces of money they reimbursed or whatever it was. So there was a healthy amount left there that no one had claimed, so we sent notices out. And then it came to the point that it would have to go to the state of the deceased, which would be fine but there were one or two people on that plane who were from Ohio, and their family didn't agree that it would all go to Georgia. So we worked on things like that. Finally, as I recall, they all agreed that it would go to Georgia for a memorial, which it did. It was fascinating work. I loved it.

Q: I was just thinking that in France, in Paris particularly, in those days I would think you would have a certain number of particularly men living with some French woman or something with a wife back in the States, and trying to unsort those things.

BARNHART: I had one of those, a really bad one of those in Japan.

Q: We'll come to that.

BARNHART: I remember other deaths. Someone died alone in an apartment. I can't think who or the circumstances, but we sent back the effects to the family. The family said, "We were over visiting him, and we left a box of candy with him and you didn't send it back to us." We didn't see a box of candy. Even if we had, we probably wouldn't. We were responsible. We were a temporary conservatory of an estate. Someone training me said, "Don't even throw out paper bags, 'cause some people put money in paper bags, so you go through everything." And the only things I would ever dispose of were small items which would cause distress to the family. That really turned up in Tokyo. I don't know what you call them now - the transvestites, I guess. And also, I certainly would keep if there condoms in the wallet of a young kid or something, that sort of thing, or bloody clothing.

Q: I remember getting one with condoms which at the end were shaped in, I think, a rooster in one and Stalin with his mustache was the other.

BARNHART: Anything that would be an embarrassment was disposed of. In the Welfare Whereabouts section, I dealt with the tourists that came through, every day. I remember once two very nice young girls came in and needed money, and I sat them down. The way I handled most of these young kids was: "Well, now, isn't that nice? You're broke? (Yes.) Have you cashed in your return ticket? (Yes.) Your family told you you couldn't do this all by yourself? (Yes.) Let's call them." And sit them down, put in a long-distance collect call and try to get the family to send via American Express a ticket. We had a private group, American charities or something, who provided money for us to hand out in emergency cases, but I tried to get the family to do it. Sometimes it was sad. We had to tell nationals when we had a message someone had died, their mother, father. I kept Kleenex around, and all kinds of things. But I liked that work because you could help people.

And then, of course, there was the time - this was fun - when I came back from lunch and my secretary, a French girl, said, "Oh, look, Miss Barnhart, some man came in and gave me this little cosmetic bag with jewelry in it. He said he found it at the airport. It had dropped out of a suitcase, a piece of luggage." She hadn't opened it. I spread it out on my desk, and there were a lot of pearls and a lot of diamonds and some gold PT boats and shamrocks, and I thought, uh oh, isn't that fun? What did I do next? So I looked at it all, and it was beautiful stuff, but I thought, well, this looks familiar, I mean in a sense. So I called the administrative office that handles the conference people, that handles VIP visitors. I didn't get into that too much, but Ethel Kennedy had been in town, and they said, "Oh, yes, what do you have?" I said, "Tell me who was in town." "Ethel Kennedy." I said, "Well, did she lose anything?" "Yes, we'll be right down." And I wouldn't give it to them. You know, I have it on my desk, it's my responsibility, I wasn't going to just hand it out. And so I had it identified. I had Mr. Van Cleef or Mr. Arpel, one of them, in saying, "I made this and this." And we got hold of Ethel Kennedy, and she called me from Switzerland. "Give him the jewelry. I'm so glad it's found. Give the jewelry to any pilot, because we're going on to Rome and I'd like to have it there." I ended up wrapping it up, sending it down through the classified pouch to the Ambassador. Actually it had been a robbery. There was one earring missing, which he apparently had taken to a jeweler, and the jeweler immediately became very suspicious because there had been a hotel jewelry robbery. So he panicked in thinking he had taken it out of the bag. She probably didn't lock her bag.

Q: How about Americans in jail in France? Did you have many of those?

BARNHART: Yes, not too many though. I remember visiting a couple of Americans in jail but not any great number. We had some poor veteran who kept - we repatriated him, I think, probably five times. He never could stay in one place long enough. He got a lot of disability checks, but they'd be in Marseilles when he was in Paris; they'd be in Paris when he was in Marseilles; and we kept sending them back. In those days if you were repatriated - you probably know - we had a stamp on your passport. You paid back or you didn't travel. And you always did pay it back. But it caused a lot of trouble. But those were days in Paris, and it was fun.

Q: Who was the Ambassador when you were there?

BARNHART: Gavin was Ambassador when I first arrived. He was succeeded by Charles Bohlen, a career Foreign Service Officer.

Q: Did you ever run across him?

BARNHART: Yes, the Ambassador and his wife always included a few junior officers in the various representational activities. It was a friendly embassy.

Q: You were there until '64?

BARNHART: Right.

STEPHEN H. ROGERS
Economic Officer
Paris (1962-1964)

Ambassador Stephen H. Rogers was born in 1931 and grew up in Long Island, New York. He entered the Foreign Service in 1956. His career included positions in India, France, the United Kingdom (England), Mexico, and South Africa, and an ambassadorship to Swaziland. Ambassador Rogers was interviewed by Raymond C. Ewing in 1994.

Q: So you finished at Harvard with your masters degree in 1962 and then what happened?

ROGERS: Then I went to the embassy in Paris.

Q: Did you already have French or did you go to French language training?

ROGERS: I had French in high school and at Columbia. In fact Kent and I met at the French House at Columbia, so we had that link also to French. But I had studied French at the Foreign Service Institute, I don't recall for how long, during our first tour in Washington. It was a very good program, as you know. FSI always has had very good language programs.

Q: It is always much better when you can start with a good foundation, which it sounds like you had than starting totally from scratch because often the length of training is not as long as it should be.

ROGERS: The important part was conversation at FSI. I had the grammar and a certain amount of vocabulary. Conversation was not part of high school French in those days.

Q: Unfortunately that is still the case in many schools. But the FSI does give you a chance to develop your ability to use the language in everyday settings.

ROGERS: Yes.

Q: In Paris you were again an economic officer. What sort of responsibilities did you have?

ROGERS: Well, I worked in the part of the economic section that was headed by the Treasury Attaché, Don McGrew, a person who is still remembered who was there in the embassy maybe 20 years. He had been there 12 or 13 when I got there and he stayed many years later. Don knew French and knew the French and new France very well. He never lost his Toledo accent in French, but he was very effective, had good contacts, very skeptical of what the French were doing a good deal of the time. He never became Frenchified, never lost his sense of US interests and the objectivity of dealing with the French. But that also was a good experience, working on financial matters, economic analysis and some specific issues.

Q: The Treasury Attaché's office was part of the economic section?

ROGERS: Yes.

Q: And particularly responsible for macro economic reporting, financial analysis, monetary matters?

ROGERS: Yes. And for AID. For the first year I was there a large part of my responsibility was for our liaison with the French Ministry of Cooperation and others on aid matters in Africa, which was quite interesting. It got me to Africa on one occasion for a conference of the ambassadors and AID mission directors from the French speaking countries in Africa. There was an interesting issue there that might be worth discussing. It was a question... You know, we all know, that France has maintained very close official and commercial relations with most of its former colonies in Africa, and the question that we had and seemed relevant to how we treated the French on aid matters in Africa was whether these programs were essentially for the benefit of France or essentially for the benefit of the African countries. There were some in our missions in Africa who felt that much of French aid, or most of it, was self-serving and should not be recognized as aid in the same, more objective sense, that our aid was thought of anyway. Now we all know that all aid programs are self-interest as well as in the interest of the recipients at their best. But this became quite a debate and I wrote quite a long telegram on the subject making the point that whatever the motivations were, whatever the returns to France were, these programs certainly seemed from my vantage point to be providing resources in teachers, in administrative help, in trade credits and in all sorts of ways that had to be beneficial to the receiving countries. It was paternalistic, there was no question it was and I would guess still is. But I argued that these were real aid programs in that sense. And that telegram became something of a subject of discussion at this conference I went to in 1963 which was held in Lagos.

Q: So that was still quite early in the independence of the former French colonies. Many became independent in 1960-61.

ROGERS: That is true. From this perspective, it seems as if it was immediately after. At that time I wasn't thinking of it in terms of it being quite so new. And the French relationship with those countries had been established...I think Guinea had gone its own way, I think the others had fallen into line, with the relationship that the French accepted.

Q: They were getting the advantage of the flow and transfer of technology as well as money, those countries that were continuing to cooperate and have a good relationship with Paris.

ROGERS: Right. The French certainly sent hundreds, probably thousands, of teachers, in particular, to these countries, or kept them there when they became independent.

Q: Of course, soldiers as well and businessmen.

ROGERS: Yes. I think the French had never denied that they feel that they have a special relationship and occasionally special responsibilities and even authorities in these countries. We have seen that.

Q: We have seen that many times, not just in former French colonies, but in...

ROGERS: They have expanded a little bit in recent months. Personally, I think we can be rather pleased that they are willing to take on that responsibility.

Q: They also have a great deal of expertise and knowledge of the countries. They are not coming in as total neophytes.

ROGERS: Right. So, that in any case, was a large part of my responsibilities in the first year I was there. It became important enough that AID had decided it had to have their own man there, so they sent Denis Baron, a fine AID officer, out there to serve that purpose. So in my second year in Paris I was working on other issues.

One thing we, the Kennedy enthusiasm and energy had an impact on us, specifically in the AID area. There was something called the Middle Level Manpower Conference. The administration had decided that the problem in development was very much focused on developing the capabilities of middle level managers. We got instructions to press the French to send a high level delegate to this conference, which was to be held, I think, in Puerto Rico. It was just the kind of thing where cultures clash -- the enthusiasm and idealism of this approach, "get something done; do something dramatic, quickly at a high level" -- and the French resisted. They couldn't see sending a minister or anybody at that level to this conference. We had phone calls from high level people in the White House on weekends and everything to try to get the French to send someone. They finally sent a Mr. Boisdevant. Mr. Boisdevant, I guess, was a good man, but he was not a minister and did not serve the political purpose that we were looking for.

So there were issues like that, that I got involved in that were interesting.

Q: You did some of the reporting about the French economy?

ROGERS: Yes. It was fairly routine. Whatever the Weekly Economic Reports were at that time, that kind of thing. We did that all around the world, I guess, at that time.

Q: It was a fairly early period in the new Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, the OECD, and, of course, the European Community was moving along. Were you involved with either of those organizations?

ROGERS: Not at that point. If I could go back a little. In TAD, the Trade Agreement Division, we were very much involved in the GATT and how to absorb the creation of the European Economic Community. And that was a major issue of the 12th session of the contracting parties that I went to. But in Paris, I don't recall that I had very much to do with either of those organizations.

Q: But, your next assignment brought you into contact with both of them.

ROGERS: Yes.

Q: You finished in Paris when?

ROGERS: In 1964 we returned to Washington

PETER K. MURPHY
Consular Officer
Paris (1962-1965)

Peter K. Murphy was born in Boston, Massachusetts in 1936. He received a bachelor's degree from Boston College in 1959 and served in the U.S. Army from 1959-1960. Mr. Murphy joined the Foreign Service in 1962. His career included positions in France, Argentina, Italy, and Germany. He was interviewed on April 4, 1994 by William D. Morgan.

MURPHY: My first assignment at the Embassy was to the Passport and Citizenship Office of the Consular Section. At that time, the office was located on the ground floor of the main Chancery at 8, Avenue Gabriel on the historic Place de la Concorde. I still get a thrill just thinking that I once went to work every day in such a historic location ! We are indeed fortunate in the Foreign Service, aren't we!! How any of our peers from university days can boast of such "work" experiences, Bill!

Q: That is very true! Were you assigned to the Passport Section of the Embassy based on your experience in the New York Passport Agency?

MURPHY: I suppose that was the logic of the assignment - if there is indeed logic to most Foreign Service assignments!! I seem to recall that the Office of Personnel in the Embassy had a lot to do with the assignments of new employees within the Embassy in those days. At that time, the Consular Section in Paris was an enormous entity. We had a total, I believe, of 18 or 19 officers and at least 30 Foreign Service National employees..... or "Locals" as they were called then..... (since we are recording history) !

The Consul General was Herbert Fales. To a newly arrived officer at such a large Embassy, the Consul General was a daunting personage indeed ! We peons rarely saw him in the office - - and, I soon got the impression that his job seemed to consist mainly of acting as the Embassy liaison with the large and influential resident American community in Paris.....at those days about 52,000 strong in Paris and the surrounding area. You must not forget that this was before NATO was invited to leave French territory by General de Gaulle. I had the distinct impression that the Consul General spent much of his time at luncheons and attending receptions and formal dinners. Come to think of it - - I don't think that it was far from the truth!!

Fales had a deputy named John Gossett, the Deputy Consul General (his actual title). It was he who was responsible for the daily operation of the Consular Section. There was also another interesting officer - whose name I have forgotten - who was a professional psychiatrist. This fellow was assigned by the Department to Embassy Paris at the insistence of Miss Frances Knight (of Passport fame!) to examine cases of lost passports in an attempt to determine the main reasons why young American tourists and students were losing their passports with such frequency. You remember, Bill, that we are speaking of 1962 - about the beginning of the discovery of Europe by American university students. The Embassy in Paris was experiencing the first wave of American student backpackers - and visitors to European Youth Hostels. European youths, Germans especially, had been traveling and seeing the world in this manner for generations - but our young Americans were just beginning to arrive in droves. The days of the "Grand Tour" - both for the British and the Americans had come to an end. Transatlantic fares were beginning to become more reasonable. Passage by ship from New York was even cheap as I have noted in my personal experience. The State Department seemed to be at a loss to understand why these young people managed to lose these "valuable documents" - passports - with such frequency. We tried to explain - - via Airgram - the normal mode of communications at the time - that most of the young people we saw in Europe carried their passports sticking out the back pockets of their blue jeans or shorts - - and were thus easy pray for pickpockets. The Bureau of Consular Affairs (Passport Directorate) thought there must be more to it - so the psychiatrist was sent to Paris. Needless to say, I don't believe it was a very successful study. The numbers of Lost Passport cases simply increased in leaps and bounds during the next ten years..

Q: I take it that behind this was an assumption that the young people were selling their passports?

MURPHY: Well, there was a suspicion of sale of passports, but I never did see much proof of widespread sale - in Western Europe, at least. The document was, of course, quite valuable in the Middle East and in certain parts of Asia. Our goal in Paris was to attempt to devise ways to impress the traveling public - and especially the youth - the value of the Passport and to suggest ways it should safeguarded. We attempted to encourage CA to mount a media campaign in the United States - to no avail. Such a step was considered, at the time, to be far too revolutionary.

Q: How did this work, Peter? And what was your other work in Paris like?

MURPHY: When we finished interviewing a person who had lost their passport and a determination of citizenship made - the applicant would then go on to a second interview with our in-house psychiatrist. It was his task to attempt to discover the reasons the applicant thought so little of the document that he/she did not guard it with his life!

Life in the Consular Section in Paris was a far cry to what it is today, Bill. For example, we young officers were never allowed to sign a letter destined to the United States. Such letters were signed only by the Consul General or by the Deputy Consul General. I am sure you well remember how it was: one simple reply to a logical question reached the desk of the responsible "signer" with 1) the original letter 2) the draft reply 3) the original reply with about five back up copies containing the names of the drafting officer plus those who had cleared the letter and permitted it to be typed in "final form". There was an Embassy File Room - which kept track of every piece of paper generated by the entire mission!! How often those letters were returned to the drafter with a request of a word or phrase change. Thank God for Word Processors! It is so much easier today.

Q: Was this process a local Paris directive?

MURPHY: Yes - I believe it was local. When a letter arrived at the Embassy, it took almost two to three weeks for an answer to get out because it was typed in the bowels of the Consular Section and slowly wound its way up to be approved by various officers before it reached the desk of the Consul General or his Deputy for signature.

Q: Was this restriction over fear that you might say something?

MURPHY: I think it was. I think basically we young officers were forbidden to sign letters out of a fear that we might state something on paper which was contrary to government policy. I guess it was thought that such a letter might end up in the hands of a Member of Congress ! We were, however, allowed to write directly to Americans resident or traveling in France.

Q: Maybe it really did have something to with Congressmen?

MURPHY: Maybe so.

Q: Was this only in the citizenship and passport world?

MURPHY: No, this procedure was in effect throughout in the entire Consular Section.

I worked in the Passport Unit of the Consular Section for almost a year. I liked the work very much. If you can picture it - - we were six officers interviewing all Passport applicants at desks! Our customers sat before us - - and we quizzed them - especially regarding possible Loss of Citizenship. We had a raft of questions we posed: regarding voting in foreign elections, acceptance of foreign citizenship, seeking the "benefits" of a foreign citizenship in the form of privilege, position or financial benefits (French Social Security, for example). I had very interesting customers from time to time. Several were elderly members of the "Lost Generation" who had been in Paris since the turn of the century. Most of them were dying off by the time I arrived - but a few characters were still about. Picasso also came in to the office one day - and I recall that a colleague asked for his autograph on the back of a check. The artist obliged with a small sketch - which must be worth a fortune today! I met John Marquand, the writer; Lionel Trilling, the critic, as well as many of the noted artists and actors of the day.

Q: How many resident Americans would you say there were in Paris in the early '60s?

MURPHY: Residents.... at least 50,000.

Q: Not just students passing through?

MURPHY: No, these were businessmen, their families, the large US military contingent at NATO Headquarters plus a very large population of wealthy citizens who had lived there for years.

Q: And died there.

MURPHY: And were born there and died there; and fell ill, and were thrown in jail, and were robbed and married.....every facet of consular work was represented.....even Shipping and Seamen - - as the port of Le Havre was within the Consular District and, of course, the large steamships were still crossing the Atlantic to New York in those days.

The remnants of the "Lost Generation" who visited the Embassy were very colorful - and really extraordinary characters. Several used to line up each month to collect their Social Security checks. (This was in the days before direct bank deposits were in effect!) I well remember the periodic visits of Raymond Duncan - brother of the actress/dancer Isadora Duncan. Raymond was about 78 years old at the time and he would traipse in to the Consular Section with a group of followers to collect their checks. It was indeed a sight to behold: six to ten men and women - in the dead of Paris winter - dressed in wool saris hand-woven by themselves at the Isadora Duncan Cultural Center (rue du Dragon) on the Left Bank near the Sorbonne. The French got a big kick out the spectacle. To me they seemed like a group of Old Testament Prophets strolling the city streets. We had many strange visitors to the Embassy.

The Passport and Citizenship work in Paris was very heavy - especially due to the presence of the US Military at the NATO bases near Paris. The Military even stationed three enlisted men within the Consular Section to help us with the hundreds Reports of Birth and new Passport applications received from the bases. (You must remember that this was the height of the Baby Boom era - - and the US military were certainly contributing!).

Each action carried out in connection with the Passport and Citizenship work was recorded (by manual typewriter) on a 6 x 8 card for our permanent files. Thinking back on the system of keeping track of citizenship cases, it seems extraordinarily old-fashioned. You must remember, however, that there were no computers, FAX machines or instant communications. For example: a case of suspected loss of nationality was investigated in Paris; written up on an Operations Memorandum (OM) and dispatched by diplomatic pouch to CA in Washington. By the time the Passport attorneys got around to answering the communication - at least four months normally passed. In the meantime, if the person had to travel, a Limited Passport was issued - "To be Extended in Validity upon Receipt of a Determination of U. S. Citizenship from the Department of State in Washington, DC"

I learned much about citizenship law during my time in that unit in Paris. I also learned a lot about the State Department bureaucracy - - as well as the press. I vividly recall my boss being recalled to Washington for a major gaff involving passport/citizenship work. The British-born, naturalized American actress - Elizabeth Taylor - had informed the Embassy that she wished to renounce her U. S. citizenship. In order to accommodate her wishes that there be no publicity about this act, the Consul (Aaron Coleman) actually went to her hotel room to have her execute the necessary documents of renunciation. Such a legal act should have taken place on the Embassy premise, according to the lawyers in the Passport Division of Consular Affairs. The affair was reported in the international press and Mr. Coleman was reprimanded and ordered to return to Washington. (You can see - Bill - there was no fooling around in those days! If you broke the rules, you paid the price! Personnel would never have the "audacity" to take such punitive action these days, don't you agree?)

After about a year in the passport and citizenship unit, I was assigned as number two officer in the Office of Deaths and Estates. (I'll be there were not many embassies at the time with a separate office dealing only with deceased American citizens!) My supervisory colleague in that office was Margaret Barnhart. The office was comprised of Peggy, myself and a French secretary. Poor Cecile Tallibert - our secretary! She shed tears with every widow or widower who walked through the door!. She was very sympathetic to all of our clients. When I first was assigned to the job, I thought I would be bored silly as I didn't think we'd have all that much business.... but in no time at all, I found business to be booming!. I'd wager we had an average of three or four deaths a week at that time.

Q: And it wasn't simply the death or the widow? It was the estates and the complexities?

MURPHY: Even more than that, Bill. I don't know if this system existed elsewhere in Western Europe at the time, but in Paris we worked with what we called "Living Death Cases". Americans - usually resident in Paris - would seek us out to introduce us to their American or French attorneys and also to leave with our office a copy of their Last Will and Testament. We were often given instructions on the disposition of the physical estate in France - - and also detailed instructions for the disposition of their remains and subsequent memorial service.

Q: You had some responsibility, I presume, over their wills and their estates.

MURPHY: Yes - according to regulations, we were obliged to protect the estates if no family member was present. We were also charged with dispatching remains in accord with the family's wishes. From time to time, I recall some of the odd experiences I had in that position.

You'll enjoy this little anecdote: a very strange and very wealthy woman who lived for many years near the Quai d'Orsay came to see me one day. She insisted that I visit her apartment - together with her French Notaire - to take an inventory of her estate and to review her Last Will and Testament. She wanted to be absolutely sure that her government fully understood her Last

Will in detail. No sooner had we three gathered in her luxurious apartment overlooking the Seine, than she started giving instructions: "This piece of furniture, this Louis XV chair, will go to the Louvre; and this table or painting will go to the National Gallery in Washington. We went through the entire apartment, taking note of the disposition of her possessions. When we arrived at the beautiful, mahogany-paneled library, and she said, "Now, Mr. Murphy - you see those volumes of Shakespeare on the left. The third volume contains my husband's ashes. When my time comes, I'd like the Embassy to give the funeral director orders to cremate my remains. Then I want my ashes to be mixed together with those of my late husband - - - and then flush us both down the toilet!" I was absolutely speechless - - but later was assured by her Notaire that it was all perfectly legal under French law - and that her Will contained exactly those instructions!

