DON CARROLL BLISS, JR
Assistant Trade Officer
Bombay (1924-1926)

Ambassador Bliss was born in Michigan and educated at Dartmouth College. He entered the Foreign Service in 1923, specializing primarily in the Commercial and Economic fields. During his long and distinguished career, the Ambassador served in Tokyo, Bombay, Batavia, Alexandria, Singapore, Prague, Bangkok, Athens, Cairo, Paris, Calcutta, London, Ottawa and Addis Ababa, where he was U.S. Ambassador from 1957 to 1960.

BLISS: When you arrived at a new post fifty years ago, this time in January of 1925, this time in Bombay, you took a room in the best hotel, this time in the Taj Mahal, and then asked everyone you met how and where to settle in for the duration. The hotel wasn't bad if you liked Victorian mahogany, chintz and rattan, pink gins and chota pegs, Mulligatawny soup and lamb curry, but it was rather expensive for a junior officer and I kept on asking.

In due course I put the question to a couple of young Americans who shared a flat on the Cooperage, only ten minutes on foot from the hotel, twenty or so from the office, and very soon they invited me to dinner. It was a matter of mutual inspection as we sat on the verandah in the cool of the evening, and next day John took the plunge. Would I like to join them in a three-man bachelor mess, share and share alike? I would indeed, and promptly checked out of the Taj.

My two mess-mates, I soon learned, were juniors in the Bombay office of American Express, that combination of travel agent and banker which was busily seducing American and other tourists away from Thos. Cook. John was of Irish extraction, quiet-spoken for one of his race but far from humorless. He was not a big man physically but our senior by some years and consequently our leader in most things. (He ended up a Vice President of the company.) His mess-mate was a tall, sallow, rather colorless Virginian christened F. Glasgow Clark. He was so proud of his middle name and his relationship to novelist Ellen Glasgow that we perversely called his "Oscar" for no other reason than that. Oscar kept the books and managed the household, his only weakness being a passion for banana ice-cream produced in the kitchen.

Almost every night, it seemed, we had banana ice-cream for dessert, but when John or I protested, suggesting mango ice-cream for a change, Oscar would instantly put us out of countenance. If anyone didn't like banana ice-cream he could manage the house himself; Oscar would be happy to turn over his stewardship.

In those days every household maintained in India by the master race was awash with servants. Each of us had a "bearer" to tidy his room, shine his shoes, keep his clothes in order, draw his bath, hold his shirt for him, help him into his pants and shoes, accompany him on his travels. My bearer was a sturdy dark-skinned man from Goa, recruited by asking the others to find one for me and hired because his chits (references) were good. He had been trained by British officers who found him invaluable at home and on hunting trips. His name was George, he said.

At least one of the three bearers was always available to wait at table, bring drinks, dump ashtrays, run errands, or do anything else required of him at any time of day or night. They slept somewhere, perhaps on the kitchen floor like the servants who guarded master or mistress in the hotel by sleeping across the door-still on a mat in the corridor. The cook did the marketing in the bazaar, returning home in a loaded rickshaw, a cake of ice slung from the axle. He furnished Oscar with a weirdly spelled account of his expenditures, by immemorial custom withholding is traditional commission of one anna in the rupee. (There are 16 annas in the rupee.) He was assisted by an apprentice who paid him for the privilege and would be a cook himself one day. A sweeper and a mali (gardener) were also on the roster, although only Oscar ever saw them. The sweeper scrubbed, swept and polished during the day and the mali kept us supplied with fresh flowers, never mind where he got them. Finally the dhobi came to take away a mountain of soiled white drill suits, personal linen and household linen, all returned in a day or two clean, bleached in the sun, and carefully ironed.

It was a simply but adequately furnished two-bedroom flat, the dining-room converted into a third bedroom for me, and we ate in the drawing-room. Double doors opened on a deep verandah and that was where we spent most of our time at home. The place was quite airy with fresh breezes off the sea and we didn't suffer too much from the heat. We slept under mosquito-nets, of course, and in the evening a spiral of green Japanese punk burning under one's chair also discouraged mosquitoes, but not completely. In the end we all got malaria, mosquito-born from the street. We never got dysentery, however; Oscar insisted that all raw fruits and vegetables be soaked for fifteen minutes in the "red water" of mercurochrome tablet. If any of us got dysentery the cook would be fired.

Our verandah faced the west, overlooking the dusty park known as the Cooperage. Dotted with coconut palms and clumps of shrubbery, the park boasted a bandstand where crowds of natives gathered for weekly concerts provided by the Municipality, and beyond a line of palms Malabar Hill rose above the waters of the Back Bay. From a distance Malabar was a mass of foliage through which peeped the white facades and red tile roofs of Lord Brabourne's Government House and the spacious villas of native potentates and wealthy merchants. Just perceptible were the Towers of Silence where the Parsees, unwilling to defile earth or water or fire, exposed their dead to the vultures perched on the encircling wall, waiting for the next litter-borne corpse followed to the door by silent white-clad mourners. Inside, priests split skulls and broke arm and leg bones to facilitate the cleansing process; any bits of bone the vultures left were cast down a deep well.

Malabar Hill was also the scene of a crime which caused a great scandal and provided the Times of India with material for many a column as the story unfolded. To begin with, a Bombay businessman had been waylaid and murdered as he drove along the broad highway slanting up the hill. The attackers sought to escape in a motorcar but were soon apprehended by the police; there were eye-witnesses and the fate of the criminals was sealed. There was more to it than that, however. The murderers were identified as retainers of the Maharajah of Indore and it soon became clear that their lord and master had sent them to mete out princely justice on a man who had abducted a girl from the royal harem and was living with her in Bombay City. Under British law the Maharajah was just as guilty of murder as his henchmen, but the police couldn't touch him, the hereditary ruler of a princely state, completely independent of the British Raj and even entitled to a 19-gun salute from the armed forces. In Indore his power was absolute; he was above any law but his own whim. A crime committed on territory subject to British law and British notions of justice was, however, something else again. Punishment was clearly due, but how to enforce it was the problem, and controversy raged for weeks. The issue was finally resolved when Indore was summoned, before the Council of Princes, tried and found guilty by his peers and required by them to abdicate.

It was unthinkable that a young man living in Bombay didn't belong to at least one club. The stuffy old Bombay Club was out of the question but an American junior officer could belong to the Gymkhana; it welcomed all young white males except "counter-jumpers" employed in retail establishments. The Gymkhana occupied an open space of green turf in the heart of the European section; one leg of the all-India cricket tournament was staged there, as well as an annual "gymkhana" of tent-pegging, jousting at the ring and other equestrian sporting events. Its shady verandah was a good place to meet for tiffin (lunch or light meal) or to congregate with friends in the evening before going on to dinner.

The Bombay Yacht Club was more select, a haven for sailors and oarsmen, and its terrace looking out over the waters of the harbor was a delightful place on which to linger with a gimlet, that pleasing concoction of gin and Rose's lime juice. Once upon a time, according to well-established legend, the Viceroy of India, down from New Delhi, repaired to the Yacht Club with a local maharajah to sit on that terrace and was promptly accosted by the club secretary. It was a strict rule, the secretary said, that no person of color could enter the club's premises except in the capacity of servant. As a result Lord Willingdon recruited a group of wealthy Parsees, Hindus and Moslems to organize the Willingdon Club, a dream of a country club on the edge of town, complete with golf course, tennis courts, swimming pool., and what have you, centered on a marble pavilion where the best food and drink in all India were to be had. Completely free of racial prejudice, the Club even admitted white members who could afford it. For us it was a treat to be invited to the Willingdon Club for a dinner-dance.

We were by no means wholly dependent on clubs for our social life, however. As is often the case with foreigners in a large community we tended to clot into a social group, ours being mostly but not exclusively American, and the Cooperage mess was part of it. Twenty-five or thirty of us were constantly in each other's company in a shifting pattern of dinners for eight and two tables of bridge, picnics at Juhu Beach, tea-dances at the Taj Mahal, Saturday afternoons at the magnificent Bombay race course. We were all in our twenties, bachelors and young married couples, not a single girl in the lot.

Most of the men in our self-centered little social group were the Bombay representatives of American companies, responsible for developing business in western India, and they were often away on trips of some duration. This left footloose young wives, several of them at any given time, ready and willing to be amused. In the course of human events each such abandoned wife was often seen with a particular bachelor at dances or dinner parties and this kind of pairing-off was an understood thing. The husbands seemed reconciled, perhaps out of necessity, and for the most part there was no great harm in it; when her man returned the wife would usually be telling him all.

But not necessarily. There was a story around that young Terry dropped in for a drink with Doris and in the drawing-room was surprised to find her husband unexpectedly back in town; on the table beside him lay the automatic he usually carried with him on his trips upcountry. Terry turned and fled incontinent. Guilty conscience, the tongue-waggers concluded. And there was the time when John and his boss's wife strolled into the dark from a dance at the Willingdon Club. The lady did not return and when John came into the light it was seen that the knees of his white trousers bore fresh green grass stains. This phenomenon was studiously ignored by all, including John, but he sat down rather quickly and soon went home. Nothing was ever said about this, in the mess or anywhere else.

Soon thereafter, perhaps because of this, the Cooperage mess joined the sartorial revolution which was developing. We in Bombay had scorned for some time the long-established Calcutta fashion in evening dress, slavishly copied in other cities, which combined white drill trousers with a black alpaca jacket. We thought it unattractive and impractical, especially because white drill trousers are instantly wrinkled and soon soiled, while alpaca jackets seemed more appropriate for office than evening wear. We therefore reversed the order, topping our black tropical-weight trousers with white sharkskin jackets. This was such an improvement that the new fashion caught on quickly and soon spread even to Calcutta.

The Cooperage cavaliers also developed for themselves what we called the "chit system" to mitigate the shortage of feminine society. We were particularly well equipped for this, I with colleagues at posts along the China Coast and in the Indies, the American Express boys with a far-flung network for trapping tourists. When an attractive young lady entered the system anywhere she would be picked up by one of the lads, suitably entertained, and assured that she would be well looked after at her next port of call. Thus a chit would arrive in Bombay giving the necessary particulars and we would reciprocate with similar chits covering eastbound travelers. It worked like a charm and helped to keep everyone happy.

Then came a bonanza to put all this in the shade. The Denishawn dance company arrived from California for an engagement in Bombay; they ended by touring India for three months. Until then we hadn't realized how starved for theater we were. An Italian opera company toured India annually, a magician in Chinese dress came to put on a one-man show, the Amateur Dramatic Society struggled through an occasional polite comedy, and that was literally all the theater we had, other than the aptly named “flicks” peddled by Hollywood. Now there was something we Americans could be proud of, and we were all stage-struck in varying degrees.

Ruth St. Denis, we came to understand, was an Irish girl from Hoboken who had become one of the pioneers of modern dance, breaking new ground as dancer and choreographer. Some years before she had teamed up with Ted Shawn – they were now married – to organize a dance group in California. Martha Graham had joined them after her early experience as a Spanish dancer in the “Follies” but soon left to embark on her own dazzling career. There was no lack of talent still in the company, however; Charles Weidman and Doris Humphrey were there and would later become stars in their own right, while Ted would end up with his young men at Jacob’s Pillow after path retired. For us just then the important thing was the arrival in our midst of a dozen lovely, talented, well-mannered young things. One and all they adored “Miss Ruth,” they were dedicated to their art, and they worked very, very hard. Not too much time for play, therefore, and anyway June Rhodes, the little blonde dynamo who functioned as general manager, kept a careful eye on the girls. She fended off prowlers, but for some reason had a soft spot for By Wrigley and me; we were privileged to go backstage at will and we watched many a performance from the wings. It was also acceptable to take a girl to a tea-dance if there were no rehearsals, organize a swim and picnic at Juhu Beach, see her to the hotel after the show without too much loitering on the way. We were assiduous with flowers and even more practical help, as on the occasion in New Delhi when the company arrived late from Madras after a hot and dusty train journey. Only an hour to curtain-time and the show must go on. So By and I dashed to the Cecil Hotel to commandeer two waiters with cold drinks and enormous trays of sandwiches; the girls were near to tears with gratitude.

The Denishawn repertoire was eclectic, including such contrasting numbers as a lively country dance in which the youngsters pranced joyously, or Ruth alone on the stage floating to the melody of the Liebestraum waltz, or Ted displaying his muscles as a living statue or creating the illusion of a gold-crowned, many-armed Siva. For this tour Ruth had devised a number of Indian dances and a knowledgeable Indian woman told us that every movement, every pose, every gesture was an accurate rendition of a fragment borrowed from the sacred dances presented in South Indian temples. The most famous of these for us was the “Dance of the Black and Gold Sari” in which Ruth came on the stage to a tinkling little tune, bearing on her arms a rolled-up black and gold sari; kneeling front center she bowed to the audience in a deep salaam, then rose and with graceful little dance steps unrolled the sari, twisting it around her hips and tucking in the folds with clever fingers, exactly as an Indian woman does when dressing. When she reached the climax and brought the end of the sari over her head the Indian audience burst into spontaneous applause and the galleries shrieked and whistled, demanding an encore. She never did that little dance without being compelled to repeat it three times.

When the company came back to Bombay for its last repeat engagement we gave them all a party, presenting parodies of their program to the extent feasible. Wrigley, in black-face and union suit dyed black, posed on a box as a living statue while Peggy Wills played soulful music on the piano. But when she broke into an Irish jig he hopped down and did a creditable soft-shoe dance as the youngsters giggled and Ted applauded with a strained smile. It was John who brought the house down with the “Dance of the Red and White Sari.” Dressed in his underwear he came on our improvised stage clasping a roll of cheap bazaar cottons stitched end to end and made a spectacular entrance when, being a little drunk, he tripped and fell flat on his face. He picked himself up, and with Peggy vamping the little tune John proceeded with his dance, winding yards and yards of cloth around himself, getting thoroughly entangled, and finally collapsing in a heap amid shrieks of laughter from the whole company, not least from Ruth herself.

Life for bachelors in Bombay was not all fun and games, of course. Most of our days we labored in offices to earn our modest salaries in a manner no better and no worse than anywhere else. For many of us, however, this was not all and from time to time we had to go on the road to the cities of western India regarded as Bombay territory, to great cities like Cawnpore, Lucknow, Lahore, Delhi and Agra, or to smaller centers in between. For a young man this was often exciting; after his business was done he could visit all the wonderful places described in tourist guides. There was a price to pay, however. Distances were vast, travel was necessarily by rail, and that meant acute discomfort.

The British were justifiably proud of the extensive railway network they had constructed in the nineteenth century, and indeed it had contributed greatly to the economic development of India, but in 1925 its rolling-stock, apparently designed in the days of a young Queen Victoria, was not only obsolescent, it was worn out. Locomotives belched soft-coal smoke and cinders, the third-class carriages jam-packed with natives were still much as described by Kipling, while the sleeping-cars for the elite were divided into compartments accessible only from a station platform. To get a meal passengers had to climb out during a stop at a way-station, push through the milling crowd on the platform, and climb aboard the dining-car, returning at the next stop by the same route in reverse. Fortunately the stops were long, twenty minutes or so, and there was no need to hurry.

Arrayed for travel in khaki shirt and shorts topped by the khaki pith helmet characteristic of Bombay (in Calcutta they were white) I would arrive at Central Station with George shepherding the baggage coolies to a four-berth compartment. The baggage included a bedding-roll hired from American Express containing a thin mattress, a blanket, dingy sheets and a limp pillow, a cotton towel or two. George would make up my bed on one of the berths and then withdraw with his own little bundle to a cramped cubicle for servants at one end of the car, whence he would emerge whenever the train stopped, to loiter within call on the station platform. He was there to fetch from the dining-car cold drinks or hot water for my ablutions, to pack and unpack the bedding-roll, to guard my possessions when I was away in the dining-car. No one travelled without a bearer.

The so-called berths were really hard benches upholstered in a kind of black imitation leather, one above another on each side of the compartment, and the uppers could be hauled up out of the way. A small tap yielded tepid drinking water next to a door leading to a minuscule wash-room and toilet. Open windows were screened, shades could be pulled down on the sunny side, and electric fans in the corners of the ceiling could be turned on to stir the air. They also stirred the dust and cinders that leaked through rattling doors and windows and swirled across the linoleum floor. In hot weather, it was said, one could close the windows, place a cake of ice in a tin tub on the floor and direct the fans on it. That was the theory anyway; something to think about.

If a man had a compartment to himself he was lucky, or perhaps he had bribed, the guard to ticket it as full. Otherwise the discomfort increased in geometric ratio as additional passengers intruded with their baggage and sleep might be disturbed in the middle of the night when a passenger sought to board the train at an upcountry station and the guard and he raced along the cars, banging on doors and demanding entrance. A generous man would open up; a selfish one would keep quiet behind his locked door and wait for them to go away.

With all this in mind I was not looking forward to my next trip to Delhi when an exciting alternative presented itself. Sitting at table in the Gymkhana we were listening to Larry Kent's exuberant account of his plans for a publicity stunt to put his Graham-Paige automobiles on the map in India. He was going to stage a non-stop run from Bombay to Delhi, a thousand miles away, something no one had ever done before. The roads would be primitive, of course, but passable in dry weather and the rains were months away; most of the rivers to be crossed were unbridged but there were ferries; he knew where he could get petrol and oil; he had mapped the most practicable route. To make the trip non-stop, he said, would require three drivers to take it in turns, say in two-hour shifts, since the going might be rough, and two men would be functioning while the third could sleep. How about it? Would any of us like to make the trip with him? The big redhead's enthusiasm was contagious and two of us volunteered forthwith. Pres Wills was manager of Dupont's office in Bombay and could do as he liked. As an American official I was in a more vulnerable position. What would Washington say? What would the local firms representing Ford or General Motors have to say about any activity on my part for the benefit of a competitor? It was agreed, therefore, that my participation would be strictly anonymous and above all that my name would not be used in any publicity.

The sun was setting in a cloudless sky beyond Malabar Hill as we assembled on the Cooperage for this venture into the unknown. We were all in khaki traveling kit and everything else was in the baggage sent ahead by rail with George and the other bearers to wait for us in the Cecil Hotel. We had grease to protect our faces from windburn and goggles to protect our eyes from the glare of the sun. There was food and drink, for we would not be stopping for meals; if the car came to a standstill for any reason the motor would still be ticking over and we could claim that this run was non-stop. Larry was at the wheel for take-off, with Pres beside him to operate the spotlight. He noted the time, raced the engine, and we were off!

Memories of the next day and a half are blurred. Pres and I never knew where we were, since Larry did the navigating, and for us, whether driving or operating the spotlight or trying to sleep in the back seat, our every faculty was concentrated on the road, and only the road, as we hurtled through a pitch-black night or under a blazing sun. We swept through towns and were scarcely aware of them; although we were in open country most of the time we have recollection of the fields, the trees, the hills that must have been there. What we do remember is the road, narrow, twisting, pot-holed, sometimes rocky, surfaced only by a layer of fine white dust. Glancing back we could mark our trail by the continuous band of white thrown up by flying wheels, a cloud of dust so fine that it hung in the air for minutes before drifting away. Fortunately there was almost no motor traffic – it would have been impossible to overtake another vehicle and tunnel past in an atmosphere more impenetrable than the densest fog. Twice we met motorcars coming the other way; then it was necessary to slow down, guess at the way ahead, and plunge blindly into a blank whiteness.

There were breaks when the road ended abruptly on the bank of a river and we had to stop while the motor idled. A steep earthen ramp would lead down to the water's edge and to the ferry, hastily assembled for this exceptional burden by laying planks across two boats. With the Graham-Paige precariously aboard, this contraption would be poled and paddled to the farther bank and another earthen ramp. Here we also could refuel and roar away with a loss of no more than half an hour in running time.

Concentration on the road of course encompassed everything on it. During the first night there was little traffic other than an occasional bullock-cart plodding through the darkness, its driver asleep on a pile of grain sacks or bales of cotton. The spotlight picked it up in good season and then it was up to the driver to slip by as quickly as possible before a panic-stricken bullock could veer across the road. Come dawn the traffic between villages came to life and the driver had to be constantly alert to avoid disaster as the car wove its way in a plume of dust between bullock-carts, handcarts, loose cattle and groups of pedestrians, or waded through an occasional flock of sheep. Special care was needed when passing a string of camels because camels can kick sideways. And so all day under the blazing sun we followed the relentless road.

During our second night we were traversing wild country through one or another of the native states in the Central Provinces. The way was particularly rough and tortuous and the spotlight was picking up the glowing eyes of wild animals on or beside the road. Most of them – jackals, antelopes, rabbits, civet cats – skipped nimbly out of the way, but at one moment I was confronted by the bulk of an enormous boar planted in the road, his white tusks gleaming, his little red eyes glaring. To hit him would have been catastrophe for us, even if he paid with his life; fortunately he lumbered just enough to one side as the car swerved past and we all gasped in relief.

Well into the small hours of that second night my eyes suddenly gave out. At one moment I was peering ahead along a beam of light, at the next there was complete blackness. Blindly I stopped the car in the middle of the road. "Sorry," I said, "I can't see. Somebody else will have to drive for a while." Larry took me by the arm. "Into the back with you," he ordered, "and stay quiet until you have had a rest." He took the wheel and we started off again while I lay there in a semi-stupor. (The trouble was that I had been unable to accommodate the glasses I normally wore behind the goggles that were so essential during the day and the result was severe eye-strain.) When I came to I could see again and the morning light revealed the trees and fields of the tidy countryside surrounding Delhi. Larry was driving; he insisted on being the man at the wheel for the triumphant climax to our adventure.

As we climbed wearily up the steps into the Cecil Hotel our servants were there to greet us, all broad grins, but the Anglo-Indian clerk at the desk was not impressed. "Sorry, sir," he said to Larry while Pres and I drooped against the wall, "all space in the hotel has been booked and we can't give you rooms. We have pitched some tents on the grounds, however, and we can take care of you there." Larry expostulated; we had made reservations from Bombay, we had motored all the way and just arrived, we desperately needed food and baths and sleep. The clerk was adamant; tents or nothing.

Then my old friend Miss Anna arrived on the scene like an angel from Heaven. She was manager of the family-owned Cecil Hotel, that comfortable old-fashioned hostelry which had ministered to travelers since the turn of the century. She was also a warm-hearted and perceptive woman; she took one look at me leaning against the wall, did a double-take, and issued brisk orders. We were to have rooms immediately, no matter who had to be bumped into a tent; this was an emergency and it had to be dealt with.

George promptly disappeared with the baggage and I was led upstairs to a comfortable room. In a mirror I caught sight of my face and realized what had prompted Miss Anna's reaction. Layers of dust and grease formed a mask pierced by two bright scarlet holes, a truly horrendous sight. Now George arrived through the back door, herding a gaggle of hotel servants with a tin tub and pails of hot water, and I was in his hands again. Bathed and fed, I was dropping off to sleep almost before I could reach the bed. George woke me at noon and I went down for lunch, only to fall into bed again and sleep until dinner-time.

Drinking their pink gins in the bar the three adventurers glowed with self-satisfaction. Larry was ebullient; he had been busy with reporters and photographers and was getting all the publicity he could want. The Graham-Paige, according to the press, had travelled non-stop from Bombay, its engine ticking over as sweetly in Delhi as when it had started; the air in its tires was sea-air; that marvelous American vehicle had covered a thousand miles cross-country in a day and a half! In all India there had never been anything like it. (Not for long, of course; records are made to be broken.)

Back home the Cooperage mess was soon in trouble as one after another we came down with malaria. In retrospect we know that it came from the massed listeners around the bandstand, a short hop away for a mosquito when the wind was in the west. In such a crowd there was bound to be a sizeable number of natives carrying the malaria parasite in their blood; they had no protection at all from insect bites and even our defenses were sketchy at best. We had given no thought to this and boasted that we could ward off malaria with the help of enough Scotch and soda when we sat on the verandah before and after dinner.

As it happened I was the first victim. Every Thursday at exactly four o'clock in the afternoon I would suffer a violent chill, shivering uncontrollably and obviously through with the office for the rest of the day. By the time I got home to a quinine tablet the fever was running high and when it broke I was pouring sweat, my bed so soaked that the sheets had to be changed. In the morning I was back to normal but drained of energy and barely able to stagger back to work.

This went on for some weeks until Kitty Bossi heard about it and insisted that I see a doctor, an Italian specialist on malaria. Doctor Vicente came, listened to my story, and, fingered my belly. Sure enough my spleen was enlarged and I had malaria, he said, but I wasn't really coping with it. When an attack was checked by quinine, he explained, the organisms feeding on the blood simply turned into spores which lodged in the spleen. Hence the enlargement of that organ, a sure sign of malaria. (And that was why British soldiers and policemen were warned not to hit natives in the belly, since the result was often a fatally ruptured spleen.) In due course the spores would erupt into another generation of parasites in an endless cycle. To get rid of my malaria, he insisted, I would have to eliminate every last spore, including those that remained in hiding, and that meant fifteen grains of quinine every day for sixty days. For the next two months, therefore, I went about with ringing ears, partly deaf and a bit fuzzy in the head, but it worked. In the end I was grateful to the good doctor, who later died of malaria himself.

Oscar was next, but he couldn't face the music and fled the country. Then John began to complain of stubborn constipation and turned to me for help. In view of my experience with malaria I was now regarded in the mess as a medical authority and for some time I had been dispensing home remedies with some success and only one near-catastrophe. That was the time Harry Russell said he couldn't sleep and I got some veronal tablets from the chemist. Uninformed as to veronal's potency I was nevertheless cautious enough to give him only half a tablet; when he fell sound asleep in the middle of dinner and had to be carried to bed. I was really scared and flushed the rest of those tablets down the drain. In John's case he responded to none of our treatments, not even to a glycerin enema, and he finally went to the company doctor, who thought to take a blood test. And there it was! Malaria. There are several types of malaria, we were told, including my weekly bouts, the "quartan agues" of medieval Europe (an attack every four days), and John's mysterious paralysis. So American Express transferred him to Ceylon and a convalescence at Nuwara Eliya, where he enjoyed cool mountain air and boasted of fresh strawberries for breakfast.

The departure of our leader was the end of the line for the Cooperage mess, and as we went our several ways I moved in with a young American couple as star boarder, complete with the wardrobe trunk and George. At the same time my way of life changed completely; reversing biological processes the butterfly became a grub immured in its cocoon. Instead of flitting about town I spent my evenings and my weekends hard at work on a project which absorbed my energies and commanded all my attention seven days a week for months on end.

It all started over lunch with George Shantz, who had been trading in gold and silver on the Bombay bullion market on behalf of Irvine Trust. The bank had finally tired of this, George said, and he was going home, but he thought I might be interested in one of his activities. For some time he had been inconspicuously helping one of the leading firms in the market to prepare its weekly published reports and by doing so he had gained invaluable insights into the operations of the native traders whose activities created an important, complex and highly speculative market. He knew that one of my duties was to prepare reports for Washington on financial activities in Bombay (he was one of my sources) and he felt that if I took on this job it would pay off handsomely for me.

In due course, therefore, George took me to meet Maneklal Premchand, senior partner in Premchand, Roychand & Sons, in his solidly paneled office in Apollo Street, not far from the new building of the Bombay Bullion Exchange. From the beginning Maneklal impressed me favorably. Medium in height and weight he had no outstanding physical characteristics, but his Indian dress or London suitings were equally impeccable, his eyes intelligently alert under a brush of graying hair, his facial expression assured but calm and amiable, his speech educated, direct and always to the point. We became friends on the spot and eventually he would even eat his lunch in my presence, although as a Jain, the strictest of Hindu sects, he should have turned his back lest my shadow pollute his food. That food, incidentally, consisted of a saucer of parched grain.

After not too much palaver we came to a clear understanding. What Maneklal wanted was someone to prepare every week the text of the printed market reports he distributed, the statistical work to be done by his clerks, the text to be written in lucid English by someone with a background in economics. He soon recognized that this new young man would do just as well as Shantz had done. He also recognized that such an arrangement presented problems for me as an American official and that the Washington bureaucracy might take a dim view of it, whether or not it became public knowledge.

My collaboration would therefore have to remain a dead secret. The question of compensation was not even mentioned, it being understood that the advantage for me, as it had been for George, would be the information I acquired about what went on behind the scenes in the financial markets in Bombay: the bullion market, the stock exchange, the money market, banking operations, and anything else relevant for my purposes. Every Friday just before noon I would therefore repair to Maneklal's office and for an hour or so we would discuss the happenings of the past week, deciding what should go into the published market report, the text of which was delivered on Monday morning in shape for the printer. (Some developments would be discreetly ignored, as when His Exalted Highness the Nizam of Hyderabad dipped into his fabulous treasure and broke an imminent corner on the silver market by sending a freight car floored with silver bars over his Guaranteed State Railway for spot deliveries in Bombay.)

The financial reporting from Bombay soon displayed an unprecedented sophistication which readers in Washington, unaware of what lay behind it, either took for granted or, if they happened to notice it, doubtless attributed to the competence of the reporting officer. As for him, he soon became fascinated with the lore of the bullion market and went on to undertake extensive research into the whole subject, poring over official publications and bombarding Maneklal with questions. Bombay was then the center of Indian trade in precious metals and one of the great bullion markets of the world, a highly developed complex involving banks, brokers, importers, wholesalers and retailers, organized around the Bombay Bullion Exchange, an association of the principal native dealers.

India, this research soon revealed, was a country which traditionally enjoyed a favorable balance of merchandise trade as a heavy exporter of cotton, jute, rice, wheat, oilseeds, shellac, mica and other natural products, while it was unique among nations in settling that balance mostly by imports of silver ingots, gold ingots, sovereigns or eagles, as it had done for generations. In the immediate post-war years after 1918 India was absorbing annually some 6,000,000 ounces of gold and 90,000,000 ounces of silver, 40 percent of the world's gold production and 30 percent of its silver. Unhappily for India, however, wealth in this form produced little of real value. The whole history and tradition of the people, the economic and social organization of the country and its primitive financial system induced a pervasive habit of hoarding gold and silver, whether as bullion stored unproductively in the strong rooms of princes or wealthy merchants or as ornaments adorning the wives and daughters of farmers after crops had been harvested, later to be sold at a loss when it came time to buy seed for the next crop.

All of this had many ramifications, and it took six months of hard labor to sort it all out and complete a massive report on "The Bombay Bullion Market" which was eventually published in Washington, but that is another story and here we are dealing only with matters which never reached the files.

Such a one is the story of Premchand Roychand's annual report for 1925. Maneklal and I wanted it to be more than the usual routine summary and he agreed enthusiastically to include a discussion of what we called "the fundamental problem of India's wasted resources." That problem we identified as being "in spite of the fact that the wealth of the world for many decades has been poured into India's lap in the form of gold and silver, the standard of living of the great mass of the population is distressingly low, the industrial development of the country is obviously backward, and a large proportion of its vast natural resources is as yet practically untouched. The root cause of these conditions," we argued, "lies in the rudimentary character of the country's credit system. The life-blood of Western civilization is credit and its genesis is the accumulation of capital. Without these India can never develop to the extent of which she is capable. With a pitifully inadequate banking system, with savings jealously hoarded in the form of unproductive metals, with no funds available for the development of industrial enterprise, India will always be a backward nation unless her people can be educated to see the folly of their present practices." For obvious reasons the twin evils of cow worship and over-population were not mentioned in the report, which went on to say: "If India's gold and silver holdings were invested we would be receiving from the rest of the world, not gold and silver, which experience has proved provide little in the way of comfort or improved standard of living to the Indian people, but rather the manufactured goods, the foodstuffs, the services of the other nations – in other words, real wealth."

This line of thought provoked admiring editorials from Bombay's Times of India and Calcutta's financial journal Capital. It also attracted attention in the Bombay financial community and British bankers, convinced that a "native" could never produce anything like that, besieged Maneklal with queries as to the authorship of the report. He could not honestly maintain that it was all his own work, but he kept faith with me and gave inquirers no satisfaction. One of the local bankers finally pronounced judgment: "Only an Englishman could have written such an economically sound résumé."

JOHN M. STEEVES
Office of War Information
New Delhi (1927-1942)

Office of War Information
New Delhi (1948-1950)

Ambassador John M. Steeves served in the China/Burma/India theater during World War II in the Office of War Information. His Foreign Service career included positions in New Delhi, Tokyo, Djakarta, Naha, Kabul, and Washington, DC. This interview was conducted by Charles Stuart Kennedy and Thomas Stern on March 27, 1991

Q: While you were in India -- I have you there from 1927 to 1942 -- did you have any contact with the Foreign Service, either the embassy or our consulates?

STEEVES: Yes, I did. Like any citizen that is interested in his country I knew the people of the time in the consulate general in Bombay, but only slightly. During the war when the special representative of the President was established in Delhi, I had more of an acquaintance with him. The name of that representative has just slipped my mind. But since India at that time was still part of the British Empire, he could not be given diplomatic accreditation. The President's Personal Representative was a designation used where such a situation existed. So that was what he was called during the Roosevelt administration. Hazleton, was one of his deputies.

Q: Here you were knowledgeable in the politics and social movements in India during the war; did the United States seem to be following a reasonable course in our military dealing with India or was it just pursuing the war and didn't there seem to be much sense to it?

STEEVES: You mean when our armed services began to come into the theater? Yes, I had a very good impression of that and they made a very fine impression. The army in general, which was the branch of the service that came to India on there way up to the Combat Headquarters in Assam on the Burma border. General Sultan was the C.O. in New Delhi. They were very well thought of in that GHQ area in New Delhi. I think they conducted themselves extremely well. The same thing was true when we got up to the front. The facts of the case are that our magnanimity and reputation for generosity kind of made us suckers at times. But the Americans got along extremely well. At times we were the objects of a little jealousy because, quite naturally, the British were not very popular with their colonial subjects. It was rather humiliating at times when the British personnel used to trade things (like their good Scotch whiskey) to us in order to get some of the goodies unknown to them from American stores.

Q: You came into the predecessor of what is now the United States Information Service.

STEEVES: That's right.

Q: In what year was that, 1945?

STEEVES: Yes, late 1945. The transfer from the Wartime Agency was accomplished piecemeal. It was right out of the middle of the Office of War Information. This logically took the place of the office in the Department that had handled News and Information.

Q: Office of War Information at one time?.

STEEVES: Yes, Office of War Information from which the News Agency was first lifted. Then they asked us to interest ourselves in the office of cultural affairs. This Office of Cultural Affairs was housed in a little, beat- up building across from the old State in an old house (since torn down) on eighteenth street. It was a flea- bitten place. But those were the little roots that we were attached to before we became a full blown US Information and Cultural Service. Some of us therefore were in at the creation of the new agency when it was first organized under the very colorful Bill Benton of the well-known business of Benton and Bowles.

Q: Benton and Bowles was an advertising firm. The largest advertising firm in the United States.

STEEVES: The new Office of Information and Culture (USIS) blossomed rapidly to a pretty fulsome operation. Not altogether to the glee of the old Foreign Service in those days. But a group of us had the task of sitting down and drawing up the original charters and the organization that became the first full blown organization for the USIS. and we sure had our original fun. We had to adjust old rules, regulations, make exceptions to old time-honored procedure as we went. I hired the first 350 people for the Near East and Africa operation. That's the way it was in my division, it was the old AND. I was the chief. The first person I hired was a guy by the name of Ernie Fisk. He was a newspaper fellow who had been with OWI in Lyon France, during the war. A wonderful person who lives out in Ohio in Oberlin, now in retirement.

Q: When you were drawing this up I find it very interesting that you were working in Africa and the Near East, both areas colonial preserves of our allies. In the Near East there was an exception such as Saudi Arabia. But the rest had French, British or our troops dominating the area. What did you see as our goals at that time in those areas?

STEEVES: The goals were pretty clear. To help give the people of those emerging states, working for their independence and self expression, some concept of American institutions and values. We could see what was going to happen, although I don't think we had any concept of it happening quite as fast in Africa, for instance, as it did. We saw it happening in India and then in the Southeast Asian states. That area at that time was under a different division. But India, Burma and Ceylon were in my division, although it was called Near East and Africa -- NEA. I guess it was because we were attached for geographic reasons to the old NEA division that Loy Henderson was the head of for a while. Ray Hare, I think, was the head of the Near Eastern Bureau either after or before Loy Henderson. But anyway, that was where we found our attachment.

Q: Did you find yourself, after all, pushing democracy in all these places that were ready to explode, yet the European powers, particularly France and Britain, were not pushing for independence for these colonial areas?

Did you find that the geographic bureaus, particularly European Affairs, were saying, "Hey fellows, cool it, or be careful don't push this Democratic doctrine too fast?"

STEEVES: Yes, they did. They had a conservative view towards the world. The element from which the Foreign Service was taken those days had kind of ready ears for that kind of attitude.

Q: Are we talking about the Eastern establishment the ivy league, etc., from whence many of the Foreign Service establishment had been taken?

STEEVES: That's right. People from the wealthy homes of the United States. There was an inevitable movement towards Independence and Freedom, the Older Order didn't accept very happily. The old stable powers and forces found it very difficult to accept what was going to inevitably happen. I mention in my book that if you wanted to look at it from the standpoint of what was better economically for these countries, one would have to admit that most of them were far better off in their colonial status. Their plea had been "we want to be free to make our own mistakes" and they sure made them. Burma, for instance, had been the shining light of the British Empire, became the tail end of everything. As a nation it lies in ruin. Rangoon, the capital, is a horrible hole. It had been a real shining light of what British administration could do. I think I make the observation somewhere that it will take them a hundred years to get back anywhere near what they were when they gained their independence and even then they will have to do it with our help.

Q: Didn't you feel that you were sort of "young Turks" sitting down in your areas promoting plans for the spread of democracy and that you almost looked upon the European Bureau as the adversary or not?

STEEVES: I didn't feel it so much. But we did feel a lack of appreciation of the problems of the post-colonial world outside of Europe that we had to deal with. In my area when talking about the Near East especially there was an expression used that was quite apt, "those European fellows are always putting their European foot into our Near Eastern mouth." It always irked us a little bit that all the instructions we were sending to Lebanon and Syria had to be cleared by the French desk before they went out. We thought it was none of their darned business! But of course we were wrong for it did impinge on their vital interests. We had a little bit of the same problem that lasted for years with the British. There were those on both sides of the Atlantic that were still very strong for the "British Empire" view..

Q: When you were discussing the British you referred to the "spats", mentality .You are referring to the type of foot gear worn by the more au fait British as characteristic of the British generation of that mind set, were you not?

STEEVES: Yes, and they couldn't quite cotton to this new idea. Thereby hangs a little anecdote. The columnist, Pearson came out with a report in his column one day in The Washington Post.

Q: This was Drew Pearson who was sort of a muckraking columnist?

STEEVES: The story stemmed from an episode in my office one day. Where he ever got a hold of it I don't know. But we were packing the kits for all the posts in our area. I was there helping the staff get these things together and as we were putting in copies of the Declaration of Independence, I said just as a kind of a joking passing remark while picking up one of the copies, and looking at it, "Boy you know this is pretty heady stuff to be sending out to these people, I wonder if this is more than they can digest." Drew Pearson got a hold of that from somebody and said that,- he named me by description pretty well-our basic doctrines on freedom were a little too strong to be spread around the world and we ought to be careful how we put them out. That is the way he interpreted it. I got called on the carpet for that.

Q: You have to watch what you are saying even in the packaging process! Now, there were two major developments happening in your area of concern: Indian Independence and the partition of Palestine and the establishment of the State of Israel. We will come to the Indian one later, but, to turn to the next page, you went to India in 1948. 1948 was a big year for partitions. You said you went with Loy Henderson.

STEEVES: Yes, that is right. I went out via one of the most beautiful sea voyages I have ever had in my life. I got on the maiden voyage of the "Silver Plane" down in Brooklyn Basin and 42 days later landed in Bombay.

Q: Did you have the feeling at the time that Loy Henderson was sent to India because he was so sympathetic with the Arab world and the idea was to get him out of the picture?

STEEVES: Every move, of a senior officer you know, takes that into consideration. Sometimes sympathetically. When we are talking about sending people into senior positions we often say, "For heavens sake don't torture the guy by making him go there and carry out a policy that he really isn't very happy about." There could have been an element of that. Henderson was not well accepted by the Zionists. They had him targeted and as you know when they have their ways of influencing action. If that was there it was out of my sight . I didn't see it.

Q: You arrived in India and what was the situation at the time?

STEEVES: When we got to India, independence had been declared the year before. They had gone through the blood bath of the first few months of it. The awful scenes of the massacres and slaughter of innocent people by the train load when they were exchanging people, Muslims allegedly going north and Hindus coming south. There was a train load of Muslims passing through the native state of Patiala that were stopped at a station and the Sikhs systematically went through that train and murdered every single individual on it. Of course, coming the other direction, the same thing was likely to happen to Hindus going south.

Q: You were in charge of public affairs. What were your major objectives in your particular field and how did you find dealing with that?

STEEVES: We still tried to do everything we possibly could to give a realistic exposure of the American scene to the people of India, whether we did it through motion pictures, or through the release of information or cultural events or the running of a library. We had three very good libraries in India: one in Bombay, one in Delhi and another in Calcutta.

Q: How did you find dealing with the new Indian government?

STEEVES: We had excellent relations.

Q: Relations were good in that period?

STEEVES: Oh yes. For instance there came the event very soon after our arrival when we went to present our credentials to the New President of India. Ambassador Henderson was the first full blown American Ambassador there in the new India-and the Indians had no other understanding of pomp and ceremony, but to carry the ceremony out about like the British had done. Having been in India before and remembering some of the same affairs with the British; there were those same Sikh guards, with their long lances , high turbans, etc-so statuesque you could have stuck a lighted cigarette in their eye and they would not have blinked.

We got up to the Durbar Hall where after all of the dramatic ceremony before the great oaken doors would be swung open, to match the scene nothing less than seeing a armored knight on a white charger come out to announce the President would have been appropriate. But instead a little man leaning on a cane came out wearing a turban, a dhoti, and dark glasses. I couldn't help but remember the story that I had heard the day before ,which I shall tell you in a bit.

Q: This was Mahatma Gandhi?

STEEVES: No, this was Rajagopalachari -- the first President of India .He was a wonderful scholar, a truly great man, but still of the old- fashioned Orthodox Brahmin ways. He was very, strict in the observance of his Brahmin cast rules. I had heard this story the day before and knowing a good deal about India I believed it. In order to purify the food that came out of the great fancy kitchen downstairs he had to have the walls smeared with cow dung in order to purify it. When he came to Loy Henderson's house for a meal, which he finally agreed to do, he had to bring his own bearers along with his own utensils to stand behind his chair and serve it to him. He couldn't touch anything in the place.

Q: Could you explain how Loy Henderson operated in the embassy and how he dealt with the Indians, because he is one of the great figures of the Foreign Service and I would like your impression of his style?

STEEVES: As you know, Loy Henderson had no peers in his knowledge of protocol and procedure and policy and things of that nature. He was a wonderful gentleman and a good teacher to learn from and take instructions from. I can see him just sitting there going over your draft and saying, "Take this or that out, save superlative words of that nature for some really demanding moment." He was a good preceptor and disciplinarian when it came to that type of form. He was the same way when dealing with people in a very correct and proper way.

Now, having said that, his usefulness with all of that ability in dealing with leaders like Pandit Nehru was diminished a little bit by the fact that secretly he disliked and mistrusted Nehru. He disliked Nehru with a passion and didn't appreciate him but dealt with him very correctly. The day that Truman ordered American troops into Korea...

Q: June 1950?

STEEVES: Yes, President Truman sent instructions out to the Ambassador to go to the prime minister, P.M. Nehru, and see if you can get his permission to send an Indian contingent in the United Nations force into Korea. Loy Henderson, with all the experience he had had in Russia and elsewhere, made a remark I found a bit strange. What he said to me in the car going up there that day,(he had asked me to go up with him to see Nehru) was "Today is one of the proudest moments of my career." He would have rocked me back on my heels if he had said that when I was standing up. I figured out in thinking about it years later that he was so glad to be the messenger of that kind of a tough message to this Nehru, and to tell him what the great United States expected of him if he wanted to be a decent member of the world community. The Ambassador couldn't forget that after all that China had done when the Communists took over the country, Nehru, in the early days of the independence of India-had been the first to recognize the brutal Communist regime. He had stabbed the poor Chinese in the back by throwing out the Nationalist Chinese Ambassador and was one of the first to invite in the Communist Chinese Ambassador.

