RICHARDSON: Oh, I was assigned to Paris which was great. I went around telling the French, "I'm going home. I'm going home." [Laughter]. Well, after so many years of learning French in the boonies, it was like going home because many of the people I had met along the way, when they came home, came to Paris so I got to see them and continue the relationship.

Q: Well, you were in Paris from '65 to when?

RICHARDSON: '68.

Q: '68, what were you doing?

RICHARDSON: I was, that was my first full-time Consular job, I worked exclusively in American services for three years. And that was a very satisfactory ...

Q: What did the American services consist of in those days?

RICHARDSON: Well, I guess it's kind of, anything pertaining to the welfare and protection of American citizens as well as citizenship and notariats. There were all kinds of situations where their welfare is in jeopardy.

Q: To Paris. What are you doing there?

RICHARDSON: I'm doing welfare and protection of which about, almost half of it was exclusively in death and estates. Let's see, yes, I would guess I did Death and Estates for about 14 months.

Q: Well an awful lot of American expatriates and tourists would come there and die.

RICHARDSON: Yes, well, the resident expatriates were no problem. If they're working for a company, the company looks after them. It's the tourists and the walking wounded, some of whose families pay them to stay out of the U.S.

Q: Remittance men. Yes.

RICHARDSON: Yes. Because they're too much trouble, it's less of a strain for the family to have them abroad than home.

Q: Yes.

RICHARDSON: But all kinds of misfortunes can befall a person. If you give me a couple of million Americans going through, you're going to get all kinds of problems. So it was a very active and interesting time.

Q: Oh, yes. I'm sure it was.

RICHARDSON: And very satisfying.

Q: How about people who were in trouble with the police? How did the French police treat them?

RICHARDSON: Correctly, correctly. I never had any instance where the, where people would claim that they were abused. The women were looked after in institutions where there were nuns. And the men were in ordinary prisons. Maybe the food wasn't very good, you wouldn't expect it to be. But I had no complaints about physical or even mental abuse.

Q: You were there from '65 to '68, which was sort of the beginning of the era of the college students who went off and had their wanderjahr or vacations and drugs and you know hashish and all were just coming in ...

RICHARDSON: Yes, if they were in France they were only transiting on their way to India and Nepal. I saw much more of them when I got to South America. That was the regular trek for them going down the spine of South America. There weren't any great problems in Paris. Drugs, there were. Mostly marijuana, I had some musicians who were picked up for marijuana and we had an active anti-drug outfit in the embassy. One of the several predecessors of the current DEA.

Q: Who was the consul general when you were there?

RICHARDSON: Perry Cully.

Q: Perry Cully was a social animal, wasn't he?

RICHARDSON: Yes, yes. He didn't have much to do with consular work.

Q: Yes, I was going to say, I suspected that. He was, he inspected me in Belgrade ...

RICHARDSON: In what year did you go?

Q: Oh, about '63 or something like that ...

RICHARDSON: Well, that's how he got to Paris, when he was an inspector he'd seen the home occupied by the consul general in Paris and he says "that's for me."

Q: Also he got there and he never left, I guess.

RICHARDSON: He didn't. He divorced Mrs. Cully and married an English nurse at the American hospital, so he may still be there.

Q: I don't know. How did you find social life there at the time?

RICHARDSON: Fine, fine. I was comfortable. Well, that wasn't nearly as important, the social life, I had French friends coming in from the colonies so I didn't make many, yes there were a couple of lawyers, people I had met on business that I'd have to dinner or have a drink with. I became friendly with a man in one of their intelligence services and we used to meet for coffee and drinks until he told me that he'd been instructed by his superiors to break off our relationship. Either they thought I was trying to penetrate them or they decided I wasn't worth cultivating. [Laughter]. I like to think it was the latter, not the former. [Laughter]. And there was a good bunch of Americans both in the embassy and among the expats. I recently did a WAE TDY in Haiti and the woman I was working for there is the daughter of somebody who was in the ambassador's office when I was there. Barrett was staff aide. Social relations were no problem. The real big thing for me there was not the social but the cultural life. I'd been in the boondocks, at this point, for nine years. The only music and opera I had seen was Chinese opera in Saigon and a German string orchestra. They brought out a string orchestra and that was it. For 9 years I had depended on recorded music and it was great. And movies, because Paris is a great town for films.

Q: Oh, yes.

RICHARDSON: So we went to the theater, we went to concerts, we went to all kinds of things of that sort only three weeks of the month because one week every four weeks I was duty officer in the Welfare and Protection Section. It was so active you didn't have one consular duty officer. Passports, Welfare and Protection, and Visas each had it's own and that was busy.

Q: How about when people came and they were in trouble and the place didn't have a consular post or something? In some distance, did you have trouble with that?

RICHARDSON: Well, the police were good about notifying us when people ended up in hospitals, automobile accidents miles away. If it was within reasonable distance, we'd go see them. We didn't have any problem and we had so many of them that managed to get into difficulty in Paris or in the immediate environs of Paris ...

Q: Yes, if you're going to get in trouble ...

RICHARDSON: And we had a lot of consulates in France. At this time we have none except Strasbourg today. But in those days we had Lyon, Strasbourg, Bordeaux, and Nice, so the country was well covered. I don't know what they would do now. But you were asking me about the kinds of trouble people get into. Well, my first day, I had just set up shop in Paris, in Welfare and Protection and this was in the days before everybody ended up in cubby holes. I had a proper office with a window and a beautiful tree outside the window in the garden. One of the clerks came in saying there's an American gentlemen outside who's very anxious to speak to somebody, to speak to an officer. So I said, send him in. My first client!

So he comes in, a well set up, trim waisted man in his upper thirties, early forties. Neat double-breasted blue gray suit. Obviously agitated, he opened this conversation with me with "I got no satisfaction from that woman. I got no satisfaction from the police, but I damn well mean to get satisfaction from the American Embassy.” And that was his opener! So I said: Fine, fine, have a seat, sit down. What was his story? He had hired a “lady of the evening” the night before, had been unable to perform and had asked for a refund. [Laughter]. Of course she did not oblige him, so in high dungeon or whatever, he goes to the local police station about 2:00 in the morning and complains to the night sergeant. The night sergeant listens very sympathetically and says ah, Monsieur, that is really abominable. I’m going to ask my colleagues to come out and hear what the terrible things that happen to tourists in our glorious city of Paris. He goes in, wakes up the night crew and the emergency staff, and brings them to hear the story. He comes up and says Monsieur, tell my colleagues the terrible things that have happened to you. He tells the story and they all burst into laughter. So he is very T’d off when he comes to see me. What am I going to do? This is my first client in Paris. It was never so amusing again.

Q: Well, what did you do?

RICHARDSON: I let him talk himself out. He wanted someone to listen to him and not laugh. I was able to do that. [Laughter]. I was the first person who was able to hear his story and not laugh. And that’s the satisfaction he got. He had said he meant to get satisfaction from the American Embassy. And that was the beginning. There were all kinds of foolish things, but lot of real tragedies, too. Now, one, Texas. There’s a city in Texas called Paris.

Q: Oh, yes. At that time, particularly in Paris, the French had the reputation, it’s changed quite a bit, but had the reputation for being rather abrupt and not very pleasant to deal with, with Americans or foreigners...

RICHARDSON: Well, I’ll tell you about that because I certainly had lots of experience with the Parisians. Metropolitan French I would know best. I’ll tell you, my wife encountered any number of tourists complaining about the French being rude and brusque and her standard line was: “Stand still for a minute and observe the way they treat each other; it’s not anti-American. That’s the Parisian. He is impatient. He has little tolerance for even his own kind and God help you if you don’t speak French. You’re just so much worse off.” But there were times when there was, particularly amongst the intellectuals, strong feelings against things that represent American values. They’d call it the Coca-Colazation of France and of Europe, but at that time, the government, because we had supported them in Indochina and Africa, or they needed us, the government to government relations were fine, but the relations further down the line were lousy. At one event in Normandy where I represented the embassy, I was heartily booed by the crowd over the Vietnam War.

Q: You were there during the May and June of ‘68, I guess.

RICHARDSON: Yes. They had the general strike.

Q: Yes. I mean this is very exciting. How, what were you observing in this?

RICHARDSON: I was observing a degree of courtesy and cooperation among the Parisians that I had not encountered before. I saw people with gasoline stopping their autos and taking on people walking. I don't know if they took money. I know I got into the habit and I would offer people a ride if they were going my way. I'd offer them rides and sometimes somebody would offer to give me a few frames and I would say, "No, no. Let's go have a coffee or buy me a beer or something like that." One day, there was a woman with a cane, because I think she had difficulties with a prosthetic device. I think that was one of her legs. She was walking with difficulty up a hill in Montmartre and I pulled up to ask her if I could her a lift. And she was very grateful, she got in and it turned out she was walking up this hill to visit her husband in the hospital.

Q: Oh, boy.

RICHARDSON: And I saw Parisians doing that, but of course there was no traffic, so there was none of the usual road rage and impatience. There was an incident though, I remember where an Algerian pompier, a gas station attendant, was killed because people got nervous and excited when the gas ran out. And another incident of violence, some protestors down in Lyon rolled a truckload of heavy stones and things like that down a hill, and it killed a policeman. I really thought "it was going to hit the fan now." But somehow they got through it. There were many demonstrations in Paris. One night my wife and I didn't get to the theater because we ran into a wall of tear gas and couldn't get through. But, that was an exciting time and much of my work consisted of finding people, tourists, particularly students, and trying to reassure their parents that they were fine. And I said for "God sakes. Write home." They said but there's no post office. Well, call them on the telephone.

Q: Did you have problems with students getting out there and joining the protests because this was many a student movement.

RICHARDSON: Yes, yes, but not much. Most were simple tourist bystanders.

Q: I was wondering whether they were getting picked up along with...

RICHARDSON: You know sometimes the cops would go through and they would surround a neighborhood or an area and make a complete sweep of everybody. And so the Americans caught up in it would complain they pushed us around, but they didn't really keep them in there. When they found that they were foreigners and they didn't have anything on them, they let them go. But, they'd hold them for a while, while they went through their papers.

Q: Who was the ambassador when you were there?

RICHARDSON: Chuck [Chet] Bohlen. He was the ambassador all the time I was there.

Q: He was always a thorough professional.

RICHARDSON: Yes. But, I saw him just once when I made a call on arriving.

Q: How did you find the French staff in the counselor section?

RICHARDSON: There were those hired right after the war, a few of them were still working. They had more middle class backgrounds than working class because right after the war, they were the ones who spoke English and they were from a different class and I had, we had one of those left. I'll tell you a story about her. One of the things that I was always doing in Death and Estates was collecting the personal effects of the deceased, packing them up and sending them off to the family. And she was very impressed with the packages, with my packing, how well, how neatly they were done. And she remarked on this to one of the other Vice Consuls and one Vice Consul of them said to her, "Well, it's very possible that he did this before the Foreign Service, maybe he was a shipping clerk or wrapped packages in a department store." And that was a very wild ... that was absolutely absurd, she thought. [Laughter]. Diplomats don't do things like that. So we had one person like that. The others were good solid people, but they were not of that class. One of them, who I was closest to, I could say she trained me in Welfare and Protection work, like any second lieutenant gets trained by a good sergeant.

Q: Yes, oh, absolutely.

RICHARDSON: Yes. I stayed in touch with her for many years.

Q: Well, then in '68 you left to go there.

RICHARDSON: Yes.

Q: Where did you go then?

RICHARDSON: I went back to Africa. I went to Accra in Ghana.

HARLAN CLEVELAND
U.S. Ambassador to NATO
Paris, France (1965-1969)

Ambassador Cleveland was born in New York City and raised in the United States and Switzerland. He was educated at Princeton and Oxford Universities. During World War II he served on the Board of Economic Warfare, after which he held a number of senior positions dealing with Italian economic recovery, US and UNRRA assistance programs in China and Taiwan and NATO issues. He also served as Assistant Secretary of State for International Organizations and as US Ambassador to NATO. Ambassador Harlan was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

CLEVELAND: So in '65 under rather dramatic circumstances, I went to the NATO job. Once I had been confirmed, then there were plans for the usual laying on of hands which usually took place upstairs in the State Department where our current ambassadors met. De Gaulle had threatened to start at that season the rhetorical barrage about the UN that ended up in the withdrawal of France from the military aspect of NATO. So somebody obviously had to say something in reply to this big ploy of General de Gaulle. The person to say that was obviously the President.

So, my laying on of hands ceremony was suddenly promoted into the rose garden, and I helped draft the speech that the President gave on that occasion. It sort of set our line about being flexible about the French but adamant about our support of the UN, of NATO.

So when we got to Paris, it wasn't until two years later that we had to move the whole thing to Brussels. That is a story in itself that we'll get to. One of the first things I did in the mandatory calls on all of my colleagues, the other ambassadors to NATO, I called on Pierre DeLouisse, who was an older man, more de Gaulle's generation, had known de Gaulle very well. It was interesting that the French all through this period put at NATO their best foreign service people. The French foreign office was trying hard to make sure they didn't have any Goths in that because de Gaulle felt so strongly about French sovereignty being compromised by their membership in NATO. So, I call on Ambassador Pierre DeLouisse, and had an extraordinary experience. I had no sooner sat down on his sofa when Ambassador DeLouisse, still standing, said, "I hope you are not going to ask me what the old man means." I said, "Well Mister Ambassador, I wouldn't really want to bring negotiations up in this first courtesy call." He said, "Now look. You and I don't know each other yet, but we are going to have to work very closely together. We can do it two ways. We can sit across the table and glare at each other, or we can sit down on the same side of the table and we can gaze up at the great enigma and try to figure out what the hell he means."

After that, I never could treat him at arms length. He had shown such a human side of himself as a diplomat. He was more than a regular foreign service person because when he left that job, he was appointed by de Gaulle as head of the ORTF, the French radio-television monopoly. So, he had a good in with de Gaulle, and he was also a very popular colleague with both his personal sensitivities and he was also a very bright professional.

Q: Well, what was our reading at that time? I mean, all right, de Gaulle wants us out, so we get out.

CLEVELAND: No, he hadn't said yet that he wants us to go out. There was a rumbling about it. He didn't actually lower the boom for almost two years. They were being difficult about a lot of issues, especially military issues. It wasn't really part of their policy to object to a North Atlantic Council, they were just objecting to all these military commanders, and so on, being in the environs of Paris, and all the troops. So it wasn't until two years later that he finally said all foreign military will have to get out of France. That meant not only the troops doing various things, communications, aircraft duty and so on, but it also meant the supreme commander of NATO, an American and his whole staff will have to get out. There was then a period of uncertainty. Some of the allies were soft on France, and we were inclined to be, didn't want to offend France by saying the North Atlantic Council had to leave too.

But as the American representative on the North Atlantic Council, I was clear we were going to have to go. I finally got the State Department at my recommendation, to instruct me to ask one question in the council chamber. In the event of a war in which France remains neutral, how does France propose that we keep closely in touch with our supreme commander who is going to be in Belgium? The French ambassador, who was a very good friend, I had told him ahead of time what I was going to be asking. He looked up at the ceiling for a moment and said, "You'll never get an answer out of the Quai d'Orsay on a question like that." I said, "I know. That is the idea." So, he absorbed the question and reported it to Paris and the military. After about three weeks of no answer, the Danes, the Greeks and others were inclined to be uncertain whether we should move or not. Everybody agreed to move.

Q: Well, I would imagine there would also be the problem that most just didn't want to move because Paris is Paris.

CLEVELAND: Well, I think there was some of that sentiment. We really didn't have that feeling. We were looking forward to the chance to see another piece of Europe, in personal terms. In fact our general experience was that we had a more fun time living in Brussels in a sizable house, but a lot smaller than the mansion that we lived in in Paris with a lot fewer servants in Brussels, but it was just a more congenial environment in general. The Belgians were more welcoming. They had us in their homes in a way that didn't happen in Paris.

Q: Well, you had the political alliance of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and then you had the military. You were dealing mainly with the political side.

CLEVELAND: No, I was dealing with both. Remember I remarked before the decision was made by McNamara when I was appointed to make me his representative in Paris too. So, I was really reporting both to the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Defense. I had one of my deputies who was a civilian in the McNamara whiz kid think tank in the early part of the Kennedy administration, Jim Stanley. So I did a lot of business with the Defense Department as well.

Q: You were there from '65 to when?

CLEVELAND: To '69, almost five months into the Nixon administration.

Q: Had Greece and Turkey come into the organization by the time you got there?

CLEVELAND: Yes indeed. And the Greek and Turkish ambassadors happened to be extremely good friends. You would see them walking down the hall with their arms around each other and so forth. I had already been through one Cyprus crisis when I was in the State Department in the early '60s. In 1967 we had another one where at one point President Johnson had to send Cy Vance, a former Deputy Secretary of Defense, at that point, over to try to make sure that the Turks understood that it was very serious violation of their friendship with us if they should invade Cyprus. I called Washington up one night to ask, "Shouldn't we get the Secretary General of NATO involved, get him to go down and make peace between these two allies, make the point that allies can't go to war with each other?" I had been really pushed into this by the Turkish ambassador who came to me in great alarm saying he thought the invasion would be tomorrow morning if I couldn't do something about it. So I went not as an envoy but as the American representative to the Secretary General. The problem is he had to go without having an invitation from either of the two countries at the time he left. We had an American plane standing by at the airport, a military plane to take him first to Athens and then to Ankara. We were able to announce that evening that the NATO Secretary General was going down, not as another piece of the deterrent in fact. The combination with Vance we thought was the most effective ploy. But the interesting thing was when I called to make that suggestion, the crisis task force was working on Cyprus. I had assumed they had already been considering this, but I can't remember who I was talking to, said that we haven't really discussed that yet, but that is a good idea. I know they were getting quick instructions. It often happens, it does happen I think in diplomacy, the person on the ground can better figure out what his instructions ought to be than anybody else, and shouldn't be bashful about making suggestions.

Q: Well, this Cyprus crisis came about to a certain extent because of the colonel's coup in Greece. That was in April of '67.

CLEVELAND: Yes, they were becoming more militant about it. But the Turks had made very clear that they were going to take no nonsense. They kept the Turkish military force in the Turkish part of Cyprus. It was clear that if the Greek Cypriots tried to sort of envelop the whole island, that Turkey would get into it. They almost got into it on their own initiative as it turned out, so it was a very dicey, hairy situation.

Q: What, during this time, '65-'69, what was the feeling about the Soviet threat at that point?

CLEVELAND: Well, it was regarded as a maximum threat. They had this huge inventory of nuclear weapons. I suppose at that time there were 10-12,000 nuclear weapons in the world; almost all of them ours and theirs, a few in the hands of the British and French and Chinese. Our problem with the non-nuclear allies, particularly Germany, West Germany at that time, Federal Republic, was that their political leaders tended to overstate the probability of a nuclear reaction to anything. You hear politicians say that the first Russian soldier or, East German soldier, who sets his foot across the demarcation line, all hell will break loose.

Well, we had started at my suggestion really, a nuclear planning group which still exists. We were anxious to be able to cut the non-nuclear allies in on what nuclear war would be like and you couldn't deal with it. It was becoming a lot more clear that there was no way you could have a nuclear war that you could win. You'd shoot your own foot as badly as you would hit the other fellow's foot.

There had been an idea of setting up a multilateral force, MLF so-called, to be another nuclear weapons system, surface ships, but we needed another nuclear weapons system about as badly as a hole in the head. We finally suggested we set up a group that included some of the non-nuclear allies, who would be rotated, so the total number would be kept to fewer than the 15 members. We had 15, too big for conducting serious conversations in secret. We established this group. We had the first meeting in Washington, McNamara presiding, and the defense ministers from the countries involved. One of them was Turkey. To everybody's surprise, including the surprise of the security people surrounding us. McNamara suddenly dives into this capacious briefcase and pulls out photographs, satellite photographs, of a defense installation in Russia. The code name was a classification that in itself was classified at the time and way above top secret. You could just see the security people blanching and fidgeting. But that was a case that we were taking this information sharing very seriously. Finally I said to McNamara, he really had to be personally present every time we met, otherwise it wouldn't work. He agreed to do that, and he did it.

Clark Clifford succeeded him. When the Nixon administration came in, Mel Laird also stuck by that principle. So we were dealing with nuclear policy by playing war games, by having simulated exercises. You had to assume that the enemy would come over into our territory first, but you couldn't assume anything about the defensive alliance. You couldn't assume a preemptive strike ahead of time or anything like that. We played a whole series of war games with these non-nuclear defense people as well as the French and the British. We never could play a game with these tactical nuclear forces where we didn't kill more people on our side than the other side. You might mess up an invading brigade, but you also messed up a number of communities in West Germany, mostly West Germany. So there was a sudden diminution of the nonsense coming out of the political leadership in the non-nuclear countries, particularly Germany. The plan worked, that is telling people the nature of nuclear war turned out to be a much better way of educating them than having them participate in a complicated surface force where everybody got to do different things.

Q: Well, was there any communication with the Warsaw Pact at this point? In a way, they must have been running the same games and finding out this wasn't going to work.

CLEVELAND: Well, no, there was not really any. Just intelligence people on both sides trying to figure out what the others were doing, but there was no real cooperation in thinking through. That was one of the things that bothered us, that they might think more highly of the possible advantages of using nuclear weapons than we were inclined to. Everybody in our camp was of the opinion that I came to, and that I think McNamara and some other top military leaders like Admiral Noel Gayler, who was the commander in chief of the Pacific did. When he retired, he said it was a weapon too big to use. I came to the conclusion, I started calling it not the ultimate weapon but the ultimately unusable weapon.

Q: Well, you had theorists and a sort of a lobby that was particularly powerful in scientific circles. Edwin Teller is the name that comes to mind. There were others who were playing games. If we lose two million, they lose three, and somehow we'll come out ahead on this sort of thing. Did you run across these people/? They tended to be more in the Nixon era.

CLEVELAND: Well, Teller actually was more active earlier in the argument about going from the A-bomb to the H-bomb. Yes, there was always this overestimation, and to some extent our own military politics and military dynamics tended to exacerbate the problem. The three services were competing for having nuclear weapons systems. The navy finally got the main deterrent system, the Polaris submarine and its successors. The air force had the bombers that were dual-capable as they called it. The army had the Pershing missile and other howitzers that were also dual-capable. I visited all the main military headquarters while I was in NATO. I learned a lot about the thinking, and the thinking often hadn't carried deeply enough, the analysis of what would be the effects of nuclear weapons both in the short term and the long term. Chernobyl hadn't happened yet, so they weren't thinking about the world effects of nuclear energy. Through all this time the Soviets, to answer your earlier question, were just being implacably the enemy.

They weren't really doing anything to help us stop thinking of them as the implacable enemy.

Q: Well, during the time before de Gaulle finally said, "Everybody get out", there was this point in '65 when France was in the military organization. Was the rest of NATO beginning to move around and come up with the idea we can't depend on the French forces and make contingency plans, contingency thinking?

CLEVELAND: Well, the French really took care of that. They were in a way ahead of the allies moving in that direction. Within the French military forces there seemed to be some division of opinion. The cooperation in the Mediterranean with the French navy was completely different. Even after de Gaulle's pull out, the French navy continued to be part of NATO exercises in the Mediterranean which obviously made military sense.

Q: I know when I was consul general in Naples in '79-'81 the French navy was right there. In fact they were probably one of the strongest contingents of the Mediterranean fleet.

CLEVELAND: Indeed the pull out itself, the French pull out itself, was vastly over estimated at first by the press and some comments coming from Washington. I argued in a series of increasingly eloquent cables that here is a guy who is doing something for domestic consumption and to some extent for Soviet consumption, but what he had carefully not done is do things that would really be harmful such as forbidding over flights over France and interfering with communications through France. Both cases would have put a crimp on keeping the Mediterranean and northern fronts as part of the same military system. I said the fact that they haven't done anything about either of these indicates clearly that de Gaulle has thought this through and is trying to make his public declaration without hurting NATO. Don't let's help him hurt NATO more than he wants to. That did finally prevail but it got a lot of argument.

Q: Were you finding that within the French military there was some disquiet about pulling out? I would have thought that being by themselves did harm the military readiness by not being part of the NATO system.

CLEVELAND: Yes, it did. I didn't pick up, but I wasn't really in a position to pick up any dissension in the French military ranks. De Gaulle was so much in charge, particularly as a military man. He was, in fact, a great thinker among strategists of our time, which was revealed by the fact that he was able to pull off this political operation without really hurting NATO. Gradually the French got more and more cooperative with military exercises, and so on, but it has never been an easy relationship.

Q: Did you find you were there at a crucial time, of having to work and tell everybody, "Cool it. Don't aggravate the French anymore. Do what we have to, but at the lower ranks, let's not go into a pout on this thing?"

CLEVELAND: I did that kind of education with my own mission and to some extent with the other allies and with Washington. Fortunately, the president's political instinct, President Johnson, and the advice he was getting from Dean Rusk and others, George Ball, was very much along the same line. George Ball was in public somewhat more exercised than others. He regarded it as almost a personal affront.

Q: I'm told, I heard other people remark, that he wanted to be very tough at the beginning on this, and it was Johnson who said let's cool it.

CLEVELAND: Well, George had worked in France, had been a consultant to the French government. I think he almost felt personally affronted by the French getting off the wavelength at this point. It is true that the President was very clear on this from a very early stage which helped a lot. I was just trying to reinforce that from where I sat.

Q: How were the British and French taking this?

CLEVELAND: Well, the British were really pretty cool about it. There was no way in which they could challenge the French anyway, so they didn't. In fact, it wasn't even within the NATO circle. I think it was regarded more as a matter of French-American relations than it was anything else. Even the Canadian angle, which heated up when de Gaulle visited Quebec and said something to the effect of, "Vive le Quebec Libre." The rest of the Canadians always will regard that as an affront, but I didn't perceive their French relations as narrowly dicey as I thought our relations with France had come to be. I suspect that most of them felt that in the end that the relationship was going to be soured or sweetened by what the Americans did. That is what I was working toward.

JOHN GUNTHER DEAN
Political Officer
Paris (1965-1969)

Ambassador John Gunther Dean was born in Germany in 1926. He came to the United States by way of Holland in 1938. After serving with the OSS during World War II, he graduated from Harvard in 1947. Since joining the Foreign Service in 1951, his career has included positions in Saigon, Phnom Penh, Bamako, Paris and Laos.

DEAN: I did not attend the POLADs meetings, just the Science Committee. It led to my assignment to the American Embassy in Paris as the regional expert on East Asia. In 1965, Southeast Asia was one of the confrontation areas in the world. I welcomed my new assignment in Paris.

Q: So you were there from 1965...

DEAN: From 1965 to 1969.

Q: An interesting time. When you arrived in Paris in 1965, what was the political situation in France?

DEAN: Again, keep in mind that my assignment was East Asia Affairs. I was not reporting on domestic political affairs. While I was in Paris, during the 1968 upheaval, I was as much a spectator as anybody else. I was not involved in predicting it or writing about it. My main job in Paris, from 1965 to 1969, was dealing with Southeast Asia and how the French could help us in a situation they knew well. Most of my time was spent on Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia.

Q: President Johnson at just about that time was beginning to introduce ground troops.

DEAN: Yes. At first, we only had advisers to the Vietnamese military and civilian authorities, but we were moving towards sending American troops. We were very interested in talking with the French because they had decades of experience in dealing with the countries of Indochina. My main French contact was the Director for Asian Affairs in the Quai d'Orsay, the French Foreign Office, Etienne Manac'h. He was a most interesting person. He was far from being anti-American. He told me one day, with some sentimentality, how well he remembered when President Woodrow Wilson arrived in France in 1918 and how he, as a young boy, stood there waving a flag welcoming the American "liberator." He vividly remembered the arrival of the first American troops in France in 1917. "Lafayette, here we are." Manac'h considered himself all his life a friend of America. Born in Brittany, Manac'h remained loyal to De Gaulle and spent most of the war years as a professor at the French Lycee in Istanbul, Turkey. During my years in Paris, I went to his office every week. I was not a high ranking member of the Embassy, but he, as Chief of Asian Affairs, always received me with open arms. He even introduced me to the Foreign Minister of France, Monsieur Debré. Perhaps my ability to speak French and relay precisely what he told me was the reason for the friendly reception at the Quai d'Orsay. My lengthy reports on what Manac'h told me about Laos, Cambodia, and Vietnam are still available at the State Department. France had maintained a Diplomatic Mission in Hanoi and the French also passed messages from the North Vietnamese to us. At this stage, the French still had a major influence in Laos and Cambodia. A few years later, Manac'h became the first Ambassador from France to Communist China. De Gaulle had confidence in him. Manac'h played a major role again at that post. Years later, when I was Ambassador to Cambodia, Manac'h transmitted my messages to Sihanouk when the Prince was living in Beijing from 1970 to 1975. Manac'h was the person who helped bring together President Giscard d'Estaing and President Ford, in December 1974, to entice Sihanouk to return to Cambodia to put an end to the war. It failed. But in the years 1965-69 we made friends in the French Foreign Office who tried to find ways to help us in the Vietnam imbroglio in which we found ourselves. We also started in Paris exchanging ideas through Manac'h with the North Vietnamese Delegation in Paris headed by Mai Van Bo.

Q: When you say you started negotiations...

DEAN: We had, thanks to Monsieur Manac'h, direct access to the North Vietnamese Delegation in Paris, one day, Manac'h said to me: "I would like you to meet the Editor in Chief of 'L'Humanité' (this was the leading French communist newspaper). I think he can help you get some of the mail out from Hanoi written by American prisoners." I went to see the Editor of l'Humanité, Monsieur André, who was living in one of the suburbs of Paris. He had two small apartments put together into one large one. On the wall, he had magnificent Picassos. Monsieur André said: "A French journalist by the name of Madeleine Riffaut is proceeding to Hanoi. Do you want her to bring back any messages from American prisoners?" I said: "Yes, by all means it's very important that we hear from them and know what's going on at the Hanoi Hilton" (the place where our American prisoners were held). She went and came back with many letters written by American prisoners in Hanoi. These messages I was able to pass on to the families in the United States. Among them, was a tape with pictures of who is today, Senator McCain. At the time, McCain was Lieutenant Commander in the U.S. Navy Air Corps and had been shot down over North Vietnam. He had parachuted into a lake in Hanoi, and in the landing had broken both of his arms. Among the pictures, was one of McCain holding up both arms to show his bandages. Ms. Riffaut brought back that picture and it was taken immediately to his father, Admiral McCain, who was Commander of the NATO fleet in London at the time. Manac'h facilitated these contacts. He also facilitated contacts for me. He was telling me what the Representative of North Vietnam in Paris, Mr. Mat Van Bo, was saying. (A book on his Paris days was published by him in the 1990s in Vietnamese.) Much of what we learnt about Hanoi, before the Paris Peace Talks, came through Mr. Manac'h. Mai Van Bo was in one room, and I was in another room. Manac'h would go forth and back to find out what was the response to a specific issue. For example, in very early 1968, I came back from one of these meetings and wrote a cable saying: "I understand that the North Vietnamese are agreeable to holding talks on Vietnam in Paris." Whereupon, I received a thundering reply from Mr. Rostow "We will never go to Paris." Since in this exchange, I was just a reporter, I took Mr. Rostow's message back to Mr. Manac'h. "You tell me one thing, and look what I get back from the U.S. National Security Adviser." He said, "Don't worry, it has already been decided between President Johnson and President de Gaulle that the meetings will take place in Paris."

Q: A little background. You being the contact person, obviously, this was of tremendous national interest. Who was briefing you and telling you what you could do?

DEAN: Nobody, because I was mostly a channel of communications. In the Embassy hierarchy, I was in the Political Section under the supervision of the Political Counselor Richard Funkhauser. But Ambassador Bohlen had instructed me that on specific issues, I should report directly to him.

Q: I have to mention that that was an extremely able Embassy at the time.

DEAN: The DCM was Bob McBride who later went as U.S. Ambassador to Zaire. Serving with Ambassador Bohlen was one of the great experiences of my career. One day, Ambassador Bohlen called me into his office and said: "John, we've got too many Johns around here. I am going to call you 'Josh'." From then on, I was 'Josh.' In early 1968, it became apparent that what Monsieur Manac'h had told me about the convening in Paris of a conference to find a solution to the Vietnam conflict was about to happen. Ambassador Bohlen had near his office a "scrambler phone," that is a phone that was secure and which was used nearly exclusively by him if he had to discuss a sensitive issue with the Secretary of State. In those days, it was Dean Rusk. Ambassador Bohlen suggested that I could use it, if needed, regarding the arrangements for the Vietnam Conference. But before I ever used it, I got asked one day to come quickly to the Ambassador's office because a person in the Department of State wanted to talk to me. When I picked up the receiver, I heard a male voice saying that "Secretary Rusk wanted to speak with you." Next, I heard Dean Rusk instructing me to report back to him, by phone, when the location of the site for the conference was discussed in Paris by the French with the North Vietnamese.

Shortly after that telephone conversation, I talked to Monsieur Manac'h at the French Foreign Office and said: "I understand that there is an agreement on holding a conference in Paris, but do you have any specific site in mind? Manac'h left the room and went next door where the North Vietnamese Representative, Mai Van Bo, was waiting for him. Four different sites were under consideration. They were in different parts of Paris. Among them was the old Majestic Hotel, which was the place where the Peace Talks were held. With this information in hand, I returned to the Embassy and telephoned Secretary Rusk's office. Since I was passed on directly to the Secretary of State, I was too nervous to sit down and stood up during the entire telephone conversation. I discussed the advantages and disadvantages of each site, and passed on Manac'h's recommendation that the Majestic Hotel site appeared to be the best location for all parties. Mai Van Bo also agreed; so the site was settled.

Then, the question arose whether there were going to be two delegations or four delegations? This was an important decision. Were the North Vietnamese and the Viet Cong of South Vietnam one delegation? Were the Americans and the South Vietnamese Government one side? Or were there four separate delegations? The decision had political, legal, and practical ramifications. The seating around the table would reflect that decision. I want to give credit to a colleague of mine because it was my colleague Jack Perry, who came up with a solution of the seating at the negotiating table, which left the issue open to interpretation. He said: "You know, you ought to have one big table and just fill the whole room with that table. Also, you need separate entry doors. One group enters through one door and sits on that side of the table, the other group enters through the other door and sits on the other side of the table; this fuzzes the question whether you have two sides or four separate parties. Manac'h went himself to the French Government store – house to find a table big enough to fill the room – and the conference room had two separate doors. Since there was a little bit of space between the table and the wall, two small secretarial tables were introduced, one on each side to divide the room into two halves. In this way, clearly, there were two sides. The South Vietnamese Government sat on the same side as the Americans, and the Viet Cong sat on the side of the North Vietnamese. The bathrooms were not separate. As a matter of fact, they could be used in a way of permitting negotiators to meet discreetly to hold confidential brief exchanges.

Q: This is always a problem as we get more women into diplomacy. I can't tell you how many times I have talked about personnel assignments, issues being taken care of, during the pee break.

DEAN: The U.S. Delegation was headed by Ambassador Harriman and Secretary Vance. Phil Habib came with them as the top Foreign Service Officer.

Q: Vance was not a Secretary, was he?

DEAN: He had been Deputy Secretary of Defense before that time. The lowest man on this delegation was Richard Holbrooke. In this delegation of 13 people, Richard Holbrooke and I often were the sole dissenters. We were negotiations-oriented. Since I was in liaison with the French, I looked to the French to help us find compromises acceptable to both sides. Richard went on to have a wonderful career in the 1990s.

Q: He is today Ambassador to the United Nations. He was quite junior in 1968.

DEAN: He was the lowest man on the totem pole. When Phil Habib arrived in May 1968, he stayed in my apartment for three weeks until he got his own lodging. Phil and I became close friends. In parts, I turned over my contacts to him. He became the American contact with Mai Van Bo and Manac'h. Phil spoke good French. He was one of the best and most decent officers in the Foreign Service. In 1992, I flew over to Washington especially from France to attend the memorial service at the National Cathedral for Phil Habib. I don't want to anticipate, but let me go back to something which was equally important. This occurred in January 1967. Robert Kennedy came to Paris and John Gunther Dean was made Control Officer for Robert Kennedy's visit.

Q: Robert Kennedy at that time was Senator from New York.

DEAN: He had been elected Senator from New York. In 1967, he was considered to be the front-runner for the Democrats in the Presidential election. My job during this visit to Paris consisted in picking him up at the airport and accompanying him in his official calls. While in Paris, he also received a tremendous amount of fan mail. He came with his friend, Bill van den Heuvel, who later served a short time as U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations in Geneva. As Control Officer, one of my jobs was to answer the mail for his signature. When he made official calls, I went along as his interpreter. One day, he asked to see the French Minister of Culture, Andre Malraux, who had just returned from seeing Mao Tse Tung in Beijing. We had a two-hour conversation where I was the notetaker and interpreter of that conversation. Robert Kennedy was very interested in what was going on in Beijing, what Mao Tse Tung was like, etc... They had a long conversation. (As I had mentioned earlier, I had met Andre Malraux back in Mali, and indeed he was very gracious in remembering that event.) It took several hours to write the reporting telegram on that meeting. Then, Marshal Juin, one of the great French military leaders of the Second World War, died. His coffin was lying in state at the Invalides which is the 17th century building housing the military trophies and history of France, built under Louis XIV. Napoleon's tomb is also located there. Kennedy said: Let's go and pay our respects to Marshal Juin. Get me a wreath with the inscription "From the Kennedys." The American Embassy's administrative staff got us the wreath. With the wreath in hand, we drove to the Invalides. Indian file, we advanced to the coffin, as French soldiers lined in parade dress the path to the coffin. I carried the wreath. Kennedy was in front of me. Then, I gave the wreath to the Senator, and the Senator gave the wreath to a French military officer with whom he advanced to the coffin draped with a big French flag. The Senator put the wreath on the coffin, kneeled down, and sobbed. It was very dramatic. The television was grinding away at a mile a minute. The many spectators were stunned by the gesture of sympathy by this prominent American political leader. The Kennedys came often to France. Robert Kennedy's mother, Rose, had come to Paris nearly every year. The French public was clearly impressed by Robert Kennedy's friendly attitude toward the French people and their leaders. As we returned to the Embassy, the Senator received a phone call from the French Foreign Office that he should come over for a meeting. At the encounter, there were four people in the room. On the French side was Mr. Manac'h, Director for Asian Affairs, On the American side, were Senator Kennedy, Bill van den Heuvel, Kennedy's friend, and Dean as the notetaker. Mr. Manac'h said that the French had received three days ago a message from the Vietnamese which was being held for this meeting, at the request of the French Foreign Minister Michel Debré. It was what was then called the first peace signal from Hanoi. The message from Ho Chi Minh was: "If you stop the bombing of North Vietnam, we will come to the negotiating table." The date of our memorable meeting was the end of January 1967. The French Government wanted Senator Kennedy to transmit this message to the President of the United States. We are one year before any discussion about peace talks in Paris. I went back to the Embassy and realized that Senator Kennedy had been given an important message. I wrote up the conversation as a top-secret telegram. Before showing my draft to Senator Kennedy, I went back to see Monsieur Manac'h again. It was not easy to see him. He was terribly busy. I said: "Would you please read this? Is this what you told the Senator?" He said: "Yes, it's an accurate report of what I said." I showed the telegram to Senator Kennedy at 6:00 pm and he agreed to having it sent. The Senator returned the next day to Washington, and I flew to Egypt with my wife for a ten day holiday. Before leaving, the Senator wrote me a brief note; "John, if there is anything I can ever do for you – officially or personally – don't hesitate to let me know. Bob." Prior to the meeting with Kennedy, I had worked with a couple of very senior American personalities, one of whom was Mr. George Ball, who was interested in contacts with the National Liberation Front of South Vietnam. They had representatives in Algeria and in Egypt. I had also worked with Senator Claiborne Pell, who was the only former Foreign Service Officer in the Senate in recent times. The latter wanted to meet Mai Van Bo when Pell had come to Paris on a personal visit. This happened in 1966-1967.

In early February 1967, my wife and I went to Cairo. From there, we took a boat to Luxor. While in Luxor at the hotel, I received a phone call: "John, your name is on the front pages of the newspapers. Your telegram reporting on Senator Kennedy's meeting at which he received, via the French, the "signal" from Hanoi, is on the front page of "The New York Times." You had better get back to Paris because apparently the President is angry about the leak, and you are being blamed for the leak. You have a very good chance of being thrown out of the Foreign Service." I said: "How can I be blamed? I left Paris, went to Cairo, and I'm now in Luxor. I was not even around to leak anything." But I did fly back immediately to Paris. Fortunately, I had a fabulous Ambassador, Ambassador Chip Bohlen who was in Washington at the time. When this story broke, he defended me. The event is also described by Schlesinger in his book on Robert Kennedy. The newspaper reported that upon his return to Washington, Robert Kennedy went to the White House to brief the President on the 'peace signal' from Hanoi. President Johnson is alleged to have accused Robert Kennedy that the State Department was particularly friendly to him. The "peace signal" in January 1967 was the beginning of the fallout between President Johnson and the potential Presidential contender, Robert Kennedy. Fortunately, Ambassador Bohlen was back in Washington on consultation and he defended me. President Johnson was quoted as saying: "Who is that fellow, John Gunther Dean? Fire him!" Ambassador Bohlen pointed out that it could not be Dean because he left Paris immediately after Kennedy's departure from Paris and he was in Egypt at the time the story broke." The leaking of the telegram reporting on the Hanoi signal was traced back to one of the Assistant Secretaries in State, and that it was done for political reasons.

But this was not the only time I was in hot waters during my duties with the U.S. Delegation to the Vietnam Peace Negotiations. One day, perhaps toward the end of 1968, in one of my conversations with Monsieur Manac'h, I asked quite innocently: "Monsieur le Directeur, why don't you help us to extricate ourselves from this situation in Vietnam?" I also alluded to my years in Indochina and the fact that the French also had been unable to cope with the Vietnamese drive for unification and Independence. Now, the U.S. was more and more involved in the quagmire. After that meeting, Monsieur Manac'h went to see the French Foreign Minister, Michel Debré, who was close to de Gaulle, and explained that Dean had suggested that the French help the U.S. to extricate themselves from the Vietnam imbroglio. Later that same evening, Cy Vance got a phone call from the French Foreign Minister to come and see him. When confronted by Debré with Dean's remarks made to Manac'h, Secretary Vance made it very clear that Dean was not authorized to put forward any ideas to the French authorities and that Dean had been speaking on his own. I laugh about this incident sometimes, and wonder whether the idea of a "brokered solution" in 1968 would not have been better than what actually happened. I continued working with Manac'h until my departure from Paris in the summer of 1969. I would like to say a word about Manac'h's deputy, Charles Malo. He is the only French ambassador who served twice as Ambassador to China. Since we were both young at the time, we enjoyed a close professional relationship. I have seen him again after our retirement from the Foreign Service. Malo is today one of the few people alive who could bear out some of the events I cite in connection with the Peace Talks. Whenever Manac'h was not available, I met with Monsieur Malo at the Quai d'Orsay.

Q: Did you find the French critical of the U.S. getting bogged down in Vietnam?

DEAN: Not at this stage. A few years ago, I appeared on French television. It's one of the shows devoted to the discussion of history. It's entitled "The Meaning of History." I was asked about the American involvement in Vietnam and Cambodia, and specifically whether the French did a better job in Indochina than the U.S. I replied that I did not think anybody did a better job or a worse job. Rather, the mistake was made in 1945 by all western countries, including France and the United States, who did not recognize that the time for overt political colonialism in Asia had come to an end. In 1954, Mendes France tried to extricate France from Indochina with the help of the Geneva Conference. Unfortunately, the U.S. followed in French footsteps and the U.S. also could not defeat Vietnamese nationalism and drive for unification. If anybody was wrong, I think it was the West for not seeing early enough the rise of nationalism around the world and the drive for an Asian identity.

Q: Being with this delegation that came at this time, what were you picking up from the attitude of Harriman, Vance, and Habib? What did they expect? How were things going? What did they want?

DEAN: I think most of these personalities wanted to find an honorable end to the confrontation. The military briefer every day was Colonel Paul Gorman, later four-star General, and one of the brainiest military officers I ever encountered. When I was in Vietnam in 1970, he was in charge of the 101st Airborne Division. In the course of his briefing, I would hear him say: "Our bombers hit a shipyard." Averell Harriman would inject, "What do you mean, shipyard? A couple of guys hulling out a few tree trunks, that's what you are talking about." There was certainly a will to work with the North Vietnamese. Both Harriman and Vance tried to find ways of meeting with the North Vietnamese, away from the limelight, in efforts to find a mutually agreeable formula. But It takes two to tango. In November 1968, delegation members and certain Embassy officials were all at breakfast at the Ambassador's residence when election results were coming in. By that time, Ambassador Bohlen had been replaced by Sergeant Shriver, President Kennedy's brother-in-law. The results showed Nixon elected and Humphrey had lost. The negotiating delegation appointed by a Democrat, President Johnson, knew that meant the end of their tenure. When Cabot Lodge arrived, I continued my liaison work with the French, but the action was between the U.S. and the Vietnamese Delegation. Although Kissinger and Le Duc Tho received the Nobel Prize for their work in Paris, the meetings did not lead to a negotiated solution. The Paris Peace Talks led to the Vietnamization of the war effort: withdrawing of U.S. troops and letting the South Vietnamese face the North by themselves. As everybody knows, the war ended with the collapse of the South Vietnamese Government some years later, and the unification of Vietnam under Hanoi control.

Q: In 1975.

DEAN: Yes, But back in the summer of 1969, I received word that I should proceed to Saigon to work in the political section, as deputy to the chief of that key section.

Q: Who was this?

DEAN: Martin Hertz, later U.S. Ambassador to Bulgaria. The State Department decided to give me a year off to recharge my batteries. I said: "I will go back to Indochina next year, if you so desire." I kept my word. Remember, I had spent 5 years in Indochina, from 1953 to 1958. Few people had served in the same area as long as I did. I had also spent four years in Paris working essentially on Indochina. I was tired and I wanted a change. I was sent to the Center for International Affairs at Harvard, the program headed by Robert Bowie. That was to be my seventh year at Harvard.

Q: Before we talk about that. I realize you said you were a bystander on domestic French political events. What did your fellow officers at the Embassy in May and June of 1968 say about the events of that time in Paris? How were they seeing these events? What were you getting from your wife?

DEAN: Nothing from my wife. Basically, my wife has always kept out of politics. As I told you, we got to Paris in 1965. You ask about NATO and De Gaulle's decision to have NATO move out of Paris, when the unexpected request came for NATO to move out of France to another country, the Belgian Government advanced a site in southern Belgium: Bauffe-Chievre. During the First World War, my wife's grandmother's chateau had been requisitioned by the Germans. In 1940, the German Luftwaffe made the same place its western headquarters and built a runway for aircraft on the adjoining land. When in 1945 the chateau was destroyed by Allied bombing, the Belgian Government took over the land, and in 1966 offered the site to NATO. The offer was accepted.

Q: You mentioned that before, about the property having been owned by your wife's family.

DEAN: Yes. That became the NATO Headquarters. Not only in Europe, but generally, my wife stayed completely out of politics wherever we were.

Q: What was the reaction within the Embassy? First, let's think about having France kick NATO out of France.

DEAN: The Officers at the Embassy usually worked at that time with their French counterparts. There was no anti-French feeling. We had many common goals with the French, but obviously every country has its own national interests. They do not always coincide. There was no fear or distrust of the French. We knew that De Gaulle had his agenda which might differ on certain issues with U.S. objectives. Ambassador Bohlen had been at the Yalta Conference and De Gaulle had not attended this conference where major decisions were made on the shape of post-war Europe. It was one of De Gaulle's great regrets not having been invited to that meeting. Was it Yalta or something else, De Gaulle had a tremendous respect for Ambassador Bohlen. Few people knew more about De Gaulle's relationship with Ambassador Bohlen than Robert Barrett, who was once my deputy in Lebanon years later. In 1968, he was Ambassador Bohlen's personal assistant. De Gaulle listened to Bohlen, and Bohlen listened to De Gaulle. It was two heavy-weights exchanging views. De Gaulle, who usually was quite protocol conscious, never turned down Bohlen's request for a meeting – day or night, week-ends or Sundays. The two men understood each other. That does not mean they always agreed, but they could work together very well. Ambassador Bohlen was a consummate professional. In 1969, De Gaulle had a referendum on decentralization of the French administration. His proposal was rejected by the electorate. He resigned and died in 1970. So, Bohlen's ambassadorship corresponded to the closing days of De Gaulle's life. De Gaulle respected professionalism and he respected the role Bohlen played in the Roosevelt Administration, where he was one of the experts on the Soviet Union.

Q: Was the Embassy at all divided about the De Gaulle decision to kick NATO out? I can see this going two ways. One, the diplomats saying "Okay, fine. So be it. We've got to deal with this." I can also see hardcore people saying "Screw this," arousing all sorts of francophobia and all that.

DEAN: Personally, I had a full plate-looking after East Asian Affairs at the Embassy. I was not involved in the reporting or analyzing of French domestic politics. The only time I was involved in domestic politics was in 1968 when there was a student uprising. Ambassador Shriver wanted to attend, as a spectator, a meeting at the French National Assembly, which he did, in the galleries. I did not think it was a good idea for the U.S. Ambassador to be seen at that point at the National Assembly, when a domestic issue was under intense debate. In my opinion, when there is a domestic political squabble, it is much better for the American Ambassador not to be perceived as being involved.

Q: Did you ever run across Vernon Walters?

DEAN: Very much so. We had different approaches to the problems of the day, but personally, we got along well. Since he was such an accomplished linguist, he was used by different American administrations for important missions. He came out of the military, rose to the rank of Major General, and then was appointed to positions at CIA and State. He worked well with his French counterparts, who had known him for many years, going back to the days he was Eisenhower's interpreter. Dick Walters (which is really what he goes by) spoke absolutely impeccable French, and many other languages. On Vietnam, he was very much of a hawk. He said: “My day will be made when we march down Main Street in Hanoi.” Having said this, Dick Walters and I became good friends, although he would add: “Oh, John wants to negotiate everything. He wants to compromise. No, we have to stand our ground.”

Walters and I had different politics. He is an honest, decent, committed person. When you are friends, you can hold different political views. I differed with him on many issues, I start with the assumption that your adversary today is your friend tomorrow, and vice versa. Therefore, I always want to maintain contact with as many people as possible. I don’t believe in building walls around a people, which usually ends up by building up its leader. I believe that the art of diplomacy is maintaining contact and trying to resolve issues without the use of violence, if possible. For example, I fought in Vietnam in 1970-1972. Immediately after leaving Vietnam, I tried to negotiate with those who were backed by the North Vietnamese. Dick Walters has a more military approach. I had serious reservations about the use of military power in today’s world to solve serious international problems. With the development – with or without our consent – of more and more highly sophisticated technology, it became obvious to me that more countries will have lethal weapons of mass destruction. People knew my views when I was assigned to Military Region One in Vietnam as Deputy to the Corps Commander. I went to Vietnam with the U.S. military because I strongly feel that if your country needs you, one has the duty to comply with the decision of the President.

MARY CHIAVARINI
Paris, France (1965-1968)

Ms. Chiavarini was born and raised in Massachusetts. After Secretarial training, she worked with the Interstate Commerce Commission in Washington DC before joining the Foreign Service in 1944. During her career with the State Department, Ms. Chiavarini served as secretary to the ambassador and other officers in Naples, Tirana, Manila, Seoul, Prague, Rome, Singapore and Warsaw. After her appointment in 1957 as Consul and Secretary in the Diplomatic Service she served in Palermo, Monrovia and Paris. She also served as special “trouble shooter” in Nicosia, Dublin and Riyadh. Ms. Chiavarini was interviewed by David T. Jones in 2007.

Q: You transferred directly from Monrovia to Paris?

CHIAVARINI: Yes. Right.

Q: Okay. Well, why don’t you spend a little time and just tell me your initial impressions of Paris. Of course, that’s where we met. When did you arrive in Paris? You arrived in Paris in June of 1965, if I recall correctly. My wife and I arrived there about May or June of 1969. So you had been there and had a full range of experience before we arrived.

CHIAVARINI: I had a lot of experience with the young people because they were all into drugs. Some of the girls said they could fly. And they tried it, but they just ended on the ground, dead. I had one boy who had a fit of some kind in my office. I called his father in the United States. The father was not much help. He said, "That's just like him." I said, "Well don't talk like that about your son. I would like you to come over here and bring him home." He said, "Well, maybe he would." He didn't come and didn't take him home. He was so careless about his son. I just couldn't get over it.

I had another man who was a drunkard. He was a painter--and apparently quite a good one. Because some time later I met this woman in the United States, with my sister Polly, who was the wife of my brother-in-law. She gave us, one of his paintings. It's a lovely picture of a young girl. He used bother the hell out of me all the time. When I was the busiest, he would come in and want to see me for nothing. I would see him and listen to what his problems seemed to be. Well, anyway he took sick, and I called his wife on the phone and she came over. In the meantime, he had fallen into the river in Paris, or been pushed, I never was satisfied about that. But anyway, the police were satisfied, so what could I do.

Q: Did he die?

CHIAVARINI: Yes, he died.

Q: Before his wife arrived or after she arrived?

CHIAVARINI: She arrived after he died. I took care of her while she was in Paris. She appreciated that. That was why she gave me that picture and one to my sister. I always appreciated that. She took me to a large depository of his paintings. She was going to wait until he got famous to sell them. Which is all right.

Q: Yes.

CHIAVARINI: I don't know what she eventually did. I lost track of her. But it was always quite an experience with that man. He drove me nuts.

Q: Do you remember his name?

CHIAVARINI: Yes, Joseph Presser. His wife was Mrs. Agnes Presser.

Q: What was the Paris embassy like when you arrived?

CHIAVARINI: Oh, it was enormous, about four times bigger than the embassy in Liberia or any other place I had been. I grew into it as you know.

Were you there for, I used to call them les eventments?

Q: I was not there. They occurred in May of 1968. I didn't get there until a year after that. But before then I wondered if you could give your impression of the embassy and our personnel who were there?

CHIAVARINI: Well, none of them liked Paris. They all felt the French were terrible. I never felt that way. I remember another time, a friend and I couldn't close the umbrella as I got into the taxi. The two of us laughed our heads off, but he didn't care.

Q: Who was with you?

CHIAVARINI: The taxi man. I remember how much we laughed at the sight of me trying to close the umbrella and not succeeding.

Q: Well, your story also amuses me because it was in Paris when I first started carrying a collapsible umbrella all the time. You were in charge of the American passports, welfare, American citizen services.

CHIAVARINI: Yes.

Q: How did you divide your work with the visa section, which was in the Talleyrand building?

CHIAVARINI: Well, I let them be, and they let me be. Harvey Cash was the head of it.

Q: Was there any competition for resources? Having young officers, having support staff?

CHIAVARINI: Not that I knew of. Maybe there was. Maybe you knew more about it than I did.

Note: During May 1968, there were a series of popular disturbances throughout France. Originally stemming from "traditional" student riots; these "eventments" expanded partly fueled by general grievances associated with French high level education but becoming wider when labor unions, often communist dominated, sided with the students. There was a significant amount of rioting and barricade building with concern over French political stability. The French government offered various concessions to students, the police and security forces retained control with limited violence, and the disturbances ended.

Q: Were you satisfied with your French staff.

CHIAVARINI: Yes, they were very nice. They were very good. They didn't seem to harbor the same resentments that a lot of people seemed to have against Americans or foreigners in general. Anyway, I remember being there all during the period of May 1968, and I used to work late. One evening I worked until about 8 o'clock, and I walked home. I lived on the left bank. While I was walking, I met a French woman and I said to her in my bad French. "Oh, I'm so afraid that the French are going to go communist." And she said, "Don't worry; it's not going to happen." And it didn't. But I remember that walk home. Right today I can just see myself with that woman. She had sneakers; she was just like we were. I had read that a lot of people wore funny clothes, and she was into funny clothes. I don't remember exactly, but I do remember the sneakers. She seemed to be like the picture of what you would expect to see as a French woman. And she had the feel that they were not going to go communist and they didn't.

I remember one day de Gaulle disappeared, and we were all worried that something had happened to him. But nothing did. He had just not wanted to bother with the problem because he was sure nothing was going to happen.

Everybody asked me, "How do you feel about de Gaulle?" I said "I like him; don't talk to me about him; I won't listen."

I remember once he was driving by the embassy and I waved to him and he waved back. I was so pleased.

Q: What were the circumstances in the embassy at that time -- when you first arrived before the "eventments" of May? Was the staff effective? Did you feel that you were integrated as part of the embassy?

CHIAVARINI: Well, I did. I really felt as though I was part of the embassy. I liked the work. I used to have my hands full of crazy people. There were young people coming in -- and one of them like that young man having a fit right in front of me -- falling on the floor and acting like he was nothing.

Q: Well I remember that there were endless people who had lost their passports.

CHIAVARINI: Yes.

Q: Do you think that a significant number of those were frauds? People who had sold their passports?

CHIAVARINI: I don't think so. I guess I asked enough questions to each one so that I felt satisfied.

Q: Were you arranging assistance for a substantial number of Americans who were living in Paris for long periods? For social security payments or problems of that nature?

CHIAVARINI: No. We had nothing to do with that.

Q: Was Dick Rand your assistant for the entire period?

CHIAVARINI: I think so. He lives here, you know.

Q: I haven't seen Dick in 30 years I suspect. But I know you are in touch with him from time to time.

CHIAVARINI: Yes. And Phyllis, I can't remember her French name.

Q: It is Villegeurix-Ritaud -- instead of Flashner -- her maiden name.

CHIAVARINI: Right.

Q: Do you have an appreciation or any comments on any other members of the staff in the embassy, not just the consular staff but other officers, economic officers, political?

CHIAVARINI: Well, who was the girl in the passport section? I have a painting of hers.

Q: I don't know. In the passport section there was... the only American women were Phyllis and Mary Ann Mysenberg. Other than those two I don't know any.

CHIAVARINI: Well, so far as Mary Ann is concerned, I hear from her. She is in London. She usually comes over around Christmastime. She spends some time with her brother in Colorado.

Q: Can you give me more of a sense of what happened during the demonstrations in May of 1968?

CHIAVARINI: Yes, I always tell this story: I waited, kept waiting for them to break in to my apartment. I lived out there in the left bank. They were organizing down in front of my building. I remember putting my fur coat on and my pearls and having an empty bottle so I could swing it over their heads if they came.

Q: Did you go to work every day then?

CHIAVARINI: I tried to. Yes, I did.

Q: Was there anything dramatic that happened at the embassy during that time?

CHIAVARINI: Well, if there was, I didn't hear about it.

DONALD A. KRUSE
Political Military Advisor, NATO
Paris (1965-1968)

Assistant to NATO Secretary General
Paris (1968-1970)

Donald Kruse was born and raised in Philadelphia. After graduating from Wheaton College in 1952, he joined the Army. Since joining the Foreign Service in 1957, his career has included positions in Canada, Luxembourg, France, Belgium, Israel, Italy and England. Mr. Kruse was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1997.

Q: In 1965, you went to France. You were a political military advisor to NATO?

KRUSE: Actually to the U.S. Commander in Chief in Europe--EUCOM, as we call it.

Q: You were there from '65 until when?

KRUSE: I stayed in Paris and moved down to the embassy to take a Pol-Mil job in the fall of '66 and then stayed on in Paris essentially doing pretty much the same thing, although it's a little different down at the embassy where you are really back to a State Department operation.

Q: Let's talk first about the '65 to '66 period and EUCOM. Who was the commanding officer at that time?

KRUSE: General Lemnitzer was the overall Supreme Allied Commander. At his EUCOM headquarters, the American-only command in St. Germain-en-Laye, he had a deputy who was a four star Air Force general, Jake Smart. On a day to day basis, we worked with Smart.

Q: Where did this command fit into the overall...

KRUSE: EUCOM was the overall joint command that oversaw our Army, Navy, and Air Force in Europe. It is currently in Stuttgart, as all of our forces moved out of France in 1966. In that sense, it comes right from the JCS to EUCOM and then out to these subordinate service commands. It was at this time in my career, after my stint with Alex Johnson, which got me very much into political-military subjects. This was a desirable assignment for me to get out to Paris and to be able to continue to work on what was essentially NATO-related issues. EUCOM was U.S.-only forces. As you know, there are times when we use our forces in Europe not to do NATO things, but to perform unilateral tasks.

Q: What would be an example of a non-NATO thing?

KRUSE: A recent example was when our forces assigned to the Sixth Fleet attacked Qadhafi, that was clearly an American-only thing--not under NATO authorization.

Q: As the reaction to the Czech invasion by the Soviets and their allies, was there any sort of cranking up or was it just a feeling that this was something we couldn't do anything about and we just watched to make sure that something else wouldn't happen?

KRUSE: My recollections are that the NATO military asked for guidance, what to do. I think NATO authorized some minor steps, maybe more intelligence information collection and moderate increase in readiness, but certainly no alerting. Again, the Alliance looked to the United States for what lead we were going to give. It wasn't too long before it was clear that the United States was not going to engage militarily. It was not a close call. The Alliance did not want to go to war with the Soviets over Czechoslovakia however sympathetic allied countries were to the Czechs.

Q: At that time when you were dealing with NATO, what was the general feeling about Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Romania, East Germany? Where would they go?

KRUSE: There was a question as to how loyal their forces would be if there was to be a real encounter between the Warsaw Pact and NATO, how much real fighting we'd encounter from some of the Warsaw Pact nations. But given the examples of East Germany and then Hungary being crushed earlier by the Soviets, most people in the Alliance were feeling that as long as the Soviets were calling the shots the Warsaw Pact would follow their lead. It would not be possible to free the Czechs from the Soviet Empire.

Q: You weren't expecting a dissolution of this Alliance?

KRUSE: No. I think we still were pretty much of the feeling that the Europeans had come to terms with communism in the East and that was probably the way it was going to stay. Subsequent to the fall of the Soviet Empire, even West Germans told me that when they finally got to East Germany for the first time, they were appalled at just the mediocrity of everything, if not worse. They said, "We thought we knew our brethren. We thought we knew East Germany. We were just abysmally wrong in knowing how bad it was."

Q: Did you ever find yourself while you were with the Secretary General's office having a problem wearing the NATO hat rather than the American hat?

KRUSE: We tried hard to wear the NATO hat. Jokingly, you were called "the American spy." This has been typically a job that Americans handled. There would always be a person in the private office of the Secretary General. George Vest and other officers had been assigned to previous Secretaries General. I guess you do your best to serve the Secretary General. He knows that you're a career Foreign Service officer. He knows that the American must write an efficiency report on you. He knows you've got to show that you're doing things the Americans want. Everybody that works at NATO is seconded, if you will. There isn't any NATO nationality. Everybody has their national biases. But, sure, being the American and being in a strategic office, you do try to talk a more NATO line and understand the European situation.

Q: How did you find the Norwegians and Danes within the NATO context?

KRUSE: Not very strong militarily. We were always battling the Danes to keep their standards and equipment up. The Norwegians were maybe not quite so bad. The rhetoric was that they were strong allies. It's just that they didn't have much to contribute militarily. They had their particular views on nuclear weapons. Norway wouldn't allow nuclear weapons on their soil. That made them a little bit of a second class citizen. After all, the Alliance was based on nuclear deterrence.

Q: How about those two foreign friends, Greece and Turkey?

KRUSE: Well, they both liked NATO better than each other, that's for sure. There was a lot of question about whether they should ever have been allowed to come in--their aversion to democratic ideals. The Greeks have their great democratic traditions but during those years--the '60s--Greece was a military dictatorship.

Q: During this thing, the colonels were in the whole time you were there.

KRUSE: Yes. I often cite the examples, that both in Portugal, where a dictatorship was in force, and in Greece with the colonels, there was no doubt that the pressures of being within the Alliance helped eventually to destroy these dictatorial regimes.

Q: What was the attitude towards the Greeks and the Turks when you were there?

KRUSE: That they contributed to extraneous problems. I came to see that more in my later job when I was in Naples because we clearly could not conduct a regime of sensible exercises in the Aegean because of the Greek and Turkish views of what you can do there. So, it was a nuisance to us. More than a nuisance, militarily, it certainly meant we couldn't do things that we wanted to do.

Q: Were there any particular tensions at that time or were sort of the Turks and the Greeks treated with a certain (inaudible)?

KRUSE: The Turks were admired for their tough military. They contributed a lot of forces. Of course, it was essentially to protect their own country.

Q: They bordered the Soviet Union.

KRUSE: Right. The Greeks were not as formidable a fighting force.

Q: I don't think Cyprus did. It blew up in July of '74. The colonels came in in April of '67 and kept the lid on for that period of time. I was thinking that this might be a good place to call a halt for today. We've covered an awful lot of your NATO business at this point. We've covered really from '68 to '70 when you were assistant to the Secretary General. We'll pick up when you moved over from '70 to '73 at the U.S. Mission to NATO and talk about the differences there in your job and perspective and all that.

WILLIAM A. WEINGARTEN
Economic/Political Officer
Paris (1965-1968)

Mr. Weingarten was born in New York in 1936. He received his BA from Colgate University and his MSFS from Georgetown University. He served in the U.S. Army overseas from 1958-1961. His postings after entering the Foreign Service in 1962 included Paris, My Tho, Belgrade, Brussels, Canberra and Ottawa. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on July 29, 1999.

Q: Well, you were in Paris from '65 to when?

WEINGARTEN: '68.

Q: What was your job?

WEINGARTEN: I was initially in the Economic Section with the financial part of it, and then after about a year or so (my boss and I didn't get along very well), I wound up switching to the Political Section, where I did internal French politics with Charlie Tanguy.

Q: Well, let's talk a little about the economic side. What were you doing on the economic side?

WEINGARTEN: Basically the balance of payments, France's balance of payments and its gold reserves and so on, all that stuff. It was really very interesting stuff, but it's very secretive, and it was very hard to get into the French Finance Ministry for example and find out what they were actually thinking about, although they did have liaison people who would have lunch. I remember a fellow I'd had lunch with who would explain to me what was going on in French and then explained to me again the same thing in English. So it was one of the things that made me want to get my French to a better level, which I did.

Q: We've always had a Treasury representative over there. Did you find that there was a built-in tension between the Economic Bureau and what you were doing and the Treasury office?

WEINGARTEN: Well, I was in the Treasury office actually. They had two Treasury guys there and two State Department guys, and I was the junior State Department guy. And as I say, I didn't get along with the Treasury representative, and so away I went.

Q: What, was it personal or just -

WEINGARTEN: He was a very difficult guy to get along with and had very little patience. His name was Don McGrew. He was in Paris for 35 or 40 years as Treasury attaché. He started there in '45 and lasted, I think, until maybe '80, about 35 years. Very difficult, very irascible, and as I said, had very little patience with rookies, learners, and so I went on to the Political Section.

Q: You were in the Political Section from when?

WEINGARTEN: Early '66 to '68.

Q: A very interesting time in France.

WEINGARTEN: Yes.

Q: Could you describe the French political scene as you saw it, and then we'll talk about what you were doing?

WEINGARTEN: Okay. Well, the political scene was dominated by General De Gaulle, who had a moral authority over everyone else in France by virtue of his wartime experience. It seemed to us that he was getting more anti-American as time wore on. And we interpreted such things as his visit to Quebec as a kind of effort to set backfires, if you will, that the United States would have to deal with. But General De Gaulle always kept that on a fairly high intellectual-moral basis. People who worked for him, especially people in the political side of his administration were more fundamentally, it seemed, anti-American and really happy to see the United States take a reverse, take a setback. Students, of course, were very much anti-war. I think it's really about '67 that that started to pick up. The embassy had very close relations with the Socialists, including François Mitterrand and his people. And there was also at the time a centrist movement in France, the Centre Démocrate, led by a man named Jean Lecanuet, who was the head of that, and he was much more open to the United States. We also pushed very hard for European unity, which again was something that the French were holding back on. So the embassy tried to cultivate all three of those groups - the Centre Démocrate, the Socialists, and the Gaullists - and then try to fend off all the crank groups, people who would come and say, "We'll give you a safe house in Brittany if you give us some money." And I wound up being the CIA's front man... the person they would shunt people to. People would come into the embassy and say, "I must talk to someone very secretly." And they'd say, "Well, we'll send you to see Mr. Weingarten." And so I'd have to listen to all these crank stories. Some of them were pretty funny. I'm not joking. Someone did offer us a safe house in Brittany for blown agents. We got people who published newsletters that didn't go anywhere, just rants against General De Gaulle. So that was kind of funny. You never knew in the Political Section what you would encounter when you went to work.

Q: I can't remember, by this time had the Algerian business been pretty well settled?

WEINGARTEN: Yes, the Algerian business? Algeria, the French moved out of there in '62, and after terrible bloodshed and slaughter, the piets-noirs came back to France, and then there was a lot of turmoil from, say, '62 to '65, when a lot of people in France had a tremendous resentment vis-à-vis General De Gaulle, who they thought betrayed them. And so there were assassination attempts. I think the last one was in '65, when they tried to ambush him outside Paris. They blew his car to pieces, but missed him. But there were a lot of diehard Algérie-française people around at the time.

Q: Sometimes as a new Foreign Service officer, new to France and all, in a way, you're more sensitive to some of the currents that are going through an embassy, and I was wondering, particularly in the Political Section, did you see an embassy where there were those almost for De Gaulle and those against De Gaulle? Were these two sort of currents going on, or were we pretty much of one mind?

WEINGARTEN: I think we were pretty much of one mind, as I recall it. Remember that this is a big embassy in a big city, and it was not an embassy that tended to coalesce after work or on weekends, and I think that's pretty much the case for most big embassies today. No, actually, I think the one thing, the one glue that marked the Political Section and the Economic Section, and the entire embassy as a matter of fact, was the resentment that we felt much of the time against the French for the snide remarks and efforts to screw us up in North Africa or to play games with us elsewhere. And so there was... when we could get back at them in some way... I'll give you an example. At the time the embassy was completely open, no barricades. The fence was simply ornamental. And the political counselor was assured by the Quai d'Orsay, by the Americas director there, that nothing would happen. He'd gone to complain about the rise in anti-American activity, and about our Marines at a ceremony who were attacked by a crowd of French. So the Americas director said, oh, no problem, and the day after that, a lycée professor came in with about two dozen kids to protest the war in Vietnam, and walked into the courtyard of the embassy, and they all threw inkwells up against the side of the embassy, through the windows, and one of the targets they got was the political counselor's carpet. He had this nice office on the courtyard. A couple of ink bottles went through there and got the carpet. And he was just beside himself with joy. He went over to the Quai d'Orsay, told them about this. They said, "Well, of course, we'll pay for the repairs." So he went out - I don't think he had an Aubusson carpet or anything like that, but he went out for the repairs and did not bother to get the low bid.

Q: Who was the ambassador during this time, '66 to '68?

WEINGARTEN: Charles E. Bohlen.

Q: Oh, yes.

WEINGARTEN: Really, the epitome of an ambassador.

Q: As a large embassy and as junior officer did you have any contact with him?

WEINGARTEN: Oh, yes. We would go over to the National Assembly, and he'd want to see somebody, one of the deputies, and I would be sent to fetch the deputy, in effect, as the junior officer in the Political Section. We had 12 people in the Political Section. It was a big outfit. But no, I had contact with him, not daily. But to see him in action was really something.

Q: What was your impression of how he operated?

WEINGARTEN: Well, he had a tremendous presence. He was a man who had served in Russia. He'd also served in Paris in the late '20s, I think, early '30s, learned Russian at the Institute for Oriental Languages, knew Paris, spoke perfect French, was a real presence. That's the only word I can think of. He exuded authority. He knew that any Frenchman who would talk to him would know that whatever message he had to convey would be conveyed to Washington at a very high level. He was a very, very impressive man.

Q: Who was the head of the Political Section?

WEINGARTEN: Richard Funkhouser, Dick Funkhouser. He was the only political counselor when I was there. And he knew Paris, too.

Q: Well, during those times, I think we probably had as professional a group as we've ever had in Paris.

WEINGARTEN: Yes. I don't know. I served again in Paris in the '90s. Yes, you might be right on that. I think before then they always did. They always had a core of people with real qualifications, who knew France and who knew the language. Afterwards, I think they still kept... it's still such a sought-after post.

Q: Was there speculation among the junior officers about whether De Gaulle and after De Gaulle, thinking about the situation then?

WEINGARTEN: Yes, but you could not see any real challenge to De Gaulle except if he happened to be assassinated or fell sick and died. He was so far above the rest of the political world in France that he had no real competitor for president. So I think we did... We tried to look for young Gaullists or people we thought would play a role, or were young French political leaders. And we managed to pick people who have played a major role since then - not always to our advantage. One was Jean-Pierre Chevènement, who's now the minister of interior. We sent him to the States, and he was my project. And he's turned out to be one of the most fundamentally anti-American French politicians you could have. He was minister of defense during the Kuwait-Iraqi business, and had to resign his post as head of the Franco-Iraqi Friendship Society under real pressure, and finally resigned as Minister.

So we would look for people on the International Visitors Program who we thought might play a role in French society, usually in about 15 or 20 years down the road. And so who would replace General de Gaulle if he happened to pass away right then and there? We didn't do very much speculation on that.

Q: This was still the era, a carryover from the Kennedy time, when we had youth officers and there was a great deal of emphasis on youth. And of course, it turned out in, what was it, May or June of '68, youth was important. Were you still young enough to be kind of a youth officer in those days?

WEINGARTEN: A bit long in the tooth, but yes, we used to have a pretty active youth program run by a fellow who was a friend of the DCM, as I recall. I may be getting into personality.

Q: Well, personalities are all right. The time has gone on.

WEINGARTEN: Well, anyway, we had a couple of receptions, I recall, at the residence - well, not the residence, the building that eventually became the residence - but these weren't the kind of French people... these were kids who were the sons and daughters of the haute bourgeoisie and that sort of thing. I remember one time, it still amuses me, two or three of the other junior officers and myself were recruited by a Frenchman who would throw cotillions - he'd have parties, dances, once a month or so. As it turned out he was an insurance salesman, and what he was doing was starting to introduce people with titles and so on to people who had money, and what he wanted was some kind of spear carriers to just stand around on the walls - and participate, or course - but didn't expect any of them would have the knowledge of French or the family connections to make any kind of impression on any of these girls. So we'd go to these things, and sometimes they were kind of funny. You'd go out to a chateau on the Loire and have a big party - all of us in tuxedo.

Q: You were observing the mating and breeding ground, in a way.

WEINGARTEN: Yes, I really was. It was a kind of meat market, and it was a place where the girls with titles would meet guys who were from the haute bourgeoisie or vice versa - you know, had money but not a title. And so they were very involved, and very sort of snobbish kids and that sort of thing. You know the rest of it was just... I lived in the Latin Quarter, used to meet people, go to cocktail parties and so on. So you got to know a fairly good cross-section of folks.

Q: How did we deal with the Communist Party at that time, and how did we view the Communist Party?

WEINGARTEN: The Communist Party was sort of in a ghetto of its own making. It only cooperated on a arm's-length basis with the Socialist Party, and then only in major elections. As far as seeing us, they had I think one or two people designated as liaison, and they would liaise with the embassy. And we had an officer, Jack Berry, who was our designee, basically, to see these liaisons. And then Jack Berry and I used to go to press conferences that Communist leaders would give. We used to follow what they said fairly closely, but we had very little contact - no unofficial contact with them at all, and very little official.

Q: Well, was the feeling that they were a tool of the Soviet Union?

WEINGARTEN: Oh, yes, very much so, and the French Communist Party particularly. It was really just an extension of Moscow. As it turned out, it was the one... all the other European parties in the '70s began to mark a degree of independence from Moscow, but the French Communist Party never did.

Q: When did you leave? You left Paris before the invasion of Czechoslovakia, didn't you? That was in August of '68, I think.

HARVEY E. GUTMAN
AID Attaché

Harvey E. Gutman was born in Switzerland in 1921. From 1942-1946 he served in the American Army overseas. Upon returning in 1949 he received his bachelor's degree from University of Portland and later received his master's degree from American University in 1958. During his career with AID he held positions in Laos, Paris, Thailand, Morocco, Liberia, and Nigeria. Mr. Gutman was interviewed by Stuart Van Dyke in August 1997.

GUTMAN: In early 1966 I was assigned to Paris as the AID Attache in the Embassy, a State Department secondment. Our office was located in the suite of the Treasury attache. This gentleman ran a semi- autonomous operation, having held his position for over 20 years. My job was liaison and coordination with the various French assistance programs. I reported to the Bureau for Policy Planning and Coordination (PPC) in AID/W.

French aid was bureaucratically split up. Aid to the former African colonies was handled by the Ministry of Cooperation; assistance to the remaining colonies and French territories came under the Treasury in the Ministry of Finance. Anything that pertained to North Africa, especially to Algiers, fell under the Foreign Ministry as did cultural affairs, worldwide. Loans were handled by a powerful, independent credit institution. Purely monetary matters fell under the aegis of the central banks, i.e. one each for West and Central Africa and for Madagascar, all located in Paris. Further, there was a special Office for African Affairs in the Presidency, headed by the shadowy Jacques Foccart, former head of the French secret services and close collaborator of General deGaulle. Reputedly, his main concern was maintaining pro-French regimes in the former colonies.

General deGaulle was President during this period and prone to take anti-U.S. positions to demonstrate France's independence. This was the time when France quit NATO and all American military installations were moved to other locations. French officials were under strict orders to speak only French in any official contacts and to avoid "franglais" which had been both chic and popular since World War II days.

The Embassy's Minister for Economic Affairs (the late Stanley Cleveland) introduced me to the major players in the various French offices. In the next few months I became familiar with French aid philosophy, plans and operations, especially in Africa and the various players in the bureaucracy. As instructed, I explained AID's approaches and operations. AID's objective was to make our respective aid programs complementary and to avoid duplications by coordination during the planning stage.

The Director of FAC (Fund for Assistance and Cooperation), a pleasant, slightly cynical gentleman, listened carefully. He picked up immediately on the term "coordination" and pointed out that instructions from the top specifically precluded the type of advance coordination that Washington was proposing but that the French aid missions and his offices were prepared to collaborate. "To sum up", he said, "coordination - non; cooperation - oui!".

France with her long colonial history and experience in development operations still considered the newly independent states as her wards. Many of the officials were veterans of the colonial service and had transferred that mentality to their new positions. When we discussed development funds, they remarked that their in-house term for project funds was "write-offs" (fonds perdus). They fully understood but had little concern for sustained development. Their policy line was that all members of the French Community were entitled to assistance. However, once France's contribution to an activity was completed, it was up to the host country to carry on or not, as it saw fit. Beyond this, they expected the African countries, in exchange for assistance (often tailored to French interests) and budget support, to endorse French positions in international forums and to perpetuate France's status as the privileged importer within the Franc Zone.

I found most of the French officials personally friendly but convinced that France's role and experience in her former colonies was sufficiently paramount to obviate the need for exchanging detailed data and program plans with AID. On the other hand, neither- in Paris nor in the field, did the French make the slightest effort to convince us of the correctness of- what they considered- tried and tested approaches to development in Africa. In sharp contrast, AID felt that France and other donors should share their programs with AID at an early stage so that they could benefit from reflect our- frequently changing - new insights and priorities (ranging from project or sector approach to emphases on women, the rural poor, the poorest of the poor, etc.).

On the whole, French officials were disinterested in the details of American aid as long as we did not displace French importers and contractors. The only other sensitive area was a perceived threat of our trying to anglicize the cultural sphere. I had already seen in Togo that the French would try hard to keep us out of the education sector. To them, the intellectual area and, especially, the school system were the underpinnings of the very future of the French Community. The continued predominance of the French language was acclaimed as the essential "mortar" that bound the bricks of the French Community.

The Embassy was responsible for all bilateral economic matters (in contrast to multilateral aspects that fell under OECD/DAC). Throughout my tour, I spent considerable time, e.g. on the Laos currency stabilization fund to which the French contributed only reluctantly. We had ongoing difficulties reconciling U.S. and French requirement calculations. Many French officials who had seen service in Indochina before and during the war felt at best ambiguous about our successor role. Other financial matters involved various loans, e.g. a U.S. proposed moratorium on Chile's payments on all foreign loans.

It took AID/W a long time to understand France's unsentimental, pragmatic view of development as a means to her ends as opposed to AID which considered it the end per se. This reflected that, in contrast to France, we had few political and economic interests in Africa (except for preempting the USSR and China designs).

The outstanding official among my various counterparts was the Director of the Treasury (J. de Larosiere) in the Ministry of Finance who invited me several times for dinner at his house. (later on he became Executive Director of the IMF and President of the Bank of France). He was a member of the Corps of Finance Inspectors from which France - since the days of Napoleon - draws its senior civil servants. Supposedly, this institution served as the model for the Senior Civil Service in the U.S. though the latter never reached the mobility of its French counterpart.

Special letter of credit

My time in Paris paralleled a White House injunction against the purchase of local currencies, including that of CFA, the currency of the former African colonies that formed the French Community. (Guinea and Mali were the exceptions that had decided to go it alone, albeit with catastrophic consequences). The CFA, in turn, was fully convertible into French Francs.

We developed a scheme, called Special Letters of Credit under which AID would deposit a bloc of U.S. dollars with two of the largest French commercial banks. They would finance some of the letters of credits they issued for imports from the U.S. and credit AID's account in French francs/CFA. AID would then use these for program operations in Africa. Thus, AID's periodic reports to the White House would not show any direct conversions. The banks, of course, benefitted from the spread between the low interest rate earned the sizeable AID deposits and the high rate they charged their clients for L/C's. As a fringe benefit, I enjoyed a number of truly excellent luncheons in the private dining rooms of the two bank presidents involved.

Inauguration of the Central African Economic Community

During my Paris tour, AID/W nominated me the AID member of the U.S. Observer Delegation to the inaugural meeting of the Central African Economic Community in Brazzaville. I was a veteran as I had been assigned the same role on the U.S. Delegation to the East African Economic Community's initial meeting in Lusaka, one or two years earlier.

The dispatch of this State Department delegation involved the senior levels of State/AID. Congo/Brazzaville had cavalierly disregarded a number of covenants of the Vienna Convention, e.g. the incarceration of an AID officer (Stanley Berenson). The U.S. had suspended diplomatic relations and remanded the protection of its interests to the German Government. The team was met at the Brazzaville airport by the German ambassador in person. He was a friendly, gregarious gentleman with family ties to one of the German champagne dynasties (not Ribbentrop's). The U.S. Delegation benefitted nightly from his large supply of vintage libations.

The Conference achieved little as the French Central Bank could not come to an agreement with Zaire's (Belgian) advisors on terms for monetary and customs integration. The only other thing of importance that I recall is the Delegation climbing up the outside spiral staircase of a large government building. A soldier was stationed on each step. One suddenly dropped his rifle and loudly cursed in Spanish. This incident, confirming the presence of Cuban military, became the subject of an immediate NIACT.

Vietnam

A priority telegram from AID/W suddenly detailed me for 90 days to Vietnam as member of small program review team, drawn from all AID regions. The Ambassador (Chip Bohlen) was incensed that his concurrence had not been requested. The DCM who had just returned from Washington cautioned him that the President had ordered anything Vietnam-connected be given absolute priority. The Minister for Economic Affairs bet me a dinner that I would not make it back to Paris at the end of my 90 day TDY. I knew Saigon as I had been there on a temporary assignment while posted in Laos. However, this pre-dated the American build-up.

My first task involved the HQ administrative budget. I noticed a doubling of the building rent. I asked a colonel why the projection was totally out of line with the escalator clause.

"Don't you know who owns the building?"

"No idea, what's the difference?"

This building is owned by Gen. XYZ. If we antagonize him, he'll oppose our fighting here."

"Wouldn't that be just too bad," I said.

This short dialogue sums up the HQ mentality of those days (though certainly not that of the men in the boondocks).

Subsequently, our group of about ten AID officers was split up into teams. I was put in charge of the Delta Region. We were to establish what projects were actually underway and analyze what was being planned. USAID had lost track of just what was being implemented and projected.

Most of the planning and requirement estimates came from the military who were engaged in AID-financed civic action projects.

A brigadier general explained that he expected to double the number of schools that his predecessor had planned to construct. We asked about local labor availabilities in the light of the government's new draft quotas. We then posed questions regarding additional fuel needs and how they would be met with some 50 cargo vessels and tankers standing off-shore waiting to be unloaded, what about corrugated roofing, etc. The general referred the questions to a colonel who summoned a major who queried a captain.

Shortly after returning to Saigon, the USAID Director commended the team on a great job (I suspect this view was not shared by the military) and assigned me to a special task involving post-war planning. On completion of my part, I was transferred to the Multinational Projects Office which dealt with assistance from other Free World sources, titled so-called "More Flags" program. This activity was a White House priority in an attempt to increase the number of allies, joined in the fight against North Vietnam. Washington went to almost ludicrous length to augment the number of flag poles in front of the HQ building. When a Central American country offered a couple of tons of coffee, a joint Vietnamese-U.S. mission was dispatched to Latin America for the solemn presentation. It was of no importance that coffee was not used by the Vietnamese army.

At close of business on Day 90, I departed for Paris via AID/W.

The Program Office had asked me to hand carry the Mission's draft budget to Washington. The head of the Vietnam Office (Walt "Stony" Stoneman) literally gasped when he saw the four inch-thick submission. On learning that it covered 1400 projects, he sat down in stunned silence.

It is easy today to quarterback our Vietnam involvement. At the danger of being considered a troglodyte, going back 30+years in time, I understand our intervention, the domino theory and the validation of solemn commitments that we had made not only to South Vietnam but also to Taiwan, Israel, Korea and others. Of course, had we known then what we know now, our policies would have been different. AID played a vital and, in many aspects, very positive part. Roads were built, gigantic ports with industrial zones were constructed, the agricultural, health, etc. systems improved and above all, a large and varied body of technical knowledge was transferred. Whatever political systems prevails, the improvements of the country's human resource base and infrastructure that USAID's efforts have left behind will remain a contribution to the improvement in the living conditions of, especially, the rural population. So much for Vietnam.

Back in Paris, I collected my dinner from the Minister Counselor.

Helas, in fall 1967, the Assistant Administrator for Program Planning (Joe Saxe) arrived in Paris. After praising my work, he informed me that my job would be abolished. In spite of explanations, some members of Congress remained highly critical and continued to insist that the position was somehow linked to aid to France. Thus, the Administrator had decided to eliminate the slot altogether.

RICHARD W. BOGOSIAN
Paris (1966-1968)

Ambassador Richard Bogosian was born on July 18, 1937, in Boston, Massachusetts. He studied history at Tufts University and graduated from University of Chicago Law School. In 1962 he entered the Foreign Service and his career has included positions in Niger Republic, Chad, Somalia, Sudan and Rwanda. Ambassador Bogosian was interviewed by Vladimir Lehovitch in 1998.

BOGOSIAN: In any event, what this led to - and again, I consider this one of the great gifts of the Foreign Service, to have learned the French language –

Q: Absolutely.

BOGOSIAN: And so what happened then was, we came to Washington in the late fall and early winter, learned French, and proceeded to go to Paris, arriving in January of 1966. And Paris was my consular tour, and as you know that's a big, huge embassy, and as a result, what they did was make that a rotational tour, which is to say, for the first few months I worked in what was in the vernacular called "Welfare and Whereabouts," which is now called American Citizens' Services. Then I was notaries officer in the Passport Section and then, for about a year, visas. But the thing that made Paris a wonderful place to be a vice consul is, first of all, we were young and we were junior, so we had no social responsibilities. We couldn't take full advantage of Paris, because that meant money, and we didn't have money; in fact, there was an opportunity to get in with sort of a young, fast crowd of French people, but we didn't have enough money to do that. But we did have a wonderful opportunity to travel in Europe and so forth, and while we were there we managed to get up to Holland and over to Germany and down to Spain. And keep in mind that this was my one European assignment, so I was always grateful to have had that experience. When we got to Paris there was a fairly substantial American military presence in France, and as a result we also had the benefit of things like PX's and the American Hospital, when my wife was pregnant.

Q: That was in NATO days, the days when SHAPE was in France.

BOGOSIAN: It was all in France, the way God meant it to be.

Q: Absolutely.

BOGOSIAN: The only trouble was, so was De Gaulle. And in 1967, De Gaulle kicked us out. Now it's interesting in all my whole career I never served with a political ambassador, even in Paris. Our ambassador there was Chip Bohlen, and when the French were doing that, he said at a meeting of American embassy personnel, he said - this was rough for some of the Americans to see what was happening - and he said, "Just remember, there's more to French-American relations at any given time than what the two governments are saying to each other.” And I always remember that in the various places I’ve been associated with.

Q: Who was DCM at that time?

BOGOSIAN: Well, we had two DCMs, and the first was a man, Robert McBride, who later went on to be ambassador to Zaire and to Mexico, and his name, I think, was McSomething-or-other, and I just can’t think of it right now.

Q: Jack Maguire?

BOGOSIAN: No, it wasn’t Maguire. Maguire was there, but he was the head of the Pol-Mil Section. He became ambassador to Mali. The second DCM was W. Woodruff Wallner - unforgettable. Jeez, I can’t think of who the DCM was.

Q: Let me ask a follow-up question to that. Embassy Paris, from my soundings over many, many years, is traditionally, despite Paris, a very low-morale embassy. How was it when you were there?

BOGOSIAN: It may have been, Vlad. I think the thing to remember is, in an embassy like that, when you’re a vice consul, it’s like working in the State Department, and you don’t necessarily know what people are thinking in some other part. There were like seven buildings. I’m not sure I ever was in all the buildings.

Q: It may have been a high-morale embassy.

BOGOSIAN: Well, I don’t know whether it was one way or another. I know that, speaking personally, in some ways this was the low point of my career because I was really coming to grips with whether we were going to stay in or not. I did get promoted, finally, in Paris.

Q: Promoted? You mean after -

BOGOSIAN: Yes, from 8 to 7.

Q: Congratulations, I tied you. I was the champion.

BOGOSIAN: Really.

Q: Four years in class as an 8.

BOGOSIAN: Really, I thought I was the last one of the group. But anyway, there was a friend of mine, a contemporary named Ron Freeman, who currently is, I think, the number two person in the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, and he was a young lawyer. He had gone to Columbia, and we were kind of friends, and he’d come in and he’d say, “Hi, Dick, are you still processing wetbacks?” And so it was not easy to see this guy move ahead as he was working for McKinsey and Company.

The thing about Paris was the following. First of all, Paris was Paris. You simply couldn't avoid all the beauty and interest of that city. Secondly, we had our third child there, so it was a period when our family was very young and growing, and we could take them here and there and enjoy some of the things that Paris and France had to offer. We had a lot of friends, and because they were part of a big embassy, it wasn't quite the way it is when you work all day with people at a small post and then you socialize with them. We really didn't see them that much. We had friends that were in USIA, with Treasury, with the military, and so in that sense we made friends, some of whom have remained close friends for all the years since.

There was a very diverse and interesting American community in Paris in those days, and we had some exposure to them. The other thing, frankly, was there was just this passing parade of people who came to the Consular Section, some of whom were more interesting than others.

Q: Dick, did you enjoy consular work?

BOGOSIAN: I enjoyed consular work the way I enjoyed administrative work, which is to say, there were parts of it that were very interesting, but I wouldn't want to specialize in it because there were too many emotional things that tear you to pieces. There was a Turkish man who had come in for an immigrant visa, and we had to refuse him because he was a convicted felon, and his wife was American, and she had left him and he wanted to join her, and we had to tell him he couldn't go. And he said, "You're telling me I'll never see my wife and children again." I frankly had no desire to go through that. I prefer the more voyeuristic parts of our profession, where you watch other people do things and not get involved directly.

I emerged from Paris feeling that everybody should have a consular tour so you'll have enough stories to tell for the rest of your career, because there were just innumerable incidents. I mean, I had to refuse a Nobel Laureate a transit visa. I think he was the first Frenchman to win a Nobel Prize in one of the sciences for years, and he wanted to go I don't know where, and he needed a transit visa, and finally after all my questions, he said, "Well, take your visa and shove it." And my boss came and said, "You know, you probably should have bucked that up to me." I said, "What could you do? He's ineligible." He said, "I know that, but sometimes it goes down a little easier when you're more senior." We had Americans who were in jail or on drugs, just people who would come in and they would tell you their story. The woman who came in, she was of some sort of Eastern European origin, and she flashed a Nicaraguan or a Costa Rican passport, and as I was refusing her, I said, "You want to go to America and live as an immigrant." She said, "No, I want to go and live as a tourist."

Q: Wonderful.

BOGOSIAN: So that's what made it interesting. And in contrast to some of our other assignments, after all is said and done, it was only two years, but two years can go by fast.

Q: So, Dick, what happened then. We're now in 1968.

BOGOSIAN: I would note one thing. If I had gone to Cairo, I would have been there during the '67 War and probably would have been evacuated, so we kind of missed that.

Q: Did you stay in Paris for those amazing... Student uprising and - - BOGOSIAN: No, that happened after I left. As it happened, our Baghdad assignment was two years and two days, and our Paris assignment was two years and two weeks, and as it happened as well, from Paris I was assigned to the Middle East bureau, to NEA, and as the CENTO Desk officer. I would note that this was at a time that when I had to have some major surgery done -

DENIS LAMB
Administrative Officer
Paris (1966-1969)

Ambassador Denis Lamb was born in Ohio 1937. He received his BS from Columbia University and MS from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Upon entering the Foreign Service in 1964, he was posted in Fort de France, Paris and Brussels. He was interviewed by Ray Ewing on September 19, 2005.

Q: Okay, so you got to Paris when?

LAMB: It was November '66.

Q: And you were assigned as administrative advisor to the U.S. Mission to the OECD, the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development.

LAMB: That's right.

Q: About which you probably didn't know too much when you got there.

LAMB: I knew virtually nothing about the organization, and my responsibility was going to be to manage the U.S. contribution to the OECD budget. (Our contribution in 2006 will be $92 million. Allowing for inflation and exchange rate movements, we were spending a comparable amount in the mid-60s.) There were internal administrative matters to handle as well.

Q: But the Embassy administrative section did the major part of the administration of the mission.

LAMB: Yes, general services and many aspects of personnel management services were provided by the embassy. I was fortunate that the embassy administrative counselors, Idar Rimestad and Jack Lennon, treated the mission and me well. As an inexperienced administrative officer, I appreciated their willingness to take me under their wing, show me the ropes, and help me avoid mishaps. For example, when the U.S. delegation to the Paris peace talks on Vietnam arrived in town, I received a call from someone in the motor pool who asked, "Would you consider loaning us one of the Mission's cars for a few weeks?" I had three cars. I hesitated and then called someone higher up in administration for advice. “Whatever you do, don’t do that! These talks are going to go on for years!” [Which they did]. “Your ambassador will kill you!” So I declined to provide a car. The delegation to the peace talks managed without it.

Q: Well, why don’t you tell a little bit about the structure of the mission and some of the personalities and then maybe a little bit more specifically about the main things that you did as administrative advisor.

LAMB: The OECD was formed, if I can sketch in a little history, in the early Sixties. It succeeded the Organization for European Economic Cooperation (OEEC), which was set up at U.S. behest as a forum to enable the Western Europeans to collaborate in (a) determining how to spend Marshall Plan funds and (b) liberalizing their economies so as to further European integration in its early stages. We supplied the money -- $13 billion between 1947 and 1953 -- but were not members of the OEEC. When the Marshall Plan ended, the OEEC soldiered on, reducing intra-European trade barriers and working toward currency convertibility and the elimination of capital controls.

There was a study made as to what should happen to the OEEC when the Common Market was established by the Treaty of...

Q: Treaty of Rome?

LAMB: Treaty of Rome, 1958, I believe.

Q: Maybe 1957.

LAMB: The treaty was ratified in March of 1957 and came into force on January 1, 1958. At that point the machinery of European integration began to move. The U.S. decided that it would support maintaining an organization to succeed the OEEC, and join it, in order to accomplish several objectives. One was to bring Japan in as a full member of the successor organization in order to tie it to the West. (Similarly, we wanted to bring in Australia, New Zealand, and Finland.) A second objective was to keep an eye on the Common Market as it evolved to help protect our economic interests.

Arrangements were made for the European Commission, the Common Market’s executive, to have a seat at the OECD table, and to participate in committees and the governing Council. I must say that the Commission was somewhat wary of the OECD because they saw it as a rival. Decisions made in Paris, they felt, might preclude action in Brussels. That rocky relationship continues to this day. When I completed my tour as Ambassador to the OECD in 1990, I devoted a portion of my valedictory remarks to the Council to the issue of EC-OECD relations. The full text of those remarks is attached at Appendix A. This is the pertinent paragraph:

Over recent months, the Council has devoted considerable time and energy to the question of new members. This issue is important, but not critical. On the other hand, the question of the European Communities’ role in the OECD is critical and merits a fresh and careful look. The OECD will not be able to set and achieve ambitious goals unless the EC, as such, sees it in its interest to participate. As present it, and particularly the Commission, does not. There are three problems. First, to some extent, and for reasons that are in part historical, the Commission has seen itself as in competition with the OECD. We should overcome its concerns in this regard. Second, the Commission, with its principal powers residing in the trade field, takes a particular approach to liberalization. It prefers to exchange concessions in balanced agreements rather than to embrace liberalization for its own sake. We need to find an accommodation with the Commission on this point. Finally, the Community will always have difficulty in representing itself in the OECD. The Commission is constrained by its mandates -- or the lack thereof -- and the Council of Ministers, by its very nature, can have no position on an issue until a final decision is taken. Recognizing these problems, we should nevertheless look for ways to enhance the Community's role in the OECD, beginning with full membership and arrangements for the Council of Ministers, represented by the country holding the presidency, to be heard in our precincts.

A third objective that the U.S. sought to achieve in OECD was to keep economic issues out of NATO, which for the most part has been the case. At one point, ironically, when NATO's fortunes were flagging in the Seventies, there was a U.S.-led effort to add an economic and social policy component to the NATO structure. The component was created but never amounted to much.

A final U.S. objective was to fold the stand-alone Development Assistance Group into the OECD as the Development Assistance Committee. At that stage the U.S. was by far the largest foreign aid donor and wanted a forum anchored in the OECD in which to persuade others to share the aid burden. In the early days I think that was successful.

Q: I'll just note on the latter point and also the role of Japan that you mentioned earlier, I was serving in Tokyo and I think it was in 1961 that I believe it was Under Secretary Ball came to Tokyo for a meeting, I think it may have been the Development Advisory Group at the time. It was seen, certainly by the Japanese, as one important step towards beginning to integrate them into the important industrial countries, developed countries. It followed a meeting of the contracting parties to the GATT in the trade area, General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, which I think was in 1959 in Tokyo but I guess that was, I don't remember the details of what was discussed at the Development Advisory Group, but it was moving towards Japan becoming part of the OECD rapidly.

LAMB: To continue my historical sketch, it is significant that the OECD inherited the structures of the OEEC. Whereas the OEEC was a decision-making body, the OECD was largely a consultative body, in which governments were urged to adopt sound economic policies or were brought together to share experiences about how best to manage a market economy. Large permanent missions and full-time ambassadors had less to do in the OECD than in the OEEC, yet they persisted. Jack Tuthill, who was the secretary to the wise men's group that looked into U.S. participation in the to-be-formed OECD and who became the first U.S. ambassador to OECD, wanted to fire everybody on the OEEC staff to achieve a fresh start.

In retrospect, this was a brilliant idea (although it did not address the problem of national delegations) but of course it never happened, bureaucratic inertia being a very powerful force in nature. (Jack had a thing about staff. In 1967, when he was ambassador to Brazil, he and his deputy, Frank Carlucci, proposed to cut the embassy staff by 25 percent. This was dubbed “Operation Topsy,” and it caused quite a stir. As I recall, they did manage to cut back by ten percent or so.) I got to know Jack after I became ambassador. On his frequent visits to Paris we had many good conversations about the OECD and how to use it to U.S. advantage.

U.S. representation in the OECD is most effective when delegates from Washington come to Paris to meet with counterparts. So we inherited this rather heavy structure and had to figure out how to utilize it. That is something that I thought about long and hard, starting in 1966 when I arrived in Paris, and continuing through my tour as chief of mission in the late 80s.

The OECD also inherited a structure of sector committees (steel, paper, etc.) that had been part of the OEEC planning apparatus, but which served little purpose in the new organization. We worked to eliminate them, but had little success in battling their supporters in the concerned industries. Some of these committees were still in place when I became ambassador. I continued the fight and almost succeeded in eliminating the Pulp and Paper Committee. I failed, but concealed my hand so well that I received a handwritten note from Secretary of State James Baker, prompted by a communication he had received from the head of an industry association, thanking me for “saving” the Committee. (I did succeed in putting the committee on the skids. It was subsequently abolished.)

Another structure inherited from the OEEC was a pair of advisory committees for labor and business. These proved useful, both for the advice they provided and for the political support for the OECD that they generated. Labor in particular valued its connection with the OECD. George Meany, Lane Kirkland, and John Sweeney all participated personally in OECD work over the years. Through my administrative and budgetary responsibilities for the labor group I met the legendary Irving Brown, who represented the AFL, and later the AFL-CIO, in Europe. Seth Lipsky, a Wall Street Journal reporter, once called Brown “...American labor’s leading organizer, philosopher and strategist in the vast contest waged after World War II, in which free working men vied with the communists for control of European labor.” But his methods were often criticized, as was covert CIA funding for his efforts after it became public in the 70s.

Brown was a crusty type: he looked and acted very much the part of the man who hired goons to clear the communist-controlled Marseille docks so that U.S. goods could be offloaded to aid recovery after the war. He took a liking to me and, while keeping his secrets, related many stories of his exploits in sustaining and strengthening a free labor movement in Europe. President Reagan awarded Brown the Medal of Freedom in 1988, the year before his death.

Q: Earlier and then later, certainly part of it was large delegations, important, influential delegations, coming from Washington and other capitals for meetings at the OECD at various levels. Now in 1966, when you got there, how big was the permanent mission to the OECD?

LAMB: I think if you counted everybody, the drivers and secretaries and so on, it was over fifty people. State, Treasury, Agriculture, Commerce, USAID and USIS were represented.

Q: USAID did the development?

LAMB: They did the development side, yes.

Q: And the permanent representative had the rank of ambassador at that time?

LAMB: Yes.

Q: And who was it?

LAMB: Philip Trezise. Phil was a skilled economist and a formidable Foreign Service officer. He'd been Wristonized, i.e., he had been a civil service employee and was integrated into the Foreign Service following the 1954 Wriston reforms. Prior to being named Ambassador, he was counselor for economic affairs in Tokyo.

Q: I think initially counselor and then minister-counselor. Somebody above him left and he moved up. I actually worked for him in that section for a few months.

LAMB: He had a longstanding interest in Japan. By the time I came to Paris, Japan had become an OECD member. Despite my youth and inexperience, the ambassador made me part of an informal front office team, which consisted of the ambassador, the counselor, a couple of other senior officers, and his staff assistant. (The Treasury DCM was, by design, not always present, nor was the head of the USAID section; we were a State Department cabal.) The group met for drinks after work and strategy sessions on Saturday mornings. Five and a half day workweeks were de rigeur in those days.

The reason for my presence was my OECD budget responsibilities. Mr. Trezise had the feeling that there might be waste, fraud and abuse to be rooted out. Well, waste anyway, probably not fraud, maybe just a little abuse. He also worried that the U.S. was paying more than its correct share of the budget. We had signed up to pay 25 percent, but there were certain activities that were to be funded solely by interested countries, and he was never quite sure that we were getting the right bills. So he wanted me to watch this closely and eventually do something about it, which I did. In time, I was able to save the U.S. a large amount of money. In recognition of my efforts, Ambassador Trezise put me up for an award with a monetary component. I recall that other officers on the staff, with whom I generally enjoyed cordial relations or better, were a bit miffed at this. They reasoned that by advancing U.S. interests in, say, trade policy, they were also saving the United States significant sums of money. They had a point, but I cashed the check anyway.

Q: Was there tension also in the way that you were treated as a key member of the team as a second tour, very junior officer? Presumably, there were people more senior to you that were not part of this inner group.

LAMB: Yes, that was something that had to be managed, but Ambassador Trezise's leadership was quite extraordinary. The informality of the arrangement was key.

Q: Most of them were probably just as happy not to be dealing with budget issues.

LAMB: Mission staff approached the budget from a singular perspective: they tried to look out for “their” parts of the organization. The Treasury Department wanted the economic department funded. Our two trade officers wanted the trade department funded. It was up to the ambassador, with my advice, to decide what he wanted to accomplish: what the overall mission objectives were, and how to meet the goals set for us in Washington. So there were some inevitable tensions involved.

Q: There must have been also with other countries, other delegations and the Secretariat directly because the United States had 25 percent of I guess the assessed costs of the OECD budget. Perhaps somewhat more for the special programs of interest to us that we had to defend. They were glad to take our money but they didn't always want to take our advice or influence.

LAMB: Exactly right. Trade-offs were made. We supported some activities we were not particularly fond of in return for the support of other members for activities we regarded as vital. This process of horse-trading was not always pretty, but such is way of politics and diplomacy. Another problem was that it wasn't always clear how much reliable information we were receiving about how our money was being spent. So a lot of sleuthing was required, which required establishing and nurturing contacts throughout the secretariat.

Q: Did you find a lot of Washington interest in all this or was it pretty much generated within the mission?

LAMB: As I recall, there was a lot of Washington interest, as there is in all matters pertaining to funding international organizations and who disposes of those resources. More broadly, on the substantive side, the Washington mantra was “unite Western Europe; more free trade” and OECD was viewed as an important instrument in pursuing both goals.

The OECD is not part of the UN system and the international organizations bureau did not deal with its budget. But the OECD numbers had to be folded into one Department request to OMB and to the Congress, so we were struggling within the Department for what we thought was appropriate financial support for OECD. Our back-up on the “country” desk in the European bureau was charged with making sure that we received a fair hearing and ultimately got as much of what we needed as was possible. (That back- up, by the way, was the infamous Felix Bloch, who was implicated in a Soviet spy scandal late in his career. I must say that he did not exhibit subversive tendencies during our association.) And I eventually filled that country desk job, too, so I got to know the game from both sides.

Q: In terms of the Paris game, was a lot of this done in committee, a committee of the whole membership of the OECD, the budget committee?

LAMB: There was a budget committee composed of all members -- eventually I became vice chairman of it -- where a lot of the work was and is done, but some matters that cannot be resolved at that level go to the Council, where the ambassadors sit.

Back then, in the budget committee, and later, whether in the OECD, CoCom, or other international gatherings, I was always -- what shall I say, "moved" -- when I took the floor and made a statement that began with "The United States believes..." or "The position of my government is..." In Foreign Service circles we refer to this as "psychological income."

I must say I enjoyed advising the ambassador, sitting behind him in the Council meetings and seeing how that body worked. Finland was not in the Organization at that time, so the U.S. sat to the left of the French, as determined alphabetically by country names in French. The French representative was François Valéry, the son of Paul Valéry and himself a very cultured man. The secretary general was a phlegmatic Dane named Thorkil Kristensen who did not manage his meetings well, and who talked too much and not always to the point. When the secretary general began to meander, François Valéry would unfurl his Figaro and bury his head behind it. Not to be outdone, Ambassador Trezise would get out his International Herald Tribune and do the same thing. I was a bit embarrassed when it first happened. I didn't think that ambassadors should behave that way. Amusing to watch, though.

Q: Was that a model that you followed when you occupied the chair later on?

LAMB: No, my secretary general was someone you had to keep your eye on at all times, Jean-Claude Paye, a talented French diplomat who ran a tight meeting, or as tight a meeting as could be run with a gaggle of loquacious ambassadors.

Q: At the time, the earlier period, in the late Sixties, did countries generally take their responsibilities at the OECD pretty seriously? Were good people representing them? Maybe we ought to talk a little bit more about what the priority areas were that the OECD was working on at that time.

LAMB: On the whole, the representation was good. Some countries never seemed able to provide first-rate representation. I would mention the Greeks. I still don't know how they use the OECD. They tend to send scholars there -- not necessarily economists -- and their level of participation in meetings tends to be low (although this can be a blessing). The Yugoslavs were present in the OECD for political reasons ("not in Soviet camp") and to encourage economic reforms that never materialized. They were poorly represented. The Brits, the French, the Canadians, the Australians, the Belgians and the Scandinavians almost uniformly provided topflight representation. My Belgian colleague went on to become ambassador to the United States, as did one of my Italian colleagues. My Finnish counterpart went from the OECD to the UN in New York. One Japanese colleague was posted to China, another to the UN. The OECD was hardly seen as backwater; often it was a stepping-stone to more responsibility.

Q: Other than the Greeks and perhaps one or two others, did most countries fill the permanent representation position at the OECD from their career diplomatic service or from one of the economic agencies?

LAMB: Mostly from the diplomatic service. That had something to do with the OECD's origins, where a pattern was established. It also had to do with the multitude of subjects dealt with by the organization. If the foreign ministry didn't do this job, it was not clear exactly who would do it. None of the other departments of government wished to be managed by a potential rival for substantive influence. But each was willing to take a certain amount of direction from the foreign ministry because it was seen as having fewer axes to grind.

I might add on that point, Ray, that in the early days, U.S. representation was entirely professional: Jack Tuthill, John Leddy, Joe Greenwald, and Phil Trezise. We reached a point later where we were switching back and forth between political and career appointments, and some of those political appointees were quite good. Today, some 15 years after I left the OECD and the Foreign Service, ambassadorial appointments to the OECD are largely political. Some very good and some not so good.

Q: Let's talk just a little bit more about the political side of the OECD. I think you mentioned a couple of things already. Yugoslavia was included basically for political reasons and to try to influence their economic system structure. Were there other political dimensions at the OECD? I suppose bringing Japan in was one?

LAMB: The overarching political rationale for the OECD, a rationale that disappeared in 1989 with the demise of the Soviet Union, was the great struggle against the Soviets or, as some saw it, against communism. We were trying use the OECD as a pole of attraction for the Third World, promoting democracy and free markets and demonstrating how that combination offered the best way to organize economies for the benefit of populations. We wanted to keep those of like mind in the fold and to attract others. We did not do as much in the way of direct contact with the Third World as probably would have been optimal, but we did do some and we were certainly out there preaching. This political rationale for the OECD is the reason why the OECD was so strongly supported by secretaries of state and other U.S. leaders.

Q: Within Europe, though and I think you alluded to this before, there was also the aspect of integrating, trying to hold together, those countries that were outside the European Community who either did not want to try to become members or were not able to or were not wanted. Some of them were part of the European Free Trade Area but others were not even that close.

LAMB: Yes, that's a very good point. One of the things the OECD did do was help keep the core members of the Community in contact with those on the periphery, the European Free Trade Area members and others. That was another important political dimension.

Q: What were some of the main issues or of concerns in the late Sixties? Your main concern, I guess, was the budget and U.S. financial support for the Organization. There are some other things that either you were involved with or the mission was come to mind?

LAMB: There were several things. The most important issue that we were dealing with at that time was U.S. trade deficits and resulting financial imbalances. The supply of dollars was high, which generated inflation at home, sucked in imports, and suppressed exports. (This is not the same issue that the U.S. faces today because we were in a fixed exchange rate regime then.)

We didn't have the option of floating our currency or devaluing (until President Nixon broke the link between gold and the dollar in August 1971) in order to bring our trade account back into balance. So we had an ongoing debate about the responsibility for trade deficits. And it was an interesting question. Should the U.S. consume less or should its trading partners buy more? We were arguing, not very successfully, that the responsibility was shared. We would try to do our part if they did their part. However, we were regarded by the Europeans and the Japanese as profligate, as it was in their interest to do.

Secretaries of the Treasury and senior Treasury and Federal Reserve officials regularly used the OECD to push our case. The OECD featured a high level committee called Working Party Three (WP-3), a restricted grouping in which the Treasury took the lead, with participation by the Federal Reserve and State. The participants were the members of the G-10, a group formed in 1962 to provide supplementary financing to the International Monetary Fund. We used this forum to propound our arguments to the right people in other governments. Of course, they pushed back. The Economic Policy Committee (EPC), which, then and now, brings the head of our Council of Economic Advisors together with the heads of similar bodies in other countries, was also a forum for this debate.

[Let me add here that the dollar's problems predated the escalation of our involvement in Vietnam. The record shows that President Kennedy was concerned. But President Johnson's unwillingness to choose between "guns and butter" exacerbated the situation and later forced Nixon's hand. Some analysts ascribe three developments that occurred after Johnson left office -- the first oil shock (for which the proximate cause was the Six-Day War in the Middle East), the forced devaluation and then floating of the dollar, and stagflation -- to Johnson's lax fiscal policy. We will talk later of Europe's efforts to carve out a zone of currency stability after the world embarked on a floating rate currency regime in the early 1970s.]

We were also working the trade issues. At that time, the OECD served as a staging area for successive trade negotiating rounds conducted among the members of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (the GATT), which was set up in 1947. To take just one example, opening up government procurement to foreign bidders, a framework agreement was scoped out in the OECD. Then the product was sent to Geneva to be worked on by the full GATT membership. (As the U.S. Trade Representative's office consolidated its position in the policy firmament, it preferred to negotiate within the GATT, where it did not have other agencies looking over its shoulder. The OECD Trade Committee continues to function and to do good work, but it does not play the central role in trade negotiations that it played in the mid-to-late Sixties.)

OECD's energy committee grappled with the West's growing dependence on Middle East oil supplies. The committee did not solve the problem but its members shared information and perspectives on how the world oil market was evolving, thereby laying the groundwork for the formation of the International Energy Agency in 1974, in the wake of the first oil crisis.

Q: At that point, it was essentially a study group, preparing notes rather than developing a plan.

LAMB: Rather than doing anything jointly, they were comparing notes, but it was thought to be quite useful.

Q: Now I notice in your notes and this brings us back, I guess, to one of the political rationales for the OECD, in terms of the Cold War, the whole question of strategic controls and CoCom was launched within the OECD?

LAMB: CoCom was independent of the OECD and housed separately in a U.S. embassy annex on the Rue de la Boétie, but the U.S. delegation to CoCom -- one officer -- was part of our mission. CoCom was a group of countries that had agreed to control and limit their exports of technology to our adversaries -- the Soviet Union, members of the Warsaw pact, and others. Controls were the source of constant tension among the allies because the U.S. was quite willing to forego technology sales in the interest of security, whereas others were more reluctant to do so. So there were contentious negotiations about what should be maintained on the lists of prohibited products that CoCom drew up.

CoCom went out of business some years ago and was replaced by a similar grouping of countries, without, as I understand it, a permanent home or secretariat. I dealt with CoCom's budgetary and administrative issues. The knowledge I acquired of its workings proved valuable when I became involved in technology transfer issues later on in Washington.

Q: What sorts of budget issues were entailed with CoCom? Was CoCom's membership more or less the same as OECD?

LAMB: As I recall, the membership was more or less the same, although Spain was not a CoCom member. There were not many budget issues. The U.S. supplied office space for the secretariat and provided meeting facilities. This "in kind" contribution had to be valued and credited. The money had to be transferred from certain Department accounts to the U.S. embassy. It was, shall we say, complicated, but not particularly contentious.

Q: Unlike the OECD itself, which had its origin as essentially a European organization, CoCom I think was very much an American initiative.

LAMB: It was, yes.

Q: Does that mean the United States paid more than a quarter of the costs?

LAMB: I suspect that by providing in kind support we were paying a large share of a rather small budget, but that was the price of getting the organization going and keeping it in place.

Q: One of the things that's always struck me about the U.S. Mission to the OECD, from my limited vantage point, which essentially was as a visitor from both the embassies in Rome and Bern, Switzerland and also from Washington a little later, that the mission spends an awful lot of time, well, it's there all the time but anything that really is interesting people parachute in from Washington or from somewhere else and kind of take the chair or take over the discussions. Was that happening in the Sixties or was Phil Trezise a little bit more on his own?

LAMB: The OECD received about 50,000 delegates in 2005. So you are right. Visitors like you performed much of the work. But there were some important exceptions. For example, the OECD examines the performance of member country economies and makes recommendations for policy change. The mission, acting on instructions from Washington, handled this fairly important activity. To take another case, although the trade committee was composed of delegates from capitals, its quarterly meetings were prepared by a working group made up of representatives from the permanent missions, which met more frequently. Other committees, including the environment committee and the consumer affairs committee did not require as much mission involvement. We provided our delegates to these two committees, and many others, with logistical support and we engaged other missions on their agendas between meetings. As it happens, Ambassador Trezise worked in the Council to establish the environment and consumer affairs committees and arrange for secretariat resources to support them. I can provide a fuller picture of what ambassadors do when we discuss what I did as ambassador.

Q: One other aspect of the OECD that struck me and I'm not sure, it surprised me when I realized that I believe the mission is really located in the OECD building. Or it used to be. Was that the case in the Sixties?

LAMB: It is not now the case, but the mission was co-located with the secretariat for many years, and that was my doing. When I arrived in Paris the Mission was housed in leased quarters in a hôtel particulier near the Porte Dauphine, on the Rue de la Faisanderie. Sometime before my arrival, the OECD undertook to construct a new headquarters building. As an inducement to governments to fund the construction, the secretariat proposed that delegations could be housed in this building if they wished, and that they would pay the going local rental rate. I advised Ambassador Trezise that we should take up the offer.

I had two reasons: first, I thought our situation on the Rue de la Faisanderie was precarious. It seemed evident to me that the site would be developed, as it was a few years later. Second, we would receive a 25 percent discount on our rent because that amount would flow back to us as income, just as we received, for example, a 25 percent share of the OECD's income from the sale of publications. The Organization would collect our rent and immediately give us a 25 percent rebate; in practice we would pay a net rental that represented a considerable saving over what the government currently paid to house the mission. The U.S. and four other delegations moved into the building. The others were comfortably situated and decided to stay where they were. The building we moved into, which was completed in 1968, is now being renovated to deal with an asbestos problem. During the renovation the U.S. Mission is being housed a few blocks away.

[A careful reader will have noted that, absent my maneuvers, 25 percent of State's rent check would have gone to the Treasury general account, along with the U.S. share of the receipts from publication sales and any other OECD income. The U.S. taxpayer would be unaffected either way. But we needed the money in our operating budget and, I surmised, the general account would not miss it.]

Q: And will the United States go back into the OECD building when renovation is complete or stay separate?

LAMB: I doubt they will go back. When you're well situated, inertia takes hold.

Q: And there are probably even more issues about security and things like that now than there were earlier.

LAMB: I agree and I think they'll stay put.

Q: You've talked about being part of the inner team with Ambassador Trezise. Did he have a deputy? One deputy, two deputies or how did that work at the time?

LAMB: At the time, the deputy was a Treasury official named Weir Brown, who held the job for 12 years. When I arrived to take up my duties, Mr. Brown asked me what I knew about budgets. When I said "Nothing," he was appalled. When I produced a report on how to achieve budget savings, his verdict was "convinced, but not convincing." Mr. Brown and I had a checkered relationship, although we eventually worked out our differences.

Eventually, the State Department took control of the deputy position. My deputies -- I had two during my tenure as ambassador -- were State Department Foreign Service officers.

As a participant in the State inner circle I acquired my taste for economics and economic policy. The conversations ranged over all of the issues of the day and the participants were smart people, and very committed.

Q: Now did you have much to do with other elements of the U.S. government in Paris? You had mentioned that you got help from the administrative section and the administrative counselor of the embassy. Did they kind of expect you to pitch in and help them with big visits, things like that?

LAMB: Yes, they did. One of my most interesting experiences was working on President Nixon's first post-election visit to Europe in 1969. I was asked to run the motorcades with a French counterpart, the préfet de police, Maurice Grimaud. Grimaud had handled the May 1968 student cum worker uprising very well. No student died and there were relatively few injuries. He was a man much admired by the French and by me. He had succeeded Maurice Papon, who was convicted in late 1990s of WWII crimes. Papon was also implicated in the massacre of perhaps a hundred Algerians in Paris in 1961. Grimaud had come in at a difficult time and been tested by a difficult situation. While meetings were going on and our motorcade was at rest, we stood around talking. [To be clear, French government restraint 1968 was also due to Prime Minister Pompidou. Through the Interior Ministry he controlled the riot police, the Compagnies Républicaines de Sécurité (CRS). Although they were deployed, they were kept on a tight leash.]

In addition to the motorcades, I had a few other duties. One of them involved President de Gaulle's offer to lend his car to President Nixon for the drive in from the airport. This had been tentatively agreed, but when the advance team arrived I was asked by the Secret Service -- instructed really -- to tell French security that we needed to install our radio in President de Gaulle's car. In the glove compartment. This was hilarious, if only in retrospect -- the Secret Service insisting, the French refusing. At the end of the day the radio was not put in. The way it worked out was that President de Gaulle's car was in the motorcade, but President Nixon wasn't in it. He was in a black limousine without the presidential seal, somewhere else in the line.

Q: Which had a radio.

LAMB: Which had his radio in it. I was asked to interpret at the state dinner at the Elysée Palace but I was busy with one of my motorcades and missed the event. I was able to attend the dinner at the embassy residence on the following evening, when our president hosted President de Gaulle. When I arrived at the residence, I was assigned to interpret between Henry Kissinger and Pierre Messmer, the French minister of defense. So I sought them out and introduced myself. We interpreters were going to sit on little chairs behind the guests.

Q: Not eat.

LAMB: Not eat. We were known as chouchouters, “whisperers” in French. But Messmer and Kissinger were already talking in a kind of a Franglais. They could understand each other and they decided they would just proceed on that basis. So my official duties were over. But while I was standing around waiting to go to the basement and eat dinner with the drivers, Secretary of State Rogers came in a little late. It was rumored that the president’s people had let him oversleep. The secretary and de Gaulle greeted each other and started talking. I headed their way. Secretary Rogers started to introduce himself to me and so I told him who I was and said I worked for him. He seemed pleased to hear that. De Gaulle ignored me. I interpreted for the two until de Gaulle’s interpreter saw what was going on -- he’d been getting a drink -- and elbowed me out of the way.

I also met Maurice Couve de Murville, the French prime minister (and former foreign minister), earlier that evening. He had been a tutor for Harold Nicholson’s family in the UK, I later learned. So his English was excellent. As the reception line was forming to greet the French guests -- Couve and I were already in the room -- he asked me, in English, “Mr. Lamb, how would you translate ‘reception line’ into French?” Well, it turns out, there is no such thing. I somehow knew that. I told him, “I don’t think we do that in French.” So that was charming.

Q: I’m impressed that you’re interpreter level of French. Of course that’s FSI training, Martinique and then, did you use French a lot in the OECD, or mostly just living in Paris?

LAMB: It was mostly just living in Paris. We didn’t mention it earlier but the OECD has two official languages, French and English. But as you would imagine, the predominant working language is English. I was a borderline quality translator/interpreter, reasonably skilled in rendering French into English, much more tentative going the other way. I managed, but just.

Q: You have anything else in connection with the Nixon visit that you want to mention?

LAMB: Well, it was my first encounter with Bob Haldeman and John Erlichman. Erlichman was part of the advance group and I joined the meetings that DCM Robert Blake conducted with him and all of the people who were handling the substance and the logistics of the visit. I rather liked Erlichman. He was quite insistent on the president’s requirements, as he should have been, but straightforward and diplomatic. Haldeman I only saw during the visit and I did not particularly take to him. He was something of a martinet, I thought. Kissinger seemed absent-minded, which was a complete misreading on my part.

Q: Absent-minded professor?

LAMB: At one point he left his briefcase, jam-packed with classified material, at the site of a previous meeting. So I had to dispatch an officer to rush back and recover it.

I also had another interesting involvement with the embassy. Ambassador Shriver took a keen interest in youth and developed a program of contacts with youth leaders. He put one of his political officers, Jim Dobbins, in charge of it. I had gotten to know Jim when he was assigned to work with me for six months as part of his junior officer rotation. (This was a bad fit. I did not have enough work for Jim and he was thoroughly bored by what I did give him. Still, much later, when Jim was named ambassador to the European Community, he cited his OECD exposure as one of his qualifications.) Jim included my wife and me in events he organized for his youth leaders at the ambassador's residence. These were primarily social affairs, designed to size up young leaders for potential follow-up contact. A memorable feature of those evenings was the presence of the Shriver children, including Maria, dressed for bed and working the room with trays of hors d'oeuvres.

Q: You had mentioned earlier, in terms of Maurice Grimaud, the events of 1968. Were you involved with those as a resident of Paris?

LAMB: At the outset we were. We lived in an apartment on the 13th floor -- they have 13th floors in France -- of a building in the 16th arrondissement on the Right Bank of the Seine. Opposite us on the Left bank was a Citroën automobile factory, long since gone, which sprouted red flags at one point. We wondered whether workers would join the student protests in large numbers. (They didn't.) We stayed out of the areas where the protesters were concentrated on the Left Bank. Daily life went on almost normally, although I had to walk to work because the metro was shut down. Then we escaped Paris. Months before, a group of us, several couples, had rented a house north of St. Tropez. We were able to get down there before the gas ran out on the autoroutes. We spent several weeks of the worst turmoil in Provence. By the time our vacation was over we were able to get gasoline and make our way back to Paris.

It took me years to figure out that the événements of May 1968 were rooted in demography and prosperity. There was a large cohort of young people and more families could afford to forego the potential earnings of their offspring. As a consequence there were as many university students in France in 1967 as there had been lycéens in 1956. Unlike the U.K., France did not have a selective university admissions process. Anyone who passed the baccalaureat was guaranteed a place. The result was that the schools were overcrowded and poorly equipped. Daniel ("Danny the Red") Cohn-Bendit launched the student uprising at the University of Nanterre in the Paris suburbs. When the authorities closed the Nanterre campus, the locus of the revolt moved to the Sorbonne on the Left Bank. The students had legitimate grievances, but could not organize themselves to present them in a coherent way. They got carried away by the sheer fun of it all and May 1968 turned out in the end to be more about slogans than substance. The revolt was bound to peter out, which it did.

In March 1968, less than 700 miles east of Paris, a much more important uprising was launched by students, writers, and party reformers. It lasted until Warsaw Pact forces put an end to “Prague Spring.” That destroyed the illusion that communism could be reformed, that Stalinism was a mistake that could be corrected, and that democracy and collectivism could be reconciled. As Tony Judt put it, although communism hung on until 1989, “...the soul of communism had died twenty years before: in Prague, in August 1968.”

Q: You left Paris in spring 1969 after being there two and a half years or so? Anything else you want to say about your assignment at OECD Paris, the first assignment?

LAMB: Thank you for your questions, which covered a number of things I hadn't really thought about but which needed to be addressed. I would only add that while working at OECD I was not charged with observing or reporting on things French, but I did note a few interesting things. For example, French concierges, long drawn from the ranks of World War I widows, were rapidly giving way to Portuguese immigrants. The French were well dressed: no casual outfits. It dawned me after a while that, despite vigorous economic growth over a decade or more, people could not still afford a wardrobe of leisure clothing. (Clothing differentiated by age was making an appearance: viz. miniskirts.) The presence of older men entertaining young women, some of them in miniskirts, in restaurants was a sign that living standards were not uniformly high just yet.

Although there were some impoverished arrondissements in Paris, many poor people lived in the suburbs and commuted to work by train or bus. I thought that was an admirable arrangement, which permitted the middle classes to live close to their jobs. How wrong I was. When immigration from North Africa increased after the war in Algeria and in subsequent years, and the immigrants were “housed” in the suburbs, they were isolated and forgotten. On reflection, it is probably better to have ghettos in the inner city, as we do in the U.S., where they do not escape attention, however episodic and inadequate.

But the overwhelming impression one had of Paris in the late sixties was of renewal, both human and physical. From the first post-war census in 1946 to the end of 60s, the population of France grew by almost 30 percent. By 1967, one Frenchman in three was under 20 years of age. Young people were everywhere. And bright facades were everywhere, too. French culture minister André Malraux's project to clean Paris's public buildings of centuries of grime was well underway.

As to French foreign policy in those years, President de Gaulle rejected U.S. leadership in 1966 when he withdrew French armed forces from NATO's integrated military command and expelled non-French NATO troops from France. This caused the relocation of NATO Headquarters from Paris to Brussels in late 1967 and the relocation of the Supreme Headquarters Allied Powers Europe (SHAPE) to Mons, Belgium. For the Lambs that meant no more cheeseburgers at the PX in Fontainebleau. In 1967, de Gaulle vetoed Britain's second application to join the EC.

WOODWARD ROMINE
Desk Officer for France
Washington, DC (1966-1969)

Woodward Romine was born and raised in Indiana. He graduated from Wabash College and later pursued studies at the University of Geneva, Switzerland. His primary assignments in the State Department were as Political Officer in Washington and abroad. His foreign assignments, all European, include Warsaw, Paris, Strasbourg, Vienna and four posts in Germany. In Washington, Mr. Romine dealt with French relations as well as Refugee and Management matters. He is a graduate of The Industrial College of the Armed Forces. Mr. Romine was interviewed by Peter Moffat in 1998.

ROMINE: Yes, of course, I took a year off and had a delightful year at the Industrial College of the Armed Forces, the ICAF, which probably for me was a good thing because it gave me a picture of the economic and infrastructure of the world that I didn't have as close a grasp on, and I enjoyed that. Then I did come back into the Department, and I worked for about a year in RPM and then went on and was the French Desk officer for a couple of years. This was a most interesting time, because this time they had the great student uprising in Paris with barricades going up and also the downfall of Charles de Gaulle. It was a fascinating thing, because no one at that time believed that anything was going to overthrow the President, and yet there were certain indications in some of the opinion polls that were just beginning to appear that things would not go as well for him, and they didn't. One of the reasons for it was that he ran this referendum on a two-based thing. One, as I recall, was that France was going--it had something to do with an international organization--France was going to go on in European matters and that sort of thing; but the other was that they would abolish the Senate. Many people felt that he could have won on the first thing, but in attacking the Senate, he finally took on long, vested interests in France, and they simply would not tolerate this. In other words, there were a lot of senators who were going to be out of jobs, and if you're out of a job as a senator, then you also give up your job as the mayor of your community and several other offices which you can hold--as they say, the accumulation of jobs. It's still being discussed in France today. In fact, I think I heard something about it yesterday on the news. People started to look at this. This was one of the things that led to their finally defeating him on the referendum. Of course, it was a strange thing. He had always said if he didn't win the referendum, he would resign. I don't think anyone believed that, but he was a man of his word, and when the referendum was lost, he left immediately. I think the French were probably a little tired of him. He had been in power for ten years or so. Secondly, politically he made a capital error, and it's one of the few times that I ever saw that he made a mistake like that, unless perhaps he was getting ready to go anyway and wanted to go out with a flourish.

Q: Did we have big bilateral questions in play at that time?

ROMINE: I don't recall that we had big bilateral questions in play at that time. We were most anxious for the European Communities to be upward looking, as we said--in other words, to encourage free trade and, of course, the free exchange of goods. Of course, large American sales to Europe were a very normal thing, and we did have the feeling that the French wanted to turn a lot of this within to be able to do the trading within Europe but not to afford any particular favors to the United States. This did cause some problems. One time Ambassador Bohlen went to Bordeaux, where he made a speech about the development of the European Communities, and he suggested that the Communities, if they really wanted to grow and develop, should be an outwardly turned group--just this. That was all that he really said, but this caused a great deal of irritation and calls to him from high members of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs protesting that he was interfering in the internal affairs of France. I must say it wasn't pushed very hard, but still it was stated.

LESTER E. EDMOND
Counselor, US Mission to the OECD
Paris (1966-1970)

Lester Edmond attended College of the City of New York and received his Master's degree from Harvard. Since joining the Foreign Service in 1956, his career has included positions in Japan, Finland, France and the Philippines. Mr. Edmond was interviewed by Raymond Ewing in 2001.

Q: Where did you go after the National War College?

EDMOND: My next assignment was as Counselor of Mission to the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD). Phil Trezise, under whom I had served in Tokyo, had been appointed Ambassador to the OECD in the latter part of 1965 and he asked me to join the Mission after I was graduated from the War College.

Q: The Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development in Paris. Counselor of Mission where did that put you in the hierarchy?

EDMOND: That was the third-ranking officer in the mission. The deputy was Weir Brown, who came from the Treasury Department. Treasury traditionally supplied the Deputy position. In recent years, the Ambassadorial position has been given to political appointees. In some ways being at the OECD was an unusual assignment. It's an organization that focuses on the broad range of economic activities that governments deal with on a day to day basis. It was the one place where twenty industrialized democracies - actually the ones of Europe plus the United States, Canada and Japan - worked together to deal with a broad range of economic and social questions which were of interest to them. The organization actually grew out of the Marshall Plan, when the United States encouraged European countries to cooperate in advancing European economic reconstruction rather than working individually. That organization became the Organization for European Economic Cooperation, the OEEC, which in turn developed into the OECD. For a variety of reasons the OEEC had few accomplishments to its credit. But by the end of the 1950s, Europe had recovered and it was thought that a new organization should be established that would be a forum to foster cooperation between North America and Western Europe. The two had become the world's leading economic powers.

The European Economic Community, which had been established in 1957, could not speak for Europe since the EEC originally had only six members, Germany, Italy, France, Belgium, Holland, and Luxemburg. Britain and the Scandinavian countries were standing aside and Spain, Portugal, Austria, Greece, and Turkey were not considered ready for membership. The OECD which had Ambassadors and permanent delegations from all of these nations, together with Switzerland, Iceland, Canada, the United States, and Japan, which joined in 1963, was seen as a place where the interests of most of the advanced market economies might be reconciled and common interests pursued. In reality the few commitments that members were asked to make were hedged with exceptions and in any event the OECD convention had no enforcement provisions. The institution, thus, was largely confined to consultation and studies. Subjects for consultation were many and varied i.e., economic policy, balance of payments, trade, education, agriculture, the environment, consumer affairs, anti-trust issues, almost any issue with the exception of defense.

The OECD had a sizeable and on the whole a very competent secretariat that supported the many working groups that were established to deal with the various issues. The working group members were drawn from the permanent members of the missions as well as representatives from capitals. The European countries drew more heavily on officials from capitals since the time necessary to travel between the capitals and Paris was not great. Every so often the working groups would hold significant decision making sessions and senior officials from Washington and others capitals would come and participate. It normally was not difficult to persuade even the busiest official to attend, as the lure of Paris was considerable. Almost every department and agency in the United States government, with the exception of Defense and the Post Office discovered that they had an interest in the subjects being dealt with by the OECD.

In addition to being a discussion forum for government officials, the OECD was a major research organization for economic issues. My primary responsibility was to supervise the activities of many of the working groups in order to assure that the activities being undertaken were consistent with United States policies and to help assure that the work being undertaken was of as high a quality as possible. With working groups operating in areas as disparate as agriculture, manpower, social affairs, education, science and technology, industry, energy, restrictive business practices, transportation - in other words, the entire gamut of government operations - the work was challenging and intellectually stimulating. Governments used the OECD to develop common views in controversial areas and the delegations attempted to direct the work programs of the various committees in directions that promoted the views and supported the positions of their respective governments

Q: You mentioned that for important meetings of working groups or committees, officials would often come from capitals. That would include, I suppose, Cabinet officers on occasion as well. Is that right?

EDMOND: Cabinet members did not attend the working groups. Their attendance was limited to the annual ministerial meetings. Even at those meetings, the US representative generally was at the Undersecretary of State level. We did have an official visit of Vice President Humphrey, but even that formed part of a broader trip that he was taking.

Q: The US mission to the OECD was pretty large, to have experts for these various activities of the organization. Were other delegations also well staffed, or did they rely perhaps more than our case to experts' officials coming from their capitals?

EDMOND: It varied. The larger European countries followed the same staffing practices that we did, but their permanent delegations were not provided the same autonomy that the US delegation enjoyed for the officials could actually participate in a meeting and return to their capitals after the conclusion of the session on the same or following day.

One issue which took a fair amount of my time was what was known as the Technological Gap. There was believed to be a substantial and growing gap in technology between the United States and Europe. There was concern that Europe was falling further and further behind the United States in technological prowess and that development would eventually lead to a substantially lower rate of economic growth in Europe with its becoming a technological backwater. It is difficult now to believe that this was a question of serious concern. It was feared that United States industry was going to dominate the world and international action would be necessary to prevent this from occurring.

Concern over the purported technological gap actually was one of the arguments used by supporters of the UK's membership in the EEC. The argument made was that Britain needed to join with the other Europeans so as to enhance their technological capability. This was an issue that if permitted to fester could very well have affected the United States adversely. We had a very gung-ho and ambitious Science Secretariat in the OECD who proved to be strong proponents of the need for Europe to take decisive action, and were attempting to promote courses of action that could have required American firms to transfer their technology to our OECD partners. Since the proposal called only for US firms to take action, it was widely supported by most of the other members.

Phil Trezise assigned me the task of engaging in protracted negotiations with the members of the Science Secretariat to attempt to revamp the parameters of the research effort so as to neutralize its possible adverse effect on US industry. These discussions proved to be difficult as the Science Secretariat relished being in the center of a politically popular program. While I was undertaking this effort Ambassador Trezise was discussing the issue with the other Ambassadors and the Secretary General. Of course, no proposal could be formally adopted by the OECD over US objections, but it would have been politically embarrassing to have had to veto a widely approved OECD document. The US veto would have been publicly portrayed as an act of ungenerous self interest. Eventually the OECD's technology gap report was issued with most of the objectionable features deleted and the entire technology gap issue disappeared from view. While researching this entire question in preparation for the discussions with the Secretariat and members of other delegations, it became clear that there was very little, or no hoarding of non-defense technological discoveries, which were either being freely licensed or were being made available through American investment in Europe. It became evident that the real objection was that American firms in Europe were making use of these technological advances and that the American computer industry, particularly IBM, was the principal target. There appeared to be a widely held view that a nation would fall behind technologically and economically if it did not have a domestically owned technologically advanced computer manufacturing facility. I became fully aware of this widely held view during my second tour in Japan.

During my assignment at the Mission I observed how an issue that would appear to have only domestic implications could unexpectedly have international ramifications. The question of automotive safety had in this period become a significant issue in the United States. Ralph Nader's book "Unsafe at Any Speed" had savaged the design of one of the General Motors cars, possibly the Corvette and its poor accident and safety record. The outspoken Nader and his book had captured the attention of the American public and led to the introduction of federal safety standards for vehicles sold in the United States. The Europeans and Japanese awakened to the fact that our introduction of such requirements would, in effect, prevent them from exporting their cars into the United States unless they adopted the American standards. This could prove to be prohibitively expensive. The Europeans and Japanese argued that the unilateral introduction of the American standards without any consultations could well be regarded as a non-tariff barrier and should be considered in the Kennedy round of trade negotiations.

Phil Trezise asked me to try to come forth with a consultation program that would not delay the United States introducing automotive safety standards and yet would satisfy the Europeans and Japanese that we were not deliberately or inadvertently developing new non-tariff barriers. First, it was necessary to persuade Washington that it would be advantageous to enter formal discussions in the OECD on the grounds that the danger existed that we might be forced to use a forum such as the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) which did have enforcement powers. The subject then was made the focus of OECD discussion for some months, with technical experts from capitals participating. As a result of these efforts the question came to be viewed as purely a technical one and not a politically motivated one. Although some unhappiness continued to exist on the part of European manufacturers, the issue faded away as a matter of controversy among governments and in fact may have encouraged the Europeans to introduce their own safety standards.

Q: Any other examples come to mind in the period that you were there in Paris?

EDMOND: Well, yes, the two issues just discussed were those where we tried to blunt activities that appeared to be disadvantageous to US interests. I found it possible to make use of the OECD to promote views that appeared to be consistent with overall US interests. None of my initiatives, by any stretch of the imagination, could be regarded as earthshaking but they were consistent with US positions. I personally am persuaded, without doubt influenced by my academic studies, that America has greatly gained from its efforts to achieve a highly competitive industrial structure. I believe that US efforts to promote competition that began with the passage of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act of 1890 and continued under the "trust busting" policies of Theodore Roosevelt were important factors in promoting innovation and economic progress in the United States. The tradition of promoting competitive behavior has remained strong in the United States despite efforts by various administrations to weaken or even emasculate the laws, aided at times by a judiciary that often appeared unsympathetic to the need to promote competition. The benefits of competition were not that apparent to a Europe that primarily had been concerned with rebuilding the industrial base that had been destroyed in the War. Also the American tradition that equated competitive behavior with economic progress did not exist in Europe. e.g. the cartelization of German industry prior to World War II. I was authorized to promote, with the concurrence of Ambassador Trezise and the approval of Washington, an activity in the OECD designed to examine the implications of anti-competitive behavior on economic growth. I am unable honestly to say that this ever blossomed into a significant OECD activity, but it did get the subject discussed by the member countries. I like to think that the OECD activity was one factor if only a minor one, that promoted the current active European Community anti-trust program.

The other issue that comes to mind was the introduction of the subject of consumer affairs. Actually, the idea of establishing a working group to examine the idea of consumer protection originated, I believe with the Netherlands delegation. A member of that delegation informed me of their thoughts and I concurred that it appeared to be a worthwhile OECD activity. There was then a growing interest in the United States as to the need to protect the consumer. A post of Presidential Advisor for Consumer Affairs, I believe, had been established and subjects such as the need for accurate product labeling; prohibition of predatory lending; sanitary conditions in food manufacturing facilities were being actively discussed. I obtained the concurrence of the Ambassador and the approval of Washington and pressed for the establishment of this activity within the OECD. The Netherlands delegation was delighted to receive the active support of a major delegation which considerably improved the likelihood of the activity being initiated. There may not have been too much opposition to this new undertaking, but there was certainly a lack of enthusiasm since it added a requirement for additional funding and placed an increased work burden on the Secretariat and the delegations. I am unable to tell you whether the activity continued after my departure or whether there were any accomplishments for which it could claim credit. I would like to believe that some governmental officials may have taken advantage of its efforts to support consumer protection.

Q: And what about the role of France? The OECD was headquartered, as it had been from the beginning, in Paris. Were the French more positive than they were in some other organizations of this period of the late '60s, or did they cause some problems on occasion?

EDMOND: No, I wouldn't say the French created any greater difficulties than did any other country. Their attitude depended on the subject being discussed, as was true for every delegation.. For example, on the technological gap issue they were strongly supportive of the Secretariat. At that time the French were deeply concerned at the failure of their national computer firm, Machine Bull. Their principal concern and sensitivity dealt with the use of the French language in the OECD so as to ensure that English did not overwhelm the use of French. Most of the members, the northern Europeans, Scandinavian countries, Germany, Japan the United States and Canada used English as their language of choice. In addition to the French, only the Spanish, the Portuguese, the Italians, and I think the Greeks used French in meetings and preferred their documentation to be written in French. The French delegation would protest vigorously if the English version of a Secretariat paper appeared earlier than the French version, which might readily happen since the bulk of the Secretariat worked in English.

In summary, the OECD is a largely unheralded organization that deals with issues that do not appear to have a lot of sex appeal or attract a great deal of public attention. I believe it rarely received public notice except on those occasions when it issued its annual forecasts of economic growth in the various member countries.

Q: Okay. Is there anything else that you'd want to say about this period in Paris from 1966 to 1970 or thereabouts?

EDMOND: Only to note that it was a great place to be for an observer of the European scene. You will recall that the year 1968 saw two significant political developments in post-war Europe. One directly involved France, and that was the so-called Paris Student Revolt that almost brought down the DeGaulle Government while the other was the invasion of Czechoslovakia by Soviet armored divisions which obliterated the political liberalization movement in that country that has become known as the Prague Spring.

With regard to the Paris events, suffice it to say that a student protest movement broke out in Nanterre University. The proximate cause was the arrest of eight members of a National Vietnam Committee. One of the protesters was Danny Cohen-Bendit, a German student who proved to be a dynamic and articulate revolutionary. In recent years, he has remained a popular left-wing voice in the European political scene. In March, a number of students broke into the Dean's Office and occupied it. The following month, the eight students were to be brought before a disciplinary hearing at the Sorbonne. Student activists at the Sorbonne joined forces with the Nanterre protesters and there was a demonstration at the former University, which has a special place in the French educational system and in the hearts of the French people. It appears that the authorities may have overreacted. The much feared French riot police were called in and considerable violence took place and the police took some students into custody. This enraged the student demonstrators and thousands took to the streets on the Left Bank. Barricades were built by destroying cars; paving stones were torn from the streets and used as weapons. The Sorbonne had been closed, reportedly for only the second time in its history. The first was when the Nazis marched into Paris in 1940. The students demanded the reopening of the Sorbonne, the withdrawal of the police and the release of those arrested. The authorities would not agree to the last request.

What made these developments particularly dangerous for the Government was a widespread feeling of dissatisfaction among the workers. Workers in factory after factory in France went on strike and occupied their workplaces. Renault, Peugeot, Sud Aviation were only a few of the companies shut down. Then the strike spread to non-industrial workers with the department store employees and the traffic controllers at Orly Airport following. Finally a general strike throughout France was called with the strike leaders calling for occupation of Government offices. These strikes and demonstrations had been organized and led largely by self appointed and unelected leaders and not by the traditional unions. It is interesting to note that the Communist Party initially had opposed the student demonstrations and the worker strikes, stating that they had been organized by provocateurs. Only after they had received such wide spread support did the Communist leaders support them in fear that they would lose all influence. The non-communist union leaders and those of other organizational bodies began seriously to fear that anarchy and revolution might result and organized counter demonstrations to defend the government offices from occupation. General Charles DeGaulle addressed the French nation on May 24 in which he called for a national referendum calling for a mandate for renewal. Cohen-Bendit was deported on May 25 and on May 27 the Government announced a thirty-five percent increase in the minimum wage and a ten percent general wage increase. Elections were held in August, I believe, and the Gaullists won approximately 60 per cent of the vote. The crisis was at an end.

The Czech crisis I only watched from afar. The communists had obtained power in Czechoslovakia through democratic elections between the years 1945 and 1948. Economic conditions in Czechoslovakia continued to be difficult and the Czechs increasingly chafed at the authoritarian rule of the Communist regime. The Czech Communist Party named Alexander Dubcek as First Secretary and he began introducing a number of reforms and liberalizing measures that became known as the Prague Spring. These frightened the Kremlin, I assume, because the Communist leaders feared they might also be adopted by other Eastern European countries that they dominated. On the night of August 20, Soviet armor invaded Czechoslovakia and snuffed out the short lived Prague Spring. I have always noted the difference in the treatment that Soviets showed to Finland and to Czechoslovakia in the post World War II period. I continue to suspect that Finland maintained its independence because the Soviets knew that the Finns would defend themselves, even if such action appeared suicidal in nature in contrast to the Czechs who would far more likely accept the inevitable defeat.

CHRISTIAN A. CHAPMAN
Deputy Assistant Secretary for Political Affairs and Information, NATO
Paris (1966-1967)

Christian A. Chapman was born in France to American parents on September 19, 1921. He served in the U.S. Army from 1941-1945 and received a bachelor's degree from Princeton University in 1948. Mr. Chapman entered the Foreign Service in 1950. His career included positions in Morocco, Lebanon, Iran, Vietnam, Luxembourg, France, and Laos. Mr. Chapman was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1990.

Q: Then in the international side of NATO. I have you there from 1966 to 68. Could you explain what you did.

CHAPMAN: I had the longest title of my career. I was Deputy Assistant Secretary General for Political Affairs and Information. The Assistant Secretary was German, Joachim Jaenike, who served just below the Secretary General. The Directorate had about a dozen officers at the Counselor level from various nationalities.

On the political affairs side, we chaired the many political committees, the committee system being the heart of the workings of NATO. This is where the fifteen member countries could on a regular basis compare notes on what was going on in the world and what each country was doing. The political aspect of NATO has never been sufficiently appreciated. It provided , and provides today at a time of extraordinary change, a mechanism for the allies to remain currently informed and moving in the same direction. It remains a very important function- one that historically has never been so successfully tried over so many years.

We were also responsible for a very large information effort with about a hundred people. Interestingly enough, while all fifteen governments in NATO actively supported NATO, politically they felt very vulnerable at home with their public opinion. The heart of the matter was that all governments were under great domestic pressure to do more on the social side of their societies. Defense appeared to public opinion, even in the US, to take resources away from other purposes. All the governments therefore considered that this information effort was essential. So we had a big program. Busloads of people came to NATO every week and we gave them lectures and pamphlets and booklets, all sorts of literature and distributed widely information materials of all sorts.

Q: Who did you consider to be target groups? What countries or types of people were you aiming at?

CHAPMAN: Probably it was mostly the academic world. Students and teachers, grade schools to universities. But many other groups came through.

Q: The same kind of effort that has been made with the United Nations.

CHAPMAN: That's exactly right.

In 1967 De Gaulle threw out the military from France and the Council decided to move the entire organization to Brussels. I felt then and I feel now that had NATO been as fragile as it was perceived by governments, it would have broken up at that time. In fact the move from Paris to Brussels was remarkably well done. We closed our offices on a Friday in Paris and reopened on the following Monday in Brussels. Without missing a committee meeting.

Q: What was the feeling among the staff towards the French?

CHAPMAN: A lot of bitterness.

Q: How about with the French among you.

CHAPMAN: Our French colleagues were very embarrassed and of course we avoided making an issue of it with them. They were very unhappy and we had a lot of sympathy for them because it was a very difficult moment. They thought of NATO the way we did, as essential. De Gaulle was playing a political game. In fact while the French military was out of the command structure, they nevertheless retained a very close liaison. To this day it is so close that it is ludicrous for France to remain outside the military structure.

Q: So there wasn't any real break then.

CHAPMAN: There was a real moment of uncertainty when it could have broken up. And if one country had said, "Well yes we too want to take our distances from the organization," I think it could have started the unraveling of NATO.

Q: Did you have any feeling that other countries' leaders were thinking about this at the time?

CHAPMAN: The revelation was that despite the governments' anxieties regarding public opinion, they all stuck together very firmly. This was the best evidence that NATO mattered to Western Europe.

Q: Do you think de Gaulle was surprised at this or had he counted on it?

CHAPMAN: I think he counted on it. He would not have made his decision if it would have broken the alliance apart.

Q: That would have left France isolated with Germany right there.

CHAPMAN: With Germany and Russia. De Gaulle was very realistic about the Soviet Union. In fact, allowing his military to work very closely with the allies was pretty good evidence and France remained in the Alliance Council. So it was a charade for domestic purposes.

SERBAN VALLIMARESCU
Deputy Public Affairs Officer, USIS

Serban Vallimarescu was born in Romania in 1922. He immigrated to the United States in 1940 and became a naturalized citizen in 1943. Mr. Vallimarescu worked at Voice of America before entering USIA in 1956. His career included positions in Mexico, the Dominican Republic, France, Spain, and Argentina. He was interviewed by Cliff Groce in 1989.

VALLIMARESCU: So I go back to Washington after this experience. Tom Mann eventually is replaced as assistant secretary by Jack Hood Vaughn, the former Peace Corps director, who was in the job for a year, after which he was appointed ambassador to Colombia or Panama. He is replaced by Lincoln Gordon, who had been ambassador to Brazil. At which point I go to Leonard Marks, who had replaced Carl Rowan, and say, "Leonard, please, three different assistant secretaries within less than three years is a little too much to adjust to. Send me overseas, please. I'd like to go overseas again." "Where would you like to go?" "Well, if you really ask me, I'd like to go to Paris." "Let me see if I can work it out." And he worked it out. I remember that the press corps, the journalists who covered the State Department, gave me a luncheon, which Tom Mann and Jack Hood Vaughn attended, at the National Press Club. And they represented a wide range, from Bernie Gwertzman to Jerry O'Leary, the New York Times guy -- there must have been about 20 journalists there. It made me feel good because they were people who were enemies, basically ideologically different, but they got together to say goodbye to me, and I was very pleased.

So off we go to Paris. This is June, 1966. There's a story there which show how bureaucracy works, or how some people in the bureaucracy work. We wanted to go by ship; we thought it would be nice to take four days by ship. We had made reservations on the SS United States. The kids were very excited about it. Alice was, too. But then we hear from the PAO, Lee Brady. He said, "No way. I need Val here, I want him by plane." It was only a two-day difference. There was a French religious holiday during that period we were talking about a two-day difference, but Brady insisted. We had to cancel our ship reservations. We arrived in Paris on a Saturday. Monday was a holiday and I reported to the office on Tuesday. We would have arrived by ship on Tuesday. That was not a very auspicious start.

I was in Paris for three years as deputy PAO. It should have been a four-year tour. The reason it was not a four-year tour is that my second ambassador in Paris and I were not on the best of terms. I think he asked that I be pulled out. I know I asked to be pulled out. I don't know which of the two came first. This ambassador was Sargent Shriver. We didn't get along very well. My first ambassador in Paris was Chip Bohlen, and that was a great gentleman. And she was a great lady. But it was quite clear that Chip Bohlen's heart was always still in the Soviet Union, in Eastern European affairs.

It was a difficult period in Franco-American relations. De Gaulle had pulled out of NATO. Anti-Americanism was at its height in the media. All the more leftist elements were having a field day, going to extremes. They felt that de Gaulle had given them a green light. I was deputy PAO, but the job of our press, radio, television people was a very difficult one indeed because the French media were not very responsive. It was very difficult indeed. My children and my wife -- and I love Paris too -- were very happy. I was quite pleased with Chip Bohlen the first two years. But the last year I wanted to get out. The city is pretty, and everything is enjoyable, but if you go to work disliking the person you work for it's not fun.

Of course, we were there when the famous events of May took place in 1968 when the students sort of went up in arms and occupied various buildings and there were serious incidents between them and the police. De Gaulle went into exile, in effect, refused to have anything to do with it and then finally, after the thing became totally unmanageable, came back and order was reestablished.

But when Shriver came the whole embassy morale, the whole embassy spirit suffered greatly. First of all it started with his telling his DCM, who was a very nice gentleman who had kept the embassy together as chargé for six to eight months -- within a month or two after Shriver had presented his credentials, the DCM sees in the traffic, in a telegram, that the political counselor had been recalled to Washington, although he had another three years to go. The economic counselor was also being pulled out and the first he knew of it was in reading the traffic, as we call it. So the DCM walks into the ambassador's office and says, "Mr. Ambassador, what's this I hear about so-and-so and so-and-so being pulled?" The ambassador looked at him with a smile and said, "That's right. And you, too! You're leaving within a week." That's the way he fired his DCM. So it didn't help morale in the embassy.

As I say, the Sargent Shriver period was difficult for us. Now Sargent Shriver is a man with ideas a mile a minute, which is fine, he was an imaginative man -- but, you know, I developed for Shriver -- I recognized that I was no longer objective. Just as -- I always made that comparison -- just as in the days of the McCarthy era, it was enough for McCarthy to denounce somebody publicly as a communist, or whatever, for me to react and say, "That must be a nice guy." You see what I mean? It's sort of exaggerated, but with Sargent Shriver it was enough for him to have an idea for me to say, "Oh-oh, there must be something wrong with it." So I was not totally objective.

If you're still interested in anecdotes, I will tell you some which illustrate the Sargent Shriver way of doing things. Number one, he was always, always at least half an hour late for every appointment, whether it was with Pompidou or the minister of foreign affairs -- always at least a half hour late. You remember Guy Faure, who was minister of education. After 20 minutes he gave instructions that when the ambassador of the United States arrives tell him I'm busy. One day the ambassador calls into his office the PAO and me along with the information officer and press attaché. He said, "I'd like to know how you people feel I'm doing my job. Is there anything I'm not doing well?" The PAO said, "Well, Mr. Ambassador, if you say so, yes. One of the things that is rather objectionable from the French point of view is the fact that you arrive so late for your appointments. Why?" "I used to campaign with my brother-in-law, Bob Kennedy, and we arrived at campaign meetings an hour late and nobody minded." That's the comparison he made.

One day at a staff meeting the PAO was not there so I was attending the country team meeting, which is all the counselors plus the press attaché. The press attaché was Bill Payeff, who has a marvelous sense of humor, sort of a Buster Keaton sense of humor. With a straight face he will say something and you're never quite sure whether he's joking or serious. Well, this was a few months before George Washington's birthday and the ambassador wanted to do something special. One of the ideas that was very good -- he had good contacts -- he was going to bring memorabilia from museums in the U.S. and exhibit them in the embassy chancery lobby and some of them in the residence. The other thing he said he was going to do for two or three days leading up to George Washington's birthday was to dress up the Marines in period costumes. (Laughter) There was a big silence. And then Bill Payeff, again with a straight face, said, "Well, that's fine Mr. Ambassador, but where are you going to get the men?" "What do you mean, where am I going to get the men?" "Well, all the men you'll need to hold down the Marines while you dress them up in those silly costumes!" Well, we laughed. The ambassador didn't think it was funny at all. But he didn't dress the Marines in the costumes.

Another story. The ambassador was a great tennis fan and he had a very good idea. The U.S. Davis Cup team was going to play in England. He was going to bring them to France and have them tour several cities in France and play exhibition matches and have clinics and end up in Paris. That was a fine idea. So at a residence party, where the Prefect of Paris, sort of like the governor of Paris -- a very distinguished old gentleman with a great sense of humor -- was present... Shriver thought he spoke French and insisted on speaking French even to the French Foreign Minister, Couve de Murville, who was absolutely bilingual in English. He spoke good social French, but he didn't really speak French. I see the ambassador with the Prefect and him waving to me. I go over. He said, "Val, I need your help. I was telling M. le Prefet about my tennis plan and about the fact that these tennis stars would end up in Paris. And I thought we should have an exhibition match on the Place de la Concorde. (Laughter) We could paint the tennis court on the Place de la Concorde."

I turned to the Prefect and said, "The ambassador says that he would like to have this exhibition match on the Place de la Concorde." The Prefect laughed and said, "Oh, your ambassador has a great sense of humor." Shriver asked, "What did he say?" I said, "He said you have a great sense of humor, Mr. Ambassador." "What does he mean? I'm serious. Tell him I'm serious." "L'Ambassadeur est sérieux, M. le Prefet." "Then will you explain to the ambassador, please, that there are certain problems to that. Number one, the Place de la Concorde is a historic monument, respected as such. One does not paint tennis courts or anything there. Number two, it is one of the busiest traffic centers because there are avenues coming from all over. It would create a massive traffic jam everywhere. And number three, it can't be done." "Mr. Ambassador," he said, "it can't be done for these reasons." "Oh, I see. Well then we could do it on the Place du l'Hotel de Ville." (Where the municipal building is.) So the Prefect says, "Will you tell the ambassador that for the same reasons -- it is also a historic monument and traffic also would be a problem." But then he winks at me and say, "Tell the ambassador that I offer him the Place des Vosges." The Place des Vosges is a jewel, but it's fenced with a garden -- trees, flowers in the middle -- beautiful. You can't do anything there, you'd have to cut down all the trees. So the ambassador said, "You thank the Prefect. That's fine. Val, tomorrow we go." I say, "All right, Mr. Ambassador, we'll go." So we drive out to the Place des Vosges. He gets out and says, "That son of a bitch! He was pulling my leg, wasn't he Val?" I said, "Yes, Mr. Ambassador, he was." (Laughter) These were some of Sargent Shriver's ideas.

One of the sadder ones is that at another staff meeting -- again I was acting PAO...it was June, right after his brother-in-law, Bobby Kennedy, had been assassinated -- we discussed the Fourth of July reception. The ambassador said, "Eunice and I are going to do it differently this year. There's a very good rock band of young students, and we're going to have a rock band. Everybody can dance and it'll be totally informal. We'll take out all this old, dusty furniture and it'll be something like Paris has never seen." Well, all the counselors looked at each other. I'm public relations, public affairs. I said, "Mr. Ambassador, I am afraid that the French would not understand the American ambassador giving a rock dancing party less than a month after his brother-in-law had been assassinated." He said, "Well, the show must go on." I said, "Yes, but also, Mr. Ambassador, the people who get invited to Fourth of July receptions are generally not great fans of rock and roll. They're the foreign minister, the minister of economy, the minister of education, members of parliament, members of the Senate, foreign ambassadors." "Well, does anybody else agree with Val?" They finally spoke up. The economic counselor said, "Yes, Mr. Ambassador, I think it would be misinterpreted." So we had the usual Fourth of July reception. That was Sargent Shriver.

Well, I left after three years. The last year in Paris was when the Vietnam peace talks started. A good friend of mine, Bill Jorden, was sent by the president to be the official spokesman. We had daily press briefings, but we were only indirectly involved in this operation; we were supportive. There were lots of journalists from all over. There must have been about a thousand or fifteen hundred newsmen covering those peace talks. So it was an exciting time in many ways, but as deputy PAO I did feel a little frustrated because I was more of an administrator than I was a participant, and my cup of tea is to be right in there.

But we did have a visitor. We had President Nixon's first foreign visit in my last year there. That was quite an experience because the advance party was composed of people like Ehrlichman and his assistant Edward Morgan and we didn't know who they were. They were obnoxious, and totally inexperienced. I had been involved with three previous foreign presidential visits, but they thought they knew it all. The visit came off all right because USIS is professional. It was a great success.

So, we're back in Paris, July 1969, winding up in Paris, and getting ready to return -- this time by boat. It was the last trip that the SS United States made. After that it went out of business. It was a great trip. Well, not really. Alice was depressed because she didn't want to leave Paris. John, my older boy, had begun to go steady with a lovely girl. The younger one, Dan, played the guitar with friends in cafes. So they were sad. I was dancing, going around the ship playing ping pong, and these people all had long faces, my family.

PERRY W. LINDER
General Services Officer
Paris (1967-1968)

Perry W. Linder was born in California in 1931. After receiving his bachelor's degree from San Jose State College in 1952, he served in the United States Army from 1952-1955. His career has included positions in Hamburg, Kingston, Tegucigalpa, Paris, Contonou/Dahomey, Brussels, Amman, Athens, and Madrid. Mr. Linder was interviewed by Raymond Ewing in December 1996.

Q: And what was your next assignment?

LINDER: I was assigned to Paris, I mean, having been in Personnel and with the influence that one gains in Personnel, I had managed to set myself up for Paris. But along came BALPA, I don't remember what it stood for...

Q: Well, I think it...

LINDER: It was a reduction in force.

Q: Balance of Payments something-or-other, to reduce the cost of operating abroad.

LINDER: So anyway, the position that I was to go to in Paris had been abolished. And because I was in French language training, they decided to send me to Dahomey, now known as Benin, as Administrative Officer. And you know, in retrospect, it was a good change. I know I learned a lot more being Administrative Officer and got more satisfaction out of it, and I think progressed faster than I would have if I'd gone as a GSO to Paris.

FREDERICK G. MASON
Deputy Information Officer, USIS
Paris (1967-1969)

Frederick Mason was born in Waterbury, Connecticut in 1926. He graduated from Yale after serving in the Army during World War II. Since joining the Foreign Service, his career has included positions in France, Vietnam, Morocco, Madagascar and Italy. Mr. Mason was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2002.

Q: You came into USIA in when?

MASON: Laterally, on the 12th of March 1967, which was the date of our departure from the Camp des Loges and the end of our military presence in France.

Q: We are now in 1967, you have joined USIA. Your first tour was where?

MASON: In Paris. Paris was where I'd been living anyway for four years in two or three different jobs. So, when the military moved out in March of 1967, I was ready to go right down to the embassy and the job of Deputy Information Officer as a Class V officer in the Limited Reserve. USIA at that time didn't offer either career Foreign Service status or Civil Service status, and so we were attaches only. I had sacrificed, in a sense, my civil service status to do this because, I thought, I was at last getting into the Foreign Service and felt my experience and age qualified me.

USIS was in the Rothschild building on the rue du Faubourg St. Honoré at the time. It is now the ambassador's residence. Howard Simpson stayed for another three months and was replaced by Max Kraus, and we moved into the Hotel Talleyrand, on rue St. Florentin and rue de Rivoli, on the corner opposite the main embassy building. I was there for two years. It was hectic, but it was interesting work. A lot of donkey work, dragging people around - visitors and such. I was frequently called on for that sort of thing, but I was also assigned as the Vietnam Information Officer, never having been to Vietnam, never even having had an orientation at USIA. Apparently, you were expected to know or find out everything about your assignment with no guidance from above. My career had started off in Verdun as a supervisory training officer and we went through many texts and examples of what to do and what not to do to be a good supervisor, how to train and prepare your employees, and I felt that USIA was not doing that. I never did have an assignment at USIA in Washington, until my very last one, 17 years later. Throughout my career with USIA in fact, I know that I was not being adequately prepared for each assignment. That's the first criticism I would have of it.

But I enjoyed seeing the big operators from Washington come through Paris. I took Averell Harriman through the Talleyrand because this had been his headquarters when he headed the Marshall Plan, ICA. His office was a huge ornate corner room occupied at that time by Lee Brady, our Public Affairs Officer (And I'm told it is now sealed off and empty as being too risky in case of an attack. Too bad.). He recorded a talk there for the Voice of America. President Nixon came through in his first visit overseas after his inauguration at the end of February 1969. I was one of the interpreters at the formal dinner at the Elysées Palace, and I was assigned to Mr. Kissinger. I sat behind him and the wife of a French Senator, and listened to the chit chat, which did not interest Mr. Kissinger. But it was an experience to be there at the table and hear General de Gaulle welcome President Nixon and have Nixon get up and give what was really a very, very fine speech. "We come to sit at your feet and learn," was the gist of it, which is not what de Gaulle had been getting from the Johnson Administration, and this, of course, pleased the French no end.

Behind him was General Walters, the Defense Attache, who was his interpreter. General Walters did not take notes. He would wait until an entire paragraph was completed before he would repeat the whole thing perfectly in French, to my great admiration. I worked with General Walters, in the sense that if I got queries from press people about Vietnam, I would send them to him or see what the army attaché or naval attaché or the people in their office could do to help them and brief them. So I was in there trying to defend American policy, which I didn't entirely agree with, but I did the best I could, without even the experience of having been in Vietnam.

Once the Sorbonne organized a debate outside Paris on the subject of Vietnam. The speakers included Olivier Todd, a left wing journalist in France, very much in the news himself and much liked by the students just before the 1968 student uprising at the Sorbonne in May of 1968.

It was just after the Tet Offensive and I was defending American policy and the truth was that we had won the battle militarily but lost it politically. I still maintain that in winning it we wiped out the Vietcong but left the North Vietnamese to fill the vacuum. They were coming down the Ho Chi Minh Trail, and I still wonder if we couldn't have arrived at a negotiated solution with the Vietcong, who were Southerners themselves and as much anti-Northerner as the pro-American Thieu Government. Anyway, that is water over the dam. Back and forth this argument went and tough questions were asked. I don't know how well I did, but one student did come up to me afterwards and say, "You know, sir, back at the Sorbonne, there are quite a few of us who agree with you. But we don't dare say so." So much for freedom of speech at the Sorbonne. Anyway, this is the sort of thing I was thrown into without any experience, training, or orientation.

I did have a background in intelligence, where of course you don't talk about anything outside the office. In the local affairs with the mayors of the Paris arrondissements and of the surrounding communities, it was entirely cultural. It was not a political information program. I learned a great deal from this. Our ambassador was Chip Bohlen for the first year, and then Sargent Shriver. Bohlen was the perfect professional and Shriver was the political innovator who did unconventional things. I remember taking Eunice Shriver to visit a school for handicapped children, since this was one of her main interests, and I interpreted for her there. These were not substantive jobs, in that - well, I did interview journalists who knew a great deal about Vietnam and I reported on what they had said, which got up through channels into various parts of the embassy. So I learned a great deal, especially about Vietnam, before I went there.

Q: I would like though, Ted, if we could go back to Paris. What happened, were you involved in the student protest, the disappearance of De Gaulle? Sort of wondering what was going to happen...

MASON: Yes, we were covering it from day to day. I remember when he went to Germany to Baden-Baden to talk with Massu. We thought, "Uh-oh, this could end with the French army moving in and taking over." At the same time the students had taken over the Sorbonne building and the Odéon Theater. In fact, I went to one of their get-togethers at the Odéon. It was conducted in a heady atmosphere, with each student romantically imagining himself on the Barricades during a new French Revolution. They were all screaming at cross purposes, as if there had never been any free speech in France before. One was saying "Let's try the Yugoslav way of doing things,” and another said, “Let’s try something else!” It was what you would expect from students. I remember how de Gaulle waited, very cleverly and very wisely waited them out and finally moved in at three in the morning in various places and took over their strongholds with a minimum of bloodshed. By that time the students had run out of steam. But before then when they were first tearing things apart, they tore down the superstructure of the metro openings, you know, in the Quartier Latin. I remember that I was duty officer that weekend and again, Mrs. Shriver wanted to see it and show it to her kids. I took them around and showed them the damage. With my wife, I had been out there and seen what they were doing from a safe distance. The police were very restrained, there was no breaking of heads. There was no Kent State. And it worked, it really did. Now, Cohn-Bendit is actually back in there as a member of the European parliament.

Q: Known as “Rudy the Red” at one time.

MASON: Yes. He can’t decide whether he has French or German nationality.

Q: He’s from Alsace perhaps.

MASON: No, I think he is from Germany proper, but his family came to France as refugees in the 1930s. He’s in the Green Movement now and before the French elections, a year or two ago, he was seen quite often on television and has become quite respectable. No, all of this was something I followed with great interest because I had been covering French politics as an intelligence analyst for years, you see, and all the colonial troubles.

Q: Was there real apprehension that the French army might move in and if they did what might this mean?

MASON: I think there was. There was a feeling of suspense, but I don’t know if it was more so than the feeling in April 1961 when the French Colonels, Salan, Jouhaux, Zeller, and Challe in Algiers set up their little regime. There people were afraid of paratroopers landing south of Paris. That was very touch and go. But it didn’t happen, again because de Gaulle was able to rally the contingent, that is to say the draftees in the French army, who would have resisted an order from those colonels to move. I think those two events were of somewhat equal importance. And in between them, of course, there were how many assassination attempts against de Gaulle personally? There was Petit Clamart, and there was the one on the way to Colombey les-Deux-Eglises, and another one down in Toulon and so on. Those were exciting days in Paris, and in both cases I believe direct intervention by the Army would have led to a blood bath and tarnished de Gaulle’s reputation. As it was, having extricated France from the Algerian morass, it was a great humiliation for him now to see his work turned against him by students who had not been out of their cribs in the late 1950s and early 1960s. I guess he felt he was on the way out. The question that I always asked was why he dispensed with the services of Pompidou as prime minister just at that time and brought in Couve de Murville. Was it to let Pompidou keep his hands clean so that he could succeed de Gaulle more easily? Because the elections took place in the June of 1969, and de Gaulle didn’t run. He moved back into retirement and Pompidou won. And that is just when I left. So I concluded my service in France with the departure of the General.

At the end of two years in June of 1969 I was brought back to Washington and to the Vietnam Training Center at Arlington Towers, where I attended lectures that lasted two or three months. We had top flight speakers like Herman Kahn of the Hudson Institute, and experts like Chester Bain, who wrote a book on Vietnam. These were some of the people who helped us to flesh the subject out very thoroughly. So I can't say that I wasn't prepared to go to Vietnam and I appreciated that. I asked to be in the press office because of my French, thinking I could deal with the French press better than some of the others. But no, I was assigned as Reports Officer of JUSPAO (Joint U.S. Public Affairs Office). JUSPAO was in the Rex building downtown. I arrived the first of October of 1969 in Saigon.

ROBERT B. OAKLEY
Paris (1967-1969)

Ambassador Robert B. Oakley was born in 1931 in Texas. He graduated from Princeton University in 1952 and served in the US Navy until 1955. Oakley joined the Foreign Service in 1957 and served overseas in Sudan, the Ivory Coast, Vietnam, France, Lebanon, and as Ambassador to Zaire, Somalia and Pakistan. In Washington DC, Oakley served in the Office of UN Political Affairs, the Bureau of East Asian Affairs, as the Coordinator for Counter-Terrorism and for the National Security Council. Oakley was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kenney and Thomas Stern in 1992.

Q: Your next assignment was to Paris. Was that an assignment that you sought?

OAKLEY: Paris was not a post that I had requested. I guess it came as a reward for my tour in Saigon.

My job in Paris was in the Political section of the Embassy, reporting on African and Middle East affairs. I had some experience in Africa and some interest in the Middle East; in fact this became my first working relationship with Middle East issues - a subject that I would follow for much of my career. Chip Bohlen was my first Ambassador; he was followed by Sarge Shriver. The first was the most senior career officer; the second an extraordinary political personage. The same thing happen to me again after Paris when I served with the U.S. Mission to the UN where my first ambassador was Charlie Yost who was followed by George Bush. The chance to work for such special people was personally a very enriching experience. My first DCM in Paris was Chris Chapman who was followed by Bob Blake. The Political Counselors were Dick Funkhouser and Bob Anderson.

Let me make a few comments about the stylistic differences between Bohlen and Shriver. The first was an obvious super-diplomat; he was unparalleled in his ability to work with de Gaulle - to the degree that any U.S. official could work with the General. But he handled his ambassadorial duties in the formal way that he had learned in his career. On the other hand, Shriver was just superb in his P.R. efforts. I just recently talked to Shriver; he told me that Bohlen had predicted that there was little he could accomplish in Paris. I told him that had he come a year earlier, that probably would have been true. He arrived just at the time that France was beginning to open up, thanks to the quasi-revolution of 1968, after which France's relations with the rest of the world changed dramatically for a time. The French began to look outwards and finally forced de Gaulle out of office. He knew that it was time for him to leave the reins to others. Shriver had a unique style; he went to the Left Bank to observe the anti-de Gaulle student riots - before he had even presented his credentials. It was that uprising that forced a change in French attitudes and in fact was the beginning of de Gaulle's demise and, as I told Shriver, it opened the door for an American ambassador to play a more important role in France. He agreed with that assessment.

In fact, Shriver acted as if he were the U.S. ambassador to a third world country. He went down into the pits with the coal miners; he visited the vineyards to talk to the growers; he would talk to the shop-keepers. He had many of the ordinary French people to Thanksgiving dinner. The Embassy was a real live place during Shriver's tour. Shriver set up a "youth committee" to sort of parallel the Embassy's structure. Ted McNamara, Frances Cook and I were part of this "youth" movement. On one occasion, during the transformation of French attitudes and in the middle of the student-inspired strikes and agitation, he had the President of Yale - Kingman Brewster - who was visiting, as the guest of honor at one of his typical soirees. The custom was that the guests would mingle briefly before dinner, eat the repast and then have a long, long discussion about issues of interest to his guests. For this particular dinner, he had also invited the Minister of Education, the President of the Sorbonne University as well as some of the radical professors and representatives of the student movement. It was a very lively evening, I can assure you! These kinds of events occurred frequently; on occasion, he would have as many as four events at the Residence in one day - a breakfast, a lunch, a tea, and a dinner - all very lively. On another occasion, he got Wilbur Cohen, the Secretary of HEW, to come to Paris for one of these dinner sessions. Shriver would monitor the movements of all leading Americans; if they were in Europe, he would insist that they come to Paris where he would put them to work, allowing the French to express their views to our leaders and vice-versa.

For one Thanksgiving dinner, he invited movie stars, sports stars, coal miners, farmers, shop keepers - a real mixture of French society as well as the bourgeoisie such as the Rothschilds. Shriver had an extraordinary effervescence that somehow enabled him to bring together disparate elements of French society for lively, but civil, discourse. Of course, his style created an extra workload for us in the Embassy staff, but it was fun and we did not resent it. It was also an extra workload for Phyllis and some of the other wives; she was not a member of the Foreign Service at that time; nevertheless she became part of the Shriver entourage and she enjoyed the experience.

On the other hand; Sarge had some weaknesses. He was not a skilled diplomat; he insisted on speaking French which was atrocious. After the first time he had a meeting alone with the Foreign Minister, we got an anguished call from the Quai - the Foreign Ministry. John Dean - he was handling Far Eastern affairs in the Embassy - and I rushed over. We were told that it appeared that we had changed our entire foreign policy on Vietnam, Biafra and the Middle East. So we sat down with our French counterparts and reviewed the conversation that Shriver had with the Foreign Minister. The review obviously called for major revisions in the “memorandum of conversation” which the French note-taker had drafted. That established a pattern; after each of his conversations with the Foreign Minister, we would sit down with our French counterparts and clear up any misunderstandings that Shriver may have left behind because of his unfamiliarity with the French language. As far as I know, he never knew what we had done!

Shriver was much more accessible than Bohlen was. His door was always wide open - to anyone. He just had a different style and was helped immensely by the change in French attitudes. I remember the Foreign Service inspectors coming to Paris when Bob Blake was the DCM and saying: “Isn't it bad enough to have an 'unusual' ambassador; is it necessary to have an 'unusual' DCM as well?” Blake had a personality similar to Shriver's; he was an extrovert, glad-handing his way through crowds; not terribly well organized but very smart. They were a real combination!

Bob Anderson, who was my boss for a while, had a lot of French friends. He let his officers do pretty much what they wanted; I could set my own priorities and reporting targets. That was a problem for me because I had to set my own priorities. With all the issues that were pending in the Middle East and Africa, I had to be quite selective; I could not possibly give full coverage to all. I was in contact with the Quai all the time, with other embassies, with the staff of the Ministry of Cooperation. One of our very good friends was the Chef de Cabinet to Foccart; he was a very important source because it was Foccart who in effect ran France's African policy. He was a young man who attended my first meeting with Foccart and thereafter our families became very close. This fellow was very open with me. One day, he called me and told me that Foccart was sending the Minister of Cooperation to Brazzaville. That puzzled me, but then I was told that the French government did not like the way things were going in the Congo. They were concerned that the government was too close to the communists. About six weeks after the Minister's visit, there was a coup in the Congo which brought in a new government. A few days later, my friend called to let me know that Foccart was sending the Minister for Cooperation to Bamako, Mali. I asked: “Just like he did to Brazzaville?” I was told that the French regarded the Mali situation as even worse than the Congo had been. In this case, it took only three weeks after the visit for the Mali government to be overthrown.

Sometime later, I asked my French friend about Bokassa, the horrible Prime Minister of the Central African Republic. I noted that I thought that Bokassa was a real threat and a terrible leader. I was then told that if we could find someone better in the CAR, the French would be glad to review the situation; they had not been able to find a better leader. I think these events and conversations were quite revealing about French African policies. They could and did manipulate the leadership in their former colonies.

I had a similar experience with the chief of the Middle East division in the Quai. Right after his inauguration in 1969, Nixon made his first Presidential trip to Europe. He came to Paris. The Quai official had not been very communicative, but when the visit was announced he came to me, under instructions, and said: “We are now going to try to work with the U.S. in the Middle East because we also are very concerned about Soviet penetration of the area”. So he gave me a complete run down on the briefing paper that the Quai had sent to de Gaulle for his discussions with Nixon. I was made privy to all of the details of French views and policies. I was able to get that information to Kissinger and Nixon's staff before their arrival in Paris. They were very interested and that French initiative led to four-power talks - U.S., France, Great Britain and the USSR - that were subsequently convened on the Middle East. It was a fascinating process because the French shifted their policy 180 degrees; instead of working against us, as they had been, they decided to try and work with us. They had come to the conclusion that the situation in the Middle East had so deteriorated by 1969 that cooperation was by far the better policy. They hoped that Nixon would be a willing partner and in fact, for a while, we did work together on Middle East issues. The four power talks did get started in Paris; I think Dick Funkhouser was our principal representative, but I went with him to all the meetings. His counterparts in the other three embassies were their countries' spokesmen. We were trying to foster and support the UN sponsored efforts led by Ambassador Jarring which were supposed to lead to a peaceful resolution of the complicated Middle East issues. There were parallel talks being held in New York, but that was no problem; the coordination was very good and we never got our signals mixed up. Our Paris group worked on some details. Paris was agreed upon as the location for the talks because the French had been the originators of the idea of four power talks. It was a de Gaulle initiative. Eventually, the talks collapsed because we and the French just had great difficulties working together on anything, particularly something as sensitive as the Middle East. Kissinger's approach, as the NSC Advisor, was to work quite independently of the bureaucracy. Eventually, the talks collapsed; I won't say they were deliberately sabotaged by us, but the NSC did not give it much support. Furthermore, the Israelis did not like the formula very much; they were left out of the talks.

At the beginning, I thought that those talks might actually produce some positive actions and coordinated policies. I did not find that the French and the USSR sided against us and the British, as was expected by some; I would say that in a majority of the questions, the French sided with their western allies. That gave me some hopes that the four power talks could have some successes. But like the Rogers' plan and other State Department initiatives, the four power talks in the final analysis went nowhere. Of course, in early 1969, none of us knew much if anything about Kissinger and his modus operandi. But we learned! One day, my friend at the Quai asked me to come over and he let me see a reporting telegram from the French Ambassador in Washington concerning a conversation he had had with Kissinger. After reading it, I wrote an "Official-Informal" letter to Joe Sisco then the Assistant Secretary for NEA, reporting what I had read. He was very grateful for that information because he said that this was the first time he had really found out what the details of Kissinger's Middle East policy were.

I mentioned Nixon's visit. I was involved to some degree with the arrangements. The President made a point of meeting with non-governmental officials - union leaders, youth leaders, political opposition. He tossed all these disparate elements together which was a good approach. In Paris, he just listened for about two hours, trying to get a sense of what the French "public" thought was going on. I found it a fascinating session and an interesting approach to getting a "feel for the country." I arranged that meeting. But I also remember from that trip how difficult Ehrlichman and Haldeman were. They advanced the President's visit. They demanded an extraordinary amount of detailed planning, making the visit seem more like a movie script than a spontaneous visit. We would have to chart the room that the President was going to enter and then describe - step by step - exactly how he would proceed to his seat. We would go over every inch of the event time and time again; it was an agonizing experience for the Embassy. Everyone charged with responsibility for a particular event had to draw these elaborate and very detailed plans.

I think in general my personal relationships with the French was quite good. As I said, after a while, several of the officials became quite open with me and we became good friends with a number of them. It made for very good collaboration. It takes the French a little while to extend trust to a foreigner, but once having done so, I found them quite easy to work with. I think we worked well together on Middle East and African matters. The existence of jobs in the Embassy concerned with regional affairs was very useful, particularly in the areas that I covered where France played a leading role. In many African countries they had the predominant role; in others they had important roles. It was in our interest to have officers stationed in Paris concerned with African, Middle East and Far Eastern affairs; the U.S. learned a lot about what was going on in those areas from the French - not only about what was going on, but also about what the French were going to do. Furthermore, African chiefs of state were coming to and going from Paris constantly; after I had become acquainted with their embassies, I also had an opportunity to meet with chiefs of state. That gave us one more point of contact with important African persons - of course, in the late 1960s and early 1970s, we did care about Africa!

During my tour in Paris, the French were playing also a significant role in the Middle East and that made our liaison job in the Embassy a significant link in the process. Now the French have largely withdrawn from the Middle East, more or less, but at the time we are discussing, they were a significant player. I think our regional jobs were important not only because of France's roles in the areas, but also because it gave us an additional avenue for access to regional leaders who would visit Paris - that was true for African leaders, as I have mentioned, and Middle East leaders as well. It gave us another source of information of their perspectives on what was going on in their countries and regions. Since I also maintained contacts with the representatives of the African and Middle East countries in Paris, that was an additional source of information for us. Their ambassadors were considered among their top officials because France was an important country and the African and Middle East states used to send the best talent to represent them in France. These were very useful avenues for information collection and the expression of U.S. views on various issues. Since the U.S. had multiple channels to these leaders, there was always the theoretical risk of "mixed messages", but I never encountered such a situation. My main problem was essentially time; I didn't know what priority Washington gave to all of my contacts and work-load; I had to set my own priorities. I had more to do than I had time.

I earlier mentioned the student uprisings. I also mentioned that I had the "youth" portfolio in the Embassy; i.e. I was supposed to cover the comings and goings of the French younger generation. The student rebellion started in a courtyard of the Sorbonne University when two groups of students began to fight each other. The riot police then entered the University grounds trying to bring calm. Thereupon, all of the students turned on the police. That began to spill out of the University grounds unto the surrounding streets. More police came; more students came. That melee was joined by union rank and file members who joined the students. That brought police reinforcements from outside of Paris. The confrontation continued to escalate over a period of days. At one stage, de Gaulle left the country to meet with his generals in Germany; he was totally confused and didn't know what actions to take. When he returned, he found a situation totally out of control. I and others in the Embassy used to go to the Left Bank to observe the action with our own eyes. Much of my information on events came from my friend in Foccart's office; he kept me abreast of developments. Foccart soon brought his friends together - most of them having been veterans of de Gaulle's resistance forces. They organized counter moves, led by Foccart and the Minister of the Interior. After about three weeks of total chaos, they marshaled their forces for a big march down the Champs-Élysées. This turned the tide.

It was interesting to us in the Embassy to watch this rebellion spread - from the Sorbonne to Paris to other French cities and then nation-wide strikes. Union leaders were opposed to the participation of their members in the general strike. It was not like the general strike of a couple of months' ago which was led by union leaders; in 1968, it was the membership that led the general strike. They held huge parades, led by standard bearers waiving huge red and black flags. Interestingly enough, the Communist Party leadership also did not support the strikes, but it was forced into support by its rank and file members. The union membership was in essence showing its dismay with ten years of authoritarian de Gaulle rule. They decided to act like "Frenchmen" and stand up for their own rights. So they did!

The change of direction in the Communist Party leadership was crucial to the outcome of the uprising. When that leadership decided to throw its lot with the rebels, it scared the hell out of the middle and upper French classes. The Communist made the uprising appear as its own; that allowed the government to capitalize on the fears of the majority of the French people.

From my point of view - i.e. as the "Youth" officer of the Embassy - , I found it most interesting to watch every major French professional sector - lawyers, doctors, professors, architects, etc - going through a similar process: the young professionals were in revolt against the leadership provided by the older generation. They viewed that leadership as authoritarian and rigid; they viewed the "professional" system as antediluvian - since its origins really stemmed back to the time of the French monarchy. So the revolution was not only in the streets, but throughout French society. All of the foundations of society were shaken; the younger generation was not willing to abide by the authoritarian regime that had been imposed on it by their elders - with de Gaulle being only a symbol of what in fact was a prevailing authoritarian process in all French institutions. The students, with whom we talked, expressed their hope that the American educational system could be exported to France. As always, these uprising had internal contradictions; on the one hand, we and the Soviets were being vilified because in the streets we were perceived as France's principal foreign "enemies"; on the other hand, the students wished for an educational system modeled after ours. Shriver played that for all it was worth; he was always ready to talk to the students about U.S. society and culture. He drew on his experiences in the Peace Corps; he reached out to the French youth and was a real asset for the U.S. image. The riots made no difference to Shriver's approach of trying to get American leadership together with French citizens; he just reveled in his efforts to bring the two communities together, whether through social events or just exchanges on the streets.

Another interesting aspect of the rebellion was the reaction of some of the senior French leaders, like Cabinet members. Although it was their generation and their institutions that were under attack, some of them were quite proud of their children who were rioting in the streets, building barricades and throwing bricks at the cops. They took great pride in their children who were behaving in the "typical" French manner - as history tells us. They thought it was wonderful! My friend in Foccart's office told me that the Prime Minister was making a big mistake when he decided to crack down on the students, including not permitting some of the leaders back into the country. My friend's advice to Foccart was to keep repressive measures to a minimum, in part because he felt that the Prime Minister's tactics were leading to further deterioration of the situation, not an improvement. But his advice was ignored.

The Embassy did not take any special security precautions because the students and the workers were not targeting the Embassy. Of course, life was hardly normal; there was no gasoline, trains were not running, mail was not being delivered, no schools were open; very little of customary life remained the same. Phyllis finally said: "I think the strike will be broken soon because the women are becoming increasingly unhappy. They are shut in their apartments with the children. The men are having a great time occupying the factories; the women are going to start very soon taking the kids to the factories and dumping them on their husbands. That will bring the strike to a halt!" In fact, I think these domestic tensions did help end the strike. At the beginning of the revolution and for the following two weeks, people were very excited; they could join their friends in the streets and vent their frustrations without consequences. I have never seen a population so elated and on a "high". There was real comradeship; people were picking up hitchhikers, people were talking to each other - a real feeling of community, such as one might see in Washington in a snowstorm in one of our neighborhoods. It was very un-French - they usually do not speak to strangers or join in communal activities. But after that initial feeling of freedom, the consequences of service stoppages began to fray people's nerves. They began to wonder where and when it would all end. In light of recent events here in Washington, one can say that the French close their governments from below, we from above.

Let me expand a little on my role as the Embassy's "Youth" officer. Sarge asked in essence that a "Youth Committee" be established which would reach out to the younger Frenchmen - young Parliamentary deputies, student leaders, the young French leaders in all walks of life. At one time, he organized a tour of the U.S. for twelve of them, with transportation paid by some of his American friends - not the government. Fritz Stern came to Paris to pick up the crew and take them to and through the U.S.. The group consisted primarily of young professors and younger government officials who espoused anti-U.S. views, although they knew very little about us. We picked them very carefully. These were people who during the revolt had played key roles. Once this group got to the U.S., USIA picked them up and developed a program for them. The general concept was to expose these younger leaders to the U.S. so that they could talk somewhat more authoritatively about the U.S.. After they returned,, they were included in the soirees at the Residence as were many other younger French leaders. We would also include them in events in our apartments. Frances Cook and Ted McNamara, who were members of our "Youth Committee" were very active. I think I chaired the group, but it was an effort that depended on the work of all of us. Some of our more senior colleagues called it the "counter-embassy" because we used to cut across the standard lines of authority - sometime bypassing the Political and Economic Counselors. We used to quote the Ambassador as our authority which I am sure didn't make the seniors feel any better.

We met with the students continually in informal "bull" sessions. We were all about the same age. I don't believe I ever gave a formal speech, but we were in contact with those students all the time. It was great fun - for all of us, I believe. It was good for our morale; it added excitement to our work, even though it was in addition to our regular duties, which as I mentioned earlier, in my case certainly, was already more than I could handle. Unfortunately, I had left by the time the twelve younger leaders returned from their tour of the U.S., but I am sure that my Embassy colleagues stayed in touch with them.

I use this example of the younger leaders' travel to the U.S. as an illustration of Shriver's modus operandi. I thought it was marvelous. Had he been in France before the 1968 uprising, his approach would not have worked. At one time, we managed to get a hold of a report written by one of the provincial prefects to the Minister of Interior asking for guidance on how to handle the American Ambassador on his visits. He said that, if it were not the American Ambassador, he would have arrested him for subversive activities! The French were mystified by this very unconventional American envoy; neither they or the Embassy had ever worked with or for such an ambassador. I think the Shriver approach - which was replicated by others in other countries - was a real worthwhile effort. I wished it could have continued. It was atypical, but very effective. It was not the customary "stuffed shirt" approach that the Department, ambassadors and embassy staffs usually take. It requires an unusual leader who will infuse "his troops" with his or her enthusiasm for the unconventional. I thought Sarge's performance in Paris was exceptional and well worthwhile. He had the right perception of what moves a country.

I had some knowledge of the Vietnam talks that were being conducted in Paris while I was there because many of my Saigon friends participated in them. Holbrooke was there, Negroponte was there, Habib was there. We had all worked together in Saigon. I did not know about Kissinger's involvement in these talks. At my farewell party, Habib confessed that while Phyllis and I were on leave on the Riviera and he was using our apartment, he conducted the first secret talks with the North Vietnamese there. John Negroponte was both the interpreter and the food caterer - he had to get it so that the negotiators could eat in our apartment - so that the meetings might be less exposed to public observance. That explained some of the residue that we found when we returned from the Riviera which had been a mystery to us; we didn't know where all the left-overs had come from. So at my farewell - which took place six months after those negotiations had been held in our apartment - Phil explained what had happened. Of course, we knew that Harriman was in town and we knew that some discussions with the North Vietnamese were being held. The fact that negotiations had begun was also helpful to the Embassy because it improved the atmosphere in Paris for the conduct of U.S.-French bilateral issues. Just the fact that we were talking to the Vietnamese removed a French psychological block in the way they looked at the U.S.. I think they were pleased that we were talking to the Vietnamese and doing so in Paris. I think the initiation of these talks helped change the French attitude toward the U.S.; they viewed us thereafter in an entirely different light.

The change in French leadership - from de Gaulle to Pompidou - did not make that much of a difference because both men had basically the same view; their styles were different, but not their objectives or policies. Pompidou was elected because the French revolted against de Gaulle's authoritarianism, but I don't believe that basic French policy changed much because of the change of presidents. I was there when the change took place, but I think the new French attitude towards the U.S. preceded the change in presidents. Before the actual occurrence, I think that most people understood that de Gaulle was finished; his views were no longer dominant after the revolution of May 1968. I think that even de Gaulle knew that his days were numbered.

He expected the referendum to be a vote on his style of government as did the people and they rejected it. It was an elegant way for de Gaulle to leave; I think he felt that he would lose the referendum, and when he did, it was a graceful and democratic way to leave the presidency. I heard that his staff was already packing their stuff in their offices even before the results of the referendum were announced. I suspect that de Gaulle was willing to give the referendum a chance, but I doubt that he had much confidence in winning support. He considered the French people ungrateful for his past services to his country, but I suspect that he was quite fatalistic at the end - "If they are not with me, what can I can do?"

As a summary of my tour in Paris, I think I should say that my first year was terribly dull. I was just working on Africa, not the Middle East. There was very little action. But then the Department for budgetary reasons had to cut back on staff. The separate Middle East position was abolished and I inherited that portfolio. Then the action began. Nixon was inaugurated in 1969 and that started a cooperative effort between us and the French on the Middle East, as I described earlier. Shriver didn't leave Paris until March, 1970. The riots started in May 1968. All of these events made the last years of my tour very lively. I had fun in Paris. So did the family.

JOHN H. ADAMS
Marseille (1967-1969)

John H. Adams was born in 1939 and entered the Foreign Service in 1966. His assignments included initial positions in France, Israel, Trinidad, and China (Hong Kong). Mr. Adams was interviewed by William D. Morgan in 1992.

Q: John, let's take you back a little now, in your career. You've given us a very good tour d'horizon, as we used to say in Marseille, of the visa function today. But let's step back a little bit in history and, not necessarily chronologically. Give us some of the high points of your overseas career, some of the things that turned you on and kept you interested in consular affairs.

ADAMS: That's a very good question, bill. I think that, having the experience of starting out as a vice consul in Marseille, where the consulate has responsibility for most of the south of France, is probably one of the more idyllic assignments in the foreign service. It was a relatively small post, so I was able to do a little of everything. I did non-immigrant visas but I also handled immigrant visas. I did American citizen services work all through the south of France, so it was a great experience and I thoroughly enjoyed it.

Q: You even took care of sailors, maybe?

ADAMS: Occasionally, but there weren't that many shipping and seamen problems, as I came to find even during my more recent assignment in Hong Kong. That really is very much passe in the life of a consular officer.

Q: With all those ships?

ADAMS: Sad to say, there are very few American merchant vessels now plying the world. I think that my first assignment certainly helped to reinforce my attraction to consular work, doing it in a place like Marseille where I performed a variety of jobs.

GEORGE M. BARBIS
Bordeaux (1967-1969)

Mr. Barbis was born in California and raised there and in Greece. He graduated from the University of California and served in the US Army in WWII. In 1954 he entered the Foreign Service and was posted to Teheran, Iran as Economic Officer. His other overseas assignments included postings in Thailand, Korea, France, Belgium and Greece, primarily in the Political and Economic fields. Mr. Barbis served on the US Delegation to the United Nations (1973-1975). His Washington assignments involved him in Southeast Asia matters and the US military. Mr. Barbis is a graduate of the National War College. Mr. Barbis was interviewed by Mr. Raymond C. Ewing in 1996.

Q: So, you went from Fort McNair, the National War College, to be principal officer of your own post for a second time. Where was that?

BARBIS: That was Bordeaux, France.

Q: Bordeaux, that sounds pretty nice.

BARBIS: That was a very cushy, if you will, post. A very pleasant post to be at. My introduction to Bordeaux was my call on Ambassador Chip Bohlen, who was then Ambassador to France, and we had a nice chat during which he gave me my marching orders. Unfortunately, he moved on and I didn't get to know him other than that one meeting. He certainly was one of the models in the Foreign Service over the years.

Q: Why don't you briefly describe what Bordeaux was like in terms of size and what your consular district was like? And, what were your marching orders from the Department and the ambassador?

BARBIS: Bordeaux, I believe, was the first consulate that our young republic established which gave it a very special standing in France. It was responsible, it is closed now, for all of the southwest of France with Bordeaux as the seat of the consulate and the other major center Toulouse which was inland, and extending all the way to the Pyrenees and the border with Spain. A lot of Americans resided there, either married to French spouses or who had just stayed on retiring there.

Bordeaux, of course, had passed its prime as a center of commerce and everything else. France is a very centralized country but what made it interesting for me was the Mayor of Bordeaux, and that is quite an institution in the French system of government, [who] was Chaban-Delmas. [He was] a World War II underground hero, the youngest brigadier in the resistance, I think, before he was even 30 years old, but [also] president of the National Assembly, which gave him a national role. I developed a good relationship with him, he knew who I was and I could see him when I wanted.

Q: He usually came on the weekends?

BARBIS: Like most French politicians, many of them are mayors of their home town and have to return every weekend like clock work to be with their constituents and keep that contact up. Chaban-Delmas, of course, being one of the leaders of the governing elite, spent an awful lot of time in Paris too, but he did not neglect his duties as mayor. He was a very popular mayor. He was mayor at the time that I left, two years later, and had just been appointed prime minister. I guess I can say, not that I predicted he would be prime minister, but I certainly had written reports that I didn't need to write because people in Paris knew what was going on in France as a whole, as well as we in the consulates.

I guess I should say that being in charge of a provincial post is both an interesting experience and a disappointing one because whenever you would go to the capital, to the embassy, people were very busy. They were involved with their own duties and responsibilities and although they were polite and friendly and hospitable, etc. you were an outsider. And, although the ambassadors from time to time would call all the consuls--at that time we had Bordeaux, Lyon, Marseille, Nice, and Strasbourg, five consulate Generals in France--for meetings with the ambassador and the country team, still you didn't feel as though you were really part of the team.

Q: You were not in the center, you were on the periphery.

BARBIS: Exactly. Because the center of our relationship was officially in the capital between the government, the cabinet, the parliament and the embassy. And, although I think we played or could play a useful role in giving a different perspective, etc., our main role, as I saw it, was to project a good image of America in that community. We arrived in France at a time when nationalism was at its height...de Gaulle had announced the year before that NATO would leave, and was pretty much gone by the time we got there in 1967...and there was a lot of anti-American feeling, but that always exists in France. It is in the French national character to be against things. At the same time there was a tremendous amount of goodwill, admiration, affection, partisanship for the United States. The University of Bordeaux had a sister relationship with the University of California, Berkeley, so we had University of California students doing their year abroad at Bordeaux and vice versa. So, the president of the University of California came to Bordeaux while I was consul general there to visit the University of Bordeaux. The Rector of Bordeaux University had a dinner for him. I was at a round table with the Rector's wife, as the hostess, and the president of the University of California. He had been, and I can't recall his name, controller of the Defense Department. The Bordeaux Rector was a man of an older generation remembering as a boy World War I. He paid tribute to the role of the United States during World War I and was very emotional about it. Tears were rolling down his cheeks. All of a sudden I panic and said, "My God, the president of the University of California hasn't a clue what he is saying.” It wasn’t being translated or interpreted and the president didn’t speak French. So, I quickly turned the menu over and started scribbling a summary of this very emotional tribute to America that he was saying, and passed it to the president, who was then able to respond in English. Some weeks later I got a letter from him on University of California stationery thanking me for saving the night by telling him how to respond. I mention this because there were many thousands and maybe even millions of Frenchmen who remembered not only World War II but World War I. Of course, all of that is leaving us. More and more Frenchmen don’t have any memory of our role in those two wars and what we did to help the French people to regain their independence.

Q: And they also don’t have the presence of an American consul in their city. The embassy is very busy, has many things to do and quite naturally pays most of their attention to the government in Paris, paying little attention to what is happening in the consular districts. So, we are losing that as well, that presence.

BARBIS: Some people argue that that presence isn’t important. But, having lived there and seen how people react to you, I think it did serve a useful purpose.

Q: Could we talk a little bit more about the reporting and other aspects of the useful purpose? Toulouse is, of course, the aircraft center. Was that something that you paid much attention to?

BARBIS: I would always go to Toulouse on a regular basis to call on the prefect, on the mayor and the various officials that were around. I remember going through the mockup that they had of the Concorde and feeling it was not very large; my head was bumping against the ceiling.

Q: And you are not that tall.

BARBIS: And, I am not that tall. I am not quite six feet. So, I thought it was going to be close quarters and pretty tight and friends who have flown on the Concorde have confirmed that. Certainly that was a big development for them. This was at a time when we were still trying to build an SST or had given it up because it was so expensive.

Q: Didn’t we have Americans involved there because the engine was partly American?

BARBIS: That’s right. I don’t remember having contact with any American engineers or others in connection with the Concorde, but Motorola did have a plant in the Toulouse area and I remember having frequent visits with them because there was some controversy over semi-conductors and our being in that market, etc. But, again, any commercial dispute or issue of that kind would be handled by the commercial section in the embassy and not by the consulate.

Q: Southwest France, of course, is adjacent to Spain and the Basque country. This was still the period of Franco. Did you get involved with Spain at all?

BARBIS: I visited Spain several times and had close contact with the Spanish consul general, but no involvement in the political issues there other than to report occasionally on Basque developments since that was the heartland of Basque country on the French side along the

Q: More on the French Basque area rather than Spain's.

BARBIS: Yes.

Q: You were there in France from roughly 1967-69. That was a time of great turmoil on the campus of the University of California in Berkeley, your alma mater, which had a sister relationship with Bordeaux University. It was also a time of campus unrest in Paris, I think too.

BARBIS: All over France. There was a general strike. We were completely isolated. Americans during that period who were traveling through Bordeaux couldn't get gas, couldn't change money and we would try to help them with that. There was no mail, no traveling going on to speak of. We weren't getting any pouch or anything. It was a pretty serious period of turmoil in France, not only with some violence, but also in that everything came to a standstill.

Q: Were there demonstrations or public expression of concern about what we were doing in Vietnam at that time?

BARBIS: No, there were not. I remember Nureyev and Fonteyn were supposed to come and participate in the May cultural program that Bordeaux annually sponsored and we were all looking forward to this with great anticipation. The night of the performance we went down to the center of Bordeaux where they have this grand, magnificent opera building, and there was nothing but a mob in the square in front of it. Of course the performance was canceled and the Royal Ballet had to leave town because they couldn't perform. So, it was a critical time for France.

So, we were affected by that. I had a vice consul whose parents were visiting and they couldn't leave the country. We finally managed to send them out by road to Spain and they were able to return to Boston that way.

Q: How large an American staff did you have?

BARBIS: There were initially the consul general, a consul, and a vice consul and later just a consul general and a vice consul, just two American officers. We had a consular section that the vice consul supervised of about four people, one who was full time on commercial activities, two on administrative. So, I guess total about ten or eleven, including a driver.

Q: You mentioned that the NATO headquarters had already been moved out of France and the French were not integrated with the military structure. Were there US military ship visits to Bordeaux during your time there?

BARBIS: No, never had a ship visit while I was there. I did have good relations with the local military people. They had several senior people. The equivalent of Redstone, the French missile development center, was just south of Bordeaux. It was a very secret operation and I remember when I left the Department being briefed by Ed Beagle, who was a long time political/military man in WE [Office of Western European Affairs], telling me to do my best to try to get in. Well, I got to know the physicist who was the director of it, but he never invited me to visit the installation itself, so they kept their secrets in that respect.

Q: Sensitive subject I'm sure.

BARBIS: Yes.

Q: Okay. Is there anything else we should say about Bordeaux? I assume you had some good meals.

BARBIS: A lot of good meals.

Q: You probably didn't have the pressures of the Laos desk

BARBIS: No pressures, one of the reasons they sent me there, I guess. One interesting thing personally, was that you were entertained a lot by various chateau people, etc. and it was always embarrassing because they would produce these magnificent wines and I happened to have been born in a year of a great vintage and frequently they would serve wine from that year. We tried to serve American wines, which was kind of foolish so we gave it up, primarily because our commissary in Paris did not have a good selection, despite the fact that Mr. Bruce had been through there and had written books about wine and suggested wines that we could offer that would be acceptable. Since then, of course, California wines have reached the point of competing with Bordeaux wines.

JAMES DOBBINS
Consular Officer/Staff Assistant
Paris (1967-1969)

Ambassador James Dobbins was born in Brooklyn. After graduating from Georgetown's School of Foreign Service, he joined the Navy. Since joining the Foreign Service in 1967, his career has included positions in France, England, Germany and an Ambassadorship to the European Community. Ambassador Dobbins was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2003.

Q: Well, you were in Paris from when to when?

DOBBINS: I was in Paris from '67 to '69.

Q: What were you doing in Paris?

DOBBINS: I had the ideal junior officer tour. I started in the consular section and showed so little aptitude that they got rid of me after two months. I don't think it actually was a lack of aptitude, but I clearly was exhibiting a lack of strong interest, and so they weren't that unhappy to move me on. Then I became the aide, the staff assistant or special assistant, to the ambassador to the OECD (Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development) for six months, Philip Trezise, who subsequently became assistant secretary for economic affairs.

That was very interesting, a completely different world, economics, economic policy and I got to see how a small multilateral mission was run and do a lot of interesting things, a good deal of writing, mostly reporting on meetings and keeping the administrative wheels running in this mission.

When the Vietnam peace talks came to Paris, I was moved to become, initially, the assistant secretary of delegation, and then the secretary of delegation, of the Vietnam peace talks. Originally, someone from the Diplomat's Executive Secretariat was brought out to run the equivalent of the Executive Secretariat of this delegation. A series of what was then called SS officers were brought out for the first few weeks. Then they decided I'd been there long enough and they turned that over to me. So, for almost a year, I ran the secretariat for the Vietnam peace talks.

Q: I want to go back for a minute. In the OECD ...

DOBBINS: Well, let me just finish on the tour. And then the last rotational assignment was in the political section of the embassy, working for Sargent Shriver. My brief was youth and youth affairs, which he was quite interested in. It was when the youth were about to overthrow the Fifth Republic. So as a first tour, it was really fun.

Q: Well, let's talk a little about the OECD. Did you get any feel? This is in a way the precursor of the European Union, or not?

DOBBINS: It was the offshoot of the Marshall Plan. The OEEC (Organization for European Economic Cooperation), split to become the EC (European Community) and the OECD.

Q: Did you get any feel for the relationships between the various powers and how the United States fit into this?

DOBBINS: A little bit. By then, the OECD had been expanded. Japan was a member, so it wasn't just a U.S.-European club, but it was largely U.S. and European. The issues tended to be rather arcane, and the European Union, or the European Community at the time, certainly wasn't acting as a bloc on the issues that the OECD was focusing on. The EC, of course, was the trade bloc, but the OECD really didn't do trade issues. It did other types of issues.

Q: De Gaulle was in power at that time?

DOBBINS: Right, and he had just thrown NATO (North Atlantic Treaty Organization) out and the U.S. NATO headquarters was in the process of closing down. The U.S. base on the outskirts of Paris that we used to have a PX in was also closing when I was there. It was a difficult time.

Q: On the OECD thing, were there problems with the French at that point?

DOBBINS: Well, not in the OECD, that I'm aware of. There were certainly problems in our broader relationship with the French. I spent a week on the French desk prior to going to Paris. It was the week that Charles de Gaulle was in Quebec, declaring a free Quebec.

Q: Viva Quebec libre! (Long live free Quebec!).

DOBBINS: Exactly. And I was briefed on our policy toward France, which was, in the words of LBJ (Lyndon Baines Johnson), who had passed this policy onto the State Department, "We ain't getting into a pissing contest with Charles de Gaulle." So it was restraint and not rising to the bait of de Gaulle's provocations. And, of course, problems with the French were also apparent when I was dealing with the Vietnam issues, but in the OECD, nothing that I'm aware of.

Q: Then from the OECD you moved to the youth officer?

DOBBINS: No, I moved to the Vietnam peace talks.

Q: Vietnam peace talks. Were these the Harriman talks?

DOBBINS: Harriman was number one, Vance was number two, and Phil Habib was the senior Foreign Service officer. And Negroponte and Holbrooke were the other two junior officers.

Q: When you got into this world, how did you find that we were working? Did we think that things were going to work out here or something?

DOBBINS: Well, things obviously weren't working out by the time the peace talks took place. It was a very difficult time. I didn't have a lot of insight coming to the job, and so I found it a real eye opener and very exciting because it really seemed the most important thing in the world. Two thousand journalists had arrived with Harriman. Walter Cronkite would be standing outside the door, as we'd leave a meeting, asking for some comment, along with the anchors with all of the other networks.

So it was a very dramatic time. The delegation was very high-powered. As I mentioned, the junior officers, in addition to myself, were Dick Holbrooke and John Negroponte. Bob Oakley was in the political section of the embassy, handling these matters, as was John Gunther Dean. Phil Habib was my boss, he and Negroponte. Clearly, there were huge tensions in terms of the evolution of policy in Washington, big debates about how to proceed. The whole negotiations were handled with utmost secrecy. Everything was top secret, and then there were compartments within compartments, so that we conducted secret negotiations that were secret from most of the delegation and from most of the people who were seeing the regular traffic.

We had ostensible meetings with the Vietnamese where we traded talking points for hours on end, and then we'd have secret meetings with them in some other location, which were somewhat more substantive. And most of the people in Washington would be reading one set of traffic and unaware that a completely separate negotiation for compartmentalized distribution was taking place.

Q: Well, what were you doing?

DOBBINS: I was running the administration of the delegation, basically, making sure that people's briefing books were up to date, that they had the right papers, that incoming message traffic was being distributed, that outgoing traffic was dispatched - any outgoing message had to be approved by me before it would go to the message center. I was doing the sorts of things for Harriman and Vance that the executive secretary of the State Department does for the secretary of state and the other principals, on a much smaller scale, obviously.

Q: Did you have any contact with Harriman or Vance?

DOBBINS: Yes, we'd meet every morning. Vance did a staff meeting every morning. Harriman would not normally do the staff meeting, so I'd see Vance every day. I'd see Habib four or five times a day, and I'd see Harriman two or three times a week, probably.

Q: How did you find Habib?

DOBBINS: Oh, he was great. Very charismatic, very congenial, warm, tough, but in an affectionate way.

Q: Did you sit in on any of the meetings?

DOBBINS: Yes, as I said, we had regular meetings with the North Vietnamese like two or three days a week, and they would take place. My station was often in the adjoining room, as I would be in a room next to the room where they were meeting, so that if incoming messages could come in, I could decide whether to bring them in to Harriman or let them wait. If they had something they needed to get back to Washington, I would then get it back to Washington. I could take phone calls. So I was in and out of the room they were meeting in all the time.

I remember when one of the times I had to go in to bring Harriman a note saying that Bobby Kennedy had been assassinated. And then six weeks later, same room, same time of day I had to bring him in a note saying Martin Luther King had been assassinated. And you could see him each time sort of stunned. He was sitting there talking to Le Duc Tho or whoever the Vietnamese interlocutor was at the time and getting these dreadful bulletins from home.

Q: Were you getting any feel from the people who were doing this, bringing back how they felt about how things were going and how dealing with the North Vietnamese was going?

DOBBINS: Well, I certainly knew how dealing with the North Vietnamese was going, because I was privy to both formal and informal negotiations. Sure, there was lots of talk about the negotiations, and some insights into the Washington policy debates, which people on the delegation, were certainly protagonists in.

Q: Well, this period you were doing it was from when to when?

DOBBINS: When the negotiations started in '68, I can't remember the month, and my involvement lasted about 10 months. So it was probably all of '68, and of course it was at the same time that the French Fifth Republic was teetering, so it was a very interesting time, with huge riots in the street, a shutdown of the economy. I was young enough so I could pose as a student and in the evenings go over to the Sorbonne or the Odeon and listen to the speeches and stand behind the barricades and watch the riots.

Q: Was the feeling that the riots were going to topple the republic?

DOBBINS: It came very close. De Gaulle briefly fled the country.

Q: But it went to the Rhineland to talk to his troops, didn't he?

DOBBINS: He left the country to make sure that the army was behind him, and then he came back.

It was strange because there really were no casualties. The riots were very much a set piece, rather folkloric events during which the students would build barricades and the police would rush them and try to overcome them with sticks and batons and shields, rather than bringing up a bulldozer. I think the only person that was killed was a student who was running from the police, jumped in a canal and drowned. So, in a sense, one wondered what the fuss was about, but the seriousness of it was that the student riots, which as I said, were very folkloric in nature, eventually stimulated a Communist led general strike, which was a much more serious threat to the regime, because it was fairly rigorously followed.

Q: Did that have any effect on the Paris peace talks?

DOBBINS: Not much. It began to have an effect on life when gasoline gave out. It became more difficult to get around, but I don't believe it had any effect on the substance of the talks.

Q: By the time you left there, had anything happened?

DOBBINS: Yes, we negotiated a bombing halt. There was a bombing halt that was tied to certain concessions on the part of the North Vietnamese of a rather minor sort, and the main point was an expansion of the negotiations to include the South Vietnamese and the Viet Cong. So a two-way negotiation became a four-way negotiation. And then we rather foolishly engaged in a yearlong discussion of what the table would look like. But yes, when I was there we did have an agreement. The agreement was to halt the bombing, expand the negotiations. There were some other elements to it. Then I went to the political section in the embassy, and there was a rather prolonged hiatus in the Vietnam Peace Talks during which there weren't any talks, but the delegation stayed there.

Q: You were also there when all hell broke loose in the United States. I think of the political conventions of '68.

DOBBINS: Yes, the general feeling was that the world was teetering on the brink of something, with both Kennedys, and then Martin Luther King being assassinated, with large-scale riots, protests, and similarly the same thing happening throughout Europe. I mean, it wasn't only in France, although France is where the '68 events were taken the furthest.

Q: When you moved to the political section, you had what, youth affairs?

DOBBINS: Yes.

Q: That must have been sort of the hot spot, wasn't it?

DOBBINS: It was very interesting, and, of course, Shriver was a fascinating and charismatic figure, Kennedy's brother-in-law, so he had a lot of aura, and he was quite interested in youth affairs, so it gave me a certain access, an entrée. Bob Oakley actually was my direct supervisor and was designed to sort of keep me out of trouble and doing something useful. But Shriver was interested and I would have a certain amount of contact with him as well.

Q: Would you be talking to people like Danny the Red and all? Did we have contact?

DOBBINS: Well, by the time I moved to the political section, the May '68 events had been pretty much over, so Danny the Red was probably either in jail or in exile. To some degree, it was talking to people like that. To some degree, it was talking to more conservative youth who wanted more contacts with the United States, working with French-American youth groups. To some degree it was just promoting to a youth audience certain embassy events. We had – a whole group of the astronauts came. The NASA (National Aeronautics and Space Administration) guy programmed the astronauts, and so Shriver said, "We'll have Dobbins do a youth event." So my goal was do a youth event at which the astronauts would meet a selection of youth. That was my piece of the astronauts' thing, was a youth event for them. There were similar events.

Some of this was just publicity. Shriver generated publicity, but it was certainly fun and interesting and different. How significant it was in the grander scheme of things – whatever effects youth had had in '68 in France they never replicated themselves in the sense that youth never again became influential, per se. So I doubt the American embassy ever had a youth officer again who had so much access and was doing this job full time. But it was an interesting thing to be doing at the time.

Q: Well, the youth officer program started in the early '60s. I think Bobby Kennedy got that going. I remember I was in Yugoslavia at the time, and we were supposed to pick out the future leaders. Well, the future leaders looked like Marshal Tito. You just get older and the youths would sort of cycle through. Did you get any feel for how events in the United States were being portrayed at that time, particularly to the youth of France?

DOBBINS: I suppose so, in the sense that it was the same way that they were being portrayed to us. I don't know that the French press was any more sensationalist. I would say, first of all, that given what was happening in France, the United States seemed relatively tame in comparison in terms of the protests. And the youth movement in the United States, the French didn't think they had anything to learn from America in that regard. The United States was certainly more violent than France, but there was a general sort of sense of fin de régime, the world unraveling.

Q: Well, did you find when you were doing this, was the embassy at all divided between de Gaullists and anti-Gaullists?

DOBBINS: I don't think there were any Gaullists in the embassy. During '68, I was in the Vietnam peace talks, and it was only in '69 that I was in the embassy. So I wasn't sort of in the middle of the debate on whether de Gaulle could last, or would he go under? There certainly was embassy reporting, and there undoubtedly was discussion within the political section of how to portray the depth of this crisis. Dick Walters was the defense attaché, for instance, at the time, and I think he was the one that found out that de Gaulle had left the country and gone to talk to the generals in Germany. So I think the embassy was doing some fairly sensitive reporting about how deep the crisis was and how likely it was to have any lasting impact. But I wasn't part of the political section at the time.

By the time I was in the political section, I don't recall arguments about our policy toward France. Our policy in France wasn't really very controversial. It was a rather restrained policy, given what de Gaulle had done. The effort was to try to maintain a relationship that was as civil and cooperative as possible, given the basic obstacles that had been placed in the path. I don't recall that there was a great controversy.

Q: It wasn't people saying, "Well, it will be a better world if we get rid of de Gaulle. He's anti-American and all this."

DOBBINS: Well, I don't think anyone had any practical way of getting rid of de Gaulle. I would guess that there probably would have been a feeling that we would do better under another leadership, and of course de Gaulle did resign shortly thereafter, and things did get better very gradually, although never completely.

Q: Did you have much dealing with the French officials?

DOBBINS: Very little. The only job in which I would have dealt with French officials was the last point in the political section, and there I didn't have a brief that would bring me over to the Foreign Ministry and bring me into contact. There were a few occasions, but not much. Occasionally I would accompany the political counselor, for instance, to the meetings he would have with more senior officials.

Q: Sargent Shriver, you were assisting him at one point.

DOBBINS: In this capacity.

Q: How did you find him?

DOBBINS: Well, he was a very sort of exciting, glamorous figure. He was certainly pleasant, hyperactive, a bit focused on his own persona and publicity, a big attractive family. He was an exciting and glamorous boss, and I wouldn't say he was warm, but he was certainly approachable and always very pleasant.

Q: Well, then, you applied for Japanese training at the end of this time?

DOBBINS: Right. I came back and applied and was accepted and was going into Japanese language training, and then I had met my wife during the time I was in Paris.

Q: She was French?

DOBBINS: She was actually Norwegian, but she was living in Paris. So we had gotten back, I was getting married. I didn't marry when I was in Paris, but we met and then we were married, I guess, three or four months after I came back. So when they found out I was getting married, they changed the assignment and said, "Well, we'll find you another assignment." It worked out fine, because they put me on the Policy Planning Staff.

EDWARD C. MCBRIDE
Cultural Affairs Officer, USIS
Paris (1967-1970)

Edward McBride was born in Savannah, Georgia. After graduating from the University of Georgia in 1959, he was drafted into the Army and spent two years in France. He received his Masters degree from Georgetown University in 1964. Since joining the Foreign Service in 1963, his career has included positions in France, Senegal, Yugoslavia, Romania, Spain and England. Mr. McBride was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2001.

Q: You were in Paris from when to when?

MCBRIDE: I was in Paris from '67 to '70. The most interesting to tell you the truth, those dates are easy to remember, is that I was there when France fell apart at the seams in '68. The events of May it was called and it was really an extraordinary time to be in France. I in my army days lived there when the Algerian issue came to a head and they were threatening to drop paratroopers into the Tuilleries Gardens and bomb the Champs Elysees. They were exploding those things in those days which the French called "plastique," which were these plastic bombs. So I had two very interesting incarnations in Paris, two remarkable times in French history.

Q: When you were in '67 when you went there, how were relations between the United States and France at that point?

MCBRIDE: They were fairly cordial. I mean I don't remember any big issues. DeGaulle was very preoccupied with his "force de frappe," his nuclear striking force. That caused a lot of upheavals. I think the relations in fact, were a problem but later after the demise of DeGaulle when he resigned and retired. The other issue then on the horizon which was a very painful part of our relationship was of course, Vietnam. Of course I was there also when the talks began, so we were very much involved in all of this, and we saw our relations deteriorate fairly rapidly. It was ironic because the French who had done all of this before, and had created many problems in southeast Asia. They were very anti U.S. in terms of our approach to dealing with Vietnam and indeed southeast Asia, so it was a very prickly time to be there.

Q: What was your job?

MCBRIDE: The job that I went to fill was assistant cultural attaché, and it turned out that when I got there, there wasn't a job. I mean it was one of these get there yesterday, and when you get there, there was no job. That didn't bother me particularly because I thought I could find something to do. I had a great boss, wonderful guy. I have never forgotten him. He died not too long ago, Lee Brady. He was a wonderful man, and very cultured and a very fine officer. He lived a lot of his life in France, and knew and loved France very well. So he was the public affairs officer in those days. I went to see him after I had been there for awhile just doing odd jobs and kind of learning how an embassy worked, because I had never been working in an embassy before. So one day I just went up and said, "You know, why don't I work on music and art. How would that be?" I will just sort of focus on the visual arts and the performing arts, because that was good having the previous experience working in the exhibitions office in the fine arts. He thought that was a great idea and said get to it. So I made myself a wonderful little job that helped promote the visual and performing arts in France. We did some exhibitions. We brought, in those days there was a fair amount of money to support those things through the office of cultural presentations, and we brought performing arts groups. We did wonderful tours of American artists who lived in France. We organized shows which traveled around the country. We had about five or six consulates in those days, so we would do shows in museums in Marseilles or Lyon, Strasbourg, all over France. It was a wonderful opportunity to travel around France which was great fun for me and to use the arts as a means of communicating to the French. I mean they were very looking down their nose asking what do you know about art; what do you know about culture indeed. But in fact after 1964 it was a little bit more difficult for them to say that, so we did make some interesting points with the arts. And they were very particularly interested in the contemporary, so we did some wonderful exhibitions. The main thing for me that was wonderful out of all of this is of course I met all the creative people in that society. In any society, the creative people are the cutting edge of society, so it was wonderful to meet artists and film makers and impresarios and performers. It was a great experience and a wonderful way to learn. It made a very good basis on which ultimately build a career. So, after the Paris experience, I worked on the cultural side of USIA.

Q: What about, Probably more than any other country France emphasizes its culture, and you know, has tended to look down the nose at American culture because, you know I mean, you are always feeling somewhat challenged or just brought up to despise to or something. How did you find dealing with sort of the cultural leaders and intelligentsia and intellectuals whatever you want to call it, who were in the arts field. Was this a problem?

MCBRIDE: It certainly was occasionally a problem. It was not a problem that one dealt with day in and day out however. It was episodic. We were lucky in those days that there was a program pioneered by the State Department, I guess it was USIA actually, that would occasionally tap a very distinguished American, either an academic or cultural personality to come play the role of cultural attaché deal with the very issue that you raised. It was very difficult to talk to people who had very distinguished pedigrees in whatever their particular interest. The French did admit and acknowledge that they were very pleased to have the distinguished people who were there. I served under I think two or three. I am trying to remember. When I went to Paris for the first time, the cultural attaché was a very distinguished sociologist named Lawrence Wiley who was a professor of sociology at Harvard and who had written two seminal books on French sociology. He lived in a little community down in southern France somewhere and spent a year and actually wrote remarkably insightful stuff about the French character and the French personality. So he was a distinguished man by any standard, including the French academic world which admired him. So as the cultural attaché he was able to disabuse many people of the issues you raised. I think by presenting some of the exhibitions that we did and bringing some of the performing arts groups that we did, it was relatively easy to disabuse the French of the notion that we were a people without culture because whether you like to admit it or not, I mean the New York Philharmonic is a pretty good orchestra and they did come to Paris and play very successfully. These exhibitions that were presented would draw record breaking crowds in museums in France. So it tended to be a problem occasionally when you had people who were not quite so well informed, but by and large it was not a big deal. But there was a certain intellectual arrogance about it that did permeate some of the relationships, but I never found it difficult or frustrating or anything, because you could always make the point by asking how could we have done this if we had no culture. Could we have produced a painter like deKoonig or like Rauchenberg as a matter of fact, or Jackson Pollock whom they admired enormously.

Q: How did the pop art go in France? I mean did they embrace it? I mean this was during a period of...

MCBRIDE: Yes, it was a very difficult period because we all knew French invented culture. So here you come as an upstart from the other side of the Atlantic, and bring to the table, actually what was sort of the hottest movement in the art world, whether the French like to admit it or not. But the thing that was interesting was that it had an instant appeal to young people. The young people absolutely identified with it and thronged to the exhibitions. The French cultural establishment after awhile, could simply no longer ignore it, and they had to come to terms with it. And they did that. To their credit. I think we now have very strong cultural ties with France. But the French ultimately looked at people like Andy Warhol and Oldenberg with his great big hamburgers and people like Rosenquist, and they liked them a lot, and they embraced them. Many of them were also Francophile, the artists themselves and loved to come to France. So they had a good relationship, and I think we basked in a lot of the reflected glory.

Q: On the music side, by any chance did you get the, USIA was sponsoring sometime in that period there, your hometown opera, not quite hometown, Porgy and Bess.

MCBRIDE: I think Porgy and Bess was one of the highlights of the three years I spent in France. We did it with the help of a wonderful man who actually was working as a contract employee for the embassy for part-time named Doda Conrad, who knew everybody in the music world. He was a quite remarkable man. We, with his help and with a lot of coercing of funds from here, there, and everywhere, persuaded the French government to mount a production of Porgy and Bess. I think I saw Porgy and Bess in France 47 times. I went on a tour with it. We went to 12 cities in France. We took an all-American cast, including the one who created the role of Bess. She was living in Sweden at the time, and she was in the production. We hired a wonderful American black guy who was living also in Paris in those days. He trained the chorus for all these performances, and he traveled around ahead of the company. The chorus all sang in English which was quite interesting for the French. We did I think something like 60 performances of Porgy and Bess spread over about a year. It went to almost every major French provincial city. It came to Paris and played at the Opera Comique for about a week. It was a huge success.

Q: Talking about culture, did you find yourself up against the foreign service culture with State Department foreign service and USIA foreign service and all?

MCBRIDE: Absolutely, and in fact, there was not a very good understanding between the traditional foreign service officer and the folks in USIA about what the role of either. And certainly on the cultural side it was a very difficult relationship. The Department I think, felt that diplomacy had nothing to do with cultural programs and USIA, and that what you did was to write nice reports and go out and interview political leaders and come back and do your cables back to Washington. To this day I think the Department still has a hard time dealing with this issue. It is getting better, and I think in the last year since the integration of USIA into the Department, I don't think the problem has gone away. But I sense that the climate is better, and I have talked to some people who are still working there. I think Evelyn Lieberman who is the first in fact leader of USIA who became the Undersecretary for Public Affairs and Public Diplomacy, certainly understood the role and the power of the cultural diplomacy. Certainly Secretary Albright spoke out on many occasions that she did. In fact one of the last things she did before leaving office was to work with the Department and the White House to convoke a White House meeting on cultural diplomacy. So I think things are indeed getting better.

Q: Well I would have thought, I mean I can understand in some countries where you might say the traditional foreign service would say well this is all very nice, but it doesn't mean much. But in France where you are dealing with a group of people who are the poobahs of foreign policy and everything else, intellectuals, they can be gotten by good wine, good food, and good art.

MCBRIDE: There is absolutely no question about that. One of the ways, I was involved in an event that proved it in spades was we were trying to work out how to deal with a Presidential visit in Paris while I was there. President Nixon was coming to France, and I was asked if I could do some sort of cultural event that would provide the sort of after dinner entertainment at the state dinner that the Ambassador was going to give. It was going to be given at the ambassador's residence hosted by the President following the dinner at the Elysee Palace that DeGaulle gave Nixon. I took on this assignment and had a lot of fun with it as a matter of fact. It was one of the great things about being in France. I got on the phone and called somebody I knew, and ultimately got together a musical evening that involved Yehudi Menuhin, the violinist, who came to play for the dinner with his sister, Hepzibah who was a very distinguished pianist herself. We had an evening that I don't think anybody who was there will ever forget, because the front row was DeGaulle and Madame DeGaulle and President Nixon and Mrs. Nixon all seated on this little sofa in this very elegant little salon in the residence. Menuhin played beautifully, an incredible concert. At the end of the concert DeGaulle leapt from his chair quite literally, went up the two or three feet to Menuhin and absolutely almost smothered him with his embrace. Then he turned to the audience and gave this extraordinary speech about how as a young officer fighting for the free French from London, he had called on this young prodigy violinist that somebody told him about. His name was Yehudi Menuhin, and he gave a concert for the Free French, and they raised a lot of money. DeGaulle then looks at Menuhin again, gives him another bear hug and says, "And I have never forgotten that." So I think culture made its rather strong statement in that way. It was a great evening and everybody loved it.

Q: What about your contacts, your personal contacts with the French? How did you find this worked, because sometimes this is a difficult society.

MCBRIDE: They are difficult, but on the other hand if you are interested and want to make something of it, you can do it. It is discouraging sometimes because the French can be very arrogant and be very nasty, but then so can we. On the other hand because both my wife and I were French speaking it was a little bit easier to open doors. We did have a number of friends through other contacts so that in a sense we didn't have to depend on our embassy contacts exclusively for our social life. So we were lucky in that sense, and we knew a lot of people, and we got some nice introductions. I keep up with some French friends to this day, and I think we would have nothing but kind words to say about that part of our time there.

Q: What were you all doing and what were you personally seeing during what was I guess May, '68 and before. It was sort of the university student revolt.

MCBRIDE: Well it is interesting. It began, the official beginning now chronicled by historians was a performance of an American dance company in the Odeon theater. The students actually came in at the end of the performance and occupied the Odeon. They kicked out the Paul Taylor Dance Company which was performing there under one of our cultural programs. It was a remarkable evening. We were in the audience, and after it was all over, Paul Taylor who had fallen and broken his foot, and he was on crutches. Anyway we were sitting there; the evening had ended. The students had now occupied it and raised the black flag of anarchy above the theater. Hundreds of them were there, and they were sort of going at the American and the director of the theater. He was a remarkable French actor by the name of Jean Louis Barrault, who was himself a left-wing intellectual. He was therefore disposed to listen to what the students had to say. So we sat there until two o'clock in the morning listening to this incredible dialogue between the students and this distinguished grey head French cultural icon who was just sitting there listening to them.

Q: What attracted them to this...

MCBRIDE: It wasn't that. I think they wanted to draw attention to themselves. The Odeon Theater is in the heart of the Latin Quarter as perhaps you know, and that is where the university is, and that was therefore their home turf so to speak. They wanted something that was obviously going to generate a lot of attention and publicity. The fact that it was a foreign company, that it was an international festival, and the American company was there performing the context of something called the Festival of Nations which was an international festival. So the students were wise enough to know they would get a lot of publicity if they did something like this. They needed to do something spectacular, and occupying a theater like the Odeon was really quite a bold gesture. It generated exactly what they thought it was going to do. It was on the front page of all the newspapers. The television was there. They stayed in the place for about two or three weeks before they finally left. So they made the point. I think that it was only an accident that it happened to be an American company that particular day.

Q: So it wasn't anti American.

MCBRIDE: No, no, not at all. They were just fed up with the terrible conditions that they were forced to put up with in overcrowded classrooms, and the terrible attitudes of the French administration. You know a rather fierce exam schedule, all sorts of things that basically related to their education and how difficult it was, the competitiveness of it all really eliminated a lot of very bright people. They just thought that was enough. You may recall, it is an interesting historical footnote there. DeGaulle was not in France when this happened. DeGaulle was on a state visit to Romania as it turned out. So the media got an interview with DeGaulle in Bucharest and said, "Are you going to cancel your trip and come back?" He said, "Certainly not. This is nothing but a little," and he used a wonderful colloquial French word. He said, "This is nothing but a little student "chienlit." "Chienlit," is the word he used. That was a rather vulgar expression for someone like DeGaulle to use. It literally means you are going to mess your own bed, foul your own bed. So he thought that was nothing to worry about, and he didn't actually cut short his trip, well until the next day. Then he saw that France was literally falling apart at the seams and he did come back. The rest is history. But that is just an interesting coincidence that this American company was performing in the Odeon when all this happened.

Q: Well did you find as this was going on, you being particularly having, well, let me ask you about ties to the students and faculty. Was this part of your beat?

MCBRIDE: It was indeed, and it is nice now to be able to admit it a little bit more. It was a neglected part of the beat. It was neglected because none of us in the embassy really had been doing our work on that. We suddenly find in the midst of all of this the ambassador got very interested.

Q: Who was the ambassador?

MCBRIDE: The ambassador was Sargent Shriver. Shriver was quite a character himself and a wonderful guy. He is somebody else I still keep up with. He said that it was appalling that nobody in the embassy really knew the guy who was at the head of all this. He was the hell raiser called Daniel Cone Bendit. Danny the Red was his nickname.

Q: He is now in the European parliament.

MCBRIDE: Yes. Anyway, The Ambassador said, "Who knows this guy?" We were at a staff meeting. Nobody knew him. So we were quickly galvanized into something that only Americans would think of doing; we formed a youth committee. Everybody who was youthful was dragged into this service. We all were given our marching orders to go out and cultivate as many of these people as we could. We really were a little self conscious in our effort. I had a colleague at that time, a guy named Jim Rentschler who ran what was the American Cultural Center in the Rue de Dragon in Paris in the heart of the Latin Quarter. So Jim Rentschler and I who were a little older than most of them, joked that we were the only people who had to lie about our age to get on the youth committee.

Q: What did you do?

MCBRIDE: We did go out and cultivate them, and they were very interested, because they were very pleased that somebody would take them seriously, that we were talking to them. They saw a good soapbox, and they used it. I mean we were used, and they were used. It was mutually beneficial. We were at least able to keep tabs on what was going on.

Q: Did you find looking at it that you were, I mean the embassy by making this move and all was a little better placed than say maybe the British or the Germans or something?

MCBRIDE: Oh there is no doubt we were. I mean I think we were certainly better placed than any of our European colleagues. I don't remember it well enough to know how well involved other embassies were, but certainly we were considered to be the people out front. I think it is an interesting testimonial to our non-career ambassador who saw that this was a big void and that we really ought to be ashamed not to know who the players were and where they were coming from. So I think Shriver deserves a lot of credit for what was then considered a fairly unorthodox approach to diplomacy and why were we worried about the students. Well we damn well should have been worried about them.

Q: Let's say prior to the '68 student business, by the time you got there, NATO had left. It was no longer in France and moved. DeGaulle had. What was the feeling you were picking up about DeGaulle from the embassy? Was it split or did they say that son-of-a bitch or...

MCBRIDE: You know I have absolutely no recollection. I know everybody was fascinated by his movements. As you know he ultimately retreated to the west coast of Ireland and sort of gazed out into the Atlantic for a long time. Then he came back and moved down to Colombey-les deux Eglises and kind of lived out his life there basically. But I must say that I just don't remember to be honest with you, and I am sorry that...

Q: Well, I am talking about the time he was in power. I mean was there...

MCBRIDE: Oh, he was the big voice of anti Americanism of course. I think a lot of people found his pronouncements to be annoying, often wrong. And yet he was clearly in charge. I mean the French loved him because he was a big father figure that they could look up to and he made France relevant in a way that it hadn't been for a long time. So I think he did in fact have a lot of popular support, but on the other hand particularly after the events of 1968, it turned out that the French suddenly looked up and thought God, you know this guy is ancient history. This is looking backwards, not looking forwards. By this time France was overwhelmingly youthful. There were far more young people now in France than the older generation. I think the older generation which was still more vocal and articulate in a way, but it was gradually being displaced by younger people who saw a different France basically they saw France's interests certainly in a very different way than DeGaulle did and wanted to promote change and did so. But I think that is what the events of 1968 were all about basically.

Q: Well how did you find, prior to '68 events dealing with the French bureaucracy, because you did have a president who was anti American essentially. Did that set the tone or were you getting people saying oh well that's the president, let's get on with the business?

MCBRIDE: Oh I think we kind of got on with it. Occasionally there would be some irritant. They would get some instruction to do this, that, or the other thing. I don't know. But we had a huge education exchange program with France in those days. In addition to the cultural program we had an enormous Fulbright program. We had a lot of sympathy in the academic community because the U.S. was still regarded as a great place to go to graduate school, and certainly the French were no exception to that. The French academic establishment particularly, the ministry of education, were financial partners as well with us. They were putting a fair amount of money into all of this. So I think there was a line drawn between the official pronouncement and what actually happened because the French saw very clearly that their own self interests were at stake here. It was stupid to cut off your nose to spite their face and send somebody, you know a university somewhere in Romania when they wanted to go to MIT. That didn't make any sense at all.

Q: Did you get involved in the film side of things?

MCBRIDE: Not too much because we couldn't do everything, and I think it was a conscious decision. There were a lot of people who felt that the French cinema was at that point at its heyday. I mean those were the great days of French cinema. I don't think we really did an awful lot there. I can't think of a single film program that we actually got involved with.

Q: How about music? Did you get involved much in the way of youthful groups, jazz and that sort of thing?

MCBRIDE: Absolutely. We had a the cultural center in the Rue du Dragon and we had monthly concerts there, frequently with American jazz artists. Or we would do a mixed group of Americans and French people, French musicians. So music was a big force in the program and obviously a very popular one. People loved to come; the concerts were all full. We would also support visits if we could by traveling American artists whether we had any money in their tours or not. For example, if there were some big name conductor, I would usually try to get the ambassador to go to the concert if he would. And the Shrivens were very good about this I must say. They would usually give a dinner or lunch or something for Leonard Bernstein or whoever had come to conduct the French National Orchestra. We gave a wonderful dinner I remember one evening for Leyontine Price who came to sing Aida at the opera in Paris. So we did a lot with both popular music and classical music.

Q: How did Vietnam play? Things were beginning to pick up by sixty, toward the end of the time you were there.

MCBRIDE: Yes, the negotiations with the North Vietnamese began about the time of the student demonstrations. I got involved in it when the breakthrough came, when France offered to host the peace discussion, and the delegations came and it went on for years as you know. By that time I was nearing the end of my time there, so although I was there when it got started, but I wasn't there for very much of it. I mean I moved on at that point.

MICHAEL B. SMITH
Economic Officer
Strasbourg (1967-1969)

Principal Officer
Lyon (1969-1970)

Ambassador Michael B. Smith was born in Massachusetts in 1936. He received a bachelor's degree from Harvard University in 1958. His Foreign Service career included positions in Chad, France, and Iran. This interview was conducted by Charles Stuart Kennedy on August 25, 1993.

SMITH: I went to Strasbourg.

Q: You were there from 1967 to 1968.

SMITH: I got there in January, 1967, and left between Christmas [1968] and New Year's of 1969.

Q: So you were really there about...

SMITH: Two years.

Q: Strasbourg is sort of an odd town because, unlike many others, it doesn't have a city government. From what I gather it's really more like looking at Europe as a whole.

SMITH: The reason that we had a Consulate General there in Strasbourg was, first, because the Council of Europe, at that time, was there. It still is, but actually it's being shelved in favor of Brussels, even though the French have built a magnificent center for it. So that was one of the justifications. Secondly, this sounds macabre in a way, but [we have a Consulate General there] because of all of the military cemeteries that we had there -- from Lorraine all the way down to Belfort and that area there. There was a very large number of retired veterans of World War II there. We had a very big...

Q: World War I, too?

SMITH: World War I, too. Thirdly, it was on the border [between France and Germany]. During the strike of 1968 this turned out to be very useful.

Q: This is the French strike...

SMITH: The events of May, 1968.

Q: The student revolt and all that?

SMITH: We were the only post in France still open, because Strasbourg is right on the Rhine River. Germany wasn't on strike, so all the diplomatic pouches and so on were rerouted to come through us. I mean, the rest of France was closed down. The Consulate General was a listening post, a four-man post.

Q: Who was Consul General when you were there?

SMITH: John Hay, a bitter man.

Q: Tell me a little about him -- about working with a bitter man.

SMITH: Well, he was a bright man. He came from Michigan and was a nice person who had had a terrible time. He had lost his wife, and I think that that was the problem. He sort of felt on the periphery of things. He didn't speak French very well. He was a career Foreign Service Office but didn't speak French very well. He loved Strasbourg but he was very opinionated. This was his last post in the Foreign Service. In those days they used posts like that as "pasture posts." He was very good to me. He sort of turned the Consulate General over to me. He thought that I was educated and all that sort of stuff, and I'd come from the White House and all that, so he liked that.

Secondly, I was enthusiastic and tried to help him out a lot. He couldn't have been nicer to us. He had a violent temper. He was a tough guy for many people to work for, though he wasn't for me. You had to learn to roll with the punches, and that sort of thing. He felt that he was not where he should be [in the Service], in the sense that he deserved better. Not that he didn't like Strasbourg. He loved Strasbourg. But he saw that it was the end of his career. He also had a drinking problem. He served on. I did not stay to see him leave.

What happened to me was that Sargent Shriver was Ambassador to France at that time. Sarge was going to make changes in the Consulates [in France] and was going to assign "young people" as Consuls General and use these positions as "testing places." So I got a call from Bill Buell, the Supervisory Consul General in Paris three days before Christmas of 1968. He said that the Ambassador had decided that he was going to change the makeup of the Consulates. He was no longer going to go along with the idea that these would be used for FSO's on their last assignment. They were going to be for FSO-4's, under the old system.

SMITH: Yes. And young FSO's would go out to the Consulates and either make it or break it in running a Consulate. I was the first one to be assigned. I was transferred from Strasbourg to Lyon, which was the "pasture post" of "pasture posts." I was to put that Consulate back on the map and I was to be there by New Year's [1969]. The reason I say this is that John Hay was on home leave at that time. So I never got a chance to say goodbye to him [before leaving, though I saw him subsequently]. Because of the legal requirement -- seals and all of that -- they had to bring someone down from Paris to whom I could transfer the property of the United States Government so that I could go to Lyon. I did that on December 31, 1968.

Q: Going back to Strasbourg, let's look at the political situation within your consular district.

SMITH: It was very conservative. This was the place which "rallied" to De Gaulle first of all during the 1968 crisis in France. Alsace-Lorraine is very French...

Q: Really?

SMITH: It is very French in the sense of "La Patrie" and allegiance to France, very German in its sense of order, and very clever, in that when they don't want the French or the Germans to understand what's going on, they speak in Alsatian. It's a proud area. It's interesting, for example, because Alsace and Lorraine had been taken from France following the Franco-Prussian War [of 1871]. In 1906 or 1907 the French "secularized" all of the schools [of the Catholic Church] in France. Since Alsace-Lorraine was not part of France at that time, the religious schools there were not secularized. So when France got Alsace-Lorraine back after World War I, the Catholic schools there continued to get the subsidies they had prior to 1870 and continued to do so until the time I was there. So my children went to Catholic schools in Strasbourg for the total sum of $15 a month, all subsidized by the French Government.

Q: What areas were you particularly concerned with?

SMITH: I was assigned as an economic officer. That's what the Department wanted me to do, as I had just come out of this economics course. They wanted to boost the economic presence of the Department of State. So I was assigned to Strasbourg as an economics officer, following developments affecting U. S. investment. There was a lot of U. S. investment going in there: E. I. Lilley, General Motors, and Caterpillar, so that Alsace looked like a perfect place to invest in Europe. American businesses were in France, so they could always get French protection. But they were close enough to Germany so that they had the German "work ethic." And they would be on the Rhine River, which provided the cheapest transportation in the world.

I was there as an economics officer, following what they thought, at the time, would be a burgeoning corner of Europe for economic development. That has not turned out to be the case, for a variety of other reasons, but in any event I was not the only one coming out of the economics course to be assigned to one of the Consulates. But that was what I was supposed to be doing. Also, don't forget, we didn't have much else that we could do. It was the height of the Vietnam War. As a political entity we were not particularly favored, even in conservative Alsace, although there were certainly more supporters for our position in Strasbourg or Lyon than there were a year later.

Q: How did you find working with American firms there? Did they care about you?

SMITH: We had a wonderful relationship.

Q: What could you do for them?

SMITH: By and large they could take care of themselves. General Motors didn't need me. On the other hand, when they had a problem that needed a quick solution, they'd call us and say, "Look, we have a bit of a problem with the Prefet [Head of a French Department] or the Prefecture in getting a permit to do something or other." It was no problem. I'd just call the Prefet or his Adjoint [deputy] and say, "Look, GM has a $350 million investment here," which was a big investment in 1968. I would add, "Some official in your office is holding up the permit. Could you help us out?" That was sort of easy to do. Of course, I was also there during the crisis of May, 1968. We helped out the American companies. They couldn't get food and at times they couldn't get across the border during the strike. We had a small Commissary there. I lived in the Consulate General in Strasbourg -- on the second floor. It was a beautiful building, constructed after World War II, like a chateau. So I performed that sort of function.

In Strasbourg the number of Americans was fairly small -- that is, of Americans not married to French, if you will, who had decided to live there. The number of the expatriates was on a relatively small scale, so they hung around together.

Q: What about the Coal and Steel Community? Was it located there at that time?

SMITH: No, just the Council of Europe.

Q: Was that your beat also?

SMITH: The Consul General was supposed to follow that. He kept trying to justify the maintenance of the post on those grounds. I kept saying, "The Council of Europe will never stay in Strasbourg and will eventually go to Brussels. Let's not try to justify the post on the Council of Europe. Let's justify it on more substantive reasons." We did, although I think that the Consulate General is closed now.

Q: It probably is, as so many small consulates have been closed down. How did you find dealing with these international bureaucrats? This was still at a fairly early stage.

SMITH: The Council of Europe in those days was not the most glamorous or prestigious of the European institutions. So you sort of had some "castoffs" in Strasbourg among the international bureaucrats. I found them exceedingly dull and, in many ways, irrelevant. I didn't pay a lot of attention socially to the Council of Europe types. They lived in sort of a ghetto. They all had tax-free status. Strasbourg tried manfully, urged on by the French Government in Paris, to keep the Council of Europe there. They offered the Council of Europe types all kinds of benefits to stay in Strasbourg. However, the Council was not a major force at the time. The one important role it played was as a sounding board for the British, who at that time were not members of the European Community and who paid their allegiance to the Community doctrine. Prime Minister Wilson came and said, "We want to join Europe" and all of that. That was his major claim to fame, I think.

When I was there, [The Council of Europe] was in sort of a ramshackle, temporary building. Now they've got an ugly, new monstrosity, which is hardly ever used, as they nearly always meet in Brussels.

Q: Let's talk about the "May Days" of 1968. Did you get called to supply other than administrative services? There was concern about the French armies on the Rhine.

SMITH: The French Army marched right past my bedroom window. First of all, we hardly felt the effects of the strikes. When the Embassy in Paris called and said that everything was closed down, this didn't mean much to us. In Strasbourg everything was open, nothing was closed, newspapers were delivered, television went on, and all of that. That is, all local stuff. Now, the services which depended on Paris did not operate -- the postal and telegraph services, for example. We immediately set up a mail drop in Kehl, which is just across the [Rhine] River [in Germany]. All of our mail came there, and there was no problem. The Embassy in Paris kept calling us, asking, "What's going on? How many rioters," and all that sort of stuff. We said, "Who? What?"

Q: How about the students?

SMITH: Students? The universities went out on strike, but in a very gentle way, shall we say. A lot of the factories such as Peugeot and Berliet went out on strike -- but, again, very gently. There may have been one or two demonstrations of more than 500 people in Strasbourg, but they were met with disdain. This is an area which in those days probably voted 90% against the communists. These were not people who were going to support "Danny the Red" [Daniel Cohn-Bendit, one of the student strike leaders in Paris]. The people [in Strasbourg] were not going to support him. Even in the universities, when they went out on strike, the strike did not affect us, as I was saying.

Now, as I said, we got calls from Bob Anderson, the Political Counselor in Paris, asking us, "What's going on? There must be something happening." We kept telling him, "Sorry, nothing's going on."

Q: Did you get involved in "Army watching," because this was a big thing. I take it that an awful lot of the French Army is within the periphery of Strasbourg, though it may have been in Germany.

SMITH: It was in Germany.

Q: But still...

SMITH: De Gaulle went over to Germany to visit the French Army.

Q: I know that.

SMITH: De Gaulle made his first speech, which was a disaster. Then, on the following Sunday he made another speech, calling on everybody to rally around the Fifth Republic. In the interim, during that week, he had flown over to the [principal] French base in Germany and had met with the commanding general.

Q: Was it General Massu?

SMITH: Whoever it was. The general said, "We will support you but we won't fire on French people." So there was a lot of activity at about 3:00 AM, with the rumble of French Army vehicles below our windows, coming across the Rhine River from Germany and going to Paris.

Q: Well, as you went over and looked at the French Army, were you asking them, "What are you going to do?" In the first place, when De Gaulle went [to Strasbourg and Germany], he virtually disappeared from the radar. Everybody was wondering where the hell he was, including our Embassy.