I feel I should comment here on an extraordinary event which occurred in November of 1963 while I was assigned to Paris - the assassination of President John F. Kennedy. We all recall "where we were" when we received this momentous and devastating news. I had been invited, along with a few others from the Embassy, to attend a reception at the British Embassy on the Faubourg St. Honore. A group of us arrived at the Chancery at approximately 8:00 PM to be ushered into a room full of perhaps 150 people - and which was as quiet as a morgue! Not having heard the news of the shooting in Dallas, we thought it all very strange - - until our host informed us of the news flash that had been received at the Embassy a few minutes before we arrived. We, of course, left the party - and went back to our chancery on Avenue Gabriel - where we received confirmation of the shooting - and eventual death of President John F. Kennedy. The next few days were frantic at the Embassy - for the entire staff. Endless lines of people formed outside the Embassy - to express their condolences to our government and the American people by signing a Condolence Book which had been opened in the office of the Consul General - just inside the main Chancery of the Embassy. The Ambassador asked the six youngest officers of the Embassy greet the public for the four days before the funeral in Washington. Being one of the officers chosen, I shall never forget experiencing the sincere sympathy and general outpouring of affection for our nation as I spoke with French people from all walks of life during those very sad days. Everyone waited in the same line....no matter what their station in life. The entire French Cabinet came as a body; Mme Yvonne De Gaulle, the Cardinal Archbishop of Paris, and hundreds of others. I especially recall the presence of many of the old mayors of small towns along the Normandy coast - (towns liberated by American Forces during World War II) - who told me, with eyes full of tears, that they would never forget the heroic sacrifices of our men during those dark days in French history. The day of the State Funeral in Washington, the French government and diplomatic corps attended a Funeral Mass held at the Cathedral of Notre Dame - the very heart of France and the central focus of French history throughout the ages. . Together with other Embassy officers, I served as an usher at the cathedral on that occasion.

It was also during this trying period that I first met my wife, Jacqueline (Senouillet). Working in the Embassy Personnel Section, she, too, was pressed into service with the reception of the French public visiting the Chancery. Thus - this very sad occasion held a silver lining for me!

Q: Peter, let me stop here. As the reader will discover from your subsequent assignments - many of them in consular affairs - that you have seen tremendous changes in the Consular Function over the years. I would like you to cite some of the differences between those days in Paris and today. One - we've just cited some incredibly, almost if not illegal, functions that you performed.

Secondly, you experienced a tremendous bureaucracy at the time in Paris, by having your letters delayed and delayed in getting to the American recipient. And, thirdly, a sort of direction, I would argue, that failed to involve the officers and the troops in the leadership of the Consular Section. Do you want to summarize at this point, or look forward from the days in Paris, where you just stopped the clock and gave us some very wonderful insight into what it has evolved into today, at least in terms of those things?

MURPHY: The differences between then - and now - in the consular field are tremendous - as you say, Bill. As I was fortunate to have served twice at our Embassy in Paris, I am in a rather unique position to make a comparison. Even today, I am relatively familiar with the personnel composition of that Mission. One of the major differences between my first and second tour in Paris, Bill, is the size of the staff - both American and French. Layers of useless bureaucracy have been eliminated - very justly so, in my opinion. While consular workloads have indeed increased greatly - the number of people providing the public with service has diminished. You might ask: What has been lost with these cutbacks? For one thing - no consular officer in Paris (or in any large post these days) receives the public in a private office - at their desk - as in the "old days" - Granted.....a certain charm and graciousness has indeed been lost. However - budgets do not allow for such niceties. Of necessity, the Department of State has had to cut back. "Speed - efficient provision of services" - are the key words these days. "Diplomatic form", if you will, is sorely lacking in most consular sections around the world today. The pace and tenor of the work has also changed. The days of the Grand Tour of Europe are over. Today's charter flights from Dulles Airport, JFK, Logan and O'Hare are filled to capacity with young - and also older - Americans seeking the pleasure of a holiday or study in a foreign land. Nowhere is too remote or too uncivilized for many Americans today. Often - the more remote and uncivilized - the better!! The services our government offers the public have - of necessity - been reduced. We no longer, for example, accept the public's Last Wills and Testaments for "safekeeping"; or hold their mail in the consular section until they get around to picking it up; or arrange for them to be invited to the Ambassador's garden party. Those "extras" have long gone out the window. The American Consular Service today provides the American public with direct assistance when they are in serious need - and when no other source of assistance is available on the spot. Heroic lengths are often gone to in order to provide the citizen with adequate protection. Think of the work in which we have both been involved over the years: the Jonestown suicides, various airplane tragedies, the drug arrests - and overdoses; horrible automobile accidents, heart-rendering suicides, abandoned families, orphaned children, tragic deaths. Most of the citizens we have aided in such circumstances are most grateful at the moment for our invaluable services - - and then never want to hear our name again. This is natural, of course, as we remind them of a very black chapter of their lives.

A second major change in Consular Services is the inclusion of all officers in formulating solutions to meet an extraordinary situation. As I mentioned earlier, in 1962 no one in the Embassy ever asked my opinion or advice about any subject whatsoever. It is perhaps symptomatic of the evolution of American society that in today's normal Embassy - while there is still a sense of decorum and order in the ranks - all officers are more likely to actively participate in the work-life of the Mission rather than carry out a function with unquestioning obedience. In addition, today all Embassy officers participate in "Consular Duty" - that is, being available in off-duty hours in order to provide assistance in emergency situations. Formerly only consular officers participated in such work; today it is a given at any Mission that all officers - even from AID or USIS - share the extra work involved.

Embassy Paris - in 1962 - 1963 - was one enormous bureaucracy which had been added to constantly since the end of World War II. Every agency of our government was represented: from the Agriculture Department - - to the Federal Bureau of Investigation. My professional life at the time was confined to the Consular Section - providing assistance to Americans in difficulty; serving as Consular Officer duty officer - - and also, by the way, having a wonderful time as a bachelor in the city of Paris!! Only once in my entire tour did I attend Ambassador Charles (Chip) Bohlen's weekly staff meeting. I recall sitting against the wall - far from the Ambassador - wondering who half of the attendees were! In those days, it was considered rather an innovation to invite at least one - and sometimes two - junior officers to such a "high power" staff meeting. I guess the purpose was so that we could observe "first hand" how Embassy policy was formulated! In any event - I recall being appropriately impressed by this gathering of these wise men (signs of the times - not a woman was present out of a group of about 30 people). I also recall almost choking on the cigarette and cigar smoke which filled the Ambassador's conference room! Needless to say - I was not invited to say a word - and, of course, would not have dared offer an unsolicited comment! It simply was not done in the early '60s. How times have changed !!

To return to your question, Bill: it is obvious that today's U.S. diplomatic Mission is smaller in size than those we knew at the beginning of our careers. Over the years, our national financial constraints have dictated a major reduction - - but, I believe that even if funding was not a constraint, our embassies in post World War II in Europe were far too large. We often overpowered host nations with the sheer size of our official presence in their country. I saw this in country after country. The most shocking example - at least to my mind - was our Embassy in Havana, Cuba. The chancery is a seven story building dominating the city and the ambassadorial residence is almost on a par in opulence with the White House. I am convinced that a smaller Mission allows all officers to fully participate in the work of their own Sections - - and also to learn what is going on in the rest of the Embassy. This kind of a situation offers the individual officer more responsibility - and a greater opportunity to expand his/her knowledge of the various Foreign Service functions.

Q: Also some modern devices have come to help some of this.

MURPHY: Exactly, Bill. The major improvement, of course, is in the field of communications. A United States embassy no longer sends Dispatches or Airgrams or Operation Memorandums (OMs) - all those antiquated means of communication which were sent to Washington via Diplomatic Pouch.....with replies returned months later! I do believe that most posts retain, however the One Time Pad as it is reputed to be the most secure means of cryptographic communication in times of emergency. I recall having slaved over the OTPs for hours in Cordoba, Argentina. This was our sole means of secure communications with either Buenos Aires or Washington. Such antiquated forms of communication were not in evidence in Paris, however - - although they might have had them stacked up in the classified communication areas!! In the Paris Embassy, we had a central Embassy File Room, and a copy was kept of every written communication that went out to Washington or to any other post in the world. This was an enormous bureaucratic process which no longer exists. Today, of course, everything is computerized.

Before leaving Paris, Bill I would like to comment on one aspect of the Mission which I feel was unique and which - in all large Missions today - I believe is lost forever. I am speaking of the Personnel Office - - and especially two Personnel Officers: Shirley Green Fine and Eileen Kerley. At a large Embassy like Paris, new arrivals experience great difficulty getting settled after arrival. I well recall how much time and effort I personally expended in assisting three young newly arrived secretaries who were staying in my hotel after arrival at post. I was in the hotel for about a month before finding affordable lodgings - - but these young women, none of whom spoke a word of French - spent many months in the hotel. I know that they were initially very homesick and often cried themselves to sleep at night. None had ever been abroad before and so I felt obliged to do what I could to assist them. But my resources - and wallet at the time - were both limited. The Personnel Officers at the Embassy, however, went out of their way to make newly arrived personnel feel at home. I am sure their kindness towards newcomers was nowhere found in their official "job description" - but these officers arranged evening get-togethers for all the new arrivals; they set up luncheons with other young people at the post; new arrivals were often called on weekends to see if they were in need of anything or invited for an impromptu evening supper. Everything possible was done to assist them find housing. In short - - the Personnel Officers at the Embassy did what today's Family Liaison Office is supposed to do - - with the exception that they had a full time job on their hands. I shall never forget their assistance and kindness to me!

While we have taken a short break from this chronological history, Bill, I would also like to add a few comments on modern communications. Just take this project you are engaged in - for example - Diplomatic Oral History. Can you imagine how much our national history has been lost over the decades simply because this history was never recorded? I really admire and encourage you and Stu Kennedy in your Georgetown University project - - as it is most necessary and will, no doubt, be of great value to future historians. It is not, of course, what we record individually but what the historians eventually piece together from the bits and pieces they gather from a reading of several such reports. We all know full well that when a cable or report is sent to Washington from a post in the field, the text is never the "full story" of the subject involved. It is tainted not only by the author's own cultural, educational and social baggagebut often such reports are geared to elicit a hoped for reply. Operational reports of whatever nature are often falsified, exaggerated or just incomplete. Intelligence dribbles away as it moves up the chain of command! Some reports from the field, as we know Bill, are written to please the recipient!! I'll bet even Marco Polo's reports from China to the Doge back in Venice were written "with an aim to please the Master and to tell him what he wanted to hear." As proof of this - we have only to take a close look at the tone - and often the content - of cables sent directly to the White House or to SECSTATE - and often marked EYES ONLY!!

How often have you really been "debriefed", Bill, upon returning to the Department from years spent abroad? I am sure you'll agree that no one in the State Department ever has the patience or the time to speak at length about political, social or cultural happenings in foreign lands - which took place last year.. Besides, their IN BOXES are always overflowing!! The desk-bound State officers have more to do than to listen to officers passing through Washington. I'll admit that I too felt the same way when I was assigned to Washington - - and was obliged to receive officers fresh from the fields for "debriefings". I'll wager the same holds true for officers returning to Whitehall and at the Quai d'Orsay! In my 32 years of service, the only valid debriefing I participated in were conducted by the Central Intelligence Agency. No one in State had the time to listen - unless there was some major crisis involving either the Congress or - God forbid - the White House!! Following my initial assignment to the Vatican in the mid-80s, I spent two full days at Langley participating in some of the most interesting de-briefings imaginable. The people with whom I spoke were intimately familiar with my reporting - and knew all the characters about whom I reported. I spoke with experts from all geographic areas of the world - - and I consider that the majority were true experts in their fields. (What they did with all of their information I provided is another matter! I haven't a clue!.) I was, however, most impressed with the sessions - - and also personally gratified that someone else in the world felt that the reports I had written - or had authorized - had some value and contributed in some small way to the formulation of United States Foreign Policy. (Perhaps this is a rather selfish way of looking at things - - but doesn't everyone like a bit of job satisfaction!!)

Q: That is very true - and a good observation, Peter. To get back to Paris: The Embassy bureaucracy was there, in your view, because of what? The antiquated days in which we lived, or was there some reasoning behind this extensive bureaucracy in protecting the individual?

MURPHY: No, I think that our government - as all governments - was hell-bent on keeping records. Records are necessary for the good and benefit of the individual citizens. The importance of maintaining accurate birth, death, marriage, citizenship, passport matters, visa records is quite obvious in the conduct of an orderly society. In the early '60 - while I was in Paris - I experienced the cumbersome manner in which records were created and stored during that era - and then sent on to the National Archives. Today - all that has changed - as I am sure it will change again by the year 2,500.! Modern communications - with the advent of computers, satellite communication, Internet, e-mail, have all improved to such an extent that we are no longer bound by mountains of paperwork. How much easier it all seems in today's world.....except when your computer crashes!! In addition, Bill, the bureaucracy was a remnant of the "war years" - when all governments in the Western World directly controlled the destiny of its citizens. At time of war - it is logical that government grow in size and in power - as individuals are incapable of facing such a disaster alone. The key is to know when to downsize following a national emergency! I think that the past twenty years for our nation has been a period of "forced downsizing" not just in government but also in the private sector. "Uncle Sam" must take a back seat during peacetime and allow the people to have more say in their own lives.

JAMES D. PHILLIPS
Rotation Officer
Paris (1963-1965)

Ambassador Phillips was born in Illinois in 1933. He received his Bachelor's degree from the University of Wichita in 1957 and his Master's in 1958. After serving in the US Army from 1953 to 1955, he entered the Foreign Service in 1961. Postings throughout his career include Paris, Elizabethville, Luxembourg, The Gambia, Copenhagen and Casablanca. Mr. Phillips then became the ambassador to Burundi and Congo. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on May 5, 1998.

Q: It is hard to recreate those times. This was the real peak of the Cold War. You were in Paris from the summer of 1963 until 1965?

PHILLIPS: No, I was there from the beginning of 1963. In those days one went to Europe by ship and I think I may have sailed in late December of 1962 and arrived in January of 1963.

Q: What was your job?

PHILLIPS: There was a system of rotation for new junior officers designed to give you six months of experience in each of four different sections of the embassy. I started in the consular section doing routine work. Then I was transferred to the political/military section and then to the economic section. My boss in the political/military office, Jack McGuire, became a life-long friend. In the economic section I worked for Stanley Cleveland who had a major influence on my career. He was an intelligent, dynamic officer who has unfortunately passed away. He took a special interest in me and convinced me to try to become an expert on the European Community. About this time Ambassador Chip Bohlen needed a staff aide and Cleveland recommended me. I spent my last year in Paris working for Chip Bohlen.

Q: What a great experience. Before we move to that, what about the political military side? We still had a lot NATO bases in France. Was there any feel for how the French felt about what we had there or were you too far down the feeding chain?

PHILLIPS: There was no doubt the French were uncomfortable with the status quo. The U.S. had military bases throughout France and there was an American military clinic and PX in the heart of Paris, within walking distance of the embassy. There was a large and imposing NATO headquarters establishment in the Paris suburbs. The French felt smothered and France constantly tried to find ways to assert its independence. Relations between the United States and France were strained to say the least. Ambassador Bohlen had a good personal relationship with De Gaulle but could not do much to change the course of events. In 1964 France recognized Red China and the Taiwanese were forced out of their embassy to make way for the Chinese communists, which didn't help. I knew relations were sour, but as you say, I was too low on the feeding chain to realize that France was on the brink of pulling out of NATO.

Q: Can you describe your impression of Bohlen and how he operated?

PHILLIPS: He was very professional in everything he did, especially in his dealings with figures like De Gaulle, Dean Rusk, George Ball and Presidents Kennedy and Johnson. He had complete self-confidence. He was a representative of American gentry in so far as there is such a thing; born to a prominent family in upstate New York, educated at all the right schools. He was brilliant, but he was also generous and kind. He would invite my family once or twice a year to dinner or lunch with his family. He was a wonderful person to watch in action. He rarely lost his temper and always kept his sense of humor. He was one of the last of a vanishing breed of ambassadors. He could pick up the phone and call Kennedy at the White House. He would argue with George Ball over the phone and I would sometimes be privy to the conversation as a note taker. So I got to see him in action and I would sum up my impressions by saying he was a consummate professional.

Q: Were you in this position when De Gaulle announced that he wanted the United States to pull out of France?

PHILLIPS: That happened after I left in 1965. Bohlen's strategy was to keep French behavior in perspective and not overreact to it. He constantly emphasized that France had its own agenda and had a hard time adjusting to its post-war status. He contended that we needed patience and diplomacy in reacting to French pretensions.

Q: Did you find as the ambassador's assistant and a junior office a division over De Gaulle among the staff there?

PHILLIPS: There were hawks and doves. Some argued for a more confrontational policy but there was not a deep division. There were extraordinary people in the embassy at that time. Cecil Lyons was the DCM. Perry Culley was the consul general. Bob Anderson was head of the political section.. They all knew France and understood the situation and generally accepted Bohlen's leadership.

Q: Did you run across French officials at all or prepare things for the ambassador?

PHILLIPS: The ambassador had an executive assistant who was my boss who did most of the front office substantive work. He had more contact with the Quai d'Orsay and other ministries. I went through the telegrams each morning and selected ones I thought the ambassador should see and put them in the order I thought he should see them. I would also work on his schedule. If he couldn't go to a particular function I would make sure that he would be represented by an appropriate officer. All of the military attaches were Army generals or Navy captains. So I had fun as a former enlisted man sending generals to ceremonial functions beginning with mass at 7:30 on a Saturday morning.

Q: As an ex-enlisted man myself there is something about speaking on behalf of the ambassador that is kind of fun. What about congressional delegations?

PHILLIPS: They came in huge numbers and often it would fall to me to escort them around. In those days there was a congressional liaison office at the embassy because there were so many congressional delegations coming through. A mainstay of the office was a wonderful young man who is still there named Johnny Berg, and I worked closely with him. I think I saw the show at the Lido a dozen times because congressmen always wanted to go. There is one story I can tell that shows what kind of person Bohlen was and how things worked in those days. A visiting congressman went on his own to the Crazy Horse Saloon where they had a pretty risqué show featuring an American football theme with scantily-clad cheer leaders using the American flag as a back drop. The congressman, whose name I don't remember, came to Bohlen and complained that the flag was being desecrated. Bohlen told me to get two seats for the show and he and I went. They were using the flag as the congressman described, so afterwards Bohlen asked the owner of the Crazy Horse to use red, white and blue bunting instead the actual flag. The owner agreed and that was the end of that, or so I thought. About three weeks later, Ambassador Bohlen called me in and grinning sort of sheepishly said he couldn't help wondering if the owner had really kept his word about the flag. He said he thought we needed to go back to check. So we saw the show again and I believe he was a little disappointed that it was in strict compliance as far as the flag was concerned. We had no excuse to keep on checking.

Q: You were at the embassy when President Kennedy was shot. What happened there?

PHILLIPS: I was at a dinner party the night he was shot, November 22nd. Somebody at the party came late and said the radio reported the President was injured. I left the party to get more news. I walked to the Champs Elysées, close to the Arc de Triumph, at 11:00 p.m. to see if I could get an early edition newspaper. As I got close to the drug store just across the street from the Arc I could see several hundred people milling about outside and they were all sobbing, these were French people, and I thought the news must be really bad. Of course by then they knew he was dead. So that is how I learned. Everyone remembers where they were that day. I was moved by the French reaction, by the outpouring of grief. I was at the requiem mass at Notre Dame which De Gaulle attended. It is indelible etched in my mind.

PHILLIPS: Yes, I came back from the inspection assignment in 1970 and worked in the European Bureau until the summer of 1971. Then I was assigned to Paris. It is interesting how that assignment came about. Allen Holmes followed internal French political affairs at the embassy, which is among the best jobs in the Foreign Service. Ambassador Arthur Watson, a political appointee who was a son of the founder of IBM, operated without any reference to State Department bureaucracy. He would only deal with Nixon and Kissinger and Rogers. He wanted to move Allen Holmes up from the internal job to be overall head of the political section. It violated personnel practice to move a middle-grade officer into a top Embassy position even at an ambassador's behest. But Ambassador Watson wanted Holmes for the job, so he simply moved him into it. Personnel was enraged and refused to fill the position Holmes had vacated. I got a call from Perry Culley, who by now was DCM in Paris, and he asked me to take the job. I spoke French and had just come from the successful Vietnam inspection assignment and Watson wanted me too. I have an iron rule of never saying no to Paris, so I accepted.

Q: When were you in Paris?

PHILLIPS: I arrived in the summer of 1971 and I stayed until the summer of 1975.

Q: You were in internal politics?

PHILLIPS: Yes, I did internal politics for two years. Do you remember the big student uprising in 1968 in France?

Q: In June of 1968.

PHILLIPS: I should begin by saying that the internal political position in Paris traditionally attracted good officers. Allen Holmes turned out to be a Foreign Service star. Other successful officers such as Wells Stabler and Dean Brown had the job. The attraction was the close contact with French politicians, journalists and intellectuals. The events of 1968 made it even more interesting. Washington did not want to be blind-sided by another massive uprising in France so the Department devoted more resources to following the French political scene. This meant more representation funds, which meant I could make extensive contacts within what the French call "la classe politique." As a result I became very knowledgeable about French politics. I was nominated for the Director General's reporting award for my analysis of the 1973 legislative elections, which I predicted the right-of-center parties would win. I called the election results accurately, within a two seats margin of error. A lot of people thought the Socialist would win that election. But I rightly predicted the right would hold on to power in 1973.

Meanwhile the United States was experiencing its own political upheaval because of Watergate.

Q: You are talking about the Watergate period.

PHILLIPS: The Watergate period. Sometime in 1973 Ambassador Watson got involved in some fracas with an airline stewardess. It got in the papers. I think he had been drinking too much. This was the sort of scandal the Nixon White House didn't need and Watson had to resign. He was replaced by John N. Irwin, who happened to be Watson's brother-in-law. Jack, as he was called, had married one of Watson's sisters. Jack was serving at the time as Undersecretary of State, working with Henry Kissinger who was Secretary. I don't know what the chemistry was between the two men or why exactly Jack left Washington, but he did accept the assignment to Paris. Shortly after he arrived he decided he needed an executive assistant who spoke French and knew his way around Paris and he offered me the job. I accepted with great reluctance because I really did not want to leave internal politics. But I accepted and spent my last two years in Paris as the Ambassador's executive assistant. First I worked in that capacity with Jack Irwin and then with Kenneth Rush, who President Ford named to replace Irwin when he took over from Nixon.

Q: Let's go back to the 1971-1973 period. Relations with France are unique. There is a theme that seems to run through these interviews among those who deal with the French of both admiration and terrible frustration. Here you were inside the monster. How did you find dealing with the French political class?

PHILLIPS: It was very pleasant. No matter how the French appear collectively to the outside world, individually they can be charming. The politicians, the journalists, the academicians were by and large friendly. For example, I had lunch on several occasions with Jacques Chirac and with Francois Mitterrand. Of course they did not hold the positions then that they held later. Mitterrand was the leader of the Socialist opposition at the time and his chances of ever winning the Presidency appeared dim. He was happy enough to be invited to lunch by someone from the embassy. And so were other young socialists who eventually occupied positions of power.