Q: When Henderson was going up to ask Nehru to supply troops do you think he had any feeling that they would? .

STEEVES: No, and of course they really didn't. But I will tell you what they did do as a symbolic act. They sent over a very efficient military field medical unit, you know. They performed very well in Korea. So they were at least numbered among the nations that supported the United Nations effort in Korea.

Q: What do you think was behind Henderson's antipathy towards Nehru?

STEEVES: Well, Henderson was kind of a purest in the way he lived and thought of other people. He didn't want you to profess to be one thing and then turn out to be something else. Nehru to him was in a way a British country gentleman and then turned around and tried to be an Indian peasant in politics and the two didn't fit at all. One personality was always jarring against the other. For him to be almost kissing Gandhi's feet was next to ridiculous, almost comic opera to see him in this sycophantish way act around Gandhi.

You could see that where he really felt at home was in his tweeds with a shooting stick standing on the downs of England watching the foxes. That really was where he felt more at home. He was the fellow who had the reputation of writing a book that was looked upon by Lord Macaulay as one of the finest collection of British prose in the English literature. He was nobody's fool. Nehru was a very bright fellow.

Later we took Nehru to the United States. He acted as though he wasn't interested at all in going. He didn't look upon it as any great favor. His daughter, Indira, who we had to deal with later after Nehru was gone, carried on the same haughty attitude towards the United States.

The attitude was reciprocated. When Nehru invited us up to the Presidential Lodge -- it used to be called the Viceroy's House and is a real crown jewel of the British Empire in terms of the beautiful interior, a palatial place. The State Dining Room can seat between 100 and 150 people at one long table with a beautifully bedecked waiter standing behind every chair waiting to respond to your every wish. It was in that type of atmosphere when we went up for the State dinner welcoming the first American Ambassador to India that Mrs. Henderson picked up the silverware and wiped off the knife and said, "You can never tell what you get in these places." Here she was sitting along side of Nehru. Nehru, the perfectly trained country gentleman that he was, if he could have turned over and swatted her he would have. If looks could have killed her she would have been dead. Anyway he was too self-controlled to allow that to bother him. But that is another reason why the Indians and everybody else, including our staff, of course, too, disliked Mrs. Henderson. She was a real 'pain in the neck'.

Q: Well she is one of the great dragons in the Foreign Service wasn't she?

STEEVES: Oh, yes. She was terrible. I could fill rest of the tape with stories of Mrs. Henderson. She was awful.

Q: Was there anything else we should cover in New Delhi? We covered the Korean War and the arrival there. Was there any resistance on the part of the Indians to your efforts to talk about the United States?

STEEVES: No. We were welcomed everywhere. I had the best of reception for our libraries, our music, our efforts at promoting things American. When we were putting on our trade fair or any displays of that nature it went over very big in India.

JOHN WESLEY JONES
Junior Vice Consul
Calcutta (1932-1935)

Ambassador John Wesley Jones was born in Sioux City, Iowa in 1911. After graduating from George Washington University in 1930, he entered the Foreign Service. His career included positions in Mexico, India, Italy, and Washington, DC, and ambassadorships to Libya and Peru. Ambassador Jones was interviewed by Horace Torbert in 1988.

Q: Now we were about to go to Calcutta, you said you were assigned to Calcutta.

JONES: Yes. I arrived in September at the Foreign Service School and, after 3 months went to Sioux City for Christmas, knowing that I had already been assigned to Calcutta. In early January 1932, I proceeded to New York, where I got one of the American Export Line ships to Alexandria, Egypt. In Alexandria the Consul there had received instructions to purchase a ticket for me to proceed on to Calcutta. He confessed to me later that he had misunderstood "the first available vessel" and had bought me a ticket on a German freighter rather than waiting for the Peninsular and Oriental steamship line which most passengers took from Alexandria to Bombay. So I had a very interesting trip as the only passenger on a German freighter through the Suez Canal. We stopped at Aden; our next stop was in Ceylon, at Columbo. Tommy Thompson -- Llewellyn Thompson, was the U.S. Vice Consul in Columbo then. And since the ship was in port there for three days he kindly showed me around Columbo and I had a very pleasant and agreeable stay.

And then the ship went on, the freighter went on, to Madras and there I met the Consular Officer in Madras and had two days there and finally arrived in Calcutta on the 22nd of February 1932. I think that I expended probably the maximum allowed by the Department in those days sailing to a new post, which was 45 days.

In Calcutta the Principal Officer was Arthur G. Frost and Gerald Keith was the Principal Vice Consul. Dorsey Fisher was there as a Vice Consul. And I think I was the Junior Vice Consul, well I obviously was, when I arrived on the 22nd of February 1932. In Calcutta my job was double, number one, to issue visas to Indians wishing to visit or migrate to the United States. And, number two, the growing American colony in Calcutta required passport services. I stayed first at the Grand Hotel on Chowringhee and then eventually moved into a house with Fritz Jandrey and Russ Engdahl when they appeared as Vice Consuls in Calcutta.

Q: Fritz Jandrey and who else did you say?

We adopted the British custom of calling the house a chummary because there were many bachelors, principally English, in Calcutta in those days and they couldn't afford apartments by themselves, so they took houses. Our house was quite an elegant place, but it was still called a chummary. There were four of us by that time, including Wilson Flake, then an Assistant Trade Commissioner.

I spent three years in Calcutta and at the end of my three-year tour I either had to pay my own way home or wait until the Department decided to transfer me to another post. So on my salary I had saved up enough money to buy a ticket on a freighter from Calcutta to Manila. I bought a ticket on a Dutch freighter this time which took me around Southeast Asia en route to the Philippines. We stopped in Singapore where I first met Harrison Lewis, colleague of mine, same class; and then on to Hong Kong where Donald Dunham was the Vice Consul; and finally to the Philippines, where Bart Richards, former Assistant Trade Commissioners in Calcutta, was then stationed. After four or five days in the Philippines, I took an American passenger boat to San Francisco and then finally arrived in Sioux City, Iowa by train four days later.

It was while I was in Sioux City that I learned that the Department needed a Vice Consul in Rome, Italy. And since I was still on my own, I had to pay my way to Washington to pick up my official orders. Only from Washington was my travel paid to New York to board an American Export Line ship to Naples.

I arrived in Rome 1935, June. And I remember taking a taxi from the railroad station up the Via Veneto to the Consulate in the building next to the Palazzo Margherita. I couldn't believe the beauty of the city. After three years in Calcutta, to arrive in a place like Rome was like going from Hades to Paradise. In Rome the Principal Officer was Graham Kemper and his assistant was Gilson Blake. I was the Vice Consul in charge of immigration for Italians going to the United States, passports for Americans, and registration of the large American colony living in Rome.

HENRY BYROADE
U.S. Army Officer
India (1941-1944)

Ambassador Henry Byroade was born in Indiana in 1913. He graduated from West Point in 1937. He served in the Hawaiian Islands from 1937-1939. While still in the service, he received a master's degree from Cornell in 1940. His Foreign Service posts included Egypt, South Africa, Afghanistan, Burma, the Philippines, and Pakistan. He was interviewed by Niel M. Johnson on September 19, 1988.

Q: You mean they were lost over the ocean, over the jungle, or...

BYROADE: Over the ocean.

Now, we went on through Africa and arrived in Karachi [India]. There was chaos and confusion; we were going to hit Tokyo from just south of Shanghai, but it took us about three months in Florida to get organized, and underway, and by the time we got to Karachi, the Japanese had that area. The second plan was to use the Northern Philippines, but that was gone too. I was left in Karachi. General Brereton came in from Java, and he outranked our General. He took all the bombers away from us. We were left with the DC-3s and they said, "Go start a Hump run to China."

So I was on the first DC-3 that went up to Assam, India.

Q: Where were you stationed at this time?

BYROADE: Well, I was around Karachi, trying to decide now to get in the war. My orders were to report to the senior aviation engineer in the China-Burma-India theater. The people that wrote the order knew that I was it, that I was the only one. I was picked up by General Wheeler.

Q: What was his first name?

BYROADE: Raymond A. Wheeler; he was head of the Service of Supply Command in CBI; it then consisted of General Wheeler, an aide, and a secretary.

Q: What was your rank at this time?

BYROADE: Either a captain or a major, I'm not sure. I guess I had been promoted to major. We got up to Assam, India; Dinjan had half of one runway. The job was to build however many airfields it took to transport lend-lease supplies to China. There were lots of river boats there, full of lend-lease for China that had been in Rangoon. They thought that was going to fall, so they sent it all to Calcutta, and they thought that was going to fall, so they just sent it up the Brahmaputra River, as far as they could go, up towards Assam, waiting for us to get airfields, and airplanes to fly it across the Hump [Himalaya Mountains].

Am I going into too much detail?

Q: No, that's fine.

BYROADE: Well, we had to work through the British, of course. I was the American in charge of not only supplying our own forces, but building airfields and handling the air freight. We used a lot of labor, Indian coolies, breaking rocks by hand. We were to build, I think, seven freight fields, and three or four fighter fields for protection. Well, when I got there, there were two Pan-Am planes running the Hump, and two pilots; one was in bed with malaria and the other one was in the hospital. They had had a fight over some girls. At that time that was the Hump run to China. So we started from absolutely nothing, and none of us had any idea that that would build up to a couple hundred thousand tons a month.

Q: Do you recall about when that started, that operation?

BYROADE: Well, we left Florida, I think, in March. I was around Karachi a couple months. It would be the middle of the summer in '42, July or August.

Q: Where were you stationed, mainly, in India?

BYROADE: I moved up to Chabua in Assam. I built a little headquarters at Chabua and we started with elephants pulling out trees and built our first field at Chabua.

Q: So you're in Assam. When did you get into China? I mean you didn't fly yourself.

BYROADE: Well, not legally, but our Air Force friends let me get in lots of flying hours. I guess I could have got my service wings if I'd stayed one more week, but I couldn't do that.

I was in the India end of the Hump, I've forgotten, but I guess for maybe a year and a half. Then I was transferred to the Advance Section No. 4 of the Services of Supply, which was the eastern half of China, in support of the forward echelon of Chennault's 14th Air Force, and old AVG. It was a prewar outfit...

G. EUGENE MARTIN
India (1943-1956)

A Specialist in Chinese Affairs and a speaker of Chinese, Mr. Martin spent the major part of his career dealing with matters relating to China, both in Washington and abroad. His overseas assignments included Hong Kong, Taipei, Huangzhou (formerly Canton), Beijing, Manila and Rangoon. His Washington assignments also concerned China and the Far East. Mr. Martin was born in Indiana of Missionary parents and was raised in the US. and India. He is a graduate of Kalamazoo College and Syracuse University. Mr. Martin was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

Q: Today is September 21, 1999. This is an interview with G. Eugene Martin. This is being done on behalf of the Association for Diplomatic Studies and Training. I'm Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Well Gene, we'll start at sort of the beginning. Could you tell me when and where you were born and something about your family?

MARTIN: I was born in Indianapolis, actually Speedway, Indiana, which is right next to the racetrack outside of Indianapolis, during the war, in 1943. My parents were missionaries in India, and they had returned in 1941, just at the beginning of the war, for furlough back in the States. Caught in the States and not able to go back to India during the war, my father took a church in Indianapolis. We were living there when I was born.

Q: What denomination was your father?

MARTIN: He was American Baptist.

Q: Yes. Where had they been working in India?

MARTIN: They were in what is now Andhra Pradesh, then it was called Hyderabad. It was about 180 miles north of Madras (now Chennai), on the east coast of India. My parents were third generation missionaries in the same area of India so that essentially was "home." My great grandfather had started the work in that town. I guess this is how I became interested in foreign affairs.

Q: So, well, I mean, you were pretty young. By the time you started being at the age where you remembered things, where were you?

MARTIN: We went out to India when I was two on an empty troop ship going out to pick up the troops from the CBI (China-Burma-India) theater. The troop ship docked in Bombay, father met us there, and we took the train home.

Q: Yes. Where was home?

MARTIN: Home was, at that time, a small town in India called Kanigiri, where we lived for a few years. That was where I have my first memories.

Q: Yes. What do you recall first memories? Sort of family life or?

MARTIN: I guess the most vivid one is when I found some red chilies out on the back porch one day. Not knowing what they were, I popped several in my mouth. I instantly found out what red chilies were all about. I probably ate a whole stalk of bananas to moderate the heat.

Q: Well, that's down in the chili belt, isn't it?

MARTIN: Well, the hot Madrasi curry is famous in that area.

Q: Where did you start going to school by the time you were put into kindergarten or whatever?

MARTIN: My mother taught my elder brother and me initially, using the Calvert course, the famous correspondence school out of Baltimore.

Q: Yes.

MARTIN: I studied in the Calvert system from kindergarten through third grade, my brother and I in the class taught by my mother.

Q: How old was your brother?

MARTIN: He's about a year and a half older than I am.

Q: Yes.

MARTIN: My mother was the teacher, and a strict disciplinarian. She kept the distinction that she was the teacher in the classroom and not mother, so we had to behave, sit properly, and not look for motherly attention. That was for about three years. We went back to the States in 1950 for furlough and spent a year in Ohio, where I went to fourth grade. In 1951, we returned to India and entered boarding school in Kodaikanal, one of the boarding schools in the hills of South India.

Q: Yes. Well, as a very young kid, what were you getting from your parents, and your own observations, about the part of India you were in?

MARTIN: Well, I was aware of what was going on, albeit at a child's level of comprehension. I remember when Gandhi was assassinated. I remember the emotion that overwhelmed the populace, both Indian as well as foreign. I remember independence. We didn't have a radio and TV was many years away from India at that point. But we had newspapers and magazines, and occasionally a radio notice would tell us what was going on in the world. One of the other missionaries had a radio which we heard occasionally. I remember listening to that, or watching and reading about independence, political movements, Gandhi, and so forth. I was very young, only six or seven, but it left an impression.

Q: Yes. The great separation between the Muslims and the Hindus and all didn't take place down there, did it?

MARTIN: That was mainly in the north. However, Hyderabad was still ruled by the Nizam of Hyderabad, the local maharajah, who was Muslim as was a large percentage of his populace. Quite a number of families did leave for Pakistan during partition. I don't remember that too vividly myself because there were not many Muslims in our particular area.

Q: Did you have an ayah?

MARTIN: Oh, well, not really. Peter was our cook, his wife Deenama helped with the cleaning, and a gardener cared for the garden. My brother and I ran around in short pants and bare feet, and climbed trees, and played with the cook's son, George, who was our best friend. We had just a normal childhood.

Q: Yes. What about language? Where you picking up any language?

MARTIN: One of my proudest moments was helping my father find the right Telugu word for "chimney" for one of his sermons. I can't remember why he was speaking about chimneys, but I knew the word instantly, and he had not learned that in his language class. I was quite fluent, with an eight-to-ten-year-old's vocabulary, in Telugu, which was the language spoken in the area.

Q: How old were you when you went to boarding school?

MARTIN: I had just turned eight, on the ship coming back from the States in 1951. My mother felt that she had taught us as much as she could at that stage, so we went off to boarding school in Kodai, as it was called, a hill station.

Q: What was the boarding school like?

MARTIN: Missionaries started it in 1902. They recently celebrated their centennial. There were probably about 100 students, mostly missionary kids but quite a wide variety of children -- oil company dependents from the Middle East, missionary and business children from all over India as well as from Burma and Thailand, and even a few from East Asia. Most were American, a few Europeans and Asians, almost no Indians in those days. One of my brother's roommates was a Thai who became a well-known banker in Bangkok.

Q: Well, while you were at the school, was there sort of the old...things must have been changing quite a bit as things became more Indian rather than, you know, sort of, the rajah had gone and all. I mean were you feeling that as this school _____?

MARTIN: A little, but not too much. I was there from 1951 to '56. I finished eighth grade and then came back to the States for high school. But yes, there was some change, but Kodai was really in a kind of a time warp. There were many retired British civil servants, quite a few Anglo-Indians who lived up there. It had very much of a British feel to it --cottages, English gardens, country walks, the Anglican church, and so on. It was quite isolated from the rest of the country in many ways. But over the five years I was there, I did notice an increasing number of Indians building and owning houses in Kodai.

Q: How about your teachers? Were there any Indians within the teaching ranks?

MARTIN: Not really. I think there may have been a couple, who may have taught Indian history, but I recall most of them were foreigners. We had a number of Europeans who had come from Europe either during or after the war and stayed on - a Czech, a Pole, who was a musician, a number of other people who were quite interesting. They helped broaden our perspective of the world.

Q: Did you feel sort of plugged in to what else was happening in India, or was it pretty isolated?

MARTIN: It was pretty isolated! There really wasn't much contact with the rest of the country and world. We had our sports, activities and social events. We were fairly self-contained.

Q: Well then, you went back. You were how old? Had you finished eighth grade?

MARTIN: I had just turned 13. Let me here comment that while I was in India I had my first contact with the Foreign Service. We used to go into the consulate in Madras for passport services or to register. That was my first recollection of the Foreign Service of the State Department. It made a big impression on me because I always awed when I went into the consulate. I was eager to talk to the people who were issuing the passports. I guess that stuck with me through the years because later on, when I was thinking of a career, the memories kept coming back to me.

Q: Yes. Did you get to travel around much or?

MARTIN: We did some, not a lot. Before we left India my parents took my brother and me to New Delhi so that we could see the sights, something we always wanted to do. It was quite an excursion by third class coach on the train, but that was an experience, in itself, with hard seats, coal smoke coming in the open windows, beggars reaching hands through the windows at stations. But we didn't get to Kashmir, as we wanted to; we didn't get to Dehar Dun; lots of places in India we would have liked to have visited, but did not.

Q: Did you get any feel at that time...I mean, well, actually in retrospect, of course...about the impact of missionaries, in particular, that part of southern India?

MARTIN: Despite coming from a long line of missionaries, three generations since my great grandfather opened the mission station in 1866, I had fairly strong feelings, as did my parents, that the time of the foreign missionary was coming to an end. It was time for the Indian church to be run, controlled and manned by the Indian Christians. Christians are a very small minority in Hindu India, of course.

The big mission hospital in our town was probably the only one in over a hundred miles, over Indian country roads. My mother was deeply involved in education. The mission ran quite an extensive mission school system, from kindergarten through high school and teachers' training school. She also was active in evangelism, preaching, as she said, the gospel first and family planning second. She felt strongly about family planning as she saw the problems caused by unrestrained population growth and the resulting perpetuation of rural poverty and disease. And in her spare time she literally pitched in and personally supervised construction on school buildings – dorms, classrooms, and offices.

Q: Did you get any feel for Baptist versus Anglican versus Catholic versus, and I mean all of these inter Nicene Christian conflicts?

MARTIN: Early in the century missionaries adopted a policy that might be called "divide and conquer." They carved up India, not extraterritorially, but ecclesiastically. The Baptist in our area, the Episcopalians further south, the Presbyterians over on the Bombay side, etc. Occasionally, again toward the end of my time in India, we had a number of what we called itinerant missionaries come through and hold services. My parents always looked a little bit askance at them, perhaps being conservative in the sense that this is our turf, don't come in it.

Q: We'd own it.

MARTIN: I think the important thing was an increasing sense that, as a very small minority, Christian churches in India needed to work ecumenically. If they fought among themselves, proselytizing was going to be even more difficult.

Q: Did you have any feeling for the impact of the missionaries?

MARTIN: I think the missionaries provided a tremendous service in terms of education, in terms of medical services, and to a degree, in infrastructure. My mother built many school buildings, personally out there supervising in the sun, walking up and down the planks, and making sure they did it right. Going back four generations, my great grandfather, who was an engineer by training, was hired by the British colonial government to build part of the Buckingham Canal, a coastal waterway, to help relieve a famine in the 1870s. He supervised the building of five or ten miles of the canal, feeding and paying several thousand workers. That was a physical infrastructure improvement, which is still in use. In general, however, missionary schools, hospitals and social contributions helped India modernize. And most of their work was in rural areas or small towns, which still lag behind urban centers.

Q: In a way, it's off to one side, but how long did your parents continue to be active missionaries?

MARTIN: My father died and is buried in the same Indian town in which he had been born and married, in 1966, the year I joined the Foreign Service. My mother stayed on and finished her term in 1971. They had been there about 40 years.

Q: Oh boy! Well, then, taking you back - you're about 13, and you're back to where? Ohio?

MARTIN: When I left India to go to school in the U.S., I was just thirteen. My parents took my brother and me by train to Bombay. We entered the airport terminal, the first time we'd ever been in an airport terminal, boarded a Super Constellation with "TWA" marked on the sides in big letters, and waved goodbye to our parents, India and childhood. We took off on our very first plane flight, and flew for 48 hours, including 8 stops, all the way to New York City. It was quite an adventure for a 13-year-old and his older brother. In New York, our uncle and aunt met us as our parents had arranged for them to be our guardians when we were in the States. We went to Washington D.C. to see a cousin, which was the first time we'd been to Washington, to Williamsburg to learn a little American history, and finally to Pittsburgh where they lived. I still clearly remember that trip. After a few weeks, they took us to our boarding school in New Jersey, where we went to school.

Q: While you were in India, were you getting much in the way of Americanization, you know, American history, states, capitals, and that sort of thing?

MARTIN: We studied U.S. history and society in seventh and eighth grade social studies. I had a social studies teacher in the eighth grade, who was from the town of Corn, Oklahoma. We were studying Indians, and I decided to report on an Indian tribe. I researched the subject but had no idea how to pronounce the tribe's name. So I began my oral report by saying, "My report is on the See-ox Indians." I thought the teacher would fall out of his chair. Once he set me straight about how to pronounce the Sioux [pronounced Sue], we moved on. We learned the U.S. capitals and states, more than we did the geography and history of India unfortunately.

LOUISE ARMSTRONG
Madras (1944-1947)

Mrs. Armstrong was born in 1917 in Tokyo, Japan of American missionary parents. After moving to the United States she attended Wellesley College. After graduation, Mrs. Armstrong was a researcher for Time and Life magazine before joining the Foreign Service in 1947. As a Consular and Political Officer, she served in Madras, Prague, Palermo and Montreal. Following her marriage to FSO Willis Armstrong in 1959, she resigned her commission and accompanied her husband to Ottawa, where he was assigned as Deputy Chief of Mission. Mrs. Armstrong was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2000.

Q. Well, getting out in 1938, where were you pointed?

ARMSTRONG: Well, I moved into first, the Hamilton Watch Factory, first job that I could get. And that was sorting artificial diamonds for watches, a very simpleminded job. Then I worked in the Science Press, which was the press, which published, the official organ of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, the AAAS.

Q. Scientific America?

ARMSTRONG: Yes, Scientific America, things of that sort. I'm sure they've moved to other publishing houses, but this is where a lot of it was done. And I had the job of proof and manuscript reader.

Q. This seemed to be the prime occupation of graduates of the Seven Sisters schools, being first rate proofreaders at the beginning.

ARMSTRONG: I'm sure it's true because you either did that or you went to Katie Gibbs.

Q. Yeah, Katie Gibbs being the secretarial school.

ARMSTRONG: Right. At any rate, I wanted to go to New York and see what I could do for myself there. So I eventually set off with one or two introductions. It took me a while to get into anything very solid. But I did finally work for Time and Life. And it was while I was there that, as a so called researcher.

As a researcher you went along with the photographer and got all the materials that related to the story that was being shot, or you helped to evolve the story in the first place, the concept of it and then went along with the photographer. But you also, if you worked in some areas, the responsibility was to check the accuracy of the stories that were churned out by the writers, but since some of them were pretty, how would you say, high flown in their style, making or developing theses as they went along, you found you had to reign them in a little bit on a factual basis.

And I did have the experience of reading what Clare Booth Luce sent back from a trip she made to the Far East, during the war this was, when she joined up with the Flying Tigers and General Stilwell and people like that and made stops, hop skipping around the Pacific. And her reports would come back, and I had the job of reading them from a factual standpoint. And basically, she was pretty reliable, a little fast and loose, but pretty reliable. However, when it came to names, I felt I needed some type of corroboration for the spelling, the names and things like that. Very easy to make mistakes in recording from the scene. So when she would get back from these trips, I would call her at the Waldorf and talk to her, rather I talked to secretary, and I'd say would you ask Mrs. Luce if she can confirm this or corroborate that or spell this and so forth? One day I called and I got right through to the lady herself. And she said to me, "Mrs. Armstrong, what have I done wrong now?" Very pleasant lady. She wasn't being nasty.

Q: Were you initiated into sort of the unique Time writing style at that point?

ARMSTRONG: Well, I never did any actual writing. It was while I was working for Life magazine, which at that point was developing a magazine for the armed forces, which would not only give them news but also would help them in identifying foreign and American airplanes, tanks, ships and so forth – a recognition training process. And that took me to Washington on a number of occasions. And it seemed to me everybody was going overseas except me, so I began to look into the possibility of doing something overseas. And I heard from one friend of mine that he was being hired by ANRA, I think it was.

I decided to walk into the State Department, while I was down there, and I asked if I could have an appointment with somebody in foreign service personnel. In due course I was introduced to the chief of foreign service personnel, and that was in the Old Executive Office Building. He waved me to my seat and said he understood I was interested in the foreign service. I said, "Yes, but not in an officer capacity." And I said, "Is that possible?" Well he tilted himself back in his swivel chair and put the tips of his fingers together and said, "Conceivably." And so somewhat to my astonishment I discovered that State Department security was investigating me. My boss in New York would say, "What's going on here?" And the woman who owned the apartment where I was staying, she was frightened out of her wits because security people had come to interrogate her about me.

And then they made me the offer of joining the Foreign Service Auxiliary, which you've probably heard about. And that was for, on the duration of the emergency basis. And we were given a course of sprouts in everything under the sun, a couple of months of this. And I wasn't very long into it before an announcement was made of three posts open for bids. And I was afraid I'd get something like Tegucigalpa, so when I heard that these three posts were open for bids, I pricked up my ears. One was Afghanistan; one was Jerusalem; one was Madras. I didn't think I'd be considered for Kabul, and I thought Jerusalem might be pretty depressing. And I'd read A Passage to India, E.M. Forster, so I had romantic ideas about India, so therefore I offered my services there. And then as I understand it, the Department made little discreet inquiries among people who had served in India, old India hands, as to whether this young woman would go down in the vice consul capacity in Madras, and they seemed to think there was no problem. So I was the first woman officer in India. And before I left there were about six others gathered around various consular posts.

Q: You went to Madras when?

ARMSTRONG: I arrived in January '44.

Q: How did you get there?

ARMSTRONG: I sailed out of Hoboken on a passenger cargo vessel that was the Hurg Silverstar, Norwegians vessel. And we traveled in convoy, across the Atlantic, until we got to the Mediterranean by which time it was Marc Nostrum, we were free of the convoy business so we moved faster. And [we] went into Karachi. Apart from Suez, that was the only stop we made. At Karachi, I was expected, that is my boss to be in Madras had been in touch with the consular general in Karachi, and he'd made all kinds of plans for me, which made me fly Tada Airlines to Madras. Now Tada Airlines is a little bi plane with about six passengers. Had to stop over in Secunderabad, which is the twin city of Hyderabad, where Tada had its own little hotel, airport hotel arrangements.

And interestingly enough I noticed among the half dozen passengers that there was an older middle aged woman with graying hair, black graying hair, who wore a sari but was plainly not Indian. Olive skin and the sari and these leather shoes that you wear in North India, with a turned up toe. And I thought this is interesting, she is what they say has "gone native." But she was an interesting, arresting figure, accompanied by a younger man who spoke English as well as whatever he spoke to her in. I read her name off the sign in roster when we got to the hotel, and she was Maria Montessori. She was traveling around India fulfilling speaking engagements with her nephew doing the interpreting.

Q: Well, Maria Montessori established this preschool system-

ARMSTRONG: Everywhere.

Q: which is everywhere.

ARMSTRONG: Very big in India, or was. I'm sure it's still there. So anyway, one flew by way of Hyderabad, Secunderabad, overnight there. With nothing better to do, a group of us went into the local bazaar at night and that was fascinating. The craftsman were working by charcoal fires, beautiful stuff, all very inexpensive. I bought a dozen bracelets.

And then the next morning we set off for Madras. And there it was understood that my boss to be, he would meet me. It was a two officer post, Madras. And Roy Bauer, who had been in the post for some time [and] was very much settled in there, was to have met me. And then a message reached me at the airport that he couldn't leave the office and would I please take a taxi in to the hotel where I was registered and then meet him for lunch at The Madras Club. I found a fellow passenger who was going in; we shared a cab. Looking out of the plane as we approached Madras, it looked very arid and empty, and I thought, "Geez, two three years here, can I stand it?" Then as we drove in to the town, it happened to be after the monsoon so it was a lot greener than it might have been, in fact a lot of green paddy fields everywhere, but kind of a rundown situation. Everything you saw looked in a state of decay, if not from dry weather then from humid weather. And not very reassuring. And part way into town, in the middle of the country, the taxi broke down. The driver managed to flag another car. That car towed us and just as we approached the near middle of the town, the tow rope broke. I finally got to my hotel.

Q: A great introduction!

ARMSTRONG: That's right. Having arrived at the hotel, I then went on to the Madras Club. First thing my boss did was order me a gimlet, my first experience with gimlets. And with a British Indian club. It was really very agreeable, and just what I needed was a drink at that point.

Q: You were there from 1944 to ?

ARMSTRONG: '47, September '47. I left one month after Indian Independence.

Q: What was Madras like at that time? Particularly when you just arrived, still wartime?

ARMSTRONG: Yes. Well first thing that Mr. Bauer did, over a drink and then over lunch, was to explain the social situation to me. Quite clearly I was not to drop any bricks or make any gaffes. The society was dominated by the British Civil Service, ICS, Indian Civil Service really. There was a British governor and his aides were all British. The chiefs of all the administrative offices were British. And then there were Britishers who were there in business, import export, manufacturers, cotton and things like that. And there were British military.

And the situation was such socially, there was a housing shortage, that is, a housing shortage of the West and England. I'm sure there was always a housing shortage for Indians. So the people doubled up, and as my boss explained to me, sometimes the husband would be sent home and couldn't get back, having left his wife behind. And there would be somebody else who needed a place to live, so they would have a paying guest system. And you would have some interesting situations where So and so was sharing a house with Lady So and so, but they didn't have the same last name. And he just wanted to let me understand that such situations existed, from the social point of view so I wouldn't be misled.

He also said that there was one particular charming younger woman who attended all the social functions, as a somewhat unattached woman, I think she was separated from her husband. But she was hired by the British Intelligence, so that anything that got to her ears went straight to Intelligence. They had put her in that situation because so many soldiers would come through, officers through Madras, and they would have time on their hands looking for recreation and go to the several clubs that were open to them. And if they talked too much, she would be there to pick it up. And that was among some other responsibilities I'm sure.

He also told me in local correspondence I should be very careful of what I said because there were a number of British housewives who were employed to read this kind of thing. So my letters would invariably be screened.

Then there was the missionary community, which was very significant. We had about a thousand missionaries in the consular district, which included the state of Hyderabad, Mysore and Travancore, three Indian states - they all have different names now - and Madras, Presidency as it was called then. So missionaries were scattered all over this south Indian area, which was really the lower half of the Indian peninsula. And Roy Bauer was on very good terms with them; they enjoyed coming and chatting with him. He was a very approachable, easy conversationalist. He had a remarkable faculty for getting happily along with the British, the stuffiest Britishers, because he'd served in England, he'd served in Singapore, he was quite comfortable with British ways. In fact he would correct me from time to time. I was not to say "stupid," I was to say "schtupid," can you hear the difference? Because that's the way the British said [it]. He was also very comfortable with the local American community, which was small. But the missionaries were a great source of intelligence for us.

We would report on all kinds of things as they happened in our area. We would report, you see we didn't have an embassy yet in Delhi, we had the personal representative of the United States. Then in due course when it was clear that we were going to have an embassy, we had a chargé. And the first ambassador I broke in for, I'll have to take time on that, but never mind. We would send these reports back to both to Delhi and to Washington, for what they were worth. Basically we didn't have a great deal of trouble in south India. The problems that arose were chiefly in the north. Because we had a very modest Muslim community. They gave nobody any trouble, and nobody troubled them. We had some other interesting curiosities, but mostly it was a very stable community in that sense.

Q: Were we looking at the Indian Congress Party and the Gandhi general movement?

ARMSTRONG: Yes, we had a close friend in a woman congressman, and I made friends with another woman who had been a congresswoman. We had visits from Gandhi, from time to time. He would come down. I shared a platform with him. By a platform I mean a raised dais in the center of a crowd with people all around who had come for holy sight of the great man.

Q: I'm sure in making the namostay.

ARMSTRONG: That's right. The interesting thing for me was one heard so much about his fasting and his general self sacrifice. But when I saw him in person, I never saw somebody who was better fleshed out than he was. I understood in his fasting, when it took place, included in his diet orange juice and goat's milk, which was a lot better than most Indians had by way of a good diet. And when he traveled third class, in the third class car - third class in India had nothing but the bench around the periphery of the car, with most people sitting on the floor - this third class car was mostly Gandhi and his party. So it wasn't as if he had to sleep on the floor if he didn't want to. I admired him a lot, but he didn't have any great time for Americans. I suspect only for Britishers with whom he had to do business.

Q: As vice consul, what were your jobs? What were you doing?

ARMSTRONG: I had a certain amount of rubber stamping of invoices, enormous amount of invoices. Of rosters of port, and during the war time, we had a lot of American ships come in, so there was some so called shipping. But since we didn't have a Coast Guard there, if there was any serious problem, we'd refer them to Calcutta or to Ceylon, to Colombo. Because you always had incidents on cargo ships where there was some kind of a fracas going on. Some seaman was a problem or some captain was a problem. But I didn't have to deal with that type of thing directly. The invoicing was big. There was a community of Americans working in Bangalore with the Hindustan Aircraft Corporation, which was the beginning in the sense of, Bangalore is now the "silicon valley" of India. Bangalore Aircraft Corporation serviced the codas and other planes -

Q: The codas being the DC 3.

ARMSTRONG: That's right. And also serviced military aircraft. And some which later flew the hump. We had a group of American technicians and engineers working there which inevitably cohabited with Anglo Indian woman. And inevitably there were children and some consular matters involving them. And we had consular matters involving the American community, of which I said we had about 1,000. And then I was expected to mingle socially, which was very agreeable. And as I say do reporting. The more commercial economic reporting would be done by the chief Indian clerk, but it would go out under my name because I would report it. We did oil seeds reporting and reporting on coconut products and things of that sort, mainly for the Department of Agriculture I think, to some extent for Commerce. And any political reporting that we could sniff out.

Q: Was the Consul sort of under the instructions to watch this Indian Independence movement closely?

ARMSTRONG: Well, we just assumed we were under instructions if we weren't, and [we'd] report anything we thought was worthwhile. But as I say there wasn't a great deal going on in south India. South India was just moving with the times.

Q: How about the war effort? Was it your impression that the Indians you got to know, were they with the war effort or did they feel it was a British war?

ARMSTRONG: Oh, distinctly detached. In fact there was such a thing as the Indian National Army, which was working with the Japanese.

Q: In Burma.

ARMSTRONG: Well, also in India. And the daughter of this congresswoman was involved in that. She wasn't living in Madras very much, so it was just quietly spoken about. Yes she was very much involved.

Q: What about your contact with Indians? The British were still in charge, but was there an Indian class that you –

ARMSTRONG: Yes, there was an Indian community that one would regard as just as easy to mingle with as the British. One of the things I liked to do was to escape from the domain of the Raj now and again. You knew that if you spent all your time with Indians that it would create a bad impression, so you had to be a little careful. But I had quite a number of Indian friends who were what you would call upper class, prosperous, and I enjoyed learning about India through them. They provided opportunities like the missionaries. The missionaries were much closer to the Indians and the officials, of course.

Q: How about at the end of the war, which would be August of '45, did that change things at all?

ARMSTRONG: It didn't make too much difference immediately in south India. In north India, there were already riots, even before Indian independence. I went up, I joined the Foreign Service in the auxiliary, and then I was prepared to take the written examinations. They were provided, at a certain point, by courier. And I was going to be able to sit in my own office and take the examination with my supervisor next door, so to speak. The courier was a day late, after I'd done my best to bone up for this examination, I found I had to wait for the next one to come along because it was considered, that particular examination had been, what's the word you want?

Q: Compromised?

ARMSTRONG: Compromised. So when I finally took it, which was about six months later, and was discovered to have passed it I was told that I would be interviewed by a panel a traveling panel. A traveling panel came to Bombay, and I went up to Bombay for that occasion. There was a very well known man, named Joe Green, and everybody said he would be the holy terror. And it turned out he was a very fatherly type. At any rate I passed the orals, as far as I could tell, I think they told me at the time. Then I had to pass the physical. The consulate in Bombay sent me to a doctor that they had in mind, and I found myself stark naked jumping up and down on one foot and then the other for this guy. No nurses or nothing. You put up with a lot in the Foreign Service.

From there I went on to Kashmir. My mother, by the way, had come to India to join me about two thirds of the way through. She and an American woman whose husband had been Young Men Christian Association (YMCA) secretary, the three of us were going to Kashmir together. She and my mother went on ahead, and I went on from Bombay. One went part of the way by train, up to Peshawar, and then a bus from there up to Srinagar. And I could see burning villages on the ridges across the way, at that time in the spring of '47. There was plenty of trouble already.

Then when my mother and I came back we traveled separately from our friend, Marie Buck. We got on board a train with a compartment reserved for us you couldn't lock. The lock was faulty. And under normal circumstances you wouldn't feel too worried about this. But under the circumstances, it wasn't very reassuring. And at every point on the Indian railway's journey, they would stop and there would be a great hubbub of crowds on the platform. That was very characteristic, especially in North India. Crowded platforms where people would eat, sell tea, sell this and that and eat fast foods of their kind. Any hour of day or night; the Indian clock is continuous. So I found us in this unlockable compartment, and I piled everything I could think of in terms of luggage. And I suggested that my mother take the lower berth and I spent half the night screaming at people to get away from the door, that it was private, that it was locked and so forth, ready to leap on anybody who did push their way in. Well people pushed, but nobody pushed their way in. But that was a situation I wouldn't have encountered in south India. There was more turbulence and unruliness up there.

Now in south India there was one episode that gave us concern really. A very fine man who was a member of the high court, the Madras High Court, a Britisher, Justice Byers - he and his wife were delightful, I enjoyed their hospitality more than once - he for some reason had a revolver with him driving back from the high courts, which were at the far end of town from where he lived at the other end of town. His car was being pelted by boys throwing stones and it unnerved him, and he thought the best thing to do was to fire a warning shot. And he got out his pistol and he fired a warning shot and it hit a stone wall and the bullet ricocheted and killed a boy. I have never seen a British community so upset, and I'd never seen a man so shunned after that. He just didn't stay in Madras. He lost his position, and he was out of there. He retired to Vancouver.

Q: Did you find that there was a certain amount of tension between you and the American members, particularly you and the British community and you know, our general feeling is anti colonial? Or had we sort of been absorbed into the colonial society?

ARMSTRONG: I think my experience was in fact colored by the fact of Roy Bauer, who was very pro British. Now mind you he was objective at the same time. And the more I saw of the situation in south India, the more I was satisfied that the Indian Civil Service was really a very well intentioned and well organized civil service and very competent, in the sense that the young officer would go out to a large district so he would be the only one there and somehow could be responsible for local justice, local taxes and everything else. I thought they handled the situation well. The railroads were their creation. And everything India has today, to my way of thinking, is due to a very good colonial period. When I was with Indians who were chafing at the British overrule, I could be sympathetic with them as well.

But I have to say I also admired the British. Now individual British senior people could be a little stuffy. An American was not always considered to be of the same class and status. But happily Mr. Bauer was very well established, and that made a difference in their acceptance of me. I was the subject of a certain amount of local gossip, which was the principal problem I had I would say, because here I was, an unattached woman, circulating [with] a largely identified group of people, some Indians. So my name was often being associated with somebody or other, often with somebody I'd never heard of. Again, the only thing to do was to forget about it, to laugh at it.

Q: Well did you find, when you came into the Foreign Service, were you being warned this isn't the place for a woman and that kind of thing?

ARMSTRONG: Well I was only warned about the problem of Madras being a port and unruly seamen would be coming in. So I have to tell my unruly seamen story. In fact one man, I think he's the first person I talked to in the state department, said, "You know, if you go to a place like Madras, I know of a woman foreign service vice consul who kept a big monkey wrench on her desk and any time she felt threatened she would rattle the monkey wrench."

Well that didn't happen in my case, but in one instance when there was an American cargo vessel in town and by the way we had constant vessels in town because there was a big buildup for an invasion of Japan and there was a base called Avodi, which was outside of Madras, so we had shipload after shipload of aircraft parts, you name it. And these ships would frequently, almost invariably, be American vessels. Well one day this chap came in and, shirt open down to his belt buckle, he sits himself on the chair in front of my office and my desk and throws one leg over the arm of the chair and leans back and says, "Say, what is there to do in this town anyway?" Bauer had seen him come in. I talked to him – there was the Gimkana Club he could go to, and there were movies. I was scared to death he'd ask me for a date, and I'd have to say no thank you. And he began to study me and he said, "Say, you look familiar, what's your name?" And I told him Louise Schaffner. He says, "I went to school with you, I went to grade school with you. My name's Panny Beanzirfer." And I remembered Panny Beanzirfer, and I said, "I'm going to have to write my grandmother about you." At that point, we had a few other words and then he took off. Roy Bauer couldn't believe it. He couldn't believe it. I found it hard to believe too.

Q: Did you have to get seamen out of jail and things like that?

ARMSTRONG: That we left to the Coast Guard. They would come in, the captain would come in with some of the problems. Roy Bauer would talk to him and advise him what we could and couldn't do. Mainly we should ship them off to the next port. We also had problems with the local madam because these American seamen would come in and tear the joint apart. I got such a kick out of that. She would come in in this black dress, in the middle of the Madras summer heat and sit down in his office. He was very polite and very bland. He told her, "So sorry. Nothing we could do. Take it up with the police."

Q: Sometimes it's handy to have good relations with the local madams because they can sometimes keep Americans out of, they can sort of inform the Consul before they inform the police.

ARMSTRONG: I dare say. I don't know of any case like that coming up. Mostly it was just these guys who would get drunk and raise hell.

Q: You say you left there in '47?

ARMSTRONG: Yes. Incidentally, I'll tell you about Indian independence in Madras. The date was the 15th, and it was at midnight because the 14th was an unlucky [day]. Or the settlement with Mountbatten fell to the 15th. But the sky showed that the 15th was an inauspicious day. So Indian independence was officially effective as of midnight. Nehru was the one who organized it this way. At any rate that night the whole downtown Madras was, of course, ablaze with lights and sounds and music and dancing and what, I don't remember exactly. But the governor of Madras, Sir Archibald Nigh, who was later to become the first British High Commissioner, he had been deputy chief of the imperial general staff during the war, which meant that he was a senior military man. And he was a splendid man. And his wife was very interested in everything Indian. She made a point of taking part in charities, which were for the benefit of the Indians. The two of them and their, his aide, and my mother was invited, not me, my mother, drove down to midtown Georgetown, which was the busy part of the Madras harbor area to enjoy the celebrations. And nobody laid a hand on them. It was in a jeep as a matter of fact. It wasn't in the official car, it was in a jeep.

Q. A jeep, open.

ARMSTRONG: An open jeep.

Q: Now, what was the feeling from Bauer and yourself about [unknown word] India?

ARMSTRONG: I think most Americans felt that India was entitled to independence. One's servants were very upset because they saw their established way of life as crumbling. I think India did deteriorate, initially. And whether it has in some fashion ever recovered, I doubt. I'm told I would see India very much changed. And I'm sure I will; it would be magnificent, the changes. But also you know all the troubles of India at this point too. So when the British left, they left a good system, but the system was disbanded.

Q: In '47 where did you go?

ARMSTRONG: In '47 I went on home leave, and my appointment was to be Praja. And I thought when I saw that, my gosh that must be in Latin America, [but] Praja's a name for Prague. There's a place, Paraj, I believe in Brazil. And I was confusing that in my mind.