SMITH: Actually, I didn't know where he was.

Q: But did you know what the French Army...

SMITH: I just called the Embassy in Paris the next morning and woke them up.

Q: Good God!

SMITH: So I said, "I guess you'd like to know that the French Army passed through Strasbourg at around 3:00 or 4:00 AM, going your way." At least they went along the main drag in Strasbourg from Kehl, Germany. Here's the Rhine River, and here is Kehl right here [opposite Strasbourg].

Q: Kehl is in Germany?

SMITH: Kehl's in Germany. But the main street in Strasbourg is the Avenue du Foret Noir, which then joins Avenue d'Alsace, and then becomes Avenue des Vosges. You have "Black Forest" Avenue and then "Alsatian" Avenue. And the Consulate General was on the Avenue d'Alsace. You could see these French Army vehicles coming down the Avenue du Foret Noir and continuing along the Avenue des Vosges. We didn't have any reason for thinking that they were going from Germany to Paris. Paris was 250 miles away -- that's a long drive. So we assumed that, while they might be taking up positions to quell uprisings, that wasn't happening in Alsace, so we assumed that they were going elsewhere. We could tell that some of these vehicles came from Germany, because of the markers on the tanks. But we had just had the May Day parade, with the same vehicles, and we were going to have another parade on Bastille Day [July 14], so we got an extra parade that year [1968].

Q: Did the Embassy give you any guidance or ask you to find out anything?

SMITH: No. The Embassy never paid any attention to us. You have to understand. We were unaffected by the strike.

Q: This was something that those Parisians did.

SMITH: Yes. So, to us, all of these were problems in Paris. Ambassador Sarge Shriver was sitting on the curbs, talking to the strikers, and all of that. It was another world, as far as we were concerned. Nothing was going on in Strasbourg. It was the only place in France that was unaffected, but everything was going on normally.

I went up to the steel factories in Lorraine, some of which were on strike, while others were not. The big concern of the workers was what they call the "SMIG" [Guaranteed Minimum Industrial Salary], the monthly salary for industrial groups. You had the "SMIG" and then you had the "SMAG" for agricultural workers. These people just wanted a raise. They weren't students -- they were workers. They just wanted more money, a raise. The "SMIG" was renegotiated every year with the big steel companies.

You just would not have known that this was a national strike, except for the fact that there were some inconveniences. You didn't get mail from Paris. The international mail went the other way. Instead of getting it from Paris in Strasbourg, we got it instead in Kehl and sent it to Paris. We drove our cars to Paris. Took two jerry cans of gas. You just couldn't get gas in many places. I would fill up the car -- you could get gas in Strasbourg. I would take two jerry cans with us -- 10 gallons. So that gave me 30 gallons of gas: 20 in the gas tank and 10 with me in the jerry cans. That would get us to the Embassy in Paris. We would fill up there, plus the jerry cans again. We took the old N4 highway.

Q: This points out how often, when you have a political crisis somewhere, many times it's really confined to the capital. People elsewhere are sitting around, thinking, "Big deal."

SMITH: It taught me a big lesson subsequently. We used to get all these memos from Embassy Paris. Charlie Tanguy [then First Secretary of the Embassy] would have had lunch with the Deputy from some godforsaken place, and this would go by an IMMEDIATE message to Washington. Who cared?

Q: It does put things into perspective. Well, let's go to Lyon. When you went as Consul General to Lyon, you were following in the illustrious footsteps of James Fennimore Cooper, who never really worked there but was assigned [to Lyon] as a sinecure, to give him a title.

SMITH: Right. He was the first American Consul in Lyon.

Q: You were in Lyon from 1969 to 1970. Could you talk about what you were doing? First of all, what was the situation?

SMITH: At that point Lyon was a city that was trying to find its future. It had had a dynamic mayor by the name of Louis Pradel in the great French tradition. He was the sort of heir to Edouard Herriot [Radical Party leader]. However, Lyon was in a sort of gentle decay. The textile industry was going down the tubes. That's where the "Jacquard Loom" was invented, which was the precursor to "punch card" textile machines. They had automobile and steel factories in Lyon, like Berliet. Berliet was in terrible condition. Lyon vied with Marseille but was presumably the second largest city in France. It had a rich, cultural tradition, and the people were very proud of being "Lyonnais," not Parisians. It had a mixed political life, including conservative and radical elements. They had had a couple of deaths during the riots [of May, 1968].

For us, Lyon had three or four reasons [for maintaining a Consulate there]. Lyon was the only city in France which officially celebrated July 4. It was a city holiday. That was because of the aid which the U. S. gave to the French Resistance [during the German Occupation in World War II] in 1943-1944. The Resistance was headquartered in Lyon during World War II.

Q: This was at the Hotel Terminus?

SMITH: Yes, and Jean Moulin [Director of the Resistance in France, killed by the Gestapo] and his associates were all in Lyon. The old-timers remembered with great fervor the help that the U. S. had given to Lyon.

The Consulate was there because Lyon was a crossroads and was the second largest city in France. If you were going to have a consulate, it made sense to be there. Thirdly, it was thought at one time that Lyon would become a very major economic center in France, and so we should be there. Fourthly, I say cynically, it happened to be just 30 kilometers from Vienne, where the famous restaurant, La Pyramide, was. Therefore, somebody had to be in Lyon to take care of all of the Congressmen and Senators who came through to get a good meal. I say that cynically...

Q: But with a certain justice.

SMITH: I remember that very well. How could you justify a Consulate then -- particularly during the Vietnam period? We had two policemen in front of our Consulate 24 hours a day. I also had a policeman in front of my house, 24 hours a day. There was very strong anti-U. S. and anti-Vietnam feeling in Lyon, because there were a lot of Vietnamese students, by the way, at the University of Lyon. You couldn't, in a way, justify this. We did very little political and economic work. What Ambassador Sarge Shriver wanted done was to show the flag in a discreet way. Don't take on the Vietnam issue. Take on the other issues.

I was in Lyon at the height of the space program -- going to the moon and all that. There was a company in Lyon which had made the lenses which were going to be used in the cameras sent along on the moon shot. We parlayed the Apollo program like you never saw. We had Apollo VI, VII, VIII, IX, XI, XII, XIII. We showed movies all over the place. We even had one of the "moon rocks," and thousands of people saw this crazy little stone.

We kept a reasonably low profile on political matters. I handled most of the work on economic matters. The Consulate in Lyon was a visa-issuing post. It was just a Consulate. The Consular District went up to Dijon, across to Clermont-Ferrand, and down to Valence. It covered 15 departments -- a pretty large area.

Now, did I do anything good for the United States? I don't know.

Q: Well, part of it is just being there.

SMITH: There was no question that the Lyonnais liked Americans personally. It was a great place for our kids. We lived in a Swiss-type chalet. The official residence of the Consul at that time was a Swiss chalet, right on the well-known Boulevard des Belges, which overlooked Lyon's central park -- something like the Boston Gardens -- with the world's largest collection of tulips. We had a wonderful time in Lyon. It's a city with an old, long-established upper class and, in those days, a working class. There was very little in the middle. That has changed significantly. Lyon has become a fairly vibrant, economic center. But I believe that we've closed our Consulate there.

Q: How did you treat the Vietnam War? This was at the beginning...

SMITH: I was very much in favor of the Vietnam War.

Q: At this exact period I was Consul General in Saigon. You supported the Vietnam War. How did you treat it and deal with it, because, obviously, you couldn't just duck this?

SMITH: I just faced it straight on. I would say that, to the best of my knowledge, the Vietnamese asked for our help against the communists. I would say that there is no way you can tell me that the communists are good guys. They have a typical, totalitarian system. We had a commitment and we intended to meet it. How would you like it if we didn't carry out our commitments [in Europe]? What would you think if you had a [external security] problem [at some time in the future] and came to us and said that we had a treaty commitment to help you? And then what would happen if we didn't meet our commitment? I never ducked the issue. I didn't raise the issue. I didn't go out and volunteer. I didn't want to be stoned or have something else thrown at me. I never ducked the issue but was very straightforward. I said to most of my French contacts, "We probably disagree." I went on television, radio, and all that sort of stuff. We had our talking points from the Department of State.

It wasn't until I got back to Washington that I saw that we really were not addressing the war correctly. I was always a supporter of the Vietnam War, right to the bitter end. When I say that we weren't addressing the war correctly, I thought that we had handled it badly in the military sense, that we didn't throw all of our muscle into it early on. I think that gradualism in war doesn't work.

As far as the French were concerned, I said that we were taking a stand here, and you can join us or not. Then I said, "We'll remember you." Then they started thinking.

Q: Particularly because a place like Lyon did remember.

SMITH: I would say, "You guys left us this problem." I kept going back to Dien Bien Phu and said, "We're continuing what you asked us to do. So don't come at me."

Q: How did you find the French Communist Party? What was its strength, what problems did it present, and how did you...

SMITH: Well, Lyon had a pretty strong Communist Party in those days. I think that Lyon and Marseille were the two big places [for the party] outside of Paris. However, they were pretty grubby, scruffy types. In those days Lyon was a pretty ugly city -- gray concrete and stucco buildings. You'd go down to the working class districts, and it was pretty grubby.

The communists never gave me any problems because I'd walk right in there and say, "Okay, you're in a communist labor union. I just want you to know that I don't believe in communism. I'm here to tell you a different story." They would say, "Well, Mr. Consul General, we are very honored to receive you" and all that. Whether they were communists or right wingers, they would always use that protocol stuff.

They never touched us. During the two years that I was there, they only splashed paint on our Consulate once, which was lucky. We had to close the Consulate a couple of times because there were going to be demonstrations against us, particularly when President Nixon ordered the invasion of Cambodia.

Q: That was in the spring of 1970.

SMITH: So we closed down. We sent our people home. Again, you depended on the "International New York Herald-Tribune" to know what was going on in connection with Vietnam. We were on the receiving line. I can't say that we faced any physical danger.

Q: What about the power and influence of the French intellectuals in Lyon? I take it that this didn't sound like very fertile ground for them. [Intellectual opposition to the Vietnam War] sounds like more of a Left Bank, Parisian manifestation.

SMITH: Lyon had its "Left Wing" element at the University of Lyon, but it was much less of a political university than [the universities] in Paris. Lyon had a major medical school. Students who want to become doctors don't have enough time to demonstrate. So the "Left Wing," intellectual element was really not a factor. I'm sure it was among the literary types, but Lyon was a very conservative city, even though it had a Socialist Party mayor and a long tradition of being anti-Paris. But that's because it was Lyon and not because Paris was pro-De Gaulle at that time, I would say. The Left Wing was there in Lyon, but so was the Right Wing. There were kooky Right Wing groups, I can tell you.

Q: Did you have Poujade or Le Pen supporters?

SMITH: We had the "juriste" movement. You had the anti-Algerian group, but it was relatively small. You had the "juriste" or secessionist movement, named after the Jura Plateau, which wanted to get out of France! [Laughter].

Q: Sounds like a non-starter.

SMITH: Then you had people in Clermont-Ferrand who worked for the Michelin [Tire Company]. That was a company town. Everything was owned by the Michelin family. I'll never forget one time when I went to Clermont-Ferrand. I was paying a call on the head of the Michelin Tire Company. I went into this factory office. It looked like something out of the 1920's. All of the secretaries and the receptionist were women, of course. But they were dressed in long, brown smocks, practically down to their ankles. Their hair was tied back and they had horn-rimmed glasses. They were the ugliest women I ever saw in my life. You waited in the waiting room. In most cases in those days, if you went into a French corporate headquarters, there would perhaps be a picture of the president [of the company] and a picture of De Gaulle. In this waiting room there was only one picture on the wall. It was the portrait of the President of Sears Roebuck, because Michelin was the tire supplier for Sears. [Laughter]. They knew where their money was coming from, where their bread was being buttered. No picture of De Gaulle, no picture of Michelin -- just a picture of the President of Sears Roebuck.

Q: Tell me. Both in Strasbourg and Lyon, you got a pretty good look at French industry. What was your impression of French industry?

SMITH: It was terrible. They were never going to "make it." Now, what they were very, very good at, which history has since proved, is services. They were thinking ahead about how you provide services, as opposed to manufacturing. But the working conditions [in the factories] were appalling. Here was a country which had been unionized, in many ways, long before the United States, in which the unions were relatively much more powerful. And yet the "patronat" [the bosses], depending on which government was in power, were as reactionary as you could possibly imagine. You couldn't survive the working conditions, even in Mississippi. I was stunned. No worker protection against hazardous conditions. Technology was very sporadic. This was the time when Jean-Jacques Schreiber was writing about "Le defi Americaine" [The American Challenge]. They thought that we were going to take them over. The best technology came from the United States. If you went to the GM, Caterpillar, Timken, or Cincinnati Millicron factories, our technology was generations ahead of these guys, relatively speaking.

Q: When I was in Italy, I found that the unions were used so much for political purposes and maybe getting salary raises that they didn't get around to working conditions.

SMITH: I never saw them get around to working conditions. I was appalled. An American company could bring its way of handling workers, even if the company wasn't unionized, like Timken. It would be far ahead of anything the French had. The whole working relationship was much better. It showed. The workers dropped lifetime employment with Berliet to go and work for E. I. Lilley, which was a gamble.

I know that there have been dramatic changes in France since that time. I'm talking about conditions 25 or 26 years ago. French manufacturing has improved, and all of that. I was stunned at the lack of worker amenities, given the strength of the labor unions.

Q: You left Lyon after two years [in 1970] and went to a fascinating position where you were a staff assistant to the President, 1971-1973.

MAX W. KRAUS
Information Officer, USIS
Paris (1967-1972)

Max W. Kraus was born in Germany in 1920. He received a bachelor's degree from Harvard University in 1941. Mr. Kraus worked for the Psychological Warfare Detachment of the U.S. Army from 1944-1949 and joined the USIA in 1956. His Foreign Service career included positions in Italy, Cambodia, the Congo, France, and Switzerland. He was interviewed by Cliff Groce in 1988.

KRAUS: Russ saw what the situation was like and he got me an assignment to Paris. Even though it was a very expensive post, I did have all of these allowances and I was able to survive financially again.

Q: It is not exactly a hardship post.

KRAUS: It is not exactly a hardship post.

Q: So, those were the circumstances of your leaving VOA? I had not realized that you --

KRAUS: That was the circumstances under which I left VOA. Otherwise, I enjoyed my tour of VOA and would not have minded staying on until, in due course of events, I would get another assignment abroad.

Q: Russ was very good with the human side of the place. I have always appreciated that.

KRAUS: Yes.

Q: So, you went to Paris as what?

KRAUS: As information officer.

Q: Which involved doing what?

KRAUS: Information officer --

Q: I know, but --

KRAUS: As information officer, I dealt mainly with the French electronic media, radio and television, because we had a press attaché who dealt mainly with the written press. Although I got involved in that, too.

Q: Who was that --

KRAUS: At the beginning, it was Nick King. Then, after Chip Bohlen, who was my first ambassador in Paris -- left and was replaced by Sargent Shriver. Sarge decided that Nick King was not the kind of press attaché that he wanted and he started shopping around for a new press attaché and finally settled on Bill Payeff.

In addition to dealing with the electronic media, my information section also did quick overnight translation into French of important documents from The Wireless File and distributed it to leading French newspapers -- especially Le Monde, which was always interested in full texts.

We also published a magazine called "Informations et Documents."

Q: Still do?

KRAUS: No.

Q: Paris has dropped that?

KRAUS: Yes, has dropped it on instructions from Washington. I mean, I was already familiar with Informations et Documents, because we used to distribute it in Phnom Penh --

Q: How about in Africa, too?

KRAUS: Yes, it went to all French speaking posts world-wide. I was the publisher of Informations et Documents, but we had two extremely talented French national employees, Pierre Ferenczi and Marc Saporta who actually did most of the editing.

When I came to Paris, Lee Brady was PAO. I had been told in Washington, you may think you are in charge of Informations et Documents, but actually that magazine is run by Pierre Ferenczi and Mark Saporta. They have known Lee Brady forever and ever.

They will deal directly with Lee. Your name will appear on the masthead, but you will not have anything to say. So, I moved rather slowly and did not try to mess with the copy that Ferenczi and Saporta had prepared. Gradually they saw that I knew what I was doing and voluntarily showed me copy before it went into the magazine.

In fact, the two collaborated on a two-volume comparative encyclopedia of the Soviet Union and the United States, where there were -- on facing pages -- always articles about the same subject in the United States and the Soviet Union.

Q: Fascinating.

KRAUS: They presented me with copies of this encyclopedia and wrote a dedication in it of which I am still very proud. They said, "To Max Kraus from the authors who only regret that they did not have the benefit of his collaboration and wisdom in the preparation of this work."

Q: That is mighty flattering.

KRAUS: The other thing that we pioneered in Paris, in television, were the television cooperative projects -- where we would make a financial contribution to French networks exchange for direct projection rights of the programs in USIS centers.

The first case where we did this collaboration was in a wonderful series of documentaries called "The Great Battles of World War II," which was prepared by a team of Daniel Costelle, Henri de Turenne and Jean Louis Guillaud.

This team really pioneered the documentary technique where you take historical film footage and then intercut it with interviews with eye witnesses of the battles that they were treating. Costelle always came to me and wanted my help in locating French speaking American eye witnesses to battles.

Two of the eye witnesses I found for him were Bill Payeff, because Costelle was looking for somebody who landed on Omaha Beach in the first wave on D-Day, and Bill did.

Q: I did not know that.

KRAUS: Oh, yes, Bill gave a marvelous interview. I mean -- things that touched your heart strings -- how scared he was wading ashore and so on. I later on accused him of being one of the great method actors of our day.

Q: That was before he developed the belly?

KRAUS: Yes. Another much better known eye witness that I found for Costelle was when he was doing the battle of Italy. Our defense attaché in Paris at that time was Major General Vernon A. Walters who had been General Mark Clark's Aide-de-Camp during the Italian Campaign.

I took Costelle over to Dick Walters' office. Walters immediately started spewing out fascinating anecdotes in absolutely impeccable, accent free, slangy French. Costelle was drooling over this thing.

Finally, he said to Walters -- who accepted to be interviewed -- General, there is one request I have, either you agree to wear your full American uniform with decorations, when we interview you, or otherwise, try to put on a slight fake accent in French. Otherwise, nobody will believe that you are an American general.

Q: Apparently he speaks several languages just that way?

KRAUS: Oh, yes, he speaks German and Italian, Spanish and Portuguese. He is a fabulous linguist.

So, this was the first TV cooperative we did.

Q: That is an auspicious beginning.

KRAUS: Yes, and, when they did the Battle of the Pacific -- which, of course, required considerable cost in travel -- we chipped in. Then, we continued to do other similar projects with French television.

I think the most memorable one was a documentary which was produced by Danielle Hunebelle, a French woman journalist, very experienced and also a documentary producer. Danielle had interviewed Henry Kissinger in the United States and got a mortal crush on him. She later on wrote a book in which she describes with utter candor her unsuccessful pursuit of Henry Kissinger.

Danielle had sold an idea to the news director of the second French television network, Jacqueline Baudrieri, who was running a weekly magazine called, "Le Troisieme Oeil," The Third Eye.

Hunebelle wanted to do a sequence called "La Societe Des Mes Reves," The Society of My Dreams -- where she would pick a young French factory worker and tell him, "You must have thought about countries that might interest you, where you might want to live? I will give you a choice of three countries that you want to see and we will take you there. I will follow along with the camera team and look over your shoulder."

Q: What an intriguing idea.

KRAUS: Yes. The young factory worker chose three countries; Cuba, the United States and Japan. Danielle had already told us, I will guarantee that one of the countries that he will choose will be the United States.

So, we gave her, I think, about $25,000 for this project. We could not have asked for a better result, because the young factory worker said in the end, "Cuba, it is just one big jail. I visited a jail in Las Vegas and I would rather be in a jail in Las Vegas than a free man in Cuba."

Q: So, he went to all three countries?

KRAUS: Yes.

Q: Boy.

KRAUS: He said Japan may be all right for the Japanese, but it is not for me. But, the United States, there I could live happily. I think the reason why Danielle Hunebelle wanted to do this project is because, when she came to Washington, she hoped that she could have the young man received by Nixon and by Henry Kissinger.

Q: So she could see Henry Kissinger?

KRAUS: So she could see Henry Kissinger. Well, it did not come off, because Kissinger was not in town. But every time that Kissinger came to Paris, she called me up and said, you must tell Henry that I have to see him. She finally gave up her pursuit and Henry married Nancy rather than Danielle Hunebelle -- but, Danielle tried.

Well, of course, there are lots and lots of other anecdotes about Paris.

Q: So, let us have some.

KRAUS: The principal one is the change that came about when Bohlen left and Shriver took over. Because Bohlen was in Paris -- you know -- when de Gaulle was at the Elysée in his most anti-American period.

He had kicked out NATO headquarters and withdrawn from the military command structure of NATO and missed no chance of hitting us over the head. There was absolutely no way in which we had of working on common policies with the French.

So, Bohlen, who spoke absolutely fluent French, kept a very low profile, made relatively few public appearances, but kept in touch with the French government and reported his conversations back to Washington and briefed the French government on our foreign policy.

Then, Shriver came, who had no diplomatic experience other than the running of the Peace Corps.

Q: Which is not diplomatic experience?

KRAUS: Which is not diplomatic experience. He spoke execrable French, but, he is a communicator. Burnett Anderson, who replaced Lee Brady, said, actually Shriver knew much more French than he let on -- that he had told Burnett once -- my French is absolutely at the perfect level where I want it.

When I speak French, the Frenchmen understand me, even if they speak no English, and Americans understood my French, even if they knew not a word of it.

Shriver decided that he could not operate in the same manner as Bohlen. He very shrewdly decided that he had something which Bohlen did not have and that was the Kennedy connection. The Kennedy's were extremely popular in France. Shriver decided that he would make himself highly visible, do lots of traveling, make lots of public appearances --

Q: Redesigned the interior of the residence?

KRAUS: Yes, that among other things, too, and make himself the crystallization point of the very large reservoir of goodwill toward the United States that still existed in France in spite of de Gaulle's fulminations.

He was very successful in doing that. He would have been even more successful except for one thing. He was habitually and always late for everything, including for parties at his own residence.

We -- working guests -- arrived the obligatory fifteen minutes before the party started, and guests would arrive and ask where Monsieur L'Ambassadeur was. We always alibied that he was unavoidably detained in the office by a very important telephone call from the Secretary of State.

It might have worked, except for one time, and that was that the residence in Avenue d'Iena had only one entrance from the street, and, in order to get to the family quarters, you had to pass by the rooms where the reception was taking place -- which were open.

About five or ten, sometimes fifteen minutes after the guests had started arriving, you would see Shriver sneaking in, in sweaty tennis clothes and make a dash upstairs to change. That, of course, does not go over well in a country where punctuality is the politeness of kings.

Shriver also was very unorthodox in his -- let us say -- public affairs programs. In fact, he drove his officers to distraction with some of his far out ideas.

For instance, Shriver had arranged for the American Davis Cup Team to come to France for a series of exhibition matches and clinics. He wanted to kick off this tour of France with a very highly and visible event where it would be covered by the press. He asked Bob Anderson, who was the chief of the political section at that time, to ask the French whether we could mark out a tennis court in Place de la Concord --

Q: Oh, my God.

KRAUS: -- to play an exhibition doubles match in which he would play. Of course, Anderson was laughed out of the Quai D'ORSAY, because, if you would mark out a tennis court, it would have caused the most monstrous traffic jam in history.

Q: Traffic is impossible as it is -- of course.

KRAUS: Finally, he had to settle for playing in the private tennis court of the French Senate in the Palais de Luxembourg, but only after we had made another attempt to mark out the tennis courts in the Place de l'Hotel de Ville.

Lee Brady did not go along with these unorthodox ideas of Shriver. Therefore, Shriver decided that he needed another PAO and Lee was permitted to go back to the states and Burnett Anderson took over.

Q: I do not think Bernie Anderson would be any more sympathetic --

KRAUS: Well, but -- he had a better way of handling Shriver. He kind of made Shriver think that he had decided it was a bad idea, but he did some very successful things.

For instance --

Q: You mean Shriver?

KRAUS: Well, Shriver suggested things. For instance, in the 1968 presidential election, we had a big party in the Hotel Talleyrand -- an election party. We had converted the Hotel Talleyrand into an American style election headquarters with tally boards and everything else. We decided to invite all the Parisian V.I.P.'s, including show business people.

Shriver had even arranged to have a live donkey and a small elephant in the lobby. This was a wild success. The French television and radio did live broadcasts from the Talleyrand and it was a smashing success. So, Burnett knew how to handle Shriver, which Lee never did -- because, Lee is a crusty man who likes to do things according to the book.

The other very exciting thing in Paris was, of course, the events of May and June, 1968 -- the student riots on the Left Bank, which coincided with the beginning of the Vietnam negotiations in Paris.

You had the whole world press. I think it was the first example of media overkill in history -- for the beginning of the Vietnam negotiations. That, of course, was more or less a one day photo opportunity when the talks opened.

I was put in charge of accrediting the media for the briefings of the U.S. spokesmen, and, also, to set up a press working room in what is now the restaurant of the Hotel Crillon.

The press came for the opening of the Vietnam talks, but then stayed on to cover what was going on in the Left Bank, until Paris was paralyzed by the strikes. I mean, the airports were closed. The railroads were on strike. The Metro was on strike.

There were no newspapers being published and it got to be increasingly impossible for -- especially the television people -- to get their stories out of Paris. TV also was on strike.

For a while, they took their tapes up to Brussels by car and sent them from there. Then, gasoline started to run short and that became impossible. They finally went home. It was a very, very exciting period in France.

Q: How long did that period last?

KRAUS: May and June, 1968.

Q: What about some exciting adventures?

KRAUS: There are so many, I do not know where to begin.

Q: It is your choice.

KRAUS: One of the things that happened in Paris was that we had lots of visits from astronauts, who always came for the big Paris air show.

I was put in charge of their media relations. Later on, we got the first moon rock. Well, the Apollo 11 crew, of course, came over -- Borman was the first of the astronauts who came.

The, the Apollo 9 crew came for one of the air shows and then Apollo 11 came. That is a whole long story which I will not bore you with because it is in the manuscript of the book that I have written.

Then, after the Apollo 11 mission, NASA sent a moon rock to Europe, which was first shown in England and then in France. I was sent over to London to bring the moon rock back --

Q: Custodian?

KRAUS: -- to France. It was shown all over France. We had made an arrangement with one of the so-called radio peripheriques -- you know -- the radio stations that have studios in Paris, but their transmitter is outside of France with Europe #1, which had an especially good space commentator.

Europe #1 agreed to co-sponsor and finance the showings of the moon rock outside of Paris. I spent a lot of time babysitting the moon rock around France. Again, that is in a chapter of the book, so I will not repeat it here.

That was another highlight of my stay in Paris. I had a lot of fun.

Q: Is that enough that you want to talk about Paris?

CARL F. SALANS
Delegate, Vietnam Negotiations
Paris (1968-1969)

Carl Salans grew up in Chicago Heights, Illinois. He graduated from Harvard and received his law degree at Cambridge. He worked in the legal office of the State Department beginning in 1959. Mr. Salans also participated in the Vietnam Peace Talks in Paris. He was interviewed by Richard L. Jackson in 1998.

SALANS: Then in the fall of 1968, Governor Harriman asked that I come to Paris to help in the delegation there and the negotiations with the Vietnamese to try and resolve the Vietnam situation. So, in November, I think it was, of 1968, I moved to Paris and was here.

Q: Had the election probably taken place? This was the last months of the Democratic administration.

SALANS: The elections must have taken place. It was the last months of the Democratic administration, but there was still an effort being made on the part of Governor Harriman and Cyrus Vance to try to conclude an agreement with the Vietnamese before Mr. Johnson left office. That's my recollection. I remember working with the two of them to try to persuade everybody and then even into the first days of the Nixon administration, that an agreement could be reached with the Vietnamese which would have been an agreement that would have in effect declared Vietnam to be a neutral country and keep the government that then existed in place with the addition of representatives of the North Vietnamese. In other words, I think the term was a coalition government, everybody recognizing that the likely outcome of this coalition government would be the North Vietnamese communist dominance of the government. But, the feeling was that was the best the United States could obtain anyway even if it continued to fight; therefore, why not do what was at least on the face of it an honorable settlement of the war which would give the non-communist parties in South Vietnam an opportunity to prevail if they did the right things, but which would have the risk in it that the North Vietnamese would dominate and eventually take over the whole country. That was felt by Harriman, Vance, and others who shared that view including me, that would avoid continuing the war and reach an outcome that was likely to be the result of the war anyway. Those were in the first days I was at the negotiations in Paris that was our principal preoccupation. This was not so much a legal job, but I think I was perhaps helpful in putting this sort of suggested solution in the context of historical continuity of policy toward Southeast Asia going back to the 1954 agreements and then the 1962 agreements, which made it a sensible and honorable solution and a solution which had been tried before in this part of the world.

Q: There was intense scrutiny of those negotiations by the press. Were they going on two levels, the open, public meetings and then there were the quiet meetings in safe houses that both the Vietnamese and we had direct contact?

SALANS: Yes, that is exactly what was happening; although, the truth is as far as I was concerned, I did not know for a long time that those secret meetings were going on. I don't know whether that was common in the delegation for the more junior people. I'm sure that Harriman and Cyrus Vance and probably Philip Habib knew what was going on. I'm not sure whether the Carl Salans and the Dick Holbrookes knew what was going on.

Q: In Phil Habib's own oral history, he describes intricate logistics of picking up Vance and Harriman and these safe houses out in the suburbs, how they would get figures as visible as Harriman and Vance without the press getting on to it.

SALANS: Yes, of course, I have read about all of that since, but I'm telling you that at the time and for a long time, I did not know that was going on even though day in and day out, I was in the Embassy delegation working with all these people. I simply didn't know. My activity was limited to what the public saw which were weekly meetings between the two delegations at I think it was called the Hotel Majestic on the Avenue Kleber, where statements would be made by each of the delegations. I drafted many of those statements on the part of the United States because again as I have said earlier, Governor Harriman relied on me to a great extent for drafting his statements. But those statements really got nowhere. They were just the public face. The real negotiation was going on between Mr. Kissinger and Le Duc Tho.

Q: With Kissinger then, that was in the next phase when the Nixon administration came in.

SALANS: Yes, that's right. Because, by the time I got to Paris which was November, I think at that point while Harriman was still trying to reach an agreement, I think he saw the North Vietnamese and the South Vietnamese were not going to agree on anything until the new administration came in and they could see what the policy of the new administration would be.

Q: Phil Habib alleged in his oral history that the new administration actually passed a message "Hang tough; you'll get a better deal from us." to the Vietnamese via that well-known Taiwanese.

SALANS: He passed this message to the South Vietnamese, not to the North Vietnamese. They passed this message to General Thieu who was then the president of South Vietnam. Again, I have read this since. I didn't know at the time that such a message had been passed, but reading the memoirs of people like Henry Kissinger and William Bundy, one sees that in fact that did happen and accounts for the fact that the South Vietnamese dragged their feet until the new administration.

Q: Did you notice a stiffening of their position?

SALANS: We definitely noticed a stiffening in their position as we sat there. As I said earlier, both Governor Harriman and Mr. Vance became less and less optimistic as the end of the Johnson administration came that they would be able to do anything because they could see that the South Vietnamese government was not prepared to go along, was dragging its feet, and they suspected if they didn't know that the new administration had told them not to make an agreement.

Q: I would think you as the legal advisor must have been frustrated. The delegation was meeting secretly and there are the open talks and the new incoming administration saying hold off, don't make a deal.

SALANS: Yes, I was very frustrated, and my frustration eventually led to my leaving the State Department and the decision to stay in Paris and go into private practice. It was extremely frustrating because I felt very strongly that in 1968 and early 1969 an agreement could have been reached which would have preserved the ability of the South Vietnamese, our South Vietnamese as opposed to the Viet Cong, it preserved their ability to survive if they could politically function properly without the war continuing. You could have negotiated with North Vietnam a coalition government solution. They would have been perfectly confident that with time, they could have prevailed, but you would at least have preserved a chance for our South Vietnamese to prevail and stopped the fighting at that point I think. When we saw what the new administration wanted to do was in effect to continue the war to save the "honor" of the United States as they saw it, I found that extremely frustrating and I quickly decided to come back to Washington to finish my career in the State Department and then to leave the Department altogether and to return to Paris to practice law.

Q: So you then stayed in Paris a little bit into 1969 with the new team.

SALANS: I did. I stayed all of 1969 here in Paris. I wanted to leave earlier. I remember going to Governor Harriman while he was still here, it must have been the end of 1968, and saying to him that I would like to leave because I was just so unhappy. He said to me that I should stay. He said the government needs people like you to stay and continue to fight for what you think is the right position. You should stay. "I'm leaving," he said, "but you should stay." That sort of puffed up my chest and head a little bit and I stayed on for another year, but nothing changed and indeed I thought it even got worse in the sense that we began to extend the war into Cambodia, into Laos. The whole policy of saving the honor of the United States by intensifying the war under the guise of a withdrawal of American forces, but relying more on bombers and impersonal methods of warfare, I found an obnoxious policy, so I asked to be sent back to Washington. Jack Stevenson from Sullivan and Cromwell was then the Legal Advisor in the State Department. He wanted me back to help him run the office. So, I spent a year more, 1970-71. During this period, I was occasionally detached from the Vietnam delegation to perform specific functions on behalf of the U.S. Government elsewhere. I remember going to The Hague as the legal advisor on the U.S. delegation to negotiate the first International Aircraft Hijacking Convention. I remember the French delegation at that conference, heading by Mr. Guillaume, who is now a judge on the International Court of Justice, playing a very obstructive role, not wanting to surrender sovereignty by agreeing to extradite hijackers to another country. I remember being sent to Tripoli to assist Ambassador Palmer in negotiating the withdrawal of American forces from Wheeling Air Force Base in Libya after Qadhafi came to power. That was an interesting experience, because the Libyan Government had organized mobs of screaming Libyans outside the conference room, shouting "Go Home", and every time the negotiations reached a difficult point, a member of the Libyan delegation would get up from the table, walk over to a window and open it so we could better hear the howling mob. At the outset of the negotiations, Ambassador Palmer had to ask the Libyan delegation (whose members were all dressed in battle fatigues) to remove their submachine guns from the room, where they had brought them into the room and laid them on the negotiating table, to impress us. That was quite an experience.

Q: Before we get into that, there was quite a transition in the working composition of the delegation. Is it your perception that the new administration came in with considerable suspicion, replaced the Vietnamese speaking American interpreters, that kind of a thing? People like Phil Habib would have been phasing out in that period. Did you see that kind of reshuffle transition?

SALANS: No. There was of course a reshuffling at the top. Harriman and Vance left. I believe the first person that came in after that was Henry Cabot Lodge and then David Bruce followed as the negotiator. Then eventually Philip Habib became the negotiator. I think he was head of the delegation for awhile wasn't he?

Q: He describes in his oral history with a lot of indignation somebody he brought in to interpret who knew Vietnam that initially the incoming team didn't want to use. I think he said they turned it over to General Vernon Walters. He set up the safe house negotiations through French intelligence sources.

SALANS: I do remember that General Walters suddenly began to appear as a principal player in the negotiations. That I do recall with the advent of the new administration. At the lower level, I remember Philip Habib staying on. I remember Bob Miller staying on. I remember Dick Holbrooke staying on I can't recall the other...

Q: John Negroponte.

SALANS: John Negroponte stayed on. I stayed on during that period. At the level of interpreters, I don't remember that frankly. I don't see what the importance of that would have been at that level, but I certainly do remember Vernon Walters suddenly appearing and becoming more of a presence. He had an office not with the delegation but elsewhere in the Embassy. One would see more of him starting with the new administration.

Q: That was quite a crew, Dick Holbrooke and John Negroponte and some of the people who rose to the surface. You observed them in fairly intense activity in this period?

SALANS: I did. They were young at that time, as was I. We were all in our 30's although Holbrooke, I think, may have been in his 20's. I'm not sure. We were all young people. Holbrooke and Negroponte were extremely bright people. Dick Holbrooke even at that time was an aggressive young hawk type person, but much admired by everybody he worked with, an obvious star, as he later became. John Negroponte was a quieter person but also very bright, very imaginative. They were both devoted hard working people and as I recall it, very frustrated people in the delegation, as I was. I certainly had the highest admiration for them as I did for Bob Miller who was a more senior foreign service officer at that time. I remember a funny incident with Bob Miller. He was, from a hierarchical standpoint, below me in the hierarchy of the State Department. I was Deputy Legal Advisor which was the equivalent of a Deputy Assistant Secretary of State, and I think he maybe was at the level of a desk officer, but Phil Habib asked me if despite that I would be willing to sit lower down in the delegation of the ranks when the delegation marched into the room where the famous four sided table was, would I be willing to sit and have Bob Miller sit in a higher order. Of course I said yes. It had no importance to me whatsoever. He was a wonderful guy and also I think deeply frustrated as I saw it. Peter Tarnoff and Jim Rosenthal were also involved in the Vietnam Peace Talk and they later rose to the heights in the Department.

ROBERT O. BLAKE
Paris (1968-1970)

Ambassador Robert O. Blake was born in California in 1921. He entered the Foreign Service in 1947. His career included positions in Managua, Moscow, Tokyo, Tunis, Leopoldville, and Paris, and an ambassador to Mali. Ambassador Blake was interviewed by Horace G. Torbert in 1990.

BLAKE: And then I went to Paris.

I had been told, again, that I was going to Vietnam to have one of the top jobs in the embassy there, head of the so-called "I" Corps operation. I was actually training to go there when I was told that I was to go to Paris, which, of course, delighted me. Sargent Shriver, the new ambassador in Paris, did not like the DCM who was there, Woody Wallner, a very capable Foreign Service Officer, but older than Sarge. And so he asked for a list of names and chose me from this list to be his DCM. I had not met him but he turned out to be a very good friend, and my wife and I had two very fascinating years. I stayed there until Shriver left and then overlapped for a good six months with the new ambassador, Dick Watson.

Q: Was De Gaulle still there?

BLAKE: De Gaulle left office while we were there and Pompidou took over as President. And I saw a certain amount of De Gaulle and, indeed, got to know Pompidou quite well before he became the President. It was a period when our relations with the French, which had been extremely bad, began to improve. First of all, there had been the riots of the students in May, just before we got there. We arrived there just at the time of the Russian occupation of Czechoslovakia after the "Prague spring."

Q: That was 1968.

BLAKE: Right. We were in Paris from 1968 to 1970. The United States was helpful to the French in a number of instances and the relations with De Gaulle began to unfreeze. Indeed, they were very much improved by the time of the visit of President Nixon to France just after his inauguration. This was as a part of a broader European tour, and Nixon did an excellent job. De Gaulle came out of these talks with a high regard for President Nixon.

Q: And it was following your assignment to Paris that you were appointed as Ambassador to Mali.

BLAKE: Yes. There were a lot of politics involved in that assignment. Not long after Shriver left, a new ambassador came in, who, of course, was a Republican. The ambassador went on leave to the States, when he came back, he told me that people in the White House were convinced that I was a card-carrying Democrat because I had served first with Adlai Stevenson and then with Shriver; they didn't want me in Paris.

This report was confirmed to me by the Deputy Under Secretary, Bill Macomber who, while he regretted it, said that there wasn't very much he could do and that I could have any embassy that was open at the time. He felt it was important for me to get to a new place, get established, and get this behind me.

THOMAS F. CONLON
Nice (1968-1970)

Thomas F. Conlon was born in Illinois in 1924 and received his BS from Georgetown University in 1948. He served overseas in the US Army from 1943-1945. Upon entering the Foreign Service, he was posted in Havana, Surabaya, Singapore, Saigon, Le Havre, Manila, Nice, Canberra, and Bangkok. In 1992 Mr.

Conlon was interviewed by Arbor W. Gray.

Q: Did you return to Saigon from Manila?

CONLON: Only for about a week, enough time to pack up and head for Nice. Joan was still in Manila with the children, whose school year did not end until March, 1969. She stayed until they finished the school year and then came to Nice with them.

In Nice, although I was still very weak and could not put in more than a few hours of work per day, I was slowly recovering from hepatitis. Nice was an ideal post for this purpose. I would come into the small office, which had another American, Bill Holm, with me, plus seven very capable French employees, at about 10:00 AM, stay till about 1:00 PM, have lunch, take a nap, return for a couple of hours in the afternoon, leave the Consulate at 6:00 PM, have dinner at a local hotel or restaurant, and go to bed at 8:00 PM or so, unless I had a reception or dinner to attend. I paced myself carefully and recovered slowly but steadily.

Initially, when I was in Nice by myself, I lived in a hotel near the Consulate. However, I found a beautiful house, big enough for our large family, on the Moyenne Corniche East of Nice, with a fantastic view of the harbor at Villefranche. The kitchen was fairly primitive, as Joan regularly reminded me, and there were no domestic servants available. However, we found suitable French schools for the younger children. Some of them still remembered their French from Saigon and Le Havre, but the others more or less had to sink or swim. Actually, they did pretty well.

Our two eldest sons had completed high school with nothing better than "C" grades. I told them that, as they were of draft age, they should serve in the Army or another service and go through college after their military service, as I had done myself. I don't think that the boys much appreciated my attitude, particularly as they knew that many of their contemporaries in high school in Manila were going on to college in the U. S., where they could get deferments and avoid military service entirely under our truly iniquitous draft law, as many of them did. I had warned them that I could not see why we should spend the kind of money college involved, even then, when they had made so little effort in high school. After a couple of months in Nice they returned to the U. S., Paco joining the Army, where he served in an intelligence unit, and Terry joining the Air Force, where he served in communications. Both were assigned to Southeast Asia--Paco in Vietnam (in Bien Hoa and Cu Chi) and Terry at Nakhon Phnom, Thailand, on the Mekong River, at a Strategic Air Command base.

I mention family matters because a Foreign Service Officer, like everyone else, lives in both his official and personal dimension. Some of the problems, such as health conditions and the education of our children, are quite unique and unlike those facing our relatives and friends back in the U. S.

ROBERT H. MILLER
Paris Peace Talks (Vietnam)
Paris (1968-1971)

Ambassador Robert H. Miller was born in Port Angeles, Washington in 1927. He joined the Foreign Service in 1956. His career included positions in France and Vietnam, and ambassadorships to Malaysia and the Ivory Coast. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1990.

Q: You were then assigned to the Paris Peace Talks from 1968 to '71. How did you get this assignment and how did you feel about it? I ask this because in the Foreign Service one likes to move around a bit.

MILLER: Looking back on it, from the standpoint of a career pattern it may not have been the best career move, but I was pleased with the assignment. Phil Habib, who had been my boss for the latter part of my term on the desk, replacing Len Unger, asked me to join the delegation. He was the senior career State Department person, the Chief of Staff, of the Delegation. I was pleased. My wife and I loved Paris. We had spent three years there in the NATO delegation as junior officer and were delighted to go back. I thought that at least it was a constructive effort on Vietnam at that point. I have said, and it is probably true, that I stayed a year longer than I might have had the peace talks been anywhere else.

It did get frustrating, however. In the Nixon/Kissinger era which was basically the time I was there, from the Delegation standpoint and certainly with the benefit of hindsight, my view is reinforced that our negotiating positions were always too little and too late. Sometimes we would say on the Delegation that we had thought of everything but Washington had rejected it. Nixon and Kissinger had their own view about how to play this; how we should withdraw from Vietnam without dishonoring the soldiers who had lost their lives there. They could truly say that they were not responsible for getting us involved in that war. But anyway, it quickly became apparent that we were not negotiating, we were just going through the motions. The most interesting part was the times that we met privately with the North Vietnamese, which we did do from time to time.

Q: I wonder if you could explain what the setup was?

MILLER: When I joined the Peace Talks on November 1, 1968, the US and North Vietnamese governments had announced agreement on a bombing halt and on wider negotiations that would involve both the Viet Cong and the South Vietnamese government. We were not anxious to have the Viet Cong and they were not anxious to have the South Vietnamese government. This issue led to the 12 weeks that were wasted on negotiating the shape of the table. There was an added factor, of course, that prolonged this delay in getting down to the negotiations: Thieu was determined if he could possibly do it to wait until Nixon became President. It is said that he was hoping that Hubert Humphrey would lose and that Nixon would win so that Nixon would be the one to negotiate. When Nixon did win, he was anxious that real negotiations not begin with Harriman and Vance but that they wait for Nixon's negotiators. So we had a hard time getting the South Vietnamese to agree to anything we negotiated on the shape of the table. The issue, which a lot of people didn't understand because people were fighting and dying in Vietnam while the weeks went by, was whether or not we would recognize the Viet Cong as an independent delegation, which we refused to do, and whether or not Hanoi would recognize the Saigon delegation as independent which they refused to do. So we tried to come up with all kinds of devices and I can remember everyone drawing diagrams of tables. We finally came up with a round table with two separate little tables at the diameter with the tacit agreement that each side could describe the negotiation the way they wanted to, whether it was four sided or two sided. We said it was two sided, and they said it was four sided. Anyway this took 12 weeks before we were able to...

Q: This was more delaying action in a way...

MILLER: It wasn't a delaying action on our part. We were anxious to move ahead. But there was a real issue, the real political issue of whether the Viet Cong were independent, which we were convinced they were not, and whether the Saigon government was independent, which Hanoi at least, was determined to show was not the case. The South Vietnamese also employed delaying tactics because they did not want Harriman to negotiate a peace settlement with Hanoi; they wanted to wait until the Nixon Administration took over.

Q: Did you have any feel that the North Vietnamese saw that perhaps they would do better under the waning days of the Johnson Administration than they would under Nixon, or were they willing to wait it out?

MILLER: I am not sure about that. I really don't have any idea whether they thought they would get a better deal out of the Johnson Administration than the Nixon Administration. I think that their real view was, seeing what was going on in the United States, that if they persevered the United States would finally give them everything they wanted. The basic negotiating issue which kept agreement from being reached for so long was that the North Vietnamese insisted that the Thieu government be dismantled before they would withdraw their troops. We insisted that there be a mutual withdrawal of troops before elections were held to determine what kind of a government South Vietnam would have. Through many permutations and hundreds of meetings that was the basic nut that could never be cracked until, finally, at the end both sides did compromise and talk about the shape of the government that would emerge in South Vietnam--sort of a three tripartite government, as I recall, with elements of the South Vietnamese government, non-communist oppositionists and National Liberation Front (Viet Cong) people--before the troops were withdrawn. The whole negotiating position that we maintained in my view made it easier for the North Vietnamese not to agree and just hold out because we were gradually withdrawing our troops anyway under pressure at home.

Q: Your leadership under the Johnson period was who?

MILLER: During the brief period that I was there before the Nixon Administration came in, it was Harriman and Vance, with Habib again being the senior career person. When Harriman and Vance left--actually Vance stayed on a month into the Nixon Administration as continuity to get the new team started--it was Henry Cabot Lodge and Judge Lawrence Walsh, the Iran Contra Special prosecutor. Lodge stayed for about a year, as I recall. He and Walsh left and then there was an interregnum with Phil Habib as head of the delegation for a while. Then David Bruce was named and he stayed for a year or so. By that time, I left. Then Bill Porter took over the delegation for a while.

Q: Did you have any feeling that the various heads doing this made any great changes or were they under very tight instructions?

MILLER: Very tight instructions.

Q: What was your feeling about dealing with the North Vietnamese, both at the informal and formal sessions?

MILLER: We felt in the informal, private sessions which were away from the press, etc., that we at least had a better understanding of their true positions. The formal sessions at the Hotel Majestic where we would go out and brief the press generally on what transpired were really just so much window dressing. The informal sessions were more productive, but even so, they didn't really change positions. They allowed us to explore more thoroughly whether there was any negotiating flexibility in the other side's position, but that was really about all. But we were really under such tight instructions from Washington that regardless who was head of the delegation we didn't have any negotiating flexibility...what negotiating flexibility we had was carefully controlled from Washington.

Q: You had already had experience in the Vietnam Working Group where you knew you were dealing with nuts and bolts and things like this, but there were gods far above you who were handling these matters. Did you feel that you were doing anything in these negotiations? Was it difficult to keep up ones morale and stamina in doing this when you felt they weren't for real?

MILLER: Yes, toward the end, the last year I was there which was by no means the last year of negotiations, I felt it was time to move on and do something else and that as a delegation we weren't really contributing to any real solutions; we were just part of the Nixon/Kissinger negotiating process of 1) to maintain a basic level of political support in the Congress for the continuing effort in Vietnam and 2) as a cover for what Kissinger was really doing behind the scenes. A lot of what Kissinger was doing behind the scenes we didn't know at the time, at least I didn't know. It became discouraging although we continued to come up with negotiating formuli, which we would discuss among ourselves and present to Bruce, Habib and sometimes they would forward them to Washington.

Q: How did the growing demonstrations in the States affect you, especially those after the Cambodian bombing?

MILLER: They really didn't affect us very much. The subject may have come up in our negotiations or in our meetings but I don't recall that it had a big impact on us in Paris. We were kind of isolated from them because we were concentrating on trying to find a solution.

Q: Was there any time when you could sit down in an informal session with the North Vietnamese and begin to really talk about how this thing could be done?

MILLER: You could get to know them a little bit as human beings, their families and life in Hanoi under the bombing, etc., and talk about American baseball, etc., but we were under such rigid instructions that if we had done our own so-called "walk in the woods" like Paul Nitze did in Vienna with the Russians on MBFR, we would have been jerked back immediately. If we had sent in a cable saying we had this informal conversation and said, if we did this would you do that, I think Kissinger would have had us drawn and quartered before sundown. The North Vietnamese, themselves, were under very rigid instructions also. So under the circumstances that kind of freewheeling exploration of negotiating positions would not have produced anything.

Q: Were there any military situations occurring during this period that had any effect on you?

MILLER: No, I don't recall that there were. One of the things that we were always concerned about, and Washington was concerned about, was a cease fire in place. One of the reasons, we were not anxious until close to the end to have a cease-fire in place was that South Vietnamese forces and remaining American forces would be at a disadvantage because the Viet Cong were everywhere and a cease-fire in place would have given them an advantage. We were concerned that the military situation remain relatively favorable and not deteriorate so that when it came time to stop firing, our side would not be at a tremendous disadvantage. But other than that I don't recall that there was any military action that we felt had a major impact, in a negative way, on the peace talks.

Q: Did the French play any role in what you were doing except giving you food...?

MILLER: For the most part they played the role of host and provided the site and food during the breaks between sessions, etc. They played some role in the background during the peace feeler time. Kissinger used Jean Sainteny as a messenger at some point to explore possibilities in Hanoi and there were other French people who played behind the scene roles. But once we were in the negotiations, I am not aware that they played any real role.

MAYNARD W. GLITMAN
Paris (1968-1973)

Ambassador Maynard Wayne Glitman was born in Illinois in 1933. He received his BA from the University of Illinois and his MA from Fletcher School of Law and diplomacy MA, and served in the U.S. Army in 1957. His postings abroad include Nassau, Ottawa, Paris, Brussels, Geneva and Vienna, and served as the ambassador to Belgium. James S. Pacy interviewed the ambassador on April 24, 2001.

Q: Then we move on to years 1968-1973. Political Officer, Embassy Paris, and you were involved in political/military matters, arms control and West European issues.

GLITMAN: This was a wonderful assignment. As you can see, it lasted for a long time. We really got to understand France, both my wife and I, as a result of living there and working there on those issues. When I came to the Embassy in Paris, we were still dealing with the aftermath of the French withdrawal from the integrated military command structure and NATO's departure from Paris for Brussels. A lot of issues I worked on came as a result of that. My first thought was to look at these questions and see if there was some way that I could try to help mitigate the negative results of France's pulling out. I thought that if I had a goal to accomplish something while I was there, it would be to achieve that if I could. I began by looking at everything that General DeGaulle had done or said during the period as they were leaving. I found a possibility in his comment that France would be able to participate in some contingency planning with NATO countries, but this would be of a general nature and that they were not going to come back into the integrated command structure. But that phrase, "contingency planning," struck me as perhaps being a way that we could, if not get back to where we were with France at full participation, then at least have some element of cooperation working. I began to look at ways to see how we could foster that activity.

Another issue that I got involved in was to deal with the financial consequences for all of us in NATO, of France's decision to leave the integrated command structure and to effectively tell the U.S. to leave its bases in France. These bases, so called, were referred to as the "line of communication," which stretched from the Channel ports into Germany, were really crucial for us. If you look at the map, you'll see why very quickly. Assuming that an attack comes from the east, we needed to be able to move forces quickly from the ports into Germany. After France withdrew, we still had some possibilities through the Netherlands and Belgium. But most of the stuff would have to come down through Bremerhaven in Germany. Again, if you look at the map, that means that our supplies and reinforcements were going to be heading south, as the potential attack was coming from the east right across our line of communications. Whereas if our stuff could come from France, as it was set up to do, potential attackers, the Soviets, would have to go through our forces to get to our line of communication. We had pipelines, which had been put in during the Second World War, some coming from the Brittany and Normandy coast, and some coming from the Mediterranean coast of France. We did work out with the French arrangements for those pipelines, gas and oil, to continue to work.

There were problems, but nonetheless that continued to function. What we needed to do was pin down more detail, how these lines of communication would be kept open. In addition, we also had to continue working with them, so that if there were an attack, and I had no doubt that France would be on our side, that we could work smoothly together. Again, the contingency planning offered a possibility, we just needed to continue talking with them and making one another aware of how these things would work.

The French were not too interested in getting involved in exercises with us. That would have been one way to really prove it that we could work together. But they in time became more interested in working with the Germans. Germany was a full-fledged member of NATO, so through that, indirectly, we were able to get some activity together. And I worked very hard and continually tried to foster that, and in time we were able to work some things out. They are probably still classified, so I am not going to go into them. They are one of the few things that I worked on that were classified that were kept a secret for a good long while. Some of it has come out, but I am not going to be a person to put any more of it out.

Another thing that we had to do was deal with the financial consequences for us. We had all these bases, they were in France and some of them were quite useful for other purposes. Some of them were hospitals for example, and the French government was essentially saying, "We want these." The question was do we sell them to France and how do we get paid for them. I got involved in trying to figure out a way to getting the French to agree to pay for the property we were leaving behind. This is one way where I could combine work with pleasure. I wanted to go out and see these bases and see what was being done with them. So we would drive around on the weekends, take the family, we had a micro-bus at that point; all five children. Our youngest daughter was born in Paris. We'd all hop in this micro-bus and I would look for baseball back stops. This is how we knew we were getting near a base, you'd see a baseball back stop. Because at that point there were no signs that this was formerly an American base. I discovered that some of these hospitals were being used by local French communities. They were making use of them. The airfields were good. Other things came up.

One story that I heard, the Air Force had a golf course at one of the bases in Normandy. We vacated the base and the Air Force said these greens are worth something, and that they, the French, should reimburse us for these. And the French said, "No, no, we are not going to do that." This may be another one of those apocryphal stories, but in any case. Apparently, the U.S. Air Force said, "Well, in that case we are rolling up the greens and taking them to another place." They began to do it and the French said, "Wait, stay right there. The French Air Force will buy this golf course." If it's not true, it ought to be.

Interesting things came up. When we were trying to figure out the value of some of these properties, we would look at the lighting, for example. Well it turns out we use a lot more lighting than the French do. So their argument was, "You may have three lights in this room, or 3000 lights in this facility, we only need 1500, we are not going to pay you the extra amount." While all this was going on, these details, I got into the international law cases. I looked up one called the Chestushowa Factory Case and I go into all these arguments about legal aspects of this and so on. We had these discussions about these properties and how we evaluate them and so on. It seemed to me in the end there was going to be a political deal on this. We had to come up with a number that would be good for us and good for them and settle this thing. Eventually, it worked out that the French defense minister was going to a visit in Washington so I sent cable back and I said this would probably be a good time to make an offer. What we asked for was I think about 100 million dollars. Our initial claim was about 300. Well, I am told that for surplus property normally it's nickel for a dollar, and we were going to get about 25-30 cents on the dollar, so we weren't doing too badly. And it opened up a way to a better relationship in general. So we settled that. The foreign minister told our ambassador, and this went into my efficiency report, that my work with this had been very important towards a settlement on that issue. We got over a hurdle there with no bad feelings about what happened to the property.

And as I said there were other things we did that I work on. Some ideas I came up with which lead to very much closer cooperation in terms of planning and working together. It unfortunately still hasn't returned to what it used to be, when they were a full member, but little by little we learned to work with them. I spent a lot of time when I was at NATO working with the French. I guess I'd have to say I'd always found them very worthy adversaries. You got to watch yourself, they are smart. But you can deal with them, you can work things out with them.

Let's see, what else about Paris? We had a good embassy, a good group of people there. Many of whom became close friends. Bob Frowik, who I first met when I was in Ottawa, he was in Montreal. He worked next to me in the political section. Allen Holmes, also in the political section. Bob Anderson, who was a Political Counselor. John Condon was the Labor Attaché. I had mentioned Joe Pressel, later became Ambassador to Uzbekistan. John Condon and Joe Pressel were two of the best contact people I ever met. They were just wonderful in getting out and meeting folks, getting useful information, coming back and reporting. Both became good friends of ours. There was a lot of social activity in Paris. You can imagine, lot of cocktail parties, receptions, dinners, lunches, on and on. We did a lot of entertaining at home.

We found a wonderful apartment, it was on the Rue de Rivoli and Rue Camboge, which puts it across the street from the Tuilleries and was two blocks from the Embassy. The kids had to commute to school, and I walked to work. In those days, before the troubles in Vietnam and so on, we had a side gate into the Embassy, so when it was raining I learned that I could walk under the arcades on the Rue de Rivoli, stay down till the metro but not use the metro, walk underneath the Place de la Concorde and Rue de la Royale, come up outside the station to Hotel de Crillon and then walk into the Embassy through the side gate so you would get a little moisture on you but not much.

That all ended while we were there when the dangers from Vietnam grew. In fact, I was assigned the task of going over the Embassy to see what we could do to strengthen security. That was an interesting job, because I got into the basement and to the back side of the building, trying to figure out where we would have to put up gates and so on. There was a security officer but for whatever reason the ambassador asked me to do this. It began to change. That side door was closed. If you go there, the last time I was there at least, it was a small fortress.

We had quite a good spirit in the staff there. In fact, everyone was happy to be living in Paris. Almost everyone. I can't imagine why anyone wouldn't be. It was one of the most wonderful times of our life. And the dollar was strong, at least until 1973, when we left. In '71 I think gold standard ended. It was good strong dollar, the prices were not bad and we were able to see a lot of the country. Traveled extensively through France. We both got to know it really well. Soon after we got there, without too much effort, we felt at home. You could spend the entire day in French and not feel out of place. It was automatic. It was a good place to be.

We had two ambassadors while I was there. Sargent Shriver, whom I enjoyed very much. He was interested in things. If you sent him a memo, he didn't just read it. He'd write marginal notes and he'd call you in and ask you to explain things, and he was active, encouraging. Some of the things that I mentioned that I didn't want to go into any detail on went through him. I had some difficulties with some of the other folks to get some of the key messages. Got in trouble with one of those guys afterwards, but I had to do it. He was blocking what I knew we needed. Just a presentation of this. And Shriver called me in and he looked at this paper that he had in front of him, which I had written but it wasn't really what I wanted, and he said, "This is too vague," etc. I said, "Yes sir, it is. How would you like to see a legal version of this, sort of a legal approach?" Shriver was a lawyer and he said, "Yes." I said, "Just a moment." I got in trouble for this. I went and I said, "here." And he said, "yes! That's what I've been waiting for." That paper had been sitting on somebody else's desk for a month and a half and he wouldn't let it go. He was really ticked at me afterwards. Not Shriver, but one of my supervisors. Really angry. But, if I had not done that, we would not have gotten this message out and this program that we finally worked out with them, with the French, would not have happened.

He was always late to events, Shriver. But he couldn't help it. I accompanied him to receptions and people would surround him. He was a gregarious man, he enjoyed talking with people. He would head for the door, because he had another reception or two or three a night, and people would grab him. And he couldn't be rude. He was late, but I didn't hold it against him.

Ambassador Watson was probably one of the most difficult people I've ever met. Very hard guy to work with. There are tons of stories I could tell about him but I am not sure I should, he is gone. Just leave it at that, he was not easy to work with. And mercurial in some ways. I'll mention the one occasion I used the word to describe a situation. Remember I told you about learning from Howard Green the problems of being seen as provocative and how you should, if you see a situation as one that could become a problem then try to do things on a routine basis so that if you do it in emergency it'll seem normal. And we had a problem. One of the jobs I had was every year and I guess once a month in addition, we put in for over-flight rights. For American planes to over-fly France. When they left NATO we had to go through this drill with them. It was their sovereignty and they wanted to demonstrate that they would work with us but we would have to come in and say, these planes will be doing this on that mission.

I had attended a conference of political/military officers in Stuttgart with U.S. military as well as folks from embassies and they were concerned with over-flight rights in case of trouble in the Middle East. It occurred to me that when I put in these requests, they are usually for various types of flights. But if we thought we were going to have to over-fly with troop transports or something like that, again remembering that lesson about not appearing to provoke, it would be easier for the French to give clearance for a fairly large number if we had established a pattern in advance so that we when we do these over-flights and missions, and are going from here to there and we are practicing and exercising, and so I suggested that we move in the direction of asking for more over-flights in certain areas. I will say this, it will give you a feel for why Watson was hard to deal with. I explained this, that this concept came out of this conference and that I think we had a way to deal with this by every year, every time we put in these requests, we put in a request for this particular type of over-flight. You see what I am getting at? And I said, "If we skew the request in this direction, if there is a problem, it will be much easier for the French to accept, because it had already been accepting that kind of thing in great numbers." He blew up. He said, "I don't like that word 'skewed.'" It's not in the dictionary, and I banned it from IBM." Bob Anderson grabbed me, "I know it's in the dictionary, don't get on with him." And Watson said some other things which I won't be repeating. That was the end of that. But in fact we did eventually begin to make that move. I could only assume that at some point in the past someone had used that word at some meeting and he got angry or whatever was the case. I don't know what it was but he just took off. There were other funny stories, but as I said, I won't go into them.

Q: How about Mr. John Irvine?

GLITMAN: He was, if I recollect correctly, Watson's brother-in law.

Q: Oh, that's interesting. Arthur K. Watson's brother-in-law?

GLITMAN: Yes. John Irvine was a fine man. Calm, thoughtful. He knew his stuff but he did leave the impression sometime that he wasn't sure. But he had it right. You could talk to him, he'd understand it quickly but often I'd get the sense when he asked questions afterwards that he wasn't sure that he had it right, but he did. He was a good man.

Q: What was Watson's career? What was his background?

GLITMAN: He was a son of the founder of IBM.

Q: I'm sorry. I meant Irvine's?

GLITMAN: He was married to Watson's sister. I believe that's the tie-in. He was a lawyer, and had eventually become Deputy Secretary of State, either before or after this. But I liked him. As I said, he was an easy man to work with.

Q: How about some comment on Corps Diplomatique and life in Paris, just in general? We've learned about this fabulous home of yours...

GLITMAN: The diplomatic corps was large, as you can imagine. Many events, receptions, and so on. You'd get quite busy with it. They were a good group of people. I can't think of any specific example and events that stand out particularly. It was just a very busy place with lots of activity. Most of the people assigned there were very good, from all the different countries. Life in Paris. Well, what can I say? It was a wonderful place to live in a wonderful time.

Q: Did you have school-aged children? Did they go to school in Paris?

GLITMAN: Yes. The two older boys went to the American School. They were too far along and we felt, maybe wrongly, that they would be better off doing that than going to a French school. But for the three younger ones, we put them in the Ecole Active Bilingue, bilingual school, and it was in the Parc Monceau, you may have seen pictures of wonderful gilded gates. It was a wonderful school. What they did there was spend the first semester doing history in English and algebra in French or math in French and so on. You would take different subjects in a different language and then in fall you would switch around. Children very quickly became bi-lingual. My wife would go to pick them up at the school, and she would listen to them play with the French children, and back and forth, between English and French, whichever language seemed to best fit the need of the moment to describe something or make a point, they'd switch to that. They were very fluent, all three of them that went there. And they never lost their good French accents.

Our son, who was our youngest boy, he was able to read Le Monde, at least to pronounce the words, and then Herald Tribune, but here is an interesting thing. When we left Paris, we got on TWA and flew out. My wife and I tried to encourage them to continue to speak French and he just would not, not even on the airplane. In his mind, he was going back to the U.S. and he was not going to be speaking French. Well, he still speaks it quite well, but he did consciously try to stop. Another thing that happened in his case was that he learned to write, the French don't go through printing, they start out with script. He had beautiful penmanship and when we got back to Washington, to Bethesda, they forced him to print. We had his old French books, written out with this wonderful hand. His handwriting is awful now, and the school system would just not make an adjustment for this student. Which is too bad. My handwriting is pretty awful, and his is still far better than mine, but it was, if you could see it, the child of five or six writing so beautifully, and then at eight or nine it looks not quite so good.

I had mentioned that I was able to walk to work while the kids were going to have to commute. That was true for two older boys, but Chris had to drive the three younger ones to school. Both of us, I am afraid, picked up some bad driving habits, driving around in Paris in particular. We had to make corrections when we came back to the States.

As you know, when we make a left hand turn, people line up in the left hand turn lane. But in Paris, they don't do that. They line up shoulder to shoulder and the whole side swoops across. It's great fun. That reminds me of a remarkable scene I happened to witness where Champs Elysées comes out into the Place de la Concorde. I was able to walk over to the Quai d'Orsay, across the bridge from the Embassy. On this occasion I had some business over there, but I was walking. You have to try to picture this scene. This is what I saw. Coming down the Champs Elysées, which is a very wide street, were a number of cars, blocked by some other vehicles that were cutting across the Champs Elysées, just before they enter the Place de la Concorde. There is a little street there. What happened was that there were buses in effect blocking the view of the people coming down the Champs Elysées, and blocking the view of what was below that. And those who were coming out of the Place de la Concorde, seeking to go in to the Champs Elysées, their view was also blocked. What I noted was that there was this line of buses across there that blocked their view. On either side of this line of buses blocking the view of those coming out of the Champs Elysées, the drivers had begun to spread out. In other words, instead of staying in the right lane or the left lane on both sides of this traffic, which they could not see, they had spread out to cover the entire Champs Elysées. So when the buses disappeared, you found lines of cars facing one another. And they had trouble sorting that one out. It was very amusing to see that.

We talked a little bit about the apartment. I should point out that it was a wonderful place. It took a month of negotiating to get the price down to where we could barely afford it. I made sure the contract was settled in dollars, so when French franc devalued we were able to handle that. That worked out fine. There were also some presidential visits, one very important presidential visit. That was the visit of President Nixon, soon after he was inaugurated. Each of us was assigned to a different event, to cover and act as liaison with French officials. And to preview the event in a way and make sure that everything was set up right. I was given the Petite Trianon, a palace where Nixon and President DeGaulle were going to meet. I was able to go out there and in effect walk through the building and see exactly where they were going to stand and sit. We had to report all that back to Washington in exquisite detail. President will arrive, he will walk up three flights of steps, turn to the right, go x number of feet, General DeGaulle will be there to greet him, they will then proceed to this room and that room and so on and so forth. But we got to see the entire insides of the building.

Couple of interesting things happened during that visit. One was that Dr. Kissinger missed his motorcade, so he arrived late, and quite unhappy, but we did manage to get him in. We knew the building and we knew exactly where he should be. The other two things were while President Nixon and President DeGaulle were meeting alone the foreign ministers were also supposed to be meeting. But all the key interpreters had gone with the President and that left the need for someone to interpret between the American Secretary of State Rogers and the French Foreign Minister. That task fell to me. I was pretty nervous. The subject was Vietnam. It doesn't matter which way it was, French into English would have been somewhat easier, it may have been, I think that's the way it went. But I was not a trained interpreter. Taking notes and so forth. But there I was on the spot. Well, the discussion went on and there were some very easy short phrases and then at one point one of the participants dove into the matter, and begun going on at great length and I was falling further and further behind and as I was about to get almost submerged, drown in this, when somebody came in and said, "The two presidents are ready to receive you now." So I didn't have to do the translation. That was kind of an amusing escape.

Another thing I learned when I was in France and I put to use later on, and that is, the stuff that we were working on, the political/military side. I dealt with the Quai d'Orsay principally, but after a while I began to go over to the Defense Ministry as well, and meet with Michel Debré, he was Defense Minister and he had a foreign service officer, Serge Boisdevaix, from the Quai, working as his diplomatic assistant. So I spent a lot of time with Boisdevaix, and was fully in with Minister Debré as well. What I discovered during this period was that when you are trying to deal with some military problems, there are advantages to trying to keep diplomats out, and letting the military work with the military. It's a much better way to get things done. Because they get down to the brass tacks. They know exactly what it is that they need, they know how far they can go, and that was something that I found useful later on. If you are having trouble dealing with your diplomatic colleagues, see if you can make progress by letting the military do it directly. It did help move these things along in France, and also later on in NATO.

JAMES MOCERI
Information Officer, USIS

James Mocerì was born and raised in Washington, DC. He entered into the USIA in 1951. His career included positions in Bari, China (Taiwan), Sudan, and France. Mr. Mocerì was interviewed by G. Lewis Schmidt in 1990.

MOCERI: Well, the first think I heard was that I was to go to Paris for the Apollo 11 mission, because the Agency needed someone to set up a press operation in Paris to service elements of the European media. I thought, "My God, you're sending me? I'm a class two officer. I've had a fair amount of USIA experience. You can send any junior officer to set up a press operation, if you think you need a press operation in Paris for the European journalists. There are going to be 2,000 of them down at Canaveral for this event."

Well, it wasn't up to me to question, so off I went to Paris. Lee Brady was the PAO, and he offered me the services of Collette Gaudin as my staff assistant in their press center to be operated under the joint auspices of NASA and USIA.

Even as we set up the operation I continued to think, "This is a Mickey Mouse affair. You (meaning the Agency) send a class four officer and give him the experience of working with the French. Fine. Okay."

Well, as you know, we tried to do the best we could there. I still thought it was so much window-dressing for the benefit of inter-agency relations, but the fellow from NASA, who was with me, thought it was a good operation. I had an arrangement with the Hamelle Photo Laboratory so we could get almost immediate reproductions of space pictures, excellent color reproduction, in any quantity and for European distribution. Kodak used this same firm for their own work. This arrangement was made possible through Collette Gaudin's contacts. And we had excellent cooperation from the Hamelle people. We did have some measure of activity with the press.

Maybe we provided some useful service, but I had my doubts about its importance. After all, the scene of action was Canaveral and NASA headquarters. What people did come in? The journalists that did come were those, I guess, that couldn't get permission or backing to go to the United States. [Laughter]

At that time, because there was talk about the problems of NASA funding, there was a solution: we make the space enterprise a North Atlantic joint enterprise. Get the Europeans to come in and share in the development of the space program, etc. And almost simultaneously, the Economist came out with the same sort of idea.

I asked Collette Gaudin if she could do something for me, because -- I said, "I have this idea and I'd like, before even mentioning it to Washington, to sound out important people in French life, to see whether the French would really respond to anything like this." I added, "Here's the kind of people I want," and mentioned a string of industrial categories I would like to have covered in arranging contacts.

Because I thought, you know, there's no point in my trying to present something like this to USIA and then eventually introduce it in government consultations in Washington, if I come to the conclusion that the Europeans really aren't interested in becoming partners in this kind of enterprise and sharing the financial burdens, as well as potential benefits.

Well, I must say, she did a superb job.

Q: Who was this, doing this for you?

MOCERI: Collette Gaudin.

Q: Oh, yes.

MOCERI: You may remember meeting her.

Q: Oh, yes, I remember. She later died, unfortunately, of cancer.

MOCERI: I knew that she'd had cancer. That was the last I knew. I didn't know that she'd died.

Q: She died about 19 -- oh, it was in the late 70s. I had written her a letter. I hadn't heard from her for some time. And then I got a letter back from Pierre, her husband. All it was, was one line, enclosed by black border, announcing Collette's death.

MOCERI: Well, through my assistant, Collette Gaudin, a luncheon was arranged, at one of the best restaurants in Paris, for about 20 people, all top-level executives in some of the major industries, like the metallurgical industries, the steel works of southern France, and people in the railroad administration. And she had done a truly extraordinary job of getting all these people to participate in what to be honest, was a meeting with a low-level Washington functionary.

So we had this elaborate French luncheon that I never tasted because I spent all my time talking about this proposal, this idea of mine, and trying to get their reactions to it. I thought my clinching argument was, "Look, would you rather spend your $750,000,000 a year subsidizing certain West African countries, or put it into a future like space, along with other partners of the North Atlantic Treaty arrangements and the United States, under the conditions that you all share, according, at least, to the financial contribution?"

Well, there was not only interest and agreement. They were fascinated by the possibility. I don't think they were merely being polite. I think they genuinely saw this as a real possibility for the future, with certain potential that the French might well be interested in.

I came back to Washington, after the whole thing was over, and thought I should report to the head of IOP, William Weathersby. And I started to present this idea of mine. I explained the background and how I talked to Frenchmen. I had a list, then, of names and so on.

And he just -- I felt as if I had been blown out of the office. "Oh, come on. It's the silliest idea ever. You could never get Congress to even think of agreeing to anything like that. Because no matter what is said publicly, we want to keep exclusive rights to any technology that's developed, etc., etc." He gave all the reasons why my idea was ridiculous.

Fine, Okay. I forgot it. Let's forget it, then. I didn't pursue it. I didn't feel I had any right to go beyond the head of IOP. Theoretically, I had been operating under the umbrella of that office. So nothing, actually, ever came of that.

Meantime, well what am I doing here? It was disconcerting to be part of a corridor brigade. Jim Halsema had written to me in Paris sounding me out on my willingness to work with him in connection with an Arthur D. Little study. He wanted me to join him, as his assistant and serve as liaison with the A.D. Little team. So that was what I came back to. I thought it was a matter only of a few weeks' work, or a month or two. It drifted on. You know the history of that.

Q: I know. I got all involved in that. I thought it was the lousiest idea that we ever had.
[Laughter]

MOCERI: And obviously, there was a breakdown in communications on both sides. I tried to serve as an effective liaison, which meant getting to the Arthur D. Little people to understand what some of the Agency problems were. But, as you know, nothing came of that. And there I was again, without an assignment.

I made the rounds of the office. I went to people like Barbara White. I knew there was a vacancy in IOP as her deputy. Apparently, she wasn't interested, even though I'd helped her on more than one occasion in her career. I'd been partly responsible for her getting her first field assignment as branch PAO in Turin. Until that point she had occupied only staff positions in Rome. And she had worked under me in IOP when I was Jim's deputy, Jim Halsema's deputy, back in 1960-61.

FRANCES COOK
USIS, Staff Assistant to Ambassador Shriver's Wife
Paris (1969-1970)

Ambassador Cook grew up in West Virginia and Florida and attended Mary Washington College, earning her BA in 1967. She took the Foreign Service exam during her senior year of college and served at posts in Paris, Sydney, and Dakar, before becoming Ambassador to Burundi. Ambassador Cook was interviewed by Ann Miller Morin in 1986.

Q: Isn't that a coincidence? Paris pictures. You mentioned last time that you know the Kennedy family. Would you mind going back over that? You began working in the Kennedy campaign. How did you get to know the Kennedy family?

COOK: I got to know them through the Foreign Service. When I was in Paris, Sarge Shriver was the ambassador there. Before they went to France the State Department offered Mrs. Shriver a staff assistant Foreign Service officer position. I went there as a JOT on a regular rotational assignment. It was first encumbered by someone who, I think, was on second or third tour named Genta Hawkins (Holmes) who was a very good friend [Genta Hawkins Holmes was appointed ambassador to Australia in February 1997.]. You've probably heard of her. She's a wonderful officer. Then she moved on to the embassy and then I was asked to take the job. I had it for about a year. So it was technically... I think on the staffing pattern it showed as staff aide to the ambassador. It was actually Eunice (Shriver)'s aide. I think it was a watershed year for me in many ways. I think largely because most young people in the sixties were really very idealistic. One of the things that they idealized were the members of the Kennedy family. I obviously met a lot of the Kennedy family and their friends during that period. I developed a particular fondness for Rose Kennedy, whom I saw a lot and whom I saw even after the Shrivens left France. I'm an enormous admirer of Eunice Shriver's probably more than she even knows. But I watched how hard she worked. She worked so hard in Paris.

Q: Helping him in his work?

COOK: Both, but you know her special field is mentally retarded children, Special Olympics and so forth. She had a lot of assistants for that, who weren't part of the Foreign Service, working at the residence, so I sort of did the other things. But I watched how very, very hard she worked at it. She often would... When, say groups of American schoolchildren visited France on a school trip or something, she would have them to the house and talk to them about their responsibilities to help people because they were very privileged. Obviously they were if they were going to the school they were going to, if they were on this nice trip to France, and therefore they had been given privileges that most people in America never had, and they had an obligation to their fellow Americans because of this. She really lived that. She had an enormous impact on my thinking. The public image of the Kennedies is such a glamorous one, and they are glamorous. But they work incredibly hard.

Q: They're all hard workers.

COOK: Yes. Leaving aside their political views, they play just as hard as they work. They go at it full bore. She did a wonderful job raising those five children. Just to watch her operate and so many of the things that I later did, I realize when I became ambassador to Burundi, which was an enormous difference in scale between Paris and Bujumbura, I unconsciously was picking up a lot of her mannerisms just because I admired her so much.

Q: What year was this?

COOK: This was, let's see, I left Paris in '71, so it must have been '69 to '70.

Q: That was your first overseas assignment.

COOK: Yes. Rose Kennedy stayed at the house a lot. Really all the members of the family came through. We have stayed very close since. I come back for the family reunions still. I came back for - I was at Harvard when Sarge and Eunice had their silver wedding anniversary and I came down for it. The kids invited me. Then I came back from Egypt for Maria's wedding to Arnold Schwarzenegger one summer on Cape Cod. It's fun to see them all again, see the cute little babies grow up.

Q: Yes, of course.

Q: And how well they're doing, too.

COOK: They are. They're all doing very well. As busy as they were, they both had 18 hour day schedules, both the Shrivvers, they still managed to spend more personal time, I think, with their children, one on one and as a group than many of the younger couples I knew in the embassy who had their first au pair girl. They absolutely had it in their schedule and they did it no matter what was going on. Sometimes people would start arriving early for a reception and they were still upstairs reading a story or something and that was that. They just had a tremendous amount of personal time with their kids. They had nannies and things, but those kids never had a doubt, for a moment, about the love, and the understanding, and who mother and daddy were, and the amount of time given each of them.

Q: Did Rose give them a great deal of affection and attention?

COOK: She did and she gave them lots of just sort of wise advice. The great religion, I think, in the family comes from her. I remember one time I sent the driver to the airport to pick her up and he came back without Mrs. Kennedy. I said, "Oh, my god, what's happened?" He said, "She's at church praying." She goes, still, four or five times a day.

Q: She still does?

COOK: Yes.

Q: Does she really?

COOK: The Shrivvers had masses in the residence. It's one of the first ones I'd ever attended. They would have Jewish friends read the lessons. It was not an exclusive kind of religion for them, it was an encompassing humanitarian kind of view of religion. They were extremely devout and devoted to the Catholic church, but their view of religion was a very broad one. It was important to see what kind of role that played in their lives. But so many things that they did, some of the things, I think, I copied from her, eventually probably came from campaigning. But I thought it was just terribly effective and it always showed the concern for the smaller people involved in some big event. I never saw them go through a motorcade in Paris, that was the period, remember, when we were just sending astronauts up and they had always gone on these big world tours, so they'd all come to Paris. I never saw them go through one of those motorcades, for example, but they did get out of the limousine, and go back, and shake the hand of every motorcycle policeman, all the way in the back. I saw them do that kind of routinely and that's not the kind of thing the French would do.

Q: No, no.

COOK: Not even something, really, that many Americans would think about doing because this life can kind of go to your head. You've got chauffeurs and limousines and so forth and you can start thinking this is where you are. But you've got to realize that all the support is there for you, and they're putting their lives on the line for you constantly. Hours you ask them to work, whatever. She always did that. Go back and say something to the chef after a dinner. Constant...

Q: Those little touches that build morale.

COOK: It was remembering [the] people [who] weren't so important, because they're what make it all happen. I think that's so...

Q: It keeps you in perspective, too, doesn't it?

COOK: I think I would have wanted to do that, but I don't really know if it would have been so ingrained in me, if I hadn't watched her do it. I've never obviously had an ambassador's wife who was more of a public figure, or who had more of her own role to play at the post. But she found the time for that. She also found the time, always, for the children. Those kinds of things are what really matter when it's all over.

Q: Absolutely.

COOK: I think it made a very big impression on me. It also made an enormous impression on me, I think, to watch how that kind of residence was run, which I probably in a small way tried to do. I learned protocol there and all these other kinds of things, so it's never been a problem to me, because it (diplomatic practice) just sort of came along that way, and it's something about which I'm very relaxed and comfortable. They're plenty of things to make you nervous about the public aspect of the job, but I've always been very comfortable with that side of it, simply because I worked in that house.

Q: That was your very first overseas assignment?

COOK: Paris was. I had three jobs in Paris.

Q: But before you went to Paris in '68?

COOK: I had a little bit of French that was it.

Q: Oh, really?

COOK: I came out of JOT training. I came in in the fall. I came in in September after working for Maurice Ferré. Then I had the JOT training, and then some months of French that was that. I went out in May. I landed right in the middle of the May events in Paris, May '68.

Q: Oh, you did. I see.

COOK: Then I had a year's rotational job as a USIS officer because I came into USIS, but it turned out, that year, the most interesting job was the very first one that I had, because another important thing happened in May of '68. That was when we opened the Vietnam Peace Talks in Paris. President Johnson was very proud that this was the smallest delegation he'd ever sent to a major international peace conference. How he did that, between parentheses as the French would say, is that they drew heavily on the embassy staff. So I was commandeered to work in our press center (because I was a USIS officer), which was the entire ballroom of the Hotel Crillon. I forget how many hundreds, I think at least six hundred journalists came from the United States to cover the opening of the Vietnam peace talks. Every journalist that I had ever heard of or seen on television the whole time I was growing up was there. Walter Cronkite, Charles Collingwood, you name it, they were there. And I was working with them a week after I got off the plane. It was a very exciting way to start. Then I was asked in the course of that year because my French was...

Q: This was your rotational?

COOK: Yes, but it ended up being my first six months in my job, I didn't really rotate because the needs were there for what I described. Even when I went on then to do some rotational work, after they closed down the major press room (after it was clear that we were in for a long haul on Paris), I was sent as the American government representative to the North Vietnamese press conferences. Now, they were held, the peace talks were generally on Thursday, and the North Vietnamese would give their press briefing in one place and we would give ours in another afterwards. But we would wait until theirs was over. So I had to go with a tape recorder and take full notes, on their press conference, and then call our delegation to give them a briefing on what they had said. Our delegation usually had the White House, and the person of - who was the national security advisor for Johnson, the two brothers? - Rostow. They usually had Rostow on the other end of the line and I would be doing a briefing. I had to basically fight with the journalists...

Q: You mean you were briefing Rostow?

COOK: Yes, he was on the other end of the line. I had to basically then fight the journalists because there were only a certain number of pay phones at this site where the North Vietnamese had their press conference, and I would have to compose my cable in my head from the time I left my chair until I got to the telephone, and then fight the journalists to use the phone. All I can say is, if somebody asked me to do that now, I'd be too nervous to do it. But when you're 22, you can do anything. The press conferences were only in Vietnamese and French. There was no English used, so I'd be translating and writing my cable in my head and running to the telephone and really, basically competing with the wires to try to do something. Then I would have to go back to the embassy, and I'd completely transcribe the entire text from French to English and do a textual transmission to Washington by immediate of the press conference. But it's the kind of thing - as I say I think probably I could do it now, but I think ten years after that, if you asked me to do that, I'd say, "I can't do that." It's the kind of thing you don't know you can't do, so you do it! So anyway I did that. Basically the first year I had a few rotational jobs but it was basically dominated by the peace talks. I was taken away for various things for that. Then the Shriver's asked me to come to the residence when Genta moved into the embassy and I went up there for a year.

Q: You moved into the residence?

COOK: My office was in the residence and it was the most fabulous office I'll ever have. I had a Roualt painting. Timmy Shriver is John Kennedy's godson, so we had the crucifix from the Kennedy funeral on the wall. We had, I think, a Picasso. I mean I'll never have an office with a Picasso on the wall. [laugh] I worked at the residence. Sarge was also doing a lot of stuff - that was the period, if you remember, the late sixties, when youth committees were very important in the embassies, and it was terribly important in Paris, because we'd just been through all the student riots. So that was the political thing I did, separate from what was going on at the residence. I worked there for a year. I traveled with Mrs. Shriver. I did political briefings for them. I did everything that you can imagine would go on with a family like that. Plus I met about everybody I think I ever wanted to meet in my whole life, in one year, and I was still only 23.

Q: Did you really? Hard act to follow. You went to many of the social functions, of course?

COOK: Oh yes. Yes, I went to most of them. All the people that as a high school kid, from Jackie Onassis to...

Q: You must have pinched yourself from time to time.

COOK: I did quite a lot. But it marked me more than I really thought it did at the time, and how I conducted to myself later. Then the Shrivvers left. This is in '70, and Ambassador Habib asked me to join the Peace Talks delegation. Because, again I think, because of this stricture on the size of the delegation, this very small delegation, (which were all comprised of Vietnam specialists plus a few lawyers) were being submerged by POW-MIA, congressional, family, state visitors. They were all coming to Paris, if you remember the period, trying to get information about their loved ones. The delegation had nothing set up to handle this, because they were less than fifteen people. The legal advisor from the State Department was handling it because he was basically the expert on the Geneva Convention and so forth for the peace talks, and he was getting so it was taking so much of his time he couldn't do what else he needed to do. So they asked me to come full-time on the delegation to do POW-MIA matters. So I became the only full-time member of the delegation who was not a specialist on Vietnam. Then I resumed the press conference activities, but in that case I had both the North Vietnamese and the Viet Cong, who were by there then, and the South Vietnamese. So I did three press conferences on a Thursday plus the cables and the briefings. So on Thursdays I did nothing but press things, but during the rest of the week I worked on the POW-MIA issue. Phil Habib being the kind of officer he is, didn't restrict me either just to handling visitors, but he sought my ideas on the policy once I got into it. I told you last week I got so interested in the subject that even though we were working seven days a week, I found I would check all the books on Vietnam out of the embassy library and take it home and read it at night. I got so absorbed in it. It is by far the best job I've ever had in the Foreign Service.

DAVID T. JONES
Rotation Officer
Paris (1969-1971)

David T. Jones was born in Pennsylvania in 1941. He received a B.A. and an M.A. from the University of Pennsylvania and served overseas in the U.S. Navy as first lieutenant from 1964-1966. After entering the Foreign Service in 1968, his assignments abroad included Paris, Brussels, Geneva and Ottawa. Mr. Jones was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

Q: From when to when?

JONES: The spring of '69 to the summer of '71. We arrived approximately in May of '69. We had just missed "les evenements," (the events) the uprising and the rioting that so characterized Paris in the spring. As students were rioting, they definitely would have had all the young political officers (actually, we were multifunctional in a way, but we weren't coned. We were doing everything at that time, doing reporting. But they probably would not have objected for the young officers in the embassy to have been on the Rive Gauche just trying to get a sense of what was happening.

Q: What were you doing in between?

JONES: It was a combination of language training and as I was originally assigned to do an economic/commercial job, I spent time at the Department of Commerce. I also spent time taking the perfectly standard consular visa course. That's essentially what absorbed the period of time from the several months that we spent at FSI to the time when I left for Paris. Very fortunately, my wife and I went to Europe on the SS United States. It was very close to the end of that type of travel opportunity. It was a wonderful opportunity.

Q: What was your wife doing during this time?

JONES: My wife had been doing a variety of career-oriented jobs. After she got her Ph.D., which was approximately in December of '66, she went to do research. She did tobacco research with the Department of Agriculture in laboratories on the outskirts of Philadelphia at Radnor. Then when we moved in the summer of '68 to Washington, she worked again for the Department of Agriculture doing research on dairy products. She published a variety of papers in journals and left the Department of Agriculture to accompany me to Paris at that point. She worked at the Department of Agriculture until about April of '69.

Q: What was your impression of the embassy in '69 when you arrived?

Today is April 2, 1999. David, let's talk. You're off to Paris in '69. What were you doing in Paris?

JONES: This was the first tour. This was a standard first tour Foreign Service officer's exercise. It was my first experience in Europe. It was my first Foreign Service assignment really. Everything before that almost close to a year had been a combination of language training, visa training, passport training, familiarization also at the Department of Commerce, where ostensibly at least, I was appointed in Paris as a commercial officer. This was at a time when there was still a commercial section, an economic/commercial officer. There was still a commercial sector in the Department of State. When I arrived, I found actually to my great satisfaction that I was not going to spend two years being an economic/commercial officer. I was and would be still far more interested in doing political work. What they did in Paris with first tour junior officers was, I understand, relatively standard in the larger posts, to put you on a rotation. Essentially, you spent six months in four different sections in the embassy. So, the first of my tours of six months each was in the economic section. I never did go to do straight commercial work. There had been and there still is a commercial trade center in Paris. There is a big operation there. While I might have expected to go to it originally, I never went there. I just did straight internal analysis for economic affairs in Paris for six months.

Q: You were in Paris from '69 to when?

JONES: Roughly July of '71.

Q: Who was our ambassador at this time?

JONES: When I first arrived our ambassador was Sergeant Shriver. Subsequently, it was Arthur Watson. Shriver was a Kennedy connected operator. He was interesting and popular as ambassador in Paris both with the French and pretty much with the embassy. Shriver was interesting, articulate, vigorous, dynamic, did a lot of outreach things, was very interested in youth, which made younger Foreign Service officers interested and interesting. He was, however, also absolutely maddening in some of the things that he did. One of them was that he was always late. He absolutely drove people up the walls because he would not arrive on time for the things that he was doing. There is one little anecdote where he was out on a provincial tour. The ambassador would go out to different sections of the country and have meetings and give speeches and receive little awards and taste wine and all sorts of things of that nature. He arrived very, very late for something. He gave a remarkably extensive and profound apology of how deeply unhappy he was, how sorry he was he had been late and delayed. Of course, the audience forgave him. The next night, he, however, was also scheduled and he was also incredibly late to his next dinner, etc. He faced an audience and gave again an extended, detailed apology of how he had run late and done this and that, etc. This time, they were considerably less forgiving because he had perhaps forgotten that it was the same audience. They weren't all that thrilled. But as a dynamic presence in France and as a dynamic presence in the embassy, Shriver very much was that. On his Fourth of July exercise, for example, instead of having a standard Fourth of July, he put together circumstances in which people were dressed in colonial costume and organized games for handicapped children, which was very much an interest of Eunice Shriver. The Special Olympics, that were still evolving, were done by them. It was refreshing. He was different in that manner. He was not the kind of pinstriped ambassador. On the other hand, he arrived in Cardin suits wearing Guccis and looked every bit as elegant and expensive as any man possibly could.

Q: What was France like at this time? This was a year after the events of '68. This was their trauma time. How did you find France, particularly Paris?

JONES: I guess they sort of say that every young man should spend some time in Paris and every old man should go back and regret the time that he didn't take more advantage of being a young man in Paris. I guess you have to put it in the context of who I was and what I didn't know. I was remarkably untraveled to be a Foreign Service officer in the terms of 1999. Maybe in the terms of 1969 I was more typical in that manner. But this was my first European experience. It was also my first experience with the French, for whom intellectually I really didn't care very much. This was the France that had thrown NATO out of the country, led by Charles de Gaulle.

This was a France for whom many Americans didn't care very much in regard to their foreign policies. It was a France that seemed to be more interested in putting a stick in our eye than giving us a pat on the back for whatever we were doing. As I spent more time there, at least I began to appreciate the rationale for what the French were doing and why they had done it that way. Although I never cared for it, at least I could understand it a little better. Although it will probably seem curious, I was not initially particularly interested in going to France. It wasn't my choice of countries because of the points that I have just outlined. But as a country to be in at the time, it was very interesting for some of the points that you raised and interesting also because it was the period in which de Gaulle, in effect, left power and arranged a rather grudging transition between him and his then loyal deputy, Mr. Pompidou. This left de Gaulle himself in a sort of semi-retreat, retirement, exile from which nobody knew exactly what he would do, or when he would do something, or what pronouncement he would issue upon the politics and the personalities of the day. As he was always ready and willing to write memoirs and more memoirs and announce in his Olympian tones what he thought was best for France, it did make things politically interesting because you didn't know what would happen. There was this process of transition from which de Gaulle, having lost a totally trivial referendum on a topic that, frankly, I can't even remember – the point was that de Gaulle always put these referendums as “do what I want or I leave.” This time with a sigh the French population decided on a tertiary issue that they had had enough. So, he up and left. The politics of the period were still relatively calm to the extent there was not rioting in the streets.

Q: There had been though in May-June of '68.

JONES: Yes. That was before I got there. There was still tiny, slight, distant echoes of what had happened, but there was not a renewal of it. The French government had managed to break the alliance between labor and the students. They had offered sufficient enough in the way of offerings and commentary to the students and given them certain changes in how the educational system was operating and promised more money and less crowding and things along that line and got the students off their backs. As a consequence, the students were never really able to restimulate anything on the level of the disruption and the popular unity between themselves and labor unions. Students riot every spring. Who cares? The students are rioting. As a result, the police will come out and set themselves up and put themselves in a position where the students start focusing on them and then they'll have a great riot. Some of the students will get tear-gassed and a few of them may get bopped on the head. A certain number of the CRS (French riot police) will have injuries that will be cited. That's springtime in Paris. But in '68, it was the combination of the students and the labor unions who were able to create much more havoc and upset and disruption in the city and elsewhere in France. But it had very substantially calmed in '69.

Q: Your first job was in the economic section. In an embassy like Paris, you're really down in the bowels of the economic section as a first tour officer. What were you seeing and what were you getting from your more senior colleagues about the French economy?

JONES: It might amuse you to note that I had the best office in my entire Foreign Service career when I was the most junior officer in Paris. I was sitting right above the ambassador's office looking out over the Place de la Concorde. Why did I have that office? Well, because the economic section wanted to preserve it and they needed to put an officer in it, so they put me in it. I have a picture of me against the Place de la Concorde looking out over this astonishing, memorable, historic view. What I think we did at this point – and again what you have is a young officer trying to get trained and not so much in economics because I don't think they expected me ever to become an economist – was how to begin to be a Foreign Service reporting officer and analyst. So, a great deal of what I was doing was as close to the bottom rung of that level of the Foreign Service as you're likely to get: writing economic analysis from newspaper material to put into airgrams, not a telegram; on the lines of very classical dredge it out of the newspapers, new translations; this kind of work. What I think we gathered and what I would say that I gathered was that the French economy was doing reasonably well. It was, however, a very traditional government-run, centrally directed economy. The problems associated with it were not enormous problems. This was a sophisticated, high tech society. What I noticed as much as anything from that portion of it and from other times was how organized the French ruling establishment was, how carefully educated they were, how they had come up through great schools of one sort or another where. If you read their bio sketches, they had all been educated at the same type of very high level, very carefully trained, very professorial-type universities. They were all deeply enmeshed in the French way of doing things, in French culture, in French history, in the virtues of France, in every element of it – its language, its cooking, its wine, its cheeses... You go right down the line. Those people at the top were very, very, very French. You either liked this or you didn't like this. There are still almost 30 years later very, very positive aspects of what I could say are the French and France at that time. For example, they were and still are receptive to the use of nuclear power, something that we have managed to destroy as a basic source of power in the United States. The French were very practical about its development, its application, its utility for their society. If you want an organized and directed societal elite running society, that was certainly France at the end of the '60s and the beginning of the '70s.

Q: Was there still the “defi américain?”

JONES: Yes, Jean-Jacques Servan-Schreiber.

Q: Had that started?

JONES: Yes.

Q: Could you explain what that was?

JONES: It essentially was a book by Jean-Jacques Servan-Schreiber, who argued that the American challenge, “le defi américain”, was a substantial challenge to Europe and France and the Americans were doing it better, that the French, the Europeans, were going to have to change their approach, their style, in virtually everything. It was not just by any matter just political. It wasn't limited to economics. It was, again, on top of almost everything else, cultural. The American cultural challenge was a worldwide challenge. You can shorthand it down to the “cocacolaization of the world”, but Servan-Schreiber didn't take that approach. It was a positive view that America was making this challenge and it was not an unworthy one. It was one in which the French in particular had to respond because they consider themselves to have a powerful alternative culture or a culture that they consider definitely superior to English/American culture. So, as a result, it was a challenge that France would have to meet and perhaps change to meet effectively.

Q: In our embassy in Paris, did you find a certain division among the officers, not necessarily according to France, but those that were almost Francophiles and those that were almost Francophones? Was there a fissure within the embassy?

JONES: No, I wouldn't say it was that clear a split. There certainly were Francophiles. There were people that adapted themselves more totally to French culture. These are the ones that whose clothes were more French in style, who worked very hard to get more deeply into French culture and French cooking and French wines and cheeses. In other words, they were trying to make themselves more effective interlocutors with the French by being closer to them as appreciators of their culture and their qualities. The other side of the group I don't think appreciated France any less but they believed that they would be more effective Americans if they didn't try to become second class French. There was no way that an American diplomat would become as French as the French and still be an American diplomat. If you attempted that route, you would be criticized implicitly by the French for not a particularly high quality French person. If you, in effect, did the equivalent – if they came to dinner and you served them chili and beans – they couldn't argue with you that your choice of wine had been less than exquisite and your soufflé had fallen. All they could say was, "That's an American meal. Maybe I don't like it. Maybe I'd rather eat anything else if it was made in France," but they couldn't claim that you were a second class or lacking a quality to being a real Frenchman. In honesty, there is nobody, unless you have lived at the very top of French society, that can be as French as a Frenchman. I think you could also overstate this division. There were certainly no sets of arguments in the embassy over "You've gone native." The French wouldn't let you go native at this point. This was still, if not daggers drawn, a recognition that we were still only a couple of years from the time in which de Gaulle and the French had expelled NATO from France and, in effect, absented itself from the unified defense planning aspect of NATO, although France continued to sit, as it still does, on the North Atlantic Council and in Council meetings at NATO. But it did make for tension. It made definitely for bad feelings. It left some residual problems for the U.S. military still being handled in France as they had closed facilities and rushed off to Belgium with considerable deal of speed and not as much planning as they might have liked to have had.

Q: What were you doing after the economic work?

JONES: The next set of work I went on to was to do consular work. In this regard I was relatively standard as a consular officer, although all I focused on or was focused on was citizenship services. I may be one of the rare Foreign Service officers who never issued a visa. Because of that, I don't have these endless visa stories.

Q: I would have thought in the consular section, particularly in citizens services, you would have had a French national staff who really were doing most of the work. I would assume they were a very competent staff.

JONES: There were. There were good professional longtime staff. But for American citizenship services, you also had a fair group of American consular officers. The biggest issue was the replacement of passports. This was the biggest citizenship problem. Occasionally, you had a death. Occasionally, you had a certain number of people seeking welfare and support. You had individuals in the U.S. seeking missing children who were wandering around Europe somewhere and they vaguely thought, "Well, they said they were going to be in Paris in August" or words to that effect. So, you had circumstances like that. As a result, all of us as young consular officers met a fair number of Americans in circumstances that were difficult for them. What I did at that time was meet as my supervisor one of the smart, tough senior consular officers, a woman by the name of Mary Chaverini. Mary is one of these people that had a very untraditional Foreign Service career. She was then and certainly would be now one of the very few Foreign Service officers without a college degree. She started as a secretary, was a technician of one sort or another and became an officer. Through dint of absolutely relentless search for perfection and consummate attention to detail, she got very close to the top of her profession and finished as the consul general in Palermo after her tour in Paris. I was impressed by her professionalism and her exceptionally good judgment on risks of various people and her attention to detail and desire to see not a single error crop up anywhere. That bothered more people than not. It didn't bother me. I was able to appreciate this. But there was at least one young Foreign Service officer for whom she totaled his career by the type of Efficient Report that she wrote on him and who disliked her immensely and undoubtedly continues to dislike her. But other than that, she taught me a combination of patience and even more attention to precision and detail than I had appreciated before. There obviously were not many people like her. If I remember a story out of the consular section, it would be that I had been, if not duped, at least sympathetic to a young couple that came in with a lost passport story. They were certainly perfectly legitimate Americans. Mary insisted that they be issued a much more limited passport, a very short duration passport rather than a full duration passport. Subsequently, they turned out to have been involved in narcotics of one sort or another and were arrested later in their relatively short time in France. I recognized that one of the problems of being a consular officer is eliminating your implicit trust in your fellow citizens. You might be more suspicious automatically of some foreigner who is trying to get a visa from you, as you have every reason to be, but I think it's a little harder to be axiomatically suspicious of your fellow citizens who are legitimately presenting information showing that they are citizens. That was a bit of education.

Q: Did you get involved in any Americans caught up in the French legal system, prisons or other aspects?

JONES: A little bit, but not as much as some of my colleagues and friends. What you had at that time and what you still have is a lawyers list and we regularly referred people who had specific kinds of problems to this list of lawyers. I did go at one time to a trial. This was also at the point when the Vietnam Peace Talks were going on in Paris. There was a completely separate delegation within the embassy that was handling the Peace Talks, although I knew a couple of people in there. At the trial I attended the young man was facing the standard drug charges. I got the results of that trial and reported. In this case, I reported them to Ambassador Phil Habib, who was acting as our head of the Talks at that point, and stood there while he talked to the mother of the young man back in the State and conveyed to her the sad story that her son was going to spend jail time. I remember him saying, "Well, unfortunately, they also managed to bring in the fact that he had had a previous problem, which made the French even less sympathetic than they might have been." The French are not terribly sympathetic in their legal system. There are a number of people that suggest that French law is not to give you a guide to conduct but to assess blame after the fact. That was more of an approach to their traffic laws, for example.

Q: This was the time, '69-'71, where all hell was breaking loose around the world because of our involvement in Vietnam. Did that manifest itself at all other than the Peace Talks? Did you find it was an embassy almost under siege by the French? How was Vietnam playing at that time?

JONES: I think there was the sense that it was winding down with the beginning of the Talks, with the fact that Johnson elected not to run again, with the suggestion that we were on our way out, although very slowly, rather than continuing to prosecute the war at the level which we had, let alone build up to prosecute it with even more intensity. I certainly don't think there was a great deal of sympathy in France for the United States. There might have been a degree of grim amusement. They had been there, and we thought we could do it better. The fact that we were now lying flat on our face in the shit from which they had only barely and unpleasantly extracted themselves amused them, maybe amused them a great deal. But there was also perhaps a degree of "I told you so-ism" or "If you had really wanted to do this job, why didn't you help us when we were asking for assistance" or "You were so arrogant as to tell us how to do the job and now you are in the process of screwing it up and getting screwed by it that we have already gone through."

Q: Were you having demonstrations?

JONES: Certainly nothing that 30 years later gives me a twinge. I'm sure there were demonstrations. The French are always demonstrating against something. Part of it is because their unions are intensely politicized. There was both a communist union and a socialist union at that juncture. The communists were significantly stronger as a political force in France at the end of the '60s and the early '70s. You had regular one-day strikes by the CGT, the communist union. But because they were not well financed and they didn't have real war chests, they couldn't go out and close things down for weeks and weeks at a time. Their tactic was the sectoral strike – public utility workers, transportation workers, one group or another that would come out and have marches down the Champs-Élysées. But so far as specific violence associated with it, I don't remember that level of violence. I remember confusion, certain periods of upset when the Metros were not working or the buses weren't working and you had problems like that. Then you would always have people asking, "Is this going to be a repeat of May of '69?" It just wasn't so. I suspect that you could go to the newspapers and say it was a much more volatile and dramatic period than I'm remembering it as, but I'm not remembering a level of personal drama. I'm not remembering any riots against the embassy – windows broken, stones thrown, or having to withdraw people from some of our outlying buildings. We were spread all over the city, at least six different annexes where our people were associated. I would say that there was a struggle on our part to get our culture not accepted but to have our culture get an opportunity to present itself more comprehensively. You had in the economic section, which I should have remembered at the time, various fights over appellation (names). We, in the past, had labeled our wines as "Burgundies" or "Bordeaux" or labels like that. The French were just simply saying, "You cannot possibly bring a wine to France that has that kind of label on it because it isn't from that region." We were, at that juncture, arguing with increasing pressure and some degree of success that our wines were winning international blind taste testing. As a result, slowly over the last 30 years, our wine makers have become sufficiently confident of themselves that they're able to say, "This is a Napa Valley red" and they're not trying to label it in the way that the French quite correctly, although definitely irritatingly, were saying, "If this says 'Bordeaux' on it, it must come from Bordeaux." I think we've gotten past that. One of the successes of the last generation has been that American wines have sliced out a niche in markets around the world for a certain type of quality and effectiveness in taste.

Q: Where else did you serve in those two years?

JONES: They rotated us to each section. I spent a certain amount of time, maybe less than six months, in the administrative section. I did a certain number of studies for them of the nature designed to keep this young person busy and try to induce him into doing more work in administrative affairs. If anything, I was almost irritated because they gave me excessive praise for work that I thought was pretty trivial or certainly excessive praise for work that I thought was exceptionally easy and shouldn't have been praised at the level that it was.

But the most important work that I did in Paris and the most important work as a consequence for the rest of my Foreign Service career was done in the political section.

Q: In this period, what were you doing?

JONES: What I was doing was pretty standard internal domestic political section work. Let me talk a little bit about the political section. This was to me the equivalent of the "class the stars fell on" so far as West Point was concerned. During this period, in the late '60s and the early '70s, a man by the name of Robert Anderson was the political counselor. He went on to have at least a reasonably successful career as ambassador. Bob is dead now, unfortunately. Anderson was a very smart and very interesting man. As a person, you would not want Bob Anderson as your enemy. But as a friend, Anderson would be very interesting. He showed off in special ways but he also showed off in ways that were sufficiently clever so that you took a lesson. Anderson once was, so the story goes, reproached by a member of the Inspector General's staff for having given excessively high ratings to his political section members. Anderson turned around and figuratively tore a stripe off this guy and said that he had spent his entire career getting to the point where he would be political counselor in Paris and be able to select a team of the very best Foreign Service officers that he could assemble and that he had indeed assembled such a staff and that under no circumstances would he rate them less than exceptional. I could run down the list of these people and I will do so just to tell you how incredibly successful these people were. They were at that time almost all FS-03s, which is the 01 equivalent today.

Q: About the equivalent to colonels.

JONES: Yes, they were all colonel equivalents. All of these became ambassadors; Patricia Byrne, who was running East Asian affairs; John Condon, who was the labor counselor; Robert Frowick, who was the French communist and communist affairs officer; Alan Holmes, who has just retired; and Mike Glitman. Alan was the head of internal political affairs in Paris. Mike handled political-military affairs. Then there was also Andy Steigman, who was handling African affairs. Steigman, although he left the Foreign Service and has been out of the Foreign Service for probably 20 years, was also himself very successful as an Africanist. Steigman was one of the very few people at the time who actually was so far out of step as to wear a beard. This was at a time when any serious professional was clean shaven. Today, it's a sort of generational change that people wear beards and they don't wear beards. I've grown a beard three times in my life and now I'm clean shaven. But at that time, I would not have worn a beard as a serious Foreign Service officer and Steigman was virtually unique in so doing.

Q: He is teaching diplomatic practice at Georgetown. He's written books on the Foreign Service. He's been sort of a professional's professional.

JONES: Indeed. I have not seen him in a long while, but I have a great deal of respect for him.

During that period of time, during the 6-8 months in which I was in the political section, which was also broken by going back to the consular section because they brought all of the junior officers back to the consular section to handle the summer rush and the summer flow of semi-catastrophes during July and August, I worked for both Holmes and Glitman being shared by them in this work. Each of them are exceptional professionals and most of the rest of my career was designed to find opportunities to work with one or another of them. Indeed, in the rest of my career, I worked for Holmes at least twice and for Glitman at least twice.

What I did as a political officer was, again, a very standard young domestic political officer reporting style. I did biographic analyses and ran the biographic files. I did a certain amount of analysis from newspapers, reading material and making presentations on the basis of this both either for political-military affairs or internal domestic affairs. Both Glitman and Holmes appreciated my writing style and gave me a certain amount of leeway in this regard. One of the interesting projects that I had was associated with the arrival of the new ambassador, Arthur Watson. He was one of the scions of the IBM empire, son of the IBM founder and a very senior Republican businessman. In contrast to Ambassador Shriver, Mr. Watson was obsessively punctual. He would run meetings in which if you were late, you contributed a dollar to a general fund that went into some charitable operation. It meant that you were on time. Watson was very tough on his more senior officers but also rather lenient and engaged with his younger, more junior officers. This was interesting also in a way. We had a certain amount of contact with him that was unusual for the time. He would pick up the telephone and call you directly, which, for somebody who was hierarchical and thinking as I already was, was surprising and flattering even. But for his senior people, he was very demanding and very tough on them. That made them less happy.

But one of the projects that Watson was engaged in was an assessment of everything that was going on in France that had a government connection whether it was being run efficiently and cost effectively. So, each one of a wide number of officers were sent out and required to do assessments on different aspects of American presence in France. I ended up looking at the American battlefield monument cemeteries throughout France. There was one that was far down in the south of France that I didn't get a chance to see. I visited as a result all of the battlefield cemeteries in northern France and also in Luxembourg. I went out on a trip with my wife in my then new car. This was a very interesting interview, reporting, gathering of information process. At the same time, it gave me some additional insights into how the American presence in Europe is permanent. As a consequence of the report, I suggested that the cemetery operations could be run more efficiently, that they were really something of a sinecure for a fair number of older, retired noncommissioned officers (NCOs) that were getting relatively good salaries for a rather low amount of work, and that many of the cemeteries were not particularly heavily visited even 30 years ago. Certainly our World War I cemeteries were not. On the other hand, it also gave me an appreciation for the politics associated with this. You could give this kind of a job only to a naive, incredulous junior officer who would actually go out and not have an appreciation for the sacred cow status of the American Battlefield Monuments Commission operations throughout the world and in the United States. So, the embassy and I in particular got a blast back from Washington saying that, "This person doesn't know anything about what he's doing." By and large, that was the way it ended. Watson wasn't able to budge the Battlefield Monuments Commission to do anything. But it was an interesting experience for me personally to have had this opportunity.

Q: The battlefields came into a certain amount of prominence not too long before when de Gaulle had removed NATO from French soil. Supposedly the remark was, "Do you want us to remove our graves, too?"

JONES: Yes, there was that line, but it also was a throwaway line. The French just sort of shrugged it off. "You want us out of France? Shall we dig up our dead and take them home, too?" The 25th anniversary of D-Day was also at that time. That was 1969. There was a feeling that the French participation was very grudging, that it was not at a level that we would have appreciated. The French participation was "correct," but it was minimalistic rather than maximalistic.

I also participated in at least as an observer and viewer the July 14th marches and parades by the French. I was struck by the fact that these were the most militaristic parades that I had ever seen. My conclusion at the time was that it reflected the fact that France did not want to become a secondary military power, but it was forced to do so by geopolitical reality. In one of the parades, it was the first time that the Foreign Legion had participated in many years. They were back out again there. But a comparable American parade would have had floats and cheerleaders and marching bands and the girl for the day waving from a convertible. But this was a serious military parade that was marching right down the Champs-Élysées to the heart of Paris. That also gave me what I thought was a little insight on the French and the France of the day.

Q: Did you have any contact with the French officialdom at a lower level? Was there an attempt made on either part to get the junior officers in the French foreign affairs bureaucracy and the American and other embassies together?

JONES: No. We were not used as junior officers at the level in which we are now forced to use junior officers. We were very correct in most of our dealings with the French. As a matter of fact, there was an extended period of time in which our diplomatic list was limited. We were supposed to be matched with the number of diplomats that the Russians were permitted to have in France. This meant that actually for a number of months, I was not on the diplomatic list, and there was something of a scramble to eventually put me on the diplomatic list officially. I don't remember exactly when I was, but as a third secretary, eventually, I was slowly squeezed onto the diplomatic list. It made for one interesting experience when I was sent out to do a little representational swing in an area of France. All of the political section officers were being sent out to do short regional trips to both show the flag a little bit and to get some insight to what was happening locally. Although I barely remember the specific details, I went up into northern France for a couple of days and had a couple of meetings. One of the meetings that I had was with a French provincial official who had hauled out the diplomatic list and was asking, in effect, "Mr. Jones, are you CIA," although he was not putting it that way. He was trying to make it clear that since I wasn't on the diplomatic list or at least not on the copy that they had, just who was I? It took me some degree of protestation, a relatively extensive effort to describe, at least to profess, that I was not otherwise connected, that I was a legitimate American diplomat and Foreign Service officer. After listening to me for a while, they were willing to accept this. Whether they believed it, I don't know. But at least they had had this young man squirming in front of them while they looked at this particular curious representation of American diplomatic life there. I'm not exactly sure whether they viewed me as a toad or a poisonous insect or whether they were just willing to say with a sigh, "All right, this American wants to listen to us. We'll give him the party line." That's what they did. They just talked to me about local circumstances of how things were operated and how things developed and the like. It was an interesting experience in that manner, giving me a chance to practice my French and have the chance to see another part of France. My wife and I – this moves into the social, cultural aspect of it – this was when we first became parents. We were parents of twins, which was a rather abrupt surprise. We had not anticipated twins. It was at a juncture when we did not use x-rays. People had gotten to the point where they didn't want to use x-rays anymore for fear and concern for the children. They had not really developed sonograms effectively enough and they weren't available, even at the American hospital in Neuilly. So, they did the standard listen to the heartbeats bit. Although my wife, who is not a very large woman and wasn't any larger then, was very, very pregnant and she was identifiable from 100 yards because they had never seen anyone quite so pregnant. We used to say that she was the most pregnant Chinese woman in Europe at the time. They would say to her, "One baby, Mrs. Jones. A big baby, but only one baby." It wasn't until the children were delivered that we realized that there were twins. Nevertheless, we tried as much as we could to travel within France. They were born in October 1969. We traveled with them and sometimes without them as much as we could throughout France. We traveled to Belgium, into Germany. We hit various places as extensively as we could around Paris. We traveled to a degree to the South of France, but we did not get as far south as Marseille. But elsewhere, we did what we could under the circumstances and appreciated the opportunity a great deal. This, too, was an opportunity where what they say was the truth, that there are two French – the French in Paris, the Parisian, and those outside of Paris. It wasn't a night and day exercise, but you came to realize that if you compared the Parisian with anybody, you compared them with New Yorkers. New Yorkers are unpleasant, hostile, irritating, difficult. You can get into an argument with any cab driver. They have no interest in you except for whether or not they can extract something from you. Although Parisians, although not exactly with the same characteristics, had the same level of indifference to anyone who was not a native-born citizen of Paris. Outside of Paris, it was much less so. They disliked Parisians. That always gave you something to talk about. You also got a deeper sense for the history, the culture, and the society and just what France was in comparison to other places in Europe or the world.

Q: Here you are under Bob Anderson. Did you have the feeling that we were reporting on the internal politics out in the provinces but that the real game was being played in Paris and what was happening out in the provinces was interesting but more a practice run rather than the real game?

JONES: I think you've hit it absolutely. If anything, most of the officers were very reluctant to waste any time doing one of these regional trips. They were ordered to do so and they would do their one or so obligatory regional trip. But the action in France was then, as has been historically, centrally directed. This is a society that is run out of Paris. People have pointed out that at least at that time almost every country that had had a city of one million had at least a second city of one million or more. But France was the exception for this. In France, there was only one city of a million inhabitants or more and that was Paris. You could say that Paris was the center of everything. If the United States has an economic center in New York and a cultural center somewhere else and a political center in Washington, in France there was only one center for everything. It was Paris. You look at the roads and went out on the road and the roads all are marked in miles to Paris when you are looking in the direction of Paris. The center of operations, the center of whatever was happening, the center of our interest in France, was in Paris and what the French officials were doing. As the political section was broken down, it was broken down regionally and functionally, and those people with specific regional interests whether it was Africa or the Middle East or European communist affairs, or Russia, etc., we had our specialists dealing with those. If it was labor or political-military issues, we had an officer following those approaches. We found them in Paris. You weren't going to get anything that was useful in the way of information other than the general political feelings or sociological sense outside of Paris. You could get a certain amount of flavor. You might do it just to have an opportunity to go someplace else and get out of Paris for a while, but the conclusion was – and I believe accurately – that you would find all you really needed to know about what was happening in France from your connections in Paris. Those were domestic political connections as well. French office holders can hold office at multiple levels, not just on the national level. A member of parliament will be also a mayor. He may hold other ranks in between. So, these deputies in the National Assembly would also be able to be local spokesmen at the same time. This is a very curious phenomena. It must exist elsewhere in the world, but I haven't encountered it outside of Paris, where you have this kind of interconnection between local provincial and urban leadership and national leadership. Of course, France is not a federal state. France remains a very centrally directed country.

Q: How did we view the French Communist Party at that time?

JONES: We were very hostile to the French Communist Party. There was only one officer in the entire embassy, Bob Frowick, who was permitted to have any contact with the French communists. We did not deal with the French Communist Party in any official way other than this very tangential and not terribly frequent degree of association by Frowick, who had reasonably good contacts with them. Of course, it was much to their interest to be as open or approachable or willing to meet the Americans as possible. But I can't recall specifically that he did have occasional meetings with their most senior figures – George Marchais, for example.

Q: Wasn't the feeling that the French Communist Party was a tool of the Soviets or was there a different dynamic?

JONES: Certainly this was the most subservient Communist Party in non-communist Europe. There was no euro communism at that point, certainly not reflected in France. This was a slavishly Moscow-oriented Communist Party. They made it a virtue. This was a very, very old line, very Moscow-directed, Moscow-accepting Communist Party. They had themselves deep roots in French society from the commune. They certainly saw themselves as still potentially being able to gain power. They were running at better than 20 percent of the electorate and it seemed to be an unbreakable 20 percent. They put deputies into the National Assembly. There were substantial portions of the area that were clearly a “red belt” outside of Paris and in the Parisian suburbs. I believe that we did not want to be in the position of giving the communists any suggestion that we had the slightest degree of sympathy toward their interests and we certainly did not want to give the French government the slightest intimation that we had any sympathy with the communists. For that reason, it was made very clear to us as officers in the political section that only Bob Frowick would have liaison with the French communists. No one argued the case. There was an acceptance, more grudging than not, that we did have to know what the communists were doing. But there was no real interest in associating with them.

TERESA CHIN JONES
Institute Pasteur: Post Doctorate
Paris (1969-1971)

Mrs. Jones was born in the Soviet Union of Chinese diplomatic parents. She was raised in the USSR and the United States. A specialist in Scientific Affairs, both civilian and military, Mrs. Jones' Washington assignments were primarily in the fields of international nuclear and scientific matters and included non-proliferation, arms control, East-West Trade as well as general Political/Military subjects. Her foreign assignments were in the scientific and consular fields. She holds two degrees from the University of Pennsylvania. Mrs. Jones was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2007.

JONES: 1968 and part of '69. David is in the foreign service finishing his A-100 training, waiting his assignment. I am finishing up at the Department of Agriculture. We were planning a family. I had arranged for a post doctorate at Louis Pasteur because I had a professor who was French and who had done it. For free people love you. I was going to embark on the diplomatic life. I never in 10,000 years would have imagined myself as a foreign service officer.

In 1969, after French language training, David was assigned as a rotational junior officer at US Embassy Paris. This was the assignment that set the pattern of his entire career in the Foreign Service and that resulted in my taking the Foreign Service test and entering in January 1974. The post doctorate was arranged through a University of Pennsylvania professor Madeleine Jouillie. It was complicated by the fact that I was pregnant and expecting twins, though I didn't know it until hours before they were born. As a result, I was certainly enormously pregnant even in the early months.

At Institute Pasteur, I had two PhD candidates who were wonderful young men but very different from US graduate students. They always waited for technicians to do the actual lab work while they thought great thoughts. It did wonders for my French to speak and give presentations in French but my accent must've troubled them as they kept urging me to go Alliance Française for polish.

I had little knowledge of Foreign Service work, though I did meet the Science Counselor -- who was pleasant and on the periphery of the Embassy. I still remember him talking about a sniffer system to detect acetic anhydride produced by heroin labs -- alas, acetic anhydride reacts with water to produce vinegar. So an overflight of the Marseille to Nice area only managed to map all the French restaurants. As an Embassy wife and one who spoke French, I was guaranteed a seat next to the minor francophone contact. It was fun and I quickly learned that the perfect ice breaker was to ask about the cheeses, the wine, and the politics of France. David loved the work and worked for people who became friends and who eventually set him onto a political-military arms control track that got him into the Senior Foreign Service -- with the success of the Intermediate Nuclear Forces Treaty. One of his supervisors also mentioned me in his efficiency report and suggested that I take the FS Exam-which they had just opened for spouses.

The twins were a total surprise and inspired me to ask for an anesthesiologist in perfect French as soon as I heard. In fact, I was so ignorant that I had had labor pains all night before they induced labor. Boy, did I worry when I heard the midwife say "two heads, I feel two heads." I remember, praying fervently for "two bodies please, two bodies." There was non ultrasound then. We had twin girls, each about 5 and 1/2 pounds, named Martha (after David's Mom) and Lisa (after my Mom). I tied up the washing machines at the Embassy apartments for months doing diapers. I used to take notes on who did what. I also improved my French by watching TV. They had all the presidential candidates giving speeches all the time. As a result, I began to think that sentences were supposed to begin with "je constate."

Charles L. Daris was born in 1938 in Massachusetts. He served in the US Navy before graduating from the San Francisco State College in 1963. He entered the Foreign Service in 1964. His overseas posts include Afghanistan, Vietnam, Western Africa, Morocco, South Africa, Tunisia and Saudi Arabia. Mr. Daris was interviewed by Raymond Ewing in 1998.

DARIS: I was assigned back to INR to work on Southeast Asia but before I assumed my responsibilities I had the good fortune to be asked by Phil Habib to be part of our delegation to the Paris Peace Talks. I was the Executive Secretary of the delegation and I went on to do that for two years.

Q: That was really on an assignment? You were transferred to Paris?

DARIS: Yes we were transferred to Paris. It was a makeshift arrangement and no one, especially the French, thought that we would stay that long. For example my orders read “for the duration of the talks,” and that was 1969. We occupied a wing of the embassy and had a fantastic team there. At the time I arrived Henry Cabot Lodge headed the Mission and the incomparable Phil Habib was his deputy. Phil stayed the whole time I was there. Cabot Lodge was replaced by David Bruce, another splendid public servant. We had a sterling cast of all agencies represented by very skilled people. Unfortunately the format, as you know, was one meeting a week with mostly posturing so I have to admit that we had plenty of time to profit from France. Not that I regret having done that, but it would have been nice at the same time to have made more progress toward ending the war.

As it turned out, while I was there Henry Kissinger started sneaking in secretly to meetings with Le Duc Tho. Ultimately he involved small elements of the delegation – myself excluded -- in the talks that he was having with the North Vietnamese. Over time, these were to yield some results. The Thursday format at the elegant Avenue Kleber conference site, which the French very gamely kept providing us, was simply a front because the moment wasn’t ripe for negotiations. I still look back with awe on the collection of people that we had in that group. It was as talented a bunch as I’ve seen in the Foreign Service in one location and a lot of it was due to Phil Habib’s leadership. He selected the best and he kept morale up. He kept us at task and we all loved and admired him.

Q: You mentioned the side talks that were beginning after the 1968 election and the Nixon administration via Henry Kissinger who was then national security advisor. I suppose at some point the delegation, somebody like you as executive secretary, became aware that these side talks were going on. Did that sort of undermine the rest of the process or was it something that was essential that had to happen to get some new thinking and new vigor into the process?

DARIS: We were about 25 officers in the delegation. I think by the time he eventually brought some of us in -- and this was after I don’t know how many trips -- maybe four people were included in the substance of what was going on. My colleague David Engel, who was special assistant to David Bruce, was one of these; his splendid Vietnamese language capabilities were put into play as Kissinger’s interpreter. The rest of us knew something was going on but were not privy to the details and I guess that undermined our sense of mission a little bit. But we were left with continuing the facade, if you will, and that was worth it in and of itself. We prided ourselves in being professionals.

Q: And you were meeting with the Vietnamese delegation once a week and probably other times as well.

DARIS: Yes, we also saw our South Vietnamese colleagues socially.

Q: North Vietnamese too?

DARIS: No. There was no social contact. There were a few secret talks with them but not very many.

Q: And the same was true with the Vietcong delegation?

DARIS: Yes.

Q: At some point it became known that Kissinger was having talks in Paris with the Vietnamese. I was in Rome in September of 1970 when President Nixon made a visit and as I recall Kissinger came to Rome by way of Paris where he had had some talks and I think that was publicly known. Does that sound right?

DARIS: I don't think it was in the public domain that early. I left in '71 and I don't think those talks were in the public domain at that early point. They were happening, however.

Q: Was the delegation pretty much in place through much of this period? Were there people coming from Washington constantly to help out, or to second guess, or whatever?

DARIS: Oh, yes. We had an interesting setup. The presence became institutionalized. Governor Harriman and Cy Vance set up the talks in '68 before the change of administrations. The talks went on well into the '70s until the treaty was signed, in 1973. I left in 1971. We had temporary-duty interpreters and court reporters coming and going. The Legal Adviser's office always had a senior person there who would rotate. The Asia person in the political section in Paris sat with us in the delegation. John Gunther Dean, then Patricia Byrne filled the slot at the time. I had Air Force couriers at my disposal. There was a senior CIA operations officer, Bill Koplowitz, who headed a group whose work was dedicated to the Delegation and there was a senior CIA analyst specifically assigned to the Delegation. There also was a military delegation headed by a three star general; Fred Weyand was in that job when I was there.

Q: Most of these people had on the ground experience with Vietnam?

DARIS: Everyone had been to Vietnam except perhaps some of the technical specialists and the legal people.

Q: As executive secretary you coordinated a lot of the preparations. Did you actually participate in the negotiating sessions? You took notes I suppose?

DARIS: Yes, I was a member of the delegation. I attended the meetings and participated in the substantive work of the delegation as well as handling administrative liaison work with the embassy and sometimes with the French. I also helped out our Press Spokesman, Steve Ledogar, at his weekly press briefings after our plenary meetings. Things as I say were working almost automatically by this time. It was a reasonably satisfying experience professionally but with some obvious professional limitations, and it was those limitations that led me to forgo the tempting "for the duration" phrase in my original orders and opt to move onto another assignment.

Q: This in State Department personnel bureaucratic terms was considered a Paris assignment, not a Washington assignment?

DARIS: Yes, it was a Paris assignment.

Q: Anything else about the Vietnam peace talks?

DARIS: I think not. Nothing substantive occurs to me. It was simply not a productive time in the talks because it was not a time of movement in the war itself.

STEPHEN J. LEDOGAR
Delegate, Vietnam Peace Talks
Paris (1969-1972)

Ambassador Stephen Ledogar was born in New York in 1929, and received his BA from Fordham University. He served overseas in the US Navy from 1949-1952. Ledogar entered the Foreign Service in 1959 and was posted in Montreal, Milan, Quang Tri Province, Saigon, Paris, Brussels and Geneva. He was Interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on March 1, 2000.

LEDOGAR: I was assigned to quit FSI and immediately go to Paris to the Vietnam Peace Talks Delegation on very short notice.

The so-called Paris Preliminary Conversations took place between May and November of 1968 between the United States and North Vietnam. Ambassadors Harriman and Vance headed the U.S. Delegation. On the North Vietnamese side, Xuan Thuy was in charge. Remember that Nixon was elected in November. The Preliminary Conversations ended just before the election. In effect, the agreement was that in exchange for a total cessation of U.S. bombing of the north, the wider talks would be organized. They would include two additional parties, the Viet Cong on the Communist side and the government of the Republic of Vietnam on the “good guys” side. But of course Nixon was not going to be inaugurated until January. In that period between November and January, the Paris talks were in a hiatus. We devoted ourselves to working out the procedures for those wider talks before the substantive exchanges began.

Q: Were you involved in that?

LEDOGAR: From the Washington end, but by the end January, I was over there in Paris.

Q: While you were in Washington during the late '68 period, you got involved in the preparation for the talks?

LEDOGAR: Yes. For our original U.S. delegation in Paris members were all pulled from their Washington jobs temporarily. Nobody knew how long the wider Peace Talks were going to take. One of the guys from my office in the State Department had been pulled out and sent over there. Everyone was on loan from his Washington job without families until I went over. By January of 1969 Washington realized that this was not going to be a quick negotiation. It was a real hardship for someone who leaves his family and Washington responsibilities behind to concentrate and stick it out. It was also politically not very wise to have our people shuttling back and forth, rotating. But yes, I was in the State Department office that was backstopping the Peace Talks. I went to Honolulu for another conference on how to win the war and came back and started in the economic training course. Two or three days into it, I got a phone call saying that I was to go to Paris. The purpose was to go over there on a full-time basis to replace the guy, Jim Rosenthal, who was the first choice, but he was too important and was needed back on the Vietnam Desk. The Vietnam working group used the old bureaucratic trick that when you have a levy and you're required to contribute a person to a particular effort, the one person that you want to volunteer is the one who was transferred out and for whom you've already gotten a replacement. In other words, it was a slot out of the hide of the Foreign Service Institute at that time, not out of the Office of Vietnam Affairs. I went to Paris and was there for almost four years.

Q: You went out in January '69 and were there until early summer of 1972.

LEDOGAR: I should mention, to follow up on some personal notes, that in August of '67, I got married. By that time, I was in the Watch Center at the Pentagon. My wife was working here in Washington at the Arena Stage and at the Center Stage in Baltimore. We did not have children immediately. When in January of '69 we were transferred to Paris, she had to give six weeks notice to break her contract according to the Actor's Equity rules, and she followed me to Paris shortly thereafter and stayed for the duration.

Q: Can you reconstruct your feelings before you went out on how you thought the talks were going to go? Would it take a long time? Were you optimistic, pessimistic? Was this a sellout?

LEDOGAR: I did not feel it was a sellout, but by this time, having had the experience from Washington of dealing with the North Vietnamese during the so-called Preliminary Conversations in 1968, we knew that we were up against some tough characters who were going to play this forum for propaganda. Whether there would be substantive negotiations or not was not yet evident, but people knew that it was going to be hard. No, we certainly didn't consider it a sellout and we did not have any instructions that would suggest that in any way.

My predecessor, Jim Rosenthal, and later myself were sent out there to reinforce the press and public affairs part of the Delegation. The U.S. and world press descended on Paris in enormous numbers. There were thousands of accredited journalists. When I got there in January things were in transition. Cyrus Vance and General George Signius were kind of holdovers from the Johnson era. They stayed for one month to help the Republican-selected Delegation organize. President Nixon assigned Henry Cabot Lodge and Lawrence Walsh as Ambassadors. Since Johnson had Harriman and Vance, Nixon had to have two as well. The large U.S. Delegation to the wider talks included representatives of all concerned agencies. From the State Department, Phil Habib, who had been freed from his Deputy Assistant Secretary job in Washington, was the equivalent of political counselor and was career. There were senior military advisors that began with a series of four star generals. Fred Weyand was the first in 1969, and then Julian Ewell followed. Only later did we replace them with a three star general. The press spokesman of the Delegation in the Preliminary Conversation phase had been appointed from the White House. His name was Bill Jordan. But when the wider conversations began, Jordan's professional deputy, Harold Kaplan, took over as the press spokesman for the new Delegation (Kappy was a USIA career officer who had had a lot of experience as spokesman in Vietnam). Henry Cabot Lodge had a prejudice against press spokesmanship and public affairs by USIA folks that was borne, he said, of his experience as Ambassador to Vietnam. Whatever it was, he acquired a distaste for career USIS public affairs officers. Lodge felt that they were all really aspiring to a subsequent career in the media, and therefore were too kind and gentle with the press. He had been well served by appointing a Foreign Service officer as Embassy spokesman the first time he was Ambassador in Saigon from 1963-1969. So, Ambassador Lodge had a prejudice in favor of using substantive Foreign Service officers to deal with the press. He thought that someone who really knew the politics could pick up the techniques of dealing with the press. So, Cabot Lodge insisted on an FSO as a deputy to Kaplan. That's how I wound up in the job.

Q: Was Frances Cook there at all?

LEDOGAR: Yes. She arrives soon on the scene.

Q: With Cabot Lodge, one always thinks of Barry Zorthian. Did Cabot Lodge not care for him?

LEDOGAR: I think Barry was the kind of fellow that Cabot Lodge thought might be looking towards a subsequent career.

Q: He became sort of a figure. He wasn't just a spokesperson.

LEDOGAR: Oh, yes. And Kaplan had been Zorthian's deputy in Saigon.

Q: Before we move on to what you were doing, what was the impression you were getting of Cabot Lodge? I've heard stories about him. One was that he was laid back. Two was that he was kind of distant, that he wasn't a hard driver of himself anyway.

LEDOGAR: He certainly was a sort of person that kept himself aloof. I thought he worked diligently. It was evident that he really cared, especially about the plight of prisoners of war and missing in action. We'll get into this business of when Paris became a center for wives of those who were POWs or MIAs trying to find out whether they were wives or widows. But Lodge had some idiosyncracies. He was a very nice person to work for. The curious thing is that shortly after all of this started, Hal Kaplan got an offer to go to work in private industry. I don't know whether he was just tired of the whole business, but he took the offer, retired, and left the press spokesmanship in my hands. I didn't have an awful lot of experience. I had done a lot of speaking around the country fielding questions, but not from professional newsmen. So, I had a baptism by fire.

A U.S. Delegation tradition had been established in the Paris talks that before each meeting - and we had weekly plenaries with the other parties - the Press Spokesman would meet with the Ambassador and give him ideas about what were the topics of the day, what might be on newspeople's minds, and if asked certain questions how he might handle them. Well, it was just the exact opposite. I would go up 20-25 minutes before we left to go to the Hotel Majestic meeting site and I got a tutorial from Lodge in how to handle the press - the wisdom of a real professional. Everything from how and when you sat for cameras to how to keep your collar from rolling up behind you, how to use cue cards, and various other techniques... It was priceless.

Q: He was a consummate politician.

LEDOGAR: Yes, indeed. I thought since I was working so intimately with him that I ought to read more about him. I read a biography and was astounded at some of his accomplishments. His wife was an absolutely splendid lady. I know that he was criticized as a politician for not working very hard with Nixon the first time around, being too laid back. This was not the same kind of physically exhausting routine that I imagine it was on the campaign trail. Lodge lived in the Hotel Crillon, which was about 50 meters from the front door of our Embassy, where the delegation offices were.

I will say this about Lawrence Walsh. I think that he was a poor choice as Lodge's alter-ego because he was not suited for international diplomacy. He was a federal judge whom I had admired when I was a law student in New York. If I had time while I was in Law School when I was in the federal court neighborhood, I would just drop into his courtroom to see what was going on. He had a splendid career in that. But I don't think diplomacy, especially with Communists, was his forté. He was unhappy. A couple of times when Lodge had to be back in Washington and Walsh took the head of the Delegation role, he got flustered and was getting angry at insults and distortions, and he at times resorted to jargon himself. That didn't go down very well with anyone in that circumstance, getting into a polemics exchange with trained Communists. I think he soon decided that the Paris Peace Talk game was not for him and he glided away. Washington never did fill that slot. There was no real role for a second ambassador.

As the negotiations went on, it became increasingly clear that the other side was not only not interested in real negotiations, they were only trying to use the forum for propaganda purposes. In terms of their official negotiating position, they insisted on trying to achieve more diplomatically than they would have gained even by total military victory. If they drove all the U.S. and South Vietnamese forces into the sea, they would not gain as much as their negotiating position was requiring. Hanoi was demanding not only the title to South Vietnam and the elimination of all the South Vietnamese forces and the withdrawal of American forces, among other things, but also that this title be guaranteed by the United States and others. Moreover, they insisted on war reparations. So, it was an extraordinary negotiating position that they held onto for a couple of years. But it became increasingly clear that not much was going to happen, so the press corps started to slip away. Visiting media hotshots went home and the portfolio was left to the Paris bureaus of the various media. Our Delegation also adjusted in size accordingly for the long haul.

Q: You had the administrative talks about getting the expanded Paris conference together. Had that taken place?

LEDOGAR: That was just being completed when I arrived in Paris. I had watched most of it from the Washington end. It's very important that historians understand that what was glibly termed as an irresponsible "argument over the shape of the table" was not quite that bad. The fact was that there was an interregnum between the end of the Johnson era - he had become a lame duck - and the Nixon administration. There had to be a change in the composition of the negotiations, the Preliminary Conversations had to end, and the South Vietnamese delegations (one from each side) needed to arrive. Importantly, agreements were needed on how the wider negotiations were going to be conducted.

I talked before about my analysis as to what the essence of the conflict was. That was not just my own, but everybody's judgement in the U.S. and South Vietnamese Administrations. It was not a question of four parties of equal legitimacy, but it really was a question of, on one side of the conflict, the legitimate South Vietnamese government and its Delegation and the United States Delegation which was allied to them. Those were the allied "good guys" from our point of view. On the other side, the Viet Cong was not an independent entity, certainly not a government as they fashioned themselves. They were a paramilitary organization that was trained and very clearly totally controlled by the North Vietnamese, who called all the shots. But they wanted to have it, to pretend that it was, the opposite; that there was this legitimate Viet Cong Government and just a few northerners who had big hearts and wanted to come and help them out in the guise of being volunteer "popular forces." The Communists never did admit that regular North Vietnam troop units were in the South. It's ludicrous to anyone who knew what was going on there. So, they wanted to have, if you will, a dynamic, four-sided table, each side occupied by one of the four parties to the endeavor. We wanted to have a two-sided table with the Viet Cong and North Vietnamese arranging themselves however they wanted on one side. Clearly they were a single entity. As I said, we wanted a two-sided (our side and your side) configuration.

It was not as trivial as it was reported in the press and public. It was fundamental as to how the negotiations were going to be conducted, and it had to be dealt with before we could get on with substance. And, even if procedure was agreed to, you couldn't really get on with substance because the Communist side wouldn't let you until President Nixon was clearly in office and calling the shots. They would not deal with the lame-duck Johnson administration between November of '68 and January of '69.

Q: You had been dealing with this under the Johnson administration. What was your feeling about this new administration, the Nixon administration, and Vietnam?

LEDOGAR: As I recall, one thought that Humphrey would be softer on the whole Vietnam question than Nixon would be. As Vice President to Johnson and democratic candidate in 1968, Humphrey had been most uncomfortable supporting his President's policy there. People thought that he certainly wouldn't even keep as vigorous a line as Johnson did. One thought at that time that Nixon and the Republican administration would be tougher about a number of decisions, including military action against the North, including the risk of a wider war, including standing firm with our military forces who were in combat. I thought that it was going to be a turn to the hawkish side rather than a turn to the dovish side even beyond what Johnson had indicated he was willing to do. Humphrey, if elected, probably would have sought or taken more initiatives to try to wind the thing down even at the expense of some of our objectives. So, strictly in terms of the war effort, I thought U.S. interests would be better served under Nixon, but I'm not an admirer of President Nixon over Hubert Humphrey.

Q: Obviously, as you went there, you knew it was going to be a rough battle, but was the feeling “We’re going to be marking time until this thing is settled on the battlefield?”

LEDOGAR: I don’t recall thinking in those terms, but we certainly were extremely attentive to the military situation. In fact, one of the things about serving in Paris, as I did for a considerable length of time, was that it was a very clear-eyed place to observe the military conflict. You didn’t have a lot of the smoke and dust of Saigon and being so close to the military scene, and yet you didn’t have all the politics of Washington. We kind of had the best of both worlds. We had military and intelligence people on our Delegation who brought all of the information to us every day and we were able to follow the military situation each day even before Washington woke up. We had a very substantial military composition to the Delegation and that is what they did; they followed military developments, interpreted them, and advised us about how and to what extent they might be reflected in our presentations, in our positions, our recommendations to Washington, and so forth. Anyone of any senior capacity going back to Washington in those days from Saigon would go back via Paris and come in and brief us. Ambassador Bunker, John Paul Vann, and senior U.S. military leaders would all stop in Paris and talk to us about the situation. To the extent that I can recall that period and my own feelings, I, maybe in a triumph of hope over expectation, expected that something was going to break open. It turned out I underestimated the North Vietnamese ability to continue to stonewall for as long as they did, and they were taking very substantial casualties. We had periodic bombing halts and so forth. That was one campaign that we watched very carefully.

A good portion of our time was taken up with the phenomenon of a number of American officials and celebrities who came to Paris, sought meetings with U.S. negotiators, and tried to tell us what U.S. foreign policy in Southeast Asia ought to be. Many times I had to stand and answer these folks, including a couple of U.S. Representatives from Congress. They would come over and shake their fists and say, “Don’t you understand what the American people want?” I would just reply with some version of the following, while trying not to get into a shouting match: “Yes, indeed. I hear what you are saying. I also know the Constitution, and if you want to affect what my orders are, then you talk to Washington or you go to the voting polls and you affect U.S. foreign policy that way. You don’t come here and talk to the tip on the point of the negotiating pen and try to tell us to violate our instructions and bend things more in the direction that you advocate. Maybe you’re right about the American people and their attitude towards this, but until my instructions have changed, I’m going to pursue the policy as it’s laid down by the president and you wouldn’t have it any other way if you thought about it.” But that didn’t stop the people. They kept coming over, trying to tell us what was going on. The French, as the hosts for the negotiations, had undertaken to keep the atmosphere neutral, but they were having an increasingly difficult time because a lot of folks wanted to come over to Paris and demonstrate somewhere about the Vietnam War.

Then we started to get visits to Paris by delegations of American women, wives of U.S. servicemen who were listed as either POWs or MIAs. When it was quite clear that the Communist side was not going to negotiate on such things as cease fire, withdrawal of forces, and other major issues, we thought at least we should call attention to the plight of American POWs and the total malfeasance of Hanoi on their obligations under international law to release the names of those they had, to allow international observation, to allow for correspondence, and so forth. They wouldn't identify who they held. There were very clear indications that the prisoners were being badly treated. Under the Johnson Administration we had a policy of playing the POW issue sort of low-key. Hanoi was very skillfully dribbling out a few POWs from time to time in big propaganda barrages where they would invite ultradove American critics of U.S. policy to come to Hanoi and there would be a big celebration of "progressive" American anti-war opinion and of the Hanoi righteousness. Then they would release to them a couple of prisoners. I think there were three groups of three that were released that way. The Berrigan brothers were involved in one of these sorry episodes.

Q: These were Catholic priests in the anti-war movement.

LEDOGAR: Yes. We learned a certain amount from talking to these few released fellows about how, when these anti-war figures, the Jane Fondas and others, came to Hanoi, treatment of the hundreds of POWs worsened. The decision was made in Washington that the U.S. would not go that quiet diplomacy route anymore. We were going to start not just talking in public but shouting about Hanoi's poor performance. The Paris Peace Talks were not getting anywhere. We had very reasonable proposals on the table that were categorically rejected. The proposals of the other side demanded a 120% victory before negotiations could even start. So, we spent a good portion of time in a crescendo of speeches, highlighting and discussing and otherwise calling attention to the POW issue.

Q: As the U.S. Delegation Press spokesman, how did you work? Did you go out there and read a statement and accept questions?

LEDOGAR: The most important thing was to be completely informed and to participate in the preparation and articulation of our public point of view. We quickly realized that the North Vietnamese were very anxious to have this forum, not for substantive negotiations but for public information. For them, it was a direct point of contact with the mainstream Western press. Even Western journalists who I discussed this with including a few I accused of favoring the Communist side in their stories were quite frank in saying the U.S. should not expect "fair" treatment or evenhandedness in Paris. They would say, "Look, you've got people who we can talk to in Washington, in Saigon, and lots of other places. There's no inability on your part to get your message out about Vietnam. But this is the only place where we have direct access to Hanoi officials. You bet we're going to favor them." It was a very tough job. I recall once I got very upset with one particular journalist for a major U.S. newspaper.

Q: Who was this?

LEDOGAR: His stories for 11 out of 12 consecutive weeks led with a propaganda statement by the North Vietnamese or Communist side alleging atrocities or some form of misconduct on the part of the allied side. Each week, they began like this: "Today, the Communist side accused the South Vietnamese of mistreating prisoners in tiger cages" or "Today, the Americans bombed the populated village of such and such, killing so many schoolchildren. The South Vietnamese denied it. Otherwise, at the 46th meeting of the Paris Vietnam Peace Talks, there was no substantive progress." That was the formula. I know that the journalists don't write the headlines, but the headlines reflect the leads and the leads in each case were what the Communist side alleged. When I pointed this out, not only was there no remorse, the journalist said, “What do you expect? This is their window to the western mainstream press. You shouldn’t expect that you’re going to get evenhanded treatment here. We may try to treat the substantive issues in an evenhanded way when you both ever get around to talking about them, but if they want to use this forum to talk about a real or alleged atrocity or massacre, you bet we’re going to report that. That’s going to be the lead story if nothing else is happening.” It was very frustrating to be up against that. Also, we tried to adopt the policy of not responding, especially in the press conferences, to charges of atrocities. We didn’t always have all the facts at hand. That wasn’t the purpose of the Paris talks. We kept saying, “We’re here to negotiate, not to engage in polemics.” But after a while, that gets to be a losing game. You have to respond. This isn’t just American press. This was the whole international press corps.

Q: What was your impression of the press corps?

LEDOGAR: They were fairly responsible over all, quite ruthless, very competitive among themselves. The charge that they’d sell their grandmothers for a good story is largely true. I learned some curious things. Intuitively you might suspect that the ABC, NBC, CBS bureau chiefs would be competitors. It didn’t take long to find out that they were not competitors so much with each other there in Paris, as they were competitors with their respective colleagues in some other place like Beirut. They were competing for their local Paris story to get on their respective evening news programs, so they were inclined to hype it up and make it sound more newsworthy than the story that was coming from the Middle East or someplace else. Not only did they get their names on the air (“This is so and so from the Paris Peace Talks”), also, according to union rules, they had to be paid extra when their names and images and so forth appeared. They were very competitive. Then you find out that your intuition that the electronic media would be in total competition with the pen and pencil media was wrong. Sometimes they would work out little cross-media deals where one journalist from one responsible newspaper of record would conspire with a television journalist from a major network so that their versions of events would support each other. They’d come out with an angle on a story or sometimes push the envelope of truth. When a T.V. editor would say “What’s your basis for this?” The T.V. reporter would say, “Look at The New York Times.” They would cross-support each other by being able to refer their editors to somebody else who also had the same angle. There were all kinds of very charming and admirable things about journalists... But there is a limit to how far you could trust them.

Q: Was there a matter of off-microphone sitting down and having a drink with some of the major correspondents, talking about what was really happening or was it an adversarial situation?

LEDOGAR: Very much the former. I should have pointed out that that was the larger portion of my job, backgrounding the press. I learned that you have to be quite careful that, to the extent you can, you should make yourself available even when it’s inconvenient. Try to be sure that it is the journalist who sets the ground rules and you the person who agrees to them, and not you who imposes the ground rules. Otherwise, you get into this pernicious practice of them saying “a government spokesman who refused to be identified” or “who spoke under condition of anonymity” or something like that. So, I adopted the practice of responding to someone who said, “Could we kick the ball around a little bit?” by answering, “Sure, come on,” especially to journalists who came in and out of Paris, as increasingly became the norm after the first few months. They wanted me to help them get back up to speed. They would ask me, "What are the ground rules?" I always tried to reply, "Whatever you want. I'll talk to you on the record. I'll talk to you on background. I'll talk to you on deep background. You set the rules. I would add that I would probably be able to say more in one circumstance than in the other. But if I find out that you infer in your story that I was the one who spoke on condition of anonymity, then next time you come back to town, I'm not sure I'm going to be available." Now remember a very important thing. I was very much in demand in Paris. If you were not an official spokesman whom journalists may in the future need access to, the whole issue of "ground rules" is moot. Picture a guy who happens to have been witness to a crime responding to a newsman who comes over and sticks a microphone in his face and asks, "What did you see?" The guy says, "Well, on background, I'll say so and so." That's ridiculous. He's a passerby and most likely, nobody is ever going to count on him as a source again, so what's the incentive to respect his confidence? But, in Paris, I had the ability to really turn off somebody who broke the ground rules. So, it was not just professional integrity. It was also a question of a source drying up.

Q: Did you find that the responsible reporters understood the impossibility of what the North Vietnamese were insisting on or were they just reporting on a day to day basis?

LEDOGAR: Yes. I found that they were quite aware of what was going on. I suppose if you had a litmus test, you would probably find at least as much anti-war sentiment among the American press corps as in the country at large - if anything, more, but I also found that for the most part they did not let that interfere with their reporting, their personal instincts. The thing that we found annoying was more the practices that they adopted of giving preferential treatment and attention to what the other side was saying even though it had nothing to do with the negotiations. They had requirements to file so many stories and they wanted to stay in Paris and be on the beat in case something did happen. They had to file stories, and why not report the propaganda and atrocity claims of the other side?

Q: During the early part of this period, early '69 to mid-'70, I was in Saigon. Everyone was chasing around trying to look at tiger cages and mistreatment of prisoners and this sort of thing. Let's talk about the POW issue and how you dealt with it over the period of time and some of the personalities involved and how we played this for the press and with the North Vietnamese.

LEDOGAR: The North Vietnamese were extremely skilled in handling the U.S. press and taking advantage of our public affairs institutions. It was really impressive to see how they knew the sore spots and were able to push buttons and get the kind of reactions that they wanted. I don't know where they got the training. But on the prisoner of war issue, as we raised the heat, there was increasing attention. We were pointing out that the issue of living up to the Geneva Convention on POW's was not something that was the normal part of negotiations. This was a humanitarian thing where they were in violation of international norms. We highlighted the fact that they wouldn't even identify the prisoners they held, no less give them basic rights of communication and decent treatment and so forth. We did all kinds of things to keep the issue in the spotlight. At one point, we gave the Hanoi side a list of 1,400-some odd names and said, "Would you check off on the list which ones you still hold?" Now, there were problems for them in that... Let's take the case of pilots who were shot down over the North and either parachuted or survived a crash. Sometimes the citizenry would be the first one to get to these pilots before the government forces got there. The citizenry were a little bit upset about having been bombed. They would really mistreat the individual pilot and sometimes execute him or beat him to death. You might have a photograph of this fellow being led around, but then he was killed. Was that on orders of Hanoi? One doesn't know. But we do know that there were a number of folks that they published photos of as being alive and apparently in their hands who never made it out.

Then there is the question of in wartime, especially when there is a huge amount of violence with heavy guns, some people get obliterated, or a plane gets hit and goes down in flames into a cloud. No one knows if the pilot ejected. Then there was a question of some of the people that we had fighting in clandestine operations having used a "nom de guerre," (a different name that few people knew) so we had to put two names on our list, at least two names. So, you have a problem about getting an accurate account. No doubt about the fact that Hanoi was far from meeting the minimum standards. It was proven to our satisfaction that they had actually identified less than one out every three people that they held. They had allowed something like only one out of 10 to send out letters. They were supposed to allow each prisoner one letter a month in and out under the Geneva Convention. How many would receive letters? We had the testimony of one of our airmen who had been released to pacifists that a young Vietnamese soldier once came around to a cell at the Hanoi Hilton and handed one of the three POWs there a letter. They asked the soldier, "How come one of us gets to correspond with his family, a second is allowed only to receive letters, not to send, and the third is allowed nothing either way?" This young soldier, according to our former POW, said, "Well, that's simple. It's to confuse the enemy."

There were all kinds of malfeasance and shortcomings in Hanoi's basic responsibilities with regards to POWs. We took the position that this wasn't something that was negotiable. This was something that they should do because it's an international obligation. Soon, the wives of U.S. POWs and MIAs started coming over to Paris. Some of them were received by the North Vietnamese delegation and sent away with nothing. Some of them were just refused audiences and wouldn't be given access at all. A few of them received and eventually got word back that their man was either alive, dead, or unknown. We found that it was difficult to figure out a pattern of North Vietnamese behavior, but one thing that we thought we identified was that those wives who were seen by the press or the public or maybe other sources of intelligence as having come to Paris and gotten a briefing at the U.S. Embassy had less chance of getting in to see the Communists than those who did not. These women were brave and well-behaved and you had to have sympathy for them. But they were not very experienced in international affairs and didn't speak foreign languages and so forth. The very idea of not coming to their own Embassy to be briefed, but getting on the telephone and calling up the North Vietnamese themselves, was a little bit daunting. That's where we chose to have a young female Foreign Service officer there, a USIA officer, take charge, go out and meet these groups, and give them counsel and advice. She would take care of their basic requirements of food, lodging, and communications, maybe make the telephone calls for them, handle the transportation, and do all the things that you would like to do instinctively for these Americans in difficulty, but things which might be inimical to their chances of getting their audience if not done quietly. That's where this officer, Frances Cook, came in. When there were no American women in town trying to find out if they were wives or widows, Frances was attached to my press section and did some public affairs work that was not directly related to the wives. But when a group came over, her primary responsibility was to get out and go meet them and to do all of these things for them away from the Embassy. Frances was first-rate.

Q: She's been ambassador to several places.

LEDOGAR: Yes. She integrated into the Foreign Service from USIA after the Vietnam Peace Talks and had a brilliant career.

Q: In these press conferences, how would you respond to... I assume that the North Vietnamese could come up with an atrocity a day. War is war. There may be truth or there may not be. You say at the beginning we weren't responding?

LEDOGAR: The basic U.S. instinct was to try to say, "We're not here to deal with charges about conduct of the war. We're not interested in your polemics. We're here to negotiate. As soon as you've got something of substance to say, go ahead." The South Vietnamese were less capable of staying aloof from polemics. The South Vietnamese had what may be an Asian, Vietnamese, or Buddhist instinct that a charge launched and not addressed takes on an air of credibility, so they often rose to the bait.

Q: It does in the journalistic world.

LEDOGAR: It does. But really blatant propaganda should be swatted down. We would say to our Vietnamese allies, "Don't get sucked in. Don't get into a pissing contest with a skunk." Often, and sometimes this was a very wise thing to do, the U.S. representatives would "no comment" the atrocity charge and we would leave it to the South Vietnamese Delegation to respond. They would deal with them fairly straightforwardly, summarily, and not get into "So is your sister" kind of responses. But a lot of the mudslinging was done at the press conferences which followed the weekly plenary meetings. The plenary meetings were usually on Thursdays. Each was followed by four press conferences given by the press spokesmen of each of the four Delegations in rotation. Each week, the order would change. The U.S. Delegation Chief would have brief contact with the press as we left our mission on the morning of the plenary. Then the second press contact was as we walked into the Hotel Majestic, where the meetings took place. The third was as we left. At these three brief encounters the Ambassador would make a one or two sentence statement, and take one or two questions as he walked by the microphones. Then there were the formal, sit-down, on-the-record briefings. When my turn came, I would go up and take questions from the international press until all questions were exhausted, so my briefings would sometimes last 15 minutes or sometimes 45 minutes. I would field questions in French or even Italian if somebody wanted, and paraphrased them, but I always responded on the record in English. Even the other parties kind of settled on English, although the North Vietnamese used more French.

It soon became the practice - in fact, almost immediately - that while the plenary meetings were not open to the press and public, we soon were briefing and even handing out copies of all statements that were made in the plenaries.

Later we'll have to get into the whole other series of contacts under the rubric of the Paris Peace Talks. Here I'm talking about our weekly so-called plenary meetings that were restricted but the content of which was made public after the fact. But there are various other formulations that one could have and at times we did use. One could have a circumstance where we had restricted meetings and agreed that we were not going to brief on everything. Now, that is more the meaning of the term of "restricted meeting." Where news of what took place was restricted, we would just say certain things, either by practice or by agreement among the negotiators. Or we could meet other than in the Hotel Majestic, where the formal rules applied. Then you get into the levels of secret talks. In other words, secret in that nobody outside even knows they're taking place unless a special effort is made to talk about aspects of them, either by agreement or by one side deciding to blow the cover of a failed series. Then there were the super-secret talks, ones that were taking place where even members of the Delegations didn't know that some of their own people were meeting elsewhere. So, we had at various times each of these types and sometimes several levels of conversations going on. What I've been talking about so far in this interview is the weekly meetings and the on-the-record press conferences that followed. There is a whole history to the other levels of contacts that were part of the Vietnam Peace Talks, which I'll be glad to get into later.

Q: Early on, what was your impression of the South Vietnamese delegation?

LEDOGAR: They were quite competent and professional. They were from a social strata that was clearly uppercrust. One couldn't help but wonder how democratic they were. Our South Vietnamese probably among themselves found U.S. conduct difficult. They probably chafed a little bit about "sleeping with an elephant." The Americans to them were so "big and clumsy." But I found that they were very cooperative. I certainly had an excellent relationship with my counterpart, Mr. Danh, who was their spokesman. Our families became friends.

Q: Did these elements stay about the same for four years?

LEDOGAR: Pretty much. They had a lot of stability in their delegation.

Q: What about the Viet Cong?

LEDOGAR: They were not very competent. The leader, Madame Binh, was a real dragon lady. But that doesn't mean she wasn't intelligent. She was quick on her feet.

The compromise in the dispute over this shape of the negotiating table was agreement on a set of three tables. A large circular table which was effectively divided into two areas by the proximity of two little tables that were set exactly 24 centimeters from the big one at points 180 degrees apart. Clerical folks sat at the small tables. In the allied semicircles the two allied Ambassadors sat side by side the two Delegations strung out (let's call that six o'clock), with the Americans to the left of our Ambassador and the South Vietnamese to the right their Ambassador. Thus the allied side occupied from about 4:30 to 7:30, so we were very close together. Our Delegations could communicate very easily with notes or something else. On the Communist semicircle, they did everything they could to separate their two delegations. The North Vietnamese were way over here at about 2:00 o'clock and the Viet Cong were way over here at about 10:00 o'clock, leaving the largest possible gap in between the two in their semicircle. One result was that that made it very difficult for the two Communist delegations to be discreet about communicating between each other.

This was not a very urgent thing because all during the Vietnam Peace Talks, we worked in three languages. Every single word that we said was translated into French and then the French was translated into the opposite language. So, you had plenty of time, and plenty of time to get bored, especially if you understood all three languages because you'd hear things over and over again.

So, it wasn't that there was a lack of time, but with this huge space, especially if you kept a question short, if you tried to toss a tough or tricky question to the Viet Cong Delegation, there wasn't an opportunity for Madam Binh to get her instructions from the North. The North called all the shots. We played a few games like that. They demonstrated that in political terms the Viet Cong were rather pathetic with regards to their pretense to sovereignty. It was clear that they didn't really represent anything independent. They were just an extension of the Hanoi delegation, although they probably all were native southerners, from their dialects. If one of the Viet Cong delegates had to go to the men's room he always had to have a colleague escort lest there be a defection or an indiscretion of some sort. We had no social contact with them and seldom even saw them other than across the huge table. Even moving around corridors to and from the meeting hall, the French orchestrated it so that delegations didn't pass each other in the hallways. We each had our private offices for lunch break. The French did a very good job as hosts. They probably bugged the hell out of everything, especially the private offices, so that they could keep well informed.

Q: The North Vietnamese delegation.

LEDOGAR: The North Vietnamese Delegation was curious in that the Ambassador and ostensible head, Xuan Thuy, was a senior and competent professional diplomat. But from time to time, they had a visitor in Paris, a kind of commissar who was quickly recognized as a member of the politburo in Hanoi and the real force in town, Le Duc Tho. When he was in town, he always deferred in public to his Ambassador, who did all the talking. At times Kissinger was meeting in secret talks elsewhere in Paris with Le Duc Tho, but that's another story. As 1969 unfolded, it became clear that nothing was really going to happen by way of substantive negotiations. The talks drifted off into a total stalemate around June. Henry Cabot Lodge had made it clear that he wasn't going to stick with this for more than a year. The decision was made in Washington that when Lodge left, he was not going to be replaced unless there were some signs that the North Vietnamese were going to be serious. Lodge did have six secret meetings with the North Vietnamese during 1969. I did not attend those. I think they've been well written about. Then we went into a hiatus where Phil Habib was left in charge of the U.S. Delegation.

Q: What would you do?

LEDOGAR: We would continue to meet every week. At first, the North withdrew their Ambassador because they charged that there had been a "downgrading." Mind you, they had had Lodge and Walsh for six months and then Lodge for another four or five months. Then, as I said, around December of '69, Phil Habib, whom they had known as sort of a political counselor, the senior professional, not a political appointee, was left in charge.

Q: During this time, during '69, was it pretty much laying out the boundaries? Was there anything constructive being done or was it just going through the motions?

LEDOGAR: There was a lot of going through the motions, but there was also a certain amount of repackaging that went on in the plenary dialogue. I attended all the plenaries and was a direct participant in working up the weekly U.S. presentations.

On the other side when they replaced their hard line new phrases, they always put new initiatives in the mouths of the Viet Cong Delegation, trying to make it look as though the southern Communists were the ones who were pushing events, but it was all dictated by and handed to them by the Hanoi delegation. Each time they came out with a new package, be it in seven or eight or nine points, it was very clear to us that it was a superficially more attractive packaging of the same old and totally unacceptable requirements. The Communists wanted immediate withdrawal of the United States forces and they would discuss cease fire only after U.S. departure. The Americans had to get out and had to guarantee the installation of Hanoi's government and pay war reparations. In substance it was just beyond the pale. But from time to time it was put in a less objectionable tone. Once when this occurred in October of 1970, we had a quick meeting within the U.S. Delegation after the Viet Cong came out with a "new" plan. By this time newly arrived Ambassador Bruce was in charge. He said, "Well, what are we going to do with this? People have already been touting it out on the streets and handing out copies to the press corps." One of our people said, "Well, you know Mr. Ambassador, our former press spokesman Harold Kaplan once used a press line in a situation like this. He said, 'It seems to us to be like old wine in new bottles.'" Bruce said, "Oh, I like that." So, we left the meeting hall and as usual Bruce stepped out front and took a couple of questions from the journalists. Somebody said, "Well Mr. Ambassador, what do you think of the new peace plan in Eight Points?" Bruce said, "I think it's like new wine in old bottles." We jumped into the car. I always rode back to the office with the Ambassador and Phil Habib because sometimes we met more press representatives that hung around in front of the Embassy. In the car Bruce said, "That was alright, wasn't it, Steve?" I said, "No, Sir, that was not alright." What we had wanted to get across was that this is the same old Hanoi stuff, but it's been repackaged in a new wrapper. He said, "Oh, well, what did I say?" I said, "Well, you said the opposite." Bruce chuckled and replied, "Oh, well, you fix it in your press conference. Tell them I'm an old man and I misspeak a lot." So, sure enough, by the time we got back to the embassy, it was already on the tickers that apparently something important had happened. The Ambassador had said in effect that it may look like the old stuff but it's a new product that we've got to examine. The stock market in New York even started to react. I was to give my on-the-record press conference later on that day. When I got up there was wild interest and animation. The questions were predictable: "Well, what did the Ambassador say? What did that mean, new wine in old bottles?" I said, "What the Ambassador meant to say was 'old wine in new bottles.' He was trying to connote that this Eight Point Plan in nothing more than the same dreary old substantive positions in new, perhaps more attractive, packaging." "Well, if he meant to say that, then why did he say the other thing?" Back and forth.

At the end of the press conference, I got a note passed to me and by a fellow from one of the television networks. It simply said, "Steve, see Matthew 9:17." That was it. He signed his name. I went back after this was over and went to the Embassy library and got out the Bible. Sure enough, there was the parable - and it's actually in three of the gospels. As I recall the thrust is something like no more would a man who had found the light and adopted new ways return to his sinful old ways than would a... It goes on for two or three examples and the final one of them is, "Nor would a vintner put his brand new wine into leaky old wineskins." "Wineskins" is translated in the King James as "bottles." The whole point was that it's new wine going into substandard old bottles. That's not a very wise thing to do. Our recommended misquote would have met the case, but it did not reflect the Bible. So, I went in to see David Bruce and said, "Well, Sir, it turns out that even though you got bad advice from your staff, and you were under a lot of stress, you got the Bible right." He was pleased as punch.

Q: When did you see a change coming around? During this '69 period, I'm sure there were long telegrams going back and forth between the White House, the State Department, and the Delegation of what to say and how to say it. Who was calling the shots?

LEDOGAR: Well, there was an enormous number of cables going back. We reported every text and every word that was said. Harriman and Vance had rightly established back in the Preliminary Conversations in 1968 the point that tactics were to be left to the negotiators. The Delegation had a set of instructions and how we carried them out was our business, and we were not going to clear every word in our statements in advance with Washington. That pertained all the way through. We were mostly reporting after the fact, but there was a series of high level cables in which our Delegation chiefs, as any negotiator does, wrote for a different level. From time to time you write for the policy level, not the guys who are going through all the speeches and looking for little nuggets. The Ambassador says in effect, "Here is my analysis of the present situation. In the circumstances, this is what I recommend should be done. I recommend that I be instructed to do so and so." Those high level policy cables went back and forth. I was not in a position at that time in Paris where I was asked to make an awful lot of input on those. They were being written under the responsibility of the Ambassador, by his closest political advisors. I saw them all. I recall that they dealt with nuance and tactics. No one in 1969 was recommending that we change our fundamental position.

Q: One of the almost weaknesses of the American character in something like this is a matter of lack of long-term ability to hold firm. We keep trying something, maybe changing the wineskins, continuing to try to say "Maybe this or that will work." Sometimes if you do this and the other side holds firm, they can always see that at some point if you're trying to change and trying something, there is always something that's less strong than something else. It's just by nature.

LEDOGAR: That's true, and you're right about Americans having that weakness. We tend to start negotiating with ourselves when we don't get any real dialogue with the other guy. "Suppose I said it this way?" I suppose that we suffered a little bit of that. There were so many people looking at it, and all these words which were being published. Our fundamental principles were not very complex, though they were very controversial. We thought that there should be a cease-fire. We agreed to the principle of withdrawal of U.S. forces, but we thought the North Vietnamese forces should be withdrawn, too. We were willing to talk about a number of things, including postwar economic development. But until there was such a time as we had an expression of willingness on their part to engage on any of these subjects, it was hard to get into nuance. Cease-fire is cease-fire.

Q: What were you talking about?

LEDOGAR: Who was responsible for lack of progress. Now, it's kind of hard to talk about this without noting that some of the things that were happening I learned about only later. I'll jump ahead with the story.

Q: What was your impression of our military reports from what was happening in the field and also from the CIA in Vietnam? You must have been looking over your shoulder all the time at what was happening.

LEDOGAR: Yes, indeed, we were. We had daily military briefings pulled together for the Ambassador and his folks by the military contingent of our Delegation, drawing on the reporting from Saigon as interpreted by experts who were all veterans of the conflict. I don't think that we had any judgements unique to us. There were a lot of disappointments and a lot of surprises as to how the other guy could take the punishment that he was taking and still come back. The Communist Vietnamese seemed to be logistical geniuses. They certainly were adept at camouflage and disappearance and tunneling, and a whole lot of other things that frustrated us. I can recall one of the sort of sardonic jokes: a young North Vietnamese fellow struggles for months down the Ho Chi Minh Trail carrying two mortar rounds in a knapsack. He gets into place near Saigon and there is a comrade with a mortar. The young fellow drops the two rounds down the mortar tube. Clunk! Then the comrade says, "Now go back and get two more." The whole complexity of the war would flood in all the time. In Paris we had an excellent position to observe, but I don't think we came to any unique conclusions. It was terribly frustrating that we couldn't seem to achieve basic military objectives, to draw the North into main force combat and deal with their forces. But could I go back to something we were discussing before?

I want to try to deal with this question of the different levels of the Paris Vietnam Peace Talks. In May 1969, there was a series of six secret meetings which Ambassador Lodge had with the North Vietnamese ambassador, Xuan Thuy. Each Ambassador was accompanied by a small group of assistants and interpreters and notetakers. I didn't go to any of these secret meetings. They got nowhere. Essentially they rehearsed the same substance, and the same stonewalling took place at those meetings as was the case in the plenaries. But I think they led to the departure of Cabot Lodge and the Washington decision to leave things in the hands of Phil Habib. He was career, and not a political appointee, but he was appointed to ambassadorial rank for this purpose by the President.

It was later revealed (in very early '72) that during 1970, after the six secret sessions Lodge had conducted, Henry Kissinger had five of his super-secret talks outside Paris with Le Duc Tho. It was revealed still later that this was done by Kissinger flying in unmarked aircraft to U.S. bases in Germany and then taking a small plane to a French military base on the outskirts of Paris. Kissinger would not even come into Paris; he would just go directly to a North Vietnamese safehouse in the suburbs and have conversations. No one in our Delegation knew about those meetings at that time. I wonder who beside Le Duc Tho were the other people on the other side.

They clearly were from the regular North Vietnamese Delegation. So, that's the first disparity. Some of the Hanoi Delegation were in on everything.

During the period when Phil Habib was Chargé before the arrival of David Bruce, there were several of these meetings. I don't have the dates in my notes here, but they were all revealed by President Nixon in January '72. I know that no one in our Delegation, not even Habib, knew about those Kissinger meetings at that time. When David Bruce arrived, we later learned that those super-secret Kissinger meetings continued. There was a series of about six of them that ended in August of 1970. I later learned that on our Delegation, only David Bruce knew about them, and that Phil Habib and everyone below him did not know. I say that with some purpose. Many of us suspected something was going on somewhere, but I don't know of anyone on our Delegation who would have bet that whatever was going on was in or near Paris. I had strict instructions never to talk to the press about secret meetings. Just stonewall on the whole subject. I think I was fairly consistent in doing that until after the full history of Kissinger's secret diplomacy had been revealed by Nixon. One time, in 1971 I think, one of my on-the-record answers to a question about secret meetings made the New York Times' "Quotation of the Day." The questioner asked why I wouldn't comment on secret talks when so much was leaking out or being revealed by Washington. I said I had no comment on why I had no comment.

Recall that there were these Delegation to Delegation secret meetings that were not at the Hotel Majestic, and then there were those super-secret visits to Paris suburbs by Kissinger. A lot of journalists seemed to be confused on that distinction. The U.S. defense attaché in the Embassy knew about the super-secret meetings. He was the one who had to arrange Kissinger's travel with the French. He was later director of the CIA - Vernon Walters. But we did not know anything about what he was doing to help logistically arrange for Kissinger and his small party to come to the Paris suburbs. By 1971, there had been six of these meetings. The series was then resumed in the spring of 1971. President Nixon listed the dates of super-secret meetings #7-#12: one in May, one in June, two in July, one in August, one in September. At this time, I think Kissinger was mostly meeting with Xuan Thuy.

For one of these meetings, however - July 12, 1971 - Le Duc Tho was on one of his periodic overt visits to Paris. He had been confronted by newspeople who said, "You know, Henry Kissinger is coming here to Paris from Islamabad and will be in town while you're here. Are you interested in meeting privately with him?" Le Duc Tho said something to the effect of, "Well, I for my part would be available if he wanted a meeting."

So, we had this extraordinary situation where Kissinger was coming to town overtly. But he was intensely interested in diverting the press from his trail. About two weeks later, we learned that he came to town not just from Islamabad, but having just been in China, the secret trip to Peking. He was very interested in covering all of that up. President Nixon was going to announce the opening of China 10 days or two weeks later from San Clemente. So, Kissinger had two tasks while in Paris. One of them in the face of the press frenzy was to keep all of the China stuff covered up. Another one was to get out of the limelight and meet secretly with Le Duc Tho. But the journalists were all over the place. They were following Kissinger's car on motor scooters and they had everything staked out. He was staying at the old U.S. ambassadorial residence and that was staked out. The problem was how to get into a secret meeting and otherwise cover up this whole thing. I was very much involved in his plan because the press corps was kind of my responsibility. I was misled by Henry Kissinger into putting out untruths. It was quite clear.

Q: [Imitating Claude Raines] "I'm shocked" [laughter]!

LEDOGAR: Sounds like the movie "Casablanca." That was part of the game. In retrospect I don't resent being misled by him. A lot of well-known and honorable people were misled by him, but I thought that matters could have been handled in ways that did not necessarily sacrifice so much goodwill the Delegation had built with the press corps. You spend a lot of time trying to build that up and to deal with them in as honorable way as you can. Silence is not necessarily misleading, but to tell them that one thing is happening when exactly the opposite is happening is something they don't easily forget. But it was a very dicey period in which a whole lot of things took place. When it became quite clear that I was being used to mislead the press, I was annoyed. He wanted to throw the press off his trail. But it was not so much about the meeting with Le Duc Tho because that was accomplished rather neatly with the help of some U.S. clandestine operators who spirited Kissinger out of where he was and into the outskirts, and the newsmen who were right there staking out the house were not the wiser. It was the China thing that required throwing sand. So Kissinger had this flurry of activity where he was reported to be in one place and then he was reported to be going to meet Frank Sinatra in Maxim's and then he shows up on television at another restaurant with a very attractive young blonde journalist. By this time, I had just drifted away from the whole scene, figuring that enough was enough. I got a call at home and a newsmen said, "Where is Kissinger now?" I said, "I don't know." This guy, who was friendly, said, "I'll tell you where he is, Steve. He's in this restaurant having dinner with Miss So and So. We're standing out here waiting to see what happens next."

I did bump into David Bruce the next day. I kind of made some noises to the effect that I wished it hadn't been necessary to lie to the press, and that all that happened yesterday could have been accomplished without lying. Bruce said, "You know, he actually was going to meet Frank Sinatra at Maxim's, but it turned out that the restrictions on the airport were such that Sinatra couldn't get here from London and take off again before the 11:00 PM noise curfew at Le Bourget."

Now I'm going to jump ahead. David Bruce left Paris in '72. He was not terribly well. He had circulation problems and was told to stop sitting around the Paris meetings so much and to get out and keep active. He went on vacation for a while and then became our first representative to Peking, later Beijing. Then having completed that service, he was named by President Nixon to Brussels to the U.S. Mission to NATO. He replaced Donald Rumsfeld as U.S. permanent representative in 1974. I was there at the time. When a new Ambassador arrived, they arranged to gather the whole staff around, which was considerable. We had about 100 Americans. Bruce spoke to us as a group and then we all kind of filed past to shake hands. A number of our people had served with him before. He had been Ambassador to London for four years and to Germany and had led the Point Four Program in Paris and all sorts of Foreign Service postings. I came by and started to say my name and he just kind of looked up at me and said, "Steve, I want to see you immediately afterwards in my office." When the reception line was completed, I went down to his office and walked in and he said, "Hi, sit down. Good to see you again. Phil never knew." I was kind of stunned into silence. He said, "It's one of the toughest decisions Henry had to make, but it was decided that it was best that the substance of those secret talks be kept the way it was kept.” He didn’t say, “Steve, we’re sorry we left you out there with egg on your face. Too bad it was necessary to throw people off our trail.” He just said, in effect, that not even Phil Habib knew at the time. That was it. That was the total conversation. I thanked him very much and we talked about some pleasantries and that was that. The point is, there had been occurrences that caused people to suspect that negotiations were going on in Warsaw in Peking, in places other than Paris... A lot of speculation but no hard facts. Some of my colleagues on the Delegation somehow or other later convinced themselves that they had known about those Kissinger meetings at the time they were going on in the subterranean level. My conviction is that they didn’t. The only one member of the U.S. Delegation who knew was David Bruce and he had been sent specifically to Paris to provide the cover of the weekly plenary sessions for the secret talks; and that 1972 revelation was indeed a very tough blow to Phil Habib, who in 1969 had been left in charge and yet was not even brought into the picture.

Q: Moving toward the end of these sessions, your group was going through the formalities. How did that play out?

LEDOGAR: It played out with business as before, no progress whatsoever. It was a little bit embarrassing to realize that all the time before the Nixon revelations in January of ’72, many of the people on the other side of the table knew about these because they were involved in them. All of us on the allied side, everyone except our Ambassador, were not in the picture. So, you realized that at least some of the North Vietnamese had been sitting there smirking at you and drawing their own conclusions.

Q: Do you think they knew or just maybe the top person in the Delegation knew?

LEDOGAR: They had to have at least four or five. They needed notetakers and interpreters and a senior advisor at hand. My guess is that in the Kissinger super-secret talks they probably had about six and we had six.

Q: But our six were all from Washington?

LEDOGAR: Yes, and their six were for the most part drawn from their regular Paris Delegation.

Q: Often on negotiations that are difficult, as we did with the Soviets, there would be a lunch break and everybody would get together and chat a little. This never happened during your time?

LEDOGAR: We never met during lunch break with anyone other than our South Vietnamese allies. I don’t recall the issue of informal contacts even coming up. No one was seriously suggesting, “Let’s wander down the hall.”

Q: How could you keep doing this? If things weren’t moving for more than a year...

LEDOGAR: It was very frustrating. Probably most of those on our Delegation who did not have the daily interface with the press and the responsibility to be on your feet and defending not just the negotiating position but also all the other aspects of American conduct of the Vietnam conflict, were even more frustrated than as I. I would meet with journalists almost every morning of the week and then go out to receptions in the evening and run into a bunch of press people there - I had a budget and entertained my press contacts from time to time. I at least had something to do, but it was a very frustrating thing, especially when you saw the casualty lists. We had the question of the cost of the negotiations come up a number of times. People would say, "Well, how much does it cost to keep you guys here in deadlocked negotiations?" They thought that the Ambassador who was put up at the Hotel Crillon and the rest of us were living high on the hog in Paris. I developed a standard answer to the effect that as far as I could calculate, negotiations cost about the same price per year as one Huey helicopter, and we were losing at least one of those helicopters every day in Vietnam. Another line that I developed and I still believe is true is that any emotion, especially frustration or boredom on the part of a diplomat, should be likened to squeamishness on the part of a surgeon. It's unprofessional to be bored or frustrated. You have to get hold of yourself and make sure that you focus on what your responsibility is, and defend your position and make it clear that the other side is responsible for no movement, and not our side. That was a problem and it led to the departure of a number of our people who decided to seek other assignments. Life was too short for this, they decided.

Q: How about the events of May 1970 in Vietnam, going into Cambodia? Did that raise any blip on your work?

LEDOGAR: Oh, yes, and they raised a big blip on the radar screens of the American public. Many critics felt that the Cambodian incursion was a direct and vicious extension of the conflict on the part of the United States. This criticism had a negative effect. Similar to the Bay of Pigs, we got cold feet and we banked the military effort back so that it was indecisive. We took all of the heat of going into Cambodia, but we restricted ourselves to the first 25 kilometers and only for a period of weeks. What we did was militarily ineffective and yet we took all of the abuse for escalating the war.

I keep mentioning Phil Habib because he was my mentor and my direct supervisor. I can remember at certain points that he would point out the downside of acting indecisively in the military field. In 1972 there was a big allied offensive. It was one of the last ones in which U.S. forces were directly engaged. It was into Laos along Route 9 through the mountains to try to cut the Ho Chi Minh Trail.

Q: It was basically Vietnamese-run though.

LEDOGAR: That's right. It was entirely Vietnamese ground forces with U.S. air support. Again, we pulled our punch, fearing that this would be regarded as excessive U.S. force. So, we didn't really support them as they should have been supported, and the South Vietnamese got cold feet and cut and ran. It was a disaster and I remember Phil Habib waving his arms and saying, "By God, if you're going to do something like that, do it decisively." Any political-military expert will observe that truism, one that was always observed by the Soviet Union. When the Soviets moved into Czechoslovakia, they came with everything. It may have looked like overkill, but there was nothing indecisive about a military move by Soviet forces. There was a lot of that indecisive sort of thing from the U.S. in Vietnam.

I should have mentioned that in June '69, President Nixon announced that as part of his plan, which became known as Vietnamization, the first tranche (slice) of U.S. troops would be coming out. I can remember keeping in my desk drawer a little chart that I had designed with the level of U.S. in-country troops on the vertical axis, 535,500 or whatever the number was, straight down to zero; and the months from '69 to '73, that would be the end of the Nixon administration, on the horizontal axis. You could trace a straight line from 535 thousand to zero in four years. As you plotted each successive Vietnamization tranche that was announced, although they varied in size and duration - in the next so many months, so many troops would come out - the plot wasn't far from a straight line. The rate of Vietnamization, in other words, was quite predictable. So, all this time, the last half of '69 and through '70, U.S. forces were coming out in significant numbers. U.S. troop levels were headed down.

There were the Saigon elections. A secret letter to Ho Chi Minh in the middle of '69 was later revealed. Ho Chi Minh died in September of '69. That was the end of the secret talks for a long time. Lodge departed in December of '69. Here I'm speaking from notes I pulled together which compile chronologically what we knew then along with what was later made public. David Bruce was named in July of '70... He did meet with his counterpart in November of that year, but that was not the super-secret level. That was Delegation to Delegation. It was in February of '71 that the South Vietnamese forces went into Laos. That was the first big test of Vietnamization. We later learned that there were Kissinger level talks in May, through September of that year. Of course, July was when Kissinger was in Peking and came through Paris overtly.

Q: I want to come back to you. You say you were there until '72. You left when then?

LEDOGAR: Late spring or early summer. I had some home leave and then I went to senior training at Stanford University.

Q: When you went up towards '72, were you there when we announced that we were going to renew relations of some sort with China?

LEDOGAR: Yes. That was announced in late July or early August of '71.

Q: Was everybody singing the same tune over and over again on both sides?

LEDOGAR: Pretty much, but we thought that that would be received as very bad news by the Communist side, that the U.S. and China were regularizing relations. Similarly, the fact that we had some ongoing contacts including meetings at high levels with the Russians, with the Soviets, we thought that that would be something that would encourage Hanoi to get on with this problem. But somewhere at the end of '71, we resumed limited bombings of the North. When David Bruce left in August of '71 and before William Porter arrived as head of the U.S. Delegation, there was a brief period when there were no talks at all. The other side, in effect, walked out. Weekly plenaries were also suspended in '72 between March and May. I was still in Paris at the time.

Q: What were you doing?

LEDOGAR: Not much. Our second child was born in Paris in March '72. The Delegation was reading the record of Kissinger talks, which was beginning to come out to those of us who were in the business. We studied what had and what had not taken place.

Q: When the Kissinger talks were revealed, did you have any particular problems with the press or was it that they understood you didn't know?

LEDOGAR: They understood that we on the Paris-based U.S. Delegation didn't know. Some of them might have figured, "Well, boy, those guys played this pretty cool because they always said 'No comment' to any question about private talks. Maybe they knew something." They were wrong if they thought that. We knew nothing.

Q: So, what was the status by the time you left in the summer of '72?

LEDOGAR: By the time I left, the super-secret series with Henry Kissinger became just restricted sessions. They continued and indeed began to produce results in the form of a draft peace treaty. The North Vietnamese insisted that they wanted to reestablish the cover of the weekly plenaries and I did a little bit of that, but then I started training my successor, David Lambertson, and started looking towards getting out of Paris. We did resume the plenaries in May. Then they were suspended later in that month. Then they were resumed in July. By that time, I was all but gone.

Q: Looking back on it, did you feel that the sessions that you had endured had cut out some of the ground that could be built upon for other sessions or were they sterile?

LEDOGAR: That is an interesting question. I think that we broke some of the ground, but whether or not we were merely reflecting decisions that had been taken elsewhere or whether we were actually doing something that helped to focus issues elsewhere is hard to say. You would have to sit down and compare the records of both series of meetings chronologically - the full transcripts of plenaries and the reports from the super-secret talks. I didn't have that opportunity. I pointed out that in '71, in about August, William Porter became the Ambassador. David Bruce had left. Porter brought a completely different style to the dialogue. He was a tough character and he believed that if something looks like a duck and waddles like a duck and quacks like a duck, you ought to call it a duck until you have evidence to the contrary. He started using diplomatically harsh language in meetings with the other side. He started calling the Provisional Revolutionary Government the "Viet Cong" to their faces. He would trot out some statistics of the most recent elections in North Vietnam in which politburo member number one allegedly got 98.2% of the vote and politburo member number two got 98.1% of the vote and then the most junior person got only 86% of the vote, and these other curiosities of dictatorships pretending to be democratic. He affected a tough style. Instead of the U.S. Delegation working on the weekly statement from the more junior level on up the seniority line - where we would sit down and talk about what we had missed and one of the more junior officers would be assigned to draft something - we would all take a whack at the draft and refine it, gently smoothing it and sometimes pulling a punch with diplomatic niceties. Porter took the opposite track. He did the first draft of next week's speech and it would be in brutal tone, and we more junior types we would spend our time saying, “You can’t say that.” It was very refreshing and satisfying. I don’t think the resulting frankness in tone did any damage. I think it probably helped to jolt the other side a little bit. They basked in this business of being international political figures, statesmen. Porter started calling them for what they were: insurgents and aggressors. It was satisfying.

There was a breakdown of neutrality in Paris in early 1972. The French, as hosts of the talks, had undertaken to keep Paris neutral and free of demonstrations about Vietnam. But by 1972, there was such enormous pressure from peace groups from all over the world, European ones in particular, to try to stage so-called peace demonstrations in Paris, that the French broke down and said, “Well, you can’t do it in Paris, but we’ll let you demonstrate in Versailles.” So, there was a convocation of thousands of people in the suburbs who came to Paris for this big event. By this time, anti-war sentiment was the majority public view. Convening for the demonstration were a number of responsible citizens, people of discretion who were not your typical anti-American or anti-administration, knee-jerk thugs. On the eve of the Versailles convocation, some of my friends in the press corps said, “Look, Steve, the best thing you guys can do is totally ignore it. We don’t want to have to spend our Saturday and Sunday out in Versailles covering this story. It’s not in your interests that we go out there and cover this anti-war crap. Don’t get provoked into reacting to it. That’s our advice.” So, I, of course, passed that on to Ambassador Porter. The next day or so we came out of one of the plenary meetings and as we passed the journalists on the sidewalks as usual, someone said, “Well, Mr. Ambassador, what do you think about this group of anti-war protestors that’s gathering in Versailles this coming weekend?” He feigned confusion and then said, “Oh, you mean that horde of Communist-controlled agitators? Oh, I don’t have any respect for them.” Well, you had in addition to William Sloane Coffin and the Vietnam Veterans against the war, a lot of seriously troubled American citizens of responsibility who felt that it was time to do something about the war. Some of the peace groups were deeply offended that an American Ambassador would say that they were “Communists.” Porter had carefully said, “Communist-controlled agitators.” We knew from intelligence that there was Chinese money helping to finance this Versailles event in addition to French Communist Party money and resources. We knew quite a bit about organizational details from our intelligence. It might have been better to have ignored the event, but Porter couldn’t resist it.

So the next day we had Delegations of protesting American groups at the American Embassy demanding to see Ambassador Porter. Now, back in 1968 when the Paris talks first started we, of the U.S. Negotiating Delegation working out of the U.S. Embassy, had made an arrangement, which was a sensible one, with our American Embassy hosts. Our business was negotiation. Their business was dealing with American citizens. We of the negotiating delegation should not usurp their responsibility. That was readily agreed early on when we had as Ambassador Sergeant Shriver in Paris. By this time, Arthur Watson was the American Ambassador to France. Suddenly, a bunch of irate American citizens were demanding to get into the Embassy and to confront the Americans they thought had called them Communists. There were American Vietnam veterans in their uniforms and medals. They were saying, “My God, I’m not going to take this. You called me a Communist? I just returned from fighting for my country.”

Well, this happened to be on a day when Porter was not in town and I was chargé. Watson insisted on seeing me. He said that he wasn’t going to pick up the Vietnam Talks Delegation’s dirty laundry and he insisted that by God, it was up to Porter or somebody on his Delegation to deal with these people. I said, "Mr. Ambassador, whatever you wish; but please understand that you are changing an arrangement that has been in effect here since 1968." He was adamant and irate.

So, we decided that my then deputy press spokesman, soon to be my successor, Dave Lambertson, would go down to the Embassy lobby and meet this group. They had with them a protest which was supposedly written in blood on some parchment, and the protestors insisted upon handing it to us. This was in the grand lobby of the American Embassy in Paris. They handed the document to Lambertson and he took one look at it and saw that in it they called President Nixon some terrible names, and so forth. Dave said, "I'm not going to take that." He handed it back to them. The guy reached his hand out, touched it, but drew back just as Dave drew his hand back. The document fell to the floor. There was this confrontation. Lambertson was absolutely not going to back down and we were not going to give these people an audience on substance. So, that's the way it ended. Finally, they left. The parchment stayed on the floor for the char force to clean up. The group was dispersed. It was not pleasant. It certainly was very dramatic. I think it was unwise on Watson's part to break the distinction between the domains of the two Ambassadors. When you think about it, the proper vehicle for American citizens to affect policy is not through the negotiating team in the field, but rather through the democratic process.

Q: Well, I understand Watson was the ne'er-do-well member of the IBM Watsons and he was given Paris as an Ambassador in order to get him away from the IBM business.

LEDOGAR: He was very unpopular and difficult to work for. But it was his building that we were in. At the time, Ambassador Porter was not present. He would often leave the office early to go and use a HAM radio back at his residence and tune into the war. Porter was incredibly well informed about what was going on all over the place. He had this HAM network. It wasn't that he wasn't working. It was just that he felt that he didn't have to sit around the office and push paper. By this time, Habib was gone from Paris. Bob Miller was gone. Haywood Eisham was the deputy. It was not long after that I was out of there, and, after some home leave, on my way to Stanford University.

JOSEPH A. GREENWALD
U.S. Representative, OECD
Paris (1969-1972)

Joseph A. Greenwald was born in Chicago, Illinois on September 18, 1918. He received a bachelor's degree in economics from the University of Chicago in 1941 and entered the Foreign Service in 1947. Mr. Greenwald's career included positions in Geneva, London, and Brussels. This interview was conducted by Horace G. Torbert on May 16, 1989.

Q: No, but at least we got a high proportion of competent people.

GREENWALD: Yes. Qualified people. They just refused to take those who weren't, and they made it stick. Those were the good old days. Things have changed, I guess, since then.

Anyway, this is the deal we worked out. So I did not then stay on in Washington to see the implementation. It took about five years before the legislation went through, but it did go through. It had some riders on it that I didn't like and wouldn't have liked to have seen, but fundamentally it went through, and the US carried out its obligation that we had taken on in New Delhi.

Then I went to the OECD as US representative, and I enjoyed that very much. Now that's a lot of multilateral diplomacy. It was interesting. I got into a much wider range of issues than just trade, obviously. By the way, that's one where I don't take the credit for, but where a policy was evolved on the environment -- it was the principle of "let the polluter pay." It had an economic base. It's gotten much more politicized now. But when it first came up as an issue in 1969 or '70, I guess, in the early days in Paris, the concern was that if government subsidized waste removal or environmental measures, that would put some firms, some countries' firms, in a better competitive position than if the company themselves had to pay. So to try to avoid that kind of adverse impact on some firms dealing with environmental problems, we evolved the principle there that the polluter should pay and that should be adopted by all countries so that everybody would be on the same footing.

I think for political reasons, that may have gone by the board. But people are still talking about it now, I'm happy to see. It is still an objective to try to have a level playing field in the sense that the governments don't subsidize excessively so that they give their firms an unfair advantage.

Anyway, that was one of the issues. But the first one that hit me as an interesting one in retrospect, I would just mention this. The one that the OECD had started with when Phil Trezise was still there in '68 was the concern the Europeans had about something called the technological gap. And it was related to a book by a man named Jean Jacques Servan Schreiber, talking about how Europe was lost, it was going to be overwhelmed by the United States. Well, the OECD took this on -- it was given to them by the ministers -- the task of demystifying it. In other words, to try to look at the facts, find out was there really an overall technological gap. Well, the report had been started, but it came out in my time in '69. And what it showed, not surprisingly, was the US was ahead in some sectors, Europe was ahead in other sectors. There wasn't really an overall technological gap.

What's funny in retrospect is nobody said a word about Japan. Japan was not a factor, was not considered, and looking at it from 1989, it is a --

Q: Twenty years later.

GREENWALD: Twenty years later. It was only a little while after that --

Q: When the explosion came.

GREENWALD: Yes. When the Japanese came over. What people, as you know, worry about now is not a technological gap so much between Europe and the United States, but between Japan and the United States and Europe. But anyway, that was one of the interesting problems.

Then, as I say, we went on to environmental issues for the first time taken up multilaterally, which was an interesting -- anyway, it was a pretty interesting job.

But after three years of multilateral diplomacy, which included a lot of very boring meetings on budget and finance as well as work program, I was ready, I was looking forward to moving. The job that I wanted, the obvious succession, going back to my time in London, is to move to Brussels from Paris. Now, Bob Schaezel had been there for six or seven years, and he liked it and wasn't very eager to move. He wasn't a Foreign Service officer, so that there wasn't any pressure, in a sense, through the Foreign Service for him, even though he had been there a long time.

But finally the Department decided that it was time to move, so in '72, I went from Paris to Brussels, and Schaezel came back. I guess he actually left the Service, or maybe he did some special assignments and then left the Service.

Anyway, as I had anticipated, it was a very pleasant change because even though there were some interesting activities in the OECD, it still wasn't really where the action was.

Q: Just to divert a little bit there, how did the OECD get its assignments? Did you invent them yourself and sell them?

GREENWALD: Sometimes. You mean myself?

Q: No. I mean, I just wondered, who decided what the agenda was going to be in this sort of thing.

GREENWALD: Well, the way it went was that sometimes things would germinate, originate, in the permanent representatives, which was what we were in Paris. Sometimes, not all that often. Mainly they came from governments, and governments would be looking for a place to develop a policy, to get a joint policy among industrialized countries. That was the main function of the OECD. It was a kind of a pre-negotiation in broader organizations or sometimes where it only involved the industrialized countries, a program or a policy or a project would be put through like, say, the technological gap problem. That didn't affect the developing countries. It only affected the OECD countries, and they did what I call the demystification exercise. But governments would use the OECD for a kind of a caucus for broader organizations like the UNCTAD or the U.N. or the International Monetary Fund. That was one function.

Q: It had no real organizational relationship to the U.N., however?

GREENWALD: No. No organizational connection at all. Entirely independent, funded by the member countries. We paid 25% percent of the budget, which was good at that time. We were paying more in the U.N. We were up at 33%, 30%. We paid 25% there. It had, as I say, this kind of caucus function.

In addition, it had a very important function, depending on how it was used, in the financial and monetary field. For example, the famous group of seven that we have now really had its origins in the OECD. There was a group of ten. There was also a group of five. Economic policy committees. I remember in the time that I was there that people who were head of the council of economic advisors in the United States or chairman of the governors of the Federal Reserve System would use the OECD much more actively -- it isn't any more because there are other channels that have been developed. But the OECD was a place where they got together to discuss macro economic policy, interest rates, exchange rates, all the things that have become much more prominent now and which are done through similar kinds of groups, but it's outside the OECD framework. But at the time while I was there and through the 1960s -- the OECD, by the way, was only established in 1960 -- well, it was when Dillon was the Secretary of the Treasury. I think that was in the Kennedy Administration.

Q: Yes.

GREENWALD: Early 1960s. He and a man named Jack Tuthill and John Leddy were the ones who dreamed up changing the -- I should go back. The OECD was a conversion of the OECD to a more permanent broader organization. The OECD was set up in the Marshall Plan days in the 1940s and 1950s to play the role and did play the role of allocating Marshall Plan funds among the European countries. It was then the OECD, which stood for the Organization for European Economic Cooperation. And that was its first task, to achieve the most efficient and effective use of Marshall Plan funds by all of the European countries coming together and deciding what to do.

It was also used to carry out a process of European liberalization, of getting rid of the quantitative restrictions, the quotas that all the Europeans had on for balance-of-payments reasons, and the controls that they had, financial and monetary controls that they had, again for balance-of-payments reasons. And by the early 1960s, convertibility had taken place. The European economies had come back, European currencies were now convertible, and most of the special restrictions that they kept on for balance-of-payments reasons were eliminated.

So Jack Tuthill, John Leddy, working with Dillon, decided that there was time to take this organization and make the United States instead of an observer, the United States and Canada, full members. Subsequently, Japan was brought in. Subsequently, Australia and New Zealand. It turned into, basically, a caucus of -- a club of the rich countries is what it was called.

ANDREW STEIGMAN
Political Officer
Paris (1969-1972)

Ambassador Andrew Steigman was born in New York on August 30, 1933. He received a bachelor's degree from Princeton University in 1954 and served in the U.S. Army from 1955-1957. Ambassador Steigman joined the Foreign Service in 1958. His career included positions in the Congo, Libya, France, and Nigeria, and an ambassadorship to Gabon. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1989.

Q: Shall we move on then to Paris?

STEIGMAN: Sure.

Q: You went to Paris as a political officer from 1969-72. What were your responsibilities there?

STEIGMAN: There was a year in between, by the way, just to clear the record. I was a Congressional Fellow for one year before going off to Paris. I went to Paris by accident, by the way. I was really supposed to go to Brussels as a political military officer, but the position was abolished in one of these budgetary cuts, and I was in need of a job when Bob Oakley, who was then in the Paris slot, was asked by Charlie Yost to leave Paris a year early and join his staff as the Middle East guy at the U.N. So that position suddenly opened up, I needed a job and the timing was right. It was the Africa-Middle East slot in the political section. The political section in Paris had an internal and an external unit. The external unit was essentially regional specialists, one for Far East, one for Middle East-Africa and a couple for Europe, and I was the Middle East-Africa man.

Q: Again we're talking about '69 to '72. What was your impression of the French role? Let's talk about the Middle East. The American attitude has often been that the French were sort of a wild card in certain areas including the Middle East.

STEIGMAN: They were very much a wild card at that point. The French position, as we saw it from Paris, was that they wanted to be sure that they continued to play a role in any decisions that were taken on the future shape of the Middle East. The French had traditionally been a Middle Eastern power, and they really didn't want to be treated as irrelevant.

The U.S. position at that point was to try to keep the French involved so that they would not become a wild card. There was a regular four-power consultation going on in New York among the permanent representatives to the U.N. There was also bilateral consultation going on between Joe Sisco, who was then Assistant Secretary, and the French ambassador -- I think it was Lucet at the time -- who would meet fairly regularly. I tried to keep up a parallel dialogue in Paris with the Deputy Director for Middle East at the Quai d'Orsay, first Luc de Nanteuil and then Fernand Rouillon. And we had quite frank exchanges paralleling the Sisco-Lucet exchanges. Joe Sisco tended to edit his cables. Somebody would take notes on the meetings with Lucet, they would come back to him, and he would presumably do some editing to make sure that they reflected what he wanted to convey.

When the cables would come out, one was never sure whether Joe had done any editing on them or to what extent he had done any editing on them. We would play it safe. I would take a copy of the Sisco reporting cable, minus the comments, over to the Quai and Nanteuil and I would swap cables. I would show him Sisco's cables, and he would give me Lucet's version minus comments.

Q: You teach diplomatic history, and the whole idea is that you come out of a meeting . . .

STEIGMAN: Both sides understanding clearly what has been said or what has been intended. This was a very useful device because I would read the Lucet cable and comment on it, and he would read the Sisco cable and comment on it. We didn't leave text with each other. We just read them and then retrieved the text since they were all top secret, God knows why. But it was very useful because there was several times when either Lucet, who was fluent in English but that was his second language, had misconstrued something Sisco had said, or Sisco had not intended what he said and had edited his cable to reflect what he intended. It was very important that there be no misunderstanding. To our mind, that was the surest way of guaranteeing that there were no misunderstandings on the French side what Sisco wanted to convey.

Q: This is an excellent device which is normally not followed.

STEIGMAN: You have to have a very good working relationship to make this possible. Fortunately, this was in the immediate post-De Gaulle years. It would not have been possible two or three years earlier when the relations between the embassy and the Quai were much more formal and correct. We had really good personal relations. I worked with either five or six sous-directeurs at the Quai because I had a tremendous geographic spread, and I really knew them all very well. It was fun.

Q: How did we see the French role in the Middle East, your impression of the French role?

STEIGMAN: Well, the French really were not playing a major role at that point. My impression was what we really wanted was to keep them on the team to make sure that they were a part of a joint effort and did not go off on their own and to do anything independent as a wild card. That struck me as the real purpose of the whole thing. At one point, for example, when the U.S. proposed to temporarily suspend the four-power consultations in New York, something was going on and I don't remember what the reason was, but that was sufficiently important that it was something that the ambassador was asked to convey to the Foreign Minister, not something for me to do at the lower level, but to convey to the Foreign Minister and explain that this was a temporary suspension. The reason I remember it so graphically is because the Foreign Minister, Maurice Schuman, misunderstood what the ambassador had said. This was Arthur K. Watson, who was not the swiftest of ambassadors, anyway, and Schuman misconstrued what Watson said, and thought we were proposing to abolish the four-power consultations. I could see from his reaction that he was reacting too strongly. When he asked a clarifying question, the ambassador didn't catch the import of the clarifying question and reinforced the mistaken notion in Schuman's mind. I scribbled a little note and handed it to the ambassador and said, "He thinks we're ending this not suspending it. You've got to clarify." So Watson then clarified and Schuman said, "Oh, that's entirely different! That's an entirely different matter!" But the importance of it is indicated by the fact that the instruction to the ambassador was to explain to the Foreign Minister that we were suspending this so that there would be no hurt feelings. There was a real concern to keep the French on board.

Q: Well, now in Africa I assume the situation was quite different. In fact, we were delighted the French had their area of responsibility and we didn't have to worry about that. Was that the attitude?

STEIGMAN: Yes, the general attitude was very much one that we wanted to have the French stay there. One of the things that we were constantly trying to -- this went on as well when I got to Gabon -- was to reassure the French that we had no intention or desire to replace them anywhere in Francophone Africa, that we were, as you say, delighted to see them there and encouraged them to maintain their presence and to increase their assistance in Africa. Again, there was very, very close cooperation and very good exchanges. We used to exchange a lot of information. We tended to have better information very often on what was going on in Anglophone Africa, where we put more attention, and I used to do an awful lot of information exchange with the French.

I would drop in on my French counterparts and bring them up to date on whatever I picked up from embassy reporting repeated to Paris to supplement what they were getting on areas of interest to them. I would ask them questions. We'd get cables out of the Francophone posts repeated to Paris, and I would go in and get the Quai's comments on what was going on, how did they see what was being reported.

Q: This is an aspect of diplomacy that's been all but lost and that is the exchange between diplomats of information that they are getting, not only close allies but ones that are maybe not just allies but on basically friendly terms.

STEIGMAN: You've got to do a lot of trading. Information is a commodity, and by and large information is either bought or bartered. Since overt diplomats don't buy information, you generally get it by barter. You barter something for it. You may barter friendship. You may barter hospitality. You may barter information. And if you're dealing with somebody whom you can trust with some of your information, the easiest way to do it is just a nice professional information exchange from which both sides come out richer. As long as you're not compromising your own national interests or doing damage to any of your own national programs, that's an ideal way to operate and it worked extremely well in Paris.

I say it would not have been possible two or three years earlier because the French would not have given any information so there would have been no reason for us to give them any. But with the post-de Gaulle opening, the French were willing to talk to us. I assume that David Newsom has been one of your interviewees.

Q: No, not yet.

STEIGMAN: Because David, who was then Assistant Secretary for African Affairs, used to come to Paris once or twice a year. We would do a two-day, all-day session with the French on Africa, and it was wonderful. We would have an agenda worked out in advance, and we would go over all of Africa, an hour and a half, two hours per area, per chunk of Africa with an agreement as to which side would lead on each subject. We would give an appraisal of how we saw what was going on, what the current developments were; then the other side would comment what it's information was, and then there would just be an exchange of impressions and views as to what was going on and what we might do about it constructively from both sides, were the French planning to do something more in this area of concern to us, could we encourage them to do some more. It was really quite a frank exchange, and it worked very well because David has pretty good French, and the ground rule was each side spoke in its own language. I mean, everybody was reasonably bilingual but most comfortable speaking in his own language. David had no problem following and understanding the French and, in fact, he sometimes responded in French. But mostly he would make his presentations in English and they would make their presentations in French and the discussions would then tend to go back and forth after that. But these were very good open discussions.

We did this occasionally on Near East as well, not to the same extent and not as formally because Joe Sisco never was willing to give the French that much time. He didn't take the French that seriously. In the Middle East, as I say, he regarded them as a loose cannon to be sort of patted on the head and say, "There, there. You just stick with us, guys." He wasn't going to give them that kind of time. In fact, once when he was in transit in Paris, I got him to agree to spend an hour in the lounge of the airport with Luc de Nanteuil. Luc and I went out to the airport and he and Joe spent an hour in the airport exchanging views in the VIP lounge. But it was harder to get Joe to come into town.

CHARLES LAHIGUERA
Political Officer, UNESCO
Paris (1969-1973)

Mr. Lahiguera was born and raised in New York. After graduating from Georgetown University and serving in the US Navy, he entered the Foreign Service in 1963. Though he served outside the South East Asia, his primary duties concerned the Vietnam War and its aftermath, particularly refugees. His overseas posts include Germany, Curacao, Vietnam, France, Hong Kong, Thailand and Swaziland, where he served as Deputy Chief of Mission. Mr. Lahiguera was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2000.

Q: Well, then you're with UNESCO and you're working with UNESCO from '69 to '73?

LAHIGUERA: That's correct.

Q: What did UNESCO involve and where did it sort of fall within the political spectrum of the UN?

LAHIGUERA: Well, UNESCO is the United Nations Organization for Education, Science and Culture. My impression was that it probably drew the most liberal, left wing elements of the international community into it. I was assigned there as the political officer. We had the permanent representative who was a gentlemen by the name of Pierre Graham, an excellent Foreign Service Officer and we had a member of the UNESCO executive board who was Ambassador Katie Louchheim. My responsibilities were on the program side. I had the cultural programs, the communications programs, I had relations with non-governmental organizations.

As far as contacts with other delegations I focused on the East Asian delegations, but I did have relations with all of the delegations. In those days we were very much in the Cold War so as a political officer in all the meetings we had to take into consideration unfortunately the Cold War elements. Every time we voted on a meeting we had to consider which China was going to be represented in the meeting, which Korea, which East Germany, which Cambodia. One side would attack and the other side would respond. In fact I suggested once to the Romanian delegate that we just do a prerecording and play it while we had coffee because it was something of a ritual. In the beginning of those days we still had our embassy in Taipei and we were concerned about the votes on representation with China. I had to make sure all the delegates were around and knew that we were going to have a vote on the Chinese question. I had an unfortunate task when we finally did switch sides. I was asked by my boss to go down and inform the Taiwanese ambassador. That was one of the iciest meetings I've ever experienced. My heart wasn't in it, but it was my job and I did it.

Q: Now who was the head of UNESCO at the time?

LAHIGUERA: The director general of UNESCO, the head of the secretariat was a gentleman by the name of Rene Maheu, a Frenchman. He was reasonably cooperative with the United States and with the United States interests. During my time there his term was to expire and he had been there quite some time and the question arose as to who would replace him. I can remember we discussed at the time Mr. M'Bow who came from West Africa. I believe from Senegal. I wasn't terribly enthusiastic about Mr. M'Bow. I was the only one from the delegation who was reluctant. I was supporting a gentleman by the name of Gardner from Ghana. We were pretty well agreed that it probably should be somebody from Africa. I wanted an Anglophone. We had a long dose of Francophone leadership. I just thought Mr. Gardner would be a good change. I was convinced by my boss, and we had a very free discussion about this, that this Mr. M'Bow would have a better chance of being elected. We didn't want somebody who was going to be sympathetic with the communist side. Eventually we went along with the consensus and Mr. M'Bow was elected, but didn't pan out very well. There was a lot of criticism of him during his tenure. I wasn't there and I really can't comment on it.

Q: Well, did you find that UNESCO, you mentioned, when you get into things dealing with culture and education, there very definitely is a what you call a French approach. You know, highly controlled, a great deal of emphasis on the French language often enough. Did you find this permeated UNESCO while you were there?

LAHIGUERA: They certainly encouraged things French, there was no doubt about that. One of my tasks in the communications area was monitoring the question of freedom of information recall. There was a great deal of support from the developing world, from the communist bloc and from even many of our friends in Europe for some sort of media standards which we viewed with some suspicion because it moved very much toward censorship. In that one area we had a lot of debate on adopting an international code of conduct. I've forgotten the name of it. Of course they drummed on aspects of wanting to outlaw pornography and racism. What they wanted to do was be able to have control of the other side and we were in favor of freedom of expression. On cultural things, it just amazed me all the time no matter what kind of subject you would raise, somebody would come up with a political angle to it. I found myself embroiled in cultural things. The Arabs were forever raising questions about Israeli abuse of Arab religious and cultural sites. We had these constant storms where we often found ourselves as the only supporter of the Israeli delegation. Even the Europeans backed away from some of these things. I can remember the Israelis did tend to take us for granted and I can remember one time that we abstained on a vote against them and their ambassador came in shaking his finger at our permanent delegate saying that he would report us to Jerusalem because we had voted against them. I can't remember what the particular issue was. So, we had these many political fights over cultural things and over educational things.

Q: You were in the '69 to '73, you were there during the first half of the Nixon administration. Was there an attitude at that time? Later UNESCO became sort of a focal point of sort of American frustration against international affairs, thanks to Mr. M'Bow I think, but was there much of that at this time?

LAHIGUERA: Yes, while I was there we withdrew from the ILO (International Labour Organization). That had been triggered as I recall it by the fact that the ILO membership had decided to elect a Soviet deputy director and that so incensed our labor leadership that they advocated our withdrawal and we did in fact withdraw. But, I used that occasion to emphasize to many of the members of the secretariat of UNESCO and some of the other delegations that this could happen in UNESCO as well, that they could not continue to ignore our views on things if they wanted us to stay. I can remember in particular talking with the Japanese on this subject. They were very surprised when I expressed the view that someday we would leave if things continued on what I regarded as somewhat of a downhill slope. We also had complaints about getting greater American participation in the secretariat. We had a great deal of trouble getting Americans accepted in the secretariat. I had a perhaps exaggerated view of the secretariat's membership. I used to describe them as European intellectuals, the Soviet KGB members and American Quakers. Oh, and Third World son-in-laws of government officials. We would go to these meetings and listen to a tirade against the rich nations by the developing world. Then I'd get in my old broken down 404 Chevy and drive off and the African delegations would all get in their shiny new Mercedes chauffeur driven and leave the meeting. This was always a bizarre experience.

Q: Well, it would strike me that UNESCO would be a place to put your, you mentioned European intellectuals in a place that would bury them, you know, get them out of everybody's hair. The intellectual climate at that time was sort of socialist circles, which was sort of the stomping ground of the intellectuals, was anti-American. I would think this would be a good place to sort of beat up on us.

LAHIGUERA: Yes, well they certainly took every occasion. I was used to wearing flak jackets fortunately, and I needed them in this place. I can recall talking about putting people there to get them out of the way. We had an executive board member from the Ivory Coast named Dodier. The Ivory Coast is generally very sympathetic. They had warm relations with the United States at that time, but Mr. Dodier invariably voted with the communist bloc. We complained back to Washington who in turn complained to Abidjan, but we never could do anything about Mr. Dodier. So, you had this phenomenon that even representatives of countries that were usually friendly with the United States sometimes turned against us.

Let me mention an experience I had in the communications sector. UNESCO put out a magazine. They did a study on the arms race and arms reduction and sales in the world. I was responsible for the media and the magazine department. I discovered just by chance, they would put out this magazine in Spanish, English, French and Russian. I think eventually it may have come out in Arabic. I don't speak Russian. But I happened to notice that the Russian articles looked shorter. We checked it out. This magazine was published in the Soviet Union and the Russians extracted all the statements in the article describing any Eastern Bloc weapons production or sales. The article made it appear like we, the West, were the only manufacturers of arms and the only seller of arms in the world. So, we had a big row over that in the UNESCO magazine.

Q: What was American interest in UNESCO?

LAHIGUERA: Well, we did want to participate in preserving important cultural places, in fostering education especially in the developing world and fostering exchanges. In having exchanges in science and in developing science especially in the developing world. So, we were very sympathetic to this and we contributed. We were the principal donors at UNESCO. We paid the largest fee and we did support many projects. We were very much involved in Egypt with the preservation of Abu Simbel. The Nubian tombs if I recall correctly. I remember while I was there the question of the preservation and restoration of Borobudur in Indonesia came up and we were very interested in that. In Peru there was Machu Picchu. We were interested in supporting them. So, I felt there were many constructive things that could be done and we were perfectly happy to support, but invariably the other side would bring up political issues. We did not instigate political fights in this place. We spent much of our time defending.

Q: How was the social life in Paris at that time?

LAHIGUERA: Oh, you had an endless number of events. I can remember going to dinner and three cocktail parties in the same evening. I really got tired of it. Towards the end of my tour I just tried to not go unless I really had to see somebody or accomplish something. Cocktail parties are a great way of lobbying for something. If I had something on the agenda I'd go to a cocktail party and push for a vote or participation or something to get people to support our side on something. I was very interested in doing that. But if it was just another cocktail party and there wasn't any practical objective, I tended in the last year to shy away from them. I'd just had too many. In fact, you'll see I eventually volunteered to return to Vietnam because I felt that this whole thing was getting boring.

Q: Were you picking up anything about the peace talks there in Paris?

LAHIGUERA: Yes, one of my neighbors, Jim Rosenthal, was a member of the delegation at the peace talks and there were other people I did meet with. We did social things together. I did speak a lot with the Vietnamese delegation in UNESCO. They were a smaller community, so they were pretty close to what was happening in Paris. So, I did from time to time have some view of what was developing.

JOHN H. TRATTNER
Branch Public Affairs Officer, USIS
Strasbourg, France (1969)

Regional Information Officer, USIS
Paris (1969-1970)

Press Attaché, USIS
Paris (1970-1974)

Mr. Trattner was born and raised in Virginia and was educated at Yale, Columbia and American University. Joining the United States Information Service in 1963 he worked first with the Voice of America, and then was transferred to Warsaw as Press Attaché. His subsequent assignments all in the press and information field include Strasbourg, Paris, Brussels, and Washington, D.C., where he served as assistant to Deputy Secretary of State Warren Christopher and finally as official Spokesman for the Department of State. Mr. Trattner was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2007.

Q: So in 1969 you are off to France?

TRATTNER: I was transferred out of Poland two or three months earlier than my assignment would have normally ended because the recently-arrived U.S. ambassador in Paris, Sargent Shriver, had decided to re-open U.S. Information Service (USIS) operations at some of the American consulates in provincial France. Those operations had some years earlier been shut down for reasons of economy. One was in Lyon, I think, one was in Bordeaux, and one was in Strasbourg. It wasn't a job I wanted. A year before my scheduled departure from Warsaw I had lobbied for and gotten onward assignment to the U.S. Mission to NATO, as deputy public affairs officer, to begin in mid-1969. This fit with my interest in European community affairs and the East-West relationship in Europe. But in late 1968, that assignment fell through due to various personnel timing problems elsewhere. So when Shriver embarked on his re-opening of USIS operations in provincial France, I was available. We left Warsaw in April for Strasbourg. We really regretted leaving Poland, and for a time were actually homesick for Warsaw.

On a personal note, leaving Poland early meant our older daughter missed the two final third-grade months of the school year. There would be no English-language school in Strasbourg, and we didn't necessarily want one for the longer haul, only a chance for her to learn some French first. Before we left Warsaw we had her tutored in French. But we only had two months for that, and it wasn't enough. She floundered a bit at the Catholic parochial school we put her in when we arrived in Strasbourg. During home leave that followed during the summer, she again had French tutoring and by the time we returned to Strasbourg in the fall, she was ready to really pick up the language. And she quickly did. She was then almost nine. She loved the school and thrived there.

Q: What did you find in Strasbourg, and how did the work contrast with Poland?

TRATTNER: Well, Strasbourg was and is one beautiful city, at least the central old city—sort of the epitome of a central European town. The food was legendary, the weather pleasant, the people interesting. But overall we didn't entirely enjoy what turned out to be our brief Strasbourg experience because of the internal American administrative obstacles we encountered. Shriver's quick move to re-open USIS operations in Strasbourg took the administrative people at the embassy in Paris by surprise, and they never caught up. The consulate had no office space for me, and no furniture, not even a desk or telephone. They had no housing under lease that we could live in, and there was no housing allowance that would help us rent something on our own. So we spent our entire time in Strasbourg living in the third-floor apartment of the consul general's house. If we wanted to do official entertaining, we had to use that house and borrow the consul general's china and glassware. He was not very cooperative, to put it mildly. No diplomatic title existed for me, although it had been applied for. But, meanwhile, that meant I could not get diplomatic plates for our car, and it spent the first five of our six months there sitting in the consulate garage still wearing its Polish diplomatic plate.

Q: Other problems there?

TRATTNER: No. And the things I just mentioned were just typical bureaucratic snarl-ups. But I would say that substantively my job in Strasbourg seemed like overkill. There was no real need for the services it entailed. The populace of Alsace was very friendly to the United States and U.S. policies. Much more so than in other parts of France. Many people in Alsace (and in the region of Lorraine, which was also nominally part of my territory) still remembered the liberation of France in World War II. A lot of Alsatians of that time had seen Patton's tanks at first hand, pushing the Germans out of eastern France. France, of course, had long shared with us all the important democratic and human rights values. Some very old people felt even more strongly that way, since they could remember the time after World War I when Alsace and Lorraine were restored to France after 75 years or so of non democratic existence as part of Germany. Given all that, there was hardly any need to go out and win the hearts and minds of Alsace, and not even any huge need to stage constant cultural events, place articles in newspapers, or stay in continuous touch with the media and the academic community. American films were shown everywhere, American books and newspapers were available everywhere, including university libraries. A sizeable number of Americans lived in Alsace. I felt superfluous and not very useful, and on that, I got similar vibrations from USIS colleagues at re-opened posts in Lyon and Bordeaux. What's more, the consul general was already very active on the press, cultural, and academic scene that was supposed to be my responsibility, and understandably resented my presence there. So my assignment to Strasbourg seemed a terrible waste of time, money, and people. However, there was one event that I felt was indeed worthwhile and did make a real impact, and that was the visit to Strasbourg of U.S. astronaut Russell Schweickart. He had been a crew member on one of the flights in the Apollo moon series, and his ancestors were Alsatian. But you asked about the contrast of my work in Strasbourg with my work in Poland. There was no comparison, of course, with what I and my wife felt had been constructive, challenging work and life in Poland. A life and work that involved us both.

Q: Well, the public affairs officer in Paris I assume had to be a high ranking person. Who was that and how did he or she react to all of this?

TRATTNER: Leslie Brady was the PAO in Paris at the time. I had spent a week of orientation in Paris en route to Strasbourg and first met him there. Soon afterward, he was succeeded by Burnett Anderson. They were both senior USIA veterans. USIS Paris was pleased to have these re-opened provincial posts and had expectations that everything would go well. After five months in Strasbourg, I told Anderson in Paris of my intention to request reassignment, and he convinced Shriver to transfer me to the embassy in Paris, where I retained my responsibilities in Strasbourg and the region. The idea in the switch was that I would now get some support for the work I was already doing, or trying to do in Alsace. We moved to Paris in November 1969 and for the next several months I traveled regularly to and around the Strasbourg region and continued carrying out what cultural affairs programs were possible with limited resources. Two things helped. One was a visit of several days to Lorraine by the American deputy chief of mission in Paris, an old French hand around whom we could stage a number of cultural events. The other was the exceptional public interest in moon rocks—small pieces of the moon's crust recently brought back from the first U.S. moon landing and sent by USIA to show in various parts of the world. USIS Paris received one of them and I took it to Strasbourg to put it on display. It was like carrying a semi-precious jewel. Six months after we came to Paris, the USIS job in Strasbourg was closed, and I became the assistant information officer in Paris. About six months later, I became the embassy press attaché and spokesman.

Q: Did you see any signs in Alsace and Lorraine or France generally of the consequences of the Prague Spring?

TRATTNER: I'd say there was a distinct relationship. The Prague Spring of 1968, and the Soviet squelching of it that August, was just one of the political and social developments roiling the European landscape in 1968 and 1969. As people who lived in eastern and western Europe in those years, we saw much of it close up. There was the adverse reaction within western European communist parties to the Soviet action in Czechoslovakia. There were the French student riots, mainly in Paris, in the spring of 1968, when it seemed possible that De Gaulle might be toppled, especially when a sizeable segment of the French labor force supported the students. When De Gaulle did resign a year later, I recall that many looked back to the riots as a strong preamble to the end of the De Gaulle era. But not of the Gaullist era. There was also the wave of anti-Semitism in Poland in 1968 and the struggle for power within the Polish communist party, connected indirectly to the six-day war in 1967 in the Middle East. There was the war in Vietnam. The U.S. was taking heavy criticism on that in Eastern and Western Europe alike. The French intellectual left, which seemed genetically suspicious of the U.S., was particularly vocal about Vietnam, and the Gaullist government was not above encouraging anti-U.S. feeling. That was part of its posture of French independence and what it saw as U.S. infringement on European sovereignty. Even De Gaulle's encouragement of a free Quebec had been part of that mentality. In ways hard to define precisely, some of these phenomena across Europe were linked to one another. Certainly, when we arrived in Paris, the student riots there were still a fresh memory and you heard people making the connection with what happened in Czechoslovakia just a few months after those riots. When we got to Paris, speculation abounded on what further developments might be expected there. The French government and the city of Paris had for some time been on guard against possible physical assault against the American Embassy by anti-Vietnam war protesters. And the government was also wary of the possibility that further unrest among university students could morph into attacks on the embassy. Sidewalks around the embassy were sometimes barricaded with an impenetrable line of army trucks and busses and later this barrier became a permanent fixture. Finally, the Vietnam peace talks in Paris, which began in 1968, focused additional attention on the American Embassy as a target of demonstrations. More about that later.

Q: I would like to go back to one thing, Alsace-Lorraine. Was there a sizable German speaking area there, and if so, how did we treat that?

TRATTNER: French was the spoken and official language for all of that region, even though a number of older Alsatians did speak German among themselves. Much of the architectural style was typically central European, and there were some German-language publications. But the region was long since solidly part of France and French was the language spoken everywhere.

Regional Information Officer; Press Attaché
Paris, France (1969-1970); (1970-1974)

Q: OK, you were in France from when to when?

TRATTNER: From April to November, 1969 in Strasbourg and from then until July of 1974 in Paris.

Q: What were the major activities of the embassy in Paris when you were there? What was it working on?

TRATTNER: The Vietnam talks, important as they were, were a separate operation and, at least technically, were not part of the embassy's main preoccupations. But more about that later. About a year after we arrived in Paris, I became the embassy press attaché, and had extensive first-hand exposure to activities embassy-wide. In the area of French foreign policy and French relationships around the world, these included tracking the French hostility that De Gaulle had decreed towards British membership in what was then still called the European Economic Community. We closely followed developments within the EEC, NATO and such European international organizations such as the old Western European Union. This all related to U.S. support of progress toward European political and economic unity and our interest in Europe's own defense initiatives in addition to NATO. Other items on that list were the mutual and balanced force reductions talks that began, I think, in 1972 or 1973 between NATO and the Warsaw Pact, and another East-West forum, the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. Another key focus was France's view of the Vietnam War, which was distinctly negative and critical of the U.S., though it began to moderate under De Gaulle's successor, Georges Pompidou, but didn't really fade until some time after the peace accord on Vietnam reached in Paris in 1973. Part of the French antagonism to U.S. actions in Vietnam almost certainly was rooted in France's own earlier failure in Indochina, and you sensed bitter satisfaction in some French quarters at our own floundering there. In fact, I can't tell you the number of conversations I had with French journalists, and not only journalists, just on that issue. Their typical view was that we were trying to replace the French position in Vietnam, trying to establish the same position the French had developed over many years, a sort of neo-colonialist position. Only they felt that we were doing it with typical American clumsiness, not the finesse the French had employed. Some even alleged that this was our real goal in Vietnam, not rooting out the communists. I would point out the big differences between what France had done in Vietnam and what we were trying to do, that France had been the colonial power there for generations and right up to the end had tried to preserve it by force, rather than understand the feelings of the Vietnamese and perhaps reach accommodation with them that might have allowed the French to maintain their position, or at least prolonged their presence. France had not done that, and had lost its way there, and finally had to leave. As for the U.S., I said we in a real sense had to pick up the pieces of the French failure in Vietnam, fill the gap, and try to preserve South Vietnam from the communist north, but that we had no colonial designs on Vietnam. I also made clear I had no illusions about our military failures and mistakes. It was an interesting exercise to make the argument, at least.

The embassy also spent time and effort on the goal of reducing French tolerance of heroin trafficking to the United States, the so-called French connection that at one point brought the U.S. attorney general to Paris to press for more cooperation in eliminating it. And there was a range of lesser French-U.S. bilateral issues the embassy was involved in.

Also while I was there, two summit meetings took place between Presidents Pompidou and Nixon, the first in December 1971 in the Azores, and the second in June 1973 in Iceland. By the time of the Azores meeting I was the press attaché at the Paris embassy and even before that had worked with the White House press office during Nixon's attendance at De Gaulle's funeral in the fall of 1970. So, with the approach of the Azores summit meeting a year later, the White House appropriated my services to handle the French press there during the meeting. Later, they asked me to do the same job for the meeting of the two presidents in Iceland. It was actually a mix of handling French journalists and helping the White House press office with the press that accompanied Nixon from Washington. In the Azores, that got me into things like taking a couple of hours to sightsee around the island with Dan Rather and one of his cameramen in a Volkswagen rented by CBS. The Azores meeting was the first of several summits Nixon had in that period with European leaders, in part to consult with them on his upcoming visit to China, but also to talk about security and disarmament issues. Also, France had been a go-between for the U.S. and the Chinese and played a role in arranging the Nixon visit. Further, I think Pompidou had recently talked with Brezhnev and Nixon probably wanted to directly hear about that. Those summits, incidentally, were the first of a number of encounters I had with Henry Kissinger. The second Pompidou-Nixon meeting, in Iceland, was basically about defining the direction that Atlantic relations would take in the coming three to five years. As I remember, the issues surrounding that were balance of trade, currency reform, the possible withdrawal of substantial American forces from Europe that Congress was threatening, and what else? Oh, arms control. It was Nixon's "year of Europe" and he envisioned a summit meeting of Atlantic leaders. The Iceland summit was to lay the groundwork for that, but it was inconclusive. Nixon by that time was being engulfed in Watergate, and Pompidou was visibly suffering from the illness that killed him the following year. But the idea of an Atlantic summit soon materialized in the series of economic summit meetings that began in France in 1975 as a G-6 meeting.

Speaking of Nixon, I'm reminded of one or two of the atmospherics that have stuck in my memory of his meeting with Pompidou in the Azores. First, the Nixon advance team was intent on ensuring that Nixon would arrive second, not first, at the site where the initial meeting was to take place. The meeting site was a little house in the middle of the main town on Terceira, the largest of the islands. There was something nearly obsessive in the American advance team's intent to be absolutely certain that Pompidou's limousine would arrive first, and in the trouble they took to persuade the French side to allow it to happen that way. Then, second, in the discussions the U.S. advance team had with its French counterparts, I was assigned to eavesdrop on what the French on the other side of the table were saying to one another. The idea was to find out anything the French were secretly planning to one-up the Americans in some phase of the summit meeting. There was even a moment when I was sent with other Americans into the town on the night before the meeting to wander around near the meeting site to see whether any secret operations might be underway. This was really pretty astonishing, and I could only put it down to paranoia. It was very strange.

As for the Paris peace talks on Vietnam, as I said earlier the U.S. delegation was not formally attached to the embassy. It got administrative support from the embassy, but was not a part of it, and operated independently. It's not that there was a total wall separating them, just that officially the delegation had its own separate existence. Bill Porter was the head of the delegation, with the rank of ambassador, I think for most of the duration of the talks. I may be wrong about that. But Averill Harriman had headed the delegation when the talks began, with Cyrus Vance as deputy. Phil Habib was involved, too. The delegation had its own spokesman, even though that spokesman drew on one of my French staff for assistance, and he and I were in frequent touch. I filled in for him when he was away, and at some point the delegation dropped its spokesperson position, and the responsibility mainly came to me and, as I recall, another member of the Vietnam delegation. We kind of shared the work, but by then there wasn't a lot to do there; the talks had become quite routine, and press attention had dwindled. It rekindled when Henry Kissinger moved from the job of national security assistant to that of secretary of state and began a series of lightning visits to Paris as the talks reached their climax. I got involved with those visits.

But to go back a bit, as some will recall, the Paris talks on Vietnam were the result of Lyndon Johnson's suspension of U.S. bombing of Haiphong in March 1968 to encourage the North Vietnamese to negotiate. Johnson announced at the same time that he wouldn't run for re-election. Beyond hoping to end its role in the Vietnam war, the U.S. thought that would also let South Vietnam stabilize its political situation. That would help it to rebuild infrastructure, and re-enter life as an independent entity. As things turned out, those were misguided hopes. But when the Paris talks began, American casualties in the war had risen to a staggering total and were a powerful incentive to ending it on at least ostensibly good terms, or the best terms we could get. Opinions differ about U.S. motivations later on in the talks, in 1971 and 1972 when Nixon was moving to seek re-election. As I recall, North Vietnam was worried that the so-called U.S. détente diplomacy with the Russians and Chinese would affect Soviet and Chinese support for North Vietnam's military effort. So Hanoi changed its tactics in the Paris talks, by agreeing to let South Vietnam remain in existence after the fighting stopped and negotiate an eventual settlement with North Vietnam. I remember clearly that it was about then that press interest in the Paris talks began to revive and we had to increasingly gear up to respond adequately but carefully. During October 1972, two things happened. Nixon announced the U.S. was halting all its bombing of North Vietnam, and Hanoi announced details of a draft peace agreement. That's when Kissinger publicly stated that peace was at hand. His announcement surprised us in Paris because it seemed premature and rash, and because it came just a few days before the 1972 presidential election. Many people thought anyway that Nixon had maneuvered to boost his chances of re-election. They argued then and later that a settlement in Vietnam could have been reached earlier. There was a lot of skepticism among French and American reporters about Nixon's real purposes, as I've just talked about, and I spent time trying to respond to it, but didn't have much to go on. In any case, domestic U.S. anger about the war had by then gone even higher, and Nixon was under pressure to end it. South Vietnam had asked for certain concessions in an agreement and thought it had been deceived by the U.S. It was resisting the agreement that was now emerging, in which the U.S. committed itself to, I think, eventual military disengagement from Vietnam. When the U.S. told South Vietnam it would abandon its support altogether if it didn't come around, South Vietnam was forced to give up. That produced a peace accord, and it was signed in Paris by North and South Vietnam and the U.S., in January 1973. After the ceremony, Kissinger held a massively attended press conference arranged by the U.S. delegation and the Paris embassy, and I remember introducing him and being with him on the platform. Close to the end of the Vietnam talks, my staff and I had gotten more involved in the daily back and forth of news and rumors about the eventual outcome, and were providing the delegation with the extra public affairs support it needed. I guess that's why I have given you this long spiel about the talks.

In any event, fighting soon resumed in Vietnam, ignoring the existence of the International Commission of Control and Supervision established to carry out the agreement. It reminded me of what I had seen happen with the International Control Commission in Laos, when I was reporting on the Laos conference in Geneva years earlier. Within about two and a half years after the peace treaty signing, the U.S. had taken a lot more casualties, then militarily withdrawn from South Vietnam and closed its embassy, North Vietnam had defeated and taken over South Vietnam, Kissinger had received the Nobel peace prize, and Nixon had resigned. Anyone in active foreign service at the time was an especially horrified witness to how huge, destructive, deep, wounding, and sad this whole episode was for the U.S.

I should have spoken briefly about my earlier days in Paris. My work as assistant information officer was expectably routine, such as overseeing production of a magazine that USIS distributed all over France, assisting the information officer in various things, now and then sitting in for the embassy press attaché when he was absent. I'm sorry if I'm repeating myself, but in November 1970 I left that job and became the embassy press attaché, which among other things involved my moving to the embassy from the USIS offices two blocks away. Our third daughter was born about six months later.

Q: What was your impression of the French media, and how did we deal with it? What about the intellectuals?

TRATTNER: Well, first, I am hardly an expert on French intellectual life, and I'm not about to give you an exhaustive riff on it here. That's a vastly complicated topic, with a very long history. Bookshelves are filled with it. A lot of discussion and observation over the years has focused on the French intellectual left. It was and is a deeply embedded part of French political, social, and cultural life. It has contributed hugely to the country's history and vitality, and also I would say to its legacy. If I think about the French left, I see passionate views, deeply-held views, a spectrum of sometimes brilliant writers, journalists, and political figures. And what else? Philosophers, film makers, artists, and playwrights. Then there's the left's own particular defense of French primacy and independence. And that was an intellectual defense, as opposed to political defense such as the positions of Gaullist governments over the years. As I think I suggested earlier, the position of the left on France's place in the world thrived on the belief that French culture was special and superior. Well, it is certainly special. Whether it's superior, well, superiority is hard to define. In any case, that belief automatically, or almost automatically, meant skepticism, or even cynicism, about American intentions in the world, and also some snobbery about U.S. culture and society.

You asked about French media. Several leading newspapers and magazines represented the French left in varying degrees, and they generally were considered to reflect the views of the socialist or communist parties. But I don't want to absolutely categorize any newspaper because there were many ambiguities in how the French press approached any issue. The newspaper l'Humanité was the daily newspaper of the communist party then. The leading daily in France was and is Le Monde. Not in terms of circulation or popularity, of course. But that newspaper in those days often reflected the views of the Gaullist government on foreign policy issues, and was also very much a newspaper for intellectuals. It tended to be critical of U.S. foreign policy. Le Figaro, which I think was France's leading newspaper when the Second World War began, was still a leading paper, basically conservative, with more centrist views on world affairs. There was Le Canard Enchaîné, the celebrated satirical weekly. For it, there was absolutely nothing sacred, except perhaps the fact of its own celebrity and place in the scheme of things. It lampooned everyone and everything, and was very widely read. And let's not forget the wildly popular photo journal, Paris-Match, and the English-language daily International Herald Tribune, written and edited in Paris, published and sold in much of the world, which continues to be an influential player on the European press scene, and has a unique niche among American media and publishing efforts abroad. I've left out many other newspapers, including some good provincial papers. French television was a government entity, with two or three channels, but not controlled by the government. There were a couple of strong outside broadcast channels, Radio-Television Luxembourg and Europe 1, which tended to be more objective and had significant audiences. Among the weekly magazines the big ones were Le Nouvel Observateur, devoted to business and political news, and there were L'Express and Le Point, both associated with Jean-Jacques Servan-Schreiber, who was a flamboyant, versatile, and resourceful French politician and writer. He co-founded the first of those two and patterned it after Time magazine, and founded the second during our time in France and modeled it the same way. He also wrote a couple of well-read books, one of them an international best-seller titled "The American Challenge."

Q: Did you have a lot of contact with the media in France?

TRATTNER: Yes. Even more than in Poland, as press attaché I saw them frequently. This happened either individually at lunch, or at parties and dinners we and others hosted as a regular part of our work, and my wife and I were often guests at events given by French and other journalists. I handled the ambassador's media contacts, arranging a number of interviews of him by French journalists, was the embassy spokesman, and accompanied the ambassador on just about all of his official travel within France. One of the three ambassadors I served with was Arthur Watson, who was in the habit of flying his own plane around France, and I flew with him a couple of times. He always had a co-pilot, who was a professional. At the end of the Nixon-Pompidou summit meeting in the Azores, Watson, who had flown himself to the Azores, wanted me to fly back to Paris with him. But I wiggled out of it because I wanted to return on the French press plane.

Among French journalists I got to know was a reporter for l'Humanite, the communist paper, whom I sent to the U.S. for four weeks or so in USIA's International Visitor Program. That was especially satisfying, since he was the kind of person the program was particularly designed for. I could never have sent a Polish journalist on such a visit. This guy returned to France and wrote a series of positive pieces about the U.S. I set up or helped facilitate visits to the States for more than a few French journalists over the time I was there. Some of them went under U.S. official auspices, and others went on their own and paid their own expenses.

The resident U.S. press, and to a lesser extent French and other foreign journalists, gave us a lot of business. They'd call me for comment on issues or events, or asking to interview the ambassador or to cover some of his activities. Every day we distributed the USIS news wire to newspapers, magazines, radio and television stations, wire services, and foreign media bureaus in Paris and to some extent in the rest of the country, and one of my French press office staff briefed the ambassador each morning on what was in the French press that day. We also sent a summary of the French press to Washington each day. I handled and sat in on all the ambassador's media interviews, arranged some of the media's contacts with other senior embassy people, attended the ambassador's small team meetings, and worked often with the embassy's political and economic sections, sometimes sitting in on their staff meetings. The press office was also called on to help arrange and deal with what I call the public dimensions of a constant parade of visiting Americans, both official and otherwise, and we would also deal with the expected and sometimes unexpected results of their visits. These visitors included a number of American editors and reporters, many wanting to talk with the ambassador. As you can imagine, members of Congress came through all the time, and I was usually involved in their visits. A number of U.S. Senators came through, such as Mike Mansfield, the majority leader at the time, and Barry Goldwater, who came as U.S. representative to the Paris air show, and Mac Mathias. I was involved, in one way or another, with all of them. I should mention then-Senator James Buckley of New York, William Buckley's brother, who walked into my office one day for a meeting and promptly stretched himself out at full length on the floor, explaining that he had back problems. So we conversed with me at my desk and the Senator on the floor. A couple of state governors who went on to become president came to Paris. One was Jimmy Carter, on a trade-seeking mission for Georgia, whom we included in a big reception we happened to be giving at home while he was there. The other was Ronald Reagan, on a similar visit to France. I handled his media contacts and news conference, and found that, unlike many another official American visitor, Reagan was easy to manage. There was also the visit of future president George H.W. Bush, making the rounds of capitals after being named as U.S. ambassador to the UN. And there was Richard Nixon (as president, not as senator). I've already talked about being assigned to the two summit meetings he had with Pompidou, in the Azores and in Iceland. Nixon also came to Paris a couple of times while I was there, on one occasion to attend the De Gaulle funeral. That's when the White House press office first latched on to me to help handle the press. Then there were the two summits with Pompidou, and just before we departed Paris in mid-1974, the White House borrowed me to work in Jerusalem during Nixon's visit to Israel, and in Brussels where he stopped en route to Moscow. They wanted me to go on to Moscow as well, but I managed to get out of that one because by that time the packers and movers were literally at our door in Paris.

Q: Well, the communist side of things was not off limits to you all?

TRATTNER: No, not French communists. But there was an odd situation resulting from U.S. diplomatic practice of the time. Ordinary U.S. diplomats were not supposed to have any meaningful contact with officials of countries the U.S. did not recognize. In practical terms, of course, that mostly meant communist countries. It had been drilled into us, especially in Warsaw, that we had to be careful. So at a cocktail reception at the Polish embassy, for example, you didn't go out of your way to encounter anyone from, say, the East German or Chinese or North Vietnamese embassies or talk with journalists from those countries. If you were introduced, you would nod, maybe say something minimal, and move on. I think the idea was that, if you did anything more than that, the East Germans in particular might interpret it deliberately as a sign of possible change in the U.S. posture of non recognition, because the East Germans were anxious to establish parity with West Germany in the eyes of the West. Kind of ridiculous. Then, toward the end of our time in Paris, things changed. There was the Nixon visit to China. That didn't immediately result in diplomatic relations with Beijing, but it loosened things up. Another factor in the change was that the U.S. and East Germany finally established diplomatic relations in about 1974 and we opened an embassy in East Berlin. There was also new focus on the semi-annual talks between Chinese and American ambassadors in Paris, and there was also the fact of the Vietnam talks in Paris, where U.S. diplomats were meeting with North Vietnamese diplomats every day. So all that worked to ease the awkwardness about contact with diplomats whose countries we didn't recognize. It was a refreshing change.

Q: Was the communist party in France considered a tool of the Kremlin?

TRATTNER: Not really, when we were there, except perhaps in some minds on the French right. But they were still a powerful presence, with about 20% of the vote, and could partly cripple the country with labor strikes, especially in the transportation sector. Strikes occurred regularly. The party and its unions were a nuisance but never a threat. They were simply tolerated, sometimes angrily. Eventually the party began to wane and lose impact as the face of the French economy and politics bore less and less resemblance to what it had been before and after the Second World War. And the old ties with Moscow corroded in the face of the long east-west confrontation in Europe and as disillusion with the Russians set in. The situation in France roughly paralleled what happened to the Italian communists, though they were more of a real threat, of course, than their French counterparts. Also, the barons of the French party's glory days, such as they were, were growing old and dying and being replaced by less cunning but more realistic, though faceless, leaders. The party was beginning its decline before I got there and that continued while I was there. But it was still a distinctive feature of the French political landscape.

Q: While you were there what was our attitude towards the socialist left in France? How did we view this?

TRATTNER: Well, the socialists were the main opposition party in the Assemblée, and the second largest political party, with solid and durable foundations. I mean that they were strongly rooted within the French left, the unions, part of the media sector, and, if I remember right, much of the academic community. When we were there, they had never gained a majority in the assembly or elected a president, at least in the Fifth Republic. But in the early 1980s, I think it was, with the election of Francois Mitterrand to the presidency, they were able to do both. In the late 1960s and first half of the 70s, when we were there, the U.S. attitude toward the French socialist party was what you would expect toward a large political party that played a very significant role in French politics and represented sizeable numbers of people across the country. They were serious, if unsuccessful, contenders for political power, and always had to be taken seriously by their opponents. They spent what seemed a lot of time embroiled in their own internal politics. I think the U.S. would have greeted their accession to power pretty much with equanimity, as was in fact the case when Mitterrand finally made it. Certainly, they were never thought of as any kind of threat to the established democratic order in western Europe. Our approach to the French socialists was not greatly different from how we regarded the British Labor Party or the German SPD.

Q: What was your impression of the French press and the reporters?

TRATTNER: Well, earlier I spoke about the press, about the media. As for individual journalists, they were by and large a fairly hard-working, conscientious group. There were many newspapers, magazines and broadcast media in France, so the journalist community was large. Many of these news organizations could be identified with particular political parties, viewpoints, and the kinds of readerships they served, more so than in the U.S., for example. Many reporters were specialists serving those viewpoints and readers, and did not range much outside those niches. But some stood above that, usually worked for nationally-read publications, and were widely read and well-known, such as Raymond Aron, the lead columnist at Le Figaro. I didn't really have the opportunity to get to know any reporters working outside Paris for provincial papers and the like, and mainly worked to establish relationships with some at the national media level who wrote for and had impact on readers important to us. There were probably 200 serious journalists working for established, serious organizations in Paris. They were experienced, reasonably friendly, self-assured, and established. With a handful of exceptions, they were very sharp, and you had to be on your toes when you talked with them.

Q: Were there any other events that engaged you during this time?

TRATTNER: As I said, President Nixon visited Paris two or three times while we were there. I think I already mentioned his attendance at De Gaulle's funeral, which brought perhaps three dozen heads of state to Paris. On these three or four day visits by a U.S. president, of course, most of the embassy was turned full time to a supporting role. My job was in some respects similar to what I did at the presidential summit meetings in the Azores and Iceland, but it was also substantially different, because this time, in addition to personally assisting the president's spokesman in dealing with individual reporters and keeping the media informed, I had the lead for the embassy in accommodating the scores of American reporters, anchor people, TV and film people, and photographers traveling with the president. This was the White House press corps, and not only them but dozens of other Americans from around Europe. I wasn't alone, of course. I worked with the presidential advance team from Washington, which included White House communications agency technical people, and usually came in several waves over the two or three weeks preceding the actual visit; there was the advance team, the "pre-advance" team, and even the "pre-pre-advance" team. This often seemed like overkill to me, but such was the style of White House operations, and it was a style that had grown with every American presidency since the end of World War II. One key task was to provide a well-equipped facility for the phalanx of press to work in. That meant turning a large ballroom in one of the four or five best Paris hotels into a press room stocked with everything big and small that reporters need, including electronics, dozens of telephone lines, access to satellite transmission, and so on, plus a facility for the briefings and press conferences of presidential press secretaries and dignitaries that included the secretary of state. During the Nixon visits to Paris, I got to know the two people who successively served him as press secretary, Ron Ziegler and Gerry Warren, and that was why my help was requested for later Nixon travel abroad and for the travels of Presidents Ford and Carter. They just passed me along from one administration to the next.

Q: By the way, what about Ron Ziegler?

TRATTNER: Compared to the impressions I had gathered from all the bad press about Ziegler, he turned out personally to be a fairly ordinary, mild guy who didn't know much about France, or the French, or about foreign affairs, or the world generally. And why should he, given his own background before becoming Nixon's spokesman? I didn't really get to know him until toward the end of Nixon's tenure, by which time he had probably been softened up by all the adversity of that period. The Watergate business was in full cry and had begun to seriously nibble at Nixon and at Ziegler. One sign of Ziegler's isolation may have been in the fact that he called me one day during Nixon's last visit to Paris and said he had no one to have dinner with that night, and invited me to join him. Pretty astonishing. As it happened, my wife and I had another engagement that night.

Q: What was the evaluation that you were getting and your own opinion of Pompidou?

TRATTNER: He was a serious man without a lot of personality. At the meeting with Nixon in the Azores in 1971, he made time to mix with the press once as he entered the meeting site. Some of us exchanged a few words with him, and he was affable and relaxed. Just not a lot of personal charisma. But he had been a politician, and a pretty clever one, held a number of private-sector and public sector posts, and rose to become the prime minister under De Gaulle. When De Gaulle resigned the presidency in 1969, Pompidou pretty much directly succeeded him, though there was an interim president for about three months while an election took place. I thought he seemed practical-minded and bent on maintaining, but somewhat revising, the Gaullist approach and tradition but in far less pompous and exalted style. Pompidou was more of a realist than De Gaulle about France's place and ambitions in the world. More accommodating to the British and more willing to deal first-hand with his American counterparts. His party, as you may know, went through a number of incarnations and name changes over the ensuing years, but remained coherent and in power as the big party of the center-right. We'll always remember Pompidou's first words announcing De Gaulle's death on television: La France est veuve – France is a widow. Pompidou himself fell ill not long after, and died just before we left France in 1974.

Q: Did you get any impression of the French political class? My impression from what I have seen is it seems to be so much disconnected.

TRATTNER: One good way to get into that question might be to note that our oldest daughter attended a very good parochial school in Paris for most of the time we were there, from age 10 to almost 14. Our second-oldest went to a British and then to an American private school. Those two now have French husbands and live in France. So, though it's been almost 35 years since we lived there, we still have strong, and now continually updated, impressions of the people of France. Our oldest girl made some close friends at her school, some of them the daughters of well-placed and well-to-do French families, and was often invited to their homes and their country homes for weekends and the like. Through that lens, we got an out-of-the-ordinary glimpse of the upper layer of French society, and formed our impressions in many other ways as well, of course. Generally, our impressions were good. Some of those families were politically and socially prominent, but they seemed to have little, if anything, in common with the glitterati social set who were the constant focus of the popular media. I guess you could say they were old money, and they lived gracefully but quietly. There were some impressive and memorable features to their life style, but they weren't flaunted. The same was true of a family living in our apartment building, whom we came to know through friendships that developed between their daughters and our middle daughter. Members of the political class whom I actually knew as part of my job, aside from journalists, were mainly people in government ministries or in government posts and cultural positions, like museum directors, in the provinces. They were like members of the elite anywhere; most had middle-class origins and had managed, by talent or connections or both, to get an education in one of the so-called elite schools that were feeders into the ranks of government and business. Similar to their counterparts in other countries, they tended to obey deep instincts that governed their work habits, social connections, and outlook. They protected their status and smoothed the way for those coming up behind them. Because of the structure of the French system, the national government operated not only at the national level but in the cities and provinces, and had hundreds of jobs to staff, a good number of them with people coming out of the elite schools. The most ambitious, clever, and intelligent would try to work their way upward into positions at the regional and national level of government, as big-city mayors, prefects, and officials of ministries in Paris.

Speaking of Paris, I have to say something about our apartment. It was an exquisite two-floor place in the seventh arrondissement of Paris, with views of the city in all directions. A five-minute walk from the embassy. The rent was beyond what we wanted to pay, but once we had seen it, we knew we wanted to live there and decided we would somehow have to afford it. We were lucky to have it, and later, we got even luckier when an embassy administrative officer, whom we'd invited to a reception, took a look at the apartment and decided to lease it long-term for the embassy. That apartment remained in the embassy stable for quite a while.