Chirac was an assistant to President Pompidou and he hadn't yet made it big on the national scene. The so-called centrist politicians were pro-American and were totally accessible. Only the communists were hard to see, and that was largely the fault of embassy policy.

Q: Was it because you weren't allowed to or you couldn't reach them?

PHILLIPS: You could reach them easily enough. And if you went through a tedious Embassy clearance process you could meet with them. But contact with the communists was mainly handled by the CIA. Everything was so predictable in those days you didn't gain a lot by taking a communist out to lunch. You knew you would get the party line. But the socialists were very open. The Gaullists were difficult on policy issues, but individually there were easy enough to get along with. Those most friendly towards the United States and the ones we worked most closely with were the parties of the center. The Radicals, the Giscardians, the Christian Socialists, and so forth - remember France has a multi-party system. The center parties were pro-European Community, less nationalistic than the Gaullist and more pro-American than the Socialists. They were critical of DeGaulle's decision to withdraw from NATO, for example. Neither the center- left nor the center-right was virulently anti-American, but both were suspicious of United States policies.

Q: Did you find the suspicion was the official policy or when you got to know them was there much interest in what we were doing?

PHILLIPS: No, not really. I could actually write a book on this. The French, since World War II, have had a terrible inferiority complex that often plays out in relations with the United States. France was genuinely opposed to what we were doing in Vietnam. But then no Europeans particularly liked our Vietnam policies. But in addition, the French did not want to see us succeed where they had failed. There was also a French tendency to side with third world countries because they saw them as underdogs. But at the same time most Frenchmen, regardless of party, were defensive about Algeria. Remember the French exit from Algeria in the early 1960s was a traumatic national experience. It caused a deep split in French society that nearly resulted in civil war. French politicians did not like to be reminded of Algeria and they certainly resented any comparison between their Algerian experience and America's Vietnam experience. So there was jealousy and some hypocrisy combined with the very real concern that U.S. dominance in world affairs would undermine French culture and its place in the world. The feeling was summed up by De Gaulle's insistence that the world acknowledge "a certain idea of France," which makes no sense to a non-Frenchman, but which resonates across all ideological lines in France. He was appealing to the French pride in France's history, to its sense of grandeur. But this said, France was part of the west as opposed to the communist east. The average Frenchman loved American movies and jazz, and most French people were sincerely pleased to spend time with an American who spoke some French. So there was ambivalence about America, if not exactly a love/hate relationship, that still exists today.

Q: In regards to the Gaullists on NATO, was it implicate that the French thought that they could have independence from NATO but that if they needed help NATO would be there to protect them?

PHILLIPS: Well, they would not admit it in those words, but that was the case. DeGaulle had a policy he called “tout azimuth” which meant that French missiles were aimed both east and west. The policy was meant to show that France believed in a threat from the United States as well as from the Soviet Union. But this policy didn’t survive De Gaulle’s departure. There was a feeling that the United States was a hegemonious power that posed a threat to French culture and influence. French policy accordingly was to try to weaken United States influence in general, but not to make it so weak that the U.S. could not defend Europe if needed. The official who most personified this approach was the Foreign Minister, Michele Jobert. Jobert, who was married to an American woman and knew America very well, was extremely difficult to deal with. He saw himself in competition with Henry Kissinger for attention on the world stage. He made life difficult for American diplomats. He was very critical of U.S. policy towards Europe and of course Vietnam. His attitude came partly from adherence to Gaullists ideology and partly from political ambition. He knew President Pompidou was ill and he thought that playing the anti-American card would make him popular enough to have a shot at succeeding him. He actually ran for president when Pompidou died but only got about three percent of the vote.

Q: What about on the left side? We had the Kissinger government. They were very suspicious of the Kissinger State Department. He was both NSC and Secretary of State. He was very leery of socialist governments in Europe. How did you find the socialists and what kind of emanations were you getting from the European Bureau about them?

PHILLIPS: Kissinger was fearful of the socialists throughout Europe, but especially in France. In France they could only win power through an alliance with the communists. Throughout this period the communists averaged about 20 percent of the vote in local and national elections. The socialist averaged less, but even if they were to win as much as thirty 30 percent of the vote they would still need communists votes for a majority. Kissinger was very upset when the Salazar regime fell to a socialist government in Portugal. He was prepared to do anything he could to thwart the left in France, but there was not much he could do. Until Mitterrand took over the socialist party no one seriously gave a socialist-communist alliance much chance of winning power. But Mitterrand was one of the most cunning, Machiavellian political leaders of the late 20th Century. In 1964, the socialist candidate for President got about five percent of the vote, and that’s where the Socialists were when Mitterrand became party leader in 1965. He gradually made the Socialist party the largest party in France. He flirted with the communists but never actually let them get too close, and he used his formidable intelligence and debating skills to present a coherent vision of economic reform. He handled the communists deftly, in effect slowly marginalizing them. Of course the communists were marginalizing themselves to a large degree by blindly supporting Soviet policies that were becoming more and more unpopular in France. By the time a left coalition won power the Socialists were dominate and the Communists were very much the junior partner.

Q: What year did the socialists come into power?

PHILLIPS: The socialists came into power for the first time in the early 1980s.

Q: Did you find that the communists being the running dog of Moscow, were not really a power to be reckoned with?

PHILLIPS: They held a unique position in French society for many years. The communist party was both a kind of religion and the main social organization for many working class Frenchmen. It was their support system when they got fired or became ill or needed money. It was very strong in blue collar districts. But nationwide it could never win more than twenty percent of the vote. While it was very unlikely that the communists would come to power in France on their own, they formed a large enough voting bloc in the National Assembly to be a force to be reckoned with, but reckoned with ironically more as a bogeyman than as a political partner. The Gaullists and the Centrists used the communist threat to argue that the left was unfit to govern, and this tactic worked until the economy changed dramatically. Blue collar workers started getting better salaries, working conditions improved, immigrants started doing the lion's share of hard menial labor. This led to a less militant French work force and workers began to see their interests better served by the socialists than the communists.

Q: Were you reporting and watching the building efforts in the socialist ranks during your time there?

PHILLIPS: Oh, yes. We were following the socialists very carefully. We saw that they were beginning to make progress. We saw that Mitterrand was a consummate politician.

Q: While you were in France did you find yourself under pressure to explain American policy under Nixon and Kissinger? I would think the theme of their policies would be respected because the French always tried to look for themes.

PHILLIPS: I didn't deal with much the foreign office. I dealt with the politicians and the journalists. My contacts were interested in the game of French politics and they had little time for foreign policy issues. If we sat down to lunch and I said, "I saw Mitterrand on television last night," that would get them going and they would talk non-stop. Their only interest in U.S. policy was how it impacted on French politics.

Q: What about the French press?

PHILLIPS: The French press is quite different from the American press. Le Monde is the journal of record and while it tries to be somewhat neutral it has a pro-left slant. The rest of the papers are party organs. Le Figaro is establishment Gaullist, for example, and Combat is socialist. You knew in advance exactly what line most papers would take on a given subject. The journalists I dealt with, political analysts such as Bernard Lefort, were the James Restons' of France. I had an expense account that allowed me to invite them to nice restaurants for lunch or dinner. They were very sophisticated and well aware of the inconsistencies in French policies. They were also quite cynical about the politicians. The politicians themselves were willing to explain their positions to me. There were never any shouting matches or acrimonious arguments, which might have been expected given the sometimes tense relations between France and the United States. But then I was dealing with party leaders, not rank-and-file hotheads. Speaking of my expense account, there was a family joke that my job description should be "lunch-eater" because I frequently invited people to lunch. When I got a promotion in 1992, someone at school asked my youngest daughter Catherine, who was seven or eight at the time, what I got promoted to and she said in all seriousness, "dinner-eater, I guess."

Q: This brings up another subject. You were dealing with these two groups, the political press and the politicians. Did you get involved with the French intellectuals?

PHILLIPS: I mainly dealt with people from the political class which includes some intellectuals. The political class consists of some several thousand people, mainly living in Paris. It includes the politicians themselves, political junkies that follow them, print, television and radio journalists and a few people from the universities. The ones from the university were really on the fringes. They would write analytical and historical books, but were less involved in day to day politics. I had contact with people like Philip Alexander, a prolific author and radio commentator, who was clearly an intellectual as opposed to a politician. But the kinds of intellectuals you may be thinking of, like Jean Paul Sartre, weren't among my contacts.

Q: Did you find any of this approach that I have found in looking at French movies, this Cartesian way of looking at things. Americans thinking this is the way it happened because it happened. The French think there is always a great plan behind events. Did this enter into the political scene at all?

PHILLIPS: Yes it did. I think without falling into the trap of characterizing a whole people one way or another one can say that some specific French character traits do exist. And such traits were pervasive among people I dealt with. For instance, if Kissinger so much as mentioned Africa in a speech, my French friends would study it, analysis it and ponder whether it meant America was about to challenge French influence in their former colonies. They would always see minor pieces of the puzzle as part of some master plan. I would explain that Kissinger's speech writer probably just wanted to get in a plug for Africa at the behest of someone in the State Department African bureau. But they would remain unconvinced.

Q: Given the events of June 1968 for internal politics were you looking at the students?

PHILLIPS: Yes, we were. We had contact with student groups. We had a program which I think worked extremely well. It was managed by USIA and was called the leader grant program. Now I believe it is called the international visitors program. An embassy board selected young French leaders for one month travel grants to the United States. I was a member of the board and was able to nominate candidates. Because of my job a disproportionate number of my nominees were selected. Let's say we had 25 grants in a given year. Ten to 12 of those would be my nominees. I would try to pick young men and women who had been active student leaders. We hoped that exposure to the United States would give them a more realistic idea of America.

Q: What was your impression of what the French University was teaching? Was it pretty Marxist? Leftist?

PHILLIPS: The philosophy and history departments had a very left of center bent. The professors were strongly influenced by the intellectuals who emerged after World War II, many of whom were communists, or were deeply influenced by working side by side with communists during the resistance. The universities were a great strength of the left.

Q: You came a couple of years after the 1968 period. Were the student leaders following the same pattern that happens in other countries in that they were much less active after they left the university life?

PHILLIPS: Sure, because you have to make a distinction between the regular universities and the Grandes Ecoles, such as Science Politique and ENA. Acceptance at one of these prestigious graduate schools automatically assures a promising career in government. A lot of the leaders of the 1968 student uprising were very bright and were co-opted into the elite graduate schools. Many of them ended up as high ranking government officials.

Q: What was your impression of how Dick Watson, the ambassador, dealt with the French government?

PHILLIPS: I don't have much insight into that. When he dealt with me, it was mainly about who was going to win the elections. Since I could tell him what he wanted to hear, that the Right would win, I always found him to be very congenial and jovial. I think he was very difficult for some people in the embassy to work with. He had a bit of a Jekyll and Hyde personality. At times he could be charming and he often showed genuine concern for his staff. He never spent a penny of his representation money. It all went to us so we were never out of pocket for our entertainment needs. He would give wonderful parties at the residence and make sure that junior officers were invited. But he could also be very difficult. I think he was frustrated because he wanted to run the embassy like a business, which really can't be done, and because the French were so often uncooperative. I don't think it was an especially happy time for him.

Q: Wasn't it Watson that told a Marine guard to chop down a tree?

PHILLIPS: That is a true story. Our administration officer was named Pete Skoufis, a wonderful person. He had one lapse in taste though. He bought this artificial tree that he wanted to put in the beautiful entrance hall of the embassy. Of course security wasn't what it is today. People could actually walk into the embassy without going through security, but there was a marine guard on duty around the clock. The tree was made out of rubber or plastic and was supposed to look like a palm tree. Even from a distance though it didn't look real. I don't know why Pete bought the thing. He probably got it out of a catalog and thought it would liven up a dark corner of the entrance hall by the staircase. Well, Ambassador Watson hated the tree. Rumor had it that Watson would stay late sometimes and have a few drinks and maybe get a little tipsy. He hated the tree and came down the staircase one night and saw it standing there and on the spot ordered the Marine guard to take the fire ax and chop it down.

Q: Moving on to when Jack Irwin came and you were his special assistant. What was that like?

PHILLIPS: You have to understand that Jack was an entirely different kind of person than his brother-in-law, Dick Watson. He was a Rhodes scholar, a lawyer and a complete gentleman. He was from Iowa, and I think his family had some money, but nothing like the Watson money. He ended up in New York as a lawyer where he met and married one of the Watson girls. Just before he came to Paris his wife died, so he came as a widower. I guess she had died about a year before he came. He had a son and daughter in college, so he came by himself. He didn't speak French well and was not by nature a very outgoing or loquacious person. But he had great dignity. He was extremely pleasant to work for. I think his life in Paris was probably a bit lonely. He spared no expense to give wonderful dinner parties. He was just the opposite of the French stereotype image of an American. He wasn't brash or loud and he was always beautifully and conservatively dressed. He had the reputation of being one of the best ballroom dancers in New York society and women loved to come to his parties. He had the cache of being part of the IBM family. He was learning French and making real progress. But it was an especially difficult time because of Vietnam and Watergate. Relations with France were not improving. President Pompidou was still alive and Foreign Minister Jobert was Jack's main contact and, as I have noted, Jobert was a difficult man. Jack tried to introduce a more civil tone in U.S.-French relations, but he got little support from Nixon who was on his way out. Kissinger preferred to operate independently of the Embassy. If he had something to say to Jobert he would call him directly. Moreover, Jack didn't drink wine, which can be problematic in France. He did not have an easy time in France, but he made a valiant effort. I believe with time he would have been very successful. He was winning the respect of French leaders and he had a superb grasp of the issues.

Q: What was your role as special assistant?

PHILIPS: The Ambassador had his DCM and his political and economic counselors so I didn't get involved directly in formulating Embassy policy, but I did try to make sure the Ambassador saw the right people. I would go with him on most of his official calls. I tried to get him to meet politically attuned people so that he would understand the political dynamics of France. I did that too on the social side. I worked closely with Allan Holmes who was the political counselor, with John Condon who was the Labor Attaché and with Jack Kubisch, and later Galen Stone, both of whom served as DCM. I helped Jack run his office so that he would be free to devote his time to substantive issues. Because we were often together, I was his closest confidant in many ways. But I don't want to exaggerate the position. All of his top people were first rate and he worked closely with them.

HOWARD IMBREY
CIA, Worldwide Information Services
Paris (1963-1966)

Howard Imbrey was born in 1921 in New Jersey. He received his BA from the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill in 1942 and served in the US Army during World War II. His career has included positions in India, Sri Lanka, the Congo, France, Belgium, and Italy. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on June 21, 2001.

IMBREY: Well, they sent me to Paris, where again I was undercover with a news firm. Since then, '63, when a law was enacted which forbade us from using a news organization as a cover. In those days it wasn't forbidden. So worldwide information services was doing commercial public relations all over the world and they got me a post as its representative in Europe, stationed in Paris.

Q: So, what were you doing?

IMBREY: I was handling all the many, many African agents. Now, try to meet an African on the streets; everybody in Africa, white and black, played their own role. But, if a black happens to be passing through Paris one can get at him in a cafe, a movie, wherever you like and nobody thinks anything of it. So, I was handling about ten to fourteen agents regularly from various parts. If anybody had a problem seeing an agent they sent them to Paris and I would debrief them. That was my role.

Q: Paris was sort of the mecca for so many people in Africa anyway.

IMBREY: Oh, yes, all the French West Africans regularly came to Paris anyway.

Q: Did you have any problems with the French? I mean did the French know what you were up to?

IMBREY: They probably did. I guess I can't be too naive about that, but they never bothered me, they never talked to me about it. Incidentally, I had French friends who knew me in Bombay, or even Addis Ababa. They knew I was CIA and they could have easily have told the government and they may have.

Q: I mean, basically, were you sort of under constraints to keep it to Africans?

IMBREY: Not really, I had one very good agent, he was a Frenchman, but he was also very interested in Africa. Let's see, he was the head of a Christian organization that worked with students in French West Africa and I saw him regularly and I contributed to his program. So, nobody raised any problems. He himself was not particularly unhappy about the arrangement.

Q: Well, this was a time when France was going through a period of fairly strong nationalism with De Gaulle.

IMBREY: Right, and that was the time that Guinea said no to De Gaulle, where everybody else said yes. So, we were dealing with all the yes countries and not much to do with Guinea. I did, of course, have agents in Guinea that I was seeing regularly. But the French would have approved of that.

Q: What were we trying to do, just get reports and keep in touch?

IMBREY: Oh, no, again this was all against the Soviets. Most of the agents that had been developed in these various countries were watching what the Soviets were doing in shipping, penetrating the national organizations. This was the era of mass organizations. Do you remember that? The youth, the WFBY, all these mass organizations, and the Russians were playing a heavy hand developing agents and contacts in those mass organizations.

Q: And we were, too?

IMBREY: We were, too.

Q: At this stage it almost feels like if the FBI hadn't been around the communist party of the United States might have collapsed?

IMBREY: Yes, there was something like that, yes. We didn't have that many. After a while Africa was never a great priority and certainly not at the time of Kissinger. I went to a lecture by Kissinger at the War Department and some young officer asked him a question. He said, "Dr. Kissinger, which is one of the important countries as far as American policy goes?" and he said, "India is important, Pakistan is important", and he went around to France and somebody finally piped up and said, "What about Africa?" and he said, "No, not important."

Q: Did the Soviets have a plan or was this just general mischief making or something?

IMBREY: Sure. They were out to use the mass organizations to get them out on the streets in various countries of the world. Prague was the head of the WFBY for example, and they had a lot of people going to Prague to get the people out in the streets in support of the Soviet policies in Czechoslovakia and you know the Americans went there and ruined it for them at one point.

Q: Our concern in those days was mass movements and that sort of thing. We're not really talking about the terrorists?

IMBREY: No, mass organizations were very important and then Sukarno started the third world operation. What was that called? The nonaligned.

Q: Nasser, and Tito and Sukarno and Nkrumah and the Bandoon group.

IMBREY: Which later became the tri-apartheid conference under Castro.

Q: Were the Soviets putting considerable amount of money and effort into Africa?

IMBREY: Gee, I can't say.

Q: Well, did you have the feeling that [words indistinct]?

IMBREY: Dingaparsamonia [as heard] is always there and I can't believe they could have put too much into it. No.

Q: Did you get any feel for your counterparts the Soviet people running these checks? How did you feel about them?

IMBREY: Suave, talented group, could get along anywhere. They were just fine and nice people. Not at all devious.

Q: Did you ever sort, not really let your hair down, but sit around in a bar and chat with them for a while?

IMBREY: With one the name of Devorkian in Addis Ababa who was the chief of the KGB establishment there. He was a very nice, well-spoken man, good English. We spoke of niceties, not politics.

Q: You were in Paris from '63 until when?

IMBREY: Until '66.

Q: You were married?

IMBREY: Yes, yes. I was married in Bombay in '48, '49.

Q: So, this must have been a kind of delight for both of you, living in Paris.

IMBREY: My wife did not mind a bit. She had a background in France. She speaks good French, so she enjoyed it.

STEPHEN PATERSON BELCHER
Cultural Affairs Director, Dragon Student Center, USIS
Paris (1963-1966)

Stephen Paterson Belcher was born in 1916. He worked for the Civil Affairs Division of the U.S. Army and then for the State Department before USIA was created. His Foreign Service career included positions in Egypt, Nigeria, France, and Tanzania. Mr. Belcher was interviewed by Jack O'Brien in 1988.

BELCHER: Yes. And then transferred kicking and screaming to work for USIS Paris, as Cultural Center Director running the Dragon Student Center, but on the African payroll. European budgets were going down as the Agency had to open all these new posts in Africa. Paris was having to close Branch Posts. There were people who had spent three or four tours in France and were now being assigned to these ridiculous little posts in Franco- phone Africa.

Q: Who was PAO in Paris?

BELCHER: John Mowinckel. As I say, I hadn't really wanted to go to Paris, because when my wife was evacuated from Cairo during the first Suez crisis, she got a glimpse of how USIS posts in Europe are operated. Mostly the people are hiding from visiting Americans. Now, we liked the bush. We liked the third world. But the African Area felt that so many African students were in France getting naughty Marxist ideas, perhaps USIS could do something about this in France. USIS Paris was willing to accept this contribution to its staff even though it was paid for by another geographic area.

I think this was perhaps rightly resented by the Paris CAO, my boss and a fine man, Doug Schneider, who was practically binational. He had been in France before the war, and then worked for the OWI. He thought it was unethical for USIS to be subverting their ex-colonials right there in the metropole. This was undermining France. I had to be careful what I did. But I had fun.

There was a very creative Executive Officer in Paris who taught me how to budget for a seminar. I should overplan and submit an enlarged budget, with a third party accepting the contract for it. Thus, I would get more money than I really needed and could just keep the extra money in my safe at the Dragon Center, for emergency use. Other people at USIS Paris had a hard time getting any reimbursement for representational expenses. I had no problem whatsoever. At the drop of a hat, I could turn on a lovely little reception down in the basement. We had one of the most exciting places imaginable at that time. There's a lot of great American talent in Paris at any time of the year. You can draw on this for lectures, concerts, exhibits, what-have-you. Poetry readings, music, you name it. I would try to have a hook, to attract Africans.

And I would try to take advantage of Black Americans who were resident in Paris. Of 15,000 Americans, I think it was, who were resident in the Paris Consular district, at least one thousand were resident Blacks who had never had much to do with the American Embassy. I wonder whether even Josephine Baker was ever invited to an Embassy reception. Before I came, there had been the March on Washington and a parallel March in Paris on the Embassy. This was the first time the Blacks in Paris had ever done anything with the whites. It was organized by the American Church on the Left Bank, and it was a nice, peaceful, mingling of Blacks and whites.

Q: Reel Two of the interview, by Jack O'Brien, conducted on the 29th day of September, 1988. To you, Pat.

BELCHER: I had been describing my work as Information Center Director at the Dragon Center on the Left Bank in Paris in the '60s.

There was a lot of interest in France in the American Civil Rights movement. And we had quite a few notable American Blacks coming through Paris. Among them was Roy Wilkins, head of the NAACP. He gave a talk at the Dragon Center and then we were asked to invite some African students to meet him at the DCM's home, where he would answer questions. Luckily, I was again assisted by Ms. Yvonne Williams who selected the students carefully and it went very well. Wilkins was a very distinguished white-hair gentleman. A useful exchange was conducted. The students were seated on small gold folding chairs and trays of croques monsieurs and sandwiches would come around. But of course, the vast majority of Blacks in Paris -- Americans and Africans, would have been distinctly unhappy in those elegant surroundings. Again, Yvonne Williams gave me a lot of good advice on how to handle some of these situations. The DCM's soiree was the appropriate thing to do with Roy officially, but she thought we might also expose him to some other aspects of the Black community in Paris. They were part of his parish too, after all. So we took him to Butterfly McQueen's, one of Paris' black nightclubs, arriving about 11:00 at night. It was dimly lit, the people were fairly far gone. The bartender recognized Roy as a familiar face, shook his hand and gave him a basket of chicken wings. Slowly, others recognized this father-figure, soon drunks were falling all over him. So he was exposed to a slice of Paris he had never seen before. That was a good education for him.