ROYAL D. BISBEE
Visa & General Services Officer
Bombay (1947-1948)

General Services Officer
New Delhi (1948-1950)

Provincial Public Affairs Officer
Lucknow (1951-1956)

Mr. Bisbee was born of Missionary parents in India, where he was raised and schooled. After graduating from the University of Washington, he joined the US Army and spent World War II in Iraq with the Army Intelligence Corps. He entered the Foreign Service in 1947 and served, primarily as Public Affairs Officer, in Bombay, New Delhi, Lucknow, Salonika, Lahore, Freetown, Pretoria and Manila. Mr. Bisbee died in 2010. Mr. Bisbee was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2010.

Q: What brought your father to India?

BISBEE: He felt cold. I have a letter on file to the effect that he was drawn to the prospect of serving others, the importance of serving others, and the necessity to aid and assist others in their development. This is what led him to that, and the acceptance by the church for his service.

Q: Let's talk about the state where your father worked in India. What was it like when he got there?

BISBEE: Fortunately, the Maharajah at that period of time was a progressive individual. He was very forthcoming for new ideas, thoughts and desires of new things. For instance, he asked my father at one stage to develop a prayer that would be acceptable to all peoples in his state: Muslim, Hindu, etcetera. My father did this and said, tongue in cheek, "Roy, I didn't develop anything new. All I did was translate the Lord's Prayer into the local language, which was very acceptable."

From then on, my father could do most anything. He was asked to do all kinds of things for the Maharajah. In fact, he aided the Maharajah in coming to the United States to attend one of the large evangelical movements that was held in Chicago in about 1934.

Q: Where is the state in India? I am trying to put it on a mental map of India.

BISBEE: The State of Baroda is in the western area of the country, in the area of the country that was most exposed to early progress. Here you have the Indus River coming down into the western area. All the early excavations that gave evidence for the early cultivation of civilization are here. You have to think about the river valleys such as Mesopotamia, the Indus River, and all the rivers that came together in those areas. They were all talking to one another in one form or another, through shipping or...

Q: There's a tremendous amount of shipping in the Indian Ocean.

BISBEE: What one has to visualize is that you had a state such as Baroda that was not isolated. It had its talons into a variety of civilizations. There was a highly developed culture.

Q: Again, you were born in what year?

BISBEE: I was born on February 21st, 1923.

Q: How long were you there?

BISBEE: On and off, I was there for about 17 years.

Q: Could you talk about your experiences, what you were picking up from your parents, about Gandhi and that Movement. And first of all, what about the British Raj? I don't know whether the Maharajah reached into the state or not, but what about the influence that was there?

BISBEE: First of all, my father wanted us to remember that we were Americans. He was always outspoken, saying, "Remember son, we are American. We do not involve ourselves with local affairs. We may be sympathetic and very attuned to our democratic values, but we are American. We respect the local values, the activities that are taking place, the Gandhi movement, the activities of Nehru, and the needs of the British."

Q: This is all very nice, but there had to be a certain point where you or your family saw either the injustices, the rationale, or something. Did you come away from there with any particular feeling for the colonial world?

BISBEE: You are asking me a question about the injustices of the British Raj. I cannot say that I saw, as a youngster, injustices of the British Raj. What I did see was law and order, the fact that the Indians respected the law and order as they saw it, and they respected it more when the British left. They were asking that the British stay on longer. That wasn't possible to do because of the needs of the times, the political developments, and splitting the country into two parts.

My family was friends of the Nehrus and Gandhi.

Q: Where did you go to school?

BISBEE: I went to school at Woodstock in Mussoorie, the Quadrangle.

Q: Was this a Methodist school?

BISBEE: This was a school that was founded during the days of the East India Company. Other schools were later incorporated into the Quadrangle.

Q: This school is located in Mussoorie, you say?

BISBEE: It is in Mussoorie, which is located at approximately 5,000 feet in the Mani Mountains.

Q: Did the student body consist of just foreign children? Were there students from the Indian ruling class?

BISBEE: At the time I was there, it consisted of children of American missionaries and included children of leading Indians. For instance, Chandralekha Pandit was in my class, the daughter of Mrs. Pandit.

Q: This was Nehru's sister.

BISBEE: Nevertheless, I knew all these people.

Q: Did the political turmoil penetrate to the school?

BISBEE: No, it did not, and it did not involve itself into that kind of turmoil.

Q: Were you able to get vacation time where you could go out on a bike into the village or the countryside?

BISBEE: Oh yes. I was with my father on his tours into the villages. That was how I learned my languages. I can tell you right now that there isn't another person in the U.S. Government who speaks it as well as I do.

Q: How many languages were you learning?

BISBEE: I learned Gujarati, which was my first language. I grew up speaking it. My father encouraged me to learn it. In fact, he often said what a wonderful creature I would make in Gujarati. Then I went on and learned Hindi and, later, Urdu. I was able to translate for Presidents Johnson and Eisenhower.

Q: Aside from your father, did you get any Americanization influence?

BISBEE: How do you mean?

Q: I was wondering whether you were sent to the States from time to time.

BISBEE: No, I was not. We would come home when we had the money. Five years is probably the earliest time we would come home. In one period, we didn't have the money to come home.

Q: Of course, we are talking about the time of the Great Depression.

BISBEE: That's right.

Q: Were you attracted towards missionary life as a kid?

BISBEE: Not particularly. I was more attracted to things which I was able to read and learn. For instance, my father would periodically have to go to Bombay. He would take me as a youngster. Bombay was a big city.

Q: Was that the closest big city?

BISBEE: It was the closest really big city. It was the commercial hub of the western part of the country.

My father would take me, because he wanted the company I guess. He and I would go and stop in front of the American Consulate General. He would point out the flag with the stars and strips, telling me the reasons for them. He would then go upstairs and closet himself with the Consul General, to talk about things up country, as a good American should do. I would be relegated to talking with the Indian staff in the back. They would all be hilarious with this little American boy, speaking in their language. John J. Macdonald interested me in the Foreign Service, and I have never forgotten that.

Q: When you were home, was there the equivalent of a gang or a bunch of boys that you played with?

BISBEE: When I was back home, I would play with the youngsters in the compound. That helped me learn the language. My father encouraged me to translate for a number of his sermons.

Q: By the time you reached college age, where were you pointed towards?

BISBEE: I was already focused on the Foreign Service. I had wanted to go to Tufts, but I couldn't make it to Tufts because of the shipping accommodation at the time. I was a whole month late because I had to go around South Africa and up through Trinidad. So I went up to my grandparents' area. I talked to the people at the University of Washington. I told them who I was, that I was an in-state student. They looked at my record and found that I didn't have all the credits necessary. I could enter the university as a special student, which I did. From then on, I went ahead with my scholastic work for the Foreign Service.

Q: Back in India, were you much of a reader?

BISBEE: Yes, I was.

Q: Where did you get your books from?

BISBEE: They were second-hand books that came from the Methodist Church in Spokane. They were books that nobody seemed to want. I used to read every one of them. That was the way it was.

Q: With your language, being American and not being tied to the British, how did you find the attitude of the Indian military?

BISBEE: The Indian military were very friendly to me. I can suggest to you, [phrase in Indian/Gujarati?], you and we are of one country. I could just about do anything for the embassy. As a matter of fact, I was asked to do almost anything for the embassy. Henderson would ask me to do all kinds of things for the embassy, him.

Q: How was Mrs. Henderson when you were there?

BISBEE: Are you being facetious?

Q: No. I think of the stories that supposedly when he was Ambassador to India, sitting in the grand dining hall, which was very opulent, and she was very carefully scrubbing all her utensils with her napkin saying something like, "You can never tell in places like this."

BISBEE: Elise Henderson was a very sensitive and kindly woman. She was very intolerant of what she would call abuse. She couldn't stand or accept any type of slight. Does that mean that she was intolerant? Yes, she was intolerant as all hell. Was she intolerant towards me? No, because she needed me to deal with the servants and day-to-day aspects of the operation of her establishment. She couldn't seem to be able to keep servants in line, or order things from the bazaar. She would order things and then Henderson would say, "Roy, please take this back. I cannot have this. I cannot pay for this. I have no way to deal with this."

It is strange that you should ask that. No one else has ever asked me.

Q: Don't worry about that.

Was anybody in personnel saying okay, you've got these languages? You're off to India.

BISBEE: There was no discussion. It was just assumed I was going. It was as though someone had already asked for me. I have a sneaking suspicion that the person who asked for me was Howard Donovan. He was Consul of Embassy in New Delhi, and he knew my parents. My father said he asked that I be sent as language and consular officer.

Q: When did you arrive in New Delhi?

BISBEE: I arrived in Bombay first, in 1948.

MRS. BISBEE: It was January 7th, 1947.

Q: Was this during or after the split, partition?

BISBEE: I arrived during the whole process of the split. I had the whole business of the docks thrown at me. I had to sort out all of the embassy's shipping and seamen aspects of this whole thing. It was a nightmare, because you had materials being shipped from Karachi being transferred to Bombay, and materials being shipped back up to Karachi. It was a mess.

Q: I assume you had local employees who were having to split too, weren't they?

BISBEE: Not necessarily the ones in Bombay; they were pretty solid. The ones in the north had more of a problem.

MRS. BISBEE: His parents were in Delhi at the time.

Q: What was the Consulate General like?

BISBEE: There was a general manager, John J. Macdonald, a very fine gentleman. He was a good executive. Without his executive skills, I can assure you that place would not have operated well. You had a number of other staff members who, in my opinion, were not worth a damn. They were more interested in careers that were not possible there at that time. Nevertheless, we were able to operate, because I was immediately thrown into doing visas, the seamen and shipping aspects. I was too worried about how I was going to proceed and learning about the job at the same time, rather than worrying what my career was going to be.

Q: Talk a little about seamen and shipping. This was an era when there were still American seamen.

BISBEE: Very much so.

Q: In later years, they've sort of disappeared. There used to be what they used to call the China Coast. What about the Indian Coast? These were pretty much people who, I won't say the dregs of sailorhood, but they weren't the greatest. They hung around and lived off the ports where they could live quite cheaply. There were girls and booze. They would get on a ship reluctantly when they had to pick up a little money to keep going. Was that the atmosphere?

BISBEE: Very much so. It was in a way a period which was volatile. You never knew whether the seamen that were in transit in nature were actually what they were pretending to be, or whether they were somehow associated with some kind of organization that was out in some fashion to divert goods and services.

As a matter of fact, my first promotion was due to my being able to find 12 cases of Scotch whisky that had not been breached in some fashion for the embassy in New Delhi, for which they were very pleased.

Q: We are talking about the immediate post-war period. Life was quite different then. You had diversions from the supply line to the Red Ball Express in France and everywhere. It was pretty freewheeling.

BISBEE: It was not only freewheeling, but people thought they could do anything they wanted to do. It was just not possible. It was just like this Miss Cox, for instance. She came to the coast of India on a ship from Nairobi. She just thought she could get off the ship, come ashore, and go do anything she wanted to. She couldn't. It was not possible to do that, certainly not without her passport and other documents. So what happened was she landed in jail.

Q: When was this? This was quite an important episode in a much later time.

BISBEE: This was in 1948.

Q: So this is early on in your career?

BISBEE: Yes.

Q: What was her first name?

BISBEE: Her full name was Una Chapman Cox.

Q: How did she come to your attention?

BISBEE: She was incarcerated, in jail. I was called by the locals. "Saab, come quickly. The police have one lady in jail and she has to be taken care of. Come quickly."

As soon as I found out what the evidence was in terms of who she was and why she was there, I went and talked with the Consul General. He said, "Do what you can. Get her out."

That's exactly what we did. What I did was to take my local right-hand man and go and interview her to find out what ship she had come from, and to send word back by the local agent to get her documents and papers, get them validated locally, and get her out of jail. The Consul General put her up and got her off to New Delhi and points east.

Q: How old was she?

BISBEE: I really don't know that.

Q: Was she a young girl?

BISBEE: No, I think she was in her late 20s.

Q: I'm surprised the authorities would make a fuss about this.

BISBEE: They didn't really. I smoothed it out as much as possible.

Q: I'm surprised it went as far as her being arrested.

BISBEE: They didn't know who she was or what she was doing there.

Q: So as far as they were concerned, was she a free floating spirit?

BISBEE: That's right. They didn't know what the hell she was up to.

The captain of the ship was of no account. He was a drunk.

Q: How did she react?

BISBEE: She was very pleased. She was a person who was interested in what was going on. That was the reason why she had come ashore, because she was interested in what was transpiring. Who was to know that later on she was going to be...

Q: You might explain the reason why we are dwelling on this. The Una Chapman Cox Foundation has been a significant factor in the Foreign Service. Many years later, she set up the foundation to help things dealing with the Foreign Service.

BISBEE: She was instrumental in donating large amounts of money to aid and further the ability of Foreign Service Officers to broaden their horizons and academic activities, without which they would not have had the opportunity to accomplish. It has been a very fine opportunity for...

Q: You had no idea this was in the offing?

BISBEE: No, I had no idea who she was or what she was until a couple of years ago when I was informed.

Q: Let's talk a bit about Bombay. Was Bombay at all affected by the partition? Or was that over the horizon?

BISBEE: Bombay was not affected by partition in the sense that you had sections of this and sections of that. Yes, you do have and always will have in places like India sections of the city that are very demarcated as Muslim or as Hindu. But to say that Bombay is one religious aspect or another would be incorrect. Bombay is a very commercial and cosmopolitan city. That's the way that it will always be. The same holds for Calcutta, which is very cosmopolitan.

Q: Had Bollywood made a foothold in Bombay at the time?

BISBEE: Not at that time. It didn't exist.

Q: Did you get involved with visas?

BISBEE: Yes, I was doing that.

Q: Was there much in the way of movement towards the United States? We had a quota of maybe 100 a year for immigrants. For non-immigrant visas, was there much going on?

BISBEE: Not at the time. It was more in the nature of people wanting to go to Great Britain. I did not have that kind of problem, although there were interested people wanting to send their children to the United States for studies. There was not a significant number.

Q: Were there any social unrest or political movements going on in the area that concerned us? The Cold War was getting its start, and you had a little farther south the communist area. Were those things going on?

BISBEE: The movements were. In 1947, you had communist movements going on in what was known as Kerala. Nehru was attempting to deal with that. There were separatist movements going on in Eastern India, but there were not separatist activities in Bombay.

MRS. BISBEE: There was mass slaughter, while Muslims were trying to get to Pakistan, and Hindus were trying to get to India.

BISBEE: I'm trying not to deal with that entirely.

It had to do with money, with wages, and the differences between the people who were members of a scheduled caste and those of a non-scheduled caste.

Q: I'm not familiar with the terms. Does scheduled caste mean the Brahmins?

BISBEE: Yes.

Q: And then moving to the Untouchables?

BISBEE: There were Sudras and others. There were caste differences.

Q: What was the team like at the consulate general?

BISBEE: I found the team fractured. The Consul General was almost by himself. I did not find him to be the leader of a team, but almost by himself.

MRS. BISBEE: Macdonald was replaced by Charles O. Thompson, who was very controversial. His second-in-command thought he should have been elevated.

BISBEE: There were about three or four others in the consulate general who, in my opinion, were all acting on their own and not acting as a team. Quite frankly, I was quite pleased to be transferred to New Delhi.

Q: I think this is probably a good place to stop. The next time, we'll pick up when you are off to New Delhi in 1948.

How was living in Bombay?

BISBEE: We were youngsters and as far as we were concerned, we were perfectly fine. We did not have any problems. There were just the two of us and one child. We had a nice apartment with free servants. We thought we were doing pretty well.

Q: Very good. We'll pick this up in 1948 when you are off to New Delhi.

Today is May 26th, 2010. This is the second interview with Royal Bisbee.

In 1948, you were rather happy to get out of Iraq and go to New Delhi.

BISBEE: Let's amend that. I was pleased to be able to serve my country and to be able to go on and get my degree at the University of Washington. For that purpose, yes, I was pleased. I also introduced my new wife to my family in Bombay and to see to the birth of my new child.

Q: How did you meet your wife?

BISBEE: I met my wife in Baghdad. It was not a dramatic experience. We were joyfully united. She was a visa officer. In those days, they deigned to send women to do visa work, because they couldn't find men since the men were in the army. We poor young fellows were without the joyful experience of intelligent young ladies.

Q: In 1948, you went to New Delhi.

BISBEE: In 1948, I went to New Delhi.

Q: What was your job?

BISBEE: My job was two-fold. One was to serve with due diligence my ambassador, Loy Henderson. He asked me to do all kinds of services. He knew that I had considerable experience, both educationally as well as linguistically. Secondly, he asked me to do general services work. General services work is, as we all know, whatever you want to call it.

Q: It's the glue that makes the embassy run.

BISBEE: You're exactly right.

MRS. BISBEE: It's a great place to use a person with languages.

Q: Before we get to your work, 1948 rings loud and clear in India. What was happening from the perspective of the embassy then? How were things going?

BISBEE: The embassy itself was being reorganized. It was being rethought because they had no idea that there would be such tumult in the country. Nehru was a new factor to them. In many respects, Nehru himself was a new intellectual. They had to revamp their thinking. They suddenly recognized that India was going to need many things in the way of reorganization, administration, food, and more understanding. There were going to be two countries, not just one. Suddenly, there were two countries. And here they were, unprepared.

The British had not prepared them for two countries, and the British were certainly not prepared for this whole aspect.

Q: We had become used to dealing with the British, as the rulers of the country. All of a sudden, we are having to deal with the Congress Party. This can be very difficult. Sometimes our officers get more anglophile than the British themselves.

BISBEE: I think that some possibly were. Others were not. Henderson was not. He was more of a Middle Eastphile.

Q: And also Eastern Europe.

BISBEE: Correct.

Q: Was his wife from Estonia?

BISBEE: Yes.

He was not, but that was probably the hardest wrench for him in many respects. I think this is where he ran into heavy weather in Congress. As a result, he was eventually replaced.

Q: What was the problem with Congress?

BISBEE: I think Congress suddenly realized that they were going to have to come up with a great deal of largesse. They were very much taken with our friend, Mr. Nehru, and his ability to persuade. Suddenly, there he was on the scene. They wanted to keep him on our side, as it were. There were many who also thought at the time that he was very much left wing.

Q: He was. He was a London School of Economics standard bearer.

BISBEE: And he had Mr. Menon.

Q: When I was much younger, I remember Krishna Menon as the evil presence.

BISBEE: As I saw it and as I advised Howard Donovan, this man was a menace to the joint development of an alliance of a strong nature on the subcontinent. And in my opinion he destroyed the intelligence services of the Pakistan-India compact that was developing at the time. He was a real son of a bitch.

Q: You were obviously a very junior officer, but because of your language ability, were you able to sit in on meetings with Henderson and Nehru.

BISBEE: I didn't sit in on meeting with Henderson, but I did with Howard Donovan who was the Deputy Chief of Mission. I had to be extremely careful. As you suggested, I was an extremely junior officer. As I told Howard Donovan, I was not in any way to push myself forward.

Q: One of the things I find interesting about these oral histories, when I talk to people who were officers, they were often the flies on the wall. While the great people were meeting, there is a Royal Bisbee sitting off in the corner taking notes or something. Were you picking up from the Nehru entourage and the American Henderson entourage a certain antipathy? Nehru had very little regard for the United States.

BISBEE: No, he had a great deal of regard for the United States, but he did not have much regard for Henderson.

Q: Why?

BISBEE: I think because he thought Henderson was shallow. Mrs. Henderson did not help.

Q: From what I gather and I may be putting words in your mouth, I was told she had the racial traits of the petty aristocracies...

BISBEE: He felt that Henderson was arrogant. That didn't mean that he wasn't arrogant.

I probably knew Nehru very well for a number of reasons. One was the fact that I had been to his home in Surrey, where his daughters went to school. His daughter, Chandralekha Pandit, was in my class, and we were good friends. I had been to their home in New Delhi on several occasions. As a matter of fact, Henderson didn't know that, but Donovan did. Donovan requested me to keep him informed of any new developments.

Henderson went to Nehru and said, "I want to send a party to rescue Lowell Thomas."

Nehru said, "Oh fine. How is the party going to be comprised?"

Henderson said, "I'm going to send an embassy officer and a nurse. In addition, I would request that the Government of India send a comparable party of a doctor and a nurse."

Nehru, in his usual shrewd way, said, "And who is this officer that you are going to send?"

He said, "I'm going to send Royal Bisbee."

When he came back to the embassy, Henderson called me into his office and said, "Mr. Nehru has approved of you leading the party. And by the way, Bisbee, I was not aware that Nehru knew you."

"I see, sir. I hope I have been useful."

That was all that was said.

Q: What was this party, the group you went with?

BISBEE: I think it was a birthday party. You always tried to keep things on as low a key as possible, not make it something official.

Incidentally, that's in my book.

Q: Did the embassy sort of divide up into parties? Sort of pro-Indian government and – I won't say anti-Indian government. This was not easy. From what I gather, the Indians have never been an easy people to deal with. They tend to preach and we tend to preach. Two sets of preachers don't make for a very good combination.

BISBEE: You are asking a question which is extremely difficult to respond to. Perhaps I can put it this way.

There are those who sought to make themselves useful to the Indian government by perhaps acting as favorites. They hoped therefore to be useful to their own embassy. That doesn't always make for success. I think many of them fell short of that. There were other people, like Andrew Cory who was very useful. I believe he was able to play a very good part in the general dynamics of the policy within the embassy. There were others whose – who was the lady who was assigned for social welfare work in India? Somebody in Washington though this was a marvelous thing to do because of the activities of women on the Indian scene. Somebody like a social welfare person assigned to show what wonderful works we do. The name was Hersey.

MRS. BISBEE: She was a relative of John Hersey, the writer who wrote Hiroshima and A Bell for Adano.

BISBEE: She provided nothing.

MRS. BISBEE: The Labor Attaché...

BISBEE: That's another kettle of fish. You could argue that why assign a Labor Attaché to India? There is nothing you could add to the labor scene in India by a Labor Attaché from the United States. They were at right angles to each other.

Q: It may have been somewhat of a reflection of what happened in London. When the Labour Government came in in 1945, we had practically no one who knew the Labour Party people, except for the Labor Attaché. I think there was a boosting of Labor Attachés around the world because you better have somebody who knew something about this.

BISBEE: What is the point of a Labor Attaché in India who cannot speak the language of the labor people? He used to ask me how was this particular labor movement organized? How did this man arrive at this particular position? He was a perfectly fine man. I liked Sokoloff. He was welcomed by the Russians at their festivities. But what use was this?

Q: Where do you find somebody who comes out of the labor movement in the United States who would know about Indian migration? We had a quota of 100. Other countries sent people off to Argentina for instance. They spoke Spanish because they were of Spanish heritage and they were union members. I'm not excusing this...

BISBEE: I know what you are saying.

MRS. BISBEE: You don't mean to say people have to have the language.

BISBEE: No, I don't.

Q: Obviously, we don't make much headway in situation like that, but there it is.

What was your impression of the Indian bureaucracy, which was well trained?

BISBEE: The ICS, the Indian Civil Service.

Q: Were they an effective organization under the new regime.

BISBEE: They were very effective. From stem to stern, the Indian Civil Service was one of the finest organizations then and now, and has been the glue of the country that has held it together. It is going to need that glue. Otherwise, that country is going to shatter.

Q: Was there the feeling at the time that you had this country – I'm sure you called it a state – with rulers scattered about, that it would not shatter?

BISBEE: At the time, no. Most of us recognized at the time that it was the Indian Civil Service that was going to hold the country together and was holding it together. Nehru himself recognized it. He relied on the Indian Civil Service to hold the states together, and to hold the central government together. When in the face of communist problems in Kerala and other areas of the country, it was the Indian Civil Service on whom he relied to hold it together. He didn't rely on anybody else.

Q: Remembering that you were way down in the embassy, but again you were a fly on the wall. Were we concerned about Kerala, where the Communist Party was very strong?

BISBEE: The Communist Party was strong in the eastern, southwest, and central part of the country. And it is today. Don't let anybody tell you it is not.

Q: Today nobody gives a damn, but in those days, from the American point of view...

Given your language and your contacts, were you able to break loose from the embassy social set? Did you get out and around?

BISBEE: I was out all the time. I was not a member of the social set. I didn't live at the Taj Mahal. I lived separately in a portion of my parents' home in Old Delhi. I had little or not contact with the social aspects. All my social contacts, whether with the Indian Civil Service or others, came and visited me. For instance, John Law visited me after our sojourn together up in Tibet. I was a part of it, yet I wasn't.

Q: What was your impression of the Indian society you were dealing with? How were they dealing with this partition? It was the very early days.

BISBEE: They were dealing with it as best they could. I was living in an area where shots were being fired right across our living areas. Let's put it this way: they were dealing with it in a quiet subduedness. That's the best way I can tell you. There wasn't any other way for them to deal with it. The police weren't much good. They were a bunch of flunkies, as far as that went. Everybody was concerned about their own existence, and how best to survive, where to go and what to do.

Q: How long were you in this posting?

BISBEE: Do you mean the total Indian posting?

Q: No, just when you went to New Delhi in 1948?

BISBEE: I was there until the first period of 1950.

Q: So the Korean War hadn't broken out when you left?

BISBEE: No, the Korean War hadn't broken out. I was asked to join, but I was already a vice consul, and I decided I was going to remain a vice consul.

Q: When you left in 1950, where did you go?

BISBEE: In 1950, I was assigned to Washington, although Washington is not the right word for it. What I was assigned to was the University of Pennsylvania.

Q: Doing what?

BISBEE: At the University of Pennsylvania, I was assigned to language training.

Q: What language?

BISBEE: Hindi.

Q: Good heavens. How much Hindi did you need?

BISBEE: I didn't need any more. I finally had to tell Washington this was a waste of everyone's time. I'm not getting anywhere. I'm not doing you justice. I need an assignment. Isn't there something in the wings? There was. What was in the wings was the Voice of America

They asked me to start up the Voice of America broadcast to South Asia. Wonderful. I was able to recruit, monitor, and tailor the programs directly to the South Asia area in Hindi and Urdu.

Q: How long were you doing this?

BISBEE: Unfortunately, I did it only for about eight months.

Q: This was until when?

BISBEE: Until the beginning of 1952. Then I was assigned to go to India to open up the posting in Lucknow in Uttar Pradesh.

Q: What was the situation? I think of the siege of Lucknow and the Indian Mutiny. I assume we got involved in observing what was going on there.

BISBEE: You've got to understand that there is a saying in India that how Uttar Pradesh goes politically, so goes the country. Just as in the adage of the Middle East, the way that the Pushtunstan area goes, so goes Afghanistan. People better not forget it, because that is the politically controllable area.

I'm sorry. I digress, but what I'm trying to get across is that there are two areas of the world which are very important. One is where we are now, and where we went into Lucknow. It was to Lucknow that I was sent.

Uttar Pradesh was the home of Nehru. Uttar Pradesh is the capital.

We were asked to open up a post at Lucknow. I arrived there with my family in December. Chester Bowles arrived about the same time. He was very generous in that I was not versed in the politics of the time, although I had gotten to know the governor who was a Gujarati. He and I became very good friends. He encouraged me in my Gujarati language. He got a big kick out of Bowles when he first arrived.

I'll tell you this story because it is anecdotal. When Bowles arrived, I had to make arrangements for luncheons, dinners, and for the ladies to see various sights in the area. It's a very historic area. The dining table was beautifully set up. The cards on the table were beautifully engraved. Except for one thing: the name was spelled Bowels.

Q: I'm sure it wasn't the first time it happened.

BISBEE: No, I'm sure. I had to ask, "Why did you do that?"

He said, "I didn't mean to do that Roy. Why would I do that?"

I said, "I think you might have done that simply to have a good laugh."

I held meetings for Bowles. He wanted to know whether or not there had been any individuals who had gone to Everest. He was on his way to send his credentials to Nepal. I told him not to my knowledge, but the time would come, I was sure. It did, and I put it into my book.

Q: What was your impression of Bowles as ambassador? He was a major figure in the advertising world, which was a very important world in that era.

BISBEE: He was a mess. He was coming to a country where the ambassador was looked upon as someone who was well turned out and well featured. When he arrived, he was – what shall I say? – dressed down?

Q: Unkempt?

BISBEE: Unkempt is the right word. What is the matter with people? Don't they recognize what we as a country are? How we should be showing ourselves? At least keeping up with the local Joneses?

Q: The Korean War must have been quite an issue that you had to deal with in your time.

BISBEE: No, the Korean War was not the issue that I had to deal with. What I had to deal with was arms aid to Pakistan. The Chinese propaganda was vicious. I had to fix that. So did our people who came out to make speeches. They had to face some very vicious diatribes.

Q: Were there lots of demonstrations against you?

BISBEE: No, believe it or not, I did not have demonstrations against me. There were demonstrations all around me, but none directly against me.

Q: How was Chinese influence projected in your area?

BISBEE: Through their publications, all kinds of publications. If you want to pursue it further, you could say that throughout the bazaar, the kiosks and through people showing their various Chinese publications. But, there were no demonstrations, per se.

Let me change it a bit. There were such things as Hindi-Chini bhai-bhai, that is, Chinese-India brothers. There was that kind of demonstration, but there was nothing jointly of that nature demonstrated against us Americans.

As a matter of fact, I went out of my way to try to make sure that we did not in some fashion do something that would emulate or in some fashion annoy the local Communist Party. The problem with a lot of this is that many of our people will feel that it is essential to counter the demonstrations and the effects of, they think, the local Communist Party movements. There was no need for that, because most of it was hollow. I did not find it necessary to try to counter that. My counter was to present a good American face.

Q: Did you get much direction from the Voice of America?

BISBEE: No sir.

Q: Did they just let you do your thing?

BISBEE: No, the Voice of America never gave me any direction.

Q: For a while you were working with the Voice of America, weren't you?

BISBEE: For a while there, we were operating closely with the Voice of America, with the directions, as it were. But it was always implied directions. There was never any saying, "You will do so-and-so."

Or it would simply be, today the news will be that the Chinese have taken over the Tibetan government. The news would come through Bombay.

Q: Were the Soviets and the Chinese, from your observation, playing the same line in India? Or were they doing different things?

BISBEE: The Soviets were playing their own distinctive line, not a Chinese line. The Chinese were playing their own line. The Russians, in my opinion, were concerned that the Chinese would take matters into their own hands. I was being attacked by the Russians on Radio Moscow as a spy for the Americans in the Northwest Frontier. The Russians were concerned about the possibility to some degree that the Chinese would take that into their own hands on the border.

Q: The border, of course, was a prime focus in Chinese-Indian relations, wasn't it?

BISBEE: Not quite at that time, but it was becoming so. It became so in about 1954.

Q: As a practical point of view, did the United States have much interest in India.

BISBEE: The United States had a considerable interest in India, but they didn't know what they would be able to do with it. How would they be able to protect it? They wouldn't want it to go communist. At the same time, how much largesse were they able to produce?

Q: At that time and for decades, India was not much of a market because of Indian mercantile policies that didn't allow much trade.

BISBEE: What was a concern was who was going to control the trade in Southeast Asia? That was of concern. And it later proved to be the case. The Chinese have attempted, and Mao himself in several of his speeches pointed out their interest in controlling the trade of Southeast Asia, and spilling over into Africa.

Q: Was the atmosphere of the Foreign Service beginning to feel McCarthyism? Was that striking around you?

BISBEE: No, I never felt it.

Q: No people you knew?

BISBEE: No.

Q: India was sort of out of the line of sight. It was more Europe and China, I guess.

BISBEE: McCarthyism was a matter of Europe and China. This is where you began to have the problems with respect to the opening up of China, which was important to the United States at the time.

Q: We didn't really open up relations until the 1970s, but when you and your colleagues, particularly the junior officers, were talking about it, was there a feeling of gee, we should really open up to China?

BISBEE: No, not where I was, but I knew that was going on. Of course, that was where it came to pass – who was the fellow who went off to the island? What was his name? They had to decide.

Q: Do you mean Chiang Kai-shek going to Taiwan?

BISBEE: Thank you. Yes. There was a big decision that had to be made about opening up various parts of China.

Q: It was a very difficult time.

Did you leave there in 1953?

BISBEE: No, I left Lucknow in 1956.

Q: It was a fairly long tour there.

BISBEE: It was a hell of a long tour there.

Q: How did you feel about relations with the embassy?

BISBEE: I felt as though the embassy could have done more. I did not think in terms of what they were doing for me. I was thinking in terms of how we were being able to do for our own policy in the country. As far as I was concerned, I was satisfied with what was happening in Lucknow. I had no issues there. I had all the support I could possibly have. They were sending me people to give speeches and do all kinds of things. I was asked to do give talks, really great speeches. I was asked to translate for the Presidents Eisenhower and Johnson. I was extremely busy.

Q: Did Eisenhower make a visit to India while you were there?

BISBEE: Yes he did.

Q: How did that go?

BISBEE: I don't like to speak about Eisenhower in terms of India, because I was in Lahore at the time. As far as my information was concerned, he did very well. The Indians liked him, particularly the Indian intelligence services. That's what they told me. Good for him.

Q: Did you have good contacts with the intelligence service?

BISBEE: Yes I did. I had to continue to dissuade them however that I was not an intelligence officer.

Q: I understand that. We look at it today and there is a real problem in the neighbor, Pakistan, with their intelligence service. It seems to be playing a two-sided game of who they are supporting.

BISBEE: I understand.

Q: How stood the intelligence service that you could observe the intelligence service during this time? Were they political? Were they professional? Or what?

BISBEE: Excuse me, but the language you used is slightly doubled.

Q: Let's talk about the Indian intelligence service.

BISBEE: The Indian intelligence service is highly trained, and highly Western. You also have to understand it has highly religious aspects in it. Taking those things into consideration, you also have to realize that it also has in it elements of local prejudices. This is where it takes very careful analysis to work out what is essential in their needs. I find it difficult to sit here and respond to your question, because I know there are going to be six different responses, or more, to what you are asking. Yet I understand what you are saying to me. Where is the loyalty? Where is the focal point? Where is the direction that is essential that you can depend upon? This is very difficult.

Q: We are talking about the early 1950s.

BISBEE: When you go back to the 1950s, you had the opportunity, particularly with Ayoub who wanted to have a joint intelligence service.

Q: Do you mean the Prime Minister of Pakistan?

BISBEE: Yes. It fell apart as a result of both Krishna Menon and the problems with the Southeast Asian Treaty Organization (SEATO). So you had those issues.

Q: Pakistan was in SEATO and India was not.

BISBEE: That is correct.

Q: Was Kashmir a major issue while you were there?

BISBEE: Let me point this out to you. Kashmir must be treated as an internal issue of India and Pakistan. It must not be given the slightest hint of it being treated separately as a matter of concern to the international community. If that ever happens, you are going to have a totally different kettle of fish going on in that area.

If I may go back, I mentioned a country, and Kandahar is what I wanted to mention there. That area through Kandahar in Afghanistan – but that's a different issue.

Where was I? Kashmir is an issue that is a tribal issue. It is an issue that has to be treated locally. If it is given the slightest hint of being treated as an international affair, it's going to really be a bombshell in the area. I think you are aware of it as a result of the Maharajah, who was a real idiot, deciding to opt for India, when the bulk of the population of Muslim. He was an idiot.

When President Johnson came to Pakistan, he gave a big speech there. He asked me to translate. I think I did a good job, because he never swore at me. He was asked a question from the audience during the question and answer period saying, "When sir, are you going to do something about the Kashmir question? Are we going to have a solution?"

The President put his hand over the mike and said, "Son, have you got an answer for this? Sometimes there are answers from the mouths of babes."

I said, "Yes, I do. You don't say anything sir. You simply say that this is in the hands of your illustrious leaders, who are very capable of taking care of matters of this nature. They are doing a wonderful job to settle the situation."

It went off okay.

My response to a question of that nature is that is going to settle itself, but it is going to take money and political pressure from within.

Q: Where did you go after you left India?

BISBEE: I wrote to Henderson saying that I have been here long enough. I think you had ideas that I was to go on elsewhere. In the meantime, Lowell Thomas had also written to Henderson and said, "What are you doing for Royal Bisbee?"

I had not written to anybody.

Q: Loy Henderson was in charge of administration in the Department of State, a very powerful figure.

BISBEE: He was. He wrote me back a beautiful letter, as was his wont, and as I expected, saying nothing. He said yes, I must do something. Thank you very much for drawing this matter to my attention. So I found myself in Greece, in Thessaloniki.

HOWARD IMBREY

CIA Officer
Bombay (1948-1950)

CIA Officer
Kerala (1950-1951)

Upon receiving an education from the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, Howard Imbrey joined the CIA in 1948. Among Mr. Imbrey's CIA postings included India, Sri Lanka, Congo, France, and Italy. Mr. Imbrey was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in June 2001.

IMBREY: So, that was pretty good. At any rate, after training, let's see. They sent us to various courses in world affairs and in the countries of our interest. I was immediately singled out for India because of the language and the fact that I'd been there before and prepared for a post in Bombay. And we had a little trouble with the State Department as you can imagine getting our people into various posts. The two brothers Allen and John Foster Dulles.

Q: Well, this is still 1948, so Foster didn't get in until '53?

IMBREY: No, Dean Acheson was there at the time, but the State Department was jumpy as usual.

Q: Well, it was a new thing, too.

IMBREY: Yes. Then the guy whom I was replacing, Lennox Fogg, his parents were of the Fogg Museum in Boston. This chap had a drinking problem that culminated with the thought that he might be able to fly. He flew out the first floor or second story window where he was living. Didn't do him any good. He was too drunk, I guess. He survived very well. The State Department said that's enough and they said to the CIA to get that man replaced right away. So, immediately I was shipped out there to replace this guy.

Q: This was in '48?

IMBREY: Yes. '48.

Q: When did the great partition of India take place?

IMBREY: '47.

Q: '47? So, it was sort of immediately afterwards?

IMBREY: Yes.

Q: You were in Bombay from when to when?

IMBREY: '48 to '50. Just two years. The ambassador there was Timberlake. He was a leader and ambassador to the Congo and Peru and a few other places. We got along splendidly.

Q: But you were in Bombay rather than New Delhi, is that right?

IMBREY: Yes, that was in Bombay. It was a Consulate General. There were all sorts of people to meet there. First of all there was a navy. We were interested in the Indian navy's ability to cooperate with us and CIA developed sources there. A lot of funny things that were going on there, the guy that I had there was the chief of operations for the Indian navy and he was an admiral and his headquarters were in Bombay. One of the things that interested him that he tried to get me interested in was pornographic pictures, which he had by the ton.

Q: Well, you already had good training with the comic books.

IMBREY: Yes, I had wonderful training for them, but he said, "Do you think you could get me some others?" So, I didn't tell headquarters about this because I thought that was a little risky, but I had a friend who was the chief of station, Dick Clise, in New Delhi. I said, "Dick, what are we going to do?" And, he said, "Don't worry. I have sources for that sort of stuff and they produce a lot of the stuff here." What they have are these little books, some are even typed scripts of various methods of intercourse you wouldn't believe. So, I always had a supply of these things to give him and so our relationship was very good. The only funny thing about that was I went to Delhi on one occasion with my wife and four of us went out to dinner and on our way to the restaurant a guy came running pell-mell with a handful of these things and saying, "Mr. Clise, Mr. Clise, I have some more for you." His wife didn't know anything about this.

Q: You mentioned a wife. When did she appear on the scene?

IMBREY: We were married in Bombay.

Q: What was her background?

IMBREY: She was the sister of my roommate in college. I used to visit my roommate in New York when she was a little girl and eventually we got together and I proposed when drunk.

Q: Great. What was your impression of how India was settling in as a new nation?

IMBREY: There was enough time for Bombay. There were a lot of people who were being oppressed in Pakistan, the new Pakistan and particularly the Sindhi population. Sindhis are a national element from the province of Sin in Pakistan. They're generally distrusted for very good reasons. They're very sly people and they have a lot of attributes that are not particularly inviting. These people came down to Bombay in droves, set up shops, displaced merchants that had been there for years and Bombay was seething. There was a lot of trouble. A lot of fighting in the streets. A lot of loss of control, but it was a very interesting place to be of course. The key to Indian society for most Americans who, especially those who were in Bombay with parcees who are a very cultivated and interesting bunch, you have sympathies with both the Muslims and the Hindus. By now by getting with the parcees you could expand tremendously your cover of friendships and relationships. So, Bombay was in that sense a very good post to begin.

Q: How did you find your relations with the State Department people there?

IMBREY: In my case, it turned out very well. The ambassador...

Q: The ambassador or the consul general?

IMBREY: Oh, well, Timberlake, consul general, yes. Ambassador Timberlake stood in as father of the bride when I married my wife in Bombay and all the other people were extremely supportive and happy to have me along. I had no enemies and I appreciated they all had jobs to do and we worked together.

Q: How did you find some of the Indian government? Did they pay much attention to your activities?

IMBREY: No, as a matter of fact I had good relationships with the police and that was one of my chores of my job was to find out from the police what was going on. We had several communist parties at the time and that, of course, was of tremendous interest to us and to the police. So, I got a great deal of information from them that was reportable and through them I also got relations with labor unions and spent a lot of time developing relations with the labor unions who with the nature of their work were very upset and concerned about communism in their ranks.

Q: The Indian communists at that time which you had seen, were they sort of local grown or were they a disciplined group coming from or getting orders from Moscow?

IMBREY: At first it was one united party under a man named Nikay Rondevey, a very able politician who was elusive. He would have been arrested if they had ever found him. He managed to get a number of people behind him. Moscow-oriented, and certainly the Russians were supporting him to a good extent until the split of the Russians with the Chinese, at which time a Maoist group grew up particularly in the south of India. So, we were watching Membership very carefully, too. So, between the police and my military contacts and the labor contacts I could report a good deal on what was going on in the communist party.

Q: Did you cover Kerala?

IMBREY: The Kerala? Not then. Kerala had a consulate general in Madras and our guy in Madras was supposedly covering it. Unfortunately, he too was an alcoholic.

Q: You were saying the consul general of Madras was a IMBREY: No, no, the consul general who was stationed there was unfortunately an alcoholic.

Q: That was part of the problem, wasn't it? I think in some of these places where they've been doing this a long time, drinking becomes quite a way of life?

IMBREY: Oh, in the Foreign Service we all drank.

Q: It was a real, real problem.

IMBREY: Yes, it was a problem and you probably remember yourself when the houseboy came in with eighteen different kinds of liquor.

Q: Oh, yes.

IMBREY: Yes, a lot of people were under the influence.

Q: So, how did that work out for you?

IMBREY: Yes, they sent me from Bombay; they said well you handled things so well in Bombay with the first incident, why don't you go down to Madras and relieve the situation there. So, they sent the guy in Madras home and I went down to Madras with the kit and caboodle and family, down to Madras and then I did come to Kerala.

Q: Then Kerala of course for a long time was always looked upon with great suspicion from the American point of view because there was a very strong communist party there.

IMBREY: Well, only after the Maoist thing and that sort of a caste thing. The man who was in charge of that was a Nambuteripod. That is not only a family name, but a caste name and a very high up caste name so you show a lot of respect among the other castes. He was taken in by the Chinese and they were doing very well in a community in which every third guy had a Ph.D. The most amazing thing in all of Kerala is that the people are all so over-trained, over-educated and splendidly over-educated, and, of course, there are no jobs. Who needs all of these professors?

Q: So, they couldn't expand outside of the area?

IMBREY: They had that problem, too, but they were tremendously intelligent and the communist party appealed to them as a haven.

Q: Well, what were we doing? Were we trying to co-opt any of these people or just report on them?

IMBREY: No, Kerala was a specialty. You go about it in a peculiar way. For example, there's a group in Kerala of Syrian Christians. They came over with Thomas the apostle in the fourth century I think it was. They were Syrian Christians. Those guys were amenable to recruitment and reporting. Then there was another group the Maccabean Jews, the black Jews of India who have an area around called Bajetown over on the west coast and their own synagogue and their own tabernacle and God knows what and they were recruitable, too.

Q: What were we seeing there, even if the Maoists were going doing well there, it was sort of a self-sealed operation in that they really couldn't penetrate the rest of Indian society.

IMBREY: There was a tremendous evolution and what began merely as a pocket communist party in two different places spread. North of Madras is another province called Ambhra and all of them were under the influence of this man Ramadini who started a civil war. They sent the Indian army down there to deal with this and so there were security situations for the whole subcontinent that you reported on. In Madras I was the only one really reporting on that. So, we had the consul general and two other people who had consular jobs. So, I had a lot of responsibility in keeping the government informed on the status this little war that was going on in Ambhra.

Q: How did you find the Indian officials at that time? Were they concerned about what was going on?