Q: How did your wife like the work and what you were doing in Paris?

TRATTNER: She supported and enhanced everything I did. I know that's a cliché for a lot of people, but I mean it truthfully. For one thing, as a hostess, she has wonderful insights into the mix of people that is right for each occasion, and how to bring them together and make it interesting for them, and she demonstrated this repeatedly in the entertaining we did. She was always moving among the guests, like any good hostess, but she also did it at the many other receptions and dinners we attended, where she could instead have stayed in the same corner talking with the same people for two hours. She gracefully and helpfully put up with my frequently long or late hours and preoccupation with my work, and spent as much time as she could out in the city. She made an already beautiful apartment into something extraordinary. And she managed two children's sometimes complicated school lives while settling our newborn third daughter into life.

Q: Were you picking up any bubbling from the university?

TRATTNER: There always seemed to be some restlessness in the universities. Some of it was about practical things like stipends or living quarters or class curriculum. Some of it was political. Now and then, it was directed against America, because of the Vietnam war. One day my wife and I were walking toward home in mid-afternoon and heard the unmistakable sounds of an approaching demonstration. It was apparently headed for the embassy, but we weren't sure. We knew that our two younger children were probably playing in the strip of park that ran along the river near where we lived, and even though our babysitter was with them, we were worried that the crowd might just sweep through where they were. Then this phalanx of kids came running across the Pont de la Concorde into the Place de la Concorde, just as we were about to cross the bridge in the other direction. Dozens of police with billy clubs were coming after them. They were going to pass us at close range, and maybe even engulf us, so we ran down the quai on that side of the river and escaped. But since we were wearing casual clothes, the cops wouldn't have distinguished us from the kids because they weren't only kids. There were many adults among them. The crowd, by the way, had never come near to where our kids were playing. I should add that while things like this were going on, the American Cultural Center in Paris continued to be a popular attraction, and a sizeable number of visitors there on a given day were young people, and university students. From what I saw indirectly in my own work, and what I heard from USIS colleagues, there didn't seem to be a noticeable diminution of interest in America among the youth of Paris.

I wanted to mention earlier a colleague in the Paris embassy's political section. I no longer recall his name, but he was, to my mind, what a truly effective Foreign Service political officer ought to be. That was because, beyond the traditional rounds of calls on government ministries and social contacts with officials and politicians, he spent a lot of time immersing himself in the country and the people. It was a part of his responsibilities, and he took it seriously. He traveled regularly around the country, sought out provincial and local officials and every kind of French man and woman, and talked with them at length. He was a close and skilled observer, fluent in the language, and he was able to correlate everything he learned. He put it all into descriptive mosaics that were the most beautifully worded, colorful, and informative reports that I ever read. What he gathered up in those trips truly informed his understanding of the country, its politics, and its policies and this was reflected in what he wrote and how he performed as a diplomat. That skill is the true measure of the profession, as far as I'm concerned. There can't have been many like him, and I'm sure his reports were under appreciated in Washington. So I want to pay tribute to him here, even if I can't recall his name.

BURNETT ANDERSON
Director, USIS
Paris (1969-1977)

Burnett Anderson was born in Wisconsin in 1919. He entered the USIA in 1953. His career included assignments in Iran, Spain, France, and Sweden. Mr. Anderson was interviewed by Jack O'Brien on January 5, 1990.

ANDERSON: Next assignment was what might be called a troubleshooting job. I had gotten something of a reputation as a troubleshooter. In any event, Sarge Shriver wanted me in Paris, and I wasn't ready to leave.

Q: Sargent Shriver, we should note, was the American ambassador.

ANDERSON: He was the American ambassador. I managed to stave it off for a while because I wanted to continue working in Spain. I had been sent there for a five-year tour, and was finding it enjoyable and fascinating and rewarding. I'd gotten the language under good enough control so I could go out and lecture without having to read a speech and so on, and do the various things in the language of the country.

But Sarge, when he was reappointed by President Nixon for an additional year or more in Paris, then got insistent. Of course, Paris had its attractiveness, shall we say. In any event, I had no choice but to move on.

Q: You might explain, Burnett, how you happened to know Shriver.

ANDERSON: When I was working for Murrow principally, but also later under Rowan and Marks, I did an awful lot of inter-agency work, I was the number-two man on a couple of special groups. I was representative of the Agency on Bobby Kennedy's committee to work on young people. He had gotten that bug when he was on a foreign tour and had been, in effect, assaulted by a mob of youngsters in some Far Eastern country, and decided we should be doing more with young people. I sat on that group. I backed up Murrow and/or Wilson in the special group CI, special group for counterinsurgency, and several other inter-agency things, where occasionally Shriver was also involved.

Q: Shriver at that time was Director of the Peace Corps.

ANDERSON: He was Director of the Peace Corps. Also, I had had to see him occasionally about things that we wanted to do vis à vis the Peace Corps in terms of publishing something or whatever, which he generally fought against, because he didn't want us --

Q: I think this deserves development briefly, at least. He was trying to preserve the purity of the Peace Corps, is that correct?

ANDERSON: Absolutely. It was an operation of good will and assistance, and he didn't want it in any way to be tainted by association not only with USIA or the CIA, but even trying to keep it removed from the embassies in the country where it was operative. I think the policy was sound, and I think the policy has succeeded.

But in any event, he did insist then that I come to Paris, and I acquiesced and made the move in the summer of 1969, succeeding Lee Brady, who was an old and accomplished French hand. Shriver was fun to work with, very vigorous. I don't think this was generally understood. He was, in his way, flamboyant. He was creative. I used to say, when I had to deal with him, I said, "When you're talking to Sarge, don't ever give him an idea or a proposition until you're solid with it and satisfied with it, because if you suggest something exciting, he'll be halfway across the Place de la Concorde with it before you finish the sentence." A great guy to work with. In that regard, you had to know how to work with him.

One thing he said -- and curiously enough, he meant it -- was, "You know, I am an idea man and I generate a lot of ideas, and I like to think that at least some are good." But he said, "That may be only two in a hundred. You guys have got to tell me the ones that aren't any damn good so that we won't be doing a lot of crazy things." And I had occasion from time to time -- it was really great -- to go over and see him or call him up about something, some piece of paper he had sent over which said, "Let's do this," or, "Let's do that," or sent some guy to see me who had some brilliant idea, and I'd have to go in and tell him, "Sarge, a lousy goddamn idea."

And he'd say, "Then we won't do it, will we?"

I'd say, "No."

He'd say, "That's what you're here for." So he did, in fact, really mean that.

He had a conception of the position that I thought was absolutely sound. [Charles] De Gaulle, you know, was president, and we were suffering so-called anti-Americanism to a considerable degree. There was an awful lot of terribly critical and inaccurate stuff on the TV that nobody had been able to do anything about and so on and so on. But he knew and understood that there is a basic -- what should I say? -- friendship or pro-American disposition at heart in the population as a whole. He was out to carry the message to De Gaulle through the people, and I think he did it very successfully. Indeed, by the time I came along, after I got into it, we were able to make some real strides with the TV of France, and gradually changed that terribly critical and distorted orientation, which is another long story that I won't try to go into here.

But I considered him an extremely effective ambassador and I became very fond of both him and Eunice. Beneath all the glitter and the play for the public and so on, warm, decent, generous, concerned human beings, both of them. I think when Sarge, from his pinnacle of power and prominence talks about the people who are less fortunate, he's not kidding. He really means it.

Q: So you had a total of eight years in France?

ANDERSON: Yes. I thought I'd just go up there and last as long as Shriver, then move on. I never prepared to work in France. Spain was my first romance language. I had German and the Scandinavian tongues, and thought I was more or less naturally cut out for work in that area. But fortunately, I had the wit to settle right in and learn French, because then along came the famous Dick Watson, the younger scion of the IBM hierarchy, and his mottled career, but he wanted me to stay on. Then came Jack Irwin, his brother-in-law, who was as much of a gentleman as his predecessor was not, just a wonderful human being. Then Ken Rush, who had been Deputy Secretary of Defense, got the nod. We regretted that, because Jack had been, we thought, a marvelous, marvelous ambassador, but Ken turned out to be a very solid, very able representative, as well. He left in 1977 after the election, and shortly after that, I was assigned over to London for my last tour with the Agency.

JAMES D. ROSENTHAL
Paris (1970-1972)

Ambassador James Rosenthal was born in San Francisco in 1932. He graduated from Stanford University in 1953. After serving in the Marine Corps, he joined the Foreign Service in 1956. Ambassador Rosenthal's career has included positions in Trinidad, Vietnam, France, Central African Republic, Malaysia, the Philippines and an Ambassadorship to Guinea. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1996.

Q: You ended up at the Paris peace talks from when in the 1970s to when?

ROSENTHAL: From mid-1970 to mid-1972.

Q: What was happening during this period? What was your role?

ROSENTHAL: The role of the formal delegation was basically to conduct the public side of the negotiations. There were these weekly meetings in the Majestic Hotel. No negotiations went on in those meetings. We met every week; all four sides spoke. The transcripts were released to the press later and all would have a press conference later. Although the press wasn't in on the meeting, the whole thing was open. And so this was the public side of it, the propaganda side of it, and, in effect, the facade of it. Because the real negotiations went on secretly behind the backs of everybody, including me. I didn't know until much later that they were going on, with Kissinger and a few key people. I'm sure the head of the delegation knew what was going on. But those of us in the delegation were totally surprised when Kissinger made public his negotiations with the North Vietnamese. Totally. We had no idea.

Q: When did that word come out?

ROSENTHAL: It must have been in 1972.

Q: What did you do with this exercise in propaganda?

ROSENTHAL: You would prepare statements, you would prepare rebuttals, you would prepare additional statements. You might have a theme, like the POW issue on mail, for example. So we would all meet and decide what we were going to talk about that next meeting, and then we would coordinate with the South Vietnamese, and they would do part of it as well. Then we would try to figure out what the other side was going to say. In the meantime, you would answer a lot of questions from the press, official and unofficial visitors.

Q: What would you do with them?

ROSENTHAL: Like George McGovern, who would come and meet the other side. I remember that one particularly, because he was running for president at the time. He came out and met the other side, without us, of course. I was assigned to find out what went on. When they came back his guy told me nothing went on -- nothing new. That was a Saturday night. I remember it very well. Sunday morning, he had a breakfast with the press, and stated the North Vietnamese had told him something new, something very important and promising and it was a big story. Well, it's true that what McGovern described would have been a big concession on the part of the North Vietnamese. So the next Thursday -- the meetings were on Thursdays -- we asked them about this. "You reportedly said to George McGovern so and so, and so and so...is that true?" And they said, "No, absolutely not." It was really an interesting case study of somebody trying to pull something off privately for political gain, when it wasn't true. Or maybe it was just a misinterpretation. The least they could have done was say, "Hey, they told us this." We could have saved them an embarrassment, by saying no, we don't believe that's what they said. Or, they couldn't have said that, or if they did, it would be a major concession, and so on. But the McGovern group just stonewalled us, and went public with it. There were a lot of groups like that. There were POW families who came. There were all kinds of Senators and Congressmen -- peace groups of all kinds.

Q: Did you feel that a lot of these groups were basically trying to undercut you?

ROSENTHAL: I think some of them were. Most of them no -- most of them were pretty good. Almost every one that did visit the other side's delegation would come back because they would want to know, "What does this mean?" And we wanted to know what went on, too. In no case, that I can recall, while I was there, anyway, did any of the groups ever come back with anything of real importance in terms of a negotiating breakthrough. They didn't know, and I didn't know that there were secret talks going on. So, clearly, the Vietnamese would play these groups. They would try to lead them down the garden path a little bit, to put more pressure on us. But as far as I can tell, there was never any private diplomacy conducted through any of those groups. It was just propaganda. Many of them were being used by Hanoi.

Q: From what you are saying, it sounds like a pretty static situation. And to do it for two years -- this must have been a little bit wearying on the soul.

ROSENTHAL: Very. In fact, it was so wearying, I willingly went to the Central African Republic as DCM. Seriously, I was just goddamned tired of Vietnam. I'd spent a lot of time on Vietnam anyway, and I wasn't in on the secret talks, which were not secret by that time. So I figured, what the hell.

Q: Did you sort of have the feeling, as almost writing off Vietnam as a career place by this time?

ROSENTHAL: No, I didn't have that feeling. I just was tired of having spent a lot of time on it. Also, from a career standpoint, being DCM was my next move. So I went off to Bangui for two years.

Q: Why don't we stop at this point. I hope we can work this out. Let me stop here.

MICHAEL E. C. ELY
Paris (1970-1972)

Michael E. C. Ely was born in Washington, DC on August 26, 1929. He received a bachelor's degree in international affairs from Princeton University in 1952 and a master's degree in public affairs from Harvard University. Following his studies at Princeton, Mr. Ely served in the U.S. military for nearly two years. He entered the Foreign Service in 1955. His career included positions in Kuala Lumpur, Algiers, Mogadishu, Rome, Tokyo and Brussels. Mr. Ely was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1992.

Q: You left Paris in 1962 and took an economic training course, then you served in Paris from '70 to '72.

ELY: That's right. And at that time, my old boss, the Treasury attaché, was the number- two man in the Economic Section. But that was changed by Dick Watson, the ambassador, and, to my embarrassment, I was made the number two, over my old boss.

Q: Must have been uncomfortable. Did this represent anything from the Washington side as far as Treasury being unhappy with this? Or the Nixon administration?

ELY: No, this was an arrangement that had always existed in the embassy from the early days of the Marshall Plan. The Treasury people -- Tomlinson and his deputy, McGrew -- who stayed on were very capable, energetic, hard-working people who were very active and broad gauged. They handled trade questions as well as financial questions. In the Paris embassy, you had this tradition of very close integration of Treasury and State.

In my first job, I worked in the Treasury Section. Actually, there were two officers, sometimes, in the Treasury Section. My predecessor was Art Hartman, and his predecessor was Dick Vine, so there had been a lot of good State people working with Treasury there.

But this relationship was beginning to deteriorate by the time I got back there in '70. Dick Watson was a difficult and sick man. He didn't like the Treasury attaché, didn't trust him, thought he was gay because he wasn't married, and eventually just decided this is the way it's going to be.

Q: Watson came from the IBM family.

ELY: He was the younger brother of Tom, Jr.

Q: Well, he had his problems, too, didn't he.

ELY: Yes, he certainly did. He was the one that had too much to drink on a transatlantic flight and got into a shouting match with a stewardess, which was publicized.

He also did strange things around the embassy. He's the one that ordered the Marine guard to take down and destroy the Christmas tree.

Q: Shoot it or something?

ELY: He said, "Chop it up in pieces."

Q: What was the problem with that?

ELY: He was drunk and he thought it didn't look right. The admin. counselor had to send him a memorandum the next day saying that he had personally approved that Christmas tree. And he came back, "Okay, I owe you one."

He wasn't a bad man, but he was unstable, he had a drinking problem and he was arbitrary. At IBM, he played tricks on the senior management. He would organize groups of junior officers to do oversight of section chiefs. The section chiefs didn't like that very much. And he also ran people through a goals-and-objectives exercise that you could never quite get done, it was never quite right, it was always being sent back for a little more work. He kept people very much on edge. He would fine people for being late to staff meetings. You had to speak at staff meetings, but you had to know just how much. If you spoke too much, you got cut off, and if you didn't speak enough, the conclusion was that you didn't have anything to say because you weren't doing anything.

There were these minor harassment measures that were continually taking place, and people were rather unhappy.

Anyhow, I was direct-transferred from there, marriage still deteriorating, to Rome, where I ran the Economic Section.

Q: You served there from '72 to '72. In France, this was after de Gaulle by this time, wasn't it?

ELY: That's right.

Q: Did you see a difference in your dealings with the French government after the departure of de Gaulle?

ELY: Some attenuation. These were the Pompidou days. Pompidou was a Gaullist and he was very careful not to change any of the Gaullist policies of being outside of the military alliance, seeing France as an arbiter between the Soviet Union and the United States, being critical of the United States' Vietnam policy, generally critical of American social policies, economic policies, but with no animus to it, nothing ad hominem.

So the sting had gone down, but there was still a lot of official anti-Americanism around the circuit. And it bothered people in the embassy quite a bit. Indeed, the official anti-Americanism was stronger in '70 than it had been in '60, when I got there, because it had been around longer, it was deeper rooted, and people were getting ahead by being critical and unpleasant. In '70-72, nobody would speak English -- nobody -- and a lot of the French spoke it pretty well. Now, they'll speak English to practice if they can. Very little linguistic chauvinism is left in France.

It all started to change about '68, when French society was rocked to its foundations by a general uprising against the structure.

Q: This was June of '68.

ELY: There were the students, workers, everybody. And the housewives... on their balconies, beating tin cans with spoons.

It led to a widespread reform of the very coercive educational system, which has never been as good since. It led to administrative reforms. I guess the school system is the main thing. It used to be that only about 20 percent of the people in the 18-year-old cohort got a baccalaureate. Now, they're up to 55 or 60 percent, and the standards have come down quite a bit. But the intense elitism and exclusivity of the French system began to be reformed at that point.

Similarly, there was civil service reform. The liberalization of the university system was offset by the strengthening of the "Grandes Ecoles."

Q: The selective schools, the equivalent to bureaucratic war colleges, in a way?

ELY: Well, no, what they call the Commerce, Arts Métier, École Normale, ..., and several others. Because the universities are no longer selective and they can't fail anybody, the value of a university diploma has plummeted, while the value of a diplôme from a Grande Ecole went up. And that has caused further problems for French society, which it is now trying to sort out. It is the meritocracy that runs the country, even more now than ever before. It not only runs the administration, but it also tends to run a lot of the businesses, private as well as nationalized.

Anyhow, I had a nice, interesting two years. I was heading the General Economic Section. We handled trade, transportation and technology questions, and U.S. sales of computers to the French Atomic Energy Agency, and things of that nature. We also handled energy and energy reporting. The French were running a very Gaullist policy vis-à-vis the Arabs, as if they saw the 1973 oil crisis coming. But by and large, I enjoyed it. It was strenuous.

CARL C. CUNDIFF
Economic Officer, OECD
Paris (1970-1973)

Ambassador Carl Cundiff graduated from the University of the South and received his Ph. D. from the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy at Tufts University. Since joining the Foreign Service in 1966, his career has included positions in Vietnam, France, Ivory Coast and an Ambassadorship to Nigeria. Ambassador Cundiff was interviewed by Raymond Ewing in 1996.

CUNDIFF: No. I arrived in Paris...I think it was late January or early February of 1970 after having Christmas at home.

Q: Your assignment to Paris was what?

CUNDIFF: That was with the U.S. Mission to the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, the OECD, which is an international economic organization of the industrial countries headquartered in Paris.

Q: Which started out in the Marshall Plan period. I've been reading the book by Richard Bissell, I think, and how he helped put together the European Payments Union and they were certainly involved in the early period in European integration. And many of the habits of European cooperation in receiving and disbursing and coordinating Marshall Plan assistance. Much later, by the time you got there, that was all in the past. But what sort of work were you doing in the Mission to the OECD?

CUNDIFF: I had essentially two types of assignments actually. One, for the economic counselor who was a State Department person. I attended a committee which reviewed the economy of each of the OECD member countries on a periodic basis and made economic policy recommendations. That was a fairly time demanding responsibility because there were a number of countries in the OECD and their economies are being reviewed all the time.

I also back-stopped the visits to the OECD by senior economists from Washington, mainly the chairman and the other members of the Council of Economic Advisors.

Q: You say you had two bosses. Under the economic counselor, you did the economic policy review.

CUNDIFF: Largely macroeconomic policy review of the OECD countries.

Q: Who was your other boss?

CUNDIFF: My other boss was one of the treasury representatives in the U.S. Mission in the OECD. Under that person I sat on what is called the "Invisibles Committee," which is a committee which is involved in monitoring the process of liberalization of foreign exchange practices among the industrial countries.

Q: By this time, the early 1970s, the work of that committee was presumably much less than it had been earlier when they were lots of controls and regulations.

CUNDIFF: That is correct. The work...there was probably less work to be done than there had been right after World War II when there were more comprehensive foreign exchange controls. But the fact is that even when I was in Paris in the early 1970s many of the members of the OECD still had restrictions on capital movements. And largely outward capital movements. And there were also restrictions in the services areas in regards to various services transactions such as: insurance, purchase and sale of real estate, film rights, intellectual property in general and this sort of thing.

Q: Was this true particularly in the less advanced OECD countries? Or were there some kinds of restrictions in just about every case?

CUNDIFF: There were some restrictions in just about every case. For example, in Canada, a very developed country there were restrictions concerning films and magazines-culturally related transactions. And in France there were restrictions concerning property in particular. And also a lot of property restrictions in a good many of the European countries.

Q: Let's come back to the other hat or other activities in the macroeconomic policy review and you say that this was almost continuous. Because at that time there was twenty odd OECD countries or even more.

CUNDIFF: I think about twenty-one.

Q: How much response did you feel there was in general to the recommendations or to the process of interaction that took place at the OECD. Did countries listen to advice or was it in some cases sort of preemptory in the sense that they knew they were going to be criticized or asked questions and therefore made adjustments or promised they would make adjustments?

CUNDIFF: I think it is a little bit of a combination of what you described. I think that countries were very seldom surprised by the analysis and recommendations from the OECD because generally speaking, the OECD staff would have already visited the countries - and spoken with the economists that they needed to see. And they would probably be making recommendations that would not come as a surprise to most professional economists. However, some of these recommendations obviously have political implications. And I think countries generally tend to be a little bit circumspect in regard to accepting advice coming from outside the country.

Q: One of your roles, I suppose, as a representative of the United States on the committee was not only to understand and participate in economic analysis - although a lot of that was probably done at least in the initial stages by the OECD secretariat or staff. But to kind of give a kind of political understanding and maybe interpretation that were being considered. And I assume you worked with other American embassies as well as agencies in Washington.

CUNDIFF: That is correct. We would share the Secretariat's work, its analysis and recommendations with Washington in advance of meetings. We would also share that in advance with our embassies in the countries concerned. And then we would take the reactions from the embassy and Washington and use that in our own intervention during the review of the Secretariat's work. Essentially you are correct. We would try to address the key policy concerns. Often this had to do with whether the country should be taking a more restricted fiscal policy or a more restrictive monetary policy or to the contrary and be a little more expansionist. And this...if you look at it in broad terms, the idea was to try to help countries orchestrate their growth and their economic progress in a way that would be beneficial to the whole global economy.

Q: Which part of the U.S. government in Washington did you particularly work with in this area? Was it the State Department, or Treasury?

CUNDIFF: Well, the three agencies. The State Department obviously, all the time. The office in the State Department was the European Bureau that was responsible for our relations with the OECD and with the European Economic Community. And then also close relations with the Council of Economic Advisors-the President's Council of Economic Advisors. And with the international monetary side of the Treasury Department. Also to some extent with the Federal Reserve Board in Washington, DC - the international side of that.

Q: You mentioned that you also worked with or for Treasury representatives at the U.S. Mission OECD in the "Invisible's Committee" area. Did Treasury have permanent people assigned to the Mission - or are these people that came from Washington?

CUNDIFF: The Treasury had, when I was there, two permanent and fairly senior and experienced Treasury officials.

Q: Who were, as you say, quite experienced and had other assignments in Europe?

CUNDIFF: That is correct.

Q: Carl, as you know, I came at least once...maybe more than once to Paris to the economic review when you were there. I look back on that as a very rich experience personally because it gave me a chance to interact with Italian government representatives. And I think I was also there in connection with when I was in Switzerland and to be able to hear and participate and get to know the issues and the people was really a very valuable experience. So I'm not sure I would want to do that work every week - or every day. But it certainly helped me in my responsibilities in the embassy in Rome. I thank you for whatever you did to make sure that people from the embassies could actually come and participate.

CUNDIFF: Well, that made it a richer experience for me as well. When embassies like yours in Rome were able to send an experienced officer to attend because even though people like myself had read the analysis by the Secretariat and had our instructions perhaps from Washington on individual countries, the fact remains that none of us could be as aware of what was going on say with the Italian economy as say someone like yourself who was in Rome.

Q: And Paris in the early 1970s was a good place to live and be?

CUNDIFF: Excellent place to live and be.

PATRICK F. MORRIS
Deputy Director, OECD/
Paris (1970-1973)

Mr. Morris was born and raised in Montana. Educated at Georgetown University, Mexico City College, and San Marcos College, Lima, Peru, Mr. Morris served in the US Army in Europe during World War II, where he was captured and imprisoned by the German Army. He joined the newly established Point IV program in 1950 and worked with that agency and its successors in various senior level capacities in Washington, D.C., in Paris and throughout Latin America. His final posting was in the Dominican Republic, where he served as Director of the US AID Mission. Mr. Morris was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2007.

Q: What was, you might say, the thrust of both the Jackson report and our desires to make the UNDP a more effective program?

MORRIS: I cannot, at this time, recall the details. We had conducted a thorough review of the Jackson report and supported most of its recommendations. So we were pushing to have it adopted by the UN hierarchy.

We were interested in improving the whole recruitment process and making sure that they improved their professionalism. Their programming was very amateurish. And Paul Hoffman, a wonderful guy, he was treated like a god up there and with reason. You know, here was a man who brought the Studebaker Corporation out of bankruptcy and turned it into a going organization and then went on to head the Marshall Plan in Europe. But Paul Hoffman was, by this time in his 80s, a venerable figure and a wonderful guy. He had, I cannot remember his name now, he had an assistant, an American, who had the second top job in the organization who was a professional in every sense of the word but they were just living within the realities of the UN system at that time and they, both Paul and whatever this fellow's name, both realized and they accepted the recommendations of the Jackson report in toto and were happy to have the United States pushing the other delegations to get it implemented. But as in any multi-national or even any organization that has multiple interests you get all kinds of different obstacles and people had already built up their little fiefdoms and they were resisting making any changes so that even if Paul Hoffman had wanted to he would not have been able to do it without a very strong support from member nations and of course that is what we were engaged in.

And I was on that job for, let me see, '69, yes, I guess all of '69 and then I was offered a job in Paris at- U.S. delegation to the OECD (Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development) as deputy director of the delegation to the DAC, which was the Development Assistance Committee of the OECD. We had at that time four people on that delegation. And that was of great interest to me for two reasons. All the time I have been in the field I had become intimately familiar with the operation problems and I think that I had a very good understanding of what made a program work and how you made it work and what you had to do to make it work and so forth. But I had never had an opportunity to step back from the trees and see the whole forest. What was going on at the DAC looked at the development assistances worldwide. The United States had established, after the Marshall Plan in Europe, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development and within that organization there was the Development Assistance Committee that coordinated or attempted to coordinate the activities of all the countries in the industrial world that were providing economic assistance to the developing world. And I thought that that would really complete my understanding of development, both from a micro point of view and from a macro point of view. And so I was quite interested and in fact, it just happened that that particular activity was part of my responsibility in Washington; my office within AID had a responsibility for coordinating all international program activities. I had spent nine-tenths of my time on UN because the DAC was almost problem-free and we had routine requirements to provide the delegation in Paris with information and expertise whenever they needed it in particular areas that were under consideration by the DAC. So I had continuing contact with the DAC all the time I was doing the UN work and our delegate to the DAC at that time was Stuart Van Dyke. And Stuart asked me if I wanted to come to Paris and since I had spent my whole career in Latin America this was an opportunity to go to Europe, to work in Europe and in a great city like Paris. And of course my wife was delighted when she heard that I had an opportunity to take a job in Paris. So we went to Paris in January of 1970.

Q: And you were there how long?

MORRIS: Two-and-a-half years.

Q: What was your impression of the organization there? Were you up against the fiefdoms and-?

MORRIS: Probably; probably. But the play there was interesting because it had to do with governments pushing their own themes and it was great fun because part of the DAC process was that each year the heads of the various development organizations of the various countries had to come to the DAC to defend their programs; to explain their programs and to defend their programs. And so it was great fun to pick holes in everybody else's programs. And of course, you know, our programs were criticized and most of the criticism was political criticism; it was not development criticism. My interests, of course, were in the mechanics of development but this devolved on that level, at least, although we had lots of other meetings where we did get into the essence of development and we were- I think that the organization itself, OECD and the DAC, are absolutely essential to continuing interchanges between countries and among countries on what they are doing, why they are doing it; it gives you insights that are really essential to make international assistance work.

Q: Did you pick up on, I mean, there were many other themes but the fascination of, particularly Scandinavian countries with Nyerere in Tanzania and all where he was really driving his country, it was my impression, into the ground using the Fabian socialist model but he was a great talker and you know, particularly Scandinavian countries fell in love with him, kind of.

MORRIS: Yes, yes. Well, you know the Scandinavians were in many ways above the battle, they are above the ideological battles and they really thought of their programs really as philanthropic efforts. But, you know, their own development models had evolved into socialist or semi-socialistic models which worked for them and so it made sense in their view to support similar efforts around the world. And, it is an interesting commentary, really, that Sweden at the turn of the last century, that is the beginning of the 20th century, was almost 100 percent rural and agricultural and during the progress of the 20th century became a leading industrial nation.

After I served in Paris I eventually went to the Dominican Republic and I cannot remember why but at some point I had the idea of comparing the Dominican Republic and Sweden, their advances, industrially. Probably one of the reasons was that they had comparable populations; very different in every other way but they had comparable populations and comparable land mass. Maybe Sweden is a little larger than the Dominican Republic but not too much larger. And the evolution of Sweden in the 20th century, alongside the evolution of the Dominican Republic, there is a difference of night and day. And of course I think in the minds of the Scandinavians they had accomplished great things following, you say a Fabian model. Yes, they are following a Fabian model and they saw no reason why this would not work in the rest of the world.

MORRIS: And the DAC. OECD has top notch staff but mostly provides statistical and economic development information reports; reports, reports. But all of this information is extremely valuable because it is all analytical, and it gives you insights.

You know the World Bank does some of this and you find a lot of World Bank reports being cited but I think that the OECD reports are just as valid and many times better reports on development problems than the World Bank reports are. In terms of U.S. development programs or any other country development programs, the DAC reviews did not really make much difference in terms of the direction that those programs took. The programs, each one of the country programs were pre-determined long before the DAC reviews took place and they continued on their way regardless of our reviews. I think they were useful in the sense that the people who ran the programs became aware of the professional judgments that were being made on their areas of weakness.

For example, we all played a game of how generous we were and the United States included- Well first of all, the funds for U.S. development assistance included our economic assistance to Israel, our economic assistance to Egypt, which took up almost 50 percent of the budget at that time. And those programs were politically determined.

Q: Well actually, we were not giving as much to Egypt at the time you were there because it was only in the mid, late- '70s that we-

MORRIS: Well yes, you are right; you are right.

Q: But we were giving significant amounts to what is now an underdeveloped country.

MORRIS: Exactly. But we were counting it as development assistance. And of course by the same token the French included in their development programs a lot of their overseas territories that even had representatives in the French parliament.

Q: Yes, sure.

MORRIS: For example those Caribbean countries the French-

Q: Martinique.

MORRIS: Martinique, yes, and there are a couple of little islands off of Canada.

Q: Yes, yes, those two little islands.

MORRIS: Right. And they were part of the French development assistance programs and of course we would criticize them, that this was French, not overseas assistance, just territorial assistance.

Q: How about the Cold War? How did this intrude?

MORRIS: That is a good question. I think that for the most part we were all on the same page.

Q: Were the Soviets doing- Because the Soviets had quite a program in Africa.

MORRIS: Yes but they were not part of the OECD.

Q: Oh, that is right.

MORRIS: They were not part of the OECD. But you know, the thing is that we were in Vietnam and we had a large assistance program in Vietnam and obviously we included that and we got very, very strong criticism from everybody else for including Vietnam as a legitimate development assistance program. Privately I could agree that you cannot do very much legitimate development assistance in the middle of a war, just as we are seeing again in Iraq, where it is very difficult to justify any kind of traditional development assistance program when you have a war going on.

HENRY A. HOLMES
Political Counselor

Paris (1970-1974)

Ambassador Henry Holmes was born in Bucharest, Romania of U.S. diplomat parents. After graduating from Princeton University in 1954, he joined the Marine Corps. Since joining the Foreign Service in 1957, his career has included positions in Cameroon, Italy, France, and an Ambassadorship to Portugal. Ambassador Holmes was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

Q: I think he's one of the seminal figures in the administration of the State Department. You were in Paris from when to when?

HOLMES. From 1970 to 1974.

Q: Who was our ambassador when you arrived?

HOLMES: When I arrived the ambassador was leaving, and that was President Kennedy's brother-in-law, Sargent Shriver, who was just departing at that point. And the new ambassador, who was sent there by President Nixon, was Dick Watson, who was the younger brother of Tom Watson, both of them sons of the founder of IBM.

Q: How was Ambassador Watson? I mean what was your impression of him?

HOLMES: Well, Ambassador Watson - by the way he spoke very good French and played a significant role in putting IBM on the world map; I mean he was really in charge of its international operations - came to Paris with a singular mission. He'd had discussions with the President, and his mission, as he told us from the moment he got to Paris, was to close down the heroin labs in Marseilles, so that the pollution of American youth, particularly in New York, would cease. This was the much-ballyhooed "French connection." That was his mission, and he felt very strongly about it. This was what the President had spoken to him about, and all these other traditional Foreign Service diplomatic roles were not unimportant, but they were definitely of secondary importance, and this was his goal, to achieve this. And this unleashed quite a tidal wave of activity in the embassy, and he brought everybody into it. We had one DEA agent who was assigned to the embassy, and it was quite a big undertaking because he quickly discerned, after talking with the French Government, particularly the Ministry of the Interior, that there was really no interest in the French Government to do anything serious about this, that the feeling was this was an American problem and it was a demand problem, not a supply problem, primarily. And they thought it was greatly exaggerated. Yes, there may be some criminal activity in Marseilles, but this was really an American problem. So Watson and a number of us had many long discussions about how to turn the French around, because unless we had their cooperation there was no way that we could make any progress. So the USIS representatives suggested at one point, "Why don't we talk to French television and see if they're interested in using some of the material that we have, some films about what happens to children when they shoot up, and drug addiction and so forth?" And so we tried that, and I was very skeptical that we would get a hearing with French television, and they said, no, they weren't interested because having viewed the films, they said, "This won't have any impact on French audiences because this is very clearly an American setting and these are American kids, and it's obvious." But one man in the French television said, "If you will show us the places in France where this sort of activity is taking place, we'll make our own film and show it." Well, again, we were very skeptical, but the DEA guy took a small French crew around to parts of Paris and Lille and Marseilles and several large cities in France, and sure enough, they actually produced a film and showed it on French television. And this caused a firestorm of response from the French electorate, and all of a sudden the French Government got interested in cooperating with us. And there were all sorts of discussion that took place, and eventually an agreement was signed between the minister of the interior or the minister of Justice and our attorney general that we would work with them in trying to close down the heroin labs, which were mostly the Corsican mafia. The morphine base was coming into Marseilles from Pakistan and Turkey, largely, and there was transformed into heroin, and from there it went through a variety of channels to the United States.

Well, we then had started a period of cooperation, and nothing came of it, largely because the police that were assigned to work with us in Marseilles were on the take, and they were frequently Corsican cousins of those who were actually in the trade. So then the French Government decided that they would send a non-Corsican very highly regarded police officer from Paris who had devised a way of producing... There had been a lot of bank robberies, and this man had devised a way of prediction where the next bank robbery would take place and was very successful, and so they thought that he might be able to use this methodology in Marseilles. So he went to Marseilles, and again, there was no reaction, primarily because he was frozen out by the local cops.

So one day, sitting in a staff meeting... We had a wonderful science attaché, who was a distinguished professor, and older man with white hair, who spoke up, "You know, it takes a lot of water to turn morphine base into heroin. Has anybody ever thought of checking the utility bills of the various villas in and around Marseilles?" So this very sensible idea actually broke the case. I mean it was incredible. The French police got onto that, and sure enough, within weeks they had busted dozens of these laboratories that were in villas scattered around the Marseilles area. This was a huge success, and it basically started us on the road to breaking the French connection.

Q: That's wonderful. Who was the head of the Political Section when you were there?

HOLMES: Bob Anderson was the head of the Political Section, Robert Anderson, who had been my boss in the Office of West European Affairs in the State Department.

Q: If I recall, I've talked to people who've served in France, and I think they point to Bob Anderson's political section as being one of the premier ones at any time of people, including yourself, who were there. Did you have that feeling, that you were with a particularly elite group?

HOLMES: Well, Bob spent a lot of time recruiting good officers for that section, and those that handled all the international portfolios, and we had an officer that dealt with west European questions, another one that dealt with NATO questions, another officer that dealt with Asian-Pacific questions, another one on Africa and the Middle East, a labor attaché. It was a very large section, very energetic people that he inspired, that he pushed very hard to get out and do their jobs. And it was fun. I mean people were excited about the work that they were doing there, and Bob knew France. He had served there several times and spoke good French and his wife was fluent in French and they had a lot of French friends and entertained a lot. They knew a lot of senior political leaders, and he encouraged me to get out and find out what was going on, and of course the Socialists were in opposition.

We were not allowed to talk to the Communists, as was the case in most European countries, but the Socialists were a kind of a radical group, so I was trying to meet people in the Socialist Party, and I met the future minister of defense of France, a guy named Charles Hernu. I used to go over to the Socialist Party headquarters and talk with him and took him to lunch a couple of times. And I discovered at a certain juncture that he was also a contact of one of my Agency counterparts at the embassy, which could have been very embarrassing, but the two of us worked it out and made it very clear to Hernu that we were friends. I think probably Hernu understood what was going on, but he never revealed it.

But I still had a hard time getting my arms around the French socialist movement. I had a lucky break. I knew a lot of French journalists, and one man in particular who wrote for a left-wing magazine called Nouvelle Observateur called me up one day and invited me and my wife to an informal lunch at his little cottage in the country. And he said, "We will be a small group, next Sunday, and you probably won't know one of the people there, a sort of forgotten figure from the Fourth Republic named François Mitterrand." And I said, "Oh, I know who he is. I spent a year at the Sciences-Politiques, and certainly I'd be delighted." So we went for this lunch, and Mitterrand was accompanied by one of his young admirers, an attractive young woman, and we had a lot of interesting discussions at the table, and I asked him a lot of questions about his politics and his views. And he was showing off a little bit in front of his... the young woman who was with him. We spent probably three or four hours at table, and later we had a long walk afterwards. Mitterrand basically laid out his Mein Kampf, his plan for coming to power in France. It was quite extraordinary, because at the time he was a kind of forgotten figure from the Fourth Republic. He headed a small little splinter group called the Convention of Republican Institutions, and he was very specific. He said, "In a few weeks I'm going to call my party into a special congress. I'm going to ask their permission to join the greater socialist family, to reintegrate into the Socialist Party. They will give me that authority. I will then go next spring to a little town called Epinay, where the great socialist family will come together, the party. I will have about a hundred delegates of the thousand, and I will emerge as the first secretary of the Socialist Party with a program of cooperation with the Communist Party intact. And using that as a platform, we will increase our numbers in the National Assembly, and then after that I will run for president and I will become president of France." I mean he laid it all out - it was absolutely incredible - in detail. And I went home that night, and I wrote a little memo to myself, to the files, and I just tucked it away. When I left France several years later, about three years later, reassigned, he had achieved every step. And I went to Epinay, by the way. I went to that congress on the weekend and watched him operate. It was quite extraordinary. He did exactly what he said he was going to do, and he'd achieved every goal except that he hadn't become president of France because the first time he failed, in his first run for the presidency of France. Quite an extraordinary figure and great fun for me, I must say.

Q: As soon as you say the word Communist, I would have thought that would set off all sorts of warning bells and "Don't touch this man" and all that.

HOLMES: Oh, it did, it did, it absolutely did. And it was a great concern in Washington, and they were very suspicious of Mitterrand. They did not believe what he was saying, that the only way to control the Communists in France was to bring them into the government. They thought that he would be taken over by them and that basically Moscow would tell him what to do and so forth. And all this came into very sharp focus in about March of 1981. This was about 10 years later. President Reagan had been elected, and the first trip of a senior member of his Administration to Europe was taken by George Bush, who was the Vice President. This was about March. And he had two places to go. One was to go to Paris because they were really worried because the French under Mitterrand had put together a government that had Communist ministers in the government, and you can imagine this very conservative American Administration was worried about that. I was, at the time, the senior deputy assistant secretary for European affairs. My boss was Larry Eagleburger, and Larry had other things to do, and he asked me to go with the Vice President on the trip. So 10 years later this thing was all coming into focus, and I went on the trip with the Vice President. He invited me to sit with him up in the cabin on the way over, and we talked a lot about what was happening in France, and he asked me how he should handle this Communist problem. And I told him that it was important that he be very clear with Mitterrand about the concerns of the US Government but that we had to be careful not to intervene too openly in the process. We did have some private conversation with Mitterrand so that he would understand that we would be required to say some things publicly that might be not appreciated in France. He said, "Well, why do we need to do that?" and I said, "Well, because the Italians will be watching how we handle this because we'd just been through this period of the almost historic compromise between Catholic and Communist Italy, and the Italians will be very surprised if we go and say nothing." And he said, "Won't that be very insulting to the president of France to have lunch with him and then on the steps of the Elysée to say some disobliging things to the French press?" And I said, "Yes, so my advice to you is that at the end of the lunch you and Mitterrand go off and have coffee together in a separate room, and you tell him what you want to say so there are no surprises." And that's exactly what happened. And the fascinating thing is we went right from the airport to the Elysée, and we arrived as the first cabinet meeting with French Communist ministers in the government was leaving the Elysée, and we arrived and went in and had lunch with Mitterrand. There were about 10 of us around the table. And Mitterrand spent almost the entire meal describing his plan of how he was going to "suffocate" the Communists by bringing them into the government and forcing them to do things, to participate in French government policy that was basically anathema to Communist doctrine. And I watched the Vice President as he went through this explanation, and he was extremely skeptical. By dessert you could see that he was beginning to think that this man might be able to do something. He was beginning to listen. And so afterwards he and Mitterrand went into a side room, they had coffee together, and on the steps of the Elysée Bush said just enough of a note of displeasure about the United States's great ally France having Communists in the government. He didn't overdo it. It was very deftly done. It caused some predictable commentary in the French press, but the Italian press reported it big-time. But, of course, we all know what happened afterwards. I mean, Mitterrand succeeded in suffocating the Communists. He did exactly what he had planned.

Q: Allen, did you find that in dealing with the Socialists at this time, the ambassador and maybe even Anderson were saying "Don't get too friendly?" I mean, were we watching the Socialists? Did we really not like them within our orbit or anything of that nature at this point?

HOLMES: No, not really. Certainly not on the part of Bob Anderson, who was a professional. And at that point I was too junior that it didn't really make any difference from the point of view of any, quote, embarrassment to the US Government. In my view, this is exactly at the level of political discussion and enquiry that a political officer should do. And as it turned out, it was advantageous in getting some understanding of where the Socialist Party was moving.

Q: Well, as we watched with Mitterrand, you went to Epinay? Did we see the developments with Mitterrand moving into the presidency as a... How did we view that at that time?

HOLMES: I think people were concerned that in his attempt to create a working majority with the left - it was called the Union of the Left - that it would be Communist-dominated and that it would further loosen French ties to the Atlantic Alliance and that this would cause us problems. And of course at the time this was happening, we were beginning to creep out of Vietnam, if you will recall. Nixon, of course, was in office, and we were negotiating. The Paris Peace Talks were taking place, and there was still a tremendous amount of agitation on the left against American involvement in Vietnam. And I found myself defending our policy. I felt passionately that despite my own personal views on the wisdom of ever having made this stake in Southeast Asia, it was abhorrent to me that the American people treated the American servicemen who returned from Vietnam so badly. Here these kids had been drafted and gone and served their country and served their country well under enormous difficulties with enormous difficulties not only the war itself but the drug culture that was then prevalent in the armed forces, and I was absolutely outraged by the way our service people were treated by so many sectors of the American public opinion when they came home. And so I felt passionately about that. And that made it in many respects easy for me to defend American service in Vietnam. And I spent a lot of time talking to groups and arguing about it. As I say, the Paris Peace Talks were underway at the time, and we had at a certain point - and I can't remember what year it was; I was there from 1970 to 1974 - we had the opening of China at that time.

Q: Yes, it was '71, '72.

HOLMES: And I'll come to that in a minute, but just to finish up on the Vietnam piece - when a very well-known American general, Vernon Walters, Dick Walters, was our defense attaché there at the time, as a general officer - which was unusual. When he left, he was replaced by a brigadier general who had served in Vietnam. And at a certain point, Life Magazine came out with an edition where he was literally the centerfold, on bended knee, with a rifle in the crook of his arm, with the body of a Viet Cong at his feet, almost like a hunting trophy. This photograph was reproduced endlessly in the French press. This was our new defense attaché. This kind of stirred up a lot of activity for our USIS branch and the political officers.

At some point I should talk to you about the Chinese connection in Paris because that was a fascinating episode.

Q: Okay, but before we move to the Chinese connection, I would like to ask about dealing with the left. You had served before in Rome, and my experience in Italy was that our opposition to the opening to the left was profound. I mean it was like either you believed in the virgin birth or you didn't believe in the virgin birth. And yet the Italian Communist was in many ways much softer. You know, they were sort of Italian, and like everything Italian, it wasn't quite as dogmatic. But when you move over to the French Communist Party, it was - I can't remember-

HOLMES: Yes, it was Maurice Thorez who was one of the leaders of the French Communist Party, and they were very hard-edged. They were tough.

Q: They were both tough and they were very much considered the tool of the Kremlin, in a way.

HOLMES: Yes, they were very tough. They had been born, of course, in the crucible of the resistance in World War II and had fought the Germans and then later us for political influence. Yes, they were a very different breed, and difficult to deal with, and played hardball, and played hardball in the French unions as well.

Q: Did you find the same sort of theology within the embassy in Paris that you did in our embassy in Rome about opening to the left, or was it different?

HOLMES: I would say it was more sophisticated, and obviously the same prohibitions existed. We were not allowed to openly have contact with the Communist Party. Most of the contact with the Communist Party was done indirectly. I would occasionally meet Communists, but most of my reporting was through French journalists and French Socialists. I mean, that's where I got most of my information about what the Communist Party was up to. I did not have regular contacts with the Communist Party. I think one or two trusted members of the "other Political Section," the Agency's group, did have some very carefully controlled contacts with a handful of Communists.

Q: But obviously you were reading the Communist newspaper.

HOLMES: Oh, sure, L'Humanité. Yes, absolutely. And they were very, very hard-edged and working very hard to maintain the strength of their constituency in France.

Q: How did you feel at that time about the French media?

HOLMES: The French media were terrific. That was a tremendous advantage for me as a political officer in Paris. Of course, I knew a lot about French politics and France. I already spoke fluent French, so I had an ease of access that was very fortunate from my standpoint. And I cultivated half a dozen wonderful French journalists, sort of across the political spectrum. First of all, I learned a lot from them, but also I met people through these French journalists. And we were frequently working the same side of the street in terms of getting information and putting it together, making judgments on where-

Q: But did you find with the media that it was very much in reading it each newspaper you read came from a particular spectrum of the political thing, or were there ones which encompassed more?

HOLMES: Well, it depends what you were reading. The sort of stodgy but highly professional what I would call newspaper of record was Le Monde, and Le Monde did not have any particular political label on it. It was just the most professional foreign policy daily in France, and they prided themselves on not having pictures or any glossy photographs. It was just a very straight kind of reporting, and some very talented reporters for Le Monde. Humanité was obviously completely the official newspaper of the Communist Party. You had satiric newspaper, like Le Canard Enchaîné, the "Duck in Chains." It was a marvelous newspaper, and there were some interesting tidbits that came out.

One experience that I never had in the four years that I had as a Foreign Service officer that I did see when I was there as a student is that in times of crisis French newspapers are picked up by the police. There is a special statute that allows them to do that when a national emergency is declared, and I can remember after the 13th of May, 1958, when the colonels' Putsch had taken place in Algiers and when there was this very nervous period of about a week when there was this negotiation going on with De Gaulle, when the police were out in the street and the army was out, and every morning the police would go out and hit all the newsstands and pick up those newspapers which they felt were subversive, including - I remember being amused - Le Canard Enchaîné.

There was a guy named Servan-Schreiber.

Q: Oh, yes, Le défi américain, was it? The American Challenge.

HOLMES: Oh, yes, Le défi américain? He had a weekly magazine. They had their sort of Time and Newsweek, which were L'Express and Le Point. And he, as I recall, published Express. And I saw him occasionally. I knew several people at Le point. There was a wonderful newspaper pundit named Bernard Le Fort, who was very plugged in with the senior French leadership. I learned a lot from him. I had a range of people. Some of these papers tended to be a little bit more conservative or a little bit to the left, but other than party rags like Humanité, they weren't slavishly devoted to a certain credo. They weren't doctrinaire.

Q: The French media seem to be more out to impart information than, say, the British ones. In the British press you have to wade through sex and scandal to find out-

HOLMES: Well, there are a lot of tabloids in England, but there are some great newspapers. I mean the Financial Times to me is a wonderful newspaper.

Q: What about your impression during this time of the importance of dealing with the French intelligentsia?

HOLMES: Well, it was important. That sort of outreach was of critical importance, and I think that Sargent Shriver did a better job of that than Dick Watson did.

Q: I've heard people talk about Sargent Shriver and say, "You know, he's given a bad rap. He really had a very good feel for things."

HOLMES: That was my view as well. I think he did, but then again, I only had a few weeks overlap with him, so I really wasn't in a position to gauge.

Q: I always come away with the impression that there's sort of a built-in disdain for Americans in the intelligentsia. Was this your impression?

HOLMES: Oh, sure, that absolutely is true, yes.

Q: How did one deal with this?

HOLMES: I mean, you just talked with people, you explained your government's point of view, you exchanged ideas. I never had any problems with that. Actually, one of the most difficult sort of discussion evenings I can remember spending in France was not with a Frenchman; it was with Mary McCarthy.

Q: Oh yes, she was the Catholic authoress.

HOLMES: Yes, and she was rabidly anti-Vietnam and anti-US policy and was an embarrassment. I had a knock-down drag-out fight with her that went on for about four hours after a dinner with a great deal of alcohol being consumed, mostly on her side, where basically her thesis was that any American that served in Vietnam, even if he were drafted - and they were practically all drafted; there were some volunteers; the Marine Corps still had volunteers - was ipso facto by association with that a war criminal. I mean, that was her thesis, and that's the thesis that she expounded in France when she talked to French media. And it was one of the most unpleasant evenings I can remember, and I'm sure she went away feeling the same way about me.

But I never had any problems. There was a very enterprising labor attaché that we had in our embassy named John Condon, and John had a lot of contact with the French intelligentsia, and he entertained in a nontraditional and much more appealing way than most Foreign Service officers. He would invite people for breakfast or for supper in his kitchen, and people would kind of come and go. It was kind of an open house, and he became known for that, and so he had terrific contacts, and I tapped into some of that. That was a lot of fun. So we had people that were out there really talking to French intellectuals, French labor leaders and political leaders, writers.

Q: Did you find that there was a curiosity about the animal American on the part of the intelligentsia?

HOLMES: People were trying to understand what was happening in the United States because of the reaction to the war in Vietnam in the United States. This was something that was analyzed and discussed and reported on in great detail by the French press.

Q: How were Nixon and Kissinger treated?

HOLMES: Well, now, Nixon was treated... I can remember friends of mine who were left-of-center liberal political types and journalists more than once saying that we were committing regicide the way we were going after Nixon. They were appalled. They liked Nixon.

Q: Nixon and Kissinger were the most European of-HOLMES: Well, they understood. They felt that these were two American political leaders who understood Europe and understood France - and wanted to understand more about their country. They were flattered about the attention of people like Nixon and Kissinger. It was very interesting. They were appalled by Watergate, and they thought it was a huge exaggeration on our part.

Q: You mentioned the Chinese connection.

HOLMES: I failed to mention something. I started out my first year in Paris of a four year assignment as head of a small internal political unit. At a certain point about the end of that first year, the DCM came to me and said that the ambassador wanted me to be his special assistant. I just absolutely did not want to do that. I had been a special assistant and I thought that I had moved in my career beyond that. I was strongly opposed to it. I tried to get out of it, and I basically was told that I had no choice, that it was a done deal, but that I would be rewarded. I said, "What do you mean 'rewarded?'" and he said, "Well, after you do this for a while, when Anderson leaves, he wants to make you political counselor." And I said, "Well, that'll never happen. I'm not senior enough, and it's a big section, and Washington will never permit it." And I was really opposed to this, but anyway, I was just told to shut up and grit my teeth and do my job, and this was good for the Foreign Service. So I did that for about six to eight months, I guess. I was his special assistant, and we worked a lot on drugs, you know, bringing down the French connection in Marseilles. And then eventually, to my surprise, when Anderson was leaving, he did put my name forward to be the political counselor, and there was a reaction in Personnel in Washington. They didn't want me to do this. They said I was too junior and so forth. And Watson insisted, and so finally they agreed. So I became political counselor, which then opened up a whole different range of international responsibilities and activities operating out of the political section of that embassy. And the Chinese connection was the big one.

Q: Let's talk about that.

HOLMES: This was absolutely fascinating because what happened was that when Nixon came out of China, after the Shanghai communiqué was published, everyone knew that there would be a long period before we would be able to effect the opening of liaison offices (they weren't called embassies) in Beijing and in Washington. And so in the interim, Paris was established as the official point of contact between our two governments. The Chinese selected Paris. Why? Because, Huan Chen, the Chinese ambassador there, was the senior Chinese diplomat serving abroad at that point. He was a member of the Central Committee; he was a veteran of the Long March; he was a trusted colleague of Mao and Zhou En-Lai. It was a very big embassy, very disciplined, with a few special characters. Anyway, when this was announced, our ambassador, Watson, was called back to Washington to receive special instructions from the President and primarily from Kissinger, who was still the national security advisor at that point. And Al Haig was a colonel working on Kissinger's staff. And he got all these special instructions on how to handle the channel, and there would be no freebooting, that this was to be tightly administered, that he would receive instructions from the White House, not from the State Department, et cetera et cetera. Watson returned from that trip and called on Huan Chen and took me along. I was by that time political counselor, and he took me to see Huan Chen. Huan Chen had with him a man named Tsao, and after some initial pleasantries and some tea, Huan Chen told Watson, he said, "You and I will not meet very often, but for secondary matters I will appoint Mr. Tsao to handle the Chinese side." And so Watson said, "Well, for secondary matters, I appoint Mr. Holmes." So then that established a relationship that ended up - I must have gone to the Chinese embassy 40 times or so for many, many meetings on a variety of subjects. And by the way, we worked through a Chinese interpreter until I was able to get Washington to assign a Chinese language officer into our political section. And I spent a lot of time with Mr. Tsao, who was a very interesting individual. He was the hand-picked personal representative of Zhou En-Lai in that embassy. Zhou En-Lai, of course, had a big stake in the American relationship, and very frequently criticized inside the Chinese politburo.

Q: Oh, yes. This was the "Gang of Four" time. This was a very difficult time.

HOLMES: It was a high-risk venture for Zhou En-Lai. So Mr. Tsao was his personal rep. Tsao could be described as a blend of political counselor, station chief, and USIS officer. Those are sort of the press, the politics - that was his area. He was the only member of the Chinese embassy who seemed to be aloud to travel by himself, who wore a European suit. He always wore the same tie. I finally felt like buying him and bringing him a selection because I got tired of seeing the same necktie. But we had a file on this guy. He came from a Shanghai bourgeois family. There was an American college in Shanghai before World War II and he had spent a couple of years there, so I knew he understood English, and I knew he also spoke French, because he had served in Southeast Asia, in Cambodia. But until we got to know each other, he always insisted on working through Mr. Lin, his interpreter. And we both had very tight instructions. My instructions were actually written by Haig and sent, not through the Department but through special White House channels, and I was told always to go back through that channel and not to discuss anything but what I was told to discuss. It was very, very controlled.

But the interesting thing was that whenever I went to see Tsao we wouldn't get down to business. There was always tea and a period of munching on dried lichee nuts and candied apples. And so it was during that period, which was kind of informal, that Tsao, after a certain time, was absolutely badgering me with questions about what was happening to Nixon - obviously, Zhou En-Lai was very concerned - and whether Nixon would survive or not, and if he didn't, as it became apparent more and more that he might not, did that mean that we would all be fired, the entire administration, people like me? Would the embassy be fired? Would there be a wholesale roundup of all the accomplices of Richard Nixon? So, you know, even though I didn't have my little instructions from Al Haig, I spent a lot of time giving him basically Political Science 101 on the American government and our system and how it operated.

Q: I would think it would be very difficult, really, to give good comment on the Watergate system because most of us abroad - I was consul general in Athens during this time - I mean, we were at some remove. We weren't feeling how the heat was-

HOLMES: And so was I, and I was very careful not to speculate on what might happen to Nixon, but there were always a series of hypothetical outcomes. What I could explain to him were the impeachment process, how it worked, if it were to happen what would ensue, and our presidential succession system - the Vice President - the administration, how people were appointed. I gave him a lot of sort of fundamental information about our Constitution and the workings of our government, which I think was probably enormously relieving. I never speculated on, if such a thing were to happen to Nixon, what would this do to our policy to China. I never speculated on that. I never speculated explicitly, but there were plenty of opportunities for him to draw inferences from what I was saying, that although, yes, the opening to China had been done by the President on his visit to Beijing and, of course, Kissinger's role in this, but that this had become a part of American foreign policy. I didn't say that if Nixon goes and another man comes in the policy will remain intact, as sort of frozen in time, but the implication was that there was a commitment here to an opening to China that was broader than just the President operating out of the National Security Council. Anyway, it was a very, very interesting period. And of course I did report all of that, what this guy was saying to me. It was important that Washington understand that.

We had a couple of amusing incidents. When Nixon went to China, the Chinese gave two panda bears, which ended up in the Washington Zoo, and we gave a couple of musk oxen. And the musk oxen, at a certain point, got sick and had this terrible scrofula. And so here was this very secret channel of communications, and I was sending back a message encrypted about going to the Washington Zoo and finding out how they could treat the musk oxen. You know, this is really high policy. And then other things would happen, like one time we bombed Hanoi harbor and hit a Chinese ammunition ship. And Mr. Tsao made a visit to the embassy with a very grave face - there was a certain amount of theater involved because basically they wanted to get on with business; he had to carry out this démarche - and I told him solemnly the point of view of my government, and he said, "Okay, can we have some coffee?" And it was over. It was business as usual.

At a certain point I invited him. We'd had no contact with the Chinese. After I'd had quite a few meetings with him, I invited him to dinner at my house. I guess the occasion was that his wife had arrived. She'd not been at post. So I invited him and his assistant, Mr. Tsai, and his wife, who was the acupuncturist at the embassy, and Mr. Lin, the interpreter. They all came to dinner. And of course at this point we were bombing Hanoi, and we'd hit this ship. By that time we had a Chinese language officer, so that helped, and my wife was very concerned that they were going to stage a walkout. Oh, and her parents were there. That was what was interesting. Her parents were retired in Nice and had come up. He was a retired AID officer, and her mother was French, and so everyone was very fluent in French. And at a certain point in this dinner, Tsao discovered that he had served in Phnom Penh shortly after my father-in-law had, and at a time when our relationship was very bad, and a road that my father-in-law had started as an AID project Mr. Tsao had continued as a Chinese project. And this was an amazing coming together. They got along together like a house on fire, so much so that at a certain point toward the end of the dinner, Tsao got up and - he had been talking in French by this time, got beyond that point - but at a certain point he stood up and had something to say, and he said it in Chinese. And so I waited nervously for the interpretation to be something about bombing, but no, he wanted to insist - he knew that my parents-in-law were going back to Nice in a couple of days, but he absolutely wanted to have them for dinner, and this was very important to him that he had discovered this wonderful person, and he just had to do this. So I inferred from all of this that the respect for elders was not something that had got completely washed out of the Communist experiment in China. We had a wonderful dinner afterwards. We went to a Chinese restaurant in Paris, and of course there were hundreds of them. This one was clearly in the hands of the Chinese Communists because when you walk in, nothing about ancient China but here was a tapestry of a dam being built, obviously in the '50s. And we had a wonderful, wonderful evening, and the ice was broken. We had developed a relationship with him that went a little bit beyond the more formal part of our dealings with each other.

Q: It's interesting, too, that you're talking about this almost unwillingness on the part of Henry Kissinger and Nixon to let go. I mean, this was their baby, and they didn't want the State Department... You know, they had to use you, but you were their tool and no one else's.

HOLMES: Yes, I think it was a question of control. It was their baby. They wanted to have absolute control of this channel. They didn't want a lot of... They didn't want it to become diffuse and become just another one of the issues handled by the Bureau of East Asian Affairs.

Q: Well, tell me, the whole time you were in the Political Section but particularly when you were a political counselor, one of the things about the French - what is and will be - has been that no matter what it is, the French take a different tack than the United States. It drives Americans up the wall. I mean, I had one man whom I interviewed who was in Belgium, Phil Merrill, who was saying-

HOLMES: Oh, I know Phil Merrill.

Q: -his children thought there was a breed of people called "Those goddam French" out there because every time he'd come home he'd talk about "those God-damned French." You must have been sort of on the point of contact where the French were always taking a stand different from the United States.

HOLMES: Well, not always. I think that this attitude toward the French is greatly exaggerated, and it's almost in inverse proportion to the truth of it. The less the diplomat who talks about the "God-damned French" knows about France and French policy, the more he's likely to say this sort of thing, because it's true, the French always have a point of view, very clearly articulated, you have to listen very carefully. And I discovered early on when I would go to the Quai d'Orsay to carry out démarches on a variety of subjects that it was very important to know... If there were twelve points to know about the subject, you might feel pretty good about knowing eleven of them, but if you didn't know all twelve, with absolute certainty the Frenchman would know the twelfth. And so you had to be intellectually equipped, and in terms of information, you had to have full information about the subject in order to be able to have a conversation. And once you got beyond that initial barrier, you could work things out with the French. I got to the point with the director of North American affairs, who was a senior French diplomat who'd been ambassador. His name was Saint-Léger - I remember him. I proposed that we meet once a week, and we did. We would meet every week. And on one occasion, after we got to know each other, he said, "Let's take a walk" - because it was a delicate subject we were discussing, one where French interests were seen as diametrically different from ours. We went out, and we walked in the park. And when we got out in the park he explained to me. He said, "I asked you to come out and walk with me in the park because I've discovered that my offices are bugged and that the Gaullists are so catatonic about what I might say about what I might say to an American colleague, or anybody who comes to my office, that they're listening to my conversations with fellow diplomats. So from now on, I think we should walk in the park so that we can have a real conversation and I'm not nervous." I thought this was absolutely extraordinary, but the point is: the French bring a lot. Yes, they can be difficult as hell, but they also bring a certain intellectual rigor to a conversation, and there's a certain logic. Sometimes they call it Cartesian logic; sometimes it's not. But if you listen very carefully, if you take the trouble to understand their point of view as well as understanding your own government's views and objectives, you can make progress on subjects. I never had a big problem with this. And then there are certain things that are just insoluble - you know, this is our view, and that's your view, and I'll report it that way to Washington, and we'll see if at the next senior meeting maybe we can make some progress on that. But I never had trouble with this aspect of dealing with the French.

Q: How did we feel at this time about the French and the rest of the world and the United States and the rest of the world? Were we in basic agreement? Let's take the Middle East.

HOLMES: Look, the French never really accepted the dissolution of the French empire at the end of World War II because they always felt that they were a major power and that even though they no longer had Indochina and Algeria and other parts of the world, that because of their... The French always had a cultural policy. They had a responsibility to defend the French language, French cultural institutions, and that this gave them a certain entrée around the world, and they used it. They were basically working very hard to maintain influence. They were absolutely unwilling to accept a sort of second-class status, and one of the reasons for this was they were always afraid of Germany, and they were working very hard to develop this comity with the German nation and the twinning of the cities and kids, students, going back and forth and spending time in each other's lycées and gymnasiums and university exchanges, but at the same time they were working very hard to become an economic power and not have to always be the caboose of the European monetary system with the central bank of Germany being the engine. And one way to counteract that financial and economic prowess of Germany was for them to be able to maintain a certain status as a power in the world. And they were absolutely determined to do it. So this did lead to some conflict. They exaggerated, for example, and they continue to exaggerate to this day, I think, their influence in the Middle East. They had a kind of traditional role in Lebanon and Syria. There was a certain French influence going back to the early part of the century, French lycées. Even today in Lebanon there are Lebanese Maronites whose Christian names are French. And we always felt that we were the one country that could talk to both sides, to both Israel and the Arab countries, and we were not very inviting, to say the least, to French attempts to exert influence in the Middle East. And yet today there is a commission that takes place to tamp down the violence that takes place between southern Lebanon and northern Israel and the intervening security zone, the Katusha attacks. There is a group that's French, American, Israeli, and I believe Lebanese that meets every two or three weeks. So they have been able to salvage some sort of position, so I think that that desire on the part of the French Government - and it's bipartisan, across the board, something that they want to do - that still exists today; and it is the reason why sometimes we have difficulty.

Q: Did you find that Africa-

HOLMES: Africa was a special place for them.

Q: I was going to say that I've often had the feeling that-

HOLMES: After the Fifth Republic was set up and the institutions of the Fifth Republic and this hybrid system - you had a president who had executive responsibility and a prime minister - the French presidency, as started by De Gaulle and maintained by subsequent presidents of France, had what they call a domaine réservé, their special office that dealt with Africa. So there was an office in the Elysée where African leaders - prime ministers and presidents - could turn and have direct access to the president of France. And they took this very seriously, always have. And my own point of view is that we have not worked with that in a creative way. We had tended to feel that we're in competition somehow with the French in Africa. Different administrations, different secretaries, different assistant secretaries for African affairs have used this relationship in varying ways.

I'll give you an example of a current problem, and that's peacekeeping and the turmoil that's taking place in Africa today. The French have had, up until recently, when they've begun to cut back as well, they've had much more of an establishment - French economic aid, French military - throughout the French-speaking part of Africa, basically a zone of influence, something that is good for all of us. It's good for the west; it's good for our relationship. We haven't used this sufficiently; we haven't recognized it. And we kind of turn to the French at the last minute and say, oh, yes, would you mind joining us, rather than treating them as full-fledged partners from the beginning. And an example of this was the African Crisis Response Initiative, where a couple of years ago the State Department, led by a guy named Marshall McCallie, started a project to train cadres or battalions of Africans to do peacekeeping. And one of the early success stories was the Senegalese battalion. Well, eventually, the French joined us in this, but we bumbled our way along and tried to do it unilaterally, and then we brought the British in, and finally, the French were opposing us because they weren't being invited in. And we finally realized that we're missing something here. This is a typical example of us not listening to and understanding the realities on the ground. The French bring a lot to the table in Africa. They have a lot of influence; they put a lot in there. And so it's an example, I would say, of how to deal with the French intelligently...

Q: Back to this '70-74 period, you mention at the Quai d'Orsay that the Gaullists were sort of sitting there listening. Who were the Gaullists? Did we have the feeling at that time that there was a Gaullist cadre within the French Government with whom we were dealing that was essentially, this early, anti-American, or not?

HOLMES: Yes, I think that's safe to say, not all of them viscerally anti-American, but I would say viscerally pro-memory-of-De-Gaulle. I would put it more that way. Yes, there were cadres of people who were absolutely Gaullist, and people knew who they were, and other Frenchmen were wary of them because they felt that it was some sort of a priesthood that and it prevented them from letting French policy evolve, seeking opportunities to do things in different ways that were in the French national interest and so forth and so forth. So yes, they were there.

Q: Did we sort of try to identify who they were and how to work around them?

HOLMES: Oh, we were dealing with them. We knew who they were. I mean, there were no secrets about it, and we just went about our business trying to make our point of view heard, but we didn't limit ourselves to those people. We talked to a variety of Frenchmen.

Q: During this period Pompidou was the president?

HOLMES: I can't remember the exact dates, but during this period or most of it, Pompidou was president. In fact, I think that shortly after I arrived in Paris, in 1970, De Gaulle died, as I recall, and then Georges Pompidou came in. I'm trying to remember when Giscard d'Estaing was president. He was president before that - or just after. After, I guess.

Q: Afterwards-

HOLMES: That was after I left.

Q: -because De Gaulle resigned in '69, and I think Pompidou succeeded him, didn't he, or more or less. There may have been something in between.

HOLMES: De Gaulle resigned in '69, and then he died in 1970. And Pompidou succeeded him. And then, I guess, after that it was Giscard d'Estaing and then Mitterrand. Anyway, it was Pompidou.

Q: How did we view Pompidou? I mean, was he a little De Gaulle or were we seeing a difference in dealing with him?

HOLMES: No, we were seeing a different man, a man who was much more of the sort of crony politician and very skillful maneuverer, somebody who had a very different kind of experience in World War II, that was frequently pointed out by his detractors, that he had been a high-school teacher and had written sort of critical editions of French classics during the war. His detractors would make a lot of that. Ambassador Watson developed a special relationship with him. Presidents of France, just because we lived practically next door to the Elysée, didn't mean that... Presidents of France did not go to ambassadors' houses for dinner. And Watson kept working on this, and finally he said, "Look, suppose I invite you to come over for dinner as your neighbor, not as the ambassador of the United States? Would you accept?" And he did. And he came for dinner, and it was a very interesting evening with him.

Q: You've mentioned Watson so far as being sort of one-dimensional - the French connection - but obviously there was more to it. How would you say he evolved as an ambassador?

HOLMES: Well, he met a lot of people, and he did have a good command of French, and when necessary he would go and talk to the foreign minister about this subject or that subject. He didn't really evolve that much. He was very active in the business field. He knew a lot of French business people. IBM was one of the first big American corporations after World War II, when it was developing its overseas operations, not only to hire but to prepare for senior leadership local business people. And I remember Jacques Maisonrouge. It was kind of unheard of that he was elected early on to the board of directors of IBM. I think he was the only non-American when he was elected, and that was considered an unusual move. And Watson had a lot to do with that, so he had easy entrée into the French business community and met with them a lot. That was an advantage, too.

Q: Was Servan-Schreiber and The American Challenge, was that in vogue at the time, or did that come a little later?

HOLMES: Well, Jacques Servan-Schreiber was also a political figure. As I recall he was running the Radical Socialist Party, so he was a well-known figure.

Q: But I was saying, was there concern in French circles about the American challenge? We're talking about business, we're talking about American corporations.

HOLMES: Yes, there was a certain amount of that, certainly. I think there was a concern that American business, through their overseas operations incorporated within France - they were watched very carefully... The French wanted to develop their own industrial and commercial prowess. I mean they didn't want to be dominated by American companies. They worked very hard at that. Kind of - if you will - emblematic of that desire to have their own strategic sense, both in the military and the economic sense, was De Gaulle's decision to develop nuclear power in a big way, to develop nuclear weapons. They went their own way, they did it on their own, although it has come out - I think I can say this now - that there was some American help, mostly on safety, but this was a very deep secret for a long time, but it was going on during that period, as early as the late '60s, early '70s. But this was a decision that De Gaulle made for France, that France should have its own sweep of nuclear weapons. They called it the force de dissuasion, the force de frappe. And the offshoot of that was that France also made a decision to develop in a major way nuclear power for their national energy grid, and today, if I'm not mistaken, as a percentage of power generated by nuclear energy, I think France is the second country in the world. I think the first is Lithuania. Something like 85 percent. France has just slightly more than 80 percent of their national power generated by nuclear power plants. So this was a major commitment of French resources and, of course, a long-term commitment to go that way. It was De Gaulle who set them on that track, and succeeding French governments pursued that. French technology developed tremendously during the '60s, '70s, and '80s. We've all had this experience traveling in France - just taking computers, for example. Today it's commonplace. If you go downtown to Union Station to take a train to New York, you make your reservation with your credit card and you go and you tap into the system and put your reservation number in and your credit card and out come the tickets. Well, France had that years ago, long before we did, and of course their successful experiment in high-powered fast trains and their transportation system. They've done a lot to develop their own high technology, and they've tried initially to do it in a way that was independent. Of course, that was impossible, and eventually, like all of us... You have multinational corporations that are the only corporations that have the resources to be able to develop the financing and the technology to do a lot of these very expensive projects. But this was a deliberate French policy started by De Gaulle. And if it hadn't been for somebody like

Charles de Gaulle and his will power to do it, probably it couldn't have been done.

Q: No, I think France would have really moved very much into a satellite or not very powerful European power, which today, of course, it is. Just one last question before we move off France. Did you get involved in the movie wars - I mean Hollywood versus the French films and all that?

HOLMES: No, I didn't, but you're speaking about culture. I'll recount one little incident, talking about French pride. My wife and I were friends with a New York lawyer named Lee Eastman (he's now dead), whose law practice was focused on artists and actors and musicians. He had, in the early days, the American abstract expressionists, beginning with Jackson Pollock and that whole school. He helped them, and they frequently couldn't pay their legal fees, so they gave him paintings and drawings. He ended up with the most extraordinary - now worth hundreds of millions of dollars - collection of American abstract expressionist art in private hands. He wanted to establish somewhere in Paris - because he was struck by the fact when he would visit Paris that it was very nationalistic. You go to the Orangerie and see French expressionists and once in a while they'd have a show of some American paintings, but he felt that there ought to be a room, at least, or one gallery in one of the big museums in France that was dedicated to American art, so he offered to gather together a collection, mostly from his own collection, and sort of send it on permanent loan - sort of 99-year loan - if we could negotiate with a French museum to do this. Well, we tried - my wife and I did - and we struck out big-time with the national museums. And then we went to the Municipal Museum of Paris, and there's a very good painting museum there. And we made a lot of headway with underlings, but when we got up to the director, it turned out he was a card-carrying member of the Communist Party, and he hated Americans and there was no way that he was going to allow this cultural infiltration from a fly-by-night school. Oh, yes, Jackson Pollock and company, they were pretty good painters, but he wasn't going to allow them. "Once in a while we show one of those paintings." We said, "This is not going to cost you anything. It will be a 99-year permanent lease." No, it never happened. This is sort of an interesting little footnote.

Q: It really is. Well, on that interesting little footnote, why don't we stop for today, and if you think of anything, obviously-

HOLMES: Well, one other thing I might quickly mention because it's just another footnote.

Q: Yes.

HOLMES: The kind of work that a political officer or a political counselor in a place like Paris is called upon to do. I was assigned the responsibility at a certain point to maintain contact with Papandreou, who had been president of Greece.

Q: Yes, it was the time of the colonels, '67 to '74.

HOLMES: The colonels had taken over, and there had been a coup, and he was in exile in France, and we wanted to stay in touch with him.

Q: This is Andreas Papandreou.

HOLMES: Andreas Papandreou. Yes.

Q: George Papandreou was his father.

HOLMES: Well, today the defense minister of Greece is a Papandreou, and he's either the nephew or the son. I think I'm talking about George.

Q: No, George was dead, I think by this time. This had to be Andreas.

HOLMES: I guess it was Andreas. But he was in exile there, and we wanted to stay in touch with him very quietly, so that was one of my jobs. I was just told, go and find him and be in touch with him. So I would go to his hotel, and we'd have tea and we'd talk. I probably did that half a dozen times. But it was just a little vignette of the way a good assistant secretary of European affairs, sort of thinking ahead to the future, was taking advantage of a rather well-staffed embassy in Paris to sort of keep a relationship going there.

Q: One question. Here you are dealing with political affairs in France, and obviously it's a complicated subject. It covers a whole spectrum. We have a large, I assume, intelligence agency there, talking about the CIA and all that. Was there much cooperation, swapping of information, or was it a one-way street. In that particular aspect, how useful was it for you?

HOLMES: Actually, for me personally it was very useful. Others had difficulty, but first of all, the defense attaché, General Dick Walters, was a very, very old friend who actually had known my father in World War II when he was a young lieutenant, and he and I had served together in Italy, and so we had a close personal friendship, and that made a big difference, although, as garrulous a man as Dick Walters was, I never knew that the Kissinger trip to Pakistan and Indochina to set up the Nixon opening to China had all been negotiated by Dick Walters with the Chinese embassy in Paris. That's how close... And I learned that he had done that in about my third meeting with Mr. Tsao, when I said, "I really like these candied apples." He said, "So does General Walters." Bingo. The light went on. I went back to the embassy and said, "Dick, you've been holding out on me." And he said, "You didn't have a need to know." But actually I had good relations with him. We worked very closely. And the station chief and I had a good relationship, primarily because I discovered the CIA officer that was working the Socialist Party was a very intelligent, engaging individual, and we became very good friends, and so we got a lot of cooperation. But institutionally, it didn't always work that way. It was a very difficult relationship.

Q: And in a way it's, you know, both people are working on the same subject, and yet the reports go in and do they come back? Are they useful? And the answer often is-

HOLMES: Institutionally, I got to see what they allowed me to see, because typically the way they operated in those days was to gather the political reporting and they would write it up in ways similar to the way we did, in full paragraphs and organized and as well-written as they could make it, and get it off; but then at Langley it would be edited and sent back to the field as an official report. That's the way it worked. But the raw reporting you would never see - I never saw. But coming back, occasionally, there would be certain things that were centered on France that a couple of us were allowed to see. It was pretty tight.

Q: Okay, well, why don't we stop at this point, and we'll pick this up: in 1974, you left Paris for where?

HOLMES: For the Senior Seminar.

STEPHEN BOSWORTH
Paris (1971-1973)

Ambassador Bosworth was born and raised in Michigan and educated at Dartmouth College and George Washington University. Entering the Foreign Service in 1961 he served abroad in Panama, Madrid and Paris before becoming Ambassador to Tunisia, where he served from 1979 to 1981, to the Philippines (1984-1987) and to the Republic of Korea (1997-2000). The Ambassador also was a member of the Department's Policy Planning Staff, and he played a major role in the US-Japan Foundation and the Korean Peninsula Energy Development Organization. In 2009 Ambassador Bosworth was named the President's Special Representative for North Korean Policy. He was interviewed by Michael Mahoney in 2003.

Q: In effect you were doing a sort of political reporting as you've explained on the side.

BOSWORTH: Well, I would describe most Foreign Service economic work as political economist. It's not, for the most part, strictly speaking, is not really economic at all, it's some of that, but not very much. In the larger posts of course that's done by the treasury attache, so State Department people are basically doing political economy. I'd met a fellow who was then an economic minister in Paris and I decided I'd like to go to Paris so I applied for a job there.

Q: Who was that?

BOSWORTH: A fellow named Bob Brand who later went on and he was the ambassador to Australia. He's had a long and pretty good career. I wanted to study French. I thought French would be useful to me. I went back to Washington for four months.

Q: In the summer of '71?

BOSWORTH: In the summer of '71. I actually left Madrid in April or May. My family then followed when school was over. I was in Washington for four months studying French and found that speaking Spanish was quite an aid to me because I was able to get it. Actually it was only three months and I got a 3/3 in French after three months. Then we went to Paris where I was again in a sort of internal political unit or economic unit rather, focused on what was happening domestically, but more focused on what was happening within the European Union and the European Community. That was a good place to be.

Q: How many years were you there?

BOSWORTH: I was only there for two years.

Q: '71 to '73?

BOSWORTH: '71 to '73.

Q: What would you say were the, tell me a little more of the substance of the issues that you worked on there.

BOSWORTH: These were largely issues having to do with U.S. concerns over the EU's or EC's negotiation of the affiliation agreements, association agreements with a large number of countries in North Africa, Central Europe which we felt were trade discriminatory toward the U.S.

Q: Because?

BOSWORTH: Because they created preferences within the trading block and we were not benefiting from those preferences.

Q: Give me an example of one of those, if you can recall.

BOSWORTH: The preferences flowed in both directions. The Europeans would give preferences to North Africans for citrus, which would have the affect of damaging the interest of citrus exporters in the Caribbean or in the U.S. In return they would have preferences for sales of manufactured goods under those countries. We were somewhat conflicted on this because on the one hand we supported as a matter of principle the integration of Europe and there were those who thought that Europe would constitute a point of stability in the world, again in the Cold War world. Our trading interests were somewhat divergent from that point.

Q: Did you advocate for things as an economic officer or just report or both?

BOSWORTH: I was doing more advocating than, it was a lot of reporting, but I was presenting under instruction demarches to the foreign ministry on various subjects having to do with these trading arrangements.

Q: With the French government or multilaterally?

BOSWORTH: We'd go to the French government. We had a mission of course in Brussels, which was dealing with the European community as an entity, but we were in all of the major European capitals also dealing simultaneously with the governments and I think probably to a degree much greater than is now done. My sense is that we now deal with Europe pretty exclusively on economic and trade issues through Brussels, not through individual national capitals.

Q: How did you find dealing with the French on these matters?

BOSWORTH: Challenging. I decided it was a little bit like Sinatra's song about New York. I mean if you can make it in Paris as a U.S. diplomat, you could probably make it just about anywhere because these were not easy times. It hadn't been that long since the French had pulled out of NATO. De Gaulle had died, but it wasn't going to be a lot easier. It was a difficult time. We were taking over or had taken over from them in Vietnam. We were going through, let's see, we were going through the first stages of disengaging from the gold exchange standard, so we were in confrontation with them over certain aspects of our monetary policy. It was not, not an easy time.

Q: One issue for example was citrus. Are there any others that particularly strike you?

BOSWORTH: Not that I can recall offhand, no.

Q: But it was the general subject of preferences.

BOSWORTH: It was the general subject. That's right. The extent to which we were disadvantaged by these association arrangements which on the whole we favored for political reasons.

Q: For political reasons, the theory being that having a unified European community would ultimately result in more stability than otherwise?

BOSWORTH: Yes.

Q: Now did you get a lot of pressure from interest groups in the United States on various matters?

BOSWORTH: Sure. I was not getting it directly. It was all coming through the State Department, but yes.

Q: People lobby in effect and in the sense that I guess they're entitled to, obviously, make their views known.

BOSWORTH: Sure. Yes. Then in the second year I was there. It would have been the second year, again in this small unit, there were four of us in the unit and the chief of the unit was transferred and there was no assigned replacement immediately. So, I was made acting chief and hoped, actually very much encouraged to hope that I would become permanent in that position. I was under grade for the position and in the end the Department put somebody into the job after I'd been doing it for about eight months. At the same time I had also been given a couple of other temporary assignments prior to the economic minister. I was handling civil aviation among other things. I had a very full portfolio and I was very engaged. I got kind of disenchanted with the State Department or the Foreign Service at this juncture.

Q: Why?

BOSWORTH: Because they wouldn't leave me in the job that I knew I could do and was doing well. I had to go back to being the number two and of course not, I suppose I might not have dealt with it in the maturest manner possible. I decided that with some encouragement actually, I decided to try to get an assignment for a year outside the State Department. I was encouraged to apply for something called the White House Exchange Program, the Executive Exchange Program.

JACK B. KUBISCH
Paris (1971-1973)

Ambassador Jack B. Kubisch was born in Missouri in 1921. He joined the Foreign Service in 1947. His career included positions in Brazil, France, Mexico, and Washington, DC, and an ambassadorship to Greece. Ambassador Kubisch was interviewed by Dr. Henry E. Mattox in 1989.

Q: You received notification then that you were going to be DCM in Paris?

KUBISCH: Yes.

Q: How does such an assignment come about?

KUBISCH: That's a very good question because it doesn't happen very often. It happened as follows. President Nixon appointed a non-career officer to be ambassador to Paris, his name was Arthur K. Watson. He was one of two Watson brothers who were the sons of really the builder of the International Business Machines company. And Arthur Watson, known as Dick, that was his nickname, and his brother Tom Watson, Jr., were these two brothers.

Well, Dick Watson had been appointed ambassador to Paris and was looking for a new DCM in his embassy there. I understand he considered about 20 or 25, interviewing many of them, and rejected them all. And he, for one reason or another heard about me, in Mexico.

In fact, an inspector from the Foreign Service Inspection Corps, had recently inspected the embassy in Mexico and had given our embassy in Mexico very high marks, including some favorable comments about my performance as DCM.

Because I was a French speaker, from my earlier service in Paris with the Marshall Plan, and for reasons of study, my name also was brought to Watson's attention. He sent a personal associate of his, who had worked for him at IBM, to Mexico City to meet and become acquainted with me, and to report back to Ambassador Watson whether or not he thought the two of us would be compatible. He said yes, and so Ambassador Watson asked Secretary of State Rogers if he would have me come from Mexico to meet Watson when he was visiting in the United States. I did. Watson and I met. And he asked for my assignment to Paris as his DCM. I should add that I didn't really want the assignment, believe it or not. Although it's a highly prized assignment in the Foreign Service and it was, in many ways, a fine opportunity. But I had already been serving at senior levels and had earlier had the rank of a class 4 chief of mission in Brazil. I had been given the impression that if I did a good job in Mexico that my next assignment would be as an ambassador. So I was not keen to go on, having acted as DCM in Brazil for a time and for a full tour in Mexico and had had a senior job in the State Department, in being another DCM. But Secretary Rogers told me personally at the time that he wanted me to go because they wanted to satisfy Ambassador Watson, and he assured me that after a suitable period he would certainly support me to become an ambassador.

Q: Do you recall in the late '50's, I can't think of the name of the person, but our ambassador in Chile was transferred from that position to DCM in Paris?

KUBISCH: Yes, Cecil Lyon.

Q: Cecil Lyon, yes. So, it was not exactly a come down for you?

KUBISCH: Oh, not at all. To be minister, DCM, in Paris, I suppose many in the Foreign Service would say is a much more important assignment than many ambassadorial assignments in many countries of the world. So I went there and served as best I could.

Q: What's the role of a DCM, in Paris, a very large embassy, under a different ambassador, that is to say, a non-career ambassador? Is the role substantially different there from the role that you played in Mexico City?

KUBISCH: It turned out to be somewhat different, through no desire of mine, because I endeavored to perform in Paris as I had in Mexico. But Ambassador Watson, who was very intelligent and very devoted to serving his country, was obviously not as experienced as a man who had spent several decades in the Foreign Service.

I could give you an example, if you wish, of the kind of problem that arose. During the time I was in Paris, 1971 to '73, the Vietnam peace negotiations were going on and there was a special mission to conduct those negotiations. Periodically, the President's National Security Advisor, Henry Kissinger and others, would come from Washington to participate in those negotiations with the North Vietnamese and others. The head of the U.S. mission to the negotiations in Paris was Ambassador William J. Porter, who later became Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs. Ambassador Watson had no authority over these negotiations except to the extent they affected our relations with the government of France. He was strictly in charge of bilateral affairs. He was not entirely happy with the negotiations, the way they were going and the way they were being conducted.

One day a few weeks after my arrival, while he was out of the embassy at lunch, a delegation of Americans came to the embassy to present a petition protesting the U.S. role in Vietnam and other things relating to the negotiations. I was called in my office by the Marine security guard about what he should do with this delegation. I had him hold the phone while I checked to see if a consular officer was present, on the ground floor of the embassy, and there was one. I instructed the Marine guard and the consular officer to receive the American delegation, there were four or five Americans in it, to take their petition, accept it, and tell them it would be forwarded through appropriate channels to Washington.

When Ambassador Watson came back from lunch, he was really incensed that I had done that. He was very angry with me. It was the first real show of anger he had ever demonstrated to me. He was angry because I had allowed an officer in his embassy to receive this group. He felt that he wanted nothing to do with such a delegation or the Vietnam negotiations.

I explained to him that American citizens, whether in the United States or abroad, have the right to petition their government. Abroad their proper place to go to present such a petition was the embassy and to a consular officer. This was quite appropriate and their petition should be forwarded to Washington. Ambassador Watson gave me a very hard time and I got very angry myself and stalked out of his office.

I was wondering, I had only been there about a month, whether I had done the right thing in going to Paris. But not long thereafter, he was basically a very generous and kind man, Watson had calmed down. He came into my office and we made up. We never really had a serious problem after that.

But that's an example of how a politically appointed ambassador might not know something that a career officer would know immediately. There were many other times, on vastly more important things, where I believe I helped Ambassador Watson avoid serious errors or pitfalls, and I think he would agree.

Q: Yes, it's not exactly a nuance, it's just a procedural question.

KUBISCH: Sure.

Q: This was in '71, then I guess?

KUBISCH: It was, about in December of '71 as I recall, or January of '72.

Q: Did he come to realize that what you had done was something you really had no alternative to, that it was something you had to do?

KUBISCH: I believe so. But in any case, I have the impression that his confidence in me as the weeks went by slowly grew as he recognized that I was doing my utmost to serve him well and to serve the embassy well. I think he came to have substantial regard for me, as I did for him, and we became very good friends.

So much so that later, after he had resigned from the embassy and I was back in Washington, he organized a business in the United States, in which he invested some millions of dollars of his own money. He was very well-to-do. He offered me a partnership in it, with no investment on my part, which I did not accept since I was still committed to the Foreign Service.

Q: Well, that's dedication, all right. Was Ambassador Porter's office in the embassy there?

KUBISCH: It was in an annex of the embassy. Ambassador Porter had words with Ambassador Watson on more than one occasion too, overheard by others, including me.

Q: He was in B building?

KUBISCH: Yes. And Heywood Isham, a career Foreign Service Officer, was his deputy.

Q: What were the words about?

KUBISCH: Well, I remember once when Dr. Kissinger was coming with a delegation from Washington for the talks. Usually when he came, Ambassador Porter went to the airport to meet him, as did Ambassador Watson, and several others of us, depending on who was on the delegation.

In the VIP waiting room, waiting for the plane to come in one night, Ambassador Porter was in an adjacent, smaller waiting room with Ambassador Watson, with the door closed. They had some words about something and all of a sudden there was some, almost shouting going on as Ambassador Porter charged Ambassador Watson with being poorly informed and just a spoiled, rich man who had come to Paris because of his political support of President Nixon.

Q: You don't know what the point of contention was?

KUBISCH: I didn't hear it at the outset, all I heard was the louder words later.

I went in and I requested an appointment to see the Secretary General of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs for France, known as "the Quai d'Orsay."

Q: For the record, what do you do to get an appointment with the Secretary General of the Quai d'Orsay and then how do you get into see him? Treat me as if I'm feeble-minded.

KUBISCH: Well, what I do is call my assistant in, who is a good French speaker, and we sit down and we look at the calendar, and I say, you know, I've got this instruction. Should I go and try and see the President of France? No. The Minister of Foreign Affairs of France, Schuman? No. Should I go and see the Secretary General, the number two man, in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs? Hervé Alphand, who had been the French ambassador in Washington during the Kennedy and Johnson administrations? Probably. Should I drop a level below him to the Under Secretary for Political Affairs? No. Alphand's the man.

So I said, "Call Alphand's office, tell him that Minister Kubisch, the chargé of the American Embassy, has an instruction to see him at his earliest convenience." So my assistant goes and calls and arranges the appointment. He knows my schedule and works out a time and late that afternoon, I have the appointment with Alphand.

I go in. Now, at that time I spoke fairly good French. I was qualified at the 3-3 level in the Foreign Service, which is the professional level, but Alphand spoke English much better than I spoke French. Even so, although he would speak English with me at parties or at dinners or something like that, in his office and in the Quai d'Orsay we always spoke French. He insisted on it. It was fine with me.

So I went in and made my representation. I had prepared an aide-mémoire, as you know an aide-mémoire is a piece of paper you prepare to aid the memory, that summarized the points of our protest. And I went in and I made my representations to Secretary General Alphand. I told him what our reasoning was, why we disagreed with the French Government in permitting this conference to take place. And as an aide-mémoire, I handed him this document, which is not an official document or of position, but to assist him in recalling exactly what I had said.

Q: Incidentally, I might comment here, bearing in mind now that I'm feeble-minded for the moment. The aide-mémoire is something typed up by your secretary before you leave, from the text of the telegram, right?

KUBISCH: Yes, exactly. I sort of lift from the telegram those paragraphs or sentences, of my instruction that can be conveyed to the representative of the other government. Not the whole instruction, obviously, with all the background and so on.

So, I gave that to Alphand. He looked at it, he read it, he listened to me, and he said, "Thank you very much," very formally. He was very formal, "Mr. Minister, I must say that I don't believe that the French Government will agree to cancel this conference but we will certainly give it careful consideration and thought, and I will discuss it with the Minister and appropriate authorities in the French Government and be back in touch with you as quickly as possible."

I said, "Thank you, Mr. Secretary General."

And then he said, "Are we finished now with the formal part of this visit?"

And I said, "As far as I am concerned, we are."

So he said, "Well, let me tell you something. I think you'll find it amusing."

The aide-mémoire contained words to this effect, "Everyone in the world will know that Versailles is on the outskirts of Paris and knows how important Versailles is and knows that such a conference would tend to compromise the neutrality and impartiality of the Vietnam negotiations in Paris."

So Alphand went on personally in saying, "I just want you to know something that you may find amusing because I don't agree that everybody in the United States or elsewhere knows where Versailles is or would attach that much importance to a conference in Versailles." He said, "When I was ambassador in Washington, I got a request from the Mayor of Versailles, who said that we were going to have in France the celebration of the 500th anniversary of the founding of Versailles, and he wanted to invite mayors of Versailles, towns by that name, all over the world to come and participate in the celebration.”

Alphand went on to say that as ambassador in Washington, he had his associates in the embassy investigate and they found, I believe, eleven towns in the U.S. by the name of Versailles, as they are pronounced in the United States. So Alphand, as the French ambassador, sent an invitation to all the mayors of them to go to Paris and participate in this great celebration in Versailles.

He said he would never forget the letter he got back from one mayor, I think it was the mayor of a town by the name of Versailles in Texas, but I’m not positive. The mayor said, “Dear Ambassador Alphand, thank you for the invitation and please convey my thanks to the Mayor of Versailles in France. I’d love to be able to go but I can’t. But I do appreciate the invitation and I want you to know that I and the people of Versailles, here in my state, are just delighted to know that there is another town by that name in France.”

Q: That’s good. That reminds me of the statistic, I’m not sure exactly what it is, but something like 83% of all Americans think New Mexico is a foreign country.

KUBISCH: Yes, something like that.

Q: Alphand told you this in French?

KUBISCH: He told me this in French.

Q: And so you didn’t get very far on that particular approach?

KUBISCH: No, the conference was held in Versailles, but it was very carefully monitored and to protect the security of the talks, no permission was given for any demonstration or parade or anything into Paris. Typical Gallic solution to a problem like this.

Q: France, not too long before, of course, had had it’s own great difficulties with Indochina. Perhaps it was just as neutral as possible because they had totally withdrawn from the whole scene in 1954. Do we know why Paris was chosen as the site for these negotiations?

KUBISCH: Well, they were chosen long before I went to Paris and I think an effort was made to find a site that was acceptable to all the parties. And Paris offered the facilities.

I had the impression that others were available. Perhaps Geneva or elsewhere, but I am sure there has been lots of published information on that.

Q: Can you talk to us now on a point that you mentioned a little while ago about the resignation of Ambassador Watson?

KUBISCH: Well, yes, I would like to say a word about that because I think he was much maligned in that. As I recall, after President Nixon visited Shanghai and the Shanghai Communiqué was released, it was decided subsequently between the Governments in Peking, now Beijing, and Washington, that a Paris channel would be opened for contacts between the two Governments. Earlier the contacts had been in Warsaw. And they were not as public or official. This was to be the official opening of an official channel of contact between the two Governments.

Q: In Warsaw, I recall, Walter Stoessel was the person who conducted the negotiations.

KUBISCH: He did. So it was agreed this would take place in Paris, between a very high ranking official of the Chinese government, Ambassador Huang, who was sent to Paris, and Ambassador Watson, the American ambassador, would handle them for the United States. This had not been released publicly yet, that Paris would be the site and channel.

One evening after I had gone home from the embassy, about 7 or 8 o'clock at night, I got a call from Ambassador Watson. He had just had a message from Washington, from Secretary of State Rogers, instructing him, Watson, to come back to Washington as quickly as possible. There was going to be an announcement in the White House about 36 hours later, of the opening of the Paris channel, and they wanted to brief Watson and have him present for that. This was about March or April of 1972, I think.

Ambassador Watson went back to the embassy to try and arrange transportation to go as quickly as possible. As I recall, he told me this subsequently, he went back to the embassy. His executive assistant, John Clark, was there. Watson, by this time it was about dinnertime, had a couple of scotches, I recall him telling me later. He tried to get transportation to get back to Washington as quickly as possible, had difficulty and finally got a military plane to take him a few hours later from Paris to London, where he was able to get on a Pan Am flight and go onto New York and Washington the next morning.

In the meantime, he lay down on the sofa in his office and I think Clark covered him up with a blanket, and he tried to get some rest before beginning his trip.

He got on the military plane later that evening, went to London, got on the plane the next morning to go to New York on a Pan Am flight. Maybe it was then, he hadn't slept much that night, he said, maybe it was then that he had his scotches on the plane. But he had also taken a sleeping pill, he told me, to try and get some rest.

He said the combination of the sleeping pill and the drinks made him woozy and not feeling well. So he loosened his tie and put his seat back and tried to put his feet up, he was in the first class section I think, on the seat in front of him. He said that a stewardess came by and told him that that was not the way for an American ambassador to sit or look and did it in some kind of manner that irritated Ambassador Watson. And he apparently said some words to her about minding her own business or something, that she didn't know what was going on or what he had been through during the evening and the night before.

This led to some kind of intermittent exchange between the stewardess and Ambassador Watson, during the course of the flight. And when she arrived in New York, she filed a written report.

Watson went onto Washington and was at the ceremony with President Nixon and Secretary Rogers, announcing the Paris channel for the opening of the talks. A couple of days later excerpts from the Pan Am report appeared in the Jack Anderson column.

It was circulated all over and was repeated to France. And it proved to be a big embarrassment to Ambassador Watson, and to some extent the White House.

So I just wanted to clarify that story and give, to the best of my recollection, Ambassador Watson's account of what happened. He departed France soon after that but did not resign immediately, as I recall. He came back to Paris for visits and so on but didn't resign until the following September or so.

Q: Did you believe Watson?

KUBISCH: Yes.

Q: You had known Karamanlis?

KUBISCH: I had known Karamanlis in Paris while he was in exile.

Q: In what capacity?

KUBISCH: In a democratic society or country it's very well advised for American officials and ambassadors and 921enefit and diplomats to maintain contacts with key leaders of opposition parties who may someday come back to power. So, for example, I used to meet with President, or at that time the head of the Socialist Party, Mitterrand in France, even though Pompidou was President of the country. And in that context, I was under instructions from time to time from Washington to meet with Constantine Karamanlis who had been Prime Minister of Greece and gone into voluntary exile. So from time to time I would send other officers from the embassy to go and discuss world matters with him and explain U.S. policies and just show him some courtesies. That's how I had come to know him.

Q: Take him to lunch?

KUBISCH: I don't think I ever had lunch with him in Paris.

Q: Is it not also true, that often the chargé, the DCM, if he is there for any substantial period of time, will normally soon have to leave also?

KUBISCH: Yes, that's true. That happened to me in Paris, for example. Our Ambassador in France departed France in late summer or early fall of 1972, and I had been Chargé for a few months, intermittently, before his departure. He traveled outside the country some, was absent. Then I was Chargé for a protracted period of about 7 or 8 months, and got so used to dealing, as I had to, with the President of France, with the Prime Minister, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and others, that when the new Ambassador arrived in April of '73, it had already been pre-arranged, as I've explained in one of our earlier sessions, that I would leave.

It would have been awkward for the new Ambassador for me to have remained there, because they might have still called me. He wasn't as familiar with our problems or our discussions. The Ambassador really needs to be at the forefront of the U.S. presence in the country. So someone who has been Chargé for any length of time probably should leave, and the Ambassador should have the opportunity to select his own DCM, because that working relationship is so central to the successful management of the mission.

JAMES DOBBINS
Strasbourg (1971-1973)

Ambassador James Dobbins was born in Brooklyn. After graduating from Georgetown's School of Foreign Service, he joined the Navy. Since joining the Foreign Service in 1967, his career has included positions in France, England, Germany and an Ambassadorship to the European Community. Ambassador Dobbins was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2003.

Q: Jim, let's start in 1971. You're off to Strasbourg. And you were there from when to when?

DOBBINS: Seventy-one to '73.

Q: Okay, can you tell me about what our setup was in Strasbourg at the time?

DOBBINS: Well, it was a two-officer consulate, or consul general, of which I was the junior officer. And it did a certain volume, modest volume, of consular work – no immigration visas, but non-immigrant visas, passport services for a small American community. It did a small volume of commercial work, and its principle reason for being, I think, was the presence of the Council of Europe organization that had been eclipsed by the European Community by that time, but still had some purpose and value. And its headquarters was in Strasbourg. It had a secretariat of 500 or 600 people, and periodic meetings of the Parliamentary Assembly, and we were an observer. We weren't a member of the Council, but we were an observer and had access and could report on their activities.

Q: Well, let's first talk about Strasbourg, per se, and then we'll go into the international, European thing. How French was Strasbourg, and how German was Strasbourg? It's sort of a hybrid.

DOBBINS: Well, it wasn't very German, but it was Alsatian, which is to say that the French, who were very consciously and proudly French, spoke a German dialect in addition to French, at home, often, and could obviously understand German, although Alsatian had deviated somewhat from German with a lot of French words in it. And at that time, the German economy was stronger than the French economy, and so at that time, several thousand – like, maybe 20,000 –

Alsations would cross the border every day to work in Germany.

Q: Well, now, when you arrived, they were three years away from the events of the spring of '68, when the student revolt and all sorts of things were happening in France. How much involved was Strasbourg and the people there we were observing in French politics?

DOBBINS: Well, Strasbourg was involved in French politics. French politics had largely calmed down since then. Pompidou had replaced de Gaulle and there wasn't much residue of '68 in terms of popular unrest. We did a certain volume of political reporting, but there wasn't much going on in French politics. Of note at the time, Gaullists were quite clearly in charge, weren't under threat. The Vietnam War was continuing and there was some anti-Vietnam sentiment and there were occasional very small demonstrations.

One night, we lived in an apartment above the consulate and about 2:00 in the morning, rocks began coming through our bedroom window, and below were four or five, probably by that time, given the time perhaps, alcoholically charged students throwing rocks in a Vietnam protest. Another time, a couple of them burst into the consulate and tried to tear down the flag, and the consul general and I, both of whom were bigger than these students, of whom there were only a couple, went out and tossed them out the gate before they could do any real harm. That was pretty innocent.

There was one, we never did find what the cause was, and it probably wasn't a protest. I was in my dining room, which had French doors overlooking a terrace, and a bullet came through the doors. It was a .22, and it was spent, so it actually went into the wall and then bounced on the floor. It was a spent .22 that had come, probably missed me by a foot or something. If it had hit me in the eye it might have done some serious damage. If it had hit me somewhere else, it might not have, because, as I said, it didn't even penetrate the wood very far. And they never find out whether it was – the police said, "Well, it was probably just someone hunting," but that seemed implausible, but not impossible, I guess. I never did find out what the source of it was.

We had a loud party the night before, and I always wondered if it was someone in the adjoining apartment building was expressing his unhappiness with it. But there were a few rather small incidents of that sort, but otherwise it was a very tranquil, quiet time.

Q: Well, did you feel any constraints, or were you making a point of going to the university there? The campus?

DOBBINS: Well, I don't recall going to the university. I did join some sort of young businessmen's groups – but they were very business oriented. After a couple of meetings, there really wasn't much point. It was very local, the sorts of things that the Shriners or the Elks would be concerned with here. But there wasn't any real hostility to the United States, except in these rather small groups. But, I say, the most they could generate for an anti-Vietnam rally was four or five people, so this was not a mass movement like what we were seeing in the '60s. And in any case, Alsace as a whole was a more socially conservative area than elsewhere in France.

Q: Who was consul general when you were there?

DOBBINS: For the first, I guess, two or three months, I was on my own. I arrived the day the consul general, whom I was supposed to serve under, was leaving. He had just been fired, though it wasn't explained quite in those terms, by the ambassador, who was rather irascible, unpredictable, and ultimately, it turned out, alcoholic.

Q: Who was the ambassador?

DOBBINS: Watson was his name. I think it was Thomas Watson. He was the son of the famous Thomas Watson.

Q: He had another brother who went to the Soviet Union.

DOBBINS: Yes, I think that's right. So he was an ambassador to France, and he finally left the post after the press got a hold of allegations that he had been making indecent proposals to an airline stewardess on some plane. There were a few occasions when he had been quite verbally abusive to Embassy staff – I don't mean sexually harassing – but just verbally abusive to his staff in Paris. He came to visit us in Strasbourg and was very pleasant, and took us out to dinner and was quite a good host.

He did take exception to the Council General, a fellow named George Andrews, who had only been there about six months. I never really got the story. Apparently, it was something as trivial as the ambassador asked Andrews to do something and Andrews turned to his deputy, the vice consul, and asked the vice consul to do it. And the ambassador was apparently unhappy that, having asked the consul general to do it, the consul general didn't do it, rather than turning to his vice consul and asking him to do it. It was a fairly simple task, like go find a copy of X, or something. I don't know whether this was really the source of the difficulty. Whatever it was, the ambassador had come for a visit, been displeased and directed that this individual should be transferred out of his jurisdiction.

So poor Mr. Andrews was abruptly sent off somewhere else. I think he ended up going somewhere where he was happy enough, although he didn't stay much longer in the Foreign Service. But it was too bad, because his father had been a consul general in Strasbourg. He may have even been born in Strasbourg. So this was a sort of a coming home, and he only spent six months. The day I arrived, he informed me, that he was leaving and I would be acting consul general.

Then, for a long time, they didn't name a replacement, and in fact the ambassador's original inclination was to not get a replacement and just allow the post to be run at a more junior level. Eventually, they did assign somebody who was a younger officer, younger than George Andrews, a fellow named Ron Woods. He and I became close friends and worked together several other times over the next couple of decades. So he arrived about three months after I'd been there and took over.

As I said, he was a fairly junior officer himself. In fact, he couldn't technically be a consul general for the first year or two, because he didn't have the rank for consul general. I think at that time I was an FSO seven and I think he was a five. You couldn't be a consul general until you got to be a four.

Q: Well, let's talk about what was the organization, the European organization, what was its title now, again?

DOBBINS: The Council of Europe.

Q: The Council of Europe. What was the staff of sort of Europe at that time? I'm talking about as a body.

DOBBINS: Well, the European Community was continuing to slowly coalesce. The Council of Europe had been overshadowed, but it was continuing. It had a somewhat broader organization because it included the European neutrals who didn't belong to the European Community. There was still no real effort at political union within the EC, or even common foreign policy, but certainly in the economic and commercial areas, it was continuing to coalesce and do important things. It was, of course, the height of the Cold War and Europe was very divided.

Q: Well, were we monitoring the Council of Europe principals? Were they unhappy or in a snit about what was happening in Brussels?

DOBBINS: The Council of Europe tended to focus on broader, non-commercial, non-economic aspects of the European union. So, for instance, it was the Council of Europe rather than the European Community that would standardize road signs throughout Europe, so they all looked the same. And there were other forms of standardization that the Council of Europe worked on.

It would do studies in social health and, particularly, juridical areas. It would try to set European standards for human rights abuses. It had its own court. I can't remember what it was called, but it was basically a human rights court where people could bring suits if they felt their rights were being abused by their own government. So we would file a report. Some of this was relevant to the United States in a general way.

We sent these reports by air gram, which ensured that virtually nobody read them at the other end. I suspect that these were largely filed and forgotten. I would be surprised if more than one or two people read most of them, and I think it was principally useful for me, just to become adept at the process of going and listening to a full day's debate in the Parliamentary Assembly and then reducing that to a coherent three paragraphs. So as a tradecraft exercise, it was quite valuable, but the actual utility of the work I would think would have been extremely low.

Q: What was your impression of the personnel and spirit of the Council of Europe?

DOBBINS: I thought they were quite professional and approachable. They recognized that they were in something of a backwater in terms of where the real action was, but it was a typical sort of international organization. It had people from 18 countries working together, living a pleasant, quiet life in a small but comfortable European city.

Q: I've seen shots on TV of doings there later on, but it seemed to me, when I see people in full dress kit of tails and all opening doors for the delegates as they go in and all ...

I sort of wondered and said, "Oh my God, I can imagine what almost the overhead would be for an organization like this. A lot of perks and ..."

DOBBINS: The European Parliament, which is the Parliament of the European Community, also met in Strasbourg, and its staff, in a typical European Community arrangement, actually were housed in Luxemburg, where of course all the other institutions were in Brussels. But they used the same facility – that is, the same building, and chambers, and probably therefore used the same ushers and things like that.

Q: How did you deal with our embassy to the European Community?

DOBBINS: We had almost no dealings. The European Parliament, we didn't report on that. If they were sufficiently interested, somebody would come from Brussels and we would obviously facilitate their visit if they wanted us to.

Q: I'm not quite sure of my timing, but were the seeds, or was it more developed, what became known as the Helsinki Accords, because it would fit more into here since this was broader representation than just the ...

DOBBINS: Well, the CSCE (Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe) was begun around that time. And it culminated only in the signature of the Helsinki Final Act in, I guess it was '76.

Q: Ford signed it, so I think ...

DOBBINS: The process had begun. The negotiations were underway. We didn't have anything to do with it there. I wrote a policy paper for the State Department. The European Bureau was inviting policy papers, so I had the temerity, because I guess I came from the Policy Planning Staff, of writing a long paper, which posited rather prematurely the idea that Europe was coming together and that the U.S. had some advantages in a more self-confident and unified Europe. I advised doing things like assisting the French nuclear weapons program, which the department got very nervous about. I only found out later they were nervous about, because it was actually being actively debated, and they felt it was a very sensitive subject. So they liked the paper, but refused to publish it. But it led to somebody in personnel who had something to do with it suggesting me for my next job.

But the CSCE, per se, no, there were really no activities there. Some of the Council of Europe human rights kind of stuff was reflected in the CSCE negotiations, but it wasn't being managed out of there.

Q: Did you find that your consular folks had a certain window on, say, the non-European – well, I mean the European, but the people who were not part of the European Community. I guess we were talking about Sweden and ...

DOBBINS: Well, the Council of Europe, its principal reason for existing separately from the European Community was that it did have a broader membership, which included the neutrals.

Q: Well, did you find that you were tasked, the post was tasked, with looking at the neutrals and how they were observing the European development or not?

DOBBINS: The post really wasn't tasked with anything. We were just doing the reporting to justify our existence. There was no technical interest in any of this, because it had no immediate operational impact on what Washington was doing.

Q: Just capture the spirit of the time, only somebody looking at this from the future or something, what was the spirit, sort of the feeling that you and your colleagues had about European unity? A good thing, or we were concerned they were building up a rival that was going to give us a problem?

DOBBINS: Well, and there's always been a tension. So I think the paper I wrote actually sort of reflected that I tried to argue, already, a more pro-Europeanist approach, as I recall. I wouldn't say – this wasn't a time when the Europeans were particularly challenging us, and if there were any concerns, it was with the Brandt government in Germany, and where they were taking their ostpolitik line made Washington nervous. So it was less a concern about European reunification than managing German ...

Q: Were you picking up any reflections from just your acquaintances or your contacts and all about the Soviet Union at that time?

DOBBINS: Well, not in Strasbourg. The politics there were very parochial, and the Council of Europe had no real East-West relations dimension. It was all within Western societies and looking at Western societies. So the Cold War and the East-West competition really weren't part of our professional life at that point, other than the background of what we were doing.

Q: As soon as you have an international organization, one thinks of the KGB (Komitet Gosudarstvennoy Bezopasnosti, Committee for State Security) and the CIA (Central Intelligence Agency) getting in there and recruiting. One thinks, of course, of particularly Switzerland, where I think every other person was on the payroll of one or the other.

DOBBINS: I don't think either were interested in the Council of Europe. I certainly never detected anything.

Q: Well, then, after this, it sounds like almost an idyllic ...

DOBBINS: It was very pleasant.

Q: And also you were learning the trade.

DOBBINS: Yes, and it was learning how a multilateral organization went. I learned political reporting. I learned management. Basically, the consul general – or he was the consul, and for a while we were both consuls, but he was the head of the consulate general, the principal officer, basically left the management of the post to me. And the locals were all long-term, highly experienced, so I did nothing but sign documents they put in front of me. I probably spent, at the most doing 25% of my time consular and administrative and commercial work. The rest of the time, I could travel in the district and make calls, see people and report on things that interested me.

Q: Anti-Americanism, was that not an Alsatian trait or something?

DOBBINS: No, not at all. Quite the contrary. They were very, very positive.

RONALD D. FLACK
Trade Promotion Office
Paris (1971-1974)

Ronald D. Flack was born in Minnesota in 1934. After receiving his bachelor's degree from the University of Minnesota he served in the US Army from 1957-1960. His career has included positions in Athens, Manila, Abidjan, Paris, Algiers, Geneva, and Copenhagen. Mr. Flack was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on January 7, 1998.

Q: You were there from when to when?

FLACK: From April, 1971 until August, 1974.

Q: ...particular briar patch of Paris.

FLACK: That is right. I was back here on consultation for quite a while because my wife was still not up to traveling. But, eventually we got over there. The trade center, which was part of the commercial operation of the embassy in Paris was in Neuilly out on Avenue Charles de Gaulle and was a very large modern building. It was a wonderful facility: well organized and thought out office space, etc. It was probably one of the nicest places I have ever worked in the Foreign Service. There was quite a large staff. We must have had about fifteen people altogether. There was a director, who was a Department of Commerce political appointee by the name of Scotty Borrowman. Then there was a deputy director, two trade promotion officers, myself and a fellow by the name of George Knowles, who is today the commercial counselor in Brussels, and a staff of secretaries, etc. We put on trade shows about once every two months. Basically my job was to do the promotion in France. I would go out and talk to French industry about an upcoming show on materials testing equipment, for example. I would contact the potential users of this equipment and tell them about the coming trade show, give them brochures, etc. and invite them to come in to see the equipment. They were usually very interested in trade shows. Some of these U.S. companies were looking for agents so we would prepare lists of potential agents and actually visit potential agents so we could set up meetings.

Q: How would a list of agents be picked?

FLACK: Let's say it was materials testing equipment. First of all we would go to the commercial office at the embassy and look at trade lists of companies that import various types of equipment. With the trade list of companies dealing with specialized equipment we could go through making phone calls to make the first list and then by further investigation and visits with brochures showing the equipment in question we would ask if they would be interested in being an agent for the particular American firm. If they said they would like to talk with them, we would set up the appointment so that when the company arrived for the trade show they would have appointments not only with potential buyers of their equipment but with potential agents.

Q: How receptive were the French at that point?

FLACK: Very receptive. I did a lot of what we called blue ribbon calls which was getting to the highest level possible in a French company. I was a first secretary at the time and it was fairly easy to call and say the first secretary of the American embassy would like to call on the executive vice president for marketing, or whatever the title might be, and you get appointments with these people. I would introduce myself and tell them what I wanted and basically they were very receptive. I found very few that simply said they were not interested. If they did say they were not interested, they were always very polite about it. Most of them were interested. Business is a little different than politics.

Q: Was this the period of the American challenge?

FLACK: Yes, Pompidou was president, he died while we were there actually. It was still a pretty Gaullist environment. So, on a political level there were problems as there always are with the French. But, I wasn't really involved in that at all, except just peripherally. I was basically involved in this business element where the relationship was very good.

Q: How were American products looked upon in France?

FLACK: It depended on the area. We were trying to focus on high tech equipment at this trade center because that is where we had the competitive advantage in most cases. Every once and a while we would run into something that wasn't expected. I remember once going to see a laboratory that specialized in a certain type of equipment in France. I went in and said that we were having a show on this particular type of equipment and we think we have the best in the field. This guy was sitting behind a desk with a slight grin on his face. When I was finished he said, "You know, here in our company we consider the United States to be an underdeveloped country in this area." Then he proceeded to show me his laboratories and it was true. They were far more advanced than anything we were doing. That was the exception, it was rare. But, we tended to assume that we were the best in everything and we weren't always.

Q: Were you using things of this nature as a feedback to somebody to say, "Hey, maybe we need to do more in this field?"

FLACK: Well, not really. The decision on what type of shows we would have were made back in the Department of Commerce, partly, I would guess, on the success of shows that we were doing. For the most part these shows were successful. At the end of each show we would talk with each individual exhibitor and ask if they found an agent, made any sales, and what they felt their prospective sales through their new agent might be for the next year. We would add up the actual sales and the prospective sales of the show to get a sales figure that you could use for the show because the Department of Commerce was always trying to quantify these things – how much was made for the U.S. economy in these shows. The figures were always in the millions of dollars at the end of each show. In some cases, sales off the floor, actual orders, and in other cases from the agents who said they would do so much business for you next year. So, these shows were successful and the areas then selected were based on what was selling, so to speak. It was basically all high tech computers, communications equipment, electronics, etc.

Q: Being in Paris, did you find that there was a difference between going out into the country elsewhere and Paris? Were there other worlds out there?

FLACK: Yes, but even today, Paris is still the centralized area of not only the administration but the economy as well. A lot is going on in the rest of France, it is being decentralized. When I was there the economy was highly centralized in Paris. Now, we did do promotion and contacts outside of Paris. That was done through our consulates, Marseille, Lyon, Bordeaux and Strasbourg, where we had commercial FSNs. They were the ones that would contact the local companies in their consular district that might be interested in a particular show.

Q: Were you reaching out to Luxembourg, Belgium and other places?

FLACK: Yes through our mailings because we always had a mailing list that the announcement of a show went out to. Very often there would be companies outside of France. However, there was another trade center in Frankfurt. We kind of divvied up Belgium, Switzerland, Luxembourg and to a certain degree a number of Italian and Spanish firms.

Q: I know that Paris is a place where congress often wants to put proteges. USIA often has a couple of cultural attachés who are there because they either have strong support from congress or for one reason or another. It is a nice place to send people. Did you feel this at all at the trade center?

FLACK: No. Of course, the ambassadors were all political, there were three during the time I was there. The rest of the embassy including the commercial counselors were career people. So, I didn't see that too much there.

Q: How close did you feel to the embassy?

FLACK: Pretty close. As close as you can in an embassy the size of Paris. It is a huge embassy and we were physically detached. I would go occasionally to staff meetings in the embassy, but not all that often. We had lots of friends at the embassy. Also, we lived at this little compound of apartments in Neuilly, two apartment buildings owned by the embassy. American officers and personnel lived there. So, of course, we were very much part of the embassy community because we knew everybody there. But, in terms of being close on a professional level, a work level, no, not very close.

Q: Were there any political developments during this time that might have intruded on what you were doing?

FLACK: No. It was the Pompidou era and he died towards the end of the time I was there. Then Giscard became president. We had fairly good relations at that time. There was the usual Franco-American friction along the way, but frankly, I had lots of friends in France from my previous days there and my wife being French born we had family there as well. We did a lot of private traveling. I didn't do much professional traveling in France. I found the climate to be one of a pretty good economy, and I can't say I felt any strong anti-Americanism.

Q: On the trade promotion side, what was the feeling between the budding European economic union that was coming along at that time?

FLACK: From our point of view, it was almost non-existent. The economic community was beginning but was not something that was looming large. The French economy was still French planning, not planning from Brussels. Europe was still pretty much a thing of the future that was building. The Treaty of Rome was signed and commitments were being made. The French had previously opposed the British coming into the EC and this was the time that it was beginning to change. I think they came in under Giscard.

Q: Who were our competitors for selling products to the French?

FLACK: I would say basically other European countries, Germany, Switzerland, UK, to some extent Italy. The Japanese were just starting to get into the European market at that point. For example, at that point Japanese cars in France were almost non-existent. The French market was and still is rather highly protected and you just didn't see a lot of Japanese or other non-European things.

Q: You left there in 1974.

JAMES D. PHILLIPS
Political Officer
Paris (1971-1975)

Ambassador Phillips was born in Illinois in 1933. He received his Bachelor's degree from the University of Wichita in 1957 and his Master's in 1958. After serving in the US Army from 1953 to 1955, he entered the Foreign Service in 1961. Postings throughout his career include Paris, Elizabethville, Luxembourg, The Gambia, Copenhagen and Casablanca. Mr. Phillips then became the ambassador to Burundi and Congo. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on May 5, 1998.

PHILLIPS: Yes, I came back from the inspection assignment in 1970 and worked in the European Bureau until the summer of 1971. Then I was assigned to Paris. It is interesting how that assignment came about. Allen Holmes followed internal French political affairs at the embassy, which is among the best jobs in the Foreign Service. Ambassador Arthur Watson, a political appointee who was a son of the founder of IBM, operated without any reference to State Department bureaucracy. He would only deal with Nixon and Kissinger and Rogers. He wanted to move Allen Holmes up from the internal job to be overall head of the political section. It violated personnel practice to move a middle-grade officer into a top Embassy position even at an ambassador's behest. But Ambassador Watson wanted Holmes for the job, so he simply moved him into it. Personnel was enraged and refused to fill the position Holmes had vacated. I got a call from Perry Culley, who by now was DCM in Paris, and he asked me to take the job. I spoke French and had just come from the successful Vietnam inspection assignment and Watson wanted me too. I have an iron rule of never saying no to Paris, so I accepted.

Q: When were you in Paris?

PHILLIPS: I arrived in the summer of 1971 and I stayed until the summer of 1975.

Q: You were in internal politics?

PHILLIPS: Yes, I did internal politics for two years. Do you remember the big student uprising in 1968 in France?

Q: In June of 1968.

PHILLIPS: I should begin by saying that the internal political position in Paris traditionally attracted good officers. Allen Holmes turned out to be a Foreign Service star. Other successful officers such as Wells Stabler and Dean Brown had the job. The attraction was the close contact with French politicians, journalists and intellectuals. The events of 1968 made it even more interesting. Washington did not want to be blind-sided by another massive uprising in France so the Department devoted more resources to following the French political scene. This meant more representation funds, which meant I could make extensive contacts within what the French call "la classe politique." As a result I became very knowledgeable about French politics. I was nominated for the Director General's reporting award for my analysis of the 1973 legislative elections, which I predicted the right-of-center parties would win. I called the election results accurately, within a two seats margin of error. A lot of people thought the Socialist would win that election. But I rightly predicted the right would hold on to power in 1973.

Meanwhile the United States was experiencing its own political upheaval because of Watergate.

Q: You are talking about the Watergate period.

PHILLIPS: The Watergate period. Sometime in 1973 Ambassador Watson got involved in some fracas with an airline stewardess. It got in the papers. I think he had been drinking too much. This was the sort of scandal the Nixon White House didn't need and Watson had to resign. He was replaced by John N. Irwin, who happened to be Watson's brother-in-law. Jack, as he was called, had married one of Watson's sisters. Jack was serving at the time as Undersecretary of State, working with Henry Kissinger who was Secretary. I don't know what the chemistry was between the two men or why exactly Jack left Washington, but he did accept the assignment to Paris. Shortly after he arrived he decided he needed an executive assistant who spoke French and knew his way around Paris and he offered me the job. I accepted with great reluctance because I really did not want to leave internal politics. But I accepted and spent my last two years in Paris as the Ambassador's executive assistant. First I worked in that capacity with Jack Irwin and then with Kenneth Rush, who President Ford named to replace Irwin when he took over from Nixon.

Q: Let's go back to the 1971-1973 period. Relations with France are unique. There is a theme that seems to run through these interviews among those who deal with the French of both admiration and terrible frustration. Here you were inside the monster. How did you find dealing with the French political class?

PHILLIPS: It was very pleasant. No matter how the French appear collectively to the outside world, individually they can be charming. The politicians, the journalists, the academicians were by and large friendly. For example, I had lunch on several occasions with Jacques Chirac and with Francois Mitterrand. Of course they did not hold the positions then that they held later. Mitterrand was the leader of the Socialist opposition at the time and his chances of ever winning the Presidency appeared dim. He was happy enough to be invited to lunch by someone from the embassy. And so were other young socialists who eventually occupied positions of power. Chirac was an assistant to President Pompidou and he hadn't yet made it big on the national scene. The so-called centrist politicians were pro-American and were totally accessible. Only the communists were hard to see, and that was largely the fault of embassy policy.

Q: Was it because you weren't allowed to or you couldn't reach them?

PHILLIPS: You could reach them easily enough. And if you went through a tedious Embassy clearance process you could meet with them. But contact with the communists was mainly handled by the CIA. Everything was so predictable in those days you didn't gain a lot by taking a communist out to lunch. You knew you would get the party line. But the socialists were very open. The Gaullists were difficult on policy issues, but individually there were easy enough to get along with. Those most friendly towards the United States and the ones we worked most closely with were the parties of the center. The Radicals, the Giscardians, the Christian Socialists, and so forth - remember France has a multi-party system. The center parties were pro-European Community, less nationalistic than the Gaullist and more pro-American than the Socialists. They were critical of DeGaulle's decision to withdraw from NATO, for example. Neither the center-left nor the center-right was virulently anti-American, but both were suspicious of United States policies.

Q: Did you find the suspicion was the official policy or when you got to know them was there much interest in what we were doing?

PHILLIPS: No, not really. I could actually write a book on this. The French, since World War II, have had a terrible inferiority complex that often plays out in relations with the United States. France was genuinely opposed to what we were doing in Vietnam. But then no Europeans particularly liked our Vietnam policies. But in addition, the French did not want to see us succeed where they had failed. There was also a French tendency to side with third world countries because they saw them as underdogs. But at the same time most Frenchmen, regardless of party, were defensive about Algeria. Remember the French exit from Algeria in the early 1960s was a traumatic national experience. It caused a deep split in French society that nearly resulted in civil war. French politicians did not like to be reminded of Algeria and they certainly resented any comparison between their Algerian experience and America's Vietnam experience. So there was jealousy and some hypocrisy combined with the very real concern that U.S. dominance in world affairs would undermine French culture and its place in the world. The feeling was summed up by De Gaulle's insistence that the world acknowledge "a certain idea of France," which makes no sense to a non-Frenchman, but which resonates across all ideological lines in France. He was appealing to the French pride in France's history, to its sense of grandeur. But this said, France was part of the west as opposed to the communist east. The average Frenchman loved American movies and jazz, and most French people were sincerely pleased to spend time with an American who spoke some French. So there was ambivalence about America, if not exactly a love/hate relationship, that still exists today.

Q: In regards to the Gaullists on NATO, was it implicate that the French thought that they could have independence from NATO but that if they needed help NATO would be there to protect them?

PHILLIPS: Well, they would not admit it in those words, but that was the case. DeGaulle had a policy he called "tout azimut" which meant that French missiles were aimed both east and west. The policy was meant to show that France believed in a threat from the United States as well as from the Soviet Union. But this policy didn't survive De Gaulle's departure. There was a feeling that the United States was a hegemonious power that poised a threat to French culture and influence. French policy accordingly was to try to weaken United States influence in general, but not to make it so weak that the U.S. could not defend Europe if needed. The official who most personified this approach was the Foreign Minister, Michele Jobert. Jobert, who was married to an American woman and knew America very well, was extremely difficult to deal with. He saw himself in competition with Henry Kissinger for attention on the world stage. He made life difficult for American diplomats. He was very critical of U.S. policy towards Europe and of course Vietnam. His attitude came partly from adherence to Gaullists ideology and partly from political ambition. He knew President Pompidou was ill and he thought that playing the anti-American card would make him popular enough to have a shot at succeeding him. He actually ran for president when Pompidou died but only got about three percent of the vote.

Q: What about on the left side? We had the Kissinger government. They were very suspicious of the Kissinger State Department. He was both NSC and Secretary of State. He was very leery of socialist governments in Europe. How did you find the socialists and what kind of emanations were you getting from the European Bureau about them?

PHILLIPS: Kissinger was fearful of the socialists throughout Europe, but especially in France. In France they could only win power through an alliance with the communists. Throughout this period the communists averaged about 20 percent of the vote in local and national elections. The socialist averaged less, but even if they were to win as much as thirty 30 percent of the vote they would still need communists votes for a majority. Kissinger was very upset when the Salazar regime fell to a socialist government in Portugal. He was prepared to do anything he could to thwart the left in France, but there was not much he could do. Until Mitterrand took over the socialist party no one seriously gave a socialist-communist alliance much chance of winning power. But Mitterrand was one of the most cunning, Machiavellian political leaders of the late 20th Century. In 1964, the socialist candidate for President got about five percent of the vote, and that's where the Socialists were when Mitterrand became party leader in 1965. He gradually made the Socialist party the largest party in France. He flirted with the communists but never actually let them get too close, and he used his formidable intelligence and debating skills to present a coherent vision of economic reform. He handled the communists deftly, in effect slowly marginalizing them. Of course the communists were marginalizing themselves to a large degree by blindly supporting Soviet policies that were becoming more and more unpopular in France. By the time a left coalition won power the Socialists were dominate and the Communists were very much the junior partner.

Q: What year did the socialists come into power?

PHILLIPS: The socialists came into power for the first time in the early 1980s.

Q: Did you find that the communists being the running dog of Moscow, were not really a power to be reckoned with?

PHILLIPS: They held a unique position in French society for many years. The communist party was both a kind of religion and the main social organization for many working class Frenchmen. It was their support system when they got fired or became ill or needed money. It was very strong in blue collar districts. But nationwide it could never win more than twenty percent of the vote. While it was very unlikely that the communists would come to power in France on their own, they formed a large enough voting bloc in the National Assembly to be a force to be reckoned with, but reckoned with ironically more as a bogeyman than as a political partner. The Gaullists and the Centrists used the communist threat to argue that the left was unfit to govern, and this tactic worked until the economy changed dramatically. Blue collar workers started getting better salaries, working conditions improved, immigrants started doing the lion's share of hard menial labor. This lead to a less militant French work force and workers began to see their interests better served by the socialists than the communists.

Q: Were you reporting and watching the building efforts in the socialist ranks during your time there?

PHILLIPS: Oh, yes. We were following the socialists very carefully. We saw that they were beginning to make progress. We saw that Mitterrand was a consummate politician.

Q: While you were in France did you find yourself under pressure to explain American policy under Nixon and Kissinger? I would think the theme of their policies would be respected because the French always tried to look for themes.

PHILLIPS: I didn't deal with much the foreign office. I dealt with the politicians and the journalists. My contacts were interested in the game of French politics and they had little time for foreign policy issues. If we sat down to lunch and I said, "I saw Mitterrand on television last night," that would get them going and they would talk non-stop. Their only interest in U.S. policy was how it impacted on French politics.

Q: What about the French press?

PHILLIPS: The French press is quite different from the American press. Le Monde is the journal of record and while it tries to be somewhat neutral it has a pro-left slant. The rest of the papers are party organs. Le Figaro is establishment Gaullist, for example, and Combat is socialist. You knew in advance exactly what line most papers would take on a given subject. The journalists I dealt with, political analysts such as Bernard Lefort, were the James Restons' of France. I had an expense account that allowed me to invite them to nice restaurants for lunch or dinner. They were very sophisticated and well aware of the inconsistencies in French policies. They were also quite cynical about the politicians. The politicians themselves were willing to explain their positions to me. There were never any shouting matches or acrimonious arguments, which might have been expected given the sometimes tense relations between France and the United States. But then I was dealing with party leaders, not rank-and-file hotheads. Speaking of my expense account, there was a family joke that my job description should be "lunch-eater" because I frequently invited people to lunch. When I got a promotion in 1992, someone at school asked my youngest daughter Catherine, who was seven or eight at the time, what I got promoted to and she said in all seriousness, "dinner-eater, I guess."

Q: This brings up another subject. You were dealing with these two groups, the political press and the politicians. Did you get involved with the French intellectuals?

PHILLIPS: I mainly dealt with people from the political class which includes some intellectuals. The political class consists of some several thousand people, mainly living in Paris. It includes the politicians themselves, political junkies that follow them, print, television and radio journalists and a few people from the universities. The ones from the university were really on the fringes. They would write analytical and historical books, but were less involved in day to day politics. I had contact with people like Philip Alexander, a prolific author and radio commentator, who was clearly an intellectual as opposed to a politician. But the kinds of intellectuals you may be thinking of, like Jean Paul Sartre, weren't among my contacts.

Q: Did you find any of this approach that I have found in looking at French movies, this Cartesian way of looking at things. Americans thinking this is the way it happened because it happened. The French think there is always a great plan behind events. Did this enter into the political scene at all?

PHILLIPS: Yes it did. I think without falling into the trap of characterizing a whole people one way or another one can say that some specific French character traits do exist. And such traits were pervasive among people I dealt with. For instance, if Kissinger so much as mentioned Africa in a speech, my French friends would study it, analysis it and ponder whether it meant America was about to challenge French influence in their former colonies. They would always see minor pieces of the puzzle as part of some master plan. I would explain that Kissinger's speech writer probably just wanted to get in a plug for Africa at the behest of someone in the State Department African bureau. But they would remain unconvinced.

Q: Given the events of June 1968 for internal politics were you looking at the students?

PHILLIPS: Yes, we were. We had contact with student groups. We had a program which I think worked extremely well. It was managed by USIA and was called the leader grant program. Now I believe it is called the international visitors program. An embassy board selected young French leaders for one month travel grants to the United States. I was a member of the board and was able to nominate candidates. Because of my job a disproportionate number of my nominees were selected. Let's say we had 25 grants in a given year. Ten to 12 of those would be my nominees. I would try to pick young men and women who had been active student leaders. We hoped that exposure to the United States would give them a more realistic idea of America.

Q: What was your impression of what the French University was teaching? Was it pretty Marxist? Leftist?

PHILLIPS: The philosophy and history departments had a very left of center bent. The professors were strongly influenced by the intellectuals who emerged after World War II, many of whom were communists, or were deeply influenced by working side by side with communists during the resistance. The universities were a great strength of the left.

Q: You came a couple of years after the 1968 period. Were the student leaders following the same pattern that happens in other countries in that they were much less active after they left the university life?

PHILLIPS: Sure, because you have to make a distinction between the regular universities and the Grandes Ecoles, such as Science Politique and ENA. Acceptance at one of these prestigious graduate schools automatically assures a promising career in government. A lot of the leaders of the 1968 student uprising were very bright and were co-opted into the elite graduate schools. Many of them ended up as high ranking government officials.

Q: What was your impression of how Dick Watson, the ambassador, dealt with the French government?

PHILLIPS: I don't have much insight into that. When he dealt with me, it was mainly about who was going to win the elections. Since I could tell him what he wanted to hear, that the Right would win, I always found him to be very congenial and jovial. I think he was very difficult for some people in the embassy to work with. He had a bit of a Jekyll and Hyde personality. At times he could be charming and he often showed genuine concern for his staff. He never spent a penny of his representation money. It all went to us so we were never out of pocket for our entertainment needs. He would give wonderful parties at the residence and make sure that junior officers were invited. But he could also be very difficult. I think he was frustrated because he wanted to run the embassy like a business, which really can't be done, and because the French were so often uncooperative. I don't think it was an especially happy time for him.

Q: Wasn't it Watson that told a Marine guard to chop down a tree?

PHILLIPS: That is a true story. Our administration officer was named Pete Skoufis, a wonderful person. He had one lapse in taste though. He bought this artificial tree that he wanted to put in the beautiful entrance hall of the embassy. Of course security wasn't what it is today. People could actually walk into the embassy without going through security, but there was a marine guard on duty around the clock. The tree was made out of rubber or plastic and was supposed to look like a palm tree. Even from a distance though it didn't look real. I don't know why Pete bought the thing. He probably got it out of a catalog and thought it would liven up a dark corner of the entrance hall by the staircase. Well, Ambassador Watson hated the tree. Rumor had it that Watson would stay late sometimes and have a few drinks and maybe get a little tipsy. He hated the tree and came down the staircase one night and saw it standing there and on the spot ordered the Marine guard to take the fire ax and chop it down.

Q: Moving on to when Jack Irwin came and you were his special assistant. What was that like?

PHILLIPS: You have to understand that Jack was an entirely different kind of person than his brother-in-law, Dick Watson. He was a Rhodes scholar, a lawyer and a complete gentleman. He was from Iowa, and I think his family had some money, but nothing like the Watson money. He ended up in New York as a lawyer where he met and married one of the Watson girls. Just before he came to Paris his wife died, so he came as a widower. I guess she had died about a year before he came. He had a son and daughter in college, so he came by himself. He didn't speak French well and was not by nature a very outgoing or loquacious person. But he had great dignity. He was extremely pleasant to work for. I think his life in Paris was probably a bit lonely. He spared no expense to give wonderful dinner parties. He was just the opposite of the French stereotype image of an American. He wasn't brash or loud and he was always beautifully and conservatively dressed. He had the reputation of being one of the best ballroom dancers in New York society and women loved to come to his parties. He had the cache of being part of the IBM family. He was learning French and making real progress. But it was an especially difficult time because of Vietnam and Watergate. Relations with France were not improving. President Pompidou was still alive and Foreign Minister Jobert was Jack's main contact and, as I have noted, Jobert was a difficult man. Jack tried to introduce a more civil tone in U.S.-French relations, but he got little support from Nixon who was on his way out. Kissinger preferred to operate independently of the Embassy. If he had something to say to Jobert he would call him directly. Moreover, Jack didn't drink wine, which can be problematic in France. He did not have an easy time in France, but he made a valiant effort. I believe with time he would have been very successful. He was winning the respect of French leaders and he had a superb grasp of the issues.

Q: What was your role as special assistant?

PHILLIPS: The Ambassador had his DCM and his political and economic counselors so I didn't get involved directly in formulating Embassy policy, but I did try to make sure the Ambassador saw the right people. I would go with him on most of his official calls. I tried to get him to meet politically attuned people so that he would understand the political dynamics of France. I did that too on the social side. I worked closely with Allan Holmes who was the political counselor, with John Condon who was the Labor Attaché and with Jack Kubisch, and later Galen Stone, both of whom served as DCM. I helped Jack run his office so that he would be free to devote his time to substantive issues. Because we were often together, I was his closest confidant in many ways. But I don't want to exaggerate the position. All of his top people were first rate and he worked closely with them.

PETER J. SKOUFIS
Administrative Counselor
Paris (1971-1975)

Peter J. Skoufis was born and raised in Bangor, Maine. He entered the Foreign Service in 1947. His career included assignments in France, Italy, South Africa, the Netherlands, and the United Kingdom (England). Mr. Skoufis was interviewed by Thomas Stern in 1992.

SKOUFIS: When my five years were up, I told the Ambassador that I was not going to ask for an extension. I would have been crazy to do so after my experiences. I got a call from some one in Washington who told me that Ambassador Watson in Paris had requested that I replace Ralph Scarritt. I said that I didn't think that Scarritt had been in Paris long enough to be ready for re-assignment. The answer was: "The Ambassador wants you to replace Scarritt!". I knew Watson; he used to fly over from Paris in his own airplane. He loved to go to the Navy PX. He also shopped elsewhere and went to the theater, with his wife and children. He would also visit the Embassy where we would greet him and he would talk to Ambassador Annenberg. So I got to know him; he was a "hail, well met" fellow. As soon as I hung up from that call from Washington, I immediately called Perry Culley who was the DCM in Paris. I wanted to find out what the score was. Perry started to laugh. It was clear that he had cranked up this plot and had convinced the Ambassador that I was available. Culley of course knew that my five years were expiring and therefore had to be re-assigned. I had previously told him that I was supposed to go to Vietnam. I think he talked to John Burns, who really didn't care because he was leaving.

So Culley assured me that the assignment was mine, if I wanted it. It didn't take me long to agree. Who wouldn't want to go to Paris? I then told Ambassador Annenberg about the Paris assignment. He said he knew all about it because his good friend, Dick Watson, had called him to ask about me. He said: "Of course, I had to tell him the truth!".

We had the packers at our house on Friday night and that weekend we drove to Paris on a direct transfer (that was the only condition: no home leave that year). On Monday morning, the moving van was in front of our apartment house in Paris. Helen and I and our maid, whom we had brought from London, got out of our car and began to unpack. Three days later, I was at work at the Embassy, when I found out what had happened to poor Ralph Scarritt. He had run into a buzz saw with the Ambassador. FBO was refurbishing the Rothschild House on Rue St. Honore, which was the official residence. It had been a long term project moving from an empty building to an office for USIS to being a residence and then becoming the ambassador's residence after Congress had appropriated something like a million dollars. Wayne Hayes and Rooney were both instrumental in doing this. The idea was to restore the Rothschild House as a new residence for the Ambassador; then we would sell the Avenue D'Iena residential property, which was near the Eiffel Tower. This was property that the U.S. government had acquired in 1924. It was small and had outlived its usefulness; it had needed a lot of work, but it was a very valuable piece of real estate. FBO had surveyed the situation and had concluded that they could fix the Rothschild House for one million dollars and sell the old residence for two and a half million. So it was net gain for the U.S. government.

So the project got underway. Ralph had worked very closely with FBO on it; as a matter of fact, Leo Riordan of FBO was stationed in Paris to supervise the work. There was a personality problem. On a couple of occasions, Ralph had told the ambassador that there were certain things that couldn't be done. If you have to say "No" to an Ambassador, you better do it very diplomatically, particularly if you are dealing with a titan of industry like Mr. Watson. His father had been the head of IBM and he had had a big role in the same company. These guys are not accustomed to hearing that the rules didn't allow for something they wanted. Apparently Watson's position was that if his wife wanted something, she would get it. So sooner rather than later, both Ralph and Leo were transferred. So the problem was left to me. It was a real headache in terms of finishing the job in time for a move that had been scheduled long ago. Of course, both Mr. and Mrs. Watson were changing the work constantly which didn't help the time schedule. They weren't fussy, but there were some changes they insisted on. The money was being consumed rapidly; there were special panels and cornices and art work that had to be restored. It was very expensive work. The Ambassador himself had contributed something like $400,000 in addition to the appropriation to keep the project going. Most of his money went to buy furniture. It was a funny process. Joe Donelan was back in the Department at the time and was following the project. The Deputy Secretary was John Irvin, who was the Ambassador's brother-in-law. My problem was trying to convince the Ambassador that we had to work within a frame-work, particularly a financial one. When it came time to move, we noticed that several things had fallen between the cracks. Part of it was due that the whole project was financed by a number of allocations and that created problems. We had to pay for something out of one pocket and for others out of another. I could manage that because my mission was to move the Watson's into the new residence on time for a Fourth of July party. That was the target. We had to landscape the gardens.

We finally put together a group that was called "The Friends of 41", because that was the address of the residence on St. Honore. These were public-spirited Americans who lived in Paris; they raised funds to purchase some items for the residence. One of the members was Randy Kidder and his wife; he was a former Foreign Service officer who became the President of the group. It was a very effective device to raise money; their donations became tax deductible. They bought carpets, etc. It was someone else's idea, but I developed and brought into being. Watson's contributions similarly were tax deductible. One time, the FBO supervisor came from Washington and made a "walk through". At the end of it, he declared the FBO role as finished with what ever was left being the Embassy's responsibility. I balked at that. For example, there was a powder room downstairs which did not have toilet paper dispenser in it. The roll of toilet paper sat on top of the tank. He told me that was my problem, not his. I pointed out to him that small problems like that multiplied by the many bathrooms the residence had (I think there must have been twenty) were a major headache and expense. I learned later that there were even difficulties in obtaining toilet seats not to mention other bathroom fixtures. But FBO insisted that those costs come out of the post's Maintenance and Repair budget and that it would not increase our allocation. I needed another $200,000 to get the house ready; just to put the finishing touches on it, like bulb for the chandelier, etc. So I finally called Joe who came through with the necessary funds. I told him that unless I was able to complete the job, I too would be thrown out and the Department would have to find another Administrative Counselor; the Department might as well cough up the dough then because otherwise it might cost even more. In the final analysis, the new residence turned out to be a great success and it was finished in time for the Fourth of July party. After getting that job done, I was in pretty good shape with the Ambassador who turned out to be a very nice guy and a remarkable man.

He was the heir to one of the great fortunes of the world; he was extremely wealthy. He had his wife and six children at the post – three boys and three girls. Some were teenagers and in some difficulties from time to time. He wanted to do everything he could to keep his family together; so he converted an upstairs room into a game room. He bought them a juke box, he bought them a pin ball game machine, he built a movie theater for them. He paid all of that from his own pockets. He did have a very difficult personality. A normal human being has a range of emotions from low to high; Watson was on the extreme of that range at both ends. When he was low, he was the meanest son of bitch you have ever seen. And I mean “mean”. He was mean to his wife, his children, everybody. When he was up, there wasn't a more generous guy around. He would take me to lunch to “Tour de Jacques”. We would sit around and chat. I wondered whether he was just lonesome, but it was just his way of trying to be a nice guy. Sometimes, he would call and tell me that I was working too hard; he would then ask me to come to his office and look at the entrance to Chancery wondering who was parked out there. Sometimes it was our representative to the OECD whose chauffeured car was parked outside. He would then tell me that there wasn't any parking allowed there and if the OECD man wanted to park, he should go into the parking garage. He just didn't want anyone parking in front of the entrance which he over-looked. That was the kind of guy he was. He was a man of tremendous contrasts which was his undoing. He was a heavy drinker, although it was controlled during the day. I never saw him drunk in the office. Helen and I would be invited to the residence periodically with other staff members to see movies – he had a tie in with a movie distributor so he and his kids could see American movies before they were shown in Paris. He would then drink a few scotches and before the evening was over, he was asleep. That was not an uncommon event. One time, he came home on an American passenger aircraft and made a pass at one of the stewardesses. That got into the papers after she reported the event. That forced him to resign.

Mrs. Watson was a very lovely and charming lady. She was easy to work with and not very demanding. Very nice. The children were not spoiled brats because she made sure that it wasn't going to happen. Mr. Watson had his own plane in Paris, as I mentioned. There was a crew of, I think, three people, whom he paid out of his own pockets. He was also a pilot so that he would fly the plane himself on occasions. He didn't travel that often, but he did go to England several times and to Vienna to a Chiefs of Mission conference. I don't think he ever flew his plane to the States.

My office was just under his. After I first arrived, he used to come down the steps. There was a IBM copying machine in the corridor outside my office. He wanted to know where we had gotten it. I said I didn't know. He said: "Get it the hell out of here. I don't want to see any IBM equipment in the offices. The next thing you know, there will be stories in the papers". I told him that we were just in the process of re-equipping the Embassy with IBM electric typewriters. He said that was OK, because that was part of a general government contract worked out in Washington. It turned out that the copying machine was there because the IBM Paris office asked us to try it out; if we had found it satisfactory we would have bought some. But after the Ambassador's comments, it went out. In any case, he came downstairs one day with an envelope full of gasoline receipts for his airplane. He wanted to know if he could get reimbursement for the taxes that were paid, as we did in the Embassy whenever we bought gas for our cars. I told him that I would see if that could be done. I sent a note to the Foreign Office. Then I got a call from the Protocol Office which said that it had no precedent for my request – they never had had an Ambassador with his own airplane. But I said that the logic would seem to apply; if gasoline for our cars were tax exempt, then the same rules should apply to the gasoline for the Ambassador's airplane. The Protocol Officer agreed and in due course, the Ambassador got his reimbursement. Of course, the French had to establish a new procedure and that took some time, but I was told to assure the Ambassador that his taxes would be reimbursed. I said that I didn't think the money was an issue, but that the Ambassador saw it as a matter of principle.

One day, he told me that people were making long distance calls on the Embassy' system. He asked me whether all the calls were business related. I said: "They'd better be!". He wanted to know how I could assure him of that. He instructed me to put a pay station in the Embassy. He then told me that in IBM his father had the phone system so rigged that when any IBM official wanted to make a long-distance call to Europe, a red light would flash in his father's office. That was one of IBM's early fetishes' some of which the son brought with him. So we put a telephone pay station in the Chancery. Of course, no one used it. That was the kind of person Ambassador Watson was. He got along with the French quite well. He spoke French; he had been educated in France and had spent a good deal of time there when IBM was starting in France. That is where the headquarters of IBM World Trade was established; there was a big IBM complex just in back of the Embassy where both the European and France offices were located. So he had spent considerable time in France before becoming ambassador. Of course, through him, we met many of the IBM people. He would see them socially, but I not aware that he ever intervened on IBM's behalf. He tried to be very careful about those relationships, as my story about the copier illustrates. Ambassador Watson was also a very generous patron of the American school which was attended by all his children.

In any case, serving with Ambassador Watson was a very interesting experience. He was the Republican member of the family; his brother, Tom, was a Democrat. The family covered both sides. Tom later went to the USSR as Ambassador in the Carter administration. Shortly after Arthur Watson left Paris, his brother-in-law, John Irvin was appointed. The contrast in personalities was amazing. Ambassador Irvin was as fine a gentleman as you would ever want to meet. He was a widower – his wife, a Watson, had passed away some years earlier. He came to Paris with his son and daughter who were young teenagers at the time. It was a lovely family; the Ambassador was very devoted to his two children. They went to school in Paris, although the son eventually returned to the States to complete his education. Irvin had been the Deputy Secretary and therefore knew the system well. We had no problem in running the Embassy. He spoke French and had a very good relationship with the French. Culley, who had been the DCM, retired when Watson did and became the head of the American Hospital in Paris. The new DCM was Jack Kubisch with whom I worked closely. The Paris Embassy became a very conventional and good operation. There were no major problems.

The major difference between London and Paris was in the Ambassadorial style of the two principals. Annenberg ran his Embassy differently from a traditional style. Paris was much more the norm. Both were big Embassies with their usual problems. A freeze on travel, for example, which occurred from time to time took its toll on morale. Fortunately, it didn't happen very often, but when it did it had a bigger impact because more people were involved. My biggest problem in Paris was a financial one because the rate of exchange between the dollar and the franc kept changing in favor of the franc. It had been 6:1 or 7:1 or 8:1; it slid down to 3.8:1. It was very hard for the Department to obtain more dollars to match these changes in exchange rates. I remember very vividly the time we had to do a local wage survey; we were way behind on our pay scales because we had not been able to keep up with the inflation that was occurring in France. The Department sent a team to make the survey which showed that a sizeable increase was due to our local employees. We were faced with a very touchy situation; there was some discussion of a strike. Nothing fortunately developed. I finally convinced the Department to approve the new wage scale by surrendering a number of local positions; we cut back on motor pool services; we cut positions out of the administrative section and forced other sections to cut back as well. Those reductions, which included American positions as well, enable EUR finally to finance the new wage scale. That was an example of the kind of administrative problems we had to face.

Both London and Paris were qualitatively well staffed. Those posts attracted very good officers; the section chiefs were all good. Hank Cohen was the head of the Political Section; Allen Holmes was there. Many of the staff became ambassadors later and you could tell that would be so even in their junior years. They were sharp.

We had a very good relationship with other agencies. In both London and Paris we went through the periodic reduction of staffs exercises (BALPA, for example). In London we surveyed all U.S. government activities in England. We found several military units that were remnants of World War II – assessing damage from strategic bombings, etc. But we told the Department that these units were the responsibilities of the DoD and that the Embassy would not pass judgment on them, but would look at all civilian activities. We found a guy in North Scotland from the Weather Bureau which was a part of the Department of Commerce. His job was to send balloons up to test the weather over the Arctic or somewhere.

PETER K. MURPHY
Consular Officer
Paris (1971-1975)

Principal Officer

Nice (1975-1977)

Peter K. Murphy was born in Boston, Massachusetts in 1936. He received a bachelor's degree from Boston College in 1959 and served in the U.S. Army from 1959-1960. Mr. Murphy joined the Foreign Service in 1962. His career included positions in France, Argentina, Italy, and Germany. He was interviewed on April 4, 1994 by William D. Morgan.

MURPHY: Following Milan we returned once again to Paris - for three and a half more years!

Q: Is this unusual?

MURPHY: I suppose it is. However, I bid on the Visa job which was open at the Paris Embassy - and was assigned to it. I did know the DCM at the time - Perry Culley - but he exerted no influence to bring about my reassignment to France. It was indeed a very interesting period to be in Paris - during the great student uprisings of the early '70s. Many of the public student demonstrations at the time were in protest of our Cuban policy - as well, of course, as our involvement in Vietnam. Many of these large and vocal demonstrations greeted us as we left work in the evening - and attempted to walk home through the Place de la Concorde. At the same time, there was also the "Algerian question" which was consuming the French - the national animosity against the pied noir living in France as well as the many Algerians themselves - and the resulting bombs plastique which continually exploded in the streets of Paris. I remember getting caught in one such demonstration one evening in the Latin Quarter - and being chased by the police through the streets.

Q. What years were you there, Peter?

MURPHY: This was 1972 to 1975.. There was also great "unrest" also in the consular world because of the fact that Vietnam fell during that period. France was heavily involved because of its strong ties to Indochina. As a result, many of the former south Vietnamese government officials came to France.....although their ultimate destination was the United States.

In Paris, I worked with Alice Clement in the Visa Section. Remember Alice Clement?

Q: I do indeed, but the reader perhaps doesn't. She needs a little parentheses.

MURPHY: Alice Clement was a consular officer from the Washington, DC area. A very distinguished woman from a socially-prominent Washington family, Alice was the Chief of the Visa Section at that time.

Q: Things hadn't changed that much when you got back?.

MURPHY: The staff was smaller - but the work was still there. The lines for consular services of all types were never ending. We were cramped in our Visa quarters - which, at the time, were located in the Hotel Talleyrand - a French government building leased to our government. It was located at the corner of the Place de la Concorde - across from the Jardine des Tailors. As you well know, Bill, the building was not at all designed as an office building - but rather a luxurious town house (or, rather, palace!) for Talleyrand. It was most impractical for the Visa Section - with the USIS offices being located on the upper floors.

Q: Wasn't this the former headquarters of the German SS when the Nazis occupied Paris?

MURPHY: Exactly. That's the place.

Q: With prisons.

MURPHY: I never did go down to the basement to see the reputed Nazi interrogation chambers and cells..

Q: You didn't.

MURPHY: No, I never did visit that area of the building. I heard of it often enough from the Marines but never ventured down there. Alice was the head of the Visa Section and I was the Deputy. I also had a "political hat" and this centered around working closely with our Political Section regarding the "Peace Talks" with the Vietnamese. As you recall, these talks took place in Paris. You'll also remember, perhaps, the months the two delegations spent discussing the shape of the conference table. - and similar important matters!

Q: Was Kissinger there at this conference?

MURPHY: Henry Kissinger did eventually did show up for the final phases of the negotiations. It was a very interesting period for me. It was also around the time we began our secret talks with the People's Republic of China - prior to Kissinger's secret visit to Beijing - via Pakistan.

Q: How were you involved? You mentioned you were assigned to the Visa Section?

MURPHY: The question of visas was a central part of our government's initial talks with the Chinese. You will recall that our first talks with the PRC involved the exchange, first of Ping-Pong players - and subsequently of personnel in the medical field. These exchanges naturally involved the issuance of visas to the Chinese - and this was all arranged at our Embassy in Paris. Not having any US diplomatic offices in the PRC, the Chinese participants were obliged to visit our Embassy in Paris prior to travel to the United States. I visited the Chinese Embassy on several occasions - and the Chinese diplomats, in turn, came to see me at my office in the Hotel Talleyrand - just off the Place de la Concorde. After three or four meetings regarding this subject, I was joined by Ambassador Thomas Watson (our ambassador in Paris - of the IBM Watson family) who would speak with the Chinese Ambassador while I discussed the initial exchanges with my counterpart. Each visit to the Chinese Embassy was very closely controlled by Washington. Watson did manage to get into difficulty the first couple of times - because he drank too much of the Chinese wine - or whatever it was that they insisted on offering to us!

Q: You would go as a representative of the Consular Section?

MURPHY: Yes. These meetings were all held very closely. There wasn't a word in the press at the time that the two countries were speaking. The direct result of the talks was, of course, the eventual secret visit of the then Secretary of State Kissinger to China (via Pakistan, I believe) to prepare the way for the historic visit to the PRC of President Richard M. Nixon..

My talks with the Chinese were very, interesting both to Washington - and I am sure - to Beijing as well. It was the first time they were talking to us 'imperialist dogs.'

Q: But your relationship with your counterpart was normal?

MURPHY: Oh, yes Bill, it was quite a normal relationship. As a matter of fact, it developed into what might in those days be called a 'friendship'. As you can imagine, it was quite difficult to become friendly with a Chinese communist in those days.

Q: The Ping-Pong players were the symbol of that.

MURPHY: That's right. When I left Paris, the Chinese Consul General gave me a gift of a rather inexpensive Chinese screen wall hanging. But I'm sure it was one of the first gifts that was given by the communist government to a United States government official by a PRC representative.

Q: Did you dare tell anybody you got it?

MURPHY: Oh, yes. Everyone in the Embassy knew it. In fact - just the acceptance of this token gift was the subject of telegraphic exchanges with Washington! I was instructed to reciprocate in kind! I don't know where the wall hanging is today. I believe I threw it away - during one of our many moves around the world.

In any event, it was a very exciting period.

Q: Was that through those three years?

MURPHY: Yes, throughout the three years. Well, I think that period was probably about a year and a half.

Another aspect of that job was also interviewing all these ex-officials in the Vietnamese government. All these Ambassadors from all kinds of countries, Ministers of government, etc. Many of them had been directed by our Ambassadors, our Embassies in various parts of the world, "Oh, go to Paris. They'll take care of you."

Q: "Take care of you" in what sense?

MURPHY: Well, take care of you and get you a visa. They'll get you to the States. "You'll feel much more at home in Paris. You can study there. You'll speak French."

Q: "Get out of my territory."

MURPHY: Exactly. "Go to the next consular district."

Q: But a Consul could have functioned in any place in the world with these people. They were refugees, weren't they?

MURPHY: They were, in effect, refugees. One time, I'll never forget, one day my secretary said to me, "You have twenty-nine people waiting to see you. Twenty-six are Ambassadors, and the rest are Ministers." I said, "Well, qu'est Ce qu'on peut faire?" "We have to begin. Should I take them in order of seniority?"

It was most difficult to work in those conditions because Kissinger and company were promising the moon to all these people and we would have to say, "No, I'm sorry you don't qualify for immigration. You're going to have roots in your own garden." Or, "You don't qualify for refugee status," whatever it is, and then go away and two days later we would get a direct cable from State saying "Minister Ngynon Vong Dong Meking Yeon (or what ever his name was) has been offered a full professorship at Princeton. Give him a J-2 visa."

Q: But, refresh our memories on this. Refugee status? These people could not be refugees...

MURPHY: No.

Q: ...because they were allowed to live in France, is that right?

MURPHY: They were. They were accepted as refugees by the French government. But many of them came to our Embassy thinking they could claim refugee status in the United States as well. So we would have to convince them that they'd been resettled in France and therefore had no claim for resettlement in our country.

Q: And maybe many of them had French nationality because they'd lived in ...?

MURPHY: Yes - some did, Bill. It was amazing to me to learn how many of these people had very close friends in the highest echelons of our government. They figured that just by mentioning certain names, we would give them visas.

Q: There are those that argue that.

MURPHY: That's right. Hundreds of these people - former Vietnamese government officials - came through our Embassy in Paris - on the way to new lives in the United States. Many more, of course, settled in France and in the Midi there are entire villages which are Vietnamese.

Q: But so many of them, as my barber, under a refugee program. You might clarify for the reader who are those people in that period, particularly.

MURPHY: I think that those people, you mentioned your barber, those people were ordinary Vietnamese that had nothing to do with the government so they could qualify for refugee status. They went to neighboring countries like Laos, Hong Kong.

Q: And had no title to French nationality?

MURPHY: No, they had no French nationality. They had no other alternatives.

Q: No alternatives?

MURPHY: They had no standing with the former government in Saigon.

Q: They were technically, and this one part of it, there were people in France who could qualify as refugees, though, I presume? There were Vietnamese who...?

MURPHY: Yes, there were. There were refugees that managed to get to Vietnam and were brought actually.... Some of them clandestinely came into the country.

Q: Did you administer that program in Paris?

MURPHY: No, I didn't administer that. I took care of most of the Vietnamese government officials.

Q: I see. And refugees who were veritable refugees were taken...

MURPHY: They were taken care of by our Section.

Q: By the Section?

MURPHY: Yes, by our Visa Section and also an INS representative as well.

Q: The immigration officer for the people who ultimately proved...?

MURPHY: Granted them Refugee Status, yes.

Q: That was an interesting period. Sad.

MURPHY: It was a very interesting period. It was also indeed very sad. I thought constantly of the thousands of our fellow citizens who had lost their lives in Vietnam. Such a useless loss of life! There was a lot of sympathy on the part of the French government for the Vietnamese refugees, of course, because of their history in that part of the world.

Q: The French accepted many of the people.

MURPHY: You'd be amazed how many they did accept! There are entire villages in France - even today - which are Vietnamese.

Q: That sense of obligation, maybe, to these people? As we have a sense of obligation, too.

MURPHY: Yes, exactly. But I must say that I admire the Vietnamese people greatly. They are a very clever people, extremely family oriented, very intelligent and very hard workers. All you have to do is look around Washington, DC at successful businesses- - or look at the list of Phi Beta Kappa graduates at our universities these days! The campuses of Harvard and MIT are full of Asian faces. I believe they are the hope for the future of our nation and are destined for great things. I would not at all be surprised if there were an Asian-American elected President of the country by 2050!

Oh - I should mention a rather particular visa case I encountered during this period in Paris, Bill. It involved the noted Soviet musician (cellist) Mstislav Rostropovich - his wife Galina Vishnevskaya and their two daughters. One cold winter day towards the close of business at the Embassy - dark, windy and very cold - as only a Paris winter late-afternoon can be - I was about to see my last appointment of the day - Mrs. Arthur Rubenstein. I believe this was in the winter of 1978. I went out to the waiting room and found her engaged in deep and animated conversation with a short, pudgy Russian who was introduced to me as "Slava" Rostropovich. I confess I did not recognize the name but Mrs. Rubenstein told me he was a well known musician in the Soviet Union. She also offered to translate for the gentleman as he spoke no French or English. It turned out that the Soviet government had given Rostropovich, his wife and children permission to come to Paris for a series of concerts - but he was obliged to return to Moscow immediately upon their conclusion - which was in a week or so - from the date of our meeting. Rostropovich had, in the meanwhile, received an invitation (which he showed to me) to perform three concerts at Lincoln Center in New York City. He had been that morning to visit the consular section of the Soviet Embassy in Paris to request that his passport be amended to permit a week's travel for himself and family in New York. The Soviet authorities laughed at him and said that it would take the Foreign Ministry at least two months to reply to such a request - and the answer would surely be NO! Rostropovich was really worked up at this point in the conversation and threw his passport on my desk. "You tell them they can keep it", he said to me. "I want to be stateless. I'll give up my Soviet citizenship if they won't let me go to New York." I calmed him down and told him that I knew my colleague - the Soviet Consul General - and would speak with him in the morning. Rostropovich arranged to return to my office - with Mme. Rubenstein - the following day. In my conversation the next morning with the Soviet Consul General, I explained what I knew of the situation - and told him that his nation would lose one of its greatest musicians if he was unable to obtain permission for the short visit to New York. Needless to say, permission arrived from Moscow in two days - - and off the family went to New York City.....never to return to the Soviet Union! Their flight was denounced in the most vile of terms by the Soviets and the family was stripped of their Soviet citizenship. A couple of years later, Prince Rainier of Monaco granted the family Monegasque Service Passports to enable them to travel at will. We often saw Slava and Galina over the years - and where ever he was performing, my wife and I had gratis front row seats. When he became director of the National Symphony in Washington (Kennedy Center) we often heard him perform. We were invited to both daughters' weddings. Also, at the palace in Monaco, Slava performed for a select group for the 25th Wedding Anniversary of the Prince and Princess. We were guests in the Palace at that time for the weekend of celebrations - having come from Genova where we were posted. Jackie got to hear the concert but, alas!, I was obliged to leave half way through the weekend as that was the time the President Ronald Reagan was shot coming out of the Hilton Hotel in Washington DC.....but that is another story. I would only like to say that Slava and his wife are among the most delightful people I have ever met. They will be ever grateful to me for my small part in their escape to the West - at a time when travel was extremely difficult for Soviet citizens - -- even world famous Soviet citizens!

To continue - - - From the Embassy in Paris, I went on to my next post as Consul in Nice and U. S. representative in the Principality of Monaco.

Q: Excuse me, one last thing before we leave Paris. You were in the Visa Section all the time in Paris?

MURPHY: The entire time, yes. But as I mentioned, much of my work was political in content in addition to being consular. You'll recall that those years were very "political years" - with Vietnam, public protests against U.S. policy in Asia, etc. I worked very closely with our Vietnamese peace delegation meeting in Paris; with our Embassy Political Section, and with other sections of the Mission.

Q: Did you notice... one last question..... again to compare Paris: had the Embassy improved in terms of the management of the consular section, in terms of the openness?

MURPHY: Yes, actually it was a breath of fresh air to see the changes made in the ten year interim period. As a matter of fact, I thought sometimes the Administration of the Embassy had become a bit too relaxed!! David Betts was the Consul General when I arrived in Paris to begin my second tour there. Ruth McClendon was the Consul head of the Overseas Citizens Unit. And, of course, Alice Clement. We did have officers of great experience in the consular function in Paris at that time. I must confess that I sometimes had a difficult time with some of the junior officers, in that...

Q: Had a generation phase begun?

MURPHY: Yes, it was certainly a generational phase. And also, for the first time in my career, I ran into young officers who were in complete disagreement with our Immigration and Nationality laws. Some of these young officers completely disregarded the laws and regulations - - and had no qualms telling me that they did so! The openness towards superiors was astounding to me. One day a young officer came to my office and said, "I think you should know before I begin to work for you I am listed as a "some-time marijuana user" according to the Medical Unit of the Department of State." Of course, I was floored. I'd never heard young FSOs make such statements before. I figured that I had better adjust - - but it was not easy!

Q: What did your leadership and you, aware that this new generation was coming,.....that the generation of the '60s had been brought in..... how did you and your leaders face this?

MURPHY: Looking back on that period..... All the directives coming out of the Department in those days, especially from the Office of Personnel, encouraged us to help younger officers "develop and grow" at post. In my own case - I appreciated this guidance. I had been out of the United States for almost ten years - - and tremendous changes had taken place on our university campuses. The Department's guidance, in my opinion, was really appropriate. It may not have been timely - and certain disasters occurred before the DOS issued such directives and guidance for managers in the field - but the Department came through in the end. I think this was very necessary at the time. Some of my most pleasurable moments, when I look back, are the manner in which I was able to work with and to encourage junior officers to grow in a professional way. Some of these officers were very discouraged working in the enormous visa mill - that was Paris at that particular period. They were usually first-tour offices.

Q: Maybe they didn't know the French language that well....in order to enjoy the local...?

MURPHY: That's right, Bill. The city was new to some, them - the language - the loneliness. I am thinking of one particular officer.... the son of an Ambassador. He would come to me almost in tears at the end of a busy work day....and tell me he couldn't stand it anymore. He told me he didn't join the Foreign Service out of choice; he was pushed into it by his parents. He claimed he didn't know his parents well but was raised and educated by nannies and maids at embassies around the world. His parents, he said, were people who were forever going to cocktails, receptions and dinner parties every evening of the week. There was a lot of resentment built up in this young man.

I simply listened to him and tried to encourage him. I told him that his next post would certainly be much better. I explained how my posting in Cordoba was so different from Paris..... and how you grow at each post; you have different responsibilities.... the work is more interesting in one place than another. Sure, I could understand why he was discouraged in this huge mill in Paris. The lines build up at 5:00 in the morning to get visas....and it was his job to listen to sad tales all day of people attempting to enter the United States. He found it very difficult to refuse a visa application....the sadder and more heart rendering the tale, the more he was inclined to issue the visa!!

Q: To me that is true human management. Were you given help? Were your leaders given help from the establishment, from the Department of State, to advise the junior officers this way?

MURPHY: I can't recall any specific guidance. We were certainly encouraged to advise young officersbut no one told us how to go about it. This was left to our own devices. I would often have long talks with these young men and women. Just listening to them was, I think, most beneficial.

To go back to this particular young man, Bill: when I encouraged him to stay in the service and just accept the next assignment, which I thought for sure was going to be better, he came to me one day and pushed a telegram in front of my face and said, "Now what do you think of that, Murphy?" He was assigned to Lubumbashi!!!.

Q: This is before the invasion?

MURPHY: Yes, before the invasion. So, I had to quickly think of something good about Lubumbashi to encourage him to go there. He did - and he eventually met his wife there. I am really happy to say today this officer is still in the Foreign Service. He is now one of our most distinguished Chinese experts and holds a position of leadership in the Department.

Q: The moral is, the boss in the early phases is very important.

MURPHY: It's true, Bill: the boss IS very, very important. You have to pay attention to people's gripes: and even if you don't agree with them..... they gripe about work, the way it's done, the way an Embassy is managed, the structure, the formality.

Q: And it will be changing. You saw the generational change in the '60s.

MURPHY: We've both seen the change from the '60s. For sure, in the year 2050, the Foreign Service will be quite different.

Q: And the Department of State will continue not to advise us how to do it.

MURPHY: You can be sure of that!

MURPHY: I went to Nice from Paris for my next assignment.

Q: It doesn't sound like a hardship post? Doesn't one normally have to go to..... Lubumbashi?

MURPHY: The assignment from Paris to Nice came about in a most unusual way! I did know Ambassador Watson - via our Chinese talks - fairly well. Normally, as you well know Bill - a consular officer in a large Embassy like Paris would not come to the attention of the ambassador too often !!

Q: Above all,an IBM Watson.... an a political appointee, at that!

MURPHY: No, that's for sure. Above all, not Watson. But I got along well with him. He did have a serious problem in Nice. Eleanor Hicks, a second tour officer, was our Consul on the Cote d'Azur. Eleanor caused all kinds of headaches for the Embassy in Paris. The story goes that this officer was chosen personally by President Richard M. Nixon to be our Consul in Nice. She was a young black girl who was quite bright and was serving at the time at our Embassy in Bangkok. During a Vice Presidential visit to Thailand, "control officer" Eleanor Hicks came to Nixon's attention. She was assigned from Bangkok to Nice. In spite of her obvious high IQ, I believe the assignment was just a bit too much for her. She was in over her head.

Q: She was qualified in the sense that she...?

MURPHY: Very bright young lady.

Q: ...had French?

MURPHY: She spoke beautiful French. However, she was out to enhance her own image, rather than the government's. It was evident in everything she did.

Q: Many people do that!

MURPHY: That's true!! But Eleanor was most successful at it. She appeared in every newspaper and magazine in Europe as well as many in the United States. Henry Kissinger once asked me to describe her abilities and to explain what made her so attractive to the European press. He said that at times Eleanor got more press coverage than he did!! As our meeting was six months after he left his position as Secretary of State, Kissinger immediately thought better of his question. He said, "No, they wouldn't let me speak to her when I was Secretary of State, so I really don't have the right to ask you now." In any event, Eleanor Hicks had her very own Public Relations firm in Nice - and also a contract with a national firm in Paris. She made a movie in Yugoslavia and also she played musical instruments in the Casino bands on the Riviera! Strange behavior for an American diplomat, don't you agree? In short - Eleanor Hicks was the most unconventional consul in the Foreign Service at that time. The final straw for the State Department (and the immediate cause of my assignment to Nice!) was Eleanor's involvement in a hit-and-run accident on the road between Nice and Cannes. Apparently she ran down an elderly man while she was driving to keep an appointment with the Captain of a US Naval vessel in the harbor of Cannes. She was charged with manslaughter by the local Court. For that reason, she had to be pulled out of the post immediately - especially since French Government were starting to express "concern" at her non-diplomatic activity.

As you can well imagine, Bill, Eleanor Hicks did not do much diplomatic work at the office. She had no time!! To get the "real story of Eleanor Hicks" you should interview ex-FSO Bill Tilney - recently Mayor of San Antonio, Texas - who served as Eleanor's Deputy during that rocky period in Nice! His stories would make your hair curl!

Q: Just one small point here. Comparing that tragedy, I mean it is in a sense a tragedy...

MURPHY: I, too, consider the whole episode a tragedy for us as Americans - - especially the damage done to our country's throughout the South of France. There were, at that time, about 16,000 American's residing in the Nice Consular District as well as a huge foreign community. America has considerable influence in that part of France - and many of the third country nationals who lived there were involved with commerce with American partners.

Q: Pressures are tremendous.

MURPHY: What was most difficult for my wife and I was starting to work in the Nice area. This resulted from the fact that Eleanor Hicks never paid her personal bills on time. Her bills were everywhere - - her residence, the gas company, the phone company, dress shops, etc. The consular was constantly being visited by bill collectors.

Q: Oh, of course.

MURPHY: Thousands of dollars worth of telephone bills, water bills, gas bills, that were her personal responsibility, but they reflected on the United States government. My wife, who was looking for a residence at the time, was rebuffed at every turn. Real estate agents said, "No, no, the American government - - we can not rent to you."

Q: "You don't pay your bills." But in comparison to the tragedy that befell the Cordoba Principal Officer and the so-called..... I won't call it a "cover-up story".... but how did the Department handle this tragedy in Nice? Did they talk about Eleanor Hicks?

MURPHY: No public announcement regarding the officer was ever made by the Department. Eleanor Hicks was pulled back to Washington very quickly. Unbelievably, within six months she was promoted! The Ambassador in Paris at that time, Kenneth Rush (former Ambassador to Germany and former president of Union Carbide) telephoned me in Nice and said, "Peter, I don't understand how this could happen. How could she get promoted?" I told him that I fully understood the reason! Her superiors at the Embassy never commented on her extra-curricular activity in her annual Efficiency Reports sent to Washington. When a Promotion Board has a report in front of it indicating how wonderful an officer is ..."

Q: You promote her.

MURPHY: "You promote her." So, that's the reason!.

From the start of my tour in Nice, I decided that dramatic action had to be taken in order for me to begin to work in that part of France . Eleanor Hicks' outstanding bills just had to be paid before I could begin to do a proper job. I sent a cable directly to the Director General of the Foreign Service, Ambassador Carol Laise - describing the situation and asking that either the Department elicit money from Ms. Hicks for these bills or to give me permission to publish in the local press a statement to the effect that these were private bills of an official American and had nothing to do with the U.S. government. Within three days, I got an answer from Washington saying the check was on its way. It did arrive in Nice - I paid off the debt. The Embassy in Paris was absolutely stunned with this action - especially since I hadn't even sent them a copy of my cable to Washington.

Q: Consular officers know how to solve problems!.

MURPHY: Frankly - I was amazed that it worked!

Q: Peter, you went off to Nice because of an emergency. Certainly, it isn't normal for one to be transferred from Paris to a constituent post like Nice after a number of years already in France; usually they like to send you off to the pits of the world. But, because of this emergency, they did appoint you Principal Officer in Nice and United States diplomatic representative to the Principality of Monaco. When you got there, you had first hand experience with France - after all the years you lived and worked there - but tell us now from your vantage point what you considered the assignment to Nice to be in terms of the uniqueness and the pressures.

MURPHY: Well, I'll admit that the pressures were certainly there! I have already explained to you the circumstances surrounding our arrival in Nice and the difficulties we experienced in lodging ourselves in the beginning. What did I think of the assignment to the South of France? I believe that the city of Nice and the surrounding area, Cannes, Monte Carlo, are today - as they were then - unique in the world. I considered myself most fortunate to have been assigned to this historic post - which, incidentally, was at the time the oldest functioning American diplomatic mission in the world! We had a very large American community resident in the area. There were many retired Americans living in the consular district: Many Foreign Service Officers, many former ambassadors, top-ranking military, especially Navy people - who had been formerly assigned to with the Sixth Fleet and, who, following retirement from the military, went to work in that part of the world. I am sure you recall that prior to De Gaulle's expulsion of NATO forces from France, the Sixth Fleet Headquarters was the town of Villefranche s/Mer - where eventually we lived during our tour of duty in the South of France. Many of the families in town had American connections - as there was much inter-marriage between the local population and the U. S. Navy personnel stationed in that beautiful town.

There were also many wealthy Americans who maintained secondary homes all along the Riviera - from Menton to Toulon. Of course, the natural beauty of the surrounding area is absolutely breathtaking. In the entire Mediterranean basin, I don't think you can find a more beautiful place to live. Some overbuilding has taken place in recent years, especially in the Principality, but, in general, it is still a choice area of the world. Looking back - I still think it is unbelievable that my family and I were able to live on the Riviera - with its beauty, its history....the Lost Generation, the noted painters, the White Russian aristocracy, the glamour and glitter. In addition to the Americans who resided there, there was also an enormous British communityas well as Swedish, Scandinavian, German, Italian, Belgian.....very international. During my time in Nice, many international meetings were held there....always attended by large Washington delegations. (Who, Bill, in Washington, would want to miss "official business" on the French Riviera!!) We were posted to Nice, for a total of two years..... a little over two years.

Q: The period again beginning...?

MURPHY: The time frame was from - let's see - from 1975 until 1977. You'll realize that period includes our Bicentennial year. The year 1976 proved to be a killer! It was great for the United States and promoted and solidified Franco-American friendship and cooperation in that part of the country! After many years in France, Bill, you yourself know that the usual canard - The French do not like the Americans - is simply not true!! It is my opinion that you could not find a more pro-American area outside of our nation - than the Nice Consular District - - which included the Alpes Maritimes, the Hautes Alpes, Alpes de Haute Provence, Monaco and the island of Corsica. Just as an example of the pro-American feelings of the local people: - when our Bicentennial Fourth of July celebrations of 1976 rolled around, the city of Nice as well as the city of Cannes closed for three full days, shops, etc., in celebration of our Independence Anniversary. Months of preparation went into these events, which included, concerts, religious services, the visits of a US Navy aircraft carrier, the Flagship of the Sixth Fleet, several parades with both US and French military participation; receptions given by the Mayor of Nice, the Mayor of Cannes, the Prince and Princess of Monaco, street dedications in Bar-sur-Loup - the birthplace of Admiral De Grasse - a French hero of our Revolution. The list goes on and on!

Q: Because the French did play an important role in our Independence, didn't they?

MURPHY: That's exactly it..... and many of the heroes of the American Revolution came from that area of France. Several of Admiral De Grasse's men, for example, who fought in the battles of the Chesapeake Bay and Yorktown came from the Riviera and especially the island of Corsica. The historic connections between the United States of America and Corsica are very strong.

Q: You had some American influence also in the Principality of Monaco, didn't you, Peter?

MURPHY: Yes - of course - with the presence of Princess Grace of Monaco - - the former Grace Kelly of Philadelphia.

Q: But is Monaco an independent country?

MURPHY: The Principality of Monaco is an independent country but dependent on the French for its defense as well asits water!

Q: And foreign policy?

MURPHY: Yes. guess we can call it an independent country - "up to a point"! Monaco has a semi-autonomous foreign policy. The Sovereign Prince, Rainier III, sends his own ambassadors to several European countries; throughout the rest of the world, he appoints Honorary Consuls General in major cities. As a general rule, however, Monaco follows the French in foreign policy matters - including voting in the United Nations, in which the Principality now has full membership.

Q: But how were you accredited to Monaco - - through Paris, through the French connection, or separately?

MURPHY: I was accredited separately - - directly from the Department of State to the Ministry of State in Monaco via our Embassy in Paris and the Monegasque Embassy in Paris. I have kept copies of these diplomatic Notes - as I found them quite unique!

Q: So it's a separate accreditation when you're assigned as Principal Officer in that country?

MURPHY: Yes.entirely separate.

Q: Was Nice an expensive place in which to live?

MURPHY: It was all a bit overwhelming for us at first, Bill.....mainly because of all the expenses involved in the required representation work. We left that post paupers!! We were never able to save a dime during our years there! The Embassy (read "the ambassador") was far from generous with the annual allocation of Representational Funds. I recall that we had a grand total of $1,200 for the second year we were in Nice - and that was intended to cover all official entertaining! Even in 1975 such a paltry sum did not go very far!

Q: Oh.

MURPHY: To put this into context, Bill..... twelve hundred dollars for the year would actually pay for perhaps (we're talking about 1975-1977) two cocktail parties. That's about what the sum would cover. During our assignment, I received VIP visitors from Washington: Former Vice President Nelson Rockefeller and his wife, Happy, came several times. Henry Kissinger, along with his wife Nancy, came for a week in 1975. Lady Bird Johnson, a delightful lady, came each summer with her friend Mary Lasker from New York City. They rented a very large villa on St. Jean Cap Ferrat which is near Nice and were usually there for a total of six weeks at the height of the summer season. When these people were entertained by the local residents - or by prominent members of the international community visiting the Riviera - - we were usually expected to host return events - - or to arrange for return parties/cocktails at the homes of local residents. My access to important political figures was fantastic - - mainly as a result of the representational responsibilities. During the height of the summer season, Prime Ministers, Ministers of Finance and Foreign Ministers of many of the Arab nations as well as many from western European countries were in residence in the area. Without much difficulty, I had free access to any of these people almost whenever I wished. At times, it was far easier for me to meet with an influential Arab in Nice than for our ambassador to do the same back in the Arab's home country. After all - the Arab was on vacation and after a few drinks, talked freely at dinner parties. As you can imagine, Bill, I sent many interesting reporting cables to Washington following such social gatherings!! But I must admit that the constant representational responsibility got very, very heavy. Throughout the summer season, rare was the night that my wife and I did not have one, two or three engagements of an evening - and almost always in black tie and long dress!

Q: And you had to return such invitations...?

MURPHY: We were obliged to, Bill. For example, when a Lady Bird Johnson or Kissinger were entertained, we had to arrange some sort of repayment of these invitations to such prominent Americans. I can't recall any visitors ever contributing to our representational funds! On the other hand, I do remember vividly one very large reception that we hosted for the Commander of the United States Sixth Fleet in the Mediterranean. He had invited over 300 officials and friends from the area to a large cocktail party at our home. The Admiral's Flagship's mess sent a huge platter of shrimp cocktail for the event. The next morning, as I was leaving the house to go to the office, I met an officer from the mess coming up our walk. He presented me with a bill for the Flagship's contribution! So much for assistance from the U. S. Navy! Life was indeed very expensive for us. Towards the end of my tour, I got a bit wiser....This was at the time of the Bicentennial celebrations. Everyone wanted to come to "American events" because of the love of America - - - and also their love of parties!! Several hundred people wanted to attend our Bicentennial receptions, and we were obliged to host separate ones along the coast. Finally, with the assistance of Prince Rainier of Monaco, I devised a plan which involved the newly opened Loews Hotel in Monte Carlo.

Q: American...?

MURPHY: An American hotel, an American venture....but with German capital ($49 Million). Shortly after my arrival in Nice, I helped convince Prince Rainier that such a hotel would actually be in the benefit of the Principality...as well as increase tourism in the area. He had been most reluctant.... thinking such an American-type hotel would bring Las Vegas-type gambling plus hoards of little old ladies with purple hair, tennis shoes...just waiting for the slot machine room to open!!

Q: Pulling down the machine.

MURPHY: Pulling down the machine, right. But, you know, after a while, the Prince began to realize that the era of "luxury tourism" was over. You just couldn't build another Hotel de Paris or Hermitage near Monte Carlo. Besides - the multimillionaires who filled such hotels were few and far between these days. Monaco was full of newly-rich Italians, Germans, Swedes, British - and not a few American long-term residents. After the new Loews Monte Carlo Hotel was completed - and proved to be a smashing success, - the owners (the Tisch brothers of New York and Bob Hausmann - also from New York City) kept asking me what they could do for the Consulate? Well, finally - with the encouragement of Prince Rainier - I thought of something they could do. We decided to have a separate Bicentennial Fourth of July reception in Monaco because the international community was so large there that we couldn't handle it at our home. The hotel arranged a fantastic reception on the hotel's roof overlooking the sea on a perfect evening and it turned out to be absolutely lovely. Not only was there a large representation of the Sixth Fleet (as there was an aircraft carrier in the harbor), but "everyone who was anyone" was present. You know how those things so, Bill!

Now, I should tell you a bit more about the interrelationship between the Consulate and the Sixth Fleet.

Q: That's a good idea - - after all these parties!!

MURPHY: Well, the Sixth Fleet. Since the early days of our Republic, the Mediterranean and the Middle East were considered to be important - because of commerce and also from a political perspective. The United States kept a fleet in the area - even in days of sailing ships. The presence of our warships signaled our interest in the area - - and was used to "send political signals" even in the 18th century. I recall an old photograph hanging in my office in Nice showing the American fleet in Villefranche s/Mer harbor in 1872. This is the same harbor which was host to the Flagship of the Sixth Fleet until the early '60s - - when France left the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (militarily) - and threw all NATO forces out of the country.

To give you an idea, Bill of the frequency of ship visits we handled at the Consulate: in 1977 we had approximately 45 visits of Sixth Fleet ships up and down the coast in ports within the Consular District....Menton, Monte Carlo, Villefranche, Nice, Cannes, Mandelieu. They ranged from tenders and supply ships - - to the largest aircraft carriers of our nation's fleet - some holding 5000 to 6000 men. During that year, the Commander of the Sixth Fleet (Admiral Fred "Fox" Turner) made three official visits within the consular district. And, you know Bill, such visits are almost as bad as a Presidential or ambassadorial visit for a small consulate.

Q: And, also you had the protection of these Americans, even though they had their military police inside, they were running all over the Riviera.

MURPHY: Indeed ! When you have 6,000 men (there were no women aboard in those days!) in the small port town of Villefranche - things happen!! Well, there's bound to be a few problems. I must say they were much better behaved than the British or the French Navy when ships of those nations visited our port towns. The USO - which was housed in the consulate building - was most helpful in assisting the crew with liberty plans - to travel within the district; visit the local sights or to go skiing in the nearby mountains. On an average, we would have maybe five or six men left behind after the ship took off. The numbers were greater, of course, when an aircraft carrier was involved. The usual reason for "missing the ship" - was oversleeping!

Q: And you would have to take over?

MURPHY: The sailors left behind after the sailing of their ship would either come to the Consulate on their own - or under police escort!! We were obliged to arrange passage - usually by train - to Gaeta (Naples), Italy - the port of the Commander of the Sixth Fleet and the home port for many of the Sixth Fleet ships. It is interesting to note that Naval regulations obliged the servicemen to reimburse the travel from their monthly paychecks! Uncle Sam provides no free rides!

Now, let me tell you a bit of what we did for the many ships which visited the district. Our ports were most popular with the crews for liberty because of the natural beauty of the area as well as the legendary welcome the crews received from the USA and also the local American and French residents of the Riviera. Local residents went out of their way to invite the men (there were no women n Navy ships in those days!) to home cooked meals or to other family-centered events. The most popular ports with the Sixth Fleet were Monte Carlo, Villefranche and Cannes. It is interesting to note that the crews now vote on where they wished to go on liberty - - a big change for the US Navy! The French Riviera always won! Five years later - when I was Consul General in nearby Genoa, Italy - I had only two port calls in the entire five years of my tour!! No one in the Sixth Fleet, it seemed, wanted to rest and recuperate in Italy! I guess its must have been our beaches in Nice and Cannes!

Q: Or chasing certain attractive, local....lovelies!

MURPHY: Exactly, especially on our fabled topless beaches in the area!

Now, we not only took care of the crew and saw to their welfare during the four or five days they usually were with us..... but we also furnished the ship with provisions to continue its journey. The Consulate in Nice arranged for the delivery of tons of perishable goods to the ship in port. This usually involved the provision of thousands of gallons of ice cream and milk, fresh vegetables, breads...anything else not provided by the US Navy supply ships which prowled the Mediterranean. Many items, such as dairy products or fresh meats, came from the Scandinavian countries - and that involved shipments arriving in Nice or Cannes under Custom seals from the point of origin to the ship.

Q: We,.....being the Consulate. There was nobody there to help you?

MURPHY: No - we had no military personnel assigned to the Consulate during my time.

Q: No military assistance?

MURPHY: No, the consulate staff did all of this work for the U. S. Navy...and had done so for many years. The Consulate did a tremendous amount of work in connection with ship visits. Communications and financial involvement were our main preoccupations at the Post.

Q: Did the military help at all financially?

MURPHY: The US Navy, of course, paid for all of the supplies as well as the transport. We, however, at the Consulate were obliged to coordinate everything else. As you know, communication with a ship at sea is not always the easiest thing to arrange, Bill!! The naval attaché's office in Paris helped, and ...once in a while... someone would come down from that office during a ship visit.....a large carrier, for example. But we basically did it all. It was a disaster for us, of course, whenever a ship visit was canceled at the last minute - as frequently happened when a ship received a "Change Order" from the Pentagon.

Q: Melting ice cream.....that sort of thing?

MURPHY: Yes - exactly ! We would receive a call from the ship telling us of the cancellation - and instructing us to donate the ship provisions to local charity. This was a more difficult task than might first appear! Before we could donate fresh vegetables, milk, cream, ice cream, cheese, etc to the local hospitals or orphanages - we had to satisfy French customs! As the merchandise came into France under Custom Seal - it was not actually on French soil - according to the bureaucrats at the Customs. (Our Custom people would interpret the regulations in the same manner, I am convinced!) After the usual couple of days of debate regarding the payment of custom fees, we gave away the U. S. Navy's goods to local charities. I assure you that we never paid a Franc in custom duty!!

On another subject: international meetings and conferences. Several important gatherings took place in southern France in the two years I was posted in Nice. Many took place in Monaco - while Nice and Cannes were also favorite sites. One fascinating conference in which I participated together with a large American delegation was that of the International Hydrographic Organization Conference. The meeting takes place every five years in a different country - in spite of the fact that the international headquarters of the International Hydrographic Organization is located in the port of Monte Carlo. At least twenty hydrographic vessels converged in the harbor at Monaco for this event - Soviet, Chinese as well as our own! As you can imagine, we were very interested in the ships from the Communist nations - given the fact that they were seldom considered solely dedicated to hydrographic research in the world's waters!!

Q: A very famous Frenchman has his sea venture in Monaco, didn't he?

MURPHY: That right, Bill - Jacques Cousteau. Cousteau was at one time the President of the Monegasque Oceanographic Museum - which is one of the wonders of the Principality. It was started by Rainier's grandfather, Prince Louis II - who was a sea-faring man who spent much of his long life collecting the contents of that museum. It's a fascinating place to visit.

So - with all these meetings and conferences on the Riviera - we had a constant coming and going of top American businessmen, U. S. Government officials, Members of the Congress, the Young Presidents Organization, participants in the Cannes Film Festival, and various other organizations from the United States that held meetings on the Riviera.

Q: What was the size of your staff at the Consulate to help you?

MURPHY: I had one Vice Consul who concentrated on consular work - of which there was a lot! Just think of the Social Security work in an area where we had over 8,000 retired American citizens! A Political - Commercial officer was assigned; the Drug Enforcement Agency had an officer there as well. The local staff numbered seven (7) - including the driver/GSO Foreign Service National.

Q: Maybe the reader doesn't fully understand how consuls are involved in Social Security matters.

MURPHY: One is eligible for Social Security in the United States at the age of 62 or 65, depending on individual choice. This eligibility is effective within the United States - or in a foreign nation, if one happens to live outside the country. At the present time, MEDICARE is not available abroad - but full coverage by Social Security is allowable. A potential beneficiary - child, orphan, handicapped, or aged - would come to us at the Consulate for assistance with the various forms for submission to back their claim. In addition at that time, we also distributed the actual checks - either by mail or in person. The work also entailed constant investigation into possible false claims - for example, claiming for someone long dead - - or claiming funeral benefits more than once. Once we did discover that funds had been paid out in error due to fraud - it was no easy task for us to extract the funds owed the U. S. Government from the perpetrators. I recall one 96 year old lady who lived in a two room hut high in the mountains offering to kill and sell one of her chickens each month to repay the Social Security her $400 debt. I think I recommended the cancellation of that debt - if I recall correctly!!

Q: Other beneficiaries, such as children...?

MURPHY: Actually, should there be a physical disability, a widow or widower can receive Social Security benefits for the partial support of their under-aged children.

Q: You pay them? The consul pays out this money?

MURPHY: The consul and his staff actually does all the work in assisting the American citizen to apply for these benefits. In actual fact - the national employee responsible for Social Security matters provides this assistance. In my Foreign Service career, I never met one single Foreign Service Officer who was intimately familiar with the several Social Security forms necessary for the processing of a claim.

Q: So all of the Americans you dealt with on the Riviera were not all wealthy types?

MURPHY: No, they weren't. As a matter of fact, we also had in the consular district several formerly wealthy people who resided there in very humble lodgings. As an aside, Princess Grace of Monaco was marvelous in ferreting out such people. She would call me at the consulate and tell me of their plight. I didn't have time to visit all of these people but she would take this on - with my wife Jacqueline - and together they would visit - and evaluate the needs of the citizens. Sometimes Grace would bring her two eldest children, Prince Albert and Princess Caroline, to help clean these peoples' apartments. She herself would bring food from the Palace. I think it was a good education for her children. It certainly showed them another side of life. Grace's actions were very touching - all the more so because her charity was done without the least bit of fanfare. No one ever knew what she was doing - or who she helped - either in person or through her own generosity. I have never read anything about this in all that has been written about her untimely death. For this reason I want to record her kindness here - - so that someone will know what a kind and charitable person she was. She may have had a privileged position in the country - but she was ever thoughtful of those less fortunate around her. Through such contacts, my wife and I got to know the Prince and Princess very well.

Q: You certainly couldn't have helped these people out financially without the help from the local community, could you?someone such as Princess Grace.

MURPHY: That's right, Bill, but our Consulate in Nice was very fortunate in having an exceedingly large welfare fund at our disposal. From this fund, we not only repatriated American families without recourse to the Department of State Welfare Funds - - but, from time to time, even paid peoples' rent, heating bills, telephone bills as well as emergency hospitalization - including expensive hospitalizations!.

Q: "We" - being not the United States Government, but acting on behalf of this group?

MURPHY: Yes - acting on behalf of what we called the "American-British Welfare Association of the Riviera". The money in this association was administered by the British Consul General in Marseille and myself. We two would meet once a month to review investment options on the approximately $300,000 fund total.

Q: And this money was from the local community, the Americans and British?

MURPHY: No, it wasn't. The Fund itself was the result of the sale of the Queen Victoria Memorial Hospital in Villefranche s/Mer. The hospital itself was built at the turn of the century in Villefranche - at a time when the Riviera was full of visiting and resident Englishmen. Shortly after the establishment of NATO and the choice of Villefranche s/Mer as the home port for the United States Sixth Fleet, it was realized that a Fleet Hospital was necessary. During those years, there were many U. S. dependents living in the Nice area. The hospital in question was taken over and operated by the Sixth Fleet. It was a Godsend for the hospital - as the British residents of means were fast deserting the Riviera! The U. S. Navy completely refurbished the hospital - but retained its quaint name! When the Fleet was expelled from France by General De Gaulle, a heavy blow was dealt to the hospital. Eventually it fell on bad times and was closed as it had no major financial support - with the departure of the U. S. Navy presence in the area and the diminishing numbers of British residents. Eventually the hospital was torn down and - because of the exceptional site overlooking the beautiful bay of Villefranche - it sold very well!! The money realized by this sale was the basis for the American-British Welfare Fund which we administered for the benefit of both communities. The Trust still exists to this day and I believe it is one of the largest (if not the largest) "welfare funds" existing at any consular post in the world today.

Q: And people like your wife and Princess Grace and other Americans helped out?

MURPHY: Yes, Bill. There were women and some men as well - usually retired businessmen - who would help with this charitable work. I rarely had time to go personally to investigate the living conditions of these people. Also - we frequently had citizens come to the consulate who had been robbed of their money - and tickets home; or women with children abandoned by the husband and left stranded in France. Then - as in all diplomatic posts - we had several Americans in jail, in hospitals - and not a few in the French Foreign Legion at their headquarters on the island of Corsica!! This was a bit unusual - as such a military unit exists only in France - and we had the training headquarters in our consular district. I recall a few times when we had Americans escape from their basic training units on the island - and show up at our door! I guess they just couldn't take the severe training undergone by Foreign Legionnaires.

Q: You have done a bit of name dropping with our American citizen, Princess Grace. Tell us a little bit more about the relationship that developed with you, how did you get to know her? I know you're the official representative of the government in Monacobut what does this mean practically?

MURPHY: Monaco is a very special place, Bill. Smaller in size than New York City's Central Park - its financial influence throughout the world is considerable. The fact that an American citizen was wed to the Chief of State - and a Sovereign Prince at that - was indeed unique. From the very start of our tour there, Princess Grace could not have been more gracious towards Jacqueline and me. She facilitated my work in the Principality and included us in every major event of international importance - - and there were many during our time there. I recall distinctly our first meeting. A few months after our arrival - and move into our new home in Villefranche - we received an invitation to attend a Sunday afternoon concert with the Princess at Monte Carlo's Garnier Opera House. We arrived 15 minutes early and were escorted to the Royal Box. As you can imagine - for a kid from Boston to be in such a situation was, to say the least, a bit daunting! Before the concert began, the Princess' other guests - her sister-in-law Princess Antoinette and a few others, gathered in a private room for drinks and introduction. Grace made us feel at home at once. It was a very special afternoon - and, as luck would have it, a very close friend was visiting Monaco that afternoon and attended the concert. At dinner following this event, we had a lot to talk about! Grace was as nice and as kind as you have always heard and read about. Well - you know, Bill! You have met her in Paris! She was the driving force for many improvements in the Principality: the revival of the Ballet Russe of Monte Carlo, the founder of the Monte Carlo Garden Club - which she invited Jacqueline to join; and - of course - she attracted the best in the entertainment field to perform at events year round in Monaco. We were indeed fortunate to be included in many of these public manifestations. She and the Prince together planned the American Bicentennial events in the Principality.. Also - never did an American ship call at Monaco without the Princess being interested in the entertainment of the officers and crew. The Sixth Fleet loved to visit Monaco! I believe that we became so close to the royal couple because of the children.

We were posted there at a time when Prince Albert was contemplating his higher education: his father opted for a College in Switzerland while Grace wanted an American university for her son - and future ruler of the country. I was unofficially enlisted by the Princess to attempt to convince her husband of the value and benefits of Albert's going to the United States to further his education. The young prince had attended schools in the Principality from kindergarten through his high school. In his last year at the Lycee in Monaco, his parents spent much time consulting with and investigating colleges and universities in Europe and also in the United States. One day when I was visiting at the Palace, the Princess pulled me aside and told me that Prince Rainier was insisting that Albert attend a German-speaking university in Switzerland. Grace thought it would be too difficult for him - especially given the fact that Albert's German was almost non-existent! She herself favored an American education for her son as she thought it would give him a bit of independence and also assist in drawing out his personality which, up to that point in his life, was rather over-shadowed by his two sisters - especially by Caroline. Albert was indeed a shy youth - always most obedient to his parents and much like his mother in temperament. His sisters, on the other hand, inherited their father's Mediterranean temperament. In Grace's way of thinking, receiving a university education in English in America would also perhaps assist in correcting the young Prince's speech impediment. Albert had had a problem of stuttering from the time he was a child and, in spite of numerous medical consultations all over Europe, it continues to this day. He has improved greatly in his ability to overcome this affliction. Following my conversation at the Palace with Grace, I wrote away for catalogues on various American colleges. I concentrated on schools in the New England area - as Albert was familiar with northern New England since he had attended summer camp for three or four years together with his sisters. After much discussion, Amherst College in Amherst, Massachusetts was selected as about the right size school and also the right location. It is, as is well known, a college with an excellent academic reputation. I should point out that Albert was never known for his academic excellence - although he was a diligent and conscientious student who usually managed a "gentleman's C average" in most courses. It took a couple of visits to the Palace for me - together with the Princess - to convince Prince Rainier that Albert would be better off at school in the United States. Rainier was worried about: abduction, the dangers of drugs and drinking - i.e. aside from the possibility of abduction, they were the usual worries of any parent sending his child away to school far from home. In order to reassure the Prince, I enlisted the aid of a good friend, a Jesuit priest I had known from my days in Paris, Rev. William Russell, S.J. - to assist in this effort. Bill Russell located the family of two professors at Amherst who were willing to offer lodging with their family. Their offers were later declined when Albert insisted on living in a dormitory - and then a fraternity house - like the other students. In addition to locating a security company willing to take on Albert's security needs, Bill Russell identified a fellow Jesuit-professor on Amherst's faculty who agreed to provide Albert spiritual guidance - should the need arise. On a visit to Boston and Amherst, the Princess consulted with Father Bill Russell about these matters concerning Albert's schooling at Amherst. After much discussion, it was decided that the young Prince would be better off without constant security in the form of a body-guard - and that he would fit better into college life if he started out living in a student dormitory. During the first three years of Albert's schooling at Amherst College, we were assigned to the Department of State and lived in a modest house in the Dominion Hills area of Arlington, Virginia. During those years, Prince Albert came to Washington to spend long weekends with us. Our boys loved having Albert in the house: he was like a big brother to them! Prince Rainier and Princess Grace were ever so grateful for our looking-after Albert - especially during his first year at the College. I'll never forget his preparations for his first visit from Amherst - to our home in Washington. (Keep in mind that he had never before actually planned a trip on his ownto say nothing of going to buy an air ticket!) He called me and asked - "How do I get down there?" I had read in the papers that a few weeks previously Albert had gone to New York City with a Monegasque buddy who was a student at nearby William's College. I asked him how he had gone to New York - and Albert replied , "In the private aircraft of one of my Dad's friends". I told him that he had better look up the bus schedule from Amherst to either Springfield or Boston - where he had to catch a plane. I told him we would be at National Airport in Washington to meet his plane. During those weekends he spent with us in Washington, he frequently went out at night with another good friend - Jean Charles van Essche who was from Monaco, grew up with Albert and was a student at Georgetown University. He also spent one of his Thanksgiving Holidays at our home with us in Arlington, Virginia. During Albert's visits, we managed to show him all the tourist sites - visited the White House, the National Gallery of Art and - to his delight - the National Air and Space Museum. On one of his visits to us in Washington during the winter, Albert rented a car in Amherst to drive to the airport in Springfield, Massachusetts too catch his flight. It was a stormy night with the New England roads covered with snow. Somehow Albert managed to bump the car in front of him - and skid off the road. No damage was done and Albert was not injured but on his arrival at National Airport I know that the experience had shaken him. He talked of nothing else all the way home. Shortly after we arrived back home n Arlington, Princess Grace telephoned from London to speak with Albert. He began the conversation by telling her all about the near-accident and, in the telling of the story, he became more and more excited about the incident. I then spoke with the Princess and learned that she was calling from Buckingham Palace where - in 10 minutes time - she was to give a poetry reading before the Queen Elizabeth, the Queen Mother and her guests for the benefit of one of the organizations of which she is Patron! It was really not the best time for Grace to receive alarming news about her son - and I assured her that he was fine - and that no great damage was done as a result of the accident in Massachusetts. We also visited Albert at Amherst - one time attending a Christmas concert of the College Glee Club of which he was an active member. Since no member of his family could attend, he was very appreciative that we had driven all the way from Washington for the event.

Albert is a very nice fellow and had a heart of gold. He is very much like his mother in temperament and personality. With his father, his relationship is at times a bit strained. I believe that his father would like his son to become tougher - and to learn to say NO to people when it is necessary.

It was Albert who telephoned me in Genoa in September of 1982, the day after his mother's tragic death, to ask if I could possibly come to Monaco to spend time with his father at the Palace prior to his mother's State Funeral. I, of course, drove over to Monaco from Genoa at once and remained with the Prince for the entire day prior to Grace's funeral. Without any doubt, this visit of condolence to the Prince was one of the most difficult I have ever made in my life. We talked all day long - just the two of us - in French, English and at times in Italian. He was often inconsolable and broke into tears. In addition, Rainier didn't want to receive anyone - even including members of the late Princess' family who had arrived from the United States...her brother, Jack Kelly, and her two sisters plus her cousin, (Secretary of the Navy) John Lehman. With an officer of the Ministry of State, the Prince and I went over the plans for the State Funeral in detail - including the reception of the foreign delegations - The President of Ireland, Nancy Reagan, Princess Diana, Danielle Mitterrand, and many other notables. Before returning to Genoa for the evening, the Prince insisted I stay for a private Mass in the Palace Chapel where Grace's remains were resting prior to the Funeral the next day in the Cathedral of Monaco. As Prince Rainier, Caroline, Albert and I entered the chapel - I remember feeling rather strange at being the only outsider there with them. Already assembled in the small chapel were Grace's relatives who had come from the United States for the funeral and, up to that point, had not seen Prince Rainier. The following day - after the Funeral itself at the Cathedral - the official delegations sent by various governments to Monaco were received at a reception in the Palace garden. Rainier did not feel up to speaking with anyone - and he and the children went to their private apartments in the Palace. He asked Jackie and I to help introduce the guests to one another. This was rather a tall order - introducing the President of Ireland to Princess Diana, for example! I knew, of course that he had not been invited to Charles and Diana's wedding in Westminster!

Grace and Rainier had planned to come to see us in Genoa in October of that year - a month after Grace's fatal accident. They were to have stayed with us for four days - and visit the international Genoa Boat Show - one of the largest in the world. Following the Princess' death, I managed to convince the Prince - with Albert's assistance - that they should both follow through with the original plans. They did come to Genoa and remain in our home as guests for three days. Rainier even purchased a huge sailing boat at the Boat Show - which took a year to build in a small fishing village near Venice. It was their first excursion out of their Palace since Grace's death. As you can imagine, in the glare of the world press, it was most difficult for them - and also for Jackie and me, I might add! In spite of the difficulties with the media during the visit to Genoa, I think that Prince Rainier appreciated our help in easing his sorrow at that period of his life.

During our Washington assignment following our return from Nice in 1977, Princess Grace, too, stayed with us in Arlington, Virginia. During that time, Grace was on a Poetry Reading Tour of the United States together with a British actor from the Royal Shakespearean Company. They performed at Harvard, Princeton and, in Washington at the Hartke Theater at Catholic University. I can assure you, Bill, that our accommodations in the Dominion Hills area of Seven Corners in Arlington were a far cry from the Palace in Monaco - - or Roc Agel - the Grimaldi country home in the mountains above Monaco - or even their town house on Avenue Foch in Paris!! We had a tiny, three bedroom rented home which had a living room capable of holding a party of six! It didn't seem to bother either mother or son one bit, however; both Grace and Albert made themselves right at home. One snowy afternoon during her visit, I remember Grace sledding with our sons Paul and Marc down the hill in back of our home. As Paul and Marc were both too young to come with us to the evening poetry reading at the Catholic University theater, Grace did a shortened version of her poetry reading in our living room just for them in our living room. I'll never forget their big round eyes as she looked and listened to her every word. She had a way of fascinating children and a marvelous way with children. It was not at all difficult for her to communicate with ease at their level.

Q: From what you say, she seemed to be full of American energy.

MURPHY: Yes. Princess Grace was mainly responsible for making the Principality a cultural center in Europe during the years she lived in Monaco. She especially promoted American art - painters, musicians, singers, dancers - all of whom performed or exhibited with their European peers during that period. Grace's American "know-how" always showed through anything she sponsored or was actively engaged in. Grace did not always have an easy time of it! She arrived in the Principality as an American with her film star background. Monaco was a foreign country to her; she was not comfortable with the language. In spite of her convent education and her comfortable background growing up in Philadelphia, nothing could have prepared her for the spotlight in which she found herself upon her arrival in Monaco for her "fairy tale" wedding. In spite of her world acclaim as an actress - she was not of royal blood - but of a mixture of Irish and German ancestry. Many of the "locals" in Monaco never let her forget this fact. In addition, Grace was not a university graduate. She often mentioned to me that in her early years in Monaco, she felt quite lonely - shut up in her gilded palace - with very few real friends in whom she could confide. I think that it was mainly for this reason my wife and I were quickly accepted by the Grimaldis - - and made to feel at home whenever we were with them. Grace, especially, craved close friendships.

Although, as the spouse of the Sovereign Prince of Monaco, Princess Grace was always at center stage wherever she went in Europe or America - I can attest that she did have her family priorities straight. I would like to leave the following striking example with you to illustrate how Grace, as a mother and spouse, ordered her life. You have perhaps heard of The International Variety Club - an organization composed of actors and internationally known political figures - engaged in financing modern hospital facilities for handicapped children. This international organization held an important anniversary meeting in Monaco in 1975. Former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger was invited to speak at the Club's annual gala dinner and to receive their Humanitarian of the Year Award. Naturally, Dr. and Mrs. Kissinger were invited to spend the duration of the meeting (a four day weekend) at the Prince's Palace. Many international figures were also attending the event including the organization's President, Prince Philip of Great Britain and Lord Mountbatten. The Prince of Wales, Prince Charles, also was present as he was being inducted by his father as a member at the closing gala dinner.

Due to the fact that Kissinger was no longer Secretary of State, the Consulate technically had nothing to do with his visit. However, because of the volatile world situation at the time, the former Secretary still had a State Department security detail with him when he traveled abroad. Naturally State kept us advised of Kissinger's travel plans via official cable. Three days prior to the designated day of arrival of the Kissinger party - including his wife Nancy - the Prince called me in the office in Nice to ask if indeed Dr. Kissinger was coming - and if he was going to accept his invitation to stay at the Palace. When I confirmed his arrival, the Prince told me that they had received no communication from Dr. Kissinger. I told Rainier that I had said nothing to him - or to the Chamberlain of the Palace - as Dr. Kissinger was no longer Secretary of State but a "simple private citizen". Rainier then asked if I could join him and the Princess for lunch at the Palace that day so that "we can figure out what to do with this fellow for four days"!!

During the luncheon, we made plans to bring Dr. Kissinger to a Monaco soccer game, visit various interesting sites in the area - in addition to the Variety Club activities. The Prince thought there should be a small reception for him - and I mentioned that, upon driving up to the Palace that morning, I had noticed the huge yacht of Sam Speigle (the movie director) in Monte Carlo harbor. Rainier thought it would be a great idea to ask Mr. Speigle to host a cocktail reception prior to the Club gala at the Sporting Club. He, of course, didn't want to ask him himself to arrange a party - so he handed me the phone - and I called. Mr. Speigle was, of course, delighted to have such an opportunity to entertain both the Kissingers and the Prince and Princess of Monaco. The event was very nice - with about 28 of us present aboard Speigle's huge yacht. Carry Grant, whom my wife had never met before, was also present at the party. He was a very close friend of the Princess and was frequently in Monaco.

To get to my point, Bill - at the end of our "planning luncheon", Princess Grace asked me to do her a favor. She said that when I met the Kissingers at the Nice Airport upon their arrival from New York the next day, she'd appreciate my giving her apologies. She told me that she would not be in Monaco to serve as their hostess - nor to attend the evening's Variety Club celebrations. She said that she would, however, be back the next day. I really couldn't believe my ears!with Princes Philip (President of the Variety Club that year) and Prince Charles in the Palace as house guests - plus the Kissingers! I asked her where she was going and she explained that her youngest daughter, Stephanie, was to receive her First Communion at an 8:00 A.M. Mass at her school in Paris the morning after the Monaco Gala evening. She said, "I can't possibly be up 'till 2 AM at an official dinner and be present in Paris for the Mass". It then struck me that Grace really did have her feet on the ground - and had her family priorities right!

When I explained the situation to Kissinger at the Airport the next day - he looked a bit bewildered - but said not a word. The evening went off very well - and, true to her word, the Princess was back from Paris the next day to play her role as hostess to all of her distinguished house guests.

Q: People didn't treat Kissinger that way.

MURPHY: No, but he really took it well.

Q: Did you tell him the real reason?

MURPHY: Yes - of course. And Kissinger said, "Oh, she's absolutely right. We fully understand."

Q: You talk about name dropping and whatever, and obviously these pressures on both you and Jackie were near to unique - - if not unique. How did you walk through them keeping your balance and not slipping? Because it's so easy to slip into ego. Your predecessor perhaps was part of it?

MURPHY: Bill, I fully realize this! I hope that the reader of these words - at Georgetown University or at the Foreign Service Institute - will not think of me as a simple "name dropper". We can all do that in the Foreign Service - because we have such particular jobs which allow us into unique situations and hence meet unusual people. I am simply trying to tell it like it was - or , at least, how I viewed the world at that time. Being in such a situation is very “heady” and you have to keep reminding yourself that next week the Department may send you to Lagos or Nouakchott!! It is the old “Sic transit Gloria mundi....syndrome!!) but you know, Bill - it is difficult to explain how Jackie and I managed to maintain this friendship with Rainier and Grace over the years. In effect - I guess you could say that they were both rather lonely people - - and appreciated meeting "normal" people - instead of the rather phony multimillionaires who resided almost year-round in Monaco - and on most of the Riviera. We had many fun nights together - and on the occasion of their Twenty Fifth Wedding Anniversary in April of 1981 - when I was posted to Genoa as Consul General - Jackie and I were invited to spend the long weekend at the Palace with them. It was truly memorable since Miroslav (Slava) Rostropovich - who was also a Palace guest together with his wife - gave a private performance in the Throne Room for very few guests after we finished a super anniversary candlelight dinner. I had known “Slava” from my Paris days when I convinced my Soviet counterpart to grant him permission to visit the United States - because without his government’s permission, he intended to go anyway!! This was prior to his having been stripped of his USSR citizenship - - and Rostropovich never forgot my part in his "American adventure". Another evening I recall with the Grimaldi Family was one hot night in late August when Rainier, Grace, their children, us with our boys and about 6 other friends had a midnight picnic on deserted beach near Monaco. We built a bonfire, roasted hot dogs and drank a “vin tres ordinaire”! Even when, in later years, we returned to the Riviera for summer visits, we were always invited to spend a day with Grace and Rainier and the children either in Monaco or at their summer home in France overlooking the Principality in Roc Agel. It was pretty relaxed up there in the mountains in their old farmhouse: Grace would cook hamburgers on the grill on the outside terrace overlooking the sea while Rainier and Albert enjoyed showing showed Paul and Marc and me their fantastic antique car collection.

Q: You are still good friends with Prince Rainier?

MURPHY: Yes.....I'd say that we are still quite good friends. We have corresponded for years - and we write to each other about every subject imaginable! I should point out, Bill, that my friendship with the Prince of Monaco is well know by our government. The United States Government has used this friendship to attempt to further our "national interest" on more than one occasion. I guess this is just - - since if it were not for my government position in Nice and Monaco - this unusual friendship never would have developed. That's what diplomatic relations are all about - isn't it, Bill! This has been the name of the game since the days of the Medici - and Lorenzo Il Magnifico!

The first time my relationship with Rainier was "used" by the Department of State was in 1977 during my tour in the Bureau of Consular Affairs in Washington.

Q: This was after you left Nice that this relationship was.....

MURPHY: Yes. The event I am speaking of occurred after I left France was working with Barbara Watson in the Bureau of Consular Affairs in the Department. The Ayatollah Khomeini had returned to his native Iran from Paris and took over the country - - much to the surprise of our government - and Ambassador Sullivan!! I guess our political officers in Paris - as well as those in Tehran - did not feel that the religious element in the political equation at the time amounted to a hill of beans - and thus their energies were concentrated on continuing our policy of supporting the Shah of Iran.

You'll perhaps recall that after the overthrow of the Iranian government, the Shah of Iran was given refuge in Cairo. He became seriously ill and flew from country to country consulting the best doctors of each. I guess that someone in our government - the White House, CIA or State??? - had moral qualms about the manner in which we had dropped the Shah (rather like a hot potato!!) and announced that we were "actively" seeking a place of refuge for the Iranian royal family "which would be in keeping with the dignity to which they had been accustomed. At that time, as I mentioned, I was working as a Special Assistant in the Department.

Q: In the State Department?

MURPHY: Yes. I was about to leave on an official trip to Eastern Europe (inspection of our posts in Poland) when I received a special request from the Secretariat. I was asked if - while on this particular trip - I minded stopping in either Paris or Monaco to meet with Prince Rainier. The object of the visit would be to attempt to convince the Prince to grant the Shah, the Empress and the family political refuge in the Principality of Monaco.

Q: They were looking for a home for the entire royal family?

MURPHY: Yes - They were looking for a home for them.

Q: Where were they at the time? In Cairo?

MURPHY: I believe they were in Cairo the time. This was prior to their travel to Algeria and then Mexico - - where they later took up residence for a time.

Q: Shopping for a place to live? To die, actually?

MURPHY: Exactly. The Shah was very ill at that point - cancer. Prince Rainier was most receptive to the request and said that they could all reside in Monaco. He did lecture me at length on the errors of Washington in the whole Iranian mess - and thought the U. S. Government had no moral character to have turned its collective back on the Shah in the manner in which we did. The Pahlavi family never did make it to Monaco - but went instead to Mexico - always seeking medical attention. It is ironic in a way that months later - when the Shah was about dead - I personally gave the Consul General in Mexico City (Vern MacInich) verbal authorization to issue Non Immigrant Visas for the Shah and his wife when he had to be rushed to the United States for urgent medical treatment. I recall that it was late in the evening and - as sometimes happened in the Assistant Secretary's office - I was still at my desk! Mac called to say that a private plane was about to depart Mexico for the United States with the royal couple aboard. He asked for permission to issue temporary visas - and I'll tell you that it didn't take me a second before telling him to go right ahead! He hesitated a bit - noting that I had not consulted any political types - but I just assured him that there would be no problem - and if there happened to be some flack - I would take the heat!! I was so ashamed at the way our government had treated this family that I could not but agree to let them into the country. I never did hear any objections to my action that evening!

After the request that I approach Prince Rainier in the case of the Shah and his family - I was simply amazed to have the same situation repeated once again in 1985 while I was serving at our Embassy to the Holy See - - the Vatican.

Q: At the Vatican, assigned to the...?

MURPHY: Assigned to the Holy See. I was called again by Secretary of State's office and asked if I would once again "ask my friend in Monaco" if he would be willing to take a political family in exile. This time it was a bit more difficult as the dictator in question was none other than "Baby Doc" Duvalier of Haiti, his wife, and children. You'll recall, Bill, that our government forcibly put Duvalier and his family aboard a military aircraft in Port-au-Prince and flew them to France. They were "dumped" at a hotel near Megeve and we gave "our solemn promise" to the French Government that we would have a place of permanent exile" within two weeks - - if only they would accept the family for a short period of time". Well - - as you recall - the weeks went by - and our government had great difficulty finding a place to accept the former Haitian leader. I went once again to see Prince Rainier - - who was most forceful in his negative reply regarding "Baby Doc" himself. He said that the wife and children could live in Monaco until they found a permanent residence in Europe or in Africa - "but under no conditions will I accept that good-for-nothing husband."

Q: The family could stay as refugees, sort of.

MURPHY: Yes - as refugees, but "Baby Doc" Duvalier would never be allowed into the country. Amazingly enough - the story of "Baby " and his family does not stop with Prince Rainier's refusal of refuge for the husband. I returned to Rome and almost immediately received another urgent message asking me to put pressure on the Vatican to pressure the Prince-Bishop of the nearest diocese to the Principality of Andorra to allow the Duvalier family to take up residence in that Principality. As you may know, Bill, Andorra is ruled jointly by the President of the French Republic together with the Prince-Bishop of the nearest Spanish diocese (I forget the name of that diocese). When I went to the Vatican's Secretariat of State (their State Department) with this request from Washington. I was told that the Vatican had already received a negative reply from the Bishop in question.....posed by the French some weeks before! The good Bishop was presently on holiday on Mallorca - and did not want to be disturbed. I suggested someone in Embassy Madrid go to the island and try to persuade him in person. The bishop never did give his permission - although President Francois Mitterrand had already agreed to the request. (You see - the French REALLY wanted him out of France!).

Q: But, Peter, again, going back with those kinds of experiences, subsequent and at the time, how did you and your wife maintain an equilibrium if you will? How do you stop it from going to your head?

MURPHY: I suppose you are referring to life in Monaco - and the constant public exposure. I think it's just common sense, Bill . You simply have to realize that you are here today - and gone tomorrow! It is the same for all of us in the Foreign Service. You can't let it go to your head.....although in the "old days" I do recall Principal Officers who did have a problem in this regard.....their wives as well! One thing negative about our posting to Nice was the effect on the family. Due to the fact that we were constantly on the go - we did not spend as much time as I would have liked with our boys. They were with us the entire tour - and went to school only a five minute walk from our home. However - at times, we were obliged to attend official events several nights in a row. The two great family periods during the year were our ski holidays - and our summers on the beaches of St.. Tropez! There - we lived in bathing suits and blue jeans!! We all have great memories of our days at the beach - and also on the ski slopes in France and in Italy. I often look back on those days with the greatest of pleasure.....and I hope that my family does as well!

About my friendship with Prince Rainier - I want to let you know - and anyone who may in the future read these words, I've never divulged any intimate aspects of our conversations or correspondence because I consider him a true friend. I think that Prince Rainier appreciates this aspect of our relationship. I have, on the other hand, saved all of our correspondence over the years and hope that someday someone will find it of interest. Much of the Prince's writings relate to world politics - and some of it not too flattering either to France or Washington! Also included are long comments on his family - and especially his children. As you know, his daughters have not had the best of marriages - especially Caroline with her marriage in June of 1978 to the French playboy Philippe Junot. Perhaps I should leave these papers to my "alma mater" - Boston College or - why not? - to the Georgetown School of Foreign Service!!

Q: You separate, in other words, the friendship from the official work you had on behalf of the US government.

MURPHY: Most definitely, Bill. I would say that we really became close friends - - as close as a foreigner can get to a Chief of State and his family. I am also fully convinced that because of this friendship I was better able to serve my country and to obtain objectives which were unique.

Q: So for financial reasons, you were glad to leave the French Riviera, but for personal and professional reasons, it was sad?

MURPHY: That's right, Bill, I'd say it was very sad in view of the fact that my wife's family resided in the area. In addition we had all made so many close friends throughout the area. The boys, especially, were very much engaged with their soccer teams and other school activities. This was the first time in their lives that they really made school friends. They were just at that age when friendships begin to count. I do believe we did a lot of good work in that area of France and that our nation's image was enhanced by our presence - - in spite of the subsequent closing of the consulate!

Perhaps I should mention my relationship with Embassy Paris - and the guidance or supervision provided by that large diplomatic post.

Q: Yes, tell us of your relationships with Paris. You were a constituent post.

MURPHY: Yes, that's right. I mentioned earlier, Kenneth Rush, was the ambassador during most of my tour in Nice. I don't recall if I mentioned his background: he had been President of Union Carbide and also Ambassador to Germany. I've recently read that, at one time, there had been speculation that he would be offered the Cabinet slot as Secretary of State! He really didn't bother us much in Nice; during the two years I served there he visited perhaps four times. On one occasion Ambassador and Mrs. Rush - and Jackie and I - made an official visit to Corsica.....part of my consular district. Talk about a traveling "dog and pony" show!! This is a fine example to demonstrate that all was not fun and games on the Riviera. The job often involved much hard work - coordination, administrative, as well as diplomatic. For the year preceding the ambassadorial visit to Corsica, the island was constantly being blown up by separatist groups who have wanted a " Free Corsica" for years. The genesis of the visit was a conversation Rush had with the French President (Giscard D'Estaing) at the Elysée Palace. Rush mentioned to Giscard that he had never been to Corsica - and asked what it was like. Quite naturally, the French President encouraged him to go see for himself. The French were desperately attempting to find a solution to stem the terrorism and return the tourists to that beautiful island. When Ambassador Rush telephoned me to tell me of his conversation, I strongly urged him to put off the trip due to the precarious situation. Only a week before, three Frenchmen were killed by terrorist bombs on the island. Alas! Nothing I said was heeded - and planning for the expedition began at once. Rush was confounded by the fact that he could not bring his ambassadorial limousine to the island - - and I never thought he believed me when I told him it was too large for the Island ferry!!

Thus - - we planned the trip and we went to Corsica. We were accompanied by our spouses and I believe we stayed there for three or four days. It was an incredibly difficult trip for my wife and me. I, of course, had to plan every moment of our stay - - from the arrival in Ajaccio to the visits to Bastia, Olbi, Corte and the other important areas of the island. It was rather complicated given the fact that neither Ambassador Rush nor his wife spoke a word of French!! (....and Corsica is NOT Paris!) Both the ambassador and his wife were very nice people - but Mrs. Rush had not the slightest interest in France (as far as I could see) and spent her time with her needlepoint!! She rarely made an effort to speak with our hosts and not once expressed an interest in the area or the people. On the other hand - after a few drinks - the ambassador made a great effort to speak with the local officials - none of whom spoke English. He got himself into rather awkward situations because of lack of French. Naturally I attempted to interpret for him - but often, after a formal official dinner - he refused to have me translate - saying that he understood everything. I recall one evening, in conversation with the Communist mayor of Calvi, Ambassador Rush agreed with several of the anti-American ideas the mayor was expounding!! The mayor was amused - and all I could think of was how this conversation would look in the morning's press! Thankfully - it was not reported in the local or national press!

Q: Not knowing what he was agreeing to?

MURPHY: Yes - Bill - It was a ludicrous situation. We did have many happy memories of that trip - the friendliness of the Corsicans, the true pro-American sentiments of the majority of the people on the Island. I especially recall - on a previous visit to the island - being completely overwhelmed when I discovered how much the people of Corsica contributed directly to our Revolution and the fight for independence of the United States of America. It came about in the following manner: the French Consul General in Monaco - Melle. Marcelle Campana - was the daughter of a distinguished French diplomat. She was born in London at the time he was French Consul General in the British capital. Prior to her posting to Monaco (for health reasons), she had been French Ambassador to Panama - and the very first French female ambassador! Her family was Corse in origin and prior to my first official visit to the island, she gave me the name of various family members to look up during my visit to Corsica. I recall visiting her sister who had resided in center the charming old city of Bastia. She was a widow and her husband, a noted attorney, came from one of the oldest families on the island. I was invited to dinner at this lady's home - which was itself something out of a novel! The entire house spilled down a very steep hill - overlooking the port of Bastia. Thus on the hill side it was two stories in height - - and on the water side 12!!! As my visit took place during our Bicentennial year (1976), my hostess had gathered together various documents relating to the Bicentennial of the U.S.A. which were continued in her husband's family archives. She presented me with letters from family members who had participated in the Battle of Yorktown with the French Admiral Conte de Grasse. In addition, she gave me an official document signed by King Louis XVI ordering her husband's relative - the then Bishop of Bastia - to cause to be celebrated in his Cathedral a Te Deum in celebration of "the victory of my friend the Admiral de Grasse" in assisting the American nation in its struggle for independence from Great Britain. I found this to be extraordinary - but soon discovered that several Corsican families had ancestors who had participated directly in our Revolution. You will ask: what did I do with these documents!? Well - being a good government bureaucrat and wanting them to be preserved for posterity - I sent them off to the Historical Office of the Department of State. I never received a word of acknowledgment....typical, don't you think? I did take the precaution of having legalized photocopies made for my own use and I still have them somewhere in my papers!! (At least, I hope I still have them somewhere!! When you move around as we do - one never knows!!)

I did enjoy the visits to Corsica during my tour of duty - - they were so different from my daily routine on the Cote d'Azur!!

Q: But guidance? You were sort of laden to yourself?

MURPHY: The guidance in the Embassy was minimal - to say the least. In theory - the Consul General was supposed to supervise the work of the Consulates in France. This was a completely different set up than, for example, in Italy, Germany or Mexico - where the Deputy Chief of Mission was responsible for such supervision. As it was my first Principal Officership, I really did need a bit of guidance. After three or four months on the job,.....with no guidance or even much interest forthcoming from the Embassy in Paris - I decided to "wing it" on my own!! There was certainly enough to keep me busy: the monthly visits of the Sixth Fleet ships; the frequent commercial conferences and gatherings attended by some of America's leading business people; the consular work.....and, of course, the political work of the post. There were very important political figures in our area....many of whom had national prominence. I contributed to the political reporting of the Embassy as well as sending political reports directly to the Department. Jacques Medecin, for example, the Mayor of Nice, was most influential both the consular district as well as in Paris. He was Minister of Tourism at the same time he held the position of Mayor of Nice - as well as Deputy. Unfortunately, he subsequently fell on hard times: exile in Latin America due to implications of corruption while in office. I believe that he has now been extradited to France and is awaiting trial on these charges.

Q: In exile, indeed.

MURPHY: Jacques Medecin's father had also been Mayor of Nice as had his grandfather before him. The Medecin family was a regular royal family in that part of France. Towards the end of my tour, there was even an American connection within the Medecin family as Jacques had married a Californian. Jacques Medecin's grandfather was a great friend of Jay Gould, of the Philadelphia railroad family, and of his wife, Florence Gould. Florence was one of the personalities of the Riviera and presided over the cultural/artistic life of the area from her magnificent villa in Juan les Pines - near Cannes. She was a very patriotic American - in spite of having lived in France from the age of 18 - when she went there as a young bride from California. She remained throughout the war years and was even made an honorary French citizen for her charitable works in the country. She once told me that her husband had donated the magnificent fountains (Neptune & company) located in the center of the city of Nice (Place Messina) as a tribute to his friendship with Jacques Medecin's grandfather. Whenever we had a distinguished American visiting the area, Florence could also be counted upon to entertain them royally (Nelson and Happy Rockefeller, Lady Bird Johnson, Congressional delegations, etc.)

Q: Maybe, given the realities of your two years there and the realities of Paris and its complexities and inadequacies, you were better off left alone, where you could be your own boss? You were literally your own boss, weren't you?

MURPHY: Absolutely, Bill. The only time I heard from the Embassy was when an important visitor was to arrive in Nice from Washington or when someone from the Embassy wanted to make a visits to the area. I vividly recall a total of four Inspectors coming to inspect the post. They managed to stay in the area for a total of seven days - including a long weekend. I guess I couldn't blame them; the place was like a paradise on earth. Looking back - I sometimes feel I did not fully appreciate the natural beauty of the Riviera while living there. Of course, having family there, I return often - but it is not quite the same as living in a place. In any event, Bill - No - the Embassy did not show much interest in the Consulate. I was very much on my own - - and fully enjoyed it!!!

Q: Until efficiency reports time!

MURPHY: Exactly, that's about it.

Q: But you had to be equipped to handle such an assignment; have a lot of experience.

MURPHY: You couldn't do it I don't think without having a solid knowledge of consular and political work - - plus a pretty good knowledge of French. Not just the French language but also an understanding of the French mentality and culture - as well as the French political system. And then, again, having a general, overall knowledge of all functions within the area of Foreign Service responsibility.

Q: You were a mini-Embassy in many ways.

MURPHY: Yes - A mini-Embassy.

Q: Because of your accreditation to Monaco, and also the nature of the south of France.

MURPHY: That's correct. I forgot to mention our anti-drug work at the consulate in Nice. With all that money about - there was little wonder that the "beautiful people" (and even those not so "beautiful") were tied up in all sorts of drugs dealings. Because the great center for drug production was just a bit to the east of us, the DEA was very, very active in the area

Q: Now this DEA (Drug Enforcement Agency)....were they there to get people arrested or what?

MURPHY: Yes, Bill. At the Consulate we had one DEA agent (Peter Charette) assigned who worked very closely with the French anti-drug police. He would gather information regarding drug running, consumption, and forward that to Washington. Agents in other European or Middle East nations would pass information to him - and he, in turn, to the French police. He would accompany them on raids although he did not, in fact, arrest people on French soil. A lot of these drug laboratories were located in the area around Marseille - but several of the owners of these labs lived in the Cannes, Nice area.

Q: Because it was a nicer part of the...

MURPHY: It was a nicer part of the world. Exactly!

Q: This is the movie "The Marseille....."

MURPHY: "The French Connection"

Q: "The French Connection", yes. That was in another consular district. That was in Marseille, next to you. Peter, we have to leave Nice, don't we. Where are we going to next?

ANTHONY QUAINTON

Political Officer

Paris (1972-1973)

Ambassador Anthony Quainton was born in Washington state in 1934. He graduated from Princeton University in 1955 and joined the Foreign Service in 1959. He served at overseas posts in Australia, Pakistan, India, France, Nepal and as ambassador to the Central African Republic, Nicaragua, Kuwait and Peru. Ambassador Quainton has also served as the Deputy Inspector General, Assistant Secretary of State for Diplomatic Security, and the Director General of the Foreign Service. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1997.

Q: Before we go to Nepal, let's talk about Paris. How did this 15 officer political section in Paris dealing with all these different geographic areas work?

QUAINTON: The mega embassies, London and Paris, were structured similarly with very large sections. It was assumed that the French and the British still retained global interests. Indeed, the French at that period had as many embassies as we did around the world and certainly played a very important role in Francophone Africa, even in the Middle East, where they had historical relationships with Syria, Lebanon and elsewhere. They were important players. We cared about what the French were doing. We also cared about what they were doing in Southeast Asia. We cared what they were doing in political military terms with respect to NATO. A lot of officers were interested in internal politics. There were half a dozen of us doing full time external work. There was nothing going on in the world that we didn't want to know what the French thought. So, the job was essentially one of going back and forth to the Quai d'Orsay inquiring about French policy in Gabon or Lebanon or whatever, in places where we had interests that intersected with the French. Keeping in touch with the French African and Middle East establishments, journalists, academics, etc., I also stayed in touch with the Elysee, because the French presidency had a separate department dealing with Africa under a man called Foccart, who over the previous 20 years had managed intelligence throughout French Africa.

So, it was an exciting job because it brought one in touch not only with professional diplomats in the French foreign ministry but with the Presidency, leading French newspapers, and academics. So, for a mid-level first secretary, it was pretty interesting. There was a lot of reporting to be done. I was quite autonomous. My job was clearly defined. The political counselor, Alan Holmes, was interested in what I did, but he was not a micromanager, so each member of the section had a great deal of latitude in defining his own turf based on instructions from Washington, requests for demarches, need for reports, etc. It was a very traditional Foreign Service job in a very large embassy with lots of other agencies represented. Both the political and economic sections in Paris had an importance which does not always exist in smaller embassies. It was a challenge. The greatest challenge of working in Paris is the French. Like the Indians, they have an extraordinary capacity to patronize the United States.

Q: I was thinking that of any two countries those two would be the most patronizing.

QUAINTON: And, there was always the problem of language. I think there is no doubt that of all the places that I served, the ability to communicate in the local language was the most difficult in Paris. The French did not want to talk to anyone in English, although many of the leading figures could and sometimes would with the ambassador. The ambassador for most of this period was John Irwin, who had been deputy secretary of state, and succeeded Arthur Watson, who had been head of IBM and got caught pinching a stewardess on an airplane and was removed. Watson spoke good French, but Jack Irwin did not speak French and was constantly being put down by senior levels of the French government. I still remember going with the ambassador to discuss some important Middle East question with the secretary general of the Quai d'Orsay, Geffroy de Courcelles. He was an extraordinary French diplomat, having served as ambassador in London. He had been educated in England and spoke perfect English with the fruitiest of Oxford accents. Irwin made the demarche he was supposed to make and de Courcelles looked at him and said in his very British voice, "Mr. Ambassador, I regret to say that I regard the policy of the United States as entirely pusillanimous. I may have the wrong word, you know, but then English isn't my native tongue." I always suspected that Irwin had no idea what pusillanimous meant, and so the comment sailed over his head.

The first time I went to the Quai d'Orsay, I went to see a rather senior sous-directeur (deputy assistant secretary) to inquire about French policy towards Libya. The officer concerned listened to my demarche, which I had prepared with some care. I had looked up all the appropriate words in the dictionary and got through the demarche without too much difficulty. He smoked Gauloises and kept one lit between his lips throughout his entire response, moving it from one side to the other without opening his mouth and talking at the same time. It was a wonderful technical tour de force and left a young diplomat absolutely spellbound like a rabbit watching a search light. I understood not a word he had said, and I returned to my office knowing I had to write a cable on the French position. I consulted the political counselor, asking him what he supposed the French position was because I had had this extraordinary experience with Mr. Rouillon. He never played that game again, but it was a good lesson to a young diplomat. The tour in Paris turned out to be a prelude to a later stage in my career in Africa. One of the things that I did in Paris was to take the ambassador to call on the President of the Central African Republic in his hotel room in Paris, Jean-Bedel Bokassa, where I was later to be accredited. Bokassa wanted American astronauts to come to Bangui and we faithfully conveyed his request to Washington. I later learned that his request was received positively and that two astronauts went and were received with all the honors of a head of state!

Q: During this brief period was it sort of the general feeling that the French were concerned about keeping the Americans from messing around in their Francophone places, or was that a problem?

QUAINTON: Africa and the Middle East were quite different. They considered Africa as their backyard, and they saw American ambassadors pursuing policies everywhere designed to undercut French influence. They were very concerned about that. In the Middle East, they were less concerned, although French relations with North Africa were clearly equally privileged. I must say I always found the French, among all the diplomats with whom I dealt, the most professional and indeed quite open in describing French policies and interests. I felt I had a good relationship with them in Paris and with French ambassadors with whom I subsequently had to deal as colleagues and friends in Africa, the Middle East, and Latin America.

Q: Okay. Let's pick this up next time when you go to Nepal as DCM.

QUAINTON: Fine.

DONALD M. ANDERSON
Political Officer
Paris (1972-1973)

Donald M. Anderson was born in Iowa in 1932. He entered the Foreign Service in 1958. His career included positions in China (Hong Kong and Taiwan), India, and France. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on July 8 and September 2, 1992.

Q: We had finished your time in New Delhi. You were in Paris from '72 to '73. What were you doing there?

ANDERSON: I don't know where we finished, but I was in Delhi and got a cable from Washington saying that they wanted me in Paris in two weeks. This was right after the Nixon trip. Actually, the lead-up to the Nixon trip, and the continuing contacts had been conducted in Paris through General Walters...

Q: Vernon Walters.

ANDERSON: ...who was the Military Attaché, and the Chinese ambassador, and after the Nixon trip the contact in Paris sort of went public and the President announced that this would be the point of contact between the Chinese and ourselves, and that Ambassador Arthur K. Watson would represent the U.S. side. It became rather urgent at the time because Ambassador Watson was flying back to the United States on one of his fairly frequent trips and according to the story that appeared in the press, he got rather intoxicated and by way of apologizing to the stewardesses attempted to stuff $10.00 bills in their blouses which one of the stewardesses duly reported to the press. Of course, the press was all over...the State Department and the White House asking, "Is this the guy that's going to be handling our contacts?" "Yes, he's going to do it, but we'll have somebody there with him who is a China specialist." That is why I was suddenly transferred to Paris.

Q: I assume under strict instructions to keep your hands off the stewardesses.

ANDERSON: We got there in May of '72, and as usual in the State Department after turning my family upside down and disrupting their lives, making everybody miserable, we got to Paris and they basically said, "What are you doing here? And we don't really know what to do with you." Pat Byrne was the Asia officer in the political section and she sort of took me under her wing and took me down to meet the ambassador. I remember that quite vividly because we were walking down the hall and Jack Kubisch, who was the DCM, appeared in the hall on our way down to the ambassador's office, and said in an absolute remarkable way, "Whatever he says, agree." It was sort of a panicky advice that I should be terribly cautious. I went down and met with the ambassador and he was an absolutely charming man. We had a session, just the two of us, and he said he considered the China contacts one of the most important jobs that he had in Paris, that I was his man for those contacts, and I had access to him anytime I wanted to. If anybody in the front office gave me a bad time just to come right into his office, etc. So I left thinking this was going to be great.

And then Allen Holmes, who was the Political Counselor, and was very close to the Ambassador -- the Ambassador trusted him implicitly, and the Ambassador did not trust most Foreign Service people -- spoke to me and said there was a question as to whether I would be Special Assistant to the Ambassador and work directly for him, or whether I would be in the Political Section. And Allen advised me, and I think in many ways saved my hide, that it would be much safer if I were in the Political Section because I would have this buffer between myself and the Ambassador.

Q: Because at certain points efficiency reports are written, and if you're Special Assistant it depends on the Ambassador. Whereas Holmes being in the Foreign Service among other things...

ANDERSON: It was even more serious than that in this case. Anyway, that's the way we worked it out. The job really didn't amount to a great deal. The Ambassador didn't take part in many of the routine things that we did, but I saw the Chinese maybe a couple of times a week, and basically didn't have that much to do otherwise.

Q: What sort of things were you dealing with?

ANDERSON: Largely very routine stuff. At this point there were delegations going back and forth between China and the United States. The Chinese delegations almost all came through Paris. They would usually neglect to get their visas arranged and would come into Paris and would have to have a visa by 8:00 the following morning in order to get to whatever appointment they had in the United States. The first Boeing sale was made, and the Boeing people came through to meet the Chinese who were en route to Seattle and didn't know how to do it, so I took care of that. A lot of that kind of routine stuff.

The big thing that we were waiting for was two packages, one educational exchanges and the overall umbrella arrangement that we were trying to set up to begin educational and cultural exchanges; and a business package to set up a similar kind of relationship and a structure for beginning business relationships, remembering that at that point we had no representatives in Beijing. We had no diplomatic relations so this was the only way we could do these things in a non-official type relationship. This was the point at which the organization I'm now with, as matter of fact, the U.S.-China Business Council which was then called the National Council for U.S.-China Trade, was designated as the umbrella organization for trade. The National Committee on U.S.-China Relations and the Committee on Scholarly Communications with the People's Republic of China were designated as the educational and cultural umbrella organizations. We were expecting to get these two packages to present to the Chinese, that was probably into around early August and the Ambassador was going home on vacation so I was pushing Washington to get these things. They finally got them out to us, two lengthy cables, and when I came into the embassy that morning the two cables were waiting, and it just happened that the Ambassador was calling on the Chinese Ambassador because he was going on vacation the following day. It was a rather extraordinary meeting because the Ambassador had been out the night before, and was nowhere to be found in the embassy. I spoke to his staff assistant, who was very wise in the ways of the Ambassador, and said, "We've got to wake this guy up, and get him ready. We've got these two things." He said, "Leave it to me, Don. Don't call the residence."

Q: I take it this was a very ticklish situation.

ANDERSON: He was a very volatile individual, he could be absolutely charming at times, but he could fire you on the spot as well. So he went over to the residence, and I got the car and met him over there. He brought the Ambassador down and I handed him the two papers. Each were about, I would say, maybe ten pages long -- one on educational exchanges, and one on the commercial relationship. He glanced at them, and tossed them back in my lap and I believe his words were, "This is crap. I'm not going to talk about this penny-ante stuff." He said, "I'll leave that to you to take care of with your counterparts." And while we were riding over to the Chinese embassy he said, "What I really want to do today is just talk about global issues, sort of a tour d'horizon," for which we had no instructions whatsoever. In fact I had been specifically told by the NSC that I was not to do that kind of thing, that this was basically a mail delivery program and I was not to engage in other types of conversation.

But we did sit down with Ambassador Huang Chen, who was an interesting individual, and Ambassador Watson did indeed proceed to indulge in a tour d'horizon. The most memorable moment of which I remember -- this was 1972 -- he said, "Mr. Ambassador, the one thing that I think both of our countries have to worry about the most is Germany and Japan." Ambassador Huang, I thought, looked rather surprised at this statement, but we carried it all off, and went back. I wrote a reporting cable which reported mainly what Ambassador Huang said. Ambassador Watson later told me it was the best cable he had seen written in the embassy since he had been there.

He left very shortly after that and went home, and I am told...I don't know this from my personal experience, that he was met in the United States, and informed that it was time for him to resign. So that was really the last I saw of Ambassador Watson.

Q: Could you explain a bit about who was Ambassador Watson? What was his background?

ANDERSON: He was one of the sons of Arthur Watson, the founder of IBM. He had been president of IBM International, and as you know, his brother became Ambassador to the Soviet Union and the story was at the time that there was a question of who was going to become chairman of the board, and the senior leadership at IBM did not want Arthur K., so they arranged for him to become ambassador. I was told later that he had told someone in the embassy that he had always considered me to be the State Department spy in this China business, and he considered that I was responsible for his demise as ambassador, which was not true at all because I was very careful about that.

Q: Just to get a little feel for somebody looking at this in future times. Maybe you were sort of a mailbox operation there while these other things were happening, but at the same time there still was an official source of communication. Kissinger was head of the NSC at that time. Were you getting instructions, or whatever you want to call them from people in the NSC, "Watch this guy. We don't want him to screw things up," or anything like that? Were people telling you this?

ANDERSON: Not really. I was hearing in the embassy, and I think it was generally understood, that this guy was rather volatile, and sort of an unguided missile. But, as I say, the instructions were really that we were a mailbox, and I can remember one instance when Marshall Green came through, he was the Assistant Secretary at the time, and I told him that I was going to try and use these contacts to broaden the discussion. And he said, "That's fine Don." And the first time I wrote a cable back based on a discussion with my counterpart on his views on Sino-Soviet relations, I got a very fast phone call from Washington saying, "Dr. Kissinger does not want you doing that. Deliver the mail, and that's all." So I did very little of that.

My only other job in Paris during that whole period was to fill in for the Vietnam Liaison; actually I did get involved in the Vietnam peace talks which took place at that time, and which involved the Chinese, of course. In fact, we had a meeting with Secretary Rogers who was with the U.S. delegation, and the Chinese representatives at the Paris Peace Conference during that time. There was a period when Jack Kubisch was involved with the talks, then Jack Irwin who was the next ambassador to come out. By that time Henry Kissinger had gone...this would be November of '72, Henry Kissinger had gone to Beijing again, and they had announced that they were going to open a Liaison Office in Beijing, which I think was a very neat diplomatic stroke. They basically had an embassy, without calling it an embassy, and managed to finesse many of the issues.

Q: Particularly the two Chinas problem which was Formosa and...

ANDERSON: I'm convinced that the Chinese, and I think probably Henry Kissinger, reached agreement on the establishment of the Liaison Office with the understanding that this was the first step toward diplomatic relations and the establishment of a full- fledged embassy. I think probably the Chinese expected it to happen, and they expected it to happen much more quickly. In fact, it took from '73 all the way to December '79 when Carter finally announced establishment of diplomatic relations. I think that was a much longer period, but it was due in large part to, on the one hand the Chinese side which was going through a succession struggle with Mao and the Gang of Four; and on our side we had Watergate.

Q: This was forcing Nixon out of office.

ANDERSON: So what happened was, basically I knew from November of '72 that my job in Paris was going to come to an end because we would be setting up the Liaison Office. Then I was informed by Washington that I would be going from Paris to Beijing. I went on a direct transfer from Paris to Beijing in May of '73, so I was in Paris literally one year.

MARSHALL P. ADAIR
Paris (1972-1974)

Mr. Adair, son of a United States Foreign Service Officer, was born in Maryland and raised at Foreign Service posts in the United States and abroad. He was educated at Middlebury College and joined the Foreign Service in 1972. During his career Mr. Adair held a number of senior positions at the State Department in Washington, DC, dealing with a variety of areas, including relations with the US military Commands, Economic and political issues in Europe and Department personnel matters. A Chinese language specialist, his foreign posts include Paris, Lubumbashi, Taiwan, Hong Kong, Beijing, Rangoon, Chengdu (China), and Tuzla (Bosnia). Mr. Adair was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2011.

Q: So you're off to Paris. What was your job?

ADAIR: I was to be a “rotational” officer. They desperately needed a rotational officer in Paris? That didn’t make any sense. However, the person I was replacing was an economic officer. He had been working in the commercial section and his job had been to organize the Paris Air Show. That’s what they told me I was going to be doing. Well, the Paris Air Show was only every other year and it wasn’t going on the year I arrived. When I arrived they did put me in the commercial section first. I didn’t see why in the world the United States Government needed to be helping American businesses overseas. American businesses were the wealthiest and the most powerful in the world. They had the most resources and they could do their own work. One of the first things I had to do was to call French companies who were behind in their payments. I was supposed to get in touch with them, inform them that they owed money and ask when payment could be expected. I was mortified and thought it was the worst possible assignment I could have. I was also completely unprepared for reaction. I got on the phone, explained who I was, etc and – then they were so nice! They were terribly sorry; they would check into it right away; and some even called me back to report when they paid. They were businesspeople; they wanted contacts in government. I had not understood that.

Then the embassy hosted a trade exhibit for American companies selling equipment for moving things around. The embassy had a whole building in Paris where the Department of Commerce organized trade shows for American companies on a regular basis. One of my jobs was to call up and invite people. Actually, I called to make an appointment and then went and delivered the invitation in person. I went to one company, and the Director looked at me and asked if I would be at the exhibit. I said yes, I’m going to be there. He said okay, he would come. He showed up with his wife and his secretary and they were so much fun. His wife started driving some of these machines around the floor and whooping it up. Then he invited me out to his estate in the country and he said he was going to invite his secretary out as well because he wanted me to get to know her, etc. I thought that sounded great. As turned out I didn’t go because someone else came to Paris who I had to host; so I had to call up and cancel. To this day I regret missing that “opportunity,” though perhaps it was good that I did miss it. But again, I was surprised because I had a lot more contact with people outside of the embassy who were actually doing things and influencing things than did many of my colleagues.

Q: Yes. Well this is just one of the interesting things. You had an economic job, and you had real contact with movers and shakers – rather than the political class.

ADAIR: Right. And I saw that the political class was pretty heavily influenced by these others – they needed each other.

Q: What was going on in France at the time?