Among other visitors we had were a group from SNCC (The Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee) who had been so active in the southern Civil Rights movement. This was after the Mississippi summer project when three American whites had been buried in a levee in Mississippi. Some of the volunteers had been doing voter registration and were given a trip to visit Sekou Toure of Guinea by Harry Belafonte. So they went out to Guinea and saw Africa. They had a great time and Sekou Toure treated them like the heroes they were.

Art Bardos was the PAO in Guinea and he said, "Flying out of here, your plane goes home via Paris. If you have any problems in Paris, just phone Pat Belcher at such-and-such a phone number." So we got accustomed to getting phone calls, "Hello, I'm at Orly and I have 27 cents. What do I do now?" We told them to come in, and we put them up in our apartment on the Left Bank. We had some quite distinguished visitors - Julian Bond, John Lewis for example. Some times my kids would compare notes about people who would be sharing their room. "My guy's been arrested 23 times. How many time's your guy been arrested?"

They held press conferences. We went around and met the media. They had quite a good time in Paris on their way home, and I think we got some good mileage.

We even had Martin Luther King coming through. A committee of resident Americans was formed to sponsor a speech he decided to give as a fund-raiser for his Southern Christian Leadership Foundation. I was perhaps as high on the official list as they got, of resident American sponsors wanting to put their names down as co-sponsor. He had won the Nobel prize and was going to be going through Paris again later on, to collect it. He came to Paris with Harry Belafonte to give the speech. As a member of the organizing committee, I had gotten a promise early on that he would not touch Vietnam. His talk would be entirely about domestic Civil Rights problems. At this time, progress was being made, and he was a hero. As I understand it, Ambassador Bohlen sent a classified cable back to Washington about whether or not it would be appropriate for him to attend this public fund-raising speech at the Palais des Sports. The Department saw fit to reply in an unclassified message that attendance at the event was not part of his mission to the Elysée Palace. Well, this message went to every official activity in France, the least NATO platoon or whatever. "Don't go to the Martin Luther King speech!" So some of the tickets we sold were turned in. Other people turned them in for cheaper tickets in seats where they'd not be so visible.

I think my wife and I were the only Americans to sit in the most expensive seats. And I discovered that no one ever paid for their seats in that area -- these were for the celebrities and movie starlets and darlings of the publicity firms around l'Etoile. So we were in elegant company at the boxing ring from which Martin Luther King was to give his speech.

Harry Belafonte had arrived in Paris a few days early, to make sure the acoustics were suitable. He's a professional! Paris had never heard such acoustics in the Palais. He also learned from somebody, not from me, about the exchange of telegrams about the Ambassador's attendance and he spilled this to the press a day before the talk and concert.

Well, it went off well, though I regret to say, some of the American students were outside getting signatures to petitions about Vietnam and it made me livid! But once inside, Harry gave a great performance. The talk was good. Afterwards there was a party by the organizers, and partying continued for the visitors, so they had problems getting their plane to Lille the next morning and had to charter a plane. So they didn't make much money.

Q: Did Ambassador Bohlen ever get questioned by the press about this by the French press?

BELCHER: I have no idea. I don't think so. But four or five months later, when things had closed down for Ambassador Bohlen (France had withdrawn from NATO; Vietnam had become a very real issue; American-French relations were not good at all) I got a surprise.

The Ambassador didn't have many opportunities to meet with French groups but he gave some talks at the Dragon Center, and we could get a few meetings with student groups. His French was excellent. He got every nuance in even the most needling question. Once I was driving home with him after such a talk at the Cite Universitaire, and I had my surprise. In the car, he said he was sorry he hadn't gone to that Martin Luther King talk, as he looked back on it. He should have gone.

Q: You had how long in Paris?

BELCHER: About three years. But I wonder if I could backtrack a bit about one small thing about Cotonou. When I left there, it turned out to be the weekend of the Kennedy assassination.

Q: Twenty-five years ago now!

BELCHER: We were going on a direct transfer to Paris by boat. One of those occasions where the family was put in a basket and hoisted up from dockside, over and onto the deck of the small French freighter-cum-passenger ship. We were the only Americans abroad. We went slowly up the West African coast to Marseille, stopping at just about every major city along the way. The assassination was on a Friday. We set off on Sunday. The ship's crew was very considerate and offered us the Purser's cabin if we wanted to hear the short wave broadcast of the funeral. Stopping off at the ports, I was able to check into what was going on. It could not have been more moving. The Africans personally were so hurt by it, so sympathetic. There were evidences of all kinds -- people signing guest books, memorial services, national days of mourning.

DENISE ABBEY
Cultural Officer, USIS
Paris (1963-1967)

Denise Abbey began her career with the War Information Program in 1944. Her career included positions in Italy, Austria, Germany, and France. Ms. Abbey was interviewed by Lew Schmidt in 1988.

ABBEY: At the end of the 3 ½ years I was told that I was now ready for foreign assignment again. I went in to find out what it was. And they said Paris. And I said, Paris, France? And they said, yes, Paris, France. I said, do you mean it? Well, yes. You're not going to change your mind? Well, no. But I thought if they'd ever read that I'd had Rome and Vienna and Heidelberg that they were never going to let me have Paris as well!

At any rate, I got out of town in three days. Went out to the West Coast. I said I'll go immediately if I can have two weeks to visit home. My father -- I didn't know then, but it was in the last months of his life. And I'll always be glad that I took those two weeks to visit him.

And then I flew to Paris and I arrived in Paris to be met by my retiring predecessor who said I have three messages for you. Your PAO Doug Schneider says greetings and don't come to work until Monday. (It was a holiday weekend.) Two, here's your mail. And three, I have the refusal of an apartment for you. Now, everybody who went to Paris had to wait one, two, three years and never got an apartment. And here I hadn't left the airport and I have the refusal of one. I said, there's no refusal involved. Dorothy Stansbury who recently passed away, she was Dorothy Ward and she was marrying Ed Stansbury. And she would move in with him so her apartment would be free. So I went to a hotel for a couple of nights. And she said this is silly. Come and stay here and then you can just stay on when I get married. So I had a wonderful apartment on the Avenue de Suffren. As I said, if the Eiffel Tower ever fell over it would have demolished it.

I lived there for 3 ½ years and used it for all the entertainment that I could and had many entertainments. Because in Paris I was working with the department with Ann Eckstein in the cultural part which was sending French people to America and receiving certain Americans aboard, especially the would-be teachers of French in the U.S.A. Now, they were not allowed to teach French in France. Only French-born could teach it. But they could be assistants d'anglais. And they would get the French experience and then go back. And we had 100 or more of them every year.

We had to divide them around about France. And immediately they came and we told them their assignments, 80 percent of them would just howl and cry because they weren't going to be in Paris. Well, two months later we would have a meeting and 20 percent of them were howling and crying because they got Paris and not the other places because everybody in the other places had the most marvelous experiences.

The program in Paris was largely dealing with the educational people and others, but mostly educational, whom we sent to the United States. And as I remarked, what I learned there was it's very, very difficult to break through the French, well, ego we'll say. They're egoistic. Their family, their own group. Nobody else gets into it unless somebody breaks into it. They came to America and they were simply stunned at the reception, at the openness, everything done for them. Please come to my home and like that. And they went back to France to decide, oh, we will do this too. And then all of their friends looked at them like they'd lost their buttons and they gradually froze up. However, if an American who had received them came to France, then there was not enough that they could do for them. And that I must say. Because they broke through that shell.

The years in Paris included the Kennedy assassination. And that had a most extraordinary effect on Paris. The entire people for once came out of their crust and did stop Americans on the street to commiserate. They came to the embassy in such quantities you couldn't believe it. The embassy spent days emptying the flowers to the hospitals. Because they brought the flowers until the embassy was just piled with them. The newspapers, the whole thing brought a personal reaction that was absolutely unique in anything I've ever heard of French reactions. And it was a magnificent occasion too.

De Gaulle, of course, came to the United States. But they had this requiem mass in Notre Dame on Monday which was the day I believe of the funeral here. And Mrs. de Gaulle was the hostess. And the whole of the diplomatic corps was there. And they filled right straight across the crossing of Notre Dame and all of the public came in. And the embassy people got in the main part. But of course there's five. And Anne and I got there and the French soldier usher waved us in. And we went into absolute darkness. There wasn't a soul there and we couldn't understand. They'd just opened this aisle. And so we got in the front row before the diplomatic corps. Then we heard the thousand pouring into the side aisles and naves, only breathing and movement.

And the whole service was magnificent of course. The church group came in. And then at the end of the service the Bishop of Paris led them out and he broke with all protocol. He stopped by the ambassador to speak and commiserate with him. And then the whole parade went out. So for several days there Paris was not Paris. It just was an adjunct of the sorrow in America. It was a completely unexpected and almost unknown reaction. It was very great.

MICHAEL H. NEWLIN
Political-Military Officer, US Mission to Regional Operations
Paris (1963-1967)

Ambassador Newlin was born in North Carolina and was raised there and in the Panama canal zone. After graduating from Harvard he joined the Foreign Service in 1952 and was posted to Frankfurt, Oslo, Paris, Kinshasa and Jerusalem, where served as Consul General. During his distinguished career, Ambassador Newlin served in several high level positions dealing with the United Nations and its agencies and NATO. He served as Ambassador to Algeria from 1981 to 1985 and as US representative to the United Nations Agencies in Vienna., 1988-1991. Mr. Newlin was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2006.

NEWLIN: I was in Paris, oh something funny. Personnel developed sort of hiccups over this assignment because it was all handled outside regular personnel procedures. But finally when they got the word that Finletter agreed, they did not want to second-guess him. Eventually Personnel called me and said, "Mike we are ready to write your assignment orders to Paris. We are in the process of trying to save money, so we are going to assign you to Paris for five years to save money of transferring you after four. Is that agreeable to you?" I said, "Yes that sounds all right."

Q: But you owe me.

NEWLIN: I said, "Yes." So that was where we were. We were going off then in 1963 at that time for five years presumably. In those days most people traveled to Europe by ship. So we were supposed to go on an American ship, the old America. While we were docked in New York and people were waving goodbye, I could look down and see that the crew was leaving the ship. A spokesman made a public announcement, "There is a slight difficulty with a dispute with some members of the crew, but we will soon be at sea. We advise the people on the dock to disperse, and we will soon be at sea." Well the America never sailed again. The upshot of it was three days later we went over three docks and sailed on the old Queen Mary. That was a very nice introduction to our thing in Europe. We were met in Paris by the head of the political section, John Auchincloss. It was a very interesting assignment indeed. Finletter of course, had been Secretary of the Air Force under Truman.

Q: Thomas K. Finletter.

NEWLIN: Yes, Thomas K. Finletter. He and Eleanor Roosevelt were with Adlai Stevenson the very liberal wing of the Democratic party. The deputy chief of mission was a very interesting fellow called Durbrow. I don't know if you have ever heard of Durbrow, but he was a cold warrior if there ever was one. Anybody that he disagreed with, he call a goddam UN loving twilight sleeping son of a bitch. 'Twilight sleeping' in those days were narcotics given women in labor. I had the impression Durbrow used the phrase rather than comsymp or comdupe. Since I came from IO, I was under somewhat of a suspicion, and since my wife was born in Czechoslovakia, even though she had risked everything fleeing communism he always sort of regarded her with some misgiving.

Q: When you arrived there, what was sort of the political situation in France vis a vis NATO, I mean at the time you arrived?

NEWLIN: At the time we arrived, it didn't really come to a head so much, but de Gaulle was very much on his campaign to increase France's role in the world and independence. Actually while I was there, the NATO mission was really the focus of a lot of activity in that regard. When I first got there in '63 it was not so. I will say right after we got there, just a few weeks after we got there, the Auchinclosses invited us for dinner. They had a beautiful place on the Champs de Mars. When my wife and I got there, the people taking our coats told us in French, "Kennedy is dead." We were just stunned.

Q: November 22.

NEWLIN: November 22, yes. So we went in, and they had the radio on, so during the entire evening we were listening to the radio as to what was happening in Houston and Washington. That was a tremendous shock.

Under Finletter, we had at that time I arrived a project called the multilateral force. I don't know whether you have ever heard of that. This was a scheme to associate the West Germans with nuclear weapons so that they could defend themselves in case of a Soviet attack. The ICBMs (intercontinental ballistic missiles) would be on surface vessels that looked like merchant ships.

The United States would control the nuclear missiles but they would be on ships that you could move around. Of course this is something that would drive the Soviet crazy. Finletter was just hell bent on this idea. The minister for political affairs was Phil Farley. He had reservations and said Finletter sounded like the ancient mariner in his dedication to the multilateral force. The French and perhaps some other delegations were not going to have any part of this, but still we spent a lot of time on that.

It became apparent that political life in Paris was divided into segments between the twice a year de Gaulle press conferences. Three months leading up to his press conference there were all these rumors and speculations about what he was going to say. The press conference would take place and for the next three months everybody was speculating as to what some of his oracular statements meant.

Q: I would like to ask you. What did you do. Was your focus on sort of the French association to NATO or was it you know were you looking at the Germans and other people there? How did you go about doing what you were doing?

NEWLIN: Okay when I got there, the political military thing was really sort of the State Department interaction with the American military presence which of course, was very large indeed. SACEUR was just outside of Paris. We had air bases and other military facilities as well as large related infrastructure such as pipelines. So I was involved with sort of liaison with the military from a political standpoint. Once we got an instruction from Washington that instructed the mission to go and see SACEUR, who was General Lemnitzer, and persuade General Lemnitzer to involve himself in the Cyprus dispute since other efforts to solve the Cyprus problem had been to no avail. So Finletter gave me the telegram, told me to go out and see Lemnitzer, and carry out the instruction. So I got in a car and went out and after a great deal of security and questioning got in to see Lemnitzer. I showed him the telegram. "This is what Washington would like you to do." It had been cleared by the Pentagon. Lemnitzer looked at me and said, "These are the God Damnedest instructions I have ever seen. I am not about to get involved in the Cyprus dispute." So I said, "I will report back. If you would like to call Ambassador Finletter, please feel free to do so." I went back, and Finletter and Mrs. Finletter were waiting for me at his residence, I reported, "Absolutely no sale on that."

I got involved in other things such as the NATO infrastructure program as well. The alliance decided to build an integrated radar program to shield Western Europe. It was very expensive and at the time no European firm was capable of taking on such a huge undertaking. At the end, the contract went to Hughes. We were very close to the Germans and assured them we were working on the multilateral force. Then however, Kennedy's death changed everything when LBJ became president. Finletter decided he had better go off to Washington and try to ingratiate himself with LBJ and bring LBJ up to speed as to where the multilateral force thing stood. Somehow he managed to get a rather small meeting with just LBJ and a few people in the oval office. While LBJ was a master of American politics, he had had little experience in international affairs. So LBJ agreed that yes, Finletter should go right ahead, full steam ahead and work with other delegations and broaden the effort and so forth. Finletter came back very much encouraged. But I thought to my self, well, I wonder about those in Washington and elsewhere who have doubts about this project. I mean even though LBJ gave him his blessing to mount a major diplomatic campaign on this, I just wondered about it.

I guess I had been in Paris 18 months or so, my wife one morning at breakfast came in with the Herald Tribune, and said, "Finletter is out and he is being replaced by Harlan Cleveland." Of course I had worked very closely with Harlan in IO before coming out. So that meant that Durbrow was out too. The first thing that happened was that Harlan's personal political advisor, Tom Wilson, who was not a foreign service officer, but was soon assigned to the mission came out on reconnaissance. I briefed him about the whole situation. Finletter and Durbrow were out. The third ranking person was Phil Farley, who was a brilliant person but rather prickly. In the Department he had been in what was then pol-mil. He had made a lot of enemies in the Department because of his very strong views, including making an enemy of Cleveland. So when I got to work that morning at the elevator downstairs Phil Farley said, "Well I am looking for another job. I am not going to work for Harlan Cleveland." I said, "Now Phil calm down. Harlan Cleveland is one of the most intelligent and creative people I have ever worked with. With you as his deputy here, we would have it intellectually over all the other delegations." Then I made the same point to Tom Wilson when he came out. I said, "Don't let Harlan fire Phil Farley without meeting and talking to him. I think it would be good." Fortunately this was the way it finally worked out. By that time when Harlan came, de Gaulle had really begun his anti NATO campaign. He had decided that he didn't want to go so far as to kick the North Atlantic Council which was composed of ambassadors of almost all European countries, he didn't want to go that far. But he decided he would kick out SACEUR – the military headquarters. There were a number of ambassadors on the North Atlantic Council, who said, "This is all right. The military HQ can go to Germany or Belgium, and the North Atlantic council would stay here. Well if the North Atlantic Council was supposed to manage crises and the military was off in another country, that wasn't going to work. Some Ambassadors didn't want to leave their beautiful homes in Paris. So at any rate it was finally decided that we would have to go to Belgium where NATO was welcome.

Q: Well up to this point two things. One, in the first place, this multilateral force with these ICBMs and all on ships. I mean it never happened, but how did it strike you? It must have been a nervousness about this because...

NEWLIN: There was a nervousness about it. At first I thought it was a good idea because it would reassure the Germans presumably. That is what it was meant to do. It would reassure the Germans and dampen any future thought that they ought to try to develop nuclear weapons themselves. But I did see that it possibly had quite a bit of security problems associated with it. On the other hand it would certainly complicate the strategic planning of Moscow because they would certainly make every effort to find out which ships these things were on and where they were stationed and where they were going. These would be surface ships made to look like merchant craft. Of course there would be security problems both at sea and if the were allowed to dock along with regular merchant ships. I have already mentioned what the Norwegian reaction would be. While I worked on the project loyally with Finletter since it was his main interest, I wasn't too sorry to see the thing evaporate after LBJ came in, and particularly when Finletter left, the thing died.

Q: Well did you have any contact with the French military or the French civilians dealing with the French military?

NEWLIN: I did not. My main military contacts were with the American military, and planning for their departure and all the problems associated.

Q: Well it was huge.

NEWLIN: We had air bases.

Q: We had supply lines running through France.

NEWLIN: Yes, we had a big pipeline running from Cherbourg or Le Havre running through France to supply the oil and gasoline that we used in Germany. George Ball sent a telegram saying that we wanted ironclad assurances from the French that that pipeline would not be touched. I remember the Ambassador to France at that time was Chip Bohlen. We were at dinner when this came up. He said, "Ironclad jock straps? Where are you going to get anything like that?" Finally we had to face the fact that both the North Atlantic Council and the military were going to Belgium. The Belgians were marvelous. They managed to put up in six months or less a new headquarters for NATO in a suburb of Brussels plus building headquarters for SACEUR and all of the military further away down near the French border. So at that time, that was in '67 I guess it was. Personnel said to me, "Well Mike, you have been in Paris for four years and you are assigned for five. What do you want to do? Do you want to just say you are through with NATO or do you want to finish out and go to Brussels for one year?" I thought it would be interesting to see how this works out, so I said I would like to go on to Brussels. So we packed up and went off to Brussels for the fifth year of our assignment.

ALAN G. JAMES
Political Advisor, European Command
Paris (1963-1968)

Alan G. James was born in Brooklyn, New York in 1920. His Foreign Service career included positions in the United Kingdom and France. Mr. James was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on December 20, 1994.

Q: Now where were you the Political Advisor?

JAMES: At United States European Command. Let me explain the command structure. In 1963, the Commander-in-Chief, United States Forces Europe, was General Lyman L. Lemnitzer, a capable, avuncular soldier-diplomat, known affectionately to his staff as "General Lem." Lemnitzer had been Chief of Staff, of the Army and Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. I saw General Lemnitzer frequently and enjoyed his hospitality. He was a fine man and soldier. He was also Supreme Allied Commander, Europe (SACEUR). His NATO headquarters was designated Supreme Headquarters Allied Powers, Europe (SHAPE). Since General Lemnitzer, like his predecessors, devoted most of his time to NATO business, his deputy, a four star Air Force officer de facto ran, U.S. European Command, EUCOM. However, if a major crisis arose in the EUCOM area of responsibility, Lemnitzer would come over to EUCOM and take command. His NATO and U.S. headquarters were only some 10 miles apart. This he did during the Congo crisis of 1963 or 1964 when EUCOM aircraft airlifted Belgian paratroopers to the Congo to protect and evacuate Europeans.

General Lemnitzer had his own political adviser at SHAPE who was called Foreign Affairs Adviser in deference to allied sensibilities. His adviser in 1963 was John Burns, an accomplished Foreign Service officer who later was Director General of the Foreign Service. Lemnitzer was fastidious about not mixing SHAPE and EUCOM business.

I was POLAD to the Deputy Commander-in-Chief at EUCOM who was known as DCINC.

Q: Who was that?

JAMES: When I arrived at EUCOM the DCINC was General J.P. McConnell who a year later became Chief of Staff of the Air Force. McConnell was a tough, smart officer who had survived a number of crashes and did not at the age of about 60 when I met him, land an airplane very gently, as I can attest having been his passenger several times. McConnell was proud of his service with Lord Mountbatten in the CBI theater during the war.

As POLAD my principal responsibility was to ensure that the DCINC and his senior staff (on which all services were represented) were apprised of significant political and economic developments in the EUCOM area, which was more extensive than that of SHAPE; it included parts of Africa in addition to NATO Europe. From the Embassy in Paris I received a broad selection of telegrams daily which I used to brief the DCINC and senior officers. I gave briefings on political issues of concern to the Command, for example, in contemplation of moving the headquarters from France to Germany after President de Gaulle ordered U.S. forces to leave France, I gave a talk on the German constitution and political system. I also accompanied senior officers on inspection trips to Morocco and Libya, where the Command had special interests, and of course frequently to Berlin.

In addition to keeping my military principals informed on political issues, I sent frequent reports to the Department about the political concerns of the Command. That was a time when there were pressures in Congress to draw down forces in Europe because of budgetary concerns. I represented to the Department the apprehensions about draw downs of McConnell and Lemnitzer. Burns showed Lemnitzer one of my letters to the Department which the General thought a cogent analysis of the military's objections to a significant draw-down.

McConnell left EUCOM around the middle of 1964 to be Air Force Chief of Staff. His successor was another four star Air Force general, Jacob E. Smart, who had commanded the U.S. Air Force in Japan and, as I mentioned earlier in the interview, commanded the bomb group in Italy during the war of which my squadron was a part. Smart is a courtly South Carolinian, gracious and cosmopolitan. He had a distinguished war record. He planned the first air raid on the oil fields of Ploesti and later won a DSC for gallantry. He was shot down in 1944, I think, and was a POW until the end of the war. He was delightful to work for. My wife and I enjoyed his company immensely.

Q: You were just outside of Paris?