IMBREY: Oh, tremendously yes because their jobs depended on how they treated their own people. We saw them regularly, we had good relations with a great many of them.

Q: How were you able to find out what was happening?

IMBREY: Through agents. As I said we had agents that were Syrian, Christian, Jewish and various Indian communities and we met surreptitiously, got our information, submitted it. In those days we had to type it on the thatch forms, remember those forms?

Q: Oh, yes. Were Indian officials in the central government concerned about I suppose a somewhat obvious operation of the CIA person there?

IMBREY: I don't think so, because they could have easily have put a stop to it; they could have easily identified us. In those days we certainly had a number of security options at our disposal, but nothing like we have today and the Indian government could have penetrated us immediately and probably had.

Q: So, you were both basically working the same side?

IMBREY: That's right. No objections. I don't recall being harassed by the Indians.

Q: How did the Indian army do when it was brought down?

IMBREY: It won the war. After all most of the people who were fighting that war were dirt poor, there were no weapons, nothing much could be done. It wasn't like today's arms or rebellions.

Q: Also, at the time India was just beginning to put itself together, wasn't it? You had the princely states, which were still quasi-independent or something?

IMBREY: Yes. They were going out of fashion and weren't happy about it; so you had that, too.

Q: How did you find society in Madras as compared to the society in Madrid in Europe in your perspective?

IMBREY: Madras was a peculiar place, everybody was super intellectual. Everybody's family has children who must be artists or in some way prove that they are better than the family that lives next door. Well, the result is they all have to play a musical instrument, dance or Indian dancing or classical Indian dancing. When a girl is about thirteen or fourteen she has to do a sort of coming out, a debut. So, they hire a hall, they put her on the stage with an orchestra and she has to do about four hours of classical dancing. You think it is tough on her; it's also tough on the backsides of those people who are called in to witness this. Anyhow, you went to dinner and just about as the dinner was ending somebody would say, oh, my sister is here and she plays the vina and we were treated to a concert of about three hours of vina music. They're all talented. It's not to say they didn't dance well or play well, but ...

Q: You're saying you found that the hand of Washington or even in New Delhi in your point of view your superiors rested lightly on you?

IMBREY: Very lightly, yes. We were concerned with other things. World communism was in fashion and we had other fish to fry. We were in the middle of Bombay then came along Korea. Korea came in 1950 and so the real attention was on Korea, not what was going on in Bombay.

Q: But wasn't there a concern because the Indians were beginning to play a nasty role. I mean this was when the Indians began with Krishna Menon. I mean, all of a sudden, the Indians weren't really the nice guys. They were a problem. They were a burr under the saddle.

IMBREY: They sure were. Krishna Menon and the United Nations? We really hated them. Colonialism.

Q: He was basically a British socialist snob in a way.

IMBREY: He was under the anti-colonist credentials. So, I'm sure he and Kwame Nkrumah got on very well.

Q: Did this affect your role?

IMBREY: Not really. Most Indians with whom we had contact, they enjoyed the prestige of having contacts with somebody in the consulate and even more so in Delhi in the Embassy. They looked forward to those contacts. They, as a matter of fact, they referred to their own people as Buddhist people.

Q: When you were in Madras, did you see any problem with Tamil separatism or connections with at that time called Ceylon; later it was Sri Lanka?

IMBREY: No. That hadn't come up yet. As far as their own aspirations went, all of the southern Indians have a literature that goes deeper and earlier than the Sanskrit literature of the north. You have writings in Talaygoo, Malayan. All of those have a literary history that is four thousand years old, not to mention Bengal. Bengalis think they have it all, too. So, these are people that are very concerned about the past and their own glory. We have that all the time.

IMBREY: '51 I guess.

HENRI SOKOLOVE
Labor Attaché
New Delhi (1948-1953)

Henri Sokolove was born in Philadelphia, PA, and started working for the National Recovery Administration in 1933. He then went on to the labor program in the War Production Board in 1942. He worked for the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration, taking him to multiple places in China. In 1948, he was sent to India as a Labor Attaché. He was interviewed by Morris Weisz on February 14, 1992.

MRS. SOKOLOVE: You came back to the United States and applied for a position in the State Department in the Foreign Service, and you were admitted as an FSO, first as an FSR, and then as an FSO. Then in 1948, you went to India as a Labor Attaché.

SOKOLOVE: Okay.

Q: That's the sequence that we want. So what it amounts to is that your relief activities, as valuable and interesting as they were, were not in the labor field?

SOKOLOVE: Right.

Q: And you reentered the labor field...

SOKOLOVE: In 1948.

Q: ...being assigned to New Delhi?

SOKOLOVE: Right.

Q: And in New Delhi, according to the records that we have, you spent the following years, and let me just get those...

MRS. SOKOLOVE: Five years, 1948 to 1953.

Q: All I can tell you is that our friend Harold Davey in the Labor Department has gotten out a big list of places where labor officers have served and, according to him, Henri Sokolove was assigned to India seven different years from...

SOKOLOVE: 1948 to 1953 is what I have always said.

Q: Okay, let's get that down. Well, he [Davey] may be wrong. He has you down from 1948 to Dave Burgess's arrival, which he has as 1955. Are you telling me that there were three years [in which Embassy New Delhi was] without a Labor Attaché?

SOKOLOVE: That's all right. Either that or maybe Edith Wall performed the function.

Q: Was Edith Wall there at the time you came?

SOKOLOVE: No.

MRS. SOKOLOVE: She came later. She came after 1948.

Q: Oh, boy. We are going to have a good time correcting the careful records of our friend Harold Davey, who has Edith Wall coming in 1950, which would have been after you came?

MRS. SOKOLOVE: We came in 1948 and I think she probably came in 1950. That is conceivable.

Q: She was your Assistant Labor Attaché?

SOKOLOVE: Right.

Q: After you had been there a couple of years she came in 1950 and she stayed three or four years with you.

Who was the Ambassador at the time?

SOKOLOVE: We started with Loy Henderson.

Q: Oh, my God! Really?

MRS. SOKOLOVE: Was Henderson before Bowles?

SOKOLOVE: Of course.

Q: Then Bowles came for his first tour. I was there for his second. What were the outlines of your function? Did he tell you what to do? Or did you just go out and make your own contacts?

SOKOLOVE: The latter.

MRS. SOKOLOVE: I might add always the latter. No matter what post he was in he set the program.

SOKOLOVE: That's a fact.

Q: If that's a fact, let's have it down. Don't be overly modest.

SOKOLOVE: It's not a matter of being modest, it's a matter of being accurate.

MRS. SOKOLOVE: That's right and I want to be accurate.

Q: And I want both of you to be accurate. Okay, you then sort of made your own thing. Just let me tell you why I think that is quiet relevant, because, as distinguished from when I came, there was a very different understanding, namely I came there to prepare a labor program. I got all sorts of materials as to what they wanted me to do. I had to talk to...

SOKOLOVE: Now, where was this?

Q: When I came to India. So you came there with sort of an open assignment and you started making your contacts.

SOKOLOVE: Right.

Q: Was there any limitation on who you could approach?

SOKOLOVE: None.

Q: Where you either encouraged or discouraged from seeing the left?

SOKOLOVE: Neither. Just go out and do your thing.

Q: Including making contact with the Communist trade unions?

SOKOLOVE: Yes.

Q: That's very interesting because this is another difference between your service and others, in which we were discouraged or forbidden in some cases from contacting the [Communists].

SOKOLOVE: Oh, really?

Q: In my case, I was forbidden in many cases from getting in touch with them because the Cold War was a little older. It was after 1962. So you sort of went off on your own?

SOKOLOVE: Right. Let me make it clear that the Communists wouldn't have wanted to have any contact with the American Embassy whatsoever, so whatever contacts I had were just casual, accidental [contacts]. They were not structured in any way either by me or them.

Q: Was Dange the head of the [Communist] union at that time?

SOKO LOVE: I think so.

Q: Yes, he lasted a long time. Okay, the next question on our list is how you worked within the framework of the Embassy? I take it you were sort of separate from it? Were you a member of the country team? Was there a country team?

SOKO LOVE: No, there was no country team.

Q: You reported to whom?

SOKO LOVE: I reported to Washington.

Q: To the Ambassador?

SOKO LOVE: Well, as far as the Ambassador was concerned, our relationship administratively was that I reported to him.

Q: To him directly, not through the political or the economic counselor?

SOKO LOVE: Right, but in fact as far as reporting was concerned, and underscore the word reporting, I reported to Washington. Nobody in the Embassy knew other than by reading my despatches what was going on, and, of course, Washington was just a listening area. They took what I wrote and filed it away. Nobody ever instructed me what to do or not to do.

Q: Yes, it became much more structured in other cases under different circumstances. What it amounts to is that you were an independent operator. The Ambassador may have signed your cables, but he never told you to do more on this or less on that or something.

SOKO LOVE: Right. Leave out the commas and the exclamation points.

Q: And that was the case both with Henderson, who certainly had a different approach, and later on with Bowles?

SOKO LOVE: Yes

Q: Bowles took no interest at all?

SOKO LOVE: None.

Q: That is so fascinating

SOKO LOVE: Because he came into a structured situation. I just went on doing what I had done before and currently then.

MRS. SOKOLOVE: There were a number of conflicts between you and Bowles. Let's face it!

SOKOLOVE: About what?

MRS. SOKOLOVE: I really don't know what it was, but I'm sure it was your work. I think he wanted to have his finger into it. Look, I remember it very well. There were times even though he came to you when you were on leave in Washington because he was told, "You see Sokolove. He can give you more information about India than anyone." So we started out very nicely. I thought we were great friends and then there was this coolness. Now I don't know what it was.

SOKOLOVE: First of all, I never felt friendly or cool toward him because what I did was to write despatches about things that I was doing, so he wouldn't have any reason to interfere or try to interfere.

Q: Well, let me then tell you that a guy I served with in India, who later became an ambassador to Bangladesh, Howie Schaffer, was a young officer when I was there in 1965 to 1971. He is writing a biography of Bowles and has interviewed me at length and I am specifically going to suggest that he look into that first term of Bowles in India and Bowles' relationship with the labor program, so if you have anything to say about that, fine. In your days Bowles was the Ambassador there under Truman.

In any event your description of what you did in India was far different from that of others and therefore it will be very interesting to us. You were operating sort of as an independent person, with the Ambassador signing off on your cables but with no effort to supplement or use your information and certainly not to control or even comment on what you were talking about.

SOKOLOVE: Exactly.

Q: What about your relations with the political and economic sections? Did they have any interest in the impact of the labor situation upon the economics or the politics of the country?

SOKOLOVE: None whatsoever.

Q: That's strange. What if you felt the Political Section was going off on the wrong track? Or the labor situation would have affected adversely what we were doing or inhibit it in some way or enhance it in some way?

SOKOLOVE: The labor situation was its own world. It did not impact on the general political situation or the economic conditions of India.

Q: What about a big strike that would affect their ability to ship food from one part of the country?

SOKOLOVE: None whatsoever.

Q: They had no such influence at that time?

SOKOLOVE: Right.

Q: Did the battles among the unions, the Socialists, the INTUC, the Communist unions, etc., create a problem for the economy or polity of the country?

SOKOLOVE: None, none whatever.

Q: That's fascinating.

SOKOLOVE: At least not at that stage.

Q: Yes, I understand. Do you have any comments on the personalities and policies of the different labor people in India? Their reactions to you or their friendliness or lack of friendliness?

SOKOLOVE: They were all personally friendly and were only too glad to tell me what they thought about [general] conditions in India without feeling that those conditions impacted on the labor situation.

Q: What about the relationship between the various Indian unions and the AFL and the CIO separately? Were there AFL and CIO people who came to India and what did they do?

SOKOLOVE: Both of them came and visited and came to me to find out who was who in the Indian labor movement and I helped them to make contacts without feeling any complication in the situation, either for them or for me.

Q: Who came for the AFL? Harry Goldberg?

SOKOLOVE: No.

MRS. SOKOLOVE: George Weaver?

Q: No. He was CIO. Irving Brown?

SOKOLOVE: Brown

MRS. SOKOLOVE: Definitely. I remember we used to sleep outside. I used to say "sleep outside together", because it was so hot when he was there. I remember he suffered.

Q: Did he stay long?

MRS. SOKOLOVE: Well, he didn't stay briefly. Henri and he went off several times to...

Q: Traveled together.

SOKOLOVE: Right.

Q: Was he particularly dependent or independent of what you did? He did what he wanted to do and you accompanied him.

SOKOLOVE: Right. I helped him do what he wanted to do.

Q: You, of course, knew him from the War Production Board.

SOKOLOVE: Yes.

Q: We all worked together. Who, if anyone, was the CIO person who came?

SOKOLOVE: That's what I am trying to remember.

Q: Victor Reuther?

SOKOLOVE: I don't think that Victor came.

Q: George Weaver?

MRS. SOKOLOVE: George Weaver definitely came.

SOKOLOVE: Yes, but when did he come?

MRS. SOKOLOVE: That's what I cannot recall.

Q: What was the purpose of his coming? He was representing the CIO, I suppose.

SOKOLOVE: Well, I'm not sure. That's why I'm hedging, because it may have been that he was already in Government.

MRS. SOKOLOVE: You see, I'm mixing George's visit to India with a much later [visit], because George came out to Malaya when we were there.

SOKOLOVE: Forget Malaya. Let's stick to India.

MRS. SOKOLOVE: No, no. I'm just saying...

Q: What she's saying is that he did visit you later. He came to the Government in 1960 as the Assistant Secretary of Labor [for International Affairs]. This would have been before, when he was still with the CIO.

SOKOLOVE: That would have been the situation.

Q: Similarly he went around with you or made his separate contacts?

SOKOLOVE: We wouldn't have had any trouble one way or the other.

Q: Were the visits by the AFL and the CIO useful in any way or contrary to the interests of the Embassy?

SOKOLOVE: No, none at all.

Q: Useful for contacts?

SOKOLOVE: Right.

Q: There was a particular group in the H.M.S. -- You remember the Socialist Trade Union. ...

SOKOLOVE: Hind Mazdoor Sabha.

Q: Right. That group was particularly friendly with the Royists in the... and they were close of course to the Lovestone group in the AFL, but that didn't...

SOKOLOVE: I don't think it impacted on the Indian situation.

Q: Right. Did you remember Maniben Kara?

SOKOLOVE: Oh, very well. She was a good personal friend of ours.

Q: She was a personal friend of every one of our Labor Attachés...

MRS. SOKOLOVE: Oh, gracious yes. She was a remarkable gal. She and I had a very good relationship.

Q: We did too. She used to stay at the house. She was so wonderful, and I'm sure that carried through. Any other personalities you would want to describe in any way?

SOKOLOVE: Only if you could mention a name.

Q: Karnik?

SOKOLOVE: Yes, well he would have been very close to Maniben.

Q: Right, I am now going through those people. Karnik was sort of a theoretical leader; Maniben, on the other hand, was the practical trade union leader and later on became very much more famous. Bagaram Tulpule?

SOKOLOVE: No recollection.

Q: What about the INTUC people, the INTUC, the conservative, pro-Nehru...

SOKO LOVE: They really weren't pro-Nehru. They were pro-Congress Party.

MRS. SOKO LOVE: Oh, yes. You knew many, many INTUC people and they came to our home. I'm trying to think of names.

Q: Ramanujam?

SOKO LOVE: No.

Q: Abad Ali?

SOKO LOVE: Abad Ali, I think he was in Bombay, wasn't he?

Q: Yes.

SOKO LOVE: I don't think I had much contact with him.

Q: Ambekan?

SOKO LOVE: No, it doesn't ring a bell.

Q: Did you go very often to Ahmedabad and Bombay? What about your travels? Were you free to travel whenever you wanted?

SOKO LOVE: Yes, but there was no inclination [to travel] because those people would come...

Q: ...to Delhi, how well I remember, and they preferred to. Did you travel in the south at all, Madras, et cetera?

SOKO LOVE: What did I do in...

MRS. SOKO LOVE: I know you went to Madras several times and he went to Ceylon.

Q: Oh, yes, but Ceylon was not within your area [of responsibility] ?

MRS. SOKO LOVE: No.

Q: What you have described is a sort of independent operation in which you were a free-wheeler, to put it bluntly.

SOKO LOVE: Right. Well, maybe it would be interesting from your viewpoint rather than mine to compare or contrast that with other Labor Attachés there.

Q: Oh, definitely with others, especially after I get into the next area that I want to get into and that is the AID program. We had an AID program. Was this before the activities of people like Walkinshaw? Does the name sound familiar to you?

SOKO LOVE: It's a familiar name but nothing else.

Q: He was the AID labor man. This was before the AID program?

SOKO LOVE: Yes.

Q: The AID program came later and therefore you did not influence which trade union programs should be supported and which should not be supported?

SOKO LOVE: Absolutely none.

Q: As was the case later on.

SOKO LOVE: Right.

Q: That is a difference we would want to indicate.

SOKO LOVE: Yes. It would be interesting for me to read that after you have done it, but it had no reality in my time.

Q: You were then an FSR and you became an FSO during the period that you were in India, or...?

SOKO LOVE: I can't really answer that. I don't know but if there was a transition it didn't seem to matter to me.

Q: At some point you became an FSO?

SOKO LOVE: Right.

MRS. SOKO LOVE: It was early on.

Q: Can you remember the grade you had?

SOKO LOVE: No.

Q: FSO-2 or FSO-3?

SOKO LOVE: FSO-3. I think it was three.

Q: And was that the grade you had when you left or had you been promoted?

SOKOLOVE: No, I hadn't been promoted.

Q: At the end of your service in India, did you attempt in any way to get a more general assignment? Did you want a labor assignment? What was your next assignment?

MRS. SOKOLOVE: After India we came home and went back to India?

Q: You went home on home leave?

MRS. SOKOLOVE: Yes. Back to India and from India...

SOKOLOVE: I thought I was in Washington.

MRS. SOKOLOVE: You went to Washington for a period and were assigned to... Was it Manila? Manila was the second assignment? Manila was 1955 to 1957. Malaya was 1957 to 1958.

SOKOLOVE: Yes, but neither of those had anything to do with labor.

Q: That's what I want to get into.

MRS. SOKOLOVE: Nothing after that.

Q: According to our records your only labor assignment was in India beginning in 1948.

SOKOLOVE: Right.

Q: Your next assignment then was Washington and then Manila, did you say?

MRS. SOKOLOVE: 1955 to 1957 was Manila, so I think that...

SOKOLOVE: But it was not a labor thing.

Q: That's what I want to know.

MRS. SOKOLOVE: It was a political assignment. A political officer. Yes.

Q: At the grade three. Now what we are interested in is the degree to which your labor experience, in India and before that, had any effect, plus or minus, on your service as a general political officer. For instance, was there a Labor Attaché in Manila at that time?

SOKOLOVE: I think there was. I think there was.

COREY VENNING

Staff Officer
Bombay (1949-1952)

Corey Venning was born in Spanish Fork, Utah in 1924. In 1948, she received an A.M. in International Relations from the University of Chicago. She served as a Foreign Service Officer in Bombay from 1949 to 1952, and other places as well. This is an excerpt from a self-interview.

VENNING: Air travel in 1949 was different from air travel now. First, it was slower. We left New York on a Sunday morning; we arrived in Bombay near midnight the following Wednesday. Second, such amenities as luxurious hotel accommodations at airports were unknown. But so was the "herd of cattle" effect. Seats were fairly roomy and service was excellent and plentiful.

At Shannon, where we landed late the first evening after a cold delay for engine repairs in Gander, we were shown into a fairly primitive sleeping room where we spent the night. Robin was impressed neither with the sanitary facilities -- he had not previously encountered chamber pots or washstands holding a basin and a pitcher of cold water -- nor with the tasteless oat porridge, beautifully served, that we got for breakfast.

Robin was a superb traveler. He amused himself with his books and crayons when we weren't rubber-necking at the seat window. Only once did I have to admonish him not to run up and down the aisle of the plane and disturb the other passengers. When I consider some later purgatorial trips I have made, with children screaming, steadfastly kicking the back of one's seat, spilling food and drink all over one -- and grownups apparently trying to outdo the young in barbaric behavior (a favorite trick is to slam a heavy bag over the fragile hat one has trustingly placed in the bin above one's seat), I conclude Robin was even at six years old a thorough gentleman.

We got into Bombay about seven hours late, having lost some time in getting out of Shannon, Ireland. Our trip was largely uneventful -- just one airport after another, all looking pretty much the same. We did get a glimpse at the pyramids, from quite a distance, and had a splendid time looking at Arabia from three miles up! At Dhahran, Arabia, Robin began to suffer a bit from fatigue and had a tummy ache. It was nothing serious, but at the moment of course it created quite a fuss. To complicate matters I was having trouble getting a cable through to Bombay with hour of arrival, et cetera. The Army was being coy that day, as usual. Like a typical American I started screaming for the consul. He arrived, just in time to witness Robin in his biggest upchuck, and took off assuring me he would wire immediately through the diplomatic lines. The upchuck resulted in Robin's complete recovery, and all was smooth thereafter. But when we clambered off the plane in Bombay, both in fine shape, we were met by two exceedingly worried young bachelors from the Consulate, who had apparently been informed he was on point of death or something, had a doctor all alerted, etc. It was only temporary, though, and probably due to too many snacks and sweets which I couldn't entirely prevent the rest of the passengers from showering on Robin.

We're temporarily lodged in a boarding house run by an Englishwoman. It is ... much like all boarding houses, and I shall try to get an apartment or bungalow as soon as possible.... it's wonderful to have tea and fruit brought first thing in the morning, laundry called for every day (price for all our stuff dirtied on the trip 12 annas -- about $.15), and service all over the place. There's no hot water, but we will arrange to have bath water heated, and so forth on the details we Americans tend to miss.... Last night driving in from the airport we got a good look at hundreds of white-garbed figures peacefully walking -- or even sleeping! -- in the road, utterly impervious to the dangers of moving vehicles.

This morning we both went down to the office and met everyone, talked over my work for the next few months and so forth. Robin was fascinated by the ships' loading and unloading, which can be seen from the windows of the office. He had the whole Commercial section explaining all details to him! Then we came home and rested a bit, then went to the apartment of one of the other vice consuls for lunch.... Tomorrow we are invited to Timberlakes' (the consul general and wife), where Robin will play baseball with their boys and I will deliver [the "few things" Julie's mother commissioned me to transport]. Robin is invited to the circus next week.... Incidentally [he] is going to be as much a shark on his rupees as he ever was on his dollars! He has it figured out to the pie (about 1/8 cent).... Do write soon, and as often as the airmail rate [25c] will permit....(November 19, 1949; n.b.: unless otherwise noted, all excerpts from letters are from my letters home)

In truth the boarding house was dark and dirty and rather grim. The food exemplified what can be achieved by combining raw materials of indifferent quality with the lower-middle-class English penchant for cooking everything to death, this augmented by the training by the l-m-c-E memsahibs of Goan cooks, who themselves inherit two of the poorest culinary traditions I have encountered, the southwest Indian and the Portuguese. Despite the absence of any raw food in the menus, I suspect that it was there that the dysentery amoeba got to me.

Only "European" (which included American) guests were accepted. There were several such segregated facilities in Bombay, including the second-best swimming and sports club. Notwithstanding Indian independence there were as far as I know no anti-discrimination laws affecting public places. This may have suited most Indians quite well. Who on earth would want to live and eat in that boarding house and pay its fees, which by Indian standards were very high? Besides, as I would learn, though they differed among themselves as to criteria of cleanliness and pollution, most Indians regarded "Europeans" and their habits, and Indians of lower castes or different religious persuasions, as dirty.

Robin and I had one room, sharing a bath with several other boarders. The furnishings were shabby, and we were crowded:

... in a room about twelve by eighteen feet, we have: two beds, two "Elmiras" (big old-fashioned wardrobes), two wardrobe trunks, all our luggage, one dressing table, one tea table, one small table, two straight chairs, one dressing table bench, one sofa, one big chair, one desk, one six-foot Christmas tree, gobs of books and toys, and the two of us. (December 29, 1949)

No lamps, just a light in a ceiling fixture. Robin didn't complain about the light's being on when he went to bed and I was there reading, but if I had gone out of an evening my coming in would awaken him.

One morning I discovered some of my writing paper in tiny bits and chunks floating loose in the desk drawer. I could only imagine that Robin had done this and that it reflected some serious emotional or psychological problem. What had this move done to my precious child? I consciously and unconsciously worried about this all day. That evening, after he was asleep and I was trying to read, I heard a rustle behind the desk. Shortly a huge rat showed itself, crept over to the fruit bowl, took a few nibbles from various pieces, then scurried back behind. Then I heard noises of paper being chewed up in the drawer. Now my fears of Robin's being emotionally disturbed were replaced by worse ones. He could be bitten, and get rabies.

Though the boarding house was a temporary makeshift pending our getting an apartment, I had been resigned to waiting for some time, as housing, especially housing suitable for "Europeans," was in short supply in Bombay and all new rentals must be approved by the relevant government agencies, whose leisureliness in India was and I think remains legendary. But After Rat I was resigned no more. Next morning I marched into the office of Joe Belehrad, the staff officer in charge of "housekeeping" for the consulate and its American personnel, with an impassioned plea to him to do everything he could to get us out of that boarding house. I said I knew if anyone could get us an apartment, he could, and begged him to try his best.

Joe was one of the bachelors who had met Robin and me at the airport. During the drive into town he had turned to me and said, "I understand you want to do shipping." I had answered that I had no idea of what I would be assigned to and anything would be fine with me, including shipping. To which he replied "Well, I'm the shipping officer here." So he was in charge of shipping and seamen, besides doing the consulate's "housekeeping" chores: housing, getting our stuff through customs, local procurement, managing the custodial staff, and so on. I must have convinced him that I wasn't after that job of his, because we soon were on friendly terms, and he was especially nice to Robin, to whom he became "Uncle Joe." Joe's bearer's wife had become Robin's ayah (nanny) almost upon our arrival. And well before the rat episode I had also learned that "Tim" Timberlake, our consul general, thought the world of Joe. Tim believed Joe accomplished wonders surmounting all sorts of local difficulties. So I had confidence in Joe.

Which was not misplaced. By shortly after New Year's we had an apartment, by coincidence the one immediately below Joe's own. A dingy one-bedroom affair, it wasn't ideal, but it could be cleaned up and spruced up and would do for the time being.

The Bombay consulate was then situated right next to the dock area, in an oldish three-story building with a parking lot and a large outdoor tap at which the chauffeurs would wash the cars and several score male locals would bathe each day. Though not large as such establishments went in some other countries, including its USIS facilities it employed some fifty or sixty people: six FSOs ranging from Claire ("Tim") Timberlake, the Consul General, down to me; a staff officer -- Joe Belehrad; Dorothy Sparks, our code clerk; three American women secretaries, five or six Eurasian women secretaries, five or six male Indian clerks, two or three Pathan chauffeurs, three or four hamals and sweepers as cleaning crew, and a couple of messengers. Once a week or so a diplomatic courier would arrive with bags of documents and other items sent through the diplomatic post. The USIS office had a Foreign Service Staff (FSS) officer, an American woman clerk, and a number of local employees.

Many of these people will appear later in this story. Of those who do not, I should mention Winnie Burrowes, the senior American secretary, an efficient good-looking, good-tempered person who shocked me when I renewed her passport and discovered she was thirty-five (she didn't look so terribly old, I thought...); two other American secretaries, Martha Darke and smiling chubby Betsy Bradfield, who a few months later embarked on a holiday flight to Kashmir and was killed when it crashed; her replacement, Jamie O'Neill, married Lester McNelly, a courier, who hailed from all places Boise; Bob Dreessen, a FSO formerly posted to Tihwa who when the Communists took China and began arresting American consuls had made the trek out through Tibet with several others in a jeep that became brakeless for the last part of the trip. Bombay was too urban and Western and civilized for Bob, who in short order went off to Kabul. Harry Spielman, our agricultural reporting officer, was a thirty-ish bachelor whose charming sister JoAnne acted as his hostess. Paul Geren, the commercial affairs officer, and his wife were nice people, very high-minded. Howard Imbrey (amusing, mischievous, a bit vicious in fact, not high-minded) called the Gerens "crypto-missionaries." Gerens did not serve alcoholic drinks at their parties so were not close to most of the American business community in Bombay, who were a hard-drinking lot.

...His nanny ... is sweet as can be with him, and looks no end picturesque in her white saris draped Muslim-style, her little turquoise nose ornament and her armload of gold bracelets. But servants here do let the children just walk all over them, especially the nannies, and I think Robin is too old for that sort of thing. So as soon as I get straightened around with an apartment I think I'll keep a bearer (manservant) who will take him to and from school, and look after him while I'm not around, in addition to his other duties.... I am still not completely used to the idea of having three or four people around to attend to my slightest wish round the clock!

Next week Walter Lippmann and his wife are coming through here, and I've been invited to dinner for them at the CG's house. Have already worn evening dress three times!..... last night [Robin] and I had a dinner date, so we started off in a gharry -- a real old fashioned horse-and-buggy deal. Well, the driver couldn't speak English and my Hindi wasn't up to telling him directions in a city whose street names I don't even know, and we had quite a gay time, but arrived only an hour late.... One nice thing about it, if you do get lost, there are always about three hundred people around ready and willing to try to help! People seem to live in the streets here -- many of them do -- and one never worries about fresh air because most places don't even have windows, but are in essence just a floor (always of polished stone), a high-ceilinged roof, and a few pillars with grillwork in between! There are some rather handsome apartment houses, from which I suspect our American architects got a lot of good ideas when they were building some of our modern buildings they look "modern," but are obviously older. (Thanksgiving 1949)

Weekends were full of visits to the beach, to one of the swimming clubs, and occasional sailing.

"Last Saturday afternoon our shipping officer took us out on a ship which was loading cargo.... You can imagine how thrilled [Robin] was, and how he went all over the ship with "Uncle Joe" (the shipping officer) and the Captain and a fine toothed comb! [description of more outings] You see he leads a fairly interesting life -- but he still occasionally gets lonesome for his Grammy and Granddad. (December 23, 1949).

We acquired Goan Antonio, who initially did our cooking and the housework except laundry, floors and bathrooms, but who eventually graduated to cook and, after I convinced him we didn't want to eat like English people -- "just cook everything for us; we'll tell you if we like it or not" -- became a fine one.

Incidentally, would you like to get me a few things? I need 6 grip-tooth side combs (the 25¢ ones)

12 black human-hair nets, cap size

2 bathing caps

a couple of cotton dresses; not too dressy but good-looking enough for office and out-to-lunch and all that.

a bathing suit, size 30. I like the knit wool or latex best

We don't wear stockings here. I can get lovely sandals, saris, evenings wraps, gobs of jewelry...

... at 8 below, the Mode [Boise's women's specialty shop] will probably think you're insane when you order such things, but that's what we are wearing. If you can find good-looking and not-too-expensive washable evening dresses, they would be ok too....four evening dresses isn't really enough. (Ibid.).

This was only the first of a long series of requests for supplies and accountings for their payment. It's a good thing Mama loved to shop.

(After lunch): Robin and I just had lunch aboard the "President Monroe" [a cruise ship] which docked here this morning. It was like stepping from Bombay into a first-class American hotel!

The job is going very well; in fact I have a little spare time these days and may work in some other things I've been wanting a try at. (Ibid.)

"The job" for me was the job most new FSO's got: issuing or refusing visas, keeping the waiting lists for immigration visas, renewing passports and looking after other noncommercial problems that Americans other than seamen might encounter in the consular district, witnessing marriages involving Americans and recording their births and deaths within the consular district, a few odd jobs such as keeping records of the incidence of certain diseases in the district for the U.S. Health Service. Americans in the district were also encouraged to register with the consulate, so that they could be contacted and if possible helped in case of emergency. All this of course under the supervision of the consul general. Fortunately for me I wasn't stuck in a huge consular factory where I would have been limited to routine work in a single area, but had the whole range of visa and passport matters to deal with and gain experience in.

I also had a great advantage in my two clerks. In the United States exquisitely beautiful Olivia d'Souza and exceedingly bright, pleasantly assertive Joan Fisher would, in any office not completely imbued with sexual prejudice, have long since been graduated to administrative or even executive positions, and their Eurasian origins would not have been the painful social limitation it was in India.

The passport side involved me with the fifteen hundred or so Americans, including dependents, in the consular district. They were about evenly divided between missionaries and business people -- two highly contrasting lots. The consular section renewed passports and sometimes issued new ones to children born in India to Americans, or dependents who had been included on the head of household's passport but now must travel abroad without him. Most of this side of the work was fairly routine, although it could be complicated by divorce and remarriage, birth and long early residence outside the United States, and so on.

One day an ancient lady in a traditional Catholic nun's habit appeared in my office. She said she had been born in France of American parents, had in fact been christened by the American Ambassador, but after her girlhood and education in France and England she had joined a missionary order, been sent to India, and been there ever since. Now in her eighties and failing a bit, she was instructed by the Superior of her order to lay down her missionary burden and go "home" to the mother house, now in the United States. Though America would be strange to her, the dear lady willingly hearkened to her vow of obedience, and duly came to the consulate to get a passport so she could fulfil that vow. She had never had a passport of any kind; when she traveled to India they were not required of Americans going there.

Well, it took several cables between Bombay, Washington, and Paris, and I have visions of a hapless French clerk sifting long through dusty files in some Gallic basement, but her citizenship claim was proved, and this courageous old soul, airborne for the first time in her life, was transported to pasture on the other side of the earth.

The Bombay consular district, one of four in India, included Western India south of the Indus and north of Kerala. Its then eighty-odd million inhabitants gave it third rank among the four in population. Our consulate alone had a waiting list for non-student immigration visas of over four thousand (half of them seemingly named Patel or Patil, a Hindu subcaste designation). What then must have been the total Indian waiting list? The annual American quota for all Indians of non-European origin was one hundred. Issuance of a non-student immigration visa to anyone but relatives of Indians already U.S. residents was a rare thing. Imagine my disgust when a plump Indian lady came to my office for some bit of business, and it turned out she and her four children had gotten five of these precious immigration visas the year before. But "Life is too hard in America," so back she came, to live where she and her brood would be waited on by servants and she would not be faced with the tasks of an American housewife.

Given this formidable and for practical purposes hopeless situation of dealing with regiments of visa applicants for the handful of visas available, and given the general perception that the job was really just a sort of necessary scutwork one must do before going on to greater things, my predecessors' having permitted the visa files to become an incredible mess is easily explicable. But it did impede our work, for whenever an inquiry about an applicant's status came in, and they came in constantly, someone had to delve long and deep to find the file. Joan and Olivia and I worked hard to get those files in good order for once. And once in good order we spent about a third the time on immigration visa matters that we had had to spend before. Then we got to work organizing our other jobs and files.

Immigration visas were impressive affairs. Besides the stamp in the passport the visa holder got an elaborate document tied in red ribbon tape (literally!) fixed with warm wax in which the impression of the great seal of the United States was then impressed, and bearing the signature of the issuing consul in no fewer than eight places. Handwriting and signatures have never been my strong point, and once I once managed, at about signature number seven and having some question for Joan about the seal, to sign "Corey B. Seal." Poor Joan had to spend half an hour doing the whole thing all over again. One day when Robin visited the office, he contemplated Olivia busily typing -- her desk was in my office room -- and asked, "Mummy, how come you get to be consul and Miss d'Souza does all the work?"

Indian nationals of European, or predominantly European, ancestry could immigrate under the quota assigned for the country of their forbears' origin. I remember a gentleman who spent many hours trying to convince me that whatever his appearance (he was a handsome man most of whose genes were obviously of the subcontinent, with a few from East Asia and possibly Africa and Europe as well), his ancestry was pure Dutch from Ceylon. I wish I could have been convinced. Unfortunately the elaborate genealogical evidence he presented on a beautifully inscribed document couldn't be substantiated.

Then there were those who wanted to go to America as students. They must of course have been admitted to a school, but that was no insurmountable problem. More commonly the question of their support in the United States was the stumbling block. The regulations did permit foreign students to take substantial part-time work. Thus when an applicant could not show an adequate source of dollar support in being, or an affidavit of support from an acceptable American source, discussion of this work option would ensue. When I asked one young man, a junior employee of a local Mahrathi-language newspaper and probably of a Vaisya (merchant and artisan) caste, if he was prepared to wait on tables, wash dishes, sweep floors -- these being the commonest kinds of student labor in American colleges and universities -- he drew himself up: "Madam, I am journalist!" I could not issue him a student visa on the supposition that his journalism would support him in the United States.

Yet I didn't know my own country all that well, either. I remember assuring people that in the United States everyone worked, even rich people who didn't have to. I was mostly right, but hadn't really tumbled to the reality of a tiny American leisure class, especially of unmarried women living at home but also some men, who did not feel it incumbent on themselves either to work for money or pursue a concentrated intellectual or charitable or public-interest concern.

One case led me into insubordination. This was in mid- or late 1950, toward the end of my visa-issuing career and shortly before China, to official Washington's surprise, entered the Korean War. China having "gone Communist" and India having recognized the new regime -- as the United States would not for more than two decades -- new personnel had replaced all the former Chinese diplomats and consuls there. One day Tim Timberlake called me into his office and told me in a conspiratorial tone that the new Chinese consul had contacted him. He told Tim he was not in sympathy with the Communists and wanted refugee visas for himself and his family. Tim had said he thought this might be arranged if the consul would quietly turnover his consular seals to Tim. (The seals might be useful, in the current derring-do atmosphere of world politics). What a coup! Our CIA man, who masqueraded none too successfully as a regular FSO, was in on the deal. I think I was suppose to be excited and a bit flattered to be allowed in on it, too.

This went back and forth a bit. I don't remember if Washington was brought in on it. I met the gentleman and for no reason I could put my finger on I neither liked nor trusted him. One morning some time later Tim called me in again, said the consul would come to my office, I should issue him and his family visas, and the consul would then turn the seals over to him, Tim.

"No, Tim. If you or Howard (the CIA man) want to do it that way, you issue the visas. I will issue them if the consul give gives you the seals first. Then you can call me into your office and I'll do the documents and take them back up to my office and have them made up. I am low man on the totem pole here. I am not going to issue visas complete with impressions of our seals to a Chinese Communist official and his family, have him not give you his seals but make fakes of ours from the impressions and then send the lot on to Peking. My neck isn't strong enough to put it in that noose. Yours is a lot stronger."

Tim was annoyed but perhaps saw the logic of my position, for he said he would contact the consul and tell him about the new arrangements. I do not know what happened then. I never again heard from the Chinese consul and never heard another word from Tim or Howard on the subject. The consul remained at his post.

Non-immigration visas could sometimes be interesting, too. I visited another gentle ancient lady, this one Indian, at her sickbed to get the information needed for a visa for her to go to the United States for medical treatment. Reading down the questionnaire she stopped at one point, looked up at me and quavered, "Oh, then I cannot go, because I have been a convicted prisoner. I was sentenced and jailed in a satyagraha [Gandhian non-cooperation demonstration for Indian independence]." I was able to tell her that that kind of jail sentence didn't count.

One of the two occasions in my life on which I bent the law rather hard had to do with a case involving both a citizenship decision and an off-quota immigrant visa. The law had it that illegitimate children born abroad of American fathers and foreign mothers were American citizens if, and only if, the father acknowledged the child. The war had left fewer of these cases in India than in some other parts, because fewer American servicemen were stationed there. But it had left enough. One Eurasian girl had had such a baby, whose father had gone back to the United States, married, and forgotten that little souvenir of his Indian service. In this case it happened, however, that a buddy of this soldier had been secretly in love with the girl. He returned to India, married the girl, and came into my office to apply for off-quota visas for her and the child. When he told me all this I could see it wasn't going to work. Even if he formally adopted the child, he was not the biological father and while his wife could get a visa the child could not. So after he had said his piece (fortunately we were alone in the office) I simply said to him, What I understand you have told me is that you are acknowledging this child as yours. Sign here. He was sharp enough to see my meaning and say no more, but signed. Later, when the baby was being added to his passport and his wife's elaborate immigration visa was being prepared, Joan (the Eurasian girls were inveterate gossips) remarked, "But Mrs. Sanderson, that isn't his baby!" "Oh, really? He seems to think it is." End of story.

In addition to the Christmas things with Robin, some of the more interesting "social" things I've been in on latterly ... a big Parsi wedding tonight, a reception for the Papal Legate for Australia, a trip to an old Hindu temple on Elephanta island, and a small gathering with Errol Flynn among those present. Also numerous small parties and lots of interesting people. (Ibid.)

Flynn was part of the company making the film "Kim" on location in northern India. Why he came to Bombay I don't remember; no filming was being done there nor did others of the cast appear. Why couldn't Paul Lukas, known as a gentleman, choose to visit us instead of Flynn? Flynn's reputation preceded him -- not only because of the scandals widely aired in American courts, but because he showed himself a thorough loose cannon in Delhi, insulting several prominent ladies and thereby precipitating a couple of diplomatic near-incidents. Before his arrival the MGM man in Bombay, Lee Kamern, some of the consular people -- including me because I handled American citizens' brushes with Indian law and police, and some others from the local American community held a council of war. We decided on policy: find Flynn plenty of pretty girls of a certain profession and some modicum of English and manners, otherwise don't leave him alone for a moment.

Flynn stayed with the Kamerns, who gave a small dinner party for him on the evening of his arrival. The guests, including me, sat at cocktails in the living room for at least two hours after our arrival at the appointed time and before Flynn and Margo Kamern emerged from elsewhere in the house. He was beautiful, ranking with Shannon Caples, Hilbert Higgins, Oliver Rampersad and Adrian Melissinos as the handsomest men I have ever met.

After introductions, with titles, he at once plunked himself down beside me and began the usual teasing remarks about the work of lady vice consuls ("You're good at vice, I hope." "Sorry, no. I just try to give good advice when asked.") Then he took a slightly different tack. What did I think of the brilliant red socks he sported along with his beautifully tailored and otherwise conventional dinner clothes? I hadn't noticed them, I lied, but -- very colorful, I allowed. "My word, maybe I should open my fly. You might work up some excitement about that." "Mr. Flynn, that would no doubt draw notice -- but excitement?" From then on he behaved like a lamb around me, though not, unfortunately, at all times and places during his Bombay sojourn. Nonetheless our war council could congratulate itself that no major crises arose.

You asked about life in India and the people; there is so much and so much of it can't really be explained in words. [I suggest they get a small projector and I send them slides of pictures I take] ... you can [then] get a very good idea of everything except the dirt and the smells... which we're quite used to by now. European dress is common among the men but very rare among the ladies. The sari drape we see in the States is pretty much confined to Parsis, Muslims and upper class Hindu women; the lower classes wear very ragged clothing, and they catch the back of the sari skirt between the legs and fasten it at the front at the waist, making a sort of "pants." Bare feet are universal in houses (which is really much cleaner), and very common outdoors. Men often wear a European shirt, tail out, and a "dhoti" or long piece of white cloth draped into a sort of flowing trouser-toga effect. Coolies and beggars often wear only the loin cloth. There are some extremely handsome people among all the groups; among the men I think the Sikhs are probably most impressive; they are very tall and majestic, with their elaborate turbans and beautifully coiffed beards. Children of the upper classes wear European dress, children of the lower classes wear very little if anything, occasionally a sari on a little girl, though..... There is magnificent Indian dancing here and I find Indian music intriguing although very strange -- quarter tones and all that. Robin has acquired the comfortable oriental habit of squatting on his haunches -- says it keeps the seat of his pants clean! To an American the absolute poverty of a large part of the population is appalling; one has to get accustomed to it and it isn't especially easy. (Ibid.)

I never did get really used to the poverty. But unless they hid their discomfort very well, many of the other Americans there all too easily took on the attitudes which also characterized so many Indians of the comfortable classes. This extended into modes and tones of speech. Ordinary communication with the lower classes seemed to a foreign ear at least to be conducted in a sharp and scolding tone. So also with the way servants and menials were treated generally. For example, I once made a day trip upcountry with Ashok Mehta, a socialist leader of national standing from whose lips scarcely a sentence escaped that did not deplore and condemn the poverty and misery and indignities heaped on India's masses, laying the blame mostly on the foreign imperialists but significantly also on India's own privileged. We stopped for a picnic lunch on a broiling plain where however there was one large tree just off the road. Mehta, I, our picnic and our car rested under that tree. Though there was ample room in its shade for them, our driver and the flunkies who had come along in a second vehicle, an open small truck, all sat at a respectful distance from us, under the full sun. And Mehta spoke to them as crossly (to my ears) as anyone else would have. So did Maniben Kara, a local Socialist labor leader whom I got to know rather well, speak to her servants.