ADAIR: Well, I arrived in 1972. Four years had passed since the riots of 1968 that had led to the resignation of President Charles de Gaulle. The French had gone through a period of instability that had really scared a lot of people. By the time I got to Paris they were recouping and the conservative inclination had re-emerged. President Pompidou was just an incredible expression of that. And I remember watching and listening to his speeches on television and being appalled by the patronizing tone. However, France was doing pretty well. Their aerospace industry was growing rapidly - the Airbus and everything – and Americans were very upset because the industry was getting government subsidies. We were constantly arguing about free market versus state supported companies. We believed they were trying to protect their agricultural sector by restricting imports from the U.S. on health and contamination grounds. The French government was also subsidizing the computer industry – trying to stimulate their computer industry in the face of IBM. When I arrived our ambassador was Arthur (Dick) Watson who had come from IBM. Jacques Chirac was the minister of agriculture and he seemed to be encouraging the big demonstrations where dairy farmers were pouring their milk out onto the streets. Valéry Giscard d'Estaing was the finance minister. The embassy's economic minister, Chris Petrow, used to Giscard d'Estaing all the time and he really didn't like doing it. Petrow spoke fluent French but he found it every difficult to communicate with Giscard because he was so arrogant and snobbish. Then, of course, the Paris Peace Talks for Vietnam and the secret meetings with the Chinese were taking place at that time as well.

Q: How did you feel about Vietnam from the perspective being in France?

ADAI: I still felt very, very strongly that what we were doing there was wrong. I'd already decided at that time that if they had popped up that list and said you, you and you are going to Vietnam and I was one of the ones that they picked I would just say no and resign.

I didn't see anything in Paris that changed my mind about that. I met refugees, if you want to call them that, from Southeast Asia - wealthy people who had fled to Paris. They were very attractive people, and they were very well educated people; but they were not the kind of people that I would have liked to have running my country.

Halfway through my tour the Department asked for volunteers to go to Vietnam for just six months, to help with the drawdown. One person from the embassy went. He thought it was a fantastic opportunity to go for a limited period of time and see what was going on. He loved his tour. I didn't even consider it.

Q: Did the air show take place while you were there?

ADAI: No, it didn't. I'm pretty sure it took place after I left. At any rate, by that time I was no longer in the commercial section.

Q: Where did you move?

ADAI: I went from the commercial section to the general economic policy section, which dealt with trade policy, which I was just describing. While I was there I was made the acting civil aviation attaché for a period of time. That was an extraordinarily lucky and unusual thing. The position had been filled by a person from the civil aviation board who had to leave due to illness. The job had been empty for six months and they needed somebody desperately. My boss at the time, Steve Bosworth, recommended that I be given the portfolio. I had no clue as to what I was supposed to do. I didn't know how the State Department worked; I didn't know how the embassy worked; I didn't know how anything worked. But it was great experience. I got out of the embassy; I met lots of people and got exposed to things I never would have been exposed to otherwise.

Q: What was the situation, Airbuses being subsidized both by the British and the French?

ADAI: Yes. Well, the big one then was not Airbus; the big one then was the supersonic airliner – the Concorde.

Q: Oh yes.

ADAI: The French and British had just finished it and they were applying for landing rights in the United States. Those landing rights were facing opposition on the grounds that it was too noisy. The French believed that the U.S. Government was going to prevent the Concorde from landing with a fabricated concern about noise, but that what we were really afraid about was the Concorde would give the Europeans an insurmountable advantage. That was certainly a part of it. There was a genuine concern with noise but I don't think many complained about the noise once it started flying.

Q: Looking at it from your perspective, were we subsidizing Boeing and other companies?

ADAI: Yes, but in more subtle ways, I think: with tax policy, government support for negotiations with other countries, military purchases, etc. It was a whole variety of things. There was no question that those industries got and still get a lot of government support.

Q: Well the Concorde never really threatened us, did it?

ADAI: Well American industry's view was it was not an economically viable option. It was a small niche and it wouldn't make a profit. American industry was concerned, however, that support from the French and British governments could make that calculation very different, so they had an interest in preventing it from being a success. Looking back, it functioned well the whole time that it existed, apart from that one tragedy in Paris. The people that did fly on it thought it was great, though a bit cramped - but only a few could afford to do it. It would be nice to be able to get across the Atlantic in four hours or whatever it was that it took. I don't know what the health implications were.

Q: While you were there, had the "frankenfood" situation become noticeable, the idea of special crops and all that?

ADAI: As I recall, that was just beginning. I believe the French were concerned at the very least about importing things that they didn't understand. It was not on the level that we have now. However, there was a lot of criticism of American grain and other things for how it was treated and what kind of pesticides were used. I can't remember now to what degree there was genetic manipulation of it then. But we had cases then, as I think we had later in China, where whole shipments were stopped because they failed to meet various standards.

Q: Was there a strong element of anti-Americanism in France at the time?

ADAI: Well there was some but not as much as I expected. President Nixon made his first trip to Europe at that time. I believe he was the first one to bring a whole fleet of vehicles to travel around in, bullet-proof car, etc. I was absolutely horrified by the spectacle that he and his entourage made when they came. I thought the French would be too. Some of them were, but many people in France were actually impressed. They were impressed by the flair; they were impressed by the show of power; they were impressed by the organization and didn't seem to begrudge it at all. I was pretty surprised by that.

Q: I would have been too, yes.

ADAI: The other thing that was going on then was the first oil crisis, when OPEC (Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries) embargoed Europe and the United States for their support of Israel. The United States, as you'll recall, had a crisis at the pump and Nixon imposed gasoline rationing. Everybody tightened their belts, turned off their lights and tried to be careful. It was a national movement that was also happening all over Europe - except in France. The French did it completely differently. They said, "We are not going to be blackmailed; we are not going to change our way of life one bit." They left all the lights in Paris on, all the street lights, and the Place de la Concorde, just outside my office window was lit up like a jewel the whole time that we were there. We thought they were crazy. We thought they were absolutely nuts, and that this is just a show of bravado that was going to cost them. Well, it didn't cost them. First of all, they very quickly mended their fences with the oil producers - much faster than we did. Secondly, their nuclear reactor program was within months of coming online. They knew that within six months to a year more than 25 percent of all their energy needs would be supplied by their own reactors. They had that to back them up so they did just fine.

Q: How important were the "intellectuals"? I mean, the chattering class who one always thinks of when you think of the French and the political movements and all that. They were a very powerful group, the commentary. Were they attacking us?

ADAI: Actually it may have been the opposite at that time. Some intellectuals were arguing that the United States model was one they had to take seriously, even though part of their prescription was be more nationalistic. And I'm trying to remember the author, the economist author-

Q: Yes, it was the American challenge; was it "Le Défi Américain" or something like that?

ADAI: That's right. Jean-Jacques Servan-Schreiber.

Q: Yes, well somebody else always has "the answer." We've gone through the Japanese having "the answer," now the Chinese have "the answer." You were there when we opened relations with China, weren't you?

ADAI: Well I was in the Foreign Service when we set up the U.S. Interests Office in Beijing, but I was not yet involved with China.

Q: Did you have much contact with the French government officials dealing with the economy?

ADAI: Some, but not much. I made one or two demarches on specific issues but not on economic policy per se. I was a very junior member the embassy and only had oblique contact with officials. I didn't get to know any of them and really get a feel for how they thought.

Q: Well you left there when?

ADAI: I left in June, I think, of 1974.

Q: Did you have much social life there?

ADAI: Yes.

Q: Were you married, by the way?

ADAI: No, I was single. Paris was a wonderful place to be. I had a French girlfriend and a few French friends but most of my friends were ex-patriots, third-country nationals, businesspeople. I intentionally didn't spend much social time with other Americans in the embassy. A lot of the people in the embassy spent most of their time with other people in the embassy.

Q: Well one of the impressions one has in the Foreign Service is that service in Paris is really not much fun for a good number of the people assigned there. It's a big embassy, it's rather rank conscious and you're not treated very well. How did you feel?

ADAI: Well, I think there is some truth to that. I was a junior officer, and at a big post like that junior officers tend to be less integrated into diplomatic work. One of the issues that bothered many of us was that we weren't on the Diplomatic List.

Q: Oh really?

ADAI: The U.S. Embassy at that time had almost 100 Americans on the Diplomatic List. We were told by the embassy's administrative officials that we weren't on the diplomatic list because the French had asked the embassy to keep the size down. The reason given was that was the only way the French could keep the number of Soviets down. We were a little skeptical about that explanation. I was told by at least one French official that he had never heard about that reason. The administrative section also argued that we didn't really need to be on the Diplomatic List. That was specious at best, and incorrect for me. I had a case once where I had to make a demarche to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs about landing rights for a very powerful American charter airline company. They had not received an answer to their application and were due to fly in three or four days. For some reason the French seemed to be delaying permission.

The embassy received a cable instructing us to make a demarche. I called up, made the appointment and then went to the Foreign Ministry. It was my first time, so one of the more senior people in the economic section accompanied me. It was Larry Raicht, you probably knew him. We arrived and were ushered into this official's office. It was magnificent, with wonderful high ceilings, huge windows and balconies – the works. He welcomed us very courteously, then sat down behind his desk and took a book out of his drawer. It was a copy of the Diplomatic List. He opened it and said, "I see Mr. Raicht here, but not Mr. Adair. Why?"

Part of me was mortified - and part of me felt vindicated. Larry leaned in and began to explain. The official listened a bit, then said, OK, he just wanted to make the point - which I assumed was don't stray too far from the rules - and asked me to go ahead and make my presentation. I made the case; he listened and then said he would call and it would be taken care of. The next day, Saturday, I happened to be the embassy duty officer and I received a call from the CEO of the airlines in question, who had not yet received a copy of the report that we sent to the Department. The stress in his voice was fairly high. He was saying he had sent the Deputy Secretary a cable and needed to know right away.... I stopped him, explained we had spoken to the Ministry the day before, and recounted what the official had said. The relief in his voice was palpable - and by the way the flight was approved and landed.

That was done. I recounted the incident to the administrative section and to the embassy leadership - and it had absolutely no effect on their policy. No one was added to the Diplomatic List. It did though strengthen our voice within the embassy a little.

Q: Well it may have given you a little more clout.

ADAIR: Right. Then, I had to spend six months in the consular section. In principle that was required for all of us. I'm glad I did it. It was an interesting experience. After that I knew I didn't want to do that kind of work though. It was a much higher level of personal stress than the work that I had been doing. I was on the visa line for eight to nine hours a day, and many of the people that I interviewed were desperate. We processed thousands of visas a day. Most of the French applicants got them automatically, so we were mostly seeing people that were third country nationals or young French women who wanted to go be au pairs. The latter was illegal at the time. Now it's fine but then it was illegal. We were only interviewing the tough cases. We didn't have any of the bulletproof glass and all that stuff then so we were just standing behind the counter and these people would come up and they'd beg and plead, and it just broke your heart. Some of them were very dignified and some of them I thought would have been great people to go to the United States but we had to apply the U.S. immigration law, and more often than not were not allowed to give them that option.

We had one case where 50 Gypsies showed up. They asked for visas to attend an international conference of gypsies in the United States somewhere, and they were going to go with their families and their caravans and essentially everything they owned. The first question we asked was the standard, "How are you going to support yourselves in the United States?" "Easy," they replied, and pulled out bags of gold and plumped them on the counter. We turned them all down because they could not demonstrate that they had an established residence anywhere to which they would return. Months later we got word from the consulate in Montreal, I think it was, that they'd showed up there and tried again. They were turned down there as well - but my guess is they eventually crossed over. The border was not very tight at that time.

Q: Yes. Well then, you left there when?

JOHN O. GRIMES Counselor for Labor Affairs
Paris (1972-1974)

Mr. Grimes was born and raised in Alabama and educated at Notre Dame University. After service in the United States Marine Corp he joined the State Department and served as Diplomatic Courier until being commissioned as a Foreign Service Officer in 1962. A specialist in Labor Affairs, Mr. Grimes served in Glasgow, Valetta, Port of Spain, Kinshasa, Brussels, Tunis and Paris (twice). He had several tours of duty in Washington, DC and a year of Labor Studies at Harvard University Mr. Grimes was interviewed by James F. Shea and Don Kienzle in 1996.

Kienzle: This is in 1972.

Shea: Oh you worked for John Condon.

GRIMES: Yes. That was interesting. That and my last assignment in Paris as labor counselor, those were my only two assignments that were purely labor. The others were a mix of labor and political.

Kienzle: That was in 1972. Do you want to describe the issues you worked on and your working relationship with John Condon?

GRIMES: John Condon didn't want an assistant. I was imposed on him. I found that out after I got there. He was courteous and nice, but he kept me in the back room. I didn't meet any labor leaders to speak of. He didn't want to waste his time trying to inform me or instruct me or coach me in this trade, so it just didn't make too much sense. I recommended that the job be abolished, and they did abolish it. They were having a cutback at the time anyway. I said, "My job is not essential so take it."

Shea: What issues did you deal with there?

GRIMES: Well, I didn't really deal with many issues. I was just a helper to John Condon. He was involved in some things like -- I don't know whether you remember the LIP watch factory. That was a big deal at the time because the CFDT was trying to take it over and make it a worker-owned thing. It never worked out, but that was the major issue that was going on at that time. Honestly, I don't remember much else that was happening. Of course, Condon was interested in keeping close contact with the left there. That brought him into some little friction with Irving Brown. As a matter of fact, Condon sent a group of journalists to the States on one of these leadership grants. Unfortunately, he let the Journalists Association decide who was going to go, and a couple of them turned out to be communists.

Shea: Did he have to get a waiver from...

GRIMES: Honestly I don't know. I don't know if they were card carriers or just sympathizers, I'm not sure.

Shea: Who did your officer efficiency rating?

GRIMES: Condon wrote mine. His, and later mine, too, were written by the political counselor, and then reviewed by the DCM.

Kienzle: Do you want to describe your impressions of the work of Irving Brown and the AFL in Paris?

GRIMES: I thought Irving Brown was one of the most interesting people and famous people I have ever met. I was impressed with that little office in Paris, that little two-man show they ran there and the kinds of things they were involved in. I give Irving Brown as much credit for turning the communist thing around as anybody else. He was instrumental in the help that got to the Polish trade unions. He never said much about it; he never said anything about it as a matter of fact, but you could see what was happening there. He was traveling east quite a bit, not into Poland, I guess, but he was seeing to it that the flow of machines did -- printing presses, Xerox machines all of that kind of equipment that was essential to what Solidarity was able to do. I think that is the best example I ever saw of the AFL-CIO encouraging democracy abroad. I forget the name of that program.

Kienzle: NED?

GRIMES: Is that what it is called?

Kienzle: National Endowment for Democracy.

GRIMES: Then they do a lot of other stuff that busts, but there I think he made a difference.

Kienzle: This would have been during your second tour in the early 80's. Did Irving coordinate at all with the Embassy or inform you of what he was doing?

GRIMES: Oh, no. He was very close about what he was doing. He was just sort of mildly interested about what was happening in labor in France. He knew everybody, and of course, everybody knew him. I think they thought of him as a CIA agent. A lot of them did; the people on the left did anyway. The Force Ouvrière, he had been very close with them. I don't know how he felt. He wasn't interested very much in the CFDT or the socialist side of things. He was interested in things he needed from the Embassy. If he needed transportation for Kirkland, or something like that, that is about the only time he would ask anything of me. I used to go around to see him frequently, maybe a couple of times a month, to see what was going on and to exchange information with him. He was very close, and I guess he had to be, with what he was doing.

Shea: Who was working for him at that time?

Kienzle: Is this the first tour or second tour we are talking about?

GRIMES: First tour. Jeepers, I really didn't have any contact with him in the first tour because I was in the back room. In the second tour, I can't remember his name, a Polish man. Anyway, he kept track of the union publications from Eastern Europe, that kind of thing. He had languages.

RICHARD SACKETT THOMPSON
Delegte, Paris Peace Talks (Vietnam)
Paris (1972-1974)

Richard Sackett Thompson was born October 1, 1973 in Washington. He received a bachelor's degree in political science from Washington State University in 1955 and studied at Oxford University as a Rhodes Scholar from 1955-1957. Following his studies at Oxford, Mr. Thompson served in the U.S. military for two years. He later received a master's degree from Georgetown University. Mr. Thompson entered the Foreign Service in January of 1960. His career included positions in Aruba, Niamey, Saigon, and Algiers. This interview was conducted by Charles Stuart Kennedy on February 25, 1994.

Q: Okay. You were in Paris from 1972-74. When you arrived, what was the status?

THOMPSON: Well, they were a kind of ritual that had been going on for at least a couple of years. There had been all that discussion about the shape of the table, but by the time I got there that had been settled. Of course, those sorts of issues are very important because they are symbolic. One side maintained that they were four-sided talks, and the other side maintained they were two-sided talks. So you had all these seemingly trivial issues like the shape of the table and the arrangements, etc., which really were symbolic of who was actually going to prevail and impose his view on the other side. They went to the heart of how the war would come out.

By the time I got there were these talks in the Conference Center in the Avenue Kleber. They were very ritualized with the exchanging of statements around a large table, then you had lunch, and then would come back for some rebuttals. There were four delegations for North Vietnam, the United States, The Republic of Vietnam and the Provisional Revolutionary Government, which was the puppet government that Hanoi had set up purporting to represent the South. Of course, the famous Madame Binh was the head of that delegation. You would come into the room and the first few minutes are kind of exciting to be sitting there with the North Vietnamese and Madame Binh. And then the speeches drone on and it becomes less exciting, especially as every speech had to be given in three languages. The procedures were set up that the Vietnamese would speak in Vietnamese, it would be translated into French and then into English. There was simultaneous translating so you could hear all three at the same time, but it still meant that every statement was made three times so everything was really dragged out.

Q: What were you doing?

THOMPSON: I was liaison officer in our delegation. This meant that I was the person authorized to talk to the other delegations to set up meetings, sometimes to exchange documents, and at times visit their headquarters to exchange documents or procedural proposals or something. If you stop and think this makes a lot of sense because you need to have a designated person as a contact point for the delegations. If someone else from the delegation called them they should ignore him or her. You could imagine a delegation with 12 or 15 people if anybody felt he could phone somebody from another delegation and start setting up meetings or passing papers, etc. You needed to have a definite point of contact for that sort of thing.

I did some of the reporting on the meetings and there was always a press conference right afterwards in the same location where the four delegations would take turns speaking to the press. I would do a reporting cable of what was said at the press conference. At the actual meetings, part of the arrangements was a big circular table and a small rectangular table on each side which sort of divided the big table into two sides. That was part of the proceedings. I sat at a small table and opposite me on the other side was the North Vietnamese liaison officer. His English, of course, was much better than my Vietnamese. When somebody started a speech we would exchange the text because they were all written out ahead of time to help your translators know what to say. So, he and I did certain things relating to our duties as liaison officers even during the meetings.

The whole point of these lengthy meetings was to make them last until lunch because the French would give a good lunch. Apparently in the early days, it had been a nice hot lunch, but as the years went on, it started becoming a cold lunch, but it was still very tasty. So, the object was to make sure you could go on long enough to get lunch. And then you would come back for a round of pro forma rebuttals and then go home.

Of course, behind the scenes, as revealed later, Kissinger was carrying on his secret talks. Now and then, in hindsight, there was a faint reflection of those in what went on in these more or less public talks.

Q: Who was leading our delegation?

THOMPSON: When I arrived, it was William Porter, who was a very respected career officer and who thereafter became briefly number three man in the State Department, Under Secretary for Political Affairs, and then I forget if he retired or left with the change in administration or what. Anyway he held that job for a relatively short time. A very nice person. Very realistic. One of the relatively few high ranking people I heard that always spoke honestly and made sense. He was in the Phil Habib mold who always spoke directly and frankly and realistically. His assistant was Heyward Isham, another career officer who retired not long thereafter.

The next important development was in October, 1972 when Kissinger revealed the secret talks.

Q: What did that do to what you all were doing?

THOMPSON: It meant the suspension of the talks around the round table at Avenue Kleber and a couple of us were then taken from the regular delegation and brought into the Kissinger talks. I was brought in as a second interpreter. He had a very gifted interpreter, David Engel, who really spoke fluent Vietnamese.

Q: Where did he learn Vietnamese?

THOMPSON: Well, I think in the system. He was at the Foreign Service Institute and just a very gifted person.

I was pulled in to the delegation as sort of an additional flunkey to attend meetings. I don't remember exactly what happened, but basically what happened secretly was that the North had started to pull back from positions it had been taking before and that was when Kissinger revealed the secret talks in October. I attended one or two meetings then at houses in Neuilly, a suburb of Paris where we met with the North and they in effect were confirming that they were pulling back from previously agreed positions. There was one last meeting in early December at which Hey Isham was head of our delegation, all the top people having left already. Hey Isham and I went out to a Communist-sponsored meeting place on the outskirts of Paris and just ran down the list of issues and confirmed that they had pulled back on everything. This set the stage for the famous Christmas bombing of Hanoi, after the election.

Q: You say that they pulled back from previously agreed positions, these are ones that both sides had agreed to?

THOMPSON: Yes, in the secret talks.

Q: And then all of a sudden they just stopped?

THOMPSON: I can't remember. I am talking from memory. I am sure Kissinger has written about this.

Q: Were both sides looking over their shoulders at the battlefield at that time?

THOMPSON: No, they were looking over the shoulders of the American presidential election. And I suppose the reason they pulled back was because they saw that Nixon was going to win and they were not succeeding to influence the election by their maneuverings in the secret talks. The last meeting we held with them was after the election, I recall, in December, and they were still recalcitrant so we had the famous Christmas bombing.

There were two military officers attached to our delegation. During most of the time it was a general and a colonel, but towards the end it was a colonel and a lieutenant colonel. They had the best intelligence coming in from around the world to our delegation. During the Christmas bombing the North started shooting down B52s, the first time any were shot down. I can't remember how many were downed but from our intelligence we also knew they were running out of missiles so they would soon be totally helpless in the face of our bombing. Under the influence of this bombing, which I think was intended to be close to Hanoi, somehow stray bombs not only strike the French embassy, but killed the ambassador's mistress, which is very unkind indeed. So, in early January they agreed to resume the talks, the secret talks which by then were not very secret because hordes of newsmen would follow Kissinger wherever he went.

Q: Did you attend these meetings?

THOMPSON: Yes. Some meetings were between Kissinger and Le Duc Tho, and I would be there. As they started to make progress, they broke into two levels and Kissinger and Le Duc Tho would be working out the general agreement and Ambassador William Sullivan would be meeting with a deputy foreign minister, Nguyen Co Thach, who later became foreign minister. Bill Sullivan and Thach would be working out the protocols which were the details of application, how you set up inspection teams, etc. in a separate set of meetings. So there were two sets of meetings going on. The principals, Kissinger and Le Duc Tho might be meeting in one place and Sullivan and Thach in another meeting place. So I was the interpreter for the Sullivan/Thach meetings and David Engel would stay with Kissinger and Le Duc Tho. Now and then I would be in one of the principal meetings. Maybe they would have to meet and talk to set some guidance for the secondary meetings and then the secondary meetings would resume.

Q: How did Kissinger and Le Duc Tho conduct their meetings?

THOMPSON: When the meetings first resumed in January, they were very frosty. The media, of course, didn't have much to go on but they set up cameras on raised towers 20 feet high so they could focus down inside the walls and see what happened between Kissinger and Le Duc Tho. Kissinger would arrive and knock on the door and somebody would let him in. Then after some days Le Duc Tho would come out and greet him on the doorstep and guide him in, and then he would shake hands on the doorstep and guide him in. So the newsmen judged by this how warm the talks were getting. As they started to make progress, at first you would have lunch separately. Then they started having lunch together making it a social occasion between the two delegations. And then Kissinger and Le Duc Tho would sit together and chat during the lunches. So the atmosphere gradually grew warmer as we made progress toward an agreement. By the time we got to the point where they were sitting together they were chatting together almost like old friends. You could tell that they were both very intelligent men, very dedicated to the interests of their respective countries and that there obviously was continuing reserve and carefulness even as they were seemingly chatting in a social way.

Q: Before going to a meeting, what would you and the support people on the delegation do? Would you sit around and try to figure out what you were trying to get from that particular meeting?

THOMPSON: I was not a substantive factor in this. Kissinger certainly would sit around and talk with Bill Sullivan; George Aldrich, his legal advisor who had been working on the negotiations for years; Bill Stearman, who I think is now on the faculty here at Georgetown and who was there with the NSC, about what they were going to get out of these meetings. I was not involved in that.

Q: You had been in Vietnam for a long time, did you find yourself being asked how such and such played with the Vietnamese, etc.?

THOMPSON: No, Kissinger and his substantive assistants had been dealing with the Vietnamese in these negotiations for several years and there wasn't anything a political officer from Saigon could add. They had been gaging and judging these people at the level they worked for years.

Q: At this point we essentially bypass the South Vietnamese and the Viet Cong?

THOMPSON: That is very true. Of course, the PRG was only a puppet anyway, although Madame Binh tried to pretend she had a more serious role from time to time. We immediately briefed the South Vietnamese after every meeting. Kissinger usually sent Bill Sullivan to do that. Whether he told them everything or not I don't know. You will recall that at one point the issue arose that the negotiators had been working with English language documents and there was also a Vietnamese translation. We gave the South Vietnamese the Vietnamese version of the document and they said, "Well, look, in Vietnamese this says very different things than it says in English." We went back to the North and got some changes in the Vietnamese language to correspond more closely with the English. But they were somewhat shunted aside. I can't remember the exact sequence of the meetings, but I recall at one point when the agreement had been virtually finalized and we were preparing for a very formal international conference because there was sort of a guarantee statement that would be signed by China and the Soviet Union, as well as the four countries involved. There was an international conference with the foreign ministers of all the great powers for the first time in many years after World War II. They all came together in Paris to sign the document guaranteeing and recognizing the agreement on Vietnam. While the preparations were being made for this, suddenly Madame Binh called for a meeting around the old round table again. I remember I was meeting with Ambassador Sullivan and Thach in another room in the conference center to work out some final procedures for the formal signing while she had called this meeting. I can't remember what she was talking about, but anyway, our meeting finished and we came in to the other meeting and Thach was resuming his chair as head of the North Vietnamese delegation. Thach, the deputy foreign minister, walked behind Madame Binh who was talking to the group and stopped and made a choking gesture behind her where she couldn't see him and everybody else in the room laughed and he went on and sat down. This, I think, was pretty symbolic of how the North Vietnamese regarded the Provisional Revolutionary Government. They were nonplused when she called the meeting because this was not following orders.

Q: During this time did you form any relationship with your North Vietnamese counterpart, or were things still chilly at your level?

THOMPSON: Since we met together and chatted during the luncheons, of course, and I had my counterpart close to me at the general talks, so we chatted a bit about our families and other things, I felt there was a certain degree of personal relationship. At the secondary meetings between Sullivan and Thach working out the protocols, again you had the regular meeting at a table, which might be the dining room table in a house in a suburb, but then you would adjourn for tea after a while and Thach spoke pretty good English, although Sullivan and he could talk in French too, and they would sit off to one side and probably work on some of the details. Tea breaks are very important in diplomacy as you know and that was certainly true of these.

Q: Did you stay until the end of the whole process?

THOMPSON: Well, even beyond in a sense. I am trying to remember when the Paris Agreements on Vietnam were signed. It was in late January, 1973. At any rate, once the agreements were worked out and initialed all the foreign ministers came together and had a big signing and cocktail party in this conference center at which the Foreign Minister of South Vietnam and Madame Binh clinked glasses and toasted peace...I remember at the same party I ran into a Soviet diplomat who had been posted five years in Hanoi and we talked for a half hour in Vietnamese, that was our common language. That was kind of fun.

One of the things that was set up by the Paris Agreements on Vietnam, was a joint economic commission between North Vietnam and the United States because we had undertaken a commitment in the agreement to bind up the wounds of war, which meant to give the whole of Indochina additional help. There was a secret promise, under Johnson, that was originally proposed to North Vietnam that they would get a considerable amount of assistance and this was confirmed in an exchange of correspondence between the prime minister of North Vietnam and Nixon that they would get, as I recall, $3.25 billion over five years. The Agreements also set up a joint economic commission. So I stayed on in Paris as one of two delegation members who were kept on -- the other one was Bill Marsh, now US Representative to the FAO in Rome -- to staff this new delegation. New people came out from Washington to be substantive members of this delegation headed by Maurice Williams, then deputy administrator of AID, who is a very able man. On our delegation, only Maury Williams and I knew that Nixon had promised $3.25 billion over a period of five years if the North Vietnamese would be good. This was a secret for several years. It finally became public a few years later.

So these meetings started taking place at two levels. There would be meetings between heads of delegation in which key issues were discussed. Of course, the North wanted us to hand them a check for $650 million every year and they would know how to spend it. We were saying that they had to have projects and sign agreements for each project and have the full AID detailed treatment of each project. The North was saying that was ridiculous, etc. So, we worked out a set of principles which would guide the US assistance. In our general meetings with everybody from both delegations present we would be discussing our assistance on the basis of specific needs they had, the commodity import program, a statement of principles to guide the US assistance to North Vietnam (their principle would be hand over a check and ours would be all the usual oversight safeguards of an AID program). But after two or three months it was clear that they weren't abiding by the agreement. They were preparing for future war, so we broke off the talks.

In June, 1973, there was something called the June Communiqué. Things were breaking down so seriously that Kissinger and Le Duc Tho came back to Paris and had some additional talks and came out with a communiqué which to some degree modified the Paris Agreements and described how both sides would implement them. This joint economic commission came back and met again briefly, as I recall, in June and July. But the North was not observing various parts of the agreement from our point of view and we adjourned those talks and never met again. I think the world has not really noticed that joint economic commission ever existed, ever met, but we were, of course, holding out carrots to the North Vietnamese to observe the Paris Agreements, which would have preserved an independent South Vietnam.

Q: When the Paris Accords were signed in 1973, how did you feel? What did you think?

THOMPSON: We felt that the North would probably take over the South in the near future. We were withdrawing our support from the South. Kissinger observed it, and the rest of us, that the South could not stand up and prevail since US support was gone, and Congress had passed a law forbidding any further bombing of Hanoi. These agreements would give us a chance to pull out our troops and make an honorable retreat. There was a lot of talk that Nixon could have had the same agreement four years earlier, but that is not true because the North had been insisting that we set up a coalition government with the current government, neutralists and communists in Saigon even before they would let us withdraw, which was absolutely intolerable. It was only in the negotiations of 1972 that they started to say, "Okay, you don't have to overthrow this government before you leave." So the South Vietnamese government which was our client stayed in place, we withdrew our troops, got our POWs back and were able to withdraw the American forces in some sort of order from Indochina, and that was about the most we could hope for really. We left with the government we supported still in place and with some perhaps small fighting chance to maintain itself, but we weren't very optimistic. So I think we all felt we had gotten what we could out of it and managed to negotiate a more or less honorable US withdrawal from this commitment to Southeast Asia, which obviously was not supported any longer by the American people.

Q: By the time the Peace Accords were signed were you watching Congressional actions as far as support for the war went?

THOMPSON: Yes, that was very clear. Even the hawks were giving up. Of course, then the fighting was resumed, there was the offensive in 1975 and there was a very key vote, and I can't remember how much the money was, perhaps $300 million, on assistance to the South. By then even the hawks were saying that there was no sense throwing good money after bad, so even the hawks were not willing to vote money for Vietnam by 1975. You could see that trend developing already.

Q: When did you leave Paris after these economic talks had broken down?

THOMPSON: After these talks adjourned in July, Marsh and I were left there in charge of the delegation.

Q: This was in 1973?

THOMPSON: Yes. These talks had adjourned but in theory they could resume. Our delegation's quarters were very splendid because these quarters were a section of the American embassy in Paris which had been organized to house the US ambassador to NATO and his assistant. So they were very nice offices in Building B, as it was called, adjoining our embassy in Paris. It was just Bill and me in two very impressive large offices with large anterooms and a whole series of smaller rooms for other members of the delegation, etc. So we were kept on there I guess almost indefinitely. Finally after a while I said to the Department of State, "There is nothing happening here, will you reassign me?" But by then my two years were almost up and they said, "Fine, we will do it." Ambassador Graham Martin asked me to come back to Saigon to be head of the external affairs unit in the political section. I left Paris I believe in February, 1974 and I arrived in Saigon in late February or March after some home leave in the States.

WILLIAM H. MARSH
Delegate, Vietnam Peace Talks

William Harrison March was born in Pennsylvania in 1932. He graduated from Cornell University in 1953 and from Princeton University in 1957 with an MOA after having served in the US Air Force. He entered the Foreign Service in 1960 and served overseas in Saigon, Bangkok, Brussels, Paris, Geneva and Jeddah. Mr. March was interviewed by Lambert (Nick) Heyniger and Vladimir Lehovitch in 1997.

Q: Alright. We are now in 1972. You've been in Belgium for four years. You are due for reassignment. What happened?

MARSH: I managed to get myself assigned to the Delegation to the Vietnam Talks in Paris. It had been my dream for many, many years. I had four years of French in high school, taught by Parisians, by the way. I had always wanted to live in Paris and so I got myself that job. It was absolutely fascinating.

Q: Whom were you working for?

MARSH: Well, I was working really for the deputy chief of mission, who was Heyward Isham, of the delegation.

Q: Who was the chief of delegation? Was it Kissinger?

MARSH: The question is really which delegation because we had the public talks, the weekly talks, held at the International Conference Center in Paris and then we had the Kissinger meetings that were Secret, back channel, and held out in the suburbs. So it was a fascinating life.

Q: But you were with the official delegation?

MARSH: I was with both.

Q: You were with both. The deputy was Heyward Isham, the head of the delegation was?

MARSH: Oh, Lord. The last position was Bill...I can't think of his last name. He was ambassador to Canada. This is awful.

Q: Not Robinson?

MARSH: No...no...no.

Q: What were your duties with the delegation?

MARSH: Well, my duties with the public delegation to the public talks, is what I mean, was to write the weekly presentation. And to do such other tasks as were fitting with respect to the work, and to maintain liaison with the delegation of South Vietnam.

Q: About how many officers on the official delegation?

MARSH: On the official delegation we had a half dozen or so, I would say. We also helped one another out so I met with the weekly press conference after the meeting held in Paris in the International Conference Center. When David Lambertson, the press attaché, was away for one reason or another, I would take that. He would do my work, if I were away.

And then on the Kissinger Delegation I was a factotum who would do all the necessary and proper things to make sure that all the information possible reached Dr. Kissinger from all over the place. At first he was the Assistant to the President and later he was that and Secretary of State. Because you see after we signed the agreement in January of 1973 he came back for some follow-up talks a couple of times.

Q: And of course he was only there from time to time.

MARSH: That is correct. He was an extraordinary man...he is an extraordinary man, I shouldn't talk about him in the past tense.

Q: In what way?

MARSH: Well, in the first place, he is the quickest and most supple thinker I have ever encountered in my life. Just amazing. Time and again he would come up with something and all of us would ask ourselves now why in heaven's name didn't I think of that? It was so appropriate, so incisive and so original. But, still, we who had so much more experience on the ground should have thought of that sort of thing. But it was just that we were Salieri and he was Mozart!

Plus he had a sense of humor. I have always appreciated a good sense of humor, particularly when it is based on certain ironies and that is the very nature of the Kissingerian humor. The man used to break me up, quite unintentionally, every once in a while. Now he could be scathing. I have seen senior ambassadors of the United States reduced to jelly by some of his cutting condemnations and admonitions, just all aquiver, I mean really, literally. Again I was relatively young, well in my early forties, but my father always taught me not to take very much from public people unless you happened to be married to them or they were wearing a clerical collar or something of that sort. Neither condition applied to Dr. Kissinger so I would speak right back to him, and he respected that. So we got along very well.

Q: So these negotiations then I gather were fairly continuous and ongoing, at least on the official side from '72 to '74?

MARSH: Well, you see what happened, after we signed the basic agreement we then held super secret negotiations on a program of economic aid for North Vietnam. Never publicized. I stayed on with a small delegation, very small, just two officers and one secretary...a fellow who worked for me and a secretary who served us both and yours truly... to act as a matrix for these economic negotiations. But at any rate in the Carter Administration, my Top-Secret NODIS cables were all declassified in one day. The amazing thing is they really didn't cause much of an uproar.

Q: I want to take you back to your work for the delegation. What can you tell us about your North Vietnamese and Vietcong counterparts? Who were they, how was their negotiating style different from yours?

MARSH: Well, in the first place, they didn't negotiate in any public forum at all, or even any closed forum. And they would never negotiate in the presence of the South Vietnamese. The interesting thing is they had contempt for the so-called Provisional Revolutionary Government of South Vietnam, that is to say the Vietcong Delegation, and couldn't stand Madame Binh, who was the head of that delegation. So there were times when they refused to talk privately with us when somehow or other the Vietcong Delegation had gotten wind of the meeting and had come to the meeting. They would put it off... the North Vietnamese.

Q: Do you remember any of those meetings?

MARSH: Some of them. But the point is the basic courtesies and pleasantries were always absent. The only thing that they could talk about...very few spoke English incidentally. Some spoke French. The only thing they could talk about was the weather. I remember one time I had my two sons at the Arc de Triomphe, we were looking at the great ceremonial fire there. It was either on Armistice Day or near it, something of that sort, and I had taken the boys there and was telling them about World War I, and all of a sudden the North Vietnamese delegation shows up there! I would say a dozen had come out, all virtually in lockstep marching along. The only thing they could talk about was the weather. It was raining like the devil that day, the weather was absolutely ghastly, and the other topic of conversation was what was the weather like where you come from?

You know you don't get very far.

Q: Doesn't sound too thrilling!

MARSH: No. Now there were very few who were with that delegation, senior political leaders, and one trusted senior fellow from the Foreign Ministry and they could talk substance. But the rest of those forty staff, all aides and that sort of thing, would never engage on anything concerning substance whatsoever. Never.

Q: Did you ever have pizza brought in or chop suey and sort of have lunch together?

MARSH: Oh, yes, and those were chilly affairs and we tended to stay on our respective sides. We had bilateral talks out in the suburbs, quadrilateral talks in Paris, although we said it was two-sided talks, you remember that.

Q: It's sounding a little bit like what I imagine the talks between the two sides in the DMZ at Panmunjom are probably like. Very sort of set piece talks with statements being read but not really much sort of face to face negotiation.

MARSH: Actually there was negotiation but really it was Dr. Kissinger with a Vietnamese counterpart taking a walk and talking of things out of earshot and that kind of thing. There was a great deal of subtlety and the real breakthrough came after the North Vietnamese had surprised us by rejecting the terms we offered and calling off the negotiations in late 1972. They went back to Hanoi and the Christmas bombing resulted. That brought about their acceptance because they were so surprised. As a matter of fact the delegation's plane was landing at Hanoi Airport and the air raid siren went off and they ran into the terminal. A bomb came down and blew their plane to pieces, in front of their eyes. This apparently had a very strong effect.

Q: A very sobering effect. Wow! Anything else that you can think of that an historian would be interested in knowing about this negotiating period, from '72 to '74?

MARSH: The thing that I would emphasize is that it is very difficult to make comparisons between this and other negotiations. You mention Panmunjom, well, of course, there really hadn't been negotiations there. Not until very recently had the North Koreans undertaken the slightest kinds of talks with us about things. For forty odd years they were really messing with negotiations. With the Soviets it took a long time but ultimately, yes, you reached an agreement on strategic arms, something of that sort. But the point is that effort by President Johnson and his successors from '65 on just came to nothing. They were up against an absolutely implacable adversary there. The irony of the situation was that our policy of military restraint against North Vietnam, when finally abandoned, in Christmas of 1972, brought about the desired result. I don't see much revisionist writing to say, well, we should have lambasted them in 1964, '65. I don't see it. But you have to admit the possibility that it might have proven very fruitful.

Q: I want to twist your arm, Bill, a little. The United States has to negotiate with a number of what have appeared over the years as fairly implacable adversaries. I am thinking either of negotiating with the Soviet Union, of negotiating with the Iranians over the release of our hostages from the embassy in Teheran; I'm thinking about the North Koreans. I'm also thinking about negotiating with terrorists and hostage-takers who have this sort of extreme position that there will be no negotiation but just you do what we want or we kill the hostages.

Now you've had experience, you've had direct experience as a State Department negotiator dealing with another side that is very, very difficult to deal with. Have you got any sort of advice or insights or suggestions?

MARSH: First of all, I don't really regard myself as much of a pundit, Nick, when it comes to these sorts of questions. I don't know what makes Saddam Hussein tick, and how you convert him into a reasonable human being. I'm prepared to believe it is an impossible task, and missions impossible are not exactly my forte. In negotiations, and I've had a lot of experience in negotiations because we have negotiated things in which I have been approached to participate in, such as keeping the PLO out of international organizations. I had lots of experience in that in Geneva and elsewhere. That involved a lot of negotiating and politicking. There is not really an awful lot of difference in my view.

But what's involved in negotiating and politicking, of course, is an exchange of interests in which both sides agree that in return for giving up something they will receive something and there will be an acceptable balance struck. When you are dealing with terrorists, these are be-all and end-all types, it seems to me, and it's our position that we don't negotiate with them. It's not their position. They'd love to negotiate with the United States because they would love the dignity of sitting down with the only super power and despite this Mutt and Jeff disparity in size and, frankly, in virtue, that they could be welcome at the same table with us.

I would want to emphasize, however, the crucial role that experience and prior knowledge play in crisis situations and in negotiations. The great thing that hurt us, it seems to me, in Vietnam more than any other thing, was that we didn't know anything about the place. We attempted to apply our leverage from outside without really understanding whether this would have the desired effect. The tragedy was, of course, the enormous cost for the utterly unacceptable ultimate results. That's the great tragedy of the thing.

Now I'm being a little hard on the Department, here, but let me just say something about the Belgium experience. I asked around, because you know we had travel grants that we could put out. We did have some cooperation from USIA, from USIS. I found the head of the youth movement in West Flanders, the Christian Democratic Youth Movement in West Flanders, simply because I asked some senior Christian Democratic politicians who, in their view, would be good people to send to the United States on leader grants. They directed me to one Wilfred Martens, who became Prime Minister many times over. I left in '72 from Belgium, and when I returned in '84, he was Prime Minister. This had some utility. I'll say no more.

Q: One final question that I just wanted to ask, get your opinion about. Some people feel that there are certain negotiating skills that some people possess and others don't and that there should be sort of a team of professional negotiators who negotiate from the United States no matter whether it is aviation agreements or hostages or ending a trade embargo or whatever. Now you have made the point already that you believe that people who go into negotiations should know as much as they possibly can about the context of the people you are dealing with. What do you think of this idea of sort of a small cadre of sort of permanent U.S. negotiators?

MARSH: Well, frankly, not much. And the reason is that each negotiation advances the current distinct interests of the United States, or is supposed to. Each set of negotiations has a different clientele of interests in the United States. Now State knows more about effective negotiation than anybody else does. I'm utterly convinced of that. Dr. Kissinger certainly knew how to rely on the Foreign Service for his various negotiations. Other Secretaries, I think particularly of Baker, belittled the Foreign Service and did not really make proper avail of it. But I think that was exceptional. Secretary Shultz certainly knew how to use it and did frequently.

The thing is that the Department does not, frankly, enjoy the trust of an enormous part of the American population and particularly among some of the leaders of some of its most significant interests in the private sector. Thus I don't think that we can say we are double-jointed and will negotiate all these sorts of things. That won't wash. But on the other hand, what we can do is to chair, and usually do, chair negotiations and keep under control the various interests. I will never forget the one international conference, a United Nations conference, in which some members of the United States Delegation took the floor to attack U.S. policy. Stupefaction resulted from that, worldwide stupefaction! No one had ever seen anything like that before. A friend of mine, who was very versed in these things, said the purpose of the Department of State in international delegations is to provide adult supervision. And that is probably very much the case.

It would be very nice.

I would just like to amend what you said, Nick, to say that knowledgeable people from State should be part of each and every delegation. Besides, perhaps, having a State chairman of it there should be someone at the working level who really knows what he is talking about, who the other side is and that sort of thing. That said, we have to be prepared in State, I'm still saying "we" even though I am now retired. We have to be prepared at State to devote far more training and far more time in terms of assignments and so forth to crisis management, terrorists, negotiation, and all of these key things than we have ever shown an inclination to do before this time.

STEPHEN H. ROGERS
Counselor, OECD
Paris (1972-1975)

Ambassador Stephen H. Rogers was born in 1931 and grew up in Long Island, New York. He entered the Foreign Service in 1956. His career included positions in India, France, the United Kingdom (England), Mexico, and South Africa, and an ambassadorship to Swaziland. Ambassador Rogers was interviewed by Raymond C. Ewing in 1994.

Q: Your tour finished about 1972 and you went back to Paris.

ROGERS: Back to Paris and the OECD mission this time.

Q: Had the mission been there during your previous assignment in Paris?

ROGERS: Yes. I had very little to do with it at that point. I can't say that I was very enthusiastic about going to the OECD mission. Joe Greenwald was there at the time I arrived but left about a month later to become Ambassador to the European Communities. As a matter of fact we didn't have an ambassador for two years and the acting chief of mission was the Treasury representative, Weir Brown, who had been there for many years and knew the business. I acted as his deputy for that time. At the end of two years the administration finally got around to replacing Joe with a businessman from Arizona, named Bill Turner. He was a very nice fellow, but was new to the business and it wasn't easy for him to get a hold of this very technical organization, so they sent Abe Katz to be his deputy. Weir Brown left at that point. So the third year I was under Bill Turner and Abe Katz.

Q: And then Weir Brown, who had come from the Treasury was replaced by another Treasury man?

ROGERS: Yes, but not at as high a rank within the structure.

Q: That was Ralph Korp wasn't it?

ROGERS: I think it was.

Q: He came from Rome.

ROGERS: Yes. Jim Ammerman was there then too. We had two Treasury people all the time.

Q: While you were acting deputy, what other responsibilities did you have or was it all coordination of the mission?

ROGERS: Well, it was partly that, partly personnel matters and coordination of Mission activities, but with special responsibilities for the trade committee, the energy committees, the manpower and social affairs committees. I did not have responsibility for the financial side of the OECD, the Economic Policy Committee and Working Party III, which were under the Treasury person there. But much of the rest...agriculture for most of the time I was there was part of my responsibility.

Q: I spent part of that period in Bern and I was spending a fair amount of time on something called the Executive Committee in Special Session which was where high level trade economic policy officials come together in fairly quiet ways periodically. Did you work with that?

ROGERS: Yes. That was a limited group. It wasn't all countries. I was there at the time that structure was set up.

Q: The OECD has been there a long time and still does good macro economic research, studies, coordination of AID programs. How would you assess the OECD, particularly looking at the period when you were there, but more generally both before and later?

ROGERS: I had had some background, of course, in my time in RPE, so I knew something about it. I think anyone who has had experience with international organizations knows enough not to jump at the chance of going back to such environments because there is so much talk and so much paper. But I also feel strongly that the OECD is a necessary organization. It serves to deal with some pretty basic problems in international economic and scientific and other relations. It isn't a very exciting place and that is probably an advantage in dealing with these difficult subjects in a technically competent way. I can think of two or three examples, perhaps.

One is the issue that was brought up in Europe about US technological domination of the world - the technological gap. This had become a major political issue for some people. We were able to put that into the Committee on Science Policy in the OECD and deal with it through a series of specific studies on different areas to see what the situation was and to see whether in fact there was damage to the Europeans of the sort that would require some kind of action which presumably we would not like. I think that somewhat depoliticized the issue and controlled it. That worked quite well.

Q: Another aspect that I think is interesting about the OECD is the inclusion of Japan at a fairly early time. I think the OECD was the first regional grouping that Japan became a member of after the Second World War. The willingness of the Europeans, I think with strong American leadership, to have Japan be a part of the OECD was very much appreciated in Tokyo. I don't know if you had any experience with the Japanese at OECD or any reflections about the expansion of the OECD beyond Europe?

ROGERS: Well, it certainly was an interesting development when the European countries started expanding to Australia and New Zealand and then Japan. It made it the premier organization of developed countries on economic matters. I think the expansion was obviously necessary, to include Japan. Everything since then has shown that it was absolutely right. I don't recall that the Japanese took great leadership at my time there, but they did become active. They had people in the Secretariat and wanted to be active in that fashion.

There was another issue that I should mention that came up then, an issue with which I also had quite a bit to do with in RPE, and that was energy, the oil crisis.

Q: The oil crisis was about 1973.

ROGERS: It was the end of 1973 when OPEC announced that prices would rise. We thought it was a very big rise as of January 1, 1974. I say we thought it was a very big rise, but it went up a good deal more in 1979. The OECD was well placed to do a quick analysis of what the implications were of this great increase in the price of oil. Much of the month of December, 1973 was focused on this. It happened to be a time when Weir Brown was on a well-earned home leave so I was sitting in the Council for the US and was the principal high-level contact on these matters with the Secretariat and all. The Secretariat put out some analyses and policy papers that certainly impressed me at the time and as far as I can recall would still stand up well. They had to do with the implications for capital movements. They foresaw the massive transfer of capital to OPEC countries and the fact that this capital would have to be placed somewhere. Something would have to happen with it. This led through the years to tremendous lending through Western banking institutions during the critical times of the late seventies and eighties in the international balance of payments situation.

Q: Another thing that happened with strong OECD involvement as a result of the OPEC price increases was the establishment of the International Energy Agency.

ROGERS: Yes, that's right.

Q: Were you involved in that?

ROGERS: Yes. That happened in my third year there, or we were in the process of creating it then.

Q: Steve, let's break for today and pick up at this point at our next meeting.

ROGERS: Fine.

Q: Today is Thursday, August 4, 1994 and this is the second session of the interview with Ambassador Stephen H. Rogers which is being conducted on behalf of the Foreign Affairs Oral History Program of the Association for Diplomatic Studies. Steve, when we finished talking last week, you were talking about your experiences as counselor of the US delegation to the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) in Paris where you worked in 1972-75. You were talking about how the International Energy Agency got started. I wonder if there is anything else that you particularly wanted to cover from that time in Paris?

ROGERS: The five years that I had in Europe, that is the two years in London and three years at the OECD mission in Paris, occurred at a good time to be there in the sense it was a time of economic change and a certain amount of crisis and many major issues. To go back to the London time, in August, 1971 when President Nixon took major economic steps to protect the US balance of payments including cutting the tie to gold and putting a surcharge on US imports, it caused a good deal of consternation in Europe and in Britain in particular. Then going through the rise in the oil price on the first of January, 1974, that I think we mentioned before. And, in this period also, the negotiations for Britain's entry into the Common Market, which raised issues and heightened issues in our minds, in particular about agriculture, but about other things too. So this was a time of tension, uncertainty and change. In some senses it showed the importance of the OECD, the fact that we had something like that in existence, well supported with a secretariat that was excellent in some fields, including fields of most importance here. I remember that following the announcement, late in 1973, by the OPEC countries of the increase in the oil prices that would shortly go into effect, there was this flurry of activity in the OECD and the Secretariat through the Christmas period and all, to try and analyze what the significance of this would be and the analysis, which I think I mentioned last time, seems to have held up as having been quite valid.

One concern that the Secretariat and the Organization expressed in particular was that countries, especially the developed companies, the oil importing countries that were most impacted by this rise in price of oil, would react in protectionist ways. So, the organization developed a trade pledge, that is a pledge that committed the countries not to take protectionist actions as a reaction to the rise in the price of oil. And that was something we worked on significantly, both in the development of the pledge and then in its renewal later.

Q: Was it initially for one year?

ROGERS: My recollection is that it was for one year. I remember the discussions of renewal while I was there too, so I suppose that means it was one year in each case.

Q: I have been reading a book called "The Cold War, A History," and one of the points it makes is that one of the good results, if you will, of the Cold War was a number of economic measures that served to strengthen and pull together the cohesion of the countries of the West. The OECD, obviously, was one of the important organs or institutions that brought together the industrial countries. Was that a theme or sentiment that you thought much about at the time you were there?

ROGERS: I think it was more something that we took for granted. I don't think it was explicit in our thinking. Rather the focus of our thinking tended to be protecting the continuing movement, the overall trend towards liberalization and opening up markets for goods and capital and all, against the rise in the price of oil. This was a period of adjusting to or toward a new international financial system, devaluation of the dollar in 1973, I guess it was.

Q: I think 1971 perhaps?

ROGERS: Well, there was August 15, 1971, but then in February, 1973 there was another action, and I can't remember just what it was, but it again disturbed people and we had to explain and defend the action. I mention that because looking through my notes I recall that I happened to be sitting in the Council of the OECD at that point and defending the action by the United States to our major trading partners.

Q: I suppose in retrospect one would have wished that when a major action like that were taken that there had been prior consultation, discussion in an organ like the OECD with our major trading partners. But in some cases that wasn't feasible, wasn't possible, wasn't even thought of, and then it became an important task of explaining, justifying, defending what had already been done after the fact.

ROGERS: All that is true and a little embarrassing on occasion, but the United States was and remains a large economy and has perhaps different responsibilities and requirements than other countries because of that reason.

Q: There was also some disadvantage when you telegraphed your intentions by consulting, by discussing because that has an impact, obviously, for certain parties who are involved in the market.

ROGERS: It gives a field day to speculators, among other things.

JOHN N. IRWIN, II
Ambassador
France (1973-1974)

Ambassador John N. Irwin, II was born in Iowa in 1913. He was a partner in a law firm for several years before he began his work with the government. He was the U.S. Representative in negotiations for the new draft of the Panama Canal Treaty from 1965 to 1967, Under Secretary of State in 1970, Secretary of State in 1972, and ambassador to France from 1973-1974. This interview was conducted by Gordon W. Evans on May 30, 1991.

IRWIN: I continued in State until the end of 1974, at that time there was a vacancy in the embassy in France and President Nixon asked if I wanted to go to France. He appointed Kenneth Rush as deputy secretary of state and I accepted to go to the embassy in France.

I had known in moderation France, but never intimately. Paris itself is such a beautiful city that it was a delight to be in. I found the French charming and hospitable. Often I would have Americans come to me and say that "I find the French so irritating" whether they were just passing in the street or what their experience in a shop had been. I would say, "Yes that is true, they can be, were and are, but you must remember that they can find Americans equally irritating from their perspective so we both have to recognize that we can irritate the other, so let's not let the irritation, at least from the American point of view, overcome our good sense and recognition of the vital role that France plays in Europe, and in much of the rest of the world, originally through its former colonial empire and then through its successful continuance of its friendly and sometimes paternalistic relationship with its former colonies. Anyway France has done a better job in keeping its good relations with its former colonies than perhaps the British have." Although I always thought that when they had colonies Britain ran them better than France, but that is one of those uncertain things that one never knows too much about.

Perhaps my first experience in France goes back to my days in the Defense Department. I traveled with President Eisenhower when we went to London, Bonn and Paris. At that time the U-2 had just been shot down over the Soviet Union, Secretary Dulles had died and Secretary Herter was Secretary of State. We were at a meeting of NATO in Turkey and I remember the incident well; we had just left NATO and were flying to Athens and this message came to Secretary Herter that the U-2 had been shot down. It was partially a result of that that we returned more quickly to the United States. There was a debate as to whether or not we should avow the U-2 or whether we should just keep silent on it, or say nothing about it as if it were not basically our aircraft. However the ultimate decision reached by President Eisenhower was that it be accepted as our airplane. As a matter of fact he gave out all the pictures that had been taken to show what it could take in Russia. The plane used to fly from Pakistan to, I think, Norway and then back and forth. It had made many successful flights, it could fly above what was thought to be the range of any then artillery or missile, but on the day that Gary Powers was flying it from Pakistan to Norway, whether the plane was low or the missile was higher than it was thought to be, it was shot down, and the pilot, whose name was Gary Powers, was taken prisoner. Later on he was exchanged for a spy [Colonel Abel] whom we had incarcerated over here.

That U-2 incident of course aggravated the relationship between Russia and the United States; Premier Khrushchev had previously visited the United States and there was beginning to be a softening of relationships, a least a little better relationship.

Q: I think he went to your home state.

IRWIN: Yes, he went to D'Estaing, California, several places across the country. A meeting between France, England, Russia and the United States had been set for Paris and that came just after the U-2. President de Gaulle was then still alive and in power. There was the assembly of the four heads of those states, but it was clear that the meeting that could have been profitable under the relationship pre-U-2 could not have continued in the atmosphere because of the attitude and indignation of the Soviet government. At that meeting I would say that although President de Gaulle has never been particularly popular with Americans, he generally was not popular with our military, at that time I thought he was very helpful to President Eisenhower in easing the situation at the meeting between Khrushchev and Eisenhower. There was no question that de Gaulle, while trying to keep the meeting in even temper, was clearly in Eisenhower's corner.

Another incident of de Gaulle I would mention that I did not know about, but only heard about, but in that same line. Was in the Cuban missile crisis when President Kennedy had taken over. Later on our aerial photography showed missiles being moved into Cuba by the Soviet Union and it was at that point that President Kennedy faced up to Premier Khrushchev that they be withdrawn. President Kennedy sent emissaries to the European countries and show them pictures of the missiles and explain the background so that we would have the support of our NATO allies and they would understand what was going on. I have always been told that when the emissary got to President de Gaulle, President de Gaulle said, "You don't have to show me the pictures. Tell President Kennedy he has my support". So while I think that the French are always individualistic, they are always zealous and jealous of their so-called French independence, they are particularly keen to be sure their language remains pure and they can be mischievous when their people with their language are involved, you may remember when General de Gaulle visited Canada. When he left he said, "Vive Quebec libre!" which did not please the Canadian government at all, although it did please the French nationalists in Quebec.

My having left the State Department which brings us to our present topic. I might say that my only tie to the government since I left France was that I served on a commission to UNESCO under President Reagan. That was an interesting short term service.

Now in France it is difficult, both because of faulty memory and I have kept no records, I left them in the State Department and I failed to keep a diary. In my next life, if I ever have the opportunity, I will keep a diary. In preparing for this interview I asked two of my former colleagues in Paris, Dan Phillips, who is now ambassador to the Congo, and Hank Cohen, who was political counselor and is now assistant secretary for Near East and Africa, to remind me of principle issues. So what I say is more a measure of their memories than it is of mine.

My ambassadorship came at a time when France was moving into a new internal relationship as well as a relationship, perhaps, with its NATO allies and the United States. The transitional period in French politics was from de Gaulle to whomever was ultimately to follow, but the immediate transition was to President Pompidou. President Pompidou took office immediately following President de Gaulle's resignation and continued to the election of Giscard D'Estaing in early 1974. It was clear that President Pompidou did not have the charisma and the wide appeal that General de Gaulle had, but he did have a sense of pragmatism, which I felt was very valuable at that time. In fact at the time of his death I felt that France lost at his early death, I think that if he had survived for a couple of more years it would have been better for the transition from de Gaulle to, as it turned out, President Giscard than as it was, his having died that early. But all was not easy with the Pompidou regime. He himself was a much easier man to deal with than General de Gaulle, partially because of his pragmatism and partially because he had been a businessman a considerable part of his life, he was a partner in one of the Rothschild operations. He was just a solid, fine individual, at least in my mind.

While he was in the Elysée Palace his primary assistant for foreign affairs was Michel Jubert and while M. Jubert was in the Elysée I found him always helpful. When I had problems and while we may have disagreed with a problem he was helpful. Then President Pompidou appointed him foreign minister and he moved to the Quai d'Orsay and from then on he was unhelpful. I have never quite understood the change, almost in personality, that occurred from Jubert leaving the Elysée Palace and then going to the Quai. Perhaps it was the issue, perhaps it was because he was in more true foreign policy charge of the issues. Other people have queried whether it was a sense of competition with the then Secretary Kissinger who had been in a comparable position with the Nixon in the White House before he became Secretary of State, whatever it was he did make quite a change. That does get on further than the issues to which I might speak.

During Pompidou's regime, his party, the UDR, the Union de la République, was losing strength. The center and center right and just left of center were gaining strength, and that was Valéry Giscard d'Estaing's Republicains Independants, along with other centrist parties, Servan Schreiber's Radical Party, called CD. They were moving towards becoming the primary political force, if you joined them all together in France. In the elections in early 1974 or you could say that the early elections in 1973 you could say that while the UDR, the Gaullist party, had the largest party in the Assembly, it no longer had an absolutist majority. It had to work with Giscard D'Estaing's Republicains Independents with the Radical Party and with the CD in order to have an absolute majority.

Q: This is a follow on of side one. I have the privilege of turning back to Mr. Irwin.

IRWIN: Thank you Mr. Evans. At the 1973 election in France in which the UDR Party one the largest number of seats but not an absolute majority the Socialist Party under François Mitterrand won a number of seats, I don't remember how many, but it was enough to be recognized as a small section of the parliament. Mitterrand almost immediately began to develop a relationship with the Communist Party, trying to get them to work together on socialist issues. This was displeasing to the United States and Secretary Kissinger was concerned and asked that the embassy make a demarche to M. Mitterrand to see if he would not break off from the Communists. The concern was that the Communists might through the Socialists develop too much influence in the overall two parties and therefor effect the relationship that France had with its allies. We made such a demarche, which M. Mitterrand did not accept and as ultimate political events showed, he was correct. You have to skip a few years until the election in which the Socialist won and President Mitterrand came to power. He brought the Communists into power with him but they steadily lost power in the French electorate and they went down from something like fifteen to twenty percent or even a little more to down to under ten percent, maybe under five percent. So Mitterrand strategy of bringing them in and then encompassing them and smothering them, you might say, within his own party was successful both for his view and to a large degree for ours - I am getting a little ahead of ourselves for that happened considerably after. The consideration came much later than when he was a small party in the French parliament in 1973.

As mentioned earlier the de Gaulle government was almost fanatical in its desire to be independent, particularly to be seen in Europe and by the Soviet Union as not a dependent of the United States. It had a combined view of the United States, or rather, a schizophrenic view almost, on one hand it had certain resentments against the United States in theory, not in any particular issue, but just the concept of we being too powerful in Europe, on the other hand it recognized the importance of the military strength of the United States in back of the NATO allies. Any one who listens to this tape will know that General de Gaulle withdrew militarily from the NATO alliance, he drew his military forces out from under the military command of the NATO headquarters, however France remained a member of NATO, often that is misunderstood in the United States and people thought that France just withdrew from NATO. They only withdrew from the military arm of NATO. They would not have thought of moving away from the political side of NATO for that would have lessened their political influence in Europe. That is one of the key ambitions of France, to remain powerful politically in Europe and in the Third World.

In 1973 the United States had various objectives. One of them was to try to move the Gaullist government, the UDR government, then under President Pompidou to a more productive relationship with the United States, or at least a more open and less confrontational dialogue. For this purpose the embassy met at all levels with the French government. I would meet with President Pompidou, with Foreign Minister Joubert, with Premier Ministre Jacques Chirac, and later on Premier Ministre Chaban-Delmas and others while the staff of the embassy would be meeting with their opposite numbers in the Quai d'Orsay, or perhaps with the Treasury or with the Interior Ministry or whatever it may be. We tried to cover the whole gamut of relationships so we could find out what the French were thinking and doing throughout its government and report that to our government, and so that we could tell the various arms of the French government our views and thoughts, whether they were acceptable to the French or not. That is what we wanted to achieve, a dialogue, even if we disagreed, rather than the sense we had a difficult time talking to each other, which had existed under de Gaulle.

As well as meeting with the government, of course, we met with the other political parties, particularly with Giscard D'Estaing's party and the other centrist parties and with the Socialists. We would hope that our relationships that developed with the centerist parties would have been one of the reasons when Giscard came to the presidency in May 1974 that the United States was able to have good relationships with him to a much greater degree than it had with de Gaulle and considerably better than with M. Pompidou and M. Joubert.

Carrying on the same tradition with the Socialists we met at all levels with the Socialists. I had then M. Mitterrand, now President Mitterrand, to lunch at least once and to my memory he came twice and some of the younger Socialists were invited to visit the United States as part of the USIA international visitors' program. This included certain men who became ministers later on under the Mitterrand government. M. Mitterrand did not speak English but was considered a French intellectual among the French intellectuals which was somewhat unique for a French politician just as it would be for an American politician. But you would have to say that M. Mitterrand had been an opportunist. One time he worked closely with de Gaulle in the early days, then he ran for political office under one of the centrist or conservative parties and did not do well. Finally he shifted to the Socialist Party and it was there that he came into his success, first in this modest way in 1973 and then later on as all of us know, as president of France. This is jumping to his presidency. During his first two years as president he put forward many of the Socialist theories as part of his government program. It was only after two years of in effect failure and watching the economy of France deteriorate substantially, that he switched from socialism and became quite pragmatic and went into a different phase which drew criticism over the past few years from some of his theoretical socialists, but some acceptance from the business community. They would now say that he is not as bad as they originally thought him to be or expected him to be. That does not say that most of the businessmen you meet in France would not say they would like to see the Socialists defeated in the next election. But at almost the same breath they would fear that there is no one on the horizon that could defeat them. Speaking today rather than as I should be talking about my embassy, I believe the Socialists could be defeated, and rather easily, but only if M. Giscard D'Estaing, M. Chirac and M. Barre, who are the three principle centrist or rightist who will all independently run for president, but none of them will succeed, if all of them were to get together, and say "We have agreed not to run, but will support so-and-so" they could pick out whomever they wished out of the center parties, then I think France would really have a chance for a new look. A new president who would defeat the Socialists, who would not be far right, but have the support of those three gentlemen who had power in the past politically and still have power, but not sufficient power. Again as many know M. Chirac has been an excellent mayor of Paris, but will not, in my mind, succeed in becoming president of France.

However, that may be wrong, but as we go back to the time of 1974 and de Gaulle and Pompidou, energy was one of our issues, there was disagreement. As you may remember, OPEC had recently been formed and the price of oil was rising because of the policies of OPEC. Secretary Kissinger wanted the United States to lead a bloc of the Western countries and take a tough attitude in the negotiations with OPEC. Pompidou and Jubert preferred to have a French-led dialogue with OPEC on behalf of the Western countries, including the United States. They argued that they had a special relationship with Arabs in contrast with the United States relationship with Israel which they felt would be disadvantageous with the Arabs. The combination would qualify France for the leadership. There was merit in the French position, but it also reflected their deep-seated resistance to U.S. leadership over Europe. They recognized US leadership in military affairs and leadership in other parts of the world, but they always strived to prevent a domination by the United States, at least what they considered a domination, of Europe even through NATO.

Foreign Minister Jubert took a harsh line against the United States also on the issue of the formation of the International Energy Agency. We strongly favored its creation. Kissinger pushed it hard with the rest of Europe and Jubert became more Gaullist than de Gaulle and was abusive both of the United States and its allies over the issue. In fact, he opened one of the EEC

Council of Ministers meetings at that time by saying to his European colleagues, Bonjour Messieurs les traitres! As an aside on M. Jubert, even with his anti-U.S. views at the time he was Minister of Foreign Affairs, his wife is an American and his child was at that time attending the American School in Paris. In the end France was isolated in opposing the IEA and as time went on Jubert faded from prominence when Giscard won the presidency. Throughout that period the embassy's mission was to present the U.S. views forcefully but diplomatically in the sense that I mentioned earlier, seeking a dialogue rather than just a confrontation.

In defense there were also disagreements between the United States and France. Some of them were the abstract differences arising from France's so-called desire for independence, but also there were concrete issues, such as the financial one of the replacement of aircraft by Belgium, Denmark, the Netherlands and Norway. The issue was the U.S. F-16 pitted against the Mirage M-53. There was great political pressure by France on its neighbors and the U.S. too was trying to sell its airplane, although at that time and I think it is still largely the policy of the United States as the government generally kept out of economic issues of trying to persuade a country to buy a particular American product. We would speak generally to the ambassadors of European countries in Paris or other ambassadors would talk to the countries to which they were assigned, we did not exert the same kind of political pressure on the potential purchasers of an aircraft that France did, directly in support of its industry. That of course is true of most other countries.

The United States is almost isolated in its traditional distancing itself from the business of the United States rather than looking at the examples of the France, Japan, the Soviet Union and even Britain, all of whom support to a much greater degree their economic outreach than the United States has. I hope in more recent times, and in the future, the United States is moving towards more support of its private sector because so much of the world today is international economic competition. If the United States business has no support from the United States government and the other countries have support it makes it a much more difficult competitive environment for an individual American business, particularly a small business in the United States. That, of course, is personal opinion.

Another less publicized issue was the problem that arose from the visit of U.S. naval ships which might have nuclear weapons aboard to French ports. The United States never will state whether or not a particular vessel has or has not nuclear weapons, but it just in effect desires our ships to come ashore. The French did not object to our coming into port, but there was a difference of opinion as to the type of indemnity that would result if there were an accident, particularly a nuclear accident, when a vessel of the United States was in a French port. The French wanted to have any indemnity or fault decided by the French courts. The United States held that it should be subject to bilateral negotiations. It was not decided during my time.

With respect to the broader issues of NATO and detente and the EEC, by detente I really refer to the Soviet Union, at that time President Pompidou and Minister Jubert questioned what they called our over commitment to detente with the USSR. That had a certain irony to it because France over the years has looked to itself as the principle link to the Soviet Union for Europe, and itself would have liked to be the real representative for the Western group with the Soviet Union, and even helping the U.S. with the Soviet Union. Along with that there was disagreement on the Force de Frappe, the nuclear force of France which grew at the same time that the nuclear force of England was growing. The United States never objected to the nuclear force in England and France, and it fact had helped at certain times, but it was not enthusiastic about it. The Soviet Union was, of course, opposed to it. So there was always an element of question in dealing with France about the Force de Frappe, any limited test ban treaty with the Soviet Union, who wished to include the French and British forces and the United States said, "We have no control over them." The Soviet Union was looking in effect for us to have the same type of control over the nuclear forces of France and England as they had over the forces they put into Eastern Europe. Of course, Eastern Europe had no nuclear forces of their own. So France was of two minds, as I mentioned earlier. They wanted not to have the U.S. in too great prominence and control in Europe, but they also worried that if the U.S. was pushed too far from Europe, isolationist sentiment might take over in the United States and it might weaken alliance because of the uncertainty of the military power being available from the United States.

So all through this thing you have this dual view. At the same time that these issues were occurring with France, and of course in different degrees on other issues with other countries, Europe was going through what possibly might be called a difficult phase. Revolutionary change was underway in Portugal with the ultimate end of the Salazar regime, the Greek-Turkish dispute over Cyprus had heated up, there was unrest in Spain and Italy which threatened the democratic underpinnings. At one time there was real concern about the Communist strength in Italy. Of course there was the civil war earlier in Spain and then there was the domination of Franco, and in Italy there was the Communist potential. One was concerned with the future of Spain. Although no one probably remembers it today, there was often discussion in the press and among the commentators who had to look for something to say in their columns, about the Finlandization of areas of Western Europe or all of Western Europe. That disappeared in time, but there was a period when that was of concern.

As a result of all this France did begin to show a degree of greater flexibility in its role towards NATO. The French attitude toward NATO loosened in the sense that it began to cooperate in small, low visibility steps, such as in planning, logistics, more information sharing, joint exercises of our forces even though they maintained independent control of their forces, and that type of military issue in which they could cooperate without appearing to reduce their political independence or their separation of military force. Still it represented a giant step away from de Gaulle's attitude which was perhaps best stated or symbolized by his contentious statement that France nuclear arms defended France from aggression coming from both the East and the West.

Another side of closer French-U.S. cooperation on Europe resulted from a U.S.- EEC agreement to share information and consult as the community developed common foreign policies. This arrangement was originally opposed by France, they were reluctant to reach an agreement but such an agreement was worked out by Secretary Kissinger and Foreign Minister Jubert. The French honored the agreement when it came the time for a Frenchman to be the head of the EEC because it was under each presidency that the president would enter into the discussions with the United States, normally of the embassy in the country which held the presidency of the EEC.

When Giscard took over there was more cooperation. As Pompidou had begun to move away a degree from de Gaulle's firm position, Giscard moved considerably further and was cooperative, and even worked well with the United States. During Giscard's period he initiated a North-South dialogue. The United States was not particularly enthusiastic about that because it felt that it would result on a greater demand on U.S. resources through aid. But we agreed to it and went along with Giscard with it . Similarly Giscard came up with the idea of an economic summit with the Western countries - that started at the time I was in Paris, but finished thereafter a couple of years later. Not much was done through the embassy. It was largely done by Mr. George Shultz, who was sent as a special, almost a secret, envoy by Dr. Kissinger to work with the countries of Western Europe.

Economics and trade has always been an issue, or potential issue between France and the United States. They support strongly their own agriculture and do not wish to be undersold by any other country, certainly not by the United States shipping large quantities of grain which we have often for sale at a lower price. They were concerned about the floating of the dollar, which - I forget the exact time it went off the gold standard - but it occurred while I was in France. If the dollar seemed to be too high the French criticized the United States for undermining French economic stability; it is was too low they were apt to charge we were dumping cheap goods on the French market and competing unfairly with their industry. That of course remains a perennial issue and still is one of the facts involved in GATT today and will be involved even more so if we succeed with a free trade agreement with Mexico, the United States and Canada.

The Middle East was always an area of contention. Secretary Kissinger at that time was taking a step by step approach to the Middle East. The French preferred an international conference which they felt that they could have more dominance in politically because of their position, not only within Europe, but because of their previous position and relationships with the Arab world. Because of that Jubert gave great support to Arafat and the PLO [Palestine Liberation Organization] supporting, as a modest example, Arafat's request to address the United Nations. All of which was irritating to the United States and we, of course, differed frankly with them. The degree which we succeeded to any leadership in the United States, the difference in feeling can be recalled in a comment that M. Jubert made when he spoke of the United States leadership in the Middle East peace process as a humiliation for France. That seems from our point of view a rather narrow, individual view, but anyway that is what his statement was. The embassy's mission was damage limitation and using diplomacy and dialogue rather than confrontation.

In the negotiations to end the Vietnamese war France was very helpful. Most of the negotiations took place in France, secretly by Secretary Kissinger himself dealing with the Vietnamese representatives in France. The embassy had practically nothing to do with that as it was directly out of Kissinger's office when he was National Security Advisor and later, of course, when he was Secretary of State. Again the duality of the French views came forth, some circles in France were happy to see the United States humiliated in Vietnam, others were concerned because they knew that it was essential for a strong Europe to have strong outward looking America who would be willing to cooperate with Europe and not retreat into isolationism, which Europe remembers as a former strong feeling in the United States, certainly at the beginning of World War II.

I spoke earlier about President Giscard d'Estaing's approach being less ideological, but even there he had certain inhibitions because Jacques Chirac was a strong Gaullist and he was his prime minister. All of that limited to some degree Giscard's ability to move away from the Gaullist doctrine although he and his foreign minister, became the architects of what could be termed a more benign foreign policy towards the United States and towards the world and accordingly our relations improved.

The embassy in other contexts continued to work with France, criticized French views but presented French views to the United States in a way we could understand the French point of view and not just as a confrontational issue. We tried to oppose voices in Washington that appeared to be confrontational and looked at French views of the French government primarily with pretension and ambition other than trying to get a working agreement together. We tried to point out to both sides that we were in favor of a strong France, economically and militarily, because it would complement the United States' power, not only in NATO and Europe, but throughout the world. That was the approach that Giscard and the U.S. administrations following the time I was in Paris really adopted and worked quite well together with.

There were other important, but less political issues, one of which, for example, dealt with culture. France always was concerned and perhaps upset that after World War II much of the modern painting world, the center of it, shifted to the United States, away from the traditional situation where Paris was the center of all the art world. Now whether that is going on today, there is some question, whether in the 1990s it is shifting partly back to Europe, partly back to here. There was one incident dealing with a painting that the National Gallery was purchasing from a Frenchman. I had Frenchman who had been in what would have been comparable to their supreme court call me as an independent position, he was not calling as an official of France, but calling because he was concerned about the National Gallery purchasing this very fine French painting. He asked me if I could not persuade the National Gallery to take another painting rather than this particular painting. Fortunately I could disavow any part of what the National Gallery was doing, or any influence on it.

But there are elements in France that carry their position not only in the political, military and economic world, but also in the cultural and aspects of business and the media. I think in essence the view in France really remains much the same that it always has, the desire to perpetuate the French language as a beautiful language used throughout the world wherever it has been used and a desire to remain a strong influence in Europe and always looking askance at the United States if we appear to be too dominant in our relationships with NATO or the EEC. It will be interesting to watch the next decade of the 1990's to watch what happens to our relationships in Europe as a result of the situation in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union.

ROBERT M. BEECROFT
Staff Aide to Ambassador Irwin
Paris (1973-1975)

While Mr. Beecroft served as Political Officer at a number of posts in Europe, Africa and the Middle East, his primary focus was on Political/Military Affairs, both in Washington and abroad. Later in his career he served as Special Envoy to the Bosnia Federation and subsequently as Ambassador to the Office of Security & Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) operating in Bosnia & Herzegovina. A native of New Jersey, Mr. Beecroft served in the US Army and studied at the University of Pennsylvania and the Sorbonne in Paris before joining the Foreign Service in 1967. Mr. Beecroft was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2004.

BEECROFT: To the last place I expected: Paris. Amazing story. I had met a guy at a reception in Washington before going out to NATO in 1971, a lawyer named Scott Custer. I did not know that I had made any kind of impression on him, but it turned out that Custer was the Executive Assistant to the Deputy Secretary of State, John N. Irwin II. Well, in 1973, Mr. Irwin was named U.S. ambassador of France. They were looking for a staff aide. Scott Custer remembered me. One day I got a phone call out of the blue: this is the office of the U.S. ambassador in Paris, and we're wondering if you would care to come here to be the Staff Aide to the Ambassador. Gulp. This took about two milliseconds to consider. That summer we were off to Paris.

Q: You were in Paris from when to when?

BEECROFT: '73 to '75.

Q: What was Ambassador Irwin like?

BEECROFT: He was an exceptionally kind, decent and upstanding individual, as well as subtle and smart on the issues. He had been Deputy Secretary of State during the first Nixon term, and was a major contributor to Nixon's campaigns. In early 1973 he became Ambassador to France. He was born in Keokuk, Iowa, where his family lived for generations. His grandfather was governor of Arizona Territory in the 1890's. They kept a souvenir -- a ranch of about 200,000 acres outside of Prescott, which we later visited. He went to Yale Law School and had become a senior partner in a major firm in New York, to which he returned to afterwards. When he went off to Paris, he naturally assembled a front office team a team, and Scott Custer recommended me. So Mette, Christopher and I moved to Paris in the summer of 1973. It was my first assignment in an embassy. Gulp. The only embassy experience I had had was poking around the embassy in Brussels now and then, and that was of course much smaller and didn't have anything like the cachet or scale that the U.S. Embassy in Paris had. Mr. Irwin was a forgiving man, and in my case he had to be because I was learning as I went along and very much an introvert. He was a quiet, thoughtful person who never, never raised his voice. But he was always on the issue, and he was always asking probing questions. Scott Custer was in many ways what Mr. Irwin was not. He was sharp-tongued, outgoing and aggressive. While working for Mr. Irwin in Washington, Scott commuted to work on a Harley-Davidson. I can't imagine Jack Irwin on a Harley-Davidson. I can imagine him on a horse, though, because he was a superb rider. Working for him was a pleasure. What was interesting though was that this was at the very beginning of the Watergate affair, and here was a man who had been very close to and supportive of Richard Nixon. He was mortified.

Q: Did he get involved, I issued a subpoena to one of the _____ treasurer, Tom Pappas in Athens and I was consul general there. Did Irwin get caught up in this at all?

BEECROFT: Only later and indirectly, but I can share two anecdotes with you. He got a letter one day from Julie Nixon. Mr. Irwin had brought with him a woman with him as his personal assistant. She had worked for him in the Deputy Secretary's office, and you never, ever wanted to cross her. No one trifled with Velma. She had an unsettling way of smiling with everything but her eyes. Nothing got past her. We got along very well, and we relied on each other a lot. That day, I heard her saying, oh my goodness, oh my goodness. The letter from Julie Nixon to Ambassador Irwin said, "I hope you have read the article that I just published in the Reader's Digest, supporting and defending my father the president. I know that as a loyal supporter of the president you will want to support him at this difficult time." I can still see Mr. Irwin shaking his head as he read the letter.

The other one I remember was a letter he got signed, by Walter Annenberg, who at that time was the Ambassador to London. This letter was addressed to Mr. Irwin on Embassy London stationery, and it began with "Dear John." This raised eyebrows, because Annenberg knew very well that he Mr. Irwin always went by Jack. The gist was similar: Now is the time to stand up for the president. I know that you will join me, etc. -- the same kind of message. So Mr. Irwin got in touch with Annenberg and said, "I got your letter." Annenberg replied, "What letter?" It turned out the letter was on bogus Embassy London stationery and had been drafted by Charles Colson. You can imagine how well that went down. Now, here are two very heavyweight political loyalist ambassadors who are basically being used by the White House. So they kept their distance. That was the spring of '74, when Georges Pompidou died.

Q: He was the president of France.

BEECROFT: President of France. The heir apparent to de Gaulle. President Richard Nixon came to the funeral. I do not know whether there was ever a discussion between them, between Nixon and Irwin even had a private discussion on that trip. I do know that I was the control officer to the Chief of Protocol, Ambassador Henry Catto. We were together at the Cathedral of Notre Dame for the funeral, in morning coats. Catto was -- still is -- a big, tall Texan, a really delightful, politically astute man. So we're in Notre Dame and there's Nixon sitting next to Pierre Eliot Trudeau, and Nixon looked awful -- heavily made up. This was a clearly a man under enormous strain. The contrast with Trudeau made it that much more striking. What was really funny about that event was that after the mass, Catto and I went out of Notre Dame at high speed, only to see Nixon's motorcade already pulling out. Here I am, with the State Department Chief of Protocol, in tails on the porch of Notre Dame, and no motorcade. So he looked at me and I looked at him and he said, "Well, what shall we do?" And I said, "Well, let's take the Metro." So we did. We had a great time. We rode the Metro dressed in tails, and both loved it. We got back to the Embassy just as the motorcade did. It was one of those things you never forget. Ambassador Catto is Chairman of the Atlantic Council now, and we still laugh about that adventure.

Q: Let's talk about Embassy Paris.

BEECROFT: Yes.

Q: Here '73 to '75.

BEECROFT: Yes.

Q: What was the embassy like?

BEECROFT: The Embassy was a very heady place to be. It had real clout in Paris. France was as always a difficult partner -- some would say partner -- but it was seen as essential.

Q: You're putting a question mark after partner?

BEECROFT: Yes. Remember 1973 was the "Year of Europe."

Q: This was Kissinger's idea.

BEECROFT: Yes. Henry Kissinger had decided that the beginning of the second Nixon term, which at that time no one thought would be abbreviated, would provide an opportunity to rein the Europeans in and get them back in line. Kissinger started out with the intention of building a strong and effective relationship with Michel Jobert, who was the French Foreign Minister. Of course, at that time there were no e-mails. Cables were the medium of choice for diplomatic communications, and it was still rather unusual for a secretary of state to phone a foreign minister directly. We even still had things called the despatches.

Q: Oh, yes.

BEECROFT: Remember the old forms? Anyway, it was the Year of Europe and the Embassy was the message-bearer and in many ways the interlocutor. Mr. Irwin would go see Jobert, and he would bring messages from Kissinger and convey the responses back to Kissinger. I well remember the curve of the relationship between Kissinger and Jobert, because it was so remarkable. The message salutations started out as Dear Mr. Minister, Dear Mr. Secretary. Then, as the ice began to thaw a little bit -- because Jobert was a very prickly guy -- it became Dear Dr. Kissinger, Dear Mr. Jobert. Then by midyear, it had advanced to Dear Henry, Dear Michel. By the end of the year, it was back to Dear Mr. Secretary, Dear Mr. Minister -- full circle. Jobert was a complex man. He was brilliant, cynical, suspicious of U.S. intentions, and had a withered arm. He had grown up next to the ruins of a Roman city in Morocco. There were a lot of chips on this man's shoulder. He was also a superb novelist. His books are beautifully written in classic French. He was very confident of his own intellectual acumen and he wasn't about to be abashed or awed by Henry Kissinger.

Q: Was this a time I mean I guess there was always a time, but was there a particular thing about in various efforts of the United States to do this or to do that where the French were weighing in on the other side and screwing things up?

BEECROFT: The Year of Europe raised a lot of questions and a lot of eyebrows. For the French, every year is the Year of Europe and they couldn't understand what we had in mind. So I guess the answer is yes, our declaration of the Year of Europe raised their suspicions.

Pompidou may have been mortally ill, which virtually no one knew, but he was no fool. He and Jobert were very much on the same wavelength when it came to the U.S. Mr. Irwin spent his time trying to reassure two very suspicious people, Pompidou and Jobert, about what the motives were. Where security and defense issues are concerned, the French saw the Year of Europe as an attempt to either isolate them or get them back in the barn. They weren't about to be isolated, because they were leading the charge on the formation of a stronger European Union, and they weren't about to go back into the NATO integrated military structure either. They would always point out, as they still do today, that they are faithful and loyal members of NATO and that they're one of the largest bill payers in the alliance, which is true. What rankled Washington was that they chose to opt out of the integrated military structure. If you raise this, the French will ask you a very simple question: find me one reference to the integrated military structure in the North Atlantic Treaty. There is none. It's a political agreement. The French were not about to be trapped on that. That's what it was like to be at Embassy Paris in 1973-74. The atmosphere was prickly and was suspicious, but Mr. Irwin was a charming man and that made a huge difference. He had brought with him to Paris several hundred of his own paintings, a world-class art collection, Manet, Monet, Pissarro, you name them, all the impressionists, plus a fabulous collection of art from the American West. Mr. Irwin favored an artist named called John Chumley, who painted many rural American vistas. He also had several Remington sculptures. The French appreciated his exquisite taste and his love of the arts. Such things will open doors in France. He gave the most wonderful dinners and receptions. The Ambassador's residence in Paris is an old Rothschild mansion on the rue du Faubourg St.-Honoré. It's a glorious building with French doors – what else? – that open onto a beautiful lawn and garden in the back, so when the weather's good you can have receptions outside. He used the Residence to the hilt.

Q: You mentioned the foreign minister, I want to use the “intellectuals”. Were they a group that were considered important at the time and did Irwin make overtures to them?

BEECROFT: Oh, he did more than make overtures. I mean, he would make it a point to include intellectuals and artists at his various events. He knew what the pressure points were and where the real levers of influence are in France. I remember a reception he gave once in honor of the Alvin Ailey Dance Troupe, which had been performing in Paris. Alvin Ailey himself was there. Literally hundreds of the great lights of Paris were there. You could see people walking around the Residence, looking at the paintings, looking at the sculptures and they would come forth with that cliché you always hear from Europeans when you don't fit their stereotype: “But he is not a typical American.” My response would always be, “What is a typical American?” .

Q: How did you find operating there because sometimes an ambassador's aide is a pain in the ass to most of the other people. You're running around and sort of a low ranking low squirt demanding papers and doing this sort of thing. How did you find this worked?

BEECROFT: I think it was Debussy who once said of the music of Wagner that it had its good moments and its bad half hours. The good part was that you were operating in that quite heady environment. I can remember once getting the Admin Counselor so mad at me that he wouldn't talk to me for a few days. But I was carrying out Mr. Irwin's guidance on a point that clearly mattered to him, or I wouldn't have done it. You had to be persistent. You had to ask uncomfortable questions. You had to do what the Ambassador could not personally do.

By the way, those were the days when the front gate of the Embassy was wide open. I used to drive into the front courtyard every morning, swing around to one side and park my car in the Embassy basement. You didn't have to show any ID; you just drove in and parked. Try that now.

I found that as time went on and I learned the trade, it was important to have one or two allies in each section, whether it was the Political Section or the Economic Section or the Admin Section or Consular or USIA or the Defense Attaché's office, someone you could pick up the phone and call discreetly. That way, you could often avoid raising eyebrows. People tended to what the Ambassador's aide was poking around about this time. Mr. Irwin was a man of many parts. Having worked at a high level in Washington, he knew his way around. He was always asking questions. He wanted people to come in and talk. Allen Holmes was one. Allen was the Political Counselor when I arrived, and we are still friends. Hank Cohen succeeded him. They are both consummate professionals, and Mr. Irwin was asking them questions all the time.

Q: How well, how important was it with the sort of the political world of France, you know, I mean the communists were always hovering. At this time Eurocommunism was considered to be a threat.

BEECROFT: Oh, yes. The one French political party that Mr. Irwin didn't have much to do with was the French communist party. I don't think George Marchais ever came to the Residence, but the Political Section talked with people all over the political spectrum. After a year in the ambassador's office, I joined the Political Section. That was the usual progression for the Ambassador's Staff Assistant: after a year you would go into a line office. At that point, I had never served in a line office in an embassy. I'd been deputy POLAD at SHAPE and Staff Aide in Paris. I wanted to get to do some substance. As Staff Assistant, I felt I was losing the ability to read for content – you skim everything. Because I spoke good French, I went to work in the Internal Political Unit, which consisted of three or four people. Each one took part of the French political spectrum. I did the Right and the Center. At that time, the Far Right was a joke. It isn't anymore.

Q: What about Jean-Marie Le Pen?

BEECROFT: Oh, he was around, but he just wasn't taken seriously. His daughter, who is his de facto successors, was at that time a teenager. We had one officer who did only the left, a colorful guy named John Dobrin, you may remember him. Joe Presel – later Ambassador to Uzbekistan -- and I worked together on the right and center. And there was a fellow named Mike Davis, a wonderful person who not long after, while still a young man, had a stroke that effectively ended his active career. Joe had a crush from afar on Princess Caroline of Monaco and had several photos of her on his office wall.

Yes, internal political affairs in France were seen by Washington as important, which is why we had four people covering them. We were expected to be out and about. I spent that year regularly visiting various party headquarters and attending political conventions. In addition, the French have a tradition of political clubs. These are like less tightly knit political organizations that lean in the direction of one party or another, but are normally independent. Michel Jobert founded one while he was Foreign Minister. I also developed contacts in the various ministries who watched or were affiliated with the parties. I went to the political conventions of the Gaullists and the Liberals – Giscard’s party. It was a really fun job. Oh, and I also got to know some good restaurants, because you taking a contact to lunch was a regular part of the job. The Internal Unit made book on all the good restaurants.

Q: What was the attitude, it wasn’t your particular sphere, but what was the attitude toward the socialists? I assume Mitterrand was there. How did we feel about the socialists?

BEECROFT: Yes. There was a lot of concern, because at that point the Constitution of the Fifth Republic was still new and still largely untested. There had never been such a thing as cohabitation. There was a lot of uncertainty about whether cohabitation could work.

Q: You better explain what cohabitation means.

BEECROFT: Okay. The French Fifth Republic constitution, as promulgated in 1958 by de Gaulle, allows for the possibility of a president from one side of the political spectrum and a prime minister from the other side. When this happens, it’s called cohabitation. At that point, it had never happened. Now, the first sign of change came when I was there, when Giscard, who was not a Gaullist, became president. So Giscard, being a centrist and not a Gaullist, had to cohabit or cohabitate, I don’t know what the English is, with a Gaullist prime minister – Jacques Chirac, no less.

Q: Well, I mean was there that much difference between the Gaullists and the centrists?

BEECROFT: A centrist like Giscard didn’t necessarily consider being president of France as being the keeper of the flame of French nationalism. He tended to be more in the Jimmy Carter mode. By contrast, the Gaullists, de Gaulle considered it almost unpatriotic to be not a Gaullist. As for the socialists, there was a sense in France, shared to some extent in Washington that if they ever gained power, France would be on the slippery slope to communism. But people didn’t reckon with the cleverness of Mitterrand, and his determination to neutralize the Communists. Mitterrand, in fact, was not really a known quantity. In 1978, three years after I left, the Socialists came very close to taking power, but failed. This produced a lot of unease in Washington. When the Socialists actually did take power four years later, no one was sure what to expect.

Q: What about when you were there covering the right.

BEECROFT: Yes.

Q: Were you looking at sort of the scandals that have come out. I mean there was an awful lot of money sloshing around in this political system unlike except that the American system doesn’t have.

BEECROFT: Perish the thought.

Q: I mean Chirac has got real problems about when he was mayor of Paris.

BEECROFT: But nothing really happened.

Q: You know there was money coming out of the former colonies and all that. Was this something that you were looking at?

BEECROFT: Not really. I think at that point, even more than now, the French establishment has a way of locking these things down tight. There is the inside and there's the rest, and once you are on the inside you're exempt. Chirac, even then, was very much on the inside. He had been Pompidou's executive assistant -- chef de cabinet. Pompidou called him "mon bulldozer." Chirac was the go-to guy. You needed something done, Jacques would get it done. After he fell out with Chirac and left the Prime Ministry, he became mayor of Paris. By the way, being mayor of Paris is the second most powerful job in France after the president. The mayor of Paris is more powerful than the prime minister.

Q: Did you get a look at the French system and the high schools? I always avoid using French pronunciations because I never used it, although I studied it. In a way it's an establishment when you were there, there was an establishment and it was very pronounced.

BEECROFT: Still is. It's a little bit more tolerant and open now. You're referring to what are called the "grandes écoles" -- a half-dozen state-run university-level schools which are separate from the regular university system. That's where the intellectual élite are formed. They are considered (and consider themselves) for the rest of their lives to be something quite special. You have the Institut d'Etudes Politiques, or Sciences Po. You have the Ecole des Mines, literally the school of mines, which is actually the MIT of France. There are a half dozen others, including the Ecole Polytechnique, the Ecole Normale Supérieure and the Ecole Nationale d'Administration, or ENA. If you don't go to ENA, you won't get to reach the top of the French bureaucracy; it's that simple. And those are prestige jobs in a bureaucratic state like France.

Now, obviously most French students are not accepted by those schools, so there is a set of inbred expectations, which are there from the outset. We at the Embassy were dealing regularly with products of the grandes écoles, because these people often go into politics, all across the spectrum, from far left to far right. They also enter the world of finance, banking and economics. This is the club.

Q: Did you find when you were there the French were trying to figure out, you know the Americans for the British and the French are hard to figure out because with the British you've got this class system, things are changing, but with the French the school system and all. Did you know who's who and who is coming up and somebody can come up from university and really be very capable and move well up in the system.

BEECROFT: That's right.

Q: This must confuse the hell out of them.

BEECROFT: I think it confuses them a lot more than it confuses us. It's easy to understand a system that is more structured, like the French, but the kind of social mobility that we take for granted, they don't take for granted. Even now, for example, ENA, or at least part of it, has been moved to Strasbourg. You can't imagine the protests when that decision was taken. There's still a feeling that if you're in Strasbourg you're somehow not as relevant as if you're in Paris. Everything in France is centered on Paris. As a student, when I went to Paris from Strasbourg for weekends occasionally, I would be sort of snickered at because I had acquired a marked Alsatian accent. That was when I realized that the French reputation of being hostile to foreigners is oversimplified. First of all it's not the French, it's the Parisians. Second of all, they're not hostile to foreigners, they're hostile to anybody who isn't a Parisian. If you come from Strasbourg, Bordeaux or Marseilles and speak your brand of French in Paris, you're just as likely to be laughed at as if you come from New York or London.

Q: As you're looking at the rightist parties, was there an anti-immigrant or was there even an immigration problem? I mean today this is probably the major one coming from North Africa and farther south in Africa from particularly Muslim countries. Was this a concern at the time you were there?

BEECROFT: Not to the degree you see today. First of all there were fewer Muslims in France than there are now. Second of all, there was a very strong and vivid memory in France of the Algerian war and the wave of pieds noirs -- refugees from Algeria who had left for France. The pieds noirs were generally angry and resentful at the Algerians who had overcome them. But the immigrants, Muslim or not, hadn't yet shown up in such numbers in France itself.

Q: You were there at a time when we essentially pulled out not rather ignominiously from Vietnam. How did that play? Was it sort of rejoicing, schadenfreude or the equivalent?

BEECROFT: There was less of that than I would have anticipated, because the United States was in crisis in several different ways, not just Vietnam. The French always assume that it's easy to kick Uncle Sam because he's so big that he won't feel it. Watergate. The oil crisis of 1973. The defeat in Vietnam. These all came at about the same time. The staying power and the future role of the United States were very much in question, so there was less Schadenfreude than I would have expected. I think it's because when all is said and done, the French know they need us more than we need them, and that won't change. The oil crisis never hit Europe as badly as it hit us. Watergate, well, everybody knows how traumatic that was. When Nixon resigned in August of '74, the Parisian elite got busy trying to divine the "real reason" he left office. The French always look for plots. I remember one acquaintance -- highly placed politically, should have known better -- coming up to me and declaring, "You know, we understand the real reason. We know what happened. It was because Nixon was too friendly to the Arabs because of the oil crisis and so the Jewish interests on Wall Street forced him out." This is the kind of cockamamie theory that was going around. The French love this stuff and some always take it very seriously. But overall, there was relatively little Schadenfreude. In the media, there was some crowing that Uncle Sam was getting his comeuppance and looking more like the rest of us, but that's to be expected.

Q: You might explain what Schadenfreude is.

BEECROFT: Schadenfreude is one of these wonderful German words that is almost impossible to translate. It means “joy in the pain of others.”

Q: Anyway, so you, how did your wife find Paris?

BEECROFT: Well, with a Ph.D. in French, she loved being in Paris, but with a young child, that meant she had her hands full. She was not working at the time. We lived in the embassy apartments in Neuilly, a Paris suburb, because as a junior officer I couldn't afford a Paris rental. Then, to complicate things further, our second child came along.

We did some wonderful things. In the summer of '74 we drove south through Burgundy, where good friends from Strasbourg lived -- she was Welsh and had married a French fellow student. We visited them at their farm, then we drove down to Orange, the Pont du Gard, Marseille and Carcassonne, and across the Pyrenees to Catalonia and Mallorca. We had a wonderful trip. That September we also spent a week at Ste. Maxime, near St. Tropez. That was all very nice, but as the Ambassador's aide you were on call 24/7. When I went into the Political Section I got to travel, but on business as I mentioned, going to political conventions and things like that. Then in the fall of '74 Mette became pregnant with our second child. Pamela was born in Paris in April of '75, and we returned to the U.S. that summer.

MARIE THERESE HUHTALA
Paris (1973-1975)

Ambassador Huhtala was born and raised in California and Graduated from Santa Clara University. Joining the Foreign Service in 1972, she studied Thai and Chinese languages and became a specialist in East Asian and Pacific Affairs. Her overseas postings include Paris, Quebec, Hong Kong and Chiang Mai (Thailand). In Washington, she dealt primarily with East Asia and Pacific Affairs. From 2001 to 2004 she served as US ambassador to Malaysia and, from 2004 to 2005, as Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs. Ambassador Huhtala is a graduate of the National War College and the State Department's Senior Seminar. Ambassador Huhtala was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2005.

HUHTALA: I asked for Paris. Paris was the only place in the world I wanted to serve at that time because I already spoke French. Also my husband back in Thunderbird was studying international management with a focus on Western Europe and he was studying French. I presented all of those arguments to the counselors and by golly, I got Paris. I got to go to the only place in the world I thought I wanted to go.

Q: You were in Paris from when to when?

HUHTALA: April 1973 till June 1975.

Q: What was your job?

HUHTALA: I was in the consular section. What that meant initially was the NIV visa line. Back in those days French citizens had to get visas like everybody else. We had a very crowded waiting room, we stood behind a counter, but there was no glass window. The applicants would be smoking their Gaulois cigarettes and blowing smoke in our faces and it was very trying to interview them under these situations. After about 11 months on the visa line I was really burning out. It was very stressful work. I noticed other young officers were being allowed to transfer into the other section of the consulate, to issue passports and perform American citizens' services. So I made a bit of a stink and asked for a transfer, which I got. I took over the portfolio of the "deaths and estates" officer for a whole year.

Q: Who was the Consul General then?

HUHTALA: Bill Connett, did you know him?

Q: I know the name. Who was the ambassador at the time?

HUHTALA: The ambassador was Mr. Irwin.

Q: You must have found that this was a huge establishment.

HUHTALA: To a certain degree, I felt lost. For one thing the visa section was physically separated from the embassy. It was over in the old Talleyrand building, a few blocks from the main Chancery, so I didn't really feel that I was part of the Mission. If I wanted to read the political reporting being sent out from the Embassy I could walk over to the Chancery on Avenue Gabriel and look at it (which I did a few times), but we visa officers weren't integrated into the main operations. The DCM, Galen Stone, a nice man, tried to mentor the junior officers but I think I met with him maybe twice in my whole tour. There were quite a few junior officers there so every six months my turn would come up to go sit in and observe the Country Team meeting. It was not enough to get a real sense of what U.S. objectives were in France or what was really going on. I felt that nobody outside of my immediate chain of command in the consular section had any real interest in me, knew who I was or what I was doing.

Q: This of course is always the trap of some places like Paris where people think, people at all levels, they get there and it's very easy to get lost because people are busy.

HUHTALA: I think the Service does a much better job now of mentoring our junior officers. Many years later, I was the DCM in a very large embassy and none of our JO's felt like that. When I was a junior officer, though, our leadership didn't put very much emphasis on mentoring us.

Q: What happened, where were you living?

HUHTALA: Oh that was fun. We were living in the Seventh Arrondissement, near the Eiffel Tower.

Q: You're saying we, now?

HUHTALA: My husband joined me that summer, a few months after I got there. He had just finished grad school. I had found us an apartment on Avenue Bosquet. It was lovely. It was fun to be living in Paris and using French all day long. I enjoyed it. Gradually it dawned on me how hostile most of the Frenchmen were; especially the Parisians were very anti-American at that period. When we went out of the capital and traveled around the countryside people were much nicer. Paris itself was kind of tough. I rode the metro every day.

Q: Kind of like New York?

HUHTALA: Yeah, kind of. I took the metro and I went to see French movies and walked around the city. All of that was a lot of fun.

Q: Did your husband find a job?

HUHTALA: No, poor guy. Britain had just come into the Common Market, as they called it. All of a sudden being a native speaker of English no longer counted as a skill that would get you a work permit. You had to have skills that nobody in the entire Common Market had, so he couldn't get a work permit like we had been hoping that he could. In fact we had a very interesting run-in with the French government. When Eino arrived, the Embassy sent in a diplomatic note requesting a consular ID card for him as a spouse; there came back a diplomatic note from the French saying that they did not issue these ID cards to the "husbands of female agents" unless such husband was either disabled or over the age of 65. The Embassy was great, very supportive of me. They drafted a note in response that said, "The U.S. Government considers Mr. Huhtala a dependent with the same status as all of the other dependents of our officers. We issued him a diplomatic passport and his travel here was paid for by the Department of State. Therefore we think that you should treat him like you treat all of the other staff." There was always a delay of around two months between all of these notes. Eventually we received a note in response that said, "The French government would like to know what Mr. Huhtala plans to do while he is living in France." So we sent back a response that said, "He plans to study the French language." He had in fact started at Alliance Française while waiting for this issue to be resolved. That did the trick; he was granted his Carte de Séjour soon afterward.

Q: Well he can't be all wrong.

HUHTALA: The Embassy had never had a situation like that before. Eino was the first.

Q: As you say they had just allowed married women to come back in the business.

HUHTALA: In fact before that when we were still in Washington he took the Foreign Service Wives' Course at FSI and they had to change the name to the Spouses' Course.

Q: Was there much, in the consular section, was there much collegial of the young officers?

HUHTALA: Yeah there was. We'd all go out to dinner together and entertain each other in our homes. That was nice.

Q: Often this is another aspect of Foreign Service where later you look back on this and you've made some very good friends there because you're all together in this thing and you don't have to worry about the people on the top because they don't know you exist.

HUHTALA: Yes, exactly.

Q: Did you get any feel for what was going on in France at the time? This is about four years, three years after the '68 business.

HUHTALA: Right. I knew that Charles De Gaulle's successor, President Georges Pompidou, passed away about a year after I arrived and Valery Giscard d'Estaing was elected President. I had a vague, general understanding of what was going on politically there. But not in any real depth.

Q: How about the Paris Peace talks, were they going on then?

HUHTALA: No, they were in '72. I got there in April 1973.

Q: Oh yeah. So Vietnam was more or less, by this time, sort of over.

HUHTALA: I was, however, in Paris in April 1975 when Cambodia and then South Vietnam fell to the communists. I'll never forget, I was in the American citizen services office and in came a young Cambodian couple. They were studying in Paris and they had left their baby with Grandma back in Phnom Penh; they were scared to death and beside themselves. Was there anything we could do? – and there was nothing we could do. I thought that was so sad. Then, I remember there was the orphan airlift out of South Vietnam and one plane crashed. I remember all of this terrible news coming in while we were in Paris.

Q: Would you talk a bit about the death and estates job. I'm a consular officer by profession. Can you tell us any experiences?

HUHTALA: It was really interesting. First of all there was a backlog because the previous one or two incumbents hadn't really done all the paperwork so there were still personal effects of deceased Americans waiting to be inventoried. They had a little vault in the basement of the embassy full of dead peoples' underwear and that kind of thing and that all needed to be done. Then the week I moved over from the visa section there was a major air crash, a big DC-10, Turkish Airlines, crashed into the forest north of Paris.

Q: Oh yeah, I remember that, a door came out.

HUHTALA: A cargo door. We lost about 25 Americans there, including several entire families, very sad. In June 1974 they had a memorial service for all the victims, many of whom were in an unmarked grave. The airlines brought the family members over from the United States so I had to take care of them. I escorted them all -- I think there must have about 10 or 12 of them -- on a drive up to the place in the forest where the plane had crashed. I had not yet seen it so I wasn't yet prepared for it. It still looked really raw. There were still big gashes in the ground and a tree limb sheared off and pieces of clothing still hanging from the trees; no one should have asked relatives to look at that. That was very unnerving. Then I had to take them to a shed where there was a huge table with all of the unclaimed personal effects laid out. (Now we had already returned to the families the effects that we could clearly tell belonged to their family members.) These were piles of watches and jewelry and things like that and we were supposed to ask these families to look through all of these things and see if they could find anything that belonged to their family members. That was very hard for them. I was 25 years old and two months pregnant (but it wasn't showing yet). I said, "Let's go get some coffee." I was just feeling my way through this. We went to a café and we ordered coffee. They pulled out pictures of the family members that they'd lost, and I thought this is going to be hard, but in fact it was really good. It was very healing for them to show me all the pictures of the people who had died and tell me what their names were and what they were like and tell me some stories. I understand now what was going on but at the time this was new to me too. I just sort of instinctively, I think, did the right thing.

Q: Did you have any sort of contact with dead bodies that you had to take care of and all that?

HUHTALA: My two "best friends" were the two French undertakers that serviced Americans. They were hilarious. One of them had been in the business for many, many years. He had a professionally glum face. He always dressed in black three piece suits, and he would tell me all these gory stories, for example, about an American who had been murdered and how they took a chain saw to cut the head off and how hard it is to saw through the head. My God, my cocktail chatter during that tour was really gross. People would move away from me in a cocktail party!

The other undertaker was a former cement manufacturing who got bored in mid-life and sold his company and bought a funeral home. For him this was all an exciting new lark. He took me to his place of business so I could see his caskets. In the window they had the lozenge-shaped ones like in Dracula movies. That's what they were using in Paris in those days. In the basement he had something special to show me. There had been an exchange of some sort and his company had received an American casket, a big bronze rectangular thing with a hydraulic lift so that the head of the deceased could be raised. He just thought that was the funniest thing he had ever seen.

I never had to handle a body myself during that tour. I did later on but not then. What I would have would be the bereaved, the freshly bereaved coming in to see me. One Monday morning I came in to work and there was a lovely middle-aged woman whose teenage son had died over the weekend. He had cancer and was in remission and they were visiting Paris to cheer him up, and just like that, he passed away. What do you say to somebody in that situation? I guess that's what I was learning.

There was another time when a woman in her 50s came in. She had been visiting Paris with her fiancé who was also of that age, and he wanted to impress her, so he climbed up the Eiffel Tower. He didn't take the elevator, he climbed up all the stairs and they enjoyed the Eiffel Tower and then they went back down, on a summer day, then they went to the hotel and he was taking a shower and his heart just gave out and he died in the shower. Not only was she very, very sad to lose him, they were not yet married so she was not the next of kin. I had to ask her to give me his son's coordinates so I could I contact him. I had to get instructions from his son about what to do with the body and all of that. She took that with a great deal of dignity but I could see that it was distressing. It was very hard for us both.

Q: I have to say as a consular officer I found on these things this is where you might almost accuse me of sexism I guess, but women consular officers are usually better at this than males. Guys really can't handle this very well, myself included.

HUHTALA: Because I was doing that for my primary job for a whole year I got pretty good at it. I learned how. At first it was very difficult for me too. As a culture we Americans avoid death at all costs.

Q: Was there any system covering development of various things within the Foreign Service establishment. Was there anything equivalent to family liaison officers or something, I mean something within the embassy to find a job for your husband?

HUHTALA: No. That came a few years later. That did not exist yet. He was sort of at loose ends. He eventually found a job teaching English on a contract basis to French students. It wasn't ideal but he made some friends through that. There was a lot of stress on us.

Q: What about the contract you had, one year or one tour?

HUHTALA: Well a lot happened before we got to that point. I got pregnant, deliberately. I got pregnant in early '74. We'd been married almost three years, it was time, right? But you would have thought that there had been a tsunami or something when I told my boss. Actually I was chatting with Bill Connett's secretary in French and telling her the news. He came in and he overheard. He said "Tu blagues! (You're kidding!)." No kidding, I was indeed pregnant. It turns out the embassy in Paris had never had a pregnant vice consul except one, some years before, when one of the single women got in trouble with a French guy and had to marry him, and they kept her on despite the ban on married officers. But in general the experience had always been, vice consuls are men and men don't get pregnant. So my condition caused a bit of an uproar. I was surprised, because no one seemed to have thought of the obvious fact that married women would be starting their families on the job.

Q: Well you couldn't get up to the counter as easily.

HUHTALA: Now, now. I worked though most of the pregnancy. I was doing fine. I transferred over from visas to death and estates, and I was fine. Then at about seven months I went on a Thursday night for my check-up and the doctor found that I was starting to dilate and needed immediate bed rest. "Don't get up until I tell you," said the doctor. But I said, "Tomorrow is Friday, can't I go and clean out my desk and arrange for an orderly back-up?" No. Well as fate would have it, my boss at that time, the head of the ACS Section was a woman who had been forced to choose between marriage and the Foreign Service and she chose the Foreign Service.

Although she tried to be understanding, my sudden absence was difficult for her.

Q: That was the generation that never, it was difficult for them to see the next generation.

HUHTALA: It was. I'm sure she thought I was a smarty pants and I thought I had everything. I was in bed for around three weeks until I was allowed to come back to work. I went into labor a week after that. Then I had my six weeks of maternity leave. So I was away for a long time. When it came time for my efficiency report she put something in about how I had done a good job but I did create a burden in the section by being gone for a long period of time. Then she asked me to state in my statement that I had no problem with her saying that. That shows you how confused and uncertain we all were. I decided to be forthright about it and in my statement I said, "Yes, I was away on maternity leave. I had a daughter." That was the end of that.

GALEN L. STONE
Paris (1973-1975)

Ambassador Galen L. Stone grew up in Massachusetts. After attending Harvard University and serving in the U.S. Army, he joined the Foreign Service. His career included positions in Germany, France, India, Vietnam, Laos, Austria, and Washington, DC, and an ambassadorship to Cyprus. He was interviewed on April 15, 1988 by Malcolm Thompson.

Q: Galen, according to my notes in 1973 you were reassigned to Paris?

STONE: That's right. I had served on my second tour in India for almost four years, initially with Kenneth Keating, and then with Daniel Patrick Moynihan. During the interim between the departure of Keating and the arrival of Moynihan, I was Chargé d'affaires for almost six months. I was brought back to the Department to meet privately with Ambassador Moynihan and brief him and his family about India. I remained in India for some two months with him, trying to help him into the saddle so to speak.

At that point I learned that Ambassador John Irwin, who had been the Deputy Secretary of the Department, wished me to be assigned as his Deputy in Paris. I served with him throughout his tour there and subsequently served with his successor, Kenneth Rush. So in all I had four different political Ambassadors to whom I was the Deputy. I must say in retrospect that the job of DCM in a major American embassy with a political appointee Ambassador is I think the most challenging and demanding position in the Foreign Service. I was very fortunate in working for Ambassador Irwin, who was a thorough gentleman. He is one of the few men that I would describe as being a gentleman almost to a fault. I say that because in the hurley-burley of the Washington bureaucracy he was a man who was always courteous enough to allow the other person to speak first. The result was that he didn't have sufficient opportunity to voice his own thoughts.

He was extremely perceptive and extremely able; but because of his politeness his talents were not fully appreciated. This was true of the French as well, and was compounded by the fact that his knowledge of the French language was quite limited. It wasn't until the end of his tour that the French realized what an effective and outstanding Ambassador he was. Unfortunately, his tour was all too short, he was there only eighteen months, and during that period he was away from the post for eight of them.

That was the period during which negotiations were going on in Paris with the Vietnamese. Our then Secretary of State Mr. Kissinger thrived on having various separate lines of communication with foreign officials.

I found myself at times carrying personal messages to the French Foreign Minister Jobert very late at night. My tour in Paris was without doubt the most difficult and challenging that I had in my Foreign Service career. The demands on the time of the top people in the embassy in France extensive. There were so many functions that it was really difficult to avoid because one felt the United States had to be represented. This took so much of one's time, combined with the fact that there were twenty-six different U.S. government agencies represented in the Embassy , and as DCM I had to try and keep all of them going in the same direction. It was a real challenge.

Q: How long were you in Paris during this tour?

STONE: I was there for twenty-five months which may not sound like a long time, but I can tell you that none of my three predecessors lasted more than fifteen months. They were Jack Kubisch, Perry Culley, and I think Woody Wallner was the other one.

WILLIAM VEALE

Mr. Veale was born in Washington, D.C. into a US military family and was raised primarily at Army posts in the US and abroad. Entering the military after graduating from Georgetown University, he served with the US Army until joining the Foreign Service in 1971. Throughout his career Mr. Veale dealt primarily with Political/Military and Disarmament affairs, serving both in the Department of State and the Department of Defense. Among his assignments, Mr. Veale was posted to Strasbourg, Berlin and Rangoon. He also taught in the Political Science department at the US Air Force Academy. Mr. Veale was interviewed by Thomas Dunnigan in 2000.

Q: In the middle of 1973 your tour was up and you were assigned to Strasbourg as a vice consul. Was this a tour you requested?

VEALE: Again, I got two weeks notice of this assignment. I guess junior officer assignments weren't perceived in those days with much interest. I had been told that there were no overseas assignments and then a few days later I was told to be in Strasbourg in two weeks. My wife and I bundled ourselves up and we managed to get there in August 1973. It was a two-person post. Ron Woods was the Principle Officer. The post's primary rationale was to be observers at the Council of Europe. At that time the Council of Europe had been promoted by Churchill after World War II as a political alliance to go along with the military alliance that NATO would represent. It would have very strong democratic criteria for membership and it would be aimed at making the legislation permanent and the types of approaches to problem solving of the social problems that existed in the Western European area. It was beginning to be surpassed by the development of the European Parliament and the European Communities at that point. But, there was still a parliamentary assembly which was useful place for gauging the international sentiments of political parties of different countries in Europe. So, the observer function, which had been much larger – with five or seven people in it back in the late '40s and '50s, and maybe into the '60s – had been honed down to just a consul general and a vice consul.

Q: Who was your consul general?

VEALE: Ron Woods. He had been in the Embassy in Paris before. Alan Holmes was the Political Counselor in the Embassy in Paris at that time. Kenneth Rush was the Ambassador, and then there was John Irwin who had been Deputy Secretary.

Q: Did they ever visit Strasbourg?

VEALE: Yes, I believe Rush did and I am trying to remember whether Irwin did. My job was as economic/commercial reporting officer there, although I was assigned as a political cone officer, this post required that I promote business with the U.S. – trade opportunities and things of that sort – so I had dealings with the Chambers of Commerce in the counselor district of eastern France.

Q: Did you have to sample Alsatian wines?

VEALE: Oh, yes. I was forced to drink and eat for my country.

Q: Did we issue visas and passports there?

VEALE: Yes, we did. It had a very normal sort of consular workload there. The Alsatians were not particular problems. There were not really a lot of abusive issues that one had to deal with. I had two American welfare and whereabouts cases that I had to deal with that were very sobering for me. A girl was killed and I had to deal with that and then there was a Picasso art thief that I had to visit in the prison in Metz. To me the most interesting thing was reporting on this process of political amalgamation that was going on at a slow tempo, but fairly deliberate, through the Council of Europe. At this point, the Council of Europe's delegations seemed to have attracted an interesting collection of New World socialists like the Schwartz family from Italy...

Q: Count Schwartz. You don't mean socialist you mean social.

VEALE: I found in my musings through the kinds of thing that are going on there is fascinating efforts of social engineering that were being thought about. One of the more interesting organizations of the Council of Europe was the European Court of Human Rights. I got to know people there fairly well and did an airgram on it.

Q: The good old airgram!

VEALE: That's right.

Q: Were there any domestic troubles in that part France while you were there or were things quiet?

VEALE: Well, the Arab-Israeli war of 1973 weakened the Palestinian-Arab community very much. We had demonstrations. My wife was back in the States at the time. This was shortly after my arrival in the fall of 1973. Our apartment was above the consulate and so, among other duties, I had the job of raising and lowering the American flag from my living room window. I was sitting at my desk writing a letter, looking out this window and noticed this huge crowd that had assembled out there. There were several people chanting about the U.S. being pro-Israeli, etc. It was at this point that Ambassador Irwin called wanting to know how I was doing – besieged as I was. But it wasn't any particular problem. I don't recall, maybe something was thrown but no windows were broken. Nothing really serious.

One of the other interesting things that happened while I was in Strasbourg, is that our Ambassador to Saudi Arabia at that point, Jim Akins, who had some connection with France, perhaps a French wife, would come back to France periodically. He was in Strasbourg and he had to send a highly classified message to Henry Kissinger about Middle East issues. We had no communications of a secure nature except for the one-time-pad. So he had this relatively long cable that I had to encrypt using the one-time-pad. After coming out of the military, I just could not understand how the State Department could possibly operate, a few years after we put a man on the moon, using one-time-pad technology.

Paris (1973-1976)

Gordon S. Brown was born in Italy in 1936. He received a bachelor's degree from Stanford University in 1957 and served in the U.S. Army from 1957-1960. Mr. Brown entered the Foreign Service in 1960. His career included positions in Iraq, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, France, Tunisia, and Mauritania. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on December 11, 1996.

Q: What was the title of your position?

BROWN: I guess I was just economic officer in the General Economic Policy section. I didn't have a title like energy attaché or anything like that, but in fact that's what I was. And because that crisis - the '73 war, the Arab oil cut off, the differences we had with the French over how to deal with the Arabs as a result of that, which led to the first of the north-south conferences, etc. - I had interesting work in all of the three years I was there. A super job, and a pleasant embassy to work in.

Q: When did you arrive in Paris?

BROWN: It must have been late August 1973.

Q: The October war of 73.

BROWN: Well, it was a big surprise to everybody.

Q: What was your reaction?

BROWN: I guess my first reaction was that we were not going to sit still too much longer with respect to the Middle East. If you'll recall, in that respect, the war was started by Sadat in an effort to break the log jam in the negotiations and get down to some serious discussion with Israel about the state of their relationship. It succeeded in the end in doing that. A little bit of quick catch-up in policy on our part was very helpful. But the reason was that Sadat did not launch that war in order to defeat Israel. He launched that war in order to change the diplomatic situation. So I felt some vindication in that the Arabs had called an oil embargo - and here I saw what I'd just been working on for the last couple of years coming to reality - a selective oil embargo against certain states. There was going to be an Arab political leverage of the most massive kind, and the Saudis were going to join in it willy-nilly. Everything we'd been arguing about was taking place but we hadn't achieved anything because most of our arguments over the years had been listened to, but not acted on. There was nothing in place to deal with this situation. So the discussion for the next couple of years was obviously going to be: how do we deal with it, what do we do structurally to change the dialogue over oil and energy. That was fascinating. The north-south dialogue, the beginning of the formation of the International Energy Agency, started off being run out of the embassy, and started off being my portfolio. Eventually the north-south dialogue moved over to the US mission to the OECD, but I was still very much a part of the whole process, the delegations which came and went, and the meetings which took place in the first north-south conferences in Paris.

Q: Can you talk about your perspective of what the French were doing at this time, and what relations between the United States as you were seeing them over this oil embargo?

BROWN: Well, the French, of course, had always resented the fact that they were the junior members of the oil community. They had their two oil companies in ELF/ERAP and CFP; they held positions in the Iranian consortium, and had minor positions in the Gulf countries. But they had more or less been squeezed out of Saudi Arabia -- and out of resentment over what they considered to be an Anglo-Saxon lock on the major oil resources in the Middle East -- had actively cultivated the Iraqis over the years, and particularly the years leading up to the '73 war, in an effort to get their own assured sources of supply through preferential deals. And that was their approach. Their approach was that they could, by political maneuvering and active pro-

Arab bilateral relations, assure their own security and supply on an individual basis. Our position, the State Department position, and eventually the US government position, was that common measures on the part of the oil consuming countries were necessary to meet the threat of division, and counter the leverage from OPEC -- that we should combine our efforts. And the French, as you know, consistently fought the formation of the International Energy Agency. They joined hands with the Arabs to produce a different kind of a dialogue -- a political dialogue over the terms of trade over natural resources and money -- which became the North-South Dialogue. So their approach was totally different, which, I suppose, was facilitated by the fact that the then French Foreign Minister, Michel Jobert, and Henry Kissinger had a very instinctive dislike of each other on a personal level, as well as on the political level. So the relationships between the two governments got fairly icy at times during this debate over oil and energy policy, and response to the Arabs.

Q: Was the attitude from the embassy, I mean from what you were getting, was it that the French were doing this as a matter of survival, but was this also a matter of sticking it to the Americans.

BROWN: Well, there's that element in anything that the French do. I mean, there's the Gaullist desire to be independent of the Americans just because they don't like to be led around by the Anglo-Saxons, and particularly the transatlantic Anglo-Saxons. They also have a more positive philosophy behind it, and that is that they would go their own way, so as to avoid being identified with a strong Israeli lobby -- that is, that they can cut their own deals in the Middle East much better if they go an independent way than if they tried to cooperate with us.

Q: Did you have any dealings with the French Foreign Ministry at all?

BROWN: Oh, yes. I was over across the river, the Quai d'Orsay, twice a week at least, with the French oil companies once a week, with the Ministry of Industry twice a week. The French ministries have a close relationship with their commercial sector, and the French Ministry of Industry was the ministry supervising the petroleum and gas industry -- in fact they set policy for the French energy industry, so they were the key for administering price and import policy, purchasing, etc. I had to keep in touch with them as well as the Quai d'Orsay, the Presidency, and the oil companies quite regularly.

Q: What was your impression of the French that you dealt with at both the Foreign Ministry and elsewhere?

BROWN: Well, they're very professional. These people are all trained in professional schools, the upper level bureaucrats, and the ones I was dealing with were quite often infinitely better versed on their portfolio than I was. I was learning, as I was there, about how they administered their companies, how they administered their foreign policy, how they manipulated oil contracts, how they achieved preferential deals in the Middle East. These are all things which they did within their bureaucracy, with a non-prying press, and with a great deal of old buddy relationships between themselves in the various ministries, and the senior members of the companies. So that they were able to do things in a closed circle which I kept trying to butt in on. I found them to be exceptionally good, exceptionally difficult to get information out of, and they defended their interests extremely well. It was very frustrating because they were doing things that we were clearly not in favor of, but they weren't exactly telling us what they were doing, and the French press does not search very hard to find information which is embarrassing to the French government.

Q: Was the Libyan connection relationship, was that important at this period?

BROWN: You know, I don't have much recollection of whether or not the Libyans were a significant factor. The Libyans were a minor supplier relative to the Middle East. So the French were really playing footsie with the Iraqis and other people in the Middle East, the Iranians and others, in an effort to ensure their supplies. Libyan oil was going at that point mainly to Italy if I'm not mistaken, and the Italians were the people who were playing footsie with the Libyans more than the French. Probably some of it was going to Marseille as well.

Q: Did you see much cooperation between Germany, the UK, maybe Benelux countries, and the United States of policy.

BROWN: The Germans, of course -- when Kissinger and the United States proposed consumer solidarity against the oil producers -- were much more inclined to come along with us, because they didn't have any significant oil companies of their own to protect their interests, and (unlike the French), they saw that they were likely to be victims of a world market shortage, so they were inclined to go along. The British were inclined to go along because, yes, their companies -- whether or not they saw things commercially the same as our companies -- saw things geopolitically pretty much the same way we did. So it probably heightened the French -- with Dutch Shell in the same boat -- French suspicions about the cabal of northern Europeans were heightened. Frankly, their determination to go it alone was heightened by virtue of the fact they saw these other people not necessary colluding with each other, but acting in parallel out of their own interests.

Q: Did Soviet oil finally roll at this time?

BROWN: The Soviets didn't have much oil to put on the world market. They were selling largely to Eastern Europe and they were trying to get more oil to put on the world market. They had, I think, at that point gas to put on the world market. There was hope, I think, that the Soviets would increase supply to meet shortfalls in Western Europe, but I don't recall that was a major factor in what was discussed in Paris, nor did we ever get much from them as I recall.

Q: Who was your ambassador at the time?

BROWN: The first one was John Irwin, of the IBM family, and the second one was from Dow Chemicals, Kenneth Rush -- two political ambassadors, anyway.

Q: Did they engage much in this?

BROWN: They both did to a certain degree, but they left it as largely a professional thing. They wanted to be informed; they obviously had to deal with French dissatisfaction about our policies at the level of the Presidency, so they had to be informed. And they had to know the line; they had to go in periodically and argue with the French. They were not really driving this very hard. It became fairly rapidly a dialogue which was carried out at the staff level by people like me, and at the professional level by Assistant Secretaries talking with each other on the transatlantic phone. My boss at that point, the Economic Counselor Chris Petrow, wound up leaving the Foreign Service after he left Paris because he had been undercut so many times by Washington's direct contacts with ministries in Paris; he felt embassies in Western Europe were beginning to lose their role when they could be cut out of significant communications between Assistant Secretaries or Deputy Assistant Secretaries in Washington, and their counterparts in capitals. Those people were seeing each other at international meetings; they developed personal relationships with each other; they had each other's telephone numbers, and the time difference wasn't so substantial that they couldn't phone each other every day, or once a week or something like that. It happened at my level sometimes, but at Petrow's level more often. He would go into a ministry with some instruction from Washington and he'd say, "Please help us do this, or let's do that," and they would say, "But Chris, you don't understand; I was talking to your boss last night on the phone and the instructions have changed." The French were quite good in playing this against us. They quite often knew more what was going on in Washington than we did.

Q: This is an addendum to an interview that was done with Ambassador Gordon Brown. There were some parts of it that did not come through, in particular the part 1979 to 1984, which covers your end in Paris. Today is the 14th of December, 1999. I'm Charles Stuart Kennedy. Gordon, did you have a chance to look at the part that didn't come through?

BROWN: No. I had nothing to look at. I should make a comment, I think, about the rest of my assignment in Paris because - to make it quick - we were talking last time about the U.S.-French bilateral situation. The end of my assignment really wound up much more in a multilateral framework because (if you'll recall) as a result of the oil embargo of 1973, the big and burning issue between the U.S. and France, and the rest of the world in fact, became: How do you deal with the OPEC group? Do you deal with them as a group? Do you set up a countercartel, or do you cooperate with them? The French were very far over towards the cooperation side. Our policy under Secretary Kissinger was pretty far over towards the confrontational side. As a result, we had a bilateral fight with the French which ultimately, I would say, tactically the French won and strategically, we won. Tactically, that is, the French got they wanted which was a consumer-producer dialogue between energy or resource producing countries and resource consuming countries, whereas we got a standfast position - even though the dialogue finally did take place - but we ultimately did confront the OPEC cartel by one means or another. The setting up of this international economic dialogue between producer and consumer countries moved the action closer to the OECD realm. In fact, after I left the embassy, the entire function was moved over to the U.S. mission to the OECD because they felt that was the proper place to do it - as a multilateral negotiation at that point, rather than bilateral.

Q: Did you find that the British and the Germans for example were sort of consulting with you at the beginning? Their oil people trying to figure out... Were they sort of watching this battle between the French and the Americans and waiting to see where the dust fell or...?

BROWN: I think that is about the best way to characterize it. I don't recall their positions very strongly, to be perfectly honest. After this period of time has passed, it would imply that they didn't have very strong positions. It was in many ways a little trilateral struggle between us and the Saudis talking on one track, and the French and the Saudis talking on another track, and us and the French talking on a third track. It was played out in the multilateral...what was it called...the dialogue...I don't even remember. It had a name. The endless meetings were held over at Avenue Clébert in Paris and dignitaries came from all over the world, and it was a great talkfest and nothing ever was achieved. Ultimately, it was a way, I guess, for the developing countries or the resource producing countries to feel that they were being heard in the other capitals, and it did have that advantage. It defused a pretty aggravating situation at the time.

Q: Well, did Kissinger have a Mr. Oil who would appear from time to time from Washington?

BROWN: That was Tom Enders who I'm sure you know from others...

Q: Unfortunately, I never had the chance to interview him - a very strong personality. What was your impression of how he operated in this situation?

BROWN: Well, he was a very strong and independent person as you point out. The under secretary for Economic Affairs, whose name escapes me, was a little more soft line than Tom at that point. Tom was playing Kissinger's game to the full - and that was to be as hard-nosed as he possibly could towards the energy producing countries. It got actually comical at times because there was one point, for example, in which Tom obviously was unhappy with the U.S. line for an upcoming meeting. He came into Paris the night before the meeting started. I picked him up at the airport, took him to the hotel. He then had an interview with some journalists which I hadn't known about, in which he told the journalists this conference was going to go to Hell and that everything was...He gave them a very tough line. The next morning I went out to the airport to meet the under secretary. He was furious because he'd read the interview which was entirely opposite to his instructions. There was that kind of thing going on all the time. Various agencies were feuding. There was even a feud within the Department as I just mentioned. In the end, Kissinger saw that there was a need to compromise and let Mr. Enders drift away. He undercut him in short. He used him and then undercut him.

Q: Which seems to be part of the modus operandi. Did you find yourself when these things were going on...You were sort of playing clean up, sweeping behind the elephants in the parade?

BROWN: To a certain extent. I was pretty junior. I was the factotum really rather than the policy maker.

Q: I was wondering, would you sort of sit down with your French colleagues and you'd both kind of wonder what the Hell was going on or did you try to figure it out?

BROWN: No. No. Relations with the French were such that I wasn't really free to do open heart kind of exploration. I really had to follow the line pretty closely, if I knew what the line was in any given week.

Q: Well then, just after, when you left... You left France when?

BROWN: It was summer of '76. Is that right? Yes. Must have been. Yes right. I went directly to Saudi Arabia if I'm not mistaken.

Q: What was your impression of France overall as being part of the West? Talking to Foreign Service people, I have some who think that the French are a real pain in the ass frankly, and others who say well yes, they may be a pain in the ass but they are with us when times are tough and all this. Where would you put yourself?

BROWN: I'd be in the second school. They are definitely our ally. They just don't like being pulled around by the nose. We have a tendency to ignore them or to treat them with scorn and they react.

MARK S. PRATT
Member US Delegation to International Conference on Vietnam
Paris (1973-1978)

Mr. Pratt was born and raised in Massachusetts and educated at Harvard, Brown, Sorbonne and Georgetown Universities. Entering the Foreign Service in 1956, he studied Chinese and was posted to Hong Kong. Throughout his career Mr. Pratt dealt with Far East and Southeast Asian affairs, serving in Taichung, Hong Kong, Vientiane, Paris, Taipei and Guangzhou (Canto), where he was Consul General. His Washington assignments also concerned Southeast Asian matters. Mr. Pratt was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

Q: Well, now, you left this Indochina Working Group in 1973, and you went where?

PRATT: Well, I was still part of that group when I went to Paris for the International Conference on Vietnam. And this was where we brought in all the people who had been previously at the Geneva conferences, one and two, and had a conference there where everybody signed it and the Chinese came and the Soviets came and so on. And that was supposed to be reaffirming what it was. Then it finally was signed between the U.S. and the Vietnamese. Prior to that time we had several last-minute meetings that instead of Kissinger you had Le Duc Tho. It was Bill Sullivan and Minh Co Tac, who was then the foreign minister.

Q: Of North Vietnam.

PRATT: Of North Vietnam. And we had those little talks to iron out the various aspects of holding the conference. So I went over for three or four meetings of that sort and then finally went over for the conference itself, came back to close up house and finish up my job and was over in Paris in April of 1973.

Q: First, before we move to that, what did you think, what was the mood at this international conference? What did you think? This was the one that essentially set up the so-called peace, wasn't it?

PRATT: That's right.

Q: In the first place, was there within your group a feeling of annoyance that in this whole damn thing you were working on a sideshow while Kissinger and Le Duc Tho were putting it together.

PRATT: Well, at that point we were merely implementing, under Kissinger and Le Duc Tho, what it was that Kissinger and Le Duc Tho had come to. And then the Vietnamese sort of stuck at a couple of issues, and we had the Christmas bombing, and then that was broken away and we went back to the board there. We felt that this was a kind of Soviet-Chinese persuasive action which had taken place. The bombs helped, but the real influence on Hanoi was what the Soviets and the Chinese said, which was, "Listen, you've got all you need. The Americans want out. You're going to give them a chance to get out, and so stop trying to hold out for the last little bit of America's humiliation and holding up for the last little bit of what you hope is going to be a lot of money." Now, as you know, the agreements did include a provision for the U.S. providing assistance for reconstruction to North Vietnam after the war. That was one organization which was set up there in Paris. Of course, they went on negotiating for months and came up with something which, of course, the American Congress said forget about it. But the major reaction was come on, let's get it over with. This is not where the real battle is going to be. None of us think the Vietnamese are going to be able to do anything very effective, so our view was that we've lost this, and therefore just let's go through with it and get rid of the last bits of this because we are admitting that we are going to let them take over South Vietnam. We're basically going to stand by and let Cambodia crumble and Laos go to the Communists. And therefore, let's do it in as gentlemanly a fashion as we can. So our view certainly was that this was countdown to the end. We did not believe, as Kissinger professed to believe, that this was a peace with honor in the sense that the South Vietnamese would be able to hold their own more than, shall we say, a decent interval.

Q: Was there concern on the Asian hands, which you were, about the aftermath of this thing, of an aggressive Vietnam, say toward Thailand? Was this a concern?

PRATT: Yes, very much so. And of course that, as you know, was why we had SEATO to begin with, originally China, but of course also covering Vietnam. And this is of course why ASEAN finally sort of kicked off after the end of the Vietnam War. It's because they themselves could not agree as to whom the greater enemy was. For some, Thailand, it was Vietnam. For Indonesia it was China. For Malaysia probably it was China. And so our view was that we didn't believe necessarily in the "domino" system because we believed that Indochinese nationalism would go just so far, and it was basically French Indochinese nationalism and it would not necessarily extend to Thailand and Burma, which is what originally, let's say, Ho Chi Minh had perhaps been dreaming of. So we did think that this was going to be a problem and, in other words, that struggles were not over, but they would take a different form. And this, from our point of view, one of the few good things about it was that we had worked out a relationship with China where we could perhaps expect to be on the same side as China in many of the ensuing struggles, and therefore, of course, none of us were terribly surprised when eventually Deng Xiaoping attacked Vietnam. It was the sort of thing which we would have felt was quite possible because, as I said, even the 1970 Indochinese People's Summit Conference seemed to be a way for China to lay down the rules to Hanoi, giving the limits of what they expected Hanoi to be able to do. So already we had a better situation because of a China which was being concerned about its own national interests, and one of those was not to support Hanoi in its ambitions.

Q: So with this in mind, when you went to Paris in 1973 to settle, this was what, April of 1973? You were there, by the way, from when to when, approximately?

PRATT: April 1973 to I guess it was basically April of 1978, so five years.

Q: What was your initial job?

PRATT: My job was the one that remained the same throughout my entire career there. It was to be a first secretary in the embassy handling liaison with whatever kind of negotiation group we had there, which was the post-peace-settlement negotiation about aid for Hanoi and also to handle turnover with Peking, because although we had established our working groups in Peking and the Chinese one in Washington, nonetheless communications were such that a certain amount of our communications back and forth were still done through our embassy in Paris. And also I was supposed to deal with both the North Vietnamese, because we had no other place where we could have contacts with the exception of occasionally in Saigon. But the major turnover point was in Paris, and I was charged with that. And then also, of course, working on liaison with the Lao and the Cambodians for the fallout of the peace agreement, and then dealing with the French Government.

Q: Well, it would seem that in a way your connection to our embassy outside of for administrative support was rather thin.

PRATT: Well, it was, and basically I was expected to be working primarily for Washington. For example, we worked out later on when we started new talks with the Vietnamese, it was the DCM in Paris who had these talks with Hanoi's DCM, and he, of course, provided a certain amount of supervision, as did the American ambassador because they were both interested in this.

Q: Who were they?

PRATT: Well, there were three ambassadors there. Watson was just departing, so he was out. He, I think, formally left a little later. Then they had Kenneth Rush, and then we had Art Hartman [Ed: see Hartman's ADST interview]. Oh, I'm sorry, we had Jack Irwin first. Jack Irwin, Kenneth Rush, and Art Hartman. So there are four ambassadors inside my period there, but three that I dealt with.

Q: Well, let's talk about the money first. This was essentially a non-starter.

PRATT: Well, we thought it would be a non-starter - that is, the unofficial sort of people who discuss things in the Department of State - because we felt that the major interest of the Vietnamese was not in getting money. They had never been good capitalists. Their interest was in getting, for their own people primarily, admission of guilt for the U.S. in fighting an aggressive war, and we sort of figured that would not be easy to get out, certainly, of Nixon, and maybe Congress wouldn't like it. So that was one of the things which you may remember, because I was there when Nixon and Ford and Carter were President. There were three Presidents. And so at no point was the Congress ever prepared to do what would have to be labeled "reparations" or pass for reparations, and even when Carter wanted to give them and Holbrooke had sort of worked them out, the Congress blocked it. And of course it was quite a bit later. But from the early period, and I've forgotten who was the head of this, it was a political appointee who was sent out there to renegotiate it, and he tried to keep me out of things as much as possible, but of course I would generally find out what they were doing anyway. There was, of course, need to know, and I had to know the general atmosphere because I had to discuss this with others. But again, it was going to be sent directly back to Henry Kissinger, and there's no question but that the terms that Hanoi wanted were not terms that Henry would be prepared to give, so those talks resulted in a kind of document which was the best they could do, and then we never went anywhere with it.

Q: Were you talking to your North Vietnamese counterparts at this point?

PRATT: Yes.

Q: Did they seem to be other than messengers, or how did you see them?

PRATT: Well, they sent special people out from Hanoi to negotiate with . . . Williams I guess his name was. And so this was a separate kind of channel. I would deal with the embassy personnel on arranging for messages to be sent back and forth. For example, if we had Sunny Montgomery coming out to talk about trying to get more information about POWs and MIAs and so on, then I would be the one to arrange this and accompany them to see the North Vietnamese and so on. So I would handle all of the stuff except for the actual negotiation on the so-called "reparations agreement." And my contacts would tell me, because they would be told more by their negotiating team what was going on than I would be able to get easily out of Williams and his crew - although I say Williams and his crew were very competent and they were good people.

But it was, I think, fairly clear that the Vietnamese, as we would have predicted, were continuing to be not so much interested in the money, which they felt they were going to be able to get out of the Soviets in ways which they thought would be less destructive to their society than getting reparations from the U.S., so that they were primarily interested in something which would look like an admission of war guilt.

Q: That wasn't in the cards at all, was it, from our side?

PRATT: We thought it wouldn't be in the card. We thought that regardless . . . But we weren't so sure when Carter came in because when Carter came in, of course, he sent his emissary, Don White, who basically beat his breast and said that, basically, Carter wanted to let bygones be bygones and have mutual forgiveness and let's go to church together and sing the same hymn.

Q: So there was concern about the Carter crew, that they seemed to be full of Christian forgiveness and all, that they might come up and say something that might, in a way, let our side down. Was that a concern?

PRATT: Well, we felt he had the full authority as President to make such a policy shift; however, we did not think it would get by the Congress, and in the end it didn't. And I'm sure that under our current President, after all, we did reestablish relations with Hanoi. It was a few years after Carter, perhaps.

Q: We're talking about the Clinton Administration.

PRATT: The Clinton Administration, of course. And so we get another sort of anti-war crew in, coming with hat in hand. And of course times have changed in Hanoi as well. The same old people, some of them are still there, but some of them have gone, and they're not holding out for the same reparations. However, they will get recognition, and they will get trade, and of course we would all say that, well, times have changed, water has gone under the bridge, and so on. But we did not feel that in the immediate aftermath of a very bitter war - because it had been not perhaps quite so bitter on the ground there as it was inside the United States, but it was not one which left a political climate which would be congenial for somebody like Carter himself and his views. But even before that, the reaction of the Congress had been very clear, and I think both Nixon and Ford read the Congress well enough to know. And that, of course, was another aspect of my little struggle in Paris, and that was the POW-MIA question.

Q: Yes, I wanted to ask about that. Before we move to that, though, just to finish up on the money side, there has been sort of rather grandiose talk about a big Mekong Delta plan and all this. Was there sort of a plan in your hip pocket or the negotiators hip pocket that if this thing did open up this is what we'd do?

PRATT: Well, there has long been a Mekong project under the United Nations, and one of the key things which we had been working on even while the war was going on was the Nam Ngum Dam in Laos. And therefore, even farther down from the Mekong it was considered that there was work to be done. I'm sure, given the importance of the Mekong to Laos, Cambodia, and Vietnam, that it would have been one of the things which would have been what we would have prepared to provide greater support for. So indeed, there was supposed to be quite a bit in the way of rebuilding, and of course rebuilding also in North Vietnam - port facilities and things of that sort. So yes, there were some very good projects which had been identified even before the war reached its peak as good projects and which would have obviously been ones which resurfaced if you could ever pacify the area. So, sensible projects were in abundance, and we were prepared to give quite a bit, and even Henry Kissinger talked about 13 billion. They were figures which were bandied about and all denied, but nonetheless some of them seemed to make some sense. It was indeed what appeared to be a fair amount of money that we were prepared to provide. However, know under the terms that it would be considered reparations, and never tied directly to the sort of thing which would permit it to be called reparation. So the Vietnamese deprived themselves of this. I think it would have perhaps collapsed anyway when they moved into the Parrot's Beak and certainly when they occupied all of South Vietnam as well.

Q: Just to continue on this particular side before we move to the other, was the situation on the ground, were we coming back and saying, "No, we're not going to talk about money" - you've done this or that, which is a violation of the truce agreement and all that?

PRATT: No, it didn't look as though we were going to get out from under. I think they took the proposals back and said we would study it, there are things we still don't like in there. And this, of course, by that time, we were getting very close to the North Vietnamese decision to move full-force against the South. Remember that was, after all, 1975 by that time. So we went through a year or more of these negotiations, and that, I think, got them fairly close to their preparations for moving against the South because after all we'd made it very clear that we were going to continue to remove our forces. And of course the Congress refusing to permit money to be voted for military equipment for the South was giving a very clear indication that the North Vietnamese had won their war in the United States.

Q: But it also meant that if it wasn't going to give it to the South, it sure as hell wasn't going to give it to the North.

PRATT: That's right. And that was, I think, why they decided. They may have held back in their invasion of the South to see if they could get some of this money first, but then I think that they saw that the chances of their getting the money were not very good, and if they did start getting it, it would be cut off the minute they invaded the South. So I think they decided this was good as to see what the U.S. might be prepared to do, and when it wasn't going to do what they needed, then to hell with it.

Q: Well, when they invaded in full force in the first part of 1975, did that stop all the talks?

PRATT: They had stopped before then.

Q: Why?

PRATT: On the economic side? Well, our turnover had never stopped, and we had a hiatus at that point, in fact, slightly before that. But the money talks had just been dropped, I think, sometime in 1974.

Q: Well, then, let's talk about a problem that still remains with us, sort of an artificial problem, the missing in action, the prisoners of war thing. What were we doing when you got to Paris? What were your marching orders on this issue?

PRATT: Well, the only marching orders we in Paris had were to research the French experience, which had already to a great extent been done by a special contract to the Rand Corporation, so that one would be able to have an accounting and be able to address, for example, to find out where persons were buried, if they had died in captivity, and registration of this sort of thing. And then, of course, we were going to work on the recovery of remains. And so we would be doing all of our discussions there. We, for example, whenever we were going to have . . . this would be later, of course, after 1975, that we would actually be sending planes in, but we would arrange that sort of thing through Paris. It was, as I say, our turnover point. So we were basically waiting to find out how many came out, whether they all came out, dealing with the French Government to find out if the French, who had, after all, an ambassador in Hanoi, could provide us any indication as to whether the "Hanoi Hilton" is now emptied or do they still have some people there. And of course, we always are dealing with the French, trying to find out if they had gotten through any of their contacts any information about places where they might be held or whether they indeed had all come out.

Now in Paris, we were basically sharing the views of the people we were depending on later on as well that they were not holding any people. Now, we had to take what they said and parse it, because they said that "we are not continuing to hold any prisoners." Now we tried to tell Washington what that means, that is the terminology they used also with the French, but it did not apply to Senegalese troops who had deserted from the French Army and had asked to remain in Vietnam, married Vietnamese wives and so forth. So we were not surprised when - I've forgotten the name of the chap now who finally was released years afterwards - and we wouldn't be have been surprised particularly if some African-American had done what the Senegalese had done - perhaps they had met some of the Senegalese and the Senegalese persuaded them to stay on, life isn't half bad here - because they were very good at driving wedges between various aspects of the American military. So some people may have rallied to, to put it militarily, rallied to the North Vietnamese side and they therefore were not considered still to be POWs.

Q: Now it's still an issue today - I think it's basically a fake issue - that somehow or other the Vietnamese are holding prisoners of war somewhere. Did the French - I mean obviously we were looking at the mass capture of troops at Dien Bien Phu and other places - did the French have the feeling that there were any prisoners of war - not deserters, but prisoners of war - who remained in North Vietnam afterwards?

PRATT: Well, there they believed, as we did, that maybe it's going to take a month or so to make sure that they have gotten the word around everywhere that if you've got anybody, for God's sake send them in, because anyone who disappeared in the last weeks of the conflict might possibly be in a remote area and they hadn't gotten the word yet. I mean they don't know the war's over. So we thought that perhaps there could be some short delay, but we did not think that they were lying about this question - not that they didn't lie about almost everything else, but the point is that one question where it was put in such a way that the only way that others said they were lying was that they would not answer the question which we put: Do you hold any Americans? They would not answer that question, so we knew that, yes, they did have some who were there, but they were not considered by them to be prisoners. So we did not consider that then, of course, this whole question about all these prisoners supposed to be held in Laos - we felt that was a red herring, that for the most part it was people who had gone down in areas where the control was in the hands of the Vietnamese, not even, shall we say, indirectly through the Lao Communists, but directly to their own Communists, and that they were being sent back to Vietnam. They may have died en route, and of course a number of people may have been killed when they first came down because sometimes the troops weren't that disciplined. But the thing is, we did not feel that this was . . . I mean, I had to deal with the league of families quite frequently, and I think that they were - even though we thought they were somewhat misguided - nonetheless, we thought that they were honest in their concerns to make sure that everybody got out and we didn't believe that they were correct in saying that they thought all these people were still there.

Q: During the Vietnam conflict, several of our people, like Philip Manhart and others, had been picked up and basically held out in the hills somewhere by the Viet Cong and all that. Did we feel that this was just a matter of some months, of making sure that the word had gotten through?

PRATT: Yes, we did. As you know, Phil Manhart finally got the word.

Q: Had the cottage industry which is still going on today, particularly in Thailand and all, of entrepreneurs who were picking up pictures of so-called prisoners of war being held - had this started yet?

PRATT: It started.

Q: I mean the creating of artifacts to show that there was a cadre out there.

PRATT: Yes, this, of course, was after 1975.

Q: Yes.

PRATT: And even, for example, Phoumi Nosavan got his son cranked up to get involved in this in the hopes of getting U.S. support moved back into Laos. At that time Laos had a Communist government, and what did a good anti-Communist do except to offer his services and find out some things that the Americans might possibly want, such as dog tags and reports of American prisoners in the mainline area. We found that most of this was fabrication of various sorts. Even as late as when I was in Guangdong we had people coming up in to China purporting to have reports of some people still being held somewhere in Vietnam. So indeed yes, when people can't make money without working too hard, they generally find a way of doing it. We were concerned about the way in which the U.S. military handled it, but we knew how difficult it was for them. They had established a big office in Washington and, of course, had undertaken a number of studies, and they sent a lot of people out, so they did not want to call the National League of POW/MIA Families [Ed: Ann Mills Griffiths, Executive Director] or groups of the press. They knew that they were mostly well meaning and so on, while many of these persons, of course, in the military realized they were trying to get maximum pay benefits, which if they had a husband who was missing in action pay, including combat pay et cetera and automatic promotions, would continue until they could establish probable death. Therefore, the family had no incentive to try to have that straightened out until the wife decided she wanted to be married. And so there were all kinds of stories about just what this really meant for a lot of people. But nonetheless, for the most part, I think the Defense Department leaned over backwards to try to follow up on any story. They didn't believe there was any prison camp or even two straggling prisoners around there by that time, but the thing is they weren't going to turn it off. So I think all the attacks saying that we abandoned our POWs in that whole area of Laos and Cambodia I think is misguided, and all the films that they turn out - you know "Rambo" this and that - are certainly keeping alive something which deserved a much speedier death.

Q: Well, had it turned into a real political issue? Today it represents - God, we're talking about 25 years later - had it turned into a right-wing conservative political issue at that time, or was it mainly groups, during this time you were dealing with it, around the families and all, as opposed to sort of a political movement in the United States?

PRATT: Well, I think that it has a little bit of each. The families were there to be exploited by other people. They had their other political agenda, and that often included people who were anti-war people, who wanted to consider that we shouldn't have done the war at all and when the war was over we should have fought a war to get our MIA back.

Q: How did you find the North Vietnamese in dealing with this issue? Were they understanding and businesslike, or what was their attitude?

PRATT: Well, I was dealing for the most part with a very, I thought, professional man who was fairly young. He had been involved in the war against the French, I believe, but had then gone into the Foreign Ministry. His French was pretty good, and this was always in a very professional manner because, of course, he would basically report back what I said to him and then give me the report in from Hanoi. He was not embroidering too much, and very clearly they had been somewhat prepared for this by the way in which the French had handled their prisoner and death issue following the war. And the French have perhaps an even stronger motivation than our government had in that there was a provision in French law which requires anyone who is mort pour la patrie to either have his remains brought back and put into a military cemetery or elsewhere, if the family itself is not in France, with perpetual care for the grave, or being in a foreign graveyard which is basically supervised, at least, if not run by the French. And so whenever . . . for example, on one occasion Hanoi wanted to take over one of the cemeteries inside Hanoi for some building project and wanted to move these bodies from that to another, they had to go through a whole rigmarole of trying to find out from each family whether they wanted the body to be reburied in this other cemetery or whether on this occasion they wanted the remains sent back to France. So they had been accustomed to dealing with the French on these matters, which from their point of view were a bit extraneous because, they, after all, never really made much of an effort to recover their own dead.

Q: Of course, the project was a mess, but what was the Vietnamese culture regarding the remains of dead?

PRATT: Well, of course, in their circumstances of peace, they have to a certain extent a cult of the dead. They have their cemeteries. They don't exactly worship their ancestors, but nonetheless, the tombs of their ancestors are very important. So that part they understand. But during wartime, when it's difficult to do this, then of course you have to abandon some of your usual rules. So they were not making a great to-do about getting back from South Vietnam the bodies of the North Vietnamese who were killed there. In the first place, most of them, they said, were not there. Anyway, it was nothing but the South Vietnamese doing all this. But what I think amazed them more than anything else - and this, of course, was later on when we began to send out our forensic boys - the fact that they were able, from a bone here and there, to sort out the remains, because sometimes bones were put together, and sometimes they would include bones of a Vietnamese in with the bones of an American. And the fact that they were able to determine all this and that we would go to the point of doing it sending in all these big forensic teams and all this aircraft and all this equipment and so on and then shipping them off to Honolulu and sending a report back saying, Well, you gave us four bodies, you thought, but it's really three plus parts of two others. So this, I think, the technical aspect, was something which they were amazed that we could do as much as we could do.

Q: Well, let's talk about the French side of this whole equation, not just about the bodies missing in action but on your work with the French on this whole liaison and being point man dealing with the Vietnamese and reports from the embassy. What was your impression of how the French supported or worked with us?

PRATT: Well, obviously two very diverging trends in France - it's no more united, I guess, than the U.S. is. But as you were aware, I'm sure, at the time, there was a whole group within the French Government, and that included the Foreign Ministry, included political figures, included the military, who were still smarting from their defeat in Indochina and were quite determined to enjoy the U.S. defeat and to gloat over every aspect of it. One of Dolores's friends back in this country was married to somebody, a French woman, who used to rub her hands with glee every time casualty figures came in on the American side. So indeed, there was that whole trend within France. But you know, the French have always had a love-hate relationship with the U.S. anyway, and on the other side there were persons who, of course, wished us well and hoped that we would not have such a feckless government as they had had fighting against Hanoi and therefore would be able to succeed where they had not. And we found those persons as much in Saigon and in Vientiane as in Paris. And in addition to that, you had, of course, the real professionals, and these professionals, like Challier, who had been ambassador in Hanoi and then ambassador in Peking and when I was there was working within the French Foreign Ministry on the problems of resettlement of the Vietnamese, because when Saigon fell there were just as many boat people who wanted to go join their family members in France as wanted to come to the United States, maybe more. France took certainly, on a per capita basis, far more refugees than we did, and of course we had people coming over and lecturing them about how they ought to do their share. And Challier was very gentle in explaining how they were doing already a good deal more of their share than we were doing of ours. And I think that we really had a lot of good friends who went out of their way, for example, over the whole grave question and repatriation of remains and so on. They had an organization there which spent hours with... Some people came out and wrote a full report, and then other people came out and didn't even know that the Defense Department already had in its library a report which they had already laboriously provided for them. Whenever I wanted to see them, I could get to see them. They were really leaning over backwards. So yes, we had that side, the very admirable side of the French.

At the same time, we had the bloody-minded people who just wanted to stick their finger in the U.S. eye, and they had a good chance to gloat and to cause us problems. This was something which had existed from the time of the Paris Talks on. Even at the end of the French involvement in 1954 they were pretty nasty, and then they were nasty again in the Geneva agreements of 1962. And you have this whole trend. And I'm sure they didn't think they were being nasty to the Americans. It's just that they obviously so much understood Hanoi and the whole Asia so much better than the Americans did, and therefore they wouldn't have made any of the mistakes that the U.S. had made. The fact that they already had made them, and made them under circumstances where they had less of an excuse - because loads of people knew that area very well . . . So this included people like, shall we say, the chap who was then there during the '70s and handled the Asian bureau and then was ambassador to Peking - Manach, a very strange French name [inaudible], I think. And these were the old socialists, and that strain of anti-Americanism was very much alive in much of the Foreign Ministry.

Q: Well, were we using our connections there? I mean were you involved in trying to figure out what was happening in Hanoi, because this goes with the time, how the truce implementation went and then the takeover? The French were sitting there. Did we use that, and were you involved in that aspect?

PRATT: Well, of course, I would have regular meetings with the people in the French Foreign Ministry and others who would talk about what their perception was of what was going on in both North and South Vietnam. And yes, I would send in their estimates. Of course, it's a fairly closed society, and therefore it's not easy to get too much hard information, but the impressions and what information they did have, they were often prepared to provide to us. Not all of them - as I say, there was that very nationalistic, anti-American side of some French which meant that they wanted to make sure that we were led astray so we would do ourselves the maximum harm. But that was not what I found among many of the more professional people who realized that they had had their chance in Indochina, and De Gaulle himself said let's forget about it, it's past, and so let's not try to just wish ill on the Americans just because we failed ourselves. And as I say, the people who were most important to us, namely those who could be of assistance in trying to get out persons for whom we felt a responsibility - they were very helpful, and they understood this and they themselves were trying very hard to deal with Hanoi to get out the persons from South Vietnam who were important to them. As you know, some of the people who had been involved with us, in talks in Paris or something of the sort, were taken prisoner there and sent to education camps. Some of them had French connections, and the French tried very hard to help get them out, and we, of course, would go to the French and say we know that you are aware of such-and-such; what we have heard is the following; I'm sure you have more information; we also have an interest in seeing if this person can be gotten out of the education camps from which he might not emerge alive.

So in general it was the usual mixed bag of dealing with the French, which is that some of them are marvelous, but difficult, and some of them are difficult, but marvelous.

Q: What about after the fall of South Vietnam, were you continuing to talk to the North Vietnamese?

PRATT: Yes, well, we resumed our talks very shortly after that because we had to find out about including some Americans who were still there. There are always a few stragglers, and on the American side, people go out to do some ethnographic music in the Highlands and, you know, what's happened to them? So yes, we started to have our talks again. These were not designed to do anything about the previous negotiations. They were considered by that time a dead letter, although it was occasionally still mentioned by people in Hanoi, the reparation, as one of the unfinished business between us. Nevertheless, they knew that that was just for the benefit of their own people, not out of any hope to get anything going. Of course, as I mentioned, when Carter came in they picked up considerably.

Q: Talking about the cleaning up after the fall of South Vietnam, were we getting people out? For example, Saigon must have had still a considerable number of deserters. There was a whole deserter colony in Saigon of GIs who had gone AWOL. They were deserters by this time and living in the black market. Were we trying to get these people out?

PRATT: Well, we were trying to make sure that . . . When families came to us we would ask what information they could provide on some of these people. However, things were sufficiently chaotic, so we didn't expect really to get much in the way of answers down there. And of course very quickly the boat people started arriving. That, by the way, is another whole and rather shameful chapter. I think the United States behaved rather badly in that.

Q: Before we move to the boat people, were you taking any information the families would have and passing it on to the North Vietnamese and saying where was so and so and do you have any information?

PRATT: Yes.

Q: How would they accept that?

PRATT: Well, they'd accept whatever we gave them. They wouldn't necessarily ever respond. I think for the most part we never got a response.

Q: Where all of a sudden an agricultural researcher in the Highlands who sort of disappeared, would he or she surface?

PRATT: Did surface, did get out.

Q: I mean this is not a matter of putting and holding. In a way it was pretty much they were trying to clean up and not leave these people.

PRATT: That's right. They were trying to get rid of these people. They didn't want them around.

Q: What about people, for example, we would have Vietnamese that we'd say, Look, can you let so-and-so - we're talking about a South Vietnamese national who's got a sick mother in the United States or something - and can you just . . . if you let him go, we'll take care of him or something like that? Were we trying any of that?

PRATT: Not at that point. Later on we were prepared, by transmission or to tell the family in the United States how to address their own communication. And so we'd say we think it would be better if you were to raise this personally, and you send it to the Vietnamese Embassy in Paris, Mr. So-and-so, and say that this is a family unification matter, and you would like to be able to promise that you will support this person and please let him leave and so on. The French were doing the same thing. The French were trying then to get out people, and of course the last thing they wanted to do was to have everybody get off by boat.

Q: Did you get involved in the boat people business.

PRATT: Yes, well, we were handling much of it there and trying very hard to get all the people concerned - that means countries as well as private organizations - to provide what assistance they could and also trying to make sure that ships implemented the law of the sea. Because under maritime law, if a ship comes across a vessel in distress, they are required to stop, pick up the people, and they may offload them at the nearest port. Well, unfortunately, out in that neck of the woods, the nearest port is not very close. Secondly, it may not be the port to which they are heading. In the third place, none of these ports may be willing to offload these Vietnamese. And in the fourth place, no matter what happens, it delays you and costs you money. So they were constantly passing by . . . Some countries did not do that. Some countries gave instructions to all their flag carriers to follow strictly the maritime law, and I believe that American carriers got those instructions, and I think for the most part they lived up to them. But of course you had the Lebanon and Panama and Liberia registries, and of course God knows, it was probably a Greek who owned the ship, and these were not really living up to these requirements. And we had, of course, an office in the Department of State which was trying to handle this refugee migration matter and so forth - Frank Sieverts. And we were trying to see whether we could get maybe even a tougher U.S. law which could penalize foreign carriers if they failed to implement the maritime law, and deny them U.S. ports or something or other. And I guess they looked into it and decided it was much too cumbersome, too difficult, and so we did not follow through. We did not try anything more than just try to make sure that our own flag carriers did not violate the maritime laws. But a lot of people died because these ships passed them by.

Q: How about the French? Do they-

PRATT: They tried. I think the French flag was probably pretty good. Well, of course, you know, they have felt a sense of continuing responsibility for almost all of their colonies anyway, and therefore, they were taking, as I said, far more Vietnamese into France, per capita, than we were. And I think that at all points they were sort of among the most active. And I'm sure some French ships probably didn't stop, but the French Government made every effort to make sure that any ship which was under their discipline would do something even though it would cost them time and money.

Q: Did you, in your capacity as this liaison person, tap the Vietnamese community in Paris at all?

PRATT: Yes, Vietnamese, Cambodian, and Lao. And obviously my time was limited in doing this, but I had best contacts with the Lao, but also good contacts that I gradually built up to some of the Cambodians because they were interested in having their views conveyed at a time when we were still important there in Phnom Penh. And then after the Khmer Rouge took over, they of course were interested in seeing what we could manage to do to help, particularly some of their relatives, because there was not much we could do but, of course, we had contacts with more people perhaps in Thailand than they had, and of course they were able to escape out to Thailand.

One of my contacts, for example, at the Cambodian Embassy was called back to Phnom Penh and was there when Phnom Penh fell, and he was, I believe, part Vietnamese origin, and he know that if he tried to go toward Thailand the Khmer Rouge would get him and, of course, kill him because he was educated. And he went back through the highlands in Vietnam and into southern Laos and from there was able to get out through the UNHCR. And of course when he was able to get out and back to his family in Paris, he gave me quite a report on his trek. He eventually went down to Abidjan for a while. So that's the kind of person whom I would talk to to get what information he could provide.

Q: Talking about the time you were in Paris, 1978, were we aware of the enormity of what happened in Cambodia at the time?

PRATT: Yes.

Q: How were the French reacting?

PRATT: Well, the French felt particularly - I can't say "responsible," but particularly concerned - because they blamed us for the polarization by our behavior over Sihanouk. However, they also knew that the Khmer Rouge movement-

Q: It has a French name even.

PRATT: That's right. Pol Pot - or Saloth Sar, as he was originally known - and Ieng Sary and Thio Som Po and so forth - all of these person imbibed their Communist in France. They were not part of the Vietnamese Communist movement as Kun Sen is, but instead were the French intellectual side of Communist, and so of course they saw this as a direct implementation of the most anarchistic and chaotic and extremist type of political movement and having very good roots in France. Not in Marxism - well, in Marxism, perhaps, but not Leninism. In any case, the French were very concerned about what was happening in Cambodia, and they, of course, were in the forefront of trying to protect some of the people and trying to get them out, particularly as Phnom Penh was falling. The French ambassador had in his compound a large number of persons who would have been, in fact, Sirik Matak was there first and then decided he should not take refuge in a foreign embassy and went out to his death. So the French were very, very concerned about this, and of course they continued to have information on what was going on and to of course see that we got it. So we were not unaware of the killing fields.

Q: Speaking of the French intellectuals, they always occupy an important place within the French social and political life. Were they of interest to you in your job, or socially? I was wondering how they were reacting? Here they had been sort of anti-American and things were falling apart in Indochina and it wasn't a nice scene. It wasn't the nice clean, tidy parlor Communism that many of them had ascribed to.

PRATT: Well, of course, there again, the French intellectuals are even more divided, I think, than they would ever be in the United States. I of course had a great deal of respect for and enjoyed talking with people like Raymond Aron, who of course I think, as a good Jewish intellectual, was pretty solid, and a number of other journalists and writers. But one of the problems I had with many of them, of course, was that they would have their opinions first and then seeing what facts would fit. That, of course, is not something which is unique to the French by any means.

Q: No.

PRATT: But it did mean that even some of the persons whom I would deal with fairly frequently because they were scholars on China and so forth were ones whom I would deal with as best I could, but still often I would find that their positions were, you know . . . it was very difficult to argue with them because they had already had their conclusions, and any facts I gave them would be of interest only if they happened to fit in. But that was not true of many of the others. For example, on the China side there was General [Jacques] Guillerma, who had been one of the famous line of French military officers who did some of the best reporting out of China in the late 1940's and early '50s. And he was sent by De Gaulle to Taiwan, for example, to break the news to Chiang Kai-shek that De Gaulle would be recognizing Peking. And he was head of a Chinese institute there. They did very, very good work. They were very conscientious. Others, however, were just, well, particularly of course the Communists - they had real problems after the Sino-Soviet split because, of course, the French Communist Party was basically dominated by the Stalinist Russian side, and so of course it was bound to be somewhat against Mao, but then of course you had another crew that just loved Mao because he was more of a French-type intellectual. And of course even the intellectuals who were not Communists Peyrefitte [Ed: ?], for example, who recently died, and others of that sort - were often very pro-Mao and pro-China. Of course, they saw a very different China from just a purely political one; they saw it as a great empire on the cultural side and philosophical side and all the rest. There was Mao, the great philosopher king. Well, I saw quite a few of them, but I didn't have time to cover the full range, and it was not my principal focal point because I needed to be kept up on what the facts were and what the French Government's position was and how they intended to implement it. These influences on the French Government, which you get from the writers, both scholars and journalists, were, of course, something I would follow in order to be able better to predict what might be a governmental decision.

Q: Did the intellectuals have an influence on the Foreign Ministry and the people you were dealing with, on the government?

PRATT: Yes, somewhat. But what they wrote would have an impact based upon the political level, not the working level. The working level had to be concerned about it, to know what it is that their minister might have read in the morning Express, and therefore what he might be telling them they ought to do and what they ought to look into. The French politician, of course, found that China was always something from which you could get benefit. In other words, China was good news, good copy, and anybody . . . It was Giscard who went there representing the National Association of Manufacturers, of the patronat, and other people going there representing aspects of the government and the establishment - they all would have very nice things to say about China because China was well regarded in France. And it doesn't make any difference whether it's under the Cultural Revolution or the anti-cultural revolution and so on. They probably preferred the news they could get out of Mao and the Cultural Revolution to what they could get out of Deng Xiaoping, who is much more pragmatic and therefore not so French. But as I say, the other side of the intellectuals, of course . . . I don't know whether you are aware of Pierre Ryckmans (writer, sinologist) (born 28 September 1935, in Brussels, Belgium), who also uses the pen-name Simon Leys,, a Belgian really, but someone whose works, in French, had been most highly critical of the Chinese Government. He's somebody who has a great admiration for the Chinese and their culture but does not consider that their politics is something for which they are most gifted, unlike art and poetry and literature and philosophy and so forth. Politics is not their forte. In any case, you would find that as well in France, but regardless of that, China always is something that the French are interested in.

Q: Well, maybe this would be a good place to stop, I think. Was there any other aspect of your time there we should talk about up to 1978?

PRATT: Well, let's see. I think that the interesting thing, of course, was the fading of Kissinger from the scene. We found, of course, that Brzezinski came in and apparently -

Q: As national security adviser to Carter.

PRATT: He seemed to be picking up - we might have said - the bad habits, but he I'm sure would say the intelligent approach to his role that Kissinger had adopted. And of course it was later on that we saw the sharpest dispute between Brzezinski and Vance, but already this was part of the framework that we noted for matters which were of import to me, anyway. The Indochinese and Chinese areas were ones which were also of importance to Brzezinski, and therefore one found the same problem of secrecy, of obfuscation, and of conflict. And of course this put many of these problems which I faced into the basket of the difficult things. Do I aim this for one or for the other? What can I expect to have happen when I do some of these things? And this, of course, when we began our new discussions with the Vietnamese after Carter eventually came in on the problem with the trip to Hanoi and also Woodcock, and then the efforts in Paris to get things going, which I think I should discuss the next time because the framework of that was also difficult in dealing with our own government because our own government does not want to deal with its own people.

Q: Today is the 12th of January, 2000. Mark, when you heard what we said the last time, do you want to pick it up from there for a while?

PRATT: Well, I think that the key aspect of the entry of Carter was of course the personality of Carter himself. I'm sure many others have commented on much of his approach to foreign policy and the importance to him of his religion. And of course it made it very uncomfortable for people who have their own religions views but do not necessarily believe that religion is the best direct guide for handling politics and particularly foreign affairs.

Q: Could you explain as you say it what was his religion and what thrust did this give to his approach to foreign policy?

PRATT: Well, I think the key thing mentioned impacted on me, but I think we can see it in, say, his approach to Africa and other countries - the desire for peace and his trip to Korea and so forth

- but as it affected Vietnam, it was the Christian view, which I can respect but don't agree with, that we had fought a bad war, morally, in Vietnam and therefore he should be having the U.S. atone for this. And he, of course, wished to be able to establish relations with Hanoi. He wished to, in effect, apologize for the war and try to if not get political reparations, nonetheless from his point of view moral reparations for what he considered to have been an unjust or immoral war in Vietnam.

Q: Was this palpable when he came in? You were still in Paris dealing with Vietnam.

PRATT: I was the only turnover point at that time. After the fall of Saigon, we basically had all of our contacts, such as there were, in Paris. Of course, we did have things we had to talk about. Not all of them were ones that you were willing to raise in any meaningful way, but nonetheless, whatever you were prepared to do, and often we were acting on behalf of the Congress because, as you well know, the Foreign Service is the Foreign Service of the United States, it's not the Foreign Service of the President. So when Congress wished to be very active about missing-in-action or something of that sort, then we were expected to be of assistance. And indeed, we were. So it forced us occasionally to get involved with the North Vietnamese when, probably, the President and Secretary of State would not have been so happy to have done so. But when Carter came in, he of course was most anxious to do so. Of course, one of the early acts was to send Leonard Woodcock to Hanoi [Ed: March 1977], in effect to try to move things toward recognition. Obviously it was very early in that process, but that was the flavor of that trip. In addition, in order to emphasize this approach, Woodcock got all of the State Department people whom he was forced to take along because they were the experts and knew the languages and all that stuff, forced them out of any meeting which he considered important. This, of course, was again an aspect of the Carter view that the Realpolitik of the State Department was something he had to get around, and to do that he had to get his own people and to be as much against the State Department as any Republican had been who was suspicious of these liberals in the State Department.

Q: Well, this is interesting. We'll talk about the Woodcock thing, but when Carter came in, since you were the point man for the Vietnamese-American contacts, did you sense a change in attitude, the fact that they'd read Carter and figured that they could, in a way, get more out of us than previously? Were you aware of anything like that at your level?

PRATT: Well, somewhat, because, of course, the signals were coming, indeed, from the White House about the desire on the part of the President to overturn what he considered then to be a Republican policy, you know, a Nixon policy, which was, from his point of view, I guess, immoral. But more important, one could see that the forces in Hanoi were what drove them more than anything else. In other words, we may think that only the United States had domestic politics, but Hanoi had a lot of them, and of course the top leadership, their whole framework had changed with the collapse of Saigon, and the relative strengths of various groups and what they ought to be doing with each other, who was up and who was down, which one was pro-Chinese and which one was not, which one was really totally concerned with the concerns of Moscow and nationalism and so forth. There were various trends there, which meant that they had to treat the United States in a particular way for their own internal needs.

Q: Were we getting any feedback - I mean particularly you - about what was going on in Hanoi and any feel for the various currents that were going on there?

PRATT: We were not getting too much. Of course, we had nobody of our own in Hanoi. I was also not getting much of the intelligence information coming out from Hong Kong and persons whom we were using as agents there, but I would get a bit from the French themselves, but the French had their own national interest and their own way of chivvying things to serve their interest. And as I mentioned the last time, we had a series of heads of the Asian department in the Quai d'Orsay who were basically very, well, they're not anti-American in the sense that they were opposed to what the U.S. was doing in the U.S., but the point is they were very much suspicious of and against what they considered U.S. policy in Asia to be. So we were not getting at the political level the kind of insights which would have been much more helpful, but we were getting a great deal of direct information from the lower level of the Quai, which was concerned about facts, as we tried to be in the State Department, and less concerned about the great political games.

So, yes, we were getting certain information about what was going on in Hanoi, and yet we had to extrapolate because, of course, that society was perhaps even more closed than was Peking society. And Ho Chi Minh, particularly during his lifetime and for a short time thereafter, was a unifying force which one did not have in China because after all in China from the early 1950s on there had been fights within the top leadership and purges and all the rest of it. One did not see much of that, and to this day, you know, we still have not seen much in the way of open fights going on in Hanoi, with one exception. But we nonetheless knew that there were various strains because the war had been such a unifying force. Once it was over, then, of course you would quarrel about how you managed the next stage, what you'd do vis-à-vis Cambodia, your next-door neighbor, what you'd do about the agreement you'd previously arrived at in 1970 with the Chinese about giving greater independence to the Lao and Cambodian Communist movements, and then of course how you would handle the border area with China. So there were a number of issues which would be viewed differently and of which strains would have to be handled without the moderating and overall influence of a Ho Chi Minh because they, of course, lost their great leader.

Q: He died in, what, September 1969?

PRATT: I'm sorry, you're right - 1969. So this had occurred before. But as I said, they were able to carry on as though he were still sitting there.

Q: And the war was still keeping them together.

PRATT: That's what I mean, and it was basically his framework that was behind it.

Q: Well, it's January 21, 1977. The Carter Administration comes in. What were you doing and how did you proceed at this point? Was there the usual hiatus while they were sort of putting their administration in place?

PRATT: Somewhat, although of course very quickly on, as you know, he did get some staffers in to the White House and into the State Department for handling foreign affairs. And of course Dick Holbrooke came in as assistant secretary for East Asia, and he apparently had established a kind of relationship - less so than perhaps some others, because he wasn't, after all, from Georgia - so he was in and, of course, had his own history with Vietnam, and also, working in the White House, he had his own personal desire, I think, to move things along in East Asia, in particular with Vietnam.

Q: What were you doing? The Carter Administration is in. You're kind of a point person in Paris. What were you doing?

PRATT: Well, whenever there was a message to be passed, that was where it was passed, and this would be, for example, if we were going to have Sonny Montgomery [Ed: Mississippi Democratic congressman] come to talk about MIA issues, we would have to make all of the arrangements for the aircraft and so on. So we also had information which we would sometimes want to get about certain Vietnamese in the South, some of whom had worked very closely with us. And we were often asking whether they could find us any information about this. A lot of them were the same persons the French were asking about, and occasionally we'd get the information via the French, generally a more thorough report. But whatever it was, and of course, any meetings, anything we wanted - for example, the Woodcock visit - we had to set all that up in Paris. He was taking his own aircraft in, and one had to say what aircraft it would be, where it would take from, where it would be landing, and so forth. We had to get the information and say what facilities they had, what airfield to land at, what were the means of getting the airplane started through ground equipment or whether they had to bring in their own ground equipment.

Q: Did you have a feeling that, yes, there was activity there but at the same time that sort of this whole apparatus of the Department of State and the military, the Pentagon, and everyone else, had been so focused on Vietnam that all of a sudden it was sort of, "Well, we lost that one," and getting on with it and in away, except for these efforts, which are based a lot on missing-in-action but also the Woodcock visit, that it almost passed off the radar of the foreign policy apparatus?

PRATT: Well, we thought it had basically gone off the screen when Ford and Kissinger were calling the tune, because then, of course, Vietnam was something where we couldn't go ahead with any of the economic stuff because of the demands of Hanoi that it be cast as reparations and the unwillingness of the Congress to budge on that. And therefore, of course, China had to shift to be the more important relationship. And of course, as I said, we had a kind of role in that as well, in addition to being one of the turnover places when the communications were swamped for our newly established liaison offices in China. We would take the slack there, but in addition to that, of course, we had our own head of the liaison office, David Bruce, coming to Paris quite frequently, and we were interested in getting the French view on what was going on in China because this was, after all, a very significant time in China, with the demise of first Zhou Enlai and then Mao Zedong and the ups and downs of Deng Xiaoping. This meant that we, of course, had China far more on our screen and Paris was one of the places where we thought we could get information which would supplement and deepen some of our understanding of what was happening in China. So indeed, for that particular moment, China was far more important. When we had Nixon visit Paris for the Pompidou ceremonies, one of the key things he wanted to do while there was to see Deng Xiaoping when he was on his way through Paris to New York for the United Nations, and that didn't happen because he decided, I think very intelligently, that he did not want to give the French the impression that any stopover in Paris was to be able to see the American President. So he didn't show up, although I was taken to the ceremony for Pompidou.

Q: Are we talking about the funeral?

PRATT: Well, it was after the funeral. The funeral had taken place, and then they had a big reception, a memorial service sort of thing. And I was taken along with the Nixon crew to be the interpreter for Deng Xiaoping, should he arrive. In the end, since he didn't arrive, we did talk to the person from the Chinese Embassy because this was being organized by Nixon to give himself maximum international coverage as a way of defusing, or at least trying to make himself a little bit more popular in the United States, and to show also to anyone else that he at least was very popular abroad - as indeed he was. And he managed a very spectacular session at the Pompidou ceremonies, four or five people sort of moving him around and turning from one group to the next, and everybody was anxious to come up and talk to him. Of course, we had the general, Vernon Walters, as his major interpreter, because of course he could talk with the Russians and the French and the Italians and the Germans and so forth, but he didn't know Chinese, so I was there to take care of that.

So that sort of set the framework from, shall we say, the end of the Nixon Administration, and then through the Ford Administration China was increasingly important to them and also much more activity. But when Carter came in, then the activity shifted to Vietnam.

Q: What was Carter after, did you feel, at the beginning?

PRATT: Well, I think that he wished very much to erase this long war, probably as much for the United States domestic political scene as for anything to do with foreign affairs. But nonetheless they had the attitude of that more than apologies, one needed to try to reestablish friendliness and show Christian forgiveness et cetera, and this would mean that there would be a resumption, perhaps, of trying to give aid to Vietnam for reconstruction and then moving toward what he would call "normal political relations." And that's I think what the Leonard Woodcock mission was all about. It was very hard for us to know because, I guess on the President's instructions, persons who were not in the political appointee - and therefore politically reliable - group were not privy to what his real thoughts and real intentions were. I have seen very little that has come out from Freedom of Information Act queries which would clarify much of this, and we knew that there were a number of things which we were very much excluded from.

Q: Well, from your perspective, you were told Leonard Woodcock would be coming out. What were you doing? I mean was it airplane arrangements and that sort of thing?

PRATT: Yes. We were not told very much because, I think, they had only the most general descriptions which they were prepared to make available to lower-level people. They wanted to get directly through to persons whom they considered would be politically reliable in Hanoi and avoid very much of, shall we say, persons who would not be considered to be loyal by the top government figures in Hanoi. So we weren't told very much about the substance, as I say. Woodcock excluded the State Department people from most of his important conversations while he was in Hanoi. We would see what it was the State Department people drafted coming out of Hanoi, and it was fairly revealing, but nonetheless we knew that in many of the key meetings had people excluded, and Woodcock would not himself tell them what it was he had discussed, and he would say he would report back directly to the President upon his return. So this was very much something which had the flavor of a presidential operation.

Q: Well, in a way, was there sort of the feeling that Henry Kissinger and Nixon or Nixon and Henry Kissinger had sort of set the pattern for this type of thing, and so this was Brzezinski and Carter picking up, and this was considered this is really the way to get things done?

PRATT: Yes, I think that's quite true, and of course I think also the usual view, which of course being Republicans, would say the reason they couldn't trust the State Department is that it was composed of a lot of persons who had voted Democratic and were really not even closeted liberals. And the Democrats coming in would say these are persons who, if they could work for Nixon, you can't trust them. And therefore, also, of course, there they were coming up from Georgia, and here were persons who had worked in the Washington, DC, area for so long, and of course that meant that they were automatically not so trustworthy. Brzezinski, I think, also . . . of course, he had known Henry Kissinger. They were to a certain extent colleagues and ran across each other for quite a number of times over a number of years. And so I think he felt that this is a model to follow.

Now the fact that also you had a President whose initial interests were not that much in foreign affairs, was again also of significance. I think, Vance, who was an honorable man, was considered, however, not be within, shall we say, the closed sphere of Carter's friends. He was, after all, drawn from the New York lawyer establishment and he was not a Georgia, shall we say, political figure around Carter. And so the paranoia... and of course it's interesting that you see the paranoia at the same time you see considerable, shall we say, emphasis from a form of rather fundamentalist Christianity.

Q: As this went on - I'm trying to capture the spirit of the times - was there concern on your part personally that this Woodcock mission might try to give away the store, in other words, to make an abject apology, to promise reparations, and all that?

PRATT: Well, on the one hand, I personally did not feel - although I thought that this was the kind of action which would undermine much of what we might try to do elsewhere in Asia, because it would show us, I think, not really understanding what had really happened, because after all we had engaged in that kind of war for a relatively high-minded reason. There was nothing in it for us. We were not trying to establish or maintain an empire, like the French. We were just trying to basically get out gracefully at the end, and in the beginning we were trying to defend a kind of people. Maybe you'd call them Chechens against the Russians, but nonetheless they were a people in the southern part of Vietnam. Vietnam had never been one, even during the times of the empire it was handled in rather separate ways. But high-minded intentions were those, certainly, of both Kennedy and Johnson, but nonetheless, as I say, I don't think it would have hurt us terribly if that had been successful. On the other hand, we didn't really believe he could pull it off, because the Congress was very much of a different mind, and that included members of Carter's own party.

In addition to that, Congress had the wherewithal to block it because a major thing which the Vietnamese wanted was the kind of money which would indicate that we were really saying that we caused the war and therefore we have a responsibility to reconstruct all of Vietnam, and the billions of dollars are given for that purpose. Well, the Congress was jolly well not either going to give or to be committed to be given that kind of etiquette. So we could feel that it was a rather misguided intention that the President had, but in any case that he couldn't follow through it. And of course, this is in the end what actually happened because they started conversations in Paris, and we had to arrange them, and Holbrooke came over and Phan Hien came from Hanoi, deputy foreign minister, and we talked and talked. And we don't know all that was discussed. We were there for the more formal set pieces, you know, 12 people around a table. But every time Holbrooke would go off in a corner with Phan Hien, and we would not know what had been discussed. They did not really get too far because Congress actually passed a resolution which was designed to make sure that whatever Holbrooke thought he was doing in Paris, whatever Carter wanted to do in Paris, the Congress would be on record as making sure that it was not including any money.

Q: Was money, from your perspective, foremost on the part of the Vietnamese?

PRATT: That was their foremost interest, and a symbolic gesture more important than the money itself. In other words, they were getting still a certain amount of subsidies from the Soviet Union, and they knew how they could use these subsidies and how they could run this, but if American aid were to be provided, then of course they had seen how American aid was provided elsewhere, and they knew that they wouldn't stand for that. And therefore, I think that the actual getting the money and the practical things it would do was something which was not high on the list of priorities of the Ho Chi Minh-oriented leadership. But getting it as a symbolic admission of the justness of the North's war and the aggressive nature of the U.S. intervention was key. It was the last thing which would show how they had been Marxist-Leninist correct all along. And this, of course, would be one which would be the best memorial to Ho Chi Minh and the best brownie points and gold stars for their performance as loyal inheritors of the Ho Chi Minh mission.

Q: How long were you there? When did you leave?

PRATT: I left in April of 1978. I was there about five years.

Q: Did you see any change in attitude in the various meetings and all that you were having with the Vietnamese? I'm talking particularly towards the -

PRATT: Not really, because, as I say, my contacts had been with mostly the working level, the person at a level comparable to mine, who was the intermediary, and he was always very businesslike. We did not engage in any kind of recrimination one way or the other. We always tried to be of assistance. We tried to make sure that both sides understood that we were available at any time night or day that a message came in because it was a horrendous problem at that particular point because you can imagine that in Washington you couldn't get anything cleared through probably until five o'clock or six o'clock on a Friday evening, which meant that your Saturday and Sunday were days when you had to be delivering messages to the Vietnamese, and they, on the other hand, were of course 12 hours out, and they'd come in with a message in the early afternoon, which would make the handing it over, and I had to get it in, of course, by noon Washington time. And then, of course, Washington would sometimes want to go back almost immediately with something or other. So it was late at night that we were often working and then also on weekends. So at that point it was not a very relaxing situation, and basically I was sort of told, at least from Washington, that they were going to be having some message coming through and therefore I shouldn't plan to go off for the weekend, but I couldn't call my friend O Tan and say, "You're going to have something coming in and therefore I've got to stay in town, or can I go off now to visit friends in the country?" So it was very difficult because we did have one occasion, I guess, when we did not mesh, and by telephone I couldn't be there in time for the transfer, and so we had to deputize somebody else to go and take the message. But that was only once.

But from their point of view, the top leadership, indeed, seemed more ingratiating, but they had been very ingratiating when we were having the talks in 1973 after the Christmas bombing. They knew full well that when they were getting what they wanted the best thing to do is smile and be jovial about it. Even the foreign minister, Nguyen Co Thach - subsequently he was purged apparently - was very gracious, sort of taking Churchill's view, when you're getting what you want you shouldn't bother about being impolite.

Q: Were you involved in the China connection, or was that pretty much . . . We had our office in China, so that was not . . .

PRATT: Well, when I first arrived in Paris in 1973, we didn't have the liaison office. It was being set up. And therefore I went along with Don Anderson.

PRATT: Don was the one who was handling the turnover, but he was being taken out because he knew this was being reduced in frequency and importance as the liaison office went into effect, and also he was asked to go to Chuokei to work there. And so this was something which went on for a few months, and then I took over that aspect, which within a matter of, oh, I'd say, six months was almost totally gone. However, we still had certain things which we were expected to do back and forth, and the Chinese became much, much more ingratiating once they had a formal permission from Peking to be more forthcoming.

Q: Did the Vietnamese-Chinese border war happen during the time you were in Paris?

PRATT: No, that was when I was in Taiwan. Dick Holbrooke did not particularly like having the conversations take place in Paris because it made it more difficult for him to handle the rest of his job as assistant secretary for East Asia. So he wanted to have them close at home, but they were established in Paris because both we and the Vietnamese had good communications from Paris. One of the key things was that the Vietnamese wanted to be able to have these talks without their being intercepted by Moscow. They could do that because they had their own dedicated communications from Paris to Hanoi. They were not, however, able to do so in many places in the world, and one of them, of course, was New York at that time. They had, of course, gotten their mission to the United Nations, and yet that, I believe, was piggy-backing on the Soviets. This was a subject which they themselves did not wish to, shall we say, have the Soviets peering over their shoulders. So it was a while, I guess they did establish decent communications from New York which they could consider secure. So this is where Holbrooke wanted to shift the conversation.

However, we were still making these arrangements in Paris, and much of the communication was done there. Whenever we had full-fledged meetings, they went there. However, one of the activities of the Vietnamese representative in New York, apparently, was involvement in a certain amount of espionage in the United States, including somebody who had recruited a member of the USIA, and we knew about this USIA problem in that the USIA chap had been trying to get a Vietnamese woman, with whom he had had an affair, out of Vietnam. And apparently this was considered to be a way of getting the girl out, to serve as an agent for Hanoi. And I don't believe he had - he certainly, I don't think, intended or wished to pass information of great value, but nonetheless, apparently there was enough of it so that they did have a court case over it, and the Vietnamese representative at the United Nations was named an unindicted co-conspirator, and we requested his withdrawal from the United Nations. That took place. This is when we decided, in April of 1978, that there was not much chance of anything important going on for a while with the Vietnamese. This was when I was told, go on to your next assignment, whatever that may be.

JOAN M. PLAISTED
Commercial Officer
Paris (1973-1980)

Ambassador Joan M. Plaisted was born in 1958 in Minnesota. She attended America University and received both her Bachelor's and Master's Degree. Her postings abroad include Paris, Hong Kong, Geneva, Rabat and Marshall Island as Ambassador. Ambassador Plaisted was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on July 30, 2001.

Q: You were in Paris from '73 until when?

PLAISTED: From '73 until 1980 which was highly unusual and highly illegal.

Q: Well, let's start, when you went there in '73 who was the ambassador?

PLAISTED: It was John Irwin when I was first there. I just remembered Ambassador Irwin as being very generous. Occasionally I would be invited over to the residence when he was entertaining some of the top business people for luncheons. He, of course, was known for his very fine vineyard. He had an interest in Chateau Haut Brion, and he helped introduce me to the finer wines of France. Once I caught on that they were going to serve Chateau Haut Brion at the luncheon table, I would clear my calendar for the rest of the afternoon, and tell my staff that if they wanted me to do anything that day it would best be signed in the morning because I had a lovely lunch. I was going for lunch at the ambassador's residence and I was going to try and get as much Haut Brion as I possibly could, because if I finished my glass, the wine stewards would quickly fill it up again. So that was one of my more memorable experiences with the ambassador. This was the first ambassador I really knew.

Q: What was the situation in France, particularly as seen from the American Embassy in '73?

PLAISTED: It was a time of still close relations with the French. I was there during the election campaign between Valéry Giscard d'Estaing on the right and François Mitterrand on the left the first time around. It was something we were watching very closely at the American embassy, who was going to win. We were a little concerned about the possibility of the socialists, and in those days the communists were getting about 10% of the vote in France, as to who was going to win the elections. It was Giscard who was victorious at that point. We were following political events in France very closely, especially the presidential elections.

Q: Did you get involved with all the officers in the embassy being sort of sent out to look at the political scene?

PLAISTED: I was friends with a number of people in the political section. I would team up with them. I wasn't professionally sent out as a commercial officer to go and observe political developments, but I was very interested in it personally, and would go with friends of mine to see the debates. I remember going to see Mitterrand in a television interview that he was giving. He was just absolutely perfectly charming, ran overtime, was as gracious as he could be publicly, and then once it was time to leave, I was sitting in the back, he started yelling at his staff for allowing him to be late. Sort of a Jekyll and Hyde personality coming out that one can only see behind the scenes. What I was sent out to do was to be a control officer for VIP visits. For Jimmy Carter's presidential state visit to Paris when Giscard was president, I was the control officer for the segment, it was a dinner at the Grand Trianon, and also a big reception at the Palace of Versailles. I was the control officer for that event and had to write up all these elaborate scenarios. I got to go through the palace several times, to make decisions with security, where were we going to place the nuclear football in case the President had to declare a nuclear war during this reception at Versailles, and decided on Madame de Maintenon's bedroom. If she only knew what was happening so many years later that that's where the nuclear football was, in her bedroom. Also we set up johnny's-on-the-spot at the Versailles palace because Louis Quatorze never designed it that way in the first place. The French polished the floors so highly; they were cleaning every chandelier, waxing the floors. I had to get word to the President's party it would be best to wear rubber soled shoes because you are going to slip all over these highly waxed floors at Versailles. Then to my absolute panic at the end of the Versailles event we lined up all the cars to pick up the President and the congressional participants. There was the chauffeur for a congressman, but we couldn't find the congressman. It was about two or three o'clock in the morning after the events at Versailles. I was running through the palace trying to find a lost congressman who must have shown up in Paris, because I never heard about him again.

Q: In the commercial office at that time, did you find it a challenge to try to get American products through the French system? Was it a feeling that the French were through various bureaucratic methods trying to inhibit our selling things in France?

PLAISTED: It was very much a competitive environment, and there was always the philosophy of buy French if the French product is available. I was the coordinator for the Paris Air Show. Where we had some of the greatest competition with the French was in selling aircraft and avionics equipment. So that was a very competitive environment. But we were able in those days to have record sales at the Paris Air Show, I think in part because of the quality of the U.S. equipment. Of course at the Paris Air Show, there are international buyers, too. These aren't just French buyers for some of the avionics, but this is an international show where the U.S. was very competitive in those days.

Q: Did you run across, let's say the proclivity of the French to sort of sweeten deals for selling things and competition? I mean it has been mentioned many times they sweeten the deal by making some under the table agreements or something like that. Was this apparent?

PLAISTED: It obviously wasn't anything I saw firsthand. It was something that was talked about in those days. Later when I was at the OECD, one of the issues at the OECD was to come up with a code of conduct for this type of investment and just what are legitimate business practices.

Q: By the time you were there, the book, "The American Challenge" had come out...

PLAISTED: Jean-Jacques Servan-Schrieber wrote that. In fact that was one of the questions I was asked on the foreign service oral exam. Are you familiar with Jean-Jacques Servan-Schrieber, and they said it in such a way, and I had been a student in France, that I didn't quite understand until a few moments had elapsed who they were talking about. But yes, the book had come out earlier, I believe, and was debated quite a bit at the time when it came out. I think America was certainly seen as an economic competitor, an economic giant as it is today.

Q: Who were you dealing with in the French bureaucracy?

PLAISTED: In the French bureaucracy the ones I was really closest to were the air show organizers, because my main job was to coordinate the U.S. participation. I was working for the Minister of Economic and Social Affairs, Chris Petrow at that point and later Robert Harlan for the second show. I would be coordinating very closely with the organizers of the Salon Aéronautique, the Paris Air Show, trying to get additional VIP passes, additional tickets, good space for the U.S. exhibitors, negotiating with the officials at the Paris Air Show. I was also in contact with some of the people in the aviation firms. Also I was a U.S. delegate to a Bureau of International Exhibitions that approves world fairs. There was a French head of the Bureau of International Exhibitions who had been in their diplomatic service, and had been a consul general in the U.S. at one point. I had very close relations with him.

Q: How did you find these international exhibitions? There is a tremendous amount of politicking isn't there on that?

PLAISTED: Yes, absolutely, and the Russians were members. In fact my first day in Paris there was a luncheon at the George V hotel. My new boss wanted me to arrive in time to attend a meeting of this bureau. He insisted I move up my arrival date. I was seated at lunch next to a Russian delegate, but thank goodness somebody had tipped me off that he was really KGB. I had to watch out because he was asking me rather embarrassing questions. I knew exactly why he was trying to do so. My first day in Paris and the KGB is trying to convert me! It was quite exciting, but it was in a very international context and it could be quite controversial.

Q: What were some of the dynamics that went on there? Were you more at the technical level or...

PLAISTED: It was really my boss, the commercial counselor, he was our main representative. I was the junior representative. Yes, at times it would get very technical.

Q: In dealing with the French did you get involved, I mean the system in France. I have never served in France, but I understand some of the intellectuals represent a very strong important group, chattering class, whatever you want to call them. Then there would be the commercial people who were pretty hard nosed and practical. I mean did you find any cleavage between these two? Did you get involved in any of this?

PLAISTED: I would sometimes be at dinner parties with people from the staff of Le Canard Enchaîné who were absolutely delightful.

Q: This was the satiric...

PLAISTED: Yes, a very satirical newspaper. I dined with some of their French journalists. In Paris we had delightful, magnificent political conversations around the dinner table. We were used to quite a lively discussion, but I never saw the break between the commercial people and the intellectuals.

Q: You had seen the beginning of the computer generation coming though in France?

PLAISTED: Yes, in fact it was one of the industry products that I was responsible for, trying to promote U.S. exports of computers to France. We were somewhat successful in breaking into the French market. Of course you have the American firms that were established in France, manufacturing computer equipment in France. But even today, the use of computers, the use of the Internet in France, is a lot less than it is elsewhere in the developed world.

Q: In the commercial world, did you feel the relatively heavy hand of the government in controlling things, I mean compared to much looser control in the United States?

PLAISTED: I think there was more planning, certainly more, I don't think there was central planning per se, but there was more government direction, yes, than there would be in the U.S. I think the relationship between government and industry was closer in France than it was in the U.S. It wasn't as close as you would find it to be in Japan. There was a close relationship between government and industry. You would have industrialists sometimes serving in the French government.

Q: Was there much interest on the behalf of commercial people in what America had to sell and all?

PLAISTED: Yes, I think French businessmen were always interested in what was in their industry sector. We had a very active Paris Trade Center. We would be mounting exhibitions on computer equipment, machine tools. We were quite big, the U.S., in the environmental protection field. There were areas where we were quite competitive. Of course those were the areas where we would try and have the trade shows. We could draw a large crowd and get some very good sales results. One of our objectives was always to introduce new-to-market exporters, the little guy. The big guys could take care of themselves and didn't need my help. I was to introduce the little guy, new to exporting to the French market, with his pollution control equipment and help him find an appropriate French agent through the trade center shows. In the mid-'70s it was quite doable.

HOWARD R. SIMPSON
Marseille (1974)

Howard R. Simpson was born in 1925 and raised in Alameda, California. In 1943, he was drafted into the U.S. Army and served in the European Theater. He returned to the United States in 1945 and continued his education in California and Paris, France. Mr. Simpson joined the Foreign Service in 1951, where he served in Vietnam, Nigeria, France, and Algeria. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on January 10, 1994.

Q: Well then you left there in 1974. Was that right? And you went back to Paris. You were there from..., well maybe you were back in Washington for a bit. But I've got you from '75 to '79 in Paris.

SIMPSON: Well, I tell you, there was a big gap, wait a minute, we're missing something here. Because, no, I went from Algiers to Marseille as Consul-General.

Q: Oh, I see.

SIMPSON: After 2 years in Algiers, they appointed me Consul General in Marseille. Which was sort of a surprise because you know, USIA types don't normally go into that kind of thing. But I had heard that the thing was coming open and I made a few soundings and some people had been favorable of the time I had spent in Marseille and all that. So that worked out and it was very nice. There's a nice residence there and I was back in my element and coming back as a Consul General was good because I had all the press contacts, the cultural people, and I knew the politicians, the mayor and all that sort of thing. So it was a natural assignment and lasted a little over two years. Once again, it was one of those administrative hiccups. It was suppose to be a 2-2 (years) or something like that or at least 3 years. And State, I didn't know it, I didn't realize it, was going into this economic mode. In other words, saying this Consulate General is now going to be Economic not Political. Well, unfortunately for me, they decided that Marseille was going to be an Economic post so I was replaced by somebody who specialized in Economics. And that was the time when I didn't know where I was going from there. But fortunately, I heard about this Paris possibility coming up. And in the interim, I went to the University of South Carolina as a so-called Diplomat-in-Residence. But this wasn't the State Department program. This was a deal through USIA. And it only lasted for about 3-4 months.

ELIZABETH RASPOLIC

Vice Consul

Elizabeth Raspolic worked for the Peace Corps in Pakistan, Thailand, and Tunisia before joining the Foreign Service in 1973. She served mainly as a consular officer in France, Korea, Ethiopia, and China. Ms. Raspolic was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1989.

RASPOLIC: To Lyon, France. It would have been one thing had I been going to a larger post, where if you had a procedural question, you could always turn to a colleague and ask, "How is this done?" But when there's only one other person in the post, and that person has never served as a consular officer, then you really do have to rely on the FAM and your own wits, and also how well the long-distance telephone system works in the country, so that you can call a nearby post and ask for advice.

Q: What were your responsibilities in Lyon?

RASPOLIC: Basically, I was sent to be the vice consul in charge of consular operations, and to oversee the administrative side of the office. I ended up doing that, plus doing some USIS work and also working with the commercial section. Admin, USIS and Commercial were all parts of the office that were run by French staff members. The American CG did his own thing and wrapped himself in the flag and showed up on various official occasions, and sometimes took an active role in commercial affairs, but mostly left the rest of it to me. It worked out well for me, because I was very interested in doing as much as I could, learning as much as I could.

Q: Was there much consular business there?

RASPOLIC: There was, but it was rather limited in scope. We did not handle immigrant visas at all; those were handled only by the Embassy in Paris. We had the second largest NIV issuance in the country, outside of Paris. We had an enormous number of businessmen in eastern France, who had a lot of business with the United States. We also had a lot of ACS [American Citizen Services] work, because the Alps were in our district, the ski resorts were in our district. We had a lot of cardiacs, a lot of deaths, a lot of tragedy, frankly, that had to do with the ski season. So that kept us rather busy.

Q: Can you give me an idea of how a ski case might work?

RASPOLIC: I remember one case very clearly, a death case where a charter group came over from Philadelphia. I believe it was the telephone company charter. They arrived in Grenoble and immediately went to the slopes. It was a nice, bright, sunny day, and it was misleading, obviously, because some of these people went skiing inadequately prepared for the weather. One fellow, in particular, was wearing jeans and a tee shirt and went skiing, because the sun was shining and he felt apparently that he could get by with this kind of clothing. Halfway up the mountains, the weather changed dramatically, he got lost in a sudden snowstorm, he completely lost his sense of direction, and he was found the next day frozen to death.

The French were simply appalled. Aside from the tragedy of the whole thing, they simply couldn't believe that anyone would be so lacking in judgment or so ill prepared to enjoy a sport. The man had appropriate ski clothing in his luggage, as it turned out. It was totally unnecessary for him to have died that way.

So my first indication of all of this was a call from the Grenoble police, telling me that they had a missing American, presumed dead. That was the night before. Then I went over to Grenoble the next morning. There was no point in going at night for a search and rescue operation on a mountainside. So I went over at 7:00 the next morning, about a two-hour drive from Lyon, and they found the body maybe three hours later, brought it down the mountain, and I had to do the usual notification of next of kin and make arrangements for the shipment of the body home.

Q: In notification of next of kin, how did it work at that time? Did you talk to them directly?

RASPOLIC: No. I'm trying to think. We've had so many changes in the procedure. It must have been a telegram at the time, then a follow-up offering the family the option of getting in touch with us by phone, which most people did, considering we were in western Europe and it was quite an easy operation. I don't recall initiating a phone call, no, so they must have called me.

Q: Was the non-immigrant side of visas a problem? These were businessmen, also French. The French seemed to return more than almost any other group.

RASPOLIC: They do. They don't use their maximum immigrant visa numbers at all. They never have, as far as I'm aware, at least not since I've been in the Foreign Service. There were some problems, not all that many. Certainly the problems were nothing compared to problems that I faced in other countries later on in my career.

France is the only country I've ever served in where we had mail-in visa applications. That really was just a mechanical problem for us, because we had one full-time French visa assistant, who was wonderful. She had been with the consulate since the late forties, and she knew more about visas than probably I'll ever know. We worked together very, very closely on processing mail-in applications. We also had a couple of summer hires during the peak season that would come in and help. So business visas were quite routine. Most student visas were quite routine. Once in a while we had some questions. They had to be interviewed in person, anyway.

Our biggest problem, I suppose, with visas were two categories of cases. One was third-country nationals, non-French citizens, who would either be passing through or would be in France for some unspecified reason and suddenly decide that it was imperative that they go to the United States. The other problem was just the usual French au pair who claimed to be going for six weeks to visit Disneyland, but actually more often than not, had a contract from an American family offering them an au pair job. At that time, it was illegal to have an au pair.

Q: How would you sort these out?

RASPOLIC: Through personal interview. You'd listen to what they were saying, and also weigh that against, in your mind, what they weren't saying, and see whether you could come up with a reasonable solution.

Q: Were these difficult? After you had refused, would you then get all sorts of pressure to issue a visa?

RASPOLIC: Not very often, frankly. Not in France. I did have one very funny case. A girl who I had refused, I had suspected she was a possible au pair, and I had refused her. Then she'd come back in and applied again. We had a very interesting conversation, and I thought perhaps I'd really misjudged her. I went ahead and issued the tourist visa.

Lo and behold, about four or five days later, she walks back into my office with her mother, and her mother was absolutely livid. I said, "What on earth is wrong? Why don't you come into my office and we'll sit down and discuss this." So we sat down. It turned out that the girl had gone off to the United States with a B-2, arrived in JFK, and had her luggage searched, because INS at JFK did not believe her. Lo and behold, she had an au pair contract in her suitcase. So they put her on the next plane back.

Her mother was furious with the American government because the mother had wasted the money on the plane ticket, and she wanted to know what we were going to do about it and what the family needed to do to get the girl back into the United States. I just threw up my hands at that point and said, "Listen, the girl has already lied to me. Now you're asking me to counsel you on how to break our laws again? Get out of here!" (Laughs) It was just outrageous, absolutely outrageous. But it was also very French.

Q: Did you serve in consular work the whole time you were in France?

RASPOLIC: Yes.

Q: How were your relations there with Paris, as far as from a consular support point of view?

RASPOLIC: All of the consulates were under the jurisdiction of the consul general in Paris. It didn't matter what the subsidiary function was of the consulate. Both my boss and I reported to the consul general in Paris. He would come through on sweeping inspections maybe once or twice a year, and that was sort of it, and we would never hear from him again.

On the other hand, when I had tricky visa cases and I really wanted to check on procedures, or even an ACS case that I really wasn't sure of, because I hadn't handled a case like that in the past, I could very easily call Paris and ask for guidance. I must say the person who handled the waivers in the visa section, Peter Murphy, who later was DCM in the Vatican for several years, was extremely helpful, very, very helpful. And Ruth McClendon at that time was head of the American Citizen Services section in Paris, and she also was very wise in telling me when to follow the FAM exactly, and when I could forget about the FAM. (Laughs)

I remember one case in particular, I had an American drifter who was panhandling. The French were trying to get him out, and I was trying to get him out. I was trying to have a repatriation loan authorized by the Department. At that time, the FAM said, "Send the memorandum in and we'll let you know as soon as the decision is made." So I called Ruth and said, "Ruth, I sent this thing in by memorandum. It's going to take ten days for them to get it. In the meantime, this guy is here running up a hotel bill. It's just a holy mess. Can't we do this any faster?"

She said, "Oh, my God, send it in by telegram. Forget the FAM!" (Laughs) I had not had a repatriation case, so that's why I simply didn't know that the Department was that flexible.

Q: There are certain things which are built-in delays which are almost on purpose.

RASPOLIC: Probably so. I'm sure there are other cases, certainly renunciation of citizenship. My God, there's simply no point in hurrying that along. If you give the person enough time, perhaps whatever decision they come up with is a considered decision. That's fine. I can see the value in that. Repatriation, usually by the time the case has walked into your office, the situation is rather desperate. Time really sometimes is of the essence. This fellow, not only was he a drifter, but he had three kids with him. His wife had walked out on him -- with cause, I think. (Laughs) But what we had, basically, this man was 35 years old and was perfectly capable of caring for himself, but he was ignoring the health and well being of his three little kids, who were all under the age of seven or eight.

Q: Of course, he was running up a bill, which did not work to the benefit of the American government.

RASPOLIC: Not at all. Besides, the case was becoming more and more of a thorn in the side of the French authorities, too, so it behooved us all, I think, every player, to get this family out as soon as we would and could.

Q: Did you get him out?

RASPOLIC: Well, sorry you asked that. What happened was I did get the authorization for the repatriation loan, I did set up the return reservations, I did offer the guy and his family a ride to the airport, and he said, no, no, no, he thought he could get them out there himself. He was very, very thankful, this and that. The next thing I knew, he did not catch the plane. The reason I knew that was I had a call from Ruth McClendon in Paris, who said that the man had been picked up for panhandling in the lobby of the Hilton Hotel in Paris 24 hours later. So I succeeded in getting him out of my consular district. (Laughs) Paris ultimately had to plop him onto a plane and get him back to the States. In fact, I think what Paris ended up doing was getting authorization from him to send the children back to the United States, and if he wanted to mess around in France, that was up to him. But it simply reached the point where it was much more a concern for the welfare of the children. It was a memorable case, I must say.

JOHN H. WILLETT
Consul
Bordeaux (1974)

Political Officer
Paris (1975-1977)

John H. Willett was born in Massachusetts in 1941 and received his BA from Kenyon College in 1941. His career has included assignments in Gaborone, Tunis, Bordeaux, Paris, Rome, Strasbourg and Rabat. Richard Jackson interviewed Mr. Willett on December 21, 1998.

Q: So you're working your way north. You started in Botswana. You got to Tunis. You're on your way by Ferry to Bordeaux, and a short time it looks like there, a year or so, and then on to Paris. So let's talk about Bordeaux first.

WILLETT: Well, that was planned, Dick. They had a system then whereby incoming young officers -- I was no longer a junior officer because I'd been promoted -- but young officers were encouraged to do something else first in France, a year in ENA or a consulate, before entering the Political Section in Paris for another 18 months or so. Something like that.

Q: That makes great sense.

WILLETT: It does make sense, because Paris is not France, despite the fact that Greater Paris has nearly 20 per cent of the French population. In Bordeaux I learned a lot about the way French politics works in the grassroots.

When I arrived in Bordeaux, William Dixon Boggs was Consul General and I was to serve as Consul. This was in January 1974, and it seemed to me that the eyes of all France were riveted on Bordeaux. Just sheer coincidence, but the reasons were threefold. In the first place, Chaban-Delmas was running for President of France against Giscard d'Estaing, so the papers were filled with news of Bordeaux, not only the local papers, but also the national papers.

Secondly, for the first time in recent memory, there was a scandal involving Bordeaux wines. Now we can laugh at this and call it "very French" or whatever, but it was no laughing matter in Bordeaux. One of the great Bordeaux vintner and trading families, a member of the Cruse family and of that closed society they call the Quai des Chartrons -- going back to the 18th century, when Bordeaux was part of the "triangular trade" with the United States, the Caribbean and Africa -- was found doctoring the wine. Tanker trucks of cheap wine from outside the Bordeaux appellation were trucked in at night and unloaded into vats. They were chaptalizing, they call it -

- I don't know the English for it -- adding illegal sugars to the wine vats to raise the alcohol content. Things got so bad that the patriarch of the Cruse family committed suicide by jumping off a bridge into the Garonne. The scandal cost Bordeaux millions of dollars in good name, and exports to the United States plummeted. Americans stopped buying Bordeaux.

The third issue, a national one, involved the implantation of a nuclear power plant on the Garonne River. There were huge manifestations against this project. It was believed the plant would pollute the river, that it could even have an effect on ground water going into the vineyards; there were jokes about luminescent grapes the size of a grapefruit, etc. So for that one year, there I was in the second oldest consulate in U.S. diplomatic history...

Q: The oldest being Tangier.

WILLETT: Exactly, but Tangier was closed, so this was the oldest active consulate we had -- and in a minute we can talk about what's happened in Bordeaux -- but at any rate, I had my hands full.

In addition there was a mess in the consular section. The Consul General's secretary was a clearly deranged woman who'd been working there for years. No one had dared fire her.

Q: American.

WILLETT: No, she was French, but she had, I think, an LOU clearance, as locals sometimes do.

Q: Sure.

WILLETT: There was an ages-old backlog of cases, unresolved consular cases, safe drawers filled with them, and the Consul General had said to me when I arrived, "If you could do something about this situation, it would be a feather in your cap. As long as people can remember, nobody's ever surmounted this problem." You can see I'm heading towards braggadocio. I did get them all cleaned up, just taking file after file and determining what do we had to do with it. I drove the staff there -- there were 11 locals in the consulate -- I drove them crazy.

Q: And how many Americans?

WILLETT: Just me and the Consul General, that was it.

Q: So the workload was for both of you largely consular, or you were entirely consular and he was economic and political.

WILLETT: No. I did political reporting and economic reporting as well. Hell, with a two man post like that, everybody does everything -- sort of like Botswana, except that, unlike Botswana, Dixon Boggs -- may he rest in peace -- did write reports. He worked.

Q: He was a working Consul General.

WILLETT: He was a working Consul General, yes. His feet weren't just up on his desk. But he went away once, on home leave, and there I was alone for six weeks. He allotted his secretary to me; she used to drift in at 10 o'clock in the morning and drift out at 4 in the afternoon. One day I closed the door and took her to task, as a result of which she fainted. I wrote a report. I contacted Boggs on home leave and said, "Look, this can't go on. I have invited your secretary not to return to the consulate until you're back." Eventually she was fired. Overnight, the atmosphere in the consulate changed. You could sense a window had opened, letting in the spring.

Q: He wasn't the strongest manager not to have taken that step before.

WILLETT: I think he should have, though she performed, I guess, competently enough for him. But she had so poisoned her relations with everyone else that she'd become a detriment to the ability of the consulate to carry out its work. I think, in fact, that part of that backlog was due, indirectly, to her presence. Anyway, we got her out of there; a delightful woman replaced her.

The ten months passed. I lived pretty much on my own. There was a surprising amount of work, however. When I say to people that I had a year in Bordeaux, they kind snicker, but there was a lot of work, a lot of late nights. It wasn't as if you had crisis situations, but with the mayor of Bordeaux running for the presidency of France, there was a lot of reporting to do. I went out, just like a political officer□□ which I'd never really been, invited people to lunch and exchanged views with them on the political situation in Bordeaux. I remember going to see the conseiller général, a kind of -- what would you call him? -- regional official. I remember seeing the préfet a couple of times in the Consul General's absence. It was the first time I really felt a sense of responsibility, that I had been given real responsibilities, and was important to me that I acquit myself well in the job.

By the time summer came around and Giscard won the election, I was packing my bags to move on to Paris. Bordeaux had sunk back into the kind of invisibility it had before I arrived. It seemed as if there was one little magic period of ten months when every eye had been riveted on Bordeaux, then it ended. The wine scandal ended, unhappily, but it ended. As regards the nuclear power plant, the French said, Dammit, you can protest all you want, but we're going to build it. So the year ended. My personal life there was very quiet and pleasant; I did a lot of horseback riding and swimming at the nearby beaches. I could drive out to the Atlantic coast, and it was sort of like Long Island, with endless expanses of broad, mostly empty beach good for running my dog. I led a quiet but rich life those ten months in Bordeaux. There again, I recall my stay there with great fondness.

Q: They say that for the past few decades power in Europe and France has been devolving to the subregional level, and it's trendy these days to talk about bananas that stretch up from Barcelona and pick up Bordeaux and go to Milan as being the power centers industrially of Europe, and central governments have less and less power. From the perspective of what you said on Bordeaux, how about that?

WILLETT: I don't believe France has decentralized very much. I didn't see much evidence of it then, nor do I now. A préfet is still a préfet, and he's got a lot of power. In France, of course, you can have more than one mandate. You can be mayor. You can be a member of the National Assembly. I think you're allowed to hold three different posts at once. Right now, Alain Juppé is mayor of Bordeaux, having taken over the job after Chaban's 30 year stint, both of them having been Prime Minister of France at one point.

Q: Well, from the perspective of your stay there, if you in later years had been responsible for the Department management, would you have closed that post?

WILLETT: Yes.

Q: That is to say, there were no real U.S. interests that you could perceive?

WILLETT: No. In part we were driven, very understandably, by nostalgia. I mean, it was a historic post. At one point, when we first talked about closing it, Chaban-Delmas dealt directly with U.S. senators whom he knew. He'd call them up on the phone and say, "Look, don't close this post." Of course, we not only closed Bordeaux, but Nice and Lyon to boot. Of those three, I think the most logical closing was Bordeaux. A number of American retirees lived there, and the Ford Motor Company had a plant outside town making automatic-shift gearboxes that were transported all over Europe; but our interests there were, and remain, limited.

Q: You don't feel, on the one hand, as you close all the consulates and you give quickie two week courses in leadership, that the Foreign Service officers rise up to DCM and ambassador with not the slightest managerial training, so one, it's training, and two, it is as you found before going to Paris, quite a different perspective than inside the beltway in whatever the capital city is.

WILLETT: Yes. It really is.

Q: In those respects it has some value.

WILLETT: Yes. Oh, I'm not saying we should close all our consulates. It's just that if we're driven by budget concerns, if we're constrained to take a hard look at which consulates to keep open and which to close, and if inevitably we're going to close some, then Bordeaux rightly figured on that list. I'm sorry to say this. I know it's traitorous to my friends in Bordeaux, a couple of whom I've kept up with, but there's no way around it. The State Department did right to close the post.

Q: So you were happy then to get to the big city, Paris, which you reached in December of '74.

WILLETT: Right.

Q: And then you went into the political reporting side.

WILLETT: I went into the Political Section as a reporter on the majority conservative parties. The Political Section in Paris was huge. It's smaller now.

Q: A dozen people then.

WILLETT: More.

Q: That's counting everybody.

WILLETT: Oh, if you counted the secretaries, I think there were 21 people in the Political Section.

Q: Goodness.

WILLETT: There was the political counselor, the deputy political counselor, the Middle East officer, the Latin America officer, the Asia officer. There was the internal unit, which in and of itself had four officers who did nothing but report on internal affairs. There was the social affairs office, run by John Condon, who later became Ambassador to Fiji. There was the political-military office, with two officers and a secretary. By the time you added all of those up, biographic officers and people like that, you had a solid 21 or 22 people. There are far fewer now; that I know. But somehow or other -- what is it, the Peter Principle? -- "Work expands to fill the occupation of the number of people available to do it." Well, POL Paris was the living proof of this. We kept busy, reporting all the time on everything, too much reporting, much too much.

Q: Giscard had just been elected for another term. The conservatives were fairly entrenched. There was not a lot of uncertainty. Was there a concerned readership in Washington for your product? Were they saying, "Give us more, report on this, report on that"?

WILLETT: I don't think they were saying so much "Give us more" as "Tell us what this all means." You know, it's easy to crank out telegrams every day on every burp and fart the political parties engage in. What's harder is to take the tendencies, the trends in the parties themselves, take the intraparty and interparty rivalries and try to make sense out of them, to extrapolate a prognosis for the future of the country. For example, do these fights on the right mean the conservatives will become so weakened that the left will win the next election? I remember well -- this was the time Giscard was caught with the Bokassa diamonds.

Q: I guess that's true, the Central African caper.

WILLETT: Right, the Central African caper. I'd become a close friend with the editor-in-chief of the Canard enchaîné, the paper that broke the story. So I had a tremendous source to all the ins and outs and skullduggery of that scandal. But France is unlike the United States, where such a scandal might, I think, have occasioned another forced resignation in the White House□□□□□mean, here's the head of state taking graft.

Q: So he really did have it. It was an open and shut case.

WILLETT: Yes, but the French didn't care.

Q: They didn't care. But how could he have been so stupid?

WILLETT: Well, perhaps he just took it as a prerogative of office or something. He also had a crash in his private car, in which the French actress Mireille Darc was riding; he rammed a milk truck, and there was milk and broken glass all over Avenue Gabriel, right where the Embassy is, for heaven's sake. Giscard's people came along and had that cleaned up before you could say "Jack Robinson." Then, of course, there was the Mitterrand affaire, the phony assassination attempt up by the Observatoire. Mitterrand for years had let it be known that not only was he a valiant resistance fighter, but such an extraordinary man and such a threat to the right that they -- whoever "they" are -- tried to kill him. As the story goes, he was in a car, he jumped out, somebody fired a machine gun at him, or something like that. Nobody believed it for a second. They think he engineered this whole thing so he could appear a hero. The French are more philosophical about this kind of cynical manipulation than we are in America. Although people snickered and it made the Canard enchaîné, it didn't, as you can see, have any long-term deleterious effect on Mitterrand's career, because he was President of this country for 14 years.

Q: So you were essentially a journalist in a big environment, a political reporter ferreting out the latest scandal within the conservative ranks and getting the inside story, trying to get it to Washington before the press.

WILLETT: Well I made friends way back in the lower ranks of the conservative parties. Alain Juppé was a regular contact. In fact, when I returned to Paris on assignment in 1987 and found Juppé clearly destined for the highest ranks of elected political officialdom, I could still see him. There were a couple of ministers I could still see. In the Foreign Service you have to be careful about this. If you're a little twerp in the Political Section and you're frequenting people who should rightly be seen by the counselor or the Ambassador, then you have to be careful. You make a mistake -- I won't even qualify it -- by thinking, Oh, I'm going to rush out and see Alain Juppé and do a reporting cable that'll knock their socks off; because when the political counselor or the Ambassador sees that cable, he may not like it at all. He may feel constrained to send it, but he'll be suspicious of you from that point on. He might think you're trying to upstage them or something.

Q: You mean to go forward in the Service, it's go along to get along, keep your head down, that sort of thing?

WILLETT: No. I don't at all mean keep your head down. I mean that in certain situations you should go to the political counselor if you're a younger officer and say, "Look, by dint of my connections formed years ago, I'm a friend of So-and-So. I'd like to have lunch with him. What do you think? Do you want to come along? How should we do this? Should I invite him in to call on the Ambassador first?" You've got to use your noggin, because if you don't things could backfire. People resent a mean and hungry look. I too might feel a little threatened, you know, if I were in the reverse position. So I handled those fortuitous acquaintances of mine carefully.

Q: That's such a big embassy, I guess one of the biggest we have. Who were some of the people at the top of it, the Ambassador and so on, at that time?

WILLETT: Let's see. One of the men, when I first arrived in Paris, was Ambassador Rush.

Q: Kenneth Rush?

WILLETT: Yes, Kenneth Rush. I thought he was a blowhard who didn't understand anything about France

Q: He had been Deputy Secretary.

WILLETT: Yes. He was IBM before that, no? I had no respect for him at all. I'm sorry, but I have to say it. Nor for the DCM in place when I got there. I didn't have much respect for him either. The whole Embassy called him "The White Mouse." But the political counselor Hank Cohen was a brilliant analyst and drafter, and a great boss. I recall him as one of the three or four superlative bosses of my career. I still see Hank when he comes through Paris.

Q: But they sound like fairly remote figures. That is to say, the people we were talking about in Tunis, they jumped right out. These were people whom, as a reporter in the Political Section, you didn't see every day. The Ambassador wasn't pulling you out to work with his visitors or that kind of thing all the time.

WILLETT: Well, we were active in the Internal Political Unit in proposing lunches. We would say, "You should host a lunch at the residence for the head of such-and-such a party and his four key deputies. We'll be good reporting officers, listen carefully and write you a crackerjack cable on that lunch." The Ambassador would be receptive to that.

Q: John Irvin, were you there under his tenure?

WILLETT: Briefly. John Irvin was approachable, decent□

Q: Serious sort.

WILLETT: Yes, Ambassador Irvin was a pleasant person to work for, kind and professional, but not distant. We could approach him. We could write him a short action memo to suggest an activity, and he would do everything he could to fit it in his schedule. We were invited to most of the receptions he held at the Residence, to lunches and dinners when it was appropriate. And of course there were the visits, by the Secretary or the President or a CODEL or political figures. Then the whole Embassy would be mobilized. It didn't matter whether you were third secretary or DCM, you were up to your neck in work and hands on tasking in preparation for, and during the execution of, whatever visit was taking place.

Q: This is a fairly frequent occurrence in Paris: Presidents and Secretaries, they're in and out. We're talking the Jimmy Carter years.

WILLETT: Yes.

Q: We're talking before the Iran hostage year.

WILLETT: That's right. It was before the Iran hostage year.

Q: The Secretary would be Cy Vance, no?

WILLETT: Right. Cy Vance. He came through on a couple of occasions. That was the time, too, Dick, when one of the big problems between France and the United States was resolved, a residual debt from the time France kicked U.S. NATO forces out of France and they moved to Belgium. We were claiming $125 million, if I remember correctly, and the French gave us $25 million, what, 20 cents on the dollar? That accord was finally signed in a major ceremony at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, what they call the Quai d'Orsay, and I was present for that. Quite moving. We were a little bitter because we felt we were getting rooked, but I suppose we believed it was the best deal we could get. The whole gamut of Franco-American relations is a highly complex one, charged with emotion on both sides, charged with resentment. It goes on today. We can see it in virtually every major foreign policy issue. The French will want to distance themselves from the United States, to show their singularity. They have an expression for it, "l'exception française." Even when France agrees with the United States, this exception française sometimes emerges. De Gaulle's decision to have NATO moved out of France is an example.

Q: In the scheme of things, those particular years, Giscard, Jimmy Carter or Cy Vance, wasn't Alain Juppé the foreign minister?

WILLETT: No. He was still a young whippersnapper.

Q: Was the chemistry particularly good, bad? It wasn't the period of the more strident misunderstandings between the two countries in those years, was it?

WILLETT: Well, let's see. Vietnam was over, the secret talks having been conducted here in Paris. I came just after that. Of course, the French had no lessons to give us on Vietnam. There were foreign ministers in place who were as close to being outright anti-American as one could meet in this country. Take, for example, a man who served as foreign minister of France for barely a year, Michel Jobert (with an American wife, by the way). Jobert would be damned if he'd say yes to any American. He and Kissinger mixed it up, and in Jobert's memoirs he writes about showing up Henry 'the K' letting him know he couldn't push France around, etc. Much later I had a public dispute with Jobert, after he'd left the Foreign Ministry. He was giving occasional public talks, and still had a coterie of people who'd show up. He could draw a couple of hundred people into a room when he gave a talk, and I'd decided to attend one of them. This was during my second incarnation in Paris. I'll come to this later on. We had a most uncomfortable public exchange, in which I stood at a serious disadvantage because I was a first secretary on active duty and he was a retired foreign minister of the host country in which I was serving. He could treat me to tous les noms de la terre and I had more or less to take it on the chin; otherwise, I'd have been PNG'd.

Q: He, if I remember, was a Frenchman from Meknes in Morocco, who frequently wrote very favorable articles about Morocco and the King and maybe was on some sort of a retainer from the Moroccans.

WILLETT: While I was in Morocco on my last assignment, he would periodically blow in and out of the country. I believe he's a member of the Moroccan Academy.

Q: Yes, he is, along with Henry Kissinger, whom you mentioned.

WILLETT: Along with Vernon Walters, and the former head of the French espionage service, Maranches, who died last year.

Q: You certainly came to Paris from two small, relatively, posts -- Tunis and Botswana. How was the atmosphere, the morale, in this giant embassy? I get from what you're saying a feeling of some distance. The names don't jump out. Everybody was doing their own thing in their own subsection. Did you get a picture that there was some kind of a conductor bringing that orchestra together, something like 48, 49 different agencies of government housed in the embassy? Was it a real symphony or not?

WILLETT: From my perspective as a second secretary in the Political Section, I was ill placed to evaluate the overall management of the Embassy. If I'd been the DCM, or even the political counselor, I could answer that question better. But I did sense there was overall coordination. Mind you, my job, and those of my colleagues in the Internal Political Unit, was to be out meeting Frenchmen, and I did it with enthusiasm. My French was good. At the time I had a French girlfriend who later became my wife, Chantal, and I almost never saw Americans. I spent my life with the French, either on a professional or friendly basis. I was in the Embassy but in curious way not of it. I didn't like going to intraembassy dinner parties on Saturday night, seeing the same people I'd worked with all week. I didn't like taking Embassy-organized trips. I would come into the Embassy and do my job, but even then I was out a lot.

If you're not lunching with contacts two or three times a week, you're not doing your job. We were encouraged to produce at least a couple memcons a week. (Those were the days when people wrote memcons.) One of mine contributed to my getting a meritorious Honor Award. I went and saw René Andrieu, editor-in-chief of L'Humanité, the French Communist daily. I had to get permission to do so, because we had no official contact with the Communist Party. I managed to do a couple of reporting cables on that. As I later learned, Andrieu also had to get permission, from his Central Committee, to see somebody in the American Embassy. It was a lesson to me that you had to be careful how you handle these things. Do it by the book. Talk to people. Tell them what you're planning. I'd gone to a lecture he was giving, then I went up to him afterwards, handed him my card and said, "If I were to call you, do you think we could have lunch?" "Well," he replied, "I'd have to think about it." So I cleared it all through the Embassy, and once I had the Embassy's accord, I could get in touch with him.

I had a lot of journalist contacts, French journalist contacts. Paris is filled with discussion groups. I joined a few of them and even gave an occasional talk.

Q: In French, of course.

WILLETT: Yes. You remember I met Chantal because we were both members of the youth wing of L'Alliance atlantique, the Atlantic Alliance. The Embassy sent me down - this was Watergate time...

Q: Ah yes, of course.

WILLETT: □□□they sent me to give a talk to this youth group about what Watergate meant, to a rather incredulous audience of young, sophisticated French people. I told them Richard Nixon had been forced to resign because if he hadn't he probably would have been impeached. He had violated U.S. law. It wasn't just a question of whether you liked him or not. And it was at this talk, on an island off Toulon -- you can see how "rough" some of these assignments were -- that I met Chantal. So I can say my marriage is a direct consequence of Watergate!

Q: But in trying to explain Watergate, you met relative incomprehension from the French.

WILLETT: Yes, total incomprehension.

Q: And was that incomprehension any more or less unique than today in discussing the question of President Clinton?

WILLETT: Same thing.

Q: Same incomprehension.

WILLETT: Yes.

Q: No more, no less.

WILLETT: No, same. To them, the Americans are still "big kids." Les américains sont des grands enfants. It's a cliché. I used to be offended by it. Now I have all sorts of replies. I've become a little more cynical, like the French, but I turn it back on them now. What they couldn't understand is how something they considered a peccadillo -- eavesdropping on your political opponent -- could get blown up into something that caused a President's downfall. They just didn't get it. And they don't understand today why the fact that a President is doing things with a young woman and then acting discreetly to, as they see it, protect her honor should bring such a merdier down on his head. I suspect they may believe U.S. politics are somehow cleaner than theirs. Many French fail to grasp how nasty it can get Stateside. I see little evolution on this between 1974 and now.

Q: Well, John, before we leave your first tour in Paris, anything we've missed, any particular things that stand out, accomplishments you're particularly proud of from that period, any particular things you would have done differently that somebody who hears this coming into the Service might benefit from?

WILLETT: I would say two things. One is that hard work, imagination and energy are rewarded. The other is that it's as important to be diplomatic with your colleagues as with your host country officials. Maybe more important, because you're going to be with your colleagues for the long haul, whereas with host country people, you've got your assignment there, but you may never be back. You have a little run-in, well, okay. This does not mean you should roll over and play dead, because, for me, that's the unfortunate tendency of many people in the diplomatic service. It always backfires.

I remember a political counselor once coming into my office on my first assignment in Embassy Paris. I'd arrived early in the morning, as I often did. I had a ton of work, and the only person there besides me was the POLCOUNS (political counselor) secretary; I asked her if she could type a short action memo for me quickly, something that had to be on the Ambassador's desk at opening of business. She said, "Sure, be happy to." She was a good-natured lady, and the political counselor wasn't in yet. Later I was conducting a meeting of the Internal Political Unit□□□I think the guy who normally headed it was away, so there were only three of us. We were talking about the day's work when the door burst open and the political counselor stormed in. He tears into me for daring to have used his secretary without his accord. I just blew up right back at him; I said he had hell of a nerve humiliating me in front of my colleagues, that I wouldn't stand for it, that I was trying to do my job, and if this was the reward one gets for coming in early, the hell with him. He walked out, but later came back and apologized.

Q: Good for you.

WILLETT: I said to myself right then and there, That's it, that is the clearest lesson. And I think foreign entities, foreign governments sometimes have to be treated the same way. This doesn't work all the time, because when you're wrong, you're wrong. If you make a mistake and somebody comes in and chews you out, okay. But never humiliate someone out in front of other people. To me that's an automatic dictum. You can say, "May I see you afterwards?" Maybe everybody's going to realize that the person you've asked to see is in for it. Nonetheless, never do it in front of that person's colleagues. It's too damaging.

The behavior of CODELs, in Paris and elsewhere, also made a lasting impression on me, because frankly I was appalled by what I saw. One very powerful senator came here and the only thing that man wanted to do was go to nightclubs. He took eight or nine people, including me, to the Tour d'Argent and spent I don't know how many 1975 taxpayers' dollars on a dinner there. I found this disgusting, and I saw it time and time again. It seemed to me there should be some better oversight of the way elected officials spend money when they're abroad. Nobody dares do anything, and I didn't either. I deserve no credit for standing up to a senator and saying "Aren't you ashamed!" But I found it ultimately saddening to think there was such abuse of the people's trust, to use an appropriate cliché.

Q: They all come through Paris.

WILLETT: They all come through Paris. There were something in the neighborhood of 20/30 CODELs a year in town, and even if they had no business here, they'd orchestrate the trip so as to arrive on a Friday with one meeting, make sure there was a holiday on Monday and have their second and last meeting on Tuesday afternoon. So they could be here from Thursday evening to Wednesday morning and have two meetings. Of course the Ambassador, doing his job, would always feel constrained to have dinners for them and shepherd them around, and they would devour the time of two or three officers. Anyway, just thought I'd get that off my chest.

One of the most distasteful aspects of our Foreign Service careers is taking care of these visiting firemen, though every now and then, very rarely, there'd be a crackerjack CODEL. One of these involved arms control. Claiborne Pell and the then head of the Senate Armed Services Committee, a Rhodes Scholar, the names don't come to me. There were five of them in all, and they were good. I was proud to be with them. A couple of them spoke good French. On the other hand, one of our most respected senators came through and was inebriated half the time he spent here. He bullied the marines and blustered his way around with the French. It was embarrassing to be seen with him.

Q: But, John, I'm thinking more about the diplomacy with colleagues. I've never been myself in a political section and I can't imagine it of a total of 20. I can't imagine ambitious young middle grade officers trying to get ahead. There must have been some sharp elbows and competing for scraps. How did that work out, and when you were the acting head of the internal section, how did you keep the boys apart and preserve the, kind of, good working relations?

WILLETT: There it was pretty easy because the jobs were defined in a way that made it difficult to transgress. Admittedly, I said previously I was doing the majority conservative parties, then all of a sudden I'm dealing with the editor-in-chief of Humanité? Why is it me that brings him into the Embassy? That was a target of opportunity; I'd attended his talk simply to hear the man, and wasn't intending to identify myself. I made that decision on the spur of the moment. Having gone that far, though, I carefully shepherded the deal through the Embassy, as I mentioned, including, first and foremost, the young man responsible for the opposition parties. He did resent it a bit, as I might have in his place. But the categories of work were clearly defined. If you're doing Asia, you probably won't get involved in domestic politics. If you're doing the Middle East, you probably won't get involved in Latin America. Spillover did occur, Dick -- and your question is well placed in that respect -- on the political-military side of things. The very definition of the job, political-military, means that it's both military and political. We were stepping on one another's toes all the time. And not only was political-military stepping on political's toes, or vice versa, but on the military's toes as well. John Kelly was political-military officer in Paris when I was there, and before him there was a very strange man who later murdered his wife and committed suicide.

Q: In Paris.

WILLETT: No, back in the States. It was a famous case. We don't have many FSO's who do that.

Q: I remember that, I remember.

WILLETT: In fact, this event occurred not too distant from the time when the former French ambassador to the Vatican killed his wife and four children and then committed suicide. Marital problems and alcoholism run high in diplomacy. Too much easy alcohol lying around.

Q: How were relations as a reporting officer between the reporting officers and the Station?

WILLETT: Tense at times, but I, for one, always remained convinced, and did so through the time I was acting DCM and briefly chargé d'affaires in Morocco, that the only people who stand to gain when tensions arise between pol and the station are the people who don't have U.S. interests at heart. I would go out of my way to work with the Station, when appropriate, even on a couple of rare occasions sharing contacts with them. I wouldn't let them take my contacts unless they needed to get at someone else through one of mine. Then I'd ask: "Is this what you're planning to do; let's see if this is workable," or whatever.

Q: You mentioned the DCM. That wasn't Chris Chapman and the celebrated incident he thought was an attempt on his life?

WILLETT: No. I arrived after that.

Q: Okay. So you weren't particularly constrained at that time by terrorist threats, menaces and so on, security.

WILLETT: I never felt it. I lived on Ile Saint Louis. I didn't have car, but I did have a dog, which I took to the Embassy. I walked him the two miles from Ile Saint Louis to the Embassy every day, and no matter what time I got out of work, I walked home at night. This kept me in good shape. The ambassadors were understanding about the dog, which slept on a chair in my office. The political counselor was less thrilled, but I pointed out to him that Giscard kept his two retrievers in his office. "Yes, but he's the president of France," he answered, "and you're a second secretary," which was a pretty good response. Anyway, it all worked out.

Q: John, before we leave France, the whole aspect of the impact of U.S. culture and embassies as a platform for cultural projection and understanding -- have you any thoughts on that?

WILLETT: I've always believed that the cultural section of a post is as important as any other section. Every time one steps out of the embassy, one is, in effect, acting as a cultural ambassador for one's country. I enjoyed going to the cultural events. I readily agreed to speak a few times. I traveled to universities in France and spoke on American topics. I did have a slight advantage over some of my colleagues, because I'd majored in French literature at Kenyon and was therefore able to talk to the French perhaps a bit more on their own terms. But this said, the Political Section in Paris, where I worked, had a number of excellent French speakers. It is incorrect to say that Americans are monoglots; they're not. There were proficient French speakers working in the section with me. One of them was Chuck Redman, who followed the left. We stayed friends until he left the Foreign Service after completing a tour as ambassador to the FRG. In fact, my family and I went up to visit him and his wife Eileen when he was ambassador to Sweden. We stayed there ten days, hiking with him and his family. But back to your question; staying involved in the culture of the country one's serving in, speaking the language of the country, incrementally increases one's ability to do his or her job well.

Q: But in a country as culturally aware as France, whether it's James Baldwin or Michael Jackson or Ernest Hemingway or Gertrude Stein, the U.S. influence is flowing in all around an embassy. Can an embassy really play a role in that? It seems to me the influence is so much more pervasive than anything the embassy can purvey.

WILLETT: You're absolutely right. The influence of American popular culture is all embracing and has, in fact, reached a point in this country where the authorities are now limiting the number of American films on TV. The GOF has also imposed tariffs on the importation of American movies, which doesn't stop people from paying $10 a ticket to go see, you know, totally idiotic things like Lost in Space.

Still, there's another side to American culture, less popular, which the Cultural Section has a role in bringing into France, Spain, Germany, Italy -- whatever. Poets, artists, writers who are not so well known by foreign publics are sponsored by USIS. It's true that William Styron is a well known abroad, so when he came to France there was a ready-made audience for him. But there are others. William Gass, for example, is less well known. I shepherded him about when he came to Strasbourg. I learned a lot; the French learned a lot. It was stimulating to watch him entrance a French audience even though he didn't speak French. I would end this by repeating that it's a mistake for Foreign Service officers to ignore the cultural side of their job, a real mistake. First of all, foreigners are understandably flattered when you evince knowledge of, and appreciation for, their culture. As a result, they're more inclined to learn about the better aspects of your culture. You're right; American popular culture is omnipresent. But there's another side to things in America that deserve knowing, and that's where USIS plays an important role.

Q: Feeling as strongly as you do about cultural outreach, are you reassured or concerned by the recent complete merger of USIA and the State Department?

WILLETT: I would say it's not a bad thing. Why not amalgamate them? Each one can influence the other in beneficial ways. What I certainly hope is that this doesn't make USIS a less powerful presence in embassies; that would be a mistake.

HERMAN J. COHEN
Political Counselor
Paris (1974-1977)

Ambassador Herman J. Cohen was born in New York City. After graduating from The City College of New York, he joined the Foreign Service in 1955. His career has included positions in France, Uganda, Zambia, Zaire, Senegal and Rhodesia. Ambassador Cohen was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on August 15, 1996.

Q: Well you left there in '74, where to?

COHEN: I was appointed political counselor to the U.S. embassy in Paris. This was a result of Kissinger's so-called "GLOP" policy. I think you may have heard of it.

Q: Oh, very much so.

COHEN: He decreed within six months before I was due for a transfer that you couldn't be assigned to an area in which you were a specialist.

Q: This was I understand from a meeting he had with ambassadors from Mexico and Latin American who weren't as interested in his policies as they were trying to tell him about Interamerican problems and he wasn't very interested.

COHEN: The story goes that he came back and said, "Those guys don't even know what NATO is." So anyway I went to personnel and I had just completed 13 straight years in African affairs. I said, "Where in Africa are you going to send me?" They said, "Didn't you hear of the "GLOP" policy; you are forbidden to go to Africa." I said, "Well, what can you offer me" They said, "We were thinking about political counselor in Paris." I said, "I accept!" So, it was a great happy surprise for me.

Q: You were political counselor in Paris from when to when?

COHEN: From June of '74 to September of '77.

Q: What was the political situation in France at this time?

COHEN: President Pompidou had just died. They had an election and Valerie Giscard D'Estaing had replaced him. I was coming in just at the beginning. The election was in May of '74, and I arrived in June. There was a spanking new French administration. Gaullism, in effect, had left the scene, and a new modernizing conservative regime was taking over.

Q: I would have thought this would have been a very congenial type of regime to the U.S. or not.

COHEN: It theoretically should have been, but it turned out not to be. One thing, in France, the legacy of Gaullism was still pretty fresh, was that one does not show that you accept American leadership. It was really politically incorrect in France to say that the Americans were the leader in the NATO alliance. French politicians had to show their independence constantly, and Giscard d'Estaing was no different. So, he was constantly flirting with the Soviets and Eastern European countries while we were treating them as adversaries.

Q: You had worked in our embassy in Kinshasa. Did you find here was sort of the mega embassy with always a somewhat distant difficult country to deal with. We were never completely comfortable with the French or the French with us. What was sort of the operating atmosphere in France?

COHEN: Well, I found that people, political party leaders, intellectuals, and press people, were always very friendly in the sense that they always wanted to be close to us and talk to us and influence us. They never refused dialog with us; they were always available, always approachable. Now, their public rhetoric was frequently anti-American, but they were always accepting lunch invitations, and always doing so recognizing the U.S. was the superpower, and they wanted to remain close to us.

Q: Did you find that working as a political officer, your method of operation was different than in other places you have been?

COHEN: Not particularly. I think diplomatic discourse and getting to know people is all pretty much the same. Having worked in Francophone Africa, I found a lot of similarity intellectually in the approaches of people, but in France one must know the language.

Q: A question I have put to a number of people that have served there, what about dealing with the intellectuals? I don't think there is any other country who can use that term and really mean a rather specific group. Could you talk about this?

COHEN: The French had what we called the “classe politique”. They were a whole bunch of people who spent their whole waking hours dealing with political issues. One thing I found about serving in Paris is that we had a very deep interest in internal politics. Normally we deal with state to state relations. For example, how are you going to vote in the UN; what are you doing about Iran, and a host of international issues. We had a sub section in the political section to deal only with internal politics. It was fascinating how French people were willing to talk to us about their internal politics instead of saying it is none of your business. Every Frenchman is politically intellectual. They are always looking for people to talk to about it, so we got loads of information. This went from the far left to the far right; everybody wanted to talk.

Q: In the long run, what difference did it make in our operating policy?

COHEN: Well, there was a great deal of interest in internal politics there because the socialist party that was in opposition was reforming itself, reinvigorating itself. Francois Mitterand, who had taken it over, was sort of a Johnny come lately socialist anyway. It was coming back and it was starting to get popular. Gaullism was on the decline, and his method was to make an alliance with the communist party, so that the left would be unified in defeating the right. Now this blew Kissinger's mind. These guys were saying, “when we come to power, we will have communist ministers.” Kissinger was saying that was unacceptable”. It is not acceptable for a NATO country to have communist ministers in the government listening to all those secrets. So, we had to watch this very closely; it was very important. It also meant that we had to combat these people who were constantly anti-American, the right who were in power had to constantly show that they were not anti-American but independent. So this worried Kissinger since it threatened his whole European policy. Internal politics had an impact on European policy.

Q: You were there from '74 to '77. Was there one ambassador or several?

COHEN: When I arrived, our ambassador was John Irwin. He left after maybe about six months and was replaced by Kenneth Rush who stayed there until the Carter administration came in. Then he stayed a couple of months and then left. Mainly I served with Rush.

Q: How did Rush operate there? What was your impression of his work?

COHEN: Rush lacked enthusiasm. First, he didn't speak French at all. He was getting a bit tired. He once confided in me that he was in the semi-retirement mode.

Q: He had been an under secretary?

COHEN: Deputy secretary. Before being deputy he had been ambassador to Germany where he did a very good job on the Berlin treaty. He sort of saw that as his crowning moment. In Paris, he was not that energetic; however, on the question of communists in a future French government allied with the socialists, he defended the embassy's analysis that it might not necessarily be against U.S. interests. In fact, it might be pro-U.S. in that it would result in a reduction of communist influence. It was hard to understand why communists in government would lose power rather than gain power, but we had it all analyzed by experts. We had communist affairs officers. Of course sending this analysis to Washington was sort of taking your life in your hands, but he defended us. I give him a lot of credit. He was a conservative American businessman who understood the real world of French politics.

Q: What was the basis for this analysis that it would actually diminish the power of the communists?

COHEN: The power of the communists was to be constantly in opposition and to denounce the bourgeois establishment. By being coopted in a regime dominated by socialists, they would in effect have to defend everything the government was doing. When they stopped attacking government, the people who normally vote for them would just lose interest you see. So the communists would lose their image as a protest party, and it worked out that way later. When they finally did come to share power, that is exactly what happened. Their vote went down from something like 16% to 8% in a couple of years.

Q: Did we have any contact with communist leaders?

COHEN: That was a policy question. It was a great debate. Should we actually legitimize them by treating them like a normal political party as we did every other political party. The answer that came from Washington was that we should keep contact but only at a low level. We had a Foreign Service officer in the political section named John Dobrin who followed the left. He reported on socialists and communists. He was allowed to meet with communist officials, but nobody else saw them. The political counselor was forbidden and of course, the ambassador was absolutely forbidden.

Q: How about with the socialists? Did you see Mitterand in those days or not?

COHEN: The socialists were totally legitimate. The ambassador invited Mitterand to lunch usually once every couple of months. I had the honor of sitting next to Mitterand because I was usually the translator for the ambassador, so I got to know him well.

Q: What was our approach to the French? I mean on major issues, did we kind of know what battles to fight and what not to fight in those days? We knew the French were always trying to look like they were not our tools and it seemed they were always the burr under our saddle every time you turned around. Were we trying to explain this and say let's don't worry about that; let them go ahead. Let's concentrate on this.

COHEN: Basically we tried to ignore the irritations usually from some public statements. We tried to work on issues in a substantive way and make headway. We usually did. For example, you remember when Jeruzelski in Poland had a coup, the army took over to consolidate communist rule and to eliminate democratization tendencies. We saw this as a Soviet move against Walesa and that sort of thing. We denounced it and were calling Jeruzelski all sorts of horrible names. So what does Giscard D'Estaing do; he goes to Poland and makes an official visit. He does just the opposite of what the U.S. is doing. But, we decided to ignore these irritations and work on issues. Usually we had a meeting of the minds on issues.

Q: What was the political section's analysis of Giscard D'Estaing at this time? Where was he coming from particularly as far as American interests were concerned?

COHEN: We found him to be pretty good for U.S. interests. He had his own agenda, but we really didn't find any major problems with him, nor did we find any with Mitterand. Both of them were being very cooperative generally. Both were quite anticommunist and were fully aware of the need for NATO solidarity in moments of crisis.

Q: What about the role of the media in France?

COHEN: The media is very powerful, and we paid a lot of attention to them. We didn't leave it to USIS only and we spent a lot of time with the media political analysts. First of all, they were a great source of information for us. They had a lot of channels that we didn't have. Secondly, we liked to influence them. I had a policy to bring in one of the leading political journalists to the embassy once a month for a little seminar. This was mainly for the political section but we invited everyone else. We found this was very useful.

Q: Did you find that the press could reflect where America stood, not necessarily support it, but reflect our position. I'm talking about different presses although they might have a different attitude or not.

COHEN: Generally they were pretty fair in reporting our point of view. We gave them ample interviews. We brought them in to see the ambassador and the ambassador would serve drinks. We got a pretty fair shake. Of course, it depended. If you are talking about Le Figaro, which was pro-American and conservative, versus L'Humanité, which was communist.

Q: Or Le Monde where was that?

COHEN: Le Monde blew hot and cold depending on the journalist.

Q: Again back to the French intellectuals, How did you sort of work with them? Did you find, from what I've seen although I have never served in France, they always seem to have wonderful constructs of how event come about where I think most Americans there isn't a plot behind everything or there is not a manipulation. Did you find that you were out to cultivate this group?

COHEN: Yes, we did. For example there was always this feeling about the Israelis having too much power in Washington, and we tried to put that into perspective. There were all sorts of special interest groups they were worried about.

Q: How about the officers you were getting? Did you feel you had a pretty strong crew?

COHEN: We had very bright officers. You know you are talking about a mega embassy, there was a mega political section; we had about 15 people including two CIA undercover officers who did regular work. We had one doing international organizations and another doing Asia. They were all very bright, especially the younger ones. They all spoke good French. I did find a very high percentage of prima donnas that I never saw in Africa. I get the feeling this was the Europeanist. "You know, we are Europeanists; we are better than anyone else." Coming in from Africa, I sort of had an inferiority complex.

Q: You were sort of the country cousin of the European bureau?