JAMES: Yes, near St. Germain-en-Laye, at a base called Camp des Loges, where, it was said, there had been a military encampment since the time of Caesar. That's where I was from the summer of 1963 to the spring of 1967 when U.S. forces left France and the headquarters moved to Germany. Smart was DCINC when President de Gaulle decreed in March 1966 that U.S. forces and NATO should leave France.

Our Embassy in Paris had advance, but very brief, warning of de Gaulle's ultimatum, a fact incidentally, that Ambassador Bohlen did not mention in his autobiography "Witness to History." A night or two before Foreign Minister Couve de Murville called Bohlen to the Quai d'Orsay to receive a note formally requesting the departure of U.S. forces, a senior officer of the Foreign Office called the Minister, Robert McBride, and Political-Military Counselor, Jack McGuire, to the Quai d'Orsay to inform them of the General's plans. With such advance warning, Washington could at least be prepared to make a quick riposte to the French demand to withdraw. April 1, 1967 was the deadline for withdrawal of U.S. forces and EUCOM. NATO was allowed somewhat more time.

For the next year, I shuttled between EUCOM and the Embassy constantly, attending Ambassador Bohlen's staff meetings, being briefed by my friend McGuire on Embassy contacts with the French, and generally gathering as much information as possible to be useful to Smart and officers at EUCOM. McGuire, who had preceded me as POLAD at EUCOM, was splendidly helpful. He was bright, precise and ebullient. I enjoyed a most agreeable association with him. I was supposed to replace McGuire in the Embassy sometime in 1966 but Bohlen did not want any of the players to change. So he froze McGuire's and my transfer for a year.

I passed to General Smart information I got from McGuire about French requirements for withdrawal and other information that would assist EUCOM in executing withdrawal of U.S. forces and the long, complex line of communications that stretched across France from the Atlantic to the Rhine.

This was a lively if depressing time, for being expelled from France was not a happy prospect for our military friends or us civilians close to them. John Burns at SHAPE, and McGuire and I arranged for our principals, Generals Lemnitzer and Smart and Ambassador Bohlen to compare notes regularly. Bohlen was a tower of strength during this trying time. Often these consultations took place over luncheon at Bohlen's residence. He had a talented chef and our political-military camaraderie was made closer, more congenial and I hope more productive by sharing the pleasures of the Bohlen table and cellar.

Q: Had there been any intimations that this was going to happen before you got this leaked word? Were you thinking, well, de Gaulle, we better start thinking about getting out of here? Or was this pretty much a bolt from the blue?

JAMES: I recall that it was a complete surprise to us all.

As I have said, McGuire and I were very friendly and talked regularly even before this crisis. I know he would have told me if he and his superiors had an intimation or were predicting that this would happen. In retrospect, it seems clear that given de Gaulle's vision of France, his obsession with fear of domination by the United States and NATO, and his insistence that France should not allow her independence to be diluted, it was only a question of time before he sought to dissociate France from the military side of NATO and order U.S. forces out of France. But when the blow fell we were all shocked and surprised, military and civilian alike.

Q: You're talking about the French military.

JAMES: No, I mean the U.S. military. I would not venture to guess whether the French military were surprised. Our military plan for all sorts of contingencies and presumably they had a plan for just this sort of emergency, that is, for winding up the line of communications, LOC, moving stocks from France to other NATO countries, and withdrawing headquarters and subcommands. But I do not remember any officer at EUCOM saying, well it has finally happened. General Smart I can attest was taken aback by the news.

Q: What about the reaction of our military? You got two days and all of a sudden, you know it's going to happen. Military being military, although it's NATO, it really must have been, "Goddamn the French!" or "What the hell!" or something. How did you work on this?

JAMES: At EUCOM, de Gaulle's decree was regarded as an arrogant act. Expelling U.S. forces and NATO would, it was generally felt, make defense of Europe more difficult because, among other things, the LOC henceforth would have to run parallel and not, as military doctrine required, at right angles to the potential battle line. And there was resentment; we had after all gone to the rescue of France twice in this century. However, senior people at EUCOM were sophisticated and knew how to conduct themselves without much, if any, tutoring from me.

I have the recollection that not a few French officers were chagrined by de Gaulle's decision. Those we knew at EUCOM seemed to be. The French civilian officials I knew deplored our eviction. I think particularly of the French liaison office for assistance to allied forces, headed by a distinguished civil servant, Pierre Dambeza, and his deputy, Louis de Beauchamp, a Proust scholar. Both were friendly to me and senior officers at the Command beyond the demands of protocol. They were too correct to criticize the General's decision openly, but I thought they regretted and were saddened by it.

Dambeza gave a splendid farewell party in his Paris apartment for senior Embassy and U.S. military officers. Lemnitzer and Bohlen both attended. Smart was sick, I think, and did not attend. It was an imaginative affair that showed genuine esteem for the United States and its representatives. Dambeza created, in miniature, the LOC which ran, as if from the Atlantic to the Rhine, from one room in his apartment to another. In each room were laid out the specialities, the cheeses, wines, pates, pastries, of the particular region of France through which the LOC actually passed. It was a lavish affair and a Lucullan delight, but most of all it was a gesture of amity that we all deeply appreciated.

Whatever their feelings about the decision of the French Government, the American military got on with the job and did it smartly. The word went out from EUCOM that the General's timetable would be met. There was little time to bemoan the fact that we would have to leave.

Q: Did you have to help put out brush fires of resentment, such as, well, if we're going to pull out of here, let's do this or that, or make it hurt, or anything like that? Was that a problem?

JAMES: I did not detect a disposition in the U.S. military not to uncooperate or to drag their feet. Ambassador Bohlen and Generals Lemnitzer and Smart would not have tolerated it. They made sure that the evacuation went smoothly and that the public attitude of U.S. forces was politically correct throughout that difficult year.

General Smart left EUCOM before we moved to Germany. His place was taken by another four star Air Force officer, David Birchinal, who had been Director of the Joint Staff of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. He obviously was a capable officer, but I did not enjoy with him the close rapport I did with Smart. He was a bit of a cold fish. I don't remember much about my dealings with him, except that I took an instructive trip with him to Madrid where he went to talk with the Spanish military. Birchinal was keen on Spain joining NATO, and didn't seem to accept the force of what I told him repeatedly that as long as Franco was alive, Spanish membership of the alliance would be politically unacceptable to the Europeans.

I made a couple of trips to Stuttgart before the headquarters moved to reconnoiter, meet our Consul General and get a line on any political problems the Command might encounter. On one visit to Stuttgart, I was introduced to the Minister President of Baden-Wurttemberg, Kiesinger, who later was Chancellor of Germany for a brief time. Kiesinger was most cordial. He liked Americans. It seems his daughter was married to an American and lived in the United States. Kiesinger welcomed the prospect of EUCOM being in his state and I think saw to it that things went smoothly from the German side. We spoke in German, mine being a bit rusty but Kiesinger was tolerant.

We moved out of Camp des Loges quickly and smartly. Actually, we beat de Gaulle's deadline by a couple of weeks. EUCOM was operational in France until late one afternoon, decamped over night, and the next morning was operational in Germany. We occupied a former panzer kaserne where an American army unit had been based, known as Patch Barracks. This place was a few miles outside Stuttgart.

I stayed with the Command for a couple of months and then returned to France.

Q: Then you moved to be Political Counselor in Paris.

JAMES: No, political/military counselor

Q: You were there from when to when?

JAMES: From May 1967 to September 1968. Ambassador Bohlen left in January 1968, by which time most of the elements of the LOC had been removed and surplus stores sold to the French. Technically, removal of the LOC did not occur within the time de Gaulle allowed. The French were understanding, however, about the difficulty of dismantling the LOC within 12 months and gave a de facto extension. I think their main interest was that EUCOM leave within the time set. After Bohlen left, the Minister, Woodruff Wallner, became Charge. President Johnson did not appoint a new Ambassador until around May 1968 when he selected Sargent Shriver, President Kennedy's brother-in-law.

Shriver was in office only a week or so when Robert Kennedy was assassinated. He immediately left Paris to return to the States to be with the Kennedy family. In his absence, I was designated to represent him at D-Day commemorations that year. But I am getting ahead of myself. We should talk about that event later.

Q: That was '68.

JAMES: And three months later I was transferred to London.

Q: Let's talk now about your time as political/military counselor at our embassy in Paris. What was your main responsibility at that time?

JAMES: I must preface my response to that question by noting that the fifteen months I was political/military counselor in Paris were far less hectic than the preceding ones had been for Jack McGuire. I cannot say that I was frantically busy.

My brief was to deal with the political/military office of the Quai d'Orsay. One activity on which I spent a good deal of time was arranging for overflights of French air space by the USAF after U.S. forces were withdrawn. I presented the annual plan with rationale to the director of the political/military office. A month or so later I was called to the Quai to receive the approved plan which was considerably scaled down from what the USAF had proposed. I assume our Air Force people were not too upset, at least I was not asked to go back to the French and argue for a more generous schedule.

When I returned to Paris in May 1967, closing the LOC was progressing well. The U.S. military presence in France was fast disappearing. As I mentioned, closing of the LOC, removal of equipment and stores, was not completed by April 1, 1967, but the French had granted a de facto extension. They seemed satisfied with progress, at least there were no complaints at the political level. I made a number of inspection trips to LOC facilities to assess progress. At none of the bases I visited did American officers I met express any feelings of wanting to get back at the French. All were carrying on correctly. It was particularly interesting to note how many former U.S. installations were being converted into industrial operations by French companies or American subsidiaries.

I also saw Dambeza a good deal and talked with him about the sale of surplus U.S. equipment to the French. That, it seems was a business that both sides considered profitable.

Among my other duties was a certain amount of reporting on matters peripheral to the closing of the LOC, such as French attitudes toward cooperation with NATO after leaving the integrated military structure.

Q: What about dealing with the Quai d'Orsay? How did you find relations were at that time? The French professional diplomats, are they difficult to deal with? How did you find them?

JAMES: On a personal plane I did not find them at all difficult. However, I found Gaullism uncongenial politically, and thought it much harder to represent U.S. interests, present U.S. positions to the French than was the case during my subsequent posting in London where I dealt with officials more attuned to the United States. As political/military counselor I dealt mainly with two or three officers at the Quai, the principal one being the official who at risk to his career alerted the Embassy in March 1966 to de Gaulle's impending demarche to the U.S. and NATO.

I found these men intelligent, well-informed and precise. The Office Director, in particular, exemplified the exquisitely trained French bureaucratic elite. Quai officials were always cordial to me. They spoke good English but insisted, as you can imagine, that official business be conducted exclusively in French.

I cannot generalize about attitudes at the Quai, but I sensed that those with whom I talked and negotiated were Atlanticists at heart, not dyed in the wool Gaullists.

Q: I've never served in France, but my understanding is that the "intellectuals" play a major role in French social and political life. What was the attitude towards the French intellectual at that time in our embassy? Did you have any feel for that?

JAMES: I cannot offer much enlightenment on that subject. The French intellectual establishment was considered brilliant in the 1960s, and Embassy officers acknowledged that fact. Ambassador Bohlen cultivated French savants, along with other segments of French society. You know, he learned Russian at the prestigious Ecole des Langues Orientales in the early 1930s. So he knew his way around French intellectual circles.

There was an excellent U.S. cultural center in Paris. I forget the name. In those days it was popular with the French generally. Whether an "intellectual" or an academecien would have frequented it I don't know, but it was more intellectual and aesthetic than a simple library. In addition to a wide range of books on the United States, the center mounted excellent art exhibits and had a serious lecture program. I was impressed by the Maison...

Q: Lafayette or something?

JAMES: Maison Franklin or Center Franklin. We had talented, literate officers who were able and did communicate, linguistically and intellectually, with French writers and political thinkers. Among the latter I think of Raymond Aron.

Q: Were you there during the embarrassing episode when one of our planes was taking pictures of French nuclear facilities, and the French caught us at it?

JAMES: I don't think I was. I think that happened while I was in London.

Q: You were there when the generals' revolt happened in Algeria, weren't you?

JAMES: No, that was a little earlier.

Q: So, by the time you were in as political/military counselor, de Gaulle was well in power. There was no problem.

JAMES: Oh, that's very true. Algeria gained its independence in 1962. By the time our War College group visited Algeria in 1963, I can attest that the troubles there had ended. When I entered the Paris Embassy four years later, civil unrest in France caused by diehard former French settlers in Algeria was over and de Gaulle was firmly in power. That is, he was until the so-called evenements of 1968 when France was almost paralyzed by a student rebellion and subsequent industrial action by the unions.

The events of 1968 were outside my area of responsibility, but all of us at the Embassy were affected in one way or another and were concerned. The political, economic and cultural sections were most immediately concerned and did the main reporting. The student takeover of the Sorbonne and spreading strikes slowed down French public life for several months. The situation deteriorated to the point where it looked as though there might be anarchy. The state seemed to be in danger.

There was widespread malaise and defiance of the established order. Not having had his subtle, conciliatory Prime Minister, Pompidou, on hand at the outset of the troubles to counsel moderation and find a way out, de Gaulle took a hard line and refused to deal with the students and strikers. Matters worsened and use of force by the government seemed possible.

By late May a crisis atmosphere prevailed in Paris. Tanks or armored personnel carriers surrounded the Elysée Palace. Then de Gaulle disappeared from public view. I remember that Vernon "Dick" Walters, our Defense Attaché, and later Ambassador to Germany and Deputy Director of CIA, was trying to find out where de Gaulle had gone but wasn't having any success. My eldest son Gray, who was locked out of the Sorbonne where he had been attending classes, occupied himself by taking painting classes offered by Madame Debre, wife of Defense Minister Michel Debre. Gary was at Madame Debre's the afternoon de Gaulle disappeared. When he came home that evening he told me he knew where de Gaulle was; he had gone to Germany to talk to the troops, Gray said. It appears Madame Debre had told him the secret. Her husband had gone with de Gaulle.

I was patronizing and refused to credit Gray's account, but later could have kicked myself for not having dashed off a telegram to Washington and beaten Walters to the punch.

A day later it was revealed that de Gaulle had made a tour des popotes, a swing around the army messes, to sound out French commanders in Germany and eastern France on whether they would back him if he refused to step down and stayed firm against demands of the students and strikers. He obviously got the assurances he wanted, for shortly after returning from Germany he made a masterly radio address to the nation. I remember that Wallner called the staff to his office to hear the speech and watch the crowd that was massing in the Place de la Concorde and side streets which grew to close to a million. The air was figuratively electric. Then de Gaulle spoke, his voice being piped to the crowd by loud speaker.

I do not remember his exact words, but they were something like: "Je me retirerai pas. Je reste." At that declaration a tremendous roar came from the crowd, Gaullist to a man (and woman). After the speech, the crowd began marching triumphantly out of the Place de la Concorde up the Champs-Élysées. It took several hours for the last marchers to reach the Arc de Triomphe. We had just witnessed a brilliant display of de Gaulle's charisma. His bravado carried the day. Student and union resistance soon collapsed.

A couple of weeks later I represented Ambassador Shriver at D-Day commemorative ceremonies, as I mentioned earlier. It was an "off-year" but the Gaullists made it a special event to celebrate their recent victory and show their strength by gathering massively at the landing beaches. Thousands of bemedaled French veterans came; virtually every prefet from northern France was there, resplendent in full dress uniform. There was a sea of Tricolours. I made a little luncheon talk at the Mairie of St. Mere Eglise which the accomplished linguist Dick Walters thought not bad. I spoke again at Utah Beach. I can't remember what I said but my brief remarks went over well with the crowd which was ready to cheer anything one said.

Q: What was the atmosphere in the embassy at this time? Because here you had de Gaulle, who was both a towering figure, but did not view the United States with the kindness that we might have expected. Did you consider it a divided embassy on how to view de Gaulle at that time?

JAMES: The embassy was not divided under Bohlen. Embassy officers regarded de Gaulle for what he was, a towering figure, as you say, a leader under whom France had begun to grow into an industrial power. From the late 1950s when de Gaulle returned to power, France entered the modern technological age and we all acknowledged de Gaulle's accomplishments. But we thought him frustrating and his political and military policies misguided. We deplored his suspicion of the United States and his shortsighted view that France should stand apart from the military side of NATO.

Bohlen did not impose his views of de Gaulle on embassy staff. He did not need to do so, for one naturally accepted that Bohlen's attitude was valid and sensible. We took our lead from him. He was the consummate diplomat and dealt with de Gaulle as effectively as anyone could. He showed us all how to live with Gaullism. Patient, dignified himself, he was an example to us all. I believe de Gaulle respected Bohlen, who assuredly played an important part in preventing U.S.-French relations from getting any worse than they were made by de Gaulle's actions.

Q: Did you see a splitting after that, when Wallner was the Charge when Shriver came in? Did the inspiration at the top sort of go and then any sort of...it's too extreme to say Gaullists and anti-Gaullists within the embassy, but something of that nature.

JAMES: There were no Gaullists among embassy officers. After Bohlen left, Woody Wallner became Charge and carried on in Bohlen's style, insisting on absolutely correct dealings with the French and avoidance of provocative or critical public statements about the General or the French government. Wallner was a most estimable man, witty, and dedicated to the Service. I enjoyed him and admired how he dealt with Prime Minister Pompidou on a number of complex problems.

I cannot say much about the morale or attitude of the embassy under Shriver. I was there only a short time after he arrived. He had big shoes to fill after Bohlen and I doubt that he filled them with any special distinction.

Although I found Gaullism uncongenial and misguided in many respects, I confess to feeling great admiration for the General. He gave France much to be proud of and restored a fair measure of its amour propre after years of defeats and national weakness. He had extraordinary personal courage. He tried and in a good measure succeeded in reducing internal divisions. I felt honored to shake his hand at the 1968 reception he gave at the Elysée for the diplomatic corps.

Q: So you left there when?

JAMES: September of 1968.

ROBERT H. MAYBURY

UNESCO

Paris (1963-1968)

Professor Maybury was born in Pennsylvania and educated at Eastern Nazarine College, College of Idaho and Boston University. A recognized leader in the field of chemistry, he taught various aspects of his subject at a number of universities in the United States and was the recipient of several organization grants for research at Harvard and other universities. During his career Professor Maybury served with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) in Paris and in Lagos, Nigeria and with the World Bank as Executive Director for Chemical Science and Development, heading missions to several African countries. Professor Maybury was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2013.

Q: Today is the 24th of January, 2013 with Robert Maybury.

Bob, where did we leave off?

MAYBURY: I told you that, after six years of teaching chemistry at the University of Redlands in California, I had a sabbatical at Harvard in 1961 under a National Science Foundation faculty fellowship. While working in the laboratory, I got a telephone call from Albert Baez who had been a professor of physics at Redlands, but had gone earlier to Paris at the invitation of UNESCO to set up the Science Teaching Division in the science sector of UNESCO. His call was to invite me to consider coming to Paris to join him as the chemist on the team he was assembling in the Science Teaching Division in the Science Sector of UNESCO. The team would have specialists in each of the basic fields: chemistry, physics, biology and mathematics. I agreed to discuss this with Helen and, as I said earlier, after returning to Redlands to complete the next academic year, in June 1963 we took our five kids to Paris where I began my work with UNESCO.

Q: Sort of setting the stage, looking at the world in the 1960s, where were the significant centers of chemical research in the world?

MAYBURY: At that time I would say one of the top centers in chemical research was the University of California at Berkeley. The other top U.S. universities in chemical research were Harvard, Columbia, University of Chicago and several state universities in Iowa, Indiana, Ohio and Washington. Worldwide, Oxford and Cambridge were also important and, to a lesser extent the German universities were coming up, but I can't think of any in particular other than University of Bonn. In Sweden it was the University of Uppsala in sciences. These are the chemistry research ones I can think of.

Q: Japan?

MAYBURY: Yes, Japan was certainly prominent. France, the Sorbonne probably.

I am a little ahead of myself but when I went to UNESCO in Paris, I was invited to have a laboratory at the Sorbonne. One of the professors there came and saw me at UNESCO and he said, "If you are going to be a bureaucrat you shouldn't let your chemistry die so I am going to give you a laboratory there." He did, but I never found the time to go there and use it. I got too busy being a bureaucrat. The Sorbonne was prominent as an international university in chemistry research. As were the ones I just mentioned: Uppsala in Sweden, Cambridge and Oxford in England and to a lesser extent, the University of London.

Q: What was your initial impression of the office in UNESCO you were coming to and what it was like?

MAYBURY: At that time, UNESCO stood high in the world's esteem. It was still close enough the time it was founded by the group of diplomats and world scholars such as Julian Huxley that it was still widely and popularly recognized. The director general, Rene Maheu, was well-known as an international figure. UNESCO's entry into science education was welcomed quite widely, although in UNESCO itself, Albert Baez did face some disagreement from colleagues in the education sector who thought he should set up the science teaching division in their sector and not in the science sector. This proved to be an issue of contention for years.

The head of the science sector in UNESCO was a Russian scientist, Professor Victor Kovda, an academician in Russia and probably one of the leading geologists in the world. I also remember that the biology division was staffed by several outstanding scientists. Other than myself, there were no other chemists in the science sector at that time; I was the first chemist to appear on the scene there. Since there was no chemistry division, it was not organized like a university, but was organized more along program lines. As the director of the new science teaching division, Albert Baez was held in quite a bit of esteem in UNESCO, including among the educators.

Baez brought in an Argentinean physicist, Nahum Joel, to be the specialist in physics education in the science teaching division. Joel was a good physicist, but not of world class. For that matter, neither were any of the others Baez brought in to complete the staff of the division of science teaching. Hence, in the science teaching division, I met no world class scientists of the kind I had known at Harvard, so I would say the scientists in that division were very much like those I knew in the American Chemical Society, where I was the Member-at-Large of the science education division.

As for the rest of the science sector at UNESCO, I found several scientists who were world class. One was the distinguished biologist, Rita Colwell, a woman who later became head of the U.S. National Science Foundation and is now a leading professor at the University of Maryland. She was one of the most highly distinguished scientists in UNESCO at that time. She was very approachable and I had several opportunities to talk shop with her.

Of course, for me UNESCO was totally unexplored territory. There was a very fine Nigerian scientist, Stephen Awokoya, who had been the minister of education in Nigeria prior to joining UNESCO. At that time, no African country was considered anything other than hopelessly undeveloped, but Awokoya stood out for his qualities of leadership. He had been an Oxford graduate in physics and in UNESCO held a diplomatic position as Deputy Director General of the science sector. He was personally both sincere and friendly and took a liking to me. As the years went on, I was beginning to wonder whether perhaps I should try to get back into chemistry at a university, but he would say to me: “Bob, you are the top chemist here, so remember, bring that to your work and help build the chemistry program here at UNESCO.” This describes quite well the atmosphere that I found at UNESCO, especially after Albert Baez resigned in about 1968.

Q: UNESCO later had a problem but at that time it was riding high, would you say?