Americans and Europeans tended also to exhibit general disdain for India and Indians: "If there's a wrong way to do it, that's the way they'll do it."

I have wondered to what extent this callousness is a defense mechanism. Perhaps, in face of such misery and knowing that one can't do much about it, one develops hard-heartedness as a sort of anaesthetic. Yet I found other versions of it in American attitudes in Greece, and later in Italy and Japan -- a mixture of annoyance and contempt. Is this just a natural human reaction to different ways? Perhaps so, because at bottom most Indians thought Americans coarse and immoral -- but so rich! and Greeks and Italians and Japanese have their own tit-for-tat reactions.

For my own part I am sure I made my own lower-ranking servants (the hamal, the dhobi, the sweeper), and others of similar status, uncomfortable when I insisted they stand up before me instead of crouching, turn around and walk out of the room rather than backing out.

Just got a letter from you under date of October 27, inviting me to Charlotte for the weekend! Please, incidentally, do send only airmail -- the other takes from six weeks to two months. I'd rather hear less often and get the news while it's new.... I've been laid up the last few days with an attack of dysentery, but it's gone now, and a couple of days in bed were really quite pleasant....I was silly enough to go out and eat in an unknown restaurant one night a couple of weeks ago.... You should have heard the doctor giving me heck! We use only boiled water for cooking, drinking, making milk, etc. Milk is made from Klim -- powdered -- and is really quite good. Believe it or not, I have tea first thing in the morning, and tea for breakfast -- a defection on the part of one of the champion supporters of the coffee industry... (January 7, 1950)

To this day it is tea -- good strong cheap black Indian tea, with a bit of milk -- that gets me going in the morning. The Klim was not as pleasant as my letters pretend: not instant-mix, it was lumpy and tasted much like diluted evaporated milk. We a substitute in buffalo milk from a dairy, certified beyond belief. This buffalo milk was rich and delicious, one only had to get used to its pale gray tint.

Besides heck and some pills to relieve and control the dysentery, the doctor, the charming one of two Austrians who did most of the doctoring for local Americans, looked sympathetically into my eyes and said Madam, you are not happy in this terrible country; try to bear with it and try to get out of it. Did one get dysentery because one was unhappy? This puzzled me a bit. In fact I was happy as a clam.

I went to the races with the Spanish consul last week -- my first experience with the races and lots of fun. Didn't lose much money, but was livid when an old nag which I'd put five rupees to place on, just because I thought it had such an icky name, won 20 to 1. I got thirteen rupees and could have gotten two hundred! The races are really quite something -- "tout le monde" goes out there to see and be seen... and wears its most gorgeous saris and jewels and Paris frocks and so on.... It is heavenly to have a nanny [and other servants]. You should have had some such opportunity and you both had to work so hard.... we were talking about you and imagining what you would be doing -- it would be about 7:30 PM there. Robin said he guessed Granddad would be working in the garden. That seemed reasonable enough until we suddenly remembered it is the middle of winter in Boise, and you were probably just about to put a log in the fireplace! (January 7, 1950).

The nanny and her husband, Joe Belehrad's bearer, lived with their son, Pullaj, in one of the servants' rooms in the small low building that was a part of many apartment compounds. They had apparently decided to take their chances on having only one child, and educating him, for Pullaj was studying English and other subjects not typical for children of the servant class. He was also a congenial little playmate for Robin. One day I overheard them planning some mischief. Pullaj whispered, "But won't your Mummy punish you?" Robin: "Oh, no. I can do anything I want. I'm never punished." After Pullaj left Mummy told Robin that he was mistaken, that in this case he would be punished in advance, and that the punishment would be that he was "campused" for the rest of that day and the next. He was not to go out and play, nor were his pals to come inside with him. At dusk I saw Robin leaning over the verandah disconsolately telling Pullaj below, "No, I can't come out, and you can't come in. I'm campused."

He spends lots of time flying kites nowadays. His big American ones are gone -- one was eaten up by a rat in the other place (we don't have them here, I think) and the other split in the wind, but he has purchased some small Indian kites and gets a big kick out of them. He has, besides the consulate kids, two little English boy friends and several of his schoolmates, Indians and others, who live around here.... He visits almost all the big American ships coming into Bombay -- being a special pal of our shipping officer (Ibid.)

The little English boys were the sons of Sir Richard Temple, Bart., and his wife Mari. Sir Richard, a descendant of the early nineteenth-century India scholar and statesman of that name, was a delightful chap, himself a scholar, then in his seventies. He had been born and spent most of his life in India. It was his home. He had been long widowed when he married Mari, a beautiful young woman then at most twenty-five who some implied was Eurasian. This was to have been a brilliant marriage for Mari, offering social position, all material comforts, and even the possibility of escaping "this dreadful place [India]." Alas! a head for business was not among Sir Richard's assets. Some bad investments and possibly dishonest partners suddenly rendered him nearly penniless when John, the younger boy, was newly born. Mari's description of the Dickensian scene in which the creditors' men came to collect "everything, even John's layette and bassinet" was so heartrending as to reduce poor Mama to tears when she heard it. When we knew them they lived near us in a cavernous old apartment housekept by Mari's dark gentle mother. "Granny" was beloved by all including their servants, who were reputed to supplement Temples' own pathetic market allowance from their own tiny wages. For Mari, only the social position remained. That and the hope against hope that ten-year-old Peter would inherit the title, which included an income that was now somehow out of Sir Richard's reach. Unfortunately there was another son, now well into his thirties, from Sir Richard's first marriage, who lived somewhere in the West Indies. He, not Peter, was the heir. Mari's unspoken hopes that this son would somehow disappear before he had a son were reflected in her insistence on Peter's being groomed for the title. Peter had everything in Temples' power to give him; John, Robin's age, the barest leftovers. Therefore it was no surprise that Peter was something of a pill, whereas little John was a charming child. John and Robin became best friends, and I believe corresponded for several years after we left India.

Last night I was at a farewell dinner party for one of the higher Indian officials around here. You would have gotten quite a kick out of it. Most of Asia and some of Europe was there (at least as far as the consular corps was concerned), complete to the Saudi Arabian burnoose, et cetera. One gets very used to this sort of thing... it is we who dress oddly! Well... it came up in the conversation that you had engineered the Zion Mt. Carmel highway. It turned out that several of the other guests had been down there, and they were no end impressed....

Hindi is a required subject at [Robin's] school and he practically knows the Hindi alphabet already! -- talks with the servants in the strangest pidgin English I ever heard. What he does is talk English with them with their accent, vocabulary and construction. Sometimes he forgets and talks like that to me, but I remind him I understand good English better. He has named the dog "Mandrake". The servants ... were calling him "Rodji." You should have heard Robin: "Rodji NAY! NAY Rodji. Yat [this] MANDRAKE!!!" and so forth. And to his nanny: "Nanny pi-ress [press] NAY! Is-pi-lay!" and so the ironing doesn't get done for another day, and they "pi-lay." (January 18, 1950)

Oh, yes, Mandrake. I have always been a cat woman myself, but agreed with Robin's "Uncles" that a boy should have a dog. And happily took the first cute little white purebred puppy that was offered us. I had not heard of the bull terrier breed. And I do tend to leap before I look. Well, Mandrake grew into a perfect bull terror -- sixty pounds of pure ferocity. And he elected to be my dog (why have so many dogs loved me? It's rarely mutual), sleeping at the foot of my bed, unwilling to let the bearer bring my morning tea tray in in peace, tolerating Robin but no real companion for him. But we put up with Mandrake for quite a while before finding him a home with one of the "Uncles." Then we got a sweet little pie bitch puppy, Amanda, who loved Robin and promptly died of distemper. So it was back to cats. After some vicissitudes we got a pair of Siamese, Raja and Rani, who lasted with us until we left Athens. The "Uncle" was no cat lover. One evening when he dined with us he caught them clawing at a carpet. "Corey, you'll have to get rid of those cats. Look what they're doing!" I observed that compared with Mandrake they were harmless. "But," he responded, waving his stitched-and-bandaged hand and arm, "at least Mandrake doesn't destroy things." Ah, definitions, definitions. Later --this was after Mama had arrived in late 1951 -- the "Uncle" was transferred and we again had Mandrake on our hands. At last we found him a permanent home with a woman who had a plantation upcountry and kept packs of bull terriers to keep off the wild fauna. They could easily handle cheetah and even elephant, only tiger was a problem for them.

My car has arrived and is ideal for here -- short wheelbase, good mileage and tight brakes. (to Pat, February 4, 1950).

One of the consulate drivers is going to give me lessons... I think two or three rides around town with him should be enough to acquaint me with the technique of driving around here. But there are some problems: (a) one drives on the left hand side of the road, (b) in this city of 2½ million there is not one traffic light that I know of [constables were cheaper], (c) people don't cross at intersections, but anywhere they feel like, (d) more people walk in the streets than one the sidewalks, (e) in addition to people and automobiles, there are trams, buses (both double-decker), gharries (a ""Victoria" horse-and-buggy taxicab), numerous bullock carts, and people carrying things, sharing the roads, which are always winding and usually narrow.... Everyone assumed I would solve the whole problem by hiring a driver, but I already maintain three people besides Robin and me and can't take on another one, even at the equivalent of twenty dollars a month. (January 18, 1950).

Now it should be noted that my previous driving experience had been limited to a few trips covering the half mile between our house and town in Coeur d'Alene, with Mama along as instructor, and one disaster in Boise, also with Mama instructing, during which I drove over the curb turning into Harrison Blvd. and then, a couple of miles down Hill Road, gave up when we rounded a sharp bend and almost collided with a largish house being moved on rollers. Mamma did the backing-up and turning round then, and that was the end of my early American driving career. I of course had no driver's license.

So here I was in Bombay, with a left-hand drive car in a country where theoretically traffic kept of the left side of the road. After the "two or three rides around town" with my Pathan instructor I took the test for driver's license. On the appointed day and hour for the test I, the Pathan, and one of our Madras clerks got in my car and discovered that its "tight brakes" had become nonexistent.

Narasimhan: "Do not concern yourself Madam. I shall make another appointment for your test."

Corey: "No, I haven't time to do all this twice, and I need to be able to drive now. I'll take the test today as planned."

Narasimhan: "But Madam! how are you taking driving test in car with no brakes?"

Corey: "Not in my car. I'll take it in Abdul's jeep."

Narasimhan (aghast): "But Madam!! jeep is large station wagon with right-hand drive! You are not previously learning right-hand driving!"

Corey: "Well, I'll try it anyway. But you don't have to come along, Narasimhan. Abdul and I can take care of it." (Abdul loftily silent; Pathans are said to enjoy danger and adventure).

Narasimhan, stiff-upper-lip, ready-to-die-in-line-of-duty: "No, Madam, I am accompanying you. Be not concerned with me."

So off we went in Abdul's jeep, Narasimhan cowering in a back seat. Aside from my having to use opposite hands and feet for everything, in this large wagon I seemed to be sitting about a mile above the road. Also I learned that Abdul, ever adventurous, had adjusted the gas gauge so that even without foot on gas pedal the thing moved at at least twenty miles per hour. We made it to the station, amid the typical melee described above, mostly on brake. There we were joined by a spruce police officer who sat besides me while Abdul joined a by now almost pale Narasimhan in the back. Somehow we careened around the city for a half hour or so and I even managed to park the thing back at the station without revealing my utter lack of talent (which continues) for parking. An only slightly wilted police officer jumped out, turned to me, and delivered the verdict:

"Madam, you have passed the driver's test. But Madam, you need more self-confidence!"

In the fulness of Indian bureaucratic time the license arrived, a beautiful accordion-like document which served me well at least once later, back in the States. But the great bargain of a car Bill Decker had negotiated for me was a continuous pain in the neck. A year or so later I sold it -- at a considerable profit, though I had paid at least double what it was worth in the States -- and got a new Chevrolet through the Foreign Service procurement system.

[Our] things are in process of being unpacked.... Every time Antonio's eye lights on a dish or table cloth or piece of silverware he breathes a sigh of relief. We've been getting along with next to nothing in that line. The first night he fixed dinner for us, he came in and said, "Tablecloth, Memsahib?" to which I replied, "I haven't one." The expression that called forth leads me to think that a memsahib without a tablecloth -- and other accoutrements -- is in the same category as a burly queen without a G-string, but he has stood it manfully up to now. He is really very good -- and what a cook! (to Pat, February 4, 1950).

Robin needed, and benefitted from, special coaching at his school, a small one run by Portuguese Jesuits. Here is an example of the reading dictation he brought home early on:

Potter's Gift -- I

Mrs. Martha Trumbles had been to Ashford to do her shopping. She held a string bag 2 quite full of good things Pitter-patter! Went The rain and (sic)....

Not exactly first-grade stuff in the States.

I am in process of making my official calls.... So far I've seen the Governor, Chief Minister, Passport Officer, dean of the Consular Corps, Chief Secretary, Customs Collector and Mayor, and have only the Chief Justice to go. (Ibid.)

A note on calls and calling cards. Today a card is typically a business card, with not only name, but business address, telephone and fax numbers, and very likely a logo. These were not unknown in the late 1940s, but were exchanged only by businessmen on business and were considered vulgar in other contexts. Social calls and cards were much more important. These cards bore only one's name. A box of engraved cards and little envelopes for them was as much a part of the rites of high school graduation as the yearbook and the class ring (are they still?). When new neighbors moved in, or when people for whom one's friends had sent letters of introduction moved to town, they were called upon, or the newcomers might call first, if they knew the introduction had preceded them. That opened social relations. Calls were then returned. Gentlemen as well as ladies called on one another, and a gentleman who had been entertained at dinner left a card the next day, sometimes accompanied by flowers, for his hostess.

Social calling rules were simple. Gentlemen left cards for the man of the house, for his wife, and for any other adult members of the family who lived at home. Since women never called on men, ladies left cards only for the ladies of the house.

Mama kept a small silver tray on the entrance hall table, on which reposed the cards that callers had left. I, too, did so in my dwellings until I moved to Chase Street in Chicago in 1978. There the entryway was too small for a table -- and no one had left a card for a good ten years.

Official Foreign Service protocol ordained that officers' cards would carry their names only, engraved in Old English script. It differed from the social rules in that the lower-ranking newcomer always made the first calls and the calls need not be returned. A FSO newly arrived at a post would call on a fixed list of important local officials at their offices. These calls had both business and social import. He also called on the wives and other ladies of the houses of officers in his own embassy or consulate who were higher in rank than he. He might also need to call on the ranking officer and his own opposite numbers in other embassies or consulates with which the American establishment had warm official relations and a good deal of business.

What was I to do, given these rules about calling? I must make these calls, which in the case of calls on officials were at once business and social. All these official calls were male. A woman never called on a man.

Back in Foreign Service training, Romaine Alling had been no help at all. As far as she was concerned, there just wasn't any way to get from here to there. So I contrived my own solution. I had two sets of cards made up. One read "Corey Sanderson"; that was for official calls (i.e. calls on men). The other carried the strict social title for a divorced lady: "Mrs. Brown Sanderson." At offices I left only the former; at houses I left only the latter, and only for the ladies. It seemed to work.

Mama and Daddy must have worried about our health:

.... please don't worry about me or my health. I am really feeling fine and have had no compunctions about taking off when I haven't.... The dysentery is about licked by now....It's not so much a question of dirty food -- although that is what brings it on -- but ... it is some times before certain things, probably the spices, agree with you. Robin of course hasn't had a sign of it, as he does eat at home all the time, or if not, at the house of this or that set of friends, and never at public places. He is a picture of health and bloom -- brown as a berry -- swims at least once a day and sometimes oftener.... (February 6, 1950)

Following the common Western perception I had given Antonio orders that Robin's food should be seasoned only with small doses of salt and those spices common in the American diet. Yet when I lunched at home with him, as I did when I had no engagement elsewhere, I noticed he lacked appetite. But wasn't sick and wasn't getting thin. After a time I asked Antonio about it, and learned that Robin wanted to eat with him, and eat the same food he ate. Since what chotta sahib (little master) wanted was what chotta sahib got, he and Antonio would scarf down a Goan meal an hour or so before the lunch hour with me. Spices! Goan food may not be very good, but it is hot! I later discovered that Robin was also buying himself treats from the street vendors. So much for all the protection I assured Mama and Daddy about. Out of all this I came to the conclusion that whereas adult Americans had had resistance to intestinal germs and tolerance for spices sanitized out of them, children might have retained more of Mother Nature's own weapons. I also came to believe highly seasoned food is good for the digestion generally.

I didn't buy much for myself or Robin beyond current needs in clothing, furniture and so on. I did have a teak bunk-bed, desk and chest made for him, and a satinwood headboard and side tables to blend with the bird's eye maple bedroom furniture I hoped someday to inherit.

And the carpets. After I had been in India about a year I became interested in these beauties. The typical manner of buying them was to interview a series of little men who came round with a stack of them, leaving those one might like for closer inspection. For months I had a pile of folded-over carpets in a corner and two or three on the floor. I slowly chose the two Bokharas I still have, several others which have been distributed around the family, and after several months' argument with myself and hard bargaining with the rug man, committed the terrible extravagance of paying $400 for the glorious silk Kashan that has hung somewhere in every place I've lived in since. When Richard Temple, who knew these things better than anyone else I knew, saw it he was thrilled. He congratulated me on my patience, on waiting until I had found just the right thing. A couple of weeks after I bought it the merchant came round and tried to buy it back. He was persistent, kept bringing other silk carpets, brighter, larger carpets. He wanted the worst way to make a trade, to get mine back, but I hung on to it.

The Timberlakes became my closest American friends. Tim, a thoroughly competent officer, feisty and yet usually tactful when that was called for. Julie sweet and bright, the perfect diplomatic wife. And fun people.

Last night I had Julie Timberlake, the CG's wife, over for dinner. Tim is in Washington temporarily and I thought of a very informal little hen party à deux. As usual I left the food planning up to Antonio, who is something of a wizard in the kitchen. We came up with soup, fish, meat, salad, vegetables, rolls, dessert and coffee, with appropriate wines and side dishes! This being my first venture in entertaining at home, I was naturally somewhat surprised! The other day I had three of the fellows from the office for lunch, rather on the spur of the moment. When we arrived all was fine and we had a drink and sat down to (sic) table. Then appeared two of my guests' bearers, solemnly serving while mine concentrated in the kitchen! I was quite unaware until then, of course, that they had fixed it all up among themselves. When I think of you giving lunches and dinners for twenty with no help! and doing so nicely, I wonder why it's necessary to have about one helper per guest around here. (February 6, 1950)

On Tim's return I got another surprise. Harry Spielman, our agricultural officer, had been transferred shortly after I arrived. While I was still in training his expected replacement, who had joined some of the training class sessions, introduced himself and we happily pored together over the Bombay post report. After poor Betsy Bradfield's death Martha Darke, with whom she had shared a largish house, was moving in with an American business family. I had just moved into my apartment and was not yet unhappy with it when I was asked if I wanted that house. It seemed too big for me and Robin, and knowing that the arriving agricultural officer had a wife and three or four children, I suggested it be held for them. jener Kraft, Die stets das Böse will und stets das Gute schafft. Mephistopheles started from the other end, but I achieved a similar effect -- except that I wanted good for others and got the bad for myself. Not an uncommon phenomenon, of course.

On Tim's return from Washington he called me into his office for the briefing customary for all officers when one was back from home base. In the course of it I asked when we could expect the new agricultural officer -- hadn't he been scheduled to arrive about now?

Tim shot me a glance, then , "How well did you know him?" I told him I had met him in the class, had several coffee breaks and checked out the post report with him. He seemed a nice fellow. When would he and his family arrive?

"He isn't coming. I don't suppose you've seen this. It made me wonder why you had been so solicitous about housing for them." And handed me a clipping of a column of Mary Haworth's, a sort of Washington-Post Ann Landers of the time. I don't remember the exact wording but it went something like this:

Dear Mary Haworth:

My husband is being sent by his agency to a south Asian post soon, and our children and I are to go with him. A few weeks ago I found an unfinished letter in his typewriter. It was to the man whom he will replace at that post, who is a bachelor. It said that an extremely attractive young woman Foreign Service Officer would be coming out there shortly, so the post would be brightened up a bit. My husband told me he and she had talked about the post together. I am not sure it went beyond that, but Mary, I am terribly worried and upset. What shall I do?

Mary Haworth sensibly suggested that there was nothing on which to base the lady's worries. But why did she publish it? No names were mentioned -- but there was only one young woman American foreign service officer in all south Asia.

I was dumbfounded. I said to Tim, quite truthfully, that I had not laid eyes on the man other than in the class and at coffee breaks.

Well, said Tim, I told the Department I wouldn't have him here. If you two are having an affair it would be bad for morale all round; if you aren't I don't want an imbecile female like that on my hands.

So that agricultural officer never came to Bombay. He probably never had any other foreign assignment, either, because Tim mentioned that when a principal officer flatly turned down someone outside the regular service they usually weren't considered for other such feathers in their caps. Too bad for him. One of Harry Spielman's successors, Giles Hubert, was black, as was one of the USIS officers who came on board. The Foreign Service was ahead of its time in making places for minorities and women.

Meanwhile that perfectly good house went to another consular family.

In February I was sent to Delhi for a week's work and orientation, and took some leave so as to see some of the great sights of India:

... I negotiated a car and driver yesterday and am seeing Agra in style! The Taj Mahal by moonlight is beautiful beyond description -- no one can tell me now that the Orientals don't love their wives!... also King Akbar's tomb and other things [notably Fatepur Sikhri outside Delhi; it is one of the great palace complexes of the world]. Agra is full of history and art. Not the least interesting to me was the 120-mile drive down from Delhi. It was my first view of the Indian countryside. Passed through Mathura, the center of one of the strictest Hindu sects. Saw a lot, and believe me, was seen! I felt like I was as much an object of curiosity as the things and people I saw were to me.... we're in the throes of a severe cold wave -- down to 45_ and we're all freezing. Thank heaven Agra and Delhi are full of fireplaces and I have some warm things. It's been 55_ in Bombay. (February 13, 1950).

The Indian countryside. Between Delhi and Agra it is flat, and in February looked like a desert. How could all the people I saw along and in the road -- people in bullock carts, women under huge burdens of wood or pots, the very occasional truckload -- how could they sustain themselves?

It was a dusty ride, inducing great thirst. I hadn't yet learned to bring bottled boiled water along on trips. At Mathura I asked the driver to stop at one of the thatch roadside teahouses and get us something to drink. It would be hot sweet tea in which the milk and water had been boiled together -- not very tasty, but anyway wet. He did so, and apparently asked if there was some private place where the memsahib could be comfortable. The proprietor must have misunderstood and the place one with other functions besides dispensing tea, for he led us into a little lean-to furnished only with a charpoy (wood bed frame with rope or heavy tape woven to support the body). I merely shook my head in the back-and-forth motion indicating "No," but the driver was incensed! Insulted, I think.

Back in Delhi I met the ambassador and most of the other embassy officers. I was given piles of reports and other materials to go through, and learned a good deal. Two of them stick in my mind: first, that (carefully classifying his report "Secret") a senior embassy official took supercilious and I thought really colonialist exception to an Indian counterpart's using his sixteen-year-old daughter as official hostess -- "she is educated [and therefore spoke English] but is much too young for such a function; the man has a wife." Did he think to guess that perhaps the wife lived in purdah and spoke no English?

Second, I visited the biographical-files section, where two young officers were supposed to keep tabs on Indians of interest to the United States. I had a list of people in our consular district whom we in Bombay wanted to know more about. Now I should say the embassy was in the throes of massive expansion, from a five- or six-officer outfit to one treble that size. After all, there had been an American embassy in India for only five or six years. There were more American personnel than desks for them to work at. This by the way was no doubt only the first of many such expansions. God knows how many Americans are at the Delhi embassy now.

My counterparts took my list, searched their files, and came up with almost nothing less than two years old. Quite a bit before then, though. "Geez," said one, scratching his head, "They only had one guy then, and he only did this biographical job part time. How did he get so much done?" I didn't say what crossed my mind then and many too many times thereafter in the Foreign Service, namely, that he had put his finger on the problem. Too many people falling all over each other very soon reach the point of diminishing return of useful work. Six dolts can't do a better job than one competent person. And so on.

Off office time I was well entertained by a number of officers and their families. Least well, I think, by Mrs. Henderson, whom I remember only as distinctly condescending when we lunched at the embassy residence, after she had let me wait half an hour beyond the time she had set. While waiting I counted nineteen pairs of things in the faux-Federal decor of the residence reception room. Dreary elegance.

On the whole, though, the embassy people were most pleasant, and hospitable to me. I especially remember Howard Donovan, the feisty Counselor of Embassy, who was not universally popular among Foreign Service personnel in India but who seemed to me a very sensible sort. And dear Captain Cortner, the Naval attaché. A widower, he had his little daughter with him in Delhi. He told me how he spent many evenings sewing dresses for her! Delhi not being the ideal geographical spot for watching the physical part of the Indian navy, he also said he would ask his Indian naval contacts in Bombay to get in touch with me, and he coached me in what the various vessels looked like and asked me to keep an eye on what showed up in Bombay harbor. I was flattered with this, given the several World War II veterans on the Bombay staff.

Of later trips to Delhi I remember only that one took place in the Delhi summer. It could reach 120_F. in the shade then. In the absence of air conditioning, how were the embassy offices kept bearable? Well, on visiting it I at first thought a major renovation must be under way. The whole place was draped in wide strips of heavy cloth, flowing over windows and walls. Every few feet there was a rickety ladder running from the ground to the roof, and a small army of little men in nothing but loin cloths and turbans, who made a sort of continuous ant-chain going up and down them. Then I saw that atop each turban was a metal bucket filled with water. The men would climb to the roof, splash the water over it and the draperies, climb back down again, fill their buckets, climb back up again ... all day in that heat, to keep the embassy rooms cool. A version of the ice box Mama fixed up in that hovel in Coeur d'Alene.

I finally fired the nanny, who in addition to tipping my bottle occasionally, did a lousy job of laundry and took to departing in the evenings when I needed her. In her place I've hired another boy. He is quite good, and with two boys I can entertain more easily. Antonio is a good cook but hardly efficient by our standards -- he works practically all day fixing meals just for us! chops vegetables into atom-size pieces for soup, etc. Now I'm getting more service and a better kept house for the same money. One has to get the hang of housekeeping in this new manner. The boys also do better with Robin, I think. (March 10, 1950).

Both my boys are good Catholics from Goa and they [and Robin] go over Catechism and stuff when I'm not there to help. I really have a jewel in Rafael, the bearer. He is wonderful with Robin and I can feel absolutely sure that all will be well when Robin is with him. The other afternoon, having nothing else to do, and with no suggestions from me, they took off for a trip to the museum. (April 6, 1950)

The kitchen sometimes looks like a barnyard, because all the stuff comes in alive. Occasionally I hear loud yelps and cacklings, which means Dog and Chicken have discerned each other's presence. Robin is usually in on it all, including the kill, and takes great interest. The other morning ... he came rushing into the bedroom saying, "Mommy, mommy, come in and see what we've got in the kitchen!" I went out and found four huge lobsters thrashing round in the sink. In about half an hour he reported that "Now Antonio has them in the pot and Mommy they've turned red!" He still enjoys beating eggs and such, which no doubt puzzles the cook, but they all get along beautifully. (April 4, 1950)

End of a somewhat harrowing day... Honestly, sometimes I feel like a cross between Mr. Anthony and Simon Legree, and there have been at least thirty people in my office since nine this morning, each with his own problem, which of course is the BIG one to him. It's something of a challenge being successful in this job and still not becoming one of the most detested members of the community -- as you can understand a visa officer undertakes a job whose public relations are prima facie bad. We just can't do for people what they want in lots of cases. But I guess it's good training in diplomacy. (Ibid.)

Five o'clock, and I have to wait while a lawyer and his client thrash out in three languages whether a draft of a deposition is what they said or not, so I'll take a few moments for a letter. (March 30, 1950)

[Robin] came home [from a beach picnic] with a collection of fancy shells and vivid descriptions of how difficult it was to disengage the original residents from them. I didn't go as, what with two ships full of Americans in and a few other complications, I couldn't risk being thirty miles away if needed. Believe me, things can happen that the most imaginative liar couldn't think up.... Spent Friday afternoon rushing around the docks and local police offices in a boiling sun, trying to straighten out a woman who gaily boarded an Italian ship at Australia without a single visa in her passport, making a great tour and all that. [She] arriving in Bombay and not being let off, the whole thing fell in our lap. Her ire at the local government people wasn't soothed when I asked her what she thought a foreigner's chances would be of taking a sightseeing tour through New York under similar circumstances. (Please don't repeat this to anyone -- it's not secret stuff, of course, but it's just best not to publicize office affairs. I thought it would amuse you). (March 19, 1950)

We've had more visiting firemen than you could shake a stick at... as between that, the FS Inspector's scheduled visit late this month, and what seems like every American ship in the Eastern hemisphere going through, we've had one week of it! Last Sunday I was duty officer and spent the day shinnying up and down gangplanks of freighters, clearing them, etc. Arrived two hours late for a luncheon party for which I'd dressed in a white suit before coming to work, covered with coal dust from one end to the other. It's a good thing I enjoy this sort of thing... (May 6, 1950).

As duty officer I could shinny up and down gangplanks, but the switchboard defeated me. I never did learn to get a call in or out on it. And it wasn't that suit, but another dress, that got its full skirt caught in a greasy ventilator and was ruined. It took several exchanges of letters with the IRS, who took "Corey" to be male, before they gave up and allowed my deduction claim for it.

The "corker" was a young man who showed up at the consulate one day, completely broke. I do not remember how he got there, but he demanded that the consulate look after him. All we could do was see that he got minimal sustenance until a ship came in on its way to the States. Then he could be signed on as an unpaid seaman and return to his country. This didn't suit him at all. I told him to think it over for a day or so, and come back and we could discuss the few options. He did come back, but insisted on seeing the Consul General. Tim called me in on the interview. When Tim asked him how he proposed to support himself in India, he replied that he guessed he'd just have to go on relief. This was too much for me. Relief indeed! I asked him who, or what agency, he thought was offering relief to the maimed beggar children who wandered the streets, to the thousands whose only homes were the sidewalks of Bombay. Whether he finally agreed to ship back or whether he simply disappeared I do not remember. I do remember Tim dressing me down a bit for being "too positive, not feminine enough." Maybe he was right.

.... the new (U.S.) Security Act -- all visas canceled, people getting hysterical and doing silly things like canceling their passages and so forth and then coming to see us, telegrams, phone calls and heaven knows what from Paris and London and all other places en route where hapless people suddenly discover their visas are no good.... I've given out press interviews here saying in effect don't get excited but it has little effect.... the Ambassador is down for a few days, made a big speech yesterday, and we're all in for a grueling round of teas, receptions, luncheons, dinners and so forth... I don't see how he stands it! (October 25, 1950).

With notable exceptions -- especially among the medical missionaries, the Catholic priests, and at the American Marathi Mission, and among a few of the business people as well -- one could not feel that the local Americans represented the best of this country. By and large the missionaries were a self-righteous lot, holding both the pagan Indians and the sinful non-missionary Americans in shocked low esteem. By and large the business people and their families all too soon got used to their privileges and saw only the hardships of their lot and the shortcomings and stupidities of India. Few of the common ways of spending leisure time in America were available there. As a result these people, by no means an extraordinary lot, amused themselves with drink and gossip and various expressions of general dissatisfaction, ill health and so on. That explains the doctor's connection of my bacillary dysentery with unhappiness in "this terrible place." Another doctor called it "Memsahib's disease -- the ailment of women who have nothing to do."

You are so right about the impressions Americans give out here. Of course I can't say it officially, but the way Americans act makes me positively ashamed of them.... Here in India [they] are of course terribly rich by local standards, and live very comfortably by any standards. Women who have washed their husbands' sox regularly take about six weeks to start howling at and about their six or eight or ten dumb, lazy servants, etc. In general, the men of the American community associate with Indians in business, but the women won't stoop so low as to attend mixed parties or anything like that. Consulate people have to stand up against a barrage of criticism for doing so, of course, and you can imagine that the attack is concentrated on the gals. Furthermore, everyone drinks like fish. There is a greater desire for long cool ones in this climate but it is still not necessary to carry it as far as many people do. Lastly, about ninety percent of them forget their blessings, forget that they are living in a style to which they will never again be accustomed, think India is the last post on the way to savagery, want to go home on the next boat You can imagine the reaction these attitudes produce in a society which is proud, puritanical, prohibitionist, and anything but tolerant itself.

The other night I went to a dinner party where I was the only foreigner present.... well- educated upper-middle-class Indians, who had had no previous contact with Americans. Apparently their ideas were entirely formed by the movies and by hearsay.... they had gone to great lengths to lay in a formidable supply of liquor. I could see they were very surprised by my appearance -- no dyed blonde hair or too much makeup, no loud voice, no over-revealing clothes, etc. Then when drink was urgently suggested [this was during the treatment for amoebic, and I wasn't supposed to take alcohol at all, but saw I must]... I at last settled for a beer [which] came in a tall ice-filled glass, so you can imagine I was more than satisfied with one, but got it all down. Later I learned they had even set aside a special room for me to drink in if I wished.... that is the sort of shock one gets when one realizes exactly what they think of us, and logically so, from movies, newspaper headlines, and the Americans they observe at a distance. Don't publicize any of this, of course -- we'd probably have another Senate investigation or something! (6/7/50)

...the other day I took five little ones to the zoo. One of these kids has apparently picked up some of the nastier traits of his parents, and continually makes disparaging remarks about Indians, etc. A poor old woman was selling peanuts, and as is the custom had them spread out in neat little piles on the sidewalk. This big lummoX just made a running bound through the whole thing, on purpose, and of course destroyed most of her working capital. It was quite a fracas since she spoke a language I didn't speak and naturally was furious. I tried to apologize and paid her and it got smoothed over, but I was kind of furious myself. My only consolation was that I know Robin wouldn't do such a mean trick. I tried to explain that such jokes are all right played against people who can afford it, but not when they are as poor as most people around here are. The kid is just like a lot of his American elders, I'm sorry to say. (April 4, 1950)

And that kid's kids may have been among those American brats I saw trying hard to accomplish pandemonium in a railway station in Japan in 1985. I rather hope Michael Fay will serve as salutary proof that worms may turn.

Mama and Daddy were surprised that such people were allowed out into the wide world to disgrace us:

Re the quality of our Americans abroad -- Washington screens the State Department and other government people very carefully of course, but can't be so particular about others. If someone is obviously going to injure the prestige of the United States abroad, he will not be issued a passport. But this is pretty extreme and can't be done except in a very few cases. The things which cause adverse comment aren't the things which can be pointed out as basis for refusal of passports -- it's just that we're too rich, drink too much, are too noisy and brassy, etc. Sometimes I doubt if we'd be liked even if we were on the average delightful cultured people because the powerful must use their power, and are never liked. We have inherited Britain's role, I'm afraid. (July 20, 1950)

Something of the same sort -- Americans hanging together and belittling the locals and their ways -- could be seen in almost any foreign place. In India they also tended to ape their run-of-the-mill British predecessors in this respect, and this no doubt from the same root causes as with the British: ignorance, fear and lack of self confidence in an unfamiliar milieu. Some of them had no idea on which coast of India they had landed when they got to Bombay. Fear not primarily of physical violence, but fear of strangeness in general. And India offered plenty of strangeness to Westerners. This fear was not entirely unjustified. What of the poor woman who opened up her baby's bathinette one morning and found a nest of newborn cobras inside? And Westerners, especially Americans, in India tended to suffer from all sorts of unfamiliar ailments arising out of the relative lack of sanitation as we understand it (Indians', or at least Hindus', definitions of what constituted pollution were vastly different from ours). I myself got a bad dose of amoebic dysentery and several of the "three hundred undiagnosed diseases of the alimentary tract" (if they were undiagnosed, how did the doctors know there were three hundred of them?, I wondered). All this did bring on a sometimes neurotic fear of germs and infection. I recall the woman who among other precautions several times a day wiped all the doorknobs in her apartment with Lysol solution.

Apartment kitchens were sometimes furnished with western-style sinks, but usually there was only a floor drain in one corner with a cold-water tap above it. Here the cook would squat and peel vegetables and so on. Then he would prepare them either at a table or on a board elsewhere on the floor. Cooks went barefoot inside the house, as did most Indians. A typical American family whom I met on their arrival in Bombay asked me to ask my servants to find some servants for them. When she instructed the new cook, the memsahib was careful to insist that he peel vegetables and do other food preparation on the table she had had put in the kitchen, and not at the corner drain, and first he must each time wash the table with Lysol solution. About two days later, when I was having a peaceful lunch at home for a change, my cook and the other one both came in the dining room, weeping. The memsahib had become very upset and had fired her cook. What had he done wrong? He had followed her directions to the letter. He had washed the table she provided with Lysol solution, and done all the food and vegetable preparation on that table. Hardly had they returned to my kitchen after I told them that I would look into the whole thing right away than the memsahib burst in, hysterical. "This ghastly place -- I told him he had to wash the table and to fix all our food on it -- when I came in the kitchen, there he was, working away squatting barefoot on top of the table!!!" I think that family didn't last long in India.

Through John Hlavacek ("Check"), the UP correspondent for India, I met the Natarajans, charming dear people, old friends of Check's. They and I immediately took a great liking to one another. "Nat" was editor of one of the best English-language dailies in the country. Sophie had an Oxford or Cambridge degree. They were among the few with whom Check would talk about books and such. We spent many a happy evening à quatre. He was Hindu, she Muslim. They had no children. This kind of marriage there was very much like a black-white union in the United States. It usually meant broken ties with both families, as I think it had with the Natarajans. In late 1951 I was successful in getting their names on a list of "leaders" who traveled to the United States at USIA expense, and to arrange that they would visit not only New York and Washington, where Nat would see the U.S. press in action, but also Chicago and the West, and be squired around here and there by my relatives and old friends. They never forgot that trip. On the day of our departure from India, when we were in our cabin and the ship about to unmoor, a messenger arrived with something in a paper sack "for Sundaresan memsahib." It was the Shiva figure that has graced every living room of mine since, a treasure they had brought back from a trip to South India and that I had admired. We lost touch many years ago, during my dead funk of the late 1950s. To my lasting regret. They being perhaps twenty years older than I, they are probably no longer with us. But I still love them both.

It was early on, only a few weeks after we had moved into the apartment and shortly after the Mary Haworth episode -- and after I had given up our chance for the house that had previously been available, that I found us in what I thought of as Real Trouble. Our apartment left much to be desired, but it was, I had thought, an improvement over the boarding house. And Robin was having a good time, especially since "Uncle Joe" was so nice to him, inviting him to come up to his place for treats, and so on. I don't remember who, or if it was more than one person, who suggested to me that I ought to watch out for my boy in Joe Belehrad's company. Now Joe was a big handsome iron-jawed fellow, dark, with a Cary Grant dimple in his chin. He looked the picture of masculinity, and nothing in his speech or gestures suggested otherwise to me. I at first dismissed the warnings as simply malicious. But then I began to notice all sorts of strange men whom Joe seemed to entertain singly and in batches. Also, Antonio and Rafael seemed reserved about him. They said nothing -- but then they were servants, and well knew their place. When on at least two occasions I was awakened in the middle of the night by loud goings-on above, male shouts of "Joe don't come near me, I never want to have anything to do with you again," and so on, desperation replaced dismissal.

I knew such a thing as homosexuality existed, but like most of my contemporaries I knew nothing else about it except that it was "abnormal" and "evil" and would invariably involve pedophilia. Thus, and especially given the hints that had been dropped, I took it for granted that Joe's interest in Robin was something very bad for Robin. Rob says Joe never made a pass at him, and from today's vantage point I see that I rushed to conclusions unjustly. But at the time I thought I must protect my child from something unspeakable.

Despite the crimp it put in his style, and without saying why, I decreed that Robin should under no circumstances leave our apartment without Antonio or Rafael along, unless the parents of one of his little friends had invited him to their place. Not even with "Uncle Check" or the other "uncles"; I couldn't afford to pinpoint Belehrad as the cause of my prohibitions. Still, this was a poor and at best temporary solution. I HAD TO GET US OUT OF THAT APARTMENT.

But how? There were now no vacancies among the houses and apartments allocated to the Consulate by the housing authorities; I would have to find one "off allocation." But how to do this? Housing for Europeans (and for Indians as well) was terribly scarce in Bombay. My fairly broad acquaintance among Bombay officialdom did not include the housing authorities. That in fact was part of Belehrad's job. I didn't know whom to go to, or whom to bribe.

And I could confide in no one. Not only because such a thing was extremely serious at that moment, when Washington was already in an uproar about "queers in the State Department." How could I support any such allegation? By asking people to stay in my tiny hot one-bedroom apartment with us until the next night a wild party took place upstairs? Hardly. Furthermore, Belehrad was Tim Timberlake's White-haired Boy. For the first (by no means the last) time I witnessed a situation in which a boss had "fallen in love with" one of his young men -- not in the sexual sense, but in the sense of believing this one was special beyond all others, of brooking no criticism of him, seeing only his shining virtues. This affliction is not at all the same thing as being a mentor. It involves no assessment of the other beyond some sort of belief in his excellence and devotion to his advancement in every possible area. Why these "boys" invariably turn out to be sour apples I have never figured out, but it was not hard to figure out some of Belehrad's attraction in this case. He could be charming, and he saw to it that Tim's slightest wish, or the slightest wish of Julie or Tim's kids, was fulfilled A.S.A.P. and sometimes sooner. He was a lot less regarding of the rest of us, and of his duties as shipping officer -- but Tim seemed blissfully unaware of that, and was sharply disbelieving when anyone tried to tell him or was moved to complain about some negligence of Behrad's. For me to let it be known why I was so eager to move would be dangerous.

Then hope appeared. There was an applicant for a refugee visa, an unpleasant middle-aged Central European anti-Semite who regularly visited the consulate and made my life difficult for a few minutes each time. Information in our files indicated that not only did he not fulfil the legal requirements for refugee status, but that some of his business dealings in India were highly questionable. On being queried by the Department about his status I had forwarded the relevant information to them, only to receive a nasty letter from a Congressmen some of whose constituents wanted this man allowed in as a refugee and had signed affidavits of support for him, followed by a telegram from the Department in effect saying "Give him the visa, you dolt."

This fellow had a shabby apartment in Colaba, a mixed Indian-European neighborhood at Bombay's southernmost tip. It was a decent though not fashionable part of town. There were indeed families living in carton-and-burlap shelters they had made on the sidewalk, there was indeed an ever-more emaciated cow tethered at the corner beneath the apartment, whose morning bellows could tear the heart. But so there were such people and cows -- thousands of both -- all over Bombay. The apartment was not far from Robin's school and our friends the Imbreys and the Temples.

When my "refugee" next came to the office, I implicitly let him know that one visa would be available for him if one apartment became available for me. Agreed. Immediately I went to our executive officer and begged him to get the authorities to allocate that apartment to me. I gave as my reasons the smallness and poor ventilation of our present apartment. It wasn't quite decent, I said, for a six-year-old boy to have to share a bedroom with his mother. Furthermore, I said, Robin was highly sensitive to heat and might well fall ill during the oncoming hot season; the other place was old, had high ceilings and broad verandahs. And when the monsoon did come all of the things we had no place for except on our tiny verandah would be water-logged and ruined.

One fine day three weeks later I watched that old villain of a "refugee" clamber triumphantly aboard a ship bound for New York, where presumably he lived out his days in his usual manner.

I finally have got definite possession of the new flat and am in the throes of negotiating all the necessary details. I somehow persuaded the landlord to paint [i.e. calcimine] the place -- a marvelous thing in this housing-shortage town....(April 4, 1950).

At this point I am more uncertain than ever of just where we'll be laying our heads in the next couple of weeks. After no end of delay, etc., the old boy in the flat I want left and it's been vacant since the 3d. But the housing authorities are insisting that he hasn't gone yet. Since I saw him leave, I can't quite agree with them. Meanwhile I've looked at ... a 2-bedroom flat in a brand new apt. house in the nicest section of town, right by the seaside, near Robin's friends, etc. [that one fell through for me](May 8, 1950).