COHEN: That's right. I remember a secretary who worked for me in Africa. A secretary whom I considered to be very smart and competent, and she was working there, and I said, "Brenda, what do you think of these guys who call themselves Europeanists?" She said, "They certainly think a lot of themselves." So, there were prima donnas and people with turf problems. For example, I had one officer who covered French relations with the Soviet Union in Eastern Europe. He felt he should supervise the political section's work on communist party and socialists. He was trying to grab John Dobrin's turf away. I also found the political military guy who was brilliant, a NATO expert, was constantly fighting with the Army Brigadier General who was the military attaché. I was always mediating. I spent so much of my time with this sort of thing instead of doing my substantive work.

Q: Well, in a place like France in Paris as well as in London, you really have people who are reporting on things like French relations with Africa, French relations with the Far East and all this, so in many ways you were much more as political counselor, dealing with the whole panoply of American foreign policy.

COHEN: That is one of the reasons why I valued this assignment so much because it gave me a totally different perspective. For example, the Vietnamese negotiations were going on. We had a guy there who spent all his time on that. I got to know a lot about the Vietnam negotiations.

Q: You were there during the fall of Vietnam.

COHEN: That's right, and I remember one last effort to save things and Giscard D'Estaing offered to mediate between the United States and the North Vietnamese. It lasted a few weeks, and we got involved with that.

Q: Did you find the French were just sort of being politely nice and saying well you didn't do any better than we did? Was this something?

COHEN: I felt they were kind of sincerely hoping to bring that to a soft landing to avoid humiliation. I thought they were good on that.

Q: France at that time was in but not in NATO. Not on the military side, but really was. I realize there was another embassy that dealt with NATO affairs, but from your perspective, how did this NATO thing work out?

COHEN: They were in on the political side of NATO. They had an ambassador to NATO who sat on the Atlantic Council that includes all of the ambassadors. However they were not under the unified military command. Their forces in Germany, for example, did not report to SAC Europe, NATO command. They reported to Paris, totally separate. They did not sit in the military council and its regular committees. They did not sit in the nuclear committee and all that. However, they constantly protested they were part of NATO. I remember once when General Alexander Haig was SAC Europe. He constantly made the rounds of all the capitals, and he came to Paris once, so Ambassador Rush invited him to lunch with the defense minister. As usual, I got into a lot of these things by virtue of my being able to translate which is always very helpful. I was there for the lunch. Our political-military officer was also there, as well as Haig and the minister of defense and the ambassador. After lunch the conversation became free flowing, and the minister of defense, who was relatively new, said to Haig, "General, I want you to know one thing. If the balloon goes up; if there is a Soviet attack, we will be under your command in under three hours." Haig sort of took it for granted like well I knew that all the time. I, after listening to all this rhetoric, we don't come under American command, all that sort of thing, it sort of blew my mind. After that point I never worried about this separatism from NATO. I knew that was really just rhetoric.

Q: Were we watching Germany, because in many ways almost every, as I look about American foreign policy we had three things: one to keep the Soviets from taking over, two, to keep the Japanese from reviving, and three to keep the French and Germans from going at each other. We had already gone into two wars because of this. Were we watching the French-German connection from your perspective for any glitches or anything else like that?

COHEN: We watched it in terms of our interest in Europe, but we never felt there were any problems. In fact, the Germans and French had always made a point of having a special relationship, very friendly, many meetings between heads of state. We never saw it as something to worry about.

Q: Were there any major developments during the time you were there that particularly absorbed you or problems?

COHEN: As I said, I spent most of my time on the internal French politics. I had a policy. I said the government, the establishment, let the ambassador and the DCM and the minister counselor for economic affairs, let them spend most of their time stroking those people. We in the political section will spend most of our time on the opposition, knowing they will come to power eventually. Let's get to know them and work with them, so I spent most of my time with the left, and I found that this officer who did the left, John Dobrin, was very good, very well connected, and had tremendous contacts. He'd say, look can you make a lunch for the shadow defense minister, and I'd make a lunch. He was really terrific. But, even better than him was the labor attaché. The labor attaché, John Condon, was one of the legendary labor attaches of the Foreign Service. Mitterand was his personal friend. Jacques Attali, who later became the chief of staff of President Mitterrand, was his personal friend. He wouldn't even tell me who was coming to lunch. He would just tell me come to lunch tomorrow, and all these big socialists were there. It was fabulous. The trouble with Condon though was that he didn't like to spend time doing any reporting. He had fabulous contacts, but he couldn't turn it into useful reports, so he would invite me and other colleagues, and we would do all the reports. That was my main concern, making sure that the left didn't turn bad. We knew they were going to come to power. The other things that were of interest to me, I remember the Turkish Greek problem over Cyprus.

Q: Yes, July, '74.

COHEN: That was my first crisis. I remember the western European director in Paris, a great diplomat named DeMargerie, who later became ambassador in Washington. We became very friendly. Through the summer months we were working on a day to day basis on the Cyprus crisis. We also had the famous Entebbe raid by the Israelis.

Q: Air France was hijacked and went to Uganda.

COHEN: This was Air France. Then we had an American plane hijacked to Paris. It was a TWA flight, New York to Chicago to Paris. It was Croatian nationalists. I was the embassy's anchor man for that. Usually the Americans say we don't negotiate for hostages, we don't negotiate with terrorists, but here was the administration ordering us to negotiate. Get the ambassador out to the airport, because it was all Americans on board. But it was the French who said, "No. Either they give up or we kill them." So, we had a tough time on that one. Luckily, the people who took over the plane eventually gave up.

Q: So what happened? How did it work out?

COHEN: The Croatians demanded that certain things be published, some of their manifestos be published, so we got the Associated Press office in Paris whom we were very close to, and they agreed to put it out on the news wire. Then when we showed them that here it is, it is in the newspapers, and they surrendered. That worked out. They were immediately put on a plane and returned to the States; there was no extradition procedure there. We had a number of these very interesting short-term problems. Kissinger was very worried about the communist-socialist alliance because it looked like in the next election they might win. He was really getting panicky, so he sends an instruction to the embassy to go and see the socialists and tell them that this alliance with the communists is unacceptable. It will kill NATO. You, know, such a real interference in their internal politics which was something the French really didn't like, even if you did it confidentially. So, the ambassador said, "I'm not touching this," and the DCM said, "I'm not touching this," so they both looked at me and said, "You do it." So, I said, "How am I going to handle this?" I was planning a trip to Marseilles anyway because I liked to travel around France, and the head of the socialist party foreign relations committee was the Mayor of Marseilles. His name was Gaston Defferre, who was one of the old socialist barons. He had already given me an appointment, so I came in and I saw him. I decided to make the approach with him since he was the head of the Socialist Party foreign relations committee. So we talked about Marseilles and internal politics, very friendly. He was a right wing socialist. So then I made the pitch and he got very upset. "This is unacceptable of the American government to try to tell us what to do in our internal politics. Who are you to tell us about the danger of communism?"

After the Second World War when I came back to the city we found communists installed in all of the city offices trying to run the city. We didn't fool with them. We just got our taxi drivers out with their wrenches, and within five hours these guys were all out. We know how to handle communists and we really resent this attempt to tell us what to do " So, that meeting kind of ended in an angry tone, but I made the pitch and carried out my job. So nothing came of it until about six months later when there were local, municipal elections, and this was seen as a sign of what would happen in the national elections. Defferre was out campaigning, and he was in Bordeaux, and he was in a very nationalistic mood. He said, "Let me tell you a story. This American diplomat who came to see me and try to tell us what to do, and tell us that our alliance with the communists is dangerous to NATO, and I told him off." This got tremendous press play. My phone was ringing off the hook. There is a satirical weekly in Paris called Le Canard Enchaîné. (the shackled duck). They had a picture of me in a cowboy hat that said the sheriff goes south. But, then, of course, I became the darling of the right wing. So, anyway, we had a few of those types of adventures.

Q: Did you have any problem with the French Deuxième Bureau or what ever their equivalent is to the CIA, and our CIA as well, everyone seemed to get into collisions over things. Were there ever any embarrassments over things of this kind or problems?

COHEN: When I was political counselor, there weren't any. We were kept informed. We had pretty good relations. Actually there was a big problem later when I was Assistant Secretary; we were really going off on a tangent with each other in Africa and some African countries, but not while I was there.

Q: One last question on France. It seems like relations with Germany, France and the UK often are secretaries of various departments have their direct contacts; the President has his direct contact and all this. Did you ever feel like the big boys were flying over you and that you weren't quite sure what was happening?

COHEN: This was a problem. Kissinger especially was adept at this. Shortly after I became political counselor, I was at the foreign ministry talking about a specific problem. I can't even remember now what it was. Anyway, they talked to me about it and said in any event Kissinger will be here next week and we know he is interested in this. He and the foreign ministry will settle this. I was new and I hadn't heard that was coming, maybe it was arranged before I came. So I went back and the ambassador said what happened at the foreign ministry? Well they said Kissinger was coming next week. "Kissinger is coming next week? I didn't know that!" This was John Irwin, a sweet man. He was a very nice person, but he got very upset about it. He wrote one of those NODIS cables that are eyes only for the Secretary of state. He said, "I don't see why you need an ambassador here if you are going to come over here and not even tell me you are coming so that we can help prepare the way and all that. This is really unacceptable" It was a very angry cable, and he showed it to me. I asked, "do you really want to send this?" He said, "No, I really feel strongly about it." So, he sent the cable out. About four days later an answer came in eyes only saying, "I'm terribly sorry I didn't inform you about my visit. It was totally due to the incompetence of my staff."

Q: Kissinger is renowned for doing this. If caught with his hand in the cookie jar, it was always somebody else.

COHEN: So he visited a few times; it was usually like that. I remember the ambassadors tended to be kept on the periphery of his visits. He visited quite a bit actually. There was a lot of preparation for it, so we got involved in that. We had one big event that was the first G7 summit ever held, and that was in France in 1975. Giscard d'Estaing thought up the idea to have a summit. They met in a suburb of Paris called Rambouillet. President Ford was in office, so we all had an assignment to deal with tremendous advance parties. I was assigned to getting the U.S. delegation the best possible quarters to stay in. One of my big diplomatic victories was to beat out the Japanese in commandeering a small hotel. The Japanese were very upset about it. I also was in charge of Ford's bedroom. Does he want logs in the fire? Also there was another issue. Did Ford want to go to church on Sunday? There was going to be a weekend involved before he went back to Washington. He is a Protestant, there is a chapel, because he would be staying on the grounds of the palace. There was an old feudal palace there. There is a chapel. we can bring out the American Episcopalian Bishop of Paris. Word comes back from Washington no, he wants to go to a local church even if it is Catholic, it is okay. He wants to go mix and mingle with other people. You can think of the security. We find a local church. The French say look we can't have him mingle with local people. We don't know who they are. I'm sure they are all nice people. So the French say to us, get as many people as possible from the American embassy to fill up the church. So, we put the word out more or less, you must go to this church. We all went to the church. It had Giscard d'Estaing and the Prime Minister of Italy, and I think one of the other heads of government was there, so it was a mini summit in church, but there were no French people there.

WOODWARD ROMINE
Consul General
Strasbourg (1974-1977)

Woodward Romine was born and raised in Indiana. He graduated from Wabash College and later pursued studies at the University of Geneva, Switzerland. His primary assignments in the State Department were as Political Officer in Washington and abroad. His foreign assignments, all European, include Warsaw, Paris, Strasbourg, Vienna and four posts in Germany. In Washington, Mr. Romine dealt with French relations as well as Refugee and Management matters. He is a graduate of The Industrial College of the Armed Forces. Mr. Romine was interviewed by Peter Moffat in 1998.

Q: 1974 takes you back to Europe, to one of its more delightful cities, as Consul General in Strasbourg, with all the excitement of France and the Consular Bureau associated functions.

ROMINE: Those were three lovely years. One, you're far enough away from the capital so that generally speaking you can do the things that you want to do or that you feel are important. This was an absolutely fascinating part of France, especially in Alsace. When you cross the Vosges Mountains and come down into Alsace, you find that there's another language spoken there. It's a language very much like German. It is a German dialect. This gives people a slightly different viewpoint of things. Also, they have always felt that they had been very much protected and taken care of by the people of what they call the interior, the people of the interior. That was meant as a highly complimentary thing to the French-speaking people, but sometimes it wasn't taken that way and the French people thought that this was aimed at them as a condescending sort of thing, but it wasn't. I was very interested to see how this affected people's attitudes in that part of the world. While there were many people of the left there, what the French would call the left, the Socialist party, still with these people in Alsace there was a great feeling of being very, very French and therefore very much attached to the memory of de Gaulle, who was, of course, out of the picture by that time, and an even nicer thing, a feeling of deep affection for the Americans, because the American 7th Army who came down and been highly instrumental in freeing that area from the German occupation at the end of the war. This you found always reflected in the attitudes of the people towards anyone there who was American, and it made your work interesting. Also, it was an interesting place from what was going on. There was a rapidly developing area that had a lot of industry in it that was interested in getting into the American market and in buying things. One of the things that I remember the most was a textile industry which was most interested in getting American cotton and which, for reasons that were sometimes obscure, always seemed to have difficulty in doing this. The consular district itself covered not just Alsace but also Lorraine and parts of France bordering on Switzerland, very beautiful country. It gave you a different view of how people would view problems than you would get from being in Paris. Then there was the Council of Europe and later on the European Parliament. The Council of Europe was sort of a discussion- (end of tape)

-members who were not members of the Communities at that time like Spain, Portugal, Greece and Turkey, and they could meet and discuss all of these European questions. As I recall, also the Council had the Court of Human Rights attached to it. Now, maybe that's with the European Communities. I don't think so. I think it was with the Council. And that was a very interesting thing. We followed its work a great deal. During the time I was there, there was a dispute between the Irish and the English on the holding of prisoners in Northern Ireland, Irish Republican prisoners, of course. This was debated at the Council. It was a splendid thing to see these perfectly trained English barristers from both sides, English or Irish but all obviously out of good English universities, debating this with the most exquisite courtesy to each other and some of the most sad and tragic matters that you could talk about, that they all recognized themselves as they made these debates. That was a part of my stay there that I found very rewarding, mainly because the representatives there certainly wanted to reach some sort of understanding. They knew how to talk to each other, and they were all very pessimistic, to say the least, that any solution could be found. The court did find, however, in favor of the Irish complaint this time, and the Brits acknowledged this and, I think, the prisoners were released or something was done. Then the assembly of the European Parliament came there, and they built a new great building for them. That was an interesting thing to follow, but, of course, the mission in Brussels liked to cover this very carefully itself, and its representatives were nearly always there, but still you could watch carefully what was going on, and the residence where I had the great fortune to live could be used to receive prominent guests and people from Brussels that I could talk to.

GEORGE Q. LUMSDEN
Economic Officer
Paris (1974-1979)

George Quincy Lumsden was born in New Jersey in 1930. He graduated from Princeton University in 1952 and served overseas in the U.S. Navy as a lieutenant from 1952-1955. His postings abroad after entering the Foreign Service in 1957 include Izmir, Bonn, Amman, Beirut, Kuwait and Paris, with an ambassadorship to The United Arab Emirates.

Q: It's a dirty job, but somebody's got to do it. You were in Paris from when to when?

LUMSDEN: I got to Paris in late summer 1974 and was there through the first Iranian takeover in the latter part of 1979. I was back home by the time the main hostage crisis started.

Q: 1974-1979.

LUMSDEN: It was a tour that turned out to be very good for me. With my petroleum economic reporting background, the 1973 oil crisis had just hit and the International Energy Agency was being formed and France was objecting to this formation of this cartel of rich countries. They were grandstanding to the non-rich countries of the world by saying that the IEA is, as Jobert said, "a machine de guerre contre l'épais en droit de développement." We had famous arguments in the paper every day between Kissinger and Jobert about the efficacy of establishment of the IEA and I got the assignment in that the French were not joining to do the French energy policy. At that time, it's amazing. Western industrialized countries including the United States simply did not have overall energy balances. They didn't really know what segments of the energy input was going into what segments of the energy output. It was incredible. Even countries like Germany that you would have expected to have one didn't.

Q: Did we have something like that?

LUMSDEN: No, we did not. We had basically Jim Akins playing Cassandra doing his Wolf is Here article and President Nixon getting on television showing people how to turn down the thermostat in their living room. We did not have the Energy Information Agency, any of that stuff. We did not have a coordinated plan at all. It was amazing, after having controlled the world of oil and energy for the better part of a century through our multinational corporations which we were very happy to have incorporated in our territory, suddenly losing the handle through the Tripoli and Tehran agreements. The posted price situation busted and then, of course, we had the 1973 war, which you can read about in Daniel Yergin's, The Prize, how the airlift to Israel arrived during the middle of the day when it was supposed to arrive late at night because the winds in Lajes Field and the Azores kept these huge, goliath planes down. The friendly Arabs knew that we were going to do this, but then when it all got publicized, they met and the Arab oil boycott resulted. Before they met, OPEC in general busted the price and it skyrocketed up to $5.60 or $5.70 a barrel, but the important thing was that OPEC was calling the shots all of a sudden, not us.

Q: What was your position in the embassy?

LUMSDEN: In the embassy, I was the general economic policy officer. I worked for a gentleman named Jack Myerson and Art Hartman, who was the ambassador then. I guess I flatter myself in saying that I did an awful lot of work in French energy policy at that time and came up as close as we could get with a French energy balance and what the French oil companies were doing. We fed that back to Washington.

Q: Did the French know what they were doing?

LUMSDEN: To start, not all that much. They knew what they wanted to do, how to grandstand to the Arabs as much as possible. They felt that would assure a continued friendly relationship and that they wouldn't be cut off. However, shortages hit them just as well. As we all know by now, the oil market is totally fungible. You can't say, "You don't get any and you don't get any." It's just a great world.

Q: The word "fungible" came out during the crisis. Before that it was an esoteric term. After that, everybody was saying, "We all know that oil is fungible."

LUMSDEN: Of course, another thing that happened to me there was, as fate would have it, the Iranian Revolution came on. I got extensive TDYs back down to the Gulf to interview people down there and talk about the situation as a result of the Iranian Revolution. Khomeini was in Paris at this time. The French flew him back, thinking that they would get a special deal out of that, which they did not.

Q: I'm sure it's from my chauvinistic American point of view, but it seems like the French always end up by being, in the British phrase, "too clever by half."

LUMSDEN: Oh, I think you're right. The problem heretofore with French policy has been that the various insiders, the Ecole Nationale d'Administration-types and others, are able to make policy decisions with very little reference to what public opinion might think in France. When it doesn't work, they just brush off their desks and say, "Well, we'll do something differently." There has not been really in my view in France a really good public accountability quotient for many of the policy actions that they've taken in the past. Now, they're faced with the new globalized economy and we'll see whether they can break out of that pattern or not. But I would agree completely that they are too clever by half.

Q: When you got there in 1974, what about dealing with the French? How did you go about it? What were your impressions? Did they change over this period of time?

LUMSDEN: Well, I don't think my impressions of the French have changed as much as they have developed and become more, I think, penetrating. The French actually are a very nice people who have an inferiority complex that shows itself in superiority. There is anxiety there. You can't blame many of them because of the constant pressure on the great French culture and what was "la grande nation" for them acting sometimes the way that they do. When you got your back up against the wall, they'll usually come out on the right side and support you. But they are terribly sensitive to the fact now that a bipolar world in which they were not one of the two poles, but in which they thought they could play an interesting swing role, has now, to all intents and purposes, become a unipolar world where they don't feel they have the leeway to play one side against the other and inject themselves as crucial.

Q: We want to swing to 1974-1979. Could you go down to the Minister of Energy or the equivalent thereof and get information or go to the oil companies?

LUMSDEN: Oh, yes, I got lots and lots of information and lots and lots of lectures on the state of the world and how if only America's strength could be combined with France's intelligence. But I took this all in good stead. I'm a rather cynical, humorous person. I think that people enjoyed having me around. I had a pretty good time while I was there. Anybody who can't have a good time living a few years in Paris ought to have their head examined. But this was their wont to try to get us to understand the true nature and complications of the world that only a very, very mature society such as France could impart and they wanted to help us out.

We had, of course, while we were there, the Conference on International Economic Cooperation, the CIEC, at the Kleber Palace. I think that was 1975 or 1976. It ran on for three years and ended not with a bang, but a whimper. This was a time when generally economic policy in the U.S. as well as elsewhere was in the model of John Maynard Keynes. Nixon said, "I'm a Keynesian." We were willing to take the whole menu of commodities that are crucial to the industrialized world and the third world and to put ceiling and floor fixed prices on these if the oil producing states were willing to put ceiling prices on their commodity. Guess what? They sort of liked the free market at that particular time. It simply wouldn't work out. I think since that time there has been a steady decline in the resultant vector of international economic policy makers that governments can fix things. Currency markets have gotten out of the control of finance ministries and departments. They're just too enormous. Oil, on the other hand, can no longer really be fixed by governments anymore, not even OPEC. At that time, it was felt that you could. Of course, you couldn't. The price went up, way up in the first Arab oil embargo. Then at the end of the decade with the Iranian Revolution, where there was no exact embargo, but the market had a strong perception in 1978 and 1979 that supply was going to be inadequate, the price spiked again. I went to the Gulf in 1978 and again in 1979. I found my former contacts there riding a crest of egomania. They thought that this was it, they had it made. As the Shah said, "This is a noble resource. The price is right and that's the way it will stay and it will probably go to $50 or more a barrel." Kuwait was showing the door to Gulf Oil and people like that. Of course, we had been trying to impress the Department with the fact. Jim Akins at least certainly got the message and knew that with the nationalization moves underway and the reliance of the West upon this commodity, we were headed for big trouble. Indeed, we were - so much so that after I got back from a TDY in the Gulf in 1979, I suddenly found that my assignment in Paris was, in effect, over and I was to report back to the Office of Arabian Peninsula Affairs forthwith as deputy director in charge of all the Gulf states except Saudi Arabia. That came in 1979 just about four or five weeks before the big hostage takeover in Iran.

Q: To whom were you reporting on oil matters back in Washington?

LUMSDEN: On oil matters then, we were reporting to the Office of Fuels and Energy, which I think has been transmogrified into something else by now, and to the Bureau of Near Eastern/South Asian Affairs. I remember seeing the then-assistant secretary having written on a memo (I wasn't there then. I was still in Paris.) when the threatened embargo was made, "What are they going to do, drink their oil?" Nobody really believed that it could happen. It did. It caused a great recession in this country. I'm trying to think of what I can usefully add to something that has been written about so thoroughly.

1973 before I went to Paris... I'm sorry I jump around, but these things pop into my head not in a perfect chronological order. I, being an eager desk officer for Kuwait, Bahrain, the United Arab Emirates, Qatar, Oman, and Yemen, of course, went to the office on Saturday. The word came in that the OPEC meeting in Kuwait had busted the posted price system, that they were taking control and were going to price it themselves.

After OPEC broke the posted price, the OPEC countries who met in Kuwait, after the Iranians and the Venezuelans and other non-Arabs left, broke up in disaccord over the question of whether or not to embargo, with Saudi Arabia stonewalling in trying to keep this thing from happening. This was all the same day. The Secretary of State, who had flown off to Eastern Europe somewhere, had received the news that the airlift to Israel had been delayed and that when it arrived, the Arab ministers who had just left Kuwait and gotten back that very day to their own countries, heard about it and said they were going to embargo anyway and that our airlift had to go forward because it was a question of U.S. arms perhaps being defeated by Soviet arms. This was when the Egyptian army had pressed the Israelis on the other side of the Canal. This was all one day. We had gone to DEFCON two. That is like full nuclear alert.

Finally, that was the day of the Saturday night massacre! my wife said, "What is going on down there?" I said, "Wait until I come home!" It was an incredible day. You can see how with the Watergate scandal breaking something like that would affect the decision making ability of the government. Luckily, we backed down from DEFCON two. The Israelis held. As a result, Sadat got just what he wanted: everybody to pay attention to him so that he could sign some kind of peace agreement with the Israelis having some sort of negotiating position. Anyway, that was the famous October 20, 1973.

Shifting back to Paris, it was agony all the time on energy while we were there. We basically had lost our negotiating leverage with OPEC and they just ran the show. The International Energy Agency was formed. Tom Enders negotiated that agreement. Actually, that was November 18, 1974. I was invited back to the 25th anniversary on November 18, 1999. The agency sans la France (French: without France) went into effect and started to try to get the industrialized consuming countries to have some sort of cooperation. Out of that comes our strategic petroleum reserve, a whole lot of work on other energy sources, and comes the producer-consumer dialogue which I skip ahead to because that is something that at that time was absolutely anathema to us because the dialogue meant that the producers were going to levy terms on us that we didn't want that were not market terms. So, this was in the late '70s and early '80s. I jump ahead a bit.

Q: Who was calling the shots in the French government? Was this a matter of the foreign ministry?

LUMSDEN: No. The foreign ministry pretty much followed the ministries of finance and economy on this. Their job was to keep relations with the Arabs good. Well, Valéry Giscard d'Estaing was the president of France at that time. I think by and large most of the decisions on energy policy - for example, going to 70% nuclear for electricity - were made at the presidential level. I am trying to remember the names of the various economic ministers we had at that time. Darned if I can recall all their names right now. A very important person was Raymond Barre, who was Minister of Economy then. The fellow who is now the head of Total. The French move people out of government. Thierry des Males or someone like that was very important in that. But I think that the basic decisions on energy policy at the time I was there were made by Giscard d'Estaing and Raymond Barre, not by the foreign minister.

Q: When you were watching this, you had both, the oil portfolio and you were an Arab specialist. The French are still even today trying to show that they're greater friends with the Arabs than anyone else. Did you see a short-term, long-term effectiveness of this policy at all or did the Arabs...

LUMSDEN: To be very honest, no. The Arab oil producing countries are mostly desert Arab Bedouin stock people. They know what they call "killam fadhi" (free words) when they hear it. They also know where the real power is and that was with us. I did not see a tremendous benefit for France except possibly in contracts to negotiate for arms sales. I admit, they did preserve their concession rights in places like the United Arab Emirates, but so did we. They never nationalized. The French would say, "Look, we weren't taken over." But where else other than in Iraq were the French that strong? I do not see that it gave them that much of an advantage over everyone else.

Q: Did you see a certain amount of almost delight in feeling that "We're the big boy and we're playing this carefully balancing game and sticking it to the United States" when actually nobody else was playing the game and it was almost an internal French one?

LUMSDEN: You see, yes, there was, but it was done for local political clout. It was constantly "France-Amerique." It didn't make any difference whether it was positive or negative, but it had to be "France-Amerique," "Paris-New York" to put the political discussion on this phony level that France and the United States basically were equal partners in the world. The policy was one of delighting in American difficulties to pronounce these in front of the French public. It still goes on. Jacques Lang visits death row in Texas and thereby certainly condemns to death anybody that he visits. If you think the state of Texas is going to buckle under if some froggy goes down there and tells them, "Oh, don't kill that fellow." He's dead meat as soon as Lang arrives. Excuse my cynicism, but I'm getting old. But it is true. Plus the fact the French themselves had the death penalty through 1981. We had done away with it before.

Q: While you were doing this and were watching the French but you were dealing with oil - this was sort of a place where people met from other countries - were there really other players that were around in the oil thing? I'm thinking of Germany, the United Kingdom, Japan, maybe Italy?

LUMSDEN: Oh, very definitely, but at this period of which we speak, I was assigned to the embassy in France with a brief to cover France. I was not in any international thing. I from time to time would meet a German diplomat or something like that. But it was not my bag to get into what the Japanese, Germans, and others were doing. So, the answer is, yes, of course. They played very prominent roles, particularly in the founding of the International Energy Agency, right under the French nose. The French wanted the headquarters to be in France. Although they didn't necessarily want to join it themselves, they wanted it under the OECD umbrella. So, it came out as a dotted line out to the side administrated by but autonomous from the OECD. France, by the way, is now a member of the IEA and is participating fully in all the discussions there. Times change.

Q: Were you reporting on other elements of the economy?

LUMSDEN: Energy took up a lot of my time, but other mineral resources and commodities got a little bit of their share. The Law of the Sea took up quite a bit of time. Reports generally on non-energy related mining, some on technological developments in agriculture, but we had an agricultural attaché there who did most of the gut work on that. And hustling bags for Bob Strauss, the WTR. I did an awful lot of note taking and carrying on whenever the World Trade representative was there. I followed him around and took care of him. Which was terribly interesting, by the way.

Q: What was your impression of Strauss in this environment?

LUMSDEN: I think he did pretty well, all things considered. The problem, of course, was the U.S. economy was pretty weak at the time he was trying to operate. We had an enormous inflation rate. We were constantly getting into these trade flaps with the Europeans that ended up like kindergarten sandbox fights. But I don't fault him at all for his personal tactics. It's just that it was a time when, totally unlike today when our economy is so obviously muscular that what we say and what we do counts. Back then, we were scrambling around under some pretty bad economic indicators and trying to get a move toward (Was it the Uruguay Round???) was awfully painful. We really didn't progress that much during the Carter administration on these economic matters.

Q: How did you find dealing with these graduates of the Ecole Nationale d'Administration, L'Ecole Polytechnique? One always hears about these people who were off to one side in rather austere offices smoking heavily and making these decisions. How did you find dealing with them? This was not just a normal relationship. Everybody was, if not scared to death, really concerned about a present day situation of an energy crisis.

LUMSDEN: Yes. Well, first of all, there is a social cache of complete snobbism there that is totally out of it as far as this country is concerned. I guess we can edit this later. I found that my entrée such as it was with these types, who were quite smart to start with, came around quite a bit when they knew that my great, great, great grandfather was the first treasurer of the United States, before Alexander Hamilton, that I went to Deerfield Academy in Massachusetts and Princeton University and had been an officer in the U.S. Navy and blah, blah, blah. That is what they were looking for. They were looking for what they imagined eastern establishment elitist Foreign Service officers to be. So, I tried to make them happy. It tended to break the ice. They don't go on to first name basis very easily. They don't cotton that much to the hail fellow, well met American. The Arabs, on the other hand, do. It's snobbism and it's snobbism that is a cover for what is basically inadequacy. What more can I say?

Q: I watch French TV every night and no matter what happens, they're comparing what is happening there to the United States.

LUMSDEN: Mais naturellement (French: But of course.).

Q: You won't find much comparing of France in the United States.

LUMSDEN: We don't even think about what they're... They're trying desperately to retain this grande nation image, which clearly even the other Europeans sort of smile wryly about.

Q: This was a worldwide crisis. You were in one of the key places. How much did the ambassador, Arthur Hartman, and others look at what was happening? Or was it sort of out of their hands?

LUMSDEN: I would say that Ambassador Hartman was extremely interested in what I was doing in energy. I would get called down to his office once or twice a week just to report, "What's going on? What are they up to now?" I would try to explain the best I could. Sometimes I knew. Sometimes I didn't know. I don't think the other branches of the government had the assets there to discuss sections of nuclear power going into electricity, what the world scale tanker rates were doing, whether they were meeting or lagging behind oil prices, how oil prices were even set. These other agencies were more interested in the Cold War aspect and what was going on in the big picture. I think I was about the only guy there doing this little bit. Suddenly, I got my day in the sun. Interest, yes, heavy interest. But it was such a new, awful field. We had gotten ourselves into a terrible bind. We were searching wildly for ways to get out of this. The way to get out of it ended when they started to produce so much oil that the price went down.

Q: Were there concerns, interests, or what have you in the fact that France was turning to 70% nuclear? These are small countries with big nuclear plants.

LUMSDEN: No, it was not of concern. It was sort of "Gee whiz. I wonder if they can do this. I don't think we can do it in the States." We were building nuclear plants at this time, but we all know the difficulties of nuclear power, which aren't as difficult as some people paint them to be. I personally believe it's still something that should be looked at in the future. I will give the French full marks for just plunging... This is what you can do in France regardless of public opinion. We are the French. We know better, right? So, nobody says anything. The Loire River level drops as all the dams are put in and all the heating units and everything go. Everyone says, "Ah, we're better than the Americans. Look what we can do." The degree of nuclearization in France, I think, has really topped out. I think they're going to actually have to back off a bit from this now. But it was an outstanding example of what you can do if you don't have too much public opinion to worry about.

Q: There was a lot of publicity at the time about the French putting research into solar energy, wind energy, etc. When Carter came in, he was saying, "We're in the equivalent to a state of war. We have to do something about our energy." There was a lot of effort made... Was there collaboration? Solar energy, for example, was considered to be perhaps one of the keys to cutting our dependency on oil.

LUMSDEN: Yes. Solar energy, wind power, fusion... More power to anybody who can get those things into a commercial state.

Q: Were you seeing a collaboration?

LUMSDEN: There were incessant people coming from the United State to France and French scientists going to the States to talk about fuel cells, about fusion, about hot dry rock, about all these processes, gasohol. The point is that there is lots of talk and there are lots of things you can do in the laboratory aside from nuclear and hydroelectric under certain conditions. Virtually none of these have yet advanced the point where they can make a significant contribution to the energy balance. The more they're examined, the more the negative aspects - wind power and the amount of space required to get enough windmills up, the amount of damage done to birdlife, the degradation of the landscape as a result of that - not good.

Gasohol. Someone figured out that if you took all of the corn every year raised in Iowa and didn't sell it to anybody except the energy industry and they turned it into gasohol, we could have perhaps 1.5-2 percent of our gasoline requirement. Plus the fact that these things kick in at high prices just as some hydrocarbons do (shale, Orinoco sands, shale oil, tar sands, all of these). The thing that saves us - here's my cynicism again - is that all this created a colossal damned recession. The bottom fell out of demand. OPEC went on thinking they were kings of the world until about 1983. At that point, one day, the finance minister of Saudi Arabia came into Fahd and said, "Here is the government's balance sheet." The figure for foreign exchange holdings was $99.5 billion. It went under $100 billion. The king said, "What's this?" He said, "Your Majesty, we're OPEC's swing producer. We have to keep lowering our production in order to maintain the price because the demand is dropping. The others have the right to go ahead. We, having so much oil, have agreed to swing down." "How much oil are we producing?" "Well, only about two million barrels a day, Your Majesty." "Get Yamani on the line." Yamani was told, "This doesn't work anymore. Open up the taps. We're getting back into this." So, of course, they opened up the taps and by 1985, the price was in a downward trend and the largest economic recovery in American experience started soon thereafter, not to say, please, that oil is as important today as it was then. We've got the whole new economy. That is an entirely different discussion. But that was a hinge point in the late '70s and '80s. They created their own demise by throwing everybody else into recession.

Q: Did we have an Arabist specialist - not you; somebody else - at the embassy in Paris?

LUMSDEN: They did have a position for a third world either African or Arab specialist in the Political Section and apparently rotated. While I was there, it was an African specialist.

Q: My question is, were you in much contact with the Arab embassies or missions in Paris?

LUMSDEN: Yes, I was socially. I knew people. It was not specifically other than discuss energy with them - and, of course, the Saudi embassy doesn't have a clue as to what Riyadh is doing on energy policy.

Q: It was more just a social embassy?

LUMSDEN: Yes. We've been in the Middle East a long time. Of course, there were a whole lot of Lebanese refugees there. As the French called them, "Refugees des luxes." There were a lot of Lebanese businessmen. We had a number of Gulf Arabs who took apartments and things in Paris that we knew; by and large the Gulf Arabs couldn't function because of the language problem. But we did not have an Arabist as such other than myself at the embassy when I was there. They do from time to time have one in the Political Section. I think we had a couple of officers who had served in the Arab world. In the station, there was somebody who had really served in the Arab world who is a friend of mine. If he were allowed to give stories on... He was really in.

Q: What was your impression of... There was always this grand policy, but were the Arab embassies having much effect in France at all?

LUMSDEN: The embassies themselves?

Q: I'm just wondering about was there an Arab clout?

LUMSDEN: The Arabs let themselves be flattered by the French knowing full well that it was flattery. That is basically what it was. The Arab embassies as such could always be received and fawned over just like the former colonial governments in Africa. They were given satin treatment. I don't think that the French for a moment had any illusions about having truly substantive discussions with the embassies in Paris. France worked that through the French embassy out in the field - just as unfortunately, depending upon who our ambassador is in France, so did they do with us. Pamela Harriman was a very interesting person to the French. She was received at all levels. I can guarantee you though that they were not discussing force levels in Bosnia with Pamela. That was done through Reservoir Road here in Washington, DC. They've seen these ambassadors come and go. Hartman was an exception. He was a professional. They liked that. But we keep putting people who are not professional diplomats in. Some of them are very good, but some of them aren't.

Q: They tend to often get at the social level.

LUMSDEN: Yes. I don't know, the current ambassador apparently does quite well. I just have no knowledge of that.

Q: How about Kuwait? One hears reports about the Kuwaitis being disliked by just about everybody in the Arab world as well as elsewhere. Did the Kuwaitis raise any... or were they pretty much just an English phenomenon?

LUMSDEN: The Kuwaitis can be the most insufferable people ever seen. They are a tiny little place. If the Arabs have chutzpah, the Kuwaitis have it. It's just unbelievable. The Kuwaitis are smart. They were millionaires before oil was ever found there. They are a trading, bargaining type of people. It's in their blood just like the people in Dubai. There are a couple of colonies in the Gulf that do this.

A great example recently. Here we are, Bill Richardson, Secretary of Energy, is going out. We've got to convince these countries to increase their oil production. Would you believe that the Kuwaitis are hardliners against increasing oil production? By god, we fought to defend their country and what the hell is going on out there? Well, you see what happens. Let the man come. Then you get in with the emir and after he sees the emir, he says, "You know, there are some good points there. I think maybe we ought to agree to increase production. We'll talk with the other members." In other words, don't give away your card before you can really make something of it.

Q: What about events in Iran? While you were in Paris, was there concern about the fall of the Shah? Were we concerned about what was going to happen there?

LUMSDEN: Some of us were concerned, but the some of us who were concerned were so unimportant that it didn't make... Here you've got to hand it to the French and their ability to collect information and have a fingertip feeling for what's going on. They were extremely cognizant of which way things were going in Iran. They had Khomeini there. He had asylum and did whatever he wanted. We on the other hand had so attached ourselves to the Shah even when in 1972 he shafted us with constant oil price increases because of the Tripoli-Tehran business that when Irwin got out there he called him up on the carpet and told him this was too noble a resource and we should pay. But he was our man. To tell a succession of American presidents both republican and democratic that the Shah was a weak reed and could fall would be like trying to tell the Pope that the Immaculate Conception is a fraud. It just didn't sell at political levels here and wasn't going to happen. Quite to the contrary, all of the biggies in Washington would go to the Middle East and come back. When I came back from Kuwait, the conversation at every Georgetown cocktail party was the longevity of the House of Saud. "It's really going to collapse and then we'll be..." "How do you know?" "Oh, well, I've just been with this group with Secretary So and So to Tehran and the Shah told us." Well, the House of Saud, like it or not, is still there and the Shah is long gone. We couldn't see the forest for the trees.

Q: Do you think sometimes we oversell ourselves? If somebody becomes our friend, we seem to be unable to qualify it.

LUMSDEN: Yes, I agree.

Q: This happened in Vietnam and other places, Chiang Kai-shek.

LUMSDEN: I agree. But I also would ask you to entertain that when we finally decide that somebody is really our enemy, we're also unable to qualify it. Everything in the Balkans is Milosevic. I know he's a bastard, but he's not everything. You saw today that now they're starting to have to move against the KLA. But it's always just incessantly "Milosevic, Milosevic, Milosevic." Everything is Milosevic.

Q: Either a devil or an angel.

LUMSDEN: Everything is Saddam Hussein, Saddam Hussein, Saddam Hussein, Khomeini, Khomeini, Khomeini, Castro, Castro, Castro. We're not winning these rhetorical battles.

SAMUEL R. GAMMON, III
Deputy Chief of Mission
Paris (1975-1978)

Ambassador Samuel R. Gammon, III was born in 1924 in Texas. He received a bachelor's degree in 1946, a master's degree in 1948, and a doctorate in 1953 from Princeton University. He served in the U.S. Army from 1943-1946 and joined the Foreign Service in 1954. His career included positions in Italy, Ethiopia, and France, and an ambassadorship to Mauritius. Ambassador Gammon was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1989.

Q: I'd like to go on to what must have been a fascinating assignment as a Deputy Chief of Mission in Paris. Is this considered a particularly good job or not?

GAMMON: In the good old days it was one of the best, and all DCM's Paris went on to embassies. I think I was the last one for whom that was an absolute rule because Chris Chapman, my successor, did not. I'm not sure about the later successors. But indeed previously an ambassador might come back to be a DCM in Paris like Cecil Lyon, been somewhere as ambassador in Latin America then went to Paris as DCM and then went to Ceylon as ambassador again. His wife, who was Joseph Grew's daughter, once told us on a visit to Paris, she said, "When we arrived in Ceylon and we were on our way into town from the airport I looked at Cecil and said, 'Cecil, let's go back to Paris.'"

Paris was a major break because I was not fluent in French, though I crammed the hell out of it for the six or seven weeks I had to get up to speed. I read French fluently, but I never before served in a French-speaking post.

Q: Your ambassador to begin with was Kenneth Rush?

GAMMON: Ken Rush, who picked me for the job, and was a previous Deputy Secretary of State and who had dealt with me in S/S and picked me for the job following Galen Stone, who then went as ambassador to IAEA and then to Cyprus from Paris.

Q: How did Rush use you as a DCM?

GAMMON: I like Ken, he knows the great game, knows it very well, but he was not hyperactive, he was in a sense "energy efficient," shall we say. He would say basically, "I will deal with the prime minister and the President of the Republic."

Giscard d'Estaing, was President in those days, the Prime Minister Jacques Chirac, the Mayor of Paris, a fascinating man. And usually Ken would see the foreign minister, and say to me you do everything else. Which meant all the rest of the cabinet with their business to be done. The Director General of the Quai d'Orsay, the whole schmeer. And then, of course, he would be gone at least four months out of the year, out of the country, so I did an awful lot of chargé time. Whenever anything went wrong or something hit the fan I was chargé, that's a paranoid's rule of thumb. It became very different under his career successor, Hartman, for my last year.

Q: So at the time under Rush, you were really much more an operator as Deputy Ambassador rather than sitting down and being the manager as often a DCM is.

GAMMON: Which is exactly what I was for Hartman, who is, of course, a crackerjack pro and an old friend.

Q: This is Arthur Hartman.

GAMMON: Yes, I switched to being the floor manager and particularly looking after the huge mission. We had something like thirty agencies in Paris, including the Veterans Administration and Social Security!

Q: That was obviously done for efficiency sake rather than putting them someplace cheaper like Tangier or something like that.

GAMMON: Yes, and interestingly enough when Kingman Brewster came in as Ambassador to London in the early Carter period and fairly late in the day for me in Paris, I had this funny message from London shortly after he arrived, that he was going to be in Paris and needed an hour's time with me. I said, "What was all this?"

When he duly came he said in effect that he was thinking about how he should organize his embassy in London and somebody in Washington said come and talk to Sam Gammon across the channel. So I told him in effect it's like, where does the 800 pound gorilla sleep? You organize the embassy in the way which will be most effective for your operation. Then I talked a little bit about Rush's role and how the embassy functioned. And about Hartman's role, he had been there three or four months and how obviously he was starting to function. Brewster had already picked his DCM, who was coming over from U.S. NATO, and said, "Talk to him, and you do it any way you want."

In fact I think he experimented, somebody told me, with merging the political and economic sections or some adventurous innovation of that sort. I said, "Whatever works for you is fine, there ain't no you got to do it this way or you got to do it that way."

Q: Who managed the store, the operations of the embassy when you were acting as really the deputy ambassador?

GAMMON: To a very considerable extent the section heads. I tried to get to all of the constituent posts and I think I got to all of them at least twice during my three and a quarter years in Paris. For some reason I seemed to have made it to Nice more often than to Lyon, I can't think why! And similarly staying in touch with the other agency operations, the Secret Service, the Treasury, the Social Security and the Battle Monuments Commission, all of the rest of them. But I relied very heavily on the counselors.

In fact, when I visited Moscow a couple of years after I left the service, Warren Zimmermann, who came to Paris with Hartman as political counselor, said to me -- I was ravished with pleasure, very decent of Warren because he was then DCM Moscow -- "I'm trying to operate this job the way you did in Paris. I was very impressed that you never peered over my shoulder or joggled my elbow as political counselor and I'm trying to do the same here."

Q: In the 1975 to '78 period in France, what were our major issues with France?

GAMMON: Concorde landing rights.

Q: Concorde being a jet aircraft?

GAMMON: The supersonic transport which was only allowed to land in Washington for a year and a quarter because the Federal government used to control the landing field. New York wouldn't let it in. The French people were furious with this, because this was their macho symbol. The Brits thought it would be nice and yes, it would happen, but they didn't work themselves into a rage.

It had all the sensitivity for the French people, that French "trimming" vis a vis terrorists did it for us. They sprung a couple of nasties, Abdul Aboud was nailed and arrested and they let him go very quickly. When Jean François Poncet, who was later Foreign Minister, nailed me at a reception at the Embassy, "You've got to do something about Concorde."

I said, "Yes we do, we're working on it very hard and I realize that this is every bit as neuralgic to your people, to the entire French people as Abul Aboud is to the American people."

Q: So very often you save up things and then sit down and work them out?

GAMMON: Yes, an embassy is a funny bird. As you know, its partly on the side of the country and people to which it is accredited. Because it sees them close up, it understands their problem, but it can never lose sight of the basic U.S. interests. When you've been too long in the country or you're suffering from what's called localitis, then you become more nearly the representative of the host country to your own, which is dreadful. That's terrible and it's a perpetual danger because you work like smoke to understand and get close to and to empathize with the people and the government of the country to which you are accredited. Particularly if it's a friendly or allied country etcetera. But at the same time, you can't give away the store in anyway whatsoever, so there you are balanced in-between.

I did an awful lot of work on African problems. Partly because France had more clout in Francophone Africa by the mid to late seventies than Britain did in what somebody once referred to as anglo-saxophone Africa. That by the way, was an African diplomat, who referred to anglo-saxophone Africa.

Q: The French maintained troops in many of those places?

GAMMON: Sure, and a willingness to send them back in. U.S. relations with France, the water was muddied by Gaullism an awful lot. Though we talked, and we talked intimately on some things, there was always this desire on the part of the successors of the General to cock a shock at the U.S. because they could get away with it.

One thing I found most helpful in dealing with U.S. congressional visitors who come in believing that the French are not our allies and garbage like that. I always said, "Well, the French are following exactly the policy of General Pershing and President Wilson in World War I. They're an associated power, but they're not part of the unified command structure."

But particularly on African matters, there were things that France could do in Africa that were highly desirable from the western point of view that we could not. They could send troops into Zaire which they did a couple of times or into Chad.

Q: Because they sort of were acting in a way, maybe it's not the right term, but sort of a cat's paw for the whole western position.

GAMMON: Sure. As I once commented to François Poncet, "we have to be careful on these things because we don't want people to say you're our Cubans." The bottom line was that France was a hell of a lot more effective and a hell of a lot more authoritative middle power that could do things in our interests, as well as its own, that we could not.

For instance, the French Air Force was short of long range airlift, they could do short range, they could airlift to northern Chad, but as you get them beyond that if they're going to tidy things up in Zaire, if the Belgians didn't, then they had to borrow our airlift. So they could have a lot of sensitive things needing crash action and very fast turnaround time.

Q: Really you could say the nervous system is all there, but it wasn't talked about and it was sort of almost understood when the chips are down as happened in the Cuban Missile Crisis? That France often is in a much more stalwart position than Britain or some other countries?

GAMMON: And usually also the career people. The French diplomatic pros and the French military are much closer to us than the French political scene. So a politician like Chirac would want to swagger a little bit and have a couple of cock crows from the French rooster where the pros would forget all that stuff.

We're never really comfortable with France, the American people, because our establishment is northern European and we come from a beer drinking Anglo-Saxon pattern and we do not understand and we have very little respect for wine drinkers! So the French are rated in the American unconscious -- at surprising high levels -- very often get treated as though they were Italians or Greeks or Mediterranean types. Which they ain't. They have that part of their culture too, but no more than we. For instance because of the powerful influence of our very large afro-American minority through the years, jazz and slang and cultural what all, but we aren't an African or a Caribbean country. So that's part of the misconnection between the two countries.

Q: You and the Embassy, at the time, were aware of these currents and you dealt with them realizing there is a sort of a cross misunderstanding, but at the same time a cross affinity.

GAMMON: Yes, you worked to reinforce the basic tie perpetually, to be sympathetic on Concorde problems, to send as strong a message as you can back to the U.S. The French used to say, "Why didn't the U.S. government just tell New York the plane can land?" I would say, "That's all the fault of a Frenchman." Montesquieu and separation of powers influenced our Framers of the Constitution! We don't have a unitary government like France does where the préfet in Bordeaux is not going to say that an American jet can't land there.

Q: You were there in '77 when the Carter Administration took over from the Ford Administration. How was this reflected in our relations as you saw it?

GAMMON: It was basically my last year plus. The Carter crowd took longer to shake down. In other words, there was a certain amount of naïveté at various levels. Not so much in State, where Secretary Vance and the pros were in good shape, but as far as the White House was concerned, a certain amount of awkwardness, such as the barely visible shudder on the Carter visit to France when the White House decreed to its advance people that they were not willing to wear black tie. So the French dinner party at Le Trianon for 130 or 140 people were long dresses for women and tenue de ville for men. And was at the very last minute, about ten days before the event, long after the invitations had gone out, Sally Quinn and the Washington Post had a snide article about these clowns from Plains, Georgia who don't even know what a black tie is. So we got a hasty telegram W.H. saying "we've reconsidered and we're willing to do black tie for the banquet" and the advance man for the White House in residence came into me in a swivet. I said, "Not to worry, I'll take it around, we'll kill this off." So I went around to see the chief of protocol in the Quai d'Orsay, and said, "Jean-Paul sit down. Jean-Paul, I have to ask you a question and just reply honestly and we'll take care of it all, but I have to go through the motions." Then I delivered the message.

He sprang up, "No, no"-The invitations have already gone out. "Just say no and I'll take care of it." The U.S. chief of protocol who advanced that trip, whose name happily escapes me, but who's previous experience of power had been mayor of a central Massachusetts town, had just been to London, which was an earlier stop on the Carter trip. Then he came on to Paris, this was his first trip outside of the U.S., and he was saying, "Gee, that London is a great place; you ought to go there some time."

Q: This does show how even trivial things can get played up.

GAMMON: They capture the atmosphere.

Q: They capture the atmosphere and a new administration coming in with people who don't know, but exercising power for the first time.

GAMMON: It takes time, the good ones learn very quickly and the lucky ones don't have a Bay of Pigs.

Q: How about France in the Middle East? We've talked about Africa.

GAMMON: In general the Middle East, the French instinct was to outflank us and anybody can do with the Islamic world. French public opinion was Pro-Israeli. But the difference between France and the United States, still existing, is that foreign affairs is a prerogative of the throne or in this case the Elysée and public opinion doesn't count for much.

I have enormous respect for the Quai d'Orsay and the French Dip Corps, but when they blow one, and they do occasionally, it's always an issue in which public opinion is so outraged over some issue or policy some step that the Elysée and the Quai d'Orsay have done, as they would do on anything, and then they're caught by surprise by a public opinion blast and have to walk the kitty back.

We, in our government, spend all our time agonizing with the funny papers and public opinion and "will it play in Peoria and what does congress think." So we're probably too unwilling to do anything risky.

I would say, in general, the French were always nudging us to be less captive of the Israeli lobby. During our time, there no major flaps. Maybe minor flaps like the Abdul Aboud business. And to my great pleasure, the French were pretty tough on internal terrorism. The French and the Israelis between them took care of about three terrorists at Orly, who tried to shoot up an AIEI flight on the ground and in the airport terminal. To my distinct and great pleasure, and I always wanted to go around and shake the hand of the actual police type who had done it, one of the murderers that was killed was the guy who had killed Ambassador Frank Meloy in Beirut. Frank was a good friend. I was gratified by that one. A routine precautionary episode and a couple of Israeli security guards and the French guards on the scene that responded instantly and did away with the three terrorists.

DAVID M. ADAMSON
Deputy Principal Officer
Strasbourg (1975-1976)

Executive Secretary, Conference on International Economic Cooperation (CIEC)
Paris (1976-1977)

David Adamson was born in Connecticut and raised in Virginia. He graduated from Swarthmore College and the Fletcher School of Tufts University. Since entering the Foreign Service in 1974, Mr. Adamson has held positions in France, Panama, Portugal and Honduras. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2002.

Q: So, you went to Strasbourg, France? You were there from when to when?

ADAMSON: I arrived, I think, around the 1st of August 1975. I stayed only until the following May or so, because I was pulled into Paris, which was good, professionally, but not so good, personally, because Strasbourg was a wonderful place to serve on a personal basis.

Q: Where did Strasbourg fit in those days? What was its importance?

ADAMSON: At that point, the Department was in a process of reducing personnel and presence, a process that went on during most of my career, and particularly reducing it in the outlying area, outside of Paris. The reason why Strasbourg continued to exist as a post, although albeit a two officer post, and now I think a one officer post, unless things have changed very recently, was because of the international institutions there. Notably, the Council of Europe. Also, there was a Commission of the Rhine, and also the European Parliament would meet in Strasbourg, periodically, although the Consulate didn't cover that. That was the rationale for having Strasbourg.

Q: How was the Consulate General set up?

ADAMSON: It was set up with just two American officers, the Consul General, and then the so-called deputy principal officer, who was really a junior officer, a Vice Consul. The Consul General handled what little political reporting and political contacts we did. He handled that primarily, although the deputy also did some of that. The deputy's primary charge was to handle the economic, commercial and consular work in the district. For each of those functions, I had one or more French national employees, who worked for me.

Q: Who was the Consul General?

ADAMSON: At that time it was Woodward Romine.

Q: What job did you have?

ADAMSON: I was the deputy principal officer and vice consul, who as I say, handled primarily economic-commercial and consular work.

Q: How did you find France at that time - your corner of France? How were Americans perceived?

ADAMSON: I found it to be a wonderful place to serve because Strasbourg and its surrounding province of Alsace were a fairly conservative part of France, very pro-American, because they still had vivid memories of being liberated by American soldiers in 1944-1945. We were very well received there. We had a very good relationship with the local French authorities.

Q: It's an awful event that this long, long, troubled or mixed relationship with France exists. That was more Paris centered, would you say?

ADAMSON: I would say it's Paris and political elite centered. Alsace was basically, as I say, favorably oriented toward the U.S. Of course, by that time, de Gaulle had left power, indeed he was deceased. I guess Pompidou would have just left the presidency of France and Giscard d'Estaing was coming into the presidency. Giscard had a somewhat more pro-American, more modernist, orientation. At the same time, there was no question of France going back into the military side of NATO at that juncture. Still, France was a favorable environment for the U.S. in general terms in those days.

Q: Was the German heritage sort of shunned, or was this a factor?

ADAMSON: The German heritage was certainly very much alive in a number of respects. You could see it in the culture, in the architecture, in the food, in the wines, in the patois, the dialect that people spoke. Many Alsations at that time spoke what was called Alsatian, which is, as I understand it, a German dialect. I never learned to speak it, but I did speak French. The local newspaper was printed both in French and Alsatian. I think at that time they published more copies in Alsatian than in French, although I could be mistaken about that.

Right across the Rhine was Germany. Germany was very accessible, although the European Community, at that stage, had not gotten to the point where you could cross the bridge into Kehl, Germany, without showing your passport. Generally, it was a very hassle free border crossing. So, I did get into Germany with some frequency. Relations had greatly improved over the course of the post-war period between Germany and France. They were then essentially allies, even if at a personal and social level the Germans still did not have the best reputation in France, at that time.

Q: Did you have any contact with the French university students at all?

ADAMSON: I did not have very much. I had some contact. I was still young, 25 at that point. I had some contact with some higher level, medical and other students, who were basically in my age bracket. But, in my official functions, as far as I can recall, I never went to speak to the university, or taught a course, or anything like that. I interacted with them strictly on a personal level. There, the interaction was good.

Q: Any problems with American tourists, consular problems?

ADAMSON: No, it was a very amenable, attractive, welcoming environment for American tourists. The only security problems we had, as I recall, in 1975, 1976, were when Franco was on his deathbed. Franco was perceived as an American friend and ally. He was seen as very close to the United States, and the United States as very close to him. I recall that he was going through his death throes. Somehow this ignited threats against U.S. consular personnel in Strasbourg. We had death threats against us, which we didn't take too seriously. The French stepped up their patrolling outside the Consulate. Actually, some years later, there was an apparent attempt against the life of the American Consul General. Things didn't get that bad when I was there. Even then, I think the later assassination attempt was an isolated act. It did not reflect popular sentiment.

Q: Did you ever find out where this sentiment was coming from? Strasbourg is very far from Spain.

ADAMSON: Yes, it is far from Spain. I suppose it was “student radicals,” whoever that might be. Also, whether it was any kind of offshoot of the ETA Basque movement, or other such terrorist organizations, I really don’t know. I can remember seeing graffiti and so on, but I just don’t have any sense from where that emanated.

Q: Obviously Strasbourg is in the heart of the embryonic European Union. Was it called the European Community at that time?

ADAMSON: Yes, I believe it was called the European Community. It was not called the European Union, in any case, as the Union did not come into being until the early 1990s.

Q: Was this seen as something that was bound to develop? What were you getting?

ADAMSON: It was seen as a good thing that was developing, and that would no doubt develop further. I’m not sure that in 1975 people anticipated that it would go as far as it has gone by now, 2002. Yet certainly there was a perception that it was developing, that it was a positive thing, and that it would be developing further.

Q: Was there much of a European Community in Strasbourg?

ADAMSON: Since the Council of Europe was there, which is a European intergovernmental institution separate from the European Community, Strasbourg was a very “European” city. There were a lot of international civil servants, European civil servants, and a lot of consciousness of the evolving nature of European integration. But, the primary presence was of the Council of Europe, not of the European Community. There was this sort of peripatetic European Parliament, which would meet in the Council of Europe’s headquarters building from time to time. Still, basically the “European” presence that was there was the Council of Europe, which was a very pronounced presence. There was certainly a sense of European integration. There was also a sense by then that the European community was becoming the place where the action was, and that the Council of Europe was being marginalized except perhaps in its central area of effort, the protection of human rights.

Q: Today is the 26th of June 2002. David, you went to Paris in 1976?

ADAMSON: That is correct.

Q: You were there from when to when?

ADAMSON: I was there from April 1976 to roughly July 1977.

Q: What was your job?

ADAMSON: My job was to serve as executive secretary for the U.S. delegation to the Conference on International Economic Cooperation (CIEC), also known as the North-South Conference. This was a conference that emerged from the international economic turbulence associated with the 1973 Arab/Israeli war and the oil embargo that ensued. There was intensive diplomacy thereafter, trying to get the oil embargo, such as it was, removed. The Arab countries used that as leverage to try to develop a negotiating framework in which concessions would be made to them and to others in the "Third World." Of course, there was pressure on the oil exporters for solidarity from others in the Third World. These were poor countries who did not have oil resources to use as the so-called "oil weapon," which proved to be less than that, to get concessions from the developed countries that would assist in the development of the less developed countries. So, I was the executive secretary of this delegation, which was headed, on a day-to-day basis, by a deputy assistant secretary from the Bureau of Economic and Business Affairs at State, by the name of Steve Bosworth, who by the way, is currently the Dean of the Fletcher School at Tufts University, where I went to graduate school.

Q: We're talking about the end of the administration, when you went out there.

ADAMSON: Yes, we're talking about the end of the Ford administration. Kissinger was Secretary of State.

Q: Kissinger was Secretary. One thing, Kissinger - this not being a prime concern of his, as he was interested in east-west, not north-south relations - how dedicated were we to doing something about North-South issues?

ADAMSON: Kissinger was actually quite interested in this, because this tied into the Arab-Israeli dispute as well as the developed world's so important oil imports. As you will recall, he engaged in all kinds of shuttle diplomacy, in the 1974 to 1976 period, to try to make progress. He also participated in various meetings and negotiations that really gave birth to CIEC, also known as the north-south dialogue. He was actually more interested in this, than he had been in the past in what were seen as economic matters. This really was a political-economic conference. He was not, and the U.S. was not interested in making deep concessions. We were interested in getting a process going that would help to manage these issues, but we were not interested in making enormous concessions. I don't think we believed that this kind of a negotiating forum could really bear fruit. We agreed to this kind of a forum, because it would help to mollify the Third World, and hopefully stabilize the oil markets and lead to a more stable economic climate.

Q: What was our sounding of the European delegations, I mean the major ones?

ADAMSON: The European delegations and the Japanese were probably more interested in this kind of process than we were because of their greater dependence on Middle East oil. The Japanese, of course, were very nervous, because they were totally dependent on oil imports. The Europeans were more dependent than the United States, and they were very interested. Plus, the Europeans and Japanese generally have a more accommodative foreign policy, because they are less self-sufficient in various areas of power than the United States.

Q: Did you find the Europeans and the Japanese a bloc, or were they all sort of doing their own thing?

ADAMSON: The Europeans, at least the European Community nations, were a bloc. In fact, the EC countries were represented in the conference collectively, by the European Community. There were no doubt differences among them, but they did try to negotiate as a block. The Japanese were entirely separate. I would say, they certainly were as close to us as they were to the Europeans, if not closer to us.

Q: Now the representation from the south, where were they coming from?

ADAMSON: There was one other actor from the north. That was Canada. Canada was actually co-chair of the conference, along with Venezuela.

Q: What was Canada's position?

ADAMSON: They saw a leadership role in CIEC as consistent with their foreign policy. They saw themselves, and still do, as being a moderating force in international affairs. They were, however, at that point, and may still be, essentially self-sufficient in energy. They didn't feel directly the pressure from the third world. The Arab countries had limited leverage over them. Nevertheless, their foreign policy was attuned to the third world. They saw themselves and see themselves today as more responsive to the third world than the United States. The third world was represented by various groupings. First, the OPEC countries were very influential. Venezuela was co-chairman of the conference. Saudi Arabia was co-chairman of one of the four commissions - on energy - perhaps the most important one. They co-chaired that with the United States. There were various and sundry third world countries. These represented a pretty wide gamut of both resource rich and resource poor countries.

Q: How did our delegation work? Was it a strong delegation?

ADAMSON: It was a strong delegation. Bosworth was a savvy leader. When we had more senior meetings, the Undersecretary of State for Economic Affairs, first William Rogers, under Kissinger, then Richard Cooper under Cyrus Vance, led the U.S. delegation. They were a knowledgeable group. There was a deputy assistant secretary from the Treasury, John Niehuss, who was there. At the higher level meetings, the Undersecretary of the Treasury, Tony Solomon, was present. So, we had a very capable delegation. Underneath those leaders, we had office directors from State, Treasury, Commerce, and the Energy Administration that existed at that time. The Energy Department didn't yet exist.

Q: What was your impression of the delegations from the oil producing countries? Were they sort of "one," or were they varied?

ADAMSON: They were varied in their outlook. The Saudis were certainly very cooperative with us. The Venezuelans, who co-chaired the conference, had a ministerial level guy, by the name of Manuel Perez Guerrero, leading their delegation. He could be a bit fiery and oratorical, but I think beneath that, he was a practical guy. Some countries like Algeria were more radical in orientation. Others were not so radical. They were more heterogeneous than the developed countries' delegations. The South generally was a heterogeneous group with deep cleavages in it, including between those who had resources such as oil and those who were resource-poor. Of course, they came from many different continents, many different political systems. They were a group that I think had some difficulty coalescing and really exerting significant and coherent leverage.

Q: It sounds like a three-sided school here. You have the major consumers, but they were industrial consumers. You have the oil producers. Then, you have the poor folk, who are out there for an awfully long time, who don't have much to work with, except moral suasion.

ADAMSON: Yes, moral suasion and their link to the OPEC countries. That link was a one-way street. They were really dependent upon the oil producers to pressure the developed countries on their behalf. There was only so far that the producers were willing to go in that direction.

Q: So, how did it work? In the first place, what were you doing? What was your role?

ADAMSON: My role was basically the junior man on the U.S. delegation. So, I did some reporting. I did some note taking. I made sure that reporting went out, that various managerial tasks were taken care of. I was not, by any means, a decision maker or leader, quite the contrary. I was a 25-year old junior officer, basically doing the dirty work.

Q: Of course, from an oral history point of view, this is interesting, because you are the "fly on the wall." This view is as important as somebody who is the decision maker. How did the conference go?

ADAMSON: I would say that in the end, the conference wasn't a hugely productive conference. When these conferences take place, even if they don't produce much, there is always one point of view that says it's better that these people were talking, and letting off steam that way, than being out there acting unilaterally without a larger cooperative framework. That is probably the most you could say about the utility of this conference. I actually studied this conference quite closely and later wrote my doctoral dissertation on it. I came to the conclusion that these kinds of conferences are not generally very effective venues for negotiation because there are too many players with too many disparate interests, to really be able to negotiate effectively. You get into situations with the lowest common denominator results. Generally, from a point of view of achieving concrete results, it tends to not be very useful. In terms of improving the international atmosphere and managing international problems, in a negotiating framework, these kinds of exercises could have some utility. I think this conference did in that respect. It did peter out without achieving the aims of the developing countries. On the other hand, there weren't any great repercussions from that.

Q: Was there any difference with the election of 1976 and the Carter administration? The conference obviously continued. Was there any change, other than the people?

ADAMSON: Yes, there was a change. When the Carter people came in, they were marginally more prepared to accommodate the third world, than the Republican administration had been. So, you had the United States, the Europeans, and the Japanese a little more willing, at the margins, to give at least on paper, what the third world seemed to want, or indicated it wanted. But, I would say, these were marginal changes. They were not really a quantum leap up. Maybe they were sufficient to allow the conference to conclude, even though the conference concluded on a whimper, rather than a very positive bang. Without those marginal changes in U.S. policy, it would have been more difficult to reach a final conclusion.

Q: Was there also a time factor and that by doing this, we could avoid being hit by this oil crunch? How far up was the oil weapon? By doing this, it was occupying time when everybody had to see what the fallout was going to be, and help dissipate the effect.

ADAMSON: This conference was part of a larger diplomatic process that had begun really in late 1973, or early 1974. It helped contain the broader problem. So, I think from the U.S. point of view, it was useful in that respect. Of course, you never know what would have happened had you not taken the road that you took, had this conference not taken place. It's difficult to say. But, I think from our point of view, it was a useful way to manage North-South relations

VICTOR D. COMRAS
Deputy Delegate to COCOM
Paris (1975-1978)

Victor D. Comras was born in New York State in 1943. Comras graduated from Georgetown University in 1964, the University of Florida Law School in 1966, and promptly joined the Foreign Service. While in the Foreign Service, Comras served overseas in Zaire, Nigeria, South Africa, France, Canada and Macedonia. He also worked on the Law of the Sea negotiations. Comras was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2002.

Q: You went to Paris in '75?

COMRAS: Yes.

Q: And you were there until when?

COMRAS: Until 1978. Yes. But, the assignment also disappeared before I got there. Just at the last minute, I received a call from my personnel counselor. He told me that he was going to change my assignment to Beirut. "Vic, we've got a great new opportunity for you in Beirut," he said, "This is a great job. It's above your grade, but you'd be good for it. We want to send you as economic counselor to Beirut." At first I liked the idea. But my wife told me. "You go to Beirut on your own."

Q: Was that before Beirut exploded?

COMRAS: Yes, Beirut appeared to be a great place at that time. Fortunately, I was able to get my personal counselor to hold on to the Paris Assignment for me. Beirut blew up just after we arrived in Paris.

Q: So you were working with COCOM. Could you explain what COCOM was and how you fit in?

COMRAS: COCOM was established in 1948 right around the same time as NATO. After the war there was a burst in creating new post war institutions to reflect the new situation resulting from the aftermath of World War II. The creation of the UN, the post war recovery organizations, the administration of Germany and Japan, and the rise of the communist security threat gave new imperatives for new international institutional frameworks. One such resulting organization - or better arrangement, that resulted was a very secretive Consultative Group that had the objective of depriving the Soviet Union of strategic materials that the Soviet Union could use to expand its military industrial support base and the strength of its armed forces. It was directed at reducing the threat posed by the Soviet Union in the post war period. It sought to develop a limited, but highly coordinated, strategic embargo against the Soviet Union. This would include military equipment, but also critical raw materials, commodities, technology and equipment that might strengthen its military industrial capacity.

The Consultative Group was to serve as a mechanism to coordinate and hold the line among different countries that were in a position to trade with the Soviet Union. Its consultations were very secret. Its controls were very secret and very little information was made public at the time. But this is now all history in the public domain.

The Consultative Committee was initially composed of ministerial level representatives from its member countries. It met in Paris (NATO was located in France at the time) and it fell to the French Government to chair the group. The Group laid down policies to be followed. The work was actually carried out by different coordinating committees. They drew up a list of strategic technology, commodities, and equipment that would not be provided to the Soviet Union or its newly communist dominated satellite states unless all the members of the Consultative Group agreed. The targeted countries included the Soviet Union, the Warsaw pact countries, China and North Korea.

While the embargo agreement was a voluntary one, it reflected the great leverage the United States had over its NATO partners, including the French, at that time. The arrangement literally gave the United States a veto over the export of any of the listed commodities or items. Of course, each country was free to disregard the decisions of the Consultative Group if it felt inclined. But, there was considerable political and economic pressure on them not to do so. This was particularly the case as the United States was providing critical economic and military support to Western Europe at that time. And one must also recall that there was universal concern in Western Europe with the threat posed by the Soviet Union.

The initial members of the Consultative group were the same members as NATO. Its membership grew to include West Germany and Japan. During the period I served in COCOM it had 15 members - all the NATO countries, minus Iceland, plus Japan. It grew subsequently to include South Korea, Australia, and New Zealand.

When De Gaulle took over in France and expelled NATO, it also refused to name a new chairman for the Consultative Group. However, it did not go so far as to expel COCOM, which, after all, was an informal arrangement which continued to be critical to France for both strategic and economic reasons. Since a Chairman was required to call for meetings of the Consultative Group, the work devolved to the various Coordinating Committees. Since they operated so similarly, in time they were merged into one coordinating committee that became known as COCOM for short.

COCOM had its headquarters in Paris on le Rue de Boite “between a hairdresser and a bank”. At least that is how it was subsequently described in an article in Time Magazine. It had a small permanent secretariat. Delegates from the member countries were posted with their bilateral embassies in Paris (or with their missions to the OECD as was the case for the United States). The delegates met twice a week to review matters pertaining to the list and to review requests for export exceptions to the list.

The embargo lists evolved over time. Most raw commodities were removed, and in time, the COCOM lists focused principally on arms, military equipment, nuclear items, and dual use equipment and technology deemed strategic. In the beginning, there were very few requests for exceptions but as time grew there were more and more exceptions.

One of the main ideas behind COCOM, was to create a relatively free trade between the countries of the Western alliance including trade in certain military and nuclear items, and dual use equipment and technology. The United States, for example, would have been reticent to provide western Europe and Japan with access to much of our advanced technology if we could not have been assured that the technology would not slip through such countries to the Soviet Union. COCOM permitted us to draw a strategic trade fence around the Soviet Union and the Warsaw pact, rather than on our own borders. Other non-NATO countries could join this open area if they agreed to provide the same controls that COCOM countries provided.

By the 1970s, COCOM had become a specialized group charged with maintaining and reviewing the control lists, keeping the lists up-to-date as technology evolved, and as a clearing house to air and decide on exceptions to the list. The number of exceptions grew to the thousands per year. Each of these was reviewed on a case by case basis. The delegations would present the information in the case exceptions or against the exceptions sought by others in regular discussions. That was the role of our COCOM delegation.

Q: How would you treat Sweden, for example, which later became a problem? They want a fancy milling thing that's good for making submarine propellers but they could use it for... Could you look at what a country was ordering...

COMRAS: While COCOM itself did not limit sales to non designated countries (i.e., the communist countries) the COCOM member countries understood that they would have to closely review and restrict trade in sensitive commodities to third countries, where there was a risk that the item or technology would be reexported to a COCOM designated country. Each COCOM member had its own export control regulations that addressed these issues. COCOM held discussions from time to time on the need to harmonize these regulations and assure they were adequate to prevent leakage of strategic items to the Soviet Union and its allies. This did encumber trade with a number of third countries and led to special arrangements being made with such third countries to safeguard transferred equipment and technology. Countries like Sweden, Switzerland, and Finland found that they had to negotiate bilateral arrangements that gave full effect to the same COCOM restrictions as COCOM countries. Subsequently, in the early 1980s, under the Reagan Administration a special effort was made to reenforce these bilateral arrangements. That became known as the COCOM Third Country Initiative. I played a major role in designing and implementing this strategy.

If Sweden, wanted to sell anything that involved U.S. technology or any NATO country technology to the Soviet Union, it was obliged itself in the contract of sales to first clear the reexport with COCOM.

I recall one incident that demonstrated both the vulnerabilities and the seriousness of these issues. It involved a request by Sweden to reexport to the Soviet Union a sophisticated Air Traffic Control system for use at the Moscow Airport. The export was to be handled by the Swedish company Datasaab. It was a very controversial request as the equipment was quite sensitive to air defense. But, international air traffic safety also had to be taken into account. Much of the equipment and technology involved was of U.S. origin. COCOM debated that request for almost a year. Finally, a compromise was reached and the sale was approved subject to a number of conditions which were insisted upon by the United States. This involved reconfiguring the air traffic control system to eliminate a number of features which had particular application in Air Defense. Special responsibilities were also placed on Datasaab to carry out close verification and inspection procedures to insure the civilian use of the equipment. There was also a limitation on source software and other spare parts. Sweden agreed to the conditions and the export went ahead.

Subsequently we learned that Datasaab had failed to abide by the conditions that were imposed by the United States and COCOM. They provided the Soviet Union with an air traffic control system that retained the capabilities we had required DataSaab to eliminate from the system. This transaction turned out to be a something of a national security disaster for us.

This information only came to light after DataSaab had gone bankrupt and had been acquired by the much larger Swedish company, Eriksson. The Datasaab case developed into a major scandal in Sweden and a major issue in Swedish American relations.

We eventually got full cooperation from the company officials and the Swedish government to piece together what happened, and what features were actually passed to the Soviet Union. This enabled us to better assess the actual damage done and to take the necessary counter-measures.

Q: When you arrived there, where did this thing fit? Were you a world unto yourselves?

COMRAS: The U.S. COCOM delegation was located in an embassy annex building. But, our office was officially part of the U.S. mission to the OECD. I guess it meant that we really independent from both missions. Our small 5 person office was a world apart. We did our work separately from the embassy and the OECD mission. Much of our work dealt with the reproduction and forwarding of materials related to COCOM. We were responsible for the preparation and submission of U.S. exception requests, and for forwarding the exception requests of other countries to Washington for expert consideration. The two officers were charged with dealing with the substantive issues in the organization.

COCOM was located in an embassy annex building which, as I mentioned before, was located between a bank and a hairdresser. Some of the delegates were full-time just handling COCOM. Some of the delegations had other functions in their embassies besides COCOM. But for the U.S. it was a full-time assignment.

Q: Was there a COCOM building?

COMRAS: No, COCOM had a suite of offices in a U.S. embassy annex - it had almost a whole floor in the Annex Building.

Q: And that was it for the whole organization?

COMRAS: Yes.

Q: Which was multinational.

COMRAS: That's right. It had a multinational secretariat staff. But each person on the secretariat staff was on loan, or was otherwise paid out of funds coming from the various missions participating in COCOM. A formula had been worked out to share these expenses. For example, Italy provided the chairman of the COCOM and the Italian government paid his, and his secretary's salary. They also paid the cost of maintaining them in Paris.

Q: How did this group work together?

COMRAS: Very good. We all became very close friends and colleagues. Our sessions were very gentle and very friendly, although we could have our barbs. It was a good working environment and a good team. There were two kinds of meetings. Most of the regular meetings were at the delegation level. These were held on a regular basis and handle the day to day issues. But, special meetings were also held with higher level officials and/or experts from capitals to discuss policy or technical issues.

Q: I would think that, here you're trying to figure out how to stop the Soviets from gaining technical advantages, but what the hell would you know about this?

COMRAS: Most of our work was based on either general or specific instructions from Washington. But, the delegations themselves were quite adept at filling in the gaps in these instructions. We also dealt with the nuances, the advocacy, and the general diplomatic side of how to insure our instructions were well presented, respected and accepted or rejected. We also provided a very important channel back to Washington regarding the attitudes expressed by others. Of course, our work was also supplemented by direct approaches in Capitals on critical or controversial issues. We often generated such activities when we felt such interventions were necessary. We were the experts at working the system.

Q: I would think you would find yourself playing the traditional role where the Department of Defense doesn't want to let anything get out at all. The Department of Commerce says, "Hey, these are sales" and is pushing for that. The State Department is kind of in between.

COMRAS: That was just about the way it was.

Q: Then for Germany, I imagine that their salespeople were stronger than their defense people. And the French the same way.

COMRAS: With strategic trade controls there is a built in tension between commercial and national security interests. This tension is compounded by the factor of multiple sources and international competition. The Soviet Union and its allies were very adept at playing off one source with another. And not all the COCOM countries evaluated the national security costs or risks the same way that we did. After all, the United States footed the largest bill for the common defense. So there was always a lot of tension, and some intrigue, associated with each exception request. And this game was not always played just in COCOM. Not everything would happen in COCOM itself. A lot was happening around us, through bilateral channels government to government, embassy to embassy. A French company that wanted to sell something used its own representatives and employed its own lobbyists to get the necessary approvals through the Commerce Department and the Defense Department. The French government used its own bilateral channels to push the USG to approve their exception in COCOM. Still, since we at COCOM knew the system best, and how it worked, we were often very valuable players for everybody in this process.

Some of our colleagues in COCOM limited their role to only delivering their instructions and reporting back on the outcome. Others, like the U.S. Delegation were very active players. I was very much engaged in the COCOM process. I developed very valuable knowledge and experience concerning the COCOM process, and I was able to bring that skill back with me to Washington. It served me particularly well in subsequent years when I took over the responsibilities for Strategic Trade issues and COCOM in the Office of East West Trade.

Q: We'll stop at this point.

Today is April 23, 2002. '75-'78. We've talked about COCOM in general. Let's get specific. What were some of the issues that stick in your mind?

COMRAS: I arrived at COCOM in 1975, at the height of the U.S.-Soviet Union period of détente. I recall that many of my colleagues in State were beginning to believe that COCOM should be dropped or at least modified. In fact, some thought that COCOM had already been dropped altogether. Some of my colleagues were surprised when I told them that I was going to COCOM, and that it still played a major role in East-West Trade. Trade relations with the Soviet Union had increased significantly through the 1970s. More and more exceptions were being granted in COCOM. Refusals were becoming increasingly rare. There was also increasing pressure to liberalize the COCOM lists themselves. The list had been amended several times since the adoption of an almost total embargo of the early 1950s. Since the United States was by far the most advanced in high technology and since the way COCOM worked, we had a veto on any changes to the list, any shortening of the list - removal of technology and equipment from the list - was subject to our veto. We also had a veto on any exceptions from the list. We held a very powerful seat in COCOM.

We had technology that other countries wanted and we had the ability to stop them from selling items and technology to the East at least openly. Every COCOM member government was always free to do what it wanted. Some violated COCOM openly, some covertly. But those occasions were relatively rare. There were times when countries completely disregarded COCOM. This included the United States. Some of our first trade with China was conducted without reference to COCOM. But, for the most part, COCOM played a major role in coordinating strategic trade and strategic trade policies within the Atlantic Alliance. It played a major role in permitting the West to preserve and increase its technological lead over the Soviet Union, and to win the arms race. It made it significantly more difficult and expensive for the Soviet Union to compete with the West economically and militarily. COCOM certainly played its part in helping us win the arms race. It also played an important role in the downfall of the communist system in the Soviet Union and the Warsaw pact.

Q: Were there sometimes issues that would come up and we would say, "Let's not even raise that because it doesn't make sense. If we raise it, then we have to take action?"

COMRAS: Right. There was an understanding that certain things would be talked about bilaterally among the countries that were most interested. Not everything was vetted in COCOM. But that was still the exception rather than the rule. Many believed that the U.S. used its leverage in COCOM to apply its own strategic export controls extra-territorially. The other countries generally looked to the U.S. to lead in policy. If the U.S. had no problem with an export, they shouldn't have a problem. However, there was a suspicion that the U.S. might also be using COCOM to gain trade advantage. For example, the U.S. might be the first to approve a large strategic export to a Communist Country. The Warsaw pact countries also might have believed that if the export was to be made by an American firm, the U.S. government would be under greater pressure to approve the export they would be if the export was to be made by a company in another COCOM adhering country. On the other hand, applying for an export from another country might also serve to place greater pressure on the U.S. to grant the license.

Q: And also we were the schoolteacher, making people stick by the rules more or less. If we weren't doing it, nobody else would do it.

COMRAS: That's right. But that was kind of a snapshot of the situation. The pressure for liberalization was always there from our business community, from our détente impulses, and from our new openings to China. So, while I was in COCOM I witnessed a growing more liberal, favorable attitude towards exceptions to the COCOM lists.

However, I should tell you that back home in Washington there were many conservatives and others that were beginning to believe that we were giving away the store. This was certainly the case in the Pentagon. There was growing criticism and concern that perhaps we were liberalizing our strategic trade restrictions too quickly. And there was increasing intelligence and other information that the Soviet Union was becoming increasingly adept at circumventing the COCOM controls in place - that they were getting their hands on some very advanced western technology. I began to see growing pressure from the Defense Department to hold back this liberalizing trend. As I said the number of exceptions began to grow exponentially. This gave rise to increased calls from the other COCOM countries for a reduction in the Lists and the establishment of new mechanisms to streamline the exception approval process. The more exceptions that were requested, the longer the backlog of exception cases grew, and the longer it seemed to take to get any exception request through the national and COCOM review process. Companies, and subsequently countries, began to complain loudly in Washington that the COCOM process was inhibiting their legitimate business and trade interests. This in turn gave rise to increased rivalry and jockeying for position vis a vis potential Warsaw pact clients. There were also suspicions that the U.S. would delay other country cases while pushing ahead on its own.

Q: What do you mean by "delay?"

COMRAS: When an exception request was presented, it was referred back to capitals for full analysis. Although COCOM rules provided a specific timetable, it was easy to get extensions of time to review cases. If the U.S. felt overly pressed for a response, it would simply object to the export, pending further review. When exception requests were sent back to Washington, they would be circulated around the various interested agencies. This usually included the Commerce Department, the Defense Department, CIA and State. Some cases would also involve the Department of Energy, the NRC and perhaps even NASA. All the agencies had to agree. Often, they disagreed, and that entailed further delay to work out their differences. Sometimes this took 10 to 12 months or more. Some cases had to go to the White House for final resolution. In the early stages of COCOM, cases could generally be disposed of quickly. The agencies would quickly say "No" and the export was stopped unless the Defense Department really wasn't worried about it. But, during détente, a Defense Department "no" was often challenged by the Commerce or State Department. So the delay factor became a growing problem within COCOM during my tenure there. Delay also became a growing irritant in our relations with other countries. The result was increasing pressure to liberalize and shorten the COCOM lists.

Q: I would imagine that another factor would be that if this was a European outfit that wanted to do something, it would have a lower priority back in Washington.

COMRAS: That often was the case, but sometimes it appeared that way more than the actual fact. The first step in processing an export license request was to have it viewed domestically. Before the U.S. submitted an exception request to COCOM it had already vetted the case at home and decided on approval. So the case would stay in COCOM for a relatively short time before being approved. However, other countries would often just send the case directly to COCOM for review, and then await the U.S. position in COCOM. The case would only get reviewed when in COCOM. They took the view that if the export was ok'ed by the U.S., they should have no objection to it. So, when a U.S. case was going to go to COCOM, it had already been vetted in Washington. COCOM review, could be handled rapidly for the most part. This made it appear that there was little COCOM delay in handling U.S. cases. However, other countries cases in COCOM got held up for months while the case was being reviewed in Washington. This made it look like the U.S. was holding up other cases, while its own were being processed quickly. In fact, both U.S. and non-U.S. exports were subjected to the same, often time consuming review - U.S. cases before they got to COCOM and other cases after they got to COCOM.

There was another factor also at play during my tenure in COCOM. Other countries were beginning to close the technology gap with the United States. They began to compete directly in many areas of high technology. The percentage of U.S. components, or U.S. source technology began to diminish. This weakened U.S. leverage with regard to the exports of such items. This also gave rise to increased pressures to reform the COCOM lists.

The Soviet Union and the Warsaw pact countries began to play on this growing intra Western competition. They looked increasingly to other countries for their purchases, and they favored equipment that did not contain U.S. origin components. This became a costly business for U.S. OEMs. This gave rise to increasing pressure in the U.S. business community, also, for export control and COCOM list reform.

Q: Who were the operative people who would say, "Okay, we've got to do something about this" and do something about it?

COMRAS: Our instructions came from the State Department's Office of East West Trade. But the major players in Washington were the Commerce Office of Export Administration and two offices in the Defense Department - the Office of the Secretary of Defense which dealt with export control policy and another office known to me as DDR&E which looked closely at the technology and its military implications. All of these offices, agreed, for their own purposes with the need to begin to undertake some reform of our Export Control system including the operations of COCOM.

But, along comes 1978 and 1979 and the Soviet invasions of Poland and Afghanistan. Détente is put on hold. The U.S. begins to reconsider its relations with the Soviet Union and to review the advances that the Soviet Union has made in its own military technology. Much of this, it happens was either purchased or stolen from the West. The Carter Administration orders a full review of our export control system, including COCOM. Not with the intent of liberalizing, but, rather, to reassess what we should do to preserve our technology advantage and slow down the advance of Soviet armaments.

Q: Yes. Was that comparable to the '68 invasion of Czechoslovakia?

COMRAS: No, I don't think it was quite as dramatic. But, I do think it had major consequences. It changed our whole attitude towards the Soviet Union. It led to the imposition of new sanctions - the grain embargo - it led to a tightening of our export regulations and administration, it suspended further liberalization in COCOM and it helped elect Ronald Reagan. It ushered in a new period of concern with the nuclear and military threat posed by the Soviet Union.

As I mentioned previously, a number of stories began to appear about how the Soviet Union had acquired sensitive high technology from the West. They reported that the Soviet Union had succeeded in circumventing many of the COCOM controls and had gained technology and equipment in areas that we would never have let them have. More and more of these stories came out about the failure of COCOM to adequately control high technology. Blame was placed on a common failure by our allies to provide sufficient monitoring and enforcement over their export controls. There was a significant mood change. Rather than liberalize, there was now pressure to reinvigorate COCOM. The Europeans shared this attitude to a point, but those concerns faded rapidly when the initial shocks wore off. The election of Ronald Reagan reenforced our own desires for a more stringent set of export controls.

One has to also consider that during this period - early '78 through the early '80s, Europe was in an economic recession. The Soviet Union and the Warsaw pact countries were very tempting markets for European high tech companies that risked going out of business. There was a great loss of jobs in those industries throughout Europe. If they could sell to this new and growing and exciting market to the east, they might be able to stave off closing. So, there was enormous pressure within Europe to liberalize and to sell to the Warsaw Pact countries.

Q: I've noticed this even today dealing with Iraq and other places, that there seems to be almost a game that goes on that the Europeans almost depend on the U.S. to be their conscience and to be the tough guy making them do things where they can almost feel free to try to see what they can get away with and pursue trying to sell things because it means good business and almost depending on the United States to make them be a bit careful about over arming potential enemies.

COMRAS: That's been true for a while. European countries, particularly the smaller ones have either been unable, or unwilling, to devote the same level of resources and expert review to vet each dual use export. It is simply easier to rely on the U.S. However, when it comes to challenging a negative U.S. position, these countries sometimes decided to devote a greater expert effort to respond to U.S. concerns. Their attitude was, "Why should we do this if the Americans are going to do it? Let's just take the piece of paper, we'll look at it, we'll be good guys to our business, we'll grant it, and we don't have to take the political heat for any denials. In any event, we don't have the resources or the personnel to figure out whether this should go or not. We'll ship it over to the Americans and then they're going to study this thing to death anyway. If they've got real problems with it, they're going to kill it. What the hell, let them..."

Q: "And then we can scream and yell and point to our business and say, 'We want to do it, but those damned Americans.'"

COMRAS: Yes. Hiding behind the American skirts became a regular tactic. However, sometimes they wanted to show their independence from the U.S. This was often the case for the French, who often challenged our rationale for denying a French export. They could apply considerable pressure, and sometimes used linkage as a tactic to push their cases through. The Germans, the British and the Italians also took to increasingly challenge U.S. negative positions as time went on. And later on even the Japanese began to express their own independent considerations, political considerations in their own trade relationships, with the Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact. Each of these countries increasingly felt - and the Soviet Union played well into this - that this kind of trade had enormous political and foreign policy overtones and that there were many reasons that the Europeans wanted to be able to deal on their own with their own foreign policy interests towards the East. Their relations with Poland were a good example. And the Europeans perhaps quicker than the Americans envisaged a day where Europe might be as the Europeans even began to talk in the mid-'80s, this European home. They wanted to be the first out of the block. If they perceived that eventually the United States was going to liberalize, then they wanted to be at the forefront of such liberalization. They were resentful that we would change our policy and be the first out and then we would be holding them back. Our companies, they feared, would know if we were willing to change or become more liberal before foreign companies knew. This would give our companies, they felt, a commercial advantage. To prevent this they would regularly test the envelope so they could be out in front and as soon as we would change our policy, they'd be in the market before us. This was a period of great computer technological advances. New technology companies were right at the cusp of profitability in a number of countries. These countries were pushing for further technology investments. But they also remained heavily reliant on new U.S. technology. They needed to keep us on board and willing to allow technology transfers to their shores. You add to that several other factors that play into this very complex picture.

At that time COCOM consisted of the NATO countries, minus Iceland plus Japan. But, a number of other countries were beginning to experience new technological advances, and wanted to be able to share in the same relatively open market for technology transfers that the NATO countries were enjoying. They wanted to be in the same circle. This included Sweden, Finland, Switzerland, Singapore, Taiwan, Korea. Many other countries were also beginning to create and replicate the same technological capabilities that the COCOM countries had.

To some degree, the United States retained through this period a degree of control because it was the source of much of the base technology and equipment needed by these countries. By the early 1980s when I am back in Washington, these factors are all prominent forces that are influencing our strategic export policies.

Q: During this '75-'78 period, Israel was the beneficiary of a lot of our technology. It also was adding its own embellishments. They were also playing a game with the Soviets of getting the Soviets to let Jews out and were offering goodies for the Soviets mainly to get Soviet Jews out. Were we looking at Israel as being a leak?

COMRAS: No. During this period Israel was only a marginal player in the high tech area. They became more important later on. Many of the items that were in Israel were subject to the U.S. reexport licensing requirements. In fact, during that period of time, relations were not that favorable with the Soviets. When detente came to a halt in late 1970s, there was no significant trade moving between Israel and the Soviet Union. The aftermath of the '72-'73 Middle East war had cooled relations between Israel and the Soviet Union even further. So, Israel was not viewed as a source of leakage of western technology to the Soviet Union.

However, there was a growing concern during this period with leakage from the emerging high tech markets in Southeast Asia, and in Sweden and Finland. They were all active in the Soviet market at that time.

Still the Soviet Union was most interested in gaining access to the most advanced new technologies available only in the United States.

Q: Were we concerned about Americans who were going after the fast buck?

COMRAS: Yes. There were a couple of transactions that stand out during that time.. The most serious issue was a case of the sale of an air traffic control system to the Soviet Union from Sweden.. We had put very significant and severe conditions on what they could sell before we had agreed to it. They accepted those conditions and then ignored them and sold a system that created enormous problems for us later. There were other problems that arose. In the late '70s, there was a major anti-trust lawsuit against IBM which dealt with the issue of the software and the interfaces with what were the mainframe computers where IBM had a near monopoly, if not a monopoly. As part of the settlement of that case, it was agreed that IBM would have to publish its whole series of technology related to its interfaces so that others could make equipment that could be components and peripherals to IBM mainframes and open up the market to other countries. All of a sudden, all this control technology was beginning to appear in textbooks and in other non-classified sources. The Russians move in very quickly to take advantage of this. They used this new publicly available information to design their own interfaces and systems and began to replicate IBM technology. They also did a lot of work on reverse engineering stolen equipment and components. The Soviet Union tried to copy as much Western technology as they could. In fact, there new generation computers were based largely on the published data and interface material and other replicated and reverse engineered components. This is the technology that they were targeting during this whole period of time. The machine tool area and the chip area and the computer technology area were the real big areas of concern. Israel and some other states weren't into that kind of stuff.

Q: How about Taiwan and South Korea? Was there any talk about bringing them into the COCOM circle.

COMRAS: Not in the 1970s. But later in the 1980s. In 1982 when I came back into export control - I was doing Law of the Sea from 1978-1980 - Taiwan and South Korea, along with Singapore, Malaysia and Indonesia were getting into high tech. This gave rise to a new policy debate in the United States. It also led to the adoption of a new U.S. strategy to broaden out the COCOM cooperating countries circle to include these countries. This became known as the Third Country Initiative, which basically brought these countries into COCOM without their actually sitting at the COCOM table. They agreed to abide by the same strictures as COCOM. This, in turn, led to a new round of COCOM and export control reforms.

GEORGE JAEGER

Political Officer/Deputy Counselor
Paris (1975-1978)

Mr. Jaeger was born in Austria and raised in Austria, England and the US. Evacuated from Austria to Holland and England, he immigrated to the US. After serving in the US Army he was educated at St. Vincent College and Harvard University. He joined the State Department in 1951 and the Foreign Service (USIA) in 1953. Primarily a Political Officer, Mr. Jaeger served in Washington several times as well as in Monrovia, Zagreb, Berlin, Bonn, Geneva, Paris, Quebec (Consul General), Ottawa (Political Counselor) and Brussels (Deputy Assistant Secretary General of NATO for Political Affairs. His final assignment was Diplomat in Residence at Middlebury College. Mr. Jaeger was interviewed by Robert Daniels in 2000.

JAEGER: To my delight and surprise I was next assigned as First Secretary for Political Affairs in the American Embassy in Paris: Delight because this was obviously a challenging assignment, surprise because I didn't have more than a smattering of high school French and so had never expected to be sent to this very sought-after post.

Personnel explained that they wanted me there to help strengthen the Political section which apparently had some problems, and packed me off to FSI for three months of intensive French from which I 'graduated' just before Christmas of 1974.

Q: And then you were off.

JAEGER: Yes. Pat, our infant daughter Christina and I arrived to a warm welcome from my new boss, Political Counselor Hank Cohen - later Assistant Secretary for African Affairs - who met us at the airport and took us to our temporary quarters. As it turned out, I had hardly time to settle into my new office when word came from Washington that they wanted me to go to Geneva on a temporary assignment to help Ambassador Sherer and his delegation negotiate the Helsinki Final Act!

For Pat this was particularly hard, since, after 58 false starts, she had finally found a wonderful large apartment for us overlooking Place d'Auteuil in the 16th Arrondissement. What's more, our shipment of effects had just been delivered and stood around in large not yet unpacked cases, when I had to explain that, for an as yet unspecified number of months, she would be on her own in Paris!

Q: When the Geneva conference ended in July 1975 you went back to the Embassy in Paris?

JAEGER: Yes, still another beginning in, what in retrospect, was one of the most challenging assignments of my career. As second ranking officer in the Embassy's large Political Section I now had broad reporting and policy responsibilities for France's east-west relations; a charge later expanded to include France's Western-European and Mediterranean relations, including special issues like Cyprus and Portugal's struggle to become a democratic country. Still later, I was made Deputy Political Counselor, a new position which was created for me, with management responsibility for the work of the section.

Q: That sounds like quite a challenge!

JAEGER: The trick was keeping all these balls in the air, while making and maintaining effective contacts at the Quai d'Orsay, the Elysee, among Paris's intellectual and journalist elite and with its many Embassies, including the Soviet and the swath of Iron Curtain Missions.

Personally it was a wonderful, if often stressful, time. Pat, Christina and I gradually settled into our lovely top-floor apartment overlooking the Place d'Auteuil, with its bustling, colorful biweekly market, the Auteuil subway station and an oyster merchant virtually at our door. Our kitchen was cramped and separated from our elegant dining room, with its French windows, by a too long corridor which made serving hot food a daily challenge. But these shortcomings were made up for by the large and airy formal rooms which were ideal both for our family life and for entertaining. Christina, now five, was enrolled at Notre Dame des Oiseaux on Rue Michel Ange, virtually around the corner, came to speak French like a native and, I think, rather liked playing Madeleine in this strange new world.

In due course, we even shared a weekend get-away from the pressures of Paris with our colleagues Bob and Mette Beecroft - a damp gatehouse on an estate owned by dour and impecunious Lionel Armand Delisle, near Dampierre in the Beauce - whose chimney smoked uncontrollably whenever a fire was lit to overcome the cold.

Getting there, or anywhere beyond the city confines, involved hours of fighting Paris weekend traffic. But the rewards were long walks on the paths crisscrossing the wooded estate, picnics and games, and the special fun of surreptitiously liberating a few of Delisle's thousands of pheasants which he kept penned up, to be released from time to time for his commercial 'hunts', when rich Germans popped away at them and were then rewarded with an 'authentic' hunters' banquet at the chateau - decked out and candle-lit for the occasion. Although Armand Delisle suspected that I was the culprit, I redeemed myself when I found and returned his beloved riding horse, one day, which had gone astray.

When, after some months, the smoke and damp of our gatehouse had lost their charm we rented a more comfortable weekend retreat from Jacques Leprette, then French Ambassador to the UN - an ancient farm house near Toucy in northern Burgundy, which, with its ancient windmill, overlooked the wheat field where Charlemagne's nephews had divided France at the Battle of Fontenoy in 841 AD. That battle, according to recent research, was a huge affair which left tens of thousands dead. Ironically, the short inscription on the nineteenth century obelisk commemorating the carnage does not lament this first failure to maintain a united Europe, but remarks with unabashed nationalism, that "it was here that the victory of Charles the Bald, separated France from the Western Empire and established the independence of the French nation".

Q: Hardly surprising for the time, although not quite the text they would choose if the monument were to be replaced.

JAEGER: History aside, our weekend perch in Burgundy was a marvelous place from which to explore Burgundy's ancient towns and villages, including Autun, Cluny and other medieval treasures, the area's fabulous vineyards, and, last but not least, the region's many restaurants, among the best in France. I also discovered that French officialdom in Paris was one thing, but that 'la France profonde' lived in the Provinces, where people were warm and outgoing, Americans were welcomed for their roles in two World Wars, and where all French politicians ultimately had their roots.

I am digressing.

Q: Right, but still relevant and interesting. Let's go back now to the challenges you faced in getting started in the Political Section and with your work at the Quai d'Orsay and elsewhere. Tell us first a bit about the Political Section and the Embassy.

JAEGER: We were a section of 19 political officers - somewhat an overstatement since almost half were from the Station and kind of floated in and out.

Q: Are we supposed to infer from that what was going on?

JAEGER: Well, if you like. Particularly after I was made Deputy Counselor, I was supposed to know them all but didn't. So it was sometimes disconcerting when somebody I had never seen before would come gushing up to us at a cocktail party and say, "Oh, my husband is enjoying so much working in your section." I would, of course, smile brightly and then say to Pat, "Who the hell was that?"

Q: Laughter

JAEGER: To get back to the point, the regular members of the Political Section were a brilliant bunch. The Counselor, Hank Cohen, an outstanding Africanist, French expert and gifted analyst, focused mainly on the French left and was adept at running productive staff discussions. He would introduce some major question and deftly weave everyone's contributions into a coherent whole, which would then form the basis of a major, often very perceptive telegram. Hank was much less gifted as a manager. In his Oral History of the period he describes the very capable but strong-willed officers in this Political Section as typically 'superior' 'Europeanists', a description clearly not meant as a compliment which said more about Hank's own insecurities than the generally very high caliber of his staff. From my perspective the main problem was his cautious, self-protective management style - he would simply disappear into his office and type away on telegrams - which left the obvious conflicts in the section unresolved and me often in the middle.

The key problems, when I arrived, were between John Dobrin, a brilliantly verbal, undisciplined youngish officer and so-so drafter, who would come in when he pleased and do what he wanted - but who knew France better than any of us and had developed extraordinary contacts with the French left, including Francois Mitterrand and other key people in the Socialist and Communist parties.

On the other end of the spectrum was Marvin Humphries, the Embassy's high-strung, intensely turf-conscious tall and handsome Political/Military Officer, who was in constant combat with Dobrin, whom he despised, and who also had major difficulties with the Brigadier General who was the Embassy's Military Attaché and others. Marvin prepared for my arrival by letting it be known at the Quai d'Orsay that I was a junior officer who worked for him, and that he should always be consulted if anything I said produced questions or doubts. Needless to say, it took some effort and time to set the record straight.

Things improved markedly when Humphries was replaced by competent and relaxed John Kelly - who later became Ambassador to Lebanon and Finland and Assistant Secretary for Near Eastern Affairs; although Marvin gave us one last, horrendous shock when we learned from news reports that, some months after he had returned to Washington, he had shot his two young sons and his lovely wife, whom we all knew and liked, and then committed suicide! He was a deeply troubled personality whose illness should have been diagnosed and dealt with long before.

Q: How horrible. No wonder there were problems! What were the rest like?

JAEGER: Varied and uniformly able. In no particular order, there was Mark Pratt, our experienced Far East and Vietnam expert, who helped Henry Kissinger on his frequent meetings with the Vietnamese in Paris, and was famous for the mounds of classified and other papers which always graced his desk and produced endless security violations and for the superb Chinese dinners which he prepared for the favored, which sometimes included Pat and myself, in his bachelor digs. There was 'Frecky' (Fredrick) Vreeland, the urbane son of Diana Vreeland, our UN expert, who may also have had other less visible duties, perhaps having to do with his long relationship with the king of Morocco and others at the top levels of the social world. I will never forget the day the phone rang and a deep feminine voice said hoarsely: "Is Frecky there? This is the Duchess of Windsor!" There was also Chuck Redman, a bright, gifted young officer, joined the French internal politics reporting unit, did excellent work and enhanced amity. He later became Department spokesman. I should also mention Phil Rizik, the scion of a Washington clothing store, who headed the internal unit and did a fairly competent job, although managing Dobrin was beyond him.

Q: Was Hank Cohen there throughout your tour?

JAEGER: No, he was replaced for a few months in '77 by Jack Myerson, a delightful, experienced Europeanist who had just finished a gig as Ambassador to the UN Economic and Social Council and was in a holding pattern before becoming the Embassy's highly respected Economic Counselor: A voluntary step down which enabled him to live in Paris. Jack and I had met and become friends years earlier through Pat, who had known him in Brussels and were both delighted at this chance to work together. He was soon replaced by Warren Zimmerman, who was to become famous as our 'last Ambassador to Yugoslavia'. Warren ran the place like the serious pro he was, did a brilliant job at developing high-level contacts and raised the work of the Section to a new level. As his then Deputy I much liked and greatly admired him.

Q: Before we get back to your work, tell us briefly about the Ambassadors during your time.

JAEGER: The first was the same Kenneth Rush for whom I had worked in Bonn. He had, in the meantime, been Nixon's Deputy Secretary of Defense and Deputy Secretary of State and, after Nixon's resignation, had been asked by President Ford to take on Paris. He was a thoroughly nice man, consistently kind and appreciative of our work, but didn't speak a word of French and, in spite of his years in Bonn, didn't have a deep understanding of European affairs. The residence at rue Saint Honoré reflected his mid-western background and tastes, mostly American cowboy pictures and wild west stuff. French officialdom, predictably, did not relate to him or appreciate his mild but frequent English-language admonitions through which he thought he was advancing American positions. Rush and his wife did not seem to notice, and, instead of getting to know the real France, spent a good deal of time visiting and hobnobbing with France's now largely impotent aristocracy in their various great chateaus.

Q: Sounds like a typical political appointee.

JAEGER: Well, maybe a shade above, since he really was a kind and good-hearted man. He became a burden only when he went on official trips to various parts of France, because he required major, grotesquely detailed briefing books for every stop he made, even if it was only at a 'mairie' in some minor town.

There were also some major gaffes which made the rounds of Paris, such as the one about Mr. and Mrs. Rush's visit to Chartres cathedral, whose dignitaries, as you would expect, had put on a big show. After the presiding bishop had shown them the stained glass windows and discoursed on the cathedral's history, he invited them to join him in going up the tower to enjoy the famous view of the town and its surrounding countryside. At which, and I can vouch for this since I was there, Mrs. Rush famously blurted out, "Kenny, do we really have to? My feet hurt!" "Well, honey," Rush replied, "in that case, maybe we better cut this short, and let's just go straight to lunch." The French, of course, were appalled. I recount this not to ridicule but to explain why he probably was not our most distinguished Ambassador to France.

Q: Did he launch any worthwhile new projects?

JAEGER: Yes. He thought all of us should find out first hand what people were thinking across France during the run-up to the important municipal elections, in which Francois Mitterrand's Socialist-Communist alliance threatened, to Washington's chagrin, to carry the day. Some grumbled that in a country as centralized as France one can follow the regional press and opinion polls from one's office and so get elections right without making long time-consuming trips. The counter-argument was that many of the politicians with their fingers on the pulse were local mayors or had other hometown roles and were more available in the provinces than they were in Paris. I for one strongly agreed that we could all benefit from the chance to spend over a week out of the office interviewing journalists, mayors and ordinary people in the provinces.

I, for my trip, had drawn the south-west, starting my explorations in Limoges and Périgueux and then drove on through small towns and villages to Cahors and Albi. At each stop I was overcome by the unexpected warmth of people, who might or might not have given me much time in Paris, who were clearly delighted that I had come to see them in their home towns. As a result there were many long and informative discussions over splendid meals in cozy local restaurants. My only trouble was that I was invariably asked if I would try the specialty of the region, which, just as invariably, was delicious, but very rich cassoulet de confit d'oie, washed down with great local wines and finished with desserts and vintage armagnacs.

So I came back to Paris noticeably heavier than I had left, but a good deal more aware what France was thinking and, for that matter, what it was all about. The trip was also an opportunity to see things I might otherwise have missed, such as the vineyards of Cahors, the fortress church in Albi with its frightening murals which mother church erected to remind future generations what it could do to heretics, and the almost mystic beauty of the French countryside in the cold mists of early March.

All in all Rush was right to send us out of town, although our basic prediction, that Mitterrand's Socialist/Communist coalition would sweep the municipal election remained unchanged. As it turned out the left won 155 of 221 cities and towns with populations over 30,000.

Q: Well, Rush did make a contribution after all. Who followed him?

JAEGER: Arthur Hartman arrived later in 1977 and could not have been more different: A superb career Foreign Service officer, who had just been Assistant Secretary for European Affairs, Hartman had the stature and breadth of experience the job called for and, with the help of his gifted wife Donna, immediately took Paris by storm.

For starters, out went the cowboy pictures, to be replaced by an eye-popping collection of French art, including Monet's, Manet's and other famous French impressionists and post-impressionists. It seems that before their arrival, Mrs. Hartman had persuaded American museums to loan them to the Embassy for display in the residence. When the French Foreign Minister arrived for their first glittering reception on rue St. Honoré he was clearly blown away: "My goodness, Mrs. Hartman," I heard him say, "you have a Monet!" Mrs. Hartman replied with little smile, "Ah, but you see, Mr. Minister, that's only the first! The rest are coming later."

Q: Laughter

JAEGER: In short the Hartman's, both fluent in French, made a terrific impression and from the outset greatly improved the quality of our relationship.

Q: Hartman, I believe, went to Moscow after Carter sent him to Paris and was very well thought of there too.

JAEGER: That's right. From our perspective in the Political Section, life also became less stressful. Out went the immensely time-consuming briefing books, because Art Hartman was a pro who knew what to do. Instead Art welcomed new thinking, appreciated good reporting and creative recommendations. I always thought of this tall, aquiline, fast-moving but graceful man as our Jewish Prince.

Q: You yourself had to learn French to manage this assignment. How did you make out?

JAEGER: That recalls a funny story. One of my very first calls at the Quai d'Orsay was on Ives Omnes, the Director of Soviet and Eastern European Affairs, who was to be one of my main contacts for my work on Soviet and satellite issues.

Needless to say, my French was still pretty wobbly and I was, understandably, somewhat nervous. Omnes greeted me warmly in French and, after I sat down at his desk, explained that he had been concerned that Washington may not completely understand all the nuances of the then French policy toward the satellites and the USSR and proposed a series of five meetings, in which he would set out and explain French East-West policy.

When he saw that I was ready to take notes, he began his first disquisition, talked for almost an hour and then sent me off. Together these five initial meetings produced a really remarkable series of telegrams, because the French had never before, to my knowledge, so systematically laid out their Soviet and east-west thinking for us. Even so, writing them was a nightmare, since, with my still rather limited French, I was continually worried that Omnes might have said something that I had misunderstood or that I had missed something important, and so sent Washington off in the wrong direction.

The surprise came when we met for the last of this series and Omnes looked at me with a kindly smile and said in perfect Oxford English: "Well, George, I think you've now worked hard enough, and you've made some progress. Why don't we do this one in English!"

Q: Laughter.

JAEGER: I had evidently passed the test, and, as it turned out, the telegrams all this produced were all right as well! In time my French got pretty good and became a major asset.

Q: I was going to ask you earlier, how you managed the language issue in the Geneva negotiations.

JAEGER: We had simultaneous translation into all the key languages, linguists in little booths which were set up in each conference room, with wires running all over the place. We could both listen to others and speak in English...

Q: ...with radio headsets.

JAEGER: Yes. It really worked very efficiently. But living and working in France was quite another matter. The French are often ridiculed for their insistence on the use of French. Its partly a matter of survival, since they don't want to be submerged linguistically, and partly a matter of cultural self respect. I suspect we would do the same thing if the tables were reversed.

Q: So your initial job was to cover France's east-west relations?

JAEGER: Yes. Reporting on and analyzing French east-west relations was the core job. This had all sorts of ramifications beyond Paris' bilateral relations with Moscow, including the evolving SALT and other arms control developments, CSCE issues, Berlin, GDR and FRG policy, as well as France's often rather special relations with Poland and the other Soviet satellites.

Given France's tendency to play at the margins of Western policy toward Moscow and its satellites as a way of enhancing its own role, some of this was fairly tricky, since Paris sometimes went to some lengths to keep us in the dark. Given Moscow's involvement in the French Communist party, which was then still quite influential, my work also involved some aspects of French domestic issues.

Later, as I think I mentioned, I was also asked to take on French Mediterranean policy, including Portugal's precarious transition to a left-leaning democracy under Mario Soares and Cyprus. In 1977 I was made Deputy Political Counselor, a new position created for me, with responsibility for the day-to-day management of the Political Section and was asked to add French Western European relations to my portfolio. To round things out we had intensely energy and time consuming visits by Jimmy Carter, French elections, a visit by Brezhnev, not to mention the world's highest rate of Congressional visits.

Q: Maybe we could get a sense how you managed all this if you were to describe an average working day.

JAEGER: Well, it was nothing like the popular idea people have of the relaxed life of striped-pants diplomats. Virtually every evening there was either a national day reception or some other social function followed by a dinner offered by another Embassy, French friends or someone on our staff. Frequently we ourselves would entertain, a big job for Pat, since we didn't have help and she put on the whole show by herself. Her peak performance was a sit-down Thanksgiving dinner for twenty-two, a memorable occasion at which the distinguished French lady at my right skeptically held up something on her fork for my inspection and asked me "exactly what it was?" It, I explained, is a "sweet potato" - which she then made plain was clearly not part of Paris' culinary repertoire! But then cultural relations are never easy!

Q: So all this socializing was important?

JAEGER: Of course. It was one way of meeting all sorts of people, across the spectrum of government and the diplomatic corps, in French intellectual circles, journalism and other key professions. To understand a country and its policies you have to get inside its skin, and that means knowing, and being on warm terms with, lots of different, well-positioned people. When an unexpected situation arises and you have to scratch around at the last minute to see who can provide background and perspective it's usually too late.

Q: Who were your closest friends in Paris?

JAEGER: My warmest and most interesting recollections were of the lovely evenings offered by Dominique and John Riggs, he a leading American lawyer at the Paris office of White and Case, she the daughter of legendary French Ambassador, Francis Lacoste, former Governor General of Djibouti and Morocco, Minister in Peking, Ambassador in Ottawa and Brussels: A classic diplomat of the old school, who had the special distinction of having been fired by de Gaulle for being too pro-American! It was one of the joys of this period that he became my friend and mentor, and remained so until he died, long after we had left Paris,. Together, the Riggs knew everybody in Paris and an evening there was invariably an introduction to new sets of fascinating, often important people in diplomacy, politics and the arts. We have all remained good friends, although they are, alas, no longer married.

So, to get back to the main point, evenings usually meant brilliant food and drink, but were often more work than entertainment.

Q: Bit hard on the constitution as a regular routine?

JAEGER: Especially when you had to get up at six or six-thirty the next morning, get on the subway or fight your way through heavy traffic to the office by car. There, waiting for you, would be a good two and one-half inch stack of telegrams which had come in overnight from all over the world. The thing about a place like Paris is that you can't really say, "Indonesia doesn't interest me, so I won't read that." Countries like France have relationships in all parts of the world, with special interests in Africa and parts of the second and third world. So any of these reports might be or might become important, and at least had to be scanned.

Q: Were these telegrams between another Embassy and the Department that were copied to you, or messages sent especially to you?

JAEGER: Mostly the former, since telegrams were routinely repeated for information; but also the latter, when someone wanted to comment or supplement one of our reports. Or they might involve a new issue another Embassy wanted to bring to our attention.

Having hurriedly digested all those messages, as well as in-house memos, announcements and what-have-you, it was off to the nine-thirty staff meeting to discuss the issues of the day and agree on next steps as to who would do what, when and why.

Then there would be a bit of time to draft telegrams, review and sign out memos and messages others had prepared, or go to meetings called by the Ambassador, the DCM or elsewhere in the Embassy. By eleven or so, I would again be off to see someone, perhaps at the Quai, the Elysee, or at another Embassy; or I would meet a key journalist like Michel Tatu, the famous Soviet expert at Le Monde, or even a major intellectual like Raymond Aron (a shrewd realist who was passionately interested in the evolution of the Cold War). Particularly after first contacts had been made, these meetings, more often than not, took place a bit later over lunch.

Q: Why always lunch?

JAEGER: Its what's expected. Just calling on people usually produced little of value. Real relationships in France are established over a good meal and a bottle of wine.

Q: Isn't there a cultural difference between Americans and French in this respect?

JAEGER: Very much so. It was invariably instructive to watch American government or business people fly in from the States and expect to get their job done in a brisk, efficient meeting. In France it didn't work that way, or at least not well. If you wanted to get to the heart of issues, you had to make real human contact over bread and wine.

Q: So this happened almost every day?

JAEGER: Yes. What's more, the whole point was not to be hurried. As a result, I usually I didn't get back to the office until two-thirty or three, full of good Burgundy...

Q: Laughter

JAEGER: ... and information that should be promptly reported. The trouble was that my secretary, who had had a less splendid lunch in the cafeteria, had been impatiently waiting for me all this time and would make clear that she was leaving at five-thirty no matter what, and warn that if I had something to write, I had better do it quickly!"

Q: Laughter

JAEGER: So afternoon drafting was usually stressful. Things progressively got worse toward the evening as new piles of telegrams arrived, other colleagues brought their work for clearance or review, and there were unexpected calls to front-office meetings, flaps or visitors.

By five-thirty or six you are pretty drained. You have had no exercise all day, you have eaten too well and are still processing that half bottle of Burgundy. Then its back home for a bit of time with Christina and Pat, before being off again to the evening's social event. And so the week would go by, until we could escape two or three times a month for weekends in our fresh-air retreats in Normandy or Burgundy

Q: It sounds like a pretty demanding life.

JAEGER: It was demanding, but also exhilarating and rewarding. Demanding, because that's what it took to produce the high volume of first-class reporting and analysis required to keep Washington abreast of France's complex interactions and to offer sound recommendations. And rewarding because our collective work often did succeed in pulling important rabbits out of the hat.

Q: Let's now turn to the work you did on French Soviet and Soviet Bloc relations.

JAEGER: When I arrived in Paris in '75, detente had probably peaked with the signing of the Helsinki Final Act, since - for reasons which are still debated - Moscow's line hardened after that. The 'Brezhnev Doctrine', which had emerged after the Soviet military suppression of the 'Prague spring', hung ominously over the eastern European satellites, which, led by Romania, were increasingly restless and chafing at Moscow's control. At the same time, Moscow's renewed heavy-handedness further disillusioned the Western Communist parties, including the still powerful French CP, who increasingly trended toward 'Euro-Communism' - a new, less rigidly Moscow-controlled, ideological position.

The ideological and political Cold War also continued and in some areas sharpened in the second and third worlds. Moscow's renewed offensive posture was reflected in their military aid to Angola's 'Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola', and the astonishing appearance there of Cuban troops; in their parallel efforts in Mozambique and the Horn of Africa; as well as in Moscow's push for increased influence in Afghanistan, which culminated in its ill-fated Soviet invasion in 1978. The contest also went on in the Middle East, where Moscow continued to support Syria and the Palestinians. All together, the US and its allies were frustrated by their seeming inability to stem these renewed pressures.

The picture was further complicated by contradictory developments in the strategic arms race. On the one hand the late seventies saw the deployments in the USSR of the first of what would eventually become over 400 SS-20s, a new MIRVed triple warhead mobile intermediate range ballistic missile aimed at Western Europe. The purpose of this huge new investment, turned out to be Moscow's last, desperate try to 'decouple' Western Europe from the US by raising doubts about the reliability of the American deterrent. The question it meant to raise in Western European minds was, whether we would really launch our ICBM's if Europe were attacked, and so risk Chicago for some European city? And whether they, particularly the Germans, would not be wiser to go neutral.

By 1977 German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt was concerned enough to raise this issue privately in Washington and in major speeches, an effort which eventually led to NATO's 'dual track' response: First, the counter-deployment of US IRBMs in Western Europe which - after huge public debates in Europe - was begun in '83, and, secondly, the beginning of negotiations to limit medium-range systems. Interestingly, negotiations toward a second SALT agreement continued during the same period, suggesting a certain ambivalence in Moscow's posture.

Q: That's a fair summary. But how about the French part?

JAEGER: France, unlike Germany, was clearly a player but its frustration as usual was that, in spite of its major roles in the French-German relationship, in the European framework and on the political side of NATO, it was not in the driver seat. I think its fair to say that the French were dependable allies, although, then as later, there was a consistent tendency to try to be a bit ahead of the US through their efforts to have 'special' relations in Moscow, Warsaw and elsewhere, to enhance their importance in the east-west game.

Q: So your job was to follow all these issues and developments and analyze things as seen from Paris?

JAEGER: Yes. One part of the job was sharing and coordinating analyses of all these ongoing east-west developments and making sure the French government correctly understood and, hopefully, supported what we were thinking. Obviously, things that are now pretty clear in retrospect were much less so as these developments occurred, and all of us were groping to make sense of them. The second part was finding out what the French were up to in Moscow and elsewhere behind the Curtain and, when possible, getting the story from both sides.

Q: So your task was not only to find out what the French were thinking and doing, but what the Soviets and Eastern Europeans were thinking as well?

JAEGER: That's right. An example might be a visit by the French Foreign Minister to Moscow. To find out what really happened, I would of course call at the Quai and report what they told me. But to get the whole story, it was usually useful to check further with German and British colleagues, with well-informed journalists who followed Soviet and French policy, like Michel Tatu at Le Monde, and to talk to the Soviets and some of the satellite Embassies. As often as not they would, inadvertently or intentionally, drop a small nugget which could be measured against other information. The result would be a much more nuanced account, with useful clues as to what the French were thinking and trying to accomplish. Over time, I developed and sustained a fairly wide set of relationships with people in the Soviet and Satellite Embassies, which occasionally produced very interesting and sometimes very useful information.

Things were sometimes more difficult, for example when French President Giscard d'Estaing made one of his periodic trips to Poland to go hunting - he had a special affinity for Poland - and would sometimes remain incommunicado for several days at the Polish Prime Minister's hunting lodge without informing the Quai what was being discussed or what he was doing. People were sometimes seriously worried by this, because he would be literally out of touch and unreachable behind the Iron Curtain.

Q: Well, the Poles have always had a traditional affinity for the French since the time of Napoleon.

JAEGER: Giscard clearly tried to build on this, partly to gain leverage in Eastern Europe and soften Polish positions, partly because he enjoyed the adventure of escaping from his Presidential cocoon in Paris. What's more, he would commit quite a bit of money to Polish projects on these trips, expenditures the Quai complained were frivolous and produced few results.

Q: Did your contact work with the Soviet bloc people in Paris upset the Embassy or the station?

JAEGER: On the contrary. In contrast to my experience in Bonn, where relations with the Station were sometimes fractious, the Paris Station Chief came to my office shortly after my arrival to stress that he wanted ours to be a cooperative effort and promised never to undercut me or use me in any way I did not fully understand.

Q: All right.

JAEGER: And he kept his word. The problem in dealing with Soviet and Eastern European personnel in a cosmopolitan setting like Paris is that all sides are afraid of each other. Nobody is quite sure whom they're dealing with or what their motives are. So the business of making useful contacts was delicate and took patience. I tried to call on and often lunched with many of many counterparts in the Soviet and satellite Embassies. Most of these contacts proved useless or worse. It was sometimes only after six months or a year, after one got to know someone fairly well, that they might begin to talk more seriously about actual issues rather than repeating party propaganda.

I remember a Polish colleague, a pleasant, highly educated man with whom I had many meetings during this period. One day over a particularly pleasant lunch, he said, "Well, George, I think I know you well enough now so we can stop talking poetry!" I said, "We are going to talk about the real world?" He said, "Yes! You're not from the CIA, and I like and trust you. So let's talk reality." From then on, we had a highly productive relationship, which almost led to his defection, although he decided not to in the end.

Q: Did any of your contacts actually defect?

JAEGER: Yes. A senior East German diplomat, very bright, informed and disciplined. After months of meeting him occasionally, he said out of the blue one day over lunch: "You know, you're pretty dense. Haven't you figured out that I've invested all this time in you because I want to get out? I have got to a point where I can't wait any longer." When I got over my surprise I explained that I was the wrong person to talk to. He said, "Yes, I know, but they're a bunch of klutzes, and I don't trust them." So I said, "I'm going to talk to some people about this, but, in the end, you are still going to have to bite the bullet and deal with them, because I am a diplomat and I can't do this."

Q: So what happened?

JAEGER: Well, he told me to do what I had to and promised to comply. After I had gone over all this with the Station, it was arranged that he and I would have dinner at a famous hotel in Paris, at the end of which I would accompany him for a couple of blocks. He would then have to cross the street on his own and meet someone at a café. That was the end of the story.

Q: That was the defection?

JAEGER: That was the defection. It worked, but not without some cliffhangers, since, all during dinner he was extremely nervous and twice said he couldn't go through with it, and twice changed his mind. Needless to say, the hotel and the neighborhood through which we walked was swarming with our people to make sure he wasn't kidnapped by his service at the last minute. As it turned out nothing happened, and he presumably made it to a new life in the United States.

Q: How did they know he wasn't a mole or a double agent?

JAEGER: That, of course, was the big question. But that was their and certainly not my business. I should add that I never found out what happened to him and what, in the end, he turned out to be.

Q: Did you have any useful contacts at the Soviet Embassy in Paris?

JAEGER: Yes. We knew a number of people there, but I came to have a special friend whom I saw often over the years. After we had gone through the usual feeling-out process, he would welcome going for long walks (no listening devices) during which he discussed the petrified state the USSR under its current gerontocracy and his passionate hope as a Russian patriot that a renewal could be brought about. He made it quite clear that he wasn't interested in defecting or of compromising me with his people, but simply wanted a serious US interlocutor, so that people in Washington would know how things really were and understand that there were many who wanted change. I often asked him if he was not likely to get in trouble. He thought not, because he submitted, I assume, sanitized reports of our conversations to his security people, and had permission to continue to see me.

Q: Weren't our security types worried that you might get in trouble?

JAEGER: Actually, both my superiors and the Station warmly encouraged me to continue what gradually turned into a real friendship. He and his wife and child came to one of our Thanksgiving dinners and had an absolutely marvelous time. He even invited Pat and myself to visit them once at the Soviet Embassy compound where they all lived and worked, which, as far as was known, no one from our side had ever entered before. We were warmly welcomed in their tiny apartment where a dozen or so of his friends and neighbors in the compound brought cakes and served us tea, and made it clear how pleased they were that we had come! It was all as if a 'Moscow Spring' had just broken out!

Q: But did he give you real, valuable information?

JAEGER: Washington and the Agency certainly thought so. The relationship developed to the point that we began to get very clear readings on problems in Moscow, its views on the French Communist party, evolving relations with Paris etc.. Of course, all this raised questions whether he was a KGB guy assigned to work on me, or a legitimate diplomat and "Russian patriot" as he claimed.

Q: Do you think this was really a back channel way to communicate what someone in their government wanted our government to know, without taking responsibility for it? Or was he also passing disinformation?

JAEGER: Perhaps it was the former. All I can say is that none of the many telegrams our talks produced were ever challenged by anyone in Washington. On the contrary they again and again received high commendations. That would not have been the case, if some of it had sounded dubious.

Q: Can you cite an example?

JAEGER: One might be Brezhnev's three day visit to Paris in June 1977 which the French hoped would be a significant success and Washington was keenly interested in. As usual we had all sorts of official briefings from the Quai, talked to various direct and indirect participants and studied Le Monde's and other accounts of what turned out to be a rather unproductive but turbulent visit. To set the tone, Brezhnev broke protocol and summoned some French Ministers to Rambouillet before meeting with President Giscard, didn't like a car the French gave him and met with Paris Mayor Chirac, even though the latter had pointedly been excluded from the schedule.

Conversely he did not meet with French CP chief George Marchais, who publicly wanted to deemphasize his Moscow ties, being now committed to the "Programme Commun" with Francois Mitterrand's Socialists, through which the French left had just decisively won the municipal elections.

In the end Brezhnev made some meandering public statements saying, inter alia, that US-Soviet relations were in a 'difficult phase' and signed two documents: One on non-proliferation and another on detente, in which Brezhnev accepted, what he had already committed himself to in the Helsinki Final Act, that respect for human rights should be one of the bases for improving French-Soviet relations.

What I learned from my Soviet friend on an almost real-time basis during the visit was how very poor Brezhnev's health actually was; that he was much more feeble and sick than had generally been realized in the West; was not able to concentrate, drank too much, had to be primed and propped up for every event and helped in and out of buildings, cars and airplanes. We even learned what he had for lunch.

Q: We've seen that pattern again in more recent times with the Russian leadership in Yeltsin's time..

JAEGER: We have, except in Brezhnev's case people knew he was not well, but I think they were not certain how debilitated he really was. We received warm commendations for these reports which the Department said had changed Washington's appreciation of Brezhnev's health and therefore had significant implications for US policy.

Q: Which leaves open the question why your friend was so helpful.

JAEGER: It is possible that he helped us because, as he said again and again, he was a Russian patriot and wanted us to see clearly what was happening in the Soviet Union. Conversely, it is also conceivable that some faction in Moscow wanted us to know, which would help explain why he seemed to be able to operate with relative impunity. In the end we will probably never know.

Q: Who, by the way, was the Soviet Ambassador in Paris at the time? Did you ever meet him?

JAEGER: Stepan Chervonenko, the hard liner who had presided over the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia, whom I met once. It happened when Art Hartman phoned me one afternoon to ask if Pat and I would join him and Donna at a dinner at the Soviet Ambassador's where they had been invited. The last time the Hartmans had been there, he said, the ratio was a dozen Soviets to two Americans. That was heavy lifting. Art thought if four of us went we should be able to handle them. He was prescient.

Although obviously interesting, it turned out to be the gloomiest evening we had spent in Paris, beginning with the Soviet hatcheck girl, who made it clear that she was being watched and that even a word of small talk was unwelcome; to the cavernous reception room where a solemn Chervonenko dourly welcomed us and promptly engaged Ambassador Hartman in earnest conversation - with the predicted dozen Soviet staffers clustering around to hear what was being said; and finally to truly ghastly sturgeon dinner, served in solemn Victorian fashion - so bad, that Pat said afterwards that the sturgeon must have walked all the way from Vladivostok. As for substance, we went through the catalogue of standard exchanges before and during dinner, toasted each other several times with the obligatory vodka, and finally went home having survived but learned little.

Q: You earlier mentioned George Marchais. What about the French Communist Party in those years?

JAEGER: The whole question of the French Left, both the massive Communist party and, to a lesser extent, the Socialists, had been at the center of American concern since World War II. In my time in Paris the French Communist Party was still an extremely disciplined, centrally managed, quite powerful force in French politics, able to attract over 20% of the popular vote.

Q: And slavishly pro-Soviet?

JAEGER: That was less clear since the formation of the 'Programme Commun' with the Socialists in 1972 and the growing influence of 'Euro-Communism'. Successive shocks and revelations, from Khrushchev's secret speech, the Czech invasion and particularly the publication of Solzhenitsyn's sensational 'Gulag Archipelago' in '73, had had a huge impact and shaken the European Communist parties - especially the Italians. Although the French CP had rejected 'Euro-communism' for longer than anyone, even they had to bend to the wind at their party Congress in '76, at which they dropped the concept of the 'dictatorship of the proletariat' and moved somewhat closer to Euro-communist positions. Even so, this was a qualified shift motivated by fear of losing voter appeal rather than changing convictions, since, only three years later, the French CP loyally approved the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan - as they had supported the invasion of Czechoslovakia some years earlier.

That said, understanding the French Communist Party, and its relationships with Moscow remained one of the most difficult and important issues for us. While not a vital threat, as they had been after World War II, they could still turn out massive numbers of people to demonstrate in Paris and across France and were obviously a crucial factor in France's electoral equation. The frustrating thing was that we were able to get only fragmentary insights into what was going on inside the party or about its Moscow relationship.

Q: Can you try to sum it up for us?

JAEGER: On the one hand, it was clear that the French party chafed under Moscow's control and tried to conceal the directives it received dictating their behavior. What's more it did show some independence, as when Marchais avoided meeting Brezhnev during his visit when their lines increasingly diverged.

Even so, I remember being at the Soviet Embassy on their National Day around this time and seeing a totally relaxed and jovial George Marchais being received as a most honored guest, clearly enjoying himself and looking very much 'at home'. Indeed the leading French CP people were continually seen at the Soviet Embassy which had a full-time officer assigned to liaise with them. It is more than likely that the Soviets themselves may have pragmatically accepted the necessity of a little public disloyalty for electoral and political reasons, while trying to preserve the essential relationship behind the scenes, which remained one of their major assets on the French and European scenes.

Q: Were you able to follow any of this in detail?

JAEGER: Let's say, we managed to get a certain degree of insight for a period of time. Part of this came from John Dobrin's high-level contacts with the Socialists, part from mine and part from other sources. Since Washington was intensely concerned that a possible 'Programme Commun' government would necessarily include French Communist ministers, it was important to understand to what degree Moscow would gain influence and so obtain a window into the Western alliance.

Q: What was the CP pushing at the time?

JAEGER: One of their projects was for a Soviet-French friendship treaty, a theme which also had a certain limited appeal to extreme Gaullists opposed to NATO and some others frightened by the continuing 'balance of terror'. Even so, it was clearly a non-starter.

Q: But that would have been consistent with de Gaulle's signing of a war-time Friendship treaty with the Soviets in 1944?

JAEGER: Yes, but in Giscard d'Estaing's world in the late seventies it was out of the question. I also learned early on that the Soviets were unsuccessfully pressing for separate and far reaching French-Soviet disarmament agreements. While Giscard wanted a prominent French role in the Western alliance, breaking ranks altogether in any of these ways was not in the cards.

France under Giscard, was in the vanguard of detente, with annual summits with the USSR, but he sought detente in the context of a strengthening French role in the European context and improvements in French-US relations.

Q: Why don't we turn for a moment to Mitterrand and the 'Programme Commun'. Could you set the stage?

JAEGER: The 'Programme Commun', roughly translatable as the 'Common Program', was signed by the Socialists, the French PC and the Left Radicals in 1972 to regain momentum in view of the continued predominance of the Gaullists after the political crisis of 1958. That this sharp turn to the left was a winning strategy became evident in the presidential elections of '74 when Mitterrand's 'Union of the Left' lost only narrowly to Giscard; and even more so when it won the mid-term municipal elections in 1977, mentioned earlier, which were seen as the run-up for legislative elections to be held in '78.

Given this increasing success, there was growing concern in Washington that the 'Union of the Left' might then gain control of the French National Assembly and form a government - raising the specter of Communist Ministers in power in a Mitterrand cabinet able to influence French foreign and security policy and get access to sensitive military and intelligence information. How to deal with this and the possibility that the 'Union of the Left' might, worse still, gain the Presidency in 1981, became a major Washington concern.

Q: How did the Embassy deal with this?

JAEGER: One obvious first step, was to get to know Mitterrand a little better. John Dobrin, the Political Section's gifted 'enfant terrible' had come to know him informally as leader of the Socialist Party, and he and Hank Cohen conveyed some of these concerns, of which Mitterrand was, of course, aware. His response was an informal commitment that Communist Ministers in any future government of the left would not be given access to this kind of sensitive information. So far so good.

Q: That's nice, but...

JAEGER: Right. We then evolved the notion that maybe we should invite Mitterrand to lunch with Ambassador Rush to emphasize our concerns more formally and create a closer relationship; Mitterrand and others on the left having long been in the Embassy's and Washington's official deep freeze, with official contact largely limited to Dobrin's Second Secretary level.

Q: Did Mitterrand accept?

JAEGER: With alacrity, but one, on the face of it, quite reasonable condition. "If", Mitterrand replied, "I am going to be head of a government or President of France, I need to be read into the real strategic situation." In short, his price for coming to lunch was a comprehensive, highly classified briefing on the state of the nuclear and strategic east-west situation. That, of course created an immediate problem.

Q: How much you are going to tell Mitterrand ...

JAEGER: Precisely. At the same time, Mitterrand, and his people reiterated that a government of the 'Union of the Left' would share power and information with the Communists only on French domestic issues, and that the Communists would be hermetically sealed off from foreign and security affairs. We had his word that he would protect Allied interests and clearly understood the problems posed for America and France's NATO and European allies by the French Communists' relationship with Moscow.

Q: So how was this resolved?

JAEGER: The issue precipitated telegraphic exchanges with Washington over nine months, an endless back and forth which only underscored Washington's distrust Mitterrand. At the same time, everyone was aware of the other horn of dilemma, that the US might soon be dealing with him as head of government or even President of France, and that rebuffing him would be a bad start for this relationship.

In the end Washington waffled. An elegant little outdoor lunch was arranged on the terrace of the Ambassador's residence with beautiful food and great French wines. Mitterrand came, said little and was very polite. After lunch a lowly Lieutenant Colonel (!) gave a 'secret' half hour briefing on the strategic situation, with the usual maps and paraphernalia, which was in fact just a standard, unclassified rundown. Mitterrand might as well have read the New York Times!

Although he left with the unfortunate impression that he was still not trusted, the lunch was not a total loss. For it was Mitterrand's first-ever visit to the Embassy and so symbolically important in itself. Moreover, it gave him the opportunity to tell Ambassador Rush on the record how, if elected, he would conduct his government and to stress again that America had nothing to fear.

My own feeling, then and later, was that by delaying this meeting for nine months, and then serving him lukewarm gruel, we failed to seize an opportunity. As it turned out, when Mitterrand was finally elected President in 1981, albeit without Communist participation, he turned out to be a pillar of continuity in foreign affairs and was rather tough on Moscow, even though his domestic policies of nationalization of industries roiled French and other waters.

Q: Another piece of the Paris puzzle is the Elysee. How were the Embassy's relations with the Presidency during your time in Paris?

JAEGER: I am glad you asked. I began to realize early in my assignment that our relations with the Élysée were very, very thin. Ambassador Rush had virtually no substantive contact with Giscard. Hank Cohen did occasionally see the head of Giscard's tiny, but very influential foreign affairs staff of six or seven - a pleasant man, given to sport coats and country house manners, who invariably gave him a polite half hour but, as Hank kept saying, produced little that was worth reporting. This was a real problem, since the Elysee often kept the Quai in the dark as well, leaving us only partially informed and with little influence at highest level.

Q: So what did you do?

JAEGER: Well, time went by and eventually Hank Cohen and I decided that I should have a go at the 'working level' of that staff. After thinking about this for some time, I settled on the youngest member of the Elysee staff, Jean-David Levitt. At thirty he was a rising star among France's junior diplomats and, although very junior, reportedly had Giscard's confidence.

The next problem was how to make effective contact. I found out that one of his minor duties was to follow Andorra issues...

Q: [Laughter]

JAEGER: .. because the President France, together with the Catalan Bishop of Urgell, is one of the 'two co-princes' of Andorra - an odd arrangement which goes back to the 13th century.

Q: That's right.

JAEGER: So, on September 8, 1977, Pat and I decided to help celebrate Andorra National Day and, as expected, found Jean-David Levitt in attendance, standing in for Co-Prince Giscard. We met, hit it off, and agreed to an early lunch, at which I deplored the rather spotty relationship between the Embassy and the Elysee. Levitt fully agreed, but then said, "If we work together, can you deliver?"

I knew exactly what he meant. If we established an informal channel to Giscard, would Washington respond with equal seriousness at the highest levels? I took an enormous chance and said "Yes, I can." Levitt said, "Fine. Now what would you like to know?" Well, I said, "I have five questions," and asked for the Elysee's view on five top-flight issues of the day.

He said, "I'll be in touch."

By 3:30PM that afternoon my phone rang, and there was Levitt: "The answers to your questions are" and rattled off succinct replies to my five questions. When he had finished he proposed that we have lunch again next week "when I will ask you several questions."

Q: So you had your channel?

JAEGER: Yes. Levitt had evidently seen Giscard after our lunch, and phoned me his answers to my questions! So far so good!

The next problem was, of course, to get Washington to respond appropriately. Well, I prepared a highly classified and very restricted message 'for the Secretary and the White House only', explaining that we had succeeded in establishing a backchannel to Giscard; reporting his responses to our initial questions, some of which had far-reaching implications, and making clear that this arrangement would work only as long as we were able to respond to their questions promptly and with equally authoritative highest-level answers.

Q: Big time stuff!

JAEGER: Well, yes. I took my draft telegram to Sam Gammon, the able Deputy Chief of Mission who was then Chargé, who had not heard of any of this before and was clearly taken aback: "You know, if this isn't for real, its not just your job but also mine! You really want me to sign this? How do we know this guy is responsible?" I said, "Sam, you don't know, but, I think, it's the best source you're ever going to get. My recommendation is that you sign it, and let's see what happens." To his great credit he did. After some high level back and forth with Washington, our new channel worked effectively until I left Paris and resolved some important misunderstandings between Washington and Paris.

Q: That must have quite a coup!

JAEGER: Well, it undoubtedly helped with my promotion to FSO-2 and the Senior Foreign Service after I got back to Washington. But I recount this, not in self-praise, but because it's an important case study of how, finding the right person at the right level, making real human contact and then playing it absolutely straight, can overcome major systemic roadblocks and open the way to genuine communication - the critical prerequisite to effective diplomacy.

Too often people think you have to rely on cloak and dagger stuff, when its all there to be had with a little imagination, drive and that indefinable quality necessary to make genuine human contacts - even between adversaries.

Q: As it did with some of your Russian contacts. In this case the highest level in France realized that they had a channel they could use to get some points across without the rigidity of formal highest-level meetings.

JAEGER: Precisely. It was an official unofficial channel. The footnote to this story is of course that Jean-David Levitt had a legendary career, was France's Ambassador to the US during George W. Bush's Presidency, then served as French Ambassador to the UN and, as I edit this account, has returned to his old haunts in the Elysee - this time as the Foreign Policy Advisor to President Sarkozy.

Q: Paris being a major diplomatic hub, there must have been many other issues you became involved in. What were some of the main ones?

JAEGER: My bit-part in the Portuguese drama of the seventies began one day in 1976, when I received a call from the Portuguese Ambassador to France, Antonio Coimbra Martins, asking if he could come to see me. I demurred and suggested he might want to see Ambassador Rush. Martins said he had, and repeated that he wanted to meet with me. It was the beginning of a wonderful personal and political relationship.

Martins - a brilliant Romance literature scholar and close friend of Prime Minister Mario Soares whose Socialist party had just prevailed in the April elections of that year - came promptly, sat on the hard chair next to my scuffed desk and explained that he needed a friend in the Embassy who would help support Soares' and Ambassador Frank Carlucci's struggle to stabilize his country by persuading the French government to be more supportive. He had tried to explain this to our Ambassador, who had not seemed deeply interested and had suggested he meet with me!

Q: Amazing! Sketch in the background of what was happening in Portugal to set the stage, OK?

JAEGER: The background was dramatic. After the collapse of the Portuguese colonies and the fall of Portugal's authoritarian regime a left-leaning military coup failed to contain the deepening crisis and the Moscow-guided Portuguese Communist Party remained a powerful destabilizing influence and threatened to make Portugal the first Communist country in Western Europe. By '76, Mario Soares and his moderate-left Socialists had managed to win legislative elections and form a weak government but were endangered by Portugal's profound poverty and discontent. To visualize the situation you have to keep in mind that the average Portuguese standard of living in those days was at the level of an African country!

Kissinger had at first written Soares off as the 'Kerensky' of Portugal, the guy who would just be the front-runner for the Moscow-controlled Communists when he failed. Carlucci eventually persuaded Henry to be supportive, enabling him to undergird Soares' government with aid, loans, new military programs and strong public support. Carlucci's compelling point, which was the main theme of the gusher of telegrams from Lisbon, was that there was no alternative to Soares. So he worked like a tiger to assure Soares' survival and success.

Q: But what did the Portuguese Ambassador want you to do?

JAEGER: In brief, to help persuade the French to be more generous and to untie French assistance from the usual conditions that any resulting business had to go to French firms. Moreover, France, then as now, had a special relationship with Spain and Portugal, both being Mediterranean countries and neighbors. It was specially important, therefore, that effective support for Soares come, and be seen as coming, not only from the US but also from Portugal's European neighbors, particularly France. Soares saw this as Martins' principal task.

Q: Actually, if I remember correctly, the Germans were more supportive of the Portuguese socialists than the French.

JAEGER: That's right. In France, the Giscard government, indeed the whole right wing of the French political spectrum, was not at all happy about the socialist direction of events in Portugal, and were therefore holding back. For Soares and Martins it was critical to reassure the French and show them how much worse things could get if they didn't help.

Q: Were you able to help?

JAEGER: In the end yes. The Portuguese desk officer at the Quai was an austere, rather difficult woman who seemed like an impenetrable wall. I took up the cause and made many trips to the Quai, cajoling and pleading Soares' cause at various levels, making it clear that this was a major American priority. In the end, after months of effort, we made headway and were able to report to Carlucci and the Department that the French had untied and increased some of their aid and were being generally more helpful. Even so it remained hard for the French government to help ideological opponents in Lisbon who were friends of Mitterrand. It was a tough, uphill fight.

Q: That's fascinating. I don't think I told you about my own acquaintance with Portugal in those days. Because of my interest in the comparative history of revolution, we went there in June of '75. By that time, as you have described, the revolution was going through the characteristic phase of being radicalized, with radical officers in the military, who had come out of Africa, becoming the dominant political force. They were backed, at a certain distance by the Russians and the Communist Party. Thanks to the Embassy we got passes to the opening session of the newly elected constituent assembly.

I was, of course, comparing this with the constituent assembly that met in Russia in January 1918 and was dispersed by Lenin. Well, in this case, it was not. Following the session, when the delegates left the building, which was surrounded by armored cars for security purposes, I saw Soares talking with a group of people and went up and introduced myself and explained that I was an American historian interested in revolutions, and could we meet? He said, "Tomorrow." So my wife and I went to his office in the Parliament building. At the time he was a minister without portfolio in the military government. And, of course, it was touch and go as to whether he would be thrown out or become prime minister. In our meeting he also recounted his meeting with Kissinger at which Kissinger told him, as you said, that, "maybe you're going to be the Kerensky of the Portuguese revolution. "Well", Soares said he replied. "Kerensky didn't do so badly. He became a college professor in the United States!" I thought he was a very honorable man, who was desperately trying to steer between the forces of right and left that were threatening Portugal at the time.

JAEGER: That's right. And it was Carlucci's great merit that he clearly understood the importance of this and mobilized all possible resources to help, of which my efforts in Paris were a minor part.

Q: Yes. We happened to encounter Soares again the following year. By that time the psychological atmosphere had changed completely. There was a distinct thermidorian reaction. Exactly the same thing George Orwell described in his book on 'Catalonia' after the anarchists were crushed in Barcelona. Well, in Portugal there had been this ultra-left uprising in Lisbon in November of '75, the collapse. The Communists distanced themselves from it. Soares then made his tremendous comeback and won the parliamentary election in '76! Glad you were able to help a bit after that!

Q: What other issues came up in Paris?

JAEGER: The Political Section, when in my last year or so I was Deputy Counselor and floor manager, had to deal with an almost endless list of issues in Europe and across the globe: Arms control and Helsinki follow-up, French-German relations and European community developments. There was the endless fuss between Greece and Turkey, various problems in the Middle East, Morocco and Algeria as well as former French Africa which the French were very neuralgic about. My colleague Mark Pratt presided over the Far Eastern issues, Japan, Taiwan, China and Indonesia, but particularly Cambodia and Vietnam. There was no end of work.

Q: So Paris really had some of the most complex tasks of any of our embassies?

JAEGER: Well, much like all the great embassies, London, Paris, Tokyo, Moscow, now Berlin, where all the hubs come together.

Q: Let's talk a bit more of some of the off beat problems which you worked on personally.

JAEGER: I remember spending considerable time on problems involving Svalbard, the island archipelago north of Norway, governed by Norway under the terms of the 1920 Svalbard treaty, where suspicious Soviet activities near their mining town were raising red flags in Washington, Oslo and NATO.

There was Cyprus, and the never-ceasing Greek-Turkish problems, which became a particularly persistent theme in the aftermath of the '74 invasion. I worked closely with the British Embassy on peace initiatives then underway and often shared reports and analyses. One of the things which struck me at the time was that, although their political staff was a third the size of ours, they managed somehow to handle the same range of issues as our much larger staff.

Q: Isn't that rather characteristic of American efforts compared with some Europeans who often do almost as well with a lot fewer people?

JAEGER: Yes, although there are distinctions. The Brits tend to produce people who write concisely and do things with an economy of means, perhaps as a result of their tutorial system in Universities. I saw this again when I was heading the Political Department at NATO, where my British colleague was as productive as most of the rest of the staff put together.

Q: Don't the French do this too?

JAEGER: The French view things through a logical prism, the Cartesian method taught in the 'Grands Ecoles'. The Brits tend to begin with concise perceptions of reality and then think their way through to policy conclusions, as we do, except we tend to need more paper and more words.

Q: Was Berlin still on the front burner when you were in Paris?

JAEGER: Berlin too continued to take much time, since France was one of the four occupying powers. My interlocutor at the Quai was Francois Plaisant, the Director of Berlin affairs, a smallish man whose bangs stretched across his forehead concealed a very bright and somewhat stubborn mind.

I remember frequent meetings with Plaisant in which we tried to coordinate Allied positions, which could be difficult. One rather technical Berlin issue comes to mind, on which Plaisant had taken a hard position which our people in Berlin and the Department badly wanted to change. I met with Plaisant at least four times and presented our arguments as persuasively as I could. When I gave it one more try and had again gone over the whole thing, he smiled a little and said, Ok, if it's that important I'll meet you half way, not because you have persuaded us but because you are a friend and you really want this - which again illustrates the importance of genuine human contact.

Q: Was he able to make decisions for the French Government?

JAEGER: On most of these issues yes. Plaisant was Mr. Berlin at the Quai. The Director for Europe, Jacques Andréani was no doubt kept informed and consulted.

Q: One thinks of the French as so bureaucratic and centralized that what you say surprises me.

JAEGER: Yes, but Office Directors at the Quai, at least in my time, were powerful people who almost always became ambassadors on their next foreign assignment, like my friend Yves Omnes, the Director for Soviet and Eastern European Affairs, who became French Ambassador in Egypt. They no doubt cleared their decisions, but were very influential.

Q: Now I am sure you had one or more visits by Henry Kissinger, who was Secretary until Carter came in in January '77.

JAEGER: He came to Paris frequently, sometimes on Vietnam matters, sometimes to see Giscard d'Estaing and whoever was Foreign Minister at the time.

Q: Did you see him on these visits? I remember you had known him at Harvard.

JAEGER: Only once - since he never came to the Chancery - although that proved to be rather memorable. I was the senior Embassy duty officer, which meant being available at the Ambassador's residence at rue Saint Honoré where Henry always stayed to help with whatever issues might come up, i.e. late-night contact with someone in the French government etc..

The scene was the residence's vast lobby, where duplicate arrays of copying machines, multiple typewriters and desks had been set up in somewhat surrealistic readiness for the arrival of "the aircraft", expected about ten PM, but then delayed. At nearly midnight the doors burst open with a crack, and Henry, followed by a phalanx of assistants and staffers, burst in. Ambassador Rush stood in the middle of the hall to welcome Henry and offered him a drink. Henry, didn't even break his stride, perfunctorily shook Rush's hand and was off to his and Nancy's rooms. Poor Rush mumbled something like, "Well, welcome to Paris," and disappeared as well, while Henry's platoon of assistants, who had all brought along whatever they had been working on on the aircraft, set to typing away furiously on important papers.

I was at my little desk awaiting developments, when the very bright-looking young woman with blonde bangs and sharp blue eyes who was Henry's secretary, picked up her phone, took a message, looked at me, and said, "He wants the paper."

I said, "Today is Sunday, and there isn't a paper. There's just a weekend edition of the Herald Tribune, which was published early yesterday morning." Goldilocks, as I nicknamed her in retrospect, was unamused: "Don't be stupid! He wants the paper! Get the paper!"

So I called the Chief Housekeeper, a wonderfully kind and competent lady, and asked if there was a copy of the weekend Herald Tribune. She called back a moment later in some considerable distress and said, "The Ambassador has gone to bed, and is, I think, doing the crossword puzzle."

Q: Laughter

JAEGER: I said, "Mr. Kissinger's Assistant here says that he wants the paper." She said, "Well, if its really necessary, I'll try to talk to the Ambassador." After a few minutes the Chief Housekeeper appeared in person, looking very distressed, and said, “The Ambassador hasn’t finished with the crossword puzzle yet,

Q: (Laughter)

JAEGER: and wonders if Mr. Kissinger could wait for 20 minutes?”

Q: I can’t believe it!

JAEGER: I turned to ‘Goldilocks’ and explained the situation. She looked at me while continuing to type at an alarming rate, and said, “When Henry wants a paper, Henry gets a paper. GET IT!”

Q: Laughter

JAEGER: So a few minutes later, out comes this crumpled Herald Tribune with a half-done crossword puzzle that had been taken away from the American Ambassador in Paris so that Henry could read the paper.

Things turned out quite differently on another occasion when I was asked to help with Brzezinski’s arrival at Orly airport. On the way into Paris, there was a loud pop emanating from Zbig’s newly armored car followed by several others, at which point his limousine seemed to sink into the ground as it came to a stop. It seems our admin people had forgotten to put heavier tires on the car to compensate for its additional weight! Zbig was, of course, quickly and safely transferred to one of the other cars and sped into town.

Stories like these about high-level visitors and the endless Congressional delegations who turned up in Paris, and required much time and effort, could fill volumes.

Q: What about President Carter? Did he visit France during your time?

JAEGER: Yes, in January 1978, part of a swing which began in Poland, and then took the President through Iran, India, Saudi Arabia and Egypt. I was asked to help our Minister, Sam Gammon, to coordinate the visit.

Q: Were the preparations as intense and time consuming as one hears?

JAEGER: If anything more so. There were, of course, endless planning meetings in the Embassy and with the French, as well as major challenges - such as arranging housing for the 200-some official support staff and all the journalists traveling with the President in one place. I remember startling the General Manager of the Meridian Hotel when I told him that I needed to rent his whole 500 room hotel for Carter’s visit, and succeeded only after the Elysee kindly supported my request.

Weeks before the visit a Secret Service detail had, of course, appeared, followed by a huge Advance Group from the White House which virtually took over the Embassy. Between them they looked at every aspect of the visit in painstaking detail, including the routes Carter would travel, the prevailing security situation and, of course, the apartment the Carters would occupy at Giscard's official country retreat, the Chateau of Fontainebleau.

It was this apartment which gave rise to the first major incident. Our counterpart at the Elysee phoned me a few days before Carter's arrival in great agitation to say that the Americans were stealing President Giscard's rugs and adamantly refused to return them! He had not yet told President Giscard but very much hoped I could promptly get this straightened out!

Q: Incredible!

JAEGER: I sent a rocket to our White House liaison officer who established that the Secret Service team casing Fontainebleau thought the rugs in the apartment the Carters would be staying in were not as nice as others they seen in a nearby suite, and claimed not to have understood the loud complaints emanating from Giscard's staff - since they were speaking French! I made it clear that the rugs were to be returned instantly, and asked our Minister to convey the US Government's profound apologies. The French were kind enough to make sure that the story did not get to the press, which would have destroyed the visit.

Q: You said this was the first major incident. What else happened?

JAEGER: Well, a few days before Carter's arrival the operator rang me to say there was someone on the line who wanted to report a death threat to the President. When I picked up, a man speaking French explained that he knew of an assassination plot and wanted to warn us, but then refused to explain anything further on the phone.

Q: You had a major problem.

JAEGER: I told him it was terribly important that we meet either at the Embassy or elsewhere, that he could trust me and that we would do everything in our power to protect the President. The caller would only agree to think about it before he hung up without providing contact information. He then called back two or three times, which was reassuring, and after more conversation, finally agreed to come to the Embassy the following day. He insisted, however, that he only wanted to meet me since he said he didn't trust anybody else.

I reported all this to the Secret Service, who thought that I was in no way qualified to deal with the situation and informed me that they would now take it over. I said, "Well, this guy said he will only deal with me. What's more, none of you speak French. If we switch signals on him and he refuses to talk, it will be your responsibility if things go wrong."

They thought about this and said. "Okay, we'll put a listening device in your desk because we do want to know word for word what he says, and want a recording." So they installed an expensive looking tape recorder in my desk drawer and attached a red button under the edge of my desk. My instructions were that as soon as he started to talk I was to press the red button which would start the recording.

Sure enough, the man came, a small rather innocuous-looking person, and was shown to my office. When he was about to sit down and start talking, I pressed the red button - and guess what happened?

Q: What?

JAEGER: There was a big BANG and a cloud of smoke shot up over my desk!

Q: Laughter

JAEGER: They had installed a US specs recorder not realizing that in France the voltage is 220!

Q: Laughter

JAEGER: While I was still trying to collect my wits, my little friend was out the door like a shot, down the stairs and out of the building before anybody could get hold of him! As a result, we never found out whether there was a threat or not, which left everyone rather nervous and then greatly relieved when the visit unfolded without incident!

Q: Wow! Clearly a nut-case, but you couldn't have known that at the time. Tell us now about the actual visit.

JAEGER: Giscard d'Estaing wanted Carter's visit to be a special occasion and had decided to use the just restored Palais de Versailles for the official reception, a first since the Revolution! Because he thought of Carter as a populist he had invited 500 people drawn from all social classes and professions from all over France, besides the usual government ministers, the diplomatic corps and other notables.

When the guests arrived at the great courtyard of Versailles, illuminated only by flickering torches, they were ushered through a dramatic defile of 'Garde Republicaines', sitting their horses with sabers drawn in salute, the torchlight glittering on breastplates and helmets. The only quixotic touch in this tableau was the lone guardsman urgently running around behind the ranks of horses with a pooper- scooper ...

Q: Laughter

JAEGER: ... to make sure that the occasion would not be marred by an equestrian mishap!

Once inside, we saw Versailles at its historic best - the Hall of Mirrors and all the subsequent reception rooms sparkling in candle light, were decorated with vast flower arrangements skillfully matching the mood and colors of each room. There were small clusters of musicians here and there in period costumes softly playing flutes, harps or violins. And there were 'oyster trees' and other opulent and ingenious displays of food and drink for the eventual delectation of France's guests.

To provide structure, the 500 public representatives Giscard had invited were all gathered in the hall of Mirrors. The rest of us were variously led to other reception rooms, the ambassadors to one, the ministers to another, those of us of less exalted rank to a third, and less easily definable invitees were ushered to a fourth. It was all like a great fairy tale, extravagant, shimmering, and, for Pat and myself, somewhat overwhelming.

After some time had passed, more and more people commented on the fact that the two Presidents had not yet arrived, and were clearly late. What's more protocol demanded that no one could eat or drink until the two Presidents had walked through the reception rooms and greeted everybody, at which point the party could officially begin.

Alas, more time went by, everyone was increasingly hungry, feet began to hurt because no seating was provided and the question became more urgent: Where were the two Presidents? Had anything happened?

Finally, well after eleven PM, Carter and Giscard arrived, jovially passed through the salons shaking hands, stopping here and there for a word or two, clearly enjoying each other's company and savoring the event. We later found out what had happened. President Carter had arrived on schedule, but, as he was being taken for a quick drive around the gardens and illuminated fountains of Versailles, the two Presidents became totally engrossed in a long private conversation - we never found out what it was about - while their limousine just continued to drive around the gardens - for almost two hours!

The evening was nevertheless a great success, even though none of us had a drink or even a tiny canapé until it was almost time to return home, again passing through the ranks of glittering horsemen who were still solemnly on guard in the courtyard when we left.

Q: Any other events which should be recorded?

JAEGER: Yes, I do want to say a word about my father's rather remarkable good-bye to Vienna. Since my mother's death he had been living alone in Kansas City, was increasingly frail but surrounded by a circle of friends who admired him and his paintings, appreciated his willingness to give art lessons to their youngsters, and helped him in all kinds of ways. One day, I think it was in my second year in Paris, I received a letter from him saying that he wanted to make one last visit to Vienna to "forgive these people"! Would I therefore take a ten day leave and come with him, since he was too weak to go alone.

So we did. We flew to Vienna and had a wonderful time together visiting all his old haunts, going to concerts, the theater and even to Grinzing, the famous village in the hilly vineyards above the city where we spent a typical Viennese evening over a happy dinner and a few glasses of white wine. He returned to America at peace, having made this remarkable gesture of reconciling himself with a people who had so enthusiastically welcomed Hitler, cheered, or at least remained silent over the expulsion and death of many thousands of their Jewish fellow citizens, and who had so disrupted his own life. As he said in the end, it was the Christian thing to do. He lived on in Kansas City, cared for largely by his many friends, until he too died on January 11, 1980.

There was a personal revelation during this trip for me as well. Among the places we visited was my old grade school, the 'Volkschule' where I had learned to read and write. When we explained that I had been a student there for four years, until 1936, the teacher who had admitted us went white as a sheet. "That's impossible", he said, "they are all dead. That whole class died at Stalingrad! They were all drafted and thrown into that battle when they were 16 and 17. "

He was amazed and glad to learn that I was the only exception, having been saved by my two Jewish grand parents and my emigration to England and America from the disaster which awaited my Aryan schoolmates in the Hitler youth.

Life is sometimes very strange, and I was again and again very very lucky!

Q: What a story! And what a tour in Paris. Were you sorry to leave?

JAEGER: In a way yes, since it had been the richest and most rewarding assignment so far. We had worked hard, had made many friends and felt that we had succeeded, both in providing high-quality political reporting and in leaving the Political Section in much better shape than it was when I arrived. The icing on the cake was that Art Hartman had warmly recommended me for a 'Superior Honor Award' for my service in France, a distinction which in those days was still something special.

The evening before we left, the two Lyonnais owners of our favorite small restaurant, the 'Bellecour' on the rue Surcouf, where I had had so many of my business lunches and Pat and I had often gone to mark family events, offered us a truly magnificent good-bye dinner - a splendid, happy seven course affair with all sorts of wonderful Burgundies to match. On our way back to our pre-departure quarters at the Intercontinental Pat and I danced across the footbridge over the Seine, with moonlit Paris shimmering romantically in the waves. It was the perfect ending of a richly rewarding adventure in our lives.

RAYMOND MALLEY
Minister Counselor and U.S. Representative to OECD
Paris (1975-1978)

Mr. Malley was born and raised in Massachusetts and was educated at Boston University, the University of Geneva, Switzerland, and the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy. After serving in the U.S. Air Force and engaging in private business, Mr. Malley joined the Treasury Department. He later joined AID, where he worked in senior level positions at home and abroad until he retired. During his career Mr. Malley was posted to Karachi, Rawalpindi, Kinshasa, and Paris, as well as in Washington, where he worked on economic development projects of AID and with international organizations concerned with foreign assistance and development. Mr. Malley was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2007.

Q: What were you doing in Paris?

The OECD is where the rich countries of the world discuss international economic problems. The “rich men’s club” it is often called. There were about 25 member countries when I was there – the U.S. and Canada, the countries of western Europe, and Japan, Australia, and New Zealand. Today there are several more members, including Korea, which progressed from being terribly poor to relatively rich in not much more than a generation. OECD might be compared to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO). NATO is a military alliance of the rich democracies; OECD is where the same countries coordinate economic matters. Of course the comparison is far from perfect, but it is illustrative.

OECD has a secretariat of 100 people or so headed by a secretary general. It has offices dealing with specific international economic topics – foreign aid (the DAC), finance, trade, agriculture, science, energy, education, labor, and so on. The secretariat organizes and manages meetings of the members on these topics, including the preparation of discussion papers describing problems and possible approaches and solutions. It also does research on international economic problems.

Each member country has a delegation accredited to OECD headed by an ambassador. In my time the U.S. delegation consisted of 25 to 30 people. Our ambassadors were Turner and then Salzman, but the key man was the number two, Abe Katz. He was State’s OECD expert for many years, and eventually became ambassador himself. About half of our delegation consisted of State people; other departments of government such as Treasury, Commerce, Agriculture, and Labor provided attaches. Our USAID office consisted of Smalley, myself, two or three analysts (including Bob Asselin), and a couple of secretaries. We were a close knit and high morale delegation.

In our area of foreign aid and north-south relations we were discussing and dealing with policies, not with individual programs or projects. Such policies were very widespread – they ran the gamut. Let me give you some examples. Having received development loans for some time, many developing countries now had considerable debts and were making large repayments to donors even as they received more aid. Should some of their debt burden be reduced or eliminated? And would such reductions count as foreign aid? These questions were discussed at the DAC over many years, before, during and especially after I was there. The members decided that the answers to both were yes. This is an illustration that, although the basic question of what is foreign aid had long since been agreed, it had to be periodically reviewed and updated to respond to new developments, such as debt relief and the creation of new financial instruments.

What is foreign aid may seem like a simple question. It is not. International financial flows are constant and in the trillions of dollars, but almost none meet the definition of aid. Most move under normal commercial terms. To be counted as aid, the flow must be on concessional terms – that is, non-market terms. But only a slight concession from normal commercial terms, say five or 10 percent, is not enough. The DAC decided to define foreign aid as financial assistance provided to developing countries with a minimum 25 percent grant element – a technical term that is complex, but means partly that there must be at least a one-quarter reduction from the prevailing commercial rates. Of course the consideration of grant element is applicable only to loans. When aid is provided as grants, there is 100 percent concessionality.

Here are some other examples of what we discussed. Tied aid – requirement that the funds be spent for goods and services from the donor country – was a frequent topic. Obviously it is better for the recipient if it can buy from the lowest responsive bidders, regardless of nationality. But in donor countries, the tying of aid often is important to gain support from businesses and the public for significant aid budgets. This problem usually was compromised by donors – by tying some of their aid, untying the rest. Often it was decided to untie aid for the poorest developing countries, but not for others. In meetings, those in favor of more untying usually did not want to get too much in front of the doubters. All would have to march along more or less together to get consensus.

Most donor countries have export credit agencies that assist their exporters. Ours is the Export Import Bank. A frequent topic of discussion was the relationship between export credits and aid. To what extent should they be mingled for the same project? When is the aid portion so diluted that it is no longer aid?

The United Nations prepared a list of the least developed countries, and argued that they should receive more aid under more favorable terms than the better off. DAC generally agreed, but discussed the details and ramifications at length. We also discussed aid to individual sectors of economies, such as agriculture, education, and health. Experts often would come from Washington to assist us in such meetings. All DAC members shared their experiences with others, and all profited. We described USAID's pioneer work in such matters as evaluation and women in development, to the gratitude of other members who introduced such considerations into their own programs.

Another area of activity was the review of each member's foreign aid program by the other members, which normally took place every other year for each member. Criticisms and suggestions for improvements inevitably came out of such meetings. The U.S. program was criticized as being divided between too many agencies (USAID, OPIC, Peace Corps, and the Trade and Development Agency, which we will discuss later), and for being too small relative to our economic size. We were invariably near the bottom in the amount of aid provided as a percentage of our gross national product (GNP). The DAC had established a figure of 0.7 percent of GNP as a target for each donor country. We were usually around 0.2 percent, along with Italy and Austria. France and Britain were higher, but only the Nordic countries and the Dutch normally came near to or exceeded the target. We had a difficult time defending the U.S. record in these meetings. We stressed that because of our economic size the quantity of our aid was very great, often at the top of DAC, even if our percentage was low. Another argument was to note our preponderant role in military defense and NATO, where our expenditures well exceeded those of others – but our colleagues usually refused to see the relationship between the two. I must say though, that the discussions were civil and diplomatic. There was no rancor.

Maybe that is enough to illustrate our work at DAC.

Q: It is quite a lot.

MALLEY: But I should mention one other very important undertaking that was not envisaged when I went to OECD. That is the Conference on International Economic Cooperation (CIEC) between the DAC countries and the so-called Group of 77 developing countries (actually more than 77). It was also called the North-South conference. It was hosted by the French government in Paris during 1976 and 1977, and was a major event at the time. The Group of 77 was pressing the rich countries for all kinds of concessions – more foreign aid, reduction of trade barriers to their exports, more technology transfer, more influence in the IFIs and UN bodies, and the like.

The large U.S. delegation to CIEC was headed by Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs Richard Cooper. It was divided into four or five segments, one of which was development assistance. Joe Winder headed that segment, and myself and Bob Asselin were appointed part of his team. Other sections of our delegation to OECD provided support in other areas. There were, as I recall, three long CIEC sessions lasting two to four weeks each. A vast amount of time and expenditure went into the meetings. Position papers on all manner of topics were prepared by both sides. We had to reach agreements on topics with our OECD colleagues before facing the other side. Night discussions and negotiating sessions were normal, all night on a few occasions. Diplomatic notes regarding results were negotiated to the last word and comma. There were daily meetings with the press. Finally it all ended in June 1977. I suppose it made some contribution to north-south relations. At least we understood each other better. Secretary Cooper sent me and Asselin commendation letters for our roles.

Q: During this time, how did you get along with that political appointee who was your boss?

MALLEY: Mr. Smalley turned out to be a good and reasonable fellow. He let me and the analysts do the work and represent the U.S. at almost all DAC meetings. He limited his role to attending the highest level meetings only, and representing us at formal functions. And he did not participate in CIEC. Later under the Reagan administration, he became the State Department's number two and then number one press spokesman. He and his wife then retired in France. They were real Francophiles.

I had a fair amount of dealings with political appointees during my career. Unlike Smalley, many arrive with the attitude that they are going to change things – to “run things right,” or “in a businesslike manner.” They imply that you have not been doing so. You have to tell them truths. Foreign aid is not a business – it is a foreign policy and economic development tool. You have to say, “What you want to do is illegal – you have to get the law changed.” Or, “We can cancel these activities if you want, but they are joint with the World Bank and the Dutch, so you will have to explain to them.” The newcomers are often irked by such responses. You have to be very diplomatic.

Q: How was life in Paris?

MALLEY: Well Stu, it was very nice. My work was high level, intense at times, but there was also considerable time off. That is the European way. Let me tell you about my involvement in baseball in France.

Q: Did you say baseball?

Yes. Baseball is a minor and amateur sport in France, say like rugby in the U.S. There is a baseball league, well organized with rules and regulations, in the French manner. The top team each year wins the French baseball cup.

Well, the U.S. marine detachment in Paris had several excellent baseball players, and wanted to form a team and enter the league. They needed a leader and manager. Somehow they discovered that I had a baseball background, and asked me to assume that role. I was glad to. We found other players in the American community, applied and were accepted into the league, and practiced regularly in the Bois de Boulogne. We had a great 1977 season, ending up as one of the top four teams in the country. We lost in the semi-finals to a team from Nice, which in turn lost to a Parisian team in the finals. The next year we were not so successful – some of our best players had been reassigned. Eventually the team disbanded and left the league. But I continued to attend meetings of the French baseball association. And I became an umpire, earning francs in the process.

At their annual ball in 1977 or 1978, the marine detachment presented me a nice award and plaque for my services, to my complete surprise.

Q: Let me ask a question about the French. So often we are at odds with them. At DAC, were you pretty much singing out of the same hymnbook, or not?

MALLEY: In the foreign aid field, yes. The French had, and still have, a very significant aid program. It is much higher than ours on a per capita and GNP basis. We are one of the stingiest countries, although as I said before, our quantity of aid is still very high because of the massive size of our economy.

Q: Okay. That is probably a good place to stop. You left OECD when?

MALLEY: American politics again intervened in my life. Carter won the presidency in 1976, so Smalley had to leave. It was assumed by everyone involved that I would succeed him – after all, I had been doing most of the work all along. I was highly recommended to the Carter foreign affairs transition team by our mission and our backstops in Washington. And members of that team visiting Paris virtually promised me the job – it is “only a matter of paperwork”, Ted Van Dyke said.

But in truth, they had other ideas. They decided to replace Smalley with their own political appointee. And more egregious, this favorite was a veteran USAID officer – Lloyd Jonnes -- who had retired some years before. Stuart, you may remember that the late 1970s and early 1980s were a period when senior Foreign Service officers were in surplus – some were even “walking the halls” in Washington without assignments. For me to have been promised and then not get the DAC job, and then have a retiree be brought back to take it during a period of employee surplus, was disgraceful. Myself and the mission voiced our displeasure at the highest levels. Of course it did no good. Efficiency and cost did not matter to the newcomers. I assume that Jonnes had some great influence among the Democrats, and he and his wife wanted to live in Paris for awhile.

Actually I knew him from the past – he had been in PPC. He had been a perfectly competent senior professional, and we got along fine. But I could not stay in Paris under these circumstances. I requested transfer.

Q: And then where did you go?

MALLEY: To Washington. But I almost stayed in Europe. You are familiar with the United Nations Industrial Development Organization (UNIDO) in Vienna. The number two position became vacant, and our OECD mission recommended me to Washington and Vienna to fill it. I did not get it.

ROY STACEY
Program Officer, USAID
Paris (1975-1978)

Mr. Stacey was raised in Hawaii and educated at the University of California and George Washington University. Joining USAID in 1963, he served first on the Somali desk in Washington and was subsequently assigned to Mogadishu as Assistant Program Officer. Continuing as an Africa specialist, Mr. Stacey served with USAID in Nairobi, Mbabane, Abidjan, Paris and Harare. From 1986 to 1988, he served as Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs. Following retirement Mr. Stacey worked with the World Bank, also on Southern African Affairs. Mr. Stacey was interviewed by W. Haven North in 1999.

STACEY: After the REDSO experience, I went back to Washington for a short period of time, about three months. I was going to go into a senior position in Africa DP as I recall. Then I was asked to go to Paris to work with the DAC Chairman, Maurice Williams at the time (He had been a former deputy administrator of AID) to work on an idea of what to do in the post-drought period on the Sahel. There had been some earlier conversations that I certainly wasn't a part of, between the French and the Americans. There had been great concern about: if the Sahara had returned to its pre-drought AID levels, which were very, very small, that this region would be condemned; that there were going to be recurring droughts and recurring emergencies. How could we drought proof this region? How could we insulate it from these weather-induced emergencies?

Q: Do you know who was the instigator in this?

STACEY: Yes. The two people that were the primary instigators were Sam Adams, who was the Assistant Administrator for Africa, and Jean Audibert, the Director of Development in the French Ministry of Cooperation. Jean Audibert later went on to be their ambassador in Algeria

And he's retired now living in Paris. We see so many instances where the French and the Americans can't agree on something, but the Club du Sahel really was a French-American initiative.

Q: Why were the French interested in having us around? That wasn't always the case.

STACEY: I suspect they decided, which was a rational decision in their eyes, they couldn't bear the burden of this very poor and rather vulnerable region all alone, and it would be in their best interest...

Q: Were they active in the relief operation?

STACEY: Oh, yes. They were active in the relief operation.

Q: But not on the scale of the U.S.?

STACEY: Not on the scale of the U.S., but that's because so much of their food aid goes through the European Community, so the EC was certainly active on the scale of the U.S., but...we estimated that the drought, even though by some estimates a hundred thousand lives were lost and millions of head of livestock, the overall relief effort in '73-'74 cost about two billion dollars for the entire world community. The thought that this might happen every few years, especially in '73 seemed catastrophic, not just for loss of life but catastrophic in terms of budgetary impact. The idea that maybe we could do something to head this off became...certain people began talking about that. The idea to explore what could be done, and if the Sahelians would be interested in doing something on a regional basis, Maury Williams, the DAC Chairman was also President Nixon's Drought Relief Coordinator, and so the green light was given to Maury (this was unusual for the DAC Chairman who really is an international civil servant although he works for the U.S.) to explore whether the Sahelian countries were interested in some kind of initiative, and would they take the lead on this, or what were they interested in. So Maury said he needed a staff person from the French and one from the Americans to work on this to do the legwork, the staff-work, to do the traveling and so I was asked too do that which was a very lucky opportunity for me.

Q: Building on the fact that you had this REDSO experience.

STACEY: Yes, I think it was because I had the REDSO experience and by that time had pretty decent French. It was difficult to work with the French unless you could speak their language, they didn't like that at all. What I particularly remember about this period in which the Sahel Development Program was created as a line item in the U.S. budget - and as I mentioned it was no year money, unheard of - was that those bureaucrats like ourselves that worked on this, people in the AID office here in Washington, people in the AID missions in the field, we never succeeded in creating a strong executive branch interest in this initiative. We somehow created more of a Congressional interest in the initiative.

It was while I was in Paris at the Club du Sahel, that perhaps one of my more memorable experiences occurred as an AID officer, in that the Senate held hearings on the Sahel Development Program. In those days the Senate Foreign Relations Committee had an Africa subcommittee, which was chaired by Hubert Humphrey. I still considered myself a young and relatively inexperienced AID officer, and was asked to come in from Paris and testify before Hubert Humphrey on the Sahel Development Program. Which I did, and we laid out what we meant to accomplish. I recall that the Congressional interest in this was positive and later in my various dealings with the Hill and working with the Congress, I never saw this kind of positive interest in anything else. Hubert Humphrey was really interested. I do remember him really grilling me on who was going to be in charge, because as far as he was concerned, if we were going to have a Sahel Development Program, somebody had to be in charge, and it couldn't be an American. He wanted to know who out there was in charge.

Q: What did you say?

STACEY: I said it was the Minister Coordinator, because the organization we were working with, which had been created by the Sahelians at the time of the drought, was the CILSS, which stands for the Interstate Committee for the Fight Against Drought and Desertification. That's a French acronym. The CILSS was governed by a Council of Ministers, and there was a lead minister who was called the Minister Coordinator. The Minister Coordinator in those days was a man called Buli Mamunga, who happened to be a colonel in the Niger army, but he was also Niger's Minister of Rural Development and Agriculture. So I told Senator Humphrey that the man in charge would be Buli Mamunga. He had a tough time pronouncing that name, but we finally got it on the record. It's interesting that Buli Mamunga was really quite a competent military person. Shortly after those hearings, he was imprisoned by the president of Niger, who as we know, was a bit of a dictator and quite an authoritarian person. Buli Mamunga spent seven years in solitary confinement in a very tiny prison cell. I met him recently. He's now the head of the Energy Agency in Niger, an oil company that does all of the importing of oil. He said the way he kept his sanity in prison was a combination of exercise and prayer, but with exercising every day for hours at a time, he got to the point where he could do hundreds of push-ups. Interesting man, and he's somebody that I did remember.

Q: What was the concept of the program you were presenting to Congress and Humphrey?

STACEY: The concept of the program was first of all to mobilize a great deal of international support. There were many countries, which were not providing any kind of assistance and were not engaged in this region of Africa. This had largely been French domain in the Sahel. So the first element was to develop some conceptual framework that could be of use to other donors. There was a major study that was requested of MIT on the Sahel. I think Congress appropriated a million dollars for MIT to do that study.

HOWARD R. SIMPSON
Deputy Public Affairs Officer, USIS
Paris (1975-1979)

Howard R. Simpson was born in 1925 and raised in Alameda, California. In 1943, he was drafted into the U.S. Army and served in the European Theater. He returned to the United States in 1945 and continued his education in California and Paris, France. Mr. Simpson joined the Foreign Service in 1951, where he served in Vietnam, Nigeria, France, and Algeria. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on January 10, 1994.

Q: Well then you left there in 1974. Was that right? And you went back to Paris. You were there from..., well maybe you were back in Washington for a bit. But I've got you from '75 to '79 in Paris.

SIMPSON: Well, I tell you, there was a big gap, wait a minute, we're missing something here. Because, no, I went from Algiers to Marseille as Consul-General.

Q: Oh, I see.

SIMPSON: After 2 years in Algiers, they appointed me Consul General in Marseille. Which was sort of a surprise because you know, USIA types don't normally go into that kind of thing. But I had heard that the thing was coming open and I made a few soundings and some people had been favorable of the time I had spent in Marseille and all that. So that worked out and it was very nice. There's a nice residence there and I was back in my element and coming back as a Consul General was good because I had all the press contacts, the cultural people, and I knew the politicians, the mayor and all that sort of thing. So it was a natural assignment and lasted a little over two years. Once again, it was one of those administrative hiccups. It was suppose to be a 2-2 (years) or something like that or at least 3 years. And State, I didn't know it, I didn't realize it, was going into this economic mode. In other words, saying this Consulate General is now going to be Economic not Political. Well, unfortunately for me, they decided that Marseille was going to be an Economic post so I was replaced by somebody who specialized in Economics. And that was the time when I didn't know where I was going from there. But fortunately, I heard about this Paris possibility coming up. And in the interim, I went to the University of South Carolina as a so-called Diplomat-in-Residence. But this wasn't the State Department program. This was a deal through USIA. And it only lasted for about 3-4 months.

Q: Then you went to Paris about...

SIMPSON: I went back to Paris as the DPAO and I must say I didn't really enjoy it that much. Because everything had become so set.

Q: Well, I must say, it sounds like a huge Embassy.

SIMPSON: That's right, and not much flexibility. And all these problems. I'll tell you why I left in '79. I was suppose to do 2 years there at least, maybe 3, and I wasn't too happy with the job. And then the Director of USIA came through and we had a luncheon for him at the house, at the apartment. And at one point, he said, and how long have you been in France? And I started to tout up the number of times I'd been in Paris, Marseille or vice versa. And he looked quite shocked. And so the next thing you know, about a month later a telegram came through giving me a few weeks to get ready to go to Zaire as Counselor for Public Affairs. I had 2 teenage daughters at the time and 2 young ones and Zaire was sort of tottering, as it always is, and I'd led an inspection team to Zaire at one point and I thought: Is this really worth it? So after an evening's discussion with my wife I had the pleasure of sending a telegram saying, rather than appearing in Kinshasa on such and such a date, I'd like my retirement to begin on such and such a date and etc., etc. So that was when I bowed out.

Q: How did you find, in Paris, actually you were there 2 times, one time we haven't covered. How did you find dealing with what you'd call the intellectuals there? They seem to be a major force in France, they identify themselves as such and people know who they are. And I assume they were one of our target groups.

SIMPSON: That's right.

Q: How did you find them and how did you deal with them?

SIMPSON: Well, this was a problem because all Embassies develop their own lists, their own favorites over a period of time. And every new officer, every newly assigned officer comes in and after a while he adds his. But unfortunately there's not much shedding of these people. And so you build up a crustacean; an endless list of regulars at the Embassy. And this is particularly true of the Paris Embassy where reception after reception you find the same people. So there was a sort of limited, a difficulty of breaking into the real world outside the Embassy circle. And often when you would try to do that, things didn't work out. Now the French intellectual, whether he be on the right or the left, usually considers himself vastly superior to anybody else. You know, thinking things out and his education and all that. And so there was more a meeting of the minds in things like music and theater and cinema than you'd get in philosophical discussions or literature or whatever. And I myself wasn't too involved in the cultural side. But on the side of the journalists, information and the media, TV and all that, I found it fairly easy to operate in Paris. Because this was a worldly crew of sophisticates. And they knew what you could do for them. There's no doubt about that. And what you couldn't do for them. And they knew, you know, what we might be interested in as far as programs and things they were involved in. And we tried to help them where we thought it would work out as far as covering American events and developments. But myself, I'm probably wrong, but I think the time has come for the Agency, USIA, to stop worrying about the cultural side so much. Culture takes care of itself.

Q: It spreads like wild fire.

SIMPSON: You don't need government to fiddle in it. The very fact, this whole idea that you send some cultural leader to the States on some sort of leader grant and you're gaining great ground from this. It's not necessarily true. Some people go to the States and they hate it. We never seem to recognize that.

Q: Yes, might as well, particularly it's not as though we're talking about--if you're working out of the Ukrainian culture, you've got to work with people to come and learn about yourself.

SIMPSON: That's right.

Q: The American culture is all pervasive and people are going to make up their minds one way or other about it. I mean sometimes we're trying to prove ourselves to be more couth than we think other people perceive us. And we actually do have ballet or something like that. Well, I'm not sure it makes a hell of a lot of difference. It's a little bit pretentious. Somewhat nouveau riche. Just before we quit on this, you had 2 Ambassadors while you were there this last time, Kenneth Rush and Arthur Hartman. Can you just give me, how you felt they operated?

SIMPSON: Well they were completely different of course. Kenneth Rush was a political appointee, a businessman, a very personable fellow. And with a certain founding in foreign affairs and he knew his way around. I can't remember what his job was before that but he traveled a lot, been on international...

Q: I think he'd been Under Secretary of State or something like that.

SIMPSON: That's right, he'd been in the business before, but always on the political side. Then of course Arthur Hartman was a professional, a long time Foreign Service officer. Rush delegated a lot, you know. And I remember he came down to Marseille when I was there as Consul General. And I introduced him to Gaston Defferre who was a socialist mayor, and a Chamber Deputy, and a former resistance leader. He was very outspoken and often accused of being anti-American. But he was just an independent cuss, that's what he was. And I'd always, not defended him, but I always tried to explain this to people in Paris. And so there was a little, well they weren't afraid, but there was a little worry about his meeting with this new Ambassador who wasn't a professional. And so as it always happens, as it often happens, here are these two outspoken men, self-made men, meeting in the Mayor's office and they hit it off just perfectly. Now whether that would have been the same with Art Hartman, I wasn't Consul General when Hartman was there, I'd moved up to Paris. Hartman was, as I say, a true blue professional. Presided over all the staff meetings, scanned all the telegrams, was involved in a lot of the negotiations with the French, but talking about culture--he had great hopes for the cultural side of USIA in Paris. To a certain extent I think he was disappointed that we didn't get more into that because you know he'd have cultural soirées at the residence and all this sort of thing. In fact we finally had to bring in somebody to handle this, to be a Cultural Attaché. But they were altogether different people. To sum it up, I wasn't sorry to leave that big post.

Q: Well then why don't we stop at this point and I'm leaving room for you to fill in later. Thank you.

JAMES DOBBINS
Officer in Charge of French Affairs, European Bureau
Washington, DC (1976-1978)

Ambassador James Dobbins was born in Brooklyn. After graduating from Georgetown's School of Foreign Service, he joined the Navy. Since joining the Foreign Service in 1967, his career has included positions in France, England, Germany and an Ambassadorship to the European Community. Ambassador Dobbins was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2003.

Q: Well, today is the 17th of September 2003. We have now reached 1976, where you were in charge of French affairs in the European Bureau until '78.

Now, in the first place, let's look at the wiring diagram. Who was the head of European Affairs at that time?

DOBBINS: Art Hartman.

Q: He had not been ambassador to France at this point.

DOBBINS: No.

Q: Who did you report to?

DOBBINS: In the European Bureau? The office director was Robert Barber, and the deputy office director was Ed Roll.

Q: Well, now, what was the status in 1976 of American-French relations?

DOBBINS: Well, as usual, we were periodically irritated by some French assertion of independence. I think at the time the major issues tended to be nuclear proliferation, and I think there were some monetary issues, but nuclear proliferation was the one I recall being an irritant.

Q: Well, looking at it, was it a discussion among Office of the European Bureau, others? Had you become almost a focal point? Were people trying to puzzle out this French-American relationship? I mean, why was it always such a testy one?

DOBBINS: It was an interesting job, because there always were issues with the French, unlike most other countries of a bilateral nature, and thus there was a market for somebody who could explain how to effectively manage the relationship to get whatever it was that we were looking for at the time. So it did give somebody who could pretend to have the key to getting the French to do what one wanted entrée at a more senior level than might otherwise be the case.

Q: Well, what did you feel you brought to this?

DOBBINS: Based on two assignments in France, but also, the year I had been working with Sonnenfeldt and Kissinger, an understanding of how European politics and European diplomacy worked.

Q: Well, '76, who was the president of France at that time?

DOBBINS: There was an election, and there was a serious threat that the Socialists, allied with the Communists, would win, which made everybody very nervous, because this was a period in which Euro-Communism was the State Department's main European preoccupation. So we spent a lot of time considering how we should deal with Mitterrand, who was then running on this coalition ticket with the Communists, and deciding whether we should receive him in Washington, for instance, or not.

A lot of the European Bureau was strongly opposed to receiving him, some on the seventh floor, including probably the secretary of state, but certainly his main adviser there, Peter Tarnoff, who was executive secretary of the department, were pushing in the other direction. So there was a good deal of tussling back and forth, which we ultimately prevailed in.

Q: The issue was that Mitterrand was a candidate for, but not the ...

DOBBINS: He was a candidate for president.

Q: So the idea would be that if we received him, we would ...

DOBBINS: We would effectively be endorsing the idea that Communists could enter the French government, which of course they did, five or six years later. But by then, the concerns were a lot lower. The nature of Communism had changed, of Western European Communism.

Q: How did we view this Euro-Communism?

DOBBINS: We were very suspicious of it.

Q: In what way?

DOBBINS: We thought it would threaten the basic willingness of the countries concerned to cooperate within NATO, to adopt common positions on East-West issues, to confront the Soviet Union.

Q: Well, we had just gone through sort of the trauma of Portugal. From your perspective, did you look upon Portugal as being a positive omen? In other words, sort of the Socialists could eventually chew up the Communists, or not?

DOBBINS: I think some of us did. Henry Kissinger tended to take a cataclysmic view of it, and it was only with difficulty that Sonnenfeldt, and Carlucci, who was the ambassador there, persuaded him that if we gave the Socialists some room to maneuver that they would in fact ultimately prevail, as they did.

Q: Well, was this used as an argument on your part when you were running the French desk?

DOBBINS: At that stage, I was of the view that Mitterrand was by no means certain to win, that our receiving him could modestly improve his chances, that we could do without having a Socialist-Communist government, that one would be damaging to our interests and that we shouldn't therefore receive him or legitimize the process, but that if he did come to power, we would have to learn to live with it and work with, at least, the Socialist elements of the government. And we did some contingency planning on that basis. We had a meeting in the White House, and I did some papers on the subject.

Q: Who in the National Security Council was handling the French affairs, European Affairs?

DOBBINS: Bob Hunter was the senior director.

Q: He later went to NATO, didn't he?

DOBBINS: In the Clinton administration.

Q: What were your relations with the French Embassy?

DOBBINS: They were pretty good. I knew the ambassador, which was unusual for a desk officer. I had handled the quadripartite talks, which were very informal, confidential discussions among the main three European powers. And the French ambassador had been the French political director, so we had known each other, and I continued to perform that function for Hartman, who succeeded Sonnenfeldt as the American principal in these talks. I continued to be the note taker, which was unusual because I was on the French desk officer, but because I had done it from the seventh floor, I continued in it.

So I worked on those issues directly for the assistant secretary, and I was known to have access directly to the assistant secretary. I didn't see a lot of the French ambassador, but I did see him occasionally and I saw other members of the French Embassy.

Q: Well, I was wondering, the French government at the highest level and the American government at the highest level, have a tendency to get into kind of spitting contests over things. We're going through a big one right now. But this has been going on going back forever. Did you find that you, at the desk, and with the French Embassy, were trying to work to do what diplomats do and smooth things out and trying to keep things from getting out of hand?

DOBBINS: Yes. I think this wasn't a period of great tension in the U.S.-French relationship, and after Giscard took over from Pompidou, the relationship became a good deal warmer. There were some difficulties, but by and large, it wasn't one of the more difficult periods of the relationship.

Q: Speaking of relationships, you were there during the election of '76. Did that cause any tensions within European Bureau? Were there concerns that the Carter administration might be going in the wrong direction?

DOBBINS: There were some tensions. Euro-Communism, how seriously we should take it. Not a major problem.

Q: You were mentioning nuclear proliferation as an issue.

DOBBINS: Yes, the French were selling nuclear technology to Brazil, as I recall, and we were concerned about the Brazilians having nuclear weapons, as they appeared to be flirting with.

Q: Did we get anywhere with that?

DOBBINS: Eventually.

Q: How does someone get somewhere with this?

DOBBINS: I don't remember any particular denouement, and I don't know to what extent we were successful with the French, as opposed to the Brazilians, but eventually the Brazilians did fairly definitively give up their ambitions.

Q: Yes, I think the Argentineans were on the other side of the equation. It was a major concern to us, to have two nuclear powers down there with no particular reason to use them or anything else, but you've got unstable governments. Did the French have a different view of the Soviet Union than we did, say, under Kissinger?

DOBBINS: Not markedly. The Germans had taken a softer line.

Q: This is during the time of ostpolitik. When Carter came in, at your level, did you see any change?

DOBBINS: They had a much less experienced team and there were strong tensions between the NSC and State, which became more evident over time. And Carter brought in a young, inexperienced team of people. I remember going to a meeting at the White House to prepare for some trip he was going on, and I was by far the oldest person in the room, and I considered myself a young man at that point.

Then I went to another meeting to meet with two assistants to the president, again, to prepare for Carter's first trip, and I was explaining to them how – he was going to an economic summit – and how these things worked, because I helped set them up under Sonnenfeldt, and had assisted George Shultz, who was the sherpa for the first of them. So I was explaining to them, and these two young, very senior people in the White House, all they wanted to talk to was what time on the tennis court that the president had personally awarded them.

He had been in office a couple of weeks, and he had finally made a major decision as to how to allocate time on the White House tennis court among his chief lieutenants, a task that most chief executives would have delegated considerably down the chain.

Q: Way down the line.

DOBBINS: But which the president had made personally, and there was a definite status involved in whether you got a prime time or were delegated to something more – so that was both alarming and amusing. The NSC made an effort to get more heavily into European affairs. For instance, they insisted on sending somebody to participate in these quadripartite discussions, which made the State Department unhappy, to share this channel with the NSC, so we had to work with them. But, we weren't at the eye of the storm as it affected the Vance-Brzezinski relationship.

Q: Whom did Carter name as our ambassador?

DOBBINS: To France, he named Arthur Hartman.

Q: So, in a way, this continued a strong relationship between the bureau and France?

DOBBINS: Right, and I knew Hartman, saw him when I went to Paris, which, again, was somewhat unusual for the desk officer. And then Vest became assistant secretary.

Q: So it was quite a strong team, then?

DOBBINS: Yes, it was a good team. I saw a lot of Vest and traveled with him frequently.

Q: What sort of travel were you doing?

DOBBINS: Well, we did these quadripartite talks, which occurred ...

Q: The quadripartite talks were on what issue?

DOBBINS: On everything. They were the inner steering group for the alliance, so mostly East-West issues, but they basically discussed anything that was of common interest to the four.

Q: Well, Carter came in with the idea that one can almost literally do business with the Soviet Union. He put in Arthur Watson I think in there as a businessman. The idea was a new look. In the quadripartite group, did you sense disquiet about sort of the Carter approach?

DOBBINS: Well, there were issues on which the Europeans were unhappy. They didn't like his proposal for a consortium to control conventional arms transfers, for instance. That initiative consequently never really got off the ground. There was unease about aspects of his arms control agenda, which became more prominent as that agenda advanced, ultimately focused on the whole issue of shorter-range missiles. It led to, ultimately, the two-track decision to deploy a new generation of missiles, which the Carter administration really didn't want to do, but felt compelled to do to make the Europeans feel secure.

That sort of what I was doing when I got to London, which was my next assignment. There were lots of issues that needed to be worked out, and by and large they were worked out. It was not a time of tremendous tension. The real European concerns with the Carter administration were the idea that followed defeat in Vietnam; there were elements of the Carter administration, like Andy Young at the UN, who were saying that the United States would never engage itself again in that kind of commitment. So there was anxiety as to the durability of the American commitment to Europe and its robustness and willingness to be tough when it had to be. And this became a source of anxiety in Europe, particularly among more conservative circles.

Q: Well, the French, do you recall sort of what the French intellectuals, that class of people, were saying about Carter? Because he must have been a rather exotic bird for them to deal with.

DOBBINS: They were rather dismissive of him, the same way they later became with, say, Reagan, or the latest Bush. Later the French intellectuals in the '90s became much more conservative. There was a shift and the United States became popular with at least some conservatives. There was a reaction to the more traditional French left wing, and you were beginning to see little signs of that in the late '70s.

They were the beginning of times that you might have the wider range of views on issues, which became more prominent over the next 10 or 15 years, as a more conservative strain of French intellectual thought emerged.

Q: I realize you were at the desk level, but did you see, was there a group within Congress or the congressional staff that sort of reacted against the French, or not?

DOBBINS: A little bit. As I said, this was not a period in which U.S.-French relationships were particularly bad. Giscard made an effort to get along with the United States – not on every issue. He was not a Gaullist and didn't feel bound by certain Gaullist attitudes.

Q: Were there any problems with conflicts over African policy? The French have their spheres of influence.

DOBBINS: I think by and large we were quite content with the French to manage their part of Africa. There wasn't as much cooperation as there might be in areas where our interests coincided because of sort of mutual suspicion, but I don't recall any real tension.

Q: Well, was there in a way a sense of relief within, say, the State Department, particularly in European Affairs, that Vietnam, having been kicked out of there and all, was kind of behind us, and then we didn't have to deal with that all the time?

DOBBINS: I can't speak for everyone. I think there was a concern about American credibility and weight as the result of what was clearly a sharp defeat.

Q: Yes, I was in Korea at the time, and obviously the Koreans had a great deal of interest in how much we would stick to our commitments. There was a lot of nervousness there at the time.

DOBBINS: Right, so I think our main preoccupation was reassuring people that this wasn't going to portend ...

Q: What was your view, your collective view from the European Bureau, of Brzezinski?

DOBBINS: I didn't know him well at the time. I still don't know him well, but I know him better now. He became the opponent in the sort of interagency battles, although, again, this tended to become more prominent after I moved to London. I guess I was about a year during the Carter administration in Washington. That was the first year, and tension develops more progressively over time.

JOHN H. KELLY
Political/Military Officer

Paris (1976-1980)

John H. Kelly was born in Fond du Lac, Wisconsin in 1939. He received a bachelor's degree in history from Emory University. Mr. Kelly entered the Foreign Service in 1964. His career included positions in Adana, Ankara, Bangkok, and Songkhla. This interview was conducted by Thomas Stern on December 12, 1994.

Q: In 1976, you were assigned to our Embassy in Paris as the politico-military officer. How did that assignment come about?

KELLY: I don't think that I requested an assignment to France. In early 1976, as the Presidential election campaign was beginning to move into high gear, Hal Sonnenfeldt told me that he would be leaving government regardless of the outcome by the end of 1976. He volunteered to be of help to me if I wanted another assignment before the end of his government service. He suggested that I look around for another assignment. He did at the same time admit that his support might damage my chances of getting a good assignment and that therefore I should weigh his offer of assistance very carefully. So I went to see my friendly Personnel officer and reviewed possible assignments. He was pushing me to accept the job as permanent Chargé d'Affaires in the Seychelles Island. That was a two-officer post. Our Ambassador in Kenya was the accredited ambassador, but the permanent US representative was the resident Charge. We had a NASA tracking station and some other facilities on the islands which was one of the reasons for a diplomatic presence. So my friendly assignments counselor wanted me to go there. I was not interested; I had my tour on a tropical beach -- Songkhla; furthermore the Seychelles was far remote and isolated -- not a good post for a family, even if being Chargé had some attractions.

Anne Armstrong, then our Ambassador in London, heard about me from someone, and asked that I spend sometime with her, which I did. She offered me the job as her executive assistant in London, but that didn't work out because she wanted someone immediately and I was not available that soon. Then someone mentioned to me that the politico-military position in Paris was going to be vacated. I was only an FSO-5 at the time and my personnel counselor didn't think that I had a chance to be selected because I was just too junior. Many more senior officers had applied for it, including one senior officer who was willing to take a job rated below his rank. Somehow, Art Hartman, then the Assistant Secretary for EUR, learned of my interest and he called me. As I mentioned earlier, he and I had been involved in a number of issues so that he knew my work first-hand. He thought I would be the right person for the job; I said that I would love to get that assignment. A week or so passed by and I got a call from my Personnel officer, who told me that the assignment was mine. I am sure it was all Art's doing; as far as I know, Hal never got involved.

During the last two months in the Counselor's Office, I went to FSI to refresh my French. That was a full day's tutorial. I would go back to my office at 4 p.m. and worked usually until 10 p.m. I also started the day at 6 a.m. until it was time to take the bus to FSI. It was crazy, and I don't recommend it, but I did it. It was probably my period of peak efficiency because I had no time for anything extraneous, but again, my family life suffered.

In any case, in the summer of 1976, we went off to Paris. We arrived at the beginning of August when the Parisians flee their city. Hank Cohen was the Political Counselor and my boss. Sam Gammon was the DCM and the Ambassador was Kenneth Rush, formerly the Union Carbide CEO, Ambassador to Germany, Deputy Secretary of Defense and briefly Deputy Secretary and Secretary of State. I was the only politico-military officer in the Embassy, although a number of my colleagues were involved in P/M issues.

My main responsibilities were to deal with the Foreign Ministry on arms control -- which the French viewed with some skepticism and with the Defense Ministry on NATO programs that still involved the French. When the French, under De Gaulle, decided to withdraw from NATO's integrated command structure, General Lemnitzer, then the Supreme Allied Commander of NATO troops, and French General Ayaray, initialed an agreement which preserved French participation in a number of NATO activities, such as the European air defense system, the integrated communication system and some other systems. So we had some NATO business that had to transacted with the French.

I also dealt with the Defense Ministry on the sale of American defense articles to France. By mid-1976, these items were almost entirely high tech systems, such as the AWAC aircraft, which the French ultimately built with Boeing. I spent a lot of time selling the French on that acquisition. I also reported on French defense policy, its independent nuclear deterrent, the defense budget, etc. I was also reported on some French domestic issues -- how French political parties or politicians viewed defense or arms control issues.

Even though NATO had moved to Brussels, there were still vestiges of a US military presence in the Embassy. For example, we had personnel, both military and civilian, who worried about the NATO petroleum pipelines which carried products through France to Germany and Belgium. We had some uniformed personnel who worried about the European air defense system. There was also a large Defense Attaché Office, an Office of Defense Cooperation, which handled military sales and American Monuments Commission office. I worked with all of these groups. Our relationships were very good, which was a major change from previous eras when relationships had deteriorated seriously. My predecessor, who regrettably committed suicide some months after leaving Paris, had an extremely difficult time both within and outside the Embassy. He had feuded with the DCM, with the Political Counselor, with the American military. So I inherited a situation which could only improve, and I think everyone was looking forward to a more normal relationship. Unfortunately, my predecessor had destroyed all the files before he left, including the index cards and listing of his contacts. So I had in many ways to start from scratch. I tried to talk to him before I left Washington, but he kept referring me to Cohen; it was not until I had gotten to post that I understood how bad the situation had been and how troubled my predecessor had been. I had been told that there was a difficult situation by both Hartman and Lowenstein, the DAS, because they told me that one of my first tasks was to rebuild relationships both within the Embassy and with the French. But I was certainly surprised by the depth of the problem that I encountered.

My contacts with the French military started as being "correct"; i.e., not warm but on speaking relationships. Over the four years I was in Paris, I am glad to say that they grew to be quite close.

I was even invited to be a lecturer at the Ecole Superior de Guerre -the French War College. I became involved with a lot of activities with the French military. These things developed even though my French in 1976 was lousy; that is 3-3, but that was not good enough to transact business. I remember the trepidation I had the first time I went to the Quai d'Orsay which is right on the other side of the Seine from the Embassy. I didn't know how I could really communicate the demarche I was supposed to deliver. I went through it in my best school-learned French. My interlocutor, a former ambassador, listen to me and took some notes. At the end of my presentation, he told me that he was a little hard of hearing and asked me to go through my presentation again; that was a very kind way of commenting on my language skills. I had been told to expect the French to be very rude; in fact, I found them to be very accommodating and forgiving to someone who was butchering their language and they tried to help me overcome my deficiencies without hurting my feelings. I studied French every day and after four years, I was very comfortable with the language. I had decided during my first year that I wanted to do some public speaking which forced me to improve my French. But I must admit that I found public speaking and the "question and answer" sessions that would follow my presentation exceedingly difficult at the beginning, but by the end of my tour, that was not a problem any longer. The Embassy did not object to my public appearances; I was under no restrictions. Gammon and Cohen, in fact, encouraged me to make these appearances; they never put any limitations on me either on public appearances or contact with the French that I considered necessary, regardless of their rank or position. I had a free hand and I took advantage of that liberty. I talked to a lot of French both in the public and private sectors. They were delighted that I was interested in public appearances because I may have been one of the few people in the Embassy who actually enjoyed it and sought it out. Hank Cohen did a lot of it, but most officers were very reluctant. Hartman, when he replaced Rush, appeared regularly on radio and television, although I know that he agonized over some of his utterances because they may not have been grammatically correct; he was very effective. It was hard enough to speak publicly in English; to do it in a foreign language as the official representative of one's own government makes it exceedingly difficult. I had done it in Thailand, but that was an entirely different environment. I found that despite French not being my "mother" language, I could communicate with people effectively as long as I didn't completely butcher the language and thereby hurt people's sensibilities. I would appear before military groups, as I mentioned, student groups, etc. I made a point of telling people as I met them that I would be delighted to appear at universities around the country. There are many student clubs in France; there are many political science clubs; France had an active network of "think-tanks" -- smaller than what we have here in the US, but nevertheless very active. Pretty soon, invitations began to come in -- more, in fact, than I could handle; after some initial appearances, the "grapevine" took over and people learned that I would be available. The French loved meetings and were happy to discuss NATO strategy or US foreign policy or many other subjects with which I had some familiarity.

In my public appearances, I met the traditional French skepticism about US government policies and actions. Jimmy Carter was not terribly popular in Western Europe. The most controversial subject that I addressed was arms control because I usually met either with a student audience that wanted to ban all nuclear weapons or disarm unilaterally if not international agreement could be reached or a more bourgeois audience that felt that any efforts to limit arms were bound to fail and therefore the Western countries had no alternative but to continue the development of its weapon capacities; that audience was also often critical of the lack of US assistance to the French nuclear deterrent. So I was vigorously challenged by almost every audience that I addressed, I can't remember any unpleasant confrontation. It is, of course, not easy for an officer, particularly one of my rank, to be current on arms control strategy being discussed in Washington, but I did my best to remain current by reading French newspapers and a daily DOD publication called the "Yellow Bird," which included clippings from The New York Times, the Washington Post and other leading American papers. I used to copy selected articles from that source and give them to my French contacts in the defense community. I also used the phone frequently to Washington; I am sure that I ran up a sizeable long-distance phone bill, talking to people in the State Department, DOD, ACDA and the NSC staff. The contacts I had made during my tour with Sonnenfeldt certainly came in handy then! Finally, I was very fortunate that about twice each year, I used to return to Washington for consultations; that was highly unusual for a mid-career officer. I have Leslie Gelb and Reg Bartholomew to thank for that process. They, as Directors of PM, thought that it was important that their people in the field -- London, Paris, and Bonn -- should be brought back to Washington for a few days of discussions and briefings about twice each year. These were very useful sessions because we could, in a face-to-face situation, bring our Washington counterparts up to date on European thinking and at the same time have the opportunity to hear about Washington's thoughts.

I had good contacts with our delegation to NATO, particularly Bob Brown, the POLAD to General Al Haig, the SACEUR. Haig knew and was very conscious of the approach that the French were taking towards NATO, which was different from that of all other European countries and needed special handling. Haig would come to Paris every three months on a private trip. He would spend a full day talking to the French General Staff about defense issues. There was minimal publicity about these trips, and I think it was a very useful technique. Brown might come a week or two earlier to set things up; he would read my files and talk to various Frenchmen. He would then prepare a lengthy briefing memo; but when Haig came, he came without the POLAD and only one military aide. These were very low key visits -- no motorcade, no fanfare, no Embassy escort. But Haig would always see Hartman at the end of the visit for a debriefing of his meetings. If Hartman was not available, he would send his aide -- usually Colonel Tony Smith -- to debrief me and then I would brief the Ambassador. We didn't report to Washington about the Haig visits; there was nothing in Haig's conversations that contradicted US policy, but the fact of his visits was not widely known in Washington -- the Secretaries of Defense and State and the NSC Advisor knew -- which was as it should have been; wider knowledge might well have jeopardized further visits -- by leaks to the media -- or at least seriously hampered them. I know for a fact that Harold Brown, the DOD Secretary knew what Haig was doing and that he very likely received a briefing after each visit in a highly restricted channel. I think that the P/M Directors knew that Haig did make these forays, but they showed little interest. I think the Haig visits were invaluable. In the first place, it made NATO-France cooperation very easy. While I was in Paris, there were two operations in the Shaba region of Zaire which required participation of US airlift capability because in both cases, Westerners were in jeopardy. American aircraft carried French and Belgian troops into the area who restored order. Our participation was obviously useful for the French and the Belgians, but it was also useful to us. After the policy were set at governmental levels, the actual technical decisions were worked out by Haig and General Marit of the French General staff. The French sent three officers to Stuttgart, where our European command was located, to work out all the details. It was a very smooth operation. The same kind of operation took place when Westerners had to be evacuated from the Chad. The Haig-French connection was very useful to reach decisions on the practical details. The French used our aircraft for some of their African operations. That cooperative effort worked very smoothly.

I should note that just because France did not belong to the NATO integrated command did not make them irrelevant to the defense of Europe, if conflict should ever had broken out. So Haig was able to discuss with the French about possible scenarios and NATO and French reactions to various threats. Of course, no action could have been taken by either NATO or French military units without political approval, but at least the technical military details had already been a subject for discussion. This was not a re-integration of France into the NATO military command, but it lay out a framework for what NATO and France might do in case of confrontation. I think I should make it clear that the talks had the blessings of France's highest political authorities, like the President, and the Defense Minister, but I think that the French military were ahead of the many political leaders in understanding that if a European military crisis should ever arise, it was absolutely essential for the French and NATO to work together very closely. I think that France then and still today is only one of five countries in the world that sees itself as a global power. The US could talk to the Soviets -- and the Russians now -- the Chinese, and the French about problems in any part of the world. They will all have a view. The Germans are still very Eurocentric; they have very little concern for events in the Pacific or Africa. The British have lost their empire and although they may be interested in affairs far away from their homeland islands, they have lost much influence east of Suez. The French aspirations are probably larger than their capacities, but they maintain a global view and still tries to remain a player in all corners of the world. Given that perception and since the Cold War was still on in the late 1970s, it made life in France for an American diplomat very interesting and sometimes very irritating since the French would try to be players in areas where they had absolutely no possibility of making a difference. They French never had any doubts that they could be influential; they might use different means than we might have, but they always thought that they could make a difference everywhere in the world.

The students were divided to some extent on the question of France's role in the world. Particularly among some leftists students, whom I got to know, there was a view that France was a very corrupt society and that France's policies in the Third World was primarily a commercial effort intended to line the pockets of French manufacturers, especially the arms producers, or French politicians. The word "corruption" included bribery of foreign and French officials which seemed to appear in the media periodically. The President of France, Giscard d'Estaing and his wife had accepted fifty large diamonds from Emperor Bokassa of Central Africa, which, after the story appeared, the d'Estaings said they intended to sell and give the proceeds to some charity. So there were a number of Frenchmen, young and old, who believed that corruption was rife. There was considerable support to what the French called La Mission Civilatrice -- "the civilizing role of France" -- the cultural leader and the developer of ideas. There was a significant French minority in France that viewed the "merchants of death" with great skepticism.

While on the subject of arms sales, I might say a couple of words about my role in the sale of US weapon systems. As I said, AWACs was our major possibility. I used to talk to members of the French General Staff and Air Force and parliamentarians, especially those who were members of the Defense Committees about that plane. The French were faced essentially with four choices of planes that would be able to survey large expanses. Since they saw themselves as a major force especially in Europe, Africa and the Middle East, the French did not seriously consider relying on any other nation to conduct the surveillance. They wanted "eyes and ears" to look out for long distances. One choice was to build one themselves, but the more they examined that option, the more problematical it became. They did have a domestically-produced limited capability, but its long range use was out of the question. If they wanted to buy into a long range surveillance capability, the French had three choices: the British-built Nimrod system, which was cheaper but inferior to the AWAC, an American system built by Grumman -- the E-2 system -- a naval system which had a longer range than the Nimrod, or the Boeing E3A-AWAC (Air warning and control command), which had the longest range of all and one that became the keystone of our own surveillance system. It played a major role in the Gulf and every major military operation in which the US was involved; it allows a commander to have information about what was happening on the ground and in the air 300-400 miles in the distance. I was not a high pressure salesman; I focused on the French desire to have a system and if they had reached that conclusion, then to suggest they might as well procure the best. I worked closely with Boeing's resident representative in Paris, who was a retired American Air Force General. We held a continuous dialogue with the French decision-makers and staffs. I did not get any urging from Washington; neither State or DOD seemed to be indifferent to the sale; certainly not as interested as Boeing or the US Air Force was, but on the other hand, Washington did not put any restraints on us. The sale would have encompassed four or five aircraft, which was not a major sale. In any case, in those days, the US government was not as involved in foreign military sales as it subsequently became and is now. In fact, during the Carter administration, there was considerable discussion and in fact some actions designed to reduce US sales.

I attended two Paris air shows. They are monumental; I would guess that a Paris air show is the biggest one in the world. It took place at Le Bourget airport outside of Paris; that was not an operational passenger airport; it was used primarily for cargo, although it had been the field that Lindbergh had used in his first transatlantic flight in 1927. But the airport was large enough to accommodate the 400-600 aircraft that out on exhibit at the air show. Then there were thousands of exhibitors who set up displays; ever aerospace company in the world would show its latest wares. Some just had small areas consisting primarily of desks and perhaps photographs of their products; others had "chalets" which were substantial structures -- looking something like town houses -- one next to another stretching along runways. Each chalet would have a big room with lots of comfortable chairs, with a well stocked bar. Some had a first class restaurant which served excellent meals. All these features were intended, of course, to attract potential buyers; they would be served food and drink and given sales pitches with videos or in some cases by giving them a first hand look at the product which might well be parked right outside the house. Each chalet had a huge observation deck -- usually in the roof -- which enabled people to see the actual aircraft perform periodically, as it did throughout the day. You could watch fighter aircraft performing stunts, or the Concorde or a Soviet TU-144. Every company was trying to show the maximum capability of its aircraft, which unfortunately led to a number of serious accidents. In my first show, in 1977, Fairchild introduced the A-10 plane -- called the "Warhog" -- which was a very powerful anti-tank platform. The first A-10 took off and the pilot attempted to make a loop. He got up perhaps as high as 600 feet, made a loop, but as he was approaching land, ran out of room and crashed, nose first, into the runway. The pilot was killed and the plane destroyed. The Soviets had a crash when their TU-144 -- their supersonic transport -- stalled when it went into a climb and fell to earth. The French continued to tighten the rules with every show to minimize the chances for crashes by prohibiting the pilots from exceeding the minimum safety standards for their aircraft. But the test pilots were paid large bonuses by the manufacturers to push their planes to the limit in order to try to impress potential buyers. A transport aircraft, like the TU-144, should never go into a vertical climb; it is not needed in regular operations and the plane is not built for that purpose. Vertical climbs are reserved for fighter aircraft. Similarly, an A-10 should not do a loop-the-loop on take off; so many of the crashes were caused by pilots who abused their aircraft. In any case, there were lots of aircraft on display at the Paris Air Show. The "Harrier" was always a big hit with its capacity to take off straight up, flying backwards, flying forwards, flying sideways. It was a great show with lots of new innovations put on display and lots of souvenirs. It was a great bazaar.

Both times I attended the Paris Air show, it was as an escorted officer for an American Congressional delegation. The show itself lasted about ten days; I would guess that for 80% of that time we would have in Paris a Congressional delegation performing the taxpayers' business which was to observe how the world's aircraft industry was doing. Since I was the Pol-Mil officer, I was always the designated escort officer for the Armed Services Committees of both the House and the Senate. I got to know a number of Members of Congress that way. We would go out to the Air show, visit the various American exhibitors and the visit foreigner producers such as the Israelis. One time, Mel Price, the Chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, decided that he wanted to see what the Soviets were showing. So we went to their chalet and I explained to the greeter that I had the American Armed Services Committee in tow. That created a major uproar in the chalet; the Soviets finally decided to deny the Congressmen access to their chalet. It was a stupid reaction on their part; obviously they were not displaying any secret weapons, but in the heat of the "Cold War" their bureaucratic minds could not think of word but "Nyet". In the evening, I would escort the Congressmen and their spouses and their staffs to restaurants or receptions given by each of the major exhibitors. Those receptions had food and drink of all sorts available in copious portions.

The uniformed American military were not at the show pushing American wares; the Carter administration frowned on such activities; in fact they were barred from participating in any way. There were many American military civilian clothes, most from the intelligence services taking notes and pictures of the competition. They were invited to the receptions and enjoyed the bounties available there. But the military services refrained from becoming part of the sales efforts. Other military services were much more active; the French, for example, had a huge military presence, in part because this was their home turf. The French drew no distinction between government and private sector efforts; to them, every Frenchman should be involved in sales efforts. Of course, in the case of most other countries, each only had one major defense producer in each sector; we on the other hand had multiple producers of fighter aircraft; so we couldn't endorse just one American manufacturer. The Germans were very active in supporting the sales of their products as were the British, the Soviets, the Chinese, the Italians and most of the other Europeans as well. If you were a buyer from a country that was in the market seriously, you would be wined and dined for days on end. Many of the buyers were Europeans; during my first Air show, the raging question was which new generation of fighter aircraft would meet the needs of five European countries -- the F-16 from General Dynamics or the Mirage F-1 from Dessault or the F-15 from McDonald Douglas. So in this case, Europeans were both potential buyers and potential suppliers. Then, of course, there were a number of Third World countries in the arms market as well as Asian ones. Not all were looking for major new weapons systems; some were just interested in parts or avionics or commercial products.

I might say a word about my involvement in arms control issues. As I said earlier, I was on the phone with my Washington contacts frequently. The French felt that there was a chance that we would enter into an arms control agreement with the Soviets which would reduce our ability to defend Europe. Of course, it was somewhat paradoxical for the French to exhibit this concern because they were the major proponents of an independent nuclear deterrent. On the other hand, they also wanted us to be strong enough to defend Europe if necessary. Sophisticated French military analysts and politicians realized that a realistic defense of Europe against a Warsaw Pact attack without the US was impossible. So they wanted us to be involved and they were apprehensive that we would lose that capacity somehow in the negotiations with the Soviets. That fear was never realized, but the French, with their time honored skepticism, were always concerned. They were also concerned that we might sign an agreement that would directly impact on their military capability, conventional or nuclear.

The arms control field was my major substantive concern. I was one of the channels to the French Foreign Office on arms control matters. The French were every active in Washington and had developed a good network there. Furthermore, I doubt that a month went by without a visit to Paris by a delegation from the American government -- ACDA or Paul Warnke, our chief SALT negotiator in Geneva or Ralph Earle. And the French would visit Washington often. This constant interchange enabled me to really stay up to date on all the discussion, both intra- and inter-governmental and in Geneva -- in the arms control field. A lot of my colleagues complained by the heavy traffic of people -- too much time had to be devoted to the visitors -- but I found it very useful. I attempted to accompany as many of the visitors as I could when they met with their French counterparts. I interpreted for Harold Brown, the Secretary of Defense, when he came to Paris. These meetings and visit enabled me to stay current on all developments. Just meeting and delivering people at the airport was useful because that is when I picked up a lot of "background" information -- useful tidbits of gossip; that also happened at other informal moments -- lunch or after-dinner drinks. So I was really up-to-date on what was going in the arms control field. The visitors were a valuable resources. Once the French developed some confidence in my knowledge and my ability to accurately describe an American position or actions, that gave me credibility and much greater access to the French policy makers in the arms control field. The ability to have this constant flow of information from a variety of American sources was invaluable to me.

In 1978, the UN had a special session on disarmament, which, like most UN special sessions, didn't have much impact. But Giscard d'Estaing, the President of France, went to New York to give a speech. Like all Presidents he felt he had to something new. So he called for a "Conference on Disarmament in Europe" -- an idea that the Soviets had been pushing for years and we had rejected many times. I had heard about six hours before the speech that d'Estaing would be including his suggestion in his speech. He made a number of other proposals, including one that would have internationalized photo reconnaissance -- at the time, only we and the Soviets had that capability; the idea was that the pictures would be given to a UN agency. Of course, the availability of these photos would have saved the French billion of dollars because they would not have needed to set up their own surveillance system. That proposal was very attractive to the Third World who would have dearly loved to have access to the information that the satellites found. In any case, I was able to give Washington a few hours' lead on d' Estaing's speech; that gave the administration's spokespeople time to prepare responses particularly to some of d' Estaing's more provocative ideas. I think that is a useful role that a Foreign Service officer can play; i.e. give some warning to Washington of upcoming events so that the government will not be caught flatfooted and give some spur-of-the-moment reply, which too often just creates more problems. In this case, the brief period of notice suggested to me that the Foreign Office had probably sent over a very bland draft and that the major initiatives that were included in the final speech probably came from the President and his staff -- as happens in most countries. So there was probably only a small group of four or five people close to d' Estaing who knew what was going to be in the final text. In retrospect, I take some pride that these officials knew me well enough and have sufficient confidence in me to give me as much advance notice as they did. In fact, the final text was not approved by the President until his flight on a Concorde plane across the Atlantic the day before; the information I passed to Washington was red off the presses. In France, the President plays a major role in defining his country's role on defense issues. De Gaulle, when he set up the Fifth Republic, saw to it that the President would have a very strong role in defense and foreign policy. The French bureaucracy may not stray very far from well established positions, but French Presidents may and have.

D'Estaing's speech confronted us with a new dilemma. The Soviets supported the French, we opposed them and the Europeans split. Eventually, the Conference did meet and, after fifteen years, adopted a treaty on limiting conventional forces in Europe. In any case, the French President's speech opened up old and new areas for debate.

Another event that comes to mind was Secretary Vance's trip to Moscow in March 1977. This was his first trip to the Soviet Union. During his visit, he introduced some arms proposals which were quite different from what we had been saying to that time. On his way back, Vance stopped in Paris, Bonn and London to brief those governments. Vance and his party were in Paris for approximately twenty-four hours. I went to the meetings with the party at the Foreign Office and heard our views, some of which had been seriously criticized by the American press for not having been sufficiently vetted. By and large, I didn't have any serious reservations about the new proposals, although I felt that they needed to be fleshed out further. I believed then and do now that arms control, if seriously negotiated, can produce a more stable world. There are a number of ways of achieving worthwhile goals, but I did view some of the efforts of the Carter administration as feckless. I was particularly concerned by the Conventional Arms Transfer talks which were started in 1978. In fact, those talks never resolved any of the issues; some people described them as being too ambitious. The goal of setting limits on the flow of conventional weapons around the world is in principle a worthwhile one, but achieving it is a monumental task. Even with the Carter administration, there were opposing views giving rise to the undercutting of our negotiator, Les Gelb, by Zbig Brzezinski, the National Security Advisor. We did not put a very good showing in those talks. I attended those meetings that took place in Paris as the note-taker.

Carter came to Paris in January, 1978 for about three days. His visit raised another hot issue between us and the French -- the control of nuclear exports. I have already mentioned the issue; it was very key question for the French because while I was still in Paris, they were having talks with the Pakistanis, the Iraqis and to some extent even with South Korea and the Argentine on possible sales of parts of the nuclear fuel cycle. Occasionally, we and the French disagreed on the wisdom of certain sales which led to some fairly harsh exchanges. Carter had lectured Giscard d'Estaing as well as Helmut Schmidt about nuclear exports. Neither found that tact very appealing and certainly did not enhance their willingness to cooperate with the US. I must say, however, that the French got over the Carter lecture and cooperated with us pretty effectively. Of course, many of the disagreements we had with the French stemmed from their much more cynical view of the world; that made a dialogue particularly with Carter especially difficult.

Finally, I should mention the tremendous difference in the interest in pol-mil issues exhibited by Ambassadors Rush and Hartman. Rush was very superficial; I don't know whether that was due to the aging process or because he didn't seem to have great interest in the subject, although as former CEO of a major company, Secretary of Defense, etc. would suggest that he certainly had the necessary background to understand the issues and show some interest in them. But during the eight months during which we overlapped, he was very cordial to me, but took very little interest in pol-mil issues -- or I might say, any issues. The DCM did almost all of the substantive work; Rush was socially engaged which generated a huge amount of work for the Embassy staff. We used to have to prepare huge briefing books for his trips around the country, regardless of the size of the cities he would visit; we also had to provide a biographic paragraph on each guest who might be invited to a reception, some of which were humongous. So the Embassy was saddled with a lot of work for very little useful purpose. I think Rush was just very superficial. Hartman, on the other hand, was a professional -- a very smart man comfortable discussing the issues. He was very interested in pol-mil matters. He had been instrumental, as I mentioned, in my assignment to Paris. So I saw him very frequently; in fact, I was surprised that he was as patient with me as he was. The change in DCMs -- from Gammon to Chris Chapman -- and in Political Ministers -- from Cohen to Warren Zimmermann -- also made a tremendous difference. Chris was very interested in pol-mil issues, having just come from the Pol-Mil Bureau. I had been given permission to authorize my own telegrams, which I did in the main except for exchanges of a controversial or potentially controversial nature. Those I would discuss with Hank and Sam. I had started this practice soon after my arrival, not as a matter of principle, but because I had enough confidence that I knew the subject matter well enough that I could be expected to represent the Embassy's views accurately. But it was an unusual arrangement for someone below section chief to sign out his or her own telegrams on his behalf. But I was lucky that I worked for good people who gave me lot of room to do my job, just as Sonnenfeldt had done.

But Chris found this practice hard to accept; so very morning he would call me into his office to discuss the previous day's traffic that I had signed out. He would examine my messages minutely and ask a lot of questions; that was in the nature of a tutorial for me. Ultimately, he was satisfied that I knew my business and that I could be relied upon to send good messages, but it took him a while to accept that. Zimmermann had no problem with that arrangement even though he didn't know me very well when he arrived at post. I must say that I was somewhat suspicious when he arrived, but I learned that he was a very able and intelligent officer and I think he found me to be a good officer.

Among many other actions, the Carter administration decided to save money by requiring the lowering of all thermostats in government buildings. In Paris, we were all freezing in our offices. But Hartman had in his office a large fireplace, stocked amply with firewood. He would have a fire going during the cheerless, murky Paris winter days. I knew him well enough so that one day I took my in-box from my office and without asking anyone's permission, I went into the Ambassador's office. Hartman was at his desk, working away. I went to the easy chair in front of the fire and sat down. Art said: "Good afternoon, John. What can I do for you". I replied: "Good afternoon, Mr. Ambassador. I hope you don't mind if I do my work here in your office in front of the fireplace until we get some more heat in our offices. The secretaries are trying to type with their gloves on, the officers have their coats on and everybody is miserable, except perhaps you". That prompted immediate action; Hartman called the Administrative Counselor to talk about the working conditions in the Embassy. He did not scream at me or throw me out of the office, as he might well have. But the temperature was raised. I must say that in retrospect that was not a very judicious action on my part; I probably should have been immediately transferred to sub-Saharan Africa. I am now a little ashamed for my behavior. Fortunately, no one else found out about my behavior; I realized that evening how brazen I had been and refrained from telling any one else about it. My action perhaps can be partly justified because during my first year in Paris, my marriage broke up and I went through a prolonged period of depression, during which I did some zany things. For example, at one point, I decided that the world was filled with false appearances and duplicity and that I was going to help change that by always being truthful. That led me to many social faux pas; if some lady asked me how I liked her hair do, I might have told her that it was awful. That "honesty" not only did not change the world, but led me to several unpleasant encounters. I also refused to wear a tuxedo to some formal engagements; Hartman was very tolerable and allowed me to attend in a suit, after I had told him that I had given up "black tie" for life as a matter of principle. I must say that in retrospect, I am amazed by the patience and forgiveness shown by my seniors; they were also much more charitable about my work than I thought I deserved. Hartman, Gammon and Cohen were very supportive in these very trying days; fortunately, after a period, I began to recover and returned to a more normal behavior, including the wearing of tuxedos. Perhaps the most amazing part of the story was that despite this very personally emotional period for me, my efficiency ratings were good enough to warrant a promotion in 1979. I was very fortunate to work for such able and understanding professionals.

Overall, I think I did a good job in Paris after the first year or so. In the first place, as I suggested, I had some very good bosses. Secondly, I got out of the Embassy often; I made a lot of friends among journalists, defense analysts and French uniformed personnel. None of that would have been possible if I had stayed in my office in the Embassy. That is a lesson that I believe all young officers need to learn: get out of your office, particularly those, who like myself, might be responsible for a single substantive area; I handled pol-mil work by myself and therefore seldom had to clear messages laterally with colleagues in the Embassy. My Paris experience was entirely different from the one I had experienced in Ankara, where I was a member of a pol-mil section and where my boss did in fact discourage me from having contacts with Turkish authorities and people.

I should mention another aspect of the Paris assignment which had some relationship to counter-terrorism. This was an activity which started by chance. In September, 1976 -- a month after my arrival -- a TWA plane was hijacked as it flew from New York to Paris, via Montreal, Gander and Reykjavik. It was hijacked by a gang of Ustashis -- the old fascist Croatian gang which had become infamous during WW II. They were American citizens of Croat descent; they were making supporting an independent Croatia. After the plane had been hijacked -- and that happened essentially before the plane really took off -- the gang told New York authorities that they had left a note in a Grand Central station locker. When a policeman opened the locker, a bomb which had been planted inside, exploded and killed him. So the everyone was on notice that this was a deadly group that had to be dealt with -- as I learned later, there is a difference between hijackers that have killed and those who have only made threats. In any case, I happened to be the duty officer at the Embassy the weekend of this hijacking. After it had refueled in Iceland, it became clear that the plane was heading for Paris. As you can well imagine, the eighteen hours of this episode was one of great tension; the hijackers finally surrendered after prolonged negotiations. I have described my role that weekend in some detail in a Georgetown University publication entitled "Diplomats and Terrorists: What Works and What Doesn't". What I did, after receiving the first call from Washington, is described in that book.

I mention this episode because during this weekend it became clear to me that no one in the Embassy -- and that included the CIA, FBI and FAA components -- knew much about French counter-terrorist capabilities and how they went about handling terrorist incidents. A few days after the hijackers surrendered in Paris, I decided that we had not been able to answer with any great specificity the questions that Washington kept posing to us during that weekend when we had an open telephone line with the Department, which kept asking about French capabilities, intentions and operational methods. At one stage, a psychiatrist got one the phone from Washington urging me to tell the French to treat the hijackers gently so that they would not get upset and potentially take it out on the passengers. So I took upon myself to find out more about French anti-terrorist doctrine, capacities and approaches. Through a French friend, who was a writer on defense issues, I was put in touch with the Groupe d'intervention de la Gendarmerie Nationale (GIGN), which was an organization comparable to our DELTA Force. I asked whether I could visit their base and they were delighted to host me. They told me that over the preceding years, they had tried to contact the American government to exchange information and to try to acquire American weapons so that they could train their men on as many weapons as they could; this would help them to know the kind of capability that any adversary might have. For example, this French force had no M-16s, which are the basic weapon of an American infantry unit. They said that no one in the Embassy or in the US government had shown the slightest bit of interest in their approaches. This special unit was run by a young French Captain who later became famous and infamous. In light of their evident interest, I arranged another visit for one of Colonels from the Defense Attaché Office and a representative of one of our intelligence agencies. Over the course of the following years, this relationship grew; I and others visited this French force frequently and did members of our Delta force. Once having built this bridge, I sort of eased out of it since other members of the US government, much more involved in anti-terrorism, maintained the contact with the French. I did help them get 5 M-16s and some other American weapons, through the US government's licensing process.

There were two results from that purely coincidental connection. One was that a relationship between US and French anti-terrorist forces developed. secondly, because of my efforts, the word seemed to get around in the Embassy that I was a terrorist expert. So I got invited to meetings on the subject, although there were very few people at the time that were real experts. I learned a few things which stood me in good stead later on.

JON G. EDENSWORD
Consul
Nice (1977-1979)

Jon Edensword entered the Foreign Service in 1967. Since joining the Foreign Service, his career has included positions in Martinique, Liberia, Haiti, Jordan, France and Mexico. Mr. Edensword was interviewed by Raymond Ewing in 1995.

EDENSWORD: So I went to Nice in 1977.

Q: And you were a consul general?

EDENSWORD: It was a consulate, so I was consul.

Q: Tell me about that post - that sounds like a very nice post.

EDENSWORD: It was a nice post. There was a very nice residence in Villefranche-sur-Mer which used to be the home of the Sixth Fleet until 1966 when the French pulled out of the military side of NATO. So there were many good and strong feelings about Americans.

Q: Positive feelings?

EDENSWORD: Positive feelings - very positive. I was accredited to Monaco: I was the official representative to Rainier and Princess Grace. Corsica was also a part of my territory, and of the places I had responsibility for, Corsica was maybe the most interesting.

Q: How big a staff did you have?

EDENSWORD: I had one vice-consul and five or six FSNs. It was an old villa in downtown Nice near the old British Anglican church, about three blocks from the water. With a lot of grass around it, it was a lovely old building. The top floor, the floor that we didn't really use, had been the communications center for the Sixth Fleet back in the old days. There were still some wires hanging out of the walls up there. There was a branch of the American Legion there, and I let them use one of those upstairs offices.

Q: It was a building just devoted to the American Consulate?

EDENSWORD: It was very nice. I had a vice-consul and I also had the USO representative, a French woman, who I also gave office space too. She would have to look after, you know, they would have problems: sailors would have to go back to the States. She sort of moved up and down all over the southern coast of France, looking after these special problems. We had ship visits regularly: they liked Villefranche because the mayor was very pro-Sixth Fleet as was the mayor of Cannes. While I was there, I convinced Prince Rainier to invite the Sixth Fleet commander and his flagship to the Monaco Grand Prix and that turned out to be very nice. You can't anchor in Monaco. You have to anchor offshore. I remember that Lawrence Tisch had opened up a new hotel there just before I got there and introduced Las Vegas style gambling. He had me over for dinner when he found out about this and the flagship was there. He said that he wanted to do something for the admiral and so I said fine. He said, "Well, this is really terrific," as he sat looking out the window, seeing this American Navy cruiser anchored off Monaco. One of the things Admiral James Watkins (who was the 6th Fleet commander and later became the Chief of Naval Operations and eventually became the Secretary of Energy) offered to give Rainier and Prince Albert a briefing on Mediterranean sea power including Soviet sea power, U.S., stuff like that. He said, "It would be an unclassified briefing, but I'll answer pretty much any questions that he had." When the briefing started, there was another guy there and Watkins took me aside and said, "Who the hell is this?" I said, "I don't know." Watkins was clearly irritated. It was a cousin of Princess Grace named John Lehman, who it turned out had worked in the NSC [National Security Council].

Q: An American?

EDENSWORD: An American. I'm trying to think of this guy's name. Watkins was clearly annoyed and made his annoyance show to this American. This American later became Secretary of the Navy when Watkins was the Vice-CNO under Reagan.

Q: That's a good story.

EDENSWORD: Yes, it's a great story. Anyway, we did all these wonderful things. I went into Monaco and Watkins sent in a helicopter for my wife and me and Princess Grace and Albert and Caroline (I don't think Stephanie was there) and Prince Rainier. They flew us out and we stood on the deck and they flew planes off and on. Then we steamed into Monaco - you know, he brought his fleet in and one of his aircraft carriers in, and we steamed into Monaco and he had a lunch for us. It was really, really nicely done. Then we all went up to watch the Grand Prix and then there, of course, is...it's a big affair and they have a dinner later on and a dance. There is always a number of movie stars there: Cary Grant was almost always there and Paul Newman was another one because he likes to race. I remember my wife coming up and saying, "You've got to do something. Paul Newman is in a big argument with Admiral Watkins." So I went over there and Paul Newman is not very tall and Watkins is tall and was really, really mad. Princess Grace was also moving onto the scene at this point. Watkins later on told me what they were arguing about. He said, "It's the stupidest thing, Newman doesn't know a damn thing. Newman was accusing the Pentagon of managing news. He has no idea of how the Pentagon works. If we could manage news, we would do it. We can't possibly manage news!"

Q: They couldn't do it if they wanted.

EDENSWORD: We couldn't possibly do that. Anyway, Princess Grace grabbed Admiral Watkins and made him dance with her. I was left with Newman and I must say that I found myself tongue tied. I thought to myself, "Now, how do I deal with this guy: is this Hud or is this Harper or is this Minnesota Fats?" So, it didn't turn out so well. I found myself confused and I probably should have explained that to him. I am sure he would have laughed: he looked like he had a good sense of humor, but anyway we said a few sort of polite things and then he went off, muttering about the Pentagon and managing news.

WARREN ZIMMERMAN
Political Counselor
Paris (1977-1980)

Ambassador Warren Zimmerman was born in Pennsylvania in 1934. He graduated from Yale University, received a B.A. and M.A. from the University of Cambridge and served in the U.S. Army in 1959. Upon entering the Foreign Service in 1961, his postings abroad included Caracas, Belgrade, Moscow, Paris, Madrid, Vienna, and Geneva, with an ambassadorship to Yugoslavia. Ambassador Zimmerman was interviewed in 1996 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: Today is October 7, 1997. Warren, we are off to Paris. You were in Paris from when to when?

ZIMMERMANN: I was in Paris from '77 to '80. It was a bit of a surprise assignment for me. I was working for Arthur Hartman in the European Bureau. He was the assistant secretary for Europe. I had not spent a good deal of my career, much of my career in Western Europe. He became ambassador to Paris, and he asked me to come out as political counselor. So, I had an enormous learning curve to deal with. France is a complicated country. We were there at a fairly complicated time. Giscard d'Estaing was president. While he wasn't the most anti American president France had had, he certainly was very strong on French prestige which he felt, as many of his predecessors had, was being undermined to some degree by American power in the world.

Q: We will get into the policy and the relations with them, but first, what sort of a political section did you have? It seems that often a country like France gets a very large political section and you covered in exquisite detail.

ZIMMERMANN: It is an interesting question. We had a big political section. As foreign service posts go, Paris is one of the largest foreign service posts, of course. There were those who looked at foreign policy issues. Of course France is one of the few countries in the world with a global approach to foreign policy. Then there was a group that looked into internal politics which of course, were very confused and difficult and murky for a foreigner to understand. There were if I recall right, there were about nine people in the section, foreign service officers. But when I got there, I was told that the political section was going to provide cover for the CIA in Paris. The CIA in Paris, I discovered in 1977, was enormous. The reason it was enormous was because the Vietnam war had ended two years before. You had a lot of CIA people they had to place. Given the iron law of good posts, Paris and Rome, posts like that were considered good posts. Of course, there was a serious problem of communism in France as there was in Italy. So, a large number of CIA people, many more I think that were required, gravitated toward Paris.

Something like 20 of them ended up nominally in my section, so I was nominally the boss of an enormous political section of some 30 people, 29 or 30 people, 20 of whom I never knew at all. I did insist to the station chief that we have at least one staff meeting to which all these people turned up so I would at least recognize them by face since they were going around the city saying they worked for me. It was a very peculiar arrangement. I was not particularly comfortable about it because occasionally French contacts would come up and say oh we met so and so. He is such a charming person. I would be scrambling around trying to figure out if this was one of the CIA people that I was supposed to know, and try not to look blank at this person who was telling me about his meeting with somebody who was supposed to work for me.

Q: Well, I can't remember the terminology, but there is covered and uncovered, I mean announced or something like that. When you are in a friendly country you say so and so actually you tell at least somebody that they are part of the CIA apparatus. Do you know how that works?

ZIMMERMANN: Yes, I think that these people were declared to the French secret service which was called the SDEC. That is an acronym. I don't know what it stands for. I think they were declared to the SDEC, but they did operate under what I think was called light cover as political officers in the embassy. Of course the outside world everybody who wasn't in the SDEC including many people in the French government didn't know that they were CIA agents. There was another ground rule also, which was that they assured the French government that they were not targeting French officials, that their targets were third country nationals in France. Of course there were Vietnamese in France, there were Chinese, there were Russians and so forth, so they had plenty of targets.

Q: Well while we are on the subject of CIA, during the time you were there, was there much information that was coming in from them that was of use to you?

ZIMMERMANN: Very little. In fact we often wouldn't know of the information we saw, we wouldn't know what was generated from the Paris station because we would see it in digest, a national intelligence digest that had been prepared in Washington based on sourcing from all around the world. Given the nature of the intelligence game, the sources were never revealed so we would have no way of knowing whether a particular piece of information was generated in Paris or Moscow or wherever. So, I at least, didn't have a keen idea at all of how much of this stuff was coming from the Paris station.

Q: Well this is a theme that runs throughout a good number of the interviews we do. As a practical matter the people often most concerned with a country are those diplomats stationed in the country, and yet the connect between the CIA and the overt political economic officer is very slight.

ZIMMERMANN: It was very slight in the '70s and the '80s. This is jumping head a bit when I was ambassador in Yugoslavia in the early '90s, the station chief came to me one day and told me that they were getting real time intercepts involving Serbian politicians, Yugoslav army, people that we had a tremendous amount of interest in. They hadn't been sharing those intercepts with us, so we didn't know a lot. We didn't have a lot of information that would have been extremely useful to us in our dealings then. At that point they started giving it to us. That was how we knew it existed. We didn't know it existed before. When they gave it to us, of course, it was very useful. I understood that from my colleagues in Bucharest in 1989 which was the year of the coup when Ceausescu was overthrown, that the CIA station started giving the ambassador intercepts which were of course, tremendously valuable to letting him make up his mind about how the coup was going and the direction it was going in and what would happen to Ceausescu and so forth. But the CIA behaved in a rather arrogant way before that, keeping embassy and ambassadors in the dark about information which could have been very useful to them.

Q: In the embassy, how did Art Hartman operate?

ZIMMERMANN: I served three times with him, once in the European bureau, and twice in embassies, in Paris and in Moscow. He was one of the great ambassadors of the post war period to my mind because he had a tremendous fund of historical and economic and political knowledge which he wore very lightly. He had a remarkable way of dealing with people, not threatening, very relaxed but extremely geared to understanding what was going on. He was very well liked by virtually everybody who worked for him. He gave his officers a lot of scope. He expected them to set high standards for themselves. He expected them to get the job done. He gave good direction about the kinds of things that he wanted. The two embassies I served with him in were both very happy embassies. Neither Paris nor Moscow had long time reputations for being happy embassies for different reasons. Paris, because people get frustrated dealing with the French, and Moscow because you were dealing with an adversary all the time. So much of what would be considered normal life was out of bounds or restricted. But Hartman scored very high on morale in both of those places. I think it was because of his own professionalism and his confidence in his staff that they would exercise a similar kind of professionalism.

Q: What about Hartman in dealing with the French in your observation?

ZIMMERMANN: Hartman had a very good way of dealing with the French. He understood that the U.S. French relationship is traditionally a conflicted relationship, and to some degree has to be because to a degree French policy in the world is formulated on the assumption that the United States is an adversary and has to be treated as an adversary. At the same time France was one of our most important allies in Europe. It had a nuclear capability which was certainly an asset on the NATO side against the Soviet nuclear capability. So, it was very important to find areas of cooperation with the French, and it was equally important to take the French along when our feeling was that they were going too far in their willingness to overlook American interests. So, it was a balancing act all the time. I think Hartman did it very well. Others in the post war period have done it well, as well. I think the only other professional ambassador we had in the post war period, Charles Bohlen did it extremely well. It involves not making an enemy of the French. It also involves not falling for their nationalistic line too heavily. We discovered that Washington was uniformly anti French. That you could never make a mistake in Washington if you took an anti French position, so we and Hartman had a lot of problems in convincing Washington that the French weren't all bad. There were some assets that the French had which were of great interest to the United States. I mentioned the nuclear capability. Also the French had tremendous influence in Africa, and in those days we had as great an interest as they did in keeping in power African leaders who were prepared to deal cooperatively with the west on the economic plane, with Africa's minerals for example. Mobutu in Zaire was kept afloat partly by the French. There was a tremendous American sigh of relief at that because we didn't have to do it. We wanted to; we didn't have to do it because the French did it for us. They did that in other places in west Africa as well, basically taking the responsibility for supporting some fairly unsavory characters at the head of African states for economic reasons. That meant that we didn't have to take the brunt of that. So the French did some objectively valuable things from Washington's point of view. Washington never seemed to either recognize it or be grateful for it.

Q: Apropos that, an interview I did recently with Jack Mendelsohn who is teaching at the Naval Academy for two years. During about this period saying the word in the navy was in case there was a real crisis with the Soviet Union, the first thing to do is to sink the French nuclear submarines because, not that they had anything against the French navy but they didn't trust French politicians, and they didn't know what they would do.

ZIMMERMANN: And you know, there is an interesting corollary to that. In the 1970s we had a very secret program between the French navy and our own navy in which we provided the French the technology to make their submarines quiet so they couldn't be as easily detected by the Soviets. It was such in those days such a clandestine program that very few people in the U.S. government knew about it. I found out about it only later myself. But what we were doing was giving the French very sensitive technology. That was based on the assumption that they were on our side and not on the other side. I think it was the right thing to do. It was the smart thing to do. The French in a pinch were going to be on our side. There is no doubt at all about that. But I think what Jack Mendelsohn is describing is kind of jokey sniping that was very prevalent.

Q: Well it is again a theme that runs through our interviews. I always have fun talking about relations with the French because it is not a really cordial relationship most of the time.

ZIMMERMANN: That's right. It's a love hate relationship. The French, don't forget, they are our oldest allies. They sent us Lafayette and helped George Washington. We have never fought a war with the French ever.

Q: A quasi naval war.

ZIMMERMANN: Yes. But the British, whom we feel much closer to, we have tangled with several times, and nearly again during the Civil War period. They were hoping the South would win.

Q: Well back to Arthur Hartman, how did he connect on the social side, because I take it society plays a larger role in France than it does in the United States. I think social cultural is what I am really talking about.

ZIMMERMANN: Hartman was tremendously successful on the social side because he shared a lot of interests with the French. He is an enormously cultured man himself with a really deep love of music and art. It wasn't faked and the French understood that, so they cottoned to that very quickly. I mean they understood that this American ambassador was someone who really did have a deep understanding of some of the cultural things that they cared about as well. I might add that Hartman's wife Donna, was equally this way. She was genuinely interested in music and art, and liked going to openings of art exhibits and liked going to concerts. They were seen around a lot doing that, and I think that made them very well liked.

Q: You had never served in France had you?

ZIMMERMANN: No, never had.

Q: As political counselor so often you get somebody, my experience was in Italy where you had people coming back for the third or fourth time usually as each time a little higher up in rank so by the time one is say equivalent to political or economic counselor, they are really well versed in French, I mean Italian politics. France is a complicated place. How did you bring yourself up to speed?

ZIMMERMANN: Well, I read everything I could get my hands on when I heard I was going. I always did that. I would read as much history as I could, contemporary analysis of the political scene and so forth. Talked to professors who dealt with France. When I got out there, of course, the political section consisted of many people who knew France extremely well. Their brains were there to be picked. That was very useful indeed. Phil Rizik who was the head of the internal section, had a long association with France. He had attended the Ecole Nationale d'Administration, the elite French management school. He had relatives who were French. A couple of times a week, he would take a French politician and me out to lunch. We would go out to lunch together and talk about politics. After a couple of months of that, I was pretty well steeped in at least the political gossip that is the basis for getting more deeply into what is happening in France. I had also read European history at Cambridge, and had taught European history so I had some grounding in France's role in Europe and in the world. If you don't know a country first hand, I think there is no substitute for talking with as many people as you can. I am a great believer in getting out of the embassy and talking to people, seeing as many people as you can, getting into as many political conversations as you can. I discovered that, here again it is an interesting paradox with U.S. French relationship, I could pick up the phone and call virtually anybody in France short of the President or the prime minister and invite them for lunch, and they'd come. As the political counselor, I was not the top person in the embassy. But the job was interesting enough for French journalists or French politicians or French officials so that you could get them for lunch virtually any time you wanted them. That was fascinating to be able to talk to people who were in the power structure in one way or another. They were very glad to come.

Q: I am trying to weave a little trade craft in here. When you have a lunch like this in France, how would you use it and how would they use it, the person you had over use it?

ZIMMERMANN: Well, I had a very nice apartment. So, I would typically invite a guest to the apartment for lunch. It would be just the two of us again typically. I would, normally consult well in advance with other people in the political section: who should we have, who would be interesting to have. They would give me names and reasons why these were interesting people. So, by the time I invited them I had a pretty fair idea of what I wanted to get out of them. It might be the man in the socialist party--they were out of power in those days, who was in charge of their foreign policies. I would want to know where they differed with Giscard and the conservatives on foreign policy. If there was a major issue brewing, as for example there was during my time with the Camp David Accords, to get their take on that and how they saw that. So, there was a set of I wanted to get at that my staff would help me work out. But sometimes the conversation would go off on all kinds of different things, and I felt particularly that if this was somebody I really wanted to get to know, that the last thing I wanted to do was just bore in with one question after another. I would try to find out a little bit about them, what they were really interested in, how they spent their vacations, that kind of thing, in hopes they would come back or they would invite me, and we could establish a closer relationship based not just on trading secrets.

Q: Were they interested in how the United States operated particularly since you were there during the Carter administration which is a somewhat off beat one from previous administrations?

ZIMMERMANN: They didn't understand Carter. They found his zeal for human rights very strange and his Christian fundamentalist background, they couldn't understand at all. They certainly understood Kissinger. They hated him, but they understood him much more easily than they did Carter. They had tremendous interest in the United States, the French did. There was a growing amount of French tourism in the United States, not only the people we would see who gravitated toward the American embassy but middle class French people in general. They would love to go to the United States. They would always do three things. One is they would go to New York. The second is they would go to New Orleans for obvious reasons. The third is they would go to the west. What the French liked about America is the American west because there is nothing like it. They were just fascinated with that. There are a lot of kind of French novels that are about the west, cowboy stories by Frenchmen in French.

Q: Sort of like the Carl May type in German.

ZIMMERMANN: A lot like that. The French were interested in our technology. They were interested in our business schools. They were interested in how American finance and business worked. There were really a lot of points of contact. I recall Servan-Schreiber who was one of the major French journalists wrote a book called the "The American Challenge." That was in the '60s I think.

Q: It was quite popular here in the United States.

ZIMMERMANN: Tremendous book. Basically it said the Americans are destroying us. They are just too powerful economically. They are just going to turn us all into a bunch of satellites. Well I think that kind of approach generated a tremendous interest in France and what was going on in the United States. Of course we didn't destroy them; we didn't bury them that way at all. But they did see that we were ahead in all kinds of ways, particularly economic and business and finance, and they wanted to know firsthand what was going on. So, I think the French American relationship has grown a lot more positive and a lot deeper. There will always be the squabbles at the top because of the way France defines its national values, but I think it is a fundamentally sound relationship, and I think Art Hartman certainly contributed to that by his very close understanding of the French. He had spent many years in France before he became ambassador. He had been there during the Marshall Plan year when we were helping put France on its feet after all. There were a lot of people who remember that as well.