MAYBURY: It was riding high. The first problem occurred after I had been there for about six years and I think it had to do with Israel. Israel felt UNESCO had mistakenly blamed Israel for damaging one of the holy places in Jerusalem, so Israel momentarily withdrew in anger from UNESCO. Eventually, that got resolved. Since I wasn't working in the front office of UNESCO, I only knew that the various national delegates to the general conference of UNESCO had voted in favor of the UNESCO position, but the government of Israel was unhappy about this and withdrew.

Back in the U.S., events like this always seemed to produce a very negative impression of UNESCO, in part, I believe, because the Jewish lobby here was very strong and pointed out that UNESCO did not take the Israeli position on this, even though the general conference of UNESCO had voted against the Israeli position. I began to get some understanding of how UNESCO stood in the eyes of the U.S. public, for I had occasion to return to the U.S. on leave every two years. During those visits home, I would present talks to various universities about UNESCO and was generally received with great respect by people who introduced me to the audiences.

As time went on, I became aware that the political position of UNESCO in the U.S. was increasingly, what shall we call it? contentious, not always given top ranking. I remember well how in the spring of 1963, the Los Angeles papers carried an article announcing that Robert Maybury was leaving the University of Redlands to join UNESCO in Paris. That period was at the height of the anti-UN period in California and not only there, but all through the U.S. there were signs reading "Get the U.S. out of the UN and the UN out of the U.S."

Anyway, after this announcement appeared, an organization in Los Angeles called the truth squatters, organized by one of the right wing groups in California, traveled out to Redlands with the intention of warning the students about the "communist" organization UNESCO and accusing me of being a traitor to the country for going to UNESCO. I didn't have to meet with them to defend myself or UNESCO; the students themselves took this group on and, rising up as a whole, told the group point blank that they did not want their anti-UN message on the campus. It was quite a wonderful thing to see the students defend me. They had just elected me that year as the professor of the year, so I was already held high in esteem among them. They recognized with pride my being asked to come to UNESCO. I remember this incident well.

Q: When you arrived in UNESCO, what did you see your immediate task?

MAYBURY: Well, as I told you yesterday, I had responded favorably to the invitation from Albert Baez to come to UNESCO because I saw going there was very much a response to Kennedy's famous words.

Q: Ask not . . .

MAYBURY: Exactly, that's it. I said to Helen, here's a chance I have to live up to the message of those words. After all, in Redlands I had a wonderful situation - - I had received sizeable grants for the research I was doing; I had a very good laboratory and even had a post-doctorate working with me; I had undergraduate students working on research with me. So, as I said earlier, seeing that I've had such a favorable situation, I really should reach out to others in their need. And Albert Baez was offering me the chance to do this.

Q: Did the upper reaches of the UN look down upon you and give orders? Or would you say UNESCO was pretty much on its own?

MAYBURY: No, there is no hierarchical relationship in the United Nations, with the UN considering itself superior in operational power, or for that matter, in juridical status, to its specialized agencies. As for our day by day relationship with the UN, there was no occasion for us as individual scientists and staff members to get orders from a UN official. A specialized agency like UNESCO operates under general policies set by its governing council, a group of individuals selected by its member states. There are of course on-going relationships of each agency with the main UN, but these are determined through periodic consultation and negotiation. In our actual day by day work, we had no occasion to have any contact with the United Nations itself, although as I will mention later, I did have several occasions to work cooperatively with an officer of the UN in planning or implementing a particular scientific project or program.

Albert Baez had been a colleague and personal friend when we were at Redlands, so I enjoyed a very comfortable relationship with him at UNESCO in Paris. He just let me plan the program as I wanted to. When I arrived in Paris, he said, “Bob, I think the main thing for you to do during the first period you are here is to organize a chemistry pilot project in a region of the world you choose. Since I have started the physics pilot project in Latin America, why don’t you choose Asia?”

I agreed to organize the project in Asia and spent my first year planning the program in detail. By the way, having a secretary those days meant the lady would come and sit in your office, take your dictation and then go to her room and type the letters for your signature.

As my first step in planning, I got in touch with the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) in Paris and ask the person in their science education office for information about programs for upgrading science teaching in each of the sciences. I also got information about such programs in other countries, including the Nuffield Foundation’s program in England and programs in Australia, Czechoslovakia, and the USSR. With Professor Kovda’s encouragement, I decided to have the first planning meeting of the pilot project in Moscow and corresponded with leaders of the national chemistry curriculum improvement programs, inviting them to the planning meeting.

In the years I was at Redlands I had been active in the American Chemical Society, so I knew quite a few chemists from other U.S. universities. As word got around about my going to UNESCO, I heard from some of these chemists saying they’d be interested in spending some sabbatical time with me at UNESCO. When I heard from a professor of chemistry at Grinnell College saying he would like to come for a full academic year, I agreed he come and work with me getting the pilot project started. I was pleased that the Assistant Director General of UNESCO, John Fobes, worked out a legal contract permitting a visitor to work voluntarily with me in UNESCO, the contract providing a fee of one U.S. dollar and covering insurance and other technical, administrative aspects. Later that year, a second person (a professor of chemistry from Tufts University) joined me for his sabbatical year under this arrangement.

In preparing for the Moscow meeting, I got publications and aids from all the national curriculum improvement programs that had agreed to participate: the Nuffield Chemistry program in England; two programs in the U.S. - the Chem Study program based at Berkeley and the Chemical Bond Approach program based on four U.S. colleges; a chemistry program from Czechoslovakia; a USSR program on the chemistry curriculum; and a chemistry curriculum improvement program in Australia. All these materials arrived in my office at UNESCO and I loaded them into large aluminum containers to take with me to Moscow.

The USSR National Commission for UNESCO in Moscow then reached agreement with the National Pedagogical University in Moscow that they would serve as host for this meeting planning the pilot project. The professor from Grinnell then helped me to load the large containers of the curriculum materials into the taxi cab to the railroad station, where I boarded the sleeper train for Moscow. I traveled nonstop to Moscow, going first through the Berlin Wall, then into Poland, and finally to Moscow. All these containers with the curriculum materials and also some chemical equipment were with me in my sleeper compartment. On arrival in Moscow, I took a cab to the hotel and then to the university to meet the scientists I had invited to the meeting.

I had requested each curriculum program to send a scientist to the meeting. At the meeting, the scientists asked: “Where will this project take place?” and I replied we had decided to organize it in Asia. When they then asked “Well, where in Asia?”, I asked them about their suggestions of places they knew in Asia. However, most knew no more about Asia than I did, so the issue of the project location was left open for the time being. They then decided that the nine Asian countries should select participants from among science educators. Since China was not a member of the UN at that time, this meant Indonesia, India, Pakistan, Thailand, Malaysia, Iran, Korea, South Korea and Taiwan. They also agreed to call it the “Pilot Project on Chemistry Teaching in Asia.”

The plan for the pilot project called for UNESCO to convene the project for one full year in a laboratory somewhere in Asia. Each country would select a participant who, after the year at the project, would return to his/her country and take a leading part in upgrading the chemistry curriculum in the schools of the country. The plan also called upon UNESCO to recruit the instructional staff for the project from among scientists who were leaders in improving the teaching of chemistry and place them at the project’s laboratory for a full year. This proved to be one of my most challenging tasks once I returned to Paris from the meeting. I eventually contacted individuals I knew were chemists who were leading reform projects in chemistry in their countries. These turned out to be from the U.S., Europe and Australia.

I returned to Paris after that meeting and finalized the draft of the planning document the participants had prepared in Moscow. My next responsibility was to plan my travel to all the countries that would be invited to send participants to the project. On this trip, I would be traveling over the next month or two and spend two or three days in each country. Since planning a trip this extensive meant I would have to contact the national commission for UNESCO located in each country of the countries in Asia, I asked the Bureau of Member States in UNESCO to help me make appointments with the delegate of each of these countries, who sits permanently there in UNESCO in Paris.

At this appointment with each delegate of an Asian country to be involved in the pilot project, I explained the purpose and plan of the pilot project and then requested that he inform his country’s National Commission for UNESCO about the date and purpose of my visit. That purpose, I said, was to meet appropriate science education people and ask them to identify a scientist or science educator in their universities or teacher training institutes whom they would send to the pilot project as a participant.

Thus began my typical life, I would say, as a staff member of UNESCO, primarily working on the planning of this pilot project. This consumed most of my first two years and included the long trip to all Asian countries to explain the pilot project and assist their UNESCO offices to select participants to the pilot project. I also began forming useful links with individual scientists, one I remember well was Pradit Cheosakul, the Minister for Science of Thailand and a member of the executive board of UNESCO. I remember when he was a delegate to the General Conference of UNESCO in Paris, how he came to my office and invited me to join him at lunch.

That's when he informed me that Thailand would provide the laboratory and classroom at Chulalongkorn University in Bangkok as the headquarters for the pilot project.

I also remember that another of the first tasks Albert Baez asked me to take on was to arrange a link between UNESCO's program in chemical education and the International Union of Pure and Applied Chemistry (IUPAC). Baez wanted of the science disciplines in the science teaching division to have a link with its respective international scientific union. These unions had existed for probably a hundred years, but most did not have a committee for education in their respective science. Hence, I wrote to the president of the International Union of Pure and Applied Chemistry, who at that time was Lord Todd, an eminent professor of chemistry at Cambridge University in England, and explained UNESCO's interest in establishing an appropriate link between our science teaching division and IUPAC. Lord Todd then invited me to come to Cambridge and sit with him at High Table to discuss this matter. During that luncheon, I explained our hope for a meaningful link between our division and IUPAC and he agreed at once to set up a IUPAC committee on chemical education, appointing its first chairman, Ronald Nyholm, at that time a professor of chemistry at the University of London. Nyholm eventually was knighted to become Sir Ronald Nyholm.

During my time at UNESCO, I got to know "Ron" Nyholm very well. Whenever I went to London to talk about the IUPAC chemical education committee, he would say "Come up the back door, Bob," meaning I should go to the back door at the University of London and use the elevator that came up into his office. The first thing he'd do when I arrived was to say "Come in, Bob" and then he'd pull open his desk drawer and get out a bottle of sherry and we'd have a sherry together as we talked business. I got to know Ron Nyholm very well and he became an exceedingly effective chairman of that IUPAC committee. The committee exists to this day, meeting regularly whenever IUPAC convenes its annual meetings. That committee has become a very major supporter of improving chemical education globally.

So now the UNESCO chemistry pilot project in Asia was off to a start. I had completed various organizational matters - - selecting the scientists to staff the project, accepting participants from each Asian country, and signing the agreement with the Thailand government for a laboratory at Chulalongkorn University. Finally, I signed a contract between UNESCO and Dr. Lawrence Strong, professor of chemistry at Earlham College in Richmond, Indiana, U.S.A., to be director of the pilot project for its first year and arranged for him and his family to travel to Bangkok. He had been director of the Chemical Bond Approach project, one of the two major curriculum improvement projects here in the United States. Associating with him that first year in Bangkok were several chemists from other chemistry curriculum improvement projects, including Frank Halliwell, head of the Nuffield Chemistry Project in England, who traveled back and forth between London and Bangkok many times that first year, and Yaroslav Zyka, professor of chemistry from Charles University in Prague, Czechoslovakia, who also traveled back and forth many times to be part of the teaching staff at the pilot project.

The plan of the pilot project called for participants to develop audiovisual teaching aids to accompany the text, so I needed to find a specialist in making 8 millimeter films. When I learned about Dennis Seegalar, the top film maker of the Shell Chemical Company in London, I met him and his superiors at Shell, reaching an agreement with Shell to release him for a limited time to join the staff at the pilot project in Bangkok. He spent many, many weeks there working on teaching the participants how to make 8 millimeter films on specific aspects of chemistry. Those films were then sold to chemistry teachers of many countries through national chemical societies.

One other teaching aid developed in the pilot program was programmed instruction, a popular method at that time. It was espoused by a top educator at Columbia University, so I signed a contract between UNESCO and him to spend a month or so at the pilot project working with Lawrence Strong and the participants to develop programmed instruction material in chemistry. This is how the pilot project brought the staff scientists and participants together with outside experts to develop innovative teaching aids as well as updated subject material in chemistry.

Q: What were you finding out in the field?

MAYBURY: In my visits around Asia, especially on that first visit to inform each country about the pilot project, I realized I had made a sensible decision to get involved in promoting the improvement of chemistry internationally. For what I was seeing now just added to what I had seen in those two previous missions abroad that I described to you last time we met: the first in 1962 when I went to Pakistan for USAID, and the second in 1963 when I went to the Central American countries for the NSF, namely, how sad developing countries can be when you get into their science laboratories. That was even true at the research level. They are so out of touch with the main currents of research. They lacked the appropriate periodicals in the libraries. They don't have really up to date equipment and the general atmosphere of doing research in a Third World country is a very bleak atmosphere to say the best. I had already seen this in both my previous visits overseas.

Q: How in general or maybe in specific terms, how did you in UNESCO push your programs and improve the schools and all?

MAYBURY: As I indicated, I had responsibility for the chemistry program of the science teaching division and carried this out by working along two lines: first, I cooperated with the Committee on Chemical Education of the International Union of Pure and Applied Chemistry (IUPAC) that Lord Todd had created in response to my request. Over the years I was in the science teaching division, I worked continuously with this IUPAC committee. I would go over to London to meet Ron Nyholm, the committee's chairman, probably two or three times a year. One significant way this committee cooperated with UNESCO was for Nyholm and his colleagues, who were themselves scientists from several different countries, to identify an appropriate scientist who could be an advisor to the editor of a new UNESCO periodical entitled New Trends in the Teaching of Chemistry. In turn, I found it useful to participate in the annual meeting of this IUPAC committee wherever they convened. From funds available to our science teaching division, I was able to provide a grant each year to the IUPAC committee for activities they developed in cooperation with chemical educators in many countries.

The second line I pursued in carrying on the division's work in chemistry was to support the chemistry pilot project based in Bangkok. I had to do the early planning and follow-up work and then travel to the countries in Asia that agreed to participate to help select the participants. I then found the staff members of the project, especially the person to be its director. After the close of the project's first year in 1966, Dr. Lawrence Strong, its director that year, returned to his college in the U.S., so I had to find a replacement for the project's second year. This was Ted Watton, an Australian chemistry professor from the University of New South Wales. I had him come to Paris for briefing before he took up his post in Bangkok. I also traveled to Bangkok several times over the next two years to support him in his work there.

After the two-year period with Watton as director, I had to find a scientist to take his place and found Dr. Yaroslav Zyka of Charles University in Prague, Czechoslovakia, who had been active in improving the teaching of chemistry in the schools of that country.

In recounting these different actions of mine in response to your question about how we pushed our programs to improve science teaching in schools around the world, I realize I should have told you right up front - - even before I started describing what we were doing in the science teaching division of UNESCO - - how Albert Baez constantly entreated all of us working with him to keep in focus one fundamental viewpoint on our work: he knew very well that our group of six or seven scientists was the total manpower of UNESCO's science education force, but to think this small group could manage changes in science education at millions of schools and thousands of universities around the world would be preposterous. Instead, he entreated us to recognize our limited size, especially in view of the enormity of the educational problems we seek to help resolve, and thereby understand our necessity to be "catalysts" - - that is, to influence change by practical steps we can take with others, these steps often time being as little as to raise their awareness of a problem, or to get them to view a problem from a different perspective.

So I believe sincerely that my working along these lines I've just outlined - - cooperating with the IUPAC committee on chemical education, and planning and managing the UNESCO pilot project on chemistry in Asia - - was the catalytic way I tried to place my limited abilities and resources behind efforts to improve the teaching of chemistry, whether in the schools and universities of the Asian countries, or elsewhere in the world. I know from contacts and correspondence I had as the pilot project was concluding, around 1969 and 1970, that there were beginnings of concrete efforts to improve science teaching in several of the countries whose scientists had been involved in the pilot project. Let me mention just one of these - - the setting up of a UN Development Programme (UNDP) project in Thailand to establish the national center for science education improvement.

In addition to what I have just told you about my work in UNESCO, there were a number of other very interesting assignments I had while a member of the science teaching division in UNESCO. In January 1964, I was asked to represent UNESCO at the Pugwash Conference that convened for a week at the Udaipur Palace in India. This international conference is convened every two years with representatives of major international organizations to discuss the hope of disarming nations and devoting their resources to peaceful enterprises. I was assigned to a working group, which included Indira Gandhi, who at that time was still a regular citizen of India. I prepared a report on the conference proceedings for submission to Dr. Kovda, the head of the science sector at UNESCO.

In early 1969, the Director General of UNESCO, Rene Maheu, in one of the staff meetings I attended with Alfred Baez, brought up an Israeli request for a meeting on improving science in the schools of the nation of Israel. Maheu pointed to me and said, “Maybury, you be the person that liaises with the delegate from Israel.” Why he picked me I don’t know, but he did.”

The next thing I knew, David Avidor, the delegate of Israel, came to my office and began a series of discussions we had repeatedly over the next month or so as we planned that meeting in Israel. I gave him a list of scientists I knew from different countries that he should invite to it. I then traveled to Israel for the meeting in the summer of 1969, when I met David Avidor, Golda Maier, Aba Eban, and David Samuel of the Weizmann Institute. I enjoyed a very good interaction with Israeli scientists and Israeli political people and found that UNESCO stood very high in reputation. I had opportunity to present a paper describing the progress of the chemistry pilot project, with an Israeli participant being present.

Another interesting assignment I had over the years I was in the science teaching division was to serve as project officer for several UNESCO projects financed by what are called extra-budgetary sources, these being the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) and various governmental and even private sources. The UNDP provided funding to UNESCO projects that provided technical assistance to a country’s science ministry or universities. One of these for which I was the project officer was the UNDP/UNESCO project assisting the University Grants Commission in New Delhi, India; another was the Science Faculty of the University of Islamabad, Pakistan; and a third was the National Teachers Training College, Teheran, Iran. I traveled at least once a year to India, Pakistan and Iran for discussions with local officials responsible each project.

I served similarly as project officer for UNESCO post-graduate courses in science, financed jointly between UNESCO and governments of the host countries. Each of us in the science teaching division were assigned responsibility for each such course that lay in our particular discipline, mine being in chemistry. Hence, I visited once a year the post-graduate course in analytical chemistry at the University of Lyon, France, and the course in chemical engineering at the University of Kiel, Germany, and the course in organic chemistry at the University of East Anglia, England.

Amidst this busy, but most rewarding schedule of contacts with scientists in many countries, in 1969, I received a message from Dr. James Rutherford, Executive Director of the Harvard Physics Project at Harvard University, asking if I would take leave from UNESCO and serve as the Acting Executive Director of Harvard Project Physics, replacing him for one year, beginning September 1969. He wanted to devote the year to study of the many papers and documents from the laboratory of the Nobel Laureate, Enrico Fermi, an Italian scientist who played a critical role in developing the atomic bomb. Rutherford had visited Madame Fermi in her home in Italy, where Fermi’s papers had been stored after his death. Rutherford brought back to Cambridge all of Fermi’s writings, photographs and other material so he could develop a film on the life of Fermi for use in training institutes for teachers who use the Harvard Project Physics program textbook.

Since I had been working at UNESCO since 1963, I was ready for a sabbatical leave, so I was pleased to have an opportunity to become involved in a major science curriculum project.

Harvard Project Physics was funded by grants totaling some millions of dollars from U.S. government and private foundations. The project is based on a holistic approach to physics, especially the cultural and historical aspects of physics. Its co-founder was Dr. Gerald Holton, a professor of physics at Harvard whom I had gotten to know. He is one of America's leading intellectuals, a lot like Julian Huxley, and quite widely respected by universities and government organizations as a scientist, physicist, and a truly socially concerned person. I served as the acting executive director of Harvard Project Physics for the full academic year beginning September 1969. Not only did I have opportunity to work closely with scientists and educational specialists involved in developing the course text and teaching aids, but also to discuss with secondary school teachers their interest in teaching Harvard Project Physics. Being away from UNESCO and being at Harvard proved a comfortable respite from my administrative work at UNESCO.

In the fall of 1970, I left Harvard Project Physics and returned to UNESCO in Paris. Meanwhile Albert Baez had retired and an American engineer, Harold Foecke, was now the director of the division of science teaching. Harold Foecke made several very basic changes to the division, beginning with renaming it the Division of Science and Technology Education and altering its goal to include promoting technology education at the secondary school level. He asked me to continue my responsibility for education activities in chemistry. Since the chemistry pilot project was about to close, I traveled to Bangkok to cooperate with the project staff in preparing a formal study of its accomplishments and recommendations for further UNESCO efforts to improve chemical education. As I mentioned earlier, I also cooperated with the local UNDP office in developing the project document for a national science education center in Thailand. This document outlined the goals, working plan and staff personnel for the science education center, which would be supported by a multimillion dollar grant from UNDP.

On returning from Bangkok to Paris, I was continuing to work at UNESCO when I received a call from Dr. F. Champion Ward, a senior Ford Foundation education officer. He was in Paris and asked me to meet him at his hotel to discuss a Ford Foundation proposal. When we met, he invited me to consider undertaking a one year study of Ford Foundation projects for improving science education in developing countries. Ford Foundation would meet my travel and maintenance costs and provide my income for the year. I accepted the invitation and, on obtaining a leave from UNESCO, I traveled to Ford Foundation headquarters in New York to discuss the plan for this year of work. Between September 1972 and September 1973, I was to travel to five countries, Turkey, Lebanon, Philippines, Argentina and Brazil, spending two months in each country interviewing the people who had participated in the science education projects funded by the Ford Foundation over the past 20 years.

PERRY J. STIEGLITZ
Cultural Affairs Officer, USIS
Paris (1963-1967)

Branch Public Affairs Officer, USIS
Marseille (1968-1970)

Perry J. Stieglitz was born and raised in New York. He entered the Foreign Service in 1961. His career included assignments in Laos, France, Thailand, and Belgium. Mr. Stieglitz was interviewed by G. Lewis Schmidt in 1992.

STIEGLITZ: When it was time for me to leave Laos, to my great joy my next assignment was as Assistant Cultural Affairs Officer in Paris. I went to call on the Prime Minister to say goodbye. He graciously received me. I asked, "Altesse, is there anything I can do for you in Paris?" He replied, "Oh, no." And then he added, "Yes. Once in a while, look after my children."

Q: What year was this?

STIEGLITZ: This was in 1963. I got to Paris at the very time the branch posts of USIA were being closed. As you recall, we kept opening and closing branch posts, and this was a period of closure. Lee Brady was the PAO. I hadn't been there more than a few weeks when Lee called me into his office to tell me he was giving me the best possible assignment. He explained what it was, and I agreed it was the best. He put me in charge of all cultural and informational programs throughout France, outside of Paris.

Q: Were you still based in Paris?

STIEGLITZ: Yes. I had an apartment in Paris and an office and assistant at the embassy, but most of my time was spent going about the country, creating and directing cultural and informational programs. It was glorious.

In good weather, I would drive. During the winter, I would take the train or fly. As a consequence, I got to know France far better than most Frenchmen could ever hope to know it. I got to know the mayors of the cities, the publishers and editors of the newspapers, the directors of the museums. With Helen Baltrusaitis at our embassy in Paris, we put together some outstanding American art shows and sent them to the various museums in the provinces.