The biggest news of the last week is that at last I got damn sick and tired of the housing situation... I had been nice and patient up to now, but what with the monsoon coming and I having done all the spade work myself, I did feel that when negotiations arrived at the point where I had to hand them over to our exec and administrative officers, a little action could be called for. So I kept getting negative reports that they and the housing authorities were "keeping it in mind" and so forth, and last week got very sick of it. So I made a practice of visiting our exec's office twice a day -- he's a bachelor and just a trifle intimidated, I think -- and really pouring it on. Result: one house, now being painted, and should be ready for our occupancy by June 1. I'm afraid I'm just not a bureaucrat! (May 15, 1950).

You were optimistic about my moving on the 15th. I practically had to blackmail the local authorities into releasing the flat to me, but after only 2 weeks' delay got it on Friday. On Saturday the painters started in. I have been getting up at 6, going over there from 7:30 to 9 to supervise the day's work, shopping during lunch hours (when I haven't an engagement that is) and from 5 to 5:30. Today the electricians arrived to move the refrigerator from one of the bedrooms, where the former tenant had it, into the kitchen. Also to replace all the sockets, fuses, plugs and other easily removed objects connected with the electric supply, which he apparently removed and sold, along with everything else except a wood-burning cookstove circa 1850 which is sitting in the middle of the kitchen. After painters and electricians get through, I will go through a couple of days with hamals and sweepers, with emphasis on the importance of elbow grease and ammonia in cleaning some of the eleven years' accumulation of filth off all non-painted surfaces like the bathroom for instance. Then arrives my pretty new furniture, and lastly and I hope in an orderly fashion ourselves and belongings. (May 25, 1950).

We ... are finally moved in...The dining chairs haven't arrived, they forgot to send a bed for me (mine hasn't arrived from the Sts.)... they forgot a chest of drawers for Robin and ... they made a love seat instead of a [sofa, which] I sent back.... We have no refrigeration, since the frig went off and is awaiting repairs -- also a matter of a couple of days but I miss ice in this 96 degree heat. They told me it would be like this sometimes! and now I believe it, although how everything happens is beyond me... we'll be very nicely settled by Saturday, I think, and are already more comfortable than heretofore in Bombay. (June 7, 1950)

Thus within six months of our arrival in Bombay we had moved twice and I had gone through the first of my many, many experiences of for practical purposes rebuilding an apartment into which I moved.

It may have been just as well that we were delayed in getting into the new apartment:

I've spent a fairly interesting ten days. Last Sunday morning we went to Mass and a baseball game. Then, as Robin was still weekending with his friend Billy, I went up to Hlavacek's for lunch and a big post-game party. Feeling fine. Right after lunch I got a small "gas pain," so took some bicarbonate and lay down. The pain didn't get any better so after a couple of hours I took some bitters in water and lay down. It began to get much worse, and by 6:30 I was only able to lie on the bed in one position and couldn't even turnover. I was very ashamed of myself because the rest of the party was going strong. At 7:30 "Check" said he was going to call a doctor, and while I thought I would feel foolish to learn I just had eaten too many baked beans, I said it would be all right. Well, to make a long story short, the doctor took a blood count and did some examining and sent me straight to the hospital, where I've been since, until noon today. It seems that fool who dosed me with pills for dysentery before hadn't bothered with any real diagnosis, and what I had was not a simple case of bacillary dysentery, but amoebic which by last Sunday had developed into a nice big tumor on the scar tissue where my appendix used to be! As soon as I had my first shot of emetine the pain went away -- it was the worst pain I've ever had, not excepting labor -- and I have felt fine since. But I had to stay in hospital for eight days and got a shot every day, besides a lot of other pills, some of which I still have to take. My blood count is down to normal which means that the amoebas inside the tumor have been killed and the tumor is dissolving. I had a lovely private room and lots of company and loads of flowers, and got some reading done.... Thank goodness, this is an "illness in line of duty" so Uncle Sam will pay for it. I am going back to work again Wednesday. "Check" said he was glad I had the painful kind because if I hadn't I would still be running around thinking I was all cured. But I really am now. I am so glad it happened to me instead of Robin.... [who] has spent the week with "Check" and his four bachelor roommates. There's a swimming pool in their compound and some of his best boy friends live there, so you can imagine he's had a wonderful time and I'll have a hard time getting him back here!....[he] is going to join his school group of Cub Scouts -- and is he thrilled about it! He says he gets to start practicing how to tie knots pretty soon, so I imagine we'll be living in a welter of fancy twists for a while....(Monday, April 24, 1950)

Had a bad scare the other day -- our pup got too frisky and bit Robin. I was sitting in the office and got a call to come home, "Robin's eye has been badly hurt." I tore home wondering if he had any eye left and was of course relieved to find that the eye itself was ok. He had a beautiful shiner, though. Besides that all dogs in India are rabid until proven otherwise, and even though Mandrake has had rabies shots recently, poor R. had to have four -- in the stomach -- one each morning at 8:30, which was a beautiful start to days which also included the usual work only more so, the Inspector, me throwing up after every meal (Aureomycin treatment for dysentery -- this is the last gasp of what I think is a successful cure), moving, and so forth. This all sounds kind of harrowing, so I'm pleased to report that R. is fine, I am feeling better all the time, the Inspector was very nice, and life is really quite satisfactory -- just full! (June 7, 1950)

I remember those fearful rabies shots that poor little Robin had to undergo far better than I do the side effects of the Aureomycin. Brave soldier as he was, he couldn't contain a howl towards the end of each long deep painful injection. I am told this procedure has been made vastly less painful now. I hope so.

And I was cured, and I was lucky, much luckier than poor Margaret Amory.

Jim Amory was my predecessor in the consular section, a sweet quiet young man with a sweet quiet pallid blonde wife Margaret. They had no children. They had been in Bombay about a year when I got there. Margaret had contracted amoebic and couldn't seem to shake it. I gather she had never been a very energetic or positive person, and she almost seemed to cling to this debilitating ailment of hers, almost not to wish it gone. Her conversation was strictly limited to minute descriptions of the various unpleasant treatments she was undergoing, and the prospect of going back to the States. This latter was imminent in Spring 1950, as the Department had decided to bring Jim and Margaret back home and, it was hoped, to make a cure for Margaret more likely.

Very shortly before they left Jim came into my office one day for a confidential chat. You can guess the rest. Jim was sweet and quiet, but he was young and a man. He had fallen in love with Isabel, the thirty-ish British wife of a local British businessman. Isabel was everything Margaret wasn't -- dark, lively, witty, good conversation, great fun, bursting with health and sex. Jim said he was going to take Margaret home and stick with her until she was better and able to get along without him. Then he would come back and he and Isabel would marry -- presumably Isabel would divorce her husband. Or so Jim thought.

So the Amorys left. Isabel was as gay as ever. She took up with a succession of young men. She had only been toying with Jim. Her husband didn't seem to mind any of this. Maybe he had his own little games on the side.

I spent an evening with the Amorys when I got back to Washington. They of course were still married. Jim was still sweet and even quieter than theretofore. Margaret had been cured of the amoebic, but now she suffered from several other ailments. She, too, was if anything more wan than ever. I don't know what happened to them after that.

We were burglarized Saturday night (or Sunday morning) about 4 AM, and fortunately the guy got only my wallet and about 50 rupees, instead of everything in the house. I am feeling especially stupid because I got Mandy especially for a watchdog. Well, he barked and growled something awful, raced around and generally raised Ned, but I was so sleepy I just told him to shut up and went back to sleep! Maybe I should have invited the burglar to tea, too!.... The whole thing has sad repercussions, though, because usually the memsahib accuses the servants when something like this happens, so they are all quarreling with each other and accusing each other no matter how much I tell them to shut up and get on with their work. I am sure it wasn't any of them because (a) there have been lots of professional burglaries in the neighborhood lately, (b) they wouldn't come in at that hour and the dog wouldn't have barked at them, (c) I have had as much as 1000 rupees in my purse -- but won't again! -- recently... and if one of them wanted to steal he'd take that not 50, at the risk of a good job, (d) they know where the silver and my jewelry is and wouldn't be satisfied with Rs.50, and they all have clean records with the police. (June 21, 1950)

Burgling that place was easy, since anyone who could shinny a short floor up a wooden column could land on the verandah and from there through any door or window -- all open to catch any possible breeze. A couple of weeks thereafter a burglar struck again in the middle of the night. This time, not being so doped up with medicine, I was ready for him. When I heard him slither over the verandah rail I quietly got out of bed, picked up the heavy brass cylindrical cigarette box on my bedside table, and when he came in the door I threw it at him. I missed (was blind without my glasses and in the dark) but it made a big crash, causing rapid slithering back down the column and raising servants and neighbors.

After two burglaries I came to be on pleasant terms with the director of police for the Colaba district, a British holdover from the Raj. He would come by for a drink after work, and would take Robin and me for spins in the country, said it did his car good to get it up to speed. And he gave me a Beretta .944 from the police office collection, or perhaps it was one he had taken off a dead German in the North African campaign. He said I should have some real protection. If I would register it as required with the authorities, but say I had had it in the States and that it had arrived packed with my other things, his own risk in passing it to me would be eliminated. Two or three times thereafter he took me to some vacant beach or field and coached me in how to load it, cock it, shoot it, and so on.

I never got very good or very confident with any gun. At bottom I felt quite safe in India, safer, certainly, than I would have felt in many areas of Chicago. But it was a sweet gesture and I was grateful. I did indeed register it with the authorities, fabricating some passages in letters home about "Martin's" gun so as to cover tracks not only with the local authorities but also the consulate should some question arise. And one fine Sunday morning I took Robin, the servants, and the gun down to nearby Colaba beach, which fortunately was otherwise empty at that moment. I did a bit of target practice for them, then I said, "I am going to hide this gun in our house, and I am going to shoot the next burglar who tries to rob us. If any of you should come across the gun, don't touch it; it might kill you."

Next morning I smuggled the gun to the office in my purse, wrapped it up, labeled the package "C. Sanderson, personal," put it in the back of the bottom drawer of my safe and left it there for the rest of our stay in Bombay. We never had another burglary. Word had gotten round that this memsahib was not to be fooled with.

The wind was up otherwise, too. A neighbor of mine, another Central European but this one a genuine refugee and a nice old fellow with whom I regularly exchanged pleasantries when we met on the street, invited himself to my place for tea one day. After the suitable formalities he lowered his voice and imparted his message to me: "Madam, please be careful. This house is being watched. I see them watching constantly -- you should ask your people to investigate." He was quite right, the place was being watched. From shortly after the second burglary until we moved out of that neighborhood, a little constable stood on the corner across our street, day and night. My policeman was not taking any chances, gun or no gun. Good.

In the middle of another night I was awakened when something bit me. When I turned on the light I found a couple of little round black bugs scurrying for cover. But I was faster than they. I caught one, sealed it in an envelope, and next time I visited Dr. Choksi to collect the weekly report on the incidence of a number of diseases in the district -- this and its forwarding to Washington being one of my routine duties -- I showed him the bug. What was it? I knew only that it bit, and stung.

Dr. Choksi was Chief Public Health Officer for Bombay. He was a tiny burned-out Parsi who had held that frustrating job for three decades, inheriting it from his late father who had suffered with it before him. Dr. Choksi insisted on my being re-immunized for some of the numerous diseases the international rules required immunization for for visitors to India and which Robin and I had undergone before leaving the States. He said that American vaccines weren't strong enough for the Indian germs. So I allowed myself to be pumped full of stuff, to no ill effect. He also took me around on visits to the municipal hospital, a depressing gray place full of patients accompanied by family members who along with doing much of their nursing, prepared the patients' meals at the bedsides. The maternity ward was a special shock to me -- the average birth weight was five pounds. Indians are not genetically tiny people. Then one day when I made my call on him, I found Dr. Choksi almost in tears: "Mrs. Sanderson, I do not know what to do. As you know we have had an effective anti-malaria program in Bombay and its suburbs for three years, and during the last year malaria has been substantially eradicated. Now the City Council refuses funds to continue the program. They say malaria has been conquered and the program is therefore no longer needed. Of course next year we shall be right where we started from." Poor Dr. Choksi.

On the bug occasion Dr. Choksi took one look and identified it as a bedbug. A bedbug! I was horrified. I had heard of bedbugs but they were utterly out of my field of vision for myself or anyone I would ever know; they were something suffered by terribly poor and dirty people and by soldiers in filthy war situations. Dr. Choksi said they were common enough in Bombay. They could have come in with the laundry from the dhobi, or from any number of other sources. He would send the extermination squad to my house at my earliest convenience.

The extermination squad duly arrived. After a brief inspection its head man gave his verdict: "Madam, it will do no good to exterminate your flat alone. We must exterminate the whole compound, and we must repeat the extermination regularly." Needless to say I agreed enthusiastically to this prescription, and the place was nicely freed of some hundreds of thousands of small fauna. Followed by a night's blessed sleep in peace.

But I had forgotten something. Our immediate neighbors, who lived in the other flat in the compound building, were Jains. Jains really believe in the sanctity of life. They kill nothing, not even the mosquito which threatens them with malaria.

Sure enough, when I got back from the office next day there was a delegation waiting for me. I had done something terrible: all this killing would be on their karma, they would have to go through endless incarnations as bugs and insects and rats, be punished interminably.

I felt awful. I do not like to fly in the face of other people's beliefs, however strange these may seem to me, and I certainly try to avoid forcing my own beliefs on others. On the other hand.... on the other hand, the prospect of living in an ocean of tiny creatures doing their best to sting Robin and me and perhaps make us sick, was also too much. I had just moved in, I couldn't face another move and if I could, where would I find a place to move to?

Thank heaven most problems do have solutions. I told my neighbors I was extremely sorry for having thoughtlessly caused them such concern, for though I did not share their beliefs about the sanctity of all kinds of life, I indeed respected it, and them. But need they really worry? They had not called in the extermination squad, nor would they do so in future. This insect holocaust would be on my karma, not on theirs, would it not? Would it not be possible to continue the regular exterminations, but entirely on my responsibility? After each visit of the squad their representatives might register a protest with me, to ensure their innocence.

There ensued a sort of football-huddle in Gujarati. Then an English-speaker turned to me: Agreed. No doubt even Jains don't enjoy being bitten by bedbugs. So, for the rest of our tenancy in that apartment, the extermination squad made regular visits, after each of which a lady of the Jain house made a pro forma protest to me, and all went well.

Since then, when this tale has come into the conversation, I do ask that if, after my death, some poor cockroach or spider or fly approaches my interlocutor with a beseeching expression on its face, please just put it out of its misery as quickly as possible. That will be one down on the millions of bad incarnations I must go through.

Amid all this both Robin and I were having a fine time:

Tuesday night the American Women's Club gave their annual charity ball I was in the show... all togged out as an opera singer howling my head off with something from "La Traviata" while clowns played on stage, people played ball, blew whistles, etc. the act went over big!(March 30, 1950)

There was a slight downside to all this:

Among life's little problems in Bombay, there's such a shortage of unattached European women that I get a terrific rush. Which is loads of fun, natch. On the other hand, it creates problems as follows: (1) how to keep social contacts which are really business but which take a social form, from developing into "date" situations, (2) how to placate -- or at least avoid -- unfavorable criticism of the consulate by the local [American] ladies who have nothing to do but gossip and be envious of people with entr   to circles closed to them, (3) how to placate a nice American boy friend who gets unreasoning ... fits of jealousy.(July 20, 1950)

But the downside was slight indeed:

I had a "lazy" day ... women's club this morning, then a lunch with some of the gals, took the afternoon off and slept most of it. Last night I had the first of four big cocktail parties, 30 people, and a surprising success if I do say it myself.(June 28, 1950)

I began that June 28 description of a lazy day, however, with "As you can imagine, things have been somewhat exciting around here lately," because

I suppose everyone over there is all excited about the Korea thing. Right at the moment, of course, we don't know where it will lead, but I for one think it's a damn good thing we aren't taking this one lying down. It would be much harder to keep the peace and defend ourselves after Russia had gobbled up the entire rest of the world than now. There's still a good chance they'll back down, too, as they did in Greece and Iran, if we clamp down right now. Frankly, I don't think it will be war [between the U.S. and Russia].(Ibid.)

I was at pains to try to convince Mama and Daddy that we were if anything in less danger from Russian bombs in Bombay than they were in Boise. And they weren't the only ones who worried that, especially now that India had recognized Communist China, India would "go communist." There was a noisy and in some areas influential Communist Party of India, and a number of splinters from it, notably in Telengana, where however it seemed to me the "Communist" part was mainly a matter of the local communists taking advantage of a richly justified peasants' revolt. I never thought India would "go communist," or be forced under the monolithic Soviet wing. I had a sneaking private thought that Stalin might well welcome India as the tale has it that he welcomed Bolivia. I was beginning to see that, especially for a country with India's problems, winning its independence was child's play compared to governing it afterward. India was, however, more fortunate than most in that the leaders of its independence movement were also reasonably capable of governing. The two talents rarely come together in the same person or group.

And I can't say my general analysis of certain larger political questions has changed much over the decades, though the specifics and situations changed vastly over time:

I'm not so upset about the Korea business as you seem to be. It sounds a bit strange to hear that MacArthur didn't get what he wanted [use of nuclear weapons] because he belonged to the wrong party. Remember he was put in charge in Japan by order of the President -- if the President hadn't wanted him there he wouldn't be there. I am remembering all the clamor to get the boys home ... all the howl against compulsory military training.... Remember I worked in the State Department on the Korea desk, and I'm not the least bit surprised about this thing. The only way it could have been prevented was by our stationing permanently large forces in the Far East. Then, unless we also stationed permanently large forces all over the place, the Communists would simply have struck somewhere else.... It doesn't help much to scream around about free people, spend a lot of money on corrupt governments, and sit back and expect the best to happen. On the other hand, if we are going to maintain the force it takes to keep the world peaceful, and we are the only ones who can do it, we can expect to be as unpopular as Britain used to be, because the policeman is never loved. I for one am not too concerned with popularity. If you want my frank (and confidential) opinion ... we can't prevent [countries' "going Communist"] by trying to bolster governments which are riddled with corruption, or by talking freedom to people who have never been free, don't know what freedom is, are accustomed to violence, disease, famine, injustice, and death.... The hard and unpleasant fact remains that when people are desperate, and ignorant, the man with the most desperate and violent program... which will promise the drawing of the blood of the exploiting classes, has a big edge over the man who has a saner, but slower-moving program. Our main support in the Far East comes from the "haves" among the local population, who are precisely the people most hated -- and sometimes justifiably so -- by the vast majority of the "have nots." (August 27, 1950)

Meanwhile, because they had been favorably impressed with him, I knew it would please the parents that

Yesterday when I came to the office there was a wire from Karachi saying "Have arranged three day stay Bombay beginning tenth. Please wire if convenient, love, Bill Decker".(August 8, 1950)

Yes, Bill looked as good as ever, and was the same old Bill. He told me he hadn't written because he was so discouraged ... Not only was his departure postponed for about nine months for no compelling reason -- and he was the eagerest beaver in the class -- but it seems he fell in love with a beautiful and somewhat overprotected daughter of a Woodward and Lothrop official in Washington, who first consented to marry him and then at the last minute changed her mind, saying either he give up these notions about going abroad and take a good job in Papa's store or no marriage. Bill was somewhat low about the whole thing, but is taking it quite philosophically, for him! I reminded him of his classic remark to a sad young man in the class to whom the same thing happened last Fall -- "Well, Ed, if she won't go to Jeddah she won't go to bedda." (August 31, 1950)

A few months later I learned, from Arthur and from several others, that my old friend Arthur Hummel had also fallen in love, but with more luck in his case, for his lady and he were duly and married, and he seemed more than happy when I saw him later in Washington.

My excellent clerks and I had reorganized the visa and passport work to the point where we had quite a bit of extra time. At the same time, Joe Belehrad played the loyal overworked administrator to the hilt. Possibly at the Foreign Service inspector's suggestion and almost certainly at Frances Dailor's,

I have another job -- not instead of, but in addition to.... I am to take charge of shipping and seamen's affairs from now on. Now all the other jr. officers have been coming in to congratulate me with left-handed compliments about how they hope I won't have too much difficulty with no woman's job, but I just sweetly reply that I guess I'll have to bear with it -- I remember a number of masculine condolences on Why I Wouldn't Get in the Foreign Service, too. This puts me in charge of all the strictly consular functions of the office, which isn't so bad for a neophyte. I think I'll be getting an assistant in August, but till then it will be largely a matter of organization of the work. (June 7, 1950)

I didn't get an assistant during the six months before I was transferred to economic work. What I did get, after a couple months' smooth sailing, was a visiting "efficiency expert" from the Department, who recommended that because the combined job was prima facie too much responsibility for such a junior as I, the Department send a mid-level officer to head up the section, with me as his assistant. When I found this out I went to Tim and blew up. It must have worked, for no such boss appeared, though the section was later again divided among two officers, with a third assigned to Belehrad's former administrative housekeeping.

Shipping and seamen was fun, at least in retrospect. Whenever an American vessel (or a Panamanian or Philippines one; the US consulate took care of their affairs in Bombay as a courtesy) the captain would bring his papers to the office for certification and other formalities, and there were some duties connected with both American and Indian customs. The most interesting part, however, was dealing with seamen and their assorted problems and complaints.

There was the Sunday morning, about 3 a.m., when a constable showed up at my door. An American sailor had been arrested and insisted on seeing the consul. I told the constable I would get in touch with the district chief of police in the morning, and to make the sailor as comfortable as a Bombay jail permitted. My pal the district chief had this story to tell: the guy had been enjoying himself in a local cathouse when he got into a fight and somehow fell or was thrust out of a third-floor window onto the composition roof of a car below. That didn't hurt him but it did the car roof. When apprehended, our hero was dashing stark naked up the street, chased by several score of angry neighborhood inhabitants. The administrative judge in charge of the case, a fairly puritanical type, wanted to sentence him to two years, thus making an example so that his fellow-countrymen would behave themselves better in his port.

Two days in a Bombay jail was a fine lesson, and would serve as a horrible example of the results such carryings-on could be expected to have. Two years would very likely kill any American, not to mention the hullabaloo (Michael Fay wasn't the first such "victim"). So on Monday I got together with the judge, said I fully agreed that what the man had done was heinous both to property and to propriety, pointed out to him that his keep in jail for two years would cost the municipality something, and suggested that he be required to pay a substantial fine and compensate the car's owner, and be released on my recognizance and his ship captain's undertaking that he would not be permitted ashore in any other Indian port. Agreed, after some considerable palaver. So he was released into the captain's custody.

He did however have the right to see the consul. On the following morning I heard a scurrying as of people getting out of the way in the outer office: "I'm gonna get that consul and make the biggest grease spot in hell out of him. Leaving me in that place for two days!" My door was shoved open. "I wanna see the consul!"

"Yes?"

"I said I wanna see the consul, God dammit!"

"I am the consul."

Oh. What would such a fellow do when confronted with a lady, and one who must be aware of his recent history? Today he might well just make that grease spot. But those were gentler times. He muttered and mumbled around, finally said he wanted to tell me he was sorry for my trouble over him.

"Thank you, but that is just my job. But I'm afraid if anyone else gets in the same trouble here, I won't be able to head off a two-year sentence."

I had no more trouble of that particular kind. Some of the Panamanian vessels were magnificent, those of the Isbrandtsen line, for example. Sparkling, in excellent condition, beautifully run by well paid and courteous officers and crews. It was on those ships that Robin and I regularly feasted, and whence our Thanksgiving turkeys came, and that I decided would be an ideal berth in which for us to go home when leave time came.

But some of the others were filthy unspeakable old tubs, questionably seaworthy and manned by the dregs of the Eurasian shoreline. One day I heard another disturbance in the outer office. I went out, to find my two women clerks as well as the several men huddled in a corner, and thirteen fierce looking characters, some brandishing knives, shouting and imprecating in what seemed like several languages, none even faintly comprehensible to any of us, except that I caught a few words that sounded vaguely like my old Freshman Italian. It was Portuguese. Their speaker managed to convey to me that they were the crew of a Greek ship under Panamanian registry, come to complain of the inhuman conditions under which they had to work and the terrible food and other accommodations provided them, and demand redress and more pay. For starters they wanted "flavoring either spiritual or soft," in addition to the water they had for drinking during work in the engine room, where the heat, they said, made the body demand more than just liquid. No, none of them understood English.

This was a bit more than I could handle with no help. I sent the girls into my own office and asked the angry sailors to wait while I called the Portuguese consul, who was a bachelor and a friend of mine. He suggested I send them over to his office. I arranged with him that they should come in the afternoon, after I had had a chance to check on the ship's condition and amenities and on the relevant regulations. I went back out, pointed to the clock: "Three o'clock", made a drawing showing three o'clock; "Portuguese consul," showed the Portuguese-speaker how to get there by pointing out the window, and watched them leave.

Three o'clock and, lo and behold, here were thirteen furious sailors again ruffling the calm outside my door. I went out. "Portuguese consul!" "NO!! No Portuguese! American!" "You go Portuguese consul or I call police!"

Again the girls got herded into my office. This time, before I could call the police, I had to call downstairs and get permission to do so. Tim was out of town, our then second-in-command no model of courage. I briefed him on what had been going on, asked if I had his permission to get the local police in on it. "Oh," he said, "but let me know first if it looks like trouble."

"That, Les, is what I am doing now!" and hung up.

Just then one of the male clerks dashed in. "Mrs. Sanderson, they have gone!" I went down to report all clear. The exec was ready -- half into the well of the CG's desk. The sailors never visited to the Portuguese consulate.

I already had a contingent of the police along one Sunday morning when I went aboard one of these floating (one hoped) disgraces in response to a call to quell a disturbance. It was the high monsoon. I was soaked to the skin, even wearing my bright red-hooded rain cape. We got aboard. The fracas was in the mess room. I could hear shouts and grunts and groans and the crashing of furniture and the shattering of glass. But when Little Red Riding Hood materialized at the door everything STOPPED -- for just long enough for the police to take over the situation.

The other day the Women's Club got terribly sentimental about our poor boys who get hospitalized off ships, and took the Consul General to task for sending them to a local hospital, which of course isn't any great shakes when it comes to comfort. After explaining that hospitalization was up to the shipping companies and they are required by law only to accommodate them in rather plain style, and that the Consulate has no funds for maintaining them in more luxurious surroundings, the CG said anything the Women's Club felt like contributing would of course be welcomed by our boys. So they thought of reserving a nice private room at the local luxury hospital -- the one all of us go to. The CG had to put his foot down on that, however, in view of the fact that Bombay would rapidly become the mecca of every beach combing American in the Eastern hemisphere. As it stands, I am to inform the ladies when hospitalization or destitution cases occur, and escort them to visit and take small gifts if they like.... I don't think this will last long, however, as about ninety percent of the hospitalizations are in either for VD or as a result of brawls, usually in what are euphemistically known as "houses of ill repute", and the girls will no doubt soon tire of being Grey Ladies! (this is for your amusement only!) (July 6, 1950).

Belehrad had by no means subsided. I had of course breathed no word of my concerns over Robin, for the reasons noted above.

This shipping has been something of a headache. The fellow who has been doing it for the last two years has done a lousy job for my money, but the boss thinks he's wonderful -- mostly on other counts. I of course try to do as little as possible to give the boss the idea that maybe I don't think so. Anyway, he's also one of these characters who makes a great show about how overworked he is -- spends most of his time doing that, if you ask me -- and then refuses to give up a job. Under these circumstances you can imagine I've had one hell of a time. But it's easing up now. At first I found it almost impossible to get hold of files, instructions, information or anything else; was simply told it was all routine and I needn't worry about anything but signing my name to papers. This I dislike doing -- too easy for someone to pass you a Mickey and I wouldn't put it past this character as he's done it to others in the past. The whole office hates him like poison. Then, a month after I'd taken over, I find he's still handing cases and not telling me about it -- "In case you might make a mistake." At this point I blew up, at least blew up inside. I talked it over with the boss, using the tack that I know how hard it is to give over an old job to a new person, but there is only one way to learn, etc., and after all, the technical side of shipping is child's play compared to visas and citizenship and everyone knows it. This was about three weeks ago. I took an awful risk, but came out of it the only person in the office who approached the boss about something involving this guy who didn't get a meat cleaver in the head, so to speak. I think my work record was in my favor, maybe. Things have improved considerably since then. I also found he didn't know any of the local officials and people we deal with on these matters -- had either neglected it completely or left it up to the [Indian] clerks -- we didn't even have the right names or addresses in a lot of cases. So I went around, made about twenty calls, which seemed to surprise and flatter them all no end, so now we're getting cooperation all over the place and things are running beautifully..... Before I came out the head of the shipping section [at the State Department] wrote the CG suggesting I be put on shipping, which is really unusual because they don't generally want women in this particular job. I was also privately told that they wished to God someone would take over here

.... So when, after six months, the job was dumped in my lap, without my connivance, I expected a reaction, and got it. A lot of this -- the boss's apparent lack of interest in the thing and so forth -- can be explained by the fact that the consular side of FS work is generally regarded as routine, dull, boring, unglamorous and fit only for new recruits.... But no one can say it's not important, because in my opinion you can spend a lot of time trying to make friends for the US but you lose a lot more if you mess up one visa and the guy gets held on Ellis Island; if you let one real subversive in the States, or welcome a guy with a forged passport as a real American, you not only do a big disservice to your country but you will get your neck in a nice tight noose when discovered.... No one ever hears about a good job if a shipping officer does it, but plenty of union people and shipowners will raise hell if you really do a bad job. Besides, in this job I have constant, unrelenting and often exhausting contact with all kinds of people, always wanting something, often wanting the impossible. It is wonderful training in diplomacy if you ask me....

On the other hand, shipping is one part of consular work that has its points, other than those I've mentioned. If you want to and don't care too much about local customs regulations and the reputation of our outfit, you can very neatly practically feed, clothe (male), and provision yourself with things like cigarettes and liquor, free of charge. I think it's one thing to ask for something and offer to pay for it if you are really desperate (like last week when we were out of sugar and I got a birthday cake!), but it can be carried a long, long way. Ergo why some people particularly like the job. I might add here that I can at least say that this jerk isn't in our career service; he's "staff" -- which means someone who got in by the back door.... I probably shouldn't write you about this, because you won't be interested and it isn't discreet, but you can understand I can't talk it out with anyone here (though I certainly hear a lot -- both in and out of the office!), and it's good to get these things off your chest. I suppose you must know it isn't all moonlight and roses out here, but I can't think of anything else I'd rather do One of the fine points is assiduous practice of maintaining cordial relations with one and all no matter how skunkish they are! or at least making the other guy take the first thrust in open warfare. (August 8, 1950)

I had no further trouble with Belehrad thereafter. Not so my successor, Dave Ernst, a decent chap who was on his first post and was given the shipping job when I moved to the economic desk in December 1950. I offered to lend him a hand should he feel the need for it any time during the shakedown-cruise part of the job. So, very quietly, did Belehrad, adding that it was a great relief at last to have someone there who unlike me could do the job, and warning Dave not to mention that he, Belehrad, was volunteering help. Before the poor guy had a chance to get his feet on the ground, there was a murder on one of the ships. Being uncertain of how to handle it and being a normal male, Dave called on another male, Belehrad, for help. What a mess that one turned out to be! I was defending poor Dave to Tim before it was over, still not fingering Belehrad however. Then this in a personal letter from Frances Dailor:

.... what gives on the shipping desk? We have a report on the USNS Tomahawk that just came in showing that Ernst boarded the ship, followed by Belehrad (apparently on an independent mission) and then Small got in on it. All sounds quite confused. What's the lowdown and is there anything I can do? (Dailor to Sanderson, January 22, 1951)

.... I can't add much to what was between the lines on the report itself. Dave nearly went crazy with it.... [he] has a very good head on his shoulders and despite his newness to the job I think he can handle it and could handle it then. However, half the others in the place got in on it and the last we heard (whether our activities have any bearing on this part I don't know), [the ship] had run aground somewhere. I really know little about it except what Dave told me, but I do know he had the same trouble I had, and may still have some of the same ahead. I had hoped that he, being a man, wouldn't have to put up with it but apparently it's just as bad for him. This is of course a tale out of school, although both Dave and our exec. asked me to tell you what I know about it all. I myself feel that now Childs is here the situation may ease up, as he seems to be a believer in each person doing his own job. He hadn't come yet when the "Tomahawk" was here. (Sanderson to Dailor, February 15, 1951)

As this exchange indicates, we were seeing some new faces -- and more of them. Of Prescott Childs and George Small more later. Of Belehrad just one postscript:

1950-51 was the height of the uproar in Washington about homosexuals in government, especially in the State Department and the Foreign Service. At about the same time as the Dailor-Sanderson letters we were visited by another emissary from the Department, a nice gray-haired senior officer who, when he came to my office for a one-on-one chat about what all knew he was there for, brought up the subject roundabout and with considerable equivocation. Eventually, and with embarrassment, he came out with it: did I know anything about the truth of the rumors that had gotten back to the Department, that there were two "men of, er, irregular morals" on the Bombay staff?

I truthfully said I knew nothing about either of them in that respect, and about one of them (a USIS officer) I had no basis for any kind of judgment. But then I told him why I had so precipitously moved from one apartment to another that was not, really, all that much more desirable per se. I was careful to repeat that I knew nothing, that I had moved because as the mother of a little boy I felt I could take no chances.

Very shortly afterward Belehrad was transferred back to the United States and was not heard of or from again. I am convinced he should have been fired. He was a bad guy. He did a disgracefully poor job and displayed disgraceful ethics. I hope, though I am almost sure it is a forlorn hope, that the main, or even only, reason for his departure was not the homosexual part, and especially that it was not my at last 'fessing up' to the investigator.

By that time the Tims were being transferred to Delhi. Tim had gone there to arrange for the family's move when Julie invited herself to my place for a drink and a tête-a-tête one evening. I had somehow been expecting the conversation that ensued. Julie and I were close and real friends and Tim knew it. The conversation came round to Why Oh Why, Corey, Didn't You Go To Tim About Belehrad? I said I had gone to him, about the only thing I could prove and that had to do with the job, namely, Belehrad's interference in shipping after it had been put under my responsibility. As to the rest, I heard rumors and more of them as time went on, I heard goings-on above when we lived below him, and I had gotten Robin the hell out of the guy's way and into another apartment in another neighborhood. But how could I be expected to tell all this to Tim, when I had absolutely no proof, and when all well knew that Belehrad was Tim's "white-haired boy," that everyone else who had tried to tell Tim anything about Belehrad had been slapped down peremptorily and I had no reason to think I had carte blanche to be the exception. I said that Tim was a fine officer (which I believed) and this didn't reflect on him, really (which I didn't). Tim was indeed a fine officer and a good boss; he did suffer from a bit of overconfidence about his judgments, always very quickly arrived at. In this case, as it developed, Tim seemed to think my not having brought the whole Belehrad affair to him at the beginning constituted some kind of disloyalty. You can't win them all. And as this was only the first of several cases of the "White-haired Boy" syndrome I have encountered, so it was only the first experience of a uniform reaction to the disillusion when it comes: denial to oneself that one had become more than a mentor and to an extent a tool, and refusal to hold oneself responsible for any of the consequences.

[Robin] is going through a rather "clownish" stage ... walks around in a sort of cakewalk, whistling through his teeth, generally acting like a cross between Bob Hope and Red Skelton!..... [but] isn't all clown -- you would be very gratified to see how much the gentleman he has become, saying "How Do You Do" and so forth with really amazing savoir faire. He needs it -- we've had Sen. and Mrs. Pepper, Marquis Childs, and several other notables passing through here lately, and many of them drop in for tea or something so he meets them.... Dr. Ambedkar, the famous "untouchable" Law Minister in the Nehru cabinet, had tea at our house the other day with Mrs. Ambedkar along. So a few manners are very handy things for Robin to have.

[We] are going to ... Aurangabad... which is near some very famous ancient Hindu temple caves.... He and "Uncle Check," who's going to do the driving, have been gazing at road maps and so forth for days.... Our agricultural officer, a nice grandfatherly sort, is going along to get a look at some of the local farm areas and methods.... I have to visit a number of my missionary constituents in the area, so I guess this is an example of mixing business and pleasure. (October 11, 1950)

.... all four had a wonderful time, especially Robin. The countryside is lovely this time of year, but you should see the roads! The best ones are like the old hard-surfaced un-oiled two lane affairs in Idaho. Most of them aren't that good -- just dirt roads, one lane, and since most of the traffic is in bullock carts, there are always two well defined ruts.... One of the main problems is cows -- you never saw so many cows and water buffaloes in your life as there are on the roads of India, and they all decide to mosey across the road just as the car gets up to them. Of course if you hit one of it's almost worse than hitting a person. Also a common sight is long lines of people, usually women, with great loads of things on their heads, walking single file along the road, with a baby on the hip and another by the hand. The country is fairly high and hilly -- looks a little like some parts of Idaho and Montana, except that the trees are not evergreen, but tropical. The ghats (mountains), are beautiful, almost like the Kooskia-Lolo area but not so high.... The villages are just huddles of adobe huts.

When we arrived at Aurangabad, we found that a local movie company had taken over the hotel. So we stayed at an Indian hotel, which was nice and clean although it took us a while to get used to the lack of plumbing! ... the Ajanta caves ... [are] really a sight. Most of the mountains around there have a large solid stone scarp at the bottom -- well, in the old days the people used to carve their temples and monasteries right out of the stone, making huge caves. There are over twenty like this at Ajanta and almost a hundred at Ellora. At Ajanta, which was built between about 200 BC and 700 AD, the caves are Buddhist. There is some carving and sculpture, but mostly fresco painting, and it is really magnificent....[at Ellora], besides the caves, there is one huge Hindu temple, all cut out of the rock. The sculpture at Ellora is marvelous, but the constant repetition and the peculiar writhe forms of Hindu sculpture, especially when you see so much of it in one place, is rather frightening to me....

The high point for Robin came on the morning of the day we went to Ellora, when we went to Daulatabad... a hill 600 feet high, with a 100-foot solid rock scarp around the circular bottom....

used as a fortress from about 700 AD until about 1700, and is about the most formidable thing in its line I have ever seen. There are three rows of outer walls and fortifications, the outermost being 2½ miles around, and the present town is inside these, although the walls are in ruins now.... people are still living in the remains of old buildings.... Then there is a big gate, and a 100-foot moat with the only entrance a drawbridge. On the hill itself there are three more rows of fortifications, with some huge guns still mounted where they were in 17th century. The only known entrance is a sort of spiral staircase cut out of the solid rock, and having a regular labyrinth of secret passages, false passages, places for defending soldiers to hide and spring out at an attacker, places where hot oil and rocks and things could be thrown down from above, etc. I'll bet that place was the envy of all the kings in India in its day! Robin was simply thrilled to death with it (he's been reading King Arthur and is very much interested in knights and castles and such). About three-fourths of the way up is a small palace, and on the very top another gun tower. There is a spring high up on the hill -- I'll bet they could hold out for years in that place in the old days.... Robin has been picking out likely hills for fortresses ever since! (October 18, 1950)

Very shortly later Norton Ginsburg stopped by for a few days en route to the Far East. This occasioned more parties and another trip up-country; I have a small snapshot titled "Robin and Uncle Norton at Poona." All seemed well, his letters indicated a fine time and fruitful research. But early in June 1951 I got an anguished wire from him from Singapore. His passport had been taken by the US Consul there and amended "valid only for direct and immediate travel to the US." No explanation given, but many questions "about my security status. whether I had had troubles in the past, etc. etc.... The implications of the whole affair are sinister and shocking." (Letter from Norton, June 4, 1951). Norton returned to Washington as directed. He never did get a full explanation, though the whole matter was dropped and he "cleared" eventually. Meanwhile he had lost two excellent potential jobs.

All Norton's friends, including myself and some who had more commanding positions in the corridors of power, took up his case. I wrote the authorities, and got my Consul General, Prescott Childs, to do so as well. To its credit, UC stood by its young faculty member, and Norton remained there until his retirement. Now the geography department has been eliminated. A pity in this day when college juniors screaming about the evils of the Serbs in Bosnia place Bosnia somewhere in mid-Africa on outline maps.

From the beginning of the tour of duty in Bombay I had been much in demand for press interviews and to give speeches to civic groups and so on; this also because of my being a woman. The early interviews were nothing much, fluff about bringing feminine charm to diplomacy and so on. I have never been fond of public speaking, but my consuls general wanted me to do it. I remember ones about women's position in this-and-that, at one of which the chairman closed his introduction with, "And Mrs. Sanderson says there has never been a cocktail party in her family home!" That is when I lost all credibility with that audience, teetotalers who like most Indians who thought about Americans at all or knew what they were, thought that unless Americans were missionaries they wallowed in alcohol and other debauchery. Then there was the speech commemorating the anniversary of the establishment of the United Nations, in which I commented that Americans regarded the U.N. as one of man's great and most hopeful experiments on the road to world peace. Sure enough, the headline next day: "U.S. Regards U.N."

as Experiment." But on the whole these P.R. jobs were successful enough. I am not sure, though, that I convinced the earnest young student who insisted on knowing the condition of the American "peasants" in the part of the U.S.A. I came from. I replied that about the only people who might qualify as peasants were the sharecroppers in the south; in my part of the country farmers owned their land. They often hired help in busy seasons, but these people were employees, not bound to the land or by anything else except the terms of their employment. I could see disbelief in my audience's eyes. A land without peasants? Impossible!

When reports reached Bombay in late October or early November 1951 of some sort of brouhaha in Nepal, John Hlavacek ("Check") went off to investigate. Nepal had been recognized as an independent state several years before, but still was a bit of a hermit among nations, and its border with India was closed at the time. Check ventured a bit too close to that border and found himself a prisoner of some Nepali soldiers. He then entered Nepal, escorted by his captors, by the odd little funicular that was the main mode of doing so. While there he managed to make himself persona grata, and came out with a great deal of interesting material, some of which he put on the press wires and the rest, which was of greater political interest but not of the sort that would grab the American newspaper reader, he turned over to me and from which I was to make a highly commended report to the Department (classified, of course, though Check himself, the source, was free to tell whomever he pleased; ironically, I couldn't show him the report when it was finished). He also brought me the leather-sheathed Gurkha knife that hangs on my wall. Very useful for hacking cane and heads, and notched so that if blood should be drawn otherwise while it was unsheathed the owner could prick his thumb and therefore satisfy ancient cultic ritual.

Check had one further tidbit. Now, six months into the Korean conflict, he had some evidence that carbon black, an essential in the manufacture of tires for trucks and military vehicles and one of the numerous items interdicted by the U.S. for export to the Communist world, was being imported into Calcutta, then transshipped to North Korea. I passed this along through Tim to the Embassy. Neither the Embassy nor the Calcutta consulate had any information, nor were they interested. I was upset, and so was Tim. He leading, we rather built a fire under the contented denizens of our other establishments. I don't remember how it all came out, but no more carbon black was so transshipped, if any had been in the first place.

Meanwhile, worrisome things were happening at home. Since early on I had hoped Mama and Daddy could visit us, sent them all sorts of advice about the best season for it (winter) and the best and safest way for a person in Daddy's state of health to travel (a good passenger ship). But:

Please cable any adverse change Daddy's condition letter follows love Bettrobin (cable to Mama, September 5, 1950)

I'm so glad Daddy is better. I haven't told Robin about his granddad's illness at all, as I didn't want to worry him. Let me know when Daddy gets home and how everything is going. I do worry so about pneumonia. (September 13, 1950).

Thanksgiving was to be at our place, with Robin and me hosting all the Timberlakes, Check, and some other lone Americans, to a total of sixteen, for a true American feast. The captain of one of those magnificent Isbrandtsen ships had insisted on loading me up with a beautiful big turkey, several tins of cranberry sauce, and some pumpkin and mince pies and trimmings. What matter that the buffalo cream for the pie would be pale grey? I proudly bore the turkey home and called a conference with Antonio. His one question: "How cooking, Memsahib?" "In the oven of course." "No oven, Memsahib."

I went out to the kitchen, where I must confess I had probably not set foot since I had had it cleaned up before we moved in. Sure enough, no oven. A two-burner kerosene hotplate only.

"But Antonio, how cooking pies and pastries for us with no oven?"

"Cooking in Miss Darke's oven, Memsahib." Only then did I realize that all those nice things had been baked in Martha's "oven," which today we would call a toaster-oven.