Q: How important did you find the French intellectual class? Because unlike almost anywhere else except perhaps the Soviet Union, I can't think of anywhere where there is sort of a defined intellectual class.

ZIMMERMANN: It is tremendously important, and it dominates the press, even what we would call the tabloid press, the popular press. There are always intellectuals writing columns in it. There are interminable television programs, talking heads type of programs where the intellectuals watter on all kinds of subjects. So, the intellectual is really a very important figure. You have, the French Academy which elects intellectuals. Intellectuals are taken very seriously in France. There is a lot of arrogance that they have because of this. I had some trepidation going to France because I worried a little bit about my French. It wasn't perfect, and I worried about these French intellectuals. A friend of mine in Washington, Simon Serfaty, who was French, he is a Pied noir from Algeria actually or Morocco. He is a professor at Johns Hopkins school of advanced international studies. He said, "Let me give you some advice about French intellectuals which will help you enormously when you are dealing with them." He said this. "Bear in mind at all times that they are clowns. They are clowns in the sense that they are always trying to make an effect. They are always trying to cause a stir. It may have nothing to do with what they really believe or what is really true." He said, "If you keep that in mind as they talk at you and try to impress you, you won't go wrong." I thought about that a lot, and indeed to a large degree he was right because a lot of this was just for show. They were putting things on. If you saw through it and could deal with it, then you could get on a much more serious basis with them and there would be much less pretense and everything would be fine.

Q: Did you find in dealing with the French intellectual class, because you say they are important so this is obviously a group you want to win their respect and to insert sort of the American viewpoint hoping that this will at least make some difference. Did you find this was possible or were they too busy making posture?

ZIMMERMANN: Most of the time they were available. As I said you could call up anybody and there was a chance they would come. This was true of the intellectuals as well. They enjoyed showing off for the Americans. They liked it a lot, so they would come around for a one-on-one lunch, or they would come to a reception that the ambassador would give. There was no problem there. But, the very left wing ones were sometimes harder to attract, but you could do it. Usually, sometimes at least with a French intermediary saying, Well I know this person, let's go together you know, to some bistro and we'll talk. That worked as well.

Q: Did you find the French train of thought which is, I may be wrong as a Cartesian? Is that the correct term. Anyway, there is always a plan behind everything, and things just don't happen. I recall almost a conspiracy theory or something of this nature. Is this something you had to deal with?

ZIMMERMANN: Well, you said a couple of different things there. Certainly the French manner of argument appears very logical, and I think that is why it is called Cartesian. You build up from a basis and you draw one conclusion and that leads to another conclusion. This is all fine if the basis from which you build is correct. If the basis from which you build is wrong, all the logic in the world is not going to make it right. It actually can take it even a wronger and wronger. That often happens with the French. So, they have no monopoly on logical thought although it is quite beautiful to watch a Frenchman develop an argument. By the way, French politicians are the most brilliant speakers I have ever heard anywhere in my life, almost never speaking with notes. They can talk half an hour, an hour, two hours brilliantly developing one point after another in perfectly logical progression. I never heard anything like it. They all can do it. Mitterrand was one of the best. He was the head of the socialist party which was in opposition. He hadn't become president yet. He was brilliant. Couve de Murville, who had been De Gaulle's foreign minister, a wonderful old man, was at a lunch given by a group of diplomats. I heard him give an hour and a half speech without notes on the current foreign policy situation in France, while he was boning and eating a trout. It was an extraordinary performance. They all have this talent. Now, I think this is the Cartesian side. You talked about conspiracies and so forth. The French are Latins after all, and there is a kind of a tendency I think, in Latin countries, to believe that there is an answer for everything. Nothing is by chance and if something happens, it is because somebody willed it to happen. If nobody comes forward to say they willed it to happen, then it is a plot. That kind of thing was very prevalent. A lot of what we had to do in the embassy was to beat down these conspiracy theories about the Carter administration doing one thing or another because it was anti-French or it was thinking about ways it could score points off the French. Most countries big as well as little tend to think that people in Washington think about nothing except their country, and that therefore everything that is done has some reference to their country whereas, most of the time, of course, it doesn't at all.

Q: About the issues, let's start sort of with the progression of the major Carter initiatives. How about the neutron bomb, I am thinking about the so called neutron bomb, did this raise any hackles?

ZIMMERMANN: The neutron bomb fiasco, I think caused the French to write off Carter. They just decided they were dealing with a second rate amateur who didn't understand anything. I think after that they didn't take him seriously. Then when he got on his human rights kick they dropped him down still another notch.

Q: Could you explain how the neutron bomb thing, because this is for sort of the historical part.

ZIMMERMANN: Well, I don't remember all the details very well anymore, but Carter as I recall, was trying to get the Germans to take the neutron bomb which was advertised as something that didn't kill people but it just...

Q: Well, it killed people but not property. It had more radiation.

ZIMMERMANN: Is that what it was? Okay, kill people but not property.

Q: Sort of the ultimate capitalist weapon.

ZIMMERMANN: Yes, and the Germans as I recall, were totally resistant. It was the Schmidt government, and Carter really didn't know when to stop and just kept going. The French were very close to the Germans in those days as they have been lots in recent days as well. I am sure Giscard was getting all this from Schmidt. The two were very close; spoke to each other in English, by the way. I think the conclusion the French drew was not, whether the neutron bomb was a mistake or not a mistake, but they just felt that Carter and Brzezinski his National Security advisor just loved to lecture the Europeans on what they should do. The neutron bomb was an example of that. They weren't understanding the signals back from the Europeans that they really didn't want to get into this. So., I think it was a question of style more than substance. That the French saw Carter and Brzezinski and company as insensitive to Europe, as arrogant, as fixated on the Russian threat too much, and basically not competent to deal with the problems of the time.

Q: Human rights, could you talk about how you were trying to explain the human rights policy, and also what was the attitude of our embassy because when the human rights policy first came, I mean real emphasis. It has always been kind of there. There was a certain amount of resistance within the foreign service. You know, human rights it is all fine, we are all for it, but gee we have other fish to fry in our foreign relations. Could you explain how it hit you all?

ZIMMERMANN: Yes, well in one sense human rights has always been an element of American foreign policy right back to the Declaration of Independence which of course, was based on rather fundamental human rights. But it had never been an official part of the policy. When Carter came in he started a bureau for human rights. The Congress was very exercised about this. Everyone forgets the Congress provided a great deal of initiative.

Q: That's right, even prior to the Carter administration.

ZIMMERMANN: And the French who are pretty cynical anyway and who believe that diplomacy is designed to advance one's state interests and not one's values, took a pretty dim view of it. Partly because they felt it would damage the western relationships with the Russians because we were beginning to turn our attention to human rights violations in Russia. The Helsinki Final Act had already been signed in 1975 which provided a license for that. Partly, I think, the French felt that human rights was going to undermine the stability of important parts of the world like Iran where the Shah was beginning to come under some criticism. The French saw it as a kind of a childish approach to the adult game of diplomacy which had to do with things like the balance of power and realpolitik and Machiavelli and God save us not Thomas Jefferson and people, fuzzy thinkers like that.

Q: How about the embassy to begin with because you arrived early in the Carter administration was taking hold. Did you have problems with the bureau of Human rights or anything. I mean was it hard in a way to turn the ship of the embassy around to really focus on this?

ZIMMERMANN: Well I don't think we really did focus on it too much. In the first place France was not a big human rights violator except by extension in places like Africa where I mentioned before, they were helping us out to some degree as well. So it didn't hit us very hard there. I think Hartman's view was that human rights had a place but shouldn't be allowed to dominate relationships which we probably much more important in other areas. So, I can't say that it was a major issue in our bilateral relations with the French, except that the French looking at Carter's approach to human rights felt that it was hopelessly naive and possibly dangerous in areas like Iran where they felt very strongly that the Shah was the final protection between all that oil and chaos.

Q: What about focusing on before we move to Iran, focusing on the Israel Arab connection. This is the period of Camp David and all. The French have always maintained they have an interest in that area. How did this work? Were there tensions?

ZIMMERMANN: There were tensions. The French were very critical of Camp David. I think both the government and the opposition thought that it was not a comprehensive agreement, that it didn't deal with the whole issue. Well, you know, there is merit in that. I have heard some American Arabists say the same thing. On the other hand, it was a major partial agreement that took Egypt totally out of the war.

Q: It ended the war potential in that area.

ZIMMERMANN: It really did. I will say that Sadat's visit to Jerusalem was probably watched on television by everybody in France. It was an enormous evocative and emotional experience for the French when Sadat did that. But, in the middle east, we have always been, we have always had problems with the French because the French have always wanted to be major players in the middle east, and to some degree they have been, particularly in Lebanon where they have been the traditional protectors of the Christians. They have always been very nervous about American policy because of that. They have also tended to pick up Arab countries that they think can be useful to them and give them a kind of an entrance into the area and Saddam Hussein's Iraq was one of those countries in the late '70s. The French gave him if you recall, a nuclear reactor which the Israelis took out. The French were very critical of us for not understanding how useful countries like Iraq could be. I put it down mainly to a genuine rivalry they felt they had with us in the middle east. We had more cards to play than they did, but they wanted to be players. They had been traditional players in the middle east going back centuries, and they wanted to get in anywhere they could, and they saw us as a kind of an obstacle to it, so I think geopolitically that was more or less the way it was.

Q: How did this translate itself?

ZIMMERMANN: Well, I don't think any damage was really done. The French unlike the Soviets, the French did not actively try to undermine the initiatives that the Carter administration was taking as far as I can remember. They groused a lot; they complained a lot. They poked holes in the obviously imperfect agreement that had been reached at Camp David, but I don't think they did any real damage.

Q: In dealing with this, say with the Quai d'Orsay, did you find that the professional French diplomat and their apparatus in the foreign ministry and it had a different view than the government in a way? Was this on a more professional level or was it all in sync?

ZIMMERMANN: It was in pretty good sync then partly because you had the same party in the presidency as you had in the Parliament. The majority party, Giscard had in the parliament and he was the President. Of course, it has been very different in more recent years when you had a divided presidency and government. The prime minister was Giscard's man, Raymond Barre. Things worked pretty smoothly I'd say, but Giscard had a tiny national security staff when compared with the United States it was ludicrous, it was about five people. But some of them were on loan from French diplomacy, French diplomatic service, so I would guess it worked pretty closely. I would say we had good relations with the Quai d'Orsay. They weren't enormously warm, and on some issues there was a serious problem. I recall that, when the presidency country of the European Community as it was then called changed and the French took it over, EUR sent us a cable saying they were going to send somebody out from the European bureau who had been traditionally consulting with the incoming president of the European Community about arrangements for future consultation. We got this cable. They didn't ask us; they just said he was coming and gave us arrival information and so forth. One of the officers in the political section, Jack Maresca, knew France very well, married to a French woman, said, "The French won't receive him." I said, "What do you mean they won't receive him?" He said, "They won't receive him because their view is they have no obligation to consult with the United States on matters involving the European Community." I said, "C'mon [Come on] Jack, I just don't believe that." Well the guy arrived and we sent over, first of all we called, and then I guess we sent a note over to the foreign ministry saying what he was doing. It came back we won't receive him, and they didn't. He sat for three days in Paris cooling his heels trying to get an appointment in the foreign ministry, they would not see him. The French were furious at Kissinger for his approach to the U.S. right to know not only what the Europeans are doing but to get into their decision making process. They just stonewalled on that, and that was one of those issues on which they were not going to move. Another issue on which they were not going to move and on which they were very Gaullist was cooperation in NATO in a military sense. Anything beyond their presence on the political side of NATO was simply not going to do. Any efforts we made to lure them into something larger than that were very strongly rebuffed.

Q: Well, you know, during part of this time I was Consul General in Naples, and NATO South was located there, and Admiral Crow was commander. I remember asking him about French cooperation in the Mediterranean. He said, "It's our main other force other than the Americans." It is very close; we work very well together, but they just don't talk about it very much."

ZIMMERMANN: If you had left it to the French military without the politicians interfering, they would have been back in NATO for decades. I mean they loved cooperating with NATO and particularly with the Americans. That was certainly true while I was there. There was a wonderful French chief of staff named General Neri who was extremely friendly to the American military and to NATO. He went about as far as he could go within the Gaullist straitjacket, and I think that has been very typical of the French military. But, you know, for political reasons, because of De Gaulle and because French politicians have felt very nationalistic about this, the military has not been allowed to cooperate.

Q: Did you find during this time a difference between the approach towards the United States between the Gaullists and the Socialists?

ZIMMERMANN: Really only a very small difference. The socialists being out of power, had nothing but time. We spent a lot of time with them. They were always available for, meals or whatever you wanted, even for exchange visits. I think by the time we were finished with sending socialists to the United States on exchange visits, we had taken care of the entire hierarchy of the socialist party. When they came into power, virtually every member of the cabinet had been at least six weeks in the United States in the last five or ten years. It was fantastic. But, you know, they were Gaullists too. A little bit softer maybe about it, but they had very strong Gaullist tendencies. Mitterrand moved it a little bit toward some cooperation with NATO and Chirac has moved it a little bit more, but I don't think there has been a tremendous difference. between the socialists and the conservatives on these bedrock French nationalistic issues. I think there is still a tremendous degree of Gaullism that's there on all sides, even with the communists.

Q: What about, talking about the communists, what was you, do we have contacts with the communists, and what was your impression of the communists at that particular time?

ZIMMERMANN: I think this was done in Rome too, you would remember this. We had one relatively junior officer in the political section who was authorized to have contacts with the communists and who would see them. The communists had an appointed person to talk to the American embassy. It was a fellow who was responsible for their foreign policy brief, and our guy in the political section happened to be Chuck Redman who went on to be ambassador to Germany, would meet this fellow a couple of times a month probably. Once or twice, and I think we had to get Washington's permission for this. Once or twice Chuck would take me with him and so raise the level a little bit of how we met them. It was totally unproductive really, because they would give you their line on everything. It was absolutely standard stuff. French communists, of course, were much worse than Italian communists, less sophisticated and harder line and more pro Soviet.

Q: Did you have the feeling, I mean, that this was really Soviet controlled group or?

ZIMMERMANN: I wouldn't have said Soviet controlled, just like minded. They had very a hard, and we thought at that point irreducible, baie among French workers. They always got about 15% in elections, not much less I think. They could always count on that. They were always quite important, and of course, Mitterrand used them and abused them brilliantly. He used them to get to power because the socialists couldn't make it on their own, so he needed the coalition of the communists. When he got to power he dumped them. He always said he would. Our policy was strongly to dissuade Mitterrand from his coalition with the communists. In fact we couldn't have been wronger because it was the best way of all to destroy the communist party in France, and Mitterrand marginalized them in a way that would never have been possible if he hadn't aligned with them to begin with.

Q: Within the political section, were we thinking in those terms, or did we sort of have the mindset that any communist in any cabinet is going to be a mole who is going to divulge all the secrets and all that?

ZIMMERMANN: No, I think our approach and Hartman's approach in the political section was may I say less rigid than that. I mean if you made a communist defense minister, you would be in trouble. But no, no French government was going to do that. I think this rather frenzied campaign against French and Italian communism, particularly Italian communism which had much deeper roots than the French did, was ill advised. I don't think they were the threat that we thought they were, and I don't think we made it better by taking on this crusader like stance against them. It antagonized the French government when we were doing this, and certainly it antagonized Mitterrand and the French socialists that we took this position. I expect the same was true in Italy. I actually had done quite a lot of work on eurocommunism as it was then called when I was back in the department doing policy stuff in the mid-'70s. I reached the conclusion they were simply not as important as the whole scholarly community and the whole governmental community thought they were. I think that proved to be right.

Q: Did you have much contact with Mitterrand during this period?

ZIMMERMANN: Yes. I didn't personally, but Hartman did. It was always very formal. Mitterrand was a very formal person, and Hartman would invite him to his residence, which was a wonderful old Rothschild palace for lunch. It maybe happened three or four times during the time we were there. It was always a very rigid thing. Mitterrand would bring his chief aides, many of whom later became prime minister, like Fabius and Jospin. They were all very young; they were all in their 30s in those days. He would bring them, and Hartman would bring us political people. The conversation was always a bit stilted and wooden and never flowed freely at all. When you would get to know the socialists who worked for Mitterrand, you could see them one on one or in small groups, they were very easy to talk to, and they were fine. But, with him, they were all intimidated by him for one thing, and for another, he was just a very formal person. I don't think he was a great fan of the United States or of Carter or of American policy or of America's role in the world. I don't think he had a lot to say for any of that.

Q: What about the nationalists, Le Pen and that group at that point?

ZIMMERMANN: I don't recall they were a major organization. I think that was a bit later, although Le Pen was certainly on the scene, but we didn't take him too seriously in those days.

Q: What about the press?

ZIMMERMANN: French press, the ones who did foreign policy were very interested in seeing us and were quite often very good sources for things that were going on. You have different gradations of French press. In a way the top gradation consisted of one person, Raymond Aron, who was still alive in those days and writing columns for I think it was Figaro. I mean this was a man with the stature of Walter Lippmann or maybe even higher. He was an extraordinary man. A really deep thinker, a brilliant conversationalist, funny, profound, just a delight to be around. He was not well, but he would come quite often to the embassy. His journalism was at a level that nobody else attained. Then you had kind of the people who were genuine foreign policy experts like Andre Fontaine who wrote a column for Le Monde and others. They were the barons of French foreign policy journalism. Again they came around. We saw a lot of them.

Q: Did they pick your brains did you find?

ZIMMERMANN: No, never. No, they never needed to talk to us. These people did not beat the bushes to get stories from the American embassy. Now, others did. You drop another level down and you got working journalists who would be interested in genuine exchange. You have lunch with them; they ask you questions, you ask them questions, sort of the way it normally works with journalists, but these were the ones below the barons.

Q: Well how did you find the press, particularly the barons and all? Were they particularly with the Carter administration dubious or what?

ZIMMERMANN: Oh, yes, virtually unanimously anti for one reason or another. I don't think Carter had any journalistic support that I can remember in France either from the left or the right.

JOSEPH CHEEVERS
Consular Officer
Paris (1977-1981)

Joseph Cheevers was born in 1933. Most of his career in the Foreign Service was spent as a consular officer. He held positions in Ethiopia, Nicaragua, Senegal, Morocco, Spain, and France. Mr. Cheevers was interviewed by William Morgan in 1988.

CHEEVERS: . . .allow me to jump to my Paris assignment and tell you that at one particular time, we had a Haitian case, an official of his government, seemed to be the worst and most unqualified individual I'd ever come across. I said "that's a pretty bad case. If I were doing that adjudicating, I wouldn't have issue." And then we would go down the line on citing various scenarios, what the regulations said, what the attorney concerned was trying to do. It was an educational process for a new officer, and very time consuming.

Q: So what you're saying is, you really try and walk through the particular elements of a case, and hopefully as a learning process, the vice consul will come to the same decision.

CHEEVERS: It took time and patience. Unfortunately, in Paris we didn't have an awful lot of time, as you very well know. There wasn't a lot of time for the explanations, but I don't recall having to go through such exercises in visa cases more than once with the some officer, except one, but that's another story.

Q: Let's jump to Paris, where you and I worked together. I don't know where to start with that. What new lessons did you pick up in Paris?

CHEEVERS: How to work among the French. (Smiling)

Q: Were they any different from the Spanish?

CHEEVERS: Oh, yes, of course.

Q: What was the principal difference?

CHEEVERS: Well, they were easily irritated and individualistic. You had to spend a lot of time separating them, I found, in the very beginning. I had a lot of -- I shouldn't say problem, per se, but a lot of concerns with the management of the FSNs, because they were uneven.

Q: So you didn't have the same type of qualified FSNs?

CHEEVERS: I had some very good ones, but I didn't have the same across the board quality as in Madrid.

Q: How big was the visa section?

CHEEVERS: Let me see now. I think we had five offices all told, and about 13 to 17 FSNs.

Q: Did you restrict yourself completely to the visa function, then?

CHEEVERS: Yes, that was the Office of Visa Services, which was in a separate building when I got there. Paris was not yet considered a Visa Mill.

Q: Did you feel separated?

CHEEVERS: Very much so. There is no splendor in isolation.

Q: You were in a different annex, the famous Talleyrand.

CHEEVERS: Yes. We were two and half blocks or so away from the embassy, and it definitely did foster the feeling of isolation.

Q: We were in the midst of talking about the consular section in Paris, and specifically the visa section, which you headed, which was separate from the embassy, in a separate building called the Talleyrand. How did that separation affect your role with both the section and the rest of the embassy?

CHEEVERS: Very profoundly, I think. You were two and a half blocks away. You didn't eat in the embassy cafeteria where everybody else did, because you didn't have time, away from this. It was very difficult for your officers to run over and take a look at classified material or meet other Embassy colleagues casually. If you had to get something done at the Embassy, you had to walk across Place de la Concorde. The physical distance translated into other kinds of distances. You felt separate and apart.

Q: You felt separate. You were physically separate. But what was done to make you feel part of the mission?

CHEEVERS: In the beginning, not an awful lot. But subsequently, as you very well know, we did pull the whole consular section together in one place in the embassy auditorium, and that, for a while, cured that. The consular section is all in one place again, but they are again on the other side of the Place de la Concorde, separate from the Embassy.

Q: So what you're saying is that you were not only what some consular sections suffer from, being separate from the regular mission, but you were even separate from your own section.

CHEEVERS: That's right. I will tell you that I am a consistent believer in keeping the consular section where it should be, and that is as part of the chancery.

Q: As you know, you and I feel 100% together on that, but there are arguments against it which are security questions.

CHEEVERS: I am aware of the arguments which have come up since. There's no doubt that security is a problem. But I think it is also very curable, and I've seen places where it is. I've inspected for two years, and I've seen places who have the security situation taken care of very well, thank you, and it did not impede the functions or endanger the chancery. There are ways to manage the flow of people so that the chancery did its function and personnel are secure.

Q: I know it wouldn't be fair for me to ask you to speak for me, but since you and I have discussed this so many times in Paris, what are the arguments that you think are most important that you can give to your bosses of why it is important to have the mission together?

CHEEVERS: You have some problems with young consular officers, who feel that just by being consular officers, they're not like other embassy officers. Separating them or moving them away physically from the embassy underscores that feeling, that kind of uncertainty, of the value of the mission. One of the problems of separation was that many of the officers did not have opportunities, to have lunch with their opposite numbers in the political section or other embassy sections. It underscored their isolation and their feeling that they were different.

Q: What did you do about it, as their supervisor?

CHEEVERS: There really wasn't very much I could do, because there's no way you can roll up two and a half blocks as was the case in Paris, but you could hammer away at working toward integrating the consular section into the embassy and make your officers aware of your efforts. I think you recall your battle to take over the auditorium for the visa function.

Q: The auditorium, I should stop to say, is part of the main chancery, and that's where we ended up moving. Which put us right in the chancery. It did not make the ambassador happy at all, because the ambassador had a lofty and elite view of the consular function. I'll maintain that to this day. But we were there, and I think that the morale was better because we were there. They could exit out the back door of the visa section and be downstairs in the same cafeteria as their colleagues. They were part of the embassy. You are, of course, preaching the Holy Gospel to me.

CHEEVERS: Does it sound this way?

Q: What we're trying to do is really get from you your views on how you go about convincing ambassadors that have problems with the consular section.

CHEEVERS: I would allow that there are some ambassadors who are uneducateable. There is nothing one can do to convince them that a chancery should house the key functions of a mission or that separate deleterious effects upon young consular officers. But there are others who are dying to be educated, who never given the consular function any thought, because consul generals have ignored the opportunities to educate.

Q: But your experience in Paris was that you, me, and others did try?

CHEEVERS: Yes, there's no doubt about it.

Q: And maybe, in part, succeeded.

CHEEVERS: Oh, yes, I would have to concede that that was true, indeed.

Q: Going back to the officers, you had quite a good ones tough.

CHEEVERS: I also had some of the lame and the halt.

Q: I was going to say we have heard the cliché about Europe and Canada, that they sometimes are assigned officers they can't place anywhere else. What was your impression of some of your junior officers and other officers?

CHEEVERS: Some were junior officers in name only. They were veterans, and had gone from post to post performing poorly. It was extremely difficult to coax a performance out of them. As much as you might like to believe that there's some good in everybody and that you can get something out of an officer, I found that in one particular case, without naming names, I got so very little that the rewards were not worth the effort. There are cases of that, uncurables! In other cases, I was successful, however.

Q: What do you do with an officer that, as you say, you've tried everything out on, and it just doesn't seem to work? What do you do?

CHEEVERS: Well, there are a number of classic ways you can handle that, as you very well know. You can pick up a telephone to the Dept and say, "You've got to help me get rid of Mr. X. He's destroying the morale of my section." There are officers who do not pull their weight, and the other officers look at you and think, "What kind of a manager are you if you can't help us to get rid of somebody who's not doing his work?"

Q: So number one, talk back to the boss.

CHEEVERS: Talk back to the boss and say, "You can't let this happen. We've got to do something." You can use the system, with its flaws and often slow response, when an officer like that wants to extend, and say, "No, I can't support your extension." More serious are the cases where there is genuine incompetence, and the system does not respond. You are often forced to make adjustments, and work does suffer for it.

Q: How did you work this problem out with others beyond your own supervisor?

CHEEVERS: As you very well know, I did have your ear and your sympathy in one situation. I think you understood that. In that particular case, we were saved, because the officer concerned retired. Other cases were tougher to handle. In Spain, I had an officer who was a classic troublemaker who threatened a grievance at every perceived opportunity. Personnel management can be a minefield.

Q: Mr. Spiers, as Under Secretary for Management -- how do you stop this problem? It seems to have been going on for years and seems to still be out there, of the officer that just is really incompetent and you can't get to leave and the system won't get rid of?

CHEEVERS: I think BEX has a problem.

Q: Board of Examiners. BEX is the acronym.

CHEEVERS: They have to take a look at things and say, "What is the successful past work record of this individual?" Not "We ought to have this individual for a variety of reasons." Not related to competence and experience.

Q: Maybe take a person who's unsuccessful and read back into the BEX files and see where maybe a mistake was made?

CHEEVERS: Sure. That is one way.

Q: Or maybe the person changed.

CHEEVERS: Some people do. I would give them the benefit of the doubt. I did come across in my inspection experience an officer who did so poorly in the beginning, it was pathetic, but it turned out the officer was in the wrong environment with the wrong supervision. Subsequent assignments provided the right mix and this officer later demonstrated great competence.

Q: Am I concluding, then, no matter what, the supervisor is still responsible for doing the most?

CHEEVERS: Yes. And I believe that problems arise in the fear of the supervisor to document things or to bite the bullet.

Q: Do you have any examples of that?

CHEEVERS: Yes, I can tell you that the officers would -- and I reviewed many such examples when assigned to the grievance staff. Officers who had been problem officers for years had sterling performance records. Finally somebody would say, "This simply can't go on. This officer is not functioning." When post Eleks were reviewed you were astonished because there was no record of performance flaws. The record and the verbal performance assessment were poles apart. Poor performance were not documented because the supervisors are afraid to take on the problems of the system -- grievances, EER [Employee Efficiency Report] complaints, disgruntled employees, intimidation, all of those kinds of things. It is very difficult. I would not say that there is no simple answer to this serious flaw in the system.

Q: So it sounds like that Paris added some management skills and experiences.

CHEEVERS: Oh, no doubt about it. What I inherited in Paris was an individual who had been everybody's problem for years and nobody had dealt with it appropriately.

Q: Including me as an inspector.

CHEEVERS: I didn't know this bit of history. But it is nice to have someone to blame.

Q: I inspected him, yes. (Laughs)

CHEEVERS: Okay, fine. But I found myself at the tail end of this officer's career, documenting everything. Drafting memos to this officer that said: "On such and such a date, I asked you to do the following and I have not yet received your response. Would you promptly advise me the status of the report I asked you for?" In normal circumstances, you collegially asked your officers: "Hey, what about that thing I asked you about?" I couldn't do that in the case mentioned. Management became labor intensive. One individual took up most of your time for the management of the section.

Q: So what you added to your career in Paris is more of an individual oriented management of those individuals and so on.

CHEEVERS: Oh, sure. I would say you can't shirk these things. You have to look ahead and say, "You know something, my friend, if you don't deal with this right now, you may inherit this problem again later on down the pike." And you're not helping this officer. You are adding to the deterioration. There are people in the system who not only don't want to bite the bullet, but don't know how to evaluate a performance. From the standpoint of a grievance officer, I can tell you that 60% of all the grievances are generated by the performance evaluation report.

Q: I want to make sure, because we're really working now under the Washington area, where we should be in your two jobs there before you retired. But before we leave Paris, anything else you want to tell us?

CHEEVERS: No. You're talking about incidents, very interesting things that happened, and we talked about this once before. This was during the Iranian crisis and all the different things that were going on. We had an enormous increase in the number of third country nationals, i.e., Iranians. Then we had the controversy over what country would accept the Shah.

Q: Again, this period is 1977 to 1981, so this is '79.

CHEEVERS: As you will recall, the Shah was adrift. Wandering around the world because no one would offer him asylum. I think that when Embassy Paris got involved in the matter, the Shah was either in Mexico or Morocco, I'm not altogether certain.

Q: I don't think we were.

CHEEVERS: And we may not even have known.

Q: I don't think even Mr. Kissinger knew.

CHEEVERS: Probably not.

Q: As we understand it, Mr. Kissinger felt we had an obligation to the Shah.

CHEEVERS: Very definitely. I believe that's true. In any event, we received a Department cable very, very early in the morning -- or very, very late at night, depending on how you look at it -- and I think I called you.

Q: You called me in Brest.

CHEEVERS: You were somewhere, and I said, "Hey, wait 'til you see this. There is a cable that says the passports of Reza Pahlavi Shah and the Shahbanou and the children along with family retainers, are on their way to Paris. The passports, are being forwarded separately, with a request for visitor visas.

Q: Is there a rule against issuing a passport to somebody when he's not in the same country?

CHEEVERS: There certainly was.

Q: And we discussed that, didn't we? (Laughs)

CHEEVERS: You took the matter up with the ambassador. The ambassador said, "It's very clear. The Department wants you to issue the visas." That was what he said.

Q: So the ambassador was instructing you to issue the visa?

CHEEVERS: The ambassador, in effect, was saying, "The handwriting is on the wall. If you tell them you can't do it, you better have some darn good reasons."

Q: You were intimidated by the DCM in Rabat. How did you do with this one?

CHEEVERS: He was quite correct. We had been told, in effect, "They're on their way. Now let's wait and see what happens." Luckily for us, waiting to see what happened, did not take long. A very short time thereafter the Department advised Paris that the shah had found asylum elsewhere. The issue evaporated; we did not have to do something that would have created serious problems personally and politically.

Q: This instruction came from the highest levels of the Department?

CHEEVERS: No, not that high, but I'm not really sure of this.

Q: Did Barbara Watson, do you think, know about it?

CHEEVERS: That's hard to say. It would not surprise me that she didn't.

Q: My recollection is that she didn't know about it, which raises the question of who can give the ultimate order in visa issuance.

CHEEVERS: The Secretary. If you are talking of the last analysis.

Q: I didn't think so. Technically you are correct, but I am not aware of any case in which a consular officer has successfully challenged the Department when it had been determined that the issuance of a visa was in the U.S. interests.

CHEEVERS: Yes, the Secretary.

Q: You and I didn't always agree on everything.

CHEEVERS: No, we didn't agree on that, and as I say, we are a little better educated about things right now, I think. It didn't enter my mind at that time that the Dept could have shifted responsibility to the Attorney General with the waiver authority.

Mr. Kennedy: Is there an ultimate order?

Q: There's an ultimate decision. There's the ultimate decision of whether the visa is issued or not, and the consular officer issues the visa.

CHEEVERS: That's quite true. You can be persuaded. The ultimate comes from the Secretary. If the Secretary says, "Do it," which he probably wouldn't if he had L's advice, you would have a hard time defying it.

Q: When you walked out of the ambassador's office, were you operating under marching orders that you were to do it?

CHEEVERS: Yes and no.

Q: God, that sounds like a wishy-washy consular officer! (Laughs)

CHEEVERS: I probably said, "Okay, fine. You can't make a decision on a visa until an application and travel documents are presented. . ."

Q: Then you went and said a novena.

CHEEVERS: No. No, but I should have.

Q: You didn't call me, because I was on the plane coming home.

CHEEVERS: I'm not sure whether I even checked my memory against regulations looked to see whether or not presence of an applicant in the consul district was still a requirement.

Q: You did indeed.

CHEEVERS: ...before or after I saw the ambassador. I wasn't sure when I did that.

Q: I think also we had agreed that it would be proper to inform Barbara Watson of the action we were about to take.

CHEEVERS: Yes. Your memory is better than mine on that.

Q: What we're talking about here, obviously, is an example of the consular officers being under pressure and being told for political or whatever reasons that a decision had to go a certain way in which the officer did not feel that was the right decision, not ethically or even practically, but in this case, legally.

CHEEVERS: Legally, yes. However, if you took a look at that, the way that cable was written, I don't have any recollection that it ordered us to issue that visa, but it was implicit that passports were going to be presented. Some subtly.

Q: My real question is, do you think there are times when the U.S. national interests causes us to do things that would be in violation of the law?

CHEEVERS: Probably. Yes, sure.

Q: Do you think the consular officer should have to figure out when those are or do you think he should pass the buck?

CHEEVERS: Well, I'll tell you something. A consular officer needs guidance in such cases. I don't think any consular officer is going to make that kind of decision all by himself. As I think about this incident now, the scenario surrounding receipt of that cable, I would have picked up the telephone saying, "Okay, fine. We're waiting. But has anybody back there thought about this, this, and this?" The fallout of a controversial decision.

Q: Has everyone done their homework.

CHEEVERS: Exactly. Because if I make such a decision, I want to have all information available to me. Barbara Watson, for example, I don't know if we asked anybody, but apparently you knew or subsequently learned that Barbara Watson was not in on it.

Q: She was not in on it.

CHEEVERS: Okay. That says something about our system, and it isn't the best, in my opinion.

Q: The press was too sensitive. Some things are so sensitive.

CHEEVERS: What we've been saying here is what we all know, that there are some things which are taken out of the realm of the consular function and decisions are not made by consular officers in such cases.

Q: Or if you put them into the realm of the consular function, the consular officer will screw it up and say no!

CHEEVERS: Well, it could happen. For political reasons, they don't want that to happen.

ARTHUR A. HARTMAN
Ambassador
France (1977-1981)

Ambassador Arthur A. Hartman was born in New York in 1926. He entered the Foreign Service in 1948. His career included assignments in Vietnam, the United Kingdom (England), Belgium, and ambassadorships to France and the Soviet Union. He was interviewed by William Miller in 1987.

Q: How did the assignment to Paris take place?

HARTMAN: Well, I went with Cy Vance to Moscow in March 1977. I was not enthusiastic about the position he was taking there. Les Geld was on that team along with a number of other people. I felt at the time, and we were not told much about the position until we got on the plane. This was one of the interesting things at the time because they were anxious to prevent leaks and so there was a little meeting at the White House and then we were all on a plane, and it was only at that point that I along with Les Geld and the others who were working even more directly on the policy were informed. I had the feeling that it was such a change from the previous position and that the Soviets were unprepared, and that we were going to run into heavy seas. Therefore it might have been better to continue with the old just to try and get that nailed down before going onto something else. Well we got blasted out of the water by Gromyko and I had a feeling that Cy was not totally behind what he was doing. I mean he was kind of ordered to do that out of a meeting that took place with Sprague and others. It was not a good show, but I am fond of pointing out to my Soviet friends that they shot out of the water the position that they took them almost ten years to come around to again, and now accuse us of not giving enough support to: namely deep cuts in strategic forces. So, the objective I had no difficulty with. I think deep cuts was a hell of a lot better than just trying to put caps on the programs that both sides had planned to do in any case. It took us along time to get back to that. With the Soviets it seems to me that you have to have a certain amount of continuity, at least you used to, maybe now you don't. We didn't have it at that point. In any case shortly after that time Cy called me in. I don't know if he was still uncomfortable with me being in EUR and sort of reminding him of old positions or what, anyway he said "How would you like to go to France?" I said "Gee I'd be delighted!" So that was my first Ambassadorial post, Go to France, Why not!

Q: That was his theory, that the best of the Foreign Service should be rewarded?

HARTMAN: I think so and I must say they had an idea of quality. I mean that there were some appointments that were made for political reasons that were not too hot, but as we looked around Europe you had people like Kingman Brewster in London, and for awhile Walt Stoessel was in Bonn as a professional, I was in Paris, Dick Gardner was in Rome as a non-professional. At the EEC you had Dean Hinton, at NATO we had another professional and it varied during that period between professionals and non-professionals but I think always I've had a respect for the quality of the outsiders who were brought in.

Q: How did you find the role of Ambassador? When you were there you were at one of the great posts in the world, at least in Western Europe; beautiful embassy, fascinating country and at the height of your career. Was being an Ambassador as much fun as you had thought?

HARTMAN: Well it was a lot of fun, but very frustrating from an intellectual point of view and from a policy point of view. This was because as prepared as you are from having worked in Washington for the fact that ambassadors are really not brought in to the high policy councils, nor indeed know fully what is going on, and a lot of people try to get around you; you are not prepared for that actuality of it. I can remember the tussles I would have with people like Spate who wanted to have his own sort of direct relationship with somebody in the Elysée and without informing me sometimes, I would get messages back and forth.

Q: Well does this raise the question of the whole nature of foreign policy? In the post-war period you were a part of the new Foreign Service as you described. Then with electronic communication and the ability to fly anywhere in the world faster and faster as we get new airplanes, the nature of embassies change. You have this anomaly in the distant parts of the world where the issues are not formal diplomacy but rather what you do in the bush, or sort of hand-to-hand combat in some places. There is such a range of what an embassy should be. Can you comment on that?

HARTMAN: It depends on the situation and different people react differently to those situations. You can end up as Dean Hinton did in San Salvador where he was trying to get and encourage a kind of democratic process to begin and prepare for an election. Actually they did and they had a successful election and someone with good Democratic credentials got it. Well he was an activist and is, and is a man who understands these things and gets a great kick out of that sort of interplay. I am sure that it was the center of American policy-making with respect to that country. Then you have your more traditional embassies, say in Europe, where you may have particular problems. Occasionally a man, the Ambassador in Bonn for example, has got a very serious problem with the negotiating issues around something that the Germans are concerned about like deployments where both parties have very heavy involvement and are issue oriented.

So you've got public aspects of dealing with the German public, as well as the government, as well as the opposition on a particular issue. While I was in France, in that four years there was not much of that. There was a lot of sort of basic hand holding, of keeping Giscard particularly, from not exercising his royal independence for just the hell of it; but making sure that he understood what the policies were before he made statements and before he took decisions. There were a lot of cooperative things we did with the French around the world. One of the real oddities was to watch Jimmy Carter who didn't have that many instincts to begin with about involvement in other parts of the world, working closely with, or his people working closely with, Giscard and his services and real involvement in some of these countries and helping opposition movements or helping governments to stay in power. I said earlier, the way that administrations shift back to a kind of centerline position is interesting to watch. Jimmy Carter came in saying he wasn't going to pay any attention to the Soviets because that had been too long the preoccupation with our policy, and boom he was back to being preoccupied by them. I think that the French experience for me was fascinating, first of all to have more time with my family and to be able to really enjoy life a little bit. Also, the way to influence a country like France, particularly France and I think also the Soviet Union, is to get into their intellectual debates and into their intellectual life. So we spent a lot of time cultivating the intelligentsia in Paris. I think it paid off. I think they had tended over the years, I won't say I did this – but I certainly encouraged the movement, to be sort of pathologically left and anti-U.S. By showing an interest in their arts and even their avant-garde type things, by getting together with the youth more, by bringing in different kinds of people; I think we made a kind of place for a more favorable setting for the acceptance of American policies at a time when it was sort of difficult to do. This was because there was a lot of feeling about the softness at home and this was before the advent of Mitterrand. Then the other thing of course is the, it was always the potential, of the Socialists coming to power and you had to kind of keep a hand out there and I knew many of them from my earlier days and you could see it coming. You always have the problem, I had a Foreign Service Officer who was working for me, of people wanting to anticipate this, and getting the regime that's in power; and also wanting to have alternates just for the sake of alternates and not saying but there is an American policy interest in the French having the right views on certain subjects, as there is for example with the British. I mean the Labor Party now has a view about defense in Europe which is to say the least is antagonistic to most of the things that we stand for. So while you continue to maintain contact with them, you also have to let them know the facts of life and tell them why you are opposed to what they are discussing.

Q: How did you work with the desk back here in Washington? Did you have anything to do with the appointment of who was working on the desk?

HARTMAN: Not really, but I certainly. George Vest was Assistant Secretary for awhile and I think there was another Assistant Secretary while I was over there. You know we would talk about it, work very closely with the desk, work very closely with the Assistant Secretary for European Affairs. I knew Washington, so I would go back there often enough to kind of keep my hand in on the policies that I thought counted. I knew the Cabinet Officers quite well, I remember Jim Slezinger coming over quite often to discuss energy matters; that was one of the big issues in that period. Defense cooperation, we did a lot to encourage it, Al Haig was up in the NATO job and we worked very closely without a lot of publicity to bring the French into a much closer defense relationship. Then of course you always have the financial problems and I worked on that. When it comes to financial cooperation, the French are always varying in their view of whether the dollar is too high or too low. And that was all fun!

Q: How did you handle Congressional visits?

HARTMAN: There were a lot of visits in addition to the air show when they would all come over, there were a lot of visits back and forth. The Vice-President came, Jimmy Carter came; and then you've got all these other meetings that go on like the meeting of the five or seven summit countries. So there is a lot of contact back and forth and I would go to those meetings. For example, when we met in Martinique with Giscard and Ford, I would be present at those meetings. So it's a little bit more of a traditional role, and with a country like France there not top of our mind unless there is a very specific problem.

Q: So you have a little more free run?

HARTMAN: Absolutely, you have a more free run and you can do a lot of things, make speeches. I've made a very critical speech of the position that Giscard had taken after Afghanistan. It's the one time that I kind of intervened in a French political matter, but it was so important to us and he seemed to be taking such a kind of midpoint decision as if France was not part of an alliance, that surprised me. Even in de Gaulle's time they were part of the alliance, they just weren't part of the structure. So I spoke out and a lot of Giscard's friends thanked me at the time, we got a lot of publicity in France; but that wasn't my purpose. I felt at that point that's one of the few times that I felt speaking out in a country like France was important. He didn't like it for awhile but we still stayed friends. Then of course Mitterrand was elected at the end of that period and I knew quite of the few people around him, I had a friend who introduced me to some of his colleagues, I met Rocard, I had Mitterrand to my house before he came in. So we kept in contact with him and indeed when they got in power, at least on foreign policy issues, they were stronger than Giscard in some respects. This was true certainly on their desire to have a close connection with NATO and their desire to buttress the situation in Germany, toughness on negotiation on nuclear matters because they really believed in the independent deterrent, but a hash of the situation economically at home.

Q: Was it Regis Debray who was the spokesman?

HARTMAN: Regis Debray I would never even talk to, I think he was a very sad character. He finally disappeared from the scene I think, he still remains a friend of Mitterrand but he is one of these intellectual gadflies who may be all right when your out of power to get some ideas from, but if you have him around anywhere close to you when you're in power, I real problem. I knew his Mother very well who was not at all of his persuasion.

Q: How did the appointment to Moscow take place? What were the circumstances of that?

HARTMAN: Well again, it was I was just there for the Carter administration really in Paris and the Reagan administration came in and I of course knew Al Haig very well and he said, "I think you better stay on in France. We've got a transition period now with Mitterrand coming in, but eventually we'll have to think about a successor." I don't know what all the considerations were but I'm sure there were many. The President had a lot of friends I think that he was thinking of sending to Paris and Al finally called me back and said, "How would you like to go to Moscow?" I was torn because I was not a Soviet specialist, I did not have the language, but I was very much given to understand that if it didn't go to me, it would probably go to a non-professional.

SAMUEL S. REA
USAID Liaison Officer
Paris (1978-1980)

Samuel Rea was born in New York City in 1938. He graduated from Princeton University in 1961. Since joining USAID in 1966, his career has included positions in Tanzania, Botswana, France, Senegal and Madagascar. Mr. Rea was interviewed by W. Haven North in 1998.

REA: Marvelously, without my lobbying for the job at all, I was assigned to the one single post which AID held at the time at our Embassy in Paris. The post was located in the General Economic Policy section and was established there in 1974 to assure a measure of coordination with the French on our assistance programs to Sub-Saharan Africa. My predecessor was Howard Helman, who, as I mentioned, had been conducting our business very vigorously with the Club/CILSS livestock team. When I got to the Embassy in September, 1978, my State Department supervisor, Bob Duncan, took me aside and made clear that the Ambassador, Arthur Hartman, had agreed to continue the AID position I was about to fill on the express condition that the next incumbent, namely me, should not serve as a livestock specialist!

Rather, as the Embassy's "overseas development coordinator," my job, Duncan emphasized, was to analyze and report on the full gamut of issues connected with French economic assistance. Duncan introduced me to the individual down the hall who represented the U.S. Treasury in the Embassy – Bob Gelbard, who is today serving as the President Clinton's Representative to Bosnia – and encouraged us to work towards a comprehensive understanding of the structure of French assistance. Although Gelbard had many other things to do, that became my mission, and I'm pleased that I have something to show for it after the 16 months I was there.

Although I was the sole AID officer in the Embassy, we did have other officers in Paris – one at UNESCO and several at the OECD, which now sheltered the Club du Sahel. At the same time as I arrived in town, Art Fell came to replace Roy Stacy as Deputy to Anne de Lattre. In the first few months Art (who was bilingual in French) and I teamed up to make a series of day-long visits to several of the most important component agencies of the French assistance program. Later, I made many more visits on my own. After the end of my tour in Paris, I put together all I had learned about the French aid program to Tropical Africa in a 33 page airgram. It was a labor of love which I finally completed in Dakar in July 1980. Bob Duncan in the Paris Embassy cleared my airgram and sent it out to a wide number of posts, including all our Africa Missions. Embassy/Paris also distributed my message to our embassies in the four other capitals (London, Bonn, Brussels, and Ottawa) which along with Washington had agreed to join in the “Giscard Initiative.” This was an idea of the French president to encourage joint project funding in Africa.

The airgram represented, I think, and Bob Duncan would agree, the most complete report we had up to that time on French assistance overall. I had had to start from scratch because we knew so little. This report was the main thing I had to show as evidence of my 16 months in Paris, since the representational nature of the job didn’t encourage visible results. Norm Schoonover, our Director in Dakar, came up to replace me and I left Paris to become the Program Officer in USAID/Senegal.

Q: What can you recall about what you wrote about how French cooperation worked?

REA: The first thing that struck me was the size and complexity of the French program. In volume of assistance to Sub-Saharan Africa, France was the Number One bilateral donor -- $1.5 billion of ODA in the year I was writing, 1980. I wrote the airgram as a guide for development people like myself who had been asked to work with the French more closely, but who found they knew next to nothing about the purpose and instruments, with all the acronyms, of the French aid program: who did what, and why, and how much -- that sort of thing.

There were two other interesting characteristics of the program. First, its centerpiece was technical assistance. France had 11,600 “cooperants” in Tropical Africa at the time. About three-quarters of them were teachers. According to OECD, France was, not surprisingly, the leading bilateral donor in aid to education, accounting for over half of all education aid by the DAC countries combined. Most of these “cooperant” teachers were posted in secondary schools or secondary-level institutions. Along with the cooperant program went a very large French investment in training, on the level of well over 5,000 scholarships and training grants each year, for courses both in France and Africa, of both long and short term duration.

The second characteristic which interested me about French aid was its emphasis on research. About two-thirds of all the research assistance given by the EEC in these years was French. And the agencies which carried out this research were quite specialized and were state-supported. My airgram went into the broad lines of policy, but in it I also catalogued the various institutions which made up the French program, perhaps in more detail than many busy AID officers in the field wanted to read. I intended the airgram to be a reference document. I imagine it may still have some currency today as it describes the basic agencies and institutions of French aid, although I’m sure the program has gone through many changes over the past 15 years.

Q: Maybe we can even use the airgram as an attachment if it is not too much.

REA: That will be fine, if the scanner will work on the copy I have, which is a bit faded.

Q: That is very important history.

REA: Yes, given the sheer size of the French program, if for no other reason. Of course, French aid was concentrated pretty much on the former French colonies, and most particularly on five countries: Senegal, Ivory Coast, Cameroon, Gabon, and Madagascar. Also, the nature of the program was quite different from ours. In the way it was organized, under the watchful eye of the Presidency (the Elysée), France's aid program was a model of close articulation between foreign policy, trade policy, economic assistance, and internal economic policy, all set within the workings of the franc zone. Still, French assistance had a very human face and this was the cooperant, mostly teachers, as I've said.

Q: Were the cooperants also just people, staffing?

REA: Yes, the other quarter of the 11,600 cooperants then serving in Sub-Saharan Africa were the so-called "technicians." About 1500 of these were in health services, and the balance, some 2000, were in miscellaneous fields like administration, utilities, agriculture, and industry.

Q: In positions in government?

REA: Yes, very often. Perhaps the ones we most think of in this regard were those in administration. They were often very influential – legal, economic, and cultural counselors in presidential and ministerial offices, magistrates, internal security and military advisors, and communications people. No wonder it was said that the French technical assistance program represented the "transmission belt" of French policy in Africa. But that's a bit of an overstatement, since they were concentrated in the five countries I've mentioned. Also, compared with 1960, the proportions were reversed. Twenty years before, at the time of Independence, the "technicians" were three-quarters of the total number of cooperants and held positions in the government, and only one quarter in 1960 were teachers. So the French program had changed with the times.

Q: Well, it would be interesting to see what you wrote at that time. So, you didn't stay working in Paris very long. How did you find working in Paris compared to the SDP in Washington?

REA: My four years helping the Sahel Program to get up and running had been very intense. Sadly, my wife and I separated towards the end of that period. The Paris assignment was just what I needed to regain a larger perspective and take a few deep breaths. Our Paris Embassy was second to Bonn at that time as the largest U.S. embassy anywhere in the world. All the U.S. agencies were represented, and we were proud to be led by a distinguished career diplomat, Arthur Hartman, who went from Paris to become our ambassador to the Soviet Union. I found a ground floor apartment on the Seine across from the Eiffel Tower and I could walk to work every morning. Life was so good in that sort of way that within only a few months I realized I would be lost to development if I did not get out at the first good opportunity. I did not have long to wait.

Q: Did you have any other functions other than doing this study, so to speak?

REA: You bet! In fact, the study took the least official time -- it was the product of late nights and weekends -- even though reporting was supposed to be the main result of all I did. As the AID man in the Embassy, I spent a great deal of time, as you can imagine, supporting visitors, briefing them, setting up meetings and accompanying them. Fortunately, I had a crackerjack secretary, Jacque L'Huillier, who had worked for years in the Embassy and performed the routine jobs with great zest. She was known to all our regular visitors. I also got involved in several projects, such as a remote sensing center in Ouagadougou, and in various activities, like supplying Rwanda during a war with Uganda. But I did not have any responsibility for these activities other than “coordinating,” and I soon discovered that that kind of work, without any responsibility for programs, is profoundly unsatisfying in the long run. The good thing was that by means of all these meetings I got to see the French system in action, and this provided much of the insight I needed to write my final report, the airgram.

Q: Were you working on Club du Sahel matters?

REA: No, Art Fell was managing all of our interests at the Club. I always needed to know what the Club was doing to factor that into the larger picture of Franco-American coordination. Both France and the U.S. were members of the Club. But from my position I was interested in what the French themselves were doing, not only in the Sahel but in other places in Africa, as well, in order to orient others to the total French program. Still, the Sahel region was where the U.S. and France were doing the most together. I came to believe that in an age of shrinking budgets for personnel, if I were running AID, the position I occupied in the Embassy would be hard to justify. It made me feel uneasy to be in that kind of slot.

Q: Right. Were there any particular cooperative programs with the U.S. that you were working on?

REA: Yes, the “Giscard Initiative” which I’ve mentioned was the most important. It had a formal title, something like CADA, Concerted Action for Development in Africa. I was involved in the first two rounds of talks which involved senior people from AID/W and the other capitals. The meetings took place, as I recall, in the building which had served as the secret meeting place for U.S. negotiations with the North Vietnamese five or six years before. It was a grand old building on a tree-lined avenue in the area of the Arc de Triomphe. But I don’t know what became of the CADA initiative, since I left Paris just at the time it began to gather some steam. The fact that Norm Schoonover, our most experienced French-speaking Mission Director, replaced me at the Embassy was taken by the French as a sign, I think, that the U.S. was taking Giscard’s idea seriously. You were involved in one or both of these initial meetings. Whatever became of CADA?

Q: It petered out, but it got some things started. It is another story.

REA: It had the potential of being the most significant thing I was involved with in Paris.

Q: But you don't know much about it.

REA: No. I helped to get the six partners in the same room and they looked at possibilities for joint funding some projects, but after a couple of meetings Norm Schoonover took over. He arrived and I departed in January 1980.

GREGORY T. FROST
Vice Consul
Lyon (1978-1981)

Gregory Frost was born in Washington, DC in 1951. He graduated from the University of Kansas and then joined the Foreign Service in 1975. His overseas assignments include Liverpool, Lagos, Lyon, Maseru, Tijuana, Conakry, Hermosillo, Tegucigalpa, Brasilia, and Buenos Aires. Mr. Frost was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2012.

Q: And then you went then in '78?

FROST: Yep.

Q: Where did you go?

FROST: I went to Lyon, France as Vice Consul.

Q: Ah.

FROST: Which I truly deserved, from the hardship tour in from Nigeria, plus I had four plus, four plus French.

Q: Yeah.

FROST: You know? And I was sort of an expert on the country, I'd lived there, so to speak. So, so that was, that was a dream. That was --

Q: How long were you in Lyon?

FROST: Two years also, little over two -- two and two and -- two and a bit.

Q: What was the role of Lyon consular wise in France?

FROST: Well, they had five consulates in France back then: Marseilles, Bordeaux, Strasbourg, Lyon, and Nice. We were one of five. And they were -- as in the words of an Irish colleague that I got to know later at another post, it was a -- they were all "man-boy" operations, you know, and older, experienced Consul and a younger, junior Vice Consul -- and I was the "boy." We did, you know, a fair amount -- not -- many fewer visas that we did in Liverpool, because the French didn't travel to the States like the Brits did. But it was, you know, American Citizen Services, representation, you know, a lot, a lot -- just showing the flag and attending stuff and --

Q: What were the politics of Lyon?

FROST: Well, they had kind of a strange city. They were -- it was a very bourgeois, but very much of a growing concern than, than Bordeaux had been, you know, when I was there as a student-- progressive, prosperous, growing. But they'd had these whole series of -- there was a guy named Édouard Herriot who was, who was Mayor of Lyon, if you can believe it, from like 1914 to 1958.

Q: President of France, wasn't he?

FROST: Yes, he was, he was Prime Minister before that too, I think Yeah, during the like inter-war years, yeah. He was a very -- he was a national politician. And you know, in France, even to this day you can be a mayor and a senator at the same time and --

Q: Yeah.

FROST: -- and, and a minister all at the same time. And so he was. After him they had Louis Pradel for years, but he was really a purely local guy, whereas at least Herriot had national standing. And when I was there the had a guy named Francis Collomb So they had like three mayors between 1914 and the time I was there. And we were on the third one while I was there, so it was kind of insular. And then they had Raymond Barre, who was Prime Minister for a while back then when Giscard was President and who was an MP from Lyon, they call a "parachutist" --not local but put there to occupy a safe seat in Parliament. And he was just stuck in there, you know, by the party, whatever. So, so it's kind of interesting to have the Prime Minister be from there, you know, sort of from there. The city was very business oriented, conservative in that sense.

Q: What sort of business was going on there? Was there any particularly big business?

FROST: Well, they had kind of like chemical industries and pharmaceuticals and kind of, kind of -- you know, I'm thinking more high tech cutting edge now than it was historically, when they had the silk and textiles, before you had all the information stuff, you know. So very much -- they saw themselves as kind of a rival to Milan and Turin and places like that, kind of -- not the heavy-industry rust-belt type city.. There was Saint Etienne to the west, where they used to have a lot of coal and steel and that kind of industry. But they didn't really have that in Lyon. It was more light industry sort of things I guess you could say.

Q: Well, were there many French students going to the United States in those days?

FROST: No, not very many.

Q: Mm-hmm. It's not the time of the American challenge?

FROST: Yeah, there was that. Because -- well, Lyon was a little bit ingrown, a little bit, as we found when we got involved with the community there because of our French, you know. But they were still very open and welcoming to us, you know. But there was a group called "Rhone Accueil," which was kind of what "welcome wagon" is in the U.S. for new people that were transferred or moved there from other parts of France, you know, and didn't have a -- because France is very family, group oriented society. And so people kind of go to a new place and don't feel like they have, you know, it's their job maybe to be there, but they don't fit in, you know, their family's somewhere else in the country, whatever, you know. So we joined this group and we were there for two plus years and none of us were new anymore by the time two years had gone by. But we still hung out together. We had a bridge club that played every week or so at different people's houses. And we had one guy that was -- loved the Romanesque churches and Auvergne, and he would take us out on these little hikes and excursions and stuff like that. It was fun, you know. So that's our group of friends really, just a bunch of French people that were like, you know, young professionals I guess I would say mainly.

Q: Did the hand of the embassy rest heavily or lightly on you all?

FROST: It was pretty light. The Consul General, guy named Bill Morgan --

Q: Bill and I wrote a book together.

FROST: Oh, you did? Bill, yeah, Bill was kind of a larger than life character.

Q: Oh yeah.

FROST: In certain ways. And he was the, he was in charge of all the consulates, you know, as the Consul General in Paris. And he was a good guy and we got along, you know, we liked him, he liked us, and my boss and I got along, got along well. And but so he, you know, we were basically, you know, he was interested in -- it's about right, I would say. We sort of felt like, for example, the CG for some reason -- and it wasn't anything personal, you know, but, but the locals there just kind of like -- we, we were just a mere consulate and it was the embassy. So if, if it came time, if they wanted somebody to come down and do a representational kind of thing, you know, the -- the French people would always want somebody from the embassy. And it would always piss off my boss because he'd sort of say, "Well," guy named Carol Floyd was his name, from Arkansas, great guy, Econ Officer. But he would, he would, he would just get livid, say, "I'm a Consul General, you know, you know, I'm, I'm, you know, I'm a Colonel, whatever, you know. You know, why aren't I good enough? Why does it always -- they really have some Junior Political Officer from Paris because he's from, just because he's from the embassy than they would me who's the consul General in this district, you know?" (laughs). It was kind of weird about them in a way that the embassy was for them this huge powerful thing and we were just this little consulate.

Q: Well, there is this, this feeling, you know, I mean the title and all. Was there much anti-Americanism at the time or?

FROST: Not really, no. Didn't seem to be -- it was -- I didn't feel it really, hardly. And of course I was, I was so assimilated in terms of my, you know, French background, and my wife too, that we, we were, we were sort of honorary French in certain respects I guess you'd say. I was there when Giscard lost to Mitterrand. All the bourgeois people there, people I knew in context, they were all panicking about that and, "God, we're going to have a Socialist President and it's going to be terrible," you know.

"No, your three-star restaurants will still be there. You'll just -- they'll just be a bit more expensive, but nothing'll really change."

Q: What was your wife doing?

FROST: Well, she, she got -- she was able to work as a PIT doing visas some of the time, you know, even though it didn't seem to be a problem for summer, summer hire kind of stuff, you know. But she just really enjoyed living in France. We both joined an amateur choir there and our, our group would combine with a couple other choirs and sing with the Lyon Symphony, you know, concerts that people actually paid to attend, you know, major choral works with symphony backing us up and professional soloists brought in, and some from the U.S., you know. And that was our, that was our main hobby there, you know, so we had -- so when they had a group, a group of friends from that group, from the choir as well. And that was lots of fun. We did a lot of traveling too, because my boss liked to travel and I like -- we like to travel. So basically I don't know how we did it, but during the two years that we were there each year, I don't know how I had enough leave to do this, let alone the money, but we did two three-week vacations each year, a spring one and a fall one generally.

Q: Good heavens.

FROST: We drove all the way through -- we drove down through Spain, toured parts of Spain, ended up in Morocco, and went all the way to Marrakesh and back in our car. And we did another trip to, where we just got visas for -- got it cleared and everything and got our -- got visas for -- we had one friend in Krakow from A-100 and another friend in East Berlin, and we drove from France over there, over, over to Vienna and then transmitted up through Czechoslovakia to Krakow and went to Auschwitz and went to Krakow and stuff. And then we drove over from there to East Berlin back to France. Those were two of our vacations, three weeks each.

Q: Well, was there any significant immigration from Lyon to the States?

FROST: No, not really. They had a -- the closest thing was the Clermont-Ferrand, which was kind of the headquarters of Michelin. They had a Michelin plant in I think North Carolina, which is still there.

Q: Yeah.

FROST: And -- but no, there was, there was very little.

Q: Well, then you left there when?

FROST: It January of '81.

Q: Must have been quite a wrench.

FROST: Yeah, it, it was, especially coming back to Washington.

WILLIAM D. MORGAN
Consul General
Paris (1978-1981)

William D. Morgan was born in New York in 1925. He received a bachelor's degree from the University of Rochester in 1949 and a master's degree from the University of Maryland in 1953. He served in the U.S. Army from 1943-1946. Mr. Morgan's Foreign Service career included positions in Lebanon, Paris, and Montreal. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1988.

Q: Moving off this subject to being consul general in Paris, what was different there as a consul general than in Lebanon?

MORGAN: Of course, the dangers of being blown up, for example, are reduced. You were looking at a more civilized setting, so your living was easier, although living in Paris isn't always the easiest thing in the world. But let me tick off the similarities. First, getting to know your colleagues and working with them well is identical to the Beirut, S/IG and VO situations. There was no difference whatsoever in how you work with your colleagues, gain their confidence and relate to the consular function. Secondly, we also had a physical relocation problem in Paris that was basic and involved the entire embassy. On the other hand, the visa function involved much less intercession; as a matter of fact, next to nothing. So, visa pressures were less but the volume was far worse. We were in Paris during the Iranian hostage crisis when our embassy was held imprisoned. We had a tremendous influx of Iranians at that time.

Q: You were there in Paris between 1978 and '81.

MORGAN: Right. Exactly. The visa responsibilities were largely a function of volume and people movement logistics. The basis of our visa business was the legitimate French and European applicants weighed against the third-country nationals who were the problem cases, particularly Iranians. And the physical layout lessons I learned from Beirut became applicable in Paris. We had to relocate the section, and that was a battle far more difficult than in Beirut.

The similarities with the American community were there. The Americans weren't as concerned about security issues, but they were very sensitive that the American Embassy understood their concerns. I was on the board of the American Chamber of Commerce and the American Hospital of Paris. I was vice-president of the American Club of Paris, an organization that were very, very closely tied to Embassy objectives. The Consul General was role-playing but that role was clearly in U.S. interests in France and with the American community.

The thing that's different -- and I want to emphasize that most issues really were the same as in Lebanon -- was my role as supervising consul general over five constituent posts. I would say that took up about a third of my time. These constituent posts were constantly being closed or threatened to be closed. We also had, in some cases, prima donnas as Principal Officers. In other cases, we had not too qualified people. They were almost all two-officer posts. The small- post-syndrome versus the big embassy, was endemic: "no one ever listens to me and no one ever cares what I'm doing," versus "they don't know what they're doing out there in the consulates." The role, as supervising consul general, as well as guiding the consular function, was a ball-juggling but very fascinating responsibility.

Q: What were the posts?

MORGAN: Lyon, Bordeaux, Nice, Marseille, and Strasbourg. We closed Nice while I was there, and then we reopened it. I think we closed it again. I can't remember. But the issue: Can a consular cone officer supervise principal officers who are economic or political cone? Yes, if he ranks them and writes their efficiency reports. It's amazing what he can do. And second, if he gains their confidence and says, "Look, I'm with you." Traveling out to the constituent posts repeatedly, sitting down with the admin and other FSNs, commiserating with the principal officer and understanding where they feel they're being misused or misunderstood. Security. I traveled repeatedly with the Embassy security officer to these posts, because security in France was becoming ever more important. Remember, we lost an assistant military attaché and almost a DCM and Commercial Counselor.

ROBERT B. DUNCAN
Economic Counselor
Paris (1978-1982)

Robert B. Duncan was born in New Jersey in 1934. After receiving his bachelor's degree from Princeton University in 1957 he served in the US Army from 1958-1960. His career has included positions in Rabat, Addis Ababa, Algiers, Paris, and Bangkok. Mr. Duncan was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on April 9, 1995.

Q: You were in Paris from when to when?

DUNCAN: 1978-1982.

Q: What was your job in Paris?

DUNCAN: Now, the title of it is the economic counselor, but at that time it was called the chief of the Economic Division. We had an economic minister who was in charge of it. Because Embassy Paris was such a large embassy, the Treasury representative there handled the financial questions. We had a commercial counselor who handled the commercial issues. And we had an agricultural attaché. So, I used to think of my own division as being sort of the Department of Miscellaneous Affairs. In other words, if it wasn't something that was assigned to the commercial counselor and it wasn't anybody else's, then it was mine.

Q: Who was the economic minister?

DUNCAN: It was Jack Myers first and then Mike Ewing. I had two.

Q: I imagine you had several ambassadors while you were there.

DUNCAN: Art Hartman was ambassador for most of the time that I was there. I had Galbraith first and then Hartman.

Q: Where did he come from before that and can you tell me how he operated?

DUNCAN: He was a political appointee. He had made his money in oil tankers. We are under President Carter. Then Reagan was elected in 1980.

Q: I'm having a little trouble because I don't have my references of who was who. We think it was Hartman and then Hartman moved into part of the Reagan administration and then Galbraith followed when Hartman went off to Moscow. We can sort that out and manipulate this in the final transcript. Could you describe your impression of how Hartman operated with the embassy and his effectiveness in dealing with the French from your perspective?

DUNCAN: He had a total command of the language. He had served in Paris before. He knew lots of people in Paris who had risen. But the thing that amazed me about the man is that he took a great interest in making sure that he had good people. In other words, he spent a great deal of effort in selecting the people who worked for him. Once he had selected them, he let them do their thing. This is the most incredible thing about him: Even though your contact with him would be limited because it was a very large embassy and I was two tiers down if you don't count the DCM as a separate tier (I had a minister between me and him.) that we would let everybody know what his desires were. It wasn't that you were constantly talking to him. It was the question that he had an ability to both delegate authority but to give very clear guidelines of what he wanted. I remember a particular case where we had a problem out at the American School. A communicator went to complain. He asked me to come up because he knew that I had children in the school. He asked some very pertinent questions. We discussed the problem. He wanted to know who was the person that was on the board of trustees out there. He picked up the phone and took care of the problem himself. In other words, this was a thing that could have become a serious problem. He was made aware of the problem and immediately moved to take care of the problem. He figured out the problem and the power dynamic and took care of it. It's a minor thing.

Q: But it signified a method of operation.

DUNCAN: It signified a person who is truly an effective manager. He recognizes that a subtle problem like this can become a very serious problem.

Q: We'll talk about ambassadors, although that will probably be a little later. What about Galbraith? There was a famous economist named John Kenneth Galbraith, but this was not this person. You probably didn't have too much time with him.

DUNCAN: No. It was like day and night. In other words, we had an individual who came into the job, really did not have background, did not have the command for the language, had money, but was a bit of a bull in a china closet.

Q: If I recall, he wrote a book afterwards

DUNCAN: Now that I am absolutely sure, I know that it was Hartman and then Galbraith. We're talking about people who are still around. When Galbraith wrote the scathing attack on the Foreign Service, I had left Paris. I was away for quite some time. I'm trying to remember whether he said it to me or somebody else said it to me. He had been told that you don't want to take any experienced person who has background or their own power base and what not. You want to bring somebody in there who is totally dependent on you so that they will have total loyalty to you because they won't be there unless you are there. The DCM had been picked in that category. There were a lot of raised eyebrows. I'm not going to mention his name. There had been a lot of raised eyebrows about the fact that this individual had been picked because there were a lot of people who were much more likely to get the job, but had been picked because it was a person who would be loyal because of he'd be utterly dependent on him. He behaved that way. The DCM, in effect, basically acted like a doormat for him. So, when he came out and attacked the Foreign Service, he was basically attacking primarily this guy who had done everything for him. I remember that.

Q: Did his attitude permeate the embassy?

DUNCAN: Oh, yes. Hartman was so phenomenal. Hartman is generally considered to be probably one of the handful of the very best career Foreign Service officers, who now we know got a real raw deal in Moscow because the Russians set him up to try to divert attention away from Ames. But the point of it was that here was a guy who was running a very effective ship with very effective delegative power, but everybody operating in tandem. Then we went to a completely different agenda. My perspective was somewhat limited. I had the impression that the French were not impressed.

Q: If I recall, Galbraith got on TV to publicly espouse the American cause and to attack the French government or something like that? Does that ring a bell?

DUNCAN: That's after my time.

Q: I may be wrong on that. When you say you had the economic job of the bits and pieces, what were some of those?

DUNCAN: If it didn't fall under the jurisdiction of the agricultural attaché, the Treasury representative, or the commercial counselor, I got it.

Q: What were some of the things that you got?

DUNCAN: I spent a great deal of time was dealing with commodity issues and energy. I guess one of my major operations there was that the issue was coming up of building a huge new natural gas pipeline from Russia into Europe. At the same time, the Europeans were looking at this as an alternative to Algeria because, particularly from the French perspective, there were risks involved in being dependent on natural gas from Algeria, even though they had a big interest there. It was a matter of national policy. We were trying to work with the Europeans to not let this natural gas pipeline, in effect, become a type of Achilles heel, where the Western Europeans would become dependent on natural gas that could be turned off. It was a major strategic issue. I was involved in that.

Q: Can you talk about what at that time the French stand was on this and how did you deal and work with this?

DUNCAN: They were as conscious as we were of the risks. They were probably more sympathetic to what we were trying to achieve. They were trying to approach it from a balanced point of view and trying to work out some kind of system whereby the Algerians could participate in the exercise, but in a way that was not going to pose a threat. In other words, try to develop a relationship where Algerian gas could become like an offset. It was very interesting because the bottom line in the whole exercise at the very end when the crunch came, the Belgians undermined the united position vis a vis the Algerians. I remember at the time, this French official said to me, "Bob, it's Zaire." In other words, the question was, "Why are they doing this?" There was this FrenchBelgian competition for influence in Zaire and this was a way for the Belgians to get back at the French.

Q: This is a question I particularly like to ask about France. It's been our oldest ally and all, but the relationship has always been rocky. We're talking about this 1978/1981 period. How did you find dealing with the French bureaucracy, your estimation of the people you dealt with in the French government, how they reacted, how one deals with them as an American?

DUNCAN: I had one advantage. My French was pretty good and I made the decision that in all my dealings with the French, I was going to use French. So, as a consequence, it not only increased my fluency in it, but I had the feeling that by sitting and always talking with them in French, I would get them to be more open and forthcoming and frank, rather than forcing them to try to express their views in a foreign language. But they wanted to demonstrate their own English ability. Most French diplomats and the people I dealt with in ministries all had excellent English. So, they could work in English. If we had a problem, sometimes we could switch. Generally speaking, I think that that's absolutely essential. My own feeling is, as they used to say, you can't work in Embassy Paris unless you have really good French. I agree with that. If all you do is English and they have to deal with you, they will deal with you. But if you are, as frequently you are, really in the demander position, saying, "Would you support us on this," to have to say, "We're going to support you on this" and then force them to, in effect, do it in English... My own feeling is that I think that that creates a problem. So, that's the first key thing. I would say that I found that because I could work with them in their language, I always found courtesy and access. Then comes the problem of how are you able to condition their thinking. I think that the critical thing to understand here is, the French approach things, based on my experience and other commentators, in a very Cartesian way. That is, all the interested parties sit down and they analyze the problem in terms of "les interets de la France (the interests of France)." When they finally come to a conclusion on what is the best way to go in terms of protecting "les interets de la France..." Their policy is very oriented toward national interests. If you make an appeal to them where "This would be good for mankind" or "This is the right thing to do," maybe... But they think of what is in the French interests in this issue. Maybe the humanitarian concern might be a French interest. Americans tend to say, "Look, this is very important to us and this is very important to you. How about you go along with us on this and we'll go along with you on that?" They don't function that way. "What is the interest of France on this issue and what is the interest of France on that issue?" That's the way it is. The other thing is that when they make this determination of what is the interest of France, they must have a very effective interministerial coordination system. I guess there must be very rigid rules held that you do not engage (We're talking about civil servants.) in interministerial warfare by going outside and dragging the foreigner in. There may be ministerial differences of opinion, but you don't try to manipulate the foreigner and use the foreigner as a wedge to condition like in the American form of government. They don't have that. So, as a consequence, once they came up with a decision, it was like a parrot. You could ask this person "What is the view of the French government" and he would use almost the same language as if you asked somebody over here. I'm just saying that, in retrospect, it seemed to be always well thought out in advance. A conclusion was come to and then it was applied. The positive side of that is that they tended not to do anything rash. In other words, they wouldn't take a leap until they had thought the thing out. The trouble of it is that if they ever thought the thing out and came up with an erroneous conclusion or a poor solution, it was impossible to change their view until the realities crashed through and caused them to rethink.

Q: I have never dealt with the French in a political sense. But from watching their movies and all, they seem to see patterns where the Americans don't see patterns. Sometimes these patterns, at least to my eyes, seem to be erroneous. There are some things that happen like plots or some idiot will shoot somebody or something like that and they try to see a pattern to maybe what we're requesting, where it may be just because we're doing it because a senator in a key state wants something to be done. They think there is a pattern behind our request.

DUNCAN: I think there is an element of truth in what you say. They tend to project their own way of doing things on other people. It's hard for them to understand that you could have a totally disorganized, totally uncoordinated situation coming out that they would never permit themselves to have happen. They wouldn't permit a type of chaos that we sort of view as our way of life. There is an element of that. Another thing is that they make a decision (This is the way I look at it.). The French never condition their thinking by what you say. They condition their thinking by what they believe that you're prepared to do. So, therefore, if they don't think that you are prepared to do something, they won't do it. It doesn't matter if you tell them. They may not believe that you really mean what you say.

Q: Particularly in many international affairs where we tend to preach and bluster and say, "We should do something," when they will look at us and say, "This is all fine, but the reality is that the United States isn't prepared to insert force there or do this."

DUNCAN: Right.

Q: Did you ever find them coming to you in your position and find that they were working our system to their advantage? In other words, they would go to you and maybe to the Treasury or something like this and be trying to get something?

DUNCAN: It may have happened. Play one of us off against the other.

Q: It might have been done more in Washington than in the embassy anyway, if it was done.

DUNCAN: I guess on some trade issues if the Germans took a position that they did not like, they would try to mobilize us as an ally for them against the Germans. Or the British. Yes, that would happen. But you're talking about trying to internally play one side against the other. It may have happened, but I'm not aware of it.

Q: I'm speaking as a gross outsider in this whole relationship. Did you ever sort of have the idea that the French were sort of odd men out and doing it with a certain perverse pleasure of showing that they were different and weren't part of anybody's team or not?

DUNCAN: I think that where there was the difference is that they were not prepared for what we would characterize as a larger greater good to sacrifice what they viewed as being a French interest. In other words, I guess there was more of a Machiavellianism in theirs than in ours. There would be cases of where the American government would, in effect, not support, if you want to call it, a very narrow commercial interest if they felt that this was going to pose a serious instability or security problem. That didn't seem to bother them a bit. Do business with Iraq... The idea would be, we put an embargo on a country because of terrorism problems and they would go for the business.

Q: You mentioned commodities besides power. Were there any particular issues during the time you were dealing with this?

DUNCAN: There, the issue had to do with do you believe in trying to have commodity agreements? The French were more inclined toward commodity agreements than the American government was. So, I was more in a defensive position. In other words, the thing that they would be advocating, we would not. They were in favor of more regulation than we were.

Q: Do any particular commodities come to mind?

DUNCAN: Cocoa, coffee. They were very oriented toward quota agreements and things like that. My problem was, our administration was opposed to that sort of thing.

Q: Did you get at all involved in the development of the European Community in your position?

DUNCAN: If they were trade issues, they would normally be handled in Brussels. The negotiations between the United States and Europeans on trade issues were with the Commission. We had a number of investment issues.

Q: To rephrase the question, were there any specific problems with commodities between the French and the United States?

DUNCAN: The problem was that we and, to a degree the Germans, and to a degree the British, were more oriented toward letting the market handle itself. The French, on the other hand, were responding like an advocate for themselves and for developing countries that wanted to regulate commodities. In some areas we were prepared to consider it. But I think the French would be prepared to use a commodity agreement as a means to, in effect, raise the price of the commodity above what we'll call the normal market price and we were not.

Q: I realize that we had an agricultural consulate. Did you get involved in any farm disputes?

DUNCAN: No.

Q: That was a handy thing to have someone else for.

DUNCAN: That was his problem.

Q: You say that with a certain relief. You were there during the transition with the arrival of Ronald Reagan as President. I can imagine that the French were really kind of bewildered about, all of a sudden, here is this person is known as not a top rate movie star, despite the fact that he had become Governor of California, become President of the United States, and seemed to be coming from the strong right wing of the Republican Party. Did you find in your dealings with the French either at the social level or professional level trying to explain or answer questions about Ronald Reagan?

DUNCAN: I remember one particular meeting which was just before the election in which they wanted to know who I thought was going to win, trying to discuss American politics and the electoral system and what not. But my general impression is that they were happy with Reagan's victory.

Q: Jimmy Carter had not come across as a very strong President.

DUNCAN: That was the problem. They viewed him as a weak President. They like strength.

When they ask about all my assignments, they say, "Which one did you like the best?" I always say, "You like different assignments for different reasons. But the most dangerous assignment I've ever had was in Paris because that's when we had the terrorist attack. Our Army attaché was gunned down on the sidewalk. A Libyan attacked our DCM, Chris Chapman. They said that we were being targeted, so they set up all sorts of special operations for us. At one point, they said they were going to have us accompanied. Then we had the famous case of Rod Grant, the commercial counselor, saw the bomb under his car. This was the miracle of why American Embassy Paris continues to stand. We were having these terrorist attacks against American personnel. Rod Grant had a son who was going to UCLA. He and his father were having an argument. He was going to take him back to the airport to send him back to college. They came down the stairs. They were on the Avenue de la Bourdonnet in the seventh arrondissement. They came out of their apartment house and went over to the car. The 18 year old son, who was an athletic type, was so aggravated at his father that when he got the trunk open, he threw his duffel into the trunk and slammed the trunk so hard that a magnetic bomb that had been put under the car dropped off into the street and they drove away to the airport. Our assistant Air attaché, who lived nearby, was walking down the street, saw this thing and knew from his own experience what it was. So, they called the Parisian bomb disposal people. They came out. According to one of the security people, the reason that what happened happened was because they violated the first rule of bomb disposal. That is, you don't move the bomb until you diffuse it. They moved it and it exploded and took out windows on two sides of the avenue to the whole block of the Avenue de la Bourdonet. The thing of it was that the terrorists probably knew that Rod Grant parked his car in the basement garage of the embassy. So, the feeling was that what they had wanted was for him to drive his car into the basement and then have the thing blow up there. So, we would have lost our building on the Place de la Concorde. The fact that it took out all the windows on a whole block in the air, you could imagine what it would have done to the embassy.

Q: How about your personal life there? Did you feel particularly under attack or not?

DUNCAN: No. We went through this period where they said we were being targeted. Therefore, they were figuring out who was most involved. So, there was quite a bit of stress and strain. Other than common sense sort of things where you don't go the same way the same hour every day, I felt that... They originally wanted everybody to drive and they would have policy escorts to take you in. I remember the first time they said this. I said, "Look, I always take the Metro. I don't want to drive my car." So, here they had a motorcycle cop come along. As I'm walking from my apartment to the Metro station, he is driving along. It was like, "Here is one." This is counterproductive.

Q: Who were the terrorists that we saw at that time?

DUNCAN: Arabs, Muslims. The ones that shot Chapman were Libyan. The one that killed the assistant Air attaché was also Libyan. Afterwards, there were some bomb explosions against the French.

PAUL K. STAHNKE
Counselor of Mission, OECD
Paris (1978-1982)

Paul K. Stahnke was born in Illinois in 1923. He served in the U.S. military from 1943-1946 and received a bachelor's degree and a master's degree, both in international relations, from the University of Chicago in 1950. Mr. Stahnke's career included positions in Germany, Italy, Japan, Somalia, Denmark, France, and Thailand. He was interviewed by Thomas Dunnigan on June 1, 1994.

Q: Now, as you mentioned, in 1978 you moved from that assignment to Paris where you were with our mission to the OECD. What was your exact position there?

STAHNKE: My title was Counselor of Mission and I was number three or four, depending on how you counted it, in the Mission. To provide direction to our complex activities, the Mission had an Executive Committee composed of the Ambassador, DCM, the Treasury Attaché, myself, and the AID representative. I headed a section that dealt with the energy issue (the International Energy Agency, which was semi-autonomous), trade, steel, social affairs and a few others things of lesser importance. Perhaps one of my most important assignments was that of US representative on the OECD Budget Committee. That was the committee that annually determined the budget for the OECD Secretariat. This was important because we contributed directly to the OECD, all of the 24 member countries, and through this budgetary process at the end of each calendar year we directly influenced the activities of the Secretariat, indeed sometimes forcing them to change direction. For example, over the strenuous objections of those working in social and labor affairs, we took money from them (thus forcing a reduction in their activities) and transferred it to trade which had become a more important current issue. Using the budgetary process as a program setting device worked very effectively. We thus kept the activities of the Secretariat and member country priorities in harmony.

Q: It sounds as though you had a very full platter there. I note you mentioned energy and as I recall it was during those years that we had the great rise in energy prices in 1979.

STAHNKE: That was the second oil shock. The International Energy Agency was a semi-independent agency. We were then collectively trying, among other things, to develop a set of procedures in the event that we should have another oil crisis which would result in a cutoff of oil from the Middle East in particular. This involved programs such as stockpiling. Nobody was forced to do this, although there was a lot of talk about it and recommendations about how we best could do this and indeed the United States began about that point to store larger amounts of oil. We perhaps over did it because the concern about oil was not just whether it might be in short supply, or cutoff for various reasons, but that the price might rise. There was considerable concern at that point that it might rise to $100 a barrel; instead, it did nothing but go down, dropping to something like $12 a barrel about four or five years later. So, as a result of these changes in the years I was there, the International Energy Agency, dropped from being a very important focal point, particularly for our Department of Energy, to becoming almost irrelevant. Little purpose was served in coordinating energy policies in an environment of satisfactory supplies and falling prices. It also seemed clear that a shock similar to the two we had in the 1970s would be repeated again in the foreseeable future.

Q: My only experience with the OECD was to note that they usually issue gloomy reports as to how bad the situation is. But the period you were there it was a serious problem because inflation was rising in the United States and probably in other countries too. Were there differences between the OECD organization and the US administration's views, and you dealt with two administrations, Carter and Reagan?

STAHNKE: I suppose you are right in that these reports tended to focus on problem areas but not always. Coordination for these reports was excellent. In preparation for the report on the US economy, either the Chairman or his deputy of the Council of Economic Advisors came to Paris for discussions in depth, plus representatives of the Treasury Department. Discussions were usually heated and the outcome not necessarily satisfactory to US representatives. Still, on the whole, these reports were widely respected as they continue to be.

I think you are right that the OECD staff responsible for these reports felt, besides a certain amount of glee in criticizing various governments, that they did have a responsibility in being the sober, external, objective organization looking at the economy and providing recommendations as to where the focus should be. This was also the time when the Japanese began to feel their oats. They were always ready, whether in the economic committees or in the Executive Committee or in other organizations to provide advice to the other OECD members countries as to how they should run their economies. They were never reluctant to tell the Americans that they were spending too much and saving too little.

Q: The Dutch uncle treatment.

STAHNKE: Yes, the Dutch uncle treatment, which was kind of amusing because they were the ones who were soliciting advice ten years earlier on how they should run their economy.

Q: Did you enjoy your tour at the OECD?

STAHNKE: Yes. It was eventful and intellectually satisfying. Aside from the other activities I mentioned, I was Chairman of the Trade Committee Working Group which met weekly much of the time. The Group consisted of representatives from the various missions resident in Paris who prepared the material for consideration by the Trade Committee at its periodic meetings of representative from capitals.

The major issue with which I was involved at the time was trade and services, which I've already cited. We were trying very hard to develop a coordinated position among the OECD industrialized countries which we could then use for presentation to the GATT in Geneva for further debate and for consideration at the next GATT round, which indeed it was.

Q: It became a sticky point there for a while.

STAHNKE: It was a very strong sticky point for quite some time. That and agriculture issues. We didn't get as much as we wanted but we got a fair amount and the issue is now subject to both international agreement and international dialogue.

Yes, on the whole, besides just being in Paris, it was an interesting, exciting and very different assignment. It was different from normal embassy operations because it involved a consultative organization among 24 countries, both in the General Council as well as the various committees, with generally no decisions being reached, but a lot of discussion. So it was interesting in terms of the subject matter under discussion and a little frustrating because there was so much talk, so many papers and very little accomplished. But it was fun doing it nevertheless.

CHRISTIAN A. CHAPMAN
Deputy Chief of Mission
Paris (1978-1982)

Christian A. Chapman was born in France to American parents on September 19, 1921. He served in the U.S. Army from 1941-1945 and received a bachelor's degree from Princeton University in 1948. Mr. Chapman entered the Foreign Service in 1950. His career included positions in Morocco, Lebanon, Iran, Vietnam, Luxembourg, France, and Laos. Mr. Chapman was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1990.

Q: Then your next assignment was one that must have been sort of interesting. That was as Deputy Chief of Mission in Paris.

CHAPMAN: That was totally pleasant.

Q: How did you get that assignment from 1978-82?

CHAPMAN: Because Arthur Hartman called me and asked me if I would take the assignment. Arthur Hartman is a friend from Saigon days. I'm very fond of him and his wife, Donna, and have great admiration for both of them.

It was a totally pleasant three years with an ambassador who was thoroughly professional and very highly regarded. Arthur Hartman is one of the most politically sensitive persons I have ever known. He has antennas, that pick the essence of situations out of the air. Very good judgement. Very broad views. A strategic thinker. Highly respected in Paris and Washington.

Q: How did he operate that embassy. That is almost always a political appointment, someone with money.

CHAPMAN: He and Donna are very culturally inclined. They genuinely love the arts, particularly music. They put a lot of effort into it and received a lot of American artists and went out virtually every night to concerts or something. So they established a climate around the embassy of being receptive to the arts and to the world of the artists. Which in France, plays big. As far as running the embassy, he left it largely to me.

I ran the embassy, but Arthur always kept an eye on what he considered problems that had to be dealt with. He was also very sensitive on personnel matters. Professionally as a foreign service officer it was a fascinating job. On one side you run the embassy and at the same time, you have to maintain a presence in town so that when the ambassador leaves, the embassy doesn't become faceless. In effect, you are doing two jobs. It means thirteen to fourteen hour days every day. But it was professionally very satisfying.

We had 27 different agencies represented in the embassy. One great advantage of being the Paris Embassy was that the agencies sent, by and large, very good people. There was never a dearth of volunteers. As a result, we dealt with first class professionals in all agencies, which makes all the difference in the world, as you know.

Q: How did you find dealing with the French bureaucracy?

CHAPMAN: I let my colleagues do that. I tried to have as few operational questions to deal with as possible. Otherwise operations and contacts become layered and confused. If I were to deal with the Quai d'Orsay extensively, that would mean the political counselor would be squeezed out. It was much better to give him full rein. I had a State Department house with four servants, and I tried to provide support for my colleagues in every field, as they considered it useful and necessary. For instance, I had luncheons for senior people at the Quai to let the more junior political officers get to know them. Or when American businessmen came through, the economic and commercial officers would organize an event for their counterparts in the French government. I found this kind support for our colleagues a very good use of our rather elegant appointments.

Q: How did you find the consular operation. You had consulates all over.

CHAPMAN: It was a real problem because we were under pressure to reduce the number of consulates. The case had to be made that they served an important purpose. Very frankly, it was a stretched argument in that, although it is a very good thing to have consulates, to have an American presence around a country like France. that keeps tabs on what is going on around the countryside, the reality is that French political power remains very largely centered in Paris. However, the power of politicians remains anchored in local communities in the provinces. Typically, a French deputy spends each weekend in his department nurturing his constituencies.

It is also good to have consular affairs officers and commercial officers closer to people throughout the country. But consular posts cannot be a top priority; yet powers that be in Washington remain very attached to some of these posts, all for different reasons. The most amusing was the case of Nice. We went through a painful exercise of justifying this post, pointing out among other things that closing it would save really very little. Nevertheless, the decision was made to close it. Then, Grace Kelly wrote a Dear Ron note to President Reagan, and presto it was reopened- on a more modest scale. We lost a magnificent property in the heart of the city, and the Consulate General was reopened in a more modest setting.

Q: This happened when they tried to close Turin. Fiat wrote and you just don't close these things because there are constituencies.

CHAPMAN: Yes, and from the point of view of the local people, the Mayor of Strasbourg for instance, felt quite genuinely that closing a US consulate is a reflection on their city. (Strasbourg by the way hired a public relations firm in Washington, and for whatever reason, the Consulate General was saved.)

Q: There is the problem too, that sometimes we overload a capital. There is a world outside the capital. I speak as one consul general in Naples at one time and Rome seemed to be a world unto itself. If you want to know about Italy it wasn't enough.

CHAPMAN: The same was true in France, although perhaps not to the same degree as in Italy. France is simply one of the most centralized systems in the world.

Q: Any major issues at the time?

CHAPMAN: There was the transition of the Presidency from Giscard d'Estaing to Francois Mitterrand, as a result of the elections of 1981, which we called wrong by a hair. It was a very interesting transition, with a hard right government in Washington and a dreamy left wing government coming to power in Paris.

The great question was what sort of relationship would we have. I confess the recommendations we sent in from the embassy were to stand aloof and tough with this government to see how it would evolve. To let it define its position before we defined ours. And for once I gave the Reagan White House credit of writing, contrary to our recommendation, a very warm letter to Mitterrand, congratulating him on his election. It also came as a surprise to the L'Eysee. I don't know how it happened, but Bush, who was Vice President, came for a get-acquainted visit. The election was held over two weekends in May-June, and Bush came on the 25th of June and made a twenty-four hour stop to call on Mitterrand. It came off very well.

The issue that had rattled Washington immediately, was the incorporation of communists in the government. But Bush managed to put this in context, and I guess was reassured by Mitterrand's firmness on the subject and the impression that Mitterrand always gives of knowing what he is doing.

I had personally one experience which illustrated the gap between the Reagan Washington and the Mitterrand Paris. Early after the legislative elections, I called on Pierre Beregovoy (who by the way is of Ukrainian background) who was responsible for the transition and who is now minister of finance, and probably the most influential Minister in the government. He received me in a small office at the headquarters of the Socialist Party, where the transition team was located. He greeted me at the door and said, "Alors, M. Chapman, vous vous mettez dans la gueule du loup!" ("Well, Mr. Chapman, you are putting yourself in the maw of the wolf!") He was persuaded that Washington viewed the Socialists as a dangerous threat, almost on par with the communists. I reassured him on that count, and we got on very well from the beginning.

Q: Were you in France at the time of the new ambassador, Van Galbraith.

CHAPMAN: Yes.

Q: Could you talk about him, he was after all, a fairly controversial man.

HAPMAN: Van Galbraith is something of a mystery to me because he spent five years in Paris, four years in London and one in New York, at senior levels of banking, a very sophisticated world. But he is an ideologue. He considers the Soviet Union, not only an enemy, but as the power that manipulates everything in the world. Everything in the world can be explained by Soviet activity and action. There has to be therefore an uncompromising confrontation with the Soviet Union everywhere. He spent four years as ambassador in Paris and I don't think that to this day he understands why anyone could possibly have voted Socialist much less communist in a country where half of the vote was to the left. So I never felt that he had a good grasp of the reality of France, of Europe, or indeed of the world. Otherwise, he was a perfectly nice fellow.

One aspect of Galbraith was interesting and challenging. He considered that, in the communication world of today, the role of an embassy was limited and its principal function should be to engage in public diplomacy. He really carried out this view of modern diplomacy. He was always available to all the media for interviews, participation in panels and reactions to events. This delighted the media, greatly irritated the government (at one point they considered asking for his recall), and left his staff with their eyes lifted to the skies. Finally, I do not think it was an effective approach: the French being a formal people did not appreciate this perceived intrusion into their internal affairs. And this was a reaction of both left and right, both socialists and conservatives..

Q: Was this a little bit like a hostile confrontation when he arrived?

CHAPMAN: No, he had chosen Jack Maresca who was Director of Western European Affairs to be his DCM, and I was delighted. I spent two months with Galbraith and then left.

RICHARD FENTON ROSS
Assistant Cultural Affairs Officer, USIS
Paris (1979-1984)

Mr. Ross was born in Virginia and educated at the University of Florida and Vanderbilt University. Joining the United States Information Agency (USIA) in 1964, he served several tours of duty at its Headquarters in Washington, DC as well as at a number of US Embassies abroad. Dealing primarily with Information and Cultural Affairs, Mr. Ross served in Beirut, Amman, Jerusalem, Calcutta, Colombo, Kabul, Rabat and Paris. Following his retirement in 1992, he accompanied his wife on her Foreign Service assignments in Sana'a and Damascus. Mr. Ross was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2003.

Q: You were there from '79 to '84, yes?

ROSS: Yes. But I went over to UNESCO (United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization) after three years there.

Q: Okay. Well, okay, '79 to early '80s.

ROSS: Yes. Anyway, it finally settled down that I would be university contacts and American Political Process; and I would do some editing and writing for a magazine, which we published, and handle all kinds of sociology professors and the political process, to a certain extent, because the elections were big. The French paid a great deal of attention to the American elections right from the get-go, as they would be right now, watching the Democratic party with its nine candidates or however many there are. There's a lot of French press, and they seem to know a lot, so I had my hands full. I'd operate a system of contacts, send them things, and then have two or three big, expensive seminars. We'd get French authorities from, say, "Sciences Po Institut d'Etudes Politiques" (that's the Institute of Political Science), and get them to talk, and get American scholars or people who were professors or people who did polling to come over and do presentations. Then we would have panel discussions to explain the American political process to the French, but also to let them kind of feel that they had a place to go and that they could take part in it.

Every Frenchman who's literate thinks that he has a vote in the presidential election of the United States, much more than we would imagine here sitting in America, and they follow it. They'll tell you what the strengths and weaknesses are of Ronald Reagan or something like that. I'd get caught off guard—they'd talk to me about Lyndon LaRouche or something, and I wouldn't know that much about it. They're a very thorough kind of people. I also had to do a lot of different political things, which opened my eyes up in my late 30s to things that I didn't know about, like international economics, or the Mont Pelerin Society, or Leo Strauss and the Chicago conservative school.

There were a lot of funny connections between France and America, and they all popped up because France was going conservative at the same time America was in the sense of their politics. I would take, [it seemed (to me)], kind of obscure Americans around, but the French would seem to know more about them than I did. This would mean having people go to outlying conferences at universities, say Grenoble or Lyon. But at the same time, I got to know a lot of people, and I got involved, again, in the arts world, which I seem to gravitate toward, as I mentioned. I had known people in different places and they popped back up.

I became very thick with a black American poet named Ted Joans, who's just passed away; and I got to know Charles Henri Ford, who's also just passed away at 94 [1913 – 2002, 89] years old, who I first met in Sri Lanka, a very important figure in American poetry who started a poetry magazine in the 1920s [Blues: a magazine of new rhythms], was involved in the surrealist movement in France in the '20s and '30s, then started View, which was important in New York in the '40s, and had always published, and had a place in Paris part time. I got friendly with him and other people like that. Paris has a whole cast of characters, thousands of Americans who more or less know each other. So life was very full.

We lived downtown. One Sunday night I went off to a famous Sunday night, you wouldn't call it a salon, it was in an at-home that a guy named Jim Haynes had in Paris.

He's an American who was teaching at University of Paris VIII (Vincennes), who had sponsored all kinds of artists and had written a book or two and knew everybody; and everybody showed up at his house, and he cooked spaghetti—one of these things. He lived in, literally, an artist's studio with glass lights facing north.

I was coming back around 11:30 at night; and Mom—that is, to say Jane and the boys—we were downtown then in “Saint Germain des Pres,” a block from the church. I came up out of the Métro, and this is right where the “Deux Magots” [Café des Deux Magots] is.

“Brasserie Lipp” is across the street, “Cazes Lipp” as they say. There was this tremendous KA-BOOM! I thought, “That is not a car back firing. That is an explosion!” So people ran out into the street—it was summerish I think—and looked down the street, and some people started running down the street. I started running too, and I then turned down “rue des Saints-Pères” and then ran along a little street toward our house, and I saw smoke coming out from the building! (It was a five-story building from about 1890) I thought, “Oh, God! They got us!” because by this time we’d been in the revolution, I’d been in a couple of dustups, I’d actually been in a dustup in Cambodia—but that’s another story, where I was shot at from both sides of the bridge and everything. So I ran around and ran into the front door, and there was broken glass everywhere, and there was this car that was on fire. Our car was parked up the street on the curb.

By this time things had gotten so bad in Paris that a friend of ours who’s a military attaché got shot; the DCM had gotten shot at with the same gun they found out later; Israelis from their embassy had been killed; and there had been different kinds of threats; and somebody from the police had their feet and legs blown off trying to disarm a package that fell off a car that was at the economic officer’s house, Rod’s house—a package fell off when they drove away to the airport, and then the police went to disarm it, and it blew up and actually killed one guy; he died in the hospital later; it made him what they call a basket case kind of thing. So I ran, and I thought, “Oh, my God!” I felt my hair standing on end. I’ve never felt that before. The electricity worked, and I did the code and got in the door and ran up the steps and banged on the door, and Jane opened it. I said, “You’re alive! Oh, my God! How are the boys?” She said, “You’re alive!” I said, “I thought it was our apartment!” She said, “I thought it was our car!” because our car was all messed up.

There were people running up and down the street and below us was the “commissariat de police” (local police station), which they only open during weekday hours; it was like a little branch police office, “su commissariat.” Somebody had put a bomb in the door and blown in the police station and blown up the car, and it cracked the building, and it blew all the glass out of all the windows. We closed the metal grates which they have in Paris, to kind of make it darker in the kids’ room (they slept in the same room). Glass blew all across the floor, but it didn’t cut them because of the way the blast came. Jane had just gotten into bed, and she said she was halfway asleep and saw a white thing in front of her eyes. You know it’s funny how you can. The whole room lit up. We stayed up all night; we stayed there, and nothing much happened. It just caused a tremendous hassle to get everything all organized; then you had to do more security.

We didn’t have CD (diplomatic corps) plates after that; we had regular Paris plates they called “banalisé” (unmarked), which was wonderful because we could get any amount of tickets [laughter]! When you had CD plates, they didn’t give you tickets; Paris is famous for the parking ticket problem. So you didn’t get parking tickets if you had CD plates. You could get your car towed away if it was in the wrong place, but they wouldn’t give you a ticket; the French were pretty good about that. But as soon as we got civilian plates again, regular plates, everybody got tickets again, which nobody paid, of course.

Q: Who set off the bomb?

ROSS: It was supposedly Corsicans, a Radundi Cassio, to get back at the police for accidentally killing a 16-year-old girl in a dope bust. This was the story, that it was not against the American embassy or against us, but we didn’t know it at the time. That was the conventional wisdom on it.

Q: Dick, a question I'd like to ask you—from your perspective, during the time when you were there, '79 to '82ish or something like that, how did you find the intellectual community at the university level, which was a different level than the commentators?

ROSS: Yes.

Q: How did they view the United States? I mean was there sort of a—

ROSS: The students themselves?

Q: No, well, I'm thinking about the professors—

ROSS: Right.

Q: ...and then the students.

ROSS: Actually, both those different elements really found the United States absorbent, particularly the culture of New York City, the culture of the West, you know written big what they call “cou-for-boy” (cowboy) and the culture of films. I didn't run across too many people who disparaged or just dismissed out of hand the United States. They would, of course, tell you how you made your mistakes in Vietnam and what you should have done, and they would tell you what you were doing wrong, but they didn't do it with any animus. Almost everybody, the French that I met, liked the United States. They perceived it as having flaws, which they understood being French. That's partly I think, the French attitude toward things. “Oh, but of course we know, you see, the problem here is this. Now once that is done, then it'll be this way.”

Q: Yes.

ROSS: But there was not any on the streets or Marxist Leftist rage against the United States. That kind of '60s revolution of social mores and ideas, which may or may not have stuck in the United States, had gone over to Europe and to France later. If there was one kind of young influence which people did do, it was a newspaper period called Le Bien [Public] or Liberation which was wonderful in the sense it was full of ideas. It wasn't dumbed down, but it was different than Le Monde, which is very dreadfully serious, kind of the way the Financial Times is serious. The Liberation was sprightly, and Le Figaro was sprightly. The body politic in France was going to the Right.

These people accepted the United States. France had enough of its own problems with Africa that they didn't see too much of us to attack whatever we were doing. They kind of raised their eyes and moaned when Reagan was elected, but then they accepted it in the sense of, well now, this is something...we're realists, real “politique” (politics).

If there was one problem that I think had affected the French, it was this kind of a nuclear...what is it...that nuclear bomb that radiates everybody?

Q: Oh yes...a neutron bomb.

ROSS: Right. In Jimmy Carter's time we had tried to sell that and get it positioned in Europe, I believe.

Q: Yes.

ROSS: They were very much against the neutron bomb, and they were very much for "rapprochement" (connecting or bringing together) with the Russians.

Q: Yes.

ROSS: They weren't prepared to take on communism the way we had announced, sounded the alarm for all that, earlier. Polls showed that if the Russians rolled their tanks across the Fulda Gap and into Europe along through the north and so forth, that the French would accept it. I mean if there was some kind of a big World War II ½ or something, they didn't believe in going out and dying for all this because I guess they saw that Soviet socialism was on the way down.

Now what was also starting to come up was the Right of Jean-Marie Le Pen. I went by accident. I took a pouch run, which you could do—you went and signed up and took the pouch run. They gave you a first class pass on the French Railway, and you ran the pouches down to Marseilles, places like that. That was a wonderful deal that no longer exists, I'm sure. Anyway, I was in Nice, and I walked into this great, big, circus-tent thing where people are saying, "Come on in! Come on in!" and handing out flyers for it. I didn't know what it was. It was like 5,000 or 7,000 people, and they were very well dressed. It was one of the first of the bigger rallies because the movement of Le Pen came to a certain extent out of the south of France because of the North African immigration.

Q: Yes, it's still his center of power.

ROSS: Yes, and I went back...this is a good one...I wrote up a little, like two- or three-paragraph report and took it to John Garner and said, "I could make this bigger, because I saw a lot of this, what was going on down there. He said, "Don't get involved in all that!" [Laughter] So I knew the guy over at the embassy who was the French-watcher.

Q: Yes.

ROSS: The deputy political officer for internal affairs is what he was called, and I went and told him. So I said, "Can I talk to you?" I went over and called a meeting with him, and he said, "Oh, we know all about that. That's not important. There's no point in that. I know about that, and I'm not even gonna write a report on it." And I thought, "Oh, okay. Well, maybe he's right!" [Laughter]

When I was first started in Paris, they said, "You'll be in charge of American Political Processes. That'll be good for you." So American elections were coming up. So what do you do? Well, conceive up all these programs and figure out how much it'll cost, and we'll figure out what the budget can be, and find out what's been done, and what are you gonna publish, and who are you gonna get in contact with, and so on. It's like being a producer; I had to learn a lot of these things as I went along.

So I found out that [for] the previous election somebody had gotten hold of an elephant, and somebody had gotten hold of a donkey, and they'd had a big party. But meanwhile I was being approached by French promoters, who were saying, "We can put ze very large telescreen in de middle of the Champs Elysees, and we can do zis, and you rent the big ballroom at the 5,000-room hotel, and you do this, and do that;" and then the political Right and Left of France wanted to attach themselves. So there was this burgeoning interest. It seemed like it was getting bigger every day that I was there because there'd be more kinds of things than it'd be possible to do or conceivable.

So I was telling Lois, and she said, "Now, next thing, Dick, go over to the embassy and have a meeting with people over there to explain what you...and draw down on their ideas." Warren Zimmermann was political officer. So I went over there.

In those days the embassy had very fine, little paneled offices. They had little fireplaces with grates in them, and you could get wood, and have a wood-burning fireplace in your office in the American embassy in Paris—not everybody, to be sure, had this prerequisite. I went in, and First Secretary Zimmermann had his fire going, and he had his feet up on the grate or something like this, and he said, "Well, what do you intend to do? Why did you come see me?" So I [said], "I'm new here, and in fact, I don't speak French very well, and I don't know anybody, and you're here, and I understand that you may have been here before, and well, I need your advice." "Of course. I'd be glad to help you." So I said, "Well, it's been suggested that I organize certain events that have to do with the American election." [With a sudden interested tone of voice] "Events with the American election? Well, why here?" I said, "Well, the French are interested in this, and I'm the American Political Processes person. That's one of the three or four things we have in the country plan, and I've been assigned it, sir." "Well, why do you want to do it here? What do you want to do?" Of course I didn't know what, so I sort of fished around and said, "Well, I understand the last time they had a big event the night of the election, and they had an elephant and a donkey, you know, were brought in from the circus or something like that, and..." "What! What else would you do? An elephant and a donkey?" And I said, "Well, yes. People say—of course I'm new here—that the French have a lively interest, and I thought I'd have a couple of big conferences, one at the conference hall." That was the same hall that they had uptown in the 16th [arrondissement], where they had the Vietnam peace talks—

Q: Yes.

ROSS: ... in International Center (International Conference Center, "Centre De Conferences Internationales"), if you will. And so he's, "There? What? What would you do?" I said, "I'd rent it, and we'd have lots of people from the universities. Paris has sixteen universities and from, you know, important regional universities, and we'll have a luncheon, and we'll do...we'll bring in people from the United States." "Well, why do you want to do that?" I said, "Well, you know, this is..." I said, "The ambassador would like to know about these things too." "Oh! No! The ambassador? I don't think any of this is a good idea, Mr. Ross." He was about like five years older than me. He said, "No, the ambassador's not interested in this! This, this, this would be all wrong. You know, we're the embassy! We're neutral in these things! Don't you understand that?"

So I went off and went back to Lois Roth and didn't know what to tell her. I said, "You know, this is...I must have made a terrible bad impression or something!" Well, of course, I found out later that Ambassador Hartman had had one appointment to the Soviet Union by a Democratic president and another appointment to Paris by...or the other way around.

Q: Yes.

ROSS: So he had one foot in the Democratic sphere and one foot in the Republican sphere. It's unusual to get big posts from different presidents of different political parties, and he was also very close to Kissinger and people like that, and that was the walking on marble chips business—that's a mixing of metaphor.

Anyway, I did have quite a good thing with the political process, and I did do a lot of writing. I wrote nearly a whole pamphlet, which I don't even have a copy of, which explained the whole thing, and I was explaining down to the county levels and the municipal judges and all this stuff and trying to make it all clear, and of course, draft in French. Some people would say, "Well, why do you...you mean they do that in the United States?" I mean it was useful.

I also wrote on art and other stuff; we did layout and did photographs, did editing too.

Q: Did you ever run across or deal or observe sort of the French intellectual establishment, which is sort of the commentators, the chattering class, but they're extremely important in France? I mean they would be different than the university level, wouldn't they?

ROSS: Oh, yes! I did get to know some of them. I became friends with a guy named Jean Marie Benoit, who was kind of a guardian of the principals of the Right, of the conservative, in France. He lived near me, and I found him extremely good in English, and actually, I felt more at home trying to speak to him in French than I did other people because he was an attractive personality. He'd written books on the necessity of defending the conservative position.

Once Reagan was elected, a certain number of people got on the A-list to come over to France. Among them were [Norman] Podhoretz and Midge Decter. Podhoretz, he's a forceful personality, and she is too, and they seemed to know about Benoit. Anyway, they came over, and it was my job to take them around because I was in American Political Process. Of course everybody else in USIS was a little bit liberal. [laughter] They said, "Nobody wanted to really have drinks for Podhoretz," or something like that. Well, I went and did these kinds of things and took them to a restaurant with a conservative group of people—not the Jean-Marie Le Pen crowd, but a different crowd—and they were nice.

I had Tony Dolan [Anthony Dolan], who was Reagan's principal speechwriter, come over and then took him all around. A lot of Americans who were conservative, bankers too—that is to say, economic bankers' speakers—really can't speak much French, so they'd kind of rely on you, they'd kind of hang on you to help them along.

Benoit very good. I got to know Dominique d'Ambra quite well. He wrote in the Herald Trib [Herald Tribune]. Then I got to know his boss who had started the Institute for International Affairs in France, and I also got to know commentators, Americans who had ideas about France who would come there.

NYU (New York University) has a particularly good relationship with Paris—it's as if it felt like it owned the intellectual establishment there. Anyway, I knew Serge Hurtig, who was the director of Sciences Po, very well because we did a bunch of programs together with him; and I knew people at the institute which was down the street from us, the College de France [Institut de France], and some of them were very senior guys who'd written a whole bunch of books. I knew people at [Université] Paris VI [now IV], the Sorbonne, who had studied America and were the lecturers on it. I got to know a lot of people who perceived that they needed me because I could get them information or stuff like that, but also at the same time I found very interesting because they knew so much about the United States. When I left, George Shedan gave me a beautiful book with a very special binding up of the poems of Rimbaud.

So I did that kind of stuff, and I did some film shows, and I got to know enough people that when the time came down...you see, when I first went there, it was supposed to be a full-year assignment. Then they had a hotshot, young, career supervisor come through Paris, and he had to talk to everybody, and he said, "Well now, how long are you here for?" I said, "Well, I'm gonna stay all four years." "Oh, it's not a four-year assignment!" I said, "It isn't? They told me it was!" He said, "No! No! This is a three-year assignment. All European assignments are now three years. Didn't you know that?" I said, "Well, no, I didn't." He said, "I'm gonna check on that," like, "Be prepared not to stay."

ANNE O. CARY
Trade Policy Officer
Paris (1980-1983)

Anne O. Cary was born in September 1952 in Washington, DC. She received a bachelor's degree in international economics from the University of Wisconsin at Madison in 1973 and entered the Foreign Service in 1974. Ms. Cary's career included positions in Belgium, Haiti, Ethiopia, India, and Morocco. This interview was conducted by Charles Stuart Kennedy on November 30, 1995.

Q: You were in Paris from when to when?

CARY: From 1980-83.

Q: And what was your job?

CARY: I was trade policy officer in the econ section, it was called general economic policy. My portfolios were strategic trade (keep electronic and computer communications equipment away from the Soviets and the other proscribed destinations). This was a problem because the French did not take the same approach even though they were members of COCOM and should not be shipping things, but the French shipped things. So we had an awful lot of back and forth with them on that. I also did French relations with Eastern Europe. Again, this was an area where the French had a lot of trade with Eastern Europe and we didn't. We just wanted to keep tabs on what they were doing and what types of agreements they were signing because we felt some aspects of the exchanges were not in our best interests. On technical assistance the French were providing information that was not kosher.

Q: During this 1980-83 period, who were your ambassadors?

CARY: Art Hartman was ambassador when I arrived. He was a delightful person to work with. And then Evan Galbraith.

Q: You might talk a little bit about Hartman and then about Galbraith.

CARY: Hartman was just as professional as you could be. He was a delight to work for. It was a huge mission but you felt that he knew who you were and cared. I didn't have very many opportunities to work with him directly.

Once or twice I would go down and fill in the front office for a staff assistant. He had a very, very busy schedule with lots of meetings. The residence was just gorgeous. Everybody was sad to see him leave, but he went on to Moscow.

He was replaced by Evan Galbraith who was an investment banker and a very different sort of a person. He was very pleasant but gave the impression he saw it as an we vs them situation, and he meant the Foreign Service not the French as the them, the Foreign Service were not necessarily his friends. There were a couple of issues such as the Soviet gas pipeline with the embargo imposed following the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan.

Q: This was very early in the Reagan Administration which came from the right wing of the Republican Party and the Soviets had invaded Afghanistan and was a very confrontational time with the Soviet Union.

CARY: One of the major policy decisions by the US was to deny all equipment that would go to the Soviet natural gas pipeline that was being built, a huge 2 meter pipeline. A certain amount of the equipment was US or US licensed. Some US companies took big hits on that. The French would not honor the US requirement not to sell US licensed equipment. We had some GE turbines that were manufactured in France under US license. It became a big issue with the French. I can remember Bob Gelbard was in the Treasury office at the Embassy. He was sent to the port because as soon as the GE turbines were loaded they were informed that would break the embargo because the French were going to ship them on to the Soviets. There was an awful lot of back and forth about how to deal with the French on this issue. Galbraith was very critical publicly about the French actions, which in most people's opinion is rarely the way to get results from the French, to criticize them publicly. He, against advice, did it on French television. There was a feeling that his manner of dealing with the French was very, now you would say “in your face.” Well, he wasn’t quite that aggressive but there was no question that he was publicly criticizing his hosts and the French got all indigent and woofy about it. There was a feeling in the embassy that he did not listen to advisers very much, and had he the situation would have turned out better.

Q: Who was the economic minister at the time?

CARY: Mike Ely at the time and he was just great to work with.

Q: Yes, I interviewed him. Did you have much dealing with French officialdom?

CARY: Yes. They were not very warm. In fact, I remember one lunch I was dealing with a counterpart, a one on one lunch, and it was one of my days when French was just not coming at all and was struggling and finally at the end of the meal, he lets me know he spent eight years in India as a child growing up. I said, “You let me struggle with my French. You could have at least switched to English once or twice.” He said, “Oh, but I speak with an Indian accent.” So, it was better for me to struggle with my French than for him to switch into English because he didn’t like his accent in English.

They were very bright people. At that time one of my friends was going to ENA, the Ecole Nationale d’Administration, {every year one Foreign Service officer spends a year at ENA and then works at the embassy} . In 1980-81 it was Dean Curran and I got to know a lot of French who were going to ENA. They were just bright, bright people, and yet just not very personable.

Jean Claude Paye was the director of the economic bureau at the Quai d’Orsay. I would go with Mike Ely for most of his calls, particularly on this tech transfer problems that we had. Paye was just a brilliant person but he would lie through his teeth. He had no problem at all. He must have known that we knew he was lying. But he was just as cool as he could be. I found that there was a big difference between French diplomats in Paris and French diplomats outside of Paris. I found they tended to be a lot easier to deal with outside of Paris. It was very compartmentalized. You did your business and left, there was very little chit chat.

Q: But, this is also the atmosphere of the office too? So, it was not directed towards you as much as this is the way its done?

CARY: Well, at that point my husband, we got married in France, was working for a French company and it is exactly like that. Nobody knew anybody’s first name. We were invited to a couple of people’s houses but most people in the office had never been to anybody else’s house. It is a much more formal and distant way of doing things. I always think of their kids -- they put them in play clothes that have to be dried cleaned! You just have to wonder about it.

Q: Was the pipeline thing resolved at all?

CARY: Well, the French went ahead and broke the law. Dresser and GE were fined and lost contracts. Afterwards, one of the things I spent a lot of time on was the fact that the French wanted to sell telecom switching technology to the Soviets and we said absolutely no way. I learned a lot about switching, more than I thought I ever would about technology and digital switches and how much information could be sent. Again this was one of those instances where the French would say one thing and do another.

Q: Was it business at any cost or in your face?

CARY: Business at any cost. This was French technology, it was good and they disagreed with our...this was also the time when Richard Perle was involved in a lot of these negotiations as well. Richard Perle was Assistant Secretary of Defense for Research and Technology. This was the sonabouy story where DOD took the little chips out of a Speak and Spell, a kid's toy, and said the Soviet's could use these for sophisticated military applications.

Q: Richard Perle was the par excellence, called the dark prince because he came out of the very extreme anti-Soviet side. He was an assistant to Scoop Jackson who had been a senator from Washington and there was no accommodation, he took no prisoners.

CARY: Right. He really was "don't sell them the shoelaces." The French felt very much that we had gone overboard with the technology issue. I can remember making a demarche requesting the French not to sell spare parts for C-130s to Libya. In a very unkind way, my contact at the Directory for External Economic Relations said, "If you let the Libyans get the plane how do you expect us to keep them from getting spare parts?" We had a lot of differences with the French about what they could sell and to whom. They thought we were ridiculous about this. But, they also, in my opinion, went ahead and sold things deliberately that they knew really were of strategic use and they didn't care. Money was more important, the deal was more important.

Q: Iran and Iraq were at war part of this time, did selling to them come up?

CARY: Yes, but I didn't get too much involved in that one because it was munitions and we had the military side on that. But, yes, we had definite differences. The relationship between the French government and US government was one of very hard feelings. We were more interested in what French intelligence was up to than we were in Soviet intelligence in terms of what was going on at the time.

Q: We were concerned about French intelligence trying to get at the equivalence of trade secrets?

CARY: Yes. There was no question about it, it was going on. That was an issue. After the fall of the Soviet Union, the question in the US came up as to whether the CIA should be doing more economic espionage. I kept thinking back at how negatively we reacted to the French using their intelligence purely for commercial reasons.

Q: Well this sort of long term alliance with the French has not been an easy one has it? It seems to be a special relationship with the accent on the negative side.

CARY: Yes, very much so. The French, I always feel, have a complex. They really do believe they are superior to virtually anybody else but they just can't find the proof and it drives them nuts because they really do believe that everything has to fall into A, B, and C.

Q: I have always thought about these magnificent schools that you are talking about, the ENA and others, which were mostly set up during the Napoleonic time, and France has been diminished in power ever since Napoleon. I am not sure if there is a one, two, three relationship or not.

CARY: It was also interesting, the role of the private persona and the public persona. When we were there Giscard had lost the election, which the embassy did not call at all and everybody said, "We didn't call it because everybody spent all their time in Paris. Anybody who had gotten outside of Paris would have known that the country was ready for a change." There was mud on everybody's face on that one.

But there was never a word in the newspaper or in the media about how many of the female ministers Mitterrand had appointed were supposed to be former mistresses. That was all just understood and had nothing to do with anything else. People's personal lives were people's personal lives and had no role any place else.

France hosted the G-7 economic summit in 1982. President Reagan came. This was at Versailles. As a control officer I got to know my way around Versailles and the back rooms of Versailles. It was really pretty amazing. I was just astonished about Reagan and the way his staff protected him. He was late for a meeting with Mitterrand, he was sleeping and nobody would wake him up. I thought, "How could you do that?" But they did. And, nobody was going to apologize, he needed his sleep. He came two days early so he wouldn't have jet lag.

Q: Mitterrand was the longest term serving president, and just recently died. We didn't call the election of Mitterrand, but was this going to make things worse for the embassy?

CARY: It was not what we wanted. Mitterrand's stance on a number of political issues was directly opposed to where the US wanted to go. In the months after Mitterrand was elected, people just fled with money, baskets full of money and gold left the country. Among the upper class of France there was this feeling that under Mitterrand things were just not going to work out and they had to get their money out. And politically, he was not interested in making any accommodation whatsoever to the US point of view.

Q: In dealing with the French was there much informal mingling afterwards?

CARY: No. You got to know friends other ways. The people we saw socially were generally formed through non work contacts. Friends who we knew living there, some old Peace Corps people who had married French people and now were living in Paris. There was a group like that that we got to know. Or French diplomats that we had known in other posts and were then posted back to Paris, you would see them socially. A friend of my father readily included me into the family gatherings things like a traditional epiphany dinner, where the person who finds the almond in the cake is crowned. It was very nice to be included in such things and it gave an idea how people live at home which many people at the embassy didn't see, I think.

Q: Looking at the French social structure, one always hears of the importance of the intellectual class, the intellectuals. In no other country can I think of where somebody calls himself an intellectual and gets away with it, certainly not in the American sense. Did you find that the intellectual class, or whatever you want to call it, was important?

CARY: Ah! Amazingly so. We got to know some people from a couple of the think tanks...this was when a couple of the French graduate schools were starting to get into management.

Q: Like the Harvard Business School.

CARY: Right.

Q: Well this was the American challenge wasn't it?

CARY: Yes, "Le Défi Americaine" by Jean-Jacques Servan-Shriver. At dinner parties you were always talking about ideas and concepts and there was real debate, it was give and take, with people thinking, which is an exciting thing to do. People weren't just economist, only being able to talk about the economy. They could talk about the opera, some kind of butterfly, or whatever. The intellectual was a much more rounded individual. People were clearly identified as intellectuals and comfortable being called that.

I would say there was more excitement about intellectual activity and food. I have never seen people feel so strongly about food. I mean, the Belgians care about food, but they care about quantity. It has to be good but there has to be lots of it. The French didn't care so much about quantity but it had to be exquisite and just right. You would spend time talking about ideas but always spent time about the food, this meal and the next meal and the last meal.

Q: Was there intermingling between the industrial or business class and the intellectual class?

CARY: No, not much. We made a couple of trips with congressional people when we were trying to see the GE jet engine, a quieter engine. We went out to SNECMA, which a French government company. In all major industry at that point there was significant government control. So at the top levels you might have engineers, economists and administrators a mixture from the grandes écoles and other universities. Further down the line class lines were pretty rigid. If you didn't go to college you were limited. At the work site you just did your job. Husband John was sent out to Syria to work for a French construction company that was building an oil pipeline. He described very little mixing on the site between "management" and workers. They ate meals together, but that was it.

Q: This intellectual give and take and sort of making your points in a way is somewhat alien to us. At least our skills aren't as honed as the French who have been doing this all of the time. Did you find that this was a problem?

CARY: The problem I found was that you could not be an individual. I could not turn around and say, "Yes, I think US policy on this, that and the other thing, was wrong" in the course of the conversation and then go back and say, "But this is US policy." People didn't buy that. You weren't allowed to concede one thing and then go back to the original statement. We can generally draw a line between this is my job and I am presenting the US point of view. And we did have some dumb things to present.

Q: And early Reagan was a very difficult time a lot of us. He was going through a long learning curve, let's say.

CARY: Right. I can remember presenting demarches where you just sort of put them down and then talked about something else, obviously totally undercutting the demarche, but you had to deliver it. There were difficult times when you were trying to develop relationships with people, and yet you were sort of stuck because you couldn't cross the line. To cross the line from being a bureaucrat and a diplomat you crossed the line of friendship. After using the familiar form "tu" you can't go back to vousvoyer. And, yet, we do it all of the time. It doesn't work with the French and I had a hard time with that. So, I ended up not talking to people I worked with other than the official line.

Q: Was Galbraith still there when you left?

CARY: Yes.

Q: Because he left and had been asked to leave the embassy.

CARY: Yes. We also at that time had some terrorist incidents. One of the military attachés was murdered. There was a bomb put under the commercial counselor's car and two French bomb experts were killed trying to detonate it. The Chargé, Chris Chapman, was shot at at about 30 feet but missed. This was all within less than 6 months. So we were down on hands and knees looking under the car for bombs every morning, and we got...this was so typical...the French would let us get regular plates but wouldn't give us the regular macaron, the little sticker that said you paid your tax, so you got stopped all the time. It finally took action at the highest levels to get the French Treasury to agree to issue to us the little stickers so we could have regular plates and not be stopped all the time.

Q: The idea of having regular plates being so you wouldn't have conspicuous diplomat plates.

CARY: Yes, and the diplomatic plates all started with a specific number for each embassy - I think the US was 6 CD, so there was no question who were the Americans.

Q: Who was bombing and who was shooting?

CARY: Arabs. They never found anybody. But the person who shot at Chris Chapman was dark and appeared to be of Arab extraction. At the time there was a lot going on. There was a Jewish delicatessen that was machine gunned one Sunday morning. There was a lot of anti-Israel and anti-US activity. One poor guy, an American who lived in the Netherlands, inadvertently parked his car near the Israeli embassy and the French police blew it up. The degree of terrorism, that was one of the issues that we had a lot of problems with the French on. There was a strong belief at the time that the French had cut a deal with a number of terrorist groups... basically you leave the French alone and we will leave you alone. Not only were the Iranians living there but everybody from all over. It was felt that a lot of people's lives were at risk because France let the terrorists live there. That did change later, but there was a lot of bitterness.

Q: Well, you had really two governments. You had the Reagan administration and you Mitterrand government, both of which moved up and eventually came to coincide but again one was coming from the right and one was coming from the left and as always happens the early times of the administration and the later times of the administration, really they both come towards the center.

CARY: Right. It was funny, had it been any place but Paris, they would have sent the dependents out. But you couldn't do that. You couldn't say you were sending people out of Paris because of the high level of danger, that just doesn't work.

Yes, it was an interesting time.

MICHAEL E. C. ELY
Economic Minister
Paris (1980-1984)

Michael E. C. Ely was born in Washington, DC on August 26, 1929. He received a bachelor's degree in international affairs from Princeton University in 1952 and a master's degree in public affairs from Harvard University. Following his studies at Princeton, Mr. Ely served in the U.S. military for nearly two years. He entered the Foreign Service in 1955. His career included positions in Kuala Lumpur, Algiers, Mogadishu, Rome, Tokyo and Brussels. Mr. Ely was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1992.

Q: So you went to Paris, where you served as an economic minister from 1980 to '84. Arthur Hartman was the ambassador most of the time?

ELY: He was, for the first year, and then left. Ambassador Hartman was a superb ambassador. He loved the work. An authentic intellectual, with very broad interests. Good humored, approachable, quite effective with the French. He stayed there less than a year, in fact; I got there, there was the election, the change of administration, and Hartman left.

And then we got Evan Galbraith, a banker who had served in Paris before and was a friend of Bill Buckley. He had run the Goldwater campaign in Europe in 1964. He was a member of the right wing of the Republican Party. I'm a Democrat, and my instincts are entirely in that direction. And there was some question about whether Galbraith was going to be able to work with the embassy team. Actually, it worked out fine. I found Evan Galbraith to be an excellent ambassador in many respects. He was good humored, energetic, spoke pretty good French (not as good as he thought or other people thought), nice wife (strange but nice), good about receiving people.

He had, however, an aspect to him that was very difficult; and that is, he would occasionally kick in as a kind of Buckleyite, hard-right, second kitchen Cabinet. He had ambitions for moving to at least Under Secretary for Economic Affairs, or maybe deputy secretary of the treasury, and he was trying to show off his conservative credentials in Paris.

One day I was out of town for the day and came back and found that he'd called a press conference to essentially talk about the virtues of Reaganomics and the evils of Socialism. I would have opposed any such press conference in Paris.

He enjoyed teasing the Socialists. This was after Mitterrand came in '81.

Q: Mitterrand, who was a Socialist; it was a Socialist government.

ELY: They were very edgy, and Galbraith loved tweaking and teasing them. They didn't like that at all; they did not have a sense of humor about being Socialists. He also made right-wing speeches, which pleased the opposition very much, and people would come up to him on the street and say what a great job he was doing.

He thought that was wonderful, but I thought it was terrible, because the Socialists basically cut him out of the loop and would have nothing to do with him. The Quai d'Orsay twice called him in for making speeches about the Communists. The reproof was mild, but nonetheless, the Quai called him in and reproved him. It went over him like water off a duck; he never realized that what was happening to him was a formal rebuff. He took it in a William Buckley, happy Boy Scout way, which I found quite attractive in some respects. They weren't getting through to him. He was thinking of running for governor of New York, which goes to show you what he really had in mind.

Q: When you're at an embassy and, obviously, you have to deal with the French bureaucracy, and you have an ambassador who has, you might say, a different agenda that is cutting him out of the loop, what does this do to you all?

ELY: Well, it put me under pressure. I had three difficult issues that I was handling.

One was technology transfer, where the previous Giscard regime had been very aggressive in selling advanced French technology around the circuit. The Department of Defense was very worried, and Richard Cooper was trying to do something about this. Eventually, the Socialists came around because they discovered a very large Soviet spy ring stealing technology from France. They recognized, yes, we Americans had had some points. And they cleaned those guys out and worked with us more closely. That happened just as I left.

The second item was the miserable business of embargoing the compressors for the Soviet gas pipeline. Where Galbraith thought that was great, we were really on very poor ground. There was no agreement that France should not buy Soviet gas. There was no agreement that the Soviets would use gas supplies as a tool to extract concessions when they maneuvered the West into a position of dependence. Gas compressor technology of the '50s was not classified. The only reason that we had any control over it was the fact that General Electric had to report sales of this stuff under the Export Control Act. Once a week, I'd go in and bang heads with Jean-Claude Paye, the Director of Economic and Financial Affairs, who's now the secretary general of the OECD. He handled it extremely well; he could have been destructive. He put enough pressure on so his message got through to Washington, through me, very clearly, without exciting the hard-liners by belittling them or seizing the moral high ground too consistently.

Q: Well, also, on something like this, here you have a policy issue which was, at the time, at a very high level in the Reagan administration: "We're going to stop the Soviets in this perfidious exploitation, going into selling gas to the West. We can put a stop to this." And the French never take kindly to this type of thing anyway. And you were the principal messenger back and forth.

ELY: You better believe it.

Q: Did you find yourself consciously toning things down?

ELY: No, no. This, of course, is always the dilemma. When you see the situation rather differently than Washington, and you receive instructions that tell you to go in and punch 'em in the snoot, you go in and punch 'em in the snoot, because you're not conveying your views, you're conveying Washington's views. And then if you want to, sometime later, over a drink, talk the thing over, that's different. But you follow your instructions. You're not doing your counterparts a favor if you, by winks and nods, dilute the content of the hard line that you're instructed to convey.

Q: Okay. Well, look, we'll stop at this point, and then we'll come back again.

ELY: I've got one more issue to cover, the nationalization of American companies, which was also difficult.

Q: Today is March 10, 1993, a continuing interview with Mike Ely. Mike, we were just finishing up your time in France. You mentioned at the very tag end that you wanted to talk about nationalization. What issue was that?

ELY: Yes, well, the Socialists came in in 1981. They had an extensive program of, as one of them put it quaintly, "storming the commanding heights of the economy," which included a series of nationalizations. The companies on their list included several American subsidiaries. One, a subsidiary of ITT, was an electronics firm that worked entirely for the government. Another was a subsidiary of Honeywell.

Q: Honeywell being a computer electronics firm.

ELY: That's right. It was the Honeywell-Bull joint venture.

Q: Bull being their major computer-type firm.

ELY: Yes, it was quite interesting. Honeywell had gone into the joint venture with Bull not many years before, and had suggested that while the joint venture was being put together by the lawyers, they put in something about what might happen should the French government ever decide to nationalize the venture.

The French said, "Oh, we'd never do that."

Honeywell said, "Of course, we understand you never would, but just to give the lawyers something to do..."

So they had an ironclad nationalization agreement, where the book value of the proceeds was automatically put into Treasury bills (which meant more interest for Honeywell) as soon as nationalization happened. Then they negotiated a settlement. And, indeed, that worked out well. Honeywell continued to represent Bull in the United States and sold computers, through Bull, in France. Honeywell was being treated better than IBM had ever been treated under the Giscard government, because it was playing the game.

ITT was quite another case. It had a sick French company. It had it on government contract. Rand Araskog and his people came in. They had a valuation, made by Merrill Lynch, I believe, that said the company was worth something like $30 million. The French had another valuation, that the company was worth virtually nothing. The Socialists appointed a representative, kind of a mediator. He turned out to be a very flaky guy, who never showed up and didn't wear neckties, quite unpredictable. The ITT people were clearly concerned. They were holding out for their $27 million. They asked for embassy intervention. We declined to intervene into the substance of the issue, but said that we would stress to the French authorities the need for prompt, effective settlement, in accordance with our instructions on nationalizations. The Socialists didn't like being told by us that they were supposed to give prompt and effective settlement. They listened but with gritted teeth. Meanwhile, the negotiations went on and on. Finally (I won't string it out), the Socialists made an offer, which ITT accepted. Later, I found the ITT negotiators were chortling up their sleeves, that they thought they weren't going to get anything and that the company wasn't worth anything. This led me to some inner soul-searching about the ethics of the whole situation. It left me with a bad taste in my mouth, and I admired neither side. But, anyhow, we got over that particular hurdle.

The worst one (and I think I covered it in our last discussion) was the gas pipeline episode.

Q: Yes, you did talk about the gas pipeline.

ELY: That was difficult. And also the technology transfer talks. Then the persistent disputes over agriculture, which were a running theme.

Q: Including today, 1993, in today's paper, they're still talking about it.

ELY: That's right. The Community reformed the Common Agricultural Policy (CAP) in 1984, to make it less expensive, produce smaller amounts of unwanted surplus commodities that have to be disposed of by subsidies of destruction.

I was talking to the then-director of foreign economic policy at the Ministry of Foreign Trade. He is now the French executive director at the IMF, incidentally, an inspecteur des finances, an intelligent, well-informed young man, who spoke excellent English, although we did business in French. He was saying that this package was so good, that the Community had done so much for its trading partners, that they owed... the Community a debt. The EC should get trade concessions in response to this reform. This was the one serious dispute that he and I had. We were good friends and tried to resolve things in a friendly way, but I told him that our technicians, who I thought were very good, said that that reform wasn't worth anything. It was the third in a row. About every five years the CAP would threaten to collapse under its own weight, so the EC would try to fix it. And they didn't. I said, you know, we think there's going to be another one down the road in about five years. It was six; we were off by one year. Which the French, of course, resisted seriously.

The French have allowed their farmers, in part because of sympathy, in part because of political considerations, in part because of, I think, the lack of forward thinking, to have an inordinate political influence, which the farmers proceed to exercise selfishly on their own behalf. I mean, the French seem prepared to throw out the Uruguay round because the farmers, in some inchoate way, say, "Well, gee, you know, we can't accept a lot of this stuff that's going on, including the reforms of the Common Agricultural Policy, the soybean judgments against the Community in the GATT."

Who are the French farmers to say that they can't go along? The Common Agricultural Policy has enriched them. It is now enriching them less. And this is in response to world market forces (the way that the CAP was set up to begin with, anyhow). Their answer is, "Well, don't bother us with the facts. We just want money."

Q: Were the French farmers a force at that time as much as they are now?

ELY: Yes.

Q: Did we make any effort to try to look at the French farmer and figure out what can be done about them? Was this something that was high on your agenda as far as a concern?

ELY: We tried to understand the French farm movement. And we did, and do, well. There's nothing particularly opaque or mysterious. The French farm movement has two poles.

One is the poor farmers south of the Loire, who are marginal. The land's not very good, the farms too small, and they try to survive with a couple of cows, some vegetables and some cereals, which they feed to the cows, and grow some fruit. These people have always been on the margin and their numbers have been dropping for hundreds of years.

Against them you have north of the Loire very modern, efficient producers of wheat and soybeans, and a few other things, like rape seed, that are substitutable. These farmers typically have holdings of 250 to 400 acres, worth millions of dollars. Indeed, the high prices of cereals have been capitalized in pushing up the value of the land, and these people are all extremely wealthy, at least on paper. Their investments in terms of farm equipment and storage facilities are very considerable. They use large quantities of modern fertilizers and pesticides. And, indeed, they can compete on world markets. The French will acknowledge this; in fact, they sometimes say that they may be somewhat better than their American equivalents. [Can one be better than one's equivalent?] I don't know whether this is the case but they're certainly competitive.

Here is the irony. These well-organized, modern farmers (who give money to all the parties, incidentally) have actually lost their market in Germany, because the Germans want high prices, and the French want no limits on production, so you get the German prices and the French production scheme; lots of production. The German output is enough to feed Germany, so the French output has to be exported with subsidies. This is one reason that the French talk about their exporting vocation. Well, if they're going to run this unholy alliance with the Germans on which the Germans are now trying to blow the whistle they've got to have export subsidies. That's what makes the mechanism work. And the export subsidies are expensive and bitterly resented by other grain exporters -- the United States, but also Australia, Canada, and others.

We've made Common Agricultural Policy the centerpiece of our objectives in the Uruguay round.

Q: The Uruguay round is the one going on now.

ELY: The round that will not die. It's been going on for six and a half years; it should have been over in three. And taking the Carns Group, 14 agricultural exporters, and making very substantial reforms of the CAP a prerequisite for progress in all of the other areas -- in intellectual property, coverage of services -- we put the Uruguay round hostage essentially to the Community, and to some extent hostage to the French.

I'm a severe critic of the CAP. It works badly. It doesn't benefit the people it's supposed to benefit. It's very disruptive. It is intrusive. It is highly regulated. It is protectionist. It is all these things, but I do doubt the wisdom of putting it on the top of our negotiating list, because of the difficulty of making progress on agricultural subjects.

The Community agricultural system is at the stage of demographic evolution that ours was a generation ago. They've got six-plus percent of their people on the land (it varies by country, of course). We are down to three. When farmers are three percent, even with a disproportionate political influence, their ability to run things is circumscribed. American farmers, as a result, have been taking cuts in their support programs and in the agricultural budget. The Community is not yet to that point.

The problem is solving itself over time. The number of farmers is going down; farmers are getting older, they're moving off the land; holdings are being consolidated; some land is being turned back. This process will, in some way, solve or contribute to an eventual solution of the problem in X years.

Mounting extensive external pressure to force the Community, that is to say the French, to reform the CAP has never worked. The latest rounds of EC reforms have taken place independent of the Uruguay round, forced upon the Community by, once again, a pattern of rising expenditure, increasing production of unwanted commodities that have to be destroyed or sold on world markets at subsidized prizes, provoking outcries from the other producers of the same farm products.

However, that's neither here nor there. The round is still underway. It has all kinds of good things in it for the participants. The experts that I've talked to say that the current administration should accept it even though it's not perfect. The intellectual property and trade and services provisions are too weak for certain sectors of American industry. They would like to see it reopened and renegotiated. Very dangerous to the package. The fact that you can't get the best doesn't mean you should give up the good.

Q: Well, Mike, going back to that period of time. Here you were, in a major capital, the chief economic officer of the United States. Were you getting any reflections about the Soviet economy at that time, between '80 and '84? Because, within five years of the time you left, the Soviet system collapsed, basically because of the economics.

ELY: Well, yes. I would say you got a rather different view from the French -- always have gotten. We tended to think it was self-serving: the French wanted to sell them factories and technology. And when we complained about this, they would say, "Well, you know, the factories are never going to get unpacked. The technology is never going to be put to work." (It turned out they were correct; the Soviet Union is littered from one end to the other with unfinished factories that foreigners have sold under export...) "So don't you worry."

But our people, particularly on the analytical side, in the Central Intelligence Agency insisted on viewing the Russians as ten feet tall, with daggers clenched between their teeth, and (particularly under the Reagan administration) that anything you did that helped the Soviets in any way was contributing to the strength of your adversary, who was armed to the teeth.

A picture of the Soviet Union as a collapsing economy: the French sniffed this. They didn't actually say it, but they would continually pull back from our apocalyptic analysis of Soviet military and economic power.

A team came over from the Central Intelligence Agency to show the French the results of a very extensive survey they had done of Soviet petroleum resources and the probable evolution of the petroleum output. I knew about this, because it went back to when I was in INR in 1977 and '78, when the same team had said that the Russians by 1980 will be net importers of oil. This meant they'll be looking south to Iran and Iraq. We have a new threat in the Gulf. We should get ready for it.

My one analyst of the USSR said, "You know, even if the figures are true, the Soviets will never let themselves become that vulnerable. They'll switch resources. They'll do everything to keep up their production."

This turned out to be correct. The Russians did that, and a lot of bad things; they wrecked oil fields in the process. Only now, ten years later, are they paying the price. The Agency was off by a full decade. Very important.

The CIA came and made a presentation to the French that, on paper, was ironclad. They had the figures for all the fields, they had all the historical data, and they projected these, and they showed that by 1982 or '83 or '84, the Russians would become net importers. The French listened politely, thumbed their noses, and said, "No, it's not going to be that way."

And, of course, it wasn't. So, once again, the French, with much less in the way of analytical resources and intelligence [as in information, not mental aptitude], rolled back U.S. estimates.

We thought that their estimates were self-serving. They thought that our estimates were self-serving, to tell the allies that they had to do what we told them to do, because Russians would come and murder us all in our beds with their vast economic and military might that we have contributed to.

Q: That's interesting, because these are, as you say, both self-serving. But at the same time, we sometimes get caught up in figures without looking at, you might almost say, the personality side. And we're talking about the personality side of the Soviet economy, which basically stunk. I mean, they were unable to put things together. We added figures up, but we weren't talking about actuality.

ELY: Well, the tendency on the part of analysts is always to cover themselves, and by exaggerating the strength of the enemy, you protect your estimates.

Q: You never are off if you make them stronger rather than weaker.

ELY: That's right. If you make them weak and you're mistaken, they'll hang you by the thumbs or the neck, while the other way around, they'll give you a medal. If you're correct, they will just quietly retire you.

Q: One last question about your time in Paris. You've talked about Ambassador Galbraith and his way of looking at things, but what was your impression (you'd been there before and all) of how the embassy operated? I mean, here was a huge embassy and all, how was it being run?

ELY: Well, the embassy was huge and getting bigger. The Central Intelligence Agency had an enormous contingent there. Everybody did. And meanwhile the line Foreign Service officers, as usual, were few in number and increasingly outnumbered by their miscellaneous other-agency counterparts.

Ambassador Galbraith, in one respect, was a very good ambassador. He took an interest in what people did. His door was always open. He was personally courteous and helpful, when he didn't go through one of his hyperconservative seizures, which he did from time to time. But normally he was a fine man, a good chief of mission.

He did drive the Commercial Section crazy by positing, in a good Reaganite way, that we didn't really need any export promotion, that export promotion was best left to the private sector, and that you should close the Commercial Section. This caused anguish, and the Commercial people felt that they were being undermined, that this free-enterprise approach to export promotion didn't work. They thought that they could find evidence to support their viewpoint.

I jumped in to support them, but on an economic standpoint, saying that there are economies of scale in providing information for small- and medium-sized businesses that cannot each master the information universe, and so small amounts of money, which is what we were spending, would probably have a very good payoff in terms of increased export activity. We should logically be doing the same for foreign exporters to increase trade, but for conventional reasons it's been worked out that countries promote their own exports, not imports into their own country. This seemed to be working okay; the Commercial Service and the Foreign Agricultural Service had management programs with specific goals and objectives. I thought we could be reasonably confident that this money was being sensibly spent. The Commercial Counselor was a friend of mine and appreciated the support.

As usual, when you were talking something ideological to Ambassador Galbraith, it was "Don't bother me with the facts, my mind is made up." But he had actually dropped that particular bomb.

He also had another idea; the United States was basically, on a corrected cash flow basis, doing a much better job on investments than the statistics would indicate. A lot of people were saying then, as they have been saying for some time, that the United States was underinvesting and either had to cut its investment levels down below the optimum, or borrow a lot of money from abroad -- which we ended up doing. Ambassador Galbraith had some figures that indicated to him that on some sort of a recalculated statistical basis we were out-investing almost everybody. He asked me what I thought about the figures, and I tactfully said that, yes, you could make the case, but I think you could make the opposite case better. He didn't lose his temper, but he didn't like it a lot. He made speeches on this subject to uncomprehending audiences. He would say, "Basically, the United States is doing a lot better than anybody. And here are the numbers to prove it."

And they would say, "Yes, that sounds fine. But why is the U.S. borrowing all this money? Why is the dollar so high?"

"Well, a high dollar was a sign of strength, not of weakness."

Well, as the financial guy, I walked him through this. I said, "If you run big budget deficits, and you have a solid currency, it means it's going to lead to capital inflows, it's going to run your currency up, and it may pull your exchange rate out of line; there are dangers in doing this because this has inadvertent effects on costs in the economy, and price-sensitive industries are likely to get hurt."

He looked at me, a hard look, and he said, "What kind of argument is that?"

And I said, "Well, it's analytical. It's not an argument, it's an identity. It happens."

And he said, riled as hell, "Well, for some people it happened, but for other people it didn't," as if there were something ideological in my argument, which was not the case.

One last anecdote before leaving Paris. I couldn't help hearing a telephone call that he got from Judge Clark, who was then President Reagan's chief of staff.

Q: He was national security advisor.

ELY: That's right, he was national security advisor. Judge Clark had seen in the papers that exports of French wheat to the Soviet Union were being subsidized; here was another case of the Europeans subsidizing the Russians. He was furious. And Ambassador Galbraith, very patiently, calmed him down and said, "Well, no, in this case, although there is a subsidy attached, it doesn't go to the Russians. It goes to the French producer, who gets the difference between the support price and the world price." He explained this three or four times.

Q: Judge Clark was a good friend of Ronald Reagan's. In many ways he was a very effective expediter. But at the same time, he was not renowned for his...

ELY: Swiftiness.

Q: Swiftiness or intellectual depth, particularly in foreign affairs.

ELY: Well, the ambassador understood this perfectly well, and he explained it deftly and patiently. And he eventually got Judge Clark calmed down, so we didn't get a broadside telling the French and, indeed, the Europeans to stop passing subsidies to the bear to the east, subsidies that it would use to put on muscle and rockets to threaten us and break down our defenses and our democratic system.

Q: Well, then, you left Paris in 1984. . .

LYNNE LAMBERT
Investment Advisor, OECD
Paris (1981-1985)

Lynne Lambert was born in Ohio in 1943. After receiving her bachelor's degree from Smith College in 1965, she received her master's degree from Johns Hopkins in 1967. Her career has included positions in Athens, Teheran, Paris, London, and Budapest. Ms. Lambert was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in January 2002.

You went to Paris and were there from '81 to when?

LAMBERT: '85. I was not at the bilateral embassy. I was at the U.S. mission to the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development [OECD], which is primarily an economic organization of the wealthiest countries in the world, namely Japan, Australia, New Zealand, North America, and Europe. It was a policy organization. In some ways, it was a place where policy was debated before it was debated in a large international context. A specific example would be preparation for the Uruguay trade round.

Q: Let's get the nuts and bolts first. Who was the ambassador while you were there?

LAMBERT: Abe Katz was the first ambassador that I had. Ed Streeter was the second. I was there for four years. The mission at that time had about 30 permanent employees.

Q: Was there any relation to the European Community or to the embassy in Paris or any of these other organizations or were you sort of on your own?

LAMBERT: Serving in a multilateral organization in a foreign country, I think we sacrificed a lot of knowledge of the foreign country. Of course, you lived there. You listened to the news. You knew some people. You deal with buying your groceries, having your car repaired, and this is all in French. But you don't follow the political or cultural life of the country as much as you would in a bilateral embassy. Of course, I knew everybody in the embassy. Socially, we saw quite a lot of them. There were a lot of embassy-wide activities. We shopped at the commissary. But the kind of substantive... Culturally, we were not part of the French experience so much as the embassy was. As far as the European Community goes, they had a representation, they had a mission, at the OECD just like a country would. They attended every meeting. In some cases, where the members of the community had ceded their sovereignty, the EC represented the member states. In others, the member states represented themselves, but the EC chose to speak quite often. They always caucused. So, there was very definitely a large European Community presence. On some occasions, the member states would take pleasure in shooting down the Commission where they had the sovereignty and the Community didn't. But I think by and large, the caucus was always effective and became more so. Once the EC members had agreed among themselves, and it often was a least-common denominator position, it was hard to accomplish anything other than the EC position. I think there were 12 members of the Community at that point. Maybe they should have had one vote, but like in the UN and elsewhere today, they had 12. So they would give 12 speeches on their position, and we would get only one shot. Voting doesn't matter, really, except on officers and the budget, because the OECD works by consensus. Even so, it is hard to work with a block of countries that constitute about half of the membership. At the time, we were roughly the same size as the whole Community.

Q: What was your slice of the pie?

LAMBERT: I had an unusual and interesting slice. My title was the investment advisor. Every job at OECD relates to different committees. My primary committee was the Committee on Investment and Multinational Enterprises, which supervised three non-binding voluntary agreements, which were major at that point because there had been no international discipline in investment. Still, the OECD instruments are the gold standard. The investment instruments were quite newsworthy and interesting to U.S. corporations. One dealt with national treatment, which is the idea that we treat a foreign investor equally to a national investor. They're eligible for the same government contracts, the same tax treatment, the same treatment in licensing, etc. The committee did review exceptions and complaints. Another instrument had to do with trade-related investment measures, which is the weakest instrument. This is basically an attempt to try to stop incentives and disincentives to foreign investment and let the market regulate it. An example would be tax holidays, which in our case would usually happen at the state level, not the national level, but the U.S. government was a signatory.

The third instrument was the most controversial by far. It was a code of conduct for multinational enterprises. This was the most difficult to negotiate and certainly the most politicized, the one that business had the most interest in, even though they had the most to gain from the other two. But this was the one that would put them on stage and often criticize them. Those were the three primary instruments in the investment committee.

Delegates to the Investment Committee came from Washington. We had large delegations with a number of agencies represented – State led, with USTR as co-chair of the US delegation. Then we had reps from Commerce and Treasury, and sometimes other agencies. My job was to prepare the delegation, work the Secretariat between meetings so our positions would be reflected in committee documents, and to work with other delegations to try to resolve issues prior to the start of the formal meeting.

In addition, I was one of two U.S. reps on the Committee on Capital Movements Invisible Transactions. This committee dealt with two binding codes - in this case, obligations of the codes were mandatory – dealing with the movement across borders of services and capital. There were old codes that had been signed shortly after World War II, and probably would not have been achievable in the early '80s or today, because they were more liberal than the situation in the '80s. The Treasury representative basically dealt with capital movements and financial services. I dealt with non-financial services and investment, and I took the microphone on those issues. We managed in the time I was there to negotiate an important agreement on the right of establishment, which meant that any company of any member state had the right to establish in any of the other member states. This was a binding agreement, which took the form of an amendment to the Code of Liberalization of Capital Movements, subject to some reservations usually related to national security. This was pretty much a three-year negotiation. The negotiations were acrimonious, in part because the amendment would provide really a new investment instrument, and it would be binding. It was quite a major step forward in the mind of U.S. business. Actually, it was my initiative.

Q: Give me an example.

LAMBERT: Most American companies were having trouble establishing in France. They had to have a presence to get any business in France, and it was difficult to get a presence. The requirements were such that the bureaucracy might take four or five years, by which time the firm would lose its opportunity or its market. Some of our companies for this reason or that would never succeed in establishing a presence. This instrument made a lot of difference and set up some standards. The French government was required to be transparent on what their restrictions were. If they hadn't entered a reservation, the problem could not exist for an American company. If they had entered a reservation, the Code required gradual elimination, and it forbade new restrictions. Countries were examined annually, and with each examination were required – maybe pressured is a better word – to get rid of several specific reservations. This was a major initiative, and, although imperfect, is probably state of the art even today.

The two committees, we also made an outreach to third countries. The idea here was that developing countries needed investment to get their economies going. They needed also to understand some of the things that the investors from the developed world were looking for. In addition, a number of countries were particularly promising candidates for investment like Korea and Mexico. That was the beginning of the move to get these countries into the OECD, which did happen.

Q: What was in it for a country like France that had very strong exclusionary impulses to get involved in something like this?

LAMBERT: The French were not in the forefront of wanting the instrument. They had a number of reasons why they opposed the instrument and a number of negotiating ploys. But the OECD is a strong organization that moves forward. The Codes themselves were intrinsically liberalizing, business was pressuring, and the French eventually went along – I’m sure because they decided it would be in their interest, or against their interest to keep stonewalling. The more comprehensive investment instrument that the US wanted in the late 1990s, called the MIA, would have combined all of the OECD instruments and made them binding. Unfortunately, the effort failed. But normally in the OECD, if you have a critical mass of particularly the larger countries that want something and it makes sense and the Secretariat supports it, it’s discussed at ministerial level and the ministers give a go-ahead. In the case of the right of establishment amendment, ministers gave a fairly strong endorsement. The ball gets rolling. It’s difficult to stop. I think the French initially opposed the idea. Certainly Canada did. At that point, Canada had a very restrictive investment environment. Some of the Scandinavians opposed it. But the critical mass kept getting larger. These countries’ ability to argue down, particularly with a ministerial endorsement, failed and they changed their efforts to try and protect some of the things that they were most interested in protecting, which they succeeded in doing. It is interesting that this effort succeeded, because at one point the negative countries made an issue of sub-national units, or states in the United States, which can be a vulnerability for a US negotiator. We sign agreements with foreign countries only at the national level, but the federal government doesn’t speak for states and can’t control what states do unless the agreement is a ratified treaty. Most of our establishment regulations are actually determined at the state level. While our states for the most part promote investment, they do have regulations and laws that sometimes discriminate against foreigners. In a negotiating situation, the fact that we are not negotiating for the parties that actually control the issue, even though it’s a largely hypothetical problem, it’s one that is used against the U.S. continually in many negotiations.

Q: Were there natural allies in your particular field and natural opponents?

LAMBERT: Yes. Again, quite often, it mirrored the U.S. relationship with the European Community, because a majority of the countries in the OECD were members in the European Community. The more liberal countries on investment and trade were the UK, Germany, the Netherlands, and Denmark. Basically that was the liberal nucleus of the Community. Canada was more restrictive at that point. Japan was more restrictive. It depended on the issue. Sometimes these could countries could be allies. Occasionally, you could find other allies, but your hardcore allies were those four.

Q: It sounds like particularly France was often on the other side.

LAMBERT: Yes, usually. And then France had a little alliance of its own, which were basically the Latin countries in the Community. Turkey was a possible ally for us. It had very liberal economic policies.

PHILIP C.BROWN
Assistant Information Officer, USIS
Paris (1981-1986)

Mr. Brown was born in Massachusetts and raised primarily in Pennsylvania. He was educated at College of Wooster (Ohio) and the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy. After serving with the Voice of America, in 1965 he joined the United States Information Agency Foreign Service (USIS), where he served several assignments at its headquarters in Washington DC. His foreign posts include Dakar, Douala, Yaoundé, Paris, Vienna and Moscow, where he served twice. At these posts his assignments ranged from Assistant Branch Public Affairs Officer to Counselor for Information, Press and Cultural Affairs. Mr. Brown was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2012.

Q: Where had you been and where were you going?

BROWN: 1981 was a transition year. We had just finished this amazingly interesting three years in Cold War Moscow preceded by a year in Garmisch, Germany so we had been overseas for four.

Toward the end of that assignment in Moscow, I thought a lot about where I would like to go next. I was intent on staying overseas. My wife and I had given serious talk about staying for a fourth year in Moscow, this rather surprisingly from a woman who practically kicked me out of the house when she knew we were going to be going there for three rather than two years. My wife, Bobbi, thrived in Moscow. We could talk about the possibility of staying for a fourth year. Ultimately we decided not to.

I still have a little piece of paper on which I prepared a chart of various possible assignments. I listed the advantages and disadvantages, professional, personal and otherwise. Paris was on that list but I thought Paris wouldn't be good for my career because the position was assistant information officer. In Moscow, I am information officer, press attaché. Do I want to go to Paris and be assistant information officer?

Fortunately that was just a paper exercise because without me having to do much to do with it, I was reassigned as assistant information officer, AIO/Paris. One day I picked up one of those bland cables that came out from Washington with personnel assignments and there was my name assigned to Paris as assistant information officer.

My job was going to be press attaché. In some ways it would seem to be a step down. I was going from being information officer to assistant information officer. But there is at least one thing I did right in my Foreign Service experience. I don't usually hand out advice but if somebody asked me for advice, I would say "if you see an interesting assignment, take it. Don't turn down an interesting assignment because it wouldn't seem to be a good stepping stone to something else." The reverse of that is: Don't take a lousy assignment just because you think it is going to help you out in the long run.

I was being assigned really, forget the AIO title, as press attaché to a key West European embassy and to what would turn out to be an amazingly interesting time and place in the Foreign Service. It was a wonderful five years. I really picked the right five, actually six years to be away from Moscow because it was the period of all the funerals in the Soviet Union and I was in Paris during a time of very active American-French relations.

Late in my assignment in Paris, I got back on the Soviet circuit. I was still in Paris but I will talk more about this later. I went to the Geneva summit in 1985. I was in Reykjavik in 1986 when Gorbachev and Reagan met there. Before the Geneva summit, I spent ten weeks in the Old Executive Office building on the staff of the National Security Council under Jack Matlock, doing public diplomacy preparations for Geneva. So I got back into things in time to go back to Moscow for my second tour in the late '80s but none of that was in my mind when I arrived in Paris in 1981.

Our first four years in Paris, 1981-1985, were a very unchanging period in the Soviet Union. Yes, we were well beyond Stalinism but there didn't seem to be any flexibility. Arrests were continuing. Our good friends were regularly denied permission to emigrate. The Reagan administration seemed to be on a head-on collision course with the Soviet Union and as we all know now, some awful things were going to happen. Remember when the Korean airliner was shot down? That kind of thing. These were not good times and there was no indication of any movement.

As I prepared for today, I decided rather than going through all my detailed journals and folders and for various other reasons, I would try to recall the five years we spent in Paris from memory and see what jumped out at me; later on, I can go back and fill in some of the details.

Q: Let's describe as you went, 1981 Paris but France in '81. How stood things there? What was the situation there?

BROWN: First, to describe my office physically. The American Embassy in Paris occupies a wonderful spot right on the Place de la Concorde, a classic center city location. Two blocks away is the Hotel Talleyrand where USIS, consular and various other sections of the embassy were located. For at least my first year in Paris, the Hotel Talleyrand was undergoing a major restoration and the normal occupants, including USIS, were in temporary offices around Paris.

But my office, the press office, was in the embassy proper. Look out the window of my mezzanine-level office and you could see the obelisk on the Place de la Concorde. What a heady location. My office was one floor down from the ambassador and the DCM. In effect, I was part of the embassy proper staff. The public affairs officer, my nominal boss the IO and the cultural section were all several metro stops away doing wonderfully important work but it was the USIS work. I was the press attaché. I was the first line of contact with the journalists.

The other thing that made it interesting was the fact that both countries had just elected new presidents. Ronald Reagan had just been elected president of the United States. He was in his first year, recovering from the assassination attempt, but he hadn't even finished his first year in office. François Mitterrand had been elected president of France that year.

Q: As a socialist, this was a real change.

BROWN: So you had not only a conservative Republican in the White House and a socialist in the Elysée Palace but you also had two very different personalities. Mitterrand probably read more books in a month than Ronald Reagan would read in his life. Mitterrand was a scholar. He was out of that leftist, socialist tradition in France. It was potentially a very uncomfortable relationship.

In fact, if you look back with historical perspective, the two men got along pretty well. They never became personal friends but politically, the United States enjoyed a good relationship with France during those five years.

The key issue, at the time these words were on your tongue all the time, was missile modernization and the desire of NATO -- political people are going to tell me I don't have all my details correct, but I know what I am talking about -- the desire of NATO to modernize the Pershing missiles in Western Europe, to counter the SS-20s that the Soviets had directed at Western Europe.

A lot of West European countries didn't like this idea but Mitterrand, in a very famous speech in Germany, basically said we must modernize the Pershing missiles or the Soviets will have no motivation to limit their SS-20s. That single speech did more to bring the United States and France together politically than any other event during the five years I was there.

There were plenty of other things the United States and France disagreed on but missile modernization was not one of them.

Q: This SS-20-Pershing issue, do you have any thoughts on the conflict that must have gone on within the French government to this? This is quite a threat to the NATO and Western alliance. It was designed that way to try to split; this is all on the part of the Soviet strategy. Through the press or something, was this a raging debate?

BROWN: There was probably opposition to it within the Mitterrand government. I think that the French acted in their national interest. They were not, technically I have to be careful here, part of the military structure of NATO but they were part of NATO, the political structure. So their voice was heard. If they had resisted on this, then countries that were wavering, such as the Netherlands and even Germany, would not have gone along.

Q: Well, the Netherlands were always a problem. Actually, Germany was a problem.

BROWN: Then the decision to modernize the Pershings would not have gone forward. As I say I think the French were simply acting out of their national interest. They certainly were not acting as some favor to the United States because we know on other issues they would resist.

Quite a number of years later, when President Reagan decided to bomb Libya and requested overflight rights for American planes coming out of England, the French said no and those planes had to take a long circuitous route to carry out their mission; on that and other issues, the French had no problem saying no to the United States.

Q: I was interviewing a man who was our ambassador to NATO at the time. He was he publisher of the Washingtonian, among other things. During this crisis he was invited to a dinner at the French Embassy and people were giving toasts and all that. So he got up and said, "I would like to toast our magnificent British allies who helped us launch this attack and I'd also like to toast our French allies who are giving us this magnificent dinner."

He was also the one who said that one of his daughters said, "When are you going to see the God damned French?"

He said, "What makes you say that?"

"Well, Dad every time you come back you slap your briefcase on the table, those God damned French." She thought that is what they were.

BROWN: I think, in some ways, that what made Mitterrand's support on this issue all the more credible was the fact that the French did not line up behind the United States on every single issue. If they were a puppy dog led around by the nose ally, then they wouldn't have had much credibility but because they could be so obstinate, we knew they were acting in their own national interest.

Q: Let's talk a little about the atmospherics. Who was the ambassador when you arrived?

BROWN: Let me answer that question a little more broadly. When you walk into the embassy in Paris, into the lobby -- and it is too bad the general public can't do it now -- there is a wall listing everyone who had ever been American ambassador or envoy to France. Right at the top of the list were names like John Adams and Thomas Jefferson.

Q: Benjamin Franklin.

BROWN: Benjamin Franklin and on through many names that didn't mean very much. You reminded yourself that whoever your ambassador was, he was heir to quite a tradition. Out in the courtyard was a wonderful seated statue of Benjamin Franklin. He got moved one time because they put in a guard gate and had to relocate the statue and he was not quite so visible. I once came back from a July 4th party at the residence where they had given out hot air balloons and I thought too bad that Ben Franklin had not been able to attend the party so I tied the hot air balloons to Franklin's hands. A lot of people came by and took pictures and expressed their approval. Then some cold water person thought that this wasn't appropriate and took the hot air balloons off. There's always somebody.

But back to your question. When I arrived, the ambassador was Arthur Hartman. At that point, he was concluding his assignment to Paris; he was the ambassador-designate to the Soviet Union. So there was a little joke from his end that he and I were changing places. I never bought into that. I was very modest. Ambassador Hartman was going to Moscow as ambassador and I was coming to Paris as the press attaché but he and his wife Donna were very interested in talking to me about what they were going to find in Moscow. I think he was conscious of the fact that he was not a Soviet expert. He was not a Russian speaker and he was going into a pretty nasty climate there but he was the ambassador.

If you were at a party and you asked someone who didn't know to identify the ambassador, I am sure they would have pointed at Ambassador Hartman; tall, distinguished looking. He was right out of central casting.

Ambassador Hartman had a rather arms length relationship with journalists. He was not inclined to give interviews or talk freely with the press. He took more of the State Department approach that there wasn't a whole lot to be gained. I arrived in September and he hosted a reception on October 6 to say farewell to the press. Right during that mid-day reception, we got word of the assassination of Anwar Sadat in Egypt. Ambassador Hartman didn't have anything to say on the record about that but it was a news making event on a day he was saying goodbye to the press.

Q: The Hartmans certainly both in France and in Moscow were very much avant-garde culturally, weren't they?

BROWN: I will tell you an anecdote. He provided at Spaso House in Moscow a venue for a pianist to play, a pianist who wanted to emigrate. His name is Vladimir Feltsman. The first opportunity he had to perform publicly was thanks to Arthur Hartman at Spaso House in Moscow.

In 1985, I was called back to Washington for ten weeks to work on the public diplomacy arrangements for the Geneva Summit between Reagan and Gorbachev. Then I got to go to Geneva. Ambassador Hartman came out from Moscow. He called me aside. He said, "Here, I have some thing I want to entrust to you." It was a violin. A Russian violinist, Sasha Brussilovsky, had emigrated but was not allowed to take his violin with him. Ambassador Hartman gave this violin to me and asked me to deliver it to Sasha in Paris, which I did.

I thought at the time here we've got this very high-level east west meeting, this summit. The future of the world was at stake here and what did Arthur Hartman risk by bringing out a violin for some unknown violinist? It wasn't going to be Gary Powers and U-2 but he could have provoked an incident. But he did it and he did it I think because he just wanted to help out this guy and he could.

So yes, he did a lot for the intellectuals and artists and dissidents in Moscow during those years.

He was replaced by Evan Galbraith and I will say what I have said a thousand times and something Evan Galbraith said ten thousand times; he was no relation politically or otherwise to John Kenneth Galbraith. Evan Galbraith was a protégée of Bill Buckley. It was Bill Buckley, National Review who recommended him to the Reagan administration.

Q: Sort of the extremely articulate spokesperson of the intellectual right wing.

BROWN: Yes and also vulnerable to putting his foot in his mouth too. A French speaking, investment banker who had spent time in Paris as a banker, a very young fellow with his wife, Bootsie. He was fond of recalling the various bistros that he and Bootsie had visited when they lived there in the investment banking world.

He arrived in the fall of 1981 and he made my life extremely interesting for four years and I mean that in a very positive sense. We got along well together.

In 1985, he resigned in a flurry of rhetoric and invectives and everything else we will talk about later. He was replaced by Joe M. Rodgers, a Republican from Tennessee who had been a Reagan fund raiser there. He was my ambassador for my last year in Paris. Did not speak a word of French, a very courtly man from Tennessee who nevertheless, managed to cultivate some pretty good relations with the French during his time there simply because he went to bat for them on issues. But the fact that he didn't speak French was a handicap and made it a little bit awkward for him.

Anyway, I had three ambassadors.

I shouldn't mention the three ambassadors without saying that I had three DCMs as well. The first was a man named Christian Chapman who was probably 5/5 in French. He had been educated in France and he certainly was a native speaker of French, very distinguished; the name just fit.

Q: I think he flew a Spitfire during World War II.

BROWN: It could well be. Replaced by a man named John Maresca. Jack also had very good French. Jack was not the easiest guy to work for. Reminded me a little bit of Jack Matlock in that respect. Not the easiest guy to work for, neither one was, but I had great respect for Jack Maresca. He was smart, articulate, bought into Evan Galbraith's approach to the press which was instead of holding them at arms length, we need to try to use them to get out our message.

If I did things right, and I was right most of the time, Jack was very complimentary. If I screwed up and didn't keep him informed on something, boy, he could come down on me like a ton of bricks. His office was only one floor above me.

Then there was a third DCM whose name was Bill Barrowclough.

As long as we are going down the line, I also had three PAOs. The PAO when I arrived was Jack Hedges. Jack was already into his third or fourth year in Paris. Jack really gave me great liberty to operate as press attaché. He had been press attaché Paris (my job), he enjoyed his job and he gave me liberty to operate as long as I kept him informed.

He was replaced by one of USIA's legendary figures, Terry Catherman. I have to be a bit careful how I say this but Terry was going through a terribly difficult period in his life. He didn't speak French very well and he was hung up about that. I think he had other personal issues. For a while, he wanted to keep really close tabs on what I was doing but then he realized that wasn't going to make his life or my life any easier and I kept him informed and that was enough.

The third PAO was Sam Courtney who again was one of the high profile figures of USIA. So I had three prominent ambassadors, three DCMs and three PAOs.

Q: Let's talk about sort of the administrative wiring diagram. Charlie Wick was the head of USIA. I have had people talk about both a difficult guy but also the guy that brought in money so a great deal of respect for him for keeping USIA high profile but not an easy person to work for.

BROWN: Everything you say is true.

Charlie Wick was the director of USIA. I would have to go back and count but I bet he made at least an annual trip to Paris while I was there. After my Paris assignment, I went back to Moscow and Charlie Wick was out there a couple of times as well.

In Paris, the burden of a Charlie Wick visit fell on the PAO and I can remember Terry Catherman saying he was losing sleep and sweating and everything else worrying about the Charlie Wick visit. I didn't have that problem myself. He added to our workload, certainly. Even when he wasn't visiting, he initiated this project called WorldNet or EuroNet. I think in fairness it has to be said that Charles Wick was ahead of his time and a lot of Foreign Service officers were behind the times, dragging our feet, thinking "what is this crazy system of using a satellite to put a newsmaker in Washington in touch with a journalist somewhere out in the field?"

Admittedly, there were technical problems the first few times or you might get someone who was supposed to be a newsmaker and wouldn't say anything. But the technology is so taken for granted these days as a means of communicating that our resistance to it early on leaves the Foreign Service people who resisted open to criticism.

Q: Could you explain what it was at that time?

BROWN: It involved identifying putting a newsmaker in Washington into a studio and inviting journalists into, let's say, a USIA office in Paris and thanks to the satellite, the journalists could interview the newsmaker. One of the first persons we had was George Shultz. We had a pretty good turnout for that.

There were technical problems. It wasn't done with the ease that you do a satellite connection these days. You had a language issue and you also had . . . I can talk a lot about George Shultz and my high respect for him, but he wasn't always the most scintillating newsmaker. He gave sometimes pretty bland answers to questions. But he was the secretary of state. The second time around you wouldn't get the secretary of state. You'd get somebody else further down on the food chain and it became awkward every time to round up an audience. Charles Wick wanted to make sure we were not only getting an audience but getting placement out of this.

So it was a challenge to produce the results that he wanted. WorldNet was the global name given to it. Euro Net was the name given to it when you had a European audience.

It wasn't always bilateral. It wasn't always just journalists in France interviewing someone in Washington. You might have three or four or half a dozen posts involved so you'd go around from one post to another. Again, that added to the logistical, mechanical difficulty. But that was Charles Wick's major contribution in those early years.

The other major contribution of course, was his personal relationship through his wife to Nancy Reagan.

I have said many times, as a registered Democrat, that I always felt we got better support from Republican administrations and from Republican directors of USIA than we did from Democratic administrations and Democratic directors of USIA. Various theories as to why that might be the case, even if you accept my premise.

My basic theory is that Republicans liked the idea of going out there and telling the rest of the world our story. They had no embarrassment at using federal government funds to go to the rest of the world to say "hey, we are a good country and our policies are correct and our point of view is to be listened to. If we need money to get that message across, let's do it."

Mr. Wick came to Paris many times. Usually my job was to put him in touch with journalists and I can remember arranging a couple of luncheons with very prominent, English speaking French journalist contacts. You would hold your breath and hope that Charles Wick wouldn't say something offensive, stupid or outlandish because he did shoot from the hip. There were plenty of occasions when I had to make that kind of arrangements.

One of his other projects goes to the period when martial law was declared in Poland and we were very concerned about the situation there. He put together a program called "Let Poland Be Poland." We were to try to place it on television. The French were not at all open to the idea of taking a packaged American program and putting it on TV but one channel did. They ran "Let Poland Be Poland" on a given Sunday night and, of course, we were obligated to report the reaction to it.

Q: How did it play?

BROWN: I don't recall. I don't think it had a whole lot of impact. At least we could say it went on French TV.

I guess I could take off from that a little bit, however, and say that the whole trend of French thinking during the five years I was there was increasingly dubious, skeptical or whatever about the communist model. There was of course a communist party in France and tangentially, Ambassador Galbraith got himself in trouble early on by making negative aspersions about the French Minister of Transport, Charles Fiterman. Mitterrand's government included communist ministers and Galbraith made critical comments that got him in hot water with the French.

I recall an occasion when the French Communist Party wanted to deliver a petition to the American Embassy. I had only been there for a few months and a fellow in the political section, Ted Van Gilder, and I were assigned to the front door to receive this petition from members of the French Communist Party. My picture appeared in L'Humanité, the French communist newspaper, along with an article about this petition.

But overall, events in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe during the five years that I was in France conspired to make that model increasingly unattractive to the French left. I was so fortunate I was in Paris for five extremely interesting years in our bilateral and multilateral relationship. During those same five years in the Soviet Union, you had the death of Brezhnev, the death of Andropov and the death of Chernenko. As one person said to somebody else in Moscow at the Chernenko funeral, "didn't I see you at the Andropov funeral?" and the second guy replied, "Yeah, I bought the subscription."

Not much was going on. This was also a period when they exiled Alexander Solzhenitsyn. It is one thing for the Soviet Union to be an unattractive political model but when they exiled their leading intellectual, cultural thinkers, then the Soviet Union in general had no attraction for the French left. This was a period in which the French left was increasingly disillusioned with Soviet-style communism.

Q: Maybe this would be the time to talk a bit about the French intellectuals. I can't think of any country where the sort of intellectual class, whatever that is, has the importance or presumed importance or at least the high profile than in France. How did you approach it and what was your impression of it?

BROWN: I am going to be modest in answering that question. I think my colleagues in the cultural section and elsewhere had more direct contact with the intellectuals per se. You always were aware that intellectuals played an important role when you went to the Pantheon and saw where they were buried or you saw those long, thumb-sucking pieces in the newspaper which I never read, actually. You knew the intellectuals played an important role.

Let me address the subject indirectly. There were a more than a few French journalists who were truly intellectuals. Especially in my early years in Paris, I was frequently invited out to lunch by French journalists. These were long, two hour, two and a half hour affairs, full course meals, bottle of wine kind of get-togethers. A few of the journalists or commentators who invited me out were way above me in terms of intellectual ability. I was doing this in French and my French was good but with a few of these people, I can remember thinking "he isn't going to want to see me again because I am not really on his intellectual level.”

I didn’t worry too much about it because there were a lot of others who were just plain old practical journalists, interested in a story, interested in the good backgrounder, interested in being invited to some event with an American newsmaker. I felt comfortable with these people, able to exchange ideas, able to operate on a practical business level. For me, the French intellectuals were out there but they weren’t really a direct part of my day to day work.

Q: Did you have the feeling that they were, their chromosomes put them in the left or were they distinctively left or did you have a feeling that this was sort of an immovable group?

BROWN: Without thinking about it, you say emotionally in the left but a couple of the people I am thinking about who were just so far above me in terms of their thought processes were working for Figaro and L’Express, the journals on the right. The French journalists were thinkers. Many of them were deep thinkers and I suppose more of them were on the left than on the right but not exclusively so.

Again I come back to the point more often than not, I’d call them and say, we have somebody in town who is available for a background briefing on economic or political or issues or we can send you to the United States on an IV grant, that kind of thing. That was more the relationship I had with the French press.

Q: How about the right and the Le Pen phenomenon?

BROWN: We didn’t have anything to do with Le Pen and we didn’t have anything to do with the far left, L’Humanité. We were, I think, absolutely restricted from contact with the communists. With the far right, we were not absolutely restricted but we didn’t have anything to do with Le Pen and company. Figaro and the Express and those legitimate right-of-center publications, yes. We had a lot of contact with them. The ambassador would be invited to a big luncheon hosted by the L’Express and Figaro enterprise.

My job brought me in contact with the whole gamut of the French press – Le Matin and Liberation on the left. L’Express, Figaro on the right and Le Monde, wherever you would place it.

Q: You mentioned you were forbidden contact with the communists. It is fairly simple to be that way in the United States where the communists aren’t really much of anything. Since the communists are part of the web and wolf of the French politics

BROWN: I think it was an absolute restriction. I could not invite journalists from L’Humanité to a press event. Within the political section, there were contacts with the whole spectrum of French politics but not with the French Communist Party. There were no formal relationships. They were communists and they were in some ways farther left than any other West European communist party.

Q: As often is the case the step children of the regime. I would think that if you wanted to get at least maybe you couldn't do anything press wise, but certainly for politicians you should know what they are thinking and all because the maneuvers going on, you know. This is like in Iran, one of our terrible mistakes was we allowed ourselves to be cut out from a contact with the anti-Shah forces.

BROWN: I didn't make the policy.

Q: Did you find yourself chafing under this?

BROWN: No, I didn't. I had plenty to do. I recognized, not that I ever even thought about resisting it, that this was the Ronald Reagan, Evan Galbraith administration and this was perfectly consistent with their thinking, that we would want nothing to do with French communists. You didn't want to do anything to legitimize them.

Did people in the political section have some informal contacts? Perhaps, I don't know. But I don't think they would have wanted to have been seen in a restaurant dining with someone from the French Communist Party. We did not have relations with the French Communist Party.

Q: This was the period of time where there was the phenomenon called Euro communism. It was considered to be ___ in Italy. They were seen as more, you might say, more respectable.

BROWN: That may be true but overall, I would argue that the early '80s in France marked the decline of influence of the French Communist Party. More importantly, just a general disillusionment among the French left with communism and the eastern bloc.

Q: The invasion of Czechoslovakia in '68 I think really hit the communist Western European communism.

BROWN: On the other hand, despite the invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968, people were still talking in the 1980's, as you said, about Eurocommunism. I think that part of what happened in the '80s was the inability of the Soviet Union to produce anybody who could articulate, who could speak. It was a sclerotic society. In addition, you had the expulsion of Solzhenitsyn. You talk about intellectuals in France. Well, here was the leading Russian intellectual, an esteemed Russian writer and the Soviet leadership couldn't tolerate him; they booted him out of the country.

Let me turn to a couple of things I have notes on, some personal observations

First about arriving in France. My wife and I both passed through Paris en route from Moscow back to the United States on home leave but we did it in a clumsy fashion. She went with our younger daughter Christine to try to decide where we were going to be living and she found an apartment somewhere in the suburbs. A few weeks later, I went through Paris, decided I didn't want to live in her apartment and picked out one that I thought was better. I put down $1,000, which seemed like a lot of money to me at that time, to reserve it and went on home leave.

I came back to Paris ahead of my wife and checked into a hotel around the corner from the embassy where I was going to be staying for a while because nothing was ready. Ironically, we felt hard pressed to find anything in Paris as wonderful as the apartment we had in Moscow. Moscow living conditions, you would think, would be awful but remember that in Moscow, we had this spacious apartment on the 12th floor of a building with a view on three sides. Something like that in Paris proper would have cost multiple times my housing allowance.

There was another factor at work and that was our daughter was to be enrolled in the Lycée International several miles west of Paris, in the direction of Versailles. We decided, contrary to the advice of a lot of people, not to look for an apartment on the Left Bank or in the 16th arrondissement but out in St. Germaine-en-Laye.

Well, I got back to Paris and went out on the weekend to look at the apartment that I had put down $1,000 on and I became almost nauseated. I could not live out there where I have to take a bus and then a train to get to work. I felt confined. I tossed and turned for several nights, talked to my wife on the phone and decided to forfeit the $1,000 and start all over again. I was going to wait until she came and do it the correct way.

But I didn't. A couple of days later I went out to St. Germaine-en-Laye with a note that I picked up in the embassy's housing office and accompanied by the Reuters bureau chief, Bob Evans, and his wife whom we had known in Moscow. I found this big old airy house with a huge garden a short distance from the RER, the train line, and I was blown away by the place. This was totally different. It wasn't available for a month but I said to myself "this is where we want to live." The owner, Madame Legras, wisely suggested I wait until my wife came. I did wait until my wife came before I confirmed.

We lived in that house a 3, rue des Bucherons, and it was a huge part of the France experience. We were in a community where we had a lot of friends and acquaintances. Contrary to what the security people said I should do, I would walk every morning from my front door five minutes to the RER, pick up my Herald Tribune and find a spot on the platform where I knew the doors on the RER car would open. It was the end of the line. In 20 minutes, I would be at l'Opera and two metro stops later, I would be at the embassy. Living in the suburbs didn't inhibit my style.

At the end of the day, I would gather up newspapers and other unclassified documents and read them on the return trip home. Yes, we did not live in the Left Bank but we had a really wonderful French experience. Not only did we have a lot of friends out there, we had a chateau and a huge park, a great place for our dog, a different lifestyle, a different experience during our five years in Paris. So that is a very strong memory.

The second thought involves where my office was in the embassy, looking out on the Place de la Concorde. I replaced a fellow named Chris Henze. Chris had done a fine job. The first week I was there, Jack Hedges hosted a farewell reception for Chris. It was very well attended, a tribute to Chris and the job he had done. Journalist after journalist came up to me and we exchanged cards and said we will have to get together for lunch. I did not really know what this meant at the time but especially over the first year, I had innumerable lunches with French journalists. I got a lot of kidding about it as I came back into the embassy after a couple of hours away.

But when somebody mentioned the name of a particular journalist or wanted to have access to somebody in the French daily press, the weekly magazines or the audiovisual media, I had those contacts. My office and I had those contacts.

In my office, I was blessed with five extremely dedicated, long serving French employees -- Lucette, Monique, Nicole, Michelle and Jacques. Those five were like the starting five on a basketball team. I will never forget them. They were such an important part of doing the job there and I remain in contact with a couple of them.

Lucette Beal, in particular; I wrote a piece about her for the USIA magazine. If I do say so, it was a really good piece that captured who she was and what she did. Lucette prepared a daily press briefing for the ambassador. She had come to work for the American embassy I think circa 1948 and her office was actually in what became the ambassador's residence. She went to work for the Marshall Plan and occupied a cubicle; not far from where she sat was a young Foreign Service officer named Arthur Hartman. That was 1948 and I am going out there 30 plus years later. By 1981, Lucette is the chief FSN in the press office and Arthur Hartman is the ambassador.

Just to illustrate how things worked, it was my first week and I think back to my first day on the job in Moscow in 1978 when I had three newsmakers. I got a call from the DCM, Christian Chapman, who said Richard Allen, the NSC adviser, was in town and would like to do a background briefing with French journalists. This is my first week on the new job.

I turned to the PAO, Jack Hedges, who suggested two or three names. I turned next to Lucette who at that point, more easily than I, could contact those journalists, all of whom were delighted to come to the ambassador's residence for a background briefing with the NSC adviser. I attended and I did what I do well and what I was experienced in doing from my Moscow days. I took notes. I took good notes and I showed them to the ambassador and DCM. They were put into a telegram and they got me off to a good start. I got a lot of commendations right away for making effective use of this press opportunity. It is always nice to get off to a good start.

I won't attribute all of my success in Paris to those five French employees but they were part of it.

Meanwhile, remember that I had the title of AIO. That didn't last very long. Things were restructured. I became the information officer with a lot of other responsibilities.

As I said, Lucette did this daily press briefing. She would come in early. With her scissors, she'd cut up all the French newspapers and at about 10, we'd go up to the ambassador's office and do a briefing for the ambassador on what was in the French press. The ambassador, DCM and PAO and anyone else who was interested would attend. Not that many other people attended because they I think they found it a little bit tedious. For Ambassador Galbraith, it was a five day a week operation unless there was something extraordinary that called him away. We did it in French. He preferred to have it done in French.

Michelle Carteron was a generation younger than Lucette. She aspired to do what Lucette did and there was a lot of tension between the two of them and Michelle brought in her contacts in the French press. Things became very competitive.

Monique Barra was flamboyant type whose contact was in the audiovisual world. She would come running into my office and tell me I absolutely had to meet some particular journalist she had encountered or absolutely had to go to some event, attend a live taping of a show. A very effervescent, ebullient character.

Nicole Mazon prepared the daily summary of the French press that every West European embassy was required to do. Nicole went through and summarized particularly the French print press, the editorial comments, press round up. She would bring this to me in draft. I would correct it.

I always remember the day around 1982 when Nicole brought her report to me in draft and said “we have a new system here. Put a circle around something you want changed and we will take it back out and change it on the machine.” Literally, when I arrived, it was all being done on a typewriter. Lo and behold, a couple of years later and they had come up with this thing called the word processor produced by Wang. You may recall that Wang was the supplier early on to the State Department.

I can remember the novelty when we had the first Wang computer. It was in my office and when I wasn’t using it, other people were able to come in and use this fancy device where we could actually change words without retyping the whole page.

Then there was even a stage where once you did that, you took the report to the technology center, pushed a couple of buttons and this whole thing was transmitted electronically to Washington. Wow.

Q: This whole communications thing, you were right on the cusp of it at that point.

BROWN: Cusp but we were still on the slow side.

The fifth employee was Jacques Jacquinet. He was a midget. He was less than five feet tall, probably four feet and so well known. Everybody knew Jacques. He tended the AP and AFP tickers. All day long, he would tear news items off the tickers, photocopy them and like a mailman, in the afternoon, he’d go around and plop 20 or 25 pages on people’s desks. He did that early in the morning and again late in the afternoon.

When we say we were on the cusp of advanced communications, this is the way we kept informed. There were no other ways, except a telephone call, that brought the news any faster than the AP and the AFP ticker. I can remember any number of times when there was a news event and I would go dashing in to the embassy to get the latest news on the event so we could keep the ambassador and other people posted.

I said that I keep in touch with those people. I am still in touch with Lucette and Monique. There was a spring Saturday in 1982 and I received a phone call saying Jacques had died of a heart attack. I immediately went to his home on the other side of Paris and tried to console his widow. It was clear that the Embassy was Jacques's life.

We set up a condolence book at his desk and the outpouring among both the FSNs and the Americans was overwhelming. The ambassador went to his funeral. Partly because he was a midget, people would never forget him physically but that aside, he was a beloved character. He would come into my office late in the afternoon and although, he didn't speak much English, he'd use this little phrase like he was going to take the rest of the day off. It reflected his pride in his work. He was married to a French woman of normal stature. I don't know if he ever had any children. Bless his soul, we missed Jacques. In the condolence book, I wrote that somebody else would take his job. He could never be replaced.

And there was the practical question of who was going to monitor the AP and AFP tickers that were going to keep spewing out paper forever. I interviewed several candidates and eventually hired an Algerian-born fellow whose last name was Choutri. He was still in the job when I last visited the embassy a few years ago.

Q: Did you find your employees, the French national employees were, were they sensitive pointing out saying look this is correspondent or this event in the United States or something is taking a peculiar turn, a wrong turn or anti Americanism? Was this left sort of to the officers or were you getting from the people who had been around the press for a long, long time where things are going?

BROWN: Lucette was completely objective in her clipping of the French press. If there was something critical of the United States, that was probably the first thing she called to the ambassador's attention. There was no effort to feed the ambassador and the embassy just the good news. Critical information out of the French press was served up.

As far as the journalists we dealt with sure, we were aware of those who might provide a sympathetic hearing. Particularly between Lucette and Michelle, there was a competitive relationship enhanced by the generational gap to try to introduce me to some journalists we didn't know and they might advise that this particular person was fairly critical or not necessarily as inclined as someone else to give us a good hearing.

Q: You have five years, from early Reagan to mid Reagan. Did you sense a greater understanding of Reagan? When Reagan first came in here was a Hollywood actor from the far right and Europe was extremely dubious about this character and they learned to live with him. It was a learning experience. Did you sense this change?

BROWN: It is hard for me thirty years later to recall precisely what was in the French press. You could go back and see he was described as a movie actor and all this kind of thing.

Was there an evolution on Reagan during that time? Yes, there was. First of all, he's President of the United States. He has to be taken seriously and he didn't bomb the Soviet Union or whatever. He was conducting reasonable policies. Some policies they would agree with; some they would disagree with.

Overall, the understanding and appreciation of Reagan improved during those five years partly because we were starting from a fairly low understanding and a low appreciation. You'd have to go back and look in detail at editorials and that kind of thing to give an in-depth answer to that question.

But I was dealing more with the day-to-day kind of stuff. Very early on, a couple of months into my presence there, the word came to the press office that shots had been fired at the DCM, Christian Chapman. He was the chargé. He came out of his house in the morning to get into his car -- I think he was being driven -- and realized that someone was firing shots at him. Christian Chapman was as close to a French intellectual as you could find in the American Embassy, educated in the French or in the French tradition. But like a good American, he ducked behind his car; shots were fired but missed him, miraculously missed him.

He came to the embassy where I asked him for guidance; our phones were ringing off the hook. What had happened, etcetera? I asked him if he would be willing to speak to the French press and despite concerns from the security people, he was. I will never forget the scene as we allowed French journalists into the embassy and Christian Chapman occupying a position there on the second floor of the embassy where the ambassador's office was, a very elegant position. He answered questions in both English and perfect French and basically the word that went out was that the American embassy chargé d'affaires had ducked behind his car, the bullets had glanced off and he was safe. That was about all there was to it at that time. No clear cut information on who the assailant was or whatever.

Little did we realize this was thrusting us into a new age. In 1982, anyone who wanted just walked in the front door of the embassy. We didn't have ID cards, badges. If there was any sort of control on who walked in the embassy, it was minimal. Somewhere, not too long after that, we got ID cards. The French resisted this, particularly the more senior employees. Lucette, for example, was accustomed to French journalists coming in and having a chat with someone in the embassy, perhaps the way it used to happen in the State Department. It wasn't just the attempted shooting of Christian Chapman that caused the change but it was part of the whole evolution at that time.

The Christian Chapman incident was November 12, 1981. It was two months later, January 18, that one of our military attachés, Lieutenant Colonel Charles Ray walked out of his house and was not so fortunate. Someone walked up and shot him once in the head. He was assassinated, murdered right there in the streets. He was married with two children, roughly the same age as my children

By that time, Evan Galbraith was there as ambassador. We all assembled in his office and I can remember to this day, Ambassador Galbraith was very quick except at this point, he seemed to be a little bit paralyzed. What should we do? We lowered the flag to half staff. I drafted a statement. He didn't like the statement. He thought it was the bland kind of thing you say every time something like this happened so he came up with his own version. He not only issued it in writing but verbally as well. He said he was "revolted" by the cold blooded murder. And he went ahead with a previously scheduled lunch with President Mitterrand.

The next day there was a funeral service at Notre Dame where Charles Ray was a regular parishioner. My job was to control and advise the French and other press on what they could and could not do in the service. So that was a big news making event.

It was not the only terrorism related incident we would have but it was the only time an American official would be killed while I was in Paris.

Q: Did it become clear later who was doing this?

BROWN: They did arrest somebody, a Lebanese. He was tried and sentenced to jail.

There was another incident a couple years later on a Saturday where somebody from the embassy was coming out of his house and was suspicious about a package under his car. He called the police. The French police came to check it out. It exploded and killed one of the French police and wounded the other.

And in March, 1984, there was a shooting at our consulate in Strasbourg. The Consul, Bob Homme, was struck twice but was not seriously wounded. It was a miracle. If I recall correctly, the shooter turned out to be the same guy that shot and killed Colonel Ray.

The point is that along side having a great time going out to lunches with French journalists, there was this nasty backdrop that always involved questions from the media. It was a wakeup call to everybody and it was part of a pattern.

I mentioned all these lunches I had with the French journalists. At some point, I decided I would make a list of the restaurants I had gone to. I still have the list. It became an embassy directory of the French restaurant world. I probably should have made more of it than I did. I could have made some money off it or gone into the restaurant review business.

New subject: During my first year, I got a call from the Elysée press person -- basically the President's press person -- inviting my counterparts from five other embassies and me for a planning session for the G-7. You recall that the first G-7 meeting took place in Rambouillet, France, in 1975, hosted by Giscard d'Estaing and then it went to every other member of the G-7 which meant that by 1982, France was due to host it again. So with my counterparts from five other embassies, we went out to Versailles. The French were going to use Versailles for the 1982 G-7 meeting.

At a subsequent meeting, we were asked what the needs were for the respective press corps in covering the G-7. The Germans, Italians, Canadians gave rough estimates of what they might need. The Japanese said they would need something like 22 typewriters, 18 telex machines. They just had it down precisely, very Japanese like.

As for me, I had to say "well, we have asked the White House but they really haven't responded." As we all know, the White House just didn't march with the other countries on these things. The White House press office and the whole White House on any presidential visit had their own way of operating.

Over the course of the next several months leading up to June, 1982, I hosted any number of White House press advance teams and people from the White House transportation office for innumerable visits to the sites, discussions about photo ops and everything else leading up to the President Reagan's visit in 1982 which was the biggest presidential visit that I had ever been involved in and probably ever would be involved in. Talk about President Reagan's image in France.

I describe this as three visits. There was President Reagan's bilateral visit to France. This was his first visit as President of the United States to France and so it was a state visit with reciprocal dinners at the Elysée and at the ambassador's residence. It was rare to have two official dinners and President Mitterrand came to the residence as a guest. Mitterrand would never have gone to any other ambassador's residence for a dinner but an exception was made for the President of the United States.

There was also Nancy Reagan in France and a whole team with vast resources went into that visit. And finally, there was President Reagan's attendance at the G-7 summit meeting. I worked my tail off in the preparations. I worked very intimately with people in the White House press advance office, including especially with a very good guy named John Dreylinger. Unfortunately, his name came up often during the Clinton years in connection with the so-called Travelgate issue. I knew every one of the probably 25 photo ops at Versailles. I was intimately prepared for that meeting.

It was also a lesson to me on how the White House big foots everybody else. Yes, I got to stand at certain points along the way but the White House would never entrust anything solely to embassy people. The White House staff, many or most of whom were political appointees, would ultimately have responsibility for everything.

I did make a good impression on Larry Speakes, who was the White House spokesman. He had replaced Jim Brady, wounded in the assassination attempt. Larry Speakes liked me and I liked Larry Speakes. I got high praise for whatever it was that I did, even though it seemed to me at the time I was mostly standing at some place waiting for a photo op to take place.

A couple things characterized that G-7 meeting. I think it was the only time that Alexander Haig came to Paris as secretary of state. He was something of a show of his own which the White House didn't particularly like.

It was also extremely hot and the press operation was in the Orangerie at Versailles; the Orangerie was a hot house designed to allow fruits to grow year round. The working conditions were absolutely atrocious. If the French had hoped to call attention to the magnificence of Versailles, that failed because it coincided with the Israeli invasion of Lebanon and the Sabra Shatila massacres. All news attention was focused on that event and very little on the G-7 meeting at Versailles.

But I do have vivid memories of it, of lost sleep and long days.

Q: How about Nancy Reagan? She was quite a power unto herself. I was wondering how you found BROWN: I really wasn't too involved in it. Somebody else did all of that.

Jumping ahead several years, when Reagan came to Moscow and I was the PAO, we had all the various advance teams and specific site assignments. Everybody on the staff was assigned to some particular group or location such as the university, the writer's club, Red Square or wherever. There was a woman on my staff, an assistant cultural affairs officer, and we assigned her to the Nancy Reagan team. She came to me one day in high dudgeon and said that she didn't like this at all. It was sexism. As a woman, she was being assigned to Mrs. Reagan while everybody else was being assigned to President Reagan. I said, "Susan, first of all, a lot of women on the staff are being assigned to President Reagan but somebody also has to be assigned to Mrs. Reagan. Secondly, you're in the cultural section and most of her program will be culturally related. And thirdly, I can tell you that at the end of this event, you will have had the most interesting experiences."

She came to me later, perhaps still offended that she had been assigned to Mrs. Reagan but she acknowledged that she had had very interesting experiences while the rest of us again stood around and waited for things to happen or listened to speeches. She got to see icons and attend cultural events that nobody else got to see.

I don't specifically recall much about Nancy Reagan's program in Paris but there were probably some similarities.

Q: On that trip to Moscow I have talked to Nick Burns and others. They said the whole party ended up three days in Helsinki before they came to Moscow. I think that was the trip because her private astrologer had said that if they arrived at a different time or something it would be dangerous or something. Maybe it was that trip.

How did this G-7 thing work out from your perspective?

BROWN: The visit ended on a Monday and we went to Orly Airport, waved goodbye to Air Force One and to President Reagan. I so wished that it had ended on a Thursday or Friday so that I would have a few days to recover. Instead I went right back to the office.

From a practical point of view, some of my USIS colleagues or people back in Washington seemingly forgot that I had just been spent five or six days nonstop on President of the United States-related activities and they would ask me some mundane question about a work related project. I was physically exhausted by the end of this visit. I didn't have this great uplifting sense of satisfaction. I had put a lot of time into working with the White House advance people only to realize, come the time of the visit, that my role was pretty minimal. I didn't expect it to be maximal, certainly not involved in substance, but you were never entrusted with any responsibility because the White House wanted to hold all that responsibility to itself.

Was I the only person to feel this way? I mentioned our DCM, Jack Maresca. Jack was a very controlling kind of guy. President Reagan came to France three times while I was there. First was 1982, Versailles. The second was 1984; I'll talk more about that later, the 40th anniversary of D-Day. And the third was a quick visit to Strasbourg and the European Community. Jack Maresca was as involved as I was with the White House advance teams for each of the first two visits. By the time of the third visit, he said "I don't need to be here" and he went on leave. He realized that the White House comes in and they just take over everything.

At the end of the Versailles visit, Ambassador Galbraith felt somewhat the same way many of us did about the behavior of the White House staff. We had a wheels-up party that did not involve the White House party. Ambassador Galbraith was as offended as everyone else by how we were treated and made some pointed remarks about manners that gave all of us a good reason to laugh and to relax a little bit. He did not include President and Mrs. Reagan in his criticism.

For me personally, I had become well and favorably known to the White House press office. A year later, when it was the turn of the United States to host the G-7, the Reagan administration chose Williamsburg, Virginia, as the site. I was invited back to the United States and I attended the G-7 meeting in Williamsburg. My job was to work with the French press, attend their briefings, report back to Larry Speakes on what the French were saying, try to encourage their coverage of something other than just the G-7, the Williamsburg scene, that kind of thing.

I also went to the G-7 meeting a year later in Bonn and in 1986, I went for the only time in my life to Japan. I went again at the invitation of Larry Speakes and company to the G-7 meeting in Tokyo, to cover the French press, report back on what their take was, how they were dealing with the issues. That was heady, that was fun, a good ego trip.

Let me mention some of the other newsmaker things that kept me busy.

On September 15, 1982, right at the end of a visit from Mr. Wick, we learned that Princess Grace of Monaco had died in an automobile accident. Soon after, we got the word that Nancy Reagan would lead the American delegation to the funeral so I and others, including Lucette Beal, were sent down to Monaco to work particularly with the American press who came along with Nancy Reagan. Her press person was Sheila Tate and I met with her.

On the day of the funeral, September 18, I had the experience of being right across from the cathedral as the whole funeral party led by Prince Rainier walked down the street. I was really very moved. I didn't have much of an impression of Monaco prior to that time except I knew it was a gambling mecca. Clearly, the whole community led by Prince Rainier was grieving for the loss of their princess, Princess Grace of Monaco, and I had a firsthand seat, not a seat, but I was standing right across from the doors to the cathedral as everyone came by.

November 11, 1982 was a holiday and I got the word that Brezhnev had died. I called the Ambassador. He was having breakfast with Henry Kissinger but he called me back a few minutes later. I went in to the embassy. Kissinger was staying at the ambassador's residence. A lot of French knew about the visit and there were a lot of requests to interview Kissinger so I went over to the residence and was asked to coordinate.

I tiptoed in to the room where he was meeting with a French visitor. I had never met the great man before and I asked him if he would like me to try to coordinate media requests. To my surprise, he was very cordial and very appreciative. He explained that he had a contract, I think, with ABC and had to do ABC first but after that, he would do any number of interviews.

We used two rooms at the residence. He did the interview with ABC and then we moved him next door to do a follow on interview with a pool of French TV networks and then we moved him back to CBS and NBC. I think he did four interviews quite willingly on his memories of Leonid Brezhnev.

It was the only time in my career I encountered Henry Kissinger first hand. Fortunately in contrast to other people's experiences I found him quite easy and cordial to work with.

In October, 1983, I had one of my busiest weeks. It was on a Sunday that we woke up and heard about the bombings in Beirut, the Marine headquarters there. 250 American marines killed there. The second largest number of deaths was among French so there was an American-French link and the ambassador did not hesitate. He went on French television that same day, didn't check with anybody. I can't tell you at this point what he said but I thought it was very courageous of him to do that. His words must have been along the lines of loss of life, our common loss and that sort of thing.

With him doing that on French TV on a Sunday night, the DCM, Jack Maresca felt confident to accept a radio interview the next day. I went along. I had great admiration for Jack Maresca; he was not an easy guy to work for but very, very professional. His French was far better than the ambassador's. In some ways, his reasoning and thought processes might have been less emotional and more analytical and he did a really good interview. I couldn't tell you today what he said but I do remember those two interviews; the ambassador on Sunday night on TV and the DCM the next day on the radio. We really got our message out.

That was Sunday and Monday and on Tuesday, the United States invaded Grenada. Again, we were up in the ambassador's office, the DCM, somebody from the political section and me. Ambassador Galbraith was chomping at the bit. He wanted to go out and make a statement. The problem was nobody really knew what was going on. We didn't have guidance. We didn't know what the whole story was except the ambassador was sure he did. Everyone else was advising him to be cautious about this because we didn't fully understand but he went ahead

Q: The real concern was Americans on the island, students.

BROWN: And we were going to go in and rescue the Americans at the hospital and elsewhere. Whatever the case, the ambassador looked at us who were around him hesitating and didn't have a very charitable view. He went on television and debated Serge July who was the editor of Liberation, one of the left of center newspapers and he didn't come out too well. I think he lost the debate. He didn't come out too well on TV and he came out even worse in the eyes of Secretary of State Shultz who was in Paris on Thursday of that week.

I think the ambassador made some statement suggesting that the Grenada invasion had been planned two weeks earlier. He was really off the reservation. When Secretary Shultz arrived on Thursday, I linked up with John Hughes, his press spokesman and it was clear to me with all the body language that the ambassador was going to be disciplined by Shultz for going beyond what he should have.

That was an up week for the ambassador and a downer. I am sure in his view you won a few, you lost a few.

Q: Did the ambassador later acknowledge that maybe he'd gone too far?

BROWN: He did, maybe not publicly, but I am sure when he looked in the mirror, he said I should not have been quite so outspoken. Regarding his statement that the invasion had been planned two weeks ahead, he did say something about being misquoted.

Amidst all this, the Beirut bombings, the Grenada issue and the Shultz visit, we had a visit from Director Wick and that was always a full load. He made a speech that week; we had to record that and the Q & A session. I set up a lunch for him with two leading, English-speaking French journalists; a woman named Christine Ockrent and a man named Leon Zitrone. At the time, they were as well known on the French scene as any two network nightly network people are today.

Wick liked me personally but he was wondering during that period if we should have in our Western European capitals a super press attaché, not a career Foreign Service officer but someone from the outside who would really know how to get out there and get home the message. I have always felt good that Christine Ockrent and Leon Zitrone both rejected the idea. "You don't need a super press attaché. We deal quite well with the press office at the embassy, thank you."

That was October, 1983. It was almost two years later that Galbraith gave an interview to John Vinocur of The New York Times just as he was leaving and in that interview he criticized Foreign Service officers for not having guts. I won't take the time now to describe the repercussions but the State Department issued a formal statement disavowing Galbraith's remarks. George Shultz issued a less formal statement in which he said the ambassador's tongue ought to be tied. Galbraith found himself backpedaling and apologizing and saying he didn't mean individually that Foreign Service officers lack guts. They don't have the guts to stand up to their superiors and challenge. I think what he may have had in the back of his mind was this whole Grenada thing when he wanted to make a statement and people were advising him to be cautious.

Q: Did you sense that he during the time you worked with him sense that he was looking at you all and judging you all none too favorably?

BROWN: He may have been. I don't want to single myself out but he liked me because I, in my own interest, kept enabling him to do press contact work.

Let's talk a little bit more about what motivated Galbraith. He went to Paris and in so many words, he said I am a businessman but I don't want to be a super commercial attaché. I don't want to be a super political officer, spending all my time delivering notes to the foreign ministry. I want to go out and espouse Reaganism, Reaganomics and any opportunity speaking or otherwise to do that I will do it. I don't have to check first, I don't have to ask permission. I know what the policy is.

Very early on, we were doing one of the morning press briefings. He had given an interview to French TV in Washington before he came out and the embargo was that the interview was not to air until he presented his letters of credentials. Well, it ran before he was in France but he hadn't presented his letters; they jumped the gun.

I was told to call and make a little protest. I did. I called, I knew the guy at which ever French TV network it was. He apologized. I went back to the ambassador's office and said I had called and talked to him and he apologizes. What more can we do? Everybody nodded.

At the end of that meeting, the ambassador asked me to stay behind along with PAO and he basically said what I just said. I want to do press work and I don't have to check with people. I want to be pro active. I want to get out there and give interviews and talk about Pershing missiles and Reagan economics and he did and it really made my life interesting.

I could say to journalists, "You want an interview with the ambassador? Yes. You want to talk to the ambassador about this subject? Yes."

Along the way, there were some bumps and there were some things he may have regretted. I didn't appreciate him saying Foreign Service officers don't have guts but I have to be honest and say he really made my life interesting. I think overall he did what he set out to accomplish. Probably he advanced the U.S. national interest by espousing what he saw as U.S. government policies.

We had innumerable high-level official visits. We had three by the president; I don't know how many by the vice president, even more by the secretary of state and just as many by the secretary of defense, to say nothing of many other newsmakers farther down on the food chain. We had the one Haig visit and that was Versailles. About a month later, he resigned to be replaced by George Shultz.

Shultz and Weinberger talked to the press every time they came to Paris. Shultz was bland; Weinberger was outspoken and imminently quotable. But in the long run, I was much happier we had George Shultz where he was and we survived Cap Weinberger.

In December, 1982, Shultz came out for a meeting with his counterpart, Claude Cheysson, the French foreign minister. I think there was a gas pipeline issue, something we were not seeing eye to eye on. Cheysson reminded me of Christian Chapman; he was a French version of Christian Chapman, totally bilingual. There wasn't even a hint of the Gallic accent in his English.

Shultz had a press conference (in my diary, I wrote that it was "technically successful but substantively very bland”) and the traveling press filed their reports. There were always 8, 10, 12 journalists who came along with the secretary of state. Parenthetically, these were really serious journalists. Some of them had been covering the State Department for so many years that they had a longer mental record of foreign policy than the incumbent secretary of state. They were very unlike the White House press corps with a lot of big egos and people looking for a headline; the State Department press corps was a very serious group of people.

So Shultz had his press conference and I fed back to John Hughes, the press spokesman for the State Department, some of the early reaction and that went to Shultz and he said, “What? This isn’t what I said at all. You are totally misinterpreting.”

Shultz was trying to calm down, put to rest the idea that the U.S. and the French were not seeing eye to eye and that’s not at all the message that went out that day. John Hughes, I think, was probably the best press spokesman at the State Department that I worked with, a former Christian Scientist Monitor journalist, a very solid individual, in it for the professionalism of it, not for the ego trip and that kind of thing.

I got the word that Shultz and Cheysson were having a black tie dinner at the Foreign Ministry but at the end of that dinner, they would again meet with the press to clarify things, at 10:30 at night. The American journalists covering Shultz had gone off for a night in Paris, nice dinners and whatever. We certainly didn’t have text messages or e-mail or anything like that but somehow we rounded up as many as we could and went to the Quai d’Orsay. At the end of the dinner, Cheysson and Shultz sat down again with the press and talked in English for about an hour. I had my little cassette tape recorder. I kept praying that the red light would keep glowing, that my batteries would not die.

I recorded this press conference and went back to the embassy. It is now past midnight. The phone rings, Jack Maresca who says, “Phil, we have to have that transcript.”

I protested, “It’s midnight. It can wait until tomorrow. I can go home and get a good night’s sleep.”

Jack says, “No, we have to have it tonight.”

In my heart of hearts, I said to myself let’s get it out of the way tonight. I don’t want to go home, sleep come back and face it tomorrow.

We got hold of an OECD secretary to type. She sat down in front of the Wang computer and I am playing this tape recorder, pushing a button. Half a sentence, half a sentence would be typed. We worked all night long. We worked until 6 or 7 in the morning and came up with a 25-page transcript cable.

Well, that probably did more to advance my Foreign Service career and increase my promotion rate than anything I had done to that time. John Hughes at the end of the visit sent out the perfunctory note praising the work of the PAOs in the various posts. But he tacked onto it, I will immodestly quote, “A special word about Phil Brown who worked straight through the night doing a transcript and who was a superior fellow all around.” That was widely circulated to my betters, Charlie Wick and whomever.

It was donkey work. It was nothing but pure drudgery. It was not creative policy making but it increased my profile and probably my promotion rate. I will never forget the reaction to it.

Q: Is there anything we should be covering in the next session in France before we move on?

BROWN: I could talk about any number of things ranging from the 1984 Los Angeles Olympic Games to some plane hijackings. We will talk about those next time.

Q: Okay, great.

Q: Today is the 8th of May, 2012 with Phil Brown.

BROWN: Let’s continue with my five years in France. I’ll preface it by saying I have a lot of resources to look at -- journals and files -- and once again, I am struck by how fortunate we, I always say we, were to have had this stretch of time overseas. From 1977 through 1990, we were overseas: three very interesting years in Moscow during the Cold War and then, when very little was happening in Moscow, this five year period in France. In future sessions, I’ll talk about our return to the Soviet Union and three more very memorable years there. I turn the pages of my journal and day after day, I am struck by what an interesting time we lived in. We took full advantage of it, both personally and professionally.

So what I thought I would do today is to go through and touch on some of these experiences from our years in France, maybe not go into them in too much in depth. Some may seem trivial; others were more substantive and most of them in chronological order. I have touched on a number already.

I talked about working as the press attaché at the embassy, the wonderful French staff that I had and Ambassador Evan Galbraith who was very happy to encounter the press. He wanted to be active both with the print press and the audio visual world. He felt very confident. He didn’t feel he had to check with headquarters to know what he should say. Most of the time he did quite well and a few times he really got himself in trouble doing it. For better or worse, it made my life very interesting.

I talked about the Versailles G-7 summit of 1982, my first intense experience working with the White Office Press Office, how I got myself on the G-7 circuit and became known to Larry Speakes, the White House spokesman. He liked me, got me involved in subsequent G-7 meetings.

My ambassador in the Soviet Union had been Tom Watson, former head of IBM. We continued our relationship after he left Moscow and after we moved to Paris. It wasn’t unusual for him to take his own plane and fly to Paris. We would see him there from time to time. On one particular occasion, he called and said he wanted us to attend a dinner with the board of IBM which was meeting in Paris. At the last minute, he and his wife could not attend but he arranged for us to go to the dinner nevertheless.

We were there with some pretty high rollers. I was reminded recently when I saw the obituary for Maersk McKinney Moeller, the Danish man whose family created Maersk, the big shipping firm. When I saw his obituary, I remembered we sat with him and his wife at that dinner at a restaurant in Paris called Le Faugeron. That wasn't a typical night out in Paris but it was the kind of thing that made it fun.

A frequent visitor to Paris was Vernon Walters, General Walters, who wore so many hats it was hard to keep up with all of them; he was multilingual and bilingual in French and any time he came to Paris, he was good for an interview. We could usually line him up with TV because they loved his outspokenness and his fluency in French.

Another note about people like General Walters or any number of senior officials. I have frequently mentioned Lucette Beal, the senior French employee in my office who had been with the U.S. government since 1948. It was typical of these people like General Walters that when they came to the embassy, they'd stop first to see Lucette and then they'd call on the ambassador or political counselor. It was partly a courtesy, it was partly friendship but I also think they got a reading on what was going on in France from Lucette. I shouldn't say just Lucette because we also had Monique and Monique and General Walters were twinned.

Q: I think there was a time when De Gaulle was speaking and he used Walters and I think it was a public occasion. And Walters translated. And De Gaulle said 'tres bien' about Walters.

BROWN: His ability in the language but also his willingness to speak to the press. And as I said, he wore many hats, military, civilian and otherwise.

I had a lot of professional contacts at the International Herald Tribune but also friends we knew there in other ways. We knew Charles and Laurana Mitchelmore both through the IHT and the American Church of Paris.

Our first Thanksgiving in Paris, they invited us to their home for dinner and I learned that one of the guests was a singer but I didn't know who other than she had some association with the opera. Everyone simply called her Flicka. After the dinner was over, I learned her name was Frederica von Stade, a personal friend of our hostess for that night. Frederica Von Stade is one of the leading sopranos in the opera world.

There was something called the Anglo American Press Association, English speaking journalists, and they had a luncheon that the ambassador attended. He came back very, very pleased with the whole experience. That was good for me and good for my relationship with him.

It loosened him up all the more and so one night early 1982, soon after the assassination of our military attaché and the beginning of terrorist type activities in Paris, Ambassador Galbraith agreed to do an interview for Nightline with Ted Koppel. Pierre Salinger, who was by then resident in Paris and working for ABC, came by at the ambassador's residence. I was there to coach the ambassador on what it would be like doing an interview with Ted Koppel. It was an awkward situation because we could see an image of Ted Koppel but only the ambassador could hear his voice. The ambassador had an ear piece that allowed only him to hear the question. So there would be silence in the room and then the ambassador would speak because only he was hearing the voice. It created the image of this daft man sitting in the corner of the room occasionally talking to the wall but it worked out and it was just part of the ambassador's increasing level of confidence in doing interviews.

Q: As a press attaché in an extremely important country, how important was the ambassador's connection to the press both French and foreign, did you feel he advanced the cause?

BROWN: I think he felt it was very important. As I said last time, he did not want to be a super commercial attaché. He made that point. He was a businessman. He didn't want to be carrying diplomatic notes to the foreign ministry so he was looking around to see what he could best do that would keep him busy? He had a lot of energy and so he felt that public diplomacy, I think we must have used the term though I don't think he ever thought of it in those terms, public diplomacy was where he could do the most good.

So he certainly felt he was advancing the cause even though as I say, on occasion he got himself in hot water. It made him certainly a higher profile individual because people would read his name in the paper. They'd see him on TV. After almost four year there, he sort of wore out his welcome and he was not that much of a newsmaker.

But did it really have a major impact on U.S.-French relations? I doubt it. Relations were going to go where relations were going to go because countries like the U.S. and France act in their own best interests.

Q: How did he relate to the fairly extreme leftists?

BROWN: He didn't and I think we discussed this last time. We did not have contact with the far left press, with L'Humanité, the French communist newspapers. He would not have agreed to give them an interview.

He got himself in trouble by very critical remarks about communist ministers in the Mitterrand government. He did not relate to the far left, the communists.

I will say there were a couple of times when we had encounters, I can't recall now specifically with whom, I wouldn't say the far right but with the right and Galbraith would sometimes say, "Gosh, that guy goes a little bit further than I go."

To answer your specific question, there wasn't contact with the left.

I was working intensely. During my first year, I thought I would never get a break. It was thanks to contacts with a couple of French journalists, Jean Leclerc du Sablon and Marie-Claude Descamps from Le Matin, that we went off on our first ski trip in France in winter of '82. It was memorable.

Q: We used to listen to the French news here in Washington. When the ski weekends come the traffic

BROWN: That was the thing I learned. These school vacations or long weekends, there was no way around them. Vacations were not staggered. We left in the wee hours of the morning to try to beat it but to no avail.

But it makes a difference when you go skiing with somebody and the next week you invite him to a breakfast with a visiting newsmaker at the ambassador's residence. Or if you are calling to discuss something you didn't like in their reporting.

Q: You mentioned G-7 meetings. From the public affairs side of things, how did these meetings usually come out?

BROWN: That's a big question and I am not prepared to add much to what I said last time..

What I do recall about the Versailles summit was that with all the effort that the French had put in to this -- closing Versailles to the public and transforming it into the venue for the meetings, the press and everything else -- two things could not have been anticipated. One was the intense heat, especially in the Orangerie; this greenhouse for tropical plants became an impossible place for the press to operate in.

The other was the Israeli invasion of Lebanon at that same time; whatever news that was coming out of the G-7 was overtaken by the events in Lebanon.

The next year when the U.S. hosted the G-7 in Williamsburg, my job was to deal with the French press. That was specifically what I was assigned to do. I could go to their press briefings, unless they were closed and they generally were not closed, hear what they were saying and feed that back to the White House in case there was anything that we wanted to address.

What worked quite successfully was that after a couple of days of reporting economic news and politics, a lot of French journalists looked around and wondered "what is this place, Williamsburg?" They were looking for a new story, a new angle. A year earlier, there had been the 200th anniversary of the Battle of Yorktown, just down the peninsula. At least geographically some of them were familiar with that area. There were some good stories about Williamsburg, about William and Mary College (which is where the press center was) and about Thomas Jefferson and I was able to answer a lot of questions and point people in the right direction for interviews and information.

By the way, the White House paid to air condition the building on the William and Mary campus that was used as a press center. I think they had the Versailles Orangerie experience in mind.

Q: In the Battle of Yorktown they had troops there and the French fleet had kept the British from relieving

BROWN: That's why there was also much emphasis on the bicentennial in France because it was a glorious moment in U.S./French relations.

I had a call from Jock Shirley, a mentor of mine in late 1982, asking me if I was interested in bidding on the job of PAO, Moscow for the summer of 1983. That took me aback. I was barely in my second year in Paris. I had given some thought to returning to Moscow but not that soon so I turned him down. I said “no” to Jock. I really didn’t want to do it then. They found someone else, Ray Benson

Q: I know Ray because Ray and I served in Belgrade together.

BROWN: I eventually did replaced Ray in Moscow at a much more appropriate time for me in my career and a more interesting time in Soviet history but I didn’t like to say no to Jock. He said something at the time to the effect of: “Well, I will accept your no answer this time but it may not be as easy the next time.”

It wasn’t too much later that he called and said he wanted me to bid on PAO Brussels for 1983 or 1984. I was not the least bit interested. My quick analysis said Paris has three missions, three ambassadors. Maybe by that time we only had two because UNESCO may have been cut. We had OECD and we had the bilateral and of the two or three, the bilateral was by far the most important. I was press attaché in a big West European embassy.

Brussels had three missions, NATO, USEC and the bilateral, and the bilateral was the least important of the three. The fact that I was going to be PAO didn’t mean anything to me. One thing I did very well in my Foreign Service career was not to take a job just because it might be a stepping stone to something else. Take a job because it was interesting. So again I said no to Jock and he accepted my no and I got to stay.

About that same time, I was pushing to stay in Paris not just four years per the assignment but for five years because my daughter went there in eighth grade and I wanted her to be able to graduate after five years. I was making that case to Washington and I got a call one day saying “send us a letter saying you want to stay in Paris for five years because there is going to be a change of ambassadors and a change of PAOs and issues and other things and oh, by the way, I d like to stay because my daughter is going to be, for her schooling.” So I rephrased it and I did get my fifth year although to be honest, the real reason was the schooling.

Q: You earlier mentioned Pierre Salinger. He was one of the figures, a hold over from the Kennedy administration who was a name and continued to be a name. Was that a problem for you?

BROWN: No, it wasn’t a problem. In fact it was a big advantage. He was working for ABC then and he would quite happily receive Mr. Wick for breakfast or drinks and I’d go along. He said nice things about me and about the embassy and about how we were getting the U.S. message out. He never undercut us.

It is rather interesting that Wick thought he was going the extra mile because here he was representing a Republican administration but he was willing to speak to this former press man, under Kennedy, just an example of how open minded he could be. What I think he liked was associating with a famous name.

Pierre Salinger was a good guy, a friend. I remember going out to dinner with him one night. He lit up one of his cigars and I recall that I enjoyed it; ever since my youth, I have enjoyed the smell of a cigar because I had a friend who used to smoke them when we went to baseball games in Pittsburgh.

Pierre Salinger was also working with someone else at that time for one of these big coffee table books called Over Paris, Views of the City. I don't recall exactly how but I consulted with the man who was working with him on that book. So we liked Pierre Salinger.

Q: WorldNet; How did that work in France? The French seem to like to talk to people.

BROWN: I think Mr. Wick was ahead of the curve and I would say a lot of Foreign Service officers were behind the curve; some people dug in their heels and didn't think it was going to work. This was Mr. Wick was taking us out of our comfort zone.

It did not work real well initially because we were going through the trial and error stage, technologically. What is today taken for granted back then was a risk; you were never quite sure it was going to work.

The first couple of times we had newsmakers like Shultz or at least high profile people like Shultz. When you got down to the lower levels, it was hard to attract French journalists especially when these lower level people personally would likely as not come through Paris; General Walters or Fred Ikle. These people were available in person almost weekly so why trundle over the to the USIS office for a WorldNet?

Then they tried to get into different types of audiences; have an intellectual in with an author or something like that. We struggled with it initially, both for technical reasons and our unwillingness to get fully behind it and also because Washington wanted inflated reports on placement and audiences reached.

This was a period of martial law in Poland and we also had the "Let Poland be Poland" project of Mr. Wick's. It was different from WorldNet because he wanted us to place this specially created documentary on French TV and we managed to do that by calling in some chips. The French weren't comfortable about carrying a piece of American produced material on the Cold War.

Let me jump ahead to May 20, 1984, for one of the most amazing days I ever had in Paris. To retaliate for our boycotting the Moscow Olympics of 1980, the Soviets decided they would boycott the Los Angeles Olympics of 1984. Late on a Friday afternoon, a couple of months before the games were to begin, I got a call from French TV, TF1, saying they were going to discuss the boycott as part of their regular Sunday night sports programs called Sports Sunday, Sports Dimanche.

They wanted to have a debate about the Olympic boycott and they had invited the Soviet press attaché and now they would like to have a representative from the American Embassy. Literally this call came about 3 o'clock so I ran upstairs and explained to the DCM, Jack Maresca. I admitted that I would be nervous but when he suggested they recruit someone from the political section, that got my juices flowing. Jack talked to the ambassador and after very little deliberation, I was assigned to be the American Embassy representative on this program. Since it was the press attaché from the Soviet embassy, I would carry the ball for our side.

And so I did. Maybe it is a good thing I didn't have a whole lot of time to prepare. I spent Saturday and part of Sunday preparing for the debate but it wasn't the only thing I had on my platter that day. By that time, I was also singing in the choir of the American Church of Paris and we had scheduled a special concert that night plus my daughter was in a fashion show. So on Sunday, I sang the Schubert "Mass in C major" with the American church choir. What a wonderful experience that was. We did it by memory, this rather short mass, but we sang it well and then I went to Christine's fashion show.

And from there, I went to the headquarters of TF1, just around the corner from the American church, and debated the Soviet press attaché, Mr. Avdeyev on the Olympic boycott. They threw the ball to him first and he was well prepared. I probably should have interrupted him. He went on for several minutes but then I had my chance and my theme was basically that Americans believe you can have both freedom and security. For the Soviets it is a choice of either freedom or security. We could absolutely guarantee that their athletes would be secure while at the same time, people would have freedom of speech.

I made reference to my years in Moscow and even some reference to the KGB which is the Committee on State Security and how they interpret security and how we interpret security and obviously, if security is part of the name KGB, then it has a very different meaning in their context than in ours.

I went home and didn't sleep a wink that night. I tossed and turned wondering what the reaction would be. Jack Maresca, the DCM was the first person to greet me and he was indignant, not with me, but he felt that TF-1 had favored the Soviet, let him have more speech time than I had. But the ambassador was 100% on my side, congratulated me not only for what I did but for being willing to go do it. He felt he had set an example for people on his staff; not only he but the DCM and now the press attaché would be willing to go out and do this sort of thing.

I am not sure I ever want to do it again looking back. It was live TV and I could easily have stumbled. When we got to the station, my wife and daughter went along. The Soviet was by himself but he could not have been more courteous. Spoke English with us. But when he got on the set, he was a well-trained debater.

I remember that TV offered an interpreter. Of course, he didn't want an interpreter and I remember thinking to myself "I am so glad I don't have to say, yes, I want an interpreter." I did it in French and did very well. That was a day I will never forget. Ironically, no one taped it at the embassy. It had all come together late on a Friday afternoon so there is no record of it.

Less than a month later, I had another day I will never forget. After weeks and weeks of preparation and on-site visits, President Reagan came to Normandy on the 40th anniversary of D-Day. He came specifically to the Pointe du Hoc where he addressed still some living members of the units that scaled the cliffs of the Pointe du Hoc on June 6, 1944.

I had worked closely with the people in the White House press office on all aspects of the visit. I will be the first to point out when the big day comes, they don't pay any attention to you; they take over everything but I made many trips out there for the planning stages, to Normandy and specifically to the Pointe du Hoc.

On that morning, I was fortunate enough to be aboard a helicopter and to ride over the area to Cherbourg where the press planes came and where the press boarded buses back to wherever they were going. The roads are so narrow and the photo ops were so limited that journalists went to one particular spot and that's as far as each one could go that day.

For the visit, I was at Pointe du Hoc on a bunker that was the CBS base and with me there were Walter Cronkite and Mrs. Cronkite. While Walter Cronkite was off interviewing a couple of veterans from 1944, Generals J. Lawton Collins and James Gavin, I struck up a conversation with Mrs. Cronkite, reminding her we had seen her in Moscow when we were there. She said she remembered. She had a recollection of my wife and our dog. So when Walter came back over, she very kindly introduced me to him and we had a brief chat. Then off he went to interview President Reagan at the conclusion of his remarks. So it was a moving day from the helicopter ride in the morning to ending up at the press center in the afternoon.

I think it is still true to this day. There is no part of France where the American flag flew more prominently than it does in Normandy on June 6th. In 1984, there were still people who could remember the liberation, D-Day and the rest. Today almost 30 years later, there are not many people who can remember it as participants but the memory is still there and nowhere is the warmth of feeling towards the United States stronger than in Normandy.

This trip to Normandy was President Reagan's second visit to France. The first was Versailles, the second was Normandy. The third, in May, 1985, was a one day, no overnight, symbolic visit to Strasburg to address the European parliament, the first American president to do so. As always, the White House would send out advance teams. There would be opportunities to go look at the sites and everything else connected with a presidential visit.

I was in Strasburg in February, 1985 when an advance team came in headed by Mike Deaver, the president's image maker. A big group of Europeans came down from Brussels to Strasburg to meet with the White House officials and to talk about the arrangements for the visit. Mr. Deaver was too busy even to meet with them. Mr. Deaver did a lot of good things but I don't think that was one of his finest moments.

They had been to Munich -- this was the trip that would include the controversial stop in Bitburg -- and one of the White House press advance people was gloating about that stop. The highlight of the stop in Munich was that nine of them had used their diplomatic passports to buy BMWs at a big discount. Somehow that got under my Anglo-Saxon, Calvinist sense of what is right and wrong and I will now go on record for the first time that it was I who passed that information to the Newsweek correspondent in Paris, Scott Sullivan.

Q: I remember reading about this.

BROWN: It appeared in the Newsweek Periscope section and it led to a White House examination of the issue. The White House concluded that there was “nothing per se illegal or unethical” about this but nevertheless, they rewrote the rules. One or two of the people who bought cars using this method were Secret Service people. It bothered me.

To keep things chronological, let me recall another unusual experience that dates to December, 1984. At some level in Washington, I don’t know whether it was the White House or not, there was concern that we were not getting our message about Central America across to European audiences. This was the period when the U.S. was concerned about the Sandinistas in Nicaragua and their influence on the rest of the region. So along with PAOs from several West European countries, I traveled to Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Honduras and Guatemala over a period of ten days for a first-hand look at the situation there. The idea was that we would be better able to make the case for U.S. policies if we could say that we had actually been there.

One problem arose right away. Along with our concern about Nicaragua, we were holding up El Salvador as a model. But the people at the American Embassy there advised against our travel because of the security situation so we did not go there. It seemed rather ironic that we could safely go to Nicaragua but not to El Salvador.

I’m not sure how much I was able to draw on my experiences in my subsequent conversations and work in Paris but it was a learning experience for me – my first trip to the region, to an area that really was foreign to me and my foreign service experience.

On February 13, 1985, John Vinocur interviewed Ambassador Galbraith. The ambassador had now been in Paris for almost four years. I did not sit in on the interview. It was one of the very few times that either he didn’t invite me or I decided not to sit in.

Out of that came the article in The New York Times in which the ambassador, as Vinocur put it, talked of his “scorn” for the Foreign Service; we did not have a backbone, we weren’t courageous. That led to Secretary Shultz saying someone ought to tie his tongue, to the ambassador receiving protests from the local chapter of AFSA, a lot of hand wringing and soul-searching for the first time. His DCM did not know which way to go; whether to side with the masses in saying this was uncalled for or continue to hang on with the ambassador.

The Vinocur article provoked columns by Flora Lewis, the late esteemed op-ed columnist who lived in Paris. She took him to task.

I would never have imagined but individually Evan Galbraith, DCM Jack Maresca and Flora Lewis, none of whom was a shy character, none of whom ever had any lack of self confidence, all three separately asked me my point of view, my impression, my advice. What do you think I should say or do? After the local chapter of AFSA rose up, Galbraith said to me in so many words, did I make a mistake? He felt that he wasn’t talking about physical courage as much as the willingness to challenge and that kind of thing.

Jack Maresca, who was offended by what he had said but was still the loyal DCM, was very uncertain and even Flora Lewis at some point asked me about her column. Maybe it was a tempest in a teapot. I thought some of it had to do with that earlier time with Grenada when we didn't fully support the ambassador going on TV to talk about that event

Q: It wasn't that much of a tempest in a teapot within Foreign Service ranks.

BROWN: No, not at all.

Q: The Galbraith name in Foreign Service folklore is linked to that.

BROWN: And not unfairly. He backtracked and said he didn't mean physical courage. He said he was misunderstood and I don't think he would have looked some of us in the eyes right there in the embassy and said you don't have courage. But it was in the back of his mind. It was a thought that he had, there's no question.

For some of us close to him whose lives he had made professionally interesting, it was a hard to turn our backs on him. It was only a few months later that he left his position but I don't think it was necessarily linked to that.

From this same period, March, 1985, here's an example of the type of activity we had all the time. Defense Secretary Casper Weinberger came to Paris regularly and on this particular visit, we arranged for him to meet at the hotel where he was staying with Michael Tatu, one of the best known writers for Le Monde. I was very pleased the next day when there was a front page interview, Michael Tatu interviewing Weinberger and Weinberger putting his views on record.

You could say that anybody could do this. No French journalist is going to turn down an interview with the secretary of defense. Nevertheless, I was very pleased and it redounded to my credit that I was the go-between.

Weinberger had also agreed to do an interview with French TV. I don't remember the subject but it probably had to do with military hardware and during the interview, Weinberger was saying, whether he meant it or not, that the French had a great deal of technical prowess. Something like: "The French are very, very good in the field of technology, wonderful technical prowess. We don't always think of the French in that context but the French have a great deal of technical competence."

It was about at that point that the interviewer got a signal that a camera or the recording device wasn't working and we had to say to Mr. Weinberger, "I am sorry. We didn't get that. Would you mind?"

He said, "No problem." They rolled things again.

And off Weinberger went: "As I was saying, the French have enormous technical prowess and in the field of technology the French are leaders. The technical prowess of the French is unmatched.” He didn’t miss a beat. We were all smiling but I was a little tense for a moment. I thought he might stomp out of the room but he didn’t. He knew it was in his interest to get his views on the record. I was always rather glad that on matters of policy, he was counterbalanced by Secretary Shultz but for an interview, Weinberger was much more interesting.

I mentioned singing in the church choir in Paris. Our rehearsals were on Wednesday night and I would walk from the embassy across the river to the American Church on the Left Bank. The timing was perfect for me. I regularly worked six days. Wednesday was a halfway point of the week. It was a true break from what I was doing. There were always a bunch of Americans in town studying music so you never knew who was going to be there on a given night. There were always enough people for the tenor section that I didn’t have to worry about being alone.

In addition to singing on Sunday morning, we did special concerts. In May of 1985, the Sacré Coeur church on Montmartre dedicated a new organ and our choir was invited to be part of the celebration. We did some wonderful choral music including works by a French composer named Louis Vierne. That opportunity brought balance and spiritual pleasure into my life.

Q: You’d been fortunate because of your obvious interest in cultural life and cultural values both in France and in Russia too.

BROWN: The difference was that in Moscow, it seemed more accessible. Tickets were virtually given to us. It was maybe physically a little closer to us. We lived outside town in Paris so I always had to remember that when the concert ended at 10:30 or 11 o’clock, I’d have a long train ride to where we lived but nevertheless, you are right. The cultural, musical opportunities in both cities were considerable and there was overlap too. Some of the same people you had seen in Moscow, you would see in Paris for one reason or another; either they emigrated or they were on the circuit. In both cities, music provided me a balance to the intense press work that I was doing.

Two and a half weeks after that Sacré Coeur concert, we got word that a TWA airplane had been hijacked out of Greece and had been forced to land in Beirut. Jewish passengers on board were singled out. I think that was about a Friday of that week. The plane ended up in Algiers where women and children were released before the plane went back to Beirut. Those freed hostages were then brought to Paris and put in a hotel and the call went out that someone needed to be there with them.

I went in on Sunday. Part of the reason they needed to have someone with them was there was a lot of press interest. I spent an entire Sunday with those people. I was more than a press attaché. We wished we could follow the details minute by minute but we couldn’t. The French didn’t have much news on TV on Sunday. There was a midday program we watched but it had just had a little bit of information; then later in the day, we watched a TV program and I remember one of the ladies saying “oh, that’s my husband.” Whether or not that was the case, it was an emotional experience to be with those families that entire day while they waited for information. I did arrange for one or two of them who were willing to talk to the press.

Eventually the hostages were freed. Vice President Bush came out; he passed through Paris on his way to Germany to welcome the freed hostages and later, there was a reception at the ambassador's residence for the freed hostages who had come to Paris. I had the satisfaction of a lot of them thanking me for having spent that day with them. They didn't speak French and they appreciated me trying to keep them as well-informed as I could.

You think of a particular news event and you don't think Paris but somehow no matter what it was or where it was, it often spilled over to Paris.

Q: You mentioned, obviously the hostages, if any, usually up at least in that era, at our military hospitals in Germany. What about German French relations? Did you get any feel for that maybe in the field of interest in the press or anything like that?

BROWN: I can't give you a quick answer about French-German relations. I guess they were pretty good during those years. The process of post-war reconciliation was still underway.

Those were the times when the Germans were buying a lot of property in eastern France, particularly in Alsace, and you'd hear the French say if they'd only realized they could have bought that land in the 1910's and in the 1940s, they might have avoided two wars.

We talked before about the speech that Mitterrand gave on the SS-20 and Pershing modernization and the fact that he gave that speech in Germany was very important and of course, it endeared him to the U.S.

I remember talking to John Vinocur, whom I referred to regarding his interview with Ambassador Galbraith. He spent much of his career in Germany and then he was reassigned to Paris. I said to him, "How are you enjoying being here in France after all the time you spent in Germany?"

He said, "Oh, I would rather be back in Germany. It is much more interesting news environment there. They are going through a crisis." I don't know what crisis he was referring to in the mid '80s.

I said, "But John, France has crises of all sorts. They've got economic crises, governmental crises, and the liver crisis to which they attribute to all their ailments."

He said, "That's the point. The French always have a crisis so it is not news. When Germany has a crisis, then it is news." And that's why he wanted to be back there analyzing what was putting the self-confident Germans into a crisis mode at that time.

I went to the Bonn G-7 meeting in 1985. I can't remember it being much of a newsmaker. This was still Cold War time and the capital was in Bonn.

In July of 1985, Ambassador Galbraith left. He had been there for four years and despite bumps along the way, he and his wife had a large number of friends and were sent off with sincere best wishes. Within two days, there was a full page interview with him in Figaro in which he made some blatant comments about French internal affairs. Our chargé , Jack Maresca, found himself being called in to receive a protest about inadmissible statements about French internal affairs.

I remember thinking Jack is going to come back wringing his hands and wondering what am I going to do now? He came back basically laughing saying, “Look, we went through the ritual of their delivering the protest and me receiving it and that’s it. That is the end of Galbraith’s presence.”

Q: What sort of things? Were these things that Galbraith had been stewing in private conversations or something?

BROWN: He ran into the same trap early on and that had to do with the communist minister of transportation, Fiterman. In the Figaro interview on the 17th of July, 1985, he said the French Communist Party should be outlawed and he said he was convinced the right would win upcoming parliamentary elections. He wasn’t disagreeing with them on major foreign policy issues.

The irony was he spoke pretty good French and he was always uncomfortable calling himself a ‘liberal’ in French which meant more of a conservative to them. He could never tolerate anything that looked like socialist or public welfare programs so it might have been one of those issues.

Within days, we had Ambassador Joe M. Rodgers who didn’t speak a word of French but had raised a lot of money for President Reagan’s reelection in his home state of Tennessee. He and his wife Honey came out; very, very nice people.

I was very flattered when Jack Maresca, still the DCM, brought him down to the press office to look around. Jack described the press office as “the nerve center of the embassy” and said that we often knew about a news event before anyone else in the embassy. That was just the nature of how news traveled at that time. We had the AFP and the AP tickers. Journalists would call our office before they would call anywhere else. I felt pride in him telling the ambassador we were the nerve center of the embassy.

Ambassador Rodgers did not want any give and take with the press. He was not going into that. If he knew some event would be image creation, that was fine, but he did not want to do what Ambassador Galbraith did, understandably.

About that same time, we had another newsmaker. Rock Hudson was suffering from AIDS and he came to Paris to seek care at the Pasteur Institute. There was a report that someone had a cure for AIDS that he could benefit from only by coming to Paris. It became a news event over the question of whether Mrs. Reagan had been involved and whether she had intervened to ask that he be given special attention. She had and eventually, I was allowed to say that although not quite that baldly but to say to the press that Mrs. Reagan was very concerned about the health of Rock Hudson and hoped that he would be able to get the best of treatment in France. It was just a one or two day story and Rock Hudson then got on his 747 and went back to California where he died. Mrs. Reagan’s interest in the issue brought it a lot of attention.

By 1985, I had an additional number of people working with me in the press office. They had expanded the responsibilities and given me additional staff. Some were Foreign Service officers, others were political appointees who were rather interesting characters. One was a guy named Danny Wattenberg. His father was Ben Wattenberg, the rather well known conservative writer. I don't remember much about Danny.

Then we had a young woman named Sandy Sidey. She had been working right out of college in the 1980 Reagan campaign and ended up with Larry Speakes in the White House press office. She was a good young Republican. Her dad was Hugh Sidey, well-known columnist for Time magazine. Sandy was a delightful person. She didn't ask for any special favors because her dad was Hugh Sidey or because she had worked with Larry Speakes at the White House. She was quite willing to do all the grunt work of going through the AP or the AFP tickers or running upstairs to get the cables or working on transcripts. She was a real gem. And the French liked her very much.

\ I mentioned that Joe Rodgers didn't speak any French but one day in September of 1985, I went up to the ambassador's office and was told the he would soon be leaving to go back to the United States on an issue on an issue that was described as RITA Ptarmigan. This had to do with competition for a DOD contract on some battlefield communications technology and the French program was called RITA and the British had a competing program called Ptarmigan.

For some reason, the ambassador got it into his head that the French were not getting a fair shake back in Washington in the Defense Department and so he flew back to argue their case. This was a case where you could have had an ambassador who spoke perfect French and who knew Voltaire and all the great heroes of the Pantheon or you could have an ambassador who didn't speak any French at all but who was willing to go back and argue their case in Washington, to in effect to be the French representative in the DOD. They would obviously choose the latter.

I am not sure how the issue resolved itself but it was rather interesting that he decided this was an issue where . . .

Q: What was the issue?

BROWN: The Defense Department was going to contract for a highly sophisticated battlefield communications technology and the French program was called RITA which was an acronym for something. The British had a competing technology called Ptarmigan and the ambassador just thought somehow the French were not getting a fair shake and so he was going to go back to the Defense Department and at least make sure their case was being heard.

We are now to the summer of 1985. I had been in Paris four years, one year to go, and I went on home leave. That was the summer I shaved off my beard. I had had a beard for ten years. I came back feeling very self-conscious and people would say you've lost weight or nothing at all or you were better with a beard. I remember that very self-conscious period but I was back a very short time when I got a call saying Larry Speakes and company would like me to come back on a temporary assignment to work in the NSC in the Old Executive Office Building on the public diplomacy task force prior to the Geneva summit of 1985.

Recall the situation: Gorbachev has taken over in Moscow and is being touted as such a change from his predecessor. He is on the cover of Time magazine. He's a man who not only talks but he talks endlessly. He is now the great communicator. Ronald Reagan is running second. We have to do everything to make sure we get our message out especially with this summit meeting in Geneva scheduled for November of 1985.

I did go back for ten weeks as did a fellow named Bud Korengold who was with USIS in London. I lived in a hotel for that entire period and endured awkward, strenuous working conditions. We had very little information technology. Word processors were hard to come by. I recall researching an issue and I went to the library in the Old Executive Office Building. It had a clanging, wrought-iron door and endless shelves and the librarian, a woman, helped me locate a particular book. She pulled it off the shelf but before she handed it to me, she blew the dust off the top and I had to step aside to avoid the cloud of dust.

But the clumsiest aspect of it was just maneuvering in that NSC bureaucracy and trying to move anything forward. One of the few people who could help us move a document forward was the president's NSC advisor for Soviet affairs, Jack Matlock, with whom I had worked with on several previous occasions. I didn't know it at that point but he was soon going to be my ambassador for three years in Moscow so all in all, it was a good experience.

Q: Were you getting any feeling, obviously Gorbachev had gone through this period of gerontocracy in the Soviet Union. You can't exactly call Brezhnev or somebody like that a bright and interesting person but you had been a Soviet hand sort of qualifications or seen some of the things? Do we trust Gorbachev or what was happening?

BROWN: It wasn't a matter of trust. No and no one at that time was talking about the end of the Soviet Union or the end of Communism or anything of that sort but what had people frightened -- maybe that isn't the right word but what people couldn't cope with -- was that he was a communicator and because he was a communicator everyone was falling over him to get the interviews.

There is a parallel I draw here and it is probably not a good one but I can't help but do it. On the one hand, you've got these Brezhnev, Andropov and Chernenko stumble bums, unable to communicate, sickly men and on the other side, you have Reagan who was virile and communicative. We had such an enormous advantage. Victory is ours.

The parallel I draw is the current presidential campaign. Here is Mr. Romney being raked over the coals by Santorum, Gingrich. His staff says the wrong thing. Obama has an enormous margin on him and suddenly, Santorum and Gingrich are gone and they have effectively endorsed Romney and Romney is just about dead even with Obama in the polls. How quickly things can turn around, that's all I am saying. I think that is what had people scratching their heads.

People were saying that Reagan had met his match and that the more effective communicator was in Moscow. Forget for a moment that Gorbachev didn't have any better story to tell. Their economy was still in shambles and everything else was going wrong but people were very concerned that by the Geneva summit, we would be out argued by Gorbachev. That is why they created this special staff in the NSC to focus on nothing but interviews that Reagan would give, the timing, what messages we wanted to get out. I was just a little part of this.

Q: I have never heard of one of these before, such an effort, but something of this nature.

BROWN: I think we were created by the White House press office but Larry Speakes was the one who was instrumental in Bud Korengold and me coming back and put in a huge, high ceilinged room in the Old Executive Office Building along with a couple other people, my Foreign Service friend Gil Callaway among them.

The problem was we had responsibility but we didn't have any real authority. We couldn't make any final decisions. We could only pass papers forward and make recommendations. USIA people thought it was just great because they had all these ideas on how to get Reagan's message out. Now, they had three people in the NSC they could turn to. We were inundated by USIA people saying "hey, can you pass on our ideas? Can you pass on our suggestions?" We'd say "yeah, sure. We'll try but we don't have any magic way of getting these things over to the White House" which was still focused on the domestic press. In their hearts, they may have been thinking about getting their message out to the world but on a day-to-day basis, they were still going to focus on the domestic press.

In the end, I went to Geneva on the White House press charter plane and worked out of the press center. Even on arrival, Mr. Wick was being told "oh, the Soviets have their press center up and operating. They are getting their message out. You guys are so far behind the curve. You are not getting it out." That could be fairly easily dealt with by putting out a few American newsmakers. Bud McFarland was one of those who were doing a lot of the speaking for the White House at the press center in Geneva and in the end, it looked like unnecessary worries.

This was the summit meeting where Ambassador Hartman came out from Moscow. I got a message one day that he'd like me to come by his hotel room and he handed me this package which was a violin to be delivered to a violinist named Alexander Brussilovsky in Paris. I thought about the trouble he could have created and the deflection from the major news he could have caused by bringing that violin out but I passed it on.

On the way back, we stopped in Brussels. Reagan did a quick NATO briefing there and on the tarmac there was the first time I actually saw him as part of that assignment. We got to Washington and I said to someone in the White House press office that I actually saw the president in Brussels. I had been back there this whole time and I had never really seen him, which wasn't completely true. One day, I was in the White House because I did have access to the press office and was taking some piece of paper over and I realized there was a flurry coming in the other direction and I stood in one of these little stairwells with my back against the wall as a secret service man came by followed quickly by the President, the Vice President and James Baker. When I caught my breath, I realized that I had been that close to power.

But I told the guy at the White House I had hardly seen the president. He says, "Oh, really? We see him every day."

Not long after, after the summit, we have returned to Washington. This was the occasion when Reagan returned from Andrews and his helicopter landed on Capitol Hill and he went right before a joint session of congress to talk about his meetings with Gorbachev. Talk about stagecraft and drama. That was midweek.

The word to me was that I should come to the White House on Saturday and I would be able to attend the President's Saturday radio address. Along with Bud Korengold, we were pre-positioned in the Oval Office in late morning when Reagan came in.

There is a myth that Reagan so revered the Oval Office that he never appeared in there in anything other than a business suit. That is not true. At least on this particular day, November 23, 1985, he came in casual clothes he would wear around the ranch. He sat down at the desk. A woman there gave him some advice. This was live. Reagan delivered his remarks. He had his watch on and his wrist turned so he didn't have to turn his arm to see exactly the timing and he concluded his remarks, made a comment about how he had gone two seconds over but it was that perfect showmanship.

Then somebody said we have a couple of guests here today. So he came over and shook our hands and we got our pictures taken. He did make some jocular remark about "I don't usually come to the Oval Office dressed like this." I responded "well, I don't usually wear a dark suit on Saturday but this is a special occasion." Anyway, I got my picture taken in the Oval Office with President Reagan. I have two photos – one formal pose and one laughing.

After that, I went back to Paris. People there thought I had flown the coop forever. I had been gone for ten weeks but I still had an interesting six months in my service there.

On January 28, 1986, I was getting ready to go home when Monique came running into my office. They were showing on TV the explosion of the Challenger liftoff from Cape Kennedy. We all know that image. You might ask, "Well, what did that have to do with an assignment in Paris?" NASA had two overseas offices, one in Tokyo and one in Paris. So NASA had a full time representative at the embassy in Paris. The fellow there did not speak French but he was willing to go on TV so the next day I accompanied him to AN-2 for an interview about the Challenger and about the shuttle program. He didn't have any special information but the fact that he was a NASA representative gave him a certain cache. I remember saying to him that I bet the shuttle doesn't fly again for several years. He was dubious. I think I was closer to being accurate in that case.

A couple of days later, there was one of those moving services at the American Cathedral on Avenue George V in Paris, a service of remembrance honoring those who lost their lives in the Challenger explosion.

In mid-February of that year, 1986, there was a big flurry because Baby Doc had fled Haiti; he ended up on Lake Annecy in exile in France. I can't tell you the details but there was a question about whether the French were going to ship him out, send him to the United States. For a couple of days, we handled a lot of press questions on that subject with very little guidance from Washington. In any case, they did not send him out. He stayed on.

One thing I was able to do quite often was to invite French journalists to travel to the United States on IV programs, to be involved in newsmaker events at the embassy or to participate in NATO or U.S. military related activities. The aircraft carrier Eisenhower came into Monaco in June, 1982, right after the G-7 summit. We got to invite and accompany journalists on board.

In March, 1986, there was a plan to take a handful of journalists way up to the north of Norway where Norway has a common border with the Soviet Union. There would be NATO exercises up there. So I had a half dozen fellows rounded up to go when I got word that there had been a late season avalanche; 16 Norwegian soldiers on cross country skis had lost their lives in this avalanche in a place called Vassdalen.

If you extrapolate, 16 young men in Norway would be like 1,000 in the United States and to lose their lives on cross country skis where most Norwegians are as comfortable as anywhere was a major news event in Norway, a major confidence shaker. Despite this, we went. I went with these half dozen journalists all the way up to a place called Bardufoss, not far from where the accident had taken place. We had briefings on the NATO exercises and how NATO would be ready if there were any attack from the Soviet Union but it was all overlaid by the nation in shock and in mourning at the loss of so many young lives in an accident.

Not long after that we had another visit from Secretary Shultz. The most notable memory I have is that the press spokesman was no longer John Hughes, who I found to be the steadiest and the easiest to work with. Now it was a man named Bernard Kalb, brother of Marvin Kalb, both of them well known journalists from network news. Bernie Kalb didn't have his mind very much on news or on Secretary Shultz. The first thing we did was to head out to one of his favorite art dealers on the Faubourg St. Honoré, someone he knew well and did business with. We spent the morning with that person. It was a different approach to the job than what I found with John Hughes.

On April 15 of that year, 1986, the U.S. bombed Libya, retaliation for the nightclub bombing in Berlin. Tensions had been ratcheting up. There was all sorts of talk about how we might retaliate against Libya but when the news came through, I got a call in the early hours of the morning that the U.S. had bombed Libya. We were in for a lot of press questions, the biggest one being whether the French granted over flight rights? No. Did that affect the mission? Yes, it meant the U.S. had to fly much longer but of course, you went from there to "did the United States request over flight?" What was the nature of the request? What was the nature of the response? And we were not able to go into any detail on that because we didn't have the information. This was a low point during my time in France in U.S./French relations.