Mym Johnston, who had been in Paris for a while, was asked to work with me, and the two of us occupied ourselves with this activity for four years. I received a USIA honor award for what we accomplished.

This was during the years of General de Gaulle. The French television was strongly slanted in an anti-American way. Every night there would be another anti-American story telecast. I remember at one point calling on the publisher of one of the two newspapers in Strasbourg. During the course of our conversation. I asked about how much anti-Americanism there was in the region. He said, "Virtually none." I queried, "How does that happen?" He replied, "Here everyone watches German television."

The programs went extremely well. The climax was American month in Toulouse. The city did not share General de Gaulle's anti-Americanism, and so the officials took the opportunity to go all out to support our program. Among the many activities was an enormous exhibit of American art at the great Musee des Augustins, and Menotti operas at the Opera House.

Q: Who were the singers? Did you have an American cast?

STIEGLITZ: We had Marie Powers herself who originated the role of the Medium. We also got the traveling company of "Porgy and Bess" who gave several performances at the Opera House. That scored a tremendous success -- the Toulouse audience was wildly enthusiastic about the American performers.

We had an Alexander Calder exhibit at the secondary museum. Best of all, at the university we had a series of lectures. We brought speakers in from Paris, particularly eminent French authorities, who spoke on American history, political science, and other subjects.

Q: How did you find any French professors who would have a reasonable attitude towards the United States?

STIEGLITZ: That proved to be no problem. In the upper intellectual echelons, evident in the universities, many French deplored the General's attitude. Professor Jean Baptiste Duroselle of the Sorbonne was a leading authority who helped me enormously in this matter. We had some very big names coming down to speak in Toulouse. To my great satisfaction, the last group of speakers drew a capacity audience in the largest auditorium of the university.

Q: And was the audience favorably disposed?

STIEGLITZ: Mostly yes.

Q: Did you find that outside of Paris the anti-American influence produced and encouraged by De Gaulle then was less pervasive?

STIEGLITZ: For the most part. On the other hand, I had one bad experience in the city of Amiens. We had an excellent three-day program scheduled there with concerts, art exhibits, lectures, etc. Charles Bohlen was our Ambassador, and he, of course, was superb. He lent his complete support to my programs. Also, he was my star American attraction who would come and preside over programs where I particularly wanted him to be. In his honor, the Prefet would generally have a dinner and perhaps other events.

Q: Bohlen preceded Shriver?

STIEGLITZ: Yes, he did.

What happened in Amiens is that -- it was Hubert Humphrey who was Vice President at that time -- and Humphrey came to Paris and spoke in Paris the week before our Amiens program. The result was disastrous. Humphrey spoke of the Vietnam situation and made a great pitch for what the Americans were doing in Vietnam. During that time, many Americans themselves were shouting their protests. The French students, liberals, leftists were all well aware of this. By the time of the Amiens program the situation in that city became tense. To my chagrin, the very nervous Prefet in Amiens at the last gathering, a luncheon at the Prefecture in honor of the Ambassador and Mrs. Bohlen, made the decision that the Bohlens had to leave the city by a back route so that no one would see them. This I thought was disgraceful. Actually Humphrey was most indiscreet in coming to Paris at the time and stirring people up.

Q: He probably went on the insistence of Lyndon Johnson and had no choice.

STIEGLITZ: I suppose you are quite right, and I am blaming the messenger. That was my worst moment in those four years. Most of the other program was highly successful. Artur Rubenstein played for us in Nice, Isaac Stern in Montpellier. They volunteered.

At the end of four years, I was sorry to be leaving Paris.

Q: You left when?

STIEGLITZ: In 1967. But I have to mention this. While in Paris, I knew the Lao Ambassador, and one day at the Lao Embassy, at a reception, I saw this young woman enter the room. I was literally smitten at first sight, and asked who she was. She was the daughter of Prince Souvanna Phouma.

Q: She had not been in Laos when you were there?

STIEGLITZ: No, she hadn't. She was working at UNESCO in Paris, and when I met her, she had just separated from her husband, a French count. Her mother was friendly and invited me to a party. From then on, I lost no time in trying to advance my friendship with Moune Souvanna Phouma. Near the end of my stay in France, Moune left to return to Laos to be Chef de Cabinet in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. She had been educated at the Institute of Political Science in Paris, and was therefore well qualified to be in the government.

Then someone from USIA Washington came to Paris to speak to us about our assignments. In those days everyone was supposed to be going to Vietnam. He assured me that my position would be in Saigon. I said that I would prefer to go back to Laos -- that I had learned some of the language and could be more immediately effective there. I did not mention my personal reasons for wishing to go to Vientiane, but by great good fortune, the cultural attaché position in Vientiane fell open just at that moment. So I went from Paris back to Laos to be the Cultural Attaché at the Embassy.

After Moune and I were married, we left within a week. The people in Washington couldn't have been kinder -- my next post was as Branch Public Affairs Officer in Marseille.

Q: I met you when I was there on the inspection tour in 1969.

STIEGLITZ: Right. You came to our house. It was, of course, the perfect assignment. And, as it had been in Paris, my work involved much traveling, but this time exclusively across southern France. We would just go between Monaco and Bordeaux -- a tough life. Again, our program, I think, was good. We were able to do a great deal with information and culture. At that time we had our landing on the moon, and the Moon Rock became accessible for exhibits which attracted much favorable attention.

Q: One of our high points in the Foreign Service, I think, at that time.

STIEGLITZ: I am sure that it was. Then I continued to have very good art shows. We had excellent exchanges with the universities. I, myself, would be invited to give lectures, which I was always happy to do.

During the two years we were in Marseille, the Consul General was another old friend from Laos, Philip Chadbourn.

Q: He was there the night I was at your house.

STIEGLITZ: Philip was often with us, and he liked to travel with us. Those were lovely years.

JOHN L. LOUGHRAN
Deputy to Political Advisor, NATO
Paris (1964-1966)

Ambassador John Loughran was raised in Philadelphia. After attending Lehigh University, he joined the Marine Corps and served in World War II. Since joining the Foreign Service, his career has included positions in Germany, France, Liberia, Gambia, Senegal and Somalia. Ambassador Loughran was interviewed by Horace G. Torbert in 1988.

LOUGHRAN: It ran to '64. During that period, John Burns, later the Director General of the Foreign Service, had been posted to Bangui and had known us in Bonn, our interests in Africa, and asked me to come to Bangui as his DCM. The Department resisted and wanted me to stay for the full four-year tour in Bonn, which I did.

At the end of that tour Burns was transferred to be the political advisor to General Lemnitzer at NATO headquarters outside of Paris in Rocquencourt. When he arrived, he was given the opportunity to select his deputy, and he asked for me; the Department agreed.

Q: So your plans changed again.

LOUGHRAN: My plans changed again. No Africa, but back to Paris, which, I must say, was another choice posting. The French were thinking of pulling out of NATO, not totally, of course, but having the Western Allies remove all of their bases from French soil. Ambassador Burns was my number one for a year, and then was posted to Washington in '65, where he became the Director General of the Foreign Service. He was replaced by Bill Crawford, who had been our ambassador in Romania. So I had a year with John and a year with Bill at the NATO headquarters. I worked very closely with Ambassador Bohlen at the embassy and with General Lemnitzer at SHAPE headquarters. For a relatively young man, it was a rewarding assignment to be associated with many outstanding military officers. Working with Ambassador Bohlen was a rare opportunity. He was a man whom I admired greatly: calm, thoroughly professional, dedicated to our national interests and a very warm human being.

DOROTHY M. SAMPAS
Spouse of Foreign Service Officer, NATO
Paris (1964-1966)

Dorothy M. Sampas was born in Washington D.C. in 1933. As a foreign service spouse she lived in Ottawa, Paris, Iceland, and Washington D.C. After re-entering the Foreign Service she had positions in Brussels, China, New York, and an ambassadorship to Mauritania. Ambassador Sampas was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in October 1998.

SAMPAS: For summer and home leave in the United States, and then off to Paris, where Jim was assigned to our delegation to NATO at Porte Dauphine. So he had a regular job in a regular office building. He shuttled back and forth on the subway.

Q: You were there from '64-'65. I can't remember, was this the time when De Gaulle sort of said, "Thanks a lot, but take off?"

SAMPAS: Yes, that was 1966 with actual departures to be in 1967.

So, yes, things were already changed. I don't know that the staffing had been very much reduced, but it was in the process of being reduced, and people were in the process of moving off - to Brussels, as it turned out. NATO would move to Belgium.

Q: Were you able to do anything on your dissertation while you were there?

SAMPAS: Yes, yes, I found an interesting little library that specialized in international questions not too far from the Arc de Triomphe, where I could work on things, and it was helpful. I enjoyed that very much.

Q: I'm not very knowledgeable about French politics, but a theme that I hear during this period and even unto this day was this problem of who collaborated, who didn't, and France - what you were playing with I think would be in a way sensitive - not secret sensitive, but I mean just plain sensitive to people. Did you find yourself running across this?

SAMPAS: Yes, indeed, those problems and concerns were not very far below the surface of many French men of our age and French women of our age, too. I didn't get, in my dissertation, I really didn't get beyond the year 1940. By the end of June 1940, France had collapsed. But clearly some of the people who were making life difficult for France just before that time made it even more difficult for France during the war. And I don't know how long it will go on that the French continue to discover one or another French officials involved in war crimes. It could happen several more times still.

Q: Really, until actuarial tables will take care of it. Did you find that, as you were looking at this, was there a strong left-right movement in the French body politic in the just before the war years?

SAMPAS: As a member of a family involved with the embassy, I don't know that I ever actually met an actual communist in those years. I must say, I didn't look for any, either. There were right-wingers around who had hidden their past somewhat. I only found one woman in all the time that I was there who brought up the subject of Franco-German wartime collaboration. But, of course, you had a major socialist-communist-democrat coalition sweeping the French elections in 1936, and a more centered government by 1939-40, with a number of officials ready to accept defeat by Germany. So that certainly was a strong left to right movement.

Q: I would have thought that an American looking at French history and at the concentrated level of a Ph.D., you would have found some quite interested in what you were doing. Did you find this, or were you sort of off doing this in a lonely fashion?

SAMPAS: Mostly I was doing it in a lonely fashion, because Jim was associated with our NATO delegation. They don't really get into the bilateral social relations that an embassy does, so I really didn't have a great many contacts with the French themselves. I had some. I still had a couple of friends with whom I'd gone to school in France, and so from time to time I'd get together with them and talk about things, but they were busy, really. One of them, my best friend, had joined the French diplomatic service and was preparing to go to Moscow, so she didn't have a lot of time to waste on her other specialty, which was America. But I think I could have asked that friend for an introduction into French society more generally. I suppose in some ways I was trying to protect the friendship.

Q: I can understand. It's just that the French put such a weight on their intelligencia and all, and you were sort of rowing in those same waters, in a way.

SAMPAS: Yes.

Q: But did you, by being with a husband in NATO, I take it that this was in many ways not the traditional diplomatic post.

SAMPAS: It was for us, but I'm not at all certain that it was for the French, or NATO itself. The U.S. leadership there never seemed to take the initiative to introduce their people around. That's my impression. I don't know exactly why they didn't. Perhaps because the head of our mission to NATO then was a political appointee whose wife didn't participate in the way a Foreign Service wife might have. I think most of the French people involved in NATO were military people rather than foreign service people because their foreign service people would do only "that which we are trained to do, and that's foreign policy."

Q: De Gaulle was still De Gaulle, wasn't he, at this time? Wasn't it '68 when the students and De Gaulle did not get along, and he departed. But did you feel at all, just from the papers and what you'd see, that sort of a - if not anti-American - a not very positive approach towards the United States?

SAMPAS: Well, I think that spirit in France of being very different from “Anglo- Saxons” has underlain the surface of French politics for quite some time. They tried to bury it a little bit in the years right after the war, the years of the Marshall Plan, but I had run into that very markedly in school there. You know, there's never a good word in public for an American political viewpoint. There were suspicions that the Marshall Plan was somehow designed to bolster the black market. The French are wonderful people, but they certainly have a way of spinning facts to their own view of life, and they're not the only country in Europe which has great suspicion of the United States. In fact, I think the Greeks have it just as much.

Q: I served four years in Greece. They're a peculiar breed of cat.

SAMPAS: If anything goes wrong there, it's the CIA's fault, right?

Q: Absolutely, absolutely. Did you, as you were working on your dissertation, did you find that you were up against - being an American and sort of looking at things in a practical manner - this came up, so-and-so coming up against the French way of those three reasons - I guess it's the Cartesian approach to things-

SAMPAS: Oh, yes.

Q: -and did this show up in how you-

SAMPAS: Oh, yes. We had a course that was supposed to help the foreign students understand France and the French a little bit more, and I got rather quickly fed up with this business of, you know, in every exposé or brief speech, you start with the givens and then you have the development - two parts maybe, three parts always better - and then the far-reaching conclusions, terribly far-reaching. And one day in this course, when we had changed professors, and I thought I could get away with it, I really gave them just a, you know, sarcastic view of this. They didn't like it at all. They didn't like this mirror held up to them. They do here, in this system of “logic,” a wonderful way to develop a point, if you're really going to do it honestly and well, but you often really have to jump. Suppose the in-between part, the development, doesn't fall into two or three easy pieces. Do you dare do four? Do you cut back? There has to be some sort of symmetry there, and if you miss the symmetry, you miss the whole point of this wonderful development that the French have fashioned for themselves. But you can also hide so much. If you forget - or deliberately ignore - something in your “givens” at the beginning, that fact simply doesn't exist for the argument. So it is a way for people to miss a point, and I feel that it is as often misused as it is well used. And yet, when we hear a wonderful little speech of 10 minutes here and 10 minutes there, you can really think it's marvelous. But I never heard a French ambassador give one of those little speeches we practiced at “Science Po.” We had two ambassadors of France when I was in Mauritania, and I knew them both, one rather well, and I always was waiting for one of these marvelous little speeches to start. But it never came about, never.

Q: Well, how did you find life in Paris? I mean, raising a child and all this, still quite young - was this a problem?

SAMPAS: Oh, yes, the French always have a difficult administrative procedure for whatever was involved. But they do have some things that are thoughtful. They do have a system of schools for the very young that is, I think, better than anything we have because ours aren't state-run, except, I suppose, Head Start would be comparable. But it's just that everything in French life is just terribly complicated. The only thing that was easy was getting registered for school and the various courses within the school. You just show up. They don't know what you're doing there. You don't know what you're doing there either. And you tell them you want to enroll. Do you have your summary of previous work? Yes, here it is. Well, alright. Then you pay a very minimal fee, and off you go. When I heard of what a friend of mine had to go through to do her doctoral level examinations in Jungian philosophy, well, it would have taken a doctorate to find out which way to proceed. And I think I've been persuaded by her that that's part of the game. If you can manage to find your way to the examination room on the correct day, you're a success.

CORNELIUS D. SCULLY, III
Consular Officer
Nice (1964-1966)

Cornelius D. Scully, III was born in Pennsylvania in 1935 and raised in Washington, DC. He received a bachelor's degree in history from the University of Virginia in 1957 and entered the Foreign Service in 1961. His career included positions in Nice and Montreal. In 1992, he held the most senior legal position in the Visa Office of the State Department's Bureau of Consular Affairs. Mr. Scully was interviewed by William D. Morgan on April 16, 1992.

SCULLY: In the spring of 1964, I was informed that I had been assigned to the American consulate in Nice, France, as the vice consul. So in July of 1964, I and my first wife departed and went to Nice. At that point, I sort of lost track of what was going on in detail in the bureau, and became much more involved in life in France and my function as a vice consul there.

Q: Princess Grace and all that.

SCULLY: Exactly.

Q: Which is a separate story, but let's keep the visa thread. You issued visas in Nice?

SCULLY: Yes. Nice was a small post, only a two-officer post. We did not issue immigrant visas, but we did issue non-immigrant visas. We had a small, but relatively regular flow of non-immigrant applicants, obviously primarily tourists, but the occasional student and a few exchange visitor visa applicants. We had the headquarters of IBM France in the Nice consular district, in a little town about fifteen miles to the west of Nice, and they had a very active exchange visitor program that they ran within their company for transferring junior executives over to IBM headquarters for various kinds of management training and that sort of thing. So we used to get those.

Q: But none of this heady stuff that you'd been engaged in Washington really applied to your non-immigrant visa work in Nice?

SCULLY: No, not really. We also had an absolutely wonderful visa clerk, Foreign Service national employee. She was the Countess Olga Filatiev. She was the niece of the last head of the Imperial Russian Army Officers Association in Paris, who was murdered by the KGB in 1937, I think.

Q: So she certainly knew how to handle any communist applicants who would come in the front door. [Laughter]

SCULLY: She once said to me, we were discussing Kerensky, the last premier of Russia before the Bolsheviks took over in the fall of 1917, and I made the comment to her that Mr. Kerensky was living in New York or in the United States, in any event, and she looked at me with a very gentle smile and she said, "Well, you know, we believe that he's the one that brought the communists in."

Q: He did!

SCULLY: The Countess Olga Filatiev was at the other end of that spectrum.

IDAR D. RIMESTAD
Counselor for Administration
Paris (1964-1967)

Ambassador Idar Rimestad was born and raised in North Dakota. He entered the Foreign Service in 1957. His career included assignments in Moscow and Paris, and an ambassadorship to Switzerland. Ambassador Rimestad was interviewed by Thomas Stern in 1990.

Q: You left ACDA in 1964 and you were then assigned to Paris as Counselor for Administration. How did that assignment come about?

RIMESTAD: I knew that I would have to move sometime in 1964. So I went to Bill Crockett around Christmas 1963 and asked him to keep me in mind for any overseas vacancies that might come open. He told me that Paris would be open in the Spring or Summer. He asked me if I would like that. I told him: "Yes, if I could get it. I would like that". I don't know what happened in the system, but I got a letter from Personnel saying that I been assigned to Paris. I went to see the Assistant Secretary for EUR with whom I had dealt before -- we all knew each other. I was a known commodity. The fact that the Deputy Under Secretary -- Crockett -- had recommended me for the job carried the day because there were a lot of people interested in the job -- most of them could have done it. There are a lot of people in the Foreign Service who can fill any position adequately; you have to be in the right place at the right time. I was neither better nor worse than many others; others might have done the job just as well. But I was certainly qualified, having put together the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency. That had been the big leagues.

Q: Paris was a different experience from anything you had done before. How did you find the administrative side of the Embassy?

RIMESTAD: Big and bloated. Paris was going through a very difficult time when I arrived in 1964. Paris had been a huge post. When I got there, there were five Ambassadors and their staffs. We had the Ambassador to France, the Ambassador to OECD, the Ambassador to NATO, the Ambassador to UNESCO and then there was a small economic group which dealt with the Ministry of Finance with about a dozen people which was also headed by an Ambassador. We had to support all of them. These Ambassadors didn't talk to each other; each had his own niche and was separate. They might have talked to Ambassador Bohlen if they had a political problem, but essentially they were little principalities to themselves. Each had its own building a long ways from the Embassy. I visited each of them every week; I went to their staff meetings every week. I would return from these meetings and report to Bohlen if we had any problems -- most of them involved space. He didn't really want to know much about them. We got along fine.

Q: Did either Bohlen or Bob McBride, his DCM, interfere with your responsibilities?

RIMESTAD: No. McBride would want me to come up to see him periodically to brief him on what was going on and what my problems were so that he could be prepared if the Ambassador raised any questions. When the issue arose, he had been briefed for a month or two and knew the background. He was very good. We would have lunch often. I would go to his house for dinner and sometimes I would have breakfast with him. I kept him fully apprised. We were going through a shrinking process; we were trying to reduce staff; we were having space problems. We were redoing the Talleyrand building; we were doing a lot of things that were upsetting staff. We had to move them around or cut down on staff. Bob McBride just wanted to know so that if Bohlen raised an issue, he would be prepared to respond immediately instead of having to call me. He would call me after the meeting to make sure that he had told Bohlen the full story. He had a good memory and was almost always right in his responses to the Ambassador. But neither the Ambassador nor the DCM interfered with the administrative support I was providing either to them or the other four Ambassadors. Through my experiences in the salary-wage area, the Moscow Embassy and ACDA, I had become familiar with the administrative problems. They are usually the same wherever you are. Only the location varies.

Q: That is an interesting observation. Did you find a pattern of recurring problems that you confronted both in Moscow and in Paris?

RIMESTAD: Yes. Space, for example. In Moscow it was both living and office space. In Paris it was office space. We provided living space in Paris for about two-thirds of the Embassy staff. The other one-third went out on their own.

Q: How did you feel about the policy of government-provided housing in a post like Paris?

RIMESTAD: In Paris, we made a big mistake when we sold the Rhone Hotel. Cecil Lyon sold it because he didn't want the Embassy involved in house-keeping. It was a facility with seventy-eighty small apartments. We sold it for a good price, but then had to pay three times as much to lease other space. In a Paris which has such a high proportion of communication and secretarial personnel -- lower wage employees -- it is not practicable to ask them to find and pay for their own housing. The government has to get the housing for them. It makes for a more orderly way to transfer people to a post like Paris. Senior officers usually have sufficient allowances to pay for their quarters, but in Paris they were all in government housing. I agreed with that policy. Middle rank officers -- FSO-3 and above -- had adequate allowances to find their own housing. But there are two kinds of officers -- the ones who abhor any kind of government housing -- that is about one-third; the other two-thirds prefer government-provided housing. The trouble with the latter is that you cannot always meet the preference of each officer and his wife. In a government owned or leased apartment house, all apartments are roughly of the same size, so that an FSO-2 and a FSS-6 get roughly the same apartments. There isn't anything you can do about it.

Q: As a general policy, for those officers who had adequate allowances, you supported private leases.

RIMESTAD: I would support it in Paris, Rome, London -- the bigger posts, but not in the smaller posts.

Q: Were there any tensions among the various US agencies in Paris because of the housing situation?

RIMESTAD: Yes; it was always a struggle. They would all ask whether they were getting their fair share. Out in Neuilly, we had some two bedroom places and some three bedroom places. Everyone was assigned to that complex. If it was just a couple without children, we would not assign them to a three bedroom apartment regardless of rank. We needed the three bedrooms for families. Private housing was available; that is true in most European capitals. You just have to look for it. If you rent your own place, you are more apt to be satisfied with it than if it is government-provided. I saw people renting apartments on the left bank, which, if the government had provided, they would have had a fit. But having rented the apartment themselves, they found it unique and interesting -- right off St. Germain where all the "action" in Paris took place. The government would have trouble putting these people into such apartments because they would have objected. But having found the place themselves, they were happy.

Some of these problems are of course related to the allowances. For an FSO-3 or above, the allowances are such that he or she can afford to rent his or her own place. There is much to be said for letting people do as much of their own renting as possible. All the complaining nonsense stops. If something goes wrong with the water heater, it is their problem; they can complain to the landlord. The officer understands that.