So off to the market to buy two enormous round pots. That was the day before Thanksgiving. That evening came the wire that told me the visit with Daddy was not to be. Daddy was gone. My feelings were a mixture of grief, guilt, and indecision. The natural grief of a child who loses a loved parent, exacerbated by guilt at having been less good and less close to him than his love for me warranted, and at having taken Robin so far away from him during that last precious year of his life. Indecision as to what, or rather when, to tell Robin. Should I tell him now? I was certainly in no mood for Thanksgiving festivities, and I knew he would not be either, when he knew. But he had so looked forward to Thanksgiving. And what about all the others? At this point to give them a grey day instead of a holiday? Would it be decent to put my own feelings first in that way?

I decided to say nothing until the day after Thanksgiving. I would simply steel myself not to mention or hint of it, and not to show how I was feeling inside.

We stuffed the turkey and browned it in one of my newly-acquired pots, then covered it with the other one and steamed it (or I supposed the proper word is braised, though we used as little liquid as possible). It wasn't half bad. Antonio outdid himself with all the rest.

I must have done a fair job at concealing my emotions, because a wonderful time seemed to be had by all. Tim showed his true talents at their best when, to meet the requests of the four young fry at table, he carved four drumsticks from one turkey. He did it of course by using the thighs as well, and cutting off the skin areas. On such a huge bird that would have been necessary anyway.

Next day, when I did tell Robin the sad news about his grandpa, his response was, "Well, I know he went straight to heaven." He had previously told a little friend of his that his Granddad was a saint. "I am going to encourage Robin to look to the spirit of his grandfather for help and guidance in becoming a real man, as a man should be. Maybe that's what being a saint really is." (November 23, 1950)

His grandfather was of course a Christian saint. But Robin's heaven was well supplied. He had not only Baby Jesus and His mother and God and several saints, but Baby Lord Krishna and a dozen other Hindu figures, including the charmers Ganesh and Hanuman, and for all I know or remember Baby Mohammed as well. Safety in numbers, I have always felt.

His school, however, being run by a bunch of charming Portuguese Jesuits, Robin duly took First Communion on December 1, 1950. There is a snapshot of him and his little colleagues on that happy day, Robin almost staggering under the monster candle Rafael and Antonio made him for the occasion.

In that month I was transferred to the economic/commercial section. In a way I was sorry to leave consular work. I had enjoyed it, and in retrospect that was the best year I had, professionally, and the most fun, in the Foreign Service. But it was no way to real advancement.

I've been trying to get the new job under my belt, and it isn't so difficult. Unfortunately, my staff in this section can't compare with the ones in the old section, and I spend half my time redrafting their stuff and so forth. They are all on high pay, for alien staff, too, and even though they're not too good it would probably be impossible to get new ones as good as they are. So I just have to work it out as best I can. The commercial and economic work is fascinating, though. (January 22, 1951)

Economic work at the consulate involved not only keeping abreast and reporting on developments of economic interest to the U.S. within the consular district, but also of forwarding to the Department of Commerce information about possible trade opportunities, trying to help American businessmen establish trade relations with Indian opposite numbers or resolve trade problems arising from them, and association with other countries' trade commissioners in the district.

My academic training in economics helped me get a grasp on part of this work, and the year's intensive informal training in diplomacy that visa, passport and shipping work had given me, was enormously helpful. But I knew nothing about business as such, and had only the faintest notion of finance. So it was back to the old grind of learn something new from the beginning. As usual I found this most interesting. This time the learning came not so much through books as through perusing our files and listening to opposite numbers and businessmen, learning the lingo, so to speak.

One of the immediate lessons had to do with the great difference of approach followed by Americans and Indians. An American would breeze into my office of a Monday morning, fresh and full of beans after a two- or three-day plane trip and a good night's sleep in the Taj Mahal Hotel. He planned to see this one and that one and the other one today, then sew up the deals, get the contracts in order and be on his way Friday afternoon. Great. After one or two such experiences I would suggest he might want to consider that a more flexible schedule might be necessary, for deals, and especially finalizing them with business opposite numbers and going through the Indian bureaucracy -- and very few such deals were exempt from this latter -- might take more time than he had scheduled. (These, by the way, were almost all trade deals, and relatively minor. Any significant private American investment in India -- and it was exiguous then -- went through the Embassy). The usual response was, well, in business we don't take our time quite the way you people in government do.

Say all this took place on a Monday. By about Thursday in he would come again, this time somewhat ruffled. These people didn't seem to operate the way businessmen operate. They weren't really ready to deliver. And why did they have to go through such conniptions with foreign exchange authorities and import control regulations and God knows what other governmental stumbling blocks?

By two weeks later the vein would be popping in the poor man's forehead. I never had a real heart attack case on my hands, but I felt it close a couple of times. Sometimes the deals did in the end go through, thereupon often giving rise to more of the numerous trade disputes that filled our file cabinets.

On the other hand, there were Clarence Hulford and Andrew Price, two officers of the National Bank of Commerce of Seattle, who had business in Bombay and made a courtesy call on me at the consulate. Intelligent, agreeable, knowing their work thoroughly, and flexible -- they conducted their business in India without noticeable hassle. I saw them several times and may have included them in a couple of social events or visits to the Willingdon Club. They planned to go on to Indonesia next. Since I was interested in Indonesia as a possible next post, I asked them to let me know their general opinion of the place and its desirability or otherwise as a post for Robin and me. Not many weeks later there arrived a four-page letter, in style and content worthy of the best kind of reporting, in which they gave me their considered opinion that for the time being at least Indonesia might well not be the exact best spot. I have always been grateful to these men.

For their part, Indians -- businessmen and others -- seemed to have a sort of cloud-cuckooland idea of American business and industry, all of which they tended to lump together under the rubric "Wall Street." They seemed to picture American industrialists -- "Wall Street" -- literally as the huge-paunched men wearing gold watch chains and silk top hats so often caricatured. I remember more than one conversation under the orchids that festooned the loggias of the Willingdon Club, in which I was at pains to explain that to an American businessman, "investment" meant putting capital into plant and equipment, hiring workers who would very likely have strong unions to protect their interest, sticking with the business for years and with much hard work, luck and good management watching their fortunes grow. It seemed to me, after visiting a number of other textile and other factories where dust and filth prevailed and machinery bore dates like 1883, that with some notable exceptions the Indian entrepreneur's idea of enterprise was to buy a crumbling enterprise, hire the cheapest possible workers (and they came cheap indeed) and work them and the machinery as hard as possible, do nothing to improve either plant or equipment or human skills, and a year or so later turn the whole over for a hundred-per-cent profit.

Well, I was sort of right. But later experience indicated I had idealized American business practice in my depictions of it. If anything, the reality I idealized has deteriorated since then. And quite possibly Indian practice has made progress in the opposite -- i.e., productive -- direction.

Shortly after I took over the section I acquired an assistant. The Foreign Service was expanding, and we along with the rest. Harry Barnes was a fresh-cheeked young man, good looking in a nice wholesome blond way, on his first Foreign Service posting. He was bright and pleasant and fun to work with, although as I recall, with two of us on board we certainly weren't overworked.

Among the most pleasant of the economic officer's duties was to represent the United States at meetings of the local trade commissioners --our opposite numbers from other countries. These meetings usually took the form of a monthly luncheon hosted by one of us, and would be held at the Taj Mahal hotel unless the lucky host had a house large enough and well enough appointed to accommodate twenty-four for luncheon. There we settled any business of mutual interest; this was usually a quick and easy job. Then settled in to a good social luncheon. I was of course the only female member of the group. I do remember one puckish host who placed me at one end of a long table, with the Bulgarian on my right and the Czech on my left. We not only had only about twenty words of common language, counting such English, German, and French as we together commanded, but they were obviously terrified, as if they were sitting next to a twenty years' sentence in Siberia. Such was the Cold War in its early phases.

Then came the British Trade Commissioner's turn to play host. Now I should say that on the whole the upper-class Brits I met were delightful people, and I had some good friends among them. But every so often all but the best of them would begin to feel the sting of Not Being Top Country Any More. Then out came the needles, and I am sorry to say many of my American colleagues did not know how to handle being needled. They got angry and red-faced. They weren't equipped to respond in kind. Possibly, as my Foreign Service oral examination and some other episodes many illustrate, I had more experience with being needled, patronized, and generally put down, than my male colleagues, and was used to it and ready for it. I have always hated teasing, but this wasn't exactly teasing, it was very delicately inserting the knife in the tenderest spot -- and as far as I was concerned, even on the receiving end (I certainly didn't dish any of it out) it was business, not private. One Brit remarked to Mama that if all the Americans were like me everything would go beautifully, always. Was he just flattering her through me? was he implying high gullibility on my part? I have often wondered.

At any rate, came the Brit's turn to play host. All had been set up and secretaries notified of time and place and so on, when, an hour or so before the luncheon was to take place, he telephoned me. He was awfully sorry, Mrs. Sanderson, but he had scheduled the luncheon at his club -- the only really suitable place, you know -- and unfortunately the club did not admit ladies except on specified occasions of which this was not one. Would someone else from the consulate perhaps be able to come in my place?

But of course. I would see that we were represented, I said. The phone call over, I called Harry in. Harry would go to the Trade Commissioner's lunch. Not quite in my stead, however. Harry was not authorized to make any comments whatsoever on any substantive matter that might arise during the business session.

Harry was a truly good man. He understood exactly what I was up to, and I think he approved -- not all that common a trait in those macho days. He lunched. He kept quiet. And it so happened that (as I had known it would) a question of real significance did for once hit the table. It was a question that could not be dealt with without input from the U.S. A frantic call from our host: what to do? I sweetly explained that Harry was a delightful and intelligent chap and a real Foreign Service Officer, but one who had been fledged only very recently and had hardly had a chance to become au courant with the affairs of the trade commissioners. Best, perhaps, they all enjoy their lunch, then convene in my office for discussion of the issue.

Which they did. Twenty-four sweating trade commissioners, in my office, which measured about ten by fourteen feet and boasted two desks, numerous file cabinets and bookshelves, and four chairs: mine, my secretary's, and two for visitors. I should say it was also the stifling hot season just before the monsoon broke -- and air conditioning unknown. The issue, by the way, got resolved in record time. And I attended trade commissioners' lunches regularly thereafter, until I was transferred to labor and political reporting.

One of the real pleasures and privileges of my economic work was membership in the Economic Discussion Group, a collection of about twenty businessmen, professionals and academics concerned with economics and business in India. We met monthly, rather formally in a seminar room made available by a local bank or business (I don't remember where it was exactly), a prearranged topic was discussed, with some participants working from notes they had previously prepared. Aside from the theoretical and practical learning this experience gave me -- especially in areas where theory and practice meet and react on each other -- I very much enjoyed the ladies and gentlemen of this group, whose conversation always left me elated, as if I had drunk and refreshed myself at some rare spring.

January 1951 brought us a new consul general. Prescott Childs was older -- perhaps in his mid-fifties -- and less obviously active and energetic than Tim Timberlake. He also was obviously not, or no longer, looking for glory as an ambassador. He was happy to do a good and satisfying job as consul general. He had a nice dry humor, and was one of the fairest people I have ever met. He needed all these virtues as time went on in our Bombay shop.

Shortly after they arrived, and before the Timberlakes had left permanently for Delhi, I invited them all to dinner. I also invited Tommy and Dorrie Thompson, an attractive couple, he the head of Pan Am operations for south Asia. What I didn't know -- and without asking to I heard a great deal of the gossip in the American community in Bombay -- was that for some reason Tommy had offended Tim. Towards dessert Tim exploded, allowed as how he had kept quiet because of his being consul general but now he could let it all hang out -- and he did, and swept out with Julie in his wake.

I was amazed, and concerned. Here I was, supposed to be a good hostess and knowing about what went on among the local Americans, and subjecting my new consul general and his wife to this, first crack out of the box! I apologized profusely. Neither of the Childs seemed to think I was blameable, and Roberta endeared herself forever to me by remarking that it was really very interesting.

Both of them were dears. I loved the Timberlakes but there are virtues to a more measured approach to life, as well. I think the Childs, whose children were grown and gone, looked on me with just a trifle of parental attitude. Roberta and Mama became great friends when Mama came to stay with me later on.

And I made a couple of other bloopers as a hostess. Once I had a small dinner party for a visiting businessman, who proceeded to get thoroughly drunk and over coffee stretched out on the sofa and snored so loud conversation among us others became somewhat strained. Then there was the dinner at the Taj Mahal hotel that Bert Evans, our agricultural officer, whose wife had not yet come out to Bombay, asked me to look after for him. On the seating arrangements I decided to place the senior lady at Bert's right (I knew who was senior because I had renewed all their passports). She also turned out to be a lush, which I hadn't known before. Later on I concluded that if your parties are successful 90% of the time you can't really blame yourself for the utterly unexpected barbarism that some people think it quite all right to perpetrate on hostesses. But you should look for possible trouble as well.

One lovely Prescott Childs story. Some time in 1951 Eleanor Roosevelt visited India, with a two-day stop in Bombay. She was scheduled for a number of speeches, meetings and other events there. Excitement was high in the American community, especially among the ladies. Partisan quibbles all seemed to be forgotten. Several of the prominent ladies, including the wives of some senior consular officers, were vying for the role of on-site assistant and companion to Mrs. Roosevelt.

One day Childs called me into his office. He said he was designating me to be Mrs. Roosevelt's "aide-de-camp" during her visit. I was horrified, and said so. I said all these wives of senior people were already at each other's throats for the job; they would do their best to make mincemeat of me.

"Don't worry about that," he said dryly, "I'll see that the word gets around. Let me tell you a story. During the war at some army base in the States the wives' club decided, when the commanding officer was to be transferred, to present a silver tray to Mme. Commanding Officer. So a large luncheon was put on. It so happened that a WAC officer, a lieutenant or captain, was present at this function. When after all sorts of mouthings, they brought out the tray and the mistress of ceremonies announced that it would be presented to the senior-ranking lady present, the WAC got up, went to the head table, firmly took the tray, turned around to the audience and thanked them. As the only woman in the place who had official rank in her own right she was of course senior-ranking. And departed, with tray.

"You are the only American woman here who has official rank. You are obviously the only proper aide-de-camp for Mrs. Roosevelt."

And ADC I was. An exciting couple of days. The first function was a huge dinner at the Taj Mahal hotel, after which Mrs. Roosevelt would speak to the assembled guests. Unfortunately her plane, which had been due to arrive some hours before the dinner, had not done so by an hour after the dinner was scheduled and the guests assembled. After some discussion it was decided that the dinner should be served while it was still edible, and another prepared for Mrs. R. and her party.

Dessert was being served when in swept Mrs. Roosevelt. She was one of the ugliest and most ill-groomed women I had yet seen in public life. And now, out of consideration for those who had waited so long for her, she limited her freshening up to a rapid face and hand wash and a pass through her hair with her comb. She had not changed from her traveling outfit of ill-fitting cotton twill skirt and blouse, large flat shoes not much polished, and lisle hose that tended to droop at the ankles. She had not dined, but she went to the podium and made her remarks. And when she spoke all the lack of physical beauty, all the carelessness of dress, became as nothing. She was wonderful. And remained that way. One could not help loving her. It was a great two days for me.

The consulate was growing, fast. Shortly after Prescott and Roberta Childs arrived we got several more officers. George Small was a staff officer, transferred from Johannesburg to take over some of Belehrad's old duties. On learning that he would come on board Check, who had known him in "Jo-Berg," had remarked to me that George was a nice fellow, but not very bright. An understatement. George was a brash young man whose constant grin was a sort of composite of Bugs Bunny's and Alfred G. Neumann's. And could he mess things up! Rare the shipment that didn't arrive after endless delay on the docks, often showing considerable post-trip damage and occasioning endless bureaucratic wrangling. Rare the consular car that, needing repairs, didn't go to the wrong shop and come back in worse shape than before. George seemed never to get it straight which of his own staff, let alone which Indian and local government offices, were handling which items or kinds of work. The one professional quality with which he was amply endowed was self-confidence; that oozed from every pore. But he was a nice guy, and his own dimness was partially offset by his wife, a plain looking but very pleasant and sensible woman. When after a truly scarifying series of experiences with getting my things and money transferred from Bombay to Athens, I called him "that damned George Small" in a letter to Mama, I suppose I was unkind. He couldn't help being stupid and a fool. But there are limits.

In early February 1951 Check and I made a few days' trip by steamer to Goa, a significant source of manganese ore. My journal notes are a mixture of personal observation and items to be included in reports after my return, and will illustrate the sorts of things I looked for on these expeditions up country. Incidentally, few of the consular or embassy officers thought it necessary to bother with up-country trips except by air to big places like Nagpur or hill stations, or the sites of ancient artistic miracles like the Taj Mahal. My gypsy feet made all these trips a joy, one for which I was in a sort of continuous campaign with the consul general and the Department. I didn't need modern plumbing or familiar food. I saw so much that no one staying in the big cities would see. And possibly my reports were read by someone in Washington.

Wed. Feb. 7: Was gratified to find myself not seasick -- had worried as this is my first sea trip, albeit only coastal. Others aboard: Lawson of Burmah Shell, Mr. and Mrs. Prideau, going to Goa for Killick's, my cabin mate a Mrs. Mouledine, sweet thing but with two small children and an ayah, whose foot I fell over when going to bed thus waking the world. Also Colm and Gabriels, and -- everyone else seems to be in manganese. A heavenly day... After dinner had rather desultory conversation with Check, Lawson and the Prideaus, livened up when Check told them about Nepal.

Thurs, 8: [Several officials and others met Check and me and] took us, and Colm and the Gabriels, to the Antigo Palacio hotel in Marmagao. This is said to be the old Governor's Palace, about 400 years old. The hotel is on the top floor -- cavernous rooms, baths larger than the rooms but strictly antique (no plumbing).... as long as they fetch bath water energetically it really doesn't make much difference. Above the hotel the ruin of old fortifications -- quite a sight. After a rather good breakfast on the hotel verandah (overlooking the Marmagao docks -- space for two large ships -- 29 foot draft -- and three small ones -- rather good warehouse facilities I should think ... drove over the Panjim for shopping. Beautiful country -- lovelier than I've seen elsewhere in India. Houses adobe, tile, thatch.... People not so handsome as further north but look as well off and possibly more contented. Young Russeklal comments apropos this: "they do nothing but pick coconuts off trees, drink country liquor and sleep." To me this seems at least as satisfying as working liking ants, starving, and being generally miserable in India. Good roads. Must take ferry from Cortalim to Panjim ... a charming and picturesque place, and wonderful to go into shops and find things you want, and shop. A fair lunch at the Imperial Hotel in Panjim. I shouldn't mind at all if the Americans decided they needed a female vice consul here to handle the manganese business! After Panjim, drove to Margao, about 20 miles distant and again across the ferry. More shopping. Margao likewise picturesque but not so much for tourists as Panjim -- Kantilals have their offices here. Then back to Marmagao and a hot bath. How these drivers go like the wind! and the roads are smoother but very winding -- people stay on the side of the road here and for good reason. Dinner and early bed.

Friday, 9th: the biggest day. Drove out to Kantilal's mine. About 50 miles each way -- almost to the Indian border. Stopped at Sanvordem where the loading takes place. Two hundred people, vast majority women and children, sitting on top of huge pile of manganese ore (about 7000 tons in K's plot there now), working with little hammers, sorting the ore out. Russeklal says they can tell by looking whether it's high grade, low grade, etc., put it tiny piece by piece in little baskets, then it's carted off to the wagons (on the women's heads), loaded, and sent on its way to ship side at Marmagao. For this they are paid women Rs. 1/1 [about $.23], men about Rs. 2/6 [about $.53], per day, 6 days a week. No holidays with pay or other such amenities, but on-job injury compensated (not by law, just a policy of Ks firm). From Sanvordem, which is on the railroad, to the mine, just a track road -- how they transport heavy truckloads down it is beyond me. Road owned by govt but maintained by company. Russeklal says their firm mines about 15,000 tons/yr. -- half the total for Goa. Others in about 80 different mines, and this where the middle-man business comes in. Ks eliminate a lot of this by being mine owners, operators, and doing their own transport to railhead and arranging onward to ship side. They have a lot of trouble getting sufficient cars, due general shortage and usual squeeze tactics at every point. They were working feverishly at this angle today. The mine itself is amazing. Strip-type, just a hole in the hill, about 200 feet hollow now; 800 people working (approximately same wage and conditions), dig it out with picks, carry on heads to screens, load into trucks and drive off to railroad. Operations carried on 10 months of year, exclude monsoon's worst months. The country has never been surveyed so it is not known how much manganese ore is there or what type, except where working is actually going on. I should imagine many of the hills have workable deposits. Difficulties of setting up large-scale operations in jungle... without tremendous capital outlay obvious. Ks now thinking of eliminating rail transport by shipping stuff down in barges. But no one willing to put in a real modern operation when boom may be over in a year or two. Laborers live in shacks made of twigs -- hope my snap of one shack and its 16 inhabitants comes out.

After running over mines for a couple of hours (I've never been so filthy in my life), had beer and snack in manager's shack and went back. Noticed Goa govt. is putting in fairly extensive irrigation canal system -- should double present food output and make Goa about 75% self-sufficient for food (will try to see irrigation people tomorrow). Have been trying to assess various interesting political angles but will leave noting it till later when more info has been gathered. Should add two more points about the mines -- labor is recruited from surrounding villages, and as far as I can see is highly efficient in each job as such, but I am also convinced they have no notion whatsoever of what the manganese is, what it is used for, etc. I often got the feeling, "So this is what our steel production lies on." It can't be much different in Africa or ... in Siberia either. Would seem to me that anyone who said to them, look, follow me and you'll be driving around in big cars and they'll be carrying this dirt around on their heads, could be most successful. I suspect CP is much the same -- maybe all "modern" industries in this part of the world, regardless of plant and equipment and so forth, labor itself is ignorant of what it is really doing, it is their rupee a day to keep body and soul more or less together. Two, blasting operations, as an example of method -- to get the overcoat of silica off, they bore little holes, plug them with gunpowder repeat gunpowder, set it off. The whole thing is strictly on a shoestring basis. You can't blame the operators, for they can't see expending capital on long-term basis as things stand now, neither could I in their shoes. they lease the land from the govt at very low rates -- about Rs. 1000/100 acres per year -- govt gets most revenue from export duties and excise.

.... skipped lunch, spent a solid hour washing iron and manganese dust from hair and skin (I'll never get my feet clean) napped, then took a walk with Check up to the fort. It isn't really a fort but a fortifications wall with gun emplacements, etc. Some nice bungalows on top of the hill -- magnificent view. Then drinks, dinner and bed.

Colm and Gabriel are having a lot of trouble. I knew the manganese business in India was a mess but never realized quite how much of a mess. They work day and night, and so do all the Kantilals. Main struggle: getting ship space, getting wagons for loading, greasing enough palms, overcoming terrific and dishonest competitors. I can't feel too bad about the last, as they'll all cut each other's throats, but feel that in view essentiality manganese and lack supply in [U.S.], we should now cartelize temporarily and begin calling the tune, instead of having a dozen competitors out here forcing prices up and making business difficult -- contracts not worth their paper now, etc. (Kelsner, of course, just laughed at me -- but surely the companies themselves would get together at only the merest hint). Example: I believe Colm has chartered a ship -- Killicks have sneaked 500 tons aboard for a customer of theirs, with the connivance of Colm's company's agents in Marmagao, now the captain of the ship offers to put 500 more aboard for Colm if the palm is greased a bit. Harbor master has been making life difficult for them, insisting ship go out at a certain time, seeing that they don't get cars for loading before that time, etc.

Meanwhile, the countryside is lovely, the weather so beautiful, and I feel wonderfully refreshed. I see the point in holidays -- it's not that you get more sleep, it's that the mind doesn't have to work and the usual conflicts aren't there; one gets a rest impossible at home.

Saturday: More shopping in Panjim. I've bought a lot of stuff -- several pieces of Indian cotton produced only for export... perfume, toilet water, candy, a few bottles of brandy and liqueurs, can opener, brassieres, sox for Robin, a camera -- all the things you can't just go in and buy in Bombay. A lousy lunch at the Imperial, then asked for a room for an hour's rest. How glad I am we're not staying there! Filthy, tiny rooms, people screaming, partitions don't even come up to the ceiling and the "sanitary" ha ha facilities shared by one and all almost regardless of sex. At least where we are is cool and as clean as possible for a place overlooking manganese and iron ore shipments and loading operations, and my mosquito-netted bed is hard but not uncomfortable.

Saw Bailey -- not much impressed. He had nothing new to add on his personal troubles. Says radio Goa is actually operating on 300 watts although they say 1000 because no one will buy time from such a tiny station as they really have. Usual gripes about advertisers objecting to paying for program time -- the bazaar mentality I guess -- as if anyone would listen to a day full of ads. More gripes about slowness (no telephones in Goa -- thank God as far as I'm concerned but hard for high pressure business men. Correction: a few local lines, but no inter-city and only in Panjim). Seems they are building a new transmitter, it is strictly a step at a time. Asked us to come around later, maybe get in touch with the irrigation people, but we were too tired. Check went to Heraldo newspaper office. There are 2 Portuguese papers, "Heraldo" and "O Heraldo." All news gotten from listening to BBC and other radio stations, subscribing to Portuguese new service at Rs. 50 per month. Three Konkani papers. Heraldo, largest, claims 5000 circulation, Check guesses it is really about 2000. All papers censored page by page before publication. Back to Marmagao, cleaned up, went to see Prideaus but they weren't at home, dinner, and bed.

Sunday: A lousy day, mostly waiting around to go aboard. Went aboard at 4, ship supposed to sail at 4:30, finally got under way at 8. My cabin mate, of all people, Lady Rama Rau. She says India must have Goa. It is not suitable for Goa to be foreign. How? By attack if necessary. Check says more effective would be to make conditions in India better than in Goa. "That would take too long." [Check] pointed out business people, including Hindus, prefer Goa as is because at least possible to do business there. "That doesn't matter." Interesting, but hardly nonviolent or live and let live (cf. our conversation at my dinner party). Dinner, and bed. I practically fall asleep over coffee these days!

At dinner at my house some weeks before Lady R.R. had given us a homily on Indian nonviolence as contrasted with Western truculence. Well, consistency is a virtue of small minds. Sir Bengal and Lady Rama Rau had become frequent associates of mine. Not intimate friends, but congenial. They were close friends of Nehru; Sir Bengal had some important diplomatic and other positions both under the Raj and after independence, and Lady Rama Rau had founded and was a moving force in several local and all-India organizations devoted to various aspects of the betterment of the lot of Indian women and of the general welfare. She was my ideal of what I would like to be at 50 or so -- classic features (which I would never have of course), perfectly groomed, lovely silver-gray hair, intelligent, excellent conversationalist in a rich contralto. Sir Benegal charming in his less obvious way. They had two daughters. The elder, Premila, was also beautiful, and "very fair," a prized quality. She was married and had a couple of babies. The younger one, Santha, about my age, was neither beautiful nor fair, but she was very, very bright and articulate. She disliked me on sight, I think; at least she did her best to ignore me and my approaches toward becoming friends. Notwithstanding, or perhaps because of, her Wellesley education, Santha was if anything more critical of the United States and Americans than most. Santha married an American, Faubion Bowers, who was there part of my time in India, and later moved to the United States, where she became a several-times-published author.

While I was gone one of our bachelor friends came to stay with Robin Robin loves these "vacations" with his men friends.... This time, when I kissed him goodbye, I said, "It won't be long, sweetie, only five days." He looked a bit disappointed and said "But Mommy, I thought you were going to be gone for a month!" He's quite happy, though -- I brought him candy, stamps, and best of all some samples of manganese and iron ores. He's already been trying to make steel by burning them in a Crisco can. He's reading quite well now, but is slow on spelling. I think other things are much too interesting to keep him very interested in school. (February 13, 1951)

After I got back, I spent getting caught up on personal mail... taking a complete inventory (what an awful job! but pays off for insurance purposes, assessment of repairs necessary, and so forth), and getting my household in some kind of good shape. But tragedy struck: I was so enthusiastic about Goa that Rafael, my head bearer, Robin's best friend, and the mainstay of "Jairaz House," got homesick, decided he'd have to quit and go back to the rice paddy. He says it's for good, but I think maybe he's just going for a few weeks to help plant. Everyone's servants depart about this time of the year, and they don't seem to realize that a straight request for leave will get reasonable consideration, so they make up stories about how their father died or they are sick or something, and then show up again in a couple of months. (March 3, 1951)

Unfortunately Rafael didn't show up again. Shiva, his replacement, was older and smoother. He had been in service with British families for forty years. I thought very highly of him. Not a Goan or a Christian, he seemed to get on fairly well with Antonio, and with the lower servants, and served me meticulously.

[He] is so punctilious he almost scares me! Then I got a nice strong young fellow for the heavies, and with the cook, plus the three part-times ones (laundryman, mending ayah, and bathroom sweeper...), and our darling Siamese puss Rani, we make up quite a household. Come along, there's more than room for another! I decided against getting a driver until you come. We will need one then as you will need the car during the day, but I rather enjoy driving, nerve-wracking as it is in Bombay. (June 11, 1951)

From early 1951 on my letters are increasingly taken up with plans for Mama's visit. Over the ensuing months there followed a shower of advice from me on the best ships, what to bring, and all sorts of other things. Plans changed because her arrival was more than once pushed back and in the event she got there only in November. She had followed my suggestions as to what to bring to the letter, and then about doubled them.

Her impending arrival created another housing problem for me. Our apartment was fine for the two of us, but could not comfortably accommodate a third. There followed the usual number of false starts and lost chances, the latter effectively aided and abetted by the incompetence of George Small: "who's in charge of housing and is also a dolt" (April 17, 1951). I was not enthusiastic about living in an apartment in the consulate compound then being built. I preferred if at all possible to live at some comfortable distance from professional colleagues. Finding a new place wasn't easy:

[the] flat I told you about in the last letter went the way of many good things, unfortunately. The Government won't assign it to us, and if they do, a senior officer gets it. ... the senior officers get good places because of their rank, and the clerks get good places because of "democracy." This leaves the junior officers holding the bag, and we still have to put up a good front for the sake of Uncle Sam's prestige. (April 3, 1951)

But there was a happy ending:

... our new house... is just lovely... has a nice wide central corridor, and a 16x32 foot living-dining room... a veranda about 8 feet wide running the length of the main room.... two bedrooms, each 15x21... I'm having some nice furniture built for [Robin's] room, in sizes he can use both now and later.... why not live like human beings -- we'll always be moving around.... each bedroom has a huge bath, and I've fixed mine up for a dressing room [building a large curtained clothes closet along one side, putting a dressing table on another wall]... The apt. house is on a sort of circle, off the main road, so children can play safely and in nice gardens... [it] is leased by Caltex Oil company, and I don't know why they were so nice as to offer me the place when it came vacant! (June 11, 1951)

HARRY G. BARNES JR.
Vice Consul/Rotation Officer
Bombay (1950-1953)

Ambassador Barnes was born in Minnesota and raised in Minnesota and New York. He was educated at Amherst College and Columbia University. After service in the US Army in World War II, he joined the Foreign Service and was posted in 1950 to Bombay, India. His other foreign posts include Prague, Moscow, Kathmandu and Bucharest. He served as United States Ambassador to Romania (1974-1977; India (1981-1985) and Chile (1985-1996) in addition to having several senior level assignments at the State Department in Washington. Ambassador Barnes was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2001.

Q: Where did you go?

BARNES: The consulate general in Bombay. From February 2, 1951 until roughly July, 1953.

Q: Who was the Consul General?

BARNES: Prescott Childs who subsequently went on to be the Consul General in Antwerp before retiring.

One anecdote before we go on. This is from my wife's experience. There was a course for wives during the period while we were taking our junior officer course, taught by, don't know if I remember her first name, her last name was Alling. Her husband had been ambassador to Pakistan and had died at post [Editor's note: Paul H Alling was the first American Ambassador to Pakistan and served from February to June 1948. He contracted amoebic dysentery at post and died in January 1949]. Her job was to try to make sure that these new Foreign Service Officer's wives understood what the obligations were of the Foreign Service wife and the thing that stuck most in my wife's mind anyway was Mrs. Alling's description of how to entertain the king and the queen. Fortunately, in a sense we hadn't, at least at one point later in our career we had passing acquaintance with the king and queen of Nepal but that's about the closest we got to using that information. Not to mention questions of gloves and turning cards and so on.

Q: In Bombay in 1952, what was it like then?

BARNES: At one level, it was a shock, having never been outside the States before.

Q: You were married by this time?

BARNES: Yes. I got married actually while I was still at Amherst. I came back from the Army, almost three years and we had one child and the visual shock coming into Bombay in the late hours of the night, early hours of the morning in March, which is not really hot compared to the way it gets later but it was hot enough too and as you got off the plane it was as you were coming into a small furnace. And then going through the..., even at whatever hour it was but it was late, but it was still very,...the streets were very, very crowded. Going by a funeral procession, which was all very visible, and so on.

We should have been put up, according to consulate procedure at the principle hotel of town is some ways still is the Taj Mahal facing on the sea, on the bay, with a view of the large gate, called the Gate with India with which the British commemorated the visit of, I think it was the King. Anyway, for some reason, there was no room at the inn at that time so we were put in another hotel, which was OK but not great in terms of cleanliness, sort of what one worries about when one has a small child. We decided after a, because our apartment wasn't ready sort of after a week so that we really had to move to something that was more passable and we selected a place and just as we are getting into a car to take us to the new hotel, a consulate car pulled up with another couple and their children and they were moving into the place we were leaving and we asked them where they were coming from and they were coming from the place to which we were moving. So there was that aspect of getting used to a place but it was soon overtaken by a fascination with the country and over the couple of years we were there, we did a lot of traveling around the country often taking our child and then we had another child born in Bombay, as a matter of fact.

My work was fairly typical of a new officer; a rotational type assignment, consular work for about a year or so. I was the consular officer, I was the GSO (General Services Officer, i.e., administration) for about six months, I was one of three at that point; economic officer for another stretch, and then finally the last few months I was the one political officer at the consulate. In November 1952 the consul general departed and Everett Drumright replaced him. You may know of Drumright, who had been in China. Since July of 1951, he had been a counselor of embassy in New Delhi under Ambassador Chester Bowles. Another first tour officer there, who arrived the same month as Drumright, was Paul Kreisberg, who later would have a China connection.

Q: An old China hand.

BARNES: Right. Prescott Childs was a combination of very, very strict, very demanding and at one point he thought it was important to tell me that I should be more careful about the way I parted my hair. We got to be good friends and I saw them subsequently and so on. On the whole I would say it was a good experience. I felt I learned a lot about basics in the Foreign Service.

Q: I realize you were in a consulate general and a very junior officer. How did you see relations with India at that time? I am just thinking that, was it Krishna Menon was riding high.

BARNES: Not so high as he did somewhat later.

Q: But it was not the easiest of times, it never is, but...

BARNES: At the some time it was close enough to independence, independence having been '47 and '48, and some of the excitement that came with an old country that was a new country at the same time. Nehru was the dominant figure and I remember going to what was called Chapati Beach in Bombay and listening to Nehru talk. I also remember some of the people who were attempting to carry on the Gandhian tradition, both of non violence, but also the simple life. The problems were clear in the sense that Bombay had become home of sorts to refugees from Pakistan so there were a lot of squatters, a lot of slums and a lot of shanty towns. But my basic recollection at this point is more one of fascination and again a certain excitement of becoming in a small way involved in another society.

Q: When you were doing consular work, did you get involved with Indian authorities on consular matters?

BARNES: Occasionally, I did have some liaison responsibilities with the police, for example. The problems though were...well, there were not that many Americans who presented problems as such, although there was a fairly, not large, but not small American colony, a business colony, primarily missionaries as well. So I would say more of the standard consular problems. For a while we had regulations about the need to issue individual visas to seamen, something that came out of the 1951 Immigration Act and I so I ended up having to interview a lot of seamen. I would say having done consular work subsequently as well,

Q: You didn't end up seeing Americans in jail and that sort of thing?

BARNES: One or two had sort of brushes but nothing too serious. One American citizen died and I had to take care of that situation.

Q: I always think of the Indian bureaucracy as being difficult to deal with, in that it is a vast bureaucracy which is used to employ a lot of people.

BARNES: But it was my bureaucratic contacts or contacts in the sense of seeking help and so on. That worked OK.

Q: What about Indian society? Did you get involved with people?

BARNES: I got involved some, yes, partly through consular contacts. The Consul General would include us in what he was doing as would the deputy principal officer through some of the people in the USIS (United States Information Service) who had other contacts more on the cultural side through some of the American business people who were there. So it was in good part a mixing with Indians, less so Americans as Americans. The consulate group was fairly small..

Q: The Bombay consular district included what states?

BARNES: Well, it included the West Coast essentially from the state of Gujarat – where the earthquake took place not too long ago - I am giving the current names rather than the names at the time because the reorganization wasn't done until later in the decade. Maharashtra. Madhya Pradesh, which is inland, those are the three principle areas.

Q: Did you have French or Portuguese enclaves in your territory?

BARNES: I had Portuguese enclaves in Goa and a few, not that big in Gujarat. The French enclaves were under the East Coast. We took a trip to Goa and actually called on the Portuguese governor. Spent some time on the beach in Goa.

Q: Looking back on your political work, were we concerned at all about a Communist movement within India?

BARNES: Not seriously at that point. The section of what is now considered properly south India but at that stage was partly central India and partly south India, the state of Andhra Pradesh, the eastern part of that state had groups that are called Naxalites who were sometimes thought of as Communists. I am not sure whether they were Maoist in later jargon but were essentially rural based. It was the closest but that was sort on the border of our districts.

Q: I guess the Madras consulate covered Kerala...

BARNES: ...and Calcutta was covering West Bengal, which was the other communist influenced area in India.

Q: Kerala was one place I remember; now I never served in India, which was considered where the Communists were.

BARNES: They still are a force in Kerala and the sharing of power has gone back and forth between the Congress Party in Kerala and Communist. The Kerala Communist and for that matter, the West Bengal Communists didn't ever, what should I say, have much success in expanding their influence into other states. It was strong in only those two states.

Q: Did you get involved in the, what was it, later known as Bollywood?

BARNES: Bombay Hollywood? Just on the fringes. I believe it was getting started at that point, but no, not a lot.

Q: What was the language there?

BARNES: Bombay at that time, it was called Bombay State and as I said it covers now essentially the states of Maharashtra, Gujarat, there was a later split on the so-called linguistic states principle. There are two principle languages were Gujarati and Marathi and I began on my own to try to learn some...FSI had no language training before I left and I got to the point I could manage the script and some fairly elementary language but it convinced me that I was at least going to try after that wherever I went to get some language training. I wasn't terribly successful at the beginning but subsequently I managed to do it.

HAROLD G. JOSIF
Madras (1951-1953)

Born in Burma in 1920 to American Baptist missionaries, Harold G. Josif graduated from the University of Chicago in 1941. Josif served in the Army Air Corps during World War II, received a M.A. from Tufts in International Relations and entered the Foreign Service in 1947. His overseas posts included Pakistan, Portugal, India, Iran, Ceylon (now Sri Lanka, Somalia, Libya). Josif also served as an instructor at the Air War College. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1999.

Q: In 1950, whither?

JOSIF: In 1950, I was selected for South Asia language and area studies, which were then conducted at the University of Pennsylvania. I was brought back in August of 1950 and spent the school year plus the following summer (in other words, about a year calendarwise altogether) at the University of Pennsylvania taking their courses. They weren't designed specifically for the Foreign Service, but they were generally pretty good for us. Part of it was language training. They taught basic Hindustani that could be used in most of India and even in West Pakistan. The area studies were important. Economics of South Asia, social conflicts, art, history of art. One survey course was called "The History of Indian Civilization." It was given by W. Norman Brown, who was the chairman of the department, certainly our best-known scholar at that time of the history of the subcontinent. I undertook to write a thesis. It wasn't really required that I go to that much effort, but I wrote an 80 page single spaced paper. It was entitled "Political Stability on the Northwest Frontier of South Asia." The area covered was basically West Pakistan and Afghanistan.

Again, we enjoyed this interlude. It was good to get reamericanized. But we were then assigned to Madras. That was unfortunate in one respect. I was not able to use my Hindustani in Madras. I certainly lost my facility in it. I'm not sure how much better it would have been if I had gone to a Hindustani-speaking post right away.

Q: You went to Madras and you were there from 1951 to when?

JOSIF: To April 1953.

Q: What was Madras like at that time as a post? What was its role in India?

JOSIF: Madras was one of the four most important cities in India. It was the recognized center for affairs concerning the southern quarter of India. The population of the consular district in those days (we had only four) was roughly 80 million people. There was a consulate general in Bombay and one in Calcutta and then New Delhi, of course, took up the fourth. South India is an area of minority groups who speak the Dravidian languages. There were four regional languages: Tamil, Telugu, Malayalam, and Kanarese. I had four local employee assistants, one for each of these languages.

One of my first jobs as the head of the Political Section (Actually, I was the only American political officer.) was to report on the upcoming general election, which was the first one in independent India, in 1951-1952. These elections were to the Indian Parliament. Indian elections are spread over a period of a couple of months. I had just arrived, but concentrated on this reporting. Then I started to study why the communists had succeeded in several areas. There were three areas where the communists got a majority of the vote.

The three areas were first Travancore-Cochin (later converted into Kerala State), where they spoke Malayalam. There was one district in Madras State, where they spoke Tamil. And then there were a couple districts in Andhra Pradesh, which were Telugu-speaking. So, my task, I thought, was to find out what was common in these three areas and what made people there vote differently than in other parts of India, where they voted in general for Congress Party and regional "communal" candidates.

In South Asia, the really basic political unit is the community. By that I mean people who belong to the same caste or who are otherwise identified by some common ethnic characteristic. Generally, this is stronger than any other force - nationalism or ideology or religion per se.

At first, it was striking that these three areas spoke three different languages. There was a lot of difference in the climate, too. But then I began to get into some "pay dirt." Statistics showed that each of these areas was unusually productive agriculturally. Communism had reared its head in South India not because of the poverty of these rural districts, but precisely in the areas where they had the best rice production, the most income per capita - and the most education! I was able to gather about 12 characteristics like that that these districts had in common. Some prevalence of Christianity was another factor that was common. That went along with education by and large. I submitted a long report with statistical tables and maps showing these areas in red. The overall conclusion was that they voted communist not because of dire poverty. They were all poor by American standards, but actually better off than other areas around them. It was because of the disparity in the incomes between the landowners and the landless peasants, usually sharecroppers. That combined with literacy. Some missionary activity had had an inadvertent role in the communist success, because it had educated people. They were somewhat aware of how the outside world lived and therefore more dissatisfied with the disparity in income in their locale. So, that made an interesting report. I was commended for it by, among others, Paul Nitze of Policy Planning.

Actually, I liked this post. Chester Bowles was ambassador. Robert Taylor was consul general. I felt very confident in my role. My output was very high.

Overall, my reports from Madras were singled out for 15 commendations for excellence and seven commendations of very good by the Department. The South Asian Office at the Department then had a program for commenting on field reports. They also commented, "Largely because of Mr. Josif's efforts, the Department probably has a more coherent and up to date intelligence of the political situation in Madras and South India than in any other consular district in India." Ambassador Bowles wrote in February of 1953, "Mr. Josif has shown a marked ability to go beyond the more conventional kind of reporting and provide analyses of basic social, economic, and political conditions underlying political events and trends. It is apparent from his reports that he has well cultivated personal sources of information and has made extensive and intelligent use of documentary materials."

Q: When I was in the Foreign Service during most of the Cold War, although I never served in India, I think all of us knew about this enclave of communism in South Kerala. This sort of stuck out like a sore thumb. So, there was a lot of interest in this during the whole period.

Did you get into what kind of communists were these?

JOSIF: Most of them were nominal communists. Kerala was a very interesting case because it had by far the highest literacy rate of any state in India. Perhaps due to the caste structure there, there were equalitarian tendencies, too. It's the only area in India that I'm aware of where they had a matriarchal social system - not all of them, but in some of the communities there. I think that it was because they were more aware of social inequalities and the promise of communism for equalization that made them cotton onto that ideology. Again, you have to say that this correlated with Christianity. Christianity came to that part of India in the first few centuries of the Christian era. It's interesting that the other major center of communism in India is West Bengal, where they've had a communist government for many years. There is a similarity between the educated Bengalis and the educated Malayam people of Kerala.