There were ramifications on a personal level. Our daughter was flying back to the United States two days later on TWA to look at colleges and my wife was very, very nervous. She went to the airport to put her on the airplane and came back saying she had never seen so much security. That reassured her.

By now, everyone who worked at the embassy had ID badges. When I arrived there, we you just walked in but now we had badges. It was about that time, the bombing of Libya, that the word went down to the Marines at the entrance to the embassy that even if the Marine knew you, even if he'd seen you every day for the last six months, he couldn't take that for granted. He had to look at your badge, eyeball you and make sure you really were the person on that badge.

The result of that was there was quickly a nice long line of Americans and French out in front of the embassy and we remarked that if the Libyans ever wanted to retaliate, we had lined up very nicely for them. They could come by and pick us off one by one. That policy got turned around fairly quickly.

It was also during that time that in Le Monde, there was an article headlined "l'Inquietude des Américains à Paris," worries and concerns among the Americans in Paris. I had been authorized to talk to a correspondent at Le Monde and to say that yes, we were concerned about security but that we were going about business as usual, that we were not being deterred. We had taken certain measures that we wouldn't go into detail on. I didn't know what those were except we were always told to vary your route to work. Don't come to work via the same route or at the same time every day, a policy I violated everyday because I came in from outside of town. That article in Le Monde caught the attention of a lot of people at the time, in part of this whole context of Libya and terrorism.

Q: Was there a bit of hard feeling about the British allowed us to use their territory?

BROWN: I think the bombers actually used came out of bases in Britain.

Q: And the French didn't allow.

BROWN: Sure. This was not looked upon kindly at all. Not only did it make the mission much more difficult but you had to fly much farther, refueling, a question of the accuracy of your raid and everything else and it just seemed to be saying we are not in this together. I think the French were calculating then whether they risked more by angering the United States or by angering some of the radical countries.

Q: Were you picking up discomfort with Islam coming out of Africa?

BROWN: It wasn't a major issue then, no. Of course, I referred to the hijacked plane between Athens and Beirut but nobody was talking al-Qaeda. Nobody was talking about radicalized Muslim youth in urban settings in Europe, that kind of thing. That wasn't a preoccupation. I think it was more focused on the PLO in that part of the world or on people like Gaddafi. No one could even tell you where Yemen was on a map. Iran was of course under the same leadership it is today.

Q: Was there any discussion about the absorption of Algerian and Moroccan youth coming in? Later it became a huge problem.

BROWN: Right. Of course, though those are two totally different situations for the French; the Algerians and the Moroccans. People were aware you had these increasingly large numbers of Arab youth in the suburbs of Paris and in other cities and that it was a potential problem but it wasn't yet associated in my mind with terrorism.

There had been a bombing on the rue Marbeuf in the Jewish quarter early in the 1980's but that was not necessarily linked to a group like al-Qaeda or to radicalized Muslim youth. I am not even sure who they eventually determined was behind that.

So there was concern and the embassy was tightening up and there was talk about putting bombproof devices on the wall that was very close to the road there but still it wasn't the conversation we have these days about radicalized Islam. It seemed to be more a case of isolated incidents and a lot more associated with Lebanon than with Algeria or Morocco.

Q: Did you get any information or feedback from our attachés concerning relations between the American military and the French military?

BROWN: They were good.

Q: That was my understanding.

BROWN: Very professional.

Q: I was a little earlier on consul general in Naples and admiral Crowe I remember saying that really, the French navy excellent cooperation even under Mitterrand, the socialists and all.

BROWN: I think they were and I think Weinberger in his many visits there had always had very professional relations with the French minister of defense.

If there were policy disagreements, they were at a different level but on a pure military to military level I think they were very good and very professional.

Q: Did you get any feel for the French political class? I used to watch these people on TV. For one thing, you didn't see a single dark face in that group and not many women.

BROWN: That's true and also true in terms of the people doing their television news coverage. The term French political class is appropriate. Most of the French political leaders came out of the same schooling, the same elite and they loved debates. As vigorous as the debates could be, I would image they knew each other very well. This class was a rather small inbred group of people. These televised debates would draw large audiences that I think in America would draw very small audiences. They had frequent elections. The presidential elections were every seven years. Mitterrand had been elected in '81 and wasn't going to be up for reelection until 1988 after we left. But there were frequent parliamentary elections and elections for local offices. And for most of it, you had divided government.

Q: Did you find yourself sitting around the table or something with the French and all start getting into highly intellectual discussions which were sort of not the sort of thing we would have in an American?

BROWN: Yeas, but for me, this did not involve sitting around the dinner table. It was lunches with French journalists. I said last time and I still say that most of the French journalists I dealt with were pragmatic. They were looking for a good story. They were looking for a good interview. They were hoping this lunch would pay off in being invited to something we were putting on.

There were a few where the conversations were not so much that, where the French person would do most of the talking. All I would have to do was throw out a little question and the guy would go on at great length and it was usually a guy. I can remember some of the names: Paul-Marie de la Gorce of Figaro or Henri de Kergorlay for example. The names sounded as august as their ideas. These were primarily idea people. They weren't interested in the next interview or getting a short answer to a short story. In fact, they seemed more interested in conveying information to me. I didn't find them all that interesting. I sometimes found myself out of their league and I'd look at my watch and think I need to get back to those phone calls in the office.

Let me mention another couple of other quick memories of my Paris years.

In spring of 1986, my last G-7, I got to go to Tokyo, flew halfway around the world, and attend the G-7 meeting again at the request of Larry Speakes, following the French briefings there. I used that as the opportunity to get out to Kyoto. It was the only time in my life I have ever been to Japan.

Ambassador Rodgers was not interested in hard news interviews but 1986 happened to be the bicentennial of the French gift of the Statue of Liberty so he wanted to do anything that was Statue of Liberty related. In fact, he put out some mandate that he wanted a Statue of Liberty event every day. Anybody could come up with a Statue of Liberty event.

I was involved in proposing the mother of all Statue of Liberty events. It led to a three-day trip the ambassador made to Alsace Lorraine which is where Bartholdi, the Statue of Liberty sculptor came from. It went way beyond what I had initially thought of. We flew out in the Minister of Defense's plane. For three days, we traveled along the wine road through Epinal, Luneville, Baccarat, Colmar and Mittleberghein with the ambassador being feted with parades and lunches and dinners and gifts in each town.

I had never eaten so much quality food -- six major meals in three days -- with each town vying to outdo the last one. I went along, among other reasons, to interpret for Mrs. Rodgers. Somebody else did the interpreting for the ambassador. It was what he liked, flying the flag, saluting the French, looking back at our long historical ties. He came back very, very satisfied with that.

On my return to Paris, I found a Superior Honor Award awaiting me for my pre-Geneva work. A few days later, with complimentary tickets from NBC, I went to Roland Garros to watch some of the French tennis open. I still have the seat cushions that I bought. It all brings back wonderful memories.

One of our last trips was a visit to Annecy to visit our older daughter Sarah, a Tufts University student, who was studying at a Tufts' summer program at Talloires on Lake Annecy. She was staying with a wonderful French family who lived in Veyrier-du-Lac. I recall visiting them, looking down at the lake and eating more wonderful French food.

Soon after, on the 11th of July, 1986, I ended my five years in Paris.

AURELIUS FERNANDEZ
Economic Officer, OECD
Paris (1982-1986)

Aurelius Fernandez was born in New York in 1931. He graduated from Bowling Green University, received an M.I.A. from Columbia University and served in the U.S. Army from 1953 to 1956. His postings abroad have included Bucharest, Vienna, London and Paris. Mr. Fernandez was interviewed in 1997 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: Well, that's all right, but you can add. Then in '82 you went to the OECD. What is the OECD?

FERNANDEZ: The OECD is the Organization of Economic Cooperation and Development. Which grew out of the Organization of European Economic Cooperation, the Marshall Plan after World War II. Something that Kingman Brewster had worked on, it was always fun to talk to him about those years, too. But at any rate, this organization they had, I guess, at the time 23 or 24 members, they were really all the west European, Canada, Japan, Australia, New Zealand, and it was a marvelous...I always like to say, as I wrote down here "the greenhouse of ideas." There was always a lot of activity there and they were high-level visitors. Secretary [George] Shultz came through, [Ronald] Reagan was Treasury Secretary, [William] Brock used to come through all the time as USTR, [Secretary] Malcolm Baldrige, as Commerce, Mark Feldstein was the Counselor of Economic Advisors, and Beryl Sprinkle. Well, I could drop more and more names to engage in what my dearly beloved Kingman Brewster used to say, "Sorry, Joe, the Queen hates name droppers."

Q: The first place you were there from '82 to when?

FERNANDEZ: '82 to '86, four years.

Q: What was the role of the OECD as opposed to the Common Market, the European Union, whatever you want?

FERNANDEZ: It was in a sense, freestanding. It was not a policy-making body. It was more of a...where policies surely were debated because statements were made about them. But it was, as I say, freestanding. One of the institutions that came out of the Marshall Plan where studies were about all the subjects and they were sort of forerunning for what became the G-7 summits out of that. There would be a direct relationship between what would come out of the G-7 summit, of the ministerials, and then what would go into these summits. There was just terribly exciting work going on in the field of trade in terms of commercial policy, in terms of communications.

There was once a long, long negotiation about transborder data flows. There was an economic policy committee. That Committee Three or Committee One that used to meet two or three times a year. And the Feldsteins and all the leaders, Sprinkles, and all the leaders of... thinkers of a number of countries would come together and they would sit there for two days and they would then debate policy. Well, these things didn't always make fast years. That is to say the myriad of ministerial meetings that were happening, for example, the ministries of transportation. Those things really didn't resound in the press the way the annual surveys that were done internally would just buzz through the whole press the world over. Or the ministerial readings where the Secretary of State and the President would come.

During the period I was there [Secretary] Shultz came once. He was the only Secretary of State who came to the meeting. But these were meetings where there was always negotiation beforehand about issues but where they would sit and talk about issues. One of the issues during those years was, for example, that as far the United States had information issues in foreign relations was the matter of our deficit, budget deficit. Well, they used to beat up on the United States for having this great budget deficit and drawing in foreign capital and such and just not contributing to world growth. This was something that the whole time I was there was pretty active because we did have a big budget deficit at the time. We always argued that as a percentage of our GNP we weren't as bad as a lot of other countries, depending on how you cut it. Our position was that our budget deficit was not as disruptively destabilizing as it was often charged.

We then came back in about '84, was it or so, with a proposal in the OECD again, focusing on the international information relations problem. It was focusing on the problem of structural adjustments that what our theme then became was that what we really needed in Eastern Europe was to free the capital in labor and merchandise markets and this was a theme that we pushed very, very hard in which we put an enormous amount of energy because this was in many respects a response to the charge that we had too big a budget deficit.

Q: Well, I'm still unclear, other than having meetings and debating things, sounds like almost an academic exercise as opposed to coming down with policy or something like that. What did you think?

FERNANDEZ: It tended more toward that. You know, it was more of this greenhouse of ideas than a policy-making... You know, out of which would come let's say, factual treaty type of commitments. You didn't get that. These really were policy statements. They were talked about as issues. We're talking about another fora. The trade issues we're talking about the GATT, and the size of the GATTs. There is where the contractual obligations would come in.

Q: Could you talk a bit about maybe, from your perspective national differences as they went into this. Take the French for example.. I mean, what role did they play?

FERNANDEZ: They played a very big role. Of course they were right in town so they could always send big people to the meetings. No prime minister was in. I don't know that the foreign minister was in, too. The minister of agriculture, the minister trade and people like this would be at the meeting. What was their role? It probably wasn't a great difference than it was in any other forum in which the ministers between the United States and France, whatever you wished. When I left the organization was headed by a Frenchman. But as I say, I don't think there was anything terribly unique about U.S.- French relations in that forum from any other place, believe me, just no differences of what the priority should be. I remember during this period Mitterrand had come to power.

Q: As a socialist.

FERNANDEZ: A socialist and a series of nationalizations if you will of the banks and such. These policies were not particularly beloved by the United States. He did in time have to make a U-turn. But when he came in, was it in 1980, '81, he began a policy, a regime of directing the economy which is a strong French tradition in trade which the United States is not very much in favor of.

Other issues that we would, trying to think of another one that came up. For example, there was the matter of subsidies to industries by the government in order to compete internationally. There was the matter of giving countries foreign assistance as a sweetener to get certain deals. One, let's see, the devolution of the telephone system, or whatever. These could be very flagrant instances of the French using ODA, Official Development Assistance, to sweeten the package that French industry would be negotiating with the country in order to enable them to get the contract because U.S. and other companies couldn't make these kinds of arrangements, which would run contrary to whether or not it should be done. The fora in which that was debated was called an export credit [arrangement]. According to that arrangement, [there were] two categories. For each of these categories a government could provide a certain percentage of ODA [Official Development Assistance]. Now there is where we really separated with the French. The United States and France were really fighting that out in the export credits arrangement because then that would become policy that the country would be committed to, in a sense codified their behavior or what was legal to do in our international relations with each other.

Now, what are the French things? Well, I think on the trade matters we were always tuning and throwing during this period. I could remember Bill Brock, he was our USTR, a splendid man with an outstanding staff of people. I just want to talk about USTR as far as the Foreign Service and the State Department and foreign relations. There is no question that the USTR was a lean and mean agency that had great influence, and still has, over our foreign trade relations. Greater, in many instances than the Department of Commerce and the Department of State. At State, the old economic officers will always [be critical] or complain about [USTR being] the stepchild of the whole thing. Well, STR was very much involved in trade policy. There was a trade committee and it was a trade committee involved in trying to adjudicate differences and interests and reconciling [differences].

I remember during this period that there was a GATT [General Agreement on Trade and Tariffs] meeting in Geneva where the issues were taken. What struck me was I went down there to assist with the information activity and I was not feeling well at all, I had a terrible cold, and I said, "Well, I think I'll go home." Well, it was Sunday afternoon, so I got in the plane and went back to Paris. In the meantime the negotiators stopped the clock. They had these negotiations to go on until midnight of another day. So they stopped the clock and they kept negotiating. Lo and behold, that Sunday morning I left Paris and I woke up the next morning in Paris and the talks were still going on.

Q: Did you find within the American delegation a growing questioning of what the development of the European Community meant to the United States? This had been a cornerstone of our policy, particularly keeping the French and the Germans from fighting each other, and the more you can tie them together... The main thing was to keep the French and Germans... So we were sponsoring all this. This has been a cornerstone since 1945. But I was wondering whether you were finding people beginning to say, "Hey, wait a minute, is this a good thing as far as the U.S. is concerned? Will this become a closed market for us?"

FERNANDEZ: Well, those issues, you know, for market access and competition policy for example, those are really handled in Brussels. The major ring for the negotiations was in Brussels.

Q: I was just wondering, when you're discussing these things, one of the things, obviously, the French keep French interests foremost and I was wondering whether the United States was in discussing wondering where are all these joint cooperative like Common Market and other things going?

FERNANDEZ: See, they actually had a representative on the executive committee, seated. Let me just try to answer this from another different point of view in terms of what U.S. priorities were and what is going on in OECD. There was one issue that we didn't want to expand too much. That was environment. ...let's do more for the environment, so there was a constant struggle within OECD to keep a reign on that, so an issue like that wouldn't come to dominate...

Q: This is reflecting the Reagan administration early on, acid rain, and everything like that.

FERNANDEZ: That is correct, there would always be... There was a bureaucracy there that was very clever. [The people] trying to fill up their briefs and their sections were very, very active indeed in that sort of thing. Now, in terms to go the other side of the issue that were of interest to us in that forum, [there] were as any others, was the matter of East-West relations. Well, there, I think any officer of our mission at the time you would interview would remember that getting the East-West issues out on the table for a good debate was always a problem. It was always a compromise on the part of the others. You would say, "Well, you know, we really don't need, you know..." Then the other country would say, "We don't..." you know, went into it holding their noses to debate East-West issues. But this was the Cold War and we were very interested in having that [included] as an agenda issue for the executive committee, XESS, the Standard Executive Committee meeting which were always very interesting. You had two or three kinds. You always had big fish that would come from all the countries to this.

TERRENCE CATHERMAN
USIS Director
Paris (1983-1985)

Terrence Catherman was born in Michigan and attended the University of Michigan for undergraduate and graduate school. Since joining the Foreign Service in 1949, his career has included positions in the Soviet Union, Austria, Germany, France, Israel, Yugoslavia and Poland. Mr. Catherman was interviewed by Lewis Schmidt in 1991.

CATHERMAN: Well, I was surprised at the pro-Americanism that I found among the French. I had been led to believe that the French were cynical about the Americans.

Q: I think they were.

CATHERMAN: And I came there ill prepared. Next to Israel France was the country I was least prepared to cope with on arrival. I was sent to Paris because the deputy to Charlie Wick, Gil Robinson, wanted me out of the Voice. I was creating trouble for him down here.

Q: He was soon out of the Agency.

CATHERMAN: He was soon out of the Agency but he wasn't out of the Agency then. He wanted to get me out of there but he knew he had to handle it in a way that I would not create great trouble. He gave me a major PAO-ship, which I had trouble refusing and I went, but I was not prepared. I spent several months learning French, but by that time my hearing was going and I really had some problems with the language, although I had a conversational ability and I used French. I was not prepared for the enthusiastic reception on the part of the French and that started from the day I arrived and was still going on when I left France to go to Bonn.

I never felt as confident in my French as I did in Russian, Serbo-Croatian or German so that tempered the way I went about handling my affairs there. But the response from the French to me and to Americans was overwhelmingly positive. It was an overwhelmingly positive era in French-American relations. I arrived just in time for some celebrations of the 200 anniversary of the conclusion of our Revolutionary War. The town was full of Americans in colonial clothing and the French loved that sort of pageantry. We had some wonderful ceremonies and dinners at Versailles. They went on all night. I was overwhelmed with all of this. I had a good time with the French and I think, again, my best contribution was in bringing some better order into the academic exchanges program. Continuing the very fruitful university relationships that were in effect all over the country. And dealing with political affairs, mostly again centering around nuclear weaponry. But I will admit, that from my professional point of view, those two years in France were the least satisfying because I had never dealt with a romance language. My languages had been Germanic with the exception of Hebrew or Slavic. It just took too much of my time trying to cope with the language. That is a lesson I hope USIA has learned, not to send senior officers who are not qualified in a language to major posts. It happened with me and it caused a great deal of stress for me, more than I want to talk about.

Q: As you undoubtedly know there was a lot of feeling over many years that the Western European program had been inbred and that officers had tended to make a career out of it and resisted being anywhere else except Western Europe. No where was this more evident than the case of the French program. I think some of it was justified. The people who were in USIS almost invariably tended to look down upon anyone who came out there to participate in the USIS program if they were not Francophiles and if they were not French language specialists. An attempt was made to clear out that kind of ingrained French immersion. By the time you got there had that been fairly well adjusted or was there still a good deal of that attitude on the part of the American staff?

CATHERMAN: I don't remember that there was any of that. Most of the Americans, if not all of them, had come from African posts where they had learned that version of French and with one or two exceptions they were all having their own little problems. They were better off in the language than I was, but they were by no means perfect. There were one or two people who spoke perfect, bilingual French. But out of 20 Americans their linguistic abilities were not top class, although they did a good job, we had a good staff.

WILLIAM V.P. NEWLIN
Consul General
Nice, France (1983-1986)

Mr. Newlin was born and raised in Pennsylvania. He obtained degrees from Harvard University and the Fletcher School and, after serving a tour with the US Army, joined the Foreign Service in 1960. A generalist, Mr. Newlin's service took him to France, Guatemala and Belgium, where he dealt primarily with European Organizations and NATO. In Washington his assignments concerned Trade, Law of the Sea and other economic matters. Mr. Newlin was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2001.

Q: In your last assignment, you went off from '83-'86 as consul general. How did you get that job? It sounds like a very nice job?

NEWLIN: I've always been very grateful for that. I had this rather undistinguished career and then this nice job came along. First, I was told I was going to be consul general in Bordeaux. Then that went to the person who was working in assignments in Personnel. But Nice came up and they gave me Nice, which I thought was very nice of them. It was a funny job. It's a one person post. This was the first time it had been made a consulate general. In the past, it was just a consulate in Nice. It was nice. It was a consulate general. It was nice for me. It was nicer being a consul general down there. They treated the American consul general as "une personnalité." It was treated as a big job even though, in fact, it was a little job. We have since closed it. Although I, of course, opposed closing it at the time... I opened it. There was no consulate there at the time. I went out and opened it and they wanted me to close it.

Q: Once you close something... What happened to make them want to open again?

NEWLIN: I think that there was some political pressure to open it in the U.S. Senate. I'm not quite sure why people wanted to open it, but they did. It had a limited role. It didn't issue visas. It was lovely not issuing visas. That's kind of a messy job. We took care of American interests. We issued passports. We showed the flag. There is a lot of American industry down there. We had a commercial Foreign Service national. When the place was closed, it was never completely closed. It was a Foreign Service agency. We had a consular agent. After I left, there was a consular agent. There is still a consular agent. Much of the stuff that was done when I was there is still done. Somebody comes up from Marseille to sign passports.

Q: We have a consul general in Marseille.

NEWLIN: That's right.

Q: Did Nice cover Monaco?

NEWLIN: Yes.

Q: Was that a major reason for... Particularly since Princess Grace... What was your impression of Monaco? It had gone through a period where it was putting itself out as a tax haven and the French got a little annoyed at this.

NEWLIN: Yes. Monaco is a company. The prince runs a company. Its assets are its tax laws and its ability to decide who is going to do business there and the conditions under which they're going to do business. He ran that company very well. He is very pleased to point out that the gambling for which Monaco is, of course, known really more than for anything else is a relatively small amount of Monaco's industry. Its real industry is banking... They do have some lead manufacturing and that sort of thing. But tourism and banking are their main industries. They run their little municipality very well. It says of itself that it's the only place where a woman in a long dress and an emerald necklace can walk down the street at 6:00 pm and feel both safe and not ridiculous.

Q: Did you get involved in any consular cases? Were any Americans in trouble in your area while you were there?

NEWLIN: There were always Americans in some kind of trouble. That was the thing that the consulate general did the most of and the best. We were a very good place for an American in trouble to come largely because of our Foreign Service nationals and largely because of one who had been there for a number of years, Jeanette Reese. She had a wonderful can-do attitude that she wanted to send people away satisfied. It was my attitude that I wanted very much to send people away with the feeling that they had come to the consulate with a problem and the consulate had solved their problem. I always thought that was very much not the attitude in Marseille, which had the bureaucratic feeling – and their nationals had the bureaucratic feeling – that they had something to give and, by God, one of the things they could therefore do was to withhold it. What we did the best was deal with Americans and their problems.

Q: Do you recall any of the consular cases that you dealt with?

NEWLIN: They were mostly people with passport problems and money problems. The money problems were on two sides. One, rich people will have lost all their money and expect to get money to continue their trip. The other were people who were more or less destitute who lived down in the area who needed ongoing help. With the rich people, the biggest trick was to get them to realize that their biggest asset was their friendships at home. I'm talking about people who had a liquidity problem, not a money problem. If you have a liquidity problem, you call a friend at home who you figure hasn't got a liquidity problem and you say, "Can you send me $5,000 and as soon as I get back, I'll make you whole?" You try to get them to realize that, in fact, you would be flattered if the same person called you in such a situation. You wouldn't feel put on. You'd feel pleased that you were the person to whom they had turned. Then you had the people who were destitute and a little bit deranged, mostly had some kind of pension income coming in but they had run out of it before they got to the end of it. We would help tide them over. That was Jeanette Reese who knew them all and often would do things, in fact, that probably the regulations would have said that wasn't the way to handle a particular problem. We had a slush fund that local American organizations would give us to which we would just add money if it needed it. We would use that to tide people over when it seemed the best to do.

Q: Did you have fleet visits?

NEWLIN: We had a lot of fleet visits. We had two heads of the Sixth Fleet while I was there. One was Ed Martin and one was Frank Kelso. They were outstanding men. We worked very closely with the USO (United Services Organization). They were good people in the USO who coordinated lots of the stuff in terms of helping take care of soldiers ashore. The government of Nice was very helpful. It at the time was being run by Jacques Médecin, who was a crook. But he was Nice's crook, so he was hugely popular. His father had been mayor for a very long time. He was mayor and could have been mayor for life if he had not... When he was out of the country once... He was very right-wing. The country at that time was socialist. He was out of the country and his guys got a hold of him and said, "Jacques, this time you can't come back. This time if you come back, they're going to put you in jail." He didn't come back. He went down to Uruguay. The scuttlebutt was that he was selling tee shirts on the beach. You have to have known that Jacques Médecin knew that he had salted plenty of money away offshore and that he wasn't selling tee shirts on the beach. He had an American wife with a slightly... It's a name associated with the American cosmetics industry. People kept saying that she was an heir of that family, which was not the case. She didn't even claim that was the case. She was quite glamorous. But when he went to Uruguay, she did not follow him there. They got divorced.

The fleet... Therefore, Médecin was very pro-U.S. and very right-wing. So, he loved having the U.S. fleet come in and show the flag. The fleet put its band to good use. The local economy would put the band to good use. The band would play at things for the public. It was good flag waving for the U.S. We would entertain the officers and local dignitaries at our house, which was a good thing. Local dignitaries liked to be invited to meet the fleet. Then the fleet would invite them out to receptions on board ships, which was a nice way of making U.S. friends.

Q: Did you find that the writ of Paris ran strong in Nice or did Nice sort of run on its own?

NEWLIN: Nice ran on its own. You're talking about the government. No, Nice was always its own fiefdom. Nice was Italian until 100 years ago. Nice was operated by the Médecin family for a long time. You have lots of roles in... Médecin was not only a deputy and a mayor, but he was head of the conseil generale, which ran the... The region is run by two people, the head of the conseil generale and the préfet. The préfet takes care of the central government's part. The conseil generale is the elected part. Médecin ran that and ran the city. He didn't need Paris much at all. It was a little bit of a fiefdom. But they did get him. Then they extradited him. He did serve some time. Then he died.

Q: You left there in 1986.

NEWLIN: That was my last post.

RICHARD FENTON ROSS
Public Affairs Advisor, UNESCO
Paris (1984-1988)

Mr. Ross was born in Virginia and educated at the University of Florida and Vanderbilt University. Joining the United States Information Agency (USIA) in 1964, he served several tours of duty at its Headquarters in Washington, DC as well as at a number of US Embassies abroad. Dealing primarily with Information and Cultural Affairs, Mr. Ross served in Beirut, Amman, Jerusalem, Calcutta, Colombo, Kabul, Rabat and Paris. Following his retirement in 1992, he accompanied his wife on her Foreign Service assignments in Sana'a and Damascus. Mr. Ross was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2003.

ROSS: So okay, what do you do? After I was there for awhile I got involved with a bunch of people who worked at UNESCO. There had been a good ambassador there...a woman ambassador [Barbara Newell?], and she had had connections with the American groups of Indians and so forth. Who was that guy that ran for president of the United States [in 1976] from Oklahoma? [Fred Roy Harris] He's a very famous, old congressman, Fred Harris. We had programmed Fred Harris. We programmed a lot of people! He sat up in a chair and said, "Well, I'm gonna tell ya what is the story with America's political situation now in five or ten or fifteen thousand well chosen words!" and by George, he was not underestimating what he did, you know [laughter]. I mean it took him fifteen thousand words, but he told us!

At UNESCO a new ambassador got nominated by President Reagan, named Jean Broward Shevlin Gerard. She was our famous last ambassador to UNESCO. She decided she didn't like the public affairs fellow there who worked for her, who had been in Paris off and on for a long while, and knew everybody, and had a French wife, and so forth, and so she said he had to go. Somebody (the corridor gossip) said he doesn't even know that the red velvet tomahawk's in his back yet.

So I thought, “Well, am I gonna stay here three years or not?” I had already applied to try to go, and they said, “No, you have to stay.” They changed it then, because I said, “I’ll go be branch PAO in Peshawar, [Pakistan],” because I was getting long in the tooth not to have been a PAO. “Oh! You haven’t been a PAO yet? Well, you know, that’s too bad for your career!” So I said, “No, I always wanted to be a CAO,” which, of course, is not necessarily a good maneuver. So I went over and told her [Gerard], “Well, I’d like to have the job of public affairs advisor in the American mission to UNESCO.” So she talked to me for a long while and asked me all kinds of questions, but the subtext of the questions was, “Are you reliable—that is, for me, for the way I am personally, and for what I believe?” I must have been opaque enough or dissembled or something like that, so she called up Charlie Wick [Charles Wick], who was then the director of USIA, and said, “I want Ross to come work for me.” This astounded a whole lot of people because I guess they didn’t think Ross could pull it off, but it meant I would have another tour in Paris on top of the first one.

Barry Fulton, who was head of USIA personnel [chief of Foreign Service personnel] or USIA something or other, apparently had a meeting (he was back in Washington) where he said, “I’m gonna make it absolutely impossible for Ross to stay there any more than five years in Paris.” Everybody always wants to go to Paris, and everybody who’s there always wants to stay, and you’ve got all those poor, benighted souls in Sub-Sahara Africa who all think that they if they bid on it they’ll get it. I’ve actually been to a meeting in Paris where people sat and laughed at the fact of all the people bidding on jobs that they’re never gonna get. “They’re not gonna get up here. We’ve got it locked up!” Literally.

So the upshot of it is that I went over to UNESCO, and took Judson Gooding’s place. He was in a tremendous rage at the system, at the ambassador, and anybody who got in his way, which included me because I was moving into his office as he was moving out. But later we became good friends, and he’s quite a sensitive fella, and I had him even come down and give some talks in Morocco.

Anyway, I worked for Ambassador Gerard, who I’m told now has passed away. The first people I met were her political friends who came hustling into her office. She ran an eccentric kind of ambassadorship. There was kind of a funny attitude of the American delegation: it was, that while we’re here UNESCO’s a sick monster and should collapse, but it’s okay with me if it collapses just as soon as my tour is finished. Then people who were in the Secretariat who were Americans, there were a percentage of them, who’d lived in Paris for 20 years, who all just viewed us with kind of a baleful glance and said, “Oh, well, it’s too late for you all to do anything! It’s such a mess!”

Q: Yes.

ROSS: “And I’ll tell you, it’s not like it was 20 years ago, but I’m staying until I retire, of course,” because nobody wants to leave Paris, or very few people do!

So Ambassador Gerard came and went, and she tended to take long lunches with her friend, Mike Curb's sister. He started a very famous record company in California, and they made tons of money in the pop music industry and moved to Paris and bought himself a Rolls Royce Phantom II convertible and drove around town. Why not? If you have a quarter of a million a year, my advice is move to Paris.

So Gerard's husband was a retired, I guess, some kind of financier from New York, owned land in New Jersey, and had been a general in the 69th Infantry Regiment—or the Seventh, the Seventh Infantry Regiment on Park Avenue.

Q: Yes.

ROSS: It was the society regiment.

Q: Yes.

ROSS: So he was concerned with that.

She wore her big $100,000 or whatever it was, eagle pin, for his contributions to the Republican party. The people who came to visit her that I saw were all people who had just pots of money. There were a certain amount of very conservative people; some of them were interesting; some of them weren't. The ambassador would go off to England to the Ditchley Conference or something like that, would be very right wing kind of thing, and she was exceedingly right wing.

It became apparent to me after I'd been there for awhile that really she was hired to stick as many pins and knives into [Amadou-Mahtar] M'Bow [director-general of UNESCO] as possible. After I got there, within about two or three months, she had a speech cobbled up for her, which I didn't have a hand in, saying that the United States was now going to give UNESCO one year to clean up its act, and they had the every-two-year annual conference coming up at the end of that one year, and the United States would see how that was. We stayed there for a year, all the while making more speeches about this threat to leave UNESCO, and had the every-two-year conference with M'Bow and everybody, and delegations coming in. The delegation that came from the United States was really strange. Some people didn't have passports when they were told they were on the delegation; some people had only traveled, say, to the West Indies or something like that and had no intention of going overseas. It was a political thing. There were other people, the attorney general's wife came, Mrs. Meese, and she was a delegate, and she was a heavy hitter.

Q: Ursula Meese.

ROSS: Yes, Ursula Meese, quite a nice lady.

Q: Yes.

ROSS: Ed Hennessey was then chief of delegation. He was a New York lawyer—had been one of the, I don't know, inspector generals or counsels for the CIA in Langley and seemed to know something about American interagency workings, but had a practice in New York. He immediately fell into a tremendous struggle with Ambassador Gerard about who would be the point person, and who would lead the delegation, and who would give talks, or who would give backgrounders and briefings and everything. This was all kind of very confusing because at that point, I think, Judson Gooding was allowed to stay on to cover some meetings. Then he got involved with stuff a little bit, and there was a lot of confusion about who said what to whom and who was supposed to speak about this or that. These people were class A personalities, I tell you! I didn't have the strength to do it, besides they were way above me in rank.

Anyway, we went through that biennial conference. It was something else. People would not appear when they were supposed to. I was a delegate too, and I found myself in meetings where big decisions about important kinds of issues were being taken by people who were brought into the convention. I'd be representing the American position, and I wouldn't have been briefed into it at all. If there was anything I was supposed to know, it was to be the New World Information Order, which was kind of a...something that was always lashed out at by the Americans. But there'd be all kinds of other things, say, like a revision of the history of Africa texts, where you'd have 20 people and they're mostly African representatives; you'd have to vote or speak or something like that, and I'd have to say, "I can't cast my vote now," this all being with simultaneous interpreters, and serious stuff, everything being taken down, you know, subplenary session. "I don't have instructions on this at this time. Can I now leave the room, run, try to find somebody?" "What are we gonna do on...or what should we do? Should I just go with it?" you know, these kinds of things. It was a great learning experience.

Actually, there was a guy named Jan de Wilde, an American, who I'm told has gone over to the international organizations, who is now in Geneva, and he was very irreverent. Big, tall, blonde guy.

Q: He was a brand new vice consul under me in Saigon.

ROSS: That's right, he was there. He has a lovely wife, and his father was a World Bank figure or something like that.

Q: Yes, yes.

ROSS: And very, very slick, and puts on that sophistication thing.

Q: Yes.

ROSS: Always wrote with the Montblanc pen and all this.

Q: Yes.

ROSS: He could skewer people very funny, as if he was Oscar Wilde. Some of the stuff we saw there, I couldn't believe it! Somebody would come steaming in totally drunk and sit down and grab the mike.

Q: This is for the American delegation?

ROSS: Yes! Actually, the AEP, shall we put it that way? The Cuban would try to interrupt and just go at it, both of them talking into the mike, and M'Bow would say, "Now, now, this is enough, you know." It just—

Q: Well, you know, you're mentioning the problems with UNESCO and the United States. I mean you are the new boy on the block. What were your observations about UNESCO at the time when you got there around '82 or '83. I mean what its work was and what the organization was like in Paris?

ROSS: The one word that springs to mind is "fromage" (cheese)—that is to say, it was just a big slice of cheesecake for anybody who wanted to get there and get themselves into a position. People jockeyed all the time to get jobs there because then they got the international salary. There was a lot of kind of make work—people seemed like their offices would be full of projects and stuff, but I don't think they did very much compared to the old days. They went into a tremendous amount of hairsplitting argument about what was the New World Information Order (NWIO), and then they got into big struggles, say, with the Algerians and the Cubans and everybody, and who had a right to say what. They were arguing about the cultural position of the world.

Q: Well, if I recall, the New World Information Order, as we saw it, was basically that the press should be under the control of governments, wasn't it?

ROSS: Right, on all the new governments, that would be nonaligned governments, if you will; all said no; said that, "Of course they don't understand these cultures. We applaud the fact that you think that you have a free press and that you can do anything you want, but you just don't realize you have what they call self-censorship there. Since the press barons own everything, whether it's William Randolph Hearst or somebody, you people are manipulating your press against us, so the only way we can defend ourselves is to explain ourselves from the prime minister down, and he will control what goes in the newspaper."

Then you get into things like what correspondents will be allowed into which countries, and what correspondents will be allowed to file, and this accreditation and all that. America through Freedom House and through other heavy hitting organizations had NGOs there watching this stuff. There were different people with different axes to grind, and that always seemed to get into the argument.

Q: But to put it, in a way we had a right wing administration under Reagan, particularly early Reagan, but at the same time to be perfectly fair, UNESCO hit the wrong buttons across our political spectrum. I mean correct me if I'm wrong, but 1) it was, as you say, a bunch of fromage. I mean it had nothing, it was a place full of nepotism and good living with a lot of American dollars involved.

ROSS: Absolutely!

Q: The other one was it was a control mechanism over the press.

ROSS: That was just even one of them; it was control mechanism on all kinds of cultural ideas, on the theory of culture.

Q: Yes, yes.

ROSS: I mean East Culture, Afro Centrist, and on a lot of colonial resentment, which seemed to have wound up into UNESCO. It was a forum for all these things. The people who were really the logicians of it tended to be like Cubans who could really do that Marxist analysis of all this stuff, and a lot of Sub-Sahara people just went along and voted whichever way they were told to.

Q: Yes.

ROSS: M'Bow had come up a long way. His first language from Senegal wasn't the major language; it was a tribal language; and he'd been a sergeant in the French army, an automobile mechanic or telephone mechanic, and he derived to the distinction of being the director general; and he'd brought other people along.

There was one chap who came, God bless him, up from Sub-Sahara Africa, and his country was so poor it didn't have enough money to send him. So when they didn't have enough money to send him, M'Bow could cut money loose from whatever big pile of money he had, central funds, and give people travel and per diem for this conference. At the end of the conference this wonderful, simple guy who was obviously a farmer—they had new clothes on that they didn't take off the labels on the outside, it still had the labels on the outside because they thought that you wore the label, the little stitched on. They asked him what he would suggest to improve the conference, and he said, well, he wasn't staying in a very great hotel, but it was nice, but it was a little far from UNESCO in the Seventh, and what he would suggest is if they could move the subway stop closer to UNESCO—

Q: Yes.

ROSS: So that people could get out across the street from UNESCO instead of having to walk in the rain or something like that. That was one of the few times that I saw M'Bow cut in and say, "Well, thank you." You know, "au France", [laughter] thank you for your intervention.

Q: Well, were there any things that UNESCO was doing that you felt were worthwhile?

ROSS: Some of the science stuff seemed to be very interesting. Now I didn't have any hand in that. Some education and some science—and that is to say, coordinating either country things like water catchment flows or whatever they're called, like the Rhine River's a giant mess, and they keep trying to clean it up—well, UNESCO helps with some of that; and some of the scientific kind of thing, just like mapping in the Third World where it's very hard to do, where you can bring people together; and then some education stuff. But for the most part it was all wordage; that's my feeling after I got there.

The Americans who worked there would say, "Oh, this place is a mess!" While we were there, people were playing jokes on M'Bow, tricks like letting the air out of his tires on his cars because he had three or four Mercedes. Somebody would sneak around and let the air out of his tires, and then it would get around, or put too much salt in the food in the cafeteria or something, kind of strange stuff. Who did this? Nobody knew.

Q: Well, what were you...I mean, you know, you're the public affairs officer—

ROSS: Right.

Q: ...and normally you would be contacting delegations and getting the word out and all this.

ROSS: Right, yes, yes.

Q: I mean but how did this work in this particular case for you?

ROSS: In retrospect, I see myself a little bit as a handler for Ambassador Gerard to get her to do this or to do that or to get her to agree that these remarks that she was gonna make are all right, which you could never tell whether she was going to do it or not.

Q: Yes.

ROSS: One time it was arranged that Chirac, who was mayor of Paris, wanted to give her a distinction of some sort, the medal of the city of Paris, because of her conservative connections. Notice I never say right wing; I always say conservative. Anyway, she went off to Castille with some friends. They had the thing set up at the Mairie de Paris (town hall of Paris), and Chirac was there, and it was supposed to be at 1:30. They couldn't find her and couldn't find her and couldn't find her. It was four o'clock, and they found her just in one of these (these are very, very chichi) restaurant things. She said, "To hell with it!" like it's not important. So there was a certain amount of making sure that the guest list was right for her.

I found out I was in Tibet—that mode, you know. The people have to be good, and they have to be available because she's gonna have somebody big from New York, an old member of Congress, but she's not gonna have the party yet. So we had to call people up and ask them if they'd be free that night if there is a party. So I had Danny Wattenberg come work as my assistant. (You know the guy on television, Ben Wattenberg. He's written a bunch of books, he's a big commentator.) His son [Danny] came; Ben Wattenberg pulled a wire and got his son a job in USIA and then an overseas excursion tour. Danny had been with the New York Times, even, as he admitted, as a copy boy. He came over and he did a lot of stuff. He was considered a theoretician of the junior wing of the conservative element because Jeane Kirkpatrick had spotted him one time at a dinner party and said, "My goodness, that guy's very well informed. You're the best spoken young man I've ever heard." So you know, one thing led to another. So he was working for me, and he finally blew up and said, "Well, I'm not supposed to be doing this. I'm not supposed to be doing guest lists for parties!" as if junior officers all over the world didn't actually do that. He said, "I'm supposed to be doing think pieces." So he quit after we left UNESCO and went back and did hatchet jobs on Clinton, I think.

We didn't have a principle position except that we really were going to get out, and to say that we were waiting for a year to give them a chance for M'Bow to clean up his act. It was already decided.

Q: Well, did anybody give a _____ in the regular apparatus of UNESCO about how the United States was positioned? I'm talking about the non-American staff.

ROSS: Everybody said, "It's a shame! You shouldn't leave." That was 1) because of the money, but 2) because in the old days there was kind of a principle of operation at UNESCO, going back to Huxley, I think. Wasn't he with it? Not Julian Huxley, but another one [Aldous Huxley]. In the '50s there were some triple thinkers and stuff like that.

Q: Yes.

ROSS: Of the staff that I knew, the guy I replaced, he was in a rage, and he didn't care whether we stayed in or not. There was a guy who was an ex-Jesuit priest, who was in Education, Ray [Warner]; he's just retired recently from the State Department; he was in IO (Bureau of International Organization Affairs); he did care, but he also cared about being assigned to Paris. There was Jan DeWilde, the Wild, who saw this merely as moving on.

Q: But I was thinking about the non-American professional staff of UNESCO. Was there any attempt to sort of do something, or were they just couldn't care less whether the United States was in or not?

ROSS: The American professional staff in the Secretariat were scared that if we pulled out, that their jobs would be cut down, although we had less percentage than what we were entitled to. The British actually, believe it or not, had the most of anybody, if you just counted everybody, and then the French.

People tended to bemoan the fact that UNESCO didn't have the kind of intellectual clarity that it used to. It had devolved into a lot of sniping; and M'Bow hadn't really done anything to cut it out, in fact, may have encouraged it in a way to divide and conquer, but then got into kind of a manager of a mess; and no matter what he did, it was attacked!

So he towards the end he was trying very hard to build/mend fences. During the conference Charlie Wick came over as a delegate. He'd gotten himself named a delegate, and he was going to attend some part of it, and I went to the airport and met him. I was his handler or his escort, and that was very interesting indeed.

Q: How did that work out?

ROSS: He had come to be mistrusted by the career Foreign Service officers' staff, but they wouldn't give him a break! So immediately, since I was going around with him, they said, "Are you holding his lead raincoat for him?" "Oh, you're, yeah, Ross, you're the, you know, like _____ person," like "What's he up to now?" Well, these are the guys who were above me who worked for him. They were laughing behind his back; they were over in the corner sniggering.

I tried to get them to do this and that and the other thing, but they wanted him to come to a special UNESCO evening where everybody's delegation had cooked all the food of their various countries. M'Bow got me and said, "You must get Director Wick to come. I'm looking forward to it."

Director Wick had called me up after the explosion, the bomb, which busted up our apartment. He called me directly, which I didn't expect and said, "Richard Ross, how are you?" That was before I went to UNESCO. Then when Ambassador Gerard said she wanted me to work, he remembered me again because he just told his personnel, you know how they do it at the top, just get that person there.

So I said, "You've got to go to UNESCO right now, tonight." "I don't wanna. I don't want to go. You go instead of me." I said, "Well, you know Director M'Bow wants you to go." "No, I'm tired, I didn't sleep on the plane. I don't feel well..." this or that and the other thing. What he actually wanted to do was go over to see Evan Galbraith, the ambassador in Paris—we had different ambassadors; I'm talking about the ambassador to the French—and I don't know, discuss politics, which is what a lot of people wanted to do when they came to Paris. It doesn't happen in a lot of other countries that I've ever been in, but it must happen a lot in England too, like they want to buy ties or they want to do this, but they want to talk politics, ya da da da.

So he didn't come, and I had to go over to UNESCO and see the terrible tragic look in M'Bow's eyes. He said, "He didn't come." It was like he cut M'Bow, and also the subtext there, if I can use that fancy word, was that this is the handwriting on the wall. We don't care about you, and it's gonna be gone for a six as soon as possible. So even M'Bow couldn't do anything, even if he knew how to do it.

GLENN SLOCUM
Club du Sahel Officer, OECD
Paris (1984-1988)

Glenn Slocum was born in 1940. After finishing graduate school at the University of Maryland in 1969 he joined AID. His career includes positions in Cameroon, Senegal, Paris, Washington D.C., and Burundi. Mr. Slocum was interviewed by W. Haven North in November 1998.

SLOCUM: I continued working on the same region, succeeding Art Fell at the Club du Sahel position at the OECD in Paris. The Club was a donor group organized under OECD auspices in 1974 to help coordinate donor policies and strategies in the eight countries of the Sahel region of West Africa. In August 1984 I transferred from Washington to Paris. It was unusual for an AID officer to be assigned to a European post, but I was fortunate to be assigned to one of them. I had quite a bit of Sahel experience, having been posted to Senegal for three years in the late seventies, plus the five years I had spent working on projects in the Sahel region from the Washington side, which left me fairly familiar with the issues of the region.

Q: What was the setup that you had at the Club?

SLOCUM: Before getting to that maybe a little bit of background on how the office was established. I recall an evening dinner, when you were coming through Dakar and Gene Chiavaroli had you over for dinner while you were waiting for a connecting flight on PanAm for New York. I have a vague recollection of sitting in Gene's living room, out there by the beach, and talking about some of these issues.

As the drought had taken on some fairly devastating dimensions in the early seventies, by about 1974, AID was, I think, the main agency pushing other donors to have a more coordinated approach to the effects of environmental devastation and desertification and drought in the region. The Sahel region of West Africa goes from Mauritania to Senegal, Gambia and Guinea Bissau moving east across a belt south of the Sahara through Mali, Niger, Burkina Faso and Chad. (The same ecological conditions pertain to Sudan, southern Ethiopia and northern Kenya, but the Sahel region with which the Club du Sahel deals ended with Chad.) The Sahel also includes the islands constituting the country of Cape Verde off the coast of Senegal. Roy Stacy was the first AID officer stationed at the Club du Sahel. He went there in, I believe, 1974 and served there for about four years. Art Fell then was there for six years. So, by the time I got there in 1984, the Club du Sahel was a mature institution. It was headed by a renowned Frenchwoman, Anne de Lattre, who after 10 years was the driving force and, some would even say, the personification of the Club. Although AID was the main donor pushing the Club's establishment, the French were key to its success because six of the eight countries were former French colonies and French was widely spoken, and the official language of, these countries. In 1974, Madame de Lattre was named the first director of the Club, and served in that position for 14 years, maintaining an association with the Club until recently. She had already been an international civil servant, having worked for the OECD for a number of years in the Development Assistance Directorate. Though she had no experience living in Africa in the way AID Foreign Service officers did, she was a very dynamic and respected force behind the Club. The AID person functioned informally as the deputy in the Club. The Club staff has varied over the years. When I was there, there were four donors who seconded people to the Club. In addition to the American, Canada and the Netherlands posted officials there. France had a de facto representative in the fact that Mme. de Lattre was French, but also by virtue of the Club's location in Paris, with close access to the French Government and the widespread expertise of French citizens. Italian participation was informally supported by an OECD documentalist who was Italian. Later a knowledgeable German aid person served at the Club.

The Club had been founded in tandem with a counterpart organization in the Sahel, which was known as the CILSS, the Interstate Committee for Development and Drought Relief in the Sahel, a regional organization of Sahel countries set up to combat the effects of the drought. In the first 10 years, the CILSS and Club collaborated to complete a number of sector assessments in the main areas affecting environmental degradation and food security policy in the Sahel. By the end of the '70s, there were AID Missions in all the Sahel countries, and they collaborated in varying degrees with the Club to help do these national sector assessments.

By the time I arrived, the sector assessments had been completed for each country, and the member states had approved them. These formed the basis for the next step, forging common regional approaches to make the national programs effective and working in sync with each other. National programs of food security, environmental control and related areas had regional implications, as, for example, in pricing policy. One country's pricing policy could stimulate or discourage trade with its neighbors. If the latter, then farmers would be disadvantaged or consumer prices would be higher than they had to be. By the time I arrived at the Club, the basic analytical work had been completed, and the time had come to begin looking at national programs from both the governments' and donors' perspectives. Art had handled the anti-desertification and environmental portfolios, so I spent a fair amount of time working with the donor community in the Sahel countries helping them develop national environmental action and desertification control plans that would meet the approval of most of the donors so they could have coordinated approaches to these areas.

Q: The sector studies were for the whole region rather than individual countries?

SLOCUM: Initially the studies centered on individual countries, followed later by some "synthesis" studies bringing together some general analysis and principles, tying together the country assessments and drawing some regional conclusions. Most of the national studies were prepared in French, and they had the French-language title that became our jargon: Bilan Programmes. "Sector assessments" is a loose translation of that, but we don't have quite an equivalent.

Q: What did they focus on?

SLOCUM: The initial push was on food production. The agricultural bilan programmes looked at what they called overall cereals policy questions because they were the basis of the agricultural economies of all those countries. The others were in the areas of drought control and environment, with a focus on reforestation.

Q: They were projects?

SLOCUM: That is a good question. From the donor and Club du Sahel point of view they were not projects, they were sector assessments with policy indicators. But here is where we get into a theme that I think became a problem for the Club's network and philosophy. I touched a little bit on this earlier. From the donor/Club viewpoint, the assessments were necessary to develop consensus approaches to overcoming the effects of the drought and getting the countries back on a self-sustaining ground. A key operating, and philosophical, principle from the beginning was that the Club had to work in collaboration with the CILSS secretariat. The key founding donors of the Club, notably the French and the U.S., in effect, "created" the CILSS to institutionalize Sahelian involvement and ownership of long-term sustainable development programs. However, the Sahel states through the CILSS had a different, if unwritten, mandate, which was not in concert totally with the donors. The donor interest was to develop better policies and programs. I think the Sahelians saw the CILSS more as a mechanism to get more funding into their programs. This fundamental institutional difference was unspoken but important to recognize. It probably still persists today.

In the ten years since I left the Club the work program has branched out to include new areas, such as the linkage of coastal countries' to the Sahel countries' economies. The Club and the CILSS also began looking more to the private sector as the indispensable underpinning to growth and development. And the impact of population growth became part of the mandate. These changes have taken place since I departed in 1988. It is a sign of the Club/CILSS model's staying power that it is still a dynamic network, despite the cuts in AID's budget and personnel staffing over the years and the closure of bilateral USAID Missions in all but two of the Sahel countries. It shows that despite the divergent interests of the two institutions, their contribution has been important enough to merit continuing support.

Q: Was policy reform a major emphasis?

SLOCUM: Yes, mainly in the selected sector areas. But the implicit result was to expose the Sahelians to the regional nature of the issues with which they were working so that the countries would cooperate more closely on issues critical to their economic futures.

Q: But, it wasn't a formal program.

SLOCUM: Not as such. The idea was to spur debate among the Sahel countries to develop better policies, but to do so based on their gained experience and the added knowledge provided by their debates on the bilans programmes.

Q: How did you find this work of trying to translate a general sector analysis into a national program?

SLOCUM: It was a challenge to translate the sector assessments into national applications that had a change impact on the donors or the Sahelians. Again, the divergence I enunciated earlier, divergent interests between donors and the Sahelians — in which donors were looking for better projects and Sahelians for more money — played out here too. An additional element was that donors' national programs were unlikely to be changed based on a Club/CILSS-sponsored meeting held in country X. Holding national "concertation" meetings to see how countries might better approach agriculture or environment had only a temporarily stimulating effect. What was needed was some sort of local incentive to take the results of those discussions and put them into a framework which would effect real changes in approaches within the national programs. But it never quite came to that. I suppose that for this to happen it would have been necessary for a Club/CILSS entity to take root institutionally within that Sahel country. But that was not the purpose of the Club/CILSS, to replicate itself country after country.

In fact, I learned that USAID Missions in the Sahel were the strongest objectors to a strong Club/CILSS network in the Sahel. They saw us as laying a competing claim to scarce resources for their bilateral programs. They rarely saw us as value-added to their own programs. In meeting after meeting of Sahel Mission Directors, complaints were lodged that USAID funds going to their regional programs detracted from their own programs. I should note here that, in addition to the Club/CILSS study program, AID funded a number of regional projects, in AGRHYMET, INSAH, Population, Agricultural Research, and Pest Control (IPM). It was a battle, and despite strong support from Washington leadership, both the Administrator's office and the Africa Bureau, the field directors never fully bought into the regional program. The field directors were part of an institutional culture that rewarded the Missions' bilateral programs. Officers rarely got rewarded for building regional programs, because they were seen as not really contributing much to their own national development objectives. This was a constant tension which I don't think any of us were ever able to abate. The debate was over how much investment should be made into regional approaches vis-a-vis national ones. It was something we talked about at every annual Mission Directors meeting.

Q: What was the receptiveness of the governments to this sector strategy for the Sahel ?

SLOCUM: At the technical and policy levels, there was tremendous receptivity. For one thing, for the first time, the CILSS/Club network provided a regular forum for exchanging ideas, for learning from country to country, and this was very enriching and empowering (Anne used to refer to it as a "privileged forum.") I did feel that at a political level, there was this divergence in interests between the donors, who were aiming at better policies and programs, and the Sahelian governments, who saw CILSS as a fund-raising mechanism. However, to be honest, I should ask the question: if the interests were as divergent as I assert between the donor community and the Sahel governments, then why in 1998 does the Club/CILSS mechanism still exist? I think it is because the CILSS provided a needed forum for dialogue, even if the countries' economic indicators have not improved that much in 25 years, regional cooperation has been in their collective national interests, and the CILSS has fostered that and is now, a generation later, identified as an important contributor to that process. I should add also that the operational budgets of the Club and the CILSS as institutions were not large. In fact, donor pressure has seen the CILSS budget and staff cut back and their work program rationalized.

After my departure from the Club, the CILSS secretary general, Nigerien Brah Mahamane, was hired to set up a regional office in the Ivory Coast to look at the role of the coastal states' economies on the Sahel countries. I remember hearing that there wasn't much product from that effort, but I can't be specific as to what the problems were. It was inevitable and, I think, appropriate, that the burgeoning movement to spur market-led growth in developing countries would be reflected in the Club/CILSS work program.

Q: You talked about the coastal regions?

SLOCUM: Yes, these were a critical element of economic opportunities for the Sahelians, and I don't think the Club/CILSS strategy gave them adequate attention at the outset, though it came to recognize their importance. For over 10 years the Club/CILSS looked to restoration of the Sahel's ecological capital, but it could also have taken its coastal neighbors into account. For years, citizens from the Sahel have made their way to the coastal countries for jobs and other economic opportunities. So, for example, throughout the coastal countries of West Africa you have many citizens of the Sahel countries working in the service industries. There was an attempt to look only at the Sahel countries as a unit and exclude the economic impact of their economically stronger neighbors. There were a lot of efforts in that area after I left. The point of all this is that there were constant attempts to take a fresh look and enhance the wisdom and rationale for the CILSS and Club's agendas.

Q: To raise the question of why did it survive?

SLOCUM: Well, there was a mechanism to have the "board of directors" —the donors and the Sahel countries — conduct a formal review every two years of the Club/CILSS work programs. Later, there were efforts to re-engineer, to look at what made sense in the Sahel. What is curious is that, in response to the Sahel drought, not only was this regional mechanism set up between the CILSS and the Club, but AID also established Missions in the mid-seventies in virtually every country in the Sahel, which was, I think, a sign of the strong interest and support the Agency intended to give to development in those areas.

Q: You were able to view the work of the Club du Sahel and all resources it provided after it had been in business for about ten years, what sense did you have that it was making a difference or would make a difference? What was the result of ten years of effort? In the beginning there was an assumption that in ten years we would have finished the job or close to it.

SLOCUM: I recall seeing a review of the 1960s' antipoverty program on PBS recently, and a clip showed Sergeant Shriver, the program's first head under LBJ, reply "yes" to a question "Do you think poverty can be eliminated in America in 25 years?" I think that the 10-year time frame envisaged at the outset was totally unrealistic and not based on any firm analysis of the real problems that had to be overcome: desertification, poor human resources capacity, mismanagement, donor dependency (which was probably exacerbated during this period), inadequate macroeconomic environment, etc. We've learned that sustainability requires long-term investments. The Club has now gone on for over twenty years. Roy Stacy went back after his retirement, and became the Club du Sahel Director. He has now left, and Club donors have agreed on a replacement candidate — another American, by the way. So, despite all, the slow rate of progress in the Sahel, the closing of many USAID bilateral missions, and the historic lack of support to the operation by USAID Missions in the field, the Club/CILSS institution lives on. I think it continues for a number of reasons. One I suspect is the fact that the level of poverty in those countries, because of the low resource base and the effects of continued environmental degradation and desertification, are such that they simply cannot survive without donor support. So, collectively among the donors there is a recognition that, even if not every donor can be present in every Sahel country, as AID is no longer able to be, the Sahel needs special attention. (In fact, it could be argued that closing so many of the AID Missions was facilitated by the existence of regional sources of continued assistance to those countries.) That is one rationale that keeps it going. I think the other reason is that there probably never will be very strong results in the near term. One has learned to be very modest in the expectations as to how long it will take for these investments to bring lasting results, and that probably the best we can expect in the short term is to create a kind of standing action to keep the desert from encroaching further, to enable the nationals, both public officials as well as private citizens, to better equip themselves to manage their own development.

But, there has been another factor, and this is kind of getting us away from this assignment, but I think it is useful to put it in context because we are going to come back to it in my experience in subsequent assignments. That is, the increased propensity in many African countries towards chaos and conflict, which unsettle the already fragile conditions, have become more manifest and therefore have worsened the human condition. That means a stronger need to give some kind of attention to this. One manifestation of this is the increasing amount of funds going to relief and humanitarian aid as opposed to development aid. That is a reality. I don't have the figures on every country, but in the East Africa region four years ago, for every dollar of U.S. government money going to development, two dollars were allocated for relief and humanitarian assistance.

Q: How much would you say roughly was the aid to the Sahel over this ten year period that you can look back on?

SLOCUM: Speaking for AID, the annual Sahel development appropriation was on the order of $80 million. It varied from year to year and eventually this special appropriation got melded back into the Africa appropriation. Early on, this level of interest was manifested by some fairly big projects. I remember one for Burkina Faso that was a fairly large integrated development project. I think it was $80 million over ten years, or something like that. Wherever we went we saw the same tendency because of the availability of funding to come up with some fairly ambitious activities. In the countries in which I have more knowledge, for instance, Mauritania, where I was later assigned after leaving Paris in 1988, the impact of those initial large projects was unclear. For example, in the Rural Assessment and Manpower Survey (RAMS) in Mauritania, a great deal of money went for a wide swath of technical assistance which produced a long series of studies that, regrettably, seemed more useful as shelf stabilizers than for the application of their substantive contents, and I saw little evidence of their use by Mauritians, or anybody, when I got to Mauritania several years later. I would hope that other donors coming through wanting to work in a given area where some of these overall assessments and satellite mapping and natural resources had been completed would use them. But, to what extent it enabled the Mauritians to better understand their areas of potential that they could develop, I am less able to answer that. I just don't know.

I had a colleague who worked on a huge livestock project in Tahoua, in northern Niger. He is a personal friend of mine and I see him socially. He spent two years as a financial analyst on the project, a huge technical assistance team in this remote area of Niger and the idea was to assist Nigerians to improve herd practices, animal health, management and accounting, etc. He told me that he is not sure any beneficial result was left behind based on his own knowledge and the contacts in the years following he had with his working colleagues from there. This person is still working in development and is able to place the activity in a wider context.

At the same time, I know that Mission Directors were very keen on making these projects appropriate and making them run properly and structuring them in a way that enhanced capacity locally. Similar issues were raised, I recall, with respect to the regional integrated pest management project (IPM). This concern led to a major scaling back because it became apparent that the expected results were not being achieved, mainly because of the very weak indigenous capacity to learn and apply the assistance.

Now talking historically, of course, and lessons learned ten, fifteen years ago, I think we did learn a lot of lessons which helped us improve our approaches. The focus on managing for results and developing indicators that give you a sense of how you measure progress has all come in the last ten years. But, if I go back to your question, what results do we have in the countries in which these projects were implemented, I think probably the biggest result over time is how many trained people understand the issues, understand management, understand financial controls. I think that probably it is the most important thing. Gradually building a critical mass of trained managers and technicians who can design and run these activities themselves on the ground.

Unfortunately, what has countered that tendency has been problems of governance, power oligarchies and corruption, not to mention tribal and ethnic violence. Those things were not as apparent in the Sahel in the '80s. There was one border war between Mali and Burkina Faso, but it only flared up for a few days and quickly subsided. There was a greater tendency to maintain control, but these also were essentially nondemocratic governments. So, I think the effort to focus on the Sahel made sense, because it was recognized that over time, more and more humanitarian relief would be required if we didn't try to get a basis for development established in that region.

Q: But you don't see any results on the ground?

SLOCUM: Oh, yes, once we understood better the multiple causes of the constraints, we began to design better activities. Certainly we see results in terms of enhanced capacity, both of civil servants and in the private sector. The Club/CILSS epoch coincided with the World Bank structural adjustment programs. These SAPs, plus sector investment programs, have resulted in such innovations as modern and widespread health clinics and reforestation activities that involve community participation. While the mega-projects were probably inappropriate for their time, progress has occurred in decentralization, civil society and other examples wherein nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) serve as counterpoints to governmental dominance in economic development. The Structural Adjustment Programs became very important mechanisms for economic adjustments so that the state got itself out of some very inefficient roles in the economy and allowed the private sector to take over. All these things were germinating in the 80s and later even burgeoned in the 90s. For example, were the investments in the health sector from the donor community sustainable for the host country? Probably not. It is unlikely for the national economies to get to the point that they can maintain a national primary health service delivery system without some kind of donor assistance. Whether it was for vaccinations or for drug supplies, birth control, whatever those systems were, I suspect that it was going to take a lot more than just these projects to make these activities sustainable. But something had to be done to get the basics to the people. My point is that we are learning as we go and adjusting our programs accordingly to get at the basic constraints.

Q: Do you think these countries are viable?

SLOCUM: It just occurred to me: You came through Paris and you and I sat in Anne de Lattre's office and we were talking about some of these same issues. I remember you said to Anne, "What can we do?" Anne said, "We should just build roads and maintain them forever." I don't know if you remember this discussion, it just came back into my consciousness. We were all three searching for what would really work. I think Anne's point was that they are not going to be really viable in the national sense, and, therefore, the donors have to pick out certain sectors and provide the wherewithal to make them work for the foreseeable future, relieving the pressure from the local government by a major contribution to that one sector, and freeing resources and people to work on other important sectors. That was probably a nonscientific response Anne gave you based on her years of experience and may not have been totally thought through. If one went further with that question I think one would say that even if the economy is not viable, what are the areas that these economies can sustain? There are other complications in this discussion. For example, how much of an AID budget should go to the social sectors, how much to the economic and productive sectors? Well, there you have national parliaments and our own congress saying that you will devote so much of the budget to health and family planning. Even we, as analysts, who try to determine where the best donor investments can go, have our hands tied by the fact that some of the allocation decisions are made through the appropriations process and not on the basis of a needs analysis. So, it is a very complicated game we were and are playing here.

Q: Did you get a sense after ten years that anybody was better off?

SLOCUM: I think there was the beginning of the effort to see how local initiatives could pay off. For example, I told you a lot of my time was spent in the first three years of my four years there on working with donors in countries to come together with the national services and develop a national environmental action plan. (Actually they were called “National Desertification Plan.”) In my last year, with help from my Dutch colleague, we began to realize there had to be much more emphasis on local initiatives, what we now call civil society and NGOs. So, a big conference was held shortly after I left, and my Dutch colleague took responsibility for organizing this. It was called the Segou Conference, held in Mali. That was the first effort to bring not just government officials but also NGOs interested in reforestation and similar environmental projects throughout the Sahel to come together and talk. To my knowledge this was the first effort of the Club to get involved in participatory issues. I think donors had been talking participation for some time, this was not new, but it was the Club’s recognition that we had done the sector assessments, done the regional issues, done a lot of the national sensitization programs on cereals policy and environmental issues, and now where do we take it from here? About the time I left they were just beginning to recognize there had to be much more involvement — what we now call “stakeholder” involvement — and this was the logical direction for the Club to go, a new area for them, to get broader participation in the decision making, the actual problem identification and the whole process.

Q: In the sectors you were handling, environment, etc., what were the elements of the strategy or policy that you were promoting and trying to get governments to adopt and donors to join in on? What were some of the substantive features?

SLOCUM: In a resource-poor environment aggravated by drought, rationalizing the agricultural sector on a regional basis was the first priority. Thus the bilans programmes on cereals pricing policies. The reforestation bilans were meant to help countries and donors develop coherent strategies for stopping the advance of the desert, where feasible. Later, as I just said, the Club began looking at how these strategies could be best promoted, and we realized that there were gaps at the local level. We also began sharing technical lessons among the countries. A research activity in one country might develop a special plant species that had roots that could go down low and find the aquifer, a perfect drought-resistant species for the Sahel. One of the things we were trying to do was take lessons learned and propagate them. There were things that were drawn up by the consultants who did the sector assessments and then the idea of doing these at the national level was to see what the donors and the Sahelian officials coming to the meetings thought would make sense. The result of that meeting would be a document which would provide a list of activities that would move the process forward. Was it a shopping list that the Sahelians always like to see? Well, to some extent it was. On the other hand it did get people sitting in the same room thinking about these things.

Q: What were some of the activities?

SLOCUM: Sand dune stabilization was a controversial area and applied mainly to Mauritania and the northern regions of countries like Mali. I saw such schemes in Mauritania. Even the capital city of Nouakchott was threatened. Once those dunes start moving, they are virtually impossible to stop. The Mauriticians had constructed a good road running east from Nouakchott, which is on the Atlantic. Within five years parts of it had to be regularly plowed from sand on the northern side. Eventually the dune would be so massive that no amount of plowing could handle it. They would simply have to abandon the road at some point and relocate it further south. So, technically, stabilizing sand dunes was a lost cause. As far as I know, the idea was abandoned as unfeasible. The more successful activities over time were community-based reforestation, small-scale irrigated perimeters near water areas, natural crop and plant protection.

Q: The big part was reforestation?

SLOCUM: Yes.

Q: Would that include the community tree-planting scheme?

SLOCUM: The result of Segou was to encourage countries to give farmers more autonomy and authority over such planting sites. Prudent use of water sources was another area for development, including irrigation schemes. Other lessons learned and applied included the evolving role of the state, from one of intrusion to support for private-sector and community-based initiatives. The idea also was that these local reforestation projects were more successful if land ownership issues were resolved and if the people living in the area had a sense of personal responsibility for making these projects work. There were land tenure issues involved. We did quite a bit of work in that area.

Q: Were you involved in the cereal policy exercise?

SLOCUM: Most of that work was done before my time, although I had some involvement.

Q: Have a chance to see any results of that policy exercise?

SLOCUM: Prior to my arrival, national cereals policy analyses had been completed. The effort shifted to regional coordination of those policies. A series of regional conferences were held, the last in my era was in Cape Verde. At this point discussions were shifting away from official policies, which were becoming increasingly harmonious among member countries, to private sector incentives to increase production, and more extensive agricultural practices.

Q: Did you go to the Club du Sahel conferences where the donors got together?

SLOCUM: The formal convocation of Ministers and aid agency heads occurred every other year. I went to the one in Milan in 1986 or 87, I believe it was.

Q: Who attended them?

SLOCUM: It was very high level. Donors sent the equivalent of the Administrator or the head of their Africa sections. These were major events. Usually a president of one of the Sahel countries would come to open the session. In the case of the one I attended in Milan, the Italian Prime Minister and the President of Niger presided at the opening. The agenda was twofold: to present the results of the joint work program of the past two years, and to propose for review and discussion the work plan for the next two. A number of thematic presentations were made by Sahelians or donor representatives.

These were not just sector-level presentations. For example, two years earlier, the Canadians had proposed, and the plenary approved, an assessment of the future of the Sahel over 25 years: a “Futures Study.” The Canadians funded it and contracted with a Canadian firm to conduct the study. It was a fairly extensive effort, but my recollection is that they carried it out rather in isolation. They came to the Club and met with Anne, then traveled to the Sahel organizations: certainly to the CILSS headquarters, and probably to the INSAH. As far as I know, no other donors, including USAID, were consulted until the first draft was produced. It was a Canadian effort from start to finish, from proposal to report submission. The brief was to present a picture of sliding scenarios of what the Sahel was going to be like 25 years from now, with an analysis of what donors could do to affect these scenarios. Their draft report was quite disappointing: it concluded that the Sahel was bound to fail unless donors provided what they called a “big push,” an infusion of massive donor investments that would somehow make the Sahel viable. This was an instance where Anne’s considerable diplomatic skills brought success out of failure. (Anne wasn’t always so diplomatic, but someday maybe you can get her story!) The consultants were sent back to their drawing boards, gently, and tasked with doing more focused analyses and making recommendations for ways in which both Sahelians and donors could make a difference.

Q: Back to the biannual Club meetings. What were these meetings supposed to accomplish?

SLOCUM: Taking stock of the work accomplished and getting endorsement of the work program for the following two years.

Q: The work program was a program that each government agreed to and was willing to take on?

SLOCUM: Yes, in principle. But frankly, I don’t think the Sahel national governments were as motivated by the Club/CILSS work program and its impact on their national sector development plans as they were about attracting donor attention, meaning more funds, to invest in their own plans.

They weren't meant to be pledging sessions, but in the eyes of some attending the meeting, there was an expectation that those discussions would end in endorsements which would result in more aid. But, from donors', and certainly the Club's perspective, it was important to show what had been done and get some guidance on future activities.

Let me mention one other comment on the Paris assignment. In addition to the Club professional staff of five, three of whom were seconded from donor agencies (the U.S., Canada, the Netherlands), Club funds employed a number of consultants. There was a decided bias toward French consultants, but not entirely. One of the two full-time consultants working in the Club was French, and the preponderance of the short-term consultants we used were French. As you know, six of the eight Sahel countries are French-speaking. As an American Foreign Service officer, I found this an enormously enriching experience, too, working with development experts from other donor countries, often interacting in French. Most of the work in the Club was done in French. This opened up a world which was in many ways very different: conceptually, analytically, and culturally.

As the only native Anglophone in the Club, I was the one to do the final review of professional English translations of French studies and reports. It could be tedious but always necessary to make sure the final English version flowed smoothly. I did find, in fact, that professionally translated English-language versions of the original French often were very weak and required some work. So, I began taking on that as well, just because I was under pressure all the time to demonstrate to USAID and to the Mission Directors in the Sahel the "value-added" of the Club. So these reports in English had to look fully professional and be readable. Sometimes if you took a perfectly good sentence in French, and just translated it literally into English, it wouldn't make sense, or would come across as very stilted. I remember I would sometimes look at a sentence and wonder what it meant and would take it to my French-speaking colleagues for help. They would scratch their heads, hem and haw, and eventually we would understand each other, and I could then put it into idiomatic English. There were instances in which the sentence had to be totally restructured for it to make sense.

Q: How did you find your counterparts from other countries to work with?

SLOCUM: The ambiance was quite good. My colleagues were all development professionals and we shared a commitment to Africa. We were two groups: what I would call development managers, people like me who had "grown up" in a bilateral overseas development environment. Others were a step removed, from countries in which their aid agencies were part of their diplomatic service. The Canadians were in this category. Madame de Lattre, Anne, was the most different. She had never lived in a developing country, unlike all the rest of us, but she had a career as an international civil servant at the OECD in the Development Assistance Secretariat. So she knew the development business and the issues. She was fully bilingual, traveled well in the worlds of USAID and the ODA (British aid at the time). I would like to say a word about Anne. She was both a positive and negative influence on the Club. She was its matron. In many ways the Club and Anne de Lattre were synonymous. She put her all into it and deserved this identification with the Club's success. For the 10 years prior to my arrival, she and Roy Stacy, followed by Art Fell, were the principal drivers of the organization. She in particular gave it its stamp. But after 10 years, she had begun to realize she wanted to reduce her personal involvement and hand over the Club to someone else. But she was having difficulty letting go. In fact, even though she has not been the Club director since 1988, I believe she is still very influential and playing a role behind the scenes. At least that was the case until very recently. She was the driving intellectual force behind the Club, but she was not what one would call a “modern” manager. In the four years I was there, as she was slowly withdrawing, she would choose moments for intense involvement, alternating with periods of virtual absence. For example, each year she spent the spring semester teaching at Davidson College in North Carolina.

I must say she interacted very well with Sahelians at all levels. She was an aristocrat of the old school, yet loved traveling to the remote corners of the Sahel. She was on a first-name basis with many Sahelian presidents. She really was a very strong presence. This is the positive side. But I think her strength did have one negative impact: it did not allow the natural growth on the Sahelian side of strong counterpart leadership in the Club/CILSS network. But let’s give her credit: the Club and CILSS system is still a strong presence in the Sahel, even though many bilateral donor missions no longer are present.

I cannot talk of the Club without reflecting on the French more generally. As I said earlier, the Sahel region was in many ways still in the French “domain” (I realize this term could raise eyebrows.). The period of the strong donor buildup in the Sahel, roughly the first 10 years of the Club’s existence (1974-1984) saw growing collaboration between the French and other donor countries. The French were happy to have other donors share the load. The French had a burden after their colonies’ independence to keep investments and the economies afloat, and they welcomed assistance from other donors. I think that is one of the reasons the initial effort by the Americans to set up this regional system of the Club and the CILSS met strong French support, and also the fact that Anne de Lattre was such an excellent bridge builder. So this was a period of strong collaboration.

Occasionally there would be little scraps which gave an indication of French underlying attitudes towards their “domain.” I will give you an example. The French had financed a lot of big irrigation schemes in the Sahel. I remember there was an irrigation group that had a meeting in Paris and I don’t remember exactly who was attending, but one of the things I circulated was a comment from USAID/Mali that included a sentence saying the classic big French irrigation projects have been a failure in Mali. One of the French engineers at that meeting caught that and reacted strongly. He was a very nice, reasonable guy, but he saw that as America attacking the French. He came back with a very vitriolic letter, which was totally untypical of the man whom I had met at the meeting. I showed it to Anne, who said not to engage in polemics, just leave it alone and don’t worry about it. She had good political instincts, including which battles to pick (i.e., the ones you have a chance of winning!)

What has happened subsequently and especially in recent years is that the French budgets have gone down, just as the U.S. budgets have declined. But major conflicts in Africa have required the French to send their troops, and this always has a high cost. The French have started to become concerned that they are losing their hold in Africa, and fear we are trying to replace them. Of course, the last thing we want is to see the French leave, because their influence is still needed. So, it is a complicated subject.

The last comment I will make on the French in my experience at the Club du Sahel is that the French philosophy of development is intimately allied with their own cultural values. Their cooperation missions abroad are called not just development missions but development and cultural missions. This means propagating the French language, which is the main vehicle for propagating the French culture. One cannot understand the French attitude towards its former colonies without understanding that we, as Anglophones, do not share that sense of feeling threatened. We don't feel threatened by the potential loss of English as an international language, but the French feel constantly beleaguered by the "dominance" of the English-speaking world. They feel that that is an important part of their international role, and it is in their national interest to propagate their language as a vehicle of their culture. This is the key to understanding much of France's behavior in Africa in recent years, such as in Rwanda.

Probably the best example I can make, and this jumps ahead a little bit, was in the aftermath of the Rwandan genocide in 1994. The French sent troops into what was called Operation Turquoise, which was to try to stop the civil war. I happened to be in Paris on my way through and was in a friend's apartment watching the news that night on TV. The French prime minister was being interviewed by the newsman, who said, "Mr. Prime Minister, why is France sending its soldiers to Rwanda." Here is how he responded. In French it comes out much better, but what he said in English was, "Well, of course, you understand Rwanda is our friend and it is a French-speaking country." In French that makes perfect sense. But, can you imagine if you try to apply this to the American context, with our president announcing that he has decided to send troops to Nigeria to restore democracy and we are doing it because they are our friends, and they speak English? He would be impeached! So, there is a fundamental cultural difference in the approach and the world view the French have.

Q: A very good illustration. What about the technical orientation of the counterparts that you worked with, the French, the Dutch, etc.? Did you find them still in the old technological perspectives or were you all on the same wave length when you are talking about desertification and environmental issues and things of that sort, for example ?

SLOCUM: The French irrigation expert aside, I found that donor representatives were moving forward in technical innovations and concepts pretty much in sync. In fact, one of the Club's major contributions was its serving as a forum for bringing different points of view together and hammering out a consensus. In addition to the meetings, there was almost continuous consultation on the range of technical issues to reverse the process of environmental degradation in the Sahel. Technically, I think there was excellent interaction. In fact, as I think back on it, what the Club really represented was what USAID would call re-engineering ten years later. The principles of "customer focus" (e.g., African ownership) represented by the CILSS, "doing business differently" (hammering out regional and national consensus on approaches to development) typified the Club's philosophy and operations. The Segou Conference was a breakthrough as it applied a broader consultative approach with the populations on the types of participatory programs which could combat desertification at the local level.

Q: How did you find the Germans?

SLOCUM: Like the Swiss and the Dutch, the Germans employ what I would call a disciplined and “pure” approach to development. None of them has colonial “baggage” in Africa. (The Germans did, but that ended in 1919.) I found the Germans at the cutting edge in technical areas, and they trained well and seemed motivated by making sure Africans were able to pick up the activities at the end. Only in later years did the Germans post someone to the Club. But I worked closely with their man in Ouagadougou, an environmental expert who headed the German Cooperation Technical Assistance office there (GTZ). Part of his work was to support the Sahel regional program through the CILSS. His name was Gunter Winckler. I liked him immensely. When the Germans later decided to place a person in the Club, it was Gunter, where he served for a number of years. He and his wife were strong supporters of the Club/CILSS process, and I worked very closely with them on a number of related issues. He had great skills for the work he did, technically, interpersonally, and so on. The Germans were very cooperative during the period I was there. The GTZ in Frankfurt at one point hosted a donor meeting on environmental programs in the Sahel, to which all the major donors and the Club were invited to participate.

If you asked me to rank the donors in terms of their interest and support — and I realize you haven’t asked — I would say in the top rank, after the U.S. and France, of course, I would put Germany, the Netherlands and Switzerland, the same countries I cited above for the soundness of their programming, so this is not a coincidence that I rank them equally high in terms of their policy commitment. Canada was very interested, and collaborated closely with us, and, of course, they too had someone in the Club. Japan began getting more involved, and at one point was considering joining the Club and perhaps even placing someone, but that did not occur. Italy was hot and cold, and eventually Italy withdrew as a Club member, I understand.

Q: Were the meetings always with the Sahelians and not just among the donors?

SLOCUM: There were both. There were donor-only meetings, usually when CILSS performance issues were on the agenda or, for that matter, Sahelian countries’ performance in a given area needed airing in a frank atmosphere. There was another meeting I remember I generated with the World Bank here in Washington. I was concerned that after the national meetings on the draft national environmental action plan, there wasn’t any follow up or even an action agenda. The idea was to get the major donors interested in national environmental action plans to agree on approaches, then work out a plan of action for implementation. It was hard for us to know what practical effects these meetings had. So these meetings didn’t really push the action agenda forward on the ground. Normally the CILSS would and should have been responsible for the follow-up with their member countries, but I don’t think this was done, at least systematically.

By the way, in terms of donor interest, though the World Bank was not formally a member of the Club, it and the European Commission were interested in the process and routinely attended both donor and mixed donor-CILSS meetings. One reason for the Bank’s interest was probably that it didn’t have many resident missions in the field they way it does today.

Q: They didn’t participate in the Club did they?

SLOCUM: As I said, the Bank never formally joined the Club as a member, but Bank staff, both technical and managerial, were very active in the policy and sector issues. The Club ethos was, I would say, very “Bank-friendly”: deeply analytical, prescriptive, pointing the way to reforms. Now that I think about it, we (the Club and the Bank) were soul mates. And the Bank staff were very cooperative. This was another problem. The Club and the Sahelians generated reflection at the regional level, but the challenge became to translate that energy into national-level change. But then who was going to take responsibility at the national level to follow up? As you can see, this issue keeps popping up.

Q: The Sahelians weren't there?

SLOCUM: We had a mix of meetings. Some, especially the more formal, definitely involved national services, and Sahelian officials were active participants. But, as I showed above, we sometimes had donor-only discussions as well. But, you are touching upon another thing which is: how effective can donor-only meetings be when we are essentially trying to get the Sahelians themselves to get more involved and engaged in these areas. Once in a while someone would raise the question: why is the Club in Europe? Shouldn't it be a support organization to the CILSS in Ouaga? Well, nobody ever said so, but I think it probably was because a lot of the people who energized the Club at the OECD would not move to Ouagadougou, including Anne, herself, I suspect, if you asked her. A related proposal was to transfer people between the two organizations, to take somebody from the Club and put that person at the CILSS and put somebody from the CILSS in Paris. Implementing the proposal broke down over the practicalities: who in the Club would move to Ouagadougou? And who would the CILSS put in Paris? The problem became who they would be and how effective would they be. That never quite got to the operational stage. In fact, it didn't really come up, to my knowledge, while I was in Paris, but it had been discussed earlier.

Q: Also the question of how effective the CILSS was because you still weren't at the national level at the CILSS. How effective did you find the CILSS?

SLOCUM: Generally speaking, the CILSS had difficulty finding its proper role vis-a-vis its member countries. Though some might disagree with me, I have the impression that the CILSS's creation was more an initiative of the donors than of the Sahel member states. The Club needed a Sahelian counterpart institution with which to work. As I said before, I think there was always a different perspective between the two institutions. Donors felt the CILSS would harmonize the policy and strategic dialogue among its member states, while I suspect that the CILSS countries saw the CILSS as opening up a wider source of donor resources for their national programs. So, CILSS's effectiveness was, in my view, constrained by this reality. But I am not saying that the CILSS served no useful purpose. Its secretariat had some outstanding people. The Secretary General during my tenure was quite good, a Nigerien former Minister of Rural Development who understood the issues and possessed excellent interpersonal skills, probably one of the most self-effacing people I've ever known. These skills helped give the CILSS a certain amount of credibility, but there was always the question of what CILSS's value-added was. People with a longer history might say that the CILSS's reputation fared better under the first Secretary General, but keep in mind that he served when the CILSS was starting from scratch developing those bilans programmes in the major sector areas concerned with agriculture and environment.

He laid the foundation of the organization. Another element affecting the CILSS's effectiveness was, I think it needs to be said, the image many had that the Club drove the CILSS agenda. Was this true? Well, Anne was a very strong personality and, as I said earlier, her personification of the Club surely impacted on the CILSS. If some felt the CILSS was drifting, then the Club would pull it back. Again, I think one has to keep in mind that each institution had, by its own members' reckoning, different objectives. The Club wanted to improve the quality of development assistance going to the Sahel; the CILSS wanted to show its members that it was getting more money for them. These are not identical objectives.

About the time I came to Paris, Art Fell's counterpart for environment and forestry was a Malian who was quite good, a fairly senior man with earned credibility and respect, and an acknowledged expert in his field. Unfortunately for me, he returned to Mali (and became a senior adviser to the prime minister), and was replaced by another Malian who was just the opposite: lazy, unproductive, and lacking respect and credibility among his own peers. So, the effectiveness of CILSS varied according to the quality of its staff.

Q: How did you go about it since your primary job was to convert national plans into operating programs? What did you do and how did you get them involved at the country level?

SLOCUM: We employed experts to move from the bilan programme stage into the preparation of national anti-desertification action plans. During my time at the Club, we oversaw the preparation of these plans for about six of the eight countries. The process involved outside experts, always including Sahelians, working with national experts. Once the host government approved the plan, we would sponsor a national-level meeting among relevant services and donor representatives within the country to review the plan, revise it based on that dialogue, and finalize it for donor funding. I think it was follow-up at this final stage that wasn't very successful. Even though CILSS staff participated fully in the planning and execution of these national meetings, and even though each Sahelian government had what was called a CILSS National Coordinator responsible for managing all CILSS-sponsored activities within the country, there weren't enough personnel to shepherd this process of operationalizing the plan. Now maybe this wasn't so bad. Ultimately, the impact had to happen within the country, and whatever initiatives generated by the CILSS national meeting took root, fine. Perhaps the seeding analogy helps: when you broadcast seed you expect some seeds to take root and germinate; others to dissipate. What I cannot tell you is which seeds among the ideas discussed at the national meetings took root. It was impossible for Club and CILSS personnel to keep track of each national program, nor should we have been expected to. I would be fascinated to see evaluations of these efforts in the subsequent years.

Q: They were national workshops about environment with specific programs?

SLOCUM: That's right. They were called "National Desertification Control Action Plans." There was a dichotomy there between our perception that these plans had to have high-quality program content based on rigorous analysis and research, and the CILSS/Sahelian perception that the plan should offer a shopping list of projects for donor funding. We always had a struggle in trying to get them to reduce the "shopping-list" mentality in the preparation of the documents and focus on quality of analysis and program development as the basis for project identification.

The “first-things-first” concept. The joint Club/CILSS expert team would conduct the analysis, and when the document floated through the national services, projects for funding would be added in an annex, with little relevance to the analytical section. I think this was true in every country plan once it went through the national services.

Q: Did you find the regional meetings somewhat productive?

SLOCUM: They were useful in sharing ideas among member states and learning lessons that could be applied from one country to others. The participants, either policy-makers or technical experts, would get to know each other and to exchange ideas and experiences. I remember one technical-level meeting on agricultural statistics, which was held in Dakar. The Burkina Faso representative later became the minister of agriculture. Such meetings and discussions must have enriched his ability to direct agricultural policy in his own country.

Africa development is not constrained by the lack of good professional, analytical and technical people. I think the idea is to build a critical mass. I hope that these regional efforts by the Club and CILSS over time are helping to build this critical mass.

Q: Critical mass of...?

SLOCUM: Professionals, trained managers and technicians who form the nucleus of the institutions needed to manage the development process. Over time I think that has been developing. Institution-building has been enhanced in recent years by the revolution in information technology, which is helping to create this mass of trained people.

Q: Any other dimensions of the Club du Sahel experience?

SLOCUM: As an AID officer assigned to Paris, I was privileged to be exposed to a very different working environment in support of development objectives in Africa. I would estimate that I spent about 30 percent of my time in the Sahel region of Africa working on the areas I have described, networking, promoting national programs and representing the Club at a number of regional meetings.

However, I would like to point out one additional area related to this assignment: it is that I don't think the agency places a great deal of value on what are called excursion assignments. These are assignments in such areas as long-term training, or an assignment to an international organization or bank. The AID promotion system does not honor such assignments because the AID “culture” regards them as outside “the mainstream.” I think it is unfortunate because some of the most rewarding and broadening assignments have been these such which have served to substantially broaden one's professional perspectives. For me, the Club posting enabled me to look at development from a very different perspective in a multi-donor environment. That was very useful. Later on I went to the War College, which was also extremely enriching, but within AID, officers' chances for promotion are not enhanced by serving in such assignments.

I can tell you a story. At one point your successor as one of the Deputy Assistant Administrators for Africa, Lois Richards, pulled me aside at a meeting in Washington. She had been on one of the promotion panels and said, “I think you ought to know that when we looked over your file, someone on the panel felt if you want to get promoted you have to get back to the mainstream.” She was graciously sending me an important message: to get promoted in AID, don’t stay out of the “mainstream” very long. It was very good of her to pull me aside and give me that advice, because that was important for me to know.

Q: Your assignment in Paris was not appreciated by the system as contributing to your promotion?

SLOCUM: Again, I think AID’s value system does not include these kinds of assignments. It would be interesting to see what the progressive downsizing of the Agency has done to this concept. If anything, it has probably hardened.

Q: I think you are right.

SLOCUM: Since we are talking about the general impressions of the Paris assignment and leading on to the next assignment, I can relate an amusing set of events. I got a cable sometime in the fall or early winter of 1987, sometime before I was due to leave in the summer of 1988, informing me that my next post would be Fiji. I thought this wasn’t consistent with the discussions I had been having about my future goals, so on my next trip back I checked with people in the Asia Bureau and talked to them about the Fiji program. I was to be the number two in Fiji, not the director. People whom I knew and respected said that this was not a prominent program, and they expressed surprised I was being assigned there. I was advised by some senior people that I thought had my interests in mind to appeal it and hold out for a more senior assignment. So, I did that.

The response was that they had considered my appeal and overruled me, so the Fiji assignment was upheld. Shortly thereafter, back in Paris, I got a phone call from the head of senior placement in Personnel, who had been a senior officer in the Africa bureau, saying not to tell anybody but I would shortly be getting a call from the Assistant Administrator for Africa asking if I would like to go to Mauritania as director. This was an unexpected and immediate vacancy. I had been hoping for a senior-level appointment, and realized this was a big opportunity even though Mauritania had not been at the top of my list of preferences, so I accepted. In the same week that I got reconfirmed to go to Fiji, I got an offer to go to a senior assignment in Mauritania.

TIMOTHY DEAL
Deputy Representative to OECD
Paris (1985-1988)

Timothy Deal was born in St. Louis, Missouri and graduated from the University of California at Berkeley. After serving in the US Army, he joined the Foreign Service in 1965. His career has included positions in Honduras, Poland, England and France. Mr. Deal was interviewed by Raymond Ewing in 2004.

Q: So then you went as Deputy U.S. representative to the OECD in Paris in the summer of '85.

DEAL: Correct.

Q: And Ed Streator was the U.S. representative, the Ambassador.

DEAL: Yes.

Q: Now there have traditionally been two deputies in that mission.

DEAL: There was such an arrangement in the past, but by the time I arrived there was only one Deputy. There was a senior Treasury officer in the mission, and at times past, the Treasury person had been the DCM.

Q: Now Ed Streator had already been there a year when you arrived?

DEAL: Right. In 1984 and 1985, my first year at post, we tried to put in place the reforms recommended in the roadmap.

Q: So, some of those things had already gotten started?

DEAL: Ed had brought an official from the Labor Department on a detail to deal with the structural reforms including budget and program priorities. So, yes, much had already been done by the time of my arrival. I spent the vast majority of my time there on management issues, running the mission, and dealing with my counterparts in the other G-7 countries. We had an informal consultative network among the G-7 countries at the OECD. Probably the most difficult job I had was overseeing our relationship with COCOM [Coordinating Committee for Multilateral Export Controls], which was also located in Paris. That was the organization that dealt with Western export controls to the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. Relations with the Secretary General, who was an Italian, were especially prickly because of the hard-line stance the U.S. had adopted on the export control issue at the behest of the Defense Department. While I could not do much about the policy, I did try to make our working relations with the Secretary General and other COCOM countries as smooth as possible given the high priority the Administration had attached to the export control question.

Q: How did COCOM come to be the responsibility of the U.S. Mission to the OECD?

DEAL: I don't the origin of this setup. Certainly, COCOM could have been the responsibility of the Embassy Paris, but, in fact, it fell to the U.S. Ambassador to the OECD. American officers at COCOM were listed as members of the U.S. Mission to the OECD, even though they didn't work there.

Q: How about the Paris club? Did that come under the OECD?

DEAL: No, I certainly saw a lot of people from State and other agencies dealing with the Paris

Cub debt issues, but we had no responsibility for them.

Q: And that's true of UNESCO [United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization] too?

DEAL: Yes. It was an entirely separate mission, which closed its doors in 1985 because of the U.S. withdrawal from UNESCO.

Q: How about relations between the OECD mission and the Embassy Paris; did you have to spend much time on that?

DEAL: I did because the Embassy provided all our administrative support. So on matters of housing, assignments of personnel, finance, etc. we had to work very closely with the Administrative Section of the Embassy and the DCM there as well. We had a very good, cordial relationship. It would be easy in certain situations to end up as a second-class citizen, but that was never the case with Embassy Paris. We got all the support we needed.

Q: One of the other traditional functions of the OECD is related to the coordination of developed country positions in trade negotiations and other international economic issues. You mentioned you were part of a group of G-7 country representatives that would work together. Did you get into trade negotiations during much of that period?

DEAL: Well, the OECD is one of those international organizations where the real players come from capitals, not the mission to the organization. Much of the coordination and consultation that we had with other country representatives, including the G-7, primarily involved approaches being developed in capitals.

Q: Who was the Secretary General of the OECD when you were there?

DEAL: Jean-Claude Paye. He was a very senior French economic diplomat. He was distinguished, impressive, and intelligent. Among other things, he had been Chairman of the Paris Club and the equivalent of our Under Secretary for Economic Affairs in the French Foreign Ministry.

Q: And was there a senior American on the OECD secretariat as well?

DEAL: Yes, Jack Myerson. Traditionally there has been an American Deputy Secretary General at the OECD. We kept in contact and he was supportive of our reform initiatives. He was also helpful with the perennial budget problems that the U.S. has with international organizations.

Q: From 1973 to 1975, I was Economic Counselor in Switzerland in Bern, and at that time, there was something called the ECSS [the Executive Committee in Special Session] of the OECD, and it happened to be chaired at the time by a Swiss official. I remember meeting with him fairly often on issues related to that body; I don't know if that continued during your time there.

DEAL: It continued, and it had a fairly high profile at one time. But by the time I had arrived at the OECD, it had lost much of its importance. I believe that as the Economic Summit process became more formalized with numerous preparatory meetings, G-7 Summit teams took up the work previously carried out by the ECSS.

Q: You mentioned before that much of what happens at the OECD involved people from capitals that come to the meetings and served on the committee. Did you feel at times that you were basically running a travel agency or hotel service for visitors, or could you and the Mission be involved in substance?

DEAL: It was difficult to take part in any meaningful substantive work. In general, I believe it is difficult to be a diplomatic mission to a think-tank or to have much of a role in the policy debates at home. To the extent you have good relations with the agencies in Washington, you can play a useful supporting role, and I think we did. We had good working relations in Paris with our counterparts in other missions at all levels. However, the real players came from capitals, and it was our primary responsibility to help them prepare for those meetings and support them while in Paris.

Q: Ok, anything else you want to say about your time there from '85 to '88? Was Ed Streater the Ambassador throughout that period?

DEAL: No, he was there for the first two years, and then Denis Lamb replaced him in my final year.

Q: Denis Lamb had similar background to you, right?

DEAL: Yes, he was an Economic Officer with extensive experience at the OECD.

Q: He certainly had been involved with it in Washington.

DEAL: Not only in Washington, he had also served on the staff of the U.S. Mission to the OECD.

Q: Ok, anything else you want to say about that time in Paris?

DEAL: Well, I should mention that we lived in a beautiful apartment overlooking the Bois de Boulogne. After leaving London, Jill took a position with Rogers and Wells, a law firm with which she was associated until 1992. Chris went off to the University of California at San Diego. Bart attended the American School in Paris. We had some good times in France, especially one summer vacation in Provence, but after three years I was ready to leave.

KENTON W. KEITH
Cultural Affairs Officer, USIS
Paris (1985-1988)

Ambassador Keith was born and raised in Kansas City, Missouri. After graduating from the University of Kansas he served with the US Navy before entering the Foreign Service in 1965. An Arabic speaking Officer, Ambassador Keith served as Public Affairs Officer and/ or Cultural Affairs in Iraq, Saudi Arabia, Morocco, Syria, France and Brazil before his appointment as US Ambassador to Qatar. His Washington service included several tours in senior positions with USIA. Ambassador Keith was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1998.

Q: Today is February 21, 2000. You're going to Paris as CAO.

KEITH: The position of Senior CAO was established in the '70s to do two things: first, allow for prestigious academics to enter USIA for a limited time in the largest posts such as Paris, Rome, New Delhi and the like. Second, it was seen as a capstone position for career USIA cultural affairs specialists who were not interested in the press and information role a PAO had to play. An example of the former was the Senior CAO position in Rome where the first incumbent with that title was an eminent professor of Italian politics.. These were senior positions that enabled a handful of career CAO professionals to get to Senior Foreign Service levels usually achieved only through successful service as PAOs. In some ways, my assignment as SCAO Paris broke that mold. I had been very active in cultural affairs, but I had also been a PAO with the traditional range of responsibilities.

Q: It seems a little bit like taking coals from Newcastle to be pushing American culture in France.

KEITH: That is unfortunately the prevailing view of the Congress. The sense is that the West Europeans are allies who know American society very well. So Congress questions why we spend so much money on public diplomacy in Western Europe. But the truth is we have very legitimate interests in establishing exchange links between our institutions and French institutions, in trying to counteract some of the negative popular images of the U.S. that are seen on French television. The amount of anti-Americanism that exists in Western Europe, particularly in France but also in Britain, especially among intellectuals and media figures, is surprising and it has its influence. I believe we are cutting our programs there at some peril.

When I went to Paris, the Fulbright commission was in limbo. The reason was that the French had their interests and what they wanted to do with their own money for scholarships in the U.S. They wanted to support French students coming to the U.S. in selected fields that would take the edge off American competitive advantages in certain areas. They certainly were not interested in going in with American government educational programs and sending people back and forth to study film writing, American history, and so on. So, that was a real challenge. The thing that helped save the Fulbright program was the name itself and the prestige that has always attached to a Fulbright scholarship. So, I thought that it was my task as the senior cultural affairs officer to get on the board as the vice or co-chairman with the French Ministry of Education official assigned to the position by the French government. I wanted to try steer this the program out of the backwaters of French educational interests, and to find ways to encourage them to devote more positive energy to the commission. There was no likelihood of getting more U.S. government funding, so I set out to show how we might could involve the private sector in not just scholarships but in new institutional relationships between academia and the private sector. It was a totally new concept for the French and they took to it like ducks to water. I went to a major French bank and persuaded them to create fellowships in the U.S. in the field of public finance and monetary policy. Fellowship recipients would have what amounted to internships in the bank's Paris headquarters. The bank's name was associated with the prestigious title of "Fulbright." The French loved it, and they began to pay much more attention to the Fulbright Commission.

Q: You were in Paris from '85 to when?

KEITH: From '85-'88.

Q: In a way, what you were describing about what the French wanted to do with the Fulbright program sounds very much like the Soviets wanting to send all their students to go take nuclear physics and not being very interested in American...

KEITH: Or any Third World country, whether it's Turkey, Egypt, or Burundi. They feel generally that they need doctors, civil engineers, petroleum engineers, or increasingly computer engineers, and they're not concerned with Hawthorne scholars or even linguists. That is why American influence on Fulbright boards has to exist to ensure some kind of balance. You can't deny the legitimate desires of a board to help bolster a faculty of engineering, but allowing that to systematically exclude of people who are in arts and letters would not be in our interest. We have this challenge in virtually every country where there is a Fulbright Commission.

Q: Was there in France when you got there in '85 a place within the university system of solid American studies? We have European, French studies. Americans learn about other countries in their universities. But there seems to be a certain lack of solid American studies.

KEITH: There were institutes of North American studies in a couple of universities, including the University of Paris. But the French academic system generally is so broad and is so penetrating in its level of inquiry. In history or English language studies a student may be required to have a remarkably deep knowledge of certain aspects of our society.

We developed a lot of cooperation with the French in their annual examination process. This was a wonderful opportunity for us. We were asked one year for some help with one of the subject areas that was to be a part of the national examination for English language students at an advanced level. It struck us that not only could we supply some information, but we could start supplying lecturers and specialists. One of the first questions was about slavery in the antebellum South. We arranged for the eminent scholar on that question, John Hope Franklin, to have a sort of telephone hookup with the people who were writing the exam questions. That worked so well we took matters a step further. We said, "For your examinations, if you're going to have American topics let us know what areas we can help you with. Give us enough time and we'll bring people over to have seminars with your test writers." That worked extremely well, and helped us develop much stronger relations at the Ministry of Education.

You never knew where the French would aim their academic inquiry. I sat on a jury on one of the French universities where a student was defending a doctoral thesis on the Harlem Renaissance. He did not come out of a department of American studies such as you might find in other countries, but that obviously didn't mean you could not study American subjects in great depth.

Q: Who was the ambassador while you were there?

KEITH: Joe M. Rogers, a political appointee, a businessman from Tennessee, very warm, a very easy man to work for. He was perhaps not the most qualified ambassador of the U.S. and was the butt of a certain amount of joking on the part of the French, but in his quiet way, I think he advanced the relationship for one reason, he was the personal representative of Ronald Reagan, the most popular American president since John Kennedy.

Q: I would have thought the French would have been ill-disposed toward Reagan's politics.

KEITH: Yes. You might think that Ronald Reagan would be the incarnation of all the negative stereotypes the French have about the U.S. A cowboy, a political conservative, a confrontational figure in the Cold War. But you would be wrong. I was always bemused by the outpouring of admiration and even affection for Ronald Reagan among the French. I saw kids standing on street corners selling Reagan tee shirts. I believe he gave many French citizens feeling of confidence in American leadership. Of course this was not a unanimous view. I believe there are always competing intellectual strain in France. Those who believed in an Atlantic alliance were buoyed by Reagan's confidence in the U.S. and his forthright support for increased freedoms in the East.

Q: How about dealing with the intellectuals there? It's such an important group in France. Did you find that this was a difficult group to crack?

KEITH: Well, it was a very interesting time in French intellectual life, and the relationship with the U.S. was always a kind of reference point for competing points of view. Certainly the trendiest philosophical trend in France in those days was that of Les Nouveaux Philosophes, The New Philosophers, represented by the very media-conscious Bernard-Henri Levy. They represented a break with the existentialism of the post-war generations. Their critics described their thinking as a Reaganite right-wing philosophy dressed up in French rhetoric. In self-defense they would occasionally indulge in anti-American rhetoric, although Levy once told me that his only argument with the United States was that his books didn't sell here.

There was also a movement that was seeking a "Third Way." They were seeking a philosophical basis to support the idea of state intervention in a market economy. They wanted to make sure that those entitlements the French were used to, would never be challenged, but at the same time that the bankruptcy of socialism was certainly indicative that another way had to be found. Their slogan might be "neither the American model nor the Socialist." Italian, American, and German philosophers associated with this quest were being discussed in the coffee houses – and French philosophers, too.

The traditional Left, the Socialists and Communists, were in retreat. The Socialist president, François Mitterrand, who virtually destroyed the Communist Party in France and who was the deciding factor in the force modernization effort that was so important to American policy, was leading a Left in disarray. The Socialist party lost the legislative elections massively, bringing in Jacques Chirac as Prime Minister. As for the Communist Party, the faithful were defecting from the party in droves. They regarded their leader, Georges Marchais, as authoritarian and backward, and blamed him for not allowing the reforms that were taking place in communist parties in the rest of Europe.

Our relations with the Socialist government of Michel Rocard were somewhat schizophrenic, you're right. On the one hand, Mitterrand had been indispensable in the force modernization effort, and seemed to be a committed supporter of the Atlantic Alliance. On the other, there was a strong undercurrent of anti-Americanism among the socialist ministers. Jack Lang, the minister of culture, was one of the most vociferous in criticizing the pervasive presence of American popular culture. On a trip to Mexico he publicly decried the "Coca-cola Culture" that aspect of American culture. I was dispatched to complain about some of his more strident anti-American gestures – and not just the Coca-cola Culture incident. He had also made a very public show of not going to the American Film Festival in Deauville. He told me, "I can understand why your people would be a little bit upset, but you should advise them to look at what I do as much as listen to what I say." He started ticking off the things that he had done to help promote American culture in France. He said, "What other minister of culture you know of would give a subsidy to a nightclub so they could continue to bring American jazz groups? What other minister of culture do you know where an American writer who just needs a few months and a place to sit and some food on his table while he's finishing a book, or a photographer, can simply go to a foreign government and say, 'Can you help?' I do this all the time. We put them up with a studio and a typewriter and a stipend not because they're writing about France and even though they are not French citizens, but they're producing something we think may be valuable to humanity. He reminded me that his ministry supported the American section of the Cité Universitaire, where American students could come and be supported by the French government outside the government to government exchange relationship. "You go back and tell them that we have our problems with the popular culture but that we are very supportive of what's best in American cultural." He gave a Legion of Honor to Ray Charles while I was there, as well as to Leonard Bernstein, James Baldwin, and I.M. Pei. He was showing respect for American culture. The most popular films were still American films. Interestingly, a number of American authors who were translated into French – Paul Auster, for example, somehow captured the imagination of the French much more than American readers.

Q: He didn't go to the film festival. Was this making a public bow to the left-wing intellectuals?

KEITH: Yes, I think so. It was a very public gesture and he made it clear in public statements that he saw no reason for an American film festival in France. It was a wonderful festival. The city of Deauville, located not far from the Normandy D Day landings, was administered by Anne D'Ornano, a woman from one of the rightist parties and was quite pro-American, so there might have been an element of French politics involved as well.

Then came the legislative elections that swept the Socialist government out and brought in the Center-Right government of Jacques Chirac, creating an uneasy co-habitation between Socialist president and Gaullist prime minister. On the surface there seemed to be friendlier attitude toward the U.S. among the new crop of ministers. François Léotard, the new minister of culture, announced publicly that he would be attending the Deauville Film Festival. But by and large, I would not say the Chirac government was fundamentally closer to the U.S. than it's Socialist predecessors. There was always an element of the kind of Gaullist chauvinism we sometimes found maddening.

Q: How about the universities? One always thinks of the professors there being bastions of Marxism.

KEITH: Universities were a reflection of what was happening in the rest of France. There is always an element of chauvinism in France and it does not have to be on the left. It can be right in the center and it can certainly be on the right. There is great respect in France for French literature, French culture, and French language, even from people who are not particularly well educated. The fact that French presence on the international stage is in decline culturally is regarded as unfair and regrettable, and the villain in the play is the United States. We are seen to have an unfair advantage because of our wealth and our power. Even on the Japanese stereos the French buy, the controls buttons are in English.

Having said that, however, our relations with French universities were generally very good, and often took place outside the realm of government-to-government programs. On a visit to Lyons once, my French host invited me to a luncheon to celebrate the 10th anniversary of a bilateral exchange program between the engineering faculty at Lyons University and an American university. We had known nothing about it. And as I was leaving Paris, it was Hélène Ahrweiler, Rector of Paris University, who pinned on my medal as Chevalier des Arts et des Lettres.

Q: Did you see changes in the French intellectual establishment coming about? During this period, you had the Gorbachev period in the Soviet Union. The Soviet Union's warts were beginning to show at that time.

KEITH: Yes, Gorbachev himself was regarded very positively, but the Soviet Union was bankrupt in intellectual terms as far as the French were concerned. What was more interesting among the French of the left and especially of the far left was the renaissance in national communist parties around Europe and elsewhere, particularly in Italy, where they saw an emerging communism free of the totalitarian trappings of Brezhnev and the Soviet Communist Party. Unfortunately for the communists, the French Communist Party itself was run by a man who was basically a Stalinist and who did not go with the reformist current that was sweeping the rest of Europe. As a result, there were a lot of disaffected cadres in the Communist Party and people just fell away. Actually, some of them turned in disgust to the extreme right.

Q: Were we concerned about Le Pen?

KEITH: Increasingly.

Q: As far as hoping that he wouldn't make too much contact with the Senator Helms side of our political spectrum?

KEITH: That was never a concern. The man is so chauvinistic there is very little concern that there would be any effective coordination between him and right wing groups in the United States. But there was real worry about the possibility of violence along racial lines in France because of the immigration question. Immigration spilled over into the kind of racial politics that people like Le Pen were able to exploit. There were highly visible icons in France representing opposite sides. You had the whole moderate-liberal-left-relativist side represented by Mitterrand and people like activist Harlem Desire who were trying to promote a France more welcoming and hospitable to the diversities that came with immigration. On the other hand, you had the Le Pens with the Skinhead support, who were disaffected because of high levels of unemployment, who felt they were disenfranchised at least partially because so many people of color had been brought into the country to do work that they should be doing. So, you really had at times a sense that this could erupt into organized violence – not like the Skinheads, who every now and then would pummel or even kill somebody they didn't like -- but a more generalized movement that would be very dangerous to French democracy.

Well, it didn't happen. There is still a Skinhead problem in France. There is still racism and there are still acts of violence. But this is definitely a minority and a lunatic fringe phenomenon. That isn't to say that the immigration problem and the other racial problems have been completely solved; they haven't. Ordinary people, people you've known for years, will sometimes say pretty outrageous things about what ought to be done about immigration. They're scared. They're scared that the French way of life and what is France could be so altered that you would not be able to recognize it. In many places around France you can see that the character has been changed over the last couple of generations because of the immigrants who are walking the streets and populating the bars and sending their kids to the schools. It's not hard to understand where resentments can arise and be politically exploited.

Q: How about visits of opera or other music?

KEITH: Our officially-sponsored cultural presentations program was practically non-existent. The reason was, it was totally unnecessary. Paris had, as far as American cultural expression was concerned from jazz to symphony, orchestras, classical music, ballet, modern dance, writers, more than any city in the United States except New York, Los Angeles, and possibly Washington. I think it would compete even with Washington. In the three years that I was there, we had every major orchestra including the NSO, New York, Philadelphia and Cleveland, all on commercial tours. Our major conductors came to lead the Orchestre National de Paris and other French symphonies. You could count on seeing Isaac Stern, Andre Watts and equally famous performers on Paris stages every year. Paul Taylor, the Dance Theater of Harlem, Alvin Ailey...well, you get the picture. And as for jazz, Miles Davis and the other great stars were regulars during my years in France. Of all the major performing jazz musician at the time, the one who didn't come was Sonny Rollins, and French promoters kept calling me to ask if I couldn't intervene just to get him to think about coming. You want to complete picture of what is happening in American jazz? Go to the south of France in the summer. That's where everybody is. There is a concert cycle that starts in Montreux in Switzerland and then goes to Nice, Antibes, Salon de Provence, Nîmes and Marciac with smaller stops in between. American jazz is alive and well and it's living in the south of France in the summer.

Q: Do radio stations play a lot of jazz?

KEITH: Jazz is certainly played on French radio, but I don't know of any stations devoted solely to jazz. In a way, what exists may be even better. Where you hear jazz is on France Musique, the FM station that features serious music. So, jazz, being a serious music, is played on France Musique, as is symphony music, as is other classical music. You know you will hear good jazz periodically every day on France Musique because it is considered in France a major cultural art form.

Q: Where there any things that would fall within your purview on the cultural side that took explaining or that the French didn't quite understand or were not happy about?

KEITH: A persistent issue was French concern about the impact of American popular culture on the society, particularly on youth. The French didn't believe they were competing on equal terms because they didn't have the resources for producing and marketing French cultural products. They were especially concerned with the dominance of American cinema. They believed that the German and Italian cinema had already been crushed by the waves of American movies, and they were determined that the French cinema would be protected. What developed was a major debate over the limits of French cultural protectionism in a worldwide free trade environment. American movies are, after all, an exported commodity, and if you take steps to close the market in some way you are in theory violating GATT or WTO rules against barriers to trade. So, this was a debate that began in earnest in those days and continues to this day. Government in the eyes of the French has a right to protect its cultural heritage. In the analogy of American NFL free agency, your culture is your franchise player. There must be an exception to completely free exchange. That is what it came to be known as: "l'exception française," which would exclude certain cultural products from free trade protections. On the face of it, some saw this as an almost fascist impulse, but there was a simple pragmatism at the core. The French film industry was under threat because most of the screens in France were showing American films, often American films of poor or indifferent quality. They were looking at the fate of the German film industry. In the '70s the German film industry was thriving, with well known and innovative directors like Fassbinder, Wenders and Herzog. But by the end of the '80s, the German film industry was virtually dead. The British film industry was essentially being absorbed by American studios and television. And the French film industry was under heavy pressure from across the Atlantic. You could go to any town in France with a movie house and you would see a succession of American films that most educated Americans would not pay to see. This, in a country like France, was bound to lead to some kind of protective action.

They started by putting a surcharge on the importation of American films, the proceeds from which would go to the French cinema industry. Of course, the Motion Picture Export Association in the United States was pounding on the door of the Special Trade Representative, saying, "Look what they're doing to us. They're making us support our competition." Well, yes, but the market for U.S. films was very solid. By the 1980s, income from foreign sales of American films could virtually assure that a picture that bombed in the U.S. could still break even.

Q: I think this is the general calculation. There were an awful lot of shoot 'em up adventure movies.

KEITH: Exactly. The smart thing for MPEAA to do would have been to find ways to protect the market its market share but show some creative self-interest in cooperating with French cinema. They were perfectly ready to receive that kind of initiative. U.S. film industry people came to the Cannes Film Festival and made public statements about their great respect for the French cinema, but no real cooperation was accomplished during my tenure. Spielberg told the French media how much he had been influenced by the great French filmmakers and promised financial support to keep the industry healthy. As far as I've heard, he hasn't done much. He's made some noises, but he hasn't really done anything. It may not be his fault because the French are sometimes very hard to help.

Q: Did you get caught in this?

KEITH: Well, I certainly got involved in the whole issue of intellectual property. When Congress was debating accession to the Bern Convention on copyright protection, they held hearings in Paris, and I was given the responsibility to organize them. The hearings were designed to help Congress write implementing legislation for our long-delayed accession to the Bern Convention. There broadly two competing groups seeking to influence the committee: On one side were the creative people (film writers, director and actors) – French and American united in common cause. On the other were the money people (producers, marketers and distributors), also both French and Americans making a common front. It was a most interesting exercise.

WILLIAM P. POPE
Political Officer
Paris (1985-1988)

Mr. Pope was born and raised in Virginia and educated at the University of Virginia. After serving in both the US Army and the US Navy, he joined the Foreign Service in 1974. Mr. Pope served several tours in the State Department in Washington, dealing, notably, with Counterterrorism. His overseas posts include Gaborone, Zagreb, Belgrade, Paris, Pretoria, Rome, and the Hague, serving as Deputy Chief of Mission in the latter two embassies. Mr. Pope was interviewed in 2006 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: Well then, you were in Paris from when to when?

POPE: '85 to '88. In the Political Section; it was absolutely great.

Q: Who was the ambassador?

POPE: The Ambassador was a gentleman from Tennessee, he was a political appointee, had been the finance chairman for Reagan, a gentleman named Joe Rodgers.

Q: Did he play much of a role in your business or were you pretty far down the line?

POPE: I was, first of all, pretty far down the line and second, he was a businessman, a very successful one, and he was much more focused on, as I recall, on trade and business.

Q: Who was the president? Was Mitterrand the president?

POPE: Yes. And he had his folks at the Elysee, including his son, Jean-Christophe.

Q: I was going to say, his son was-

POPE: Jean-Christophe was one of the advisors. The main one was a gentleman named Guy Penne in the Elysee. And it was interesting because it was the first “cohabitation” government, the President and Prime Ministers from different parties. Chirac was the Mayor of Paris for a while and then Prime Minister, and it was very interesting to watch all of that, how that all came down, even though that wasn’t my primary beat. My beat was Africa, but I still was living there and watching it.

Q: Well, let’s talk about this, the French government in Africa at that time, I mean, the relationship was, as you say very close. In many cases it was almost cozy from the way of oh, money and other relationships. Were we observing this and commenting on this back to Washington?

POPE: Sure. Of course.

Q: You know, one thinks of diamonds going to the Seine or to Mitterrand himself. Was this?

POPE: I don’t remember that particular business.

Q: This has been sort of the accusations. But how did you feel, I mean, how about Mitterrand’s son? I mean, was he the person you would see?

POPE: He was one. He wasn’t the only one.

Q: How did you find the French? Were they taking and not giving or giving and not taking or how did it work?

POPE: No. I guess I was fortunate or did my job right but I had good relations across the board. Not just at the Foreign Ministry with people you would expect to be able to relate to but at the Matignon, at the Elysee and elsewhere. It seemed like the entire French government had people in various places who were Africa specialists. I got to know most of those people and was able to have interesting conversations. And it was not one-way at all. In fact, it was certainly more coming from them than went back.

Q: Well, did you find at a certain period, I think we probably were by this time in the ‘80s were past it but still, the French, when we first went in Africa sort of became independent thing; the French are extremely wary of the United States-

POPE: Yes.

Q: -thinking that we wanted to take over.

POPE: Yes.

Q: Which of course is the last thing in the world that we wanted to do and particularly Francophone and the Anglophone too.

POPE: You could not convince them of that, though. When I was there, they still believed that or at least they were still concerned about it. It was still a worry to them, that we somehow wanted to take over and take a lead role. I can't imagine what could make them think, that but they did.

Q: I mean, you know, the idea of the United States wanting to push the French aside in Chad or something like that, I mean, it's ludicrous when you think about it.

POPE: It was, but they were worried, they were concerned about it. And I suppose if you look at the broader world picture you can understand why. Being a member of the Security Council and their dominant position in at least parts of Africa, that was much of what was left of what had been great glory at one point. And so I guess that was something that needed to be rather fiercely protected. It just didn't need to be protected. But they didn't accept that. They were still worried about it when I was there.

Q: Yes, well, I think it's as an empire shrinks, I mean, this is true of Spain at the turn of the century on Cuba. I mean, they lost everything else and whereas normally the problems they had in Cuba could probably be- things could have been settled by accommodation. They just couldn't do it.

POPE: Right.

Q: But did you find yourself getting into long discussions about what in hell's in it for the United States?

POPE: Sometimes. Those questions were asked sometimes and others. I could just tell that they wanted us to continue to stay in the background; they didn't want us to challenge them. But yes, sometimes there were such discussions.

Q: How did they view our policy towards particularly southern Africa at this time? I mean, I would imagine that the French, being probably the most skeptical of all nations, and here was Crocker tilting at this windmill, which he eventually succeeded in overcoming or knocking down, whatever you want to call it. But as you say yourself, we're dubious about how it would come about. How were the French looking at what we were trying to do?

POPE: Like most other European countries; they had formal diplomatic relations with the Marxist government in Luanda, the MPLA. And so from that point of view, my recollection is that they felt that we were too ideological and not practical enough, that the Cubans and Marxists together had won. They had taken the capital and that's what counted and had shot their way into power and had forced the others out into the countryside. And that was just the way it is and that we ought to accept it and go forward. Of course they would want us to succeed over the long term in getting South Africa out of Namibia, if possible, and overturning apartheid in South Africa, should that ever become possible. But in terms of the most sensitive piece of it right at the time, Angola and the Cuban presence, I don't know, I just don't recall that they felt that the fact that the Cubans had come in there and upset the balance at the request of one of the three original parties so, not a big deal. That's my recollection of it.

Q: How were the French viewing, I mean, while you were there, did we get involved with the French on Libya and particularly with them messing around in Chad?

POPE: Oh yes.

Q: What were we doing and the French were doing?

POPE: We had very close cooperation on that issue. I don't recall how much of that remains classified, probably not very much of it anymore it was so long ago, 20 years ago. But there was very close cooperation in helping the Chadians drive, I mean, we didn't have troops there, I don't think the French had any troops there to my recollection.

Q: Well, the _____ had troops.

POPE: Well, but small, I mean advisors, they didn't send in armies and we didn't send in armies; the Chadians did it. But we worked closely, had very close cooperation with them on that particular issue because we both felt that the Libyans had no business with military units there.

Q: There seems to be this relationship, particularly with the French and correct me if I'm wrong, but in Africa always having coups or problems and there seems to be this thing where we've got the airlift and they've got, you know, a few spare brigades of paratroopers or something. Were you involved in any of these sort of movements of getting our Air Force to take to the French troops from point A to point B to quiet things and all that?

POPE: I don't remember about the transporting of the French troops but in the broad level of cooperation that you are talking about, their having troops available for short-term kind of putting things down in a capital to make sure that the foreigners were all gotten out, I'm sure we had some evidences of that, some situations like that, I'm sure we must have. I don't remember that we flew any French troops while I was actually in Paris and working on those issues. We might have but I don't think so. They had their own airlift.

Q: Yes. They had their own airlift and at a certain level we can put more in.

POPE: Yes. But they had enough to move their own folks around and it didn't take so many.

They would bring in a Foreign Legion unit and it would quickly dominate a situation.

Q: Did you run into, I mean, looking at the French Foreign Ministry and other places you were dealing with, did you have any feel about the French both political but also the civil service system there? How'd you feel about this?

POPE: Well, some of the people I dealt with were delightful, people you'd want as friends of any nationality and some others were really, really arrogant. And I think their situation, their system, produces or at least elevates and rewards a certain amount of arrogance. That's the truth of it. I'm not French-bashing because we loved our tour there and there are some absolutely lovely, delightful people but there were some people who were very arrogant and very condescending toward the United States. They were very dismissive of us as a "very young country with no real history" and sort of semi-noble savages from the western forest and 1,000 years down the line we might begin to understand some of the deeper mysteries of the universe. But right now we're much too young and too naïve to really understand anything. That was very frustrating, as you can imagine.

Q: Did you get any reverberations or this just wasn't your bag, about the changes that were beginning to happen in the Soviet Union? You know, you had the death of several Soviet leaders and the rise of Gorbachev and all that and I was wondering whether that affected the thinking of people in the political section.

POPE: A little but it wasn't quite defined enough yet that it came through to me in Paris. There were issues in Africa that had only marginal relationship to things Soviet and Cold War. There were some that had very direct, like Angola for example, but in terms of the Soviet Union itself or the Warsaw Pact, it was just a little after. Because I left in the summer of '88, and it was really as I was leaving that that was beginning. I'm sure my colleagues were beginning to already have conversations with the French.

Q: Well, were we still thinking in terms of the quote, "Soviet menace," unquote, in Africa while you were doing this?

POPE: Yes.

Q: This was something we were really concerned with for a long time.

POPE: Yes. It was peripheral. It was one of these the game being played around the edges, because the center was still Europe, the Fulda Gap, deterring the Soviets from launching this huge conventional army across Germany, etc. But there was this game being played on the margins. Vietnam was long over, but still there was Angola and Mozambique and other places we were worried-

Q: Ethiopia too.

POPE: Ethiopia too. One of the problems, one of the things that Crocker was trying to do with the apartheid government in South Africa was to rebut the "Soviet menace." Every time he'd say, "You cannot go on like this," they would answer along the lines of "Our African citizens aren't really so discontented, it's really all a plot out of Moscow to destabilize us. You're so far away you don't understand it, you Americans." And so even there they were either using it as an excuse or had real belief that some kind of a bogeyman was coming out of Moscow and that otherwise they wouldn't be having all of this trouble.

Q: Well now then did the French have a different view of the quote, "Soviet menace," unquote in Africa?

POPE: Oh sure.

Q: How were they looking at it?

POPE: They just didn't see it as... They were well aware, they weren't stupid. They have very smart people and very fine intelligence services. They thought that we looked at it with too much of an ideological prism as opposed to a practical prism. I had the impression that they didn't think that a temporary Soviet gain was as much of a huge zero sum as we felt it was. That's the difference. Not that they weren't aware of it.

Q: Well did you find yourself, you know, after dealing with this, beginning to look at Africa with a more, I won't say French attitude or at least have a different understanding of Africa now the game was being played there before you went?

POPE: Well, I think I had more understanding of it. I think I was a little bit probably less sympathetic to the French when I came out of. I realize this is going to be made public, and as I say, they are lovely people, but I was probably less sympathetic when I came out, even though Paris is absolutely glorious. It was frustrating to be an American official there, in some ways.

Q: Was the Mitterrand government sort of playing the, I won't say anti-American but opposition to American card more than, or was this a Gaullist prerogative?

POPE: Yes, I'm not sure that they were playing it more but it was, I think, the basic direction in which they would try to maintain what they did have, which by comparison to what they'd had at one point wasn't so much, but to try to be the counter-American and try to line up others to slow us down at least. Sure. But there was also a huge amount of cooperation including later when we talk about my last assignment, which was counterterrorism. That is much more recent than the period we're talking about right now, but the French are very professional and they were not too ideological and they got it.

Q: Well, this is one of the things that I've found interesting. We've had this overt sort of public dispute with France now for, you know, maybe 225 years or what have you, but at the same time sort of in the military and intelligence side and lots of other places very much closer cooperation than with many other countries.

POPE: Yes, that's exactly correct.

Q: You know, it's, at the professional level, up to a point, and I suppose the Foreign Ministry can be a place where you can't be overly arrogant and be in the military. I mean, it doesn't work. Or in the intelligence business.

POPE: Right.

Q: But you can in foreign policy.

POPE: Exactly. And that's why I say I definitely ran into it there among some. And some were absolutely terrific colleagues. It was a mixed bag there.

Q: Well then, you left there in '88?

POPE: I did.

DAVID M. WINN
Political Officer
Paris (1985-1989)

David M. Winn was born in Texas in 1942. He graduated from Swarthmore College in 1964, received an MA from the University of Texas in 1966 and an MPA from Syracuse University in 1969. He served in the Peace Corps and then joined the Foreign Service in 1969. He has served overseas in Vietnam, Lebanon, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, France and Senegal. This interview was conducted by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2002.

Q: Okay, today is March 27, 2002. David, you were off to Paris. You were there from '85 to '89. Could you explain what the job was and how the embassy was set up to use these what other area watchers were there?

WINN: My brief was, the countries and their representatives in the Middle East. All of NEA. We used to say it was from Marrakech to Bangladesh. So, the answer is the Arabs, the Israelis and the Iranians. So, I had the Arabs, the Israelis and the Iranians. Now as to your question, we had someone else who dealt with East and South Asia, and we had someone who dealt with Africa, and, incredibly in those days we had someone who dealt with Latin America. We had four regional representatives in the political section. Your point is well taken - how did the political section deal with us? All of whom were regarded as odd birds to say the least, but the political section was divided into an internal and an external part, and that's how they dealt with it. They had of course the political counselor, the deputy political counselor and then all of us gnomes running around this large internal political section and this four person external political section.

Q: Was there somebody who kind of had the French external brief, too?

WINN: Yes, and that would have been the deputy political counselor. He supervised us.

Although, he shared that with the political counselor. The joy of my job was that all of our areas were so arcane that as the area watchers, often we would deal with almost the highest levels of the Quai d'Orsay because our subjects were so obscure, whereas a comparable level officer in the internal section would have been relegated to lower dealings with the French government.

Q: Who was the, well, in the first place the ambassadors while you were there and then the political counselor and the deputy political counselor?

WINN: Sure, I'm embarrassed to say I cannot remember the name of the ambassador, who was a political appointee, a Tennessee real estate developer who was a very nice guy.

Q: But they kind of come and go.

WINN: They come and go and he was there indeed the same ambassador the entire time. For the life of me I cannot remember his name, the nicest guy in the world. The political counselor was Adrian Besora, whose long career in the Foreign Service ended up as ambassador to Slovakia I think. Then he was replaced by a guy named Phil Semler, S-E-M-L-E-R, who also had a long career. He went on I think finally as consul general in Milan. The deputy political, do you want these names literally?

Q: Sure.

WINN: The deputy was a fellow named David Engel and he was replaced by John Willett. John Willett to this day lives in Paris where he owns an apartment. David, whose wife is also an FSO, lives in Florence. Both retired.

Q: Well, in the first place I mean, when we move on, but before we go I would think that the Latin American watcher could spend most of his time sitting on a beach in Martinique or something like that?

WINN: Well, they may have reordered these priorities. I don't think there is a Latin American watcher there anymore. I also had another brief, which was the IO watcher. To put it another way, I handled everything to do with the UN, which actually was a pretty heavy.

Q: I would think that would be quite a heavy job?

WINN: Anything to do with the UN fell to me and I always kind of wondered why. So, it kept me busy and a brief I might add that always was overlooked both in the Department and in the embassy. Although I did get very good EERs out of the job, it was always on the NEA side, but imagine any cable or any demarche to the French and any visitor dealing with the UN. That's a huge burden. Imagine how many UN visitors came through? That's incredible, not to say that, so I mean it was a busy time.

Q: Well, before we move on to the NEA portion,

WINN: Which is the most interesting.

Q: The most interesting, but lets talk a little about the UN brief. Im interested in this '85 to '89, our perception of the French role in the UN because so often in my interviews I find a certain amount of frustration with the French. Always feeling the French are trying to screw us in some way or another, just for, maliciously or something.

WINN: For the heck of it.

Q: I mean sticking it to the United States seems to be you know, seems to be the diplomatic sport in France. What was our attitude towards in this period the French role in the United Nations?

WINN: I confess I do not recall that it was particularly negative. We had a lot of cordial meetings. My job would be to trot over various small demarches and they were usually well received. I don't recall that there were any great problems. I can recall the IO assistant secretary, Vernon Walters, was always entertaining and he would come through and had rather cordial meetings. Because Vernon Walters was the assistant secretary for IO and because he was raised in France and spoke perfect French he always got what he wanted whenever he came through Paris. He was by this fellow who is on TV "making sense," Al Spheres, whatever his name is, a politician. I don't recall.

Q: Allen Keyes?

WINN: Allen Keyes, sorry. Allen Keyes. I just don't remember a particularly contentious time. The Middle East was different with the French, I always sum up the French this way. They somehow have the reputation for and publicly display the characteristics of being obstreperous, however, privately they always seem to come through. Im not saying they weren't also spying on us. I mean, we were aware, they were the oddest combination, but I have a warm spot for them because particularly in the Middle East, they generally always pretty much were helpful. That's just generally what I recall about the UN.

Q: All right, let's go to the Middle East. Let's focus particularly on Lebanon. What was going on?

WINN: Lebanon. Well, it was A) I'd just come from Lebanon and B) the big issue were the hostages and the fate of Lebanon. There was a presidential election. The Middle East per se was pretty quiet. I had the occasional peace process thing, but only toward the end of '88 and even in '89 did the Intifada in Jerusalem break out. So, the Arab Israeli problem was just a minor, only occasionally did I have to deal with that. The big topic was Lebanon and the fate of the hostages and whither Lebanon, so that was a constant topic and Iran of course. The Iranian role in Lebanon and what were the Shia up to. Now, all of these countries, the Lebanese practically occupied Paris, as they do to this day. Between the Lebanese journalists and the Lebanese politicians who all assumed that I had in the palm of my hand the fate of the next president of Lebanon, I mean Amin Gemayel was up for reelection. As I recall, he was reelected. So, I dealt intimately with all the candidates who would come through Paris and all take me to lunch. I also dealt with every crazy that came to the embassy, usually these crazies were walk-ins claiming to have information about the hostages. The Agency was happy to use me in that regard. I can even say this on tape they would love to trot me down and have me interview walk-ins, often in Arabic. So, that was fun. Actually it was fun, but it was so time consuming and I would meet guys under bridges and it was constant dealings with nuts, almost invariably nut cases. One of whom was Ollie North, I might add, who as often dispatched to Paris throwing his weight around and the embassy of course supine, I was instructed to do whatever Ollie wanted because it "came from the White House," as that situation persists today. It turned out he was completely nuts and was arranging this guns for hostages thing with Iran. It was all full of derring do and a lot of fun, but I was in the middle of it simply because I was the NEA type. And I knew all the players in Paris. But of course to the French while that was always important, they had issues in North Africa as well, Algeria and to some extent Tunisia and Morocco, and the Western Sahara and it was never every day was different. The Iranians, these Iranian exiles, one whom for God sake had been my boss in the Peace Corps in Tehran. So, you have these guys all over Iran claiming to control armies that would "go back and we'd take Iran." I tended to take them perhaps more seriously than I should have, but I was trying to show a conscientiousness in dealing with Iran as well. I cannot imagine a more feckless and obscure group of people and I think my successor Josiah Rosenblack cut most of them off, rightly so. I had a fond spot in my heart for Iran also because of my Peace Corps years, so.

Q: What did the French have hostages in the Lebanon?

WINN: Im trying to recall. They may have had one or two. The French take a rather harder line on this though. Its funny I didn't deal with the French per se on the hostages very much. Had they asked I would give the status of things, but so much of my time was spent just talking to everyone who came in and relaying that back to Washington. In that sense it was not a bilateral issue with the French. They had of course a great interest in Lebanon historically. Again, to some extent the peace process. We had a flood of visitors also. Can you imagine it? Everyone who had anything to do with the Middle East, Iran came through Paris and would go over to the Quai and that was fine with me. It always meant a reporting cable. I also dealt with the broader issue, just Islam and France. I wrote a massive cable on that toward the end of my stay and I remember much of the cable deals with what was then the obscure topic of Pakistani Islamic fundamentalism and the mosque they were setting up in Paris of course. It later emerged the 15 years, 10 years, 12 years later the crazies that blew up the Trade Center. At the time I thought, who are these people? Pakistani fundamentalists. So, I dealt with that and the journalists, of course, my bread and butter were the Arab journalists and the French journalists. Now not every FSO gets along with journalists. I always have. The French with many of them to this day. They really knew what they were doing.

Q: When you say they?

WINN: The journalists. They all had a line to spin, but they were smart guys. I'll tell you, the best Arabists of all the diplomats in Paris, not surprisingly, were the Israelis. I remember an Israeli diplomat. I dealt very intimately with an Arab journalist with whom Im in touch today, who had such a line into the French foreign ministry it was quite astonishing. He would tell me things. He regularly took me to lunch and would tell me things that were scooping the Agency. I was pretty open with him in return. I was always pretty careful. I would feed him this party line, but I was pretty open with the guy. I remember an Israeli diplomat (and of course, this Arab published only in Arabic) who said, I detect your hand in this guys articles. He was right. Now, here's an Israeli reading Arabic. Now most of us could barely parse out the text, but I was really struck by this Israeli guy, his capacity in correctly detecting my hand in this Arab journalists reporting. The stuff the Arab gave me was a good example of how the French got along with the Arab journalists.

Q: Well, did you feel from that perspective at that particular time that the French were...

WINN: They were trying to play catch up. They were just running around, following us trying to see what in the hell we were up to everywhere. They were trying to and they always have been trying to carve out their own role. So, they couldn't have been more responsive to every request for an appointment. I could literally see at a moments notice the equivalent of the deputy secretary. I didn't abuse that privilege and I never saw him alone. I guess the highest guy I saw on my own would have been the equivalent for the undersecretary for political affairs. They were so interested in what we were up to.

Q: Did you feel that you could, I mean, was what we were up to pretty straight forward?

WINN: Yes, I was very open. I tried to be open because we were such at, we were floundering in Lebanon. We never had anything going on behind the scenes, not as much as the French thought we did and certainly not as much as the Lebanese thought we did. All the presidential candidates would take me to lavish lunches assuming that somehow I would dictate to the Lebanese parliament. I think the French always gave us more credit than we deserved. They didn't buy the line that we were running things in Lebanon quite to the extent the Lebanese did. They were correct though in assuming that when we would launch this or that Israeli Palestinian plan, they wanted to know whatever detail was. Richard Murphy the then Assistant Secretary, often came through Paris. They were very cordial to him. We had a separate guy that did terrorism, Steve Kashkett, now of all things our consul general in Newfoundland.

Q: The Centers of Terrorism?

WINN: At the time he was in the Agency, a fact that is well known. He said, Im tired of this. I want to take the Foreign Service test. Sat down and took it and became a Foreign Service officer and he was one of the best officers I've ever worked with. He had the terrorism brief, but Steve and I worked hand in glove on this terrorist thing for obvious reasons. We altered the trial of a French, actually Lebanese, a French Lebanese guy who had shot our defense attache in Strasbourg some years before. His name escapes me at the moment. It was a big trial and Steve and I were the embassy watchers at the trial of this guy. I remember the political counselor saying, We need people to go down there and be witnesses at this trial. I remember one of my colleagues saying, Im not going to do it. Im a married man. As if Steve and I weren't, but anyway, it was logical that Steve and I would do it anyway. But, then we had French body guards after that. Immediately after the trial, the Department said, "Your lives are in danger because the guy was found guilty and we will send you to anywhere in the world that you want to go for a couple of week as long as it's London or Brussels." So, we chose London and spent two weeks in London hanging out and then came back to find to the dismay of my landlady French plain clothes detectives shadowing us for a few weeks until we all decided this is ridiculous. End of story.

Q: Well now, how did you feel on the Arab-Israeli thing at the time you were there? Did the French come down more on the sort of Arab side or were they having the same?

WINN: They pretty much took our lead - knew we were in the drivers seat. The Intifada didn't break out until about '88 or '89 so at the time it was sort of a placid holding pattern. We were worried about the extent these settlements expanding, but things were quiet, so it wasn't as if there was any great sense of urgency there. The urgency came later. As I recall, that was quite a minor part of my brief. Its hard to realize that, but only occasionally did I deal with the French on the peace process. I think the French were willing to go along with whatever the Palestinians would buy. At the time we had various plans worked out and it was mainly pressure on the settlements issue and of course by the time the Bush administration got in there he really did lean hard. You know, we didn't have any great contentious issues with the French on it. They were just trying to get the ins and outs of what we were really up to there.

Q: Did we have any, were we still under the instructions not to have contact with the PLO?

WINN: Yes, we sure were and that's quite amusing. We would dance around town and I would go to various and endless seminars held by French think tanks. A PLO representative would be there and you know, we would sort of nod to each other, but I never, I never exchanged a word with him, nor did he embarrass me. So, I had no, I had contact with very few Palestinians in Paris, certainly not with the PLO representative and the French did. But, I don't know, that shows you again what an unreal air about the whole situation.

Q: Well, would you find yourself talking to the French saying okay you're talking to the Palestinians, what are they saying so I can go back home?

WINN: Not that often because of the Consulate General in Jerusalem. They had so many ties with the Palestinians one way or another, as did the Embassy in Tunis.

Q: It was about that time I think.

WINN: Was permitted to talk to them. So, it wasn't a great hindrance. We knew well enough what their position was. Particularly, Bob Pelletreau was there talking to them in Tunis. The last thing I wanted to do is get in his way.

Q: But you're saying at that time this?

WINN: It was a minor part of my brief.

Q: The French didn't have any major policy differences with us or something, they were kind of watching?

WINN: That's right. No major policy differences, no. It was such a rush. Each day would be incredibly busy. I remember going over to talk to an Iranian exile, whose name escapes me, at his home in a Paris suburb heavily guarded by French police. Soon after I, it was a household word at the time, soon after I left Paris. Someone else posing as a diplomat or journalist got in there and cut his throat. I've forgotten his name, but there were no great contentious issues with the French in my view. Again, behind the scenes they were always quite cooperative.

Q: How about with Lebanon, I mean the French of course, had been the colonial power in Lebanon and Syria. How did they view the Syrian connection in Lebanon?

WINN: They of course like us wish the Syrians would leave, but realize that they were there for the long haul. We had a grim acceptance of the Syrian role there and until the domestic situation between the Lebanese parties and the Palestinians resolved itself. I don't recall us differing greatly particularly with this hostage situation. In many ways we were happy to have the Syrians lurking around, trying to figure out where these people were. So, the Syrians in some ways were helpful, on the other of course, they were the conduit through which Hezbollah received arms through Damascus. So, I don't recall us differing greatly. We realized there wasn't a lot we could do about it, let's put it that way.

Q: How about the Maronites? The Lebanese Maronites? They certainly worked hard to tie up American representatives. We talked about before socially, politically and everything.

WINN: I had one in my living room 48 hours ago who still remembers me from '89, or whenever it was, '85 was the last time I saw the guy. Well, of course, they had the president of the republic Amin Gemayel, who was a Maronite and they always are the figures what stand out the most strongly when I recall our dealings with Lebanon and they were certainly active all over Paris, where most of them lived for God sake.

Q: In many ways they were more attuned to the French, weren't they?

WINN: Yes, they were and they all spoke French. Gemayel spoke only broken English for example, but perfect French. Always were more attuned to the French, but they knew where the power lay and they certainly were on our case all the time. I was taken to lunch by more Maronites than any other group of people in Paris and particularly during the tempest in a tea pot over the presidential election. I can't even remember who the candidates were at the time although I'd just received greetings from him two days ago from this guy who was just here. He said, so and so says hello. I could barely place these people. They were candidates for the presidency of Lebanon. It was always great fun. The Maronites though were still running the show then. Their day was over and it was only long after I left that a conference in Saudi Arabia rearranged the representation. We had as I say tempest in a teapots. Prime Minister Karami was assassinated. The helicopter blew up. All of these names long forgotten by us, but it was a big deal at the time.

Q: How about with Iran? What?

WINN: Well, again, sort of a holding pattern with the various exile groups. General this and former General that, assuring me that they had armies in waiting, but never really even asking for support, just wanting to maintain contact, let me put it that way. They were always calling me up and saying, "Let's just get together to chat," but never asking for any specific support and never saying they were going to make a specific move. They wanted to keep their names in the American hat in case we ever decided to approach them for some proposal. Maybe the Agency was up to something, I don't think so. So, that was an odd sort of dance I conducted.

Q: You didn't get involved in the what was it the Iran gate business?

WINN: Well, I did only to the extent that Ollie North every once in a while or one of his employees would say meet me in such and such a restaurant or I would be instructed, more specifically to meet some obscure Iranian in an obscure restaurant. The Iranian would simply give me a message to transmit back to Washington, a message which meant nothing to me. I was simply the conduit for these scum bags both North and the Iranians. So, no I never knew what was going on. I remember the first guy who told me what was going on was an American journalist in Paris named Ken Timmerman, who, I just saw on TV, published a book on Jesse Jackson. At the time he wrote a little two-page out of news letter his apartment on the Middle East. He called me up one day and told me all about this guns for hostages thing going on in Iran. I don't know how he found out, but I have to give him credit to this day he was the first one to find out. Then I put two and two together. I remember our then NEA watcher in London, Robin Rafael, later went on to be Assistant Secretary for South Asia and ambassador to Tunisia. She also called me up. She said, David, I think were dealing with the Iranians over these hostages. Yes, I found out everything about Iran Contra from journalists and Robin. I never knew what was going on when I was delivering and receiving messages. So, it was only much later that it came out in the wash. I was called to London at one point, but that had to do with the release of a hostage, Charles Glass, that was a separate issue. God, they all meld together in my mind.

Q: Well, now did the a good part of the time you were there, the Iran Iraq War was going on?

WINN: Yes, oh thanks for reminding me.

Q: A little minor matter.

WINN: Yes, a little minor matter and I would try to pick up what reporting I could on that, which is very little. Baghdad had a singularly amiable Iraqi ambassador there who had spent so much time in Cincinnati, Ohio, he spoke unaccented American English and a very nice guy and I remember we had representation in Iraq at the time, Bill Peck and Bob Eagleton.

Q: Well, we were sort of on the Iraqi side?

WINN: We were on the Iraqi side, so I had cordial relations with the Iraqi embassy. I picked up a little reporting. Half the time those guys the Iraqi diplomats in Paris didn't really know what was going on.

Q: How were the French? Did the French have any dog in the Iran Iraqi fight?

WINN: I don't recall that they did. I guess they sort of would come down on, like on our side, they kind of hoped the Iraqis would, I mean be a little more friendly to the Iraqis. I just don't recall that it occupied a lot of my time.

Q: How about Iraq at that time? The war was going on, but also Saddam Hussein was beginning to pick up weapons and this sort of thing, including an embryonic nuclear program and all? How did the French often are more commercially minded on this. Did you find we were at odds?

WINN: That's true, that's true. I have to give you credit for nudging my memory and knowing your brief. I did do the occasional demarche objecting to various commercial transactions between the French and the Iraqis that probably persists to this day. I do dimly recall going in to sternly lecture them. I remember the Iraqi desk officer looking up and said, Oh, you're here again to spank froggy's bottom. A line I put in a cable, which I was later told, made it all the way to the Secretary, that's true, absolutely right. I remember going over there from time to time, but the most information I got on the Iran War and French dealings with them, came again from this journalist, Ken Timmerman who taught me a lesson. No matter how weird and off the wall and how much of a one-man operation seems to be, this guy had a line into something, be it Iraqis, the French and everyone. I learned a lot from his newsletter and I also learned from his newsletter a lot of the stuff he printed was completely off the wall. So, you had to be able to pick and choose. Its funny, I point this out only to say its too bad so many FSOs are afraid of journalists, because you can learn so much from them depending on where you are, and certainly in Paris you can. Its true, maybe at another post, where after all we are the center of attention, you cant learn as much, they can learn more from you.

Q: But, I mean, were we seeing Iraq, particularly Saddam Hussein as being a potential problem?

WINN: I don't, it doesn't seem to have loomed large on the horizon. If it did, it went by me. I think as I fling my mind back, as I say this, the whole thing was overshadowed by the Iran Iraq War and I don't recall warnings coming from anywhere I have to confess. Who was out there, Bill Eagleton and Ed Peck?

Q: I cant remember, maybe you remember when the Israelis found the Iraqi nuclear?

WINN: I was in Washington at the time, so that would have been way back during the period I was in Washington, which was '77 to '81. By the way, Barbara Bodine who was then the number two in Baghdad at that time, is now out in California. I noticed she is speaking to the University of Delaware tomorrow if you ever want to, I mean the World Affairs Council in Wilmington, Delaware.

Q: She's not retired yet?

WINN: No, she's a Diplomat in Residence out at the University of California, Santa Barbara. You really should get her and sit her down.

Q: I'd like to, I'll sort of wait till she is retired.

WINN: Hard to catch. Exactly, of course.

Q: Did?

WINN: Well, let's see, where were we? Oh, well the hostages as I say one of whom was released then, Charles Glass, a journalist who later was accused of fabricating his escape. He claims that he had been kidnaped and held and then fashioned a key and undid the rusted lock of his room. I know a lot of people to this day insist that he made the whole thing up for the brief publicity it afforded him. But when he did escape, I was sent to London to be part of the team that debriefed him, mainly Agency people. In fact I was the only State Department person there. He certainly convinced me and he convinced the team that it was a legitimate escape. Charlie is still an active journalist for CNN and some other outfits. It was an exciting job, literally each day ranging from counter terrorism and their trials.

Q: Did you get any, you say you did something on Islam at that time in France. I watch the French news fairly frequently because we can get it in Fairfax County and obviously there is a very large Islamic community there. Its getting bigger all the time, both Islamic and American, and African community. How did you see the Islamic community in France? I mean what were we looking at?

WINN: I looked at them through the eyes of the French. We regarded them as to some extent an alien and mildly hostile entity that needed to be closely monitored by the security services. The French have always looked on them that way. The French have always been pretty tough, you know, Muslim women are not allowed to wear scarves in French schools. They don't kowtow to political correctness. I kind of admire the French for that. They can assimilate with a foreign culture and allow another culture to live in France, but they always sort of lay down the rules. Whereas we get so confused with our political correctness and falling all over backwards to tolerate for example, Muslims schools here in Virginia that are just teaching hate. The French were very clear that they monitored what was going on in the mosques. The Muslims, the French Muslims, didn't really want to talk to me either. They regard me with justifiable suspicion. I say justifiable, since they put me in the same group with the French. So, it was kind of hard to get a line on them. I mainly rely on a lot of French journalists who had been following the Muslim community for years. So, they started to use a horrible phrase from my youth, you keep them in their place because they're such an enormous community. But the French don't fool around.

Q: How about particularly Algeria and Morocco?

WINN: There were some terrorists incidents in France when I was there that if they happened here, the entire country would close down. The French of course absorb these bomb attacks. You will recall the bomb attacks in Paris and Europe that were so horrific that Americans wouldn't travel to Europe for a couple of years. The French, however, absorb these and go on. To us it's a national catastrophe and I'm not talking about the Trade Center. It's just that they're more used to bomb attacks, which was a national catastrophe, but the Europeans seem to take these in stride more than Americans. The enormous Algerian community, there was something they really kept a close eye on.

Q: Did you feel that they were moving towards assimilation?

WINN: In many ways, they have assimilated. The North Africans all speak perfect French. They all go to French schools. They all, however, live in suburban, industrial suburbs. So assimilated, no I mean yes and no. They all became part of the French community and pick up French ways and language in many ways more than foreigners do here because the French insist on it more than we do here. They still harbor these resentments, but I don't think a lot of them want to go back to Algeria. They could if they wanted to. Its an odd love-hate relationship the French have, but since they do lay down the law, they lay down the rules, you can assimilate, but you can be French, but in a way you're always going to be foreign and we're going to keep an eye on you and you will play by the rules. Particularly this business of no headscarves. I don't know what the rules are in American schools here.

Q: They allow them.

WINN: They allow them, so. Assimilate, yes, they assimilate under the rules. They're going to be second class citizens, lets put it that way. The French say, you can take it or leave it.

VICTOR D. COMRAS
Consul General
Strasbourg (1985-1989)

Victor D. Comras was born in New York State in 1943. Comras graduated from Georgetown University in 1964, the University of Florida Law School in 1966, and promptly joined the Foreign Service. While in the Foreign Service, Comras served overseas in Zaire, Nigeria, South Africa, France, Canada and Macedonia. He also worked on the Law of the Sea negotiations. Comras was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2002.

Q: Today is July 26, 2002. You're going out as consul general to Strasbourg. You were there from when to when?

COMRAS: I was in Strasbourg from the summer of 1985 until the summer of 1989.

Q: Why did we have something in Strasbourg? What was our focus there?

COMRAS: The Strasbourg consulate was one of several U.S. consulates in France. At that time we also had consulates in Nice, Marseilles, Lyon, Bordeaux. There was also a Consulate General Section in our embassy in Paris.

The Consulate General in Strasbourg had a consular district that included the eastern regions of France - Alsace, Lorraine, Franche -Compte, and Belfort. This was an historically very important part of France. This part of France was also unique in French history. These regions had passed back and forth between Germany and France for centuries.

The Strasbourg Consulate General was also unique in many respects, and had a function quite different from the other U.S. Consulates. In fact, it operated as a diplomatic mission to the Council of Europe, which was also based in Strasbourg.

Strasbourg was in many respects an international city. It had a very large diplomatic community that centered around the Council of Europe as well as the European Parliament and the other European institutions based in Strasbourg, including the European Commission and Court of Human Rights. Strasbourg considered itself one of the capitals of the European Community. The EU's European Parliament met in Strasbourg for a week once a month.

These institutions were the main focus of our Consulate in Strasbourg. The consulate also looked after the defined consular region, but provided only limited consular services in that regard.

There was a lot of confusion about the role of the Strasbourg Consulate. When the Department began looking to cut posts overseas for budget reasons, Strasbourg found itself on the list to cut, largely because of the limited consular services it provided. Even the embassy in Paris was willing to cut Strasbourg rather than any of the other consulates in France because it viewed the Strasbourg consular activities as marginal.

But, in fact, the Strasbourg Consulate played a key role as a U.S. diplomatic mission separate from these consular activities. This fact finally prevailed, but it took a great effort on my part to hold back the administrative and budget gurus who were determined to get rid of the post.

The Strasbourg Consulate had a very long history. We had a post there well into the last century. Strasbourg was French until 1871, when it was lost to Germany. France took Strasbourg back in 1918. Germany reincorporated Strasbourg during the Second World War. French Forces under General LeClerc, supported by U.S. forces under General Patch, liberated Strasbourg in 1944 and brought it back into France. Our consulate closed during the war periods, but reopened shortly after the liberation.

Q: Before we turn to the European EU side, what about your consular district? How did you find it at the time politically and economically?

COMRAS: The Strasbourg consular district was very exciting, politically, economically and historically in part because of its uniqueness and its unique history. Alsace and Lorraine are major heavy industry areas - Lorraine for the steel industry, Alsace for railroad construction. Both regions were heavy in technology. Franche Comte, was more rural, but enjoyed a famous university center in Besancon. The regions were also known for their great food, beer and wine industries. While economically vibrant, there were serious restructuring problems, particularly in the Lorraine Steel industry. This was also a major gateway for trade with the rest of Europe. Strasbourg was an important road and rail hub, and one of the most important river ports along the Rhine.

Politically, the eastern regions were going through significant changes. The area had generally, been center-right. However, the area was beginning to polarize between the Socialist Party on one side and the extreme right National Front on the other. The character of the area was also changing with the influx of a number of immigrants from North Africa. This was particularly the case in Strasbourg and the larger cities in Alsace and Lorraine. Because of vulnerabilities stemming from Strasbourg's position on the Franco-German border, the incidence of crime had increased during this same period. Much of this was attributed, rightly or wrongly to the increase in the immigrant population. There was a growing feeling among many native Alsatians and Vosgians, that their communities were being significantly altered. Some xenophobia resulted.

Also, this was a time when France was under great trauma from terrorism. Although it was very exciting to be going to Strasbourg in 1985, there were some downsides to be considered. One of the most significant downsides related to terrorism concerns for me and my family. Our predecessor, Bob Homme, had been shot by terrorists. He was shot by a member of the Lebanese Armed Revolutionary Faction as he left his house (the residence). This happened one morning just as he was leaving the residence to go to the Consulate. He survived, but was very badly wounded. He was shot while backing out his car. There was a person repairing a motorcycle out in front of the house. As he pulled out the person got up and shot him through the window. Luckily for Homme, just a week before the Consulate had installed a gate opener so that he could remain in his car while exiting. If he had gotten out of his car to open or close the gate, he probably would not have survived. As it turned out, the terrorist had to shoot him through the car window. He was hit several times. The bullets came within millimeters of hitting vital organs. One bullet grazed his head. Fortunately, he had turned at that precise second or the bullet would have entered his brain. Fortunately for him and his family and for us all, he survived and the wounds ended up being neat and repairable.

The person who fired the shots was never caught. The ringleader of the group was caught several years later.

But, at the time we were in Strasbourg, both the Consulate and the Residence were under threat and the French government provided us special 24 hour protection. This included assigning two special GPN guards to accompany me whenever I left the residence or the Consulate.

During this same period we lost our military attaché in Paris to assassination by terrorists. There had also been an attempt against our DCM. A car bomb set under his car didn't go off. However, and very sadly, a French policeman was killed when the bomb was being removed.

Q: What was behind this?

COMRAS: There were so many factors going on in that period of time. The situation in Lebanon was very unsettled with western interventions. There were a number of different homegrown terrorist groups also operating in the area including - the Red Army factions, the Red Brigade, as well as other terrorist groups in Germany and Italy. There were also a number of groups associated with one or another cause or faction or another in Algeria. Of course there were also issues related to the Palestinians, and to French interventions in Chad. Terrorism became a daily occurrence in France during this whole period with bombs going off in trash cans, car bombs, and various other things. It was a very difficult period from 1985 through 1989.

Q: This having happened to your predecessor, what did they do for you?

COMRAS: U.S. and French authorities took the issue of our security very seriously following the attack on Homme. They took a number of steps to tighten the security of the consulate and the residence. We were also given an armored car and a chauffeur. The French police set up a police box in front of the residence. They also gave us constant 24 hour close-on protection. They accompanied us everywhere I and my family went. This was particularly the case during the first 2 years. It tapered off a little after that. We also had security guards at the consulate and residence hired by the U.S. government.

Q: That must have been a real downer, wasn't it, as far as getting around?

COMRAS: It was something to which we had to adapt. The French had a team of specially trained policemen that were specially assigned to us. Over time we got to know them all well. They got to know us well. I don't know if it was the best from the security perspective, but we decided that the only way we could do this and be comfortable was by making them family. So, over time they became part of our family. So they got to know us and we them well enough that we were comfortable with them and they were comfortable with us. It worked well in that sense.

Q: You had children?

COMRAS: Yes, I had 2 sons.

Q: How old were they?

COMRAS: Both were young. Our son David was 8 and our son Manny was 13 when we came to Strasbourg. Manny was 17 and David was 12 when we left.

Q: How did they find this?

COMRAS: Constraining. It meant that they could not function in the same way as many of their friends. Their movements were restricted. It was difficult for them initially, but they adapted to it. The notion that we were all family helped them as well in this process.

Q: How about your wife?

COMRAS: She also went through a process of adaptation. Although the police protection was centered on me, they also had to cope with a number of constraints and restrictions. My wife recognized that there was a risk for her as well as for the children and so she assured that we all were cognizant of the risks and dealt with them accordingly. But there were times when we all had to escape from this. For us the way of getting out from this pressure would be to leave Strasbourg and go across the border into Germany.

Q: You were talking about the political spectrum in that area. You didn't mention the communists. At one point the communists were a third of the voting part. What had happened?

COMRAS: The Communist Party was still an important force in Eastern France. More so in Lorraine than in Alsace. Also the Communists were not very strong in Franche-Compte. The Communists were well organized among steel workers. There was not support for the Communists in Alsace and non steel parts of Lorraine. There are a number of reasons for this. One of them is that both Alsace and Lorraine were brought into Germany during the Nazi period from 1940 through 1944. All of Alsace was made part of Germany, and parts of Lorraine also were incorporated into Germany. As the men were considered by the Nazis to be German citizens, they were subject to the war drafts. A very large proportion of those drafted were sent to fight on the Eastern Front. Many were captured by the Russians and held as prisoners of war. Russia did not differentiate between the Alsacian prisoners and the German prisoners. And did not release the Alsacians until the early 1950s. This colored the attitudes of a great number of Alsatians toward the Soviet Union and the communists. It left them with a very bitter taste about Russia in the years following the war. So the Communist Party was not able to make much headway in Alsace.

The situation was very different in the Steel industry areas of Lorraine. The steel industry was going through some very difficult times. Many steel mills were closed and there was large unemployment. Slow progress was being made to restructure the steel industry and bring production standards and methods up to point. There was also a transformation into specialty steel. Also new programs were underway to restructure the local economies and to diversify. This was a difficult time for the Lorraine worker. The Communist party did well in playing to their concerns and gained significant support. This meant elected legislative deputies and majors and heads of local regional councils.

However, the center-right remained the largest political grouping in both Alsace and Lorraine. It was under increasing challenge from both the left and the right. That's pretty much the situation as I understand it still today in that part of France.

Q: Was there any feeling in Alsace towards Germany? Was this mixed identity a problem or had the European Union and developments in the past 40-odd years meant that you didn't have people sitting around drinking beer and talking about the good old days?

COMRAS: The pressures of history on Alsace had the effect of creating an "Alsacien" identity. This identity was not in conflict with their being French. It was in addition to their being French. They were proud of both heritages. While Alsacians had always felt a lot in common with their German brethren, their incorporation in Nazi Germany between 1940 and 1944 convinced most of them that they did not want to be German. There were perhaps periods of great ambivalence on the part of Alsace with respect to France and Germany, particularly when they were incorporated in Germany from 1871 to 1917/1918. Alsace had enjoyed great prosperity in that period before the beginning of World War I. This goodwill toward Germany lapsed completely during the second world war. However, even during the 1871-1918 period, many in Alsace resented Germany. They had preferred the French and saw the Germans as occupiers. I cite, for example, Bartholdi, the sculptor of the Statue of Liberty. He viewed the German period as a period of occupation. For him, Alsace had lost its freedom. This was a principal motivation for his work in creating the Statue of Liberty, which later became a gift of France to the United States.

Alsatians are a very proud people. They view themselves as a distinct part of France, but nevertheless French. In addition to French, Alsacians speak Alsatian which is a Germanic language.

I should tell you also that Alsace has closer ties with the United States than, perhaps any other region in France. Almost every Alsatian family has one or more immediate relatives who immigrated to the United States. The Alsatians and to a certain extent Lorraine also probably sent more immigrants to the U.S. than all the rest of France combined.

Q: France was never a major immigration source.

COMRAS: That's right. But every time Alsace or Lorraine moved back and forth between Germany and France, it sent a wave of immigrants to the United States. There are a number of Alsatian communities in the United States. Let me tell you one story about one community of Alsatians in the United States. The story starts back in the 1850s and 1860s. A Portuguese Jew by the name of Castro was given a land grant in Texas if he could attract an agreed number of people to settle there. This was a troubling period in Europe. So, he set off to Alsace and talked about this great place in the United States. He convinced a certain numbers of Alsatians to sign up. They formed the nodule of settlers in the new town of Castroville, Texas. When Alsace passed to Germany in 1871 a wave of Alsatians left for the United States as immigrants. They went directly to Castroville, to join the small Alsatian community already there. The same thing happened during the First World War, and again during or just after the Second World War. Castroville is one of a few towns in the United States where a good part of the population speak Alsatian.

The east of France suffered enormously during the First and Second World Wars. From the staggering death toll of the battle of Verdun in the First World War to the Liberation of the Colmar pocket in February 1945 - the region witnessed some of the costliest battles in France. Americans were deeply engaged in a number of critical battles in this area, in both World War I and World War II. The largest American military cemeteries from World War I and World War II are located in Lorraine.

You may recall that Strasbourg took on great symbolic importance for the Free French during the Second World War. Those joining the Free French Forces pledged not to lay down their arms till Strasbourg was in French hands. The Strasbourg Cathedral was the symbol worn on their soldiers shoulder patch.

Q: Did you find yourself attending a lot of ceremonies dealing with the world wars?

COMRAS: I certainly did. During my stay in Strasbourg I participated in a great number of ceremonies to mark the battles and the sacrifices of American, French, British and Canadian soldiers in the region. This included the Memorial Day, Armistice Day and other commemorative occasions. It also included the ceremonies associated with the 70th anniversary of the U.S. entry into World War I.

Let me tell you about the latter event. The American Ambassador at the time was Joe Rogers from Tennessee. He had a great interest in World War I. His father had come to France and fought in the first world war in eastern France. He was an officer in an engineering battalion that built or repaired many bridges and other structures in the region. He had written a letter to his wife dated November 24, 1918, less than 2 weeks after the Armistice, detailing to his wife all that he had done, the places that he had gone from village to village to village. So, Ambassador Rogers had the idea that to celebrate the 70th anniversary of the U.S. entry into World War I, he would retrace the steps of his father - from village to village through the whole area. He asked me to arrange this with the local authorities.

The French thought this was a great idea and we worked closely to put the appropriate events in place. We planned an itinerary that would challenge anyone - from village to village. We would start in the town of St. Mihiel and end at Chatel-Chehery, where Sergeant York became famous. In fact, the Tennessee Historical Society joined the events by dedicating a new plaque to Sergeant York in the Town Square of Chatel-Chehery.

The Ambassador reserved for us one great surprise until the last moment. He had invited his mother, in her early 90s, to accompany us on the trip. She was the one that had received and preserved the letter we used to plan the trip. Sara, my wife also joined us, as did Mrs. Honey Rogers, the wife of the Ambassador. Sara volunteered to accompany the two Mrs. Rogers and make sure that their own special needs were met. They all hit it off wonderfully, and thanks to Sara's efforts had a great time on a very grueling trip. The temperature was in the 90s and there were few of the facilities to accommodate the heat or nature's other requirements. I have to say that Sara did a marvelous job looking after the two Mrs. Rogers. In fact, they fell in love with her. Mrs. Rogers Sr. parting words as we saw them off on their plane back to Paris was "Joe, can't we take Sara with us?"

It was a wonderful trip. A wonderful occasion for Franco-American relations. Every town and village we visited welcomed us with flags and bands. The children of the town participated in the ceremonies. Each town set up photo and other exhibits demonstrating their own local history during World War One. It was just a wonderful occasion.

I'll tell you another little anecdote. The trip almost had a disastrous beginning, at least in a diplomatic sense. The first ceremonial stop was St. Mihiel. Ambassador Rogers had valiantly tried to learn French but never succeeded. However, he liked to read prepared statements in French. He did so whenever he could.

He asked the Military Attaches office to prepare a statement for the events in St. Mihiel. Through their own sources, they received information that the Mayor of St. Mihiel was going to present a plaque to the Ambassador to commemorate the occasion. They prepared a thank you statement in French for the Ambassador to accept the plaque. Turned out that they got it all wrong. The Mayor was not going to give the Ambassador a plaque. He was going to ask the Ambassador to unveil a plaque on the Hotel de Ville wall commemorating the Battle of St. Mihiel.

The Ambassador had memorized the French statement that had been prepared for him. Now, just at the last minute he needed a new statement - A statement that he could read without too many mistakes. Well, it was Sara to the rescue. My wife speaks native French. She sat down and wrote out phonetically a short appropriate statement the Ambassador could make, in simply French to unveil the plaque. He was forever greatly for the way she got him out of this fix.

Q: How did the mother do?

COMRAS: The mother did absolutely great, perhaps better than Joe in holding up to a very rigorous program. The trip was a great success. It underscored the enormous amount of affection that resides in that part of France for the United States. There are a lot of reasons for this affection.

There were two great battle areas in France where U.S. forces took very high casualties. One is Normandy and the landing, The second is the eastern part of France. Once the allies broke out of Normandy they advanced fairly quickly through the plains of France. However, they ran into increased opposition as they approached the Vosges and eastern France. These were areas that had been incorporated into Germany, or which had been specially fortified by Germany. The Vosges mountains were a natural defensive line. The French had used these mountains as part of their Maginot Line. They joined up with the Ardennes. That's where the Battle of the Bulge broke out. But, that battle had major ramifications for the areas further south also in Lorraine and northern Alsace, and for Strasbourg itself.

It proved very difficult for our troops to get over the Vosges. There were some great battles and we took enormous casualties. In fact, the last part of France to be liberated was Colmar, an area which became known as the Colmar pocket, which wasn't until February of 1945.

Q: That's where French armies ended up, too. American and French armies fought together.

COMRAS: Yes, especially when it came to taking Strasbourg. The American Fifth Army under General Patch was ordered by Eisenhower to allow General LeClerc to come across first to liberate Strasbourg. This was a great gesture made by Eisenhower, and was always greatly appreciated by General LeClerc, if not by General De Gaulle.

The Battle of the Bulge came shortly after the liberation of Strasbourg. The initial German advance posed grave risks for Strasbourg. The best military advice was that Strasbourg was extremely vulnerable and would likely fall back into German hands, creating an entrapment situation for American and French soldiers. So, General Eisenhower was advised by his people that Strasbourg should be evacuated. De Gaulle fought this tooth and nail and made a very strong plea to Eisenhower not to evacuate Strasbourg. He wanted to hold Strasbourg at all costs. Eisenhower wrote later in his memoirs that only one time did he deviate from his policy of not allowing political factors to influence his judgment on military issues, and that was with respect to Strasbourg. Military reasoning would have led to an evacuation of Strasbourg. But, he allowed himself to be swayed by De Gaulle. He decided to hold in Strasbourg. And, in the end, thank God, Strasbourg held.

There is another little story about that came to our attention. One day it ought to be the subject of a movie. While the Battle of the Bulge was raging further north and west, one of the largest tank confrontations during the war took place just north of the city of Strasbourg. At the same time as the Battle of the Bulge was raging, the Germans, sought to encircle Strasbourg. There were a number of villages in the mountains just north of Strasbourg where we had troops bivouacked for rest and relaxation. A segregated black American anti-tank brigade was stationed in two of these villages. The brigade was one of a few that had not yet been integrated. The Brigade had a poor reputation and was not noted as showing any valor. It had not distinguished itself in the war. They took the brunt of this German tank attack. Against considerable odds they held these villages and halted the German tank advance. They took enormous casualties. They were all heroes. They probably more than anyone or anything else they saved Strasbourg. They held until adequate reinforcements could be provided. The story is written up in a few little journals. It was told to me by a several elderly residents in the area. It's a story that I always said I wanted to do something more with. It's a story that should be told.

I later found out that Senator Ernest Hollings fought in this same area. He told me that he had helped liberate Strasbourg. I met him at the time the State Department had targeted the Strasbourg Consulate for closing. He was opposed to that. He was on a visit to Strasbourg and told me of his own experiences in the War. I remember that as we were walking to the Strasbourg cathedral, he turned to me and said, "Vic, they'll close Strasbourg over my dead body. I helped defend this place and keep it free."

The French have a very strong attachment to Alsace and Lorraine. The Americans who fought in this area also are tied by strong emotions to the region. As Consul General it was one of my duties to preside over the Memorial Day ceremonies at the various American Military Cemeteries in the consular district. Each year I would attend ceremonies at, at least two of the five 5 American military cemeteries in the district.

A huge crowd of French men women and children would turn out at each of these occasions. These ceremonies served to underscore just how close we were attached to each other in this war. This relationship cast in blood still colors their favorable feelings towards the United States today.

Q: On the political side, how well did that area feel it was being represented and dealt with by the central government in Paris?

COMRAS: There were times when they felt they were very different than the rest of France. They had their complaints. But they were a political stronghold of the central right. During most of the time I was there, there was a central right government in Paris.

Still, there were a number of complaints concerning immigration policy, rising crime rates, competition from Germany, and desire for improved infrastructure. There were also strong complaints concerning the downturn in the Lorraine Steel industry.

Q: One of the things you mentioned was that the steel mills had to close. One of the things... The French even with a right-wing or center-right government, maybe it was worse later than it was then, but did you see that the French economy, it was difficult for French business to operate because it was hard to shut down people, let people go, once they were hired, you couldn't eliminate workers who weren't needed? Was that a problem?

COMRAS: Pretty much the whole region of Lorraine felt the effect of the depressed steel industry. There was high unemployment through most of the northern part of Lorraine. This is the area where the Communist Party began to get increased support. It was a very difficult period for that region. Nevertheless, new programs were begun to transform the steel industry and to diversify the industrial economy of the region. This included the introduction of new high tech industries. These reforms were moving ahead only slowly and this gave rise to strong complaints.

Pittsburgh Pennsylvania provided a good example of the type of reforms that we necessary. There was great interest in what was going on in Pittsburgh during this same timeframe.

It's interesting that you had this growth of this communist party. You had the steel industry. You had great concerns about competition issues and import issues and restrictions. The United States was going through the same thing. There were complaints and counter-complaints between the United States and France about unfair trade practices, particularly in the steel sector. Yet the sympathy for the United States in the region held strong. This was so even in areas where the Communist Party had the support of a majority of the electorate. I believe these positive feelings toward the United States were tied in to the historical relationships and the relationships forged during the Second World War.

I was invited to participate in a great number of popular events in the area. Without exception I was received with great friendship and courtesy. I remember one event that involved the departure of a number of American High School Students that had spent a semester in the French Schools in the region. The whole town turned out to say goodbye.

The 5 American military cemeteries in the region were a reminder to all of the sacrifices made during the two world wars. These cemeteries were managed extremely well by the American Battleground Commission. But, just after the war, there were many, many, more cemeteries in the region where American and other allied soldiers were buried. A decision was made in the late 1940s to repatriate many of these American dead and to consolidate the others in the established American Military Cemeteries. This process took several years. Yet, today, the previous burial grounds remain hallowed ground for the villages where they were located. Many of the villages and towns put up special monuments or markers to identify and honor these hallowed areas. I attended a great many of the ceremonies that were held to honor these sites.

There was also another major event that marked the strong links between Alsace and the United States during my tenure there. That was the centennial of the Statue of Liberty. Most Americans don't know that the Statue of Liberty is Alsatian. The sculpture of the Statue of Liberty was Frederic Bartholdi, an Alsatian. The face on the statue is the face of his mother. They were from the town of Colmar, just south of Strasbourg.

Bartholdi set out to sculpt a major statue dedicated to Liberty. He wanted it to represent his sadness at the loss of freedom, as he saw it, that derived from the German occupation of his homeland, and home town of Colmar after the War of 1871. He looked for a commission to build such a statue and to find the right setting for it. He looked many places, including in Egypt. But eventually he found the perfect spot for it during a trip to the United States - New York Harbor.

Then he had to convince the French government to commission his project. The French decided to support the project and turn it into a gift to the American People for the Centennial of the United States in 1876. For a number of reasons, including the fact that the United States was unable to provide come up with the funds necessary to build a foundation of base for the statue, it remained in storage for a decade. It was not until 1886, 10 years after the American centennial that the statue was finally erected in New York harbor. Bartholdi was French-Alsatian. Louis Eiffel, who built the support structure for the Statue was also French, and the Statue of Liberty.

So, the celebrations that marked this occasion were also very big celebrations throughout Alsace. I got to play a major role in these celebrations as American Consul General in Alsace. I think my role became even more important because I could speak French, which the Ambassador couldn't. That meant that I was invited to all the TV Talk Shows to represent and talk about the U.S. perspective on these events.

Q: Did you get Alsatian dignitaries to the ceremonies?

COMRAS: Yes. In fact, the mayor of Strasbourg was invited to join the foreign dignitaries hosted on board special ships in New York Harbor the July 4, 1986 celebration of the statue. We were in the town of Colmar at our own very beautiful celebration on the same day.

Q: Was there much in the way of trade promotion there or links to American firms?

COMRAS: Business activity and investment had slowed in the mid-1980s due to a general recession in Europe. The pace of activity began to accelerate in 1988-89. The business community in eastern France had a high degree of familiarity with the United States and the American market. Also there were a number of major American companies that had offices and factories in eastern France. Some of the largest companies in Alsace were American companies. General Motors had a major plant in Alsace not far from Strasbourg. Timkin, had a large ball bearing factory in Colmar. Eli Lili had a large facility just outside of Strasbourg. There were also a growing number of American high companies in the area. All and all it amounted to a sizeable U.S. business presence in the region.

Eastern France was an area targeted by American companies for further investment. A number of American companies were looking to establish themselves in Europe and this appeared to be an attractive area given its location in the heart of Europe right along the French-German border and along the best of the north-south-east-west access routes in the region.

Trade and investment is a two-way street, and there were a number of American states that were also doing their best to attract investment from eastern France. This was particularly the case for North and South Carolina and many of the sunbelt states. Several states had established business, trade and investment offices in Strasbourg. There was significant business activity in both directions.

Q: Were there consular problems, people getting arrested, kids in trouble, split families?

COMRAS: The Consulate provided only very limited consular services. These included welfare and whereabouts. We did not provide passport or visa services except to take applications and forward them to Paris for processing. We also handled other consular services related to American services.

But let me tell you another story about one of our consular cases:

Back in 1962, during the time when Americans had military bases in France, an American soldier stationed at a base near Metz, in Lorraine, met and married a French girl. They had a son born to them in France. Shortly afterward, in late 1963 the soldier was transferred back to the United States and released from military service. His French wife and child accompanied him to the United States. They moved to Iowa. The family became a typical American family and raised a typical American son. In 1988 the son gets married to an American girl and they decide to go to Europe for their honeymoon. First they visit Germany and Switzerland. The mother suggest that they also go to France to visit with family members they had never met. So the young couple decides to take the train from Switzerland to Metz, France where the French family members live. The train crosses the border at the city of St. Louis, near Mulhouse, France. That is where customs procedures are handled and visas are checked. The train arrived at the St. Louis Station late Friday afternoon. The young man presented his American passport. He was surprised at how long it took for the authorities to process it and return it to him. While he was waiting, two French Gendarmes appear and arrest him. He is charged with evasion of French military service.

Of course, he's horrified. His wife is horrified. They're on their honeymoon and he's being pulled away by the French police. Neither of them speaks a word of French. They have absolutely no idea what's going on. He is brought by the Gendarmes to a holding cell in the station and eventually from the border into a French military detention center near the town of Mulhouse. The wife doesn't know quite what to do. She calls the U.S. embassy in Paris and they tell her to call the consulate in Strasbourg. Luckily I was working late and took the call. She was very distraught. After calming her down I was able to ascertain what had happened. I got her to go to the station masters office and arranged with the Station Master to allow her to stay by the phone so that I could call her back, which I promised to do quickly once I had reviewed the matter with the appropriate French authorities.

Fortunately, I had very good contacts with the prefet and the military governor in Mulhouse. I think it is so important for our Consulate Officers to have close contact with the local officials. That's what they are there for. Consular officers have a better opportunity to meet and know local officials than those in the embassy. Handled right, a consulate can be very effective eyes, ears and mouth for an embassy when it comes to dealing with events on the ground.

So, anyway, I called the prefet in Mulhouse and was able, because I knew him well, to get him on the line directly and quickly. We both realized that what had happened was an embarrassing anomaly. The young man had been outside of France since his infancy. He was an American citizen. He probably no longer had French citizenship. The problem was that his birth was recorded in France and his parents had never notified the French authorities or the French embassy in the United States concerning his departure from France and probable change of citizenship status.

The French authorities had a record of his birth in Metz. These records are reported to the French Bureau of National Service (their Draft Board). When he failed to show up to register for the French Draft, they sent a letter of notification and warning to his last known address in France. When he still didn't respond, they put him in their look-out book as a possible draft dodger. That list was triggered when he handed over his passport at the Mulhouse border. From that point, they treated him according to established procedures for those seeking to evade French Military Service. They hand him over to the French Military Authorities.

The Prefet suggested I call the Military Governor and see what we could do to resolve the problem. However, it was already late Friday afternoon, and there did not appear to be a solution at hand, at least until Monday morning when the Office of National Service would reopen and the mess could be straightened out.

I knew the Military Governor in Mulhouse to be a real French gentleman. I was sure that he would understand the situation and work with me to find a solution. After all, the couple were on their honeymoon. And that should appeal to the romantic side of any French gentleman. I explained the situation, and appealed to sense of the romantic. What French General wanted to be responsible for destroying this young couple's honeymoon. Especially since the problem here was more technical than real. He promised to consider what I said and see if he could find some solution. He promised to call me back shortly. A short while later, he did call me back. We were pretty much on a first name basis, so he said, "I'll tell you what I'll do. We've got him under military jurisdiction. Since we've got him under military jurisdiction, I can give him a 3 day pass. I'll do that on one condition, that you come up and get him, that you assure to me that you will keep him in your control, and make sure that he shows up at the Office of National Service in Strasbourg when it opens on Monday morning to straighten all this out." We agreed.

I called his wife to explain the situation, and tell her about the conditions imposed. I offered to pick her up and then get her husband from the French Military Garrison. I offered to put them up in our guest house until Monday when a member of my staff would accompany them to the Office of National Service. She agreed and was so very relieved.

We put them in the guesthouse over the weekend. They toured around Strasbourg a little bit. They were a very nice couple. We took them down on Monday morning to the Office of National Service and got everything straightened out. He thanked us very much for that at the end and then he said, "This has been a terrible weekend in many ways, but a great weekend in some. But I'll tell you one thing, this is a very unique story that I'll have to tell my kids and my grandkids, that I was part of the French army for 3 days and I have a pass to prove it!"

Q: I had an American major in Greece who was born in Greece and they tried to... What the hell is this? It's a real problem sometimes.

COMRAS: Unfortunately, many of the other stories were not as happy. Because of the very large number of American tourists that come through Europe, there are bound to be some difficult, unfortunate, and sometimes even tragic, happenings. I still feel sad to think about the tragic accidents and deaths I had to deal with. But, I like to tell the happy-ending stories.

Q: Did you have drug problems, kids getting arrested for possession of drugs?

COMRAS: Fortunately, we did not have very many cases involving Americans arrested for drugs. However, Strasbourg and Alsace were major transit points for the movement of illegal drugs across France. This was prior to the Schengen Agreements which opened the internal borders between the EU members. During the 1985-89 timeframe, border controls remained in effect. The French applied a major effort to cutting off the flow of illicit drugs into France. Local drug use was not so much of a problem in Alsace at that time. We did have a few Americans in jail on drug related charges. We provided them the appropriate consular services, including periodic visits.

Let me tell you another story. We did have another major incident with the local police that turned out to be quite humorous. I think the story reflects some the tensions and precautions that were in place due to the wave of terrorism that was going through France at that time.

As I said earlier there were a lot of student groups that visited Strasbourg. Many of them attended French Universities for semester or summer programs. One student group from a women's college in the United States was studying that summer in Strasbourg. The American students were invited to visit the local newspaper to see how the newspaper was put together. The visit, which took place over several hours, began in the early evening and went on until late that night when the newspaper was put in print. Since the paper was printed at a fairly late hour in the evening, they took them around first to show them and showed them the newsroom and then they took the group to a dinner at a restaurant several blocks away. After dinner the students were to return to the Newspaper for the last part of the tour. The students had a wonderful time eating and drinking and perhaps drinking in many cases more than they should. This was particularly the case for one young lady.

After dinner the group left the restaurant to return to the Newspaper. During the several block walk back, this young lady felt an enormous urge to go to the bathroom. There were no places in site, so decided to break away from the group and to go up a quiet back alley where she could find some privacy. She found herself a small area hidden by some walls, and decided to relieve herself. What she didn't know was that this was the side of the main police station and that everything she was doing was being monitored on camera.

I'm not sure the French Officer monitoring the camera quite understood what was going on. In any event it looked suspicious enough for him to send out two plainclothed policemen to check it out. When they see the lady squatting there, they move quickly to intercept her. She's in an particularly awkward position and she sees these 2 guys running towards her, so she quickly gets up and takes off. She left so fast, that she left her handbag and a package back along the wall. Could be a bomb! The police don't know what to think of this, so they take off after her. They tackle her and they grab her and they bring her back into the station. They realized quickly what she was up to and decided to let her go. Well, the next day I, I get a call from both the school and from the police captain. The calls come in one right after the other. The one from the police station came in first and it says, "Listen, we want to apologize. I know we created a little bit of an incident here, but we wanted you to know what happened, that we didn't know how to take it.” They were afraid that somehow there was going to be a complaint from the University about the incident and the tackling of the young women. They didn’t mean to rough her up or anything of this sort, they said.

Then we get a call from the school which went something like this: “We’re sorry. We didn’t know we were causing an incident. We didn’t want to create a problem with the French government or the French police, but this young lady had had too much to drink and it was all a very innocent thing. Please make sure that you can get the police to overlook this and not hold it against her.”

It was great to be able to Subsequently tell both groups, “Yes, I’ve solved your problem!”

One more story because this reflects another part of the role of a Diplomat and of a Consulate.

After arriving in Strasbourg in July 1985, one of the first issues I faced, was the local reaction to planned visit by President Ronald Reagan that summer to France. President Reagan decided to attend ceremonies in Europe to mark the 40th anniversary of the end of World War II. He wanted also to reflect the rapprochement in European relations and U.S.- European relations. He decided that he should visit a German military cemetery, and American veteran groups also decided it would be appropriate to invite German veterans to attend special ceremonies at the American Cemetery in St. Avold. The German Cemetery was at Bitburg, and included a large number of SS soldiers. The Unit invited to St. Avold also included SS veterans. Well, this idea did not go down well with the French, or with French veterans, or Jewish groups in the area. There was a general outcry against the idea and threats of local boycotts of the ceremony, and even a human shield blockade of the cemetery. The American Consulate was the first place to which the French brought their protest.

Even in the United States there were a number of people who questioned the wisdom of the President’s visit to the Bitburg Cemetery and the emotions that it would raise. Within France, it raised considerable emotion that President Reagan was going to do this. But, what happened in Germany was one matter. What would happen in France was another. There was an enormous outcry on the part of the French community against the St Avold invitation. We were asked as a U.S. Consulate to convey these feelings to the United States authorities, and to the American veteran groups sponsoring the St. Avold ceremonies. These veteran groups were free to do what they wanted. And it was the policy of the American Battle Monument Commission to allow any U.S. veteran group to sponsor a commemorative ceremony. They could invite whoever they wanted, so long as the decorum of the cemetery was respected.

So, I had to contact the American sponsors and explain to them the local reaction. Fortunately, when we were in discussions with the American veterans groups - of course all decisions were theirs - they recognized that it probably was not in their best interest and it would not be conducive to what they were trying to do to have this kind of local reaction. They did not want to cause this kind of bad feelings. So, I think wisely, they decided that it would be better for them to hold the ceremony at St. Avold with only the U.S. veterans present and to meet with their former German adversaries in Germany at a German cemetery. The American veterans agreed to hold their own private ceremony at St. Avold. And that is what happened.

I can only wonder what the feelings would be today and how things might have changed since then. But, in 1985 the war years were still fresh memories. Now we're perhaps in a somewhat different situation in Europe with the European Union and with the experience that France and Germany have had in working together with a common political ideology, with a common currency right now, and the rapprochement between France and Germany. Another 20 years have passed.

Q: Speaking of emotions, did you run across in your part of France, one of the subjects I always open up with somebody who served in France, usually in Paris, is the intellectuals, who are by their chromosomes sort of as a class left-wing, kind of anti-American or quite anti-American. It seems to be a Parisian clique, their chattering class, but it has some clout within the French political world. Did you find any equivalent to or reflection of that in your area?

COMRAS: Yes and no. I would apply the "No" to Lorraine and Alsace. Their intellectual ties with the United States, their basic feelings towards the United States, are very strong. They have not adopted the Gaullist philosophy, and particularly reject that part of Gaullist philosophy that related to distancing France from the United States. The intellectual community has been very close to the United States and cross-fertilized.

The "Yes" would apply more to Belfort and Franche-Compte. These areas had a different history than Alsace and Lorraine. Neither were incorporated in Germany after the 1871 war or during the world wars. Besancon, the capital of the Franche Compte region is a French University Town. I think the atmosphere there would be similar to that at the Sorbonne. One could sense a resentment toward the There has at the Sorbonne and other places with a lot of those who resented America during the Vietnam War which was somewhat past then but resented American culture in many ways. I think this attitude vis a vis the United States was reflected best by Jean Pierre Chevenement, who was the most notable of the French political leaders from Belfort. He was a strong critic of the United States, although he held a grudging respect for America.

Q: Who is still a political figure today?

COMRAS: Yes. Chevenement is still active, although he was quite ill a couple of years ago. They call him the socialist De Gaulle. His "France First" attitude is very Gaullist. During the period I knew him he was concerned about what he viewed as the growing hegemony of the Soviet Union and the United States - "Europe against the two empires," as he phrased it. We got to know him quite well, and he was always very friendly to my wife and me. We had a number of political discussions with him.

Q: Was there a lot of reporting and excessive reporting on horrible events that the United States has done in the treatment of crimes or what have you both in the U.S.-

COMRAS: Not so much from the regions that I was in, but there's a whole other side of Strasbourg. Remember, the Strasbourg Consulate dealt mostly with the European institutions in Strasbourg. That accounted for about 80 percent of our work. Only about 20 percent of our time was related to the regional issues and our work related to the embassy in Paris. It was our role as a stand-alone mission to the European institutions in Strasbourg - The Council of Europe, the European Commission and Court of Human Rights, that made our role in France unique among the Consulates. We also played a support role for our Mission in Brussels to the EU since the European Parliament met in Strasbourg for one week each month.

U.S. economic, political, social, and cultural happenings and attitudes were often an issue up for discussion or debate in one or another of these European Institutions. This was particularly so with the European Parliament and the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe. Our work dealt mostly with the latter. The European Union was covered mostly out of our mission in Brussels. They would send someone down to Strasbourg to spend the week if the European Parliament was in session. So they were responsible out of Brussels to do most of the issues related to the European Parliament. Our role was logistical supportive but there were many times when we would have to help and cover for them or handle specific matters. Ours was a secondary relationship with the European Parliament. But we had primary responsibility vis a vis the Council of Europe and the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe and the European Court and Commission of Human Rights. These institutions represented the broader Europe. At that time it was the Europe of 21 as opposed to the EU which was the Europe of 12.

Q: What was the relationship of the Council of Europe to what is now the European Union? Was this an appendix or an earlier manifestation?

COMRAS: The Council of Europe was the first attempt at European unification. It traces back to 1947 when Winston Churchill proposed the establishment of a Council of Europe to build a peaceful, more stable Europe. The concept behind the Council of Europe was the establishment of a unified Europe achieved through a process of harmonization of its laws and structures and on increased cooperation. The Council of Europe was created with that ideal of bringing together those countries that could form and work and begin to heal the wounds of War in the post-World War II. And to prevent such wars from happening again. Germany was brought into the organization at an early stage. But because of the occupation of Germany, a decision was made to keep the Council of Europe out of issues related to security and defense. Such issues were to be relegated to NATO. The Council of Europe was an European structure for dealing with political, social, cultural, and other kinds of issues, not defense and security.

Subsequently, with the Treaty of Rome, several European countries decided to move further and faster on European Unification. They established a coal and steel community, and went on to form a customs union. Slowly the idea emerged to create a unified Europe based on integration rather than just harmonization of laws and institutions. This was going to be Europe on the fast track. As the European Community grew in importance the Council of Europe appeared to some to decrease in importance. But, this was really not the case. Europe needed both types of organizations, and still needs them today. Although the European Union has grown considerably, the Council of Europe still has many more members, and provides an essential institution for unification and harmonization within the Broader Europe. This was particularly the case in the 1980s.

In the beginning the European Community was principally a customs and economic institution and a customs union. Throughout the 1960s and into the 1970s, the Council of Europe had a broadened mandate. But, over this time, the European Community took on greater form and responsibility and grew into the European Union with political as well as economic and social responsibilities. The train on the fast track quickly passed the train on the slow track. The European Community also grew from its initial 6 to 7 and more. It was already 12 by 1985.

The European Union began to act as a single bloc within the Council of Europe. They became the dominant political force within the Council of Europe, and began to define the role of the Council of Europe in more limited terms. In fact, by 1985 they had decided that the role of the Council of Europe needed to be redefined in light of the development of the European Community.

The initial impetus was to redefine the Council of Europe, and its subsidiary organs as an institution devoted to social and cultural issues, and as a bridge between the European Community to the broader Europe of 21. It was also to serve as a bastion for democracies. However, its role was clearly secondary to the role of the European Communities institutions. The debate over a new mandate for the Council of Europe took a dramatic turn, however, with the dramatic events underway in Eastern Europe.

The members of the European Community recognized that the Council of Europe served an important function in holding the Broader Europe together. One of the unintended consequences of the EC was that it risked dividing Europe rather than unifying Europe. A division was already developing between EC members and EC nonmembers. The Council of Europe was an essential element for keeping and building European commonality and European unity in the broader sense. At the same time, it was a good holding place to put countries that needed to feel that they were part of Europe and not being pushed aside by the European Union even if they were not yet ready to come into the European Union. It was a good holding place for European countries, EC members and Non EC members to continue their work towards harmonizing laws and institutions and maintaining close consultation and cooperation.

Then when the Berlin wall came tumbling down! What a dramatic change for the World, for Europe, and for the Council of Europe.

With the changes taking place in Europe the need for a broader European Home grew in importance. The European Union was obviously not ready to expand to encompass more of greater Europe. The Council of Europe became the essential European organization with this purpose. It took on greater importance in setting the European standard for respect of democracy and civil rights, and human rights. The Convention of the Council of Europe set a high bar for membership with regard to democracy and human rights. Countries that aspired to COE membership had to meet those standards. This was the first precondition to participating in European harmonization or integration. Some wanted to dilute the COE requirements in this regard, but the majority insisted that these standards hold.

The Council of Europe also played a role in preparing and strengthening good governance in the emerging European democracies. They helped the aspiring new members to establish or improve their systems of governance to meet European Council standards. These activities were very important to us as well. However, it took us some time to recognize that we should also join with the Council of Europe in assisting this process.

We also were slow to recognize that the Council of Europe could provide us an effective channel also for improving cooperation with Europe. It provided a useful backdoor into the EU itself in getting ideas and concepts across to the EU leadership. The Council of Europe offered great potential for U.S.-European Cooperation on equal terms.

In the beginning we had a stand-offish attitude toward the Council of Europe. For reasons I do not understand we concentrated all of our diplomatic resources in dealing directly with the EU Commission and Council. We allowed the process to develop into an “Us and Them” relationship, rather than into a cooperative relationship. Europe and the United States were more and more defining themselves as separate entities. The concept of an Atlantic community had become secondary to the notion of European integration. We were faced with a EU bloc. We had to deal with a bloc, not with a group of allies. This made reaching agreements very difficult. The EU had to first work out its own common decisions. It would take considerable negotiations, discussions and concessions among them to come to an agreed EU position. Often this reflected a lowest common denominator between them. When we got into the discussions or negotiations were faced with a EU position that had little or no flexibility. This produced a lot of tension in these discussions. Sometimes we tried to use surrogates within the EU to reflect our views. But this was not always useful or possible.

The Council of Europe, working within the process of harmonization and cooperation, offered a forum that might have been easier to work with. Several European non EU countries welcomed our participation in that forum. They saw potential benefits in getting an alignment of views with the United States that could help strengthen their own hand in dealing with the EU. After all, they were outsiders too. The Council of Europe was also a place where we could contribute to the form and development of new laws, procedures and regulations to cover new developments and new technologies. If we worked together in designing these laws, we could eliminate unnecessary differences and head off potential future problems. This was important, for example in the new computer technology, information technology and pharmacology and bio-engineering technology areas. This was also true in areas of social reform and cultural cooperation.

I believe that the Council of Europe should have been used by the United States as a potential forum where we could influence our European friends and allies on these broader issues, gauge their attitudes and fashion new approaches. We also could have used the Council of Europe better to work toward good governance in the newly emerging European democracies.

Q: '89 was when the heavens fell and you ended up with a whole Eastern Europe which was clamoring to get in.

COMRAS: I have to tell you a story about that, too. July 1989 was the final month of my assignment to Strasbourg. It was also the month that Gorbachev came to town. He had visited Paris and was scheduled to make a major address to a combined session of the European Parliament and the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe.

Before getting into this story let me step back and explain to you the difference between the parliaments.

The European Parliament is the legislative branch of the European Union. Members of the European parliament are elected directly by an electorate in each of the member countries.

The Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe predates the European Parliament. It was established as a consultative organ within the Council of Europe. It is composed of national parliamentarians who are selected by their peers to represent their national parliaments in the Council of Europe. Each member of the Parliamentary Assembly is also a member of his national parliament. The delegations from those national parliaments must represent all the significant political factions that sit in the national parliament according to a complex formula established by the Council of Europe. The Parliamentary Assembly has no real legislative power, but can only make recommendations to the Council of Europe's Council of Ministers, or to the national government. However, as they are sitting members of their own national parliaments, and representative of those institutions, their recommendations can carry a lot of weight.

Anyway Gorbachev decided that rather than pick and choose between these two important European Parliamentary institutions, it would be best to speak to both of them together. At the time both parliaments met in the same building, the Palais de l'Europe in Strasbourg, but on different dates. So a joint session had to be specially arranged. This was to be the first joint session ever. But Gorbachev was a big enough draw to get both parliaments to agree to such an arrangement.

Gorbachev's visit to Strasbourg turned into a major event for the Europeans and for our small Consulate General. The speech he gave had great historic significance. He used it to announce the end of the Brezhnev Doctrine. I remember well the moment that he got to that part of the speech. He stopped reading his text. He hesitated for a moment and then he said "These are words, but I can assure you that you will see the deeds in the reflection of these words." I was very excited about his speech and these words. I had Senator Alphonse D'Amato with me in the Gallery at the time. He had come to Strasbourg with a small congressional delegation to represent the United States.

When the speech ended I ran back to the Consulate and called Washington immediately. They were just opening in the morning for business. I went over the text of the speech and told the Office that I report to in the State Department that "Gorbachev just announced the end of the Brezhnev Doctrine." I couldn't get anyone back in Washington to take me seriously. They dismissed my analysis and asked only about what he had to say in the speech about arms control. At the time there was a small crisis with the placement of long range missiles in Europe. They asked me to read them the part of the text dealing with arms control. I did. The only response I got was - "We don't see anything new in the speech, Why don't you just send it in?" I told them I thought they were crazy. Man, this is the end of the Brezhnev Doctrine." They said, "Well, send it in and we'll look at it." I got the speech off to them right away and I wrote my own reporting telegram laying out my interpretations. I told them that the speech represented the end of the Brezhnev Doctrine. It's in that reporting cable. Nobody took it seriously. Ten days later I left Strasbourg on reassignment. In November, we saw the events that Gorbachev said would reflect the words in his speech. I had it right. The Department had it wrong. We now attribute to that speech by Gorbachev the announcement of the end of the Brezhnev Doctrine.

Q: It does point out that nobody was really ready for the earth shaking change that happened at the end of 1989. Here was a precursor of that and nobody was thinking in those terms.

COMRAS: Yes. It did catch everybody by surprise. I remember the thrill of the surprise of watching the Berlin Wall come tumbling down. It was a really...

Q: We'll cut it off here. I'd like to talk next about what your impression was of the composition of this, the clout that each had, both the European Parliament and the Council of Europe and the rivalry or how that harmonized, how you operated in this...

Today is December 6, 2002. You were in Strasbourg from when to when?

COMRAS: From July 1985 to August of 1989.

Q: Let's talk about how you saw the various elements of Europeanization that were in Strasbourg fitting together or not fitting together.

COMRAS: Strasbourg provided a very interesting vantage point to see what was happening in Europe. The city is right on the Franco-German border and right in the heart of Western Europe. It had a vocation as a European Capital dating back to the end of the War and the establishment of the first organizations for European unity. Strasbourg's history reflected the history of Europe and the historic tensions between Germany and France. Both countries felt strong emotional ties to Strasbourg.

The town reflects characteristics of both France and Germany. It was logical that it be considered the first capital devoted to post war European unification. In 1947, with Winston Churchill there, the Council of Europe was established in Strasbourg with the task of working toward the peaceful unification of Europe. The organization grew from an initial membership of nine countries to 23 countries by the time I left in 1989. It is considerably bigger now.

Q: We're talking about '85 to '89. From your vantage point, how did the elements of trying to put Europe together work?

COMRAS: The unification of Europe was proceeding on two separate tracks. A fast track represented by the European Community and a slow track represented by the Council of Europe. There was growing tension between these two tracks as the Council of Europe tried to define a role that was both consistent with, but different from the role of the European Community.

The European Community was the main economic and political force in Europe. It was growing rapidly in importance. Even the countries that originally opted out of the European Community began to reconsider their position. EC expansion was a foregone conclusion.

The Council of Europe seemed to be receding in importance. Its actions were already dominated by the EC bloc of countries. It looked to some that the Council of Europe would be bypassed or shunted aside by the EC. Some argued that the Council of Europe had become redundant.

But, on the other hand, there were also a number of European leaders that recognized that further expansion of the European Community was not imminent and that special consideration had to be given to maintaining the cohesion of the broader Europe. In their view the Council of Europe's mandate should be redefined and the organization reinvigorated.

The Council of Europe was given a new mandate in the late 1980s to maintain social and cultural cohesion among European Countries, to foster new openings toward democracy and human rights throughout Europe, and to provide a place for consultation that could serve the broader European Populace. If the European Community was economic Europe and political Europe, the Council of Europe was going to be value Europe. The notion of social policy, human rights became its calling card. This included also greater stress on legal cooperation, particularly in new areas, such as computer privacy.

The Council of Europe was directed to play an important role in pursuing European Unity and acting as an eventual gateway for the rest of Europe into the European Community.

Q: What sort of role were you playing?

COMRAS: The Strasbourg Consulate General's main responsibility was to deal with the European institutions in Strasbourg. This was one of our diplomatic windows on Europe. The State Department had kept it as a small window - probably smaller than it should have been. But, nevertheless, it (We) provided a valuable perspective on what was going on in Europe. The Consulate was, in fact, the U.S. link with the organization of the Broader Europe.

Of course, the U.S.' major emphasis was with the European Community. That's where we put most of our diplomatic chips. We had left only one small chip - our small consulate in Strasbourg - to deal with the Council of Europe.

I'm not sure I ever understood the State Department's reluctance to develop stronger relations with the Council of Europe. We were always so standoffish, even when the Council of Europe made overtures to us. These included invitations for us to send high level U.S. government officials to Council of Europe working groups and sessions. They even offered us the opportunity to have an observer ambassador in their midst. We (the Department of States) weren't interested. I guess we were just too EU-centric.

We didn't foresee the important role the Council of Europe would play vis a vis Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. We thought that the CSCE, which subsequently became the OSCE would be the more important forum for bringing Eastern Europe and the Newly emerging states into mainstream Europe and to closer relations with the West. I didn't think the OSCE could play that role. First of all the CSCE/OSCE was formed to allow dialogue between NATO and the Warsaw Pact countries. It was not created as a forum for strengthening or fostering democracy, human rights or open market economies.

The Council of Europe was dedicated to these principles.

The CSCE/OSCE represented a mélange of varying standards when it came to democracy and human rights. It represented the lowest common denominator among its member countries. The Council of Europe had set a much higher standard, and we wanted to get these countries in the East to reflect this higher standard.

Despite considerable disinterest in Washington, I remained very active in establishing and fostering relationships between the United States and the Council of Europe. I was particularly successful in creating new relationships between the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe and the U.S. Congress. This included putting together a joint Worldwide democracy building project that became known as the Strasbourg Conference on Democracy. I also was very active in assuring U.S. attitudes and positions were known and reflected in discussions within the Committee of Ministers and the Parliament. I represented the United States at a number of COE sponsored gatherings dealing with legal, social and cultural issues. I am very proud of the record I established there. My work there was recognized by a Superior Honor Award from the State Department. I was also honored by the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe when they formally presented me with their President' medal for my contributions to U.S.-European Relations.

I should tell you also that a good part of the period between 1985 and 1987 was taken up with another distraction. This was the decision taken by the State Department in 1987 to close the U.S. Consulate General in Strasbourg for budgetary reasons. Strasbourg was among 15 Consulates designated for closing as a cost cutting measure.

This planned move was a clear indication that many in the State Department did not understand the unique and important non consular role that the mission in Strasbourg played. It also showed the same amount of ignorance at the Embassy in Paris. The embassy was willing to sacrifice Strasbourg in order to keep all of the other consulates - in Lyon, Bordeaux and Marseilles. They rationalized that our work in Strasbourg could be handled via the EU Mission in Brussels.

The planned closing of the Strasbourg consulate became something of a cause celebre on both sides of the Atlantic.

In early 1987 we got word that the State Department had decided to close up to 15 additional consulates in the second phase of its cost cutting program. These cuts were being made to reflect continuing shortfalls in the State Departments budget. The State department had originally intended to close Lyon in this phase, rather than Strasbourg. But, under pressure from Ambassador Rodgers in Paris, had put that move on hold. But, there was still a need to cut at least one consulate in France. An agreement was finally worked out between the embassy in Paris, the U.S. Mission to the European Community in Brussels, and the European Bureau in the State Department that the Strasbourg Consulate would be closed, the functions of the consulate vis a vis the Council of Europe would be transferred to the Mission in Brussels, and the embassy in Paris would allow three of its positions to be transferred to Brussels to cover the additional work. Of course, nobody consulted me about any of this.

Well, I thought this was a bid mistake and I made by feelings known in a dissent channel message to Washington. I was surprised by how many other posts and personages in the European Bureau agreed with me. But having their support apparently was not enough to turn this train around.

When word leaked out from Washington about the Post closing plans, the city of Strasbourg became very upset. They immediately undertook an important public relations campaign in Washington and hired some high powered lobbyists to support their position. Strasbourg was already in a major international battle to keep their designation as the seat of the European Parliament, which wanted to move permanently to Brussels. They weren't going to allow this happen, and they certainly didn't want to see the United States also pulling the rug from under them on the importance of Strasbourg as a European capital, or of the Council of Europe as a European Institution.

Strasbourg found many important allies in the U.S. Congress. The Congress, which already knew Strasbourg well because of its historical importance and because of their relations with the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe, began to question the wisdom of the State Department's decision to include the Strasbourg Consulate in the list to be closed. It was in this context that Senator Fritz Hollings from North Carolina, during a visit to Strasbourg that summer made the point to tell me personally, "Vic, They will close the Strasbourg Consulate over my dead body. I helped to liberate Strasbourg. I know how important it is." This same strong reaction was shared by a number of Senators. In fact, one article in the Washington Post ran an article on the issue entitled "Senators Helms and Pell Finally Agree!" They both agreed that the Congress should act to keep the Strasbourg Consulate open. Amendments were placed in the State Department Appropriations which made this reaction clear. The amendments provided that if Strasbourg was closed, no new diplomatic posts could be established until Strasbourg was reopened. In the end, the State Department backed down and Strasbourg was never closed. But, this issue took about a year to resolve. Let me add a postscript. Our consulates in Lyon and Bordeaux were eventually closed, and then reopened several years later at great additional expense to the U.S. taxpayers.

There were many in Washington and Paris who blamed me for the Congressional reactions. I also was criticized heavily for my dissent message which, I might say was leaked by others, not me. This all led to need for me to file a grievance concerning my subsequent treatment by the Department regarding this issue. I won that grievance. But it certainly cost me several years in my own career. It became a serious handicap I had to overcome.

Q: How did you find the embassy in Paris? In a way you were technically under them but your job was really quite different. How did they relate to you?

COMRAS: It took some working together to figure out the right relationship between the Consulate and Paris and between the Consulate and Brussels. In the beginning, Ambassador Joe Rogers did not understand the role the consulate played in terms of the European institutions. He was focused on his own assets in France. He understood the role of the consulates in Lyon, Bordeaux and Marseilles. They were outposts of the Embassy and provided some limited traditional consular and trade services. The post in Strasbourg was different. It didn't seem to do as much in these areas as the other consulates did. So, for him, the Strasbourg consulate was less important.

It was hard to change his attitude in this regard. But, he did come around eventually to seeing the importance of Strasbourg to U.S. interests.

I don't want to underplay the role our Consulate did play vis a vis our bilateral relations with France. Our consular district represented an important part of France, including Alsace, Lorraine, Franche-Compte, and Belfort. The consulate covered the political and economic happenings in this region and reported on them regularly. You know, all the consulates in France were important outposts. They served a very important function in following, and influencing, what was happening in France.

Jacobinism in France had centralized authority over all of France in Paris. But, France was still ruled largely from the interior. The French political system allows for politicians to carry several political mandates simultaneously. Every French politician was also, first and most, a local politician. He was also a mayor, Local counselor, leader of the provincial regional assembly. That was his political base. Almost all of these political features were only part time residents in Paris. Their homes were in the regions and provinces. They spent only a few days a week in Paris. And when they were in Paris they were very very busy. It was very difficult for the embassy to establish any close relationship with them. Rather, the embassy had to deal mostly with the senior bureaucracy which ran the country under the guidance of the political leadership.

Ironically, the Consulates had closer relations with many of these political figures than the embassy. The embassy never wanted to admit this, but it was pretty much so. They might meet the politicians in their offices for short meetings, or, at most over Lunch. The ambassador might also get them to a reception or a formal dinner. But in the provinces we got to know them at home, and with their families, and mostly in informal setting. These were settings when they were "local politicians," catering to their local constituency and political base. I got to know many of them well, and on a first name basis. Over time, Joe Rogers began to understand this, perhaps more even than some of his predecessors.

Q: How were your contacts at the Council of Europe? Did you have to be careful you weren't getting crosswise from our embassy in Brussels dealing in European affairs?

COMRAS: Strasbourg was a unique situation. It was a small post with a big agenda little understood in Washington or Brussels. That gave me quite a bit of independence. I reported what I thought important. I gave Washington, Brussels and Paris my best shot in interpreting events. I contributed to our dialogue with Europe and our understanding of Europe. I made friends and influenced people - more on the European side than in Washington. I was an activist.

I took a very active stance vis a vis the Council of Europe and integrated our post into the activities conducted by the 21 other European Missions to the Council of Europe (all of which were headed by an Ambassador). I became the ex-officio representative of the United States to the Council of Europe even though we weren't members.

I had a great number of frustrations in getting my points across to Washington, and I sometimes had considerable difficulties in getting Washington to follow through on its commitments, or on activities related to the Council of Europe. Nevertheless, I was able to keep my credibility with the COE, with Washington, Brussels and Paris. Some of the people in all of these quarters didn't always appreciate me. I made my own bunch of critics, but that went with the territory. But I guess I must have done a good job as I received a nomination and favorable mention in the Director General's Best reporting competition, I received a Superior Honor Award from the Department, and I received the President's Medal from the Council of Europe.

While I was in Strasbourg we got involved in a large number of intergovernmental activities under the auspices of the Council of Europe. I took great pride in the role of the Consulate in setting up the Strasbourg Conference on Parliamentary Democracy. I also met regularly with the members of the Committee of Ministers that ran the Council of Europe. I used these occasions to make sure they were aware of, and considered U.S. views on relevant issues. These included issues related to Yugoslavia, for example, or to Turkey. I was very much involved in advocating the reintegration of Turkey into the Council of Europe after it returned to civilian rule. This was pursuant to U.S. government policy. I also reflected U.S. positions vis a vis the situation in Romania at the time of the Ceausescu and his destruction of the center of historic Bucharest. I handled numerous issues related to computer technology and computer privacy law, attempts to limit the importation of American film and TV programming, and many other related trade issues. I was deeply involved in numerous human rights questions, and proceedings at the European Commission and Court of Human Rights. This included one case where the United States was seeking the extradition of a person to Virginia to stand trial for murder. The case before the European Court of Human Rights dealt with the death penalty, and whether it violated that person's human rights to extradite him to a country which could execute him, or hold him for long periods under the threat of execution (the so-called Death Row Syndrome) There were a whole range of issues.

There were also the normal grist of political comings and goings, including visits by numerous U.S. government officials and a great many congressmen and senators.

I did a lot on the parliamentary side. This included the Strasbourg Parliamentary Conference on Democracy, which was a common effort between the U.S. Congress and the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe. This work included discussions and plans to foster democracy in Eastern European countries that were beginning to show some liberalization in the Gorbachev period.

Strasbourg also was a place for exercising a multiplier effect regarding getting U.S. points across. A large number of European parliamentarians and European Government officials were in Strasbourg at any particular time. We had a number of good opportunities to meet with these officials and to get our points across. I wanted the Consulate to play as large a role as we could on public diplomacy. I think the State Department should have given us more resources for this effort.

I want to tell you that my Wife Sara played a very very important role in this public relations effort. And she did so without the resources and support she should have gotten for the work. She was truly an unpaid volunteer employee of the U.S. government every day we were in Strasbourg. She provided the settings for so many successful occasions when we could entertain and get to know French leaders and European leaders. She was also always by my side at the very numerous occasions we attended special events and functions. She was an additional translator and interpreter. She was a scheduler and a planner. She provided an enormous service to U.S. interests and the U.S. government. She was busy working alongside me, or on the home front every day.

One cannot understate the important role that principal officer's wives or spouses play. This is particularly the case in small posts. My wife was among the best of these. She established a glowing reputation as a hostess and guest, and as one who gave a volunteer hand whenever and wherever needed. I do believe that she made a greater impact in Strasbourg than I did.

I can understand completely the efforts made by Mrs. Eagleburger to obtain some official recognition and compensation for spouses that work so hard for the United States with little or no recognition or compensation.

Q: I would think that the parliamentarians would be quite approachable because it wasn't as though they were sitting in the middle of their constituency and all that. In other words, they were somewhat fish out of water, too, weren't they, being in Strasbourg?

COMRAS: Absolutely. Strasbourg provided a very good setting in which to establish such relationships, to get to know the parliamentarians. I do believe that some of the conversations I had with members of parliament found their way back into their national parliament discussions. I believe I helped, in some cases, in broadening their understanding of certain issues, and U.S. views on them. You know these parliamentarians also produced a large amount of material during their participation in European Parliament and Parliamentary Assembly sessions that provide some useful and interesting insights into European popular thinking and attitudes toward current affairs issues. I tried to keep abreast of these discussions and, when appropriate to use them to report back to Washington on relevant issues. I think I got some very good insights on European attitudes towards various economic, political, social problems that were also of interest to us.

You know, the Council of Europe was the first international forum to put together a legal convention on the suppression of terrorism. We took great interest in those discussions. They laid down the principle that terrorism crimes should not benefit from the so-called political crimes exception to extradition.

Q: I was talking to someone else who was saying that the Europeans had played this dangerous game of allowing terrorists, if they were working on their home country's soil but doing their nasty stuff to somebody else, they weren't taking them very seriously. In other words, as long as you're not blowing up my people, we'll arrest you but we're not going hard after you. Things came to change after a while.

COMRAS: Well, I know that just about all the Western European countries took terrorism seriously during the last half of the 1980s. Terrorists were very active in Europe during that period. There was a terrible wave of terrorism throughout Western Europe. It cost the life of our Military Attache in Paris, Colonel Ray. It almost killed our DCM. Bob Homme, my predecessor,, was shot. Our military attaché in Athens was killed. We saw active terrorism throughout Europe - street bombings, train bombings, shootings. These occurred all over the place, Italy, Greece, Germany, France, Spain, Britain, Ireland, the Netherlands, Belgium. No country seemed able to escape this terrorism. I think the Europeans learned during this period to take terrorism very seriously. I hope they have not forgotten the lessons they learned in that period.

W. ROBERT WARNE
Economic Counselor
Paris (1986-1988)

W. Robert Warne was born in Washington, DC in 1937. He received a bachelor's degree from Princeton University in 1962 and then served in the U.S. Army. His Foreign Service career included positions in Buenos Aires, Brussels, Kingston, and Paris. This interview was conducted by Charles Stuart Kennedy on April 1, 1995.

Q: Was this Caribbean Initiative a real program?

WARNE: It had a substantial program. The main thing was the preferential trade arrangement. And I think it made a big impact. But it was a long-term program, and it wasn't going to turn things around right away. It certainly helped solidify our effort in the region, and we had congressional support for it. It didn't make as big a difference as we hoped, because, frankly, it depended on those countries' ability to organize their trade to take advantage of it, and a lot of them were slow in responding, such as Jamaica.

And then, finally, my last tour, I went to Paris. Actually, I did it as a last choice. I wanted to leave the Bureau. I felt that I had had enough of working on economic affairs, and I wanted to go overseas as a DCM or ambassador. At that time, I was a minister-counselor, and had been a minister-counselor for three or four years. I ran in competition for about six or seven DCM jobs, and I didn't get one of them. And it finally came down to Caracas. They had a new ambassador, not a career guy, and he chose a different candidate. So I decided to throw the towel in.

I took the job of economic counselor in Paris, as sort of a final assignment. I was in Paris for two years as the man in charge of trade and agriculture and energy and social affairs and labor affairs. I had a wonderful two years. My family and I enjoyed it immensely.

I was elected, among the 24 countries, as the chairman of the trade committee working party and ran the preparations for the Uruguay Round, which was very exciting. We developed some new guidelines for services and for investment and intellectual property protection. It made a substantial contribution to the Round. Got some new guidelines, which developed into the final agreement on agriculture. So we did a lot during those two years.

But I had decided to get out of the Foreign Service. I decided that, since I wasn't going to be an ambassador and I couldn't even get a good DCM job, I ought to go do something else.

Q: When you were in Paris, what was your attitude towards the French and how they viewed us and how we dealt with it? It always seems to be a stormy relationship. Very interesting letter from the French ambassador in the paper today.

WARNE: I saw it. I thought it was well written. I enjoyed it. I had no resentment against the French. I enjoy the French. They're wonderful people. I had a lot of good French friends.

In fact, I had an interesting experience in France. Suzy was here in Washington to take care of our daughter's wedding preparations. This was during the time when there were a lot of French terrorist bombing activities. They identified our apartment as a place where an American diplomat was living. And they just one day called me up and said I couldn't go home, that this was a threat. I said, "What do you want me to do?"

He said, "Get out of town and go stay in a hotel."

So I called a French friend and asked if I could go stay with him in Nice. He had an apartment. So I spent ten days with him down there, and I had a wonderful time.

We still have three or four French friends that stop by. No, I didn't find any problem with the French at all.

Q: Who was our ambassador when you were there?

WARNE: Ed Streator was our ambassador to the OECD.

Q: You were with the OECD.

WARNE: I was at the OECD, yes. And then the last year was Dennis Lamb. Two entirely different personalities.

The OECD was a fascinating place, and it's been very useful. In fact, I just got back from a week at the OECD, where I looked up a lot of the old people I worked with. I did an audit of the Korean effort to get into the OECD, and found that it's even a more vital organization for U.S. interests today than when I was there. It's a sleeper. A lot of people don't know much about it.

Q: Could you explain, what is the OECD?

WARNE: The OECD is a group of 25 countries that have structured themselves to look at international economic issues and collaborate together in dealing with these issues. It's an outgrowth of the Marshall Plan, in which, just after the war, as you know, the U.S. helped with the reconstruction of Europe. And coming out of that was the OECD. It was originally a community which the U.S. planned to coordinate the aid effort, the purpose of which was that we agreed that we would provide substantial financial aid if the Europeans would, in turn, structure their economies to revitalize their industry and reconstruct the war-torn countries. And the OECD was the framework for the aid program.

Well, it evolved from a major bilateral aid effort to a collaborative effort to manage the world economy, mainly focused in Europe, but throughout the world. And it now has about 16 major directors, handling everything from trade to environment to finance to education to social affairs, labor, industry, and all of the major areas of economic activity, globally. Its purpose is to try to identify emerging problems and to develop, first, an analytical basis for the ways to deal with the problems, and then, secondly, to come up with recommendations and then proposals for governments to take in the way of policy actions. For example, there are five issues that I was dealing with when I was in Paris this last week.

I can give you examples of the things. One is what to do about the stagnant and large unemployment in Europe and, somewhat, in the United States, what policy measures to be taken in the way of training, revitalizing the economies to generate more employment.

Another issue that they're dealing with is the aging population in a number of the member countries. The population of Belgium is projected to decline by ten percent over the next decade. What are the economic consequences of these demographic changes, and how do you cope with them?

A third area that I was dealing with was a new initiative to open up investment worldwide. We're negotiating a new investment instrument that would have a much higher discipline for countries in handling foreign direct investment.

A fourth area was how to restructure the International Energy Agency to better cope with the changing oil situation, particularly on how to help develop oil in the Caspian Sea and in Russia.

A fifth area was concerning new guidelines for environmental issues. How should trade negotiators take environmental concerns into account, and the impact on the environment of expanding trade and new trade opportunities. We're working out some new guidelines.

These are the types of issues. They're very nitty gritty things that a lot of people don't pay a lot of attention to, but are important.

Q: I think this is the sort of thing that I'm trying to bring out in these oral histories. Foreign relations aren't just coups and elections and things like this, but underlying it is a tremendous economic web, where the United States plays a leading role in trying to meet crises. And this is what we're getting.

WARNE: Well, for example, during the time I was at the OECD, my main interest was trying to get a consensus among the major trading countries of the world of what we wanted to do in the Uruguay Round trade negotiations to restructure our trade relations. We were, for the first time, advocating that we should have discipline on investment that all of us could agree to: national treatment, right of establishment, of transparency, of rules.

Another area was on intellectual property protection. What should be the copyright rules, and how could they be standardized worldwide to protect U.S. companies and others from invasion of their copyrights.

And then a third area, for the first time, we were taking up services -- accounting, business services, financial services worldwide -- and what disciplines could be established in this new area that is now the most important part of our trade. It's the most important part of our economy, and we don't have any international disciplines in these areas.

We were able to adopt, in the working group that I was chairing, a consensus. And we worked at it very hard. I had a mandate. Every week I would be putting forward a new paper and a new proposal, and we would dialogue about it, and we would get countries to react to it, and then we'd draw up some guidelines. I had a steady stream of people from Washington that would participate in this. We had people from USTR, primarily, that would come out and help me in the preparation of this. And we got a very good working framework out of the 24 countries, which we submitted to the Geneva negotiations, which were the basis for these agreements. So the OECD played a very good catalytic role in getting this Round.

We did the same on agriculture. We analyzed the cost of subsidies on all the major commodities, and we compared the amount of subsidies among each country, and then began to create a framework for how these subsidies could be reduced. We got a very substantial first step, not a final step, in an agricultural agreement out of the Rounds.

So, yes, we made quite an impact on it. And, as a result, trade will expand substantially in Western Europe.

DENIS LAMB
Ambassador to OECD
Paris (1987-1990)

Ambassador Denis Lamb was born in Ohio 1937. He received his BS from Columbia University and MS from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Upon entering the Foreign Service in 1964, he was posted in Fort de France, Paris and Brussels. He was interviewed by Ray Ewing on September 19, 2005.

Q: Okay, where did you go from there and how did that come to happen?

LAMB: I become the permanent representative to the OECD, which carries ambassadorial rank. The route back to OECD was circuitous. With the support of Doug McMinn, Secretary Shultz put my name up to be the U.S. representative to what is now the European Union, an assignment I welcomed, although, to be honest, the day-to-day workings of trade policy can be pretty tedious. I wasn't thrilled with the prospect of returning to Brussels, but the assignment was a good fit. (And let's face it, the chances of a career officer being named ambassador to an important post in Europe were and are slim.)

At that time, having switched jobs with Jim Baker, former treasury secretary Don Regan was President Reagan's chief of staff. His assistant, whose title was secretary of the cabinet, was Alfred Kingon. Al, who had been publisher of Institutional Investor, came to work for Regan in the Treasury Department. Although he was mainly concerned with public affairs, Al would occasionally represent the Treasury on the Trade Policy Review Group, where I represented State. (Al was the White House official I contacted to try to get "fair trade" out of the text of the Reagan speech we discussed earlier). When my nomination papers crossed Al's desk, he decided he was going to go to Brussels. He actually called me and told me that he was going to claim the assignment. Thanks, Al. The timing was good for him because Don Regan eventually left his post as chief of staff (pushed out by Nancy Reagan), which would have left Kingon in a difficult situation. My consolation prize was that my name would go over as the candidate to be the permanent representative to the OECD. (I did not deal directly with Secretary Shultz on any of this but, as relayed to me by Doug McMinn, the secretary said that he could not do anything about the Brussels assignment, but that if I wanted to go to Paris he would see to it that the nomination went through.)

Q: This was '87, the year before the election.

LAMB: Right. It raised the question of what would happen after the election. If a Democrat won, I would probably be sent packing. If a Republican won, my chances of staying were better. But I put those concerns aside.

I did have another option. At Frank Carlucci's initiative, I was interviewed -- at arm's length so to speak -- for the top economic job on the National Security Council staff that Carlucci then headed. The interview by Ken Adelman, then head of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, had a pro forma quality; my sense was that I was being offered the job. I turned it down, probably due to the lure of acquiring an ambassadorial flag. Who knows, if I had accepted, you might be talking to one of the principals of the Carlyle Group (Carlucci is chairman emeritus of Carlyle). On my yacht.

Terry Sanford chaired my Senate hearing. I was a member of a panel of three or four, so the attention of the senators was shifting back and forth; none of us received especially close scrutiny. Senator Lugar's questions to me focused on soybeans, which I knew something about. Everything was going well until Senator Sanford was about to close the proceedings. "Oh, by the way, Mr. Lamb," he said, "Senator Helms will have some written questions for you." As you know, the prospect of having to answer written questions is never welcome; questions from Jesse Helms could involve serious jeopardy. I had no idea what might have caught his interest or the interest of his staff.

Q: You waited by the mailbox?

LAMB: In trepidation. But no questions were forthcoming and the nomination proceeded quickly to the floor and passed. I was able to start preparing to move to Paris.

Q: And you did the ambassadorial seminar?

LAMB: Yes, I did. The seminar was very good. Two former ambassadors, Tony Motley and Shirley Temple Black, conducted it. We had a good mix of political and career people. The Foreign Service participants were part of the teaching process. We were helping our political appointee colleagues to acquire background that would help them do their jobs. Some were rather full of themselves, but most took good notes. I thought that having Tony and Shirley as co-chairs helped the political appointees to absorb the lessons on offer.

Q: Shirley Temple Black did the ambassadorial seminar, coming from San Francisco, pretty much throughout the Reagan Administration. She had been chief of mission to Ghana during the Nixon Administration; during the first Bush Administration she went to Prague. I've always thought it a little odd that this California movie industry president that we had (Reagan) never offered her anything other than the ambassadorial seminar, which I think she did well. I also went through it with her as a leader, respected her and felt like when I did go to Ghana later, that having known her was helpful to me.

LAMB: When she was in Prague we renewed our acquaintance at a chiefs of mission meeting in Oslo. She is a gracious lady.

Q: Well, why don't you talk a little bit about what the job as U.S. permanent representative to the OECD entails, both within the mission and as far as dealing with Washington and, I suppose, dealing with the other ambassadors. You knew what you were getting into in many ways, but how different was it this time?

LAMB: What do ambassadors do when policy makers have access to CNN, Fox News, the telephone, and email? One of my notions, which we have already touched upon, is that ambassadors help Washington coordinate itself. The agencies have overlapping interests that they have difficulty in reconciling. Ambassadors are well placed to identify conflicts, whether actual or potential, and to take steps get them resolved. That can mean simply asking people to work out their differences. It can mean injecting a proposal of one's own that the bureaucracy in Washington is forced to address and in the process sort out its differences. It can involve informal contacts, telephone calls, personal relationships, putting up visitors at the residence and talking to them informally about emerging problems.

Similarly, within an embassy or mission, conflicts can appear in local variants. The ambassador has to be alert to those and to try to reconcile divergent views.

An ambassador assigned to an international organization continuously interacts with the permanent staff. The OECD has about 2,000 people on its payroll. While the secretariat is pledged to support the committee structure and serve the member governments, the not so surprising reality is that it can have an agenda of its own. It needs to be motivated, guided, and occasionally curbed, reprimanded, and otherwise brought under control. I found in looking back over how the U.S. has been represented at the OECD that ambassadors tended either to seek to intimidate the secretariat or to seduce it. In either case, the objective is to bend the institution to your will. Well, temperamentally, I'm a conciliator and a motivator. That meant that I preferred seduction to intimidation. I wanted to work with the Secretariat. This entailed a minor course correction. My immediate predecessor leaned in the other direction. Ambassador Edward Streator arrived at the OECD in a way analogous to my own. He should have gone to NATO, but that assignment did not materialize.

Q: He'd been for many years the number two in London.

LAMB: Yes, and he headed the military-political office (RPM) in the European bureau before that. He was expert in security matters and intimately familiar with NATO. At OECD he thought the best way forward for the U.S. under his leadership was to promote change by aggressively seeking to hive off activities we did not like and moving resources to those we thought should be beefed up. Surveying the scene when I arrived, I thought that the results achieved to date had been modest, but had caused a certain amount of turmoil. I decided to turn the whole thing around 180 degrees and try a different approach. Ed's and my goals weren't all that different. It was a matter of style.

Q: And were you encouraged in that direction by the powers that be in Washington or was this pretty much something you could do on your own?

LAMB: I had the latitude to make the adjustment. The key, as I saw it, was to bring the mission staff along and to have them back me in my approach.

Q: And who was the secretary general at the time?

LAMB: As I mentioned earlier, the secretary general was Jean-Claude Paye. Prior to being elected secretary general, he had been the senior permanent official at the French foreign ministry, the Quai d'Orsay. One of my predecessors, Abe Katz, had almost single-handedly engineered Paye's election by convincing U.S. officials that it would be advantageous to have a French figure, to put it crudely, inside the tent p----- out, than outside the tent p----- in. Although Jean-Claude was an experienced, adroit French diplomat, he shared the conceit of many French officials that their role in life was to speak truth to power, i.e., to get under the skin of the United States. I had encountered him at the Quai on CoCom issues when I was in the Department. I found him difficult to deal with at the time because French interests were best served by opposing us rather than seeking accommodation. Still, I thought that Abe Katz was right to back Paye. I thought that he would strive to be evenhanded as secretary general. Paye and Ed Streator did not get along. Perhaps there was too much history there, although I can't be sure. It having been said that "you can catch more flies with honey than with vinegar," I decided to go on a charm offensive. Ultimately, it worked, but Jean-Claude and I got off to a rocky start.

Here's what happened. One of my tasks was to host a regular dinner for the senior members of the of the economic policy committee, chaired by the chairman of the U.S. Council of Economic Advisors. In addition to the members, Jean-Claude and the head of OECD's economics department attended the dinner. Well, we got the seating wrong -- I went along with the seating plan prepared by the social secretary that I had inherited. Paye was not seated to my right, where he belonged. I blundered and Jean-Claude was frosted. It took a couple of weeks to overcome that, beginning with an abject apology on my part, but eventually we got beyond the incident.

Q: You had nowhere to go but up, presumably.

LAMB: But we did progress from that low point, thankfully. One of the things I did for Jean-Claude was to help him conduct meetings of the Council more efficiently by refraining from speaking unless I had something important to say, a discipline not always exercised by my colleagues. It is not necessary that the United States representative speak to every point and, mirabile dictu, it turns out that if you only speak when you have something to say, you are more likely to be listened to. So that worked out. There were other ways that I could be helpful and, in that way, foster the relationship.

Q: I assume there were a number of American nationals in the Secretariat. Was there a senior American of influence?

LAMB: At the time, the OECD had three deputy secretaries general. Today there are four. From the creation of the organization, the senior deputy was always an American national. In the early days that post was held by a serving Foreign Service officer. When I arrived, the American deputy was Jack Myerson. Jack had taken the job on the stipulation that he be allowed to retire from the Service; that had financial advantages for him, but it loosened State's control. When it came time to consider renewing Jack's term I told him that I wanted to bring in a new deputy, someone with recent international economic policy experience in State. It was handled well and Jack, although he was willing to extend, was quite happy. But I made a serious tactical mistake. As part of my "charm offensive," and because it appealed to me as good personnel policy, I asked the Department to put up three candidates and let Jean-Claude choose one of them. This prolonged the process. To boot, the matter was in the hands of Under Secretary Allen Wallis. Lacking a bureaucratic sensibility, he did not bring the matter to closure on a timely basis. As a result, when Secretary of the Treasury Baker was in Paris for some OECD event, he took Jean-Claude aside and put forward his own candidate, Robert Cornell, a deputy assistant secretary in his department. Paye selected Bob. Although Bob turned out to be a perfectly fine deputy secretary general, I regretted our inability to fill the post with a deserving FSO. When Bob retired after six years, the job returned to State Department control.

As to the presence of Americans in senior secretariat positions, the U.S. is under-represented in relation to its contribution to the budget (if that is a useful gauge). We staffed about seven percent of the top posts. The reason is that, whereas an OECD posting adds luster to the resumes of economists from most OECD countries, in the U.S. an OECD assignment is often viewed as a detour on the path to advancement. But we did our best, with the help of the Department, to publicize job openings and find U.S. candidates to fill them.

Q: Well, I was going to ask you a little bit about the structure of the mission itself at the time you were the permanent representative, perhaps compared with what it was earlier and who was your deputy and how all that worked. Was he from Treasury Department?

LAMB: No. By the time I arrived, the deputy chief of mission was an FSO. The Treasury official in charge of the economic and finance section, John Lange, was designated deputy chief for economics and finance, but he did not have a role in the overall management of the mission. Tim Deal was the DCM I inherited from Ambassador Streater. He served with me for a year and helped me with the transition from the Streater approach to the Lamb approach, while avoiding obvious signs of discontinuity. He did a wonderful job for me.

Tim was succeeded by Dick Hecklinger, whom I recruited, and who was with me for the remainder of my tour. (Later Dick served as U.S. ambassador in Bangkok. Following that, he succeeded Sally Shelton as the U.S. deputy secretary general at the OECD.) I relied on Dick to keep in touch with thinking in Washington on matters the mission was dealing with, as well as on broader geopolitical considerations as the cold war was winding down. When Washington opened for business at about 3 pm Paris time, Dick would get on the phone and gather the intelligence that was so helpful to the mission in charting its course in a changing environment.

Q: The United States Mission to the OECD was still located in the OECD building?

LAMB: Yes.

Q: And you would have Marines on your floor or security procedures?

LAMB: We had secure access to the mission and Marines provided security. It was an honor to return their salutes. But the troops were later removed on the advice of a team of State inspectors. The inspectors told me that the purpose of Marines is not to protect people but to protect classified information, and that the mission did not have enough classified documents in its files to warrant a Marine presence. So the Marines were withdrawn and replaced by local hire guards. Although I protested the decision at the time, the new arrangements were perfectly satisfactory.

Q: Was the work of the Council the main area that you spent time on, whereas the economic policy committee, the development advisory committee, some of the other activities, were largely staffed, led if you will, by people from Washington?

LAMB: I did work with delegates to committees, but this did not ordinarily involve heavy lifting. There was one exception. The president's science adviser, Bill Graham, led the U.S. delegation to the Committee on Science and Technology Policy. Bill wanted to negotiate a framework agreement that would encourage and establish ground rules for intergovernmental cooperation on large science projects. To help him accomplish this goal, I got into the trenches, sat with him in committee, and helped him reach agreement on a document that met his needs.

In the Council, I handled the routine matters such as approving budgets and negotiating communiqué language, but I also advanced several initiatives. I went to Paris with three goals in mind. I was following the advice of Warren Christopher who, you will recall, had advised one of my predecessors, Herb Salzman, to limit his reach in the job.

One of these goals was to bring South Korea in as an OECD member. There were a number of reasons for this. One of them was that the organization needed better geographic balance. Despite the presence of the U.S., Canada, Australia, and New Zealand, it remained too heavily weighted towards Europe. Second, we believed that membership would help consolidate democracy in Korea. (In 1987 President Chun left office in the face of student unrest and international pressure in the build up to the 1988 Seoul Olympic Games. A sixth constitution was passed on October 12, 1987 and Roh Tae-Woo succeeded Chun in the first direct presidential elections held since 1971. Once in office, Roh instituted further political reforms and launched a bold anti-corruption campaign.) Also, we felt that OECD membership would contribute to the liberalization of the Korean economy. At the time, Korea maintained controls on inward direct investment. If it adopted the OECD Convention, Korea would have to abide by OECD's obligatory Code of Liberalization of Capital Movements, which would require it to lift controls. Finally, although this was only a distant cloud on the horizon, the idea of establishing an "Asian-OECD" was in the air. We wanted to foreclose this possibility.

Contacts between OECD and South Korea increased after my late-80s initiative, but formal accession negotiations did not begin until 1995. Korea was somewhat wary of the liberalization it would have to undertake to become a member (even though it was understood that liberalization could be phased in), and it was reluctant to give up its status as a developing country. (Some OECD members, including the U.S., were adamant that Korea abandon its membership in the G-77, a pressure group active in the UN system.) Korea joined the OECD in late 1996.

A second goal was to secure an agreement among OECD countries to promote and protect foreign direct investment. In addition to the capital movements code that I mentioned a moment ago, OECD countries adhered to a voluntary "national treatment" instrument that committed them to treat foreign-owned enterprises no less favorably than domestic enterprises in like situations. With Washington's backing, I proposed in Council that we transform this voluntary undertaking into a binding agreement. (I should note that my objective was both to make the world safer for U.S. investors and to counter, admittedly in a modest way, pressures for investment protectionism in our own country. Although the purchases by Japanese investors of iconic U.S. real estate -- Rockefeller Center and Pebble Beach -- did not take place until 1989 and 1992 respectively, concern over Japanese investment was already building.

Although the Council said "no" to the initiative, it didn't die. Discussions ensued in the relevant OECD committee. By 1995 (yes, as we observe yet again, the wheels do grind slowly), agreement was reached to begin negotiations on a "free-standing" treaty, i.e., an undertaking not embedded in the OECD, governing foreign investment. Within the U.S. government, this involved settling a dispute between Treasury, which championed its approach of negotiating bilateral investment treaties ("bits"), and other agencies that preferred a more comprehensive approach.

The prospective treaty was dubbed the Multilateral Agreement on Investment, or MAI. The approach followed the traditional OECD model of working out the details of a policy issue within the OECD before opening the process to other countries in the World Trade Organization. Unfortunately, the effort came to naught in 1997. The MAI encountered opposition from the EC Commission, which favored negotiating in the WTO; from developing countries opposed to relinquishing control over inward investment; and from opponents of globalization. France -- where anti-globalization forces, united under the banner of the organization ATTAC -- held sway, administered the death knell. In October 1997, France withdrew from the negotiations, insuring their collapse. In the wake of the debacle, one had to wonder whether the effort had been necessary. Developing countries continued to seek foreign investors and in the vast majority of cases treated them well. Doing so, after all, was necessary to attract additional investment.

The third thing I set out to do was to promote economic reform in Eastern Europe. The Warsaw Pact countries were slipping out from under the control of the Soviet Union and it was important to demonstrate that the West was going to assist them. It was also important, frankly, that the OECD demonstrate its relevance in a changing political landscape. The idea I came up with, aided by Dick Hecklinger and others in the mission, was that OECD should establish an East-West Center to advise on how best to make the transition from centrally-planned to market economies. I came back to Washington, talked to people in the Department, including Bob Zoellick, and on the NSC staff, including Bob Blackwill, and secured their support. I didn't think we needed much money -- a million dollars would do. We would leverage the million into four million by raising a proportionate amount from the other OECD members. As to the source of the funds, there was a bill moving in the Senate, sponsored by Joe Lieberman, which appropriated money for Eastern Europe that I thought we could tap.

To make a long story short, I got it done. Jean-Claude took some convincing. For some reason, he thought a "center" might drift out of his control. He welcomed the money, but wanted to disperse it throughout the organization. I wanted the visibility that a center offered. I prevailed, although the center remained a small entity and the programs conducted on the behalf of Eastern Europe were decentralized, as Paye (and I, for that matter) wished. The center, now renamed the Center for Cooperation with Non-Members, still exists. It conducts "outreach" to countries such as Brazil, China, as well as many others.

Q: And the million dollars, was that a one time only payment?

LAMB: Well, it was purposefully left a little vague. It was understood it wasn't one time only, but it was also understood that it wasn't part of our regular assessed contribution. Other countries dealt with their share of the cost based on their administrative structures. Most of them simply added it to their regular bill. I knew that our (annual) million would have to be worked into our regular contribution eventually and that doing so would be an enormous headache for Washington. I went ahead anyway, and I am glad that I did.

Q: 'Cause while you were there from '87 to '90 the Soviet Union would end, the Berlin Wall came down, Europe changed dramatically. Were there other aspects of all of that that affected, that impacted on the OECD or the OECD was able to influence?

LAMB: I've mentioned Secretary of State Baker's strategic vision, which centered on U.S. participation in important regional groupings. Taking that as a starting point, I tried to figure out a way to insert the OECD into his concept. Dick Hecklinger and I spent hours pondering how to fit the OECD -- a global organization with a limited membership -- into Baker's construct. To get a better sense of their thinking, I went to Washington and visited with Counselor Bob Zoellick, Under Secretary for Political Affairs Bob Kimmitt, and Jim Dobbins, who was then the principal deputy in EUR. I am sorry to say that the effort failed. There was no mention of the OECD in the series of speeches that scoped out the institutional scheme for post-cold war diplomacy.

Q: But I assume that some of the other permanent missions were not terribly active, maybe understaffed. You want to talk about some that were really good and effective?

LAMB: We've touched on the question earlier. Let me say here that the Japanese had the largest mission and they were very active. Many of the smaller missions made the most of limited resources and were quite effective. The French didn't have a permanent delegation of any size because they drew on their ministries to do the OECD work.

Q: Must be a little bit like the Organization of American States in Washington, where we do have a mission but there are lots of other people. Want to talk a little bit about, I want to go on to the political aspect, but maybe a little bit more about sort of attitudes towards this international economic coordinating body on the part of the two Secretaries of State that you were especially involved with. George Shultz, an economist by background, probably enjoyed coming to Paris for OECD meetings. Jim Baker, who probably didn't have quite the same background.

LAMB: You know, it was just the opposite. Let me step back and say that I had a rare opportunity to watch Shultz and Baker interact in Washington. Baker hosted a regular breakfast meeting, once a week I believe, when both he and Shultz were in Washington. Their deputies (Darman and Wallis) sat in, as did National Security Adviser Frank Carlucci. Shultz usually brought along Doug McMinn. When McMinn was unavailable, I attended.

The meeting was very relaxed, with no agenda and no record made. It covered whatever happened to be on their minds. In his approach to international economic policy, Baker differed radically from Shultz. Baker was not passive. For example, take intervention (buying or selling dollars) in foreign currency markets. Shultz was philosophically and temperamentally opposed to intervention. Baker thought being seen to be managing things was an important part of his job. Remember the Plaza Accord of September 1985, in which the G-5 countries agreed to intervene to devalue the dollar. That's something that I can't imagine Shultz having anything to do with.

Baker supported the OECD because he liked to use international economic institutions and to be seen using them. He wanted to foster the notion that these institutions were monitoring and guiding the system under the tutelage of political leaders and acting to benefit citizens. (Baker attended several OECD meetings, both before and during my tour as ambassador.)

I have mentioned that Shultz came to the OECD in 1982 to nail down the resolution of the Soviet-European pipeline dispute. Abe Katz, our ambassador at the time, did a fantastic job of preparing the necessary decisions in negotiations in the Council. He worked out the parameters of the IEA study, which dealt with dependence on Soviet gas exports and the OECD study, which addressed the export credit angle. The end game, at the meeting Shultz attended, featured Ambassador Katz moving around the room showing language to other ministers of foreign affairs and nailing down the final agreement. It was an example of what a skilled player in that position can accomplish under pressure.

Q: Usually, though, the communiqués were worked out in advance.

LAMB: Yes, although there were always a few contentious points to be decided by ministers. Nowadays, the organization has replaced the communiqué with a brief chairman's statement. This is an improvement in some ways, although the lengthy communiqués provided guidance for the secretariat on what it should be doing in the interval between meetings. The organization may be relinquishing an important management tool.

Q: Why don't you talk a little bit about the International Energy Agency at the time that you were there as permanent representative. Were you responsible for U.S. participation, U.S. relationship with it?

LAMB: I did not have a formal role with respect to the IEA. Although many of my fellow ambassadors represented their countries on the IEA Governing Board, the U.S. was represented by a delegate from Washington

Q: From the Department of State?

LAMB: From the Department of State, yes.

Q: So on, you wouldn't go to meetings, would your mission, you, perhaps others on your staff, meet with the Secretariat, other delegations before meetings, Governing Board meetings?

LAMB: An energy officer on my staff dealt with the IEA secretariat. The deputy executive director of the IEA has always been an American from the State Department. During my tenure John Ferriter, who had served with me in mission in the 60s, held the position. If I needed to know anything about IEA matters, it was easy to pick up the phone and talk to John.

Q: Is the secretariat of the IEA co-located with that of the OECD?

LAMB: It occupies separate quarters in a building on the Left Bank and has its own meeting rooms there.

Q: But the, to the extent anybody was involved between meetings it would be the OECD mission, as opposed to the embassy?

LAMB: Correct. The embassy had no role.

Q: You want to say anything about the relationship with the embassy?

I was fortunate in my relations with the U.S. ambassadors to France who served with me: Joe Rogers, who was in place when I arrived, and Walter Curley, who succeeded Joe. We met once a month, informally over drinks, in our respective residences, just to chat. Ambassadors can't be "one of the boys," so, aside from your deputy and your spouse, to whom you might confide your occasional doubts and misgivings, you are alone. Joe and Walter lived in the same bubble and we welcomed the chance to talk candidly about our problems and frustrations, both major and minor. Joe came to my rescue early on: the Arts in Embassies program that borrows American art for display in embassy residences had run into budget problems and could not ship paintings to hang on my walls. When I mentioned this to Joe, he offered to lend me a painting by Milton Avery that he had put in storage. It turned out to be a superb canvas, bordering on the abstract, in tones of grey. (As for the rest of the paintings we needed to cover the walls, Lee Huebner, publisher of the International Herald Tribune, came to the rescue. He introduced us to a French artist, René Théobald, who loaned us a number of her semi-abstract oil paintings. When Helen and I left Paris, René gave us a reproduction of a watercolor depicting Notre Dame, which she inscribed “Hoping that Paris will always be in your heart.” Well, it is and so is René.)

My regular meetings with Joe and Walter were probably helpful in sending a signal to our administrative support that the mission should be well treated, which it was. As to what I could do for them, although they were well-served by the embassy economic section, I had more direct contact with the economic movers and shakers from Washington and other capitals and could pass along useful insights as well as good gossip. Both of my colleagues included me in high-level visits. To cite an example, when Vice President Bush came to Paris on one occasion, there were a couple of meals at the embassy to which I was invited. One was a small, informal lunch with three (including the VP) on the U.S. side, and three French ministers. I occupied very valuable real estate on that occasion and I was grateful to my host. The other meal, a larger dinner, was less important but I welcomed the invitation as a gesture of comity and support. This was the dinner where I had my conversation, recounted earlier, with the wife of the CEO of Airbus; General de Gaulle’s son, a retired admiral, was at the same table. He resembled his father.

Many congressional delegations visit Paris, but few seek out OECD. So I counted on the embassy and the ambassador, when necessary, to alert me to upcoming congressional visits. More often than not, I would go to the hotel where the delegation was staying and meet informally with whomever was interested in chatting. I remember one occasion when Newt Gingrich and a number of others had just returned from Eastern Europe. We had a good conversation on the evolving situation and I had an opportunity to make a pitch for OECD’s new east-west center. One other angle involving Congress. There is a NATO parliamentary group independent of NATO itself. It has an economic committee that meets annually in Brussels and then pays a visit to the OECD. There would be a meeting with the secretary general and some of the directors. That evening I would host the American participants -- a senator or two and several congressmen -- plus ambassadorial colleagues and members of the secretariat. The reception was always appreciated and produced some useful interchanges.

I should mention that the embassy’s regional security officer also serviced the mission. This was important because Paris was under siege by North African terrorists who had exploded a number of bombs. It was important that the mission receive the same protection that was afforded to embassy staff. As for myself, if I was not at home, where guards were posted, or at the office, I traveled with a plain-clothes police escort laid on by the French authorities. This was reassuring but confining. I led a scripted life; the police had to know in advance when I would leave the house or the office, where I was going, and for how long. Although onerous in many respects, traveling with the cops had its up side. For example, the family never waited in line for movie or museum tickets. One of my escorts would go to the box office, pick up the tickets and escort us in. If we went to the countryside, we paid for our protectors' meals, unless the restaurant proprietor picked up the check, and many did. If we made a trip out of town by train, we would be met by a local police escort.

Now, you would think that the security threat would call for a discreet mode of transport. For a while we motored around Paris in an armored BMW that did not call attention to itself. Later, though, the BMW was replaced by a Cadillac that drew stares.

Q: Did you come back to Washington pretty regularly during the time you were there, about three years?

LAMB: Fairly regularly, yes. The secretary general visited Washington at least twice a year and I would accompany him. After joining him in his meetings with administration officials, the Fed chairman, and others, I would tack on a few days and make the rounds of my contacts. Since Washington is something of a revolving door, it was important to me to "put a face to the name" of those I was dealing with, and to let them get to know me. As I mentioned, I also visited Washington on at least two occasions to promote my OECD agenda.

Q: In those days there wasn't a third mission in Paris as there is now with UNESCO.

LAMB: There was not, no.

Q: I'd like to talk a little bit more about the political dimension of the OECD. I find very interesting the role you played with regard to Korea's membership, participation. I've often thought and I may be influenced by my assignment to Tokyo from '59 to '61, that in many ways after the recovery of Europe and the takeoff of the European Community, which really was an indication that the OEEC and the Marshall Plan had been a success, that one of its main political dimensions of the OECD was linking Japan to the rest of the industrial world and then later Australia, New Zealand, and Finland became members. You want to talk at all about that, as you saw it, when you were there as ambassador or by that time it was so accepted.

LAMB: Those countries were well integrated into the organization by the time I served as ambassador. Although the OECD did not find a place in the front rank of post-cold war international organizations, it acquired another political role, as symbolized by Korean entry, the subsequent entry of Hungary, Poland, the Czech Republic, and Slovakia, and expanded outreach to non-members. In a nutshell, its role became (and was becoming while I was there) one of integrating like-minded, democratic countries into the fold. There are two constraints. One is the number of countries ready to embrace free markets and open political systems. The other is the OECD's method of work, which is based on bringing national officials together around the table. The table can only get so big before the "magic of the OECD" ceases to appeal or to work. The OECD has yet to solve the problem of how to expand while retaining its distinctive character.

One indication of how Japan values OECD membership was its decision to host a meeting of the Council in Tokyo to mark the 25th anniversary of its accession. The ambassadors and their wives, the secretary general and his wife, and members of the secretariat were treated to a trip to Tokyo (and Kyoto and the island of Kyushu, which was the birthplace of the then Japanese ambassador) at Japanese government expense. Perhaps the most revealing moment of the trip came when our group attended a reception at the home of a provincial governor in the city of Fukuoka on Kyushu. The governor was a dynamic young man -- with whom we had conferred in his office -- touted as a rising figure in the ruling Liberal Democratic Party. As we strolled up the long driveway to his house, lined with the tombs of his ancestors, the Japanese ambassador explained that the governor came from a long line of hereditary rulers of the island.

Q: Turkey?

LAMB: Turkey is in the OECD which, along with its membership in NATO, links it to the West. Will it become a member of the EU? Regrettably, although negotiations have begun, the omens are not good. Turkey would be a difficult fit under any circumstances, but the problems faced by many EU countries in integrating large Muslim minorities are going to make them especially wary of bringing in a very large Muslim country.

I've left the Middle East out of our discussion so far, but a very good tool for reaching out to countries in the region that embrace political and economic reform would be a reformed, modernized, rationalized OECD.

Q: Well, let's see, you were there for the election of George H.W. Bush and as you said the new secretary of state was Jim Baker, coming from the Treasury Department. Was there a question about your staying on at that transition or did you get your normal three years?