Q: How many U.S. Government Americans were there in Paris when you got there?

RIMESTAD: There were 2,450 Americans.

Q: Was there much interaction among them, either professionally or socially?

RIMESTAD: The five groups I mentioned before were entities unto themselves. Sometime, the NATO political officers would seek the assistance of the Embassy. But essentially they were all independent. There were very few social interactions. Practically none. I would get invited to all the parties, but I think I was unique in the Embassy. The Ambassador and the DCM got courtesy invitations, but they never went. The Ambassador would send courtesy invitations to the other four Ambassadors, but they would never come. I was in fact the linkage among the five groups.

Q: Were any efforts from the other four units to pull away from the Embassy's support?

RIMESTAD: No. Not while I was there. No one ever mentioned the thought to me. The main reason was that they all had good office space. All were in nice offices. The only thing they might have done on their own would have been the logistic support and that was no problem. We had enough space and personnel services to satisfy them. They all had their own cars. Each Ambassador had his own car; NATO probably had a half dozen cars; OECD probably had two and UNESCO had one. The Embassy serviced them, but each unit garaged its own cars. The Embassy provided personnel, procurement, general services. Each of these four units had one American executive officer; they had no other administrative staff. They would come to the Embassy to get whatever they needed.

Q: Did you draw some conclusions from your experiences in Paris concerning the general management of overseas establishments?

RIMESTAD: Yes. I felt that Paris and all big Embassies were too big, too many people. We did too much business from these Embassies. We should be more like the Europeans. If there was a problem, some one from the Department in the capital city should be sent. With communications and transportation having made such giant strides, an official can be at an overseas post the next day to work on a problem. We used to be kidded a lot by the Germans and the British and the Scandinavians -- they would ask what we did with all of these hundreds of people. Why didn't they stay in Washington? When you needed them you could bring them over. I think there is a lot to be said for that. In Paris, 22% of the people in the Embassy were State personnel. The other 78% belonged to other U.S. Government agencies. Every US agency pushes to get into foreign affairs and to put its people overseas. The Paris representatives of many of these agencies didn't have enough to keep them occupied. They could take care of a problem when it arose. But so could have their representatives if they had flown from Washington. Such a system would not have required the officer and his family to be in Paris with all the costs involved. We should rethink the size of these Embassies and their functions because of the vast improvements in communications and transportation facilities today.

JACK R. PERRY
Political Officer, NATO

Paris (1964-1969)

Ambassador Jack R. Perry was born in Atlanta, Georgia in 1930. He received a bachelor's degree from Mercer College in 1951 and then served in the U.S. Army during the Korean War until 1954. Following his military service, he received a doctorate from the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies in Washington, DC. Ambassador Perry entered the Foreign Service in 1959. His career included positions in the Soviet Union, France, Czechoslovakia, Sweden, and Bulgaria. He was interviewed by Henry E. Mattox on July 2, 1992.

Q: Let's move on to Paris. You were at the NATO mission and then you were at the embassy. And you were there five years, all the time as a political officer. I guess you'd call this mid-level by this time.

PERRY: I guess so. Yes.

Q: What were some of your duties there?

PERRY: Well, at NATO, which was then at Port Dauphine, as you know, in Paris, I was on the international staff. I was not in the U.S. delegation; I was on the international staff, and I was supposed to be the Soviet watcher, I suppose you could say. A fascinating time to be there, because I reported for duty in July, and in October, Khrushchev fell. And, of course, the fall of Khrushchev was one of the biggest things in Soviet affairs for a long time.

I remember very well that there was another fellow on the international staff, whose name was Pierre Cerles, a Frenchman who had served in Moscow not too long before I had. And as soon as Khrushchev was ousted, he took it upon himself to write a memorandum to the secretary general of NATO, because I think he thought he really knew the Soviets much better than I did. It wasn't his job, but he did it, saying that Khrushchev was ousted because of the Sino-Soviet conflict. Well, I wrote my memorandum to the secretary general, saying Khrushchev was ousted for a whole bunch of reasons, including his personality and lots of other things, but it wasn't simply the Sino-Soviet conflict. So I remember the secretary general, Mr. Manlio Brosio, a very wonderful Italian gentleman, who said he had never had two expert reports that were so different. But he took them both and submitted them to the council, and we went on from there.

That was a very interesting assignment at NATO for two years.

Q: And then you moved over to the embassy?

PERRY: Yes, what happened in the spring of 1966 is that De Gaulle, who was then president of France, declared war, in a political sense, on NATO and on the United States, and decided that France would be better off more independent. And so he took France out of the integrated military part of the alliance. And it became very clear that NATO headquarters should move, which they announced that they would do right away.

By the way, the recollection that I will never erase of those days is that De Gaulle was having a press conference, which, of course, everyone always watched with bated breath, and it was in the air that he might do something about NATO, so we all went. Of course, De Gaulle spoke in these wonderful phrases that simply rolled out.

Q: I remember very well watching him in the late fifties on the television. It was like listening to Moses making pronouncements.

PERRY: Exactly. He just gave out some of the greatest French sentences you'll ever hear. Well, I was not probably the best French speaker in the world, but I was all right by then, and I had sensitive political antennae, and it was very clear to me that he had just said that's the end of it with NATO -- to hell with NATO, as it were. And as we walked out, I remember there was a young diplomat from another country, and I'm not even sure what country it was, but he just simply said to me, "Well, there was nothing in that press conference, was there." He had missed the point.

At any rate, when NATO decided it would leave Paris, I decided I would leave NATO, and I was fortunate enough to be offered a job in the Political Section at the embassy. Charles Bohlen was our ambassador, and had a great interest in Soviet affairs at the embassy, of course. And so I went down and took the job of sort of the Communist watcher in the Political Section.

Q: And you were there for what, four...

PERRY: Three years.

Q: Let's get a little bit operational now. Bohlen was the ambassador, who was the political counselor?

PERRY: It was Richard Funkhouser.

Q: You had the Communist Desk, in a sense. Who were some of your colleagues, if you can recall?

PERRY: I can remember some of them. John Gunther Dean covered Asia. Peter Sebastian covered Africa. Bob Oakley covered, as I recall, the Middle East; maybe it was South Asia. Peter Semler came along and worked on Germany and Europe. We had Richard Long. Some of these people came and went, of course. Maynard Glitman, who went on to a very successful career in the arms control and military field. But it was a very good bunch; a number went on to be ambassadors.

Well, of course, working for Chip Bohlen, for someone like myself who had been in Soviet affairs by then for a pretty long time was a great privilege. For me, Chip Bohlen was and is the best diplomat that I ever ran across. I had the greatest respect for him and for his wife, Avis. I couldn't have asked for a better boss, and he knew the Russians so well that it was a real joy to be around him.

Now during my time in Paris, the way these things happen, Charles Bohlen's tenure ran out and Sarge Shriver came in as his replacement. President Johnson named Shriver. That was my first experience with a political ambassador, and that was quite a different kind of show. It was a totally different embassy, and the Kennedy family style of operation made things really hop.

So I sometimes think that I had two tours at the embassy in Paris: one under Bohlen and one under Shriver.

Q: Yes. Well, that's interesting that you say that Bohlen was the diplomat par excellence as far as you were concerned. Could you tell us, for the record now and for whoever might be reading this in years to come, what it was about Bohlen, how it is that you formed this assessment of him.

PERRY: Well, a lot has been written about Chip, and I know in that book The Wise Men, for example, he figures very largely, partly because he represented, I suppose, a whole generation of diplomats. But if you talk about Soviet experts in the American Foreign Service, then surely Bohlen, Kennan, and Llewellyn Thompson would be mentioned by most people as the three greatest. Bohlen was a bona fide Soviet expert, in that he had lived there, he had studied Russia deeply, he spoke Russian really well. He was a marvelous linguist. His French was beautiful to hear, and his Russian I assume was; I never got to hear him speak Russian. But aside from his knowledge, his expertness when it came to Soviet affairs and Russian affairs, he was, of course, a cultivated man. He understood the European mind -- the French mind, the European mind -- I think, as well as anyone. When Charles Bohlen sat after dinner and talked to the French foreign minister, he was able, intellectually, to hold his own, I think, with any Frenchman -- in French, which not too many Americans can do, as you well know. Whenever I think of Chip, I think of that wonderful phrase that they applied to Ben Johnson: "O rare Ben Jonson." Chip was a rare personality, in that he had a zest for life and a wit that came across as with few other people that I have ever known. A marvelous, marvelous man. When he had his final staff meeting at the embassy, his final words were, "Well, at least you can say I didn't put any cigarettes out in the soup." And that was sort of typical Bohlen.

Q: When did he leave? In what year, roughly?

PERRY: It was either '67 or '68.

WILLIAM A. CRAWFORD
Special Assistant for International Affairs
Paris (1965-1967)

Ambassador William A. Crawford was born in New York and educated in France. He received a bachelor's degree from Haverford College in 1936 and entered the Foreign Service in 1941. His career included positions in Havana, Moscow, Paris, and Prague, and an ambassadorship to Romania. Ambassador Crawford was interviewed by H.G. Torbert on March 23, 1989.

Q: You went to Paris in '65?

CRAWFORD: Yes.

Q: Was NATO headquarters still in Paris at that time?

CRAWFORD: Yes. De Gaulle was gradually set on moving NATO out and finally succeeded. My job there was a liaison, as special assistant for national affairs to the SACEUR (SHAPE).

Q: Who was the SACEUR?

CRAWFORD: Then it was General Lemnitzer.

Q: The whole time you were there?

CRAWFORD: Yes. I stayed there for two years. It was not an easy job, particularly when I had been involved in so much action in Romania. I found that I had too many bosses. Although I was political advisor to Lemnitzer, I also had to report to Harlan Cleveland. I also had the rank of Minister at the embassy and so I attended Ambassador Chip Bohlen's meetings.

I was a liaison between an international organization and our own American side. This made it a little difficult, because I wanted to keep the Americans well informed, but there were some things that Lemnitzer, as the head of an international organization, didn't want to share with the embassy.

Q: Did you find Lemnitzer a reasonably easy man to get along with?

CRAWFORD: Yes I did.

Q: He's a man of opinion, I know.

CRAWFORD: He's a man of opinion, yes. He's rather old shoe, he's comfortable in general.

Q: Did NATO move by the time you were –

CRAWFORD: They closed down about the time that I left.

Q: That was really quite different then the present job of ambassador to the NATO council or was there such a thing?

CRAWFORD: Yes there was. That was the job that Harlan Cleveland had. I attended all his meetings and I attended Ambassador Bohlen's meetings. I was just down the hall from Lemnitzer and kept him informed on a variety of things.

My primary loyalty was and should have been to Lemnitzer, I suppose. I should have just kept it at that.

Q: Who wrote your efficiency report?

CRAWFORD: Lemnitzer wrote it. There were some problems that arose from things that I may have reported concerning his activities to Bohlen or to Cleveland. My job was not very carefully defined.

Q: Does this job still exist?

CRAWFORD: I'm not sure. I presume it does.

Q: I had a minor variant of this job somewhat earlier of being political advisor to the commanding general USVA, that is the commanding general in Austria which was a separate European command in those days. I had a couple of other hats too. It was an uneasy relationship. It was a technically difficult relationship.

CRAWFORD: It was technically difficult. I think I should have played it more smartly than I did.

Q: Did you travel around with the general?

CRAWFORD: I traveled with the general to some exercises. I went up to the tip of Norway – a few days of maneuvers up there. We were quite close, but I didn't feel that I had enough substantive work to do. It was somewhat demoralizing.

Q: Then what happened?

CRAWFORD: Then I was assigned to the Inspection Corps. I came back to work for Fraser Wilkins for a couple of years.

JOHN E. HALL
Consular Officer
Bordeaux (1965-1967)

John Hall was raised in Niagara Falls, New York. After graduating from Kenyon College, he joined the Foreign Service at the age of 21. Since joining the Foreign Service, his career has included positions in France, Iceland, Switzerland, New Zealand, Liberia and Canada. Mr. Hall was interviewed by Raymond Ewing in 1998.

HALL: In 1965 I went to Bordeaux.

Q: The rotational tour in Washington, was that focused in one area – in administration, or personnel management, or...

HALL: No, well, I did not have the feeling that it was. Every few months my counselor in what was then PER/POD would call me and say, "You've been in this place for so long, what would you like to do next time?" And we'd talk about it. I didn't have the feeling that there was any rhyme or reason for it from his side, and there was certainly none from mine. I ended up, curiously enough, being Swiss Desk officer for several months, I worked on a special project that had to do with determining pay scales, if I remember, I worked in PER/POD itself in the European Assignments Division, assigning what were then called Staff Corps personnel. There were one or two other incarnations in there. I was on the Congo Desk - then the Zaire Desk - a while... So I sort of "flitted around" from place to place, and I think from my point of view, of course, this was all to give me a broad range of experiences. I never had the feeling that there was an organized plan. It just sort of happened.

Q: In Bordeaux, you probably did consular work, visa work, and a little bit of everything?

HALL: A little bit of everything, that's right. At the time that I arrived there, there were two junior officers, one of those two slots was eliminated when the other one left, taking the post from four officers to three. I did pretty much everything there was to do, including visa work. And again, like the Washington assignment, which was a mixture of different experiences, that was a very small staff, a lot of sink or swim. My superiors there were not terribly interested in the details of consular work or administration, which was good for me, although it left me feeling very inadequate many times, but it was baptism by fire.

Q: It also gave you a good chance to reinforce your French.

HALL: Without question.

STEPHEN T. JOHNSON
Staff Assistant, USRO
Paris (1965-1967)

Stephen T. Johnson was born in Tokyo, Japan in 1936. After serving in the US Army from 1956-1957 he received his bachelor's degree from Occidental College in 1960. He entered his Foreign Service in 1961 and his career included positions in Canada, Paris, Vietnam, Laos, Romania, and Kenya. Mr. Johnson was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in January 1997.

JOHNSON: I was assigned to Paris. I might add that my successor, who arrived about a week or so before I left, immediately hanged himself in the - committed suicide in the Sheraton Mt. Royal Hotel.

Q: Oh, my God! I take it wasn't the assignment.

JOHNSON: No. It might have been the in box. But he had psychological problems before, but this concerned Mrs. Hawkins, the consul general's wife, so much that she thought I might do it too. So for my last week, after I had moved out of my apartment, I normally would have moved into the hotel, I had to live at the consul general's house so she could keep an eye on me. I kept telling her that I had orders to Paris, and the idea of committing suicide didn't come up.

In any case, I guess I had home leave. It happened that my parents were back at this time. I did some traveling with my parents and then got to Paris in late October of 1965. I was assigned to the mission to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization [NATO], it was called the United States Regional Office [USRO].

I was a staff assistant to the ambassador, Harlan Cleveland. I was also called secretary of delegation. Each delegation had somebody that was delegated as secretary to be the kind of point of contact for paperwork and stuff.

Q: You were there from when to when?

JOHNSON: I guess I was there from about October of 1965 to about July or so of 1967.

Q: What was that mission doing at that time?

JOHNSON: Soon after I arrived, and I'm not to sure about all the timing of all of this, the basic thing, exciting thing that was happening at NATO was that President de Gaulle was kicking us [NATO] out. There was a large American military establishment in France at the time, basically the zone of communication and supply to our army in Germany. There was the NATO political headquarters. There was the Supreme Allied Commander, Europe [SACEUR] NATO military headquarters in the Paris suburbs. The U.S. European Command [EUCOM], the United States Military headquarters, was also in the kind of suburbs of Paris. President de Gaulle was withdrawing France from the military establishment of NATO and at the same time booting us out. So all the ramifications of that were the principal preoccupation of the mission.

Q: Had de Gaulle made his announcement before you got there?

JOHNSON: No. That was after.

Q: Was this something that was expected? How did this hit?

JOHNSON: I am not that certain, but I don't think it was unexpected. He had given lots of hints. He had made himself pretty plain. I really forget the process, whether he made some public statement or what he did but it was soon evident. [During] the last meeting to which the French defense minister came, when the other defense ministers were all there, [he] was ostentatiously reading "La Monde" and turning the pages - crackle, crackle, crackle - of his paper while other defense ministers were making their statements.

Q: The French are very good at that kind of thing. They are still doing it. They just did it to Secretary of State Christopher. We are talking late 1996 when the minister of foreign affairs did the equivalent of that.

JOHNSON: Yes. It goes on.

Q: Particularly as the new boy on the block in this thing, one I think is always more sensitive to the emanations from where ever you are going. What were you picking up as far as the attitude of our mission towards the French? Was it sort of spit in your eye or were they mad? Or were they just saying "Oh, that is just the French"? What were you getting?

JOHNSON: I don't think they were mad particularly. It wasn't that unexpected. Obviously they were lots of very practical problems created by what the French did. At the same time, French-American relations at a personal level were never bad. Everybody had lots of French friends and obviously enjoyed living in France. It was this kind of official attitude.

Again, I mean de Gaulle in his heart of hearts, may have been tremendously anti-American, but in a sense, this wasn't an anti-American gesture. It was a gesture about France's place in the world. They were developing their idea about total defense and taking responsibility for themselves - just beginning to produce their atomic submarines with the ballistic missiles and the like. But it was a difficult time.

Of course, the people in the mission, on a personal level, were reluctant to leave Paris. There was a long palaver about where the political headquarters should go. Like most things, big diplomatic decisions end up being that you can't go there, you can't go there, you can't go there, so you have to go... Basically, you couldn't go south to Italy because that would be kind of on the flank. You couldn't go to Turkey or Greece. You couldn't obviously go to Portugal. You couldn't really go to Scandinavia. So it became the low countries or England, and they didn't want to move off the continent. So Brussels invited them, and they went to Brussels.

At the same time, there were lots of other NATO issues that were percolating along. My job was basically a paper shuffling type of job as a staff assistant to the ambassador, who was very hard working. I stayed until eight or nine or ten at night in spite of my wishing that he would leave.

Q: Harlan Cleveland. He also had a job in Washington, too.

JOHNSON: Before, he had been assistant secretary in IO. I am not too sure if he did something else in between or whether he just went to...

Q: He was a fairly major figure.

JOHNSON: Yes.

Q: What was your impression of how he operated?

JOHNSON: As a representative of the United States, it was very favorable. He was a very intelligent, serious man who always impressed me. A lot of the business of NATO is taken care of at weekly luncheons that the ambassadors have. He would come back from those and dictate a 95 paragraph telegram with sub-headings and everything just kind of right on through the whole thing. He had a great mastery of what was going on. He wasn't very good at telling jokes I remember at NATO meetings. The British ambassador, as British ambassadors always do, outshone the American ambassador there.

Phil Farley was the DCM who was equally hardworking. His background had been the Atomic Energy Commission. I think later on he was at the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency [ACDA]. So the top team was very strong. From the parochial point of view of the staff assistant, the fact that these fellows stayed in the office until all hours of the day and night - I was supposed to stay with them - was a little bit off-putting. Because my job really wasn't that demanding in a sense. You know, checking the papers and the like, but it was long. I'd go to work at eight in the morning and get off at nine-thirty or ten and sometimes have to take the telegrams around to their houses and get the corrections typed in and deliver them to the embassy in downtown Paris at midnight or something. But it was an exciting time.

Q: What was the impression you were getting on the role of the British and the French?

JOHNSON: Well, the British obviously had very close relations with us. I'd say almost invariably we and the British agreed on things. They were a well prepared delegation all the time. They had good people. Some delegations impressed you as being strong in the sense that they knew their dossier; others weren't so strong. But the British, of course, sit next to us at NATO, as they do in most place because of the alphabet. I always thought that may have been... Anyway, the French because of the way things worked out always sat across the way. We were over here sitting right next to each other. You know, it may have affected things over the years.

But the British did well. Sir Evelyn Shuckburgh was the ambassador. He died just a few years ago. He was a very able man. We did well with them. The Dutch delegation always struck me as being very strong and well prepared. The Belgian Ambassador D'Stock was the dean, and he certainly knew what he was about. He had always had what he called the D'Stock question. That was when we told the NATO Council about some attitude of ours, D'Stock would always asked whether we were telling them or whether we were actually consulting them. Very often when we wanted it to seem like it was the latter, it was in fact the former, given our own torturous way of arriving at decisions. That was always amusing. The NATO Council for the most part worked pretty well together. There was a great crisis going on.

Q: How about the Italians?

JOHNSON: Well, they were more like you would expect the Italian delegation to be. A little bit more free and easy. The Greeks and the Turks glowered at each other. A lot had happened at least in my snail's eye view. The Turkish ambassador seemed a lot more able man than the Greek ambassador. This didn't have as much to do with the attitudes of their countries, they just seemed to be better at it. The Icelandic ambassador never said anything. He wore dark glasses, and I always wanted to know whether he was sleeping or not. But it didn't really matter.

Q: How about the Germans?

JOHNSON: The Germans were quite strong-their delegation there at the time. They were just kind of getting into stretching their wings a little bit at the time. But the ambassadors worked well together. We obviously had contentious meetings and the like. The ministerial meetings, particularly during the crisis with the French were exciting.

Q: What about Norway and Denmark?

JOHNSON: I really don't have much impression of what they were up to. I assume tagging along.

Q: What was the feeling that you were getting of the Soviet threat at that time?

JOHNSON: I certainly didn't have the impression that we, at least in the political headquarters in NATO, really thought that the Soviets were about to rush across the border. Let's see this was 1965-67. The military would tell us about all their divisions and things. They were very numerous compared to ours, and they certainly had a lot more stuff on the ground than we did. As to the question of what we would actually be able to do militarily, I mean, there was the "plan," and people would sometimes question if we would be just a road bump as they made their way to the English Channel.

But at least where I was sitting, there wasn't the feeling that this was going to happen any time very soon. It was more an abstract problem. All the time of course - by this time, the Vietnam War was becoming much more something that the public was talking about - we would make reports to the NATO Council about what we were doing there. There would be questions about that, and obviously the public was getting involved in the whole question of Vietnam.

Q: Did you move to Brussels during that time?

JOHNSON: No. I left before it moved to Brussels. They were making the plans and everything. I saw the plan for the present NATO headquarters. That was going to temporary for just a few years. Then there was going to be a permanent building in downtown Brussels. They are still in that provisional building, which has grown because of the greater number of delegations, out by the airport, and any plan for a permanent building in downtown Brussels is long gone.

CECIL S. RICHARDSON
Consular Officer
Paris (1965-1968)

Cecil Richardson was born in New York in 1926, and graduated from Queen's College. He served in the US Army from 1944 to 1947, and overseas from 1951 to 1952. Entering the Foreign Service in 1956, he was stationed in Dakar, Saigon, Lagos, Niamey, Paris, Accra, Brussels, Quito, Tehran, Lima, St. Paolo and Bahamas. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on August 5, 2003.

Q: Well, you left Niger when?

RICHARDSON: In March, early March 1965, yes.

Q: And then what did they do with you?