LAMB: After the election some of the new president's supporters, major contributors among them, were agitating to replace me. The information came from friends in the Department as well as press reports. I made some calls to people I knew in the Baker State Department in which I expressed my interest in serving out my full term and mentioned some of the initiatives underway that I thought could be brought to fruition if I remained in place. I also traveled to Washington in early 1989 to brief the incoming secretaries of the treasury (Nicholas Brady) and commerce (Robert Mosbacher), the USTR (Carla Hills), and the head of the council of economic advisers (Michael Boskin) on what the OECD could do for them.

Time passed, but I eventually received word from Under Secretary for Political Affairs Kimmitt (with whom I had tangled on Libya sanctions when he was at Treasury) that I would be kept in place.

Q: Okay, anything else you want to say about your time there? I think we've pretty well covered it.

LAMB: Ambassadors receive letters from the president telling them what their duties and responsibilities are as the president's representative in a country or to an international organization.

Q: And what their authority is.

LAMB: And what their authority is and where it doesn't run, i.e., to active military commands.

At the time, I had a navy captain working for me. He was the Pentagon's man in Paris on the CoCom delegation. He was getting back channel instructions from Defense that were at odds with the formal instructions we received in cables signed by the secretary of state. So I called the captain to my office, told him that he was acting contrary to my wishes, and asked him to read the presidential letter in my presence. Now military officers are, as they must be, very sensitive to the chain of command. When he absorbed the fact that the chain ran from the president to me to him, it brought tears of remorse to his eyes. He corrected his conduct immediately. I always wondered what one did with that letter and was pleased to have found a use for it.

Q: Yes, I don't think I ever pulled mine out, used chapter and verse although it was helpful sometimes, at least to remind people of the authority. You also noted that the OECD has become less political; we talked about that but now OECD ambassadors are political appointees. Should countries have ambassadors to the OECD at all anymore? You've talked I think a little bit about that. There had not been a political appointee as OECD representative before your time or had there been?

LAMB: There had been two. Bill Turner was ambassador when I was the desk officer. Herb Salzman succeeded Bill in the late Seventies.

Q: But with strong economic policy credentials, perhaps.

LAMB: Bill was a management consultant and Herb was a turnaround artist in the business world. His wife was a Broadway producer. Both were talented and both did a good job. There's no reason why political appointees cannot do well. However, the added value that political appointees can sometimes bring to the job -- proximity to the White House -- does not count for much at OECD.

Q: Who was your successor?

LAMB: My successor was Alan Larson.

Q: Career officer?

LAMB: Yes, Alan was a career officer. David Aaron, who had been a Foreign Service officer in his youth, succeeded him. He later went to work for Fritz Mondale and, as noted earlier, became Brzezinski's deputy on the national security council staff in the Carter administration. David was succeeded by Amy Bondurant, a lawyer with a congressional staff background. George W. Bush appointed Jeanne Philips, a leading political fundraiser from Texas. The current ambassador, Connie Morella, a former congresswoman from Maryland's DC suburbs, replaced her.

Q: Anything else you want to say about your time in Paris at the OECD?

LAMB: Perhaps a brief word on official entertaining would be in order. At the posts where I served as a senior officer, Brussels and Paris, my workday and workweek were shorter than they had been in Washington, but many evenings were taken up with social obligations. A certain discipline was observed, however. Social events were scheduled Monday through Thursday;

Friday nights and weekends were your own. In addition, no entertaining was done during the Christmas, Easter, and spring school holidays. In Paris, as in Brussels, Helen and I lived above the store in a quite comfortable suite of rooms. (Herb Salzman and his wife, Rita, had used their own money to install kitchenettes on the second and third floors of the residence. They had to quarter in a hotel while the work was done. The kitchenettes made the house much more livable for both our guests and us. Herb also funded a $5,000 annual award for “excellence in international economic performance” by a mid-grade FSO.)

We had two guest rooms and one or both were usually occupied by official visitors (except during the holidays and in August, when the OECD curtailed its meeting schedule). With help of Irene Corron, the social secretary she and I recruited, Helen managed the staff of five and planned and oversaw the execution of the events we hosted. All I had to do was show up and be ready to deliver a toast. I much preferred to do working lunches, but a certain number of dinners and cocktail parties had to be laid on. Because the OECD “circle” of ambassadors and senior members of the secretariat was limited, we reached out to the wider Paris community to liven up official functions.

Occasionally we ventured out into the wider world. I remember receiving an invitation from the mayor of Paris, Jacques Chirac, to attend a ceremony at which he would give the key to the city to Frank Sinatra. (Sinatra, Liza Minnelli, and Sammy Davis were in town for a concert.) When the “Caddie” pulled up under the portico of the Hotel de Ville, a flustered protocol officer, who addressed me as “Monsieur le chargé,” greeted Helen and me. I told him that I was not the embassy chargé, but he persisted. (I was told later that the real chargé had boycotted the event because he was not offered free tickets to the concert. I have no idea whether this was true.) We were escorted into a small reception room. I was presented to the mayor as “Le chargé d’affaires de l’ambassade des Etats-Unis.” Chirac introduced us to Frank, Liza, and Sammy. As it happened, I had been in Tokyo a week or two before and had seen the three of them perform in concert on television in my hotel room. So we had something to talk about. The brief encounter went smoothly. Then it was time to move to a larger room where the keys would be handed over. As we were trudging down a long hallway, I felt a hand on my shoulder. I looked around and heard a voice say, “Hi, I’m Greg Peck.” Made my day. My new friend “Greg” and I chatted amiably as Chirac droned on during the ceremony.

MARK C. LISSFELT
Deputy Chief of Mission
Paris (1987-1991)

Mark C. Lissfelt was born in Pennsylvania in 1932. He received his BA from Haverford College and his MALD from Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy in 1959. He served overseas in the U.S. Army from 1954 to 1956. His foreign posts included London, Tel Aviv, Bamako, Brussels, Bonn, Berlin and Paris. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on May 22, 1998

Q: So such a short time in such a great challenging job only means something bigger afterwards, and you got a call to go as DCM in Paris, or engineered that yourself, or how did that play out?

LISSFELT: Well, I don't think it related at all to the experience being responsible for Southern Europe. It just so happened that one day, for whatever reason, the DCM in Paris, Bill Barraclough, resigned from the Foreign Service. He had a non-career ambassador named Joe Rodgers, from Nashville, a big Republican fund-raising leader, very energetic, able guy, but not really very interested in foreign affairs. But he desperately wanted to replace Barraclough in five minutes, and he chased down Roz Ridgway somewhere at a meeting and said he needed 20 minutes on the phone with her and laid it out. First I knew of this was a phone call from the director general, George Vest, who'd known me over the years from my NATO connection and so forth, and with that wonderful question: Would you be willing to be among those considered for DCM in Paris? Well, I almost fell out of my chair. This came right out of the blue in the spring of 1987. I hadn't been seven months in the job and back home, just settling in, and I probably would have said no, except, "Paris," I said, "Let me check with my wife, but I'm favorably inclined." And Cindy was, too, as soon as she heard it was Paris, and though we had to pack up in less than a year home and get on our way, we did - we were about a year home - and took our youngest daughter with us for her senior year in high school at the American School in Paris.

I was one of two finalists for the job, and met with Joe Rodgers for an interview, when he did all the talking, a typical interview, you know. I hardly got a word in edgewise. One of the most interesting moments, though, was I knew he was a "born-again" Christian. He was one of several born-again Christians in the administration, and I wondered how he was going to deal with that question. And he started to get a little nervous and he danced around, and I thought to myself, Here it comes. Then he asked me bluntly, "Do you go to church?" It came out that abruptly, and I said, "Well, Mr. Ambassador, the truth is not very often." And he said, "Well, never mind. It's not important." He says, "You may know of my own..." And then he explained his own religious interests. I already knew of his own conversion, which really related to a near-fatal heart attack on the Athens tarmac when he was 40-some years old, which brought him face-to-face with his life, and he became a born-again Christian. Anyway, for whatever reason, I think my old friend Bill Bodde helped this decision. The other candidate Bodde described as having his own agenda, being a hard charger, and suggested to Joe Rodgers that since Joe Rodgers was a hard charger he didn't really want another hard charger down the hall from him. Rodgers saw the logic of that and in a week moment-

Q: That's the Tiger-Patsy-Tiger-Patsy school of management.

LISSFELT: I guess so. I never quite thought of it that way. I got the nod, to my great delight, and we prepared and off we went in the summer of 1987. After just a year home, we pulled up stakes from our house, which we dearly loved, in Falls Church, took our daughter from what would have been her senior year in high school and took her along with us - the other three siblings were by then in college or out of college - and off we went. Joe Rodgers charged me with two thoughts in the course of that interview. "If you come," he said, "I want you to prepare or lead the preparation of a good work annual scheme for work and responsibilities, goals and objectives, that's your sort of mission for the embassy. It will have to be a good one. And second to help me reduce the size of the staff." Well, I think we achieved the former, but we didn't do much to improve the latter.

But off we went, very excited after about a month or so of French review at FSI, which was useful, and moved into a wonderful official residence, which is still the official residence, on the Champ de Mars, the Eiffel Tower to one side and the Ecole Militaire on the other, complete with staff and a chauffeur and a driver, which was a great luxury - in Paris it's worth a million dollars - and settled in with a terrific embassy staff. You can imagine, the kind of people who get to Paris, by and large, are the crème de la crème from whatever agency, 48 U.S. government agencies, it turned out, we had there. That became my major preoccupation, really, sort of listening to them and presiding over their differences.

Q: Did you feel prepared by previous experience training to suddenly preside over that complex and far-flung-

LISSFELT: Well, I must say, I was perfectly relaxed at the prospect, although I knew that the people I supervised, the section chiefs, all outranked me, by the way. This disparity helped me get promoted after my first year on the job to minister-counselor, fortunately. At least I was on a par with them. But no, I wasn't intimidated by it. On reflection, I'm not sure why. I knew two people there very well. One was the third man in the embassy, the economic minister-counselor named Bill Edgar, who was a friend from Bonn and a wonderful guy and very supportive, full of good advice, very practical and sound, and the other one happened to be the defense attaché, this Colonel, now General, LaJoie, who knew me from Berlin. As a matter of fact, when Rodgers was making his decision, he asked me if I knew anybody at the embassy, and I said, "Well, I know these two guys. They know me from other incarnations." And I know that he called them, and I'm sure they said nice things. So that helped, plus a very experienced head of the political section named Peter Semler. I liked the administrative guy and we became very good friends in my time there, Bruce Clark. And the Consular Section was run by a good guy and replaced by even better people. So the whole thing was very congenial. Paris also had four constituent posts (Bordeaux, Lyons, Strasbourg, and Marseilles) which I didn't know much about, but I just decided to take it day by day with no preconceptions and to try and be reasonable and supportive of Joe Rodgers, who was there only two years of my four and succeeded by Walter Curley.

Q: Probably a rather different style...

LISSFELT: A very different style, a guy who'd been ambassador to Ireland under Jimmy Carter-

Q: And a New York financier with J. H. Whitney.

LISSFELT: -and very close to the Bush family. He'd been a roommate of Prescott Bush at Philips Andover Academy. He knew the family very well. He knew more about the family than they cared, but he was close to President Bush. Bush wanted a man in Paris who would work and be friendly with President Mitterrand.

It was a mutual relationship between Mitterrand and Bush ever since Bush got the job, as Vice President, to go to Paris and explain to Mitterrand why the U.S. government was so upset when Mitterrand formed his first government with four communists in it. Mitterrand told Bush in no uncertain terms that his long-term plan was to destroy the Communist Party, and he laid it out, what he intended to do, and convinced Bush. Bush went back a believer. And of course, Mitterrand did it, and they had a close relationship ever since.

By the way, Mitterrand and Rodgers had a very good - though they couldn't understand each other, couldn't speak one word - but Mitterrand respected what he'd heard of Rodgers, this self-made millionaire, a man who'd started with nothing and built his own business, Rodgers also made the U.S. government live up to commitments to France in series of phone calls across the Atlantic relating to a thing called the RITA system, a military communications system worth a billion dollars to the French manufacturers, which Ronald Reagan's administration pledged to buy till Margaret Thatcher got a hold of Ronnie and began to twist him and urge him, "Nah [No], don't do that. Take a British system which we're still developing." Rodgers heard about this and apparently went ballistic, over the international open phone lines. Obviously he was heard by the French government arguing for the United States to live up to its commitment - it endeared Rodgers to the French government! He was given the Légion d'honneur when he left, at the highest level that they can give to a foreigner, at the insistence of Mitterrand. Funny, these two men couldn't have been more different. But Curley came along-

Q: With a background in France and French.

LISSFELT: Who?

Q: Curley.

LISSFELT: Not so much, but he knew the French in funny ways, from China days, when he was out there in the Second World War an aide de camp for a while to Chiang Kai-Shek, in the Second Marine Division, and he knew all the French ambassador's family, the De Margerys. Robert De Margery was the ambassador in Washington, the son in the family Curley knew in China. Curley knew all the daughters, I think, rather intimately, judging by his winks. But Curley, it turned out, was a Pittsburgher, as am I. We raced, as soon as we heard of Curley's nomination, to the International Who's Who, looked him up, saw he was a Pittsburgher, and I waited and didn't say a thing. I was a chargé for seven months from December 1988 to June 1989, by the way, which was pretty exciting stuff at that embassy, with Chirac as the mayor of Paris and Rocard the Socialist prime minister. It was very interesting times, and when the phone rang I never knew whether - and Chirac called me sometimes from the United States, usually in high dudgeon ordering me to do something as if I were a French bureaucrat. Rocard was nicer and very cordial. So that was a great experience, the seven months' interlude. And then Curley was nominated and I waited until he passed the Senate and was named as U.S. ambassador to phone him and introduce myself. I'll never forget the conversation. I was in Paris and he was in New York. I called him to congratulate him. And his first question was, "Where are you from?" And I said, "Well, it so happens I'm from Pittsburgh." And he said after a long pause, "But that's where I'm from." And we really had a lot of chuckles over that. I think that helped me, but to make a long story short, he'd been advised by his predecessor not to accept, necessarily, the DCM in place, but to consider him along with other candidates whom the Department might put forward, and be free to choose his own man, in effect.

Q: Advised by his predecessor-

LISSFELT: Joe Rodgers, yes. Which was kind of a slap in the face to me, but never mind. Fortunately, the Office of Western Europe Affairs was run by Ed Casey, a wonderful guy and good friend, who said to Curley, "Okay, if you want to do that, we'll get a list together," and they started doing it. "But why don't you start with the guy in place, who is a kind of a benchmark, if you like." And I went back, went to Washington, went up to New York for an interview, went to Curley's office at Rockefeller Plaza. This doesn't have much to do with French relations, but it's very-

Q: It's very interesting.

LISSFELT: -to Rockefeller Plaza, and we went to lunch at the Racquet Club over on Park Avenue - I think it's Park Avenue - with him. He liked me because I liked oysters. We had oysters on the way in and we sat down and we talked, and we must have had a half an hour together, Mr. Ambassador and Mr. Lissfelt, and chitchat about Pittsburgh friends and cousins and "What about Pittsburgh?" and "What do you know?" and the Department and so forth. Half an hour into that conversation he reached out his hand across the table, "Let's do it. You be my DCM." The chemistry was immediately right and I believe remained so during our two years together.

Q: Ha, ha, ha. Great. That's great!

LISSFELT: That was during the first luncheon course. You don't know how I enjoyed that lunch.

Q: Oh, I'll bet.

LISSFELT: One of the first questions he had after lunch was the whole connection of the prayer breakfasts which his predecessor had organized as a born-again Christian. Apparently, every day, people (staff and others) would go to the ambassador's residence for prayer breakfasts, which he fostered and paid for. Joe Rodgers and his wife, Honey, very sweet people, both of them born-again Christians. And Curley had a letter from Mr. Rodgers recommending that he continue this practice. He handed me this letter, and he said, "What's your reaction to that?" I replied, "Oh, Mr. Ambassador, that's an entirely personal thing. That's entirely up to you. It certainly has nothing to do with your official responsibilities as American ambassador to Paris. He said, "Thank you." It was a great relief. He practically did everything but wipe his brow. The result: no more prayer breakfasts.

Anyway, that was the start of a wonderful relationship that doesn't usually exist between a political ambassador and a career deputy. And the Curleys Cindy and I count among our friends, and we established a relationship that we'd go off once a month. One would choose a restaurant and just the four of us would go off and chitchat about staff, about the Department, about life, about everything. And the Curleys became very open and good friends. I had mixed feelings about leaving at the end of his being there only two years, but I'd been there four, and you know what things are like. They're cyclical, and after a while you say, "Who needs another goals and objectives exercise for the Department?"

Q: But thinking back on it, you count yourself lucky to have two political ambassadors. That gave you, as the FSO DCM, more - you were more indispensable. Had you had career types it would have been less of a challenge, right?

LISSFELT: Perhaps. I saw all the advantages of having them. First of all, Rodgers could call the White House and would call the White House and go back and grab somebody by the throat on the White House staff until he could see the President if he got his dander up about something. And people did not mess around with Rodgers in his territory, you know. We used to have visits by Supreme Allied Commander-Europe, who didn't consider he was beholden, an American general, in any way to an American ambassador in Paris, but he came regularly to talk to the French military about their role, and he was very careful there. He always paid a call on Rodgers, very deferential, because Rodgers was a tiger on questions of turf. His rights and responsibilities. The closest thing to a reprimand I ever got from him was signing off on a cable to Jerry Bremer, who headed the terrorism office, saying we hoped that he found the ideas in this cable of interest and we of course would be interested to hear his in return, which we would give due consideration - something like that, something innocuous. But Rodgers thought I was entirely too deferential, since we knew best what would go in France, and told me not to forget it.

Walter Curley was very close to President Bush and wrote him notes all the time. He had a secret way of getting access to him. He put Bush's middle name at the bottom left corner of the envelope, "Walker," and it would be shown in to the President. These guys were note-writers. I think that New England prep school training must have had something to do with it. And he could call, and would call Brent Scowcroft or whomever - never bothered the President, that I'm aware of, rarely. But the possibility was there, and Mitterrand knew it. Curley was introduced to Mitterrand up at Kennebunkport, when Mitterrand came on a state visit, and Bush had him up there for a few days, and he had Curley come up, before he went to Paris, I think it was, and put his arm around him and said, "This is my old friend Walter, and I'm sending him to you, François, and he's got my ear." So Curley came so highly recommended. As it turned out, he didn't get very involved in policy, and seldom went near the foreign ministry. I seldom went near the foreign ministry - but more than he did - but the guys who were the counselors liked to work their contacts, and I would go occasionally to the political director, one of whom was totally inept, but the second one is now the second man in their foreign ministry - Bertrand Duforque is his name, very able guy.

Anyway, it was a great experience, but working with the French is never dull. But they agreed with us on more things than most people ever knew. For instance, in the terrorism field, we worked together splendidly. And when in 1991 it came time for the dust-up in the Middle East about Desert Storm and the preparations therefor, what very few people know is that when the U.S. requested the basing in France of air tankers to facilitate flying and refueling of planes, the French agreed right away to base them down near Toulouse in Southwest France, and they soon had an airfield loaded with great, big American tankers there. Now, most people don't know. They only know about their turndown on the request to overfly and to go hit Qadhafi in 1986, but we constantly made this pitch to people when they came through, everybody from Colin Powell to cabinet level people - Dick Thornburg, whom I'd known from Pittsburgh days - who was the Attorney General. There were more areas of agreements. We had our problems with the French, and you have to be careful with the French. You have to show them the courtesy of asking their opinion on things. Because they like to think they have good ideas and they often have. Some of them often said, "We're not always wrong, you know." I heard that first from the second man in the Foreign Ministry, to Newt Gingrich in a CODEL, who told him, "You know, Mr. Gingrich, the French are not always wrong." And everybody chuckled, but you know, there is a message. But they could be difficult. One of the best contacts, by the way, was Peter Semler's, at the Elysée is the current foreign minister, Hubert Vedrine. His father had been a one-time colleague of Mitterrand. Mitterrand was devoted to Vedrine the young boy, who was the spokesman at the Elysée Palace and now, as a socialist, has been brought back to be the foreign minister, about a year ago, a very able, very nice guy. He spoke rather good English.

Q: Well, Mark, I'm having trouble picturing your day. There you're sitting at the top of this giant edifice, the embassy in Paris, you're trying to supervise, you said, 48 U.S. agencies that are producing a mound of daily reports in all channels. You are receiving probably more visitors to Paris of a high level that need care and feeding than most other posts, maybe any other posts? How can you manage that and feel on top of it?

LISSFELT: Well, the day you feel on top of it is the day you're out of touch. But first of all, you get to know, I got to know, right away the subordinates, and knew whom I had to watch and whom I could trust without a question. I had complete faith in Bill Edgar and his successor, and a key part of the whole economic side of things, complete faith in the commercial attaché, a very good guy out of the commerce department, same thing in the consular area. Peter Semler had a very good bunch of people in the Political Section. Sometimes they'd write some goofy cables that you had to watch out for, every once in a while, but not often. By and large, we had this team that was very reliable and very solid. My biggest problems probably came with the successor defense attaché, an admiral in the navy who had come right from working for the Secretary of the Navy and had been promised an aircraft carrier group when he left Paris (which he went on to get). He was a super-activist guy. He was the son of a Foreign Service officer who spoke very good French because he'd gone to French [schools] as a kid, in France with his family, and he quickly established close relations with Mitterrand's military advisor, who happened to be a navy admiral too, and there was stuff going back and forth there that I don't know the half of, I'm sure. Some of it shouldn't have been passed at all. Some of it was State Department traffic. We know that for a fact, because they blew up over a few of them and wiped them in our faces, but I did save him on one occasion around the time of the Gulf War. We were sharing with the French, Mitterrand, at the highest level, satellite and overhead photography. It was being sent to the embassy, and this guy was putting it together in satchels and taking it over to the military attaché and going in to brief the President and showing him these targets and so forth. And I asked him, I said, "Phil, let me see what you're taking?" And sure, fine, he came down with the valise and opened it up (I had the right security clearances and could look at it.). It turned out to be something totally unrelated. It was the wrong set of photographs, and I looked at it, and I said, "Wait a minute, Phil. This has nothing to do with what they're interested in." I don't know what it was, but it's absolutely irrelevant. "You can't go in and show it to the President of the Republic." And he was just aghast, and I'd saved him from a huge gaffe. And he raced upstairs and got the right stuff, and off he went. But I'll never forget that, so I always felt that I'd done him a favor on that score. But he was very active and considered himself a political-military officer and, really, I think, certain days thought he had my job. These were the days of classified faxes entering the scene too, so written communications were going back and forth in a classified channel between Washington and the embassy which I had no knowledge of, between all agencies and their home offices.

Q: Were your days foreseeable? You must have been jerked about by visitors, filling in for the ambassador here and there, entertaining, all these things..

LISSFELT: They were foreseeable, barring a crisis. The first thing I did was look at the overnight cable traffic and see whether certain instructions were out there, most of which the Political Section had long since read, or the economic, section and were on top of, but I just had to be sure of that. My major concern was the staff meeting with the ambassador which we had almost every day and being sure people knew what he wanted and watching out that nobody was getting at cross-purposes with him. But I went home for lunch most days and, when there were visitors in town or whatever, did a certain amount of entertaining at home (we had a wonderful chef) and most usefully on behalf of other embassy officers who wanted to impress their contacts and get their contacts out for some nice event and not in a restaurant. So there was a certain amount of that.

The evening stuff I picked and chose among myriad possibilities. I did not slavishly accept every diplomatic invitation that came along. I decided right when I first arrived, the calls that I made were limited to allies, the NATO Alliance, and I also called on the Egyptian because he called on me and one or two others, but I picked and chose there. I just wasn't going to go off - I wasn't interested in it, and it was too fatiguing and often a big waste of time. I did go to many of their national day receptions, if for no other reason, to see the facilities in which they worked. It was fascinating to see some of the old palaces and so forth in Paris.

There were a lot of things that came my way that the ambassador didn't want to do. Relations with the whole Cincinnati Society headquartered in Paris, which meant a couple of annual dinners and things like that. That's okay. And a lot to do with the American community and the American Chamber of Commerce whose president was one of my good friends, John Crawford, who lived right across the street from me. He's a wonderful guy. And a lawyer in Paris, so there's a certain involvement there, but generally you got a schedule of events, and you went in each day and asked "We're still here?" "Yes, we're still here" was the constant reply.

But we had certain real concerns about security in Paris, by the way. People can't grasp that, but there is a huge Mediterranean and Northern African population in and around Paris. People were very worried about Palestinian terrorists, about Qadhafi, because of the proximity, not so far away, across the Mediterranean. And there were scares, and we had to spend time briefing embassy staff. Spouses and families were brought in. There were a whole series of world events when things would heat up, and you had to try and maintain a modicum of reasonableness about protecting the embassy.

One thing I instituted there was the first fire drill they had in the embassy in the time anybody could remember. We learned in that fire drill that because of the security measures and the placing of steel plates across windows and barring the windows, there was only one door out which people were going to go. Six hundred people in that building were going to go out the front door of that building, which was as wide as this table. And that was rather scary. The weirdest thing on the security front was when somebody went up a building adjacent to us, right up to the top floor, went across the gutters on the top, climbed over onto our roof. First thing I knew, I was sitting in my office and there were papers fluttering down the front of the embassy. It turned out that this guy, who was a publicity hound, had arranged to have television out front filming all this, came and sat on the balustrade above the ambassador's office, one floor up, throwing these copies of his poetry off the roof. He had done the same thing in Marseilles and was known. But it was obvious to us: somebody could have come up there, come across that roof and shot us or thrown a bomb right in. So we had to build a special little memorial fence up on the roof for that.

Q: It's such a big embassy, Paris isn't necessarily an easy place for the junior officer. Were you able to have a watching, mothering brief with that whole pack?

LISSFELT: Well, I did, and there were, oh, I don't know, if you added up the CIA contingent and some of the other agencies, we had at least 30 people whom you could call junior officers. I tried to get them to organize themselves (and they did better with some people than others) and had them out to the house for at least an evening occasion. It started with a bull session, which turned out to be pretty stale, and then we had them out for a spaghetti dinner when they could bring their young French contacts. That was okay. Some of them had French contacts. I was always available to them, and I took interest in the embassy's language program, too. One junior officer came in and complained to me that it was dead, and I hadn't paid attention to it, and he helped me revive it. But they knew I was supportive in onward assignments questions and reviewing statements for any of their work, and I really paid a lot of attention to how they were supervised.

I had huge numbers of efficiency reports to write, as well as ratings on many of the people from other agencies. And ones that the ambassador should have written himself but he had me write and that he would sign, for instance, on that same defense attaché, who was quite a handful. But I gave him high marks. I did it one year and the next year I said to the ambassador, that's one I can't do. And Curley said, "Come on, just do it." So I did it - but grudgingly. That's a big occupant of your time, too.

There was a lot of stuff that had to do with internal organization and working with other agencies, and when all the time their visitors came and you had to see their official visitors from Washington and you had to keep an eye on them you had to try and bring them along with the rest of embassy policy. You had to know when to ignore them and leave them to their own devices. We had a whole building full of what we called "the cops," you know. We had the FBI; we had the Secret Service; we had DEA - all in one building separate from the embassy compound.

Q: You probably managed by "cluster," by justice cluster, intelligence cluster-

LISSFELT: I didn't manage them as much as maybe I should have, but--I know--more than they wanted. I got to know their chiefs, and my door was always open to them. I paid a call on them in their offices to see where they were located. It was outside the building. And I kept touch with the important ones. The DEA chief was a very responsible guy who helped us with our drug problem at the American school there, which is another entity outside Paris that we were kind of responsible for, although we contributed very little to it, in terms of money. And the CIA. I haven't mentioned the CIA, which was a huge presence, is a huge presence, not only official in the embassy, but in France. I got on well with the two station chiefs that were there. One of them is still a very good friend here in the Boston area, Chuck Cogan, who came back and did his Ph.D. under Stanley Hoffmann at Harvard University and wrote his thesis on DeGaulle in French. He was a very able guy. But I never kidded myself that they told me everything that was going on.

The most difficult chores I had to do in my memory related to personnel matters in Paris. Two of them related to French employees, one an assistant protocol officer, a woman, who, it turned out, had been dumped on the embassy by USIA, where she had given very bad service (USIS I guess it's called overseas), and was rude to me and to my wife. She was supposed to support me and my wife. It took us a year, counseling her, and lining up written complaints against her service before, under French law, we could fire her without having a lawsuit on our hands.

The other one was much more serious and was the assistant to the legendary Johnny Berg, the head of the travel office in Paris, who, it turned out, this rather flamboyant woman, was working for us and for French intelligence. Now she didn't have access to classified information, but she certainly saw every visitor or knew of every visitor and CODEL and submitted regularly the visitors list to French authorities, which gave them, we know, targets for the operations which they were famous for carrying out in hotel rooms, rifling people's baggage, and attaché cases. So it came to the point where we had to issue warnings, anybody coming to France, not to leave any classified, important, information unguarded in their hotel rooms or wherever. But it was a hairy experience to get this woman, whom we, to make a long story short, confronted at the same time investigators who came from Washington to do this confronted her daughter, who worked for the OECD - I think it was OECD, maybe it was for COCOM - as an auditor, financial person. And when they confronted the daughter, she broke down and confessed that finally she had the chance to unburden herself of something she'd known for years, the perfidy of her mother. The interrogator called me over to the one who was talking to her mother and told him, so they could play these two off, and in fact got the woman to resign and leave. Fortunately, it turned out very well. It could have been a sticky thing, because she was very good friends with a lot of people on Capitol Hill whom she had helped on hundreds of CODEL visits to Paris. She had a lot of friends, and letters from Strom Thurmond and many other distinguished American congressmen and senators. We got her to go away, and never made a stink until, later, she did go public and the French government later gave her a job working for the French national industry Renault automobile. But this was a person right in our midst for years, and we were glad to see the back of her head leaving the embassy.

Q: Mark, I've watched the voice power meter as you've been speaking about France and it's been much higher than in the earlier sections of your career. I assume this was probably the post that excited you most, the one that you felt your greatest challenge and contribution.

LISSFELT: Yes, when anyone asks me what was my favorite post in the Foreign Service - same thing with my wife - we always say we had two favorites: one of them early in our career was Tel Aviv, for a lot of different reasons related to the age of our children, the climate and so forth, after being in London, but certainly Paris was the high point, in what I consider to be the best job the Foreign Service has to offer, almost barring any, to a career person. We enjoyed it, worked hard, Cindy established good relations with many French people, and certainly enjoyed the professionalism of our staff and the work aspect which certainly was, day in and day out, considered to be important. Again, I keep coming back to that, but that's what makes all the difference in the world, when you're pushing the papers and doing the work, to have some feeling that it relates to something important.

Q: It's a job, certainly, that's its own reward. In years past it was also a platform to ambassadorships. Going through it you probably felt it was its own reward.

LISSFELT: Well, I did, and I still do. It's alumni have a very uneven record, what happens to people after a job like that or the DCM in Bonn, for that matter, or other places. Back in Washington and in the bowels of Personnel, certainly, you are considered to have had your reward in this life, and if you come back thinking that, like many of our European friends, you step right from that DCM job to a good embassy job somewhere around the world - my colleagues, the British and the Canadian, particularly close colleagues, did just that - forget it. Very seldom happened. Jack Maresca did get the title of ambassador, but he didn't go on to be ambassador. The current ambassador in Bulgaria, Avis Bohlen, succeeded me, and with all her talents had, I think it's frank to say, certain other advantages working on her behalf as well, although I always told Walter Curley, when he asked me who should succeed me (I didn't want to get involved in that), that of all the candidates that I knew of, she was far and away the most qualified, and she did a great job. But that was the exception to the rule, I think. Chris Chapman retired. Sam Gammon, I think, went as ambassador to Mauritius, but more and more it's "You'd better be satisfied with that as your reward," although I did leave it, coming back and while there, doing a certain amount of lobbying and inquiring to find what was coming up. And I was called by personnel to be put on as filler, later, on new lists for various jobs, for example, the ambassador to Romania, for whom I knew they already had a candidate, whom I'd met before. He went there, in fact, and four years later died of cancer, in the saddle, as a matter of fact, as I recall.

So I decided that four years would be enough. My wife agreed entirely, although I think if we'd gone to Curley and asked to stay on, he would have said, "Yes, stay as long as I'm here." That's a presumption on my part, but I think it's well founded. We decided that four years, the cycle, as I said earlier, even in Paris, is repetitive in a certain way, and it's time to do something else. And we wanted to come back home. Again I began to hope that the phone would ring, maybe, with an offer back in Washington, when it was known that that was my desire. When I had been on home leave, I went in to meet the new director general and his deputy, whom I didn't know at all, succeeded George Vest and Bill Swing, Ed Perkins and Larry Williamson, respectively.

I had a very startling experience with Perkins. He was new to the job, and I got talking to him about my future, and he told me, first of all, he said, "You know, Mr. Lissfelt, your extension there in Paris was very controversial" (to stay on an additional two years), and I said, "No, I never heard that at all. I thought, in fact, I helped the Department solve a problem with a new political ambassador." And he shook his finger in my face. He said, "Mr. Lissfelt" - and I'll never forget this - he says, "Don't you get greedy. We try to turn those jobs over." Then he perhaps felt bad about what he'd said - I was so shocked, I was mad - and he said, "Now we do try to give people who come out of these responsible jobs and do well another responsible job, to be sure... " blah, blah, blah. But nothing ever came of that, and I found myself, as the fourth year was winding down, with no specific prospect, except to leave in the summer of 1991, it would be, and come back as just another supernumerary senior officer in the Department, walking the halls with, then, 30 or 40 others like that, and I could not face that prospect, so I began to look for something specific, which is when I heard that at FSI - which kind of attracted me, because I knew they were going to move from the old incarnation to the new campus, where they are now, at this wonderful location out there in Arlington, it could be interesting to be part of that. The deanship for the biggest part of the school, the language school, came open when Mary Ryan, who was to go to that job, suddenly was asked to be a deputy assistant secretary of the European Bureau, opening the job. I called Brandon Grove, the director of the Institute, whom I'd known from my first job in the Foreign Service. He said, "You're my candidate." It happened almost that fast. And back I came and started in August. I had this great big organization teaching sixty-some languages, $9 million budget, and helping them prepare for the move two years later to the new campus, where we all lived happily ever after.

JOHN HURD WILLETT
Deputy Political Counselor
Paris (1987-1991)

Consul General
Strasbourg (1991-1992)

John H. Willett was born in Massachusetts in 1941 and received his BA from Kenyon College in 1941. His career has included assignments in Gaborone, Tunis, Bordeaux, Paris, Rome, Strasbourg and Rabat. Richard Jackson interviewed Mr. Willett on December 21, 1998.

Q: So on that note, in early '88 you headed back to Paris.

WILLETT: Yes, that was a real battle. I and a friend of mine, Dean Curran, then working for Armacost up on the Seventh Floor, were both vying for the job. I'd been promoted to FSO1. I was eligible. The deputy political counselor job was opening up in the Paris Political Section; it's an important, challenging job, and I really wanted it. Though there may have been many other officers more deserving than I (because my posts added up to quite something when you look down the list at them), I felt nobody was more qualified. So Dean and I got into a figurative slugfest on this. He had Armacost on his side; I had Hank Cohen on mine. Hank was in the Director General's office.

Q: Perhaps he was the head of Personnel?

WILLETT: I really wanted that job! I arrived in Paris in January 1987 and moved into the flat we're still in. Chantal followed shortly thereafter with our firstborn son, and I felt everything was in front of me. I'd been recently promoted. I'd secured the job I wanted in a city I knew well. I felt certain I'd do a crackerjack job. Chantal found work in a bank and we plunged in. I didn't give a second's thought to the morrow. I didn't want to focus on what would happen. I said to myself, "If you start thinking about what you'll be doing in the summer of 1991 when this job runs out, you're going to go crazy."

For the first time, I had real executive authority over a number of American diplomats; I could motivate a team and get them doing things. In addition I had the confidence of the front office and the political counselor. Who was the political counselor at the time? Kim Pendleton, no, before Kim it was Peter Semler. I was given a lot of leeway to mold things, craft them as I saw fit. I thought the Political Section had good esprit de corps and I flattered myself with being in part responsible for it. There I was in at a fairly high policymaking level, brought into a number of the Ambassador's meetings, etc.

Q: The Ambassador being Joe Rodgers, a political appointee from Tennessee, and the DCM Mark Lissfelt?

WILLETT: Then Rodgers was replaced by...

Q: By Walter Curley from New York, who had been Ambassador in Dublin, I believe.

WILLETT: Right. I was not so close to Rodgers, who incarnated what many French think of as "American."

Q: So they were reassured by a Tennessee appointee, without French, I understand.

WILLETT: Right, no French, which, of course, turned people like me into interpreters, a job we sometimes resented, but -- what the heck -- that goes with the work.

One of the highlights of this time for me in the Political Section was the CSCE Paris summit in, what, 1988, 1989? I volunteered for, and was appointed, control officer for that event. And control officer in a Class I embassy for a Presidential visit is really something! You hold meetings with a 120 people, you have a "third baggage handler," a this and a that.

Q: It was by then President Bush.

WILLETT: Exactly. "Preadvance teams" and "preadvance teams" blow into town, and you're running all over the place. There isn't a great deal of substance, except when you get down to writing the briefing papers, those little one page jobs, wherein the creation of the world is summed up in 30 lines. It's a good exercise in brevity.

We all really worked for those three days with George Bush. I rode in the car with him to a dinner Mitterrand hosted at Versailles. As he was leaving for Washington Bush said to me, "Good job, John," which became a joke in POL. If ever something went wrong, someone would say, "Bad job, John."

Q: George Bush had cultivated Mitterrand, had had him informally for a week at Kennebunkport. Surprisingly, the chemistry between those two was good. Was that your observations?

WILLETT: Well, I'm not sure the personal chemistry was that good, but Bush went out of his way to ensure a close relationship. On his side Mitterrand, a pretty conniving guy, also walked the extra mile. I remember two things about Kennebunkport visit. One, I knew that President Mitterrand liked wearing cardigan sweaters, and when the White House said, "What would be an appropriate gift?" I suggested giving him an L.L. Bean Kennebunkport sweater, which they did. It was placed on Mitterrand's bed in Kennebunkport. During the consultations with the Elysée to set up the Maine meeting, I had called to ask Madame Mitterrand's chief of staff, very frankly □□ whether she and the President shared a double bed or whatever. Rather a personal question, but the Bush place in Kennebunkport is not all that big. The woman at the palace frigidly responded that President and Mrs. Mitterrand never shared a bed. I said, well, okay, we'll keep that in mind. And it was dutifully done: twin beds were installed in Kennebunkport.

I found it interesting to observe how the highest level works and thinks. I met Brent Scowcroft and that terrible man Sununu. I met again Joe Verner Reed, whom I knew from my days at USUN. He'd become head of protocol.

Q: This was the CSCE summit, or Kennebunkport?

WILLETT: CSCE. I beg your pardon. This was all here in Paris. I didn't go to Kennebunkport.

Q: Walter Curley had not yet come to Paris, but George Bush introduced him there to Mitterrand as an old friend and a future ambassador designate with whom he, Mitterrand, could deal. Walter Curley viewed that as the best precedent he could have starting out here.

WILLETT: You're right. Joe Rodgers was still on board then. But there was also a visit to someplace in Florida. Mitterrand had gone to Mexico, I believe, and then stopped off for a day or two in Florida. After that visit an article appeared in Time, on the page they used to entitle "People." There were 20 lines speculating that the French President had cancer. This was around 1990.

Q: Yes, definitely.

WILLETT: Something like that.

Q: At that time, Walter Curley -- already here and charged with ascertaining the facts of Mitterrand's health before that Florida visit -- called on Mitterrand and considered him to be in fine health. But when he arrived in Florida he was not doing so well.

WILLETT: He was not doing so well. He had the kind of puffiness that people on cortisone often acquire. And along comes this article speculating that he had cancer, which, of course, he did.

Shortly thereafter I went to one of these political think tank meetings that abound in Paris, at the Sorbonne. Former Foreign Minister Michel Jobert was talking to a room of 200 people, a small room, filled with his coterie. He said, in essence, "This is typical of the CIA at work, planting a rumor that our president has cancer expressly to weaken the French presidency and thereby undermine France as a European power." He extrapolated from this article. When I raised my hand to respond, identifying myself as the deputy political counselor of the U.S. Embassy...

Q: Identifying yourself as that?

WILLETT: Absolutely, and as first secretary, whatever. I said to Jobert that American journalists were obsessed with the health of public figures, obsessed, and that the American public adored reading about the ill health of its leaders. They considered this part and parcel of their "right to know," and consequently this little Time piece should not be considered some sort of nefarious plot on the part of the CIA. I did add, rather undiplomatically, that I felt Jobert's comments were unfortunate, because his anti- Americanism, or the rumors about his anti-Americanism, would be more given more currency by this kind of speculation.

He went bananas, treating me to a vitriolic ad hominem attack. "How is it possible for the Americans to send such naïve people abroad to represent their country? How can you sit there, young man, and tell me the CIA was not behind this? Don't you know what your own government is doing? Haven't you any idea?" I had to take it because I was a first secretary on assignment in the country for which Jobert had been foreign minister. Had I responded in kind, I would have found myself in real trouble. When, after this attack, I tried simply to reiterate my point that American journalists closely followed and reported on the health of political leaders, the chairman of the meeting refused me the floor. An embarrassing moment for me, that much I remember. Michel Jobert lives nearby. I sometimes see him on the street.

Q: Well, were there other issues that were particular highlights? This was a time of many issues between the U.S. and France, and as deputy section chief you had quite a large field.

WILLETT: Yes, but I had a good team, good officers in the section. Some were young, some not so young, but they all knew they had important work to do. It was a specialized section, as I mentioned yesterday. One officer doing the Middle East. One doing Latin American. One doing Asia. Four people doing internal politics, etc., etc. This is before the big personnel slashes of the last few years.

Q: How did you and Kim Pendleton, the political counselor, divide, and how was that as a working relationship?

WILLETT: I had my own bailiwicks that I carved out for myself with Kim's accord, and Kim was content to leave the day-to-day management of the section in my hands. Of course, he wanted, and rightly, to chop on any policy cables, to decide what should go to the front office. He counted on my using good judgment as to whose name went on the approval line: his, mine, the DCM's or the Ambassador's. After working in the section for a few months, I had a pretty good idea how high up a cable needed to go. Kim or I could approve routine reporting on Middle East issues, but if we got into U.S. policy at a higher level, it might have to go to the DCM. Or if the Ambassador had been involved in the issue in any way, if it tied into a demarche previously been made by him, then of course, he was the one who chopped off.

Ambassador Curley, was an activist, and most competent in carrying out demarches. Once he went over and made nine demarches to the acting Foreign Minister, one after another, all of them perfectly. I accompanied him on that meeting and wrote up the subsequent reporting. He said everything exactly as instructed. And he was generous with his table. The Internal Political Unit would propose a lunch with a political leader, and he'd say, "Sure, let's do it." He opened the residence up to families, kids, Christmas parties -- whatever. In that sense he was exceptional. Furthermore, his office was accessible. You could go in to see one of his staffers and say, "Look, something bothers me about what's happening in this section or that section of the Embassy, and I want to talk to the Ambassador." You could do it.

Q: Mark Lissfelt was an encouraging, laid-back kind of a manager. They had good relations, the Embassy seemed to click over pretty well?

WILLETT: Yes, it did. Mark left all the running around to other people. He would go through his cubic foot of cables each morning. He would make sure the paper was moving, and he would jog people now and then with a handwritten note or a phone call "Where's this? Where's that?" One knew somebody was up front keeping an eye on things. He was not the sort of DCM who never gets over being a political officer. He left the job of political reporting up to the Political Section, and economic reporting up to the Economic Section. He didn't do much reporting on his own or go out and seek contacts. He ran the Embassy, the principal task of a DCM.

Q: It's a full-time job.

WILLETT: It's a full-time job in an embassy of -- what, 900 people? A thousand? I don't know. Walter Curley counted on him to run the Embassy.

Q: You had a look or perspective on the Embassy separated by about a decade. Notice any changes? Morale better, worse, the same? Always difficult in such a big place? Or what do you think?

WILLETT: Morale is always difficult in these big embassies. As regards Paris, I don't think the American compound out at Neuilly is a good idea. Americans are clumped together in apartment buildings, seeing no French, living a transported American life, doing all their shopping at the commissary. The "wild life" is going out together once a week to dinner in the Latin Quarter; that's the extent of their insertion into Parisian life. If I had any recommendation to make to the Embassy in Paris or to the Department, I'd say to FBO, "Get rid of Neuilly. Let people who come to Paris pick out their own housing if they can, or give them an option." Since I knew a lot of the secretaries and officers had to live out in Neuilly, on my second tour I arranged things beforehand. I said, "I refuse to live in Neuilly. I can't do my political job out there. I can't invite contacts to a Neuilly apartment building. They're not going to come. It's got to be an accessible apartment, where they can arrive at 8:30 at night and not be exhausted." They let me do it. You know, they give you the maximum housing allowance, and you rent an apartment in that range. Things worked out fine.

Q: But between '77, when you first left Paris, and '91, when you next left Paris, had the world of the Embassy changed -- in the sense that you now had 24 hour CNN, you had Internet, you had information all around you? Was the political reporting function as important as it was before? Had it changed?

WILLETT: I did not notice a change in the political reporting, although my focus was on a broader spectrum. I had to pay attention to more issues. When I was in the internal unit, by definition, I was focused on French domestic affairs. When I was deputy political counselor, I had not only to include domestic political affairs in my area of focus, but the whole shmeat. Even some of the political-military cables were cleared with the deputy political counselor. I didn't notice that CNN made any particular difference in our work, though I might be misleading myself on that. For example, the Iraq mess. Everybody was away on holiday when Baghdad invaded Kuwait in the summer of 1991, so a large share of the reporting burden from Paris fell on my shoulders. There were only a couple of us left in the Political Section to do a tremendous amount of work.

Six months later, during Desert Storm, I became - principally by dint of speaking good French and with Ambassador's Curley consent - a kind of "talking head" for the Embassy on French TV and French radio, explaining U.S. policy. I appeared on Patrick Poivre d'Arvor's television program, and on the radio. I was interviewed. Old friends I hadn't seen in 25 years called up saying they'd seen me on the tube. Of course we won, which made the task easy. Everybody loves a winner. In one debate former president Gemayel of Lebanon, a man from the PLO, an Israeli and I debated the situation.

People were impressed by the technology of U.S. destructive power, you know, films of laser guided smart bombs zipping through a particular pre-selected window. So to get back to your question, I'd say those CNN tapes did bestow a certain aura on U.S. military technology, and in fact tempered reactions, in France at least, to the U.S.-led assault. A far different cry from what's happened today, where most people in France, including the French Government, are dead set against the December strike on Baghdad that President Clinton ordered.

Q: But, John, the French had been very reluctant in the mid '80's to allow landing or refueling for the raid on Tripoli, and the U.S. coming into the Gulf War coalition, one couldn't take the French for granted. It was a lot of coalition building. France came into it, of course, but the French forces were somewhat separate from the British and American. You must have been in the thick of that diplomacy, which had very high stakes indeed.

WILLETT: Yes, high stakes, and the U.S. was glad just to get the French participating in some way.

Q: President Bush was undoubtedly on the horn directly to Mitterrand to make it possible.

WILLETT: We reminded the French at the time of what you just raised: the GOF refusal to let the warplanes attacking Tripoli overfly French territory, forcing them to make a lengthy roundabout through the Straits of Gibraltar. We reminded them of that and said, "Look, this should not happen again." It was in part handled via discreet contacts with the French minister of defense.

Q: Did he not resign, Chevènement, because France joined Desert Storm? I recall a contretemps and the defense minister was replaced as a result of that.

WILLETT: Right. Today Chevènement is back in the French government. He had a serious stroke, and it wasn't certain whether he'd be able to reassume his job. The problem with Chevènement from the American point of view is that the man is pro-Iraqi, a former President of the French-Iraqi Friendship Group in the Chamber of Deputies, which makes it difficult for us to deal with him on the Iraqi question. I don't believe he's particularly well disposed towards the United States, the case of many officials in this country.

Perhaps I'll just take a second here to say that Gaullism in France today is not a reflection of General de Gaulle's attitude. Rather de Gaulle's attitude incarnated the sentiments, then and now, of many ranking French bureaucrats and a certain segment of the population. He simply personified a point of view that already existed, that still exists: namely, that the United States constitutes a threat, that it's taking over the world, not with arms but through economic might, "cultural imperialism," etc. The GOF can't abide that. On the other hand, it's convinced the United States is biting its nails to the quick over the Euro or the advent of the Community, the future and power of the EC, that we're anxious over waxing EC power.

Q: John, before we get too far into Morocco, you might deal a little bit with Strasbourg, with being Consul General. That's the seat of the European Parliament. A previous consul general - was it Robert Hormats - had been target of an assassination attempt in Strasbourg, was it not? In brief, how was your nine months there? What were the highlights? What was it like to be Monsieur le Consul Général?

WILLETT: I had a reporting job to do there, a straightforward reporting job, and that was the Council of Europe. Catherine Lalumière, then secretary general of the Council of Europe, came to have confidence in me. The U.S. is not a member of the COE, but we had observer status. We could hang around certain meetings. In addition I dealt with the mayor of Strasbourg, a high-profile woman named Catherine Trautmann, now minister of information in the current Jospin government. I greatly enjoyed talking with this cultivated lady, and I've kept the medal she gave me when I left town.. She has a degree in Protestant theology, and she told me she 'd written her thesis on Mary Magdalen. I said, "Oh, Mary Magdalen," and she said, "Yes, but not the one you think." Apparently somewhere in the Bible there's another Mary Magdalen.

I might mention that reporting out of Strasbourg was a bit cumbersome, because you had to be your own communicator.

Q: You had some staff in the consulate?

WILLETT: Oh, yes, there was a staff of eleven locals.

Q: So you were the only American.

WILLETT: The only one.

Q: Strictly reporting, not carrying out demarches or trying to influence, or did you do some of that?

WILLETT: Yes. I'd go see the Secretary General of the Council of Europe or her senior staff. In their crazy system, the European Parliament trucks all its files over from Brussels every two weeks and holds meetings in Strasbourg. When the two weeks end, they truck everything back. This is because the French refuse to concede that Strasbourg not be a seat of the European Parliament. It has nothing to do with the Council of Europe. The EC Parliament still sits two weeks of every month in Strasbourg. A nutty situation, but I can't imagine the French would alter their position.

For communications I'd have to go in a little safe-room with a computer I barely understood and send classified cables over the phone line, kind of classified e-mail. I never really got it right, and my year there was frustrating in one sense because of the communications problems. A couple of times professional communicators came over from Germany to help me with the machinery. Despite these problems, I still managed to draft some worthwhile messages.

Besides, there were interesting outside events. Dick Walters, whom I'd worked with at various times, came up once, and we had a good weekend.

Q: What would bring him there?

WILLETT: I can't remember exactly. A meeting with European politicians and diplomats...?

Q: Target of opportunity? The people were there that he needed to see about something?

WILLETT: Something like that. He gave a talk while there, but not in his capacity as ex-CIA or perm rep to the UN or anything. And since there are a lot of American companies in Strasbourg, I made sure to become active in the Strasbourg chapter of the American Chamber of Commerce, once arranging a lunch with mayor Trautmann as guest speaker.

The city itself is unimaginably beautiful, a pleasant place to live. The CG's official residence is a historic place, very grandiose, lovely grounds, statues and walks, but I thought it would be too much to live there. Since the assignment was so brief, I chose to live in the apartment over the Consulate. It would have been ridiculously expensive to keep that huge residence up and running with a full staff for one person who lived in it only five days a week. I did my entertaining in the Consulate proper or in restaurants.

The most dramatic event of my short assignment was the farmers' demonstration against U.S. agricultural policy. I got permission from Paris (who checked with the Department) to allow riot police into the Consulate. We had to close down for the day, lower the shutters, whatever. The outside walls were splattered with eggs and tomatoes, but otherwise there wasn't much damage. At one point the demonstrators wanted me to come out and accept a petition. I said to the head policeman on duty, "Let me go out and take their petition. I think I ought to do it." He advised against it, and I felt that since they were on hand to protect me, I ought to follow the advice. But I kind of regretted it; I should have gone out and accepted that petition. It turned up in the mail next day.

I remember, too, the trade fair in Nancy, with its American theme. U.S. products were on display, and all these American cowboys showed up. I was invited as a guest speaker, and Chantal came with our two boys.

My duties also included speaking at American cemeteries, before those endless rows of white crosses. The people in the Alsace and Lorraine départements are generally pro- American, which is unusual in France. There was even a parade of American World War II army vehicles, jeeps and halftracks and things, passing by with American flags waving in the breeze.

INTS M. SILINS
Consul General
Strasbourg (1989-1990)

Ambassador Silins was born in Latvia and raised in Latvia and Maryland. He was educated at Princeton and Harvard Universities. He entered the Foreign Service in 1969 and served abroad in Saigon, Duc Thanh (Vietnam), Bucharest, Stockholm, Port au Prince, Leningrad and Strasbourg. In 1990 he was appointed United States Representative to the Baltic States, resident in Riga, Latvia, and from 1992 to 1995, he served as United States Ambassador to Latvia. He also had several tours of duty at the Department of State in Washington, D.C. Ambassador Silins was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1998.

Q: Well then, in Strasbourg... It was the European Union when you went there, or was it still the European Community?

SILINS: First of all, the organization that I was to work with was not the European Community, as it was called then, but the Council of Europe. And the parliamentary body I would be in touch with was not the European Parliament, which was the legislative side of the European Community, but the similar-sounding Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe. But the similarities and seeming overlap of the two organizations and their sub-units quickly lead to eye-watering confusion!

Only a handful of specialists had any idea what the Council of Europe was. It was not the European Community; it's a separate organization. And it had a larger membership – more countries – than what is now called the European Union. It's more inclusive but it doesn't assert, as the European Union does, supranational rights over its members. It operates on the basis of conventions, treaties and agreements covering important areas. Some of these are technical, such as standards for pharmaceutical products, but they include the fight against terrorism and human rights. It is the overseer of the European Convention on Human Rights and it hosts the European

Human Rights Court. As the former Warsaw Pact countries and eventually Russia joined the Council of Europe and accepted its requirements, the Human Rights Court and the Convention exerted positive, even decisive influence on the reform of their legal systems. So the Council of Europe does critically important things, but even in the State Department maybe only three or four people had any idea of what it was and how it was different from the European Community.

Q: Well, in its inclusivity, did it include Turkey?

SILINS: Yes, it did.

Q: What was the background of the formation of this organization?

SILINS: It goes back to the dream of a united states of Europe that Churchill called for in 1946. Unlike the organization that eventually became the European Union, the Council of Europe proceeded on the fast track without taking on the economic portfolio. It developed in breadth rather than depth, shall we say, and focused on things like harmonizing legislation and providing a political forum in which to debate issues, with a focus on rule of law and human rights. On the other track was the European Coal and Steel Community, which really got down to the nitty-gritty, that is, how some of the economic assets of the continent were going to be managed. And that's the one that led to the European Union, which acquired the clout and the money and is the one we mostly talk about today.

Q: Did the delegates run for office, or how are they selected?

SILINS: The delegates to the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe are chosen from their own parliaments. In other words, they're already elected to the parliaments of their own countries and are sent periodically to represent that country in Strasbourg.

Q: You were in Strasbourg from when to when?

SILINS: Well, I was there from '89 to, let's see, '91. The reason I hesitate is that I didn't complete my assignment to Strasbourg. I was asked in the fall of '91 to set up a new embassy in Riga.

Even before that, and I forget the exact date, in Strasbourg I got a phone call from the State Department asking if I would be interested in going to a Baltic capital, presumably Riga, although the location was still a little up in the air, to set up something that would be like a consulate general but that would represent the U.S. to all three Baltic States. Already back in Washington people were thinking the Baltic States might change their status. At the time we were represented to them only through Leningrad, a city in the USSR. Wouldn't it be nice to have representation in one of their capitals, separate from the consulate general in Leningrad? That would reinforce our policy of not recognizing their incorporation into the USSR. I said, yes, I would be interested, but how are you going to do this? The answer was, we plan to ask for Soviet permission to set up such a mission. I knew right away that the idea wasn't likely to fly. I mention it only because it does show that the thinking about the transformation of the USSR was beginning to evolve. The Swedes did set up such a consular mission in Riga and got a jump on the rest of the diplomatic community.

Q: Well, let's go back to the Council of Europe and all. What sort of a player was this in European unity?

SILINS: I think it was an important player in the early stages of grooming the former Soviet satellites for reintegration into Western Europe. They also reached out to Gorbachev, as I said. The East European countries that had been part of the Soviet bloc were invited to send guest delegations to Strasbourg and launch the process of becoming full fledged members of the Council of Europe. In doing so, the Council of Europe imposed requirements on them, including human rights and rule of law requirements that had an impact on how these countries evolved internally, because they could see now that they had to jump through certain hoops in order to be accepted back into Western Europe, which is where they wanted to be. So I would rate it as being quite important on the European stage, particularly with respect to harmonizing legislation and with the highlight on human rights issues, but as having almost no discernible impact in Washington.

Q: Did you find that there was an EU mafia that tended to be dismissive of it?

SILINS: Well, to some extent. They simply couldn't hold that many things in their minds at the same time. The European Community did exist, we knew it was important—God knows I would never deny that—and the Council of Europe looked like excess baggage that no one had much use for. So they gave me pretty much free rein to do what I wanted there. Considering how little the State Department cared, I was treated with amazing respect and consideration by the various officials in Strasbourg, as the equivalent of an ambassador from a member country. But the U.S. at that time was not only not a member country, we did not even have “official” observer status. We were simply represented by our consul general in Strasbourg.

Q: Where was the, well later it was the European Union but I guess your European Council, where was its parliament located?

SILINS: Well, here's just one of the many sources of confusion. The parliament of the Council of Europe met in Strasbourg. But so did the parliament of the European Community – part of the time. That's what we call the European Parliament. It would move back and forth. Half the time, it met in Strasbourg in the same building as the parliament of the Council of Europe until it eventually acquired its own building nearby.

SILINS: I apologize, but this is just the beginning. The European Parliament would commute back and forth, at great expense, between Brussels and Strasbourg. For good measure, it also had administrative offices in Luxembourg. The commuting was largely at the insistence of France, which demanded equal time for Strasbourg. For further eye-blurring confusion, we could talk about why the similar-sounding Council of Europe, the European Council, and the Council of the European Union are really three different institutions. But perhaps we should go on to something else.

Q: Well, did you find Strasbourg important as a listening post?

SILINS: Very much so. You know, that's what really made it for me. I mentioned that the former Soviet satellite countries were sending delegations to Strasbourg and preparing for full membership. So it was a good place to meet parliamentary and government officials from all over Europe and keep tabs on the dawning of the post-Soviet era. Among the delegations with which I met was one that included the soon-to-be foreign minister of independent Latvia.

Now, I was slightly schizophrenic officially because part of my job was to represent U.S. interests in east-central France. In fact, it was a particularly pleasant part of my job. That part of France, Alsace-Lorraine, that whole corner of France, happens to be unusually pro-American. They just love the United States. That's where the design for the Statue of Liberty came from. They thought Americans were wonderful, the Americans came over to save them from the Germans, and they will go out of their way to be nice to us. And in fact they, that is, those French citizens living there, prevented the State Department from closing the Strasbourg consulate as part of its many and frequent attempts to trim its budget. The State Department had put Strasbourg on the hit list, but a delegation headed, I believe, by the mayor of Strasbourg went to Washington and lobbied – not the State Department, they're not that dumb, they went straight to the Congress. They told the Congress that this was a really bad idea, it would give the U.S. a black eye in France and don't do it. So Congress removed Strasbourg from the hit list.

MILES S. PENDLETON, JR.
Political Counselor
Paris (1989-1993)

Miles S. Pendleton, Jr. was born in New Jersey in 1939. He graduated from Yale University in 1961 and received his MPA from Harvard University in 1967. Upon entering the Foreign Service in 1967, his postings included Burundi, Tel Aviv, Brussels and Paris. Mr. Pendleton was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1998.

Q: So you were in Paris from when to when?

PENDLETON: I was in Paris from '89 to '93.

Q: Who was our ambassador? This would be near the beginning of the Bush Administration.

PENDLETON: Yes, not long after the transition, and our ambassador was Walter Curley, who had been a school and college-roommate of George Bush's older brother Prescott. He had known the Bush family for most of his life and they were good friends. Curley was a combination of investment banker and business man, had been involved with The New Yorker and had served as ambassador to Ireland. He also was an expert on European royalty and had written a number of books on the subject. His was a long-standing fascination with the subject. And he had been, I believe, chief fund-raiser for the Bush campaign in the New York and New England area and had gotten his reward. His was an old-school charm counterposed with an ability to put his foot down.

Q: Well, now, in '89, what was the situation both domestically and in our relations with France?

PENDLETON: Well, France was still led by François Mitterrand, who had been president for a considerable period of time and remained president for a considerable period of time. He died in 1996. Mitterrand was a Socialist, a man about whom we had many apprehensions when he became president because, in part, he undertook to put in the French cabinet a couple of communists and others whom the United States found to be anathema. At that point, Vice-President Bush went to Paris to meet with Mitterrand to express to him some of our apprehensions about these choices for ministers. Now Mitterrand was a man of considerable hauteur, and it must have been one of the more delicate jobs that any Vice-President or President or anybody could have, to walk into his office and say, "We don't like your domestic appointments." Bush, by all accounts, did so with considerable sophistication and got the message across without alienating Mitterrand. He and Mitterrand developed a relationship which really strengthened throughout the time of the Bush Presidency, once Bush became President, and to which we owe a great deal, particularly in terms of the Gulf War, when it came along. At that point Bush, to a degree, became at the highest level the Desk officer for France. He invested, even before the Gulf War, a certain amount of time and energy that other presidents would not have, probably, in communicating directly by phone with Mitterrand and taking into account what Mitterrand had to say and adjusting, at least tweaking, US approaches and policies to reflect concerns expressed by the French president. And this just strengthened Mitterrand's sense that this was a relationship which was two-way and which it would really benefit France to pursue.

Below Mitterrand, a tremendous number of both bureaucrats and elected officials continued to have the traditional distaste for many things American and had to be, on occasion, dragged along to listen to our side, particularly as France became more and more a part of Europe in a way that it hadn't been before. With the collapse of the Soviet Union, French apprehensions about the role of Germany, particularly as it unified, and the close ties between the United States and Germany were always near the surface. So I cannot say that our relationship with our oldest ally was easy. It had to be worked on the whole time that I was there and has always had to be worked on, ever since we were allies during our Revolution. But the Bush-Mitterrand relationship allowed a kind of joint decision-making on occasion that was quite unusual in an historical sense.

Q: Well, before we move into some of the events, which were the Gulf War and the fall of the Soviet Union and all, what was your impression of the French Communist Party at that particular time? Was it still a tool of the Kremlin?

PENDLETON: The French Communist Party, by the time I arrived in 1989, was really very weak and getting weaker. The trade unions in France were weak and getting weaker. Marchais had been head of the French Communist Party for many years and remained head for much of the time that I was in France, but he had remained faithful to a form of Communism which was rapidly being discredited with the impending collapse of the Soviet Union and the demise of the Ceausescu regime in Romania. The result was that the rest of the France was really moving on in a way that one wouldn't have expected a decade earlier. And the French Communist Party was being left in the wake, both in terms of supporters, voters and influence. So it was not a terribly important force at that point. The Green parties were coming up a bit, and France basically remained split between Socialists and more conservative members such as the "Rally for the Republic", which led to (before I arrived) "cohabitation" between a Socialist president and a prime minister who was from the right. France returned later to cohabitation in 1994, which reflected basically the split of sentiment within the country. But France is so disciplined and has such a forceful bureaucracy, many of whom are "Enarchs," the graduates of the National School of Administration, who tend to go on one way or the other and have a hard time being influenced by elected officials, many of whom attended ENA as well. When you have cohabitation, for the United States, it means another address you have to go to when you're trying to convince France to do what we would prefer. You have to go to the Elysée Palace, where the presidency is; you have to go to the Foreign Ministry, the Quai d'Orsay; and then you would have to go, under cohabitation, to the prime minister's office. All these centers of power involved themselves in issues that France deemed to be important such as Africa, which has never been at the center of our own thinking. Nevertheless, they tend to, in France, be absolutely convinced that we wish to replace them in Africa, and they tend to be everything from jittery to frantic, depending upon whether it's morning or afternoon, about this. The whole time I was there, it was no longer Chet Crocker, there was Hank Cohen as Assistant Secretary. His wife was French. Instead of going to Africa via London, as Chet Crocker had done, he went to Africa via Paris, and he briefed the French in detail so regularly that it was destroying my limited representation budget. But his efforts only seemed, in a funny way, to heighten suspicions on the part of the long-time Africa watchers in Paris.

Q: What was the role of the (I don't know if you'd call it new, but the entrepreneur class, technicians, the people who were "The computer age is upon us," and the service industry (things like this. Were they playing, did you see, a different role than sort of the old power structure, or did you see any difference?

PENDLETON: One of the things which surprised me was that in terms of our political relationship there seemed to be less of a role than I would have expected, unless it had changed, in terms of new elements hoping to inform political decisions. This seemed to remain pretty much in the hands of traditional and bureaucratic apparatchiks who were very confident about their own abilities to make decisions and very anxious to make the best decisions possible for France. On the economic side, of course, all of Europe was going gangbusters at one level but not so fast at another level. And here France was very, very worried about its own technological expertise and its ability to convert expertise into exports. France faced, throughout the time that I was there, growing unemployment, and that became a major preoccupation. Indeed, if there hadn't been conscription (the draft) (the unemployment rate would have been for adult males up above 20 percent, with particularly high unemployment in the 18-30-year-old age cohort.

France has a remarkable capability to balance the old and the new, and France also has a level of statism that we're not quite used to. For instance, in order to keep employment high, Air France, which was owned by the government and which at that point was in line to be privatized, kept on a great many people at all levels and all jobs who in the United States would have been downsized or let go. For instance, in 1993, for every employee working for American Airlines - which is about the size of Air France - Air France had five employees. So you're not going to make a profit on that. Instead, you are going to have to satisfy a lot of customers who like the personal attention that you can give them with five employees to every one that a major American airline might have. And you had tensions within the government between the Socialists, with a very strong commitment to social welfare and a safety net for all citizens. Of course, among the conservatives there were more business elements with a less traditional viewpoint about social welfare.

You also have in France something I might mention. You had the very interesting role in the very small group who are Protestants. And I didn't realize before I went to France that being a Protestant in France is a special role. There's a lot of respect for the Protestants, and my wife and I were very well received by Protestants, who, more than many Frenchmen, had traveled abroad, had parents and grandparents and great-grandparents who had fled and lived abroad and come back. They were more open, too, and in the process were more entrepreneurial than a lot of other Frenchmen. Their families, like Peugeot, who make the cars, Schlumberger, who do oil(

Q: My brother worked for them, yes.

PENDLETON: Et cetera, quite a very interesting role in the process. And I was surprised to find that, for instance, if you have a new person joining an office, that person might be identified as a Protestant, the way in the United States one might mention, if you had a largely white office that the new arrival was black, a very discreet sense of Protestants being separate and sometimes more than equal.

Q: What about the intelligentsia? How did you deal with it? One almost has the feeling there's a visceral anti-Americanism within this group, that it has more impact in France than it does in almost any other country. Is this true, or not?

PENDLETON: Well, it was very definitely true when I spent a little bit of time in the early '60s, but I found that there was a slow and quite remarkable evolution and that people who had considered themselves to be of the intelligentsia, by the time I was there, were much more open to American notions and ideas they recognized, at least, the need to know and understand what motivates us and the need to understand what can be uncorked in the United States in the way of political and economic energy and that frequently doesn't seem to be as possible in Europe. I found a lot more respect for American culture, particularly if it had a capital C rather than a small c, than I would have expected. Now when you have something like the establishment of something like EuroDisney 20 miles outside of Paris, that brings to the fore all the latent tensions that are not always creative between those who see the debasing of French civilization by the invasion of an American fantasy land against all of those who would like to take their children to see Mickey Mouse. And within society there is a fair bit of tension in that regard. But the French intelligentsia, and these were not the people who necessarily would welcome me immediately, in part because my French was not at the 5+ level. I did sense from many conversations, that they had come a long way in being more open to the impact we have in the world.

Q: What about the bureaucracy? Did that have a thrust as far as America was concern or did it have its own foreign policy, or not?

PENDLETON: Well, I suspect that Mitterrand or any of his prime ministers might claim that the Quai d'Orsay, the foreign ministry, had its own approach to life, and they were always trying to tame it. One of the most fascinating things about French society, really, is the influence that the graduates of the National School of Administration, mentioned above, have on our patterns of thinking and French decision-making. They come out class after class and provide not just the bureaucrats but the entire political class, really, including prime minister after prime minister (the impact that that way of thinking has on French decision-making. And the way of thinking involves a kind of philosophical approach to challenges and issues, a Cartesian division of issues into three parts. Whatever you went to make a démarche on, you knew you were going to get a three-part answer, no matter how seemingly unnecessary that might be. And the three-part answer would always be informed by a staunch belief that France has a special role in the world and that the United States doesn't understand this and that the United States doesn't adequately take France into account and that France thinks harder about issues than the United States does. Indeed, their approach to issues frequently was more nuanced than our own. The watering-down process that goes into creating a démarche in Washington could also be the worst enemy of those overseas trying to convince the French to do something because you would be passing along really what often seemed to me, as well as to the French, to be half-baked suggestions that were too easily dismissed. That came out of our inter-agency jockeying process. I found many of my interlocutors to be absolutely brilliant, in their own eyes at least.

I found that the best of them wanted to be creative, and these included people like Hubert Vedrine, with whom I met at regular intervals to discuss the future of NATO. He was Mitterrand's strategic counselor at that point. He later became Mitterrand's, basically, chief of staff, and now he's foreign minister of France. Or Ambassador Jean-David Leavitte, who was charged at the Quai d'Orsay with coming up with the world's approach to Cambodia, at the time that France was leading the efforts to have elections and have the UN appropriately involved. These people were absolutely world-class individuals who, in their professionalism, could run rings around most of us. I have to say that, as I said, my French wasn't 5+/5+, ("fluid but not fluent" I used to say) and Mitterrand said he would fire any of his underlings who ever spoke with diplomats in Paris in anything but French. It was sometimes funny that you'd work on and off with somebody for a couple of years, and then you'd have a visitor from Washington who would call on them, and you would find for the first time that the person spoke colloquial English English or American English. They are quite a remarkable breed, and sometimes they serve France brilliantly, and sometimes the baggage they bring with them leaves them a bit in the wake as world events go on.

Q: A theme that goes throughout almost all of these oral histories, anybody who deals with the French, is (frustrations not the word, but not really anti-French because there are many things about the French that everybody likes (but the French policy to really grate; and often, at least in the eyes of the Americans whom I interview, they see French policy as being out to make a buck for France or to throw, as the British would say, a spanner into the works just to show that they have the ability to stop things in the international world. Did you get any of this?

PENDLETON: Oh, yes, I got it all the time. And the question of making money for France was very much involved in the interrelationship between large French corporations and the government. The government would choose who would head many large French corporations.

And France, knowing that it is a relatively small country, has mobilized to try to increase exports, increase productivity, and it has done so against the backdrop of high unemployment that we discussed earlier. In terms of the grandeur of France, it was something that would pop up like a jack-in-the-box time and time again, it wasn't simply the misplaced notion that the U.S. is trying to compete with them in Africa or get them out of Africa or whatever because we want that role. In every negotiation, there would be a demand that (a) any new international body must have French as a language even though that might be terribly inconvenient for all other players; (b) there inevitably would be a demand at a certain point in major international negotiations that whatever was going to be signed would be signed in Paris and that it would be yet another "Treaty of the Elysées" ending the cold war or it would be the "Treaty of" this or that, ending the conflicts in Cambodia, this happened over and over again. President Bush was very gracious about seeing this need and subscribing to it. Repeatedly we had to bow to this intense internal French need in order to increase cooperation in terms of the substantive issues at hand. It's a small price to pay, but it's maddening. you see it coming like a steamroller; they almost can't help themselves with these demands. France is an extraordinary country but it has a capacity to make its leaders seem petty, and leaders do seem petty when they insist on France's central role over and over again. I'm not at all surprised that this is a constant theme. I fortunately, and perhaps because of the Gulf War and because of President Bush, was there at a time when, yes, we paid more attention than I think many in Washington would ever have wanted us to. That came from the very top on down. A great many people in Washington were not pleased because the French can be varsity-level irritating. But I think we got some pretty good trade-offs in the process, so that my view is a little bit more positive, in terms of how the trade-offs can work for us.

Q: Did you find yourself in any relationship with Washington or anywhere else or with our embassies in Bonn or London or something trying to explain the French position on things --in a way sort of gritting your teeth while you were doing it because you didn't quite support the French position?

PENDLETON: One of the great dangers of serving in Paris is the whole question of "clientitis" and how you are perceived by those who are more skeptical of the French than perhaps I was or became (and I was more skeptical of the French than some in our embassy who had a lifetime of commitment to strengthening French-US relations, either because they had French spouses or because they'd grown up in France or had studied in France, et cetera. But what I was extremely anxious to do in both London and Paris was to try to assure that our reporting reflected US interests from top to bottom, even if we had to put it in a summary and then repeat it: why is this of interest to the United States? And if you package the French argument in an American context, then you're probably all right in terms of critics. And we did not get into the kind of slanging match with other embassies that I used to see, for instance, between Tel Aviv and Cairo when I served in Tel Aviv in the late '60s. No, everybody was trying to understand a rapidly evolving Europe, and then, in terms of Washington, as I mentioned, the tone President Bush set couldn't help but affect the approach that subordinates took, even if they had to grit their teeth in the process. And every time you were ready to strangle the French, they would do something that was positive enough to let you breathe for another day.

Q: Well, let's take the two big events that are at least apparent here, one the fall of the Berlin wall and all that. I would have thought we would have been looking very closely at France because it meant, you know, this thing was great, I mean, we'd all been all for this, but all of a sudden you had a greater Germany and all that. How did France feel about it? How did this affect what you were doing and your observations of the French-American relationship as these things were happening?

PENDLETON: France almost went into mourning about the unification of Germany. On the surface, they were very pleased about the course of events in Europe, but if you scratched them the slightest bit you would discover that there was a tremendous amount of apprehension about what was going to happen. Was this a new German tiger next door, now so much larger than it was, which had already wreaked havoc in Europe twice in a century (was it going to become an impossible neighbor to deal with? What would happen about the relationship that had always been so strong between the United States and Germany? Would it become even stronger? Would the United States try to influence France through Germany? What would happen about Germany's economic might, and would Germany be able to really dominate commercial ties with all of Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union in a way that France would like to have been able to stretch its own wings? Once you scratched the surface in Paris you found an almost funereal degree of apprehension about what all this would mean.

Nevertheless, the French had to put the best face on it because of trying to be good Europeans at that point, and French apprehensions contradicted the impulse toward a united Europe, which Mitterrand supported without reservation and which caused a great deal of concern on the part of many other Frenchmen. This led to Mitterrand calling the Maastricht referendum after the Treaty of Maastricht's propulsion toward a united defense and security foreign affairs policy for the EU. At the same time, the treaty that many Frenchmen resisted, created a common European currency to go into effect in 1999. Many worried that somehow the mark would become the currency of Europe and that the French franc would play a third or fourth or fifth role in the process, well behind the dollar and the mark.

I think we should say a few words about the Maastricht referendum, because it was a preoccupation of ours in terms of where France came out and in terms of the impact on the future of a united Europe and the impact on the future of Mitterrand, who I thought, from the moment I heard he was going to have a referendum, had made a major mistake. I didn't see any sense in it. I didn't see what he could gain because all the polls suggested almost immediately that it was going to be very close. Indeed, it was very close. We didn't know, up to the end, whether it was going to be decided by voters in the DOM-TOMs, the overseas departments. Were the people of Martinique, Guadeloupe and the French citizens of the Pacific going to decide this issue related to Europe? One could only guess. And uncharacteristically, I had our political section gin up two different cables, one if the referendum succeeded and one if it failed and focusing on the implications for the United States. On the night of the vote count, we stayed up most of the night and then sent the correct cable (Mitterrand succeeded. As would so typically be the case when you give a lot to something the cable got lost in the central computer in the State Department and was not read by anybody at Main State, which may be an argument for "you don't need embassies." Actually, it was fortunately relayed and was read by Eagleburger up in New York, where he was at the UN, and a few others, but by the time we realized that it had never been received by anybody, it was kind of untimely. I was tired and unhappy.

Q: What were the issues on the referendum?

PENDLETON: Well, the basic issue was whether France would go along with the Maastricht Treaty, which would give away to the EU an element of French sovereignty, particularly over foreign and security matters. This was not anything which many Frenchmen had been historically able to bring themselves to do, although France had been drifting and sometimes paddling vigorously in that direction for years. Maastricht basically was a sovereignty issue which divided, I would say, Europe, in a great many ways. It divided France in the same sorts of ways, with those who are afraid about change taking a rather conservative point of view and voting against the referendum and those who felt the change would be acceptable -- if not even good -- voting for it. Then you had the overlay of whether you were supporting Mitterrand or not. But it was a close call for Mitterrand.

Q: I would have thought, the French, in this period and really for a long time, were moving in two different directions. One, they were always concerned about a resurgent Germany, not necessarily a Hitlerian Germany, but just the sheer weight of a big, quite efficient country and all which could overwhelm them; and at the desire to sort of keep the United States out. I would have thought that there would have been an underlying spirit of "let's keep the United States in as a control over Germany," but the French always seemed to be going for this European solution, which would mean that they would, in a way, be overwhelmed by Germany. I mean, was that at all a thing?

PENDLETON: I think what they hoped to do was to be able to influence Germany and have us influence Germany a little less on issues where we disagreed with France but have us influence Germany about French concerns on issues where we agreed a little more. And you had a funny triangle involved, with no easy answer. France was very anxious to try to educate the Germans, and the Germans very anxious to keep French concerns and angst in mind. And there are structural relationships between France and Germany that aren't very widely known but have helped to support ties that are important. For instance, on a fairly minor level, there are Frenchmen and Germans who work in each other's foreign ministries. Now occasionally we've had somebody who has worked at the Quai, but they're asked to work on aid matters related to places in the world that France doesn't care much about. France had a German diplomat working in the European office on questions related to the integration of Europe, which is fairly extraordinary. French and German diplomats have joint meetings, not unlike our chiefs-of-mission meetings. They have chiefs-of-mission meetings involving both French and German chiefs of missions. There are a fair number of structural approaches which allow each country to try to influence the other and to build confidence between the two. But in the back of their mind always was, the United States had 330,000 troops in Europe. The majority were in Germany. We had a remarkable impact on German thinking in the post-World War II era, and the French did fear very much that in a way we would, through the Germans, throw a spanner in the French works. And I think that we were more sophisticated than the French frequently give us credit for, but it's something that bothered them.

Q: Did you find the NATO relationship within Europe bothersome to the French? I mean, were they talking one way and performing another way?

PENDLETON: Well, sure, and this goes back over the years. France's approach to NATO has evolved over the last decade in important ways, and yet what most people in France did not realize was that even on the military side France had quite a close relationship to NATO even in the decades following France's withdrawal from the integrated military structure. France found it very much in its interest to keep us involved in as quite a way with NATO military thinking. And then of course they remained in NATO - pushed by France, NATO decamped from France to Evère, outside of Brussels, and yet France remained very much a player on the political side. Because of its coherent view about a variety of subjects France frequently was able to play a role way out of line with its military commitment to the Alliance, which in theory was none. Next to us and next to the Brits, they played probably the major role, the Germans being relatively cautious in NATO because of their own military history. The Brits had no army in the '70s to speak of, but they had a lot of candlepower in the people who represented them at NATO and put it to good use. The French in the latish '80s began to give a lot more thought to the question of rejoining the integrated military structure, and this led to a need on their part to understand better what they were missing and what was involved(although they had a pretty good understanding(and they were testing the political waters at home increasingly. This went on into the early '90s, with the notion of reentering, and my talks with Hubert Védrine were very much focused on NATO and the French role and the French potential role in NATO. He was giving away nothing in terms of what they might do, but there was a certain amount of probing back and forth. And this I found encouraging over time, but you'd go in fits and starts as to whether France would rejoin the integrated military structure and do so with gusto. In parallel, of course, they were considering a stronger defense role for the EU.

What they did do, vis a vis the U.S., and we saw it during the Gulf War, was increasingly to cooperate with us on a variety of issues which would not have been possible even a few years before. If you think, for instance, how much unhappiness there was in the United States about France's role in the Libya bombing at the end of the '80s. France forced our planes flying out of the UK to go around France to get to Libya. That left a very bad taste in a lot of Americans' mouths, and rightly so. In the end of the day, with the Gulf War, they allowed our planes to land at French bases(two of them, as I recall, in the south of France(and this was a very big request which we made to them and one which in the end they agreed to approve. We also, in the early '90s, provided France on increasingly frequent occasions with what people in Washington like to call "lift." France had a military which was very deficient in terms of long-haul air capability, and it had aircraft carriers with no planes. When it sent an aircraft carrier to the Gulf, during the build-up for instance, the deck was covered with trucks. And the pictures taken from the air of the aircraft carrier put out to sea(instead of being called a porte-avions it was called a porte-camions(it was very embarrassing for France. Now why didn't it have planes? Because the French wanted to build their own advanced fighter and they were way behind in doing so. They wanted to build their own long-haul aircraft and they were way behind in doing so, so when they wanted to send troops to Chad or Somalia or whatever, we quietly had to provide them with the lift. But there was really a very large degree, in the early '90s, between the French military and the United States, even though the French minister of defense, Chevènement, was quite a good friend of Iraq. He was not one whom we ideally would have chosen to be the French defense minister at that point.

Q: Let's follow through on the Gulf War. This is the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq. How did that sit with the public and then with the French Government when it initially happened, before there was any response from anybody?

PENDLETON: Well, I think there was a tremendous amount of unhappiness about it in France, and for a variety of different reasons, some of which wouldn't have been necessarily our first reasons. I mentioned the French defense minister, Chevènement. He had been very anxious to build up French military sales to the Gulf, and people of his persuasion could see immediately that the invasion was going to be highly incompatible with that aim. It was going to be highly incompatible with France's desire to build up commercial relations in the entire region, and much of French foreign policy is commercially motivated. It would mean that (if the United States took this seriously, as it was pretty clear we were going to from the outset (we were going to have a situation in which France might wish to accept, possibly, what had happened, but that would not fit into its international construct. It might wish to see some kind of diplomatic compromise, and it certainly would not like to see at the outset any kind of war in the Gulf. It took a great deal of communication back and forth from August to January, right up to the end (the invasion being in August and the Gulf War in January-February) to convince the French through each step of the way that we were on track and that we knew what we were doing and that they should be with us. And as I've said repeatedly now, Bush played a very major role in communicating with Mitterrand. Secretary of State Baker also played a very major role by coming through Paris repeatedly and keeping the French fully apprized of where we were going. So did Secretary of Defense Cheney. And in the end, they came with us to a degree that I never would have expected.

Now the French were not using conscripts so that, in a way, the French public could accept the risk because those who were involved were all volunteers and Foreign Legion types and others this would not mean death in every little village around France if things went wrong. The French were also very concerned about the potential for terrorism in France; that was another constricting element. But they were extremely vigorous about coping with terrorism. They not only, for instance, took every waste basket out of every Métro station, which soon turned the Métro stations into mammoth garbage bins, but they worked through the leaders of the Muslim communities in France and basically told them that "you spread the word that if there is one terrorist incident, you people will not be welcome here." This message was terrifying for those who had come across the Mediterranean from North Africa or had come from the Middle East and who wished to stay in France, frequently for economic reasons. The upshot was that nothing happened during the whole process. As we built towards war, the French were with us, and I never personally would have guessed that they would have allowed our planes to land and refuel and stay overnight, but they did, and it was fairly remarkable.

Now at the same time as the day on which battle was to be launched by us approached, France, on the diplomatic side, felt it had to show that it would go the extra mile, and Mitterrand made some suggestions which were not welcome in Washington, about diplomacy with Iraqi Foreign Minister Tariq Aziz. We felt that we had to go an extra mile, too, and Baker had met with Tariq Aziz in Geneva and gotten nowhere.

Then, really very much at the end of the run-up to the war, Peres-de-Cuellar, UN secretary-general at that point, decided he would go out and meet with Saddam Hussein. That led me to involvement which was interesting in a sense, because he was going to come back from Baghdad and stop in Paris. We needed desperately to know what his view of the situation was after talking with Saddam Hussein. He had said he would not say until he got back to either Paris or New York(I can't remember which)(but I was asked by the folks in Washington, on I believe it was a Sunday, to find him. But at that point he was on his private plane coming from Baghdad, and I literally made more than 200 phone calls looking for him, through New York, through UN types in Paris, through everybody I could think of, from hotel bellhops to anybody and keeping the ambassador and Washington up to speed. And in the end he turned out to be in the Crillon Hotel, which was 20 feet from my office across Boissy d'Anglais Street on the Place de la Concorde in Paris.

Ambassador Walter Curley, Mark Lissfelt (the deputy chief of mission) and I went over to call on him in the hotel, at the first meeting I could arrange in the morning. It was pretty hairy. I kept getting calls the night before and that morning from the executive secretary of the Department, who was on Baker's plane, which at that point was flying from Europe to Canada. And the Secretary of State wanted to know immediately when we saw Peres, of course, what the upshot was. I told Ambassador Curley that I'd been getting these calls and that we would have to let them know straightaway on the Secretary's plane. We went over to the hotel and were shunted into a side bedroom, rather than into Peres-de-Cuellar's suite where he was receiving people. He had the Luxembourg foreign minister with him (Luxembourg at that point had the presidency of the EU), so we had to wait. Then to my horror, just as we were about to be received, the Russian ambassador came along. He had been the Soviet ambassador at the UN and knew Peres-de-Cuellar very well. Peres-de-Cuellar came out and saw the Russian ambassador and embraced him in a big bear hug. In the meantime, it thought, Oh, my God, my ambassador is going to be upstaged by the Russian ambassador and time is going by. So I threw my body in between them and said, "the American ambassador has been waiting there, and you've got to see him next," which fortunately is what happened. And basically Peres-de-Cuellar told us there wasn't any alternative to war, that Saddam Hussein had given him nothing, and that the moment had come to go ahead, which was very important news because it kind of uncorked the bottle.

We went back to the embassy, and I called the Secretary's plane, which was on the ground in Ottawa; and then I had a memorable disconnect with Ambassador Curley because he had forgotten that the Secretary's plane people had been demanding on his behalf to know right away. He had wanted to send a personal cable, which could be received on the plane, and I was to write the cable. When I told him that the Secretary had already been informed, he was not best pleased and made clear that my future lay perhaps better in Washington than in Paris. However, the deputy chief of mission kindly reminded him that we had discussed the need to make a phone call, and I was able to stay on in Paris. But that was one snippet of the last days before the fighting started.

Q: How did the French react to the victory over Saddam Hussein?

PENDLETON: Oh, I think it was interesting. First of all, during the war, I think they were absolutely flabbergasted by some of the films they were shown of smart bombs and that sort of thing. The American military might and ability to put together a coalition was something that even the French found themselves in awe of, and initially after the victory there was a tremendous outpouring of respect for what the United States had done. It was quite unusual to have French people telling me that "God, the U.S. have done something just unbelievable."

But like so many of us, they quickly sobered up, and before very long they became quite French. I must say, when I heard that we'd stopped the war on the hundredth hour, I thought that was a very bad thing to do, that it was artificial, and that it probably would have meant that we hadn't thought about some elements that were involved. And the French, a lot of my French compatriots, thought that there was something artificial there, that we did not know adequately what we wanted to do after the war, and we were being very heavily blamed for not caring about what was going to happen to those who were against Saddam Hussein in Iraq, including in northern Iraq. And we had this situation in which Bush was shown on TV down playing golf in Florida. The French, who have a strong humanitarian impulse, for a lot of reasons, were beginning to beat the drum in terms of humanitarian aid for those who were still in Iraq and who were hostile to Saddam Hussein. They were under his gun and his chemical weapons. So it was interesting how quickly we got back to business as usual in which the French had some very strong concerns about how we were comporting ourselves, which they were not shy about registering and which started almost as soon as the war was over.

Q: I think (and this is from my interviews with people like our ambassador to Saudi Arabia, Chas Freeman, and Gordon Brown, who was the political advisor to our general, General Schwarzkopf, there (we didn't have an end game, and the hundred hours thing sounded very much like the boys sitting and Colin Powell and George Bush and all saying, "Wouldn't it sound nice to end the war and get the hell out of there?" It was not our finest hour.

PENDLETON: Well, I would agree with you. I've lamented that, and you wonder how it happened that when we had such a long time to build up an advance. But it's always harder to think about the unthinkable. I think we probably assumed that Saddam Hussein would not survive, that he would either be killed during the conflict or that he would be put aside by his own people very quickly. And that was just wrong.

I think the French are better than we are at trying to push through the thought process and look at the consequences and the peripheral by-play that comes from any action. And whether it's there Cartesian way of thinking (most of us are good at thinking about one thing, and we pat ourselves on the back when we think about two things. The French, because of their education, have to think about three things, and it sometime takes them a step further than we find convenient. In this case, some of their concerns were mine. But that is not to say that their interests were ours.

All this said, the French basically were incredibly generous about what we did in terms of the execution of the war itself. When Dick Cheney, as Secretary of Defense, came to pay his final respects to France as he was getting ready to retire, the French treated him with the kind of honor and esteem that only the French can muster. For instance, I went to the airport to meet him, which I thought was a mistake because I thought the Ambassador (I was acting deputy chief of mission) should do so at that point. But at any rate I was dispatched. Cheney arrived at the airport at Orly, about 15 miles south of Paris on the notoriously busy autoroute that goes from the Mediterranean to Paris. You can spend hours getting from Orly into town. Some people spent many hours that day reaching Paris, and the reason was that the French closed the autoroute and allowed only Secretary Cheney's motorcade to be on it. And partway into Paris I pointed out to him that if he looked behind him and ahead of him he would see something he would never see on that road again in his life, which was that there wasn't another car but the ones that were with him. And even Dick Cheney, who is very down-to-earth Wyoming guy with a couple of years at Yale at a patina of some sort, was quite amused by that. That's the kind of great gestures the French can make.

I fear I amused him less. I made him talk about my vision of the new post-Cold War military, dealing with hurricanes and forest fires on top of its classic duties. I also pressed peacekeeping on him. He appeared tolerant of these notions and others but did not hesitate to make clear that he disagreed. A day later when I went to take him back to the airport, I saw he had a lot of morning reading to do and said I assessed he would like peace and quiet to focus on it. "You are damn right, Pendleton," he said.

Q: I'd hear things about the French troops that were there, including air, realizing that they really weren't that integrated into NATO and that they had to be almost assisted to find out where they were. I mean, they realized how much farther ahead NATO was than they were. Did that come through?

PENDLETON: Oh, yes, after the war there was a lot of talk on the part of the French about what lessons were learned, and part of it was the whole question of how does France deal with NATO? But here were other questions which they saw as more strictly French in nature. One was that they clearly didn't have any overhead capability, and they had to rely on us to brief them on what the French forces would be facing in the places where they were assigned. France, incidentally(I mentioned that they allowed the use of air bases(also, in an absolutely extraordinary way, allowed their troops to be placed under the command of foreigners. That had not happened since World War II and was an extraordinary gesture. Particularly since they had left the Integrated Military Command of NATO many years before.

France put the Gulf War behind them with a determination to beef up their intelligence capabilities dramatically if they could, and I think without a real sense of how expensive this would be. They, I think, became more realistic about what it meant to buy foreign planes if you have an aircraft carrier rather than to wait till you can have exactly what you want, which has "France" written on every possible component. They became quite obsessed with the whole question of lift and the ability to get to foreign points of conflict without having to rely on another air force, i.e., the United States Air Force. And there were a variety of lessons there, but underlying it all, as you suggest, was the whole question of working in the best integrated fashion with NATO and what it means to be involved. This came up almost immediately again and in terms of ex-Yugoslavia and how to manage that, because France supplies a large number of troops to the UN. The role of the UN and the role of NATO(what can you decide without having a UN resolution versus a NATO resolution, have become ongoing issues.

Q: Well, we'll move to Yugoslavia in a minute, but in Iraq, I was told somewhere, that Madame Mitterrand had taken the cause of the Kurds very much under her wing and that she, in a way, was the prime force for everything that developed with the Kurds, safe haven and support and all that. Was there anything to this, or not?

PENDLETON: Yes, she played a major role. Now her relationship with her husband wasn't very good, and yet she participated with him in all necessary functions. She had her own human rights organization which she spearheaded, and she indeed was very active in terms of supporting the Kurds. The French were very much prepared to involve themselves in it. They see themselves as people of a great humanitarian impulse, and this sometimes is a cynical approach, and it sometimes is a well-meaning approach, but the humanitarian side of it, --whether it's Doctors without Borders or the French Government involving itself in the guise of humanitarianism in, say, Rwanda,-- at some point can be an important impulse. I wouldn't give Madame Mitterrand too much credit, but I would very definitely give her substantial credit against the backdrop of what the public was perceiving as a result of watching TV.

Q: You were there up to '93. What was happening in Yugoslavia? Were we working with the French to try to do something about it, or were the French sort of saying, "We'll take care of it," or how did it go?

PENDLETON: We were working with the French, but we weren't sure what we wanted to do; and they weren't totally sure, either, and it was messy(it was really quite messy because, of course, the situation on the ground was confused, and it didn't lead to clear-cut policy options on the part of anybody involved. We had, for instance, Reg Bartholomew, who for a while was our point man on the former Yugoslavia. He came to have a day-long series of meetings with the French about options. And he kept getting up and going to the telephone every 20 minutes or so, to the annoyance of the French, but Reg kept getting new instructions all day long. And it was very clear that what we had in mind was a work-in-progress, and all we could do in terms of billing it to the French was to say, "You see, we're consulting with you. You always say we face you with a fait accompli. We're consulting with you as we work out our own approach to the issues involved, of which there are many, many layers. So you keep factoring it in." And this, in a way, brought out the traditional French apprehension of that cliché that we mentioned earlier about NATO, where the only time when the allies in NATO are more apprehensive than when the United States knows what it wants to do is when the United States doesn't know what it wants to do. I'm not phrasing it very elegantly, but that sentiment was running through. It was a bit of a shock, I think, to the French to see they were dealing with us at a moment when they really could influence our policies from the outset, and yet they seemed to me to want a better sense of direction on our part.

Q: Did you have any feeling in this early period of a certain thirst on the part of some in France who were saying, "Ah, at last, here is a European problem"(i.e., the dissolution of Yugoslavia. This was even before Bosnia got into it, but it was obviously out there), and say, "This is a European problem, and we will give a European answer and butt out"? I mean, was there that?

PENDLETON: Not really. There was a strong sentiment that it would be very nice if Europe could solve this problem by itself and for once be Europe and not the transatlantic relationship, but I think anybody who had to deal with it recognized that the capability lay with NATO and that the United States still dominated NATO. How would you create an alternative mechanism? Now this brought up the whole question of what the EU might be able to do and what the US might be able to do in conjunction with the WEU, the Western European Union, by removing some forces from NATO, deploying them under the flag of the WEU and trying to handle it that way. But this was all ground which had never been tilled before in a meaningful way. It led to a great deal of concern on both sides about whether anything could be done in timely fashion. I think most Frenchmen who were going to deal with the issue recognized, on occasion with relief, that the United States had to be a player. Presidential indecision became even more noticeable when President Clinton replaced Bush. Clinton decided to step in vigorously, only rather late on, including his useful involvement before the Dayton Accords (but it had taken months and months to sort out in his own mind what to do).

Q: What about the dissolution of the Soviet Union? Did this happen gradually enough, or did this make any difference in our relations with France or your dealing with the French?

PENDLETON: Initially, I don't think it made as much of a difference as I would have expected. I think the French were as surprised as we were and are, with the speed that it all came about, and it led to many discussions, but it led more to a sharing of views that were useful on both sides. It seemed to me, looking back, that the unification of Germany is part of a process that was much more of a blockbuster for the French for historical reasons than the breakup of the Soviet Union per se. We were all feeling our way, but Jim Baker, in particular, I think, played an important role in trying to sort out our approach to the future with his Berlin speech, to the future. The French, I think, were encouraged to hear what our thoughts were and didn't have any necessarily great apprehensions about where we might lead them in the process. As time went on, however, there was growing French apprehensions about the only remaining superpower and US "hegemony".

Q: Did you have any feel that the French were looking at Eastern Europe, which was now becoming unstuck from the Communist Bloc and saying, "Well, we'd better get in there and start turning this into a market," because obviously the Germans would be a major factor?

PENDLETON: This was a major French preoccupation from the outset. The French feared that the Germans would dominate all of Eastern Europe from the point of view of markets; and were extremely anxious to beef up their commercial approach to Eastern Europe. They saw this as a real opportunity, but one that they would have to hustle to make a dent in. While they were determined to do so, the trade statistics, I believe, suggested within a few years that they hadn't been particularly successful. The markets proved, in a way, to be a bit smaller than they had thought. The Germans were indeed very active, and the French also have a strong cultural commitment to making sure that French language and that French culture is extended as far as it possibly can (to wit, their interest in Romania, for instance, their interests in ties with the Czech Republic. In terms of contacts among peoples, it is astonishing how Europe changed during the time I was in Paris. For instance, I had some old Czech friends from my days in Ghana who lived in Pilsen, in Czechoslovakia. We have kept in touch over the years, but it was not easy without endangering them, with me being an American diplomat. We had to be in touch on those occasions when they could leave the country. Well, after the wall came down and after the Soviet Union collapsed, we invited them to come and visit us in Paris. I had noticed that every weekend there were literally hundreds of buses from Czechoslovakia that came to France, to Paris, to see the City of Light, which was practically like the capital of Czechoslovakia in the minds of many Czechs. They weren't very warmly welcomed by the French because they brought their own food(they couldn't afford to spend a dime(and slept on the bus and went home again.

We invited our friends, and they were supposed to arrive at our house midmorning on a given day, and they appeared at 6:30 in the morning. I said, "Jeez, how did you get here so fast?" They said, well, the bus picked them up in Pilsen(this was just a regular intercity busy("picked us up in Pilsen at five in the afternoon, and we stopped at the border with Germany for about a minute and a half, and then we came on through" And for those of us who thought of Europe with these boundaries and barbed wire, just listening to them saying, "and we came on through"(it was a real reminder of how things had changed.

For their part, the French saw that you could go the other way. Out in the Place de la Concorde, for instance, this isn't commerce, but there were trucks there, and if you wanted to send a package to a city in Poland, you'd go throw your package in the Poland truck, and it would be delivered the next morning. If you wanted to do Hungary, you threw it in the Hungary truck. And off they would go, overnight, and the package would be delivered. Europe was changing vastly at the human level, of people traveling, and at the same time the French wanted to get a hold of all these changes.

I mentioned Romania. One of the things that reminded me that the United States optic and the French optic are rather different on international affairs was the revolution in Romania and the killing of Ceausescu in December of 1989. It happened about the same week that we invaded Panama. And I, of course, was under orders to get French support for the invasion of Panama. When you went to French officials, all they wanted to talk about was Romania. And all you'd see on French TV was Romania, endless shots of the Romanian revolution and then a trailer of a few seconds of what was happening in Panama. And it was a reminder that the US and France are different countries with a different view of the world, and that we're in the Western Hemisphere. Even when Colin Powell came over a bit later to help brief on what we'd done(and he was by no means the legend that he became later(the French were slightly bemused that we would send a four-star around to brief them on Panama.

And then a Romanian speaker who'd been educated in Toulouse and who spoke fluent French, Peter Romano, became the president of Romania, and that excited the French tremendously. Anne Sinclair, who was the kind of Barbara Walters of France had him on, and couldn't stop complimenting him on his French. While watching, I was reminded that nobody seemed to know all that much about him in the United States Government, and it occurred to me that if he'd been educated in Toulouse there might still be professors there who remembered him. So our able consul general, Judith Heimann, went up from Bordeaux, at our request, and found a professor who still put Romano up every summer for his holidays. We got some insight into him as a person and as a potential leader from that we otherwise wouldn't have had. And we wouldn't have had that insight if we hadn't had the consulate in Bordeaux, which has since been closed, because the consul general had already met the professor. This little episode was a reminder of the price we pay when we have to close consulates.

Q: Just how did you see the role of the Ambassador during these turbulent times, Walter Curley, because he was not a professional, and I would think it a difficult time?

PENDLETON: It was a difficult time, and I don't know quite how to say it, but Walter Curley had a great fondness for France and a great interest in things financial and commercial and cultural and less of an interest in some of the political issues which preoccupied us. I think it's fair to say that in the time I worked for him, only once did he ask to see the foreign minister, and only once did he see the foreign minister, Roland Dumas, in something other than an informal way, such as at a dinner or a cocktail party or reception or something of that nature. During the Gulf War, everything got ratcheted up and there were instructions in no uncertain terms that ambassadors should deal with particular issues. It was a little bit more difficult to gain the entrée than you would think, even though the stakes were extremely high. Whether the ambassador would respond was an issue that obviously, for those of us working in the embassy, was of concern because, while the Ambassador's willingness to plunge into some of the most complex economic and commercial and cultural issues was manifest, we felt a little bit limited by his lack of enthusiasm for political démarches. And the French are so hierarchical that if you top off(I was the number three person in the embassy(at the number three, they take note of that, and the access you have is much more limited. And the deputy chief of mission had a great many challenges to face just running an embassy that included 1100 people(everything from the Battle Monuments Commission to the consulates were under the embassy(

Q: Who was the DCM?

PENDLETON: Mark Lissfelt. For him it was a challenge to get spun up on some of the issues. The embassies issues were global. The world was our oyster. I'm not talking about just the war; I learned more about, say, timber and mineral smuggling along the Thai-Cambodian border while serving in France than I ever thought I would want to know, much less need to know. You had to study extremely hard to keep on top of these substantive issues, which a political counselor could do, but a deputy chief of mission who has the FBI representative banging on his door and the DEA representative banging on his back door and at the same time the INS representative trying to waylay him in the cafeteria couldn't easily involve himself in every substantive issue that came along.

So for us it was a challenge, and certain things got done in Washington that I wish had been done in Paris. Now when Avis Bohlen came as a deputy chief of mission, involvement on the political side of the top two in the embassy changed. Avis had a very strong history of living in France, speaking impeccable French, knowing the French, being sympathetic to French concerns and understanding how to interpret them to Americans who might be more skeptical than she. She also had a kind of intellectual and personal drive that was fairly remarkable. Moreover, the arrival of Ambassador Pamela Harriman made a difference. She was determined to make her mark. She was uncertain about the issues, but she arrived with a kind of energy and commitment which was(with respect to mastering some of the tough concerns, at least when I saw her during the initial part of her tenure -- really quite remarkable. And she got involved, at that point, anyway, in issues that previously did not get attention at the ambassadorial level. She also paid attention to French officials who had never had attention paid, and of course they responded.

Q: What sort of issues would these be?

PENDLETON: Well, they ranged from some very complex arms control issues to concerns of the Treasury Attache. She not only went to make démarches, but when we had the undersecretary for security affairs visiting, she did what she did so well, which was to throw a working dinner. There wasn't much work done at the dinner but it brought into the residence level after level of French officials involved in the issues, from the top down to the working level. They were just astonished to be invited and caught in that net and were flattered and honored. Of course, she had quite a remarkable ability to make people feel at home and important. And this helped to open more doors in the future.

With the help of numerous briefings, she took on some terribly complex issues related to finance that were fraught with potential downsides and even went public to a degree on top of her private démarches. But she just waded in and saw people, at least initially, and called on people who were not used to having the embassy come knocking on their door. It was, to me, quite impressive.

Q: On the personal side, was your wife able to operate as a lawyer and an investment banker in France?

PENDLETON: Yes, fortunately, and that was due (a) in part to her capabilities and training and (b) in part to the fact that her father had been a British diplomat and she'd been registered as a British subject at birth. So Elisabeth had a British passport and could work in London and then later in Paris. In London, she worked for a French bank, Paribas, as a lawyer out on the trading floor, doing largely swaps and options. When I moved to Paris, she stayed in London and continued working there until she could organize a move to the French headquarters of Paribas, which she did, and she found that was really quite difficult working environment. In London it had been an international environment; her boss was an Australian, for instance. In Paris, the headquarters was almost all French, and she was the only American in the French headquarters -- and without 5+/5+ French---. Along the way she was head hunted by an American insurance company called AIG, American International Group, which is our biggest overseas insurance company. They were making so much money they set up a bank to invest and reinvest it. Not only were they doing swaps and options, but all sorts of complex derivatives. So Elisabeth moved to join them at their Paris operation, a twelve-minute walk from our grand representational apartment on Avenue Kleber, again out on the trading floor and had quite an experience. When I left France after four years, she stayed on for a year and a half. She continued to work for them as she undertook to line up a job at the World Bank here. But fundamentally my wife was the principal breadwinner in our family for the time that we were at our last two posts, which is unusual, to say the least, and I include in that even the value of the housing and schooling and things that we were provided by the US Government. I am terribly proud of her and proud to be her husband. So to me that was a relief on a variety of fronts, particularly in view of the leukemia which by that point I was being treated for at the Hotel Dieu Hospital near the cathedral.

WALTER J.P. CURLEY
Ambassador
France (1989-1993)

Ambassador Walter Curley grew up in the Pittsburgh area. After graduating from Yale in 1943, he fought in World War II as a Marine. Throughout his life, Ambassador Curley has been an author, a New York City Official and a partner at J.H. Whitney and Company. Throughout his Foreign Service career, he has served as ambassador to Ireland and to France. Ambassador Curley was interviewed by Richard Jackson in 1998.

CURLEY: We were down in Nassau, at the Lyford Key Club, being really frivolous, and the telephone rang. It was Jim Baker on the phone. He chided me, saying, "We're up here working." Made me feel terrible, but he said, "The President and I would love to have you get back in the diplomatic service here, and the President says you can go anyplace you like." Boy, that was pretty nice. I said, "Jim, that is so nice, but honest to God, anyplace..." He said, "Okay, look. Say something, otherwise it's going to be..." And I said, "Well, we both speak Italian, like those Italians, and know their character. We'd love that." But I said, "That's not necessary." I said also, "We know India. We don't speak it - I have a little Tamil, but not much. Well, we'd go to India and we'd love that."

Baker said, "Okay, I'll call you back in two days." And in two days, the President called me back - while we were still down there; I felt doubly embarrassed. And the President said, "How good is your Italian?" And I said, "My Italian's pretty good." And he said, "Is it as good as your French, because that's where you're going? You're going to France. How good is your French?" He and I had the same French teacher at Andover. I said, "Well, it's about as good as yours, if you had that French teacher." And he said, "Oh, no, it has to be better than that." (Well, it was. I took it at Yale and I had used it. Funnily enough, I'd used my French a lot in China. There was a French community there. So my French wasn't bad.) Well, he said, "That's where you're going." When I told Mary, or Taitsie, she was thrilled and excited and surprised.

I'm jumping a bit to the language part of it. I really worked on it before I left here. I worked with a man. I didn't write anything; we just spoke. So I got my French up to a pretty good level. It wasn't bad, but I got it up to a better level. And then when I got over there I insisted at dinner parties that we preferred to speak French at the endless formal dinner parties. They'd always start out saying, "Shall we speak French or English?" Or they'd always start out in English. And I was dying to speak English, but I said to them, "No," and Taitsie did, too, "No, we prefer to speak French." It was agonizing at first, particularly for Taitsie, but it was very good for us both. That way I became totally at ease with that part of it as we started our four years in France. We were there '89, '90, '91, '92, and I came home in mid-'93.

Q: You followed Joe Rodgers, then.

CURLEY: I followed Joe Rodgers. Right. Let me tell you a rather interesting incident. George Bush did an extraordinarily thoughtful and useful and nice thing. I had been approved by the Senate, and I had no problems there at the Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing except with Senator Joe Biden. Joe Biden was asking me if I spoke French, and then I spoke French to him at the hearing, and asked him if he spoke French. I said it nicely. Senator Claiborne Pell was there and does speak excellent French. So Claiborne Pell asked him the same thing, and Biden was put off. I think he just wanted to bait me a bit because I was a Republican nominee. Anyway, I cleared it through with no problem. Now we were preparing to go, and Bush called me up on the phone. We were here in New York, and I had just finished that ambassadorial charm school with a lot of other ambassadors. It was very worthwhile, incidentally. "What are you doing next weekend," George Bush asked. When the President calls, where does the big gorilla sit? Anyplace he wants. I said, "What do you have in mind, Mr. President?" And he said, "Why don't you and Taitsie come up for the weekend to Kennebunkport?" He said, "I think it would be very useful because I have President Mitterrand and Madame Mitterrand coming over with a bunch of his senior people." I think it might be useful if you met Mitterrand before you got to France." I said, "If the protocol is okay, not having presented my credentials. If you think the niceties of that wouldn't be uneasy-making for the French, I can't think of anything I'd rather do." So he said, "Well, don't worry about the protocol. I'll handle that part. Why don't you come up a day early." George Bush loves to play golf, and so do I. All the Bushes are very competitive. Bush said, "Come up a day early and we'll play a little golf with Baker and Brent Scowcroft." So, we went up a day early and had a bit of that, and then arrived Mitterrand, Madame Mitterrand, Admiral Langsade - remember him? - and of course, Foreign Minister Roland Dumas, Ambassador de Margerie, and a whole phalanx of French government types. And it was a time of very serious discussion but also some fun. I could never have perceived Mitterrand without a tie, or without a coat, for that matter. Well, in the Bush way of life, particularly at Kennebunkport, it is militantly casual. Sweaters were kind of foisted on and ties were snatched off President Mitterrand, and we had a hell of a good time. Mitterrand is - we can talk about him later, if you like, but we had a most interesting time there that weekend, and I can tell you, if you ever want to hit the ground running and have a leg up in France, be introduced to the President of France by the President of the United States in his house with his arm around you. It sets your social and professional scale pretty well by the time you get there. Baker was there, and Susan, his wife, and Taitsie, and one of Bush's sisters, Nancy Bush Ellis, was there, and of course, Brent Scowcroft. It was a very, very cozy time at Kennebunkport. The payoff because Mitterrand knew from that and from other subsequent things that I had real access to the Oval Office and to Jim Baker. That was most helpful. Well, Mitterrand plus his senior people. Dumas saw the relationship between George Bush and me. So that was very helpful. Also, Bush and Mitterrand were genuinely good friends. Now that was an odd couple - I mean, it really was a funny couple - so different - but they were seriously firm friends; they genuinely liked, admired, and respected each other. That had built up during the time that Bush was Vice President. He and Mitterrand had solidified this friendship. And the reason, probably the main reason, that Bush chose me, outside of the fact that he wanted a loyalist around, was that he wanted a friendly gesture to indicate to Mitterrand that he was sending one of his close friends who'd been ambassador before and for whom he had great personal rapport. He wanted Mitterrand to know that. Mitterrand would be flattered. It works that way. So that was the basic reason I was sent to France. I was very grateful to Bush for arranging it that way.

Q: What a great start!

CURLEY: It was a good start. Yes, indeed.

Q: So you arrived, then, at that big embassy, 50 government agencies, or whatever you have there-

CURLEY: Yes. 1200 employees, a change from Ireland - at least in size or scope.

Q: You kept your DCM, Mark Lissfelt, who had stayed on.

CURLEY: As I mentioned to you before we started, I thought I'd save a little money for the State Department regarding travel expenses interviewing prospective DCMs, so I said, "Let's start with the incumbent." So Mark Lissfelt came to New York for me to interview. I thought he was a really good person. We got on. The chemistry was just great, and I liked everything about him from the start, and as time went on, I liked him more and more. That holds true today. Both he and his wife, Cindy, are extraordinarily able, capable, nice, funny, interesting, curious, and attractive people. I enjoy them. We made a good team. And I hasten to add that when he finally had to leave, after renewing his assignment to the point of near irregularity, I was again deluged by people who wanted to replace Mark. I got a call from Larry Eagleburger, who said, "I'd like you to take very seriously Avis Bohlen as a candidate. Think of her very seriously." And I said, "Well, Larry, I know Avis. I like her very much. But," I said, "we are already gender-imbalanced here at the moment. The head of our commercial section is a woman. All of our senior consular people - consuls general and consuls - are all women." I said, "If we have another here, it's, I think, a little de trop [French: overboard]. Nothing to do with ability or anything." And Eagleburger said, "Well, no, I just repeat this: take it seriously." I thought very seriously, and said, "Well, that's not a big problem, gender imbalance. I mean, think of the years we went along when there were just too many men around. It wasn't so bad. So it's not going to be so bad if we have too many women." Well, Avis came, and Avis and I became really good friends. And she is without peer, peerless; she did a wonderful job, and we again were a very good team. I liked Avis and admired her enormously. And that holds true today. So I was lucky three times: with Jack Rendall, Mark Lissfelt, and Avis Bohlen. I couldn't have been luckier.

Q: You had some security worries in that big embassy. Did somebody sneak in at one point?

CURLEY: Starting in '89 - as I said, we got there in May or June '89, just in time for the Embassy Fourth of July party, an instant way to make 5,000 new friends - it was really a remarkable period in history, the events in that '90 to '92 period. The reunification of Germany; the implosion of communism in Eastern Europe; the disappearance of the Soviet Union; the Gulf War; Maastricht. We had all these things just go bang-bang-bang, one right after another. I mean it was just incredible, let alone the Tiananmen Square massacre and all that, but just in Europe itself and especially in France - not London as much. London's certainly very important - always has been, always will be - but a lot of that activity, a lot of the repercussions and reactions and responses and intrigue, if you will, was happening in Paris. So it was a cascade of events and occurrences. Of course, the Gulf War was the epitome of that whole thing.

And that was a difficult period with the French. That was not easy. The French took to that coalition effort - putting together the coalition - very reluctantly, very. They saw themselves in that posture they always have of being outside the military structure of NATO, and there was no way they were going to get into the coalition other than as an observer. I had a lot of instructions from the Secretary of State and from the President himself: get in there and do a little shin kicking, they said. I tried, but the French were wearing shin guards. But when I was given a little “ammunition” by Secretary Baker. I went in and had a chat with Foreign Minister Roland Dumas. He and Jim Baker did not have the best of chemistry. They were both very effective people, but chemically they had a hard time. I went in to see Dumas about getting France to agree to the refueling of some of our big aircraft - bombers - that were leaving the UK en route to the Gulf. We wanted to have them refueled in southern France and then onward. That was finally agreed to, and then, kicking and screaming, the French were finally brought into the coalition. And then, as always, they did a hell of a good job. The French were on that left flank in Desert Storm; they worked with our Marine Corps, so I was particularly interested as a former Marine Corps officer. They worked well with the Marines. The French did a good job.

Q: Did the defense minister resign at that point?

CURLEY: Chevènement.

Q: Chevènement, yes.

CURLEY: He did.

Q: So it was a moment of high feelings?

CURLEY: A lot, a lot. And I - well, I suppose this is supposed to be all candid, and no public secrets here - but I was pleased when Chevènement resigned. He was virulently anti-American, and he was very communist. That sounds like an epithet, but I don't mean it to be - he was very much that way, very left socialist in his political orientation, and with that came along this very undisguised anti-Americanism. I found that very hard to deal with, because he became kind of petulant and, I thought, a little arrogant - never so much to me, but I could see it in the reactions. I was pleased when he moved on. But the French, as always, have a little problem with our way of getting at the problem, but once aboard, as historically they've done before, they've always been good partners, militarily and...

Q: Your job was somehow explaining that to Washington, which didn't always see it that way.

CURLEY: Well, on that subject, if I can divert a bit here, there was a period of high sensitivity about them. There were always those, in fact. Well, right after the victory in the Desert Storm Operation, I got a call from the White House, from President Bush himself, and he said, "I want to talk to you about the French reaction right after this Gulf War thing because there are some things we'd like to do with the French and I'd like to talk to you about them. Could you please come back to Washington?" And I said, "Wonderful, I'd love to." I hadn't been to the U.S. all during the Gulf War. So I said, "Sure, I will do that, Sir." So Taitise and I went back. She hadn't been back to see the kids or anything. We went right to Washington and had dinner with the President and Barbara Bush - at a dinner party in the White House, not for us but including us. There were a lot of heavy hitters there, the Bakers, the Cheneys, the Websters, the Colin Powells, and about six others. The next morning, I met alone with the President in the Oval Office. It was expected to be a half an hour, which is a long time with the President. It ended up being over an hour. And what he wanted to ask me was, What was the French national mood and the governmental mood - the man on the street mood - post-Desert Storm? I said, "Damn near euphoric." And it was true. People were stopping me on the street and saying, "Monsieur l'Ambassadeur Américain [French: Mr. American Ambassador]," and giving me a kiss, men and women, on both cheeks. I told that to Bush. And actually, it happened to me on the street and in a restaurant. I said, "The mood is euphoric. Even in the Travelers' Club, that men's club, that bastion of propriety, I got kissed by a man." The President said, "I hope it wasn't in the men's room." But it was like that. It was euphoric.

He said the reason for his keen interest in the French mood was that they wanted to get the French into the muddle about the Arabs and the Israelis. Baker was very keen, as you know, about getting on with the Middle East peace process. And he first wanted to make the French a major partner in that. They'd been out there for so many years. They were very sophisticated on the subject. But recently - or in our recent history - they'd been kind of left out of the discussion or invited only as observers. So Bush wanted to make that change, bring in the French as major colleagues. Was the time right? That's what he wanted to talk to me about. Was the time right for that? And I said, "It will never be better." Well, that ball took a lot of different bounces before...

But back to the French-U.S. friction. Right after that euphoria, not unnaturally, I guess, a period of irritation started, a subliminal erosion of good will. It was almost palpable, and it was not pleasant at all. There was friction and abrasion between the U.S. and French interlocutors. It was there. And in Foggy Bottom, in the State Department, there was again - to use that word - palpable anti-French feeling. I didn't go native there in France, but I could feel in Washington this feeling that they felt the French were anti-American, and there was a knee-jerk reaction against the French in some very important quarters in Washington, in the State Department. And I could see this manifested in the negotiations that were happening, or trying to happen, in France between American teams and their French counterparts. It was really pretty bad. I could see that the American style, the instant familiarity, the back-slapping, the cold-water candor, the rush to the finish, the do-it-now approach, came eyeball to eyeball with the French Il faut réfléchir attitude, the Cartesian logic, the let's-take-a-little-relaxation-over-this-thing. It was a clash - nothing too fundamental, I figured - but it was a triumph of style over substance. I could see these guys - you know them all, Dick, because they were all prominent State people - some of them have left, but some of them are still there - prominent experts, State Department personages - who had this thing, not to be outdone by the French, who had the same kind of stylistic problem.

The French ambassador in Washington was a man called Jacques Andreani. And Jacques Andreani had a few stylistic problems of his own - to many, he seemed arrogant, abrasive. But I said this to him, I said, "Look, Jacques, we've got a style problem here between our top negotiating teams, our policy people. If we can get over that, we can smooth this road and get talking decently." He said, "You talk to your people." I said, "Okay," and went to the President and to Baker. Baker first. This was in Washington. I went to Washington for this purpose. I said, "I perceive problems with certain State Department people," and I named them, "at a certain level. These people are able and good and they're looking out for our best interests, but it's very abrasive, and I think we ought to try to change their style or much of our joint efforts in harmonizing policy will go down the drain." And I said, "You've got to get them to change it." Secretary Baker said, "No, you tell them to change, but you tell them I said so." I said, "Okay, and I'd like to mention this problem to the President, if you don't mind." And I did. I mentioned the guys' names and everything, but in a way that - I hope - didn't impugn their careers or anything, or their intelligence. The President said, "You tell those clowns, but you tell them, and if they have a question they can tell me or Baker." So I'm with this instruction - I'll put it like that - and I went to three or four of them and spelled out the problem and just said, "Look, let's change the act a little bit." Well, I put myself in this and said, "Let's change our act and our style a little bit to get over this problem." And they all said, "Those French bastards are hard to deal with. You know that?" And I said, "That's exactly the way they feel, too." So I went to Andreani, and he did the same. We got it changed. And it got better. There was one day [when] we started to talk about it in Paris with everybody present, the two sides. And, for a little example, the French would say, "Well, sometimes we don't like the way you arrive in Paris on your plane from Washington. At seven o'clock in the morning, we all sit down to a business breakfast. We don't like to meet until 10. We hate the U.S. 'working breakfasts.' You want to meet at 7:00." Well, there were a lot of little things, but we got the stylistic things out of the way so we could deal properly with the bigger matters. It became amiable, at least, again - for awhile. I basically like the French, a lot.

Q: Did you think somehow that France was in a delayed transition in those years and all of the shocks you mentioned of the world changing around them, and particularly German reunification, had changed their role, and they were beginning to worry about millions of North Africans and how they were fitting into the society?

CURLEY: Absolutely. No question about it.

Q: Lots of their industry, particularly in the computer area, was way behind ours, and they felt threatened.

CURLEY: They did, but in the industrial part first, they caught up fast, particularly on the high-tech side. They caught up very fast on the nuclear energy side. They certainly did, and surpassed us in some ways. Their main nervousness was the German problem. The immigration problem with North Africa and all of that racial, if you will, problem - very important and very nervous-making to them - but of priority importance was this fear of the German problem. I had many discussions - many; I'd say I had three - serious discussions on Germany with Mitterrand, and Mitterrand told me one time at breakfast, just the two of us at the Elysée, that he was very afraid of the Germans. He said, "I admire the Germans. I really admire them, but I fear them." He said - I'll never forget this - he said - and he was very interesting on the subject, very knowledgeable, very intellectual, and learned - he said that he always considered the Germans as a Volk [German: people], not a nation but a Volk; he said they have a feeling of their own destiny, you know, that their destiny lies to the east, I would say, and there's always Lebensraum [German for "room for expansion"]. There's always that. Our American efforts at the time had a lot of emphasis on Gorbachev, if you recall, and on Kohl and Bush, the three of them were always talking. They were the ones in a huddle. And that made Mitterrand nervous. It made the British very nervous, too. Margaret Thatcher was a little nervous. But you're dead right. France was in a transition then, in many ways.

Q: Well, now, Mitterrand - you got off to such a wonderful start, from the intro and he's often called, I think, "the Sphinx." You got to know him quite well in those years. Perhaps towards the end, he also knew that he was sick.

CURLEY: Yes, we did become friends. Mitterrand was never the type that relished the backslapping, let-me-tell-you-the-latest-joke type relationship. He had a very wry sense of humor, kind of an ironic view of life, and he could tweak you - he liked to do that in an enigmatic, intellectual way. I liked his sense of irony. He was highly intelligent, so whatever you were going to do, you had better be prepared to tap dance pretty fast, because he knew what he was talking about. He was always most gracious to my wife and to me and always interesting to listen to. And happily for my relationship, from my standpoint, if I needed to see him, I could call up and be received. I would try to keep that to a minimum, which is why, I guess, I was received - because I didn't hound him. We got along well, and I enjoyed it.

You asked me another question here. I'm trying to remember what it was.

Q: We talked about his health.

CURLEY: Big point. I was asked a number of times by Washington if I could find out what was really wrong with Mitterrand, because you'd see him sometime, he'd look terrible, absolutely terrible - I mean, kind of yellow, parchment skin, frighteningly bad-looking, unhealthy looking - and then other times he'd be ruddy and vibrant. His demeanor was always the same. His actions and his intellectual qualities were always there, but the physical look would vary wildly. So I was asked by Washington what did I think. And of course, they had everybody on the case; they had the CIA. What I was told was they figured it was kidney failure. I said, "Well, let me see what I can find out through all kinds of sneaky sources, French sources, see what I can find out and then you can see what you can find out." It was more than curiosity. I had a certain compassion about it. I wasn't just gleefully trying to find out what was wrong with the Sphinx. And it was an important bit of knowledge strategically for us, we Americans.

I made no headway. I mean, I tried everything and heard all the different things. And do you recall when there was a meeting of Bush and Mitterrand in Saint Martin, down in the Caribbean? Baker called me. I was flying over from Paris to Washington and then getting on Air Force One to fly down to Saint Martin with Baker and Bush, which I did. But before I left Paris, Baker called and asked me, "Can you find out about Mitterrand's health? President Bush is definitely going to ask me, what is wrong with Mitterrand and how will he be or how is he when he gets to Saint Martin?" And I said, "Okay. I will make a point of seeing him before I leave Paris, which is tomorrow." I didn't have to make a point because there was a reception at the Elysée that evening. So I went to it and there was Mitterrand - big as life. I had a minute with him and talked, and he said he was looking forward to seeing me in Saint Martin. He looked perfectly wonderful. He looked terrific. So I cabled that back to Baker, and then later I told him on Air Force One going down to the Caribbean. I said, "He looked just terrific, and all that worry about his health you can put aside." Bush then goes over to a rendez-vous area to wait for Mitterrand. Baker and I went out to the Saint Martin airfield to greet the Concorde that came in with Mitterrand. Baker and I are standing there at the foot of the ramp. The door opens and Mitterrand stands at the top of the stairs looking like Hell, like Hell. And Baker, out of the side of his mouth, as we're walking up the stairs and Mitterrand's walking down the stairs, says, "Ambassador, you're information is [expletive]. That man coming down the stairs isn't sick; he's dead!" And by God, he looked it. He really looked bad. We never learned what it was. Of course, it ended up being prostate cancer, but I still think (The doctors in France were never forthcoming.) he also did have a serious kidney condition. I think he had - what do you call it? - dialysis, on somewhat of a regular basis, which took him from deathly pale to ruddy, and fooled us all..

Q: He came in as a real socialist, I guess, with communists in his government, and then evolved to a liberal or a very moderate position. You watched much of that process. Was that expediency or change in his, kind of, outlook?

CURLEY: Expediency. Oh, yes, he was a most expedient fellow. Well, I suppose the change in outlook became expedience. Mitterrand - before I got there, but I certainly watched it before I got there - single-handedly defused and eliminated, for all intents and purposes, the Communist Party, on his own. That wasn't due to any pressure from the conservatives. No, he did that with some very adroit plays with the socialists.

On the subject of Mitterrand, as long as this is a historical document to a certain extent, or to the fullest extent, Mitterrand's personal life was something that was always an enigma to Americans, not so much to the French. But Madame Mitterrand never featured much in his official life. That doesn't mean that she was a shrinking violet. She was anything but that. She had her own agenda. She had her own passions, and I mean both physical and philosophical, and she was an interesting person, but certainly not, as far as I was concerned, a fetching person. She had minimal charm. I'm told that in previous years, way back, she'd been very good-looking. There were some vestiges of that. They also said that she'd been charming. As far as I was concerned there were no apparent vestiges of that. They also said she was very intelligent, and I would say that was in fuller bloom.

But François Mitterrand had a private life. He was a romantic figure in many ways, to put it mildly. He had many snuggles - I don't think promiscuously, not all at once - but he had a litany of liaisons with various ladies, none of whom, as far as I could discover, thought badly of him afterwards, which is about as neat a trick as you can pull - to have a former romance speaking well of you. But I think he did, so that says something for him. While I was there, France elected its first woman prime minister, Edith Cresson. Edith Cresson had style - not much class, but a lot of style. She was smart and she knew where she was going, and it was rumored - France is always big on this - that the prime minister, Edith Cresson, had been one of former President Mitterrand's "friends" - as Time Magazine used to call it, "a great and good friend." I rather liked Edith Cresson. But she was very naughty. They were great and good friends. Well, old François was a most interesting character. That friendship with Bush that I alluded to was everywhere - in the dark days and in the bright days. That was always there. I give Bush - and Baker, of course - I give them full credit for getting France into the coalition in the Desert Storm Operation. Absolutely. I don't think enough time has been spent by historians or analysts or reporters on the matter of Bush's personal diplomacy. It's been alluded to, but I don't think it was ever properly understood, or at least the breadth of it or the depth of it understood. It was a most important ingredient in Bush's foreign policy operations and a most serious ingredient in the man himself. His effective relationship with Mitterrand is a prime example.

Q: Were they putting pressure on you to slim down the size of that big embassy in those years, the budget cuts? That came somewhat later, I guess.

CURLEY: Well, yes, it did. It started in my time with the cutting down of consuls, of consular staffs. I got instructions, orders, if you will. Ivan Selin - do you remember Ivan Selin, the State Department cost-cutting czar? Bizarre - I liked Ivan, but boy, he had some very spartan, draconian ideas. Instructions came - you don't instruct an ambassador if you're at that level - I got strong recommendations, to be followed by instructions if needed, from Ivan Selin: get rid of three consulates: Bordeaux, Lyons, and perhaps Strasbourg. I knew I couldn't fight all three battles at once, so I chose Lyons, a very important center, as you know. It is sort of the equivalent of Chicago or Pittsburgh. So I said, "No." And that raised a little Hell. Selin responded, "What do you mean, 'No'?" I said "I mean just that. You give me your rationale. Start out with numbers, because if we're talking numbers, let's play a numbers game; I'll give you some and we'll see who wins." And I went to Washington and fought with Ivan. He's a good competitor. He likes that. He relishes the battle. I won that battle, at least while I remained in Paris. I think that after I left, the closures happened quickly.

Dick, maybe an interesting - at least to me - parenthetical comment here might relate to my friendship with Giscard d'Estaing, the former president of France and, as you know, an arch-adversary of Mitterrand, a totally different type. He was from the conservative right and a very interesting man, seen by many to be Mr. Arrogance, Mr. Elegance, Mr. Supreme personified, but a most engaging man. During my time there, he approached me initially and asked if he, as representative of an important French party, could be briefed. And I said, "Yes, of course." At times when I felt I was too busy or didn't want to do it, for some reason, I always did it anyway. I'd go over to his office - he would offer to come to my office; I never did; he was the former president, and so I always went to his office. We became friends, and particularly during the Gulf War, he was always interested in some of the rationale that was being employed. I was as forthcoming with him as I possibly could be without revealing anything compromising. He really appreciated that, and in turn - many times rather than just hearing one party line or if I had some dilemmas in my own mind about how certain things might work - I would go to see Giscard d'Estaing about French and European matters. And we became great friends, and are to this day. Well, that was just a little postscript to my time there, but it added to my repertoire, so to speak. I never talked about it much - I didn't hide it - but I just appreciated that friendship.

Q: Thinking of you sitting atop that big embassy and all those streams of information coming in to you every day, the French papers, the international press, the embassy reports, the CIA reports-

CURLEY: All the above and more.

Q: -all the above and a lot more, were there any you particularly valued? Did you develop a confidence in what the Agency, for example, was reporting? You found it useful?

CURLEY: I'm going to say something that history may think you rehearsed me for, and I can assure historians that you did not, nor did anybody. One of my abiding impressions of my years in working in that foreign service area was the quality of the intelligence of the men and women I worked with, in the Foreign Service. I'm not saying that gratuitously. I experienced it; I utilized it; I exploited it. It was extraordinarily wonderful. There were exceptions always, but the average of excellence and the quality of work that I got from almost all sources was of a very high level and an enduringly high level. I was impressed by most of the agencies very much. I had no complaints. I had some irritation, some complaints about a few internecine conflicts, like between the defense attaché and the political officer and this and that. There were a lot of those - nothing to do with the intelligence level of these men, or women, but it had to do with whatever bad chemistry or just bad viewpoints or conflicting viewpoints existed between the parties, and I would have to wade in every now and then and do some scolding that an ambassador is supposed to do from time to time. Overall, the reporting was wonderful, whether it was the CIA, whether it was the DEA. I mention those two off the start because a lot of people don't know about the DEA, for example. They know about, or think they know about, the CIA - excellent. I found the little things about the CIA better than some of the big ones. I was always sort of abashed by the fact that they misread the Soviet Union's strength so badly. So I think on macro work they may need a little checking up. On some of the less macro and more micro work they were first class.

The budget cutting you asked about was going on. We always had to pay attention to that, and it got no better as time went on. That budget really shrank, and for understandable reasons, I guess. But it got worse in subsequent times. I know Ambassador Harriman faced it and now Rohatyn faces it. The State Department was and is lousy, inept at courting and lobbying Congress for the money it needs. Lousy.

Q: And then finally came the election, and the administration changed yet again, and that would have put an end probably to that term of yours in Paris.

CURLEY: I stayed through March. New York was always our home base. We never gave up our apartment; we just, sort of, left the apartment. And my wife said that, after four years or four and a half years away, the culture shock of coming back from Paris - bang - to Park Avenue and 74th Street was a little much, so she suggested that it would be a very good idea for the ambassador and his wife to take a little "decompressing" detour to Morocco, where we had never been - to your old stamping ground, Dick. So we spent 10 days there and decompressed. We traveled all over, partout [French: everywhere], thanks in great measure to the loan of the ambassadorial van by Freck Vreeland, who was chief of mission there a very short period of time, but he gave me his personal Land Rover. And then we got a driver who knew what was going on, a driver who had driven for Ambassador Joseph Reed, and was on his own by then. So we moved about in some style and had a wonderful time.

My time in France and in Ireland - and I say this absolutely subjectively, not objectively in any way - were very lucky posts for me. They were both interesting; they were both areas that I remain fascinated with.

Q: Even in France, were there any things that you regretted not getting to or accomplishing? One always leaves with a sense of unfinished business, but any particular objective that you had?

CURLEY: Yes, it remains an objective. There were some small objectives, and then there were some bigger ones. The bigger objective which still is there is this. It was there when I got there and was there when I left and will be there a long time unless something is done about it. The United States and France are ancient historical allies. The old cliché that France is America's oldest friend is historically true. We've been allies in a number of wars; we've been firm friends. But the average American on the street doesn't know beans about France or about the French. The man walking along the street in downtown Cleveland - ask him about a Frenchman or a French woman or France, what do they know? They think of a beret or they think of a song or wine or couture or something. They just don't understand what the hell the French are about. Strangely enough, that is relatively true - not as much, but relatively true - in France about the Americans, although we have a lot of Americans that have been over there as soldiers and a lot of our movies and our television shows and tourism have given some knowledge of Americans over there. I'm not saying it's the right image, but some knowledge. That doesn't exist here. There are a fair amount of French tourists that come here, but not even close to the millions of Americans that go there. Also, it was explained to me by the French - obviously, I would have cottoned on to it anyway - there are no real French immigrants here. I mean, in Quebec a little or maybe a tiny bit in New Orleans, but hardly anybody has a French grandmother. Everybody has an Irish grandmother or an English grandfather or German or Jewish or whatever, but there is no French residue here. There's no "race memory," no heritage. There was no French immigration to the U.S. You see, we don't know enough about the French, and I don't think that's good. I guess there are ways. We tried. The USIS, which is an echo now, tried through cultural exchanges, and they never worked very much or very well. So that's a major project left undone: more mutual knowledge of each other in the French-American relationship. But, after all, maybe a little mystery isn't all bad. Maybe it's better that way in the long run.

Q: Right.

CURLEY: Among the short things that I wish I'd done and didn't do was to spend more time in eastern France. It's relatively unknown to the average American. There's a lot of power there with a lot of industry, a different kind of mentality. I know a fair amount about it, but not enough. That's something I wish I'd done more of.

Q: There's been a lot of writing about what they call "bananas" these days, that the regions of Europe are assuming more powers than the states, and that there are industrial regions that stretch, say, from Barcelona up through southern France and to Milan and then in Germany.

CURLEY: Yes.

Q: Does that correspond to what you see?

CURLEY: Absolutely. That was one of the reasons that I objected most vociferously to closing the Lyons consulate, because Lyons is right in the heart of one of those big belts you're talking about. So I thought that would be just madness to close a consulate in an area like that. No, I think that's very true, and increasingly so, don't you?

Q: Very much, very much.

CURLEY: I did not mention - and should have - President Chirac. Now Chirac was mayor of Paris while I was there and had been prime minister, as you know. He and I became good friends, too. I always liked him, Chirac and his wife, Bernadette. She's charming and gracious and fun, and I liked him very much. He's very different from Mitterrand in the sense of homme d'état [French: head of state]. I'd say Mitterrand was definitely an homme d'état. I'm not too sure that that same expression applies to President Chirac. He's certainly literally an homme d'état. He's President of France! But Jacques Chirac does not have that certain imperial gravitas. He has other fine and crucial qualities. I mean, I can see Mitterrand's face on a coin - and I'll tell you who also could see his face on a coin or a stamp very readily was Mitterrand himself. Sometimes when you looked at him he'd turn his face in profile. He had a feeling, I felt, that he was the emperor, and he had that imperial kind of view of life. François Le Quatre [French: François the Fourth]. I don't think Jacques Chirac thinks of himself as a head on a coin. He's a little more relaxed in that sense, but a very nice man, a first-class mayor, having his problems as president in that "cohabitation," but a thoroughly nice man, a great admirer of America, and very understanding about the frivolous things of America. He's very tolerant, unlike Minister of Culture Jack Lang, or his ilk, who take great exception to the so-called American culture invading France. Chirac's much more relaxed about that; he likes Big Macs and chocolate sodas and things like that, junk food. A good man, and I think an effective politician. I with him well. We shall see whether the "style factor" raises its ugly little head between our two governments.

Q: Well, Mr. Ambassador, I know you've got a one o'clock appointment. This has been a very interesting interview, and unless you have anything further you'd like to add, we thank you.

CURLEY: Well, you are very welcome, and I'm flattered that you took the time to come up and see me. I hope we meet again.

Q: Thanks very much.

FRANKLIN E. HUFFMAN
Director of Programs, USIS
Paris (1990-1993)

Franklin E. Huffman was born in Harrisonburg, Virginia in 1934. In 1955 he graduated from Bridgewater College and immediately joined IVS. From 1967 to 1985 he was a Professor of Southeast Asian languages and linguistics at Yale and Cornell. His second career was as a Foreign Service Officer with USIA where he was posted to London, Rangoon, Marrakech, Paris, Washington, Phnom Penh, and Wellington, with subsequent WAE tours to N'Djamena (Chad) and Phnom Penh. Mr. Huffman was interviewed in January 2006 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: So after Marrakech you were assigned to Paris, right? When were you there?

HUFFMAN: Three years, from the summer of 1990 to the summer of 1993. But Paris, as a non-hardship post, was a four-year assignment for USIS officers. I stayed three. I curtailed out of Paris. I curtailed three times in the course of my career. My mentor at USIA said, "Huffman, never extend because they'll forget about you, move often, and every time you move, you move up."

Q: Okay, Frank, what were you doing in Paris and how did you get there?

HUFFMAN: Well, I had served in London for Bud Korngold, who's one of the legendary super PAOs of USIA – former Newsweek bureau chief in Moscow, that sort of thing --and by the time I was leaving Morocco he was PAO Paris. So I contacted him and of course he knew me and knew my work and was eager to have me come to Paris and he managed to pull a few strings and get me there.

My job in Paris was Director of Programs. Now, Paris was unusual in that it had a tripartite organization of the USIS post. Most USIS posts, have a press section headed by an IO and a cultural section headed by the CAO (Cultural Affairs Officer), both supervised by the PAO. In Paris they had press, cultural and programs. I was head of programs, which meant primarily speakers and seminars. The U.S. Speaker Program used to be called the AMPART Program, or American Participant Program. I programmed about 50 speakers a year in Paris. These speakers came from three different sources. Primarily they came from our office back at USIA that recruited U.S. experts in various fields -- academics, government officials, professionals -- and supplied them to posts in response to posts' demands for particular kinds of speakers to meet the public diplomacy challenges of that particular country. Only about one third of my speakers came from this office. A second one-third came from what we call TOOs, Target of Opportunity speakers. And being Paris, of course, this was a rich source of expertise because you have a lot of prominent people going through Paris, and we would prevail on them to come and give a couple of talks for the U.S. Embassy. And the third source, not quite as prominent as the other two, was embassy officers themselves. Whenever I got a request from a university or a think-tank for somebody to discuss trade issues or security issues or the Chinese-American relationship or arms control in the post-Cold War world, I would go to the political section or the economic section and I'd say "Look, could you go out on Thursday night and talk to such and such an academic group?" Those Foreign Service Officers who could lecture in French were particularly useful. Finally, I myself would go on occasion; I think I gave maybe half a dozen lectures in French while I was there. Having been trained as an anthropologist, my topic was usually a comparison of U.S. and French culture and cross cultural communication, or as is so often the case, miscommunication.

So I was able to field about 50 speakers a year. Some of the speakers we programmed were Ambassador Vernon Walters, Librarian of Congress James Billington, Barry Bosworth and William Chace of the Brookings Institution, Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor (USIS of course played a subsidiary role in her visit), Ambassadors John Maresca, Joseph Greenwald, Maynard Glitman, and John Kornblum. Several of the embassy officers I programmed later became ambassadors, such as Alexander Vershbow and Neils Marquardt. And of course I had a very professional staff. I had three French Foreign Service Nationals working for me, each of whom was a specialist in her particular field. One was a PhD in political and military security affairs and was a member of the Institut Français des Relations Internationales, the French Institute of International Relations, and she was a professional in her own right. Another one was a PhD in economics and she was a member of the various economic organizations, well-known to her academic and governmental colleagues. The third one was a specialist in American studies. Whenever we recruited a particular speaker from Washington, one of them would go to their counterparts in the French government or in academia, at the Sorbonne, or the Ecole Polytechnique or Science Po and say, "Would you like to have such and such a speaker?" The French are extremely knowledgeable about who are the prominent people in their fields and there was great demand for Ambassador Walters as a speaker because in addition to a half a dozen other languages he spoke fluent French.

Q: Translated for Eisenhower. As a matter of fact I think it was General de Gaulle at the time when they were both making speeches and Walters translated, de Gaulle looked at him and said, "Tres bien, Walters."

HUFFMAN: I had an interesting contretemps with Ambassador Walters. I was his handler, and he was going to be available over several days. He had an apartment of his own on the Champs-Élysées; he was in Paris often enough that he had his own pied-a-terre there. And when he had finished his program at the French Institute of International Relations and the various venues where he was speaking, he was to catch a flight out of town the next day so I sent one of the USIS drivers to pick him up at his apartment and deliver him to Charles de Gaulle airport. Well, about a half hour later I had a call from General Walters, saying "Where's that driver?" I said, "Well, I sent him a half hour ago; I don't know what happened." "Well you better get somebody here pretty soon or I'm going to miss my plane." I said, "Yes sir, I'll certainly locate him or if I can't find him I'll send another car." So I got another car and went up to General Walter's apartment where he was supposed to meet my driver and my driver had apparently misunderstood exactly where he was supposed to meet the General, but to make a long story short they hadn't gotten together. And General Walters was fuming. I got them together and apologized profusely, and as he was getting in the car the driver decided he would put the window up on the passenger side. But General Walters had his hand on the window so the window went up and mashed his fingers. By that time General Walters, who does not suffer fools gladly, was turning the air blue. "Huffman, who do you work for? I'm going to give him an earful!" I was devastated, but I learned an important lesson. When I discussed this with my colleagues, they said, "Huffman, you know, a man like General Walters, you don't send a driver to take him to the airport, you accompany him to the airport." And I realized, "Yes, well, okay, that was a mistake."

Q: Oh boy. Well, with all these lectures, what worked, what didn't work from your impression? How did they go over with the French?

HUFFMAN: Well, you know, I don't think a lot of French were persuaded against their will. They tended to have a lively question and answer period but the French were very polite and very civil and you'd have an academic discussion. I think they served an important purpose in sort of reassuring certain audiences that we were not totally crazy and in modifying some of the more virulent anti-Americanism that we encountered there. Paris of course is a highly desirable post and everybody wants to go there, but from the standpoint of my function, which was to "tell America's story to the world," this was one of the most difficult of all my assignments in the Foreign Service because the French didn't want to hear America's story. In fact they felt that America could use a "mission civilisatrice" from the French.

I'll give you an example. As I said, my staff was highly professional, but we had just had a speaker from the U.S. Trade Representative's Office discussing the Uruguay round of trade negotiations of the GATT (General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade) and we were discussing agricultural supports and so on, which of course are still being debated 20 years later. But I overheard my program assistant, the economist, sort of agreeing with one of her French colleagues that the reductions of tariffs on agricultural was not a good thing for France. And I took her aside afterwards and I said "Sylvie, how are we going to be effective if even my own staff doesn't support American foreign policy objectives with our French public?" And so we argued and I said "Look, don't you think that the French would be happy if they could pay less for their groceries at the supermarket?" She said, "Listen, I've lived in the United States and I've tasted your supermarket tomatoes and we French don't want any of them." She had a pretty good point as a matter of fact. For the French, eating, I think, plays a far more important role in their daily life than it does in the United States. You might say we eat to live, they live to eat. But cuisine is one of the very important aspects of French culture, and they would rather pay more for a good tomato than to pay less for a tasteless tomato.

Q: What about the Gulf War? Did that involve you at all?

HUFFMAN: Yes, the press section was heavily involved in responding to the local and international media concerning the war. And there were increased numbers of terrorist incidents around the world at the time of the Gulf War, so the embassy was on high alert and we had to take all kinds of precautions. The French, after a period of fence-sitting, turned out to be pretty hard-nosed in the Gulf, and the French military wanted to go on into Baghdad at the end. Who knows, maybe they were right.

Q: Did you find any particular subjects particularly contentious?

HUFFMAN: Well yes, I would say the trade issues were the most contentious really. Political issues not so much. We were pretty much in sync on security issues. Whenever we had a specialist in military affairs who came and talked to the French military, they were in remarkable agreement on our position. And while France was not in NATO nevertheless they were supportive of NATO.

Q: They weren't in the military but they were in the political side.

HUFFMAN: Yes, exactly. They withdrew from the military side in 1966. The NATO headquarters at that time were in the building now occupied by one of the branches of the University of Paris, University of Paris Nine, also called Dauphine. One of the most interesting things I did while in Paris was to lead a delegation of French mid-level politicians on a NATO tour where we visited NATO and SHAPE (Supreme Headquarters, Allied Powers Europe) in Brussels, various arms control negotiation groups in Geneva, and a joint NATO military base in Oslo. I had led a similar tour for British academics while posted to London. These tours were co-sponsored by USIA and the U.S. Mission to NATO, in the interest of building support among young politicians, academics and journalists for NATO and U.S. defense policies.

But I'd say the most contentious issues were in the field of trade and economics and negotiating the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. We were always sort of in contention with them on that and as a result we brought over many speakers and specialists in trade from academia and from the U.S. Trade Representative's Office, most of whom were quite rational and credible people who didn't advocate extreme positions or anything like that and we were able to have civilized discussions with the French over these trade issues.

Q: Did you get any feel for the university system there? As you'd been a professor in the American system, how would you compare the two systems?

HUFFMAN: Well, the French system is much more elitist than ours. Entrance to university is much more competitive, as a result of which only about 30 percent of secondary school graduates go on to higher education, vs. about 60 percent in the U.S. The French like to believe that they have the best schools in the world, but that can be said only of their Grandes Ecoles – the Ecole Polytechnique, Sciences Politiques, Hautes Etudes Commerciales, Ecole Nationale d'Administration, etc. – which are highly competitive and are typically attended only by the elite of France. That's one of the things that came to a head in the recent ethnic riots in France; the students were saying that only French, white, elite can get into these schools and as a result the country is run by this revolving elite at the top regardless of which party is in power. I used to compare the two systems in my talks on cross-cultural communication. I would point out that Americans believe that everybody should have access to higher education, but that some educators go too far in claiming that everybody should have a higher education. The problem with this is that if everybody gets a higher education, then it is no longer higher. But in spite of our problems, foreign students still flock to our universities. We must be doing something right, since 30 percent of all Nobel prizes since the founding of the prizes have been awarded to American scholars.

In my speeches I would talk about cultural differences between the Americans and the French in a humorous vein. The French usually describe Americans as open and friendly and practical and so on but they also see us as loud and aggressive and naïve. Conversely, Americans tend to think the French as artistic and stylish and sophisticated, but at the same time think of them as rude, chauvinistic and cynical. And I would point out that there's always some truth to stereotypes. Charles de Gaulle is famously known for having said that the Germans are all talent but no genius, while the French, alas, are all genius but no talent. As examples of cultural differences I would talk about the fact that the French shake hands a lot. If a Frenchman meets a friend in the morning he shakes hands. If he meets him again in the afternoon he shakes hands again. If he meets him that night he shakes hands again. I said that in the United States we don't feel the need to shake hands with each other more than about once every week and that's usually when you see somebody at church. Also the French custom of kissing a lady on both cheeks, twice, sometimes three times, sometimes four -- four is becoming more and more popular now. I pointed out that most Americans are uncomfortable with that. To me it seems insincere, but if we had a French couple to my home for dinner and he kissed my wife on both cheeks I have to sort of do as the Romans do, because if I don't he'll think I don't find his wife attractive. These are all trivial little differences that don't really affect the essentially common background of the two countries.

Q: Well then, as an anthropologist, how did you see the French political system? You know, from my perspective and not a close one, there seems to be a sort of divide but they call themselves right and left. I mean, did you see French society changing to meet the demands of the future?

HUFFMAN: Yes, there tend to be two distinct camps in French society, but perhaps less radical at the extremes than in Great Britain. But in France, yes, there were definitely changes going on every day. For example I think they have had to adapt to some American business practices to try to help improve French competitiveness, which is hampered by very strong labor unions. Of course, the French are a rather volatile people. If the government does something they don't like they go out in the streets. If you reduce farm subsidies they're going to dump rotten tomatoes at the door of the prime minister. I think it was de Gaulle that said "How do you rule a country that makes 328 kinds of cheese?" But of course the divide that is opening up is between the traditional French people and the immigrants, mostly from North Africa.

Q: And they hadn't really arrived in the great numbers when you were there.

HUFFMAN: No but they had become a significant minority even by the early '90s.

There's another difference that I used to talk about in my contrast of the United States and France and that is ethnicity. There's something unique about the United States in that we all came from somewhere else, and to say you're an American doesn't mean anything ethnically or racially. To give a personal anecdote, when my wife defected from the communist regime in Romania in 1970, she headed straight for Paris, because the Romanians are great Francophiles -- educated people in Romania typically speak French. She got a job at UNESCO, but after six months she realized that she would never be French; she would forever be a Romanian living in France, whereas in the United States she could be an American. She could be one of the 30 million people in this country who were born abroad. So the designation "American" does not have the same ethnic significance as do the words "French" or "German" or "English." Those words have a clear ethnic connotation whereas American does not. I have always thought that's one of the most interesting differences between the U.S. and France, and most other countries, for that matter.

Q: Who was the ambassador while you were there?

HUFFMAN: Ambassador Walter Curley.

Q: How was he as ambassador?

HUFFMAN: He was quite good. As you know, traditionally the big posts like Paris and London and Rome are patronage posts, they're usually given to wealthy supporters of the administration, and Walter Curley was no exception -- he was an investment banker who had supported the Bush administration. But he was quite likeable and he had an uncanny ability to remember people's names and who they were. He had maybe 1,000 employees in the embassy but he'd meet one of them on the steps and call them by their first name. He'd meet me on the steps, and say, "Good morning, professor, how are you?" He knew the story. He was also quite a joker. When I was first introduced to him by the PAO, he said, "Huffman, you gave up a job as a full professor at an Ivy League university to do this? I don't think you're smart enough to serve in my embassy." I hope he was joking. But I think he did not have a great deal of access to or impact on the host government. He fulfilled all his duties as ambassador and represented the country perfectly well but he did not have the profile that I think the French would have liked. By contrast, his successor, Pamela Harriman, was extremely well known and had known socially the major players in French politics and called them by their first names. She spoke quite good French and was, I think, a very effective ambassador. But she arrived just shortly before I left post.

RONALD D. FLACK
Coordinating Committee for Multilateral Strategic Export Controls
Paris (1990-1995)

Ronald D. Flack was born in Minnesota in 1934. After receiving his bachelor's degree from the University of Minnesota he served in the US Army from 1957-1960. His career has included positions in Athens, Manila, Abidjan, Paris, Algiers, Geneva, and Copenhagen. Mr. Flack was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on January 7, 1998.

FLACK: In 1990 I left for Paris for the COCOM job, the Coordinating Committee for Multilateral Strategic Export Controls.

Q: How did you get this job?

FLACK: As I was finishing up in Copenhagen I was basically at a point in my career where as an OC I was probably backed up against the idea of having to retire in a couple of years. Frankly, I wanted to go back to Paris again. The only job that was available at that point was the head of the U.S. delegation to COCOM which was an OC job and I thought it would be interesting. I contacted a couple of people in the Department and I was assigned to it rather easily because not many people wanted that job. The COCOM job was traditionally felt to be not very important and one that was not terribly career enhancing. Well, at this point in my career I thought I may have to retire a couple of years anyway and that is okay.

Q: OC being what?

FLACK: The first level of the senior service.

Q: Sort of like a brigadier general.

FLACK: Exactly. That is the counselor level, then you go to minister-counselor and so on. As it turned out I got the promotion through that job to minister-counselor, which was surprising and unexpected in the sense that this was not a job that normally would be career enhancing in that respect.

Q: You were there from 1990 to when?

FLACK: From 1990 to 1995 and there were a number of reasons for staying on so long. First of all after I got there I realized this job was not the low level uninteresting job that it had the reputation of being. During the Reagan administration the whole concept of strategic controls and using strategic controls against the Soviet Bloc and the Soviet Union, in particular, had been renewed and invigorated and enhanced. It was at that point that they raised the level of the job there to OC from an O-1 job. The reason being they wanted to emphasize the importance of the program, use it more vigorously and increase the size of the delegations, which was actually going on by the time I got there.

Let me go back a little bit and talk about COCOM in the historic perspective.

Q: And what was it designed to do?

FLACK: First of all as I mentioned it is the coordinating committee for multilateral strategic export controls, or COCOM. The French never called it that. It was a bilingual language committee in French and English and the French called it something entirely different. The French translation doesn't have the same meaning. They called it the Coordinating Committee for East-West Exchange, which is entirely different.

Q: In our language it would mean promoting people going from one to the other.

FLACK: The French were so sensitive originally about doing anything that might upset anybody they wanted something very innocuous.

Following World War II in the late 1940s, there was a dispute between the United States and the UK over the shipment of copper wire to the Soviet Union to the point where John Foster Dulles and Winston Churchill were actually exchanging communications on this. It highlighted the problem that was emerging at that point about what do we do when you have the sale of a strategic item to one of the Communist countries that we had some concerns about. How do we handle this? I guess there was a very informal gathering of certain NATO countries to discuss this problem and how it might be faced. Well, it turned into an informal grouping of the NATO countries that would get together on a periodic basis and simply discuss the problem. Eventually this informal get together was called the coordinating committee for multilateral strategic export controls.

So, it started very informally and it was never formalized. COCOM was never a formal organization. It never had a charter, a signed agreement of anything. It was a handshake among its members that we would get together and talk about exports to the Soviet bloc. As time went on into the fifties this idea of talking about it grew more institutionalized in the sense that there were rules and regulations and formalities that were established informally through meetings. They would say, "Can one country simply veto the sales of another?" Well, it turned out through discussions to be "yes." The procedures and submission of cases were developed this way. There developed a list of goods that would be concerned and eventually there turned out to be three lists. There was the military list, which was rarely used because nobody was going to export guns and arms to these countries in the first place. There was the nuclear list which was of concern and then the most interesting one and most active one which was called the dual use industrial list which were those items that might be sold that could be used in a civilian function but could also be used in a military way.

For example, a powerful computer that was ordered by some university or public institution of some sort. That could also be diverted and used by the Soviet military. An item like this, if it were then put on the list of excluded items that were not to be sent to the Communist Bloc and if one of the countries in the organization decided that they wanted to do that being convinced it was a benign sale and not of military use, they would bring it to the committee and say, "We have an exception from the list request. We think this is a good sale and want the committee to approve it and here is why." They would make the argument why this item should be approved as an exception to the embargo list. The information would all be taken down and sent back to the various capitals to be looked at. In the United States it would be the Departments of Commerce, State, Defense, CIA and possibly Department of energy if it were a nuclear matter. They would give their opinion in an intergovernmental process and come up with the position of the country. In the case of the U.S. we would come back to that meeting and say "yes, we agree it is okay to sell" or "no, we don't agree." Any country had a veto. If the French didn't like the proposal for an American sale that we thought was okay, they could veto it and then we would not sell it. So, it was this rather extraordinary informal arrangement where members could lookover proposed sales of strategic materials to these countries and decide on the basis of the information they were given, the information they had and on their own policies whether or not they would allow it.

Today, only a couple of years after its demise, one wonders at the possibility of doing such a thing these days. It is almost unheard of that countries would actually give up a little bit of their sovereignty like they did to each other to agree on a multilateral basis to submit themselves to this type of scrutiny and control on the basis of multilateral action. So, it was an extraordinary arrangement. One, as I said, that was informal, a gentlemen's agreement and probably the reason it worked so well. At any given point the country knew that this was nothing that they were entirely tied to. If the French really wanted to make a sale and the German's were saying "no." in the back of their minds the French knew they did not have to go by this and if they really wanted to do it they could go ahead and do it. That did happen on occasion but not very often. The Brits did it once. Margaret Thatcher disagreed with something and went ahead and made a sale, much to the consternation of the other members. So, I think the fact this system did work was partially due to the fact that it was not a signed agreement.

Q: I would like to talk about some of the issues you dealt with because this is an extremely interesting time. The Soviet Union ceased to be the Soviet Union during this period and things were changing so rapidly that suddenly our concern was more about collapse rather than threat. But also the dynamics between the countries that you saw when you first arrived and did this change. And did commercial rivalries get involved.

FLACK: It did, of course. Before I get into those, let me say in terms of membership originally it was NATO members that were members. It was expanded in the sixties and seventies to include Australia and Japan because of their capabilities in the strategic field. By the way it was NATO minus Iceland. Iceland never participated, I guess, because simply they weren't an exporting country. So, we had these countries sitting around a table every Tuesday in Paris. Now the headquarters was located in Paris in an annex of the embassy called the D Building. The secretariat was about 35 people headed by a chairman or president that was usually not an American. For many, many years the Italians had the presidency simply because of almost tradition. But, after I arrived in 1990 the Italian chairman had been sent off as ambassador to The Hague, I think, and a Dutch chairman took over who was there until the organization was ended. The fact that COCOM had been originally established because of U.S. initiatives and the fact that we were always the most active in it and the fact that it was located in the U.S. embassy, which probably was a mistake, it probably should not have been, made the other members feel that they were participating in a U.S.-controlled organization or one where there certainly was high U.S. influence, which really wasn't true. The secretary was pretty independent and so were the chairmen.

All of the members had at their embassies in Paris people on their staff that were delegated to represent them at COCOM. Except for the U.S., French, British, Germans, and Japanese, these delegates were mid-grade officers in their embassies. But the countries I mentioned did have full blown delegations. I had eight or ten people on my delegation. The Japanese had five or six. Of course, the French delegation was located at the foreign ministry and they had many people working on it. So, the major players did have larger delegations. There were not only the meetings of the regular committee, but there were other meetings called on occasion where delegations would be brought in from capitals to discuss updating the lists, what should be put on and what should be taken off. Given the changing nature of technology, it was very important that we do that on a regular basis.

I arrived in 1990 at the time that things were starting to really change. Strangely enough there was a delay in the impact of all this on COCOM of several years. Even after the regime in Russia changed...

Q: When you arrived it was the Soviet regime and when did it become Russian?

FLACK: That was in 1992, I think. But during all that period of the change in Russia, nothing was changing in COCOM and for good reason. None of the governments involved, including the United States felt that it was time to give the Russians a vote of confidence in this way. They all had great concerns about the former Soviet Union republics that were now independent in terms of strategic affairs and were unwilling at that point to say we can now lighten up in this area. So, basically the whole process continued. Anything that was being exported to Russia, even when Yeltsin was president went through the same process and the members were being just as careful and giving just as much scrutiny as they did before. In the case of telecommunications there was even more scrutiny, because of the uncertainties in Russia, because of the caution that the member governments of COCOM felt they needed to use in dealing with Russia.

There was as time went on and we got into 1993, especially, there was a feeling that this was going to have to change. Yeltsin was meeting on a regular basis with our leaders and leaders of the West and the political climate was changing. We were now talking about being friends. Yeltsin personally got involved in the campaign to do away with COCOM. The first idea, during the Bush administration, of how to handle this issue of what do we do with COCOM was a good one. I think they were right on. I think it was Secretary Baker and Regie Bartholomew who had the idea of trying to very gradually bring the Russians, and others like the Ukraine, into the COCOM fold. Don't do away with the organization, create a COCOM forum as they called it. We would have meetings of the COCOM forum that would include representatives of these other countries to start talking to them about export controls. The idea being that we would eventually invite them to join this organization and change it. But, in order to do that, in order to have the confidence of the COCOM members, Russia would have to have export controls. They would have to have the confidence that if the French were going to sell something to the Russians that was of strategic value, that the Russians would be able to control where it went and it wouldn't end up in Iraq.

Q: Of course, the allied fight against Iraq was going on and we were concerned about strategic weapons going into Iran so the emphasis had begun to shift hadn't it?

FLACK: Not in COCOM. COCOM never had the mandate to control exports to anything but the list of prescribed destinations that was agreed to by the organization which was basically the Communist Bloc and after the fall of the Soviet Union it was basically China and North Korea. The other countries of concern were not of concern officially in anyway with COCOM. These countries were not under this control whatsoever. The United States tried to get the organization to include, for example, Iran, as a proscribed destination in COCOM, but most of the countries and particularly France, were vehemently opposed saying that this was not the way we should handle countries such as Iran. So, with the list of prescribed destinations dwindling and other countries of concern not being brought in, the organization, itself, was losing its meaning. But, as I said the Bush administration had the idea of creating a COCOM forum that would bring these other countries into the fold, so to speak, gradually and using their membership, which they wanted, as a lever to get them to establish good export controls. We even had monies made available from the Congress to help them do this. Then the Clinton administration came in.

Q: January, 1993.

FLACK: That's right. At that point everything changed. As was often the case, and I have seen this time and time again in my career, when a new administration comes in, particularly one of another party, anything the previous administration was doing, even if it was eminently right, the White House people mistrust it and don't feel it is a good idea. The COCOM forum approach was immediately dropped. We didn't even mention it again. When people came up and asked what was going on with the COCOM forum meetings, all I could say was that the new administration does not believe this is the way to go forward so we are basically dropping it. This was not something we were going to do anymore.

In Yeltsin's first meeting with Clinton he brought up COCOM. He said that it was a thorn in the side of our relationship and you have to do away with it. Clinton said something like, "That's interesting, I will look into it." I don't think he had been briefed on it at all. Yeltsin brought it up again at the second summit. This time Clinton said he was still looking into it. At the third meeting Clinton gave in. He had looked into it and his group basically said that we could give in on COCOM to them; it was no problem if it helped our relationship with Russia.

This in my view was an enormous mistake. COCOM was an organization that could have been used as a lever with the Russians to get them to establish better and efficient export controls. We did not do that. We simply threw away this lever as a negotiating tool and told the Russians we were going to close it down. We should of done it by first having a meeting with the other members and say that we would like to close COCOM down. Instead, Clinton announced it after the third Yeltsin summit. The meetings that we had after that were simply towards closing down the organization. It was eventually formally closed, I think, in April, 1994, but it wasn't until about two years later that the whole organization was finally disbanded in the sense of closing out the books and making sure everybody was off the roles that the place was actually physically closed down as it is now.

What the Clinton administration's view was, was to close down COCOM and at the same time negotiate a replacement regime. This in my view was a mistake because you can't give away your lever and then try to negotiate something. We should have kept COCOM going and saying we are going to change it but it is still going and use it as a negotiating tool. But, we didn't, we simply said that is gone and now we can start from a clean sheet.

We negotiated for about a year in various places around the world to try to establish a replacement regime for COCOM that would have hopefully some sort of reasonable authority in terms of controlling exports to other countries of concern. Here we are talking about Iran, Iraq, Libya and North Korea. But, nobody could ever agree to put that into writing. No one could ever agree to a list of countries of concern, especially the French. So we were just spinning our wheels around and around at meetings all over the world. We finally established what is called the Wassenaar arrangement because it was finally agreed in this small town of Wassenaar outside The Hague. We couldn't even call it an organization, a regime or anything else because the French would not put up with it. Anything that had the idea of some sort of a structure they would not agree to so it was called finally "arrangement." It is located in Vienna. We have a delegate there now who was my former deputy in Paris. But, it is an arrangement without any meaning. The members, including countries like Russia meet to discuss on a periodic basis after the fact exports of certain materials to certain countries. But since they don't meet until after the sale has been made and there is no list of countries of concern, it is all so vague that it doesn't really mean much. The Clinton administration finally agreed to it simply in terms of this would be the beginning of an ongoing negotiation to make this arrangement into something and as far as I know that has not ever happened.

Q: Did you at all feel the hand of Strobe Talbert on this because he was sort Clinton's Russia man?

FLACK: I don't know how directly he was involved, but it was clear that the White House and, for that matter, the senior people in the Department, were unwilling to use COCOM in a strategic way in dealing with Russia. When Yeltsin said he didn't like COCOM, get rid of it, we did it. What we should have said was that we needed something from him before we do that and then work with them on it.

Q: Going back to 1990, what were the major concerns?

FLACK: There were several major concerns in terms of the types of equipment we were talking about. First of all, as I mentioned, military equipment was not something we dealt with. On the nuclear side there was also the nuclear suppliers agreement that was handling that. So, most of it was in the dual use category. Within this area the things that were of prime importance were telecommunications, computers and machine tools.

One would wonder what is so special about machine tools. Well, machine tools in the West are capable of working to extreme precision. The Soviets were never able to build machine tools capable of working to the level of precision of the Western machine tools. We are talking here about laths and all sorts of things that basically work metals. An example would be manufacturing propellers for submarines, or the manufacturing the parts for jet engines. Jet engines made by the Soviets had to be overhauled about five times as often as engines made in the West simply because they didn't have the machine tools to make things to a precision enough so they would work more efficiently. So, machine tools were a great interest to the Soviets and they wanted that technology. They would have bought it and used it in the civilian sector but also mainly in the military sector.

Powerful computers were also of interest to the Soviets. As time went on, towards the end of COCOM, computers became an difficult problem simply because of the technology changing so fast and computers becoming more powerful and smaller. In the end you could hook up a series of small powerful PCs and have a super computer. So, it became almost impossible to control this. There were also countries outside the membership of COCOM that were starting to produce these things and we couldn't control this anyway. So, this was becoming a problem.

And finally, and most important of all, telecommunications. Here we get into the question of telecommunications to be produced in the West, particularly fiber optics, that could be used by the Russian military to use for military communications which would be a problem for the United States and for the West simply because it would be impossible for us to eavesdrop on those communications. So, we were trying desperately to keep this type of telecommunications from the Russians and for very, very important strategic reasons. This was one of the main and most important and seriously strategic issue and product that we were concerned about as COCOM was going into its final stages. It was one of the items that they tried to hold over into the Wassenaar arrangement, which it was, but it doesn't mean anything because there is basically no control now on these things.

Q: Did Sweden play a role? One tends to think of Sweden with rather advanced equipment, particularly machine tools.

FLACK: Well, there were a number of countries that worked closely with COCOM over the years, Austria, Sweden, and South Korea. They followed COCOM very closely and we had an informal interface with them. They very often simply followed the COCOM rules and did not go out of bounds in that sense. South Korea in particular was very careful about meeting with us regularly asking for information. They wanted to join COCOM but we wouldn't let them, although in the end they were doing just what everybody in COCOM was doing. Sweden was very much impressed with the influence of COCOM and it would have been very unwise of them, and they knew it, to overtly do things that COCOM would be upset with.

Q: What was the threat? If Sweden got out of bounds what was the implicit threat?

FLACK: There wasn't any. I can't think of a threat. I would think that Sweden and its diplomats would simply be influenced by the disapproval and perhaps public outcry in the media. They were just not willing to not play ball in that sense.

Q: And, of course, they were concerned about the Soviet threat too.

FLACK: Yes.

Q: What about the commercial rivalries particularly between France, Germany, Great Britain and the United States? I would think there would either be horse trading or blocking.

FLACK: It was amazingly coherent. There were rivalries and commerce did interfere and make itself known in these times, however, the main thing was in the business community in all these countries even though they do not like export controls, they know that they exist and realize that if their own national authority has an export control they like it when they know there is a multilateral control that puts them on a level playing field. If an American company because of American laws knows that they can't sell something to Russia, but are upset because French law does not have the same effect and therefore the French company can sell that product to Russia, that is not a good situation and the American company is upset. However, when there is a multilateral organization that everybody agrees to controlling this and the American companies knows they still can't sell it to Russia they have at least the comfort of knowing that neither can the French or the Germans or the Brits, etc. This was the leveling effect of COCOM and even though the private sector didn't like in many ways these controls, when they thought about it seriously they realized that it was better than no multilateral control because they then had real trouble with their own national control enforcing an embargo.

So, there was rivalry and when you talked to a French businessman saying you were the U.S. representative to COCOM, he would get a kind of smirk on his face and say, "Oh, yes, COCOM. That is that American organization that keeps my company and French firms from selling abroad so that the Americans can get the market." And, if you talked to an American businessman, as I have, and introduce myself as the representative to COCOM, they will say, "Oh, COCOM. That is the organization that let's the French and other countries get away with all the sales when we can't." And every country you talk to have the feeling that they are being slighted in the process and that other countries are making the sales, which wasn't the case at all.

One of my jobs, and I did this on many speaking occasions, was to try to explain to the American business community that COCOM was actually good for them in the sense of this level playing field. If you have to have export controls, don't do it unilaterally, they don't work and you are simply hurting yourself because another foreign company will get the business.

By the way, another footnote here. I mentioned that I talked to business groups and so on, when COCOM first started it was an ultra secret organization. The meetings were secret to the point where men coming to the meetings would not even tell their wives where they were going. Over the years, especially in the Reagan years, it became much more transparent and open, although the meetings were secret and everything was classified, it was much more transparent and we talked about it more openly and everybody was aware of it. But, at one point its existence was not even known.

Q: As diplomats did you find that you had to call in your experts to follow the conversation about various products?

FLACK: Absolutely, the meetings were filled with experts. If I was sitting at the head table, behind me would be people from the Departments of Defense, Commerce, Energy, CIA or whatever agency was interested in that particular meeting. The technical experts were always there in these meeting discussing these things and they were very, very important. For example, when we talked about telecommunications the NSA people were there all the time. We were discussing highly technical issues and we needed the expertise of these people. And all of the delegations were the same. Now, there were some of the delegations of the NATO countries that were kind of out of it. They were present but almost like observers, rarely participating on a technical level. Greece and Portugal for example.

Q: They weren't producing the technology.

FLACK: They weren't producing but were interested and were there to observe and were part of the process. But there were the key players who were there in force and for which this is really serious business.

Q: I have always heard of the classic situation in the State Department which I am sure is true in other countries, that basically the Pentagon says "no" to anything, the Commerce Department says "yes" to anything and then the State Department is sort of caught between and tries to come out with something. Was this played out again, again and again?

FLACK: It was again and again. I always said that dealing with the 17 members of COCOM was not nearly as difficult as dealing with the U.S. interagency process. Getting agreement in COCOM was relatively easy, but getting a position on an issue through the interagency process was sometimes impossible. So, it was very, very difficult. You have the Department of Defense with a very strong position on an issue, the Department of Commerce with a very strong position exactly the opposite, representing the interests of the business community, and the National Security Council was often involved in these discussions. The interagency process was difficult and painful at times.

Q: Were you just carrying the word or did you get involved back in the Washington process?

FLACK: I didn't get involved personally in the Washington process except observing it from a distance, but nevertheless with communications the way they are these days between the secure phone, fax and all the other things we were doing, we were really a part of the process from Paris. On my delegation in Paris we had a Department of Defense representative, a Department of Commerce representative, and several people from the State Department and they were in daily contact with their people back in Washington, so we knew on a daily basis what was going on on each issue. So, we were deeply involved but not physically present.

Q: Were you getting relatively good intelligence about what was happening in the Soviet Union and understanding how these things could be used?

FLACK: Yes. For example, Italy decided it wanted to sell a particular machine tool to North Korea.. They said it was a benign sale and were asking for an exception from the committee. We would get all the information and they would give a considerable amount of documentation about the product and about the end use and the end user. Each country then would send this to their capital. We would get back from Washington several weeks later, after it had gone through the U.S. intelligence community and some investigation had been done we would get reports back saying for example, we don't believe that this is a benign sale if this company that it is going to be sold to is a state-owned company and it is clear that they want to use it for usage that we would object to in this military installation, and they would give us classified information on why we thought this was a bad deal. We, of course, would give this information to the Italians and other members of COCOM so that they would have this. Or, other people would be doing this. We did it more than anybody else. We had the capability of getting intelligence on these sales much more often and more thoroughly than did other delegations. But, often the Brits, French, or Japanese would have information about a specific sale that would be put forward. Then we would all take it under consideration and it had a great influence. So, intelligence did play a role, yes.

Q: I would have thought in any multilateral organizations that the French usually turn out to be the burr under the saddle. How did it work in COCOM?

FLACK: Pretty much that way. The French had a reputation in this way and it was clearly earned in COCOM. The French were basically disliked on a substantive basis by almost all of the other delegations, even though we were in Paris. Whenever we were having discussions and particularly in these discussions trying to establish the new arrangement, the French were impossible. They would never agree to anything, falling back on national sovereignty, which was actually kind of amusing because when we were trying to negotiate an agreement that had some sort of teeth in it, so you could actually do something in terms of controlling these exports, the French inevitably would say, "No we can't agree to it because it will impinge upon national sovereignty to make these decisions by ourselves." Inevitably I would say, "For forty years you have been doing this in a much more specific way with this veto, and now you say you won't do this anymore." The French were difficult. Whenever we came up to an negotiating point that had any substance to it, the French inevitably would say, "No, we can't agree to it," simply because they didn't believe it was in their national interest, they wanted to make decisions on their own and didn't want anybody else looking over their shoulder, any other judgments, any other advice. They were willing to hear things like that after the sale had been made, but not before.

Q: Was there any feeling that maybe the French could be excluded?

FLACK: There were times when we could have simply said we would go ahead without the French, but you can't really. The French are one of the major exporters of high technology and dual use equipment in the world and you couldn't have an effective organization without them, basically. But, there were times when our own people were saying that maybe we should simply go ahead and do something without them. But it wasn't a very realistic approach.

Q: You mentioned that Iran and Iraq were not included in this, but when you arrived we had just finished the Gulf War against Iraq and the concern then and the concern now has been the manufacture of weapons of mass destruction. We are thinking about biological, nuclear and chemical weapons and that technology rest pretty heavily within the West. Did this come up at all?

FLACK: In an indirect way. The COCOM was specifically targeted towards the Communist Bloc and no other countries. We tried in the early 1990s to include Iran and some other countries on the proscribed list unsuccessfully basically again because the French did not agree to this. There was concern but we were not able to bring that concern into COCOM. There was an impact in COCOM as a result of the Gulf War, however, in that we learned things in the Gulf War about the importance of certain strategic items to the Iraqis, for example, but we also recognized in a general way their importance in another sense. For example, in the Gulf War you may remember how important night vision equipment was. It became extraordinarily evident that the Iraqis did not have this equipment and we did and it was a major, major advantage. Because of that we went back to COCOM and looked at our list of equipment and realized that we had been selling night vision equipment where we probably shouldn't have been selling it in the Communist Bloc. So we tightened up a lot of night vision equipment.

When North Korea, for example, would say that they wanted to buy night vision equipment from the Dutch, who are a big producer of night vision equipment, for rescue efforts, it is hard to say no because it is very useful for rescue efforts, it is also extraordinarily useful for their military. So, COCOM usually in those cases would say no even though the stated purpose is innocuous, it was just too dangerous.

Q: Was there any re-evaluation after the unification of Germany and the breaking up of the Soviet Union and the Communist Bloc?

FLACK: Yes. As these countries became, in some cases independent, or simply democratic, they were brought into this COCOM forum and we were starting to deal with them. Unfortunately, that has stopped. As the international political system changed and as the threat disappeared, we started getting a lot more information from these countries about how things operated in the past. As a matter of fact, the president of COCOM took a trip to Moscow and to some of the East Bloc countries. He was received there and shown around. He came back and made a report to the members which was rather extraordinary. He visited factories in East Germany that were desperately trying to get a hold of the materials that COCOM was keeping from them. In some cases he saw controlled equipment there. There was diversion. In one factory there were some machine tools made in the West just sitting there. The president asked how they had gone about getting the tools. They said, "Well, there are ways. We can go through third parties and get a hold of these things, but it's almost not worth it." The reasons were first it was very expensive costing them three or four times the normal cost of the machine tools. Secondly, there were no spare parts. Thirdly, when they received the machine, all of the serial numbers, all of the markings where it was made, were gone so they had no idea in some cases where it was made or what number it was. Usually the machine would operate for a few months and then something would happen and they couldn't fix it and they didn't know who to call. It almost became not worth it, they said, because they could use them for a few months at very high cost and they would be useless. So, they were able to go around our rules at great expense but it was hardly worth it and the president of COCOM was told by most of these people that the system basically worked very, very effectively, even though there were these occasional diversions.

GEORGE KENNEY
Visa Officer
Marseille (1991-1992)

George Kenney received a bachelor's degree in economics from the University of Chicago. Mr. Kenney's government service began with the State Department's Bureau for Economic Affairs. In 1991, he joined the Foreign Service. In addition to serving in Marseille, Mr. Kenney has also held positions in Kinshasa and Washington, DC. This interview was conducted by Michael Springmann on September 10, 1993.

Q: Let me start by asking for a brief description of your Foreign Service career.

KENNEY: When I started in the Foreign Service, I was recruited as an economic officer. Sometime later, in 1990 or 1991, the Department began recruiting officers without categorizing them first; i.e. "un-coned." I went through basic training here in Washington, then was assigned to the obligatory first tour as a consular officer in Marseille, France. There I was in charge of the non-immigrant visa section of the Consulate General. We issued about 36,000 visas. I did a little work on American services and a fair amount of representational work. The post was very active in hosting visits of the Seventh Fleet. We also represented the United States at different commemorations and festivals in the towns on the coast. The Consul General had so many of these invitations that she would pass them down to the staff, and, although I was the lowest ranking officer, I still got a good share of these invitations. I would guess that at least half of my weekends were taken up by traveling to somewhere in the south of France to participate in one event or another.

My tour in Marseille lasted fifteen months. It should have been eighteen months, but it was curtailed so that I could get a better job in Washington. I had a selection of possibilities and decided to take a job doing energy economics because I thought it would be interesting, a middle-pace kind of a job -- I really didn't want to go into the fast lane in my first tour in Washington, but I also didn't want a back-water. I talked to the people for whom I would work, and was given the task of worrying about oil and energy security. I found the work quite interesting. The people in the office were quite friendly, and I enjoyed my assignment.

LUKE KAY

State Department Intern
Paris (1992)

Luke Kay was born in Greece in 1969. He received his bachelor's degree from the University of Michigan in 1991 and attended the School of International Studies, Bologna. After joining the Foreign Service in 1998 he has held positions in Brazil, Ethiopia, and Uruguay. Mr. Kay was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in June 2004.

KAY: To backtrack one moment, I also had an internship with the State Department at Embassy Paris in the summer of '92.

Q: What were you doing there?

KAY: Half the time in the consular section, the other half of the time in the political section.

Q: What sort of work were you doing first in the consular section?

KAY: First, in the consular section, the summer of '92 was the time where the US Congress had passed laws basically updating our opposition to communism. The time was right after the demise of the Soviet Union. It was no longer considered a crime to be a communist in the sense that you could not officially preclude someone from entering the United States, or refusing someone a visa, based on past communist leanings or tendencies. So there would be some things, luminaries, like Charlie Chaplin, and several others, famous luminaries, basically French intellectuals who for one reason or another had dabbled in leftist politics. We basically had to go through every single file, thousands of names, to excise the ones who were just benign communists vs. veritable mala fide terrorists, real revolutionaries or "terrorists" in today's parlance.

Q: What about in the political section?

KAY: In the political section I covered French politics on the left, so we would follow the leftist paper, Liberation. I would go to symposia at the French Senate among other places, of course, writing about ramifications for the US, if any, sending appropriate cables back to Washington.

Q: What sort of a taste did that give you?

KAY: Oh, I loved it, it was fascinating and fabulous. Of course, I attended the Fourth of July ceremony at the US Embassy and got to meet the French President, Francois Mitterrand.

SHIRLEY ELIZABETH BARNES
Consul General
Strasbourg (1992-1995)

Ambassador Barnes was born in Florida and raised in Florida and New York City. She was educated at City College of New York and at Columbia and Boston Universities. Before entering the Foreign Service in 1984, Ambassador Barnes worked with the Ford Foundation in Africa and was active in African American women's organizations and in the advertising business. In the Foreign Service she served in Strasbourg, Dakar, East Berlin and in the State Department in Washington. In 1998 she was appointed Ambassador to Madagascar, where she served until 2001. Ambassador Barnes was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2004.

Q: Could you describe a little about Strasbourg? Why do we have a consulate up there and what were you all doing?

BARNES: When I went to Strasbourg we still had posts in Marseille, Bordeaux, Strasbourg and the embassy in Paris. I represented the ambassador for the northeastern part of France. Consul General, especially in Strasbourg, most people in the United States don't even know what it is. The city has the Council of Europe, important to the Europeans, though the United States could care two cents about the Council of Europe. It is the gathering of Europeans who are at the local, the state level in their country. They are usually elected officials and they are at the Council of Europe. They come every four months and they have an ambassador to the Council of Europe that treats intra-European affairs and world affairs. They have beautiful, beautiful building in Strasbourg which considers itself the crossroads of Europe although in Brussels they say they are too.

I had both multi-lateral and bi-lateral duties. I would explain our point of view to those people who were senior officials in that part of France, what we were doing bi-laterally; our policy. And especially things in the economic area, that was very important, agriculture and those things. But, also what we would do politically. All these European countries, which were then I think about 44 members, because the East European countries were just up and coming. They wanted to petition; they were petitioning to be members of the Council of Europe. So I met, very often, with all of those ambassadors to the Council of Europe. Which turned out to be—if you knew the story—that most of these ambassadors were senior officials within their foreign affairs ministries and this would probably be their last post. I mean it was cushy, Strasbourg; you couldn't get a better post. And then there were outside people, members or that were observers like the United States. The Japanese opened an embassy there. So, besides all the European countries that were members of the Council of Europe there were some outside members. We just had a grand old time, having and drinking great Alsace wine and diddle-fiddling around about policy and it was just fabulous. Great folks.

Q: Did our embassy in Brussels to the European Union send out people during...

BARNES: Only once in a while. You were—I hate to use this—we were a back order for them. I mean it was like an afterthought. So once in a while they'd come down to some meetings or something that were going on. But the United States didn't give a fig about the Council of Europe so in general our embassies didn't care about it.

Pamela Harriman—she was my ambassador in Paris. Someone else had started out and he was finished when Clinton got in.

Q: It must have been early '93.

BARNES: I don't know. I thought...

Q: He was elected in '92.

BARNES: Okay, '92. Then she became the Ambassador.

Q: How did you find Ambassador Harriman?

BARNES: Absolutely fantastic ambassador. She knew what she was doing and she did it well and people liked her in France and so it made life easy. She was very good at her job.

Q: Was the Council of Europe doing much?

BARNES: They were very good on human rights issues. For example, Turkey was petitioning to be a member of the Council of Europe. They have a very, very bad human rights record. Turkey always wants to be a part of Europe and so this would be held over their head. You've got to change your human rights record. And the Council of Europe was known throughout the world for their extraordinary position in human rights. The European Court of Human Rights comes under the Council of Europe. They have a lot of cases that come up from across Europe on human rights issues involving people who feel that their human rights have been violated. Those countries listen to what the Council of Europe comes out with and it does a lot of that kind of legal, extra judiciary work. In the area of some political affairs, if a nation seems to get getting out of line on some things, the edicts that come down from the Council of Europe make the rest of those countries or the country that they have their eye on back off on some issues: whether it's France and they way they treated some minorities, Spain or whatever. Council of Europe is a nice arbitrator in this sense and people have said, "Count me in I want to be a part of it." There are certain guidelines that you have to follow as a nation. If not, the Greeks and then they had their coup in 1967 and so the generals took over...

Q: It was '67, April 21st in 1967.

BARNES: They were kicked out! They were told, "You're out until you get your act together." And that had a tremendous effect on Greek politics to know that they were soundly and roundly told by the Council of Europe, "Get out until you get your act together."

Q: Did Yugoslavia it was beginning to split up at this time...

BARNES: That's right.

Q: Was this something that you were concerned with?

BARNES: We got demarche cables in and do this and go to the Secretary General over the Council of Europe and say, “this is what we think about the issue.” So we had a nice little basket of what to do on Yugoslavia that was breaking up.

Q: Tell me about your relationship with—I mean here you are essentially the Consul General in a place—but yet, you’ve got this almost foreign operation going on, the Council of Europe, were you having any problems dealing with the Secretary General or any of these people?

BARNES: Absolutely not. They were so delighted that America was paying the Council of Europe some attention. So it was almost, “why didn’t we see you, Shirley at this, that or the other?” I mean they were so delighted with the presence of the United States at their meetings, as an observer and they were so delighted when I finally pushed through with the State Department that we would be an “observer” because before that we weren’t even that. We were just there once in a while; we would go to Council of Europe things and all of that but we had no real official status. As I said, I had a lot of other work too. I had two hats because I had all of these things that come in on a bi-lateral business, debts and Americans in jail and I did a lot of traveling around the country. For North-Eastern France I represented the United States for Alsace, Lorraine and other French areas.

This was around the 50th anniversary of the end of WWII [World War Two]. So the French are very patriotic and they do not forget the Americans and what the Americans did in two world wars. And everything you could ever imagine was going on in every village, every little county, every town. The American Consul General was expected to be there and the events were usually on weekends. So my Sundays became driving from one part of my territory to the next. And that was when the State Department was on this rampage to cut costs. They wanted you to drive your own car. I said, I am not driving on these roads. We would use these drivers, of course. I said, “I get overtime on Sundays” and it became, really, a kind of shuffling of papers because they would say from Paris, you should go to this. Because, I said, I’ve got to stop going to these things plus I said I had no free time on the weekends. Most of these people who were celebrating the 50th anniversary of WWII in Europe, they were doing everything on Sundays and I got to see a lot of North-Eastern France, all those villages. I got to really understand them, the French in that area and the outlying provinces.

They had more American flags than I ever saw. They brought out of moth balls every tank, every jeep; you wonder “where are they storing these things?” And they would have their parades down these beautiful little towns all in North-Eastern France. And the Consul General of the United States was the most important person there so I really got an appreciation of the French and for North-Eastern France.

I got Mrs. Harriman to come there twice to events; one was in Colmar and something else. These were areas that had a real significant history. One thing seared in my memory was a group of Japanese Americans came through. They had served up there in the Vosges Mountains in WWII. They came into town and there must have been about two or three hundred of these veterans, maybe even more. They had made the trail all the way from Italy; this memory trail, through Normandy and on into that eastern part of France. They’d done this during the war, and they had been saving up for this for the last several years. Some of them came back every year. They know those people and those villages in North-Eastern France, “hey buddy!” You see these guys some of them with their grandchildren and great-grand children. They know the whole village, they know the whole region. When I had been told, “Consul General, there’s this group that’s coming in and they want you to go to all these things in Colmar and I forgot the other village up in the Vosges Mountains. I said, “I can’t do another trip.” Well, I got an earful from all these people calling me, I said, “okay I’ll be there, I’ll be there.” I drove up in the Vosges Mountains. I didn’t know that this was a Japanese American group. It was just a group of veterans, you’ve got to come. It must have been about 400 Japanese Americans and their families. Some of them had brought daughters and sons, three or four daughters and their grandchildren! And it was the most fantastic thing I had seen, to see these guys and they’d sit around and talk about ... that cold winter. That was the coldest winter that had ever been reported in European history.

Q: You’re talking about the winter of ‘44 or ‘45?

BARNES: ‘44. You’d sit down and they’d start talking to me and say, “well you know, I was in the internment camp, I was 16, 17, I had nothing to do with it and when they say, ‘you want to join the military?’ Sure! Get me out of here.” These were people who had been in internment camps in the U.S. and to see that they had been in 1944, 16 and 17 year old kids out there fighting for the United States of America it was the most moving thing I have ever seen. One of them was a very well known Japanese sculptor that lives, I think, in the Netherlands now. But pretty well known. He had a sculpted piece that was dedicated that was up there in the Vosges Mountains—I’m sure it’s still there—but that had been commissioned and he brought it there.

It was something that I’ll never forget, and the way they treated me it was like I walked on water.

Absolutely amazing people. Man oh man, you’d sit down and talk with them. “I was head of the health services at so and so hospital,” and all these professional people during their lifetimes and they’re not retired and they had their kids with them and their kids’ kids.

Q: When coming to this part of France, where did it fall in the political spectrum? Socialist, Christendom?

BARNES: Northeast France is very conservative and they always voted for Le Pen. [Laugh]

Q: Did you ever run across Jean Marie Le Pen?

BARNES: No, no, no. I never ran across him. He came in here now and then in a campaign. I mean he knew it was in his pocket, that’s why France is so conservative. They like me, but they didn’t like, if when one Arab landed in a village somewhere was like a bit scourge was coming. The most conservative people, no way.

Q: Was there?

BARNES: I think Colmar was communist. Oh I know in French county there was a communist there. Who was in on of the government’s of Mitterrand.

Q: Was there any immigrant worker groups there?

BARNES: There are lots of people of Middle-East origin; Moroccans, there were lots of them in Strasbourg, a great big community. In Colmar, too, there were a lot of North African immigrants; I'd say that about France. Proportionately speaking, outside of Marseille or Paris I think they had a large community up there in North-Eastern France. They say that the Alsatian income level is the highest in France. Those people are the kind that you see these novels and things written about ... that put their money under the bed or whatever, but they have had generations of great excellent wine and agriculture and they're very rich. The Alsations are very rich.

Q: Good subsidies too.

BARNES: Pardon me?

Q: Good subsidies too.

BARNES: Oh yes, the subsidies and they are extremely well off.

Q: How did the immigrant community fit within this, did they...?

BARNES: Not very well. They don't fit that well. They are the people that are welfare people ... I mean, most of France is welfareed anyway when you think about it, what with the subsidies but they're the ones who purportedly commit more crimes and they're the ones that have trouble with their kids in school. They're going to be there and the French are going to have to deal with them.

Q: Yeah the French are having a little problem with this.

BARNES: Yup.

Q: This is what I gather, you know, basically a political job wasn't it?

BARNES: Absolutely. People don't know that when they go into that job. They just say, "Wow, Strasbourg!" It's a real political job and it was a lot of reporting and of course by the time I got there they had narrowed it down to one American as the pope; un numero uno [the number one] and I had a consular assistant that took care of passports and deeds and all of that and a very, very good secretary who was really the administrative assistant who could get out there and she knew a lot about what was going on politically so she was really, she was a little like my political assistant.

Q: When you left there, how did you find those of Ambassador Harriman, how did your direction or contact with the embassy?

BARNES: Very little. I have to knock on the door and say, "hello, remember we're here?" But that was the same thing with Bordeaux except that there they had great wine and everybody wants to go there. Marseille got a little bit more play but in general if you didn't keep knocking on the door they would pretend you didn't exist. Once a year, the Consul General in Paris would have a meeting with all three of us where the ambassador would see us, a two or three day meeting. Which was nice because it'd just made you feel, oh you didn't forget us and you'd come up to Paris and sit around and have a series of meetings on what's going on with the embassy and what our policies are and what are we doing with the French and it would be a series of very well structured meetings from, say, eight in the morning on. And the ambassador would have me over for dinner and/or a lunch and so it was really nice. They did recognize that those guys are out in the field doing something. The only thing that came up in the first part of my being there in that job was there was a big protest on the agricultural policy and at least 200,000 farmers from all over France and all over the rest of Europe marched on Strasbourg. And they marched on the Consul General's residence.

They knew where I was living, but I wasn't scared for some reason. But they did some damage to our consulate. They burned something and all of that and pulled down the gate. The mayor who was then a woman, when I heard about it, someone called and I marched out there to the consulate to see what was going on physically and they really damaged it. It was on international television, CNN. Of course, my friends didn't even know where Strasbourg was. They said why is it that whenever you go to some place there is always things that blow up? We didn't even notice Strasbourg!

Other than that, nothing too much happened in Strasbourg which was nice. I like being under the radar. It was great. It took a lot of effort, of course, they were always petitioning me, Madam Consul General, you've got to have the ambassador come here. "Okay I'll ask her." So as it were she came to the 50th anniversary of WWII in Europe. I think she got inundated enough she came for something then and that was more difficult than anything else. At one point, the administration—Clinton—was going to come but then they scratched that. And I said, "Oh God, I'm so happy that he didn't get here." But she came twice and it was a lot of preparation but it turned out great. But other than that, as I said, I think our highest ranking person was maybe a lieutenant ... or what do you call it ... Lieutenant General or something like that. Nobody came. Once they came they wanted to get back though, oh god, this is great!

WILLIAM A. WEINGARTEN
Minister for Economic Affairs, OECD
Paris (1992-1996)

Mr. Weingarten was born in New York in 1936. He received his BA from Colgate University and his MSFS from Georgetown University. He served in the U.S. Army overseas from 1958-1961. His postings after entering the Foreign Service in 1962 included Paris, My Tho, Belgrade, Brussels, Canberra and Ottawa. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on July 29, 1999.

Q: Well, then, in '92, whither?

WEINGARTEN: Paris.

Q: And you were in Paris from when to when?

WEINGARTEN: '92 to '96.

Q: What were you up to?

WEINGARTEN: I was the minister counselor for economic affairs at the OECD mission. I had selected that post or for some years, kept an eye on it, because I had promised my wife back in 1968 and told her that I'd take her back to Paris some day to live, and I hadn't been able to do that, and this was the time to do it.

Q: What was the OECD at that time? I mean, what was its coverage? I mean, what was it?

WEINGARTEN: Well, at the time, it was an organization that includes all of the major Western industrial democracies plus Japan, New Zealand, and Australia, and it was pretty much a sleepy organization until about '91-92, and it was kind of a terminal place to go. Nobody ever gets promoted out of the OECD. It's kind of a pre-retirement tour for a lot of people. But then, it was also the place in the '70s and '80s, where if you had a really intractable international problem that you couldn't make progress on politically, you'd shunt it off to the OECD, have it looked at, have it staffed, and have it studied and talk about it there. That takes it out of the spotlight.

Q: OECD stands for what?

WEINGARTEN: Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development. It's the outgrowth of the old OEEC, which was the operating system for the Marshall Plan. And so over the years, for example, the International Energy Agency was created within the OECD structure to address the energy problem in the 1970s. And then in '92, with the dissolution of the Soviet Union, all of these Eastern European countries, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Bulgaria and so on, all wanted links with the West. For example, the preferred one was NATO. They wanted NATO, but NATO had a clause that commits every member to defend every other member, which was not something we were anxious to do with respect, say, to Poland. The other organization they angled to get into was the European Union, but the European Union has very high barriers to entry, and economically these countries weren't ready for that. But they wanted some form of link with the West that would keep them happy and would fend off the day when we would have to consider them for NATO or the European Union, so the OECD came into the fore. So we wound up bringing in Poland, Hungary, the Czech Republic, and then we added Korea during the time I was there. And we had to, in effect, interview each of these countries very, very carefully because the OECD is not an organization without entry barriers of its own. You have to have convertible currencies; you have to have free capital movements - so on and so forth. So we did a lot of work in examining these countries.

Q: I take it when you say "we" you're talking about the other members, too.

WEINGARTEN: Yes, the other members. The other thing that's interesting about the OECD is that all of the ideas, all of the motivations for the organization all come from the United States.

It's really quite extraordinary. The U.S. is basically the only country that proposes new things for the OECD to consider. Nobody else does.

Q: I would have thought that would have sort of a stultifying effect on the rest of the group.

WEINGARTEN: It does, and we never intended it that way, but they did not use the OECD or did not see the OECD as an instrument that could further their national policies, and we did. And so we used it. And then finally, I think it got to be a habit. They just sort of sat back and let the Americans take the lead.

Q: I would have though the French would have... you know, it's in Paris, and the French don't like the United States leading anything. I would have thought they would have been a -

WEINGARTEN: Well, sometimes they would be the ones that would say, "No, no, you can't do this" or "you shouldn't do that" or "you should do it this way." But they never had ideas of their own, nor did the Europeans as a group were 16 of the 27 members. But the French were very critical of some of the U.S. proposals, and could get them modified if they made a convincing persuasive case, but they never really projected... One time they sort of floated the idea that maybe the OECD should extend its reach into North Africa, but they never pushed it very strongly. It never seemed to be more than just an idea thrown up but not pushed very hard.

Q: What was the OECD doing? I mean, what was its operation?

WEINGARTEN: Oh, they had a vast variety of things. It ranged all the way from setting standards for fruits and vegetables to international aviation standards. We did aviation. AID standards, untying aid, reporting aid transactions. It was an international energy agency; it was a forum for trade debates, sometimes very technical, sometimes policy level. And then one of the things that was done while I was there was to extend a hand to these newly independent countries of Eastern Europe and give them assistance in the form of advice on how to set up a central bank, how to set up statistical systems that enabled you to measure how your economy was doing.

Q: It sounds like there are a lot of other organizations. The European Union is setting up fruits and vegetable standards - whether cucumbers can be curved or not - and you have the ICAO dealing with aviation - you know, I mean, each country is going out and doing its own aid program and all - it sounds like you were doing things, but any other countries were just doing what they or other organizations were doing their thing.

WEINGARTEN: Well, in a sense yes, but the OECD had this coordination function. All of the members would keep each other in the picture on what they were doing in these various fields, and one of the important things that the OECD had was kind of a peer- pressure aspect. As you review somebody's economy - and another part of their activity was to do an annual review of each economy, and they'd provide advice or guidance - and we, for example, in the U.S. economy, we would always try to send over somebody very senior from the Treasury Department who would get a lot of questions about U.S. deficit or about other aspects that weren't so hot in our economy. Sometimes they'd get very angry at being questioned like this.

Q: From what you're saying, though, you're saying it's sort of a sleepy thing, but it sounds like a rather key organization within the industrial world.

WEINGARTEN: Yes, it is, and it's probably not recognized as such by all that many people. It is a key economic organization, and you're right, it could be a very sleepy place at times.

Q: But it sounds like a... The types of decisions and all that would be coming out of here all sound controversial as all hell, that would set standards or how to distribute aid and all that would all seem to be very political.

WEINGARTEN: Oh, yes. It was all politicized, but to the extent possible, it had some of the political sting that these issues could have if debated openly, pitting one country against the other. In the OECD, you could debate these things, set standards, and inform each other of what you were doing and do it sort of out of the limelight.

Q: Well, what would happen when you'd set these standards? Would countries go along with them?

WEINGARTEN: Yes, basically, it's a financial organization. It sets financial standards for capital movements and so on, so that's a big part of the operation.

Q: Who was the ambassador there?

WEINGARTEN: The first ambassador was Alan Larson, who was a Foreign Service officer and is now assistant secretary for economic affairs and may become the undersecretary for economic affairs in the Department. He was there the first year, and he was the one who hired me. I knew him pretty well. I'd worked for him before, and so I went and saw him and asked to be considered for this job. And I had a lot of push from Washington because I had done this thankless food policy job and enjoyed it. So I got that job. That was Al's third year, and then he was replaced by David Aaron, who's now the undersecretary for international affairs at Commerce. And so he was there the three years, the last three years I was there. I did a four-year tour there.

Q: What were the major issues that you were in?

WEINGARTEN: The major issue that I was involved in was the opening of Central and Eastern Europe, and I did pretty much anything that anybody wanted done or the ambassador wanted done. I became a speechwriter, wrote a lot of speeches for him. And it was kind of funny because he's a professional writer. He writes potboiler mysteries. And I wrote speeches for him. Basically, it was a nice assignment. It was not a particularly testing one. I didn't really work flat-out. But I sure lived flat-out in Paris. It's really a nice place.

Q: Well, what about the new countries coming out of the former Soviet Union and the Soviet Bloc? The criteria to get in, you must have had to cut a lot of corners in order to get them in because they were - I mean they were coming out of this authoritarian system.

WEINGARTEN: Yes, well, you did have to bend the rules. There were some rules, though, that were critical to the organization, and one of those was the convertibility of the currency, the free capital movements. You had to have that; pretty much everything else could be negotiated. And what those countries got out of it, was they would undergo the same kind of reviews that the others did and point out to them some of the policy mistakes or any shortfalls they were making and problems they were causing for themselves. I benefited them. It does sort of knit you into the Western world. And it's still very sought after.

Q: Did you find that your delegation and other Western delegations were acting as sort of tutors?

WEINGARTEN: Yes, basically, that's it. They basically asked to be tutored, and we were happy to do it.

Q: What about dealing with the Europeans?

WEINGARTEN: We dealt with them... one of the things that made it easy to work in the OECD was that all of the representatives to it were either located in the same building or in the immediate vicinity, so it was really easy to stay in touch with these folks. So we had good relations with everyone.

JOYCE E. LEADER
Consul General
Marseilles (1997-1999)

Ambassador Leader was born in Pennsylvania and raised in Ohio. He was educated at Dennison University, the University of Chicago, and the Columbia University School of Journalism. After work in the private sector and with the US Department of Education, he joined the Peace Corps, serving in Kinshasa and at headquarters in Washington. Joining the State Department in 1982 he began his career in which he was to deal primarily with African concerns, both in Washington and abroad. His foreign postings include Kinshasa, Ouagadougou, Lagos and Marseilles. In 1999 he was appointed Ambassador to Guinea, where he served until 2000. Ambassador Leader was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2003

Q: You left in 1997. Where did you go?

LEADER: I got a little bit of a reprieve. I was assigned consul general in Marseilles. That was very nice.

Q: How long were you there?

LEADER: I was there for two years, not the normal three year tour because I got an ambassadorship immediately after being promoted to OC. I did not stay the whole three years, unfortunately, because it was gorgeous.

Q: You were there from 1997 to 1999?

LEADER: Yes.

Q: What were the main things that you found yourself doing in Marseilles?

LEADER: Marseilles had a lot of representation activity. It is on the southern coast of France where the United States had had such an impact during World War II in terms of saving the people from the axis powers when we invaded and liberated the coast. There is just ceremony after ceremony after ceremony commemorating this. The mayors of Nice and Cannes were very strong in terms of having these kinds of ceremonies and inviting the U.S. consul general, making sure that you're there at this or that flag ceremony. On the Fourth of July, there were about 10 stops to make for little ceremonies. That was a big time, but there were other times that these ceremonies would take place. Frequently, they were in connection with ship visits. The Sixth Fleet had its headquarters in Naples, Italy, but the fleet would circulate in the Mediterranean and stop at the French ports. These were always big events. The town would usually host a big something or another. In Cannes, they did lovely luncheons for the officers and some of the crew. We would often hold receptions and invite not only the American community but also the French community onto the ship and so I'd have to be on hand for that. Then there would be return receptions. There was a lot of activity. This did dwindle a little bit because the ships were being called more frequently to go through the Suez Canal to support the Sixth Fleet in activities off Iraq. That did slow down our ship visits just a little bit. Thanksgiving was another busy time.

Also, there were American communities. There were a lot of Americans who stayed in France after the war, married French women, raised their families there, and were getting on in years. There were clubs of Americans who would get together. One big one drew from most of Nice, Cannes, some from Monaco (to which I was also accredited as the U.S. representative). So we would have events that they would host as well. On the Fourth of July, there was always the problem of how many of the dances could I get to, how many of these soirees. And at Thanksgiving time, it was how many Thanksgiving dinners could I get to. There were two clubs in Monaco. One time, I actually went to both dinners there. Then you'd move down to Nice and Cannes. Then in Marseilles there were two or three clubs that did dinners. It was incredible. Everybody at the consulate got involved in representing us at these various dinners. Let me tell you, there are more ways to serve pumpkin than I ever imagined. Nobody knew how to make a pumpkin pie, but they knew how to make everything else out of pumpkin from pumpkin soup to some other kind of dessert that was pumpkin. They all tried to be very American and follow the ritual, but they all missed a little bit. But nevertheless, we had to eat, to do our duty. That took up a lot of time, especially traveling back and forth. There used to be a consulate in Nice as well as in Marseilles. It was Nice that handled Monaco. But that had been closed and all of those responsibilities shifted to Marseilles. When Bordeaux closed, we also got half of that territory. So, our territory extended from the Italian border and the principality of Monaco all the way to Toulouse. It was four hours from Marseilles to Toulouse and it was three hours from Marseilles to the principality of Monaco. So we were on the road quite a bit. We also went up to Grenoble. That was part of the territory as well. I only got there a couple of times. Then in addition, I dealt with American businesses in the area. We were always looking at what they were doing. But it was interesting that they didn't want a chamber of commerce. They had disbanded their chapter of the French-American Chamber of Commerce and did not want to restart it. They didn't see any value added. They all seemed to be getting along quite well without very much support from us, though they tolerated our visits and our imposition on them. A few times I traveled with the commercial officer from the embassy who came down to see what was going on. There were some high tech industries down there. There were some technological parks where there were a fair representation of American businesses. So, that was another aspect. Airbus was in our territory. So we had a lot to do with Airbus in Toulouse. Then there were some other airplane plants near Marseilles that we went to from time to time. We were trying to promote American business, but they didn't need too much promotion. There were frequently American delegations that came to look at business prospects. Sometimes we would hear about them and sometimes we wouldn't. I might hear after the fact, "Oh, we had a delegation of Americans in Marseilles." I would hear it from somebody at the mayor's office. Well, they hadn't bothered to tell us about it and we didn't really get involved. So it was kind of catch as catch can. That was another aspect. I also tried to promote the dissemination of information about American policy through collaboration with our local USIS officer. We would do this by organizing speeches at some of the universities in the area or with chambers of commerce or with other kinds of clubs in the area. One of the ones that I liked to work with quite a lot was the military. There was a military training school in the area. I organized a couple of speeches there. Usually I tried to bring down people from our Paris embassy who were more on top of the policies that we were promoting than we were in the consulate. I only had three Americans at the consulate and one person who did the navy criminal investigations. So that was another very important activity that we were doing in the area to promote dissemination of policy.

Q: Did you run across endemic anti-Americanism in some parts of the community?

LEADER: Quite honestly, they loved us. I don't know what's going to happen when these people who remember the war are all dead. I'm sure it will change and I'm sure that it has changed more recently. There was a little bit more ambivalence about the U.S. in Marseilles itself because we bombed Marseilles and they remembered that. We bombed it in the process of liberating it and they weren't very happy about that approach. So, we weren't as warmly welcomed in Marseilles at all these commemorations as we were farther up the coast on the Riviera.

Q: What about the increasing number of North Africans into France, many Muslim? Was this changing the character?

LEADER: Some people often refer to Marseilles as one of the largest Muslim cities outside of Africa. In fact, in many parts of the world, they don't have as many North Africans and Muslims. It had an impact in Marseilles particularly because there was such a large North African community and there were a lot of people... There were several different groups that had connections with Algeria and there were the Pied Noir, the French who had lived and farmed and had their businesses in Algeria who left when that revolution took place around 1960. A lot of them settled in Aix-en-Provence, but also in other parts of southern France. Then there were the Arabs who had worked for them who had fled when they did. And there was just a lot of immigration from North Africa as well. There were parts of the city that were really just Arab. In fact, it was quite fun right near the consulate, right near the old port. There was a market that made you think you were in North Africa because they had all the dates and the fruits and vegetables that came from the orchards and the farms in that part of the world. You really felt like you were in another place rather than France. Certainly a lot of French people did not like coming to Marseilles. At the time I was there, it was considered off bounds. People didn't think it was safe. It still had the aura of being connected to the mafia and drug mafias. Then to have all of these Arabs there. It's kind of like here in the metropolitan Washington area, some people don't want to come into downtown Washington because they are not comfortable there. Fortunately, it's my understanding that this has changed a lot in Marseilles. It has really changed since I was there and become a much more open city. Part of it is because of some commercial developments for which I have to give the mayor and his people credit. They worked hard and they succeeded where I didn't think they were going to. They have cruise ships going into Marseilles regularly now. So part of it was their efforts to get the cruise ships there, but it was also the fact that the fast train from Paris, the TGV, now goes all the way to Marseilles. That has also made it easier for French people to get there. It's helped it to become a tourist destination and to open the city up more to everybody.

Q: Were you looking at drugs in Marseilles?

LEADER: We did meet on occasion with some of the French investigators, but as far as U.S. interest was concerned, we had closed our DEA offices in Provence and the Riviera. The explanation for it that I was given was that drugs were still coming into Marseilles but they were not going to the U.S. from there, they were destined for other parts of Europe. So, our drug investigators were not so consumed anymore with that trafficking.

Q: That was the old French Connection.

LEADER: Right. So our drug people were not so interested in that anymore.

Q: Did you ever run across or deal with Le Pen?

LEADER: We watched very closely what was going on with that political party, the Front National, the FN. But it was U.S. policy that we not deal with them. This became a big issue when a Front National party member was elected mayor of the town which was a big port for some of our ships, Toulon. This became a big issue when we would bring our ships into that port. It was a headquarters for the French navy and so we would sometimes want to do exercises with them and maybe bring in a ship. There was a Sixth Fleet liaison officer based in Toulon. He was superb and is now the military attaché in the embassy in Madrid. He knew all the people and all the players and all the characters. He was able to give us good advice. They managed one time to bring the admiral who was the head of the Sixth Fleet onto a ship there without having him make the traditional courtesy call on the mayor. Some of the lower down officers did that. But we had to treat it not as a party issue but as a protocol issue. So we did have lower officers from the military meet them. But it made it very awkward for us. The whole idea that we were supposed to report on these people without ever being able to talk to them or any of their followers made it a little difficult.

I would like to add one more thing that did become a very important issue for us and that was security. One of the walls of our consulate was right down on the street and so we weren't in a good situation. Security was becoming a big issue after the explosions in East Africa. We worked with the mayor to get some barriers put up behind our embassy so that people couldn't park there. It was a very narrow street but cars had a tendency to pull up on the sidewalk and sort of park temporarily. So we got that so they couldn't do that. We started to look at our evacuation plan and how we would get out of our building. Our evacuation plan was outdated because the building next to us which was supposed to be our evacuation route had changed its roof and you couldn't get from one building to the other anymore. We worked with police in Nice and Cannes and Toulouse about security. So that was a big, important issue for us. We were always told that we probably didn't need to worry about any links between the Islam in Marseilles and the Islam of the Middle East, that these were very separate... Or the Al-Qaeda. That these were very separate groups, very separate issues. The rationale we were given was that nothing would happen in Marseilles because there were some Algerian activists who used it as a planning base and they didn't want to foul their own nest or to be chased out, or to bring the police down on them. I always was a little skeptical of these assurances. As we've seen more recently, there have been threats to the consulate in Marseilles that were made public. That was another big issue that we were trying to deal with. There were often big demonstrations in Marseilles. One time a consulate was occupied by some demonstrators. This was always a concern, whether the demonstrations would remain peaceful.

Q: What were they demonstrating about?

LEADER: Well, there would be political demonstrations. I'm trying to remember what that particular one was about. Turkish Kurds often demonstrated. I think it was the Turkish consulate that got occupied. Usually they were very calm and they were very peaceful in their marches. They were usually allowed to march. It was the Turkish Kurds who were protesting the treatment of a Turkish Kurd who had been arrested by the government of Turkey and imprisoned and was going on trial. That was one of the big ones.

LARRY COLBERT
Consul General
Paris, France (1997-2001)

Mr. Colbert was born in Ohio in 1940. He attended the Universities of Ohio and Missouri. After a tour in Turkey with the Peace Corps and a year as an assistant on Capital Hill, he entered the Foreign Service and was sent to Viet Nam as Regional Advisor. His subsequent postings, where he served as Consular Officer include: Ankara, Turkey, Oran, Algeria, Dublin, Ireland and Manila, Philippines. At Tijuana, Mexico, Madrid, Spain, Ciudad Juarez, Mexico and Paris, France Mr. Colbert served as Consul General. Mr. Colbert was interviewed by Charles

Stuart Kennedy in November, 2006

Q: I think these are interesting things to put in and pass on. OK you are in Paris. You went to Paris from when to when?

COLBERT: From '97 to 2001. I think let's talk about how I got to Paris.

Q: Yeah.

COLBERT: I think that's important to understand how the system works in reality in terms of assignments. The more senior the officer, the more the assignments are decided outside the system but by the system. That's to say that you have to request a position or you have to...it is rare that you're called blindly and said, "Take this job." Maybe if you are Negroponte and they want you to go to Iraq or something but for the most part when you are in the system you look around to see what's available at your grade and then when you are leaving, when the job will become open and so on.

In the case of Paris I had had my eye on Paris as a possible final assignment because of timing issues. I knew when I would be leaving Juarez, and I knew when Paris would be opening because I knew the person who was there, Jim Ward would be leaving after four years and our timing would be probably matched. But another officer had been promised the job I found out even before Jim Ward arrived to take on the job, that's really unusual that a job should be promised to somebody three or four years ahead of it becoming open. So I knew that Paris wasn't going to be a possibility for me. I had French and I had been I think a fairly well regarded professional in my field so I thought well, it's possible but if this other person had the job locked then why...you can't really fight the Bureau of Consular Affairs front office.

Q: Who was this?

COLBERT: Maura Harty.

Q: Uh huh.

COLBERT: Whom at that point I think was deputy assistant secretary. She wasn't an assistant secretary, maybe at that point she was not at that point deputy assistant secretary but she was certainly...I was reliably informed had been promised the job by Mary Ryan, Assistant Secretary. I'm minding my own business and the phone rings and Jim Ward calls me from Paris and said, "Are you still interested in coming here as consul general?" I said, "Is the Pope Polish?" He said, "Well, the job is now in play because Maura is going to be ambassador to, it turned out, Paraguay, somewhere. So would you like me to have a word with Ambassador Harriman and recommend you?" I said, "Ah yes, please do that." He said, "Well, I'll be happy to do that. Ambassador Harriman and I are on very good terms, but you are going to have to sell me yourself. What can you do?" I said, "Well, I'll call down to Ambassador Jones and..."

Q: Jimmy Jones in Mexico City.

COLBERT: He was the ambassador in Mexico City, he was a former Congressman, former president of the American stock exchange and probably one of the sharpest ambassadors I have ever worked for.

Q: I interviewed him. He was at a very early age; he was a sort of the gatekeeper for Lyndon Johnson.

COLBERT: He was in Georgetown University when Kennedy was assassinated and I think it was either in law school or in his senior year, I think maybe law school. Johnson just sort of just sucked him out of Georgetown and brought him over. Whether he finished his law degree at that point or not I don't know. He became a wonder kid in the White House, but certainly a really, really sharp guy. So I called up Ambassador Jones and said, "Would you mind contacting Ambassador Pamela Harriman and putting a good word in for me?" He said, "Well Larry, you know the consul generalship down here in Mexico City is coming open, why don't you come down here and be consul general in Mexico City. You could be supervisory consul general for all the constituent posts, it's a good job, we would love to have you, etc., etc., etc." I said, "Well Ambassador Jones I'm very flattered but I've already done two tours in Mexico and also if my wife found out that I agreed to go to Mexico City at the expense of possibly going to Paris she would probably kill me and then maybe come after you." I said that only jokingly, I don't think my wife would do that but I said, "Seriously, I really would like to go to Paris." So he said, "Well, I'll call Pamela." That was all I ever heard.

Maybe a month later the ambassador called me up on the phone and he said, "Why didn't you return my phone call?" I said, "Your phone call?" I mean I would have returned the ambassadors phone call. He apparently had called me back to tell me that he had spoken with Pamela but my secretary neglected to tell me that he had called. I didn't kill her but I thought evil thoughts at least for one day because he really thought I was very rude and he had gone out of his way for me and I hadn't been polite enough to call him. In point of fact, those things happen and he accepted my apology but it made a difference. Ambassador Harriman wrote a letter to the assistant secretary for the European bureau and wrote a letter to Mary Ryan saying that I was her personal choice. I was Pamela Harriman's personal choice. Pamela Harriman didn't know me from Adam but Jim Ward had said nice things about me and obviously Ambassador Jones had...it turned out Ambassador Jones and Pamela Harriman went way back to Democratic politics so they knew each other.

Anyway I don't know that I was the Bureau of Consular affairs Candidate for the job. I have a feeling that it was probably somebody else, but I was Pamela Harriman's candidate so in that case what the bureau of consular affairs wanted I don't think mattered as much. You can't stand in front of a powerful politically appointed ambassador who really wants something and she was very well connected, as you know. Unfortunately, I never got to work for the lady. She had a heart attack swimming in the pool at the Ritz Hotel and died. She was in her early 70s at the time. One of her regular regimes was to go to the Ritz for exercise in the pool. I mean if you are going to swim in a pool swimming in the Hotel Ritz in Paris is probably the best place to go. It is a lovely pool. I've never been allowed to swim in it myself but I've seen it.

So when I arrived she was already departed and she was replaced by Felix Rohatyn who was a

New York financier. He is probably now in his late 70s I would think, a multimillionaire, fundraiser and a very, very competent person. He had fled from Austria I think as a child, because he was Jewish, either just before or just after Hitler occupied the country. He went through I think maybe high school, junior high school, he spent a substantial period of his adolescent life in France, fled again from Marseilles 1940 and the collapse and obviously came to the United States as a very relatively young man and did very well. So I worked for him, obviously not directly because there was a DCM between the ambassador and me.

Q: How would you describe French-American relations at the time you got there?

COLBERT: Well this was under the Clinton administration and the French loved Bill Clinton. They really, really thought that he was a very good president. In terms of day-to-day stuff, if you sit in on the country team meetings, there was always an awful lot of grouching about the French not agreeing with us on that, the French being sticky about this or the French dragging their feet on that. Often I found myself quietly agreeing with the French but of course, you couldn't really do that out loud. On such issues as they had a ban on hormone, beef that had hormones added, you couldn't export to the EU.

Q: Frankenstein Food.

COLBERT: The French are fanatic about their food. They take food issues very, very seriously. I mean it's strange when you think about it, they don't pasteurize their cheese. If you've eaten French cheese in France you know it's quite good but ours is probably healthier because it is pasteurized and is really safer. But they're quite fanatical about their food and we wanted to sell wheat that had been altered or perhaps not altered and they weren't having it. So there was a struggle between the EU and U.S. agriculture as to what could or couldn't be imported into Europe. The French, who are sort of in the forefront of those countries and trying to keep out things that they didn't want in. Part of it was protectionism, I mean they wanted to save their own market, part of it was just their being French and part of it was sincere hysteria. I meant that as it came out, sincere hysteria. But often you had to be sympathetic. They had their own way of doing things.

When I was in France the 35-hour workweek came in.

Q: This was under was it Mitterrand?

COLBERT: Jospin. Chirac was still president but he was advised by his advisors that they should have a snap election and the conservatives would retain control of the national assembly. In fact, the Socialists, the main opposition party at that time, really didn't think they were going to win and they put up a very sort of, how would you describe Jospin, sort of a professorial in the pejorative sense candidate, no charisma, no "je ne sais quoi" (I don't know what). But, whatever it was he didn't have it. But Jospin won and so the Socialists were in charge. One of their campaign promises was that the country would go from 40 to 35 hours. Well I don't think that they thought that they were going to win. But then they won and suddenly France went from 38 hours or 39 hours, down to 35. It was somewhat less than 40, maybe 38 but they went to 35, which was a real challenge for everybody. The idea of the Socialists was that if you reduced the number of hours that people work then businesses would have to employ more people and their unemployment rate, which is always scandalously higher than ours, at that point it was particularly high, would be reduced because people would be working fewer hours so you'd have to employ more people. It doesn't really work out that way.

What happened was the larger companies bought more equipment, people did imaginative scheduling things, but employment did not increase. For me, as a consular manager it was a real challenge as it was for many other people in the embassy because the employees decided that the way they would go from 40 to 35 is they wouldn't work on Friday afternoons. So the embassy FSNs except for those who were being paid premium overtime pay all went home at 1:00 on Friday, or noon on Friday, whichever it was, I don't remember. So you'd go from having your entire staff to puff nobody, except for the Americans who, of course, had to stay. The Americans, as you are well aware, did not do all the grunt work, they didn't answer the phones, they didn't do the clerical stuff, they didn't do the vouchers and they certainly didn't do all the mechanical things that are involved in doing consular work. So you would find at say 1:00 everybody is gone except for all of you. What do you do to keep busy? Well I'm sure that Washington would say there are lots of things you can do but over time those lots of things become more and more problematical, so it was a real challenge. That was one of the challenges I dealt with and we managed to work it out.

Q: Did you also find that your employees, the French, have these very long vacation periods?

COLBERT: One of the reasons that it is difficult for young people to get employment in France is that if you hire a person after six months they are considered a permanent employee. To terminate them you have to go labor court; witch or bitch depending on what. She was then met by police authorities who attempt to take her into custody and she ends up rolling on the ground with one of them. She resists arrest physically so she is arrested and taken to jail. Of course, we know nothing about this.

Q: how did you find living in France at that time?

COLBERT: Very pleasant. I had only one unpleasant experience with one French person. I think once we had an unpleasant experience in a restaurant in some little town in Provence but no I think people were generally nice, friendly, my French accent is decidedly American and they never made fun of my French. They certainly were very polite, very helpful and either they have changed from their reputation of being unpleasant and surly toward Americans or that was a bad rap that they did not deserve. Certainly I had no bad experiences with any of them.

Q: I must say we've made several trips to France and I speak very little French but I found it very pleasant. This is I think it's a generational thing.

COLBERT: There's a deep, deep connection between the French and the Americans. I think that that relationship goes way back obviously to our revolution but its been enriched, not just by the First World War and the Second World War and all that but by the number of French people who study here, the number of Americans who study there, the mixture in commerce and certainly the mixture in marriage. So many, many prominent French people are married to American women and vice versa. The connections are just so, so intense and one forgets. There are so many organizations like the Daughters of the American Revolution; the Sons of the American Revolution have French branches. There is the so-called Cincinnati Society...

Q: Oh yeah?

COLBERT: Which is composed with first sons of Americans whose...

Q: Officers.

COLBERT: Officers, sons of officers, who served under George Washington. There are thirteen chapters to represent the thirteen states, there is a fourteenth chapter and that's composed of officers who served in French regiments in the American Revolution of which there were...

Q: Rochambeau and all.

COLBERT: Rochambeau and all. These organizations and many, many, many others are intertwined to the two societies. One of the most I think emotionally touching things that I experienced similar to visiting the cemetery in Normandy or the many other military cemeteries particularly the one in Normandy. But my last year I was invited to a triennial, every three years the Cincinnati Society has a meeting either in French or in the United States. This is a meeting in France where they inaugurate their new president general for a three year term. It was held in Versailles Palace, which was loaned to this Society by the French government for this occasion. It was a black tie dinner, cocktails in Louis XIV private chapel followed by a ceremony in the Hall of Mirrors in which one French soldier dressed in each regiments colors, representing each regiment that served in France or in the United States during the revolution in their own traditional 18th century uniform. They played the two national anthems and then at a particular point each soldier took three steps forward, presented arms with a musket and they read off the name of the regiment and how many people died, how many people were wounded in that regiment and stepped back. The ceremony lasted a good 20 minutes because there were that many regiments and one has to be impressed with the number of dead and wounded, these are French soldiers serving with Rochambeau and it was very, very moving. Then we had a black tie dinner with representatives from the French government.

I was the only American official there but I was there as a guest of the Society not representing the embassy. But I was very impressed with the ceremony. Once a year there is a ceremony in the town of Grasse, where Admiral de Grasse is from. I was privileged to go there, there is always a representative from the consulate in Marseilles because it is in the Marseilles consulate but I was there after I had retired and the official U.S. guest was the General Jones, the head of NATO who came down and made a speech. Admiral de Grasse commanded the fleet, which compelled the surrender of Cornwallis. The ties between the countries are just so, so tremendous.

Then you get these small-minded idiots in this country, like there are small-minded idiots in that country, who for example wanted to rename French fries to freedom fries because the French wouldn't send troops to Iraq too. That same Congressman now is one of the Congressmen who were saying that we made a mistake in going in the first place. This petty name calling on both sides by morons is just disgraceful.

Q: I think Colin Powell summed it up by talking about someone saying to the secretary of state about French-American relations. He said, "Well you know France and the United States have been in marriage counseling for about 200 years now."

COLBERT: Absolutely true but the marriage continues to work. The first leader who called Kennedy during the Cuban Missile Crisis was Charles de Gaul.

Q: Yeah.

COLBERT: We have stood together through thick and thin and we've continued to do so.

Q: Well again in my interviewing one of the strong themes that goes through these interviews is that the French-American connection, the annoyance. One man who was in NATO and an American in Brussels said his kids when young thought there was a nationality known as Those God Damn French because he would come home almost every night and slam his briefcase on the table and say, "Those God damn French." But at the same time you have intelligence in the military side, very close cooperation always.

COLBERT: On the intelligence side the cooperation is total, the mutual respect is very, very high. I knew both station chiefs that served when I was there and they had very, very close relationships with their counterparts. The military cooperate in so many ways and at so many levels and so well. People should be able to say, "Have you considered this or do you think about the circumstances of that." I think the French sometimes represent an anchor to our battleship and I'm talking categorically, slowing us down sometimes even stopping us. The trouble with being the super power and the economic colossus is that we can go charging forward. On occasion perhaps somebody saying no or stop and think about it it is a good thing. I think that recent events would indicate that perhaps more of that would be a good thing.

Q: We are talking about involvement in Iraq.

COLBERT: You understood that did you. I was being so elliptical. The French really believed that what we were about would have consequences about which we wouldn't like, we in the west. I don't have any doubt that with hindsight we would have done things differently or perhaps not at all. So I think the French are good for us.

Q: Did you have any problems with Bill Clinton and his impeachment and his affair with Monica Lewinsky and all that sort of thing?

COLBERT: The French found that whole thing to be totally incomprehensible. I have never met a French person who had any sympathy for the impeachment. Number one, why were we investigating the private life of a president? Consensual sex between adults and even adults who aren't married is not unknown in any country and certainly not unknown in France. They would have pointed out to me had the time been current that the illegitimate child of Mitterrand attended his funeral. They just couldn't understand why people would be asked to testify about their private life, why it was a concern of anybody other than the principals within the immediate circle, that is to say the spouse, mistress, husband, and why you would spend all this money to investigate something. They thought that Ken Stark was a monster.

Q: Ken Starr, S-T-A-R-R.

COLBERT: The special prosecutor was as far as they were concerned on a children's crusade and they would probably have hoped that he ended up just like the children on the children's crusade ended up. They had no truck with any of it. Basically they liked Clinton, I mean they didn't always agree with our policies but they found him to be a competent, personable leader that they could get along with. I think Chirac and Clinton from my perspective and our perspective that is obviously consul general not political counselor got along very well, communicated very well. To them the whole thing was a joke.

I was not, let's see I left in 2001 so Bush was already president, they did not care for the Bush administration when I was there. The Kyoto issue was part of it, a feeling of not being listened to was part of it. I don't know what more I want to say; maybe you can ask me a question.

LISA PIASCIK
Consul General
Paris (2011-2014)

Lisa Piascik was born in Delaware in 1957. She graduated from George Washington University before entering the Foreign Service in 1980. Her overseas posts include Beirut, Lebanon; Sana'a, Lebanon; Cebu, Philippines; Baku, Azerbaijan; Warsaw, Poland; Abuja, Nigeria; Baqubah, Diyala Province, Iraq; and Paris, France. Ms. Piascik was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2016.

Q: In 2010 what?

PIASCIK: In 2010 I left. Before I went to Iraq, I had gotten a handshake on the consul general position in Paris as my onward assignment. At some point, we all realized that the position was language designated for French, and my French language scores were decades old, so I went to FSI for six months. I probably could have met the requirements after three months but I elected to stay the entire six months. I'm very glad that I did because it really helped solidify my language skills.

So I went out to Paris in May of 2011 and served there for three years.

Q: Did you take your cat?

PIASCIK: I took two cats with me. They both passed away in Paris and I came back with a French cat.

Q: All right, let's talk about Paris. What was sort of the situation when you arrived there in 2011.

PIASCIK: By 2011, we had pretty much gotten over the bad patch that came about as a result of the Iraq war. France was seen one of our best partners and we shared common interests and values. We didn't always share the same views on how to achieve our goals, but we had a really good working relationship with the French on almost every level.

Q: Let's talk about the consular work there? How did you find the consular section when you arrived and then what were you up to?

PIASCIK: Paris was a full-service consular section with non-immigrant, immigrant and American citizen services. The consulate general in Marseille performed American citizen services and had a dedicated consular staff, although the consular officer was also the management officer for the post. The consulate general in Strasbourg offered limited American citizen services; it accepted passport and report of birth applications and carried out notarial services and emergency consular services. We also had four American presence posts (APPs), in Rennes, Toulouse, Lyon, and Bordeaux. These were tiny posts with one officer and two to three local employees. They offered the same types of consular services that Strasbourg did. These APPs were the first anywhere and had been grandfathered to officer those routine consular services. Finally, there was a consular agency in Nice that reported to Marseille.

As far as the workload was concerned, Paris was a medium-sized non-immigrant visa post, which processed some 60,000 non-immigrant visas per year. France was in the Visa Waiver Program, so French nationals who wanted to visit the United States for tourism or business for 90 days or less did not need a visa. So those who needed visas were going to stay longer than 90 days or needed visas to work, study or invest. We had a very large pool of applicants from North and West Africans who were living in France. We also saw a lot of Chinese applicants, mainly students who wanted to go to the United States during summer vacation. The visa work was pretty straightforward, but there were a cases that needed special handling of one sort or another. This ranged from French performing artists whose applications got stuck in the clearance procedure to Syrian opposition figures who needed to travel to the U.S. Our embassy in the Central African Republic didn't process visas, so we used to see a fair number of applicants wanting or needing diplomatic visas.

We had a small immigrant visa (IV) workload. We only processed 1200-1500 applicants a year. When I was there we took over IV processing for Portugal. CA decided to cease offering immigrant visas in Lisbon because the workload was so small it just wasn't efficient to do them there. The original plan was to move IV processing in Portugal to Spain, but I understand the Portuguese objected to this for political reasons rooted in history. I never really understood why. Anyway, CA saw that we had the capacity to take on the workload.

Q: You mean that a person from Portugal had to go all the way up to Paris?

PIASCIK: Yes, yes.

Q: Oh my God.

PIASCIK: Not very convenient for them. We did send our IV officer and a local employee to Lisbon once a year to interview anyone who couldn't come to Paris.

Now, our real bread and butter was American citizens services. France is a very popular tourist destination, and Paris is one of the most visited cities in the world, with more than 1.5 million American visitors each year. Most people had perfectly lovely experiences and left. But there were also those who encountered problems: they were pickpocketed, ran out of money, they fell ill or went off their medications or died, some had run-ins with law enforcement. There was also a large resident American community and again, while most of them lived their lives with no problems, there were others who had problems, For instance, child custody or child abduction, runaways, abuse, deaths, estate issues, trials and court cases. Something happened every single day.

Q: Do you remember any stories from while you were there?

PIASCIK: Well, we had family living in Brittany – they had been there for quite some time and were out of status. In other words, they were living there illegally. There was the mother, her husband, who was quite a bit older than the mother and in poor health, and their two children. The older was 16 or 17 and the younger about 10, I think. The mother's father was also there as well. The mother had a history of mental illness, and at one point, the children had been removed from her care and put in foster care. Her father claimed that he was being held against his will by her. And at some point several years earlier, the woman's husband had applied for and received a passport in the woman's husband's name. I don't remember how it was discovered, but we referred it to the regional security officer for investigation and follow-up. However, the husband died, and then the father also passed away after he returned to the U.S. We kept trying to convince the woman to return to the U.S., but she didn't want to. She managed to subsist on French social welfare subsidies, which is pretty crazy considering she was there illegally. She started acting erratically again, and the kids were placed in foster care. The older child, a girl, ran away and reunited with her mother. The mother also tried to remove the younger child, a boy, from foster care. It was a real mess. The boy was very unhappy and just wanted to be with his mom and sister. He received very good care from the foster family and French child welfare services, but we had to send an officer out to check on him. The mother and sister did return to the U.S. We eventually got the French to agree to return the boy and we worked with CA and the child welfare services in Vermont, I think it was. And the fun and games did not end there; we heard that the mother tried to abduct the boy back in the U.S. This was just a very complex case requiring a lot of time.

We also had a case in which a teenage girl who was attending boarding school. Her parents were assigned to a military base in Germany. She attended the school during the week and went home on the weekends. Well, one Friday she did not show up at home. It turned out that she ran away with some guy she met on the internet. It wasn't so much a consular case and the primary actors were the management section and our FBI representatives, but we worked very closely with them. The girl was eventually found and we worked out an agreement that she would be returned to her parents in Germany rather than enter the French social services system as a runaway.

There was also another complicated case in which an American citizen killed his doctor in a very brutal manner. This happened in the U.S. He had fled the U.S. and gone to Guadeloupe, which is a French overseas territory, and claimed he was also a French citizen. This turned out to be true. France wouldn't extradite him, but he was tried and convicted and sentenced to prison. He was able to cite some provision in French law for a retrial, so he was brought to Paris for that and this is where we got involved. The family of the doctor was really concerned that he would be let off the hook, and they were in constant contact with us. There was also congressional interest in the case. It put us in a delicate position since the perpetrator was also a U.S. citizen. We reached out to him but he didn't want anything to do with us. We did work with the French prosecutor to get them to cover the family's expenses to come for the trial, and we sent an officer and local staff member to attend the trial itself. He was found guilty once more and received an even long sentence.

We would had contact with celebrities. The actress Hilary Swank a came in because she'd been robbed in a limo on her way in from the airport. Her bag and her passport were stolen and she needed a new passport. She was perfectly charming, called us herself, came in by herself.

Q: My wife was pickpocketed in Paris.

PIASCIK: Not a day went by when we didn't have people come in or call us because they'd been pickpocketed.

We had one really unfortunate case. CA had sent us instructions to have a hearing for an American woman on the grounds that she was not entitled to American citizenship. She had come to the United States as a child with her mother. She had been naturalized as a teenager at the same time as her mother. She had lived her life and moved to Paris to study law. So the point of the hearing would be basically to remove her passport on the grounds that she was not an American citizen. What had happened was that someone had made an administrative mistake when processing her naturalization. She was a few months older than 18, and shouldn't have been naturalized through her mother in the first place. She should have qualified on her own rather than via her mother. No one really noticed this mistake until years later when she applied for a certificate of naturalization from U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services at the Department of Homeland Security. They had noticed the mistake and referred it back to CA.

It wasn't the fault of the woman at all. We were very concerned because if her passport was removed, she would be stateless. She had lost whatever her original nationality was when she naturalized as a U.S. citizen. We talked to the consular people at that embassy and they just couldn't get their minds around the circumstances, so it would have put her in a bad situation. We all felt very strongly that this was wrong on so many levels, not to mention the optics. We went back to CA and asked if there was any way to delay or to have her go back to the U.S. to deal with this. CA wasn't very helpful. So we reached out to the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services office in Rome, and the agent in charge there was not only sympathetic but helpful. We agreed that we could arrange for her to re-enter the U.S. as a returning resident, not as a citizen but as a permanent resident, and that she could make an application for expeditious naturalization. This is what happened. Unfortunately, she had been out of the U.S. long enough that she couldn't meet the physical presence in the U.S. requirement. I mean, she had enough time in the U.S. but it wasn't in the period immediately before her application. In effect she would have to have five years in the U.S. to meet those requirements. She was not very happy, and I understand that. To live so many years as a U.S. citizen, and then be told you are not? We really did the very best we could for her.

Q: Yeah. We get into these things. Did you have much problems with North African people in France?

PIASCIK: Not really. There were many North Africans who were resident in France. Those who had long term residency, those whose had the right to a ten year period of residency, we didn't worry about too much. We looked more closely at those who only had one year residency visas.

Q: What about terrorism? Association of screening people for terrorism?

PIASCIK: Well, visa applicants went through namechecks as part of the application process. We had people who came up as terrorism or security hits or near hits. Most people were cleared and we could issue. There were others which we denied and yet others just got hung up somewhere in the system. We never really got the background on these cases and had little visibility on them.

We did have one interesting case. He was a French national of Lebanese origin and had an American car dealership in France. He'd been to the United States before and then his name came up as a terrorism hit. One of the consular officers took an interest in this case and learned that the original hit had been entered by the FBI. He worked with our FBI guys and our regional affairs people and both offices indicated that there was nothing on the guy. It just looked like some case that someone forgot to remove from the namecheck database. This officer worked for over a year and a half with CA to get a one entry visa for this man to consult with the American car company. The guy went to the U.S. and returned, and then about a year later wanted to go back. So we had to go through the same process once again because his name was still showing up in the database.

As interesting as these case were, I did not spend a lot of time on individual cases. Much of my time was spent on getting France to meet requirements of the Visa Waiver Program that had been drawn up well after the program began. These additional requirements applied to all current and prospective members. One was to certify via a diplomatic note that all lost and stolen passports were be reported within a certain time period to Interpol, which would make sure they were in these widely-available databases. The second was to conclude an agreement to share information on people who committed serious crimes. We called it the preventing and combatting serious crime (PCSC) agreement. The third was to conclude an agreement to share information on known and suspected terrorists. We referred to it as an HSPD-6 agreement, for the homeland security presidential directive which defined what it would be.

Talks had dragged on for years with the French and other Visa Waiver Program countries. The Paris consul general had generally been responsible for overseeing embassy efforts to coax the French to meet these requirements, and I took this on when I arrived. The Departments of Justice and Homeland Security took the lead on negotiating the texts of the PCSC and the HSPD-6 with the French Ministry of Interior, and I worked closely with all these parties, as well as the Department of State and the Department of Justice attaché who was in Paris. A lawyer with the French presidency or prime ministry also became involved in those talks as well. I worked directly with the French interior ministry on the Interpol diplomatic note.

The French eventually were compliant on all three requirements, but it took a lot of pushing and pulling. The diplomatic note for reporting lost and stolen passports to Interpol was the easiest. This had languished for quite some time. In France, as in many European countries, passports are not issued centrally or in a couple of places but by the prefectures in the different provinces, all under the guidance of the Ministry of Interior. They really had a lot of work to do to institute accountability procedures and programs for ensuring that lost/stolen passports could be timely reported, and they were unwilling to give us a diplomatic note saying that they would do so until they actually could. They eventually did so and gave us the diplomatic note. CA periodically checked to make sure they were reporting, and everything checked out.

The PCSC negotiations began in 2009 pattered along over the next couple of years. By the time I arrived, there were essentially only a couple of issues that were unresolved. One was how our countries defined “serious crime”. For the U.S., it was basically any crime for which the penalty was one year in prison. For France, it was anything over three years in prison. Bridging that gap took a long time.

Another sticking point was that if the French shared information on someone who had committed a serious crime with us, we wanted to be able to use that information in a variety of ways whereas the French were quite adamant that we could only use that information for the purpose for which France turned it over to us for. For example, if they shared information on someone who had robbed bank, then we couldn’t use that information in a murder investigation on the same person without first getting permission from the French. Both sides really stuck to their guns on this point. The U.S. side was convinced the French were not serious about concluding an agreement and talked about walking away. The Justice attaché and I just didn’t think this was the case and that the French were only reflecting what was in their law. With this two, everyone calmed down and found a solution which was so technical I couldn’t really explain what it was.

France held elections in the spring of 2012, and in the run up to those elections, it became clear that the Socialist candidate, François Hollande, was likely to win the presidency. This really motivated our French interlocutors as they did not want to contemplate that the Socialists might not like what was in the PCSC and we’d have to start all over again. We came to a final agreement on the text, in both French and English, a couple of days before the elections.

Then we had to figure out who would sign it. The French Minister of Interior wanted to sign it with our Ambassador. We were reluctant to do this so close to the elections as we did not want to be seen as doing something that might affect the outcome of the elections. In addition, the minister was a pretty polarizing figure. We eventually agreed that the minister would initial in Paris, and we would have Secretary of Homeland Security Janet Napolitano initial in Washington. The French minister signed, and the interior ministry sent it to their embassy in Washington and --- it never showed up. DHL lost it. So another set was draw up and the French gave it to us to transmit, which we did and it was signed in good time.

After that, the French Constitutional Court had to ok the agreement, which was not supposed to be a problem since the interior ministry had run it by them, and then Parliament had to approve the agreement, and we knew it would take a long time and we'd have some work to do with the Socialists, who had won the election. However, the Snowden revelations really put the PCSC on the backburner for the rest of my time in France.

The last agreement, the HSPD-6, was the most problematic. It was a very structured format that had some infrastructure connected to it and revolved around exchanges of information on known and suspected terrorists. The French were just not interested and we were never sure why. They felt we already had robust exchanges going on and didn't feel the need to formalize it. After many, many talks, the French finally indicated that their reluctance stemmed from the fact that any agreement would have be cleared with the Parliament, and they were concerned that Parliament not only would never agree because of potential conflicts with French privacy laws, which were very tough, and because it might affect our on-going cooperation.

The French clearly understood that the Visa Waiver Program agreements were a priority for us, and I really didn't believe that they were being obstinate just for the sake of being obstinate. On the U.S. side, the National Security Council was pushing the need for all Visa Waiver Program members to sign off on all the agreements. We just needed to find a way to accommodate French concerns, so I went to the DCM, with the Justice attaché, and said we believe the best chance of success was to modify the format of the agreement, and look for a more flexible arrangement that met our requirements and French concerns at the same time. He and the Ambassador agreed.

So I wrote a cable to the Department, and to the counterterrorism bureau, specifically, to this effect. The counterterrorism bureau did the necessary footwork with the Departments of Justice and Homeland Security, and with the National Security Council, and they suggested an exchange of letters. The French agreed, and we went back and forth over the specific language, and came to an agreement. And the exchange of letters basically brought France into compliance with the Visa Waiver Program requirements. I do understand that after the terrorist attacks in Paris in November 2015, the French finally did sign on to the original HSPD-6 agreement.

Q: Who was the ambassador?

PIASCIK: Charles Rivkin. He was a political appointee but his father had been an ambassador twice. The American Foreign Service Association award for constructive dissent is funded by the Rivkin family. I have the highest respect for Charles Rivkin, who is now Assistant Secretary for Economic and Business Affairs. I thought he was a first rate ambassador and one of the best I have worked with. He was wonderful to work for and cared about his staff and was interested in all of our issues. I was acting DCM several times so I was able to see him from the front office perspective but we also dealt with each other on a number of consular issues. People would ask him about visas or consular issues and he was very careful to do the right thing.

He was very focused on disaffected youth in France. France is facing a challenge on how to integrate not only its immigrant population, which is largely Muslim, but also the children of those immigrants, who are French citizens. Many of them live in very depressed areas and face discrimination and limited opportunities. He had close ties to a number of well-known people in the entertainment industry, so looked for opportunities to involve them. For example, will.i.am of the Black Eyed Peas, agreed to do a number of programs aimed at disadvantaged youth which were very popular and well received.

Ambassador Rivkin didn't manage by walking around, but I invited him to the consular section several times for hail and farewells, or consular leadership days, or special events. He always attended, always spoke to us, and always, always spent way more time in our section than he was scheduled to. He took the time to talk to everyone, and the consular staff loved him.

Q: How did you find the special consular posts?

PIASCIK: The American presence posts?

Q: Yeah.

PIASCIK: Well, the American presence posts, or APPs, in France were a little unusual in that they were doing routine American citizen services (ACS). Other APPs in the world do not. APPs are supposed to concentrate on public diplomacy and commercial work. The France APPs were the first one established and were grandfathered to do some ACS work. They didn't receive any funding from CA to do so and the neither the American or French staff were paid for by CA funds. In terms of consular work, they accepted passport and consular reports of birth abroad, and sent them to Paris for approval. They also did notarial services and non-routine services, such as responding to Americans in distress. I didn't have any supervisory authority over them but visited them once a year. Except for one officer, who left shortly after I arrived, I was impressed by all the Americans and all of the local staff. They were all very good and diligent about assisting American citizens, and they were by and large receptive to guidance we provided.

But as I visited the APPs, I was pretty shocked at the lack of security accorded to the APPs. Most had no "hard lines" separating the customers from staff, no bulletproof glass. Most had to bring their customers into their office space to either provide the service or process the fee. The APPs were proud that they could provide an old-fashioned, personalized service, but it was just not in accordance with regulations. Volume 3 of the Foreign Affairs Manual clearly said that APPs were not to do routine ACS services because they did not have the security infrastructure. I brought it up with the economic chief in Paris, who oversaw the APPs; the regional security officer, the management chief, and the DCM, but none were really concerned.

We were inspected by the Office of the Inspector General in the spring of 2012, and right before that occurred, the regional security officer suddenly told me he was very concerned by the lack of security features at the APPs. Naturally, I raised my concerns with the security inspectors. The inspectors wrote in their report that if the APPs were going to continue to do American services they need to have security infrastructure to do so. This was really a non-starter as we were in the midst of budget cutbacks, the fallout from the Benghazi attacks, and the fact that there was no way to make changes to most of the APPs because of structural issues. So eventually, we just stopped the APPs from offering routine consular services. We agreed to send consular officers to the APPs periodically to offer services, and did a lot of public relations work in the run-up to that to make it more palatable. I think the people who were most affected were those with children. Adults could renew passports by mail, but parents needed to bring kids in for the application, so this could entail a train trip to Paris or Marseille plus most like a night in a hotel. On the other hand, with a little planning, these folks could just wait until a consular visit. From the point of view of efficiency, Paris and Marseille were able to leverage economies of scale that the APPs never could.

Q: Were many Americans getting arrested? I'm thinking of kids getting drunk and that sort of thing?

PIASCIK: Not really. If it happened, people were released pretty quickly for drunkenness or disturbing the peace. We only had about seven Americans who were in jail throughout France during the time that I was there. They were in jail mostly on murder or drug charges.

Q: How about students?

PIASCIK: There are thousands of U.S. students in France. Most seemed to be on semester abroad programs. We worked closely with the universities to brief them on safety and security as well as the consular services we offered. We had a very sad incident when an American student was killed in a fire in a dormitory, so we wanted to make sure they knew what to do in the event of a fire. We also used these talks as opportunities to encourage people to take the foreign service exam and work for the State Department.

Q: Well, during my time France had the reputation, the French of being very rude to Americans. But I'm told it's been changing a lot. I've been there a number of times; I've had no problem but was this a problem?

PIASCIK: No. You know, Paris is a big, international city, and people can be impersonal. The French, like many Europeans, don't smile a lot, which Americans find off-putting. Parisians appreciate that millions of tourists benefit the economy but I understand how tiresome it can be to deal with this tide of foreigners all the time clogging up sites like Versailles or Notre Dame. The French government did make an effort to make sure Parisians were nice to visitors. Once you are outside of Paris, people are generally very friendly and nice to foreigners. Most French people are very well-disposed towards Americans and those in areas where Americans were a factor in World Wars I and II are particularly well-disposed. I have to say I never ran across any French who were unfriendly to me, either on a professional or personal basis, or even just from very brief contacts in stores or on the street. Nobody made fun of my bad French accent or my grammatical mistakes so I found them really very easy to deal with and certainly outside of Paris they were just delightful people. People really went out of their way to help.

We had an American woman write that she and her twin sister had been born in France. Their father was a soldier. Her twin sister had died as a baby and had been buried in France. She was trying to find out where exactly the sister was buried. We normally would not have the resources to help her out, but my American office management specialist, a really capable person who had previously been a French teacher, asked if she could take this on as a project.

She was able to find the cemetery where this baby was buried and she established a good relationship with the woman in charge of the cemetery. This woman was able to locate the gravesite and she and her husband took it on themselves to clean up the site and take photos, which we were able to send back to the American lady.

The embassy always received requests from small towns which would hold memorial ceremonies to commemorate a pilot who had been shot down or a soldier killed during one of the world wars. We always tried to send someone to say a few words, and the towns were always so grateful. President Nicolas Sarkozy came to the embassy for a September 11 commemoration, which was a big deal, and he gave a very moving speech in which he talked how Americans had come to the aid of France twice and died so that France could be free.

Q: Well, is there anything else you should cover?

PIASCIK: I don't think so. I think that about covers it.

Q: And then what?

PIASCIK: I came back to Washington in May 2014.