I had an amusing experience going to Kerala once. I was traveling with our labor attaché from Embassy New Delhi. His name was Henri Sokolove. We called on a prominent newspaperman in Kerala, an editor. I had just introduced Mr. Sokolove when the editor interrupted and said, "Oh, it's so good to see you here. We are great admirers of the Soviet Union. It was very nice of you to come and see us." Then I introduced myself, saying, "I'm from the American consulate general in Madras." He said, "And you, too. We're so happy to have Americans here with the Russians."

Q: As a practical measure, did you see any translation of this communism in a local state translating itself into anti-Americanism or problems for us?

JOSIF: Not that I recall now in any detail. It was a local phenomenon due to local circumstances, basically, but we took measures to counteract anti-American propaganda in some areas. We had no reports of the Soviets or any other communists coming down and exhorting the people. This was just something that came from their reading, their outlook, and their social and economic situation. However, much of the material in local bookstores was communist, very cheap, and probably subsidized. We took steps through USIS to counteract such material.

Q: This was during the McCarthy period. Were you feeling any heat as a junior officer there?

JOSIF: Yes. I was going to mention this at the end, but maybe I should do it now. I don't want to go into this in great detail, partly because I've lost touch with the details. Briefly, when I was still in Karachi, I received a questionnaire and request to answer by affidavit about two things. One was, did I know certain named people (There were eight of them.) at the Library of Congress in 1942? Secondly, was I a member of the Communist Party at any time?

I answered to the first question by explaining that three names there were of people who were leaders in this trade union local that I belonged to when I was at the Library of Congress. Regarding the other five, I had no recollection of them. On the other question, I said, "No, I never was then or ever have been a member of that party." That was the last I heard of that. Then in 1953, the Eisenhower administration came in and a new standard of proof was instituted - it was incumbent upon the employee to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that his continued employment was in the national interest. In other words, they shifted the burden of proof from the normal place, on the prosecution, to the accused. So, this reopened my case apparently. I was called back from Madras to Washington in April of 1953 and went through a very harrowing experience for over a year. One month, I was given make-work in the public affairs area under a gentleman named John French, who was extremely understanding. There were several of us junior officers under him, all in a problematical status. But I had a lot of time to work on my case. I was separated from my family for over four months.

Q: Your family was still in-

JOSIF: Yes. They left my family in Madras.

Friends said I should get a lawyer, and I read a book by John Lord O'Brian about civil rights law. He was a Washington lawyer, very prominent, elderly, perhaps the dean of Washington lawyers. I called on him and asked him his advice and he said, "I'll get a lawyer to work with you for a minimum charge." This designated lawyer, from a law firm on Jefferson Street, urged me to write an autobiography to show what kind of person I was (and that, therefore, it was unlikely I would have ever belonged to this party, which was the real issue). The question about my associates at the Library of Congress, whatever they were, presumably arose because they were considered to belong to that party, too. He felt that the implied guilt by association here would not be decisive.

Q: When you say "that party," you're talking about...

JOSIF: The Communist Party. So, my lawyer said, "Write your autobiography." I wrote a very thorough one, perhaps 50 or 60 pages. On reading it, he complained that he was getting only "charwoman's pay," actually 50 dollars.

One day at the Department, I was summoned to see a man named Scott McLeod, who had been a big wheel in the congressional investigations of communists in government. I think he was chief of security. He tried to pressure me to resign, which I refused to do. I said, "I'm innocent." So the lines were drawn that summer. I spent a lot of time going back and looking up people that I had known at the Library of Congress, many of whom were still there, interviewing them, asking them to write an affidavit on my behalf. Most of them were just character references. What could they say? The Department finally recalled my family in September. We were separated for four months and then reunited.

Then beginning in December, I was suspended without pay for five months. I had a lot of time to think, of course. It was really an impossible situation. How do you prove that you have never been a member of a group? My replies to the charges, with the autobiography and 64 exhibits, had failed to outweigh the word of my accuser, an informant said to be of "known reliability." Only I knew different. One of the things I tried to think of was who would be the informant, who would have made such a charge? It was obviously somebody who didn't know me, at least not well. What was the basis of his or her information? It had something to do with this union I had belonged to in 1942. I admit, I had been active in it, but so what? It was a local labor union. I didn't know who controlled the union and I still don't know if any party really controlled it. One of the things I learned, however, was that in 1943-1945, there was another man surnamed like me, at the Library, who was reputed to belong to that party.

Eventually, I was called in by the Under Secretary of State, the deputy to John Foster Dulles. His name was Walter Bedell Smith. He upbraided me for having belonged to a union of government employees, and said I or someone else was lying. He then offered me a lawyer of his acquaintance "to see that you have a proper defense, assuming he agrees to take you." It turned out the lawyer was Stuart Hedden, recently retired inspector general of the CIA. In my first interview with him, he lit into me for belonging to a union of government employees. I said, "Well, you have to remember that the Library of Congress was and still is a very large, practically industrial organization. Thousands of people work there. Working conditions were not good. The pay was very low, the turnover high. I viewed it like a factory with labor problems. That is why I joined the union." He accepted that. He went through my documents, by then inches thick, and represented me at my hearing. No question of my paying him ever arose. It was all pro bono work. He also offered to pay personally for travel to the hearing by any witness against me. The authorities chose not to accept that offer - or his request to interview the investigative agents involved - or my offer to take a lie detector test.

They had called a number of witnesses to my hearing, held in April 1954. One of them was the chief of the Legislative Reference Service at the Library of Congress, Dr. Ernest Griffith, a former professor of political science, a Methodist and a strong church man. He described me as having been a very liberal young man, but definitely anti-communist. Another was the deputy librarian of the Library of Congress, an old administrative hand who had been there for 35 years, I think. I had interviewed him some months before and told him I had finally guessed the identity of my accuser and would like to interview her. He strongly advised against doing so, implying a danger in it. He chewed me out later for having done what he had advised against. I said, "Well, I was desperate, Sir." For background, I had heard several times that the likely informant was a woman who had worked at the Library of Congress in 1942. I hadn't known her at all. The name was completely unfamiliar to me. But she was now retired and living with her mother in one of those townhouses in Georgetown. I decided that if I interviewed her, I might discover the basis of her suspicions of me. Incidentally, if she didn't recognize me, that showed something: she had informed on somebody she didn't know by sight. So, I went and started asking questions as if I were an investigative agent. I talked to her for 10 minutes before she finally said, "Could you show me your identification?" I must have been an untypical agent. So I said who I was. She seemed very embarrassed. In effect, she admitted she had made a mistake, but blamed others, too. I wrote an affidavit on the interview, all four hours of it. I learned later that the board asked to interview her, and did so, eventually.

So, there was this hearing. Finally, I was cleared by the members of the board, unanimously. I am sure that I had the best representation. But I never learned the details of their reasoning.

Q: But it is very indicative of the time.

JOSIF: Oh, yes.

Q: Scott McLeod was the chief of the Bureau of Security and counselor-

JOSIF: He was sent over by Congress as an enforcer of the new Loyalty/Security program.

Q: In a way, you were somewhat helped by being a missionary kid, weren't you, being part of the missionary establishment?

JOSIF: Yes, I was. As it happened, my father had been a student at Union Theological Seminary when the president was a Presbyterian who was very well-known to Dulles, himself a Presbyterian church leader. I had written to Dr. Henry P. Van Dusen hoping to get a character reference about my family. He decided to put in a word to Dulles. I don't think that would have helped, however, if I had not made a case in writing. Also, I credit the hearing board and the others who applied some common sense to the rules and to the claims of anonymous informants and their nameless handlers.

Q: This was a very dark period and I think this is very illustrative of what happened. What does one do if you're suspended without pay and you've got a wife and kids? What do you do?

JOSIF: Well, we ran down our bank balance. It was down to $50 when I was reinstated with back pay.

Q: Did you get back pay?

JOSIF: Yes. I must say that the sequel was really very satisfactory. I was immediately made the India desk officer. I was promoted the next month to class 4. I've never been very curious about my Personnel file, but did have a glance at it a couple of times. I noticed that it made minimal reference to this whole episode and commented something like this: "Apparently, he was mistaken for another person. It was a case of mistaken identity." Somebody who had read it had sort of underlined that in pen.

Q: What was the reaction of your fellow officers and all while this was going on?

JOSIF: There was one who declined my suggestion that he write me a character certificate, somebody I thought knew me better than that. But in most cases, they came through for me very well, and fully accepted me after I was cleared. If anyone, it was I who changed the most. I became more circumspect, I believe, and thus less confident or articulate. For instance, I wrote a long analysis of "Federal Employee Security Procedures" for The Foreign Service Journal (September 1954 issue). It was critical, but in such "constructive" and academic terms as to bore almost anybody.

Q: When did you start on the India desk?

JOSIF: Right away. I think it was June 1954.

Q: And you did that from 1954 until when?

JOSIF: 1957, three years. I was India desk officer for three years.

Q: How did your wife do under this thing? This must have been terrible.

JOSIF: It was a great strain. At first, our friends at Madras thought I had been called back for some honorable recognition, but as my absence went on, people stopped asking her about it. She got very anxious to rejoin me or have me come back to Madras. I wasn't able to explain very well why there were so many delays and uncertainties. It was a complex situation. I was separated from my daughter, too. I felt guilty about both. It's something I don't look back on with any pleasure, to put it mildly.

I was pleased that I was accepted back by my friends in South Asian Affairs (SOA). I'll mention them. Jeff Jones (J. Jefferson Jones, III) was the office director. I worked under Bill Williams, who was officer in charge for India/Nepal/Ceylon. I was the India desk officer. I had somebody to help me, another officer. I had served in Pakistan and India and was one of the relatively few officers in the Foreign Service then who had done both. I felt that I had a role to play in supporting a balanced policy. This was a period when India was not popular in the United States or in Washington, understandably so. I mean, Krishna Menon was-

Q: He was the bête noire of..

JOSIF: You see, he had this combination of British snobbery and British socialism. He was a product of the London School of Economics. He represented a part of Nehru. Nehru was a much more likeable person. But he too stood for non-alignment, neutralism, equidistancing between the East and the West. All of this was detestable to some people and was at least suspicious to other people. John Foster Dulles called it immoral.

Nehru was a moralizer and he would moralize against us. We were moralizers, too. So we rubbed each other's fur the wrong way. He criticized us about neo-colonialism as seen in our security alliances. They were really bothering him. We were boxing him in with SEATO on one side and CENTO on the other. We were establishing bases in these places. Of course, he was especially irritated with any military aid to Pakistan.

We in SOA felt that we should give India economic aid and that there shouldn't be so much hassle about it. One of the problems was that Nehru was reluctant to ask for it. He thought that was beneath him, his dignity. Even when we gave aid, it was not much appreciated. My theory was that economic aid, if it was to be effective, had to be addressed to actual needs and therefore should be more or less proportional between India and Pakistan according to population. India had about four times the population of Pakistan.

One of my duties was to brief new ambassadors going out to India. There was John Sherman Cooper.

Q: He was a senator from Kentucky.

JOSIF: Yes. He only stayed there about a year and then he came back to run for the Senate again, I think. Then Ellsworth Bunker. He was a very impressive person. He had been head of a sugar manufacturing company and then an association of sugar industries. But he had a broad approach to things. I was in a meeting once when an American railroad man was talking about improving railroads in India and how they should have private railroads there the way we have in the States. Bunker put him down very effectively. Here was a person with his background in private enterprise who said, "Look, we're about the only country in the world that tries to run its railroad system with private companies. We've got better things to do in India than try to change the ownership of the railroads."

I was not entirely happy with the Department in the 1950s. I certainly felt up to the job and so on. But I had, thanks to Wristonization, been set back from FSO class 4 to 5, which was demoralizing.

Q: That was a change in the calculation. At one time, they had six grades and then they moved to eight grades.

JOSIF: So they had to set back people in some of the middle grades to keep the shape of the pyramid. As a result of that, I applied to a Washington think tank about possibly shifting jobs. They seemed to take me seriously. But when push came to shove and they took me out to lunch, I said, "Well, I've thought about it some more and decided that I'd better stick with what I've got." I had built up some assets in the Foreign Service. That was my decision. But it showed that I was looking around.

Q: I think 1954-1957 was a very interesting time. I've seen criticisms today... Right now, there is another coup in Pakistan and people are looking at our attitude towards Pakistan vis a vis the Indians and all and wondering why we seem to have come down so heavily over the years on supporting Pakistan as opposed to the democracy of India. I think you were there in one of the critical times which helped set the standards. The Indians were really not considered to be very friendly. As John Foster Dulles said, they were basically immoral by playing up to the communists.

JOSIF: Right. I wrote many briefing papers trying to explain the Indian position and why we were having so much trouble with them and how it was partly just a difference in perspective. Here were two moralistic peoples, both democracies. They should be reasonably friendly, but we were talking past each other to a large extent. We ourselves had put a cat in the henhouse by giving so much aid to Pakistan. It was not known at the time, but one reason for that was we were basing a U2 plane there. That came out later when the plane was shot down in the Soviet Union. Things like that enter into decision-making, and even the desk officer might not know about it. My idea was that we have a balanced policy and try to get along with both sides. Of course, that is what most of us have tried to do for 50 years, not with any great success.

Q: Were you seeing any of the battle of the capitals, the battle of the embassies, particularly when you get somebody high-powered like Kenneth Galbraith or Bowles or something who seem to have gone overboard on love for India? Did you see the difference between our Pakistan embassy and India? Were you watching these salvos go back and forth or was it a fairly benign period when you were there?

JOSIF: I know what you're talking about. I was later, in the early 1960s officer in charge of Pakistan Affairs during the pro-Indian period. So, if you don't mind, I'll comment on this whole problem when I come to that stage.

In 1957, I asked the Iran desk officer if possibly there was some consulate in Iran where I could serve and get some experience as officer in charge. I felt that I needed that type of experience. He got me the most important consulate in Iran, I would say: Tabriz. I was asked to arrive in May. This meant taking our daughter out of school a little early. As it happens, when we left the post two years later, we were asked to stay on through an inspection. So, we didn't get out until August. It was a direct transfer to another post, but meanwhile, we had home leave in Washington. So, we put our daughter back in the school where she had been. We felt this was a great idea. She came back in tears the first day. Nobody recognized her. You know how kids are. Two years is an eternity. They had already made new friends and they didn't recognize her. She was really devastated. On top of that, she became deeply worried about how she was missing school at our new post.

Q: I always found in our moves, the hardest ones have been when we've come back to Washington. The kids don't really adjust very well.

JOSIF: I don't know if a study has been made of this, but there is some feeling in the Foreign Service that our kids don't turn out as well as kids generally. I don't know if there are any statistics that would support that. But there have been many cases of kids who have had a lot of problems adjusting.

EVERETT DRUMRIGHT
Consular Officer
New Delhi (1951-1952)

Consul General
Bombay (1952-1953)

Everett Drumright received a bachelor's degree in business administration from the University of Oklahoma in 1929. His Foreign Service career included positions in China, the United Kingdom, Korea, Hong Kong, Taiwan, and Washington, DC. Mr. Drumright was interviewed by Mr. Lee Cotterman on December 5, 1988.

Q: What brought about your assignment to New Delhi and Bombay, India? Can you tell us about that?

DRUMRIGHT: Well, they said I had been there about three years. They wanted my views back in Washington. So I was given a ride back with John Foster Dulles, who was out there on special mission in Japan.

So I got a ride on his aircraft back to Washington. And I think they had hoped there that I would support this armistice, but I never did. I was against it and I said so. That's one of my failings in the Foreign Service, I guess. And I was then shunted off to India.

I had said I would like to go to Singapore as consul general, but they had already assigned another officer to that post. So they said Loy Henderson would be interested in having you in New Delhi, so I went. But I was there less than two months when Loy left. Chester Bowles came to be ambassador and we never did get along too well. He always wanted to run the shop strictly his own way, and he brought out his own people, and so on. But I stayed with him over a year when one day the post in Bombay came open. I went to see him and said, "I would like that post, if you would like to recommend my going there." And he said he would.

So I went to Bombay and spent less than a year as consul general, which I enjoyed. I found Bombay very agreeable after Delhi, where the Indian people, the officials, were not all that friendly towards us.

HOWARD FRANK NEEDHAM
Information Assistant, USIS
Madras (1951-1952)

Information Officer, USIS
New Delhi (1952-1955)

Howard Frank Needham began his career in journalism with the San Francisco Chronicle. In 1942, he enlisted in the U.S. Army. His career with USIS included positions in Vietnam , Guatemala, Paraguay, Lagos, and Nigeria. Mr. Needman was interviewed by G. Lewis Schmidt on March 29, 1990.

Q: This was 1951?

NEEDHAM: Yes. I received my letter of appointment from the Department of State in April of 1951, and reported within a few weeks to the Foreign Service Institute in Washington, D.C., for preliminary training. Subsequently, I was assigned to Madras, India -- in South India -- as an assistant information officer and vice consul, and at a very low grade I might add, which was later corrected.

Q: So you were assigned to Madras in Southern India; that was a fractious time in India, as I recall. I'd like to ask you what was your impression at the time; what experiences did you have as you got there that were important to give you the atmosphere of the place?

NEEDHAM: Well, atmosphere was certainly strong, Lew. To this day I have a vivid, almost immediate recollection of every detail of my arrival at Sahar Airport, just outside Bombay. The ride into town was really jolting to an American brought up with very little overseas experience. I had never seen poverty or squalor to the degree that I saw it along the roadside from Sahar Airport into Bombay. That was very jolting and gave me second thoughts as to where I was bringing the family, which by that time consisted of a wife and three children.

I arrived at the hotel, the famous Taj Mahal Hotel, commonly known as the Taj, on a bright, sunny afternoon after a very long flight. In those days we had no jets. It was a motor flight, with the only stop at Cairo, all the way from London, and I was exhausted. I remember sitting on the bed and bending over to take off my shoes, and that's the last thing I recall until about 8:00 the following morning when I awakened. There was a bearer in my room and he was drawing a bath, and unpacking my suitcase.

Oddly enough, I awakened with the same question in the forefront of my mind with which I had drifted off to sleep. That was, "Where am I bringing my family?"

I stepped to the French-doors window, opening onto a balcony, and looked down into the beautiful garden below, and watched some of the gardeners at work. It was a bright, sparkling, sunny day, and I was struck with the vivid foliage and colors of India, in a most picturesque -- almost Hollywood-type setting. And something about this reassured me, and as I stood on the balcony and listened to the chatter in Gujarati language -- at that time, I understood not a word of it -- I realized that these were a very poor people, and a very cheerful people. I was somewhat reassured. I felt that perhaps it was going to be a very good experience for all of us. I never had reason, in the subsequent four years that I served in India, to reverse that feeling. It is something that I find a little amazing, even today, to realize.

I look upon the Hindu people, and the people of that subcontinent, as a very happy and courageous people, in spite of their hardships. I find it humbling to compare their lot with our lot, or even with the lot of Western civilization. I doubt that there would be the same amount of cheerful acceptance of hardship anywhere west of the Suez.

I perhaps should mention that en route to Madras I went from Bombay by air to New Delhi for consultation with Clare Timberlake, at that time Country Public Affairs Officer for all of India. He later became ambassador, and is best known for his career in the Belgian Congo -- what is now known as Zaire.

After several days' consultation in Delhi, I proceeded on to Madras, where I took up my duties as assistant information officer, and publications officer.

The first problem that we seemed to have was getting a small pamphlet printed, which had been in the printing shop for several months. When I inquired as to why it had not come off the presses, the reply was that they were lacking a certain drying agent for their inks, and had to send to Europe for it -- a chemical. They stated it was impossible to print without this drying agent in the dye, for the colored cover of the proposed pamphlet.

I took this up with the foreman of the plant, an ex-RAF officer who had elected to stay on in India -- a very charming fellow. We had a long lunch, during which he said there was one thing they might try, and it struck me as very odd; they could substitute the white of an egg for this chemical and perhaps that would react under the heat of their gas jets as a drying agent. At least it would be worth trying, and we'd get a dye fix for the deep blue color, which was part of the cover. And this worked. I had never heard of it before, nor since. I think it's probably the first time and the only time that a USIS pamphlet was printed with the help of the white of an egg.

Q: I think when we had the tape off, you said something about this being a new post. Was it? Were you just opening the post at that time?

NEEDHAM: Yes, it was midsummer of 1951. Construction of USIS Madras had just been completed, with a substantial public (USIS) library as a nearby annex. Media and cultural affairs offices were housed in a large and airy building in Mount Road. We had the five languages of Madras State in which to work. They are actually distinct languages, having their own writing systems. I emphasize they were not dialects or sub-dialects. Each language had to have its own translation staff. We hired translator editors; people with some journalistic experience, but who were at least bilingual in two Hindu languages.

This was the staffing pattern with regard to the publications and press programs. We had the wireless file coming in at that time, and it was circulating in a limited version to about thirty publications in the countryside, and to five large daily publications (in three different languages), in Madras and its environs, on a daily basis. So the need for the translating desks to get fully operating was immediate and a matter of pressure.

In addition to not having all the furniture in place, we had not completed our hiring program. At the same time we were endeavoring to get into pay-dirt operation. The pamphlet came off the press and the advice had been good. The cover was fine, the colors were fixed, and it, I think, was the first pamphlet published from the new headquarters.

The next job of size or moment was a quick call from Delhi in late June, asking if we could arrange to publish thirteen American book titles -- American literature, classics for the most part, in each of the five South Indian languages. I remember that the book I was most interested in was George Orwell's 1984, which I thought would be an excellent think piece for all five language-audiences.

About George Orwell -- of course, we know he was a British officer, and we know that his work was highly political. My reason for including Orwell's work among the list of other titles, most of them less political, was that I felt that the Orwell thesis was a very strong counter to the rather frightening inroads into popular opinion local Communist Parties were making throughout India at this time of great change; and at this time when the Indians were coming out of centuries of not having any popular government of their own, most of them never having been concerned with government. Some of them didn't know what "government" was.

Ferment and public confusion contributed to what might have been a very fertile ground for communist takeover at that time. We did not feel that such likelihood was imminent, but neither could we ignore it.

We finally got the books translated, edited, printed, bound and published, and the next step was to get them distributed to where there were people who were literate, and with a few rupees to purchase them. They were sold at a very low price. They were paperbacks. They were printed, published, bound, and translated at very low cost. That was a phenomenon of operating in the communications field in India in those days.

Distribution was accomplished largely through the little book stalls, which you would see in every railroad station of South India. And it was a happy circumstance that these kiosks existed. We had the cooperation of the new Madras state government in gaining a franchise to distribute these books through the state-operated railway system.

We then proceeded to go to more conventional targets, and began to build our mailing lists of literate purchasers in all five languages who were asked to fill out a card giving basic biographical data, which became part of a language-circulation file. Most of them were pleased to sign on to a new learning source. We scrounged directories and libraries for lists of doctors, lawyers, educators. We visited colleges and high schools, where bright students were completing their education. And we encouraged the general public to come in and see the library and make a visit to the Mount Road office. At that time, we had gifts of pamphlets and other literature to hand out to visitors.

Q: You already answered part of my question. I assume you were aiming these books at, primarily, the elite of India, the educated of India, and those who had a reasonable reading capability. And I gather that you probably thought that the mass of Indians, who were clear down at the poverty level, weren't going to be very influential in the Indian political scene. Is that a correct assumption?

NEEDHAM: In part it is, Lew. We did feel that the mass was unfortunately illiterate. But you can't live in India very long without realizing that the most illiterate group in any language is alert; they're attentive, they are receptive, and the job of getting a response from them is really facilitated by their keen interest in the world about them, in spite of the poverty conditions which are overwhelming.

We had other means of approaching these people, both the literate and the illiterate. There was the motion picture program, the mobile units which went out to the villages and presented USIS films, all of which had some spoken message of encouragement and often a message of how to improve things in general. Many of these films were acquired from American sources, and soundtracks dubbed in, in the native languages.

I feel that also our exhibits program, perhaps, was even more effective, especially in urban areas, where we could put on a large exhibit, and where there was avid interest in anything foreign, especially in anything American, in those days. The hunger appeared to be inexhaustible, whether it be for books, exhibits, films, or visits to the office. We often were crowded with people in our reading room.

Q: I don't remember whether you mentioned earlier, but you did mention, first of all, Orwell's 1984 -- the British author. I gather most of your books, however, were of American origin. About how many titles did you put out? What were some of the other books that you published? Do you have any fix on the number of volumes that were sold, or distributed?

NEEDHAM: It's difficult to recall right now what the print runs were on these 14 titles, and subsequent titles which were published. It's even difficult to remember all the titles. But we were not printing heavy tomes, or massive works, such as you would expect from early American literature. We were putting out contemporary literary works.

When I say contemporary, I go back as far as the early 20th century, and maybe even a few in the late 19th century. It seems to me we put out three of Mark Twain's works, in an effort to provide something interesting for the youth audiences, the literate youth audiences. Other works were abridged so that the end product could be something handily carried by the dhoti-clad passengers along the South India railway system. And I also might mention that our best customers, of course, were from the first class and second class carriages. Pamphlets were also available on the railroad platforms for third class passengers, some of whom had sufficient reading ability to be interested in obtaining them.

Tamil was our richest language. It seems to me that we published, and sold successfully somewhere between 30,000 and 40,000 of these various 14 titles, to the Tamil audience alone. The other language audiences took proportionately less, but I would say that in all we probably sold between 80,000 and 100,000 books that year. I emphasize that this is many years ago, and I have not kept notes. But this estimate feels right to me at this time.

Q: You've been talking about editing and publishing these books in the five different languages that were prevalent in Madras State. I don't think you've named them yet, except incidentally. Can you tell me what those five languages were?

NEEDHAM: Well, I can recall, of course, Tamil, which is the main language of South India. And its running mate, Telugu. Then Malayalam, which is the language spoken over on the west coast.

Q: Would you spell that for the transcriber?

NEEDHAM: As I recall, it was M-A-L-A-Y-A-L-A-M. I wouldn't say that I'm a Webster authority on how you spell Malayalam; the fourth language was Kannada.

Q: You'd better spell that, too.

NEEDHAM: That would probably be K-A-N-N-A-D-A. The fifth language was Hindi.

Q: I don't know whether you want to say anything more about the book program right now, but you mentioned, also, that you were using the wireless file extensively, and therefore I assume you had to have contact with the editors of the press. So you might tell me just exactly how you operated there, and what sort of material, besides the wireless file if any, you got into the press. And finally, was this government press or was this an independent, private press operation?

NEEDHAM: To answer your last question first, Lew, as far as the press was concerned, it was, for the most part, private enterprise, in all languages. Even though we were in the highly urban area of Madras City, there were a great many small, lingual newspapers, some of them weeklies, and some of them bi-weeklies. In addition to that, there was one English language daily, The Daily Mail, and another daily, which was owned by Goenka. Goenka was the William Randolph Hearst of the subcontinent.

Q: Could you spell his name, as well as you can recall it?

NEEDHAM: Yes, that would have been G-O-E-N-K-A, and I'm sorry, I don't remember Goenka's first name, because he was a charming fellow, and a generous host. He delighted in having Americans to his house for dinner about once a month. And the occasions were always enlightening as well as enjoyable.

We contacted editors of the language press, as we called it, largely through our local employees. This was because they were familiar with their own translations. They, for the most part, had previously worked at one or more of these publications, and were on close professional terms, and in some cases, close personal terms with the editors. And we felt that their entrée and their welcome would bear the weight of daily, or semi-daily contact with these local staffs better than the U.S. consular presence inflicting itself too frequently.

We saved ourselves for visits on occasions such as anniversaries, promotions, the presentation of a new project, or similar occasions, and left the day-to-day press contact to our local employees, who did an excellent job, and placed a great amount of material. I might emphasize here that the press reflected the intellectual hunger of India in general in those days. They were so excited at being a free country, they were so hopeful of overcoming their illiteracy, hope sprang eternal. And it was a time of joyful anticipation, really. The press of India, particularly South India, reflected that mood at that time, which operated to a great extent in our favor; it made our materials welcome.

Q: What kind of materials were you getting into the press? I presume you got in much from the wireless file, but did you get any other kind of material -- of an editorial character, or so forth -- into the press?

NEEDHAM: Yes. Considering that Madras State was composed of five former political entities, either provinces or city-states, and 80,000,000 people speaking five different languages, it was a rich, sort of garden variety of a placid, methodical people, who for the most part got along very well together. And we were able, always, to place current news in the daily press, without any difficulty whatsoever; it was welcomed.

The Sunday editors were open to us for long-length features. Their primary interest was "what is America like? Is it truly the fairyland that we've heard?" And we were balancing our act to explain to them that, comparatively speaking, it was a fairyland, but that it was founded on hard work, and without identifying the puritan principle or work ethic as such, we described it.

Also, their interest ran to things cultural. They were fascinated with our motion picture industry. And incidentally, they had a very strong motion picture industry of their own in South India, Gemini Studios, run by a charming and able person, named Vasan. Vasan saved USIS Madras from a great deal of embarrassment during an international film festival, at which the Communists had arranged an elaborate exhibition -- a five-day exhibition -- on the beach, on the Bay of Bengal Beach, (of Madras City), whilst the Americans apparently had overlooked the fact that this event was coming to Madras. But I'll get to that later.

Q: We just started your discussion on the film industry when we stopped for a moment, and I think I may not have asked you before, but I guess you did not produce films in India at that time, that is, USIS did not. Were you getting all of your films, or nearly all of them, through the Agency or from the States? And what did you do about linguistics? Did you dub them, then, in India?

NEEDHAM: We in Madras depended largely on USIS New Delhi for guidance and materials with regard to the motion picture program. The pictures that we were showing were acquired by USIS headquarters in New Delhi, and were farmed out to the branch offices in the consular districts.

At first we were working with whatever we could get, frankly. And whatever we could get often was something out of Hollywood; something out of the documentary studios that dot Hollywood, on various subjects; films that were not exactly box-office appeal, but had some remote, or closer, relationship to the problems that India was facing at that time. I'm thinking primarily of films that dealt with education, with child care, with prenatal care; the forerunners of the great amount of how-to-do-it, how to live, how to improve conditions films that were produced later for USIS audiences.

From there, of course, it has developed now to the point where the film output by USIS is a sophisticated product. Also, the audience in India is a different audience from the audience that I am talking about, which after all, we must remember was back in the 1950s.

Q: You did say earlier, I think, that you went out with the mobile unit program -- went out into the hinterland. Where were you going? What kind of audiences were you reaching with this mobile unit program? And about how many mobile units were you operating?

NEEDHAM: It seems to me we were operating between 14 and 20 mobile units at almost any time in Madras. We had the capability of putting 20 on the road, but I would say that out there four or five were generally on down-time, and our active fleet was probably 15 most of the time.

As to where they went, they went to small villages in the hinterlands. South India is dotted with small villages; it's impossible to count all of them. But one cannot travel two or three miles without coming across at least two or three villages. They are so close as to be within eyesight of each other, separated largely by the dikes, paddies of rice, farms and occasional desert areas.

We felt that the motion picture program, and the exhibits program really filled a gap when it came to contacting an illiterate audience. Here was the spoken word. Here were pictures that they could stand in front of and study. And they did.

It was an enjoyable thing to watch an Indian crowd amble through an exhibit. It was the slowest moving crowd you ever saw, and gradually queues would build up behind a given shot, or a given item in an exhibit, while they stood transfixed with it. And one or more members of the audience, who were literate and could read -- that was usually the proportion of literate to illiterate -- would kindly step forth and read the native-language caption, which we had placed alongside of the item.

It was a rudimentary time, and a most enjoyable time, because we were welcomed at that time.

Q: Who was dubbing your films in the different languages?

NEEDHAM: They were done in Delhi, at a large studio in New Delhi. I cannot remember the name of the motion picture officer at that time, but he was excellent; he kept a steady stream of titles coming to us.

Q: I think you mentioned earlier, when you went to New Delhi initially for your orientation in India, that Clare Timberlake was the Country PAO. I had not been aware that Clare Timberlake ever had a USIS career, or a USIS career. This must have been just one assignment, or maybe one of two assignments that he had in the information program. Can you enlighten me on that?

NEEDHAM: Yes, Clare was, of course, a Foreign Service career officer with the State Department. And you're quite right, Lew, this was I think perhaps the single assignment, which he handled very capably, in India, with the information program.

As you may recall, in those days occasionally somebody in State would suddenly get the idea that perhaps this, (USIS), new outfit was doing something in which they ought to be interested. It might possibly round out some of the abilities of their officers. And in any case, Clare said to me, during our consultation, that he had taken the assignment because he felt it had a lot to offer anybody who planned to work in public affairs abroad, to get to know opinion molders; to understand the motivation behind professional communicators in various fields, he felt, was almost another department of diplomacy.

Q: Do you remember who the ambassador was at that time?

NEEDHAM: Yes, that was Ambassador Loy Henderson.

Q: Oh, Loy Henderson. I knew Henderson later; I never knew whether he really understood the information program or not, but if he had a man like Timberlake at that point, it didn't make much difference.

NEEDHAM: That's right. Ambassador Henderson left India very shortly after I arrived, and for years I was completely out of touch with his career.

Q: When we had the tape off for a few minutes just now, you were mentioning an event that occurred at the time. It was a rather interesting anecdote, and I wish you'd pick up and talk about it now. And spell the name of the gentleman that was involved in it.

NEEDHAM: Well, Lew, this is perhaps not an earth-shaking anecdote, but it has a certain Hindu charm for me, largely because the principal figure was a very charming, 85-year-old man, who had long been, under the British Raj, a father to the Indian people, and a great representative. His name was Rajagopalachari; that was his last name, I never knew his first name. It seemed enough if I could master Rajagopalachari. Rajagopalachari was a man, cadaverous, six-feet tall perhaps, a Brahman, very distinguished in the Indian sense.

He had operated with Mahatma Gandhi as a pioneer organizer of the Congress Party of India. He knew the British Raj extremely well. As I said previously, was a marvelous representative; had been a bridge, if you like, between the Raj and his people. And he had the respect of the British and of his people. He had held many high offices in the government of India, under the British Raj, not least of all he had been a governor of Madras during the time of Raj.

In 1947 he had been tapped by the British, by Mountbatten and his group, out of retirement to become the pro tem governor of Madras State, in preparation for the first annual elections to be held under independence, which as you know, came to India in 1951.

The work of organizing this took place during the seventh year of a continuous drought, and particularly in South India things were very, very difficult for people. The water tanks were almost dry. Disease had broken out in the cities and the villages. The crops had been light, down to almost non-existence for the last three years.

And came the day in 1951, finally, when all delegates had been elected and Rajagopalachari, still pro tem governor, was convening the very first congress of the newly independent state government of Madras. And as he did so, the chamber filled up with a large, and noisy, and jubilant crowd, which was perhaps peppered by the frequent outbursts from the front benches, where the communist delegates were seated, waiting for governor Rajagopalachari to come on stage and commence the ceremonies, which he did. And he was greeted with great applause. He was a beloved figure, particularly in the south of India, but also in the north.

This was like a crowning of his life's work. He was, early on, a Mahatma Gandhi disciple. To a great many of the Indians these were the times and events of a fulfillment of all of the Mahatma's programs. So it was a momentous and emotional occasion, interrupted unfortunately, as the old gentleman proceeded with his introductory remarks, by the communist deputies down in front, who every time Rajagopalachari paused for breath, would leap to their feet, singly or collectively, and shout, "Mr. Speaker, may we know?"

And finally Rajagopalachari stopped in the middle of his address, lowered his spectacles on his rather long and aquiline nose, and like an ancient grandfather or professor peered over the stage-apron at the communist deputies and said, "Yes, may you know what?"

And the deputies said, "We have been starving for seven years. We are thirsty. Our tanks are dry. Our children and wives are getting sick. And we want to know what is the new government going to do about that?"

Rajagopalachari paused and raised his hands in the traditional Hindu gesture of the Namasté blessing, and said very solemnly, "We will pray for rain." That stopped the raucous behavior of the communist deputies, and the proceedings went on to a happy conclusion and an orderly one. And we all started home at about 4:30 in the afternoon.

At approximately 5:00 a typhoon blew into Madras and dropped four inches of rain in about five hours. This "miraculous" episode, of course, was reported throughout the Indian press.

At this time we had a picture in the exhibits section of another event, in which Rajagopalachari was shown giving the Namasté sign of prayer-greeting and smiling at the camera. We enlarged this picture and put it in the lobby of the Mount Road office for some time. Needless to say, it drew many response-smiles from our visitors.

Q: You were discussing earlier, when we were off tape, about an incident that occurred when a film festival was given unexpectedly -- or unexpectedly to you, at least, in Madras. And I think that's worth putting on tape, so I'd like you to proceed with that now, will you Howard?

NEEDHAM: Yes, I'd be happy to. I'll start by apologizing, which is always a bad start, for not having all the details at my fingertips. But this was an exciting event and maybe just the raw substance of what really happened will suffice.

The film festival we are talking about took place in 1952 on Elliot's Beach, which is on the Madras (Western) side of the Bay of Bengal. It was attended by Western delegations from Western film-making nations, as well as from several European and Asian nations. The largest and most elaborate pavilion was the Soviet pavilion. In those days the Soviets would put on a festival, not sparing any horses, and I mean not any. We, on the other hand, in our little office over on Mount Road, had been absolutely unaware of this event. How it happened that we were unaware of it, I cannot explain. But we were unaware of it until about a week before it was due to open up, when we first heard of it.

At that time our public affairs officer, Paul Sherbet, was very concerned. In his opinion, the festival had weight around the world, and particularly out in Southeast Asia. So was there any action we could take to counter this immense budget-spectacle which we had been reliably informed the Soviets were putting forth for the occasion?

And it seemed at first that there wasn't anything we could do except sit there and take a whipping. Paul began to plunge around in his own mind and recalled that he had a friendship with Hollywood's famous producer/director Frank Capra. And he thought of having Frank fly out as a guest so that we could at least, perhaps, capture the interest of India's film brass and whoever else the Indian film brass might wish to invite from other delegations. And in short, we might be able, through the aegis of Mr. Capra, to attract an audience of multinational film moguls from Asia and Europe who were there, attending the festival.

So this was set in motion and Delhi tried to reach State and have State contact Mr. Capra. At first, State took a dim view of the idea but later, under urging from Ambassador Timberlake -- or I should say, at that time, Public Affairs Officer Timberlake -- they revised their opinion and did put the request through to Frank Capra in Hollywood. He immediately recognized Paul's name and said yes, he'd be glad to come out. And as a result, he was there in three days.

Capra's presence in India was of marked impact to people like Sri Vasam, who was the president of Gemini Studios, (one of the largest movie studios in the world), and who for years has achieved record box office revenues throughout Asia with his pictures. Vasam was delighted to have Frank Capra as his guest the whole time Capra was there. Vasam also volunteered something to us while we were waiting for Frank to arrive. It seemed that an independent film producer -- Indian, a Tamil, another Brahman -- named Sundaram, had an international cast, making what people call a French Western, down in Kerala State at that time. And among the cast was Cesar Romero, Rod Cameron, and a couple of other well-known American stars, whose names I do not recall at this distant juncture. Perhaps they, too, could come up to Madras and be honored guests?

So the result of all this was that we had Frank Capra and four American stars and numerous other Asian film lights, who were in the Sundaram Company, in the garden at PAO Sherbet's home in Madras. And the party went on variously -- in Mr. Vasam's garden, the gardens of other film producers who lived and worked in Madras -- for three days. We didn't exactly win the game, but we certainly did attract the brass from most of the delegations who had been spending all their time out on Elliot's Beach. We felt we had countered, from a defensive position, rather well.

Q: Well, it sounds to me as though even if it wasn't gathering all the crowds, it was at least a show of one-upmanship against the Soviets. Do you have anything else about the tour before we go on to your experience in Delhi?

NEEDHAM: Well, Lew, there's much that I could tell but it all would boil down to what amounts to -- in my mind, even to this day -- as a love affair with the people of my first post. And I think this is typical of most Foreign Service people.

Q: I just want to ask one final question then. We spoke briefly about radio activities earlier. You said you did have a radio officer there? What kind of a program were you putting on?

NEEDHAM: We did not have an American radio officer there. It was handled by one of our senior locals and he worked off the wireless file. I would provide him with a copy of the wireless file early in the morning and he would go through and make his own picks as to what the various radio stations would be interested in, and we would review his choices together. Normally I did not question his judgment. He was a graduate print journalist who had been a radio announcer for years. He was a man in his middle forties and mature and well known in the community.

Q: Was the radio controlled by the government at that time or was it free as the press was?

NEEDHAM: No, radio at that time was still under government control.

Q: So there was a certain limitation to what you could get on the radio then, because of that?

NEEDHAM: Exactly, yes. However, the limitation was seldom exercised.

Q: Well, I guess we've covered Madras now. Before we ever started this you told me that you were later brought up to Delhi. Can you tell me when that occurred and what were the circumstances under which you were transferred to Delhi and what assignment you had there?

NEEDHAM: Well, I was transferred to Delhi in June of '52, largely as a result of our finally getting five language desks set up for the South Indian language editions of the American Reporter, which was a USIS weekly newspaper that was published in eight languages throughout India, with the parent publication, of course, being in English, and produced at USIS New Delhi. Madras was, I think, the first post to get its language editions in operation. And I was direct-transferred up to Delhi as managing editor of the American Reporter at that time.

Q: So this was then a nationwide publication, but it went out in various languages, from the basic English that was prepared in Delhi?

NEEDHAM: That's right. I was no longer involved in the language editions. The staff in Delhi was already established. It was a very competent group and also the source of many friendships during the following three years.

Q: Was Clare Timberlake still the PAO at that time? Or had he been replaced then?

NEEDHAM: He had been replaced by that time. He had been replaced by Teg Grondahl. By that time, also, Ambassador Chester Bowles was on post, succeeding Loy Henderson.

Q: I guess, from what you said, that after you were transferred to Delhi, you had no other duties but that regarding the editing and issuance of the American Reporter. So there really isn't a great deal more to say about your first tour.

Now, I understand you went on home leave and then came back to a different assignment. So just how did that work and when did you go on home leave?

NEEDHAM: I went on home leave in the latter part of July or perhaps the early part of August in '53. In any case, George Venable Allen had arrived and was ambassador to India at that time.

Q: Didn't you also think that was about the time that you were getting the first notice of the big cut that the Eisenhower Administration ordered in the latter part of '53?

NEEDHAM: Yes. There was a very large cut and we reduced the audience size -- our circulation expenses -- on the American Reporter in order to conform to that portion of the cut which applied to the American Reporter.

Q: But the cut in personnel, which came subsequent to that, had not taken place at the time you went on home leave? That was occurring while you were on home leave.

NEEDHAM: That's correct.

Q: As I understand it, the notification of the cut in personnel occurred while you were on home leave. And at the time that you started on home leave, and most of the time you were there, you were not sure whether you, yourself, were going to be cut, or whether you were going to be retained and go back to Delhi. So will you pick it up at that point and tell me what happened on home leave and then your return to Delhi and your assignment and what you did thereafter?

NEEDHAM: Well, of course the first thing to do on home leave always was to park your family where convenient and get yourself into Washington for your debriefing, and the routine medical examination, which all officers take when they return to Washington.

That went rather smoothly. I was unable to determine whether or not I was going to be RIFed or fired. The corridors of Washington were ominously laden with conversations speculating about who was going to be fired and who was not going to be fired. It seemed to be a government-wide cut. My desk officer told me to go on home leave and to wait for a call from him, which I did. Had a most enjoyable home leave and a most enjoyable phone call at the end of it, when I was told to get back to India, that my berth there was secure and they were waiting to receive me.

So we re-embarked via Monarch Pan Am clipper, which was a propeller ship, and the five Needhams returned to India by way of Honolulu and Wake Island. We refueled there and went on into Tokyo. From Tokyo we flew to New Delhi via Bangkok. That was the Pacific route to India for Pan Am in those days.

Duty during the second tour involved a lot of routine information work. There were no particular highlights in terms of the post's relationship with its host government.

Q: Specifically, what was your position at that time?

NEEDHAM: Specifically, I was Information Officer for the New Delhi Consular District. And it involved support of other sections in USIS at the time. We all managed to cross-fertilize our ideas as well as our materials in those days.

I haven't very much to recount. It seems to me unfortunate that the thing that stands out in my mind is a very severe bout with hepatitis, which I contracted while on special duty in Kandy, Ceylon. I'd been sent there to act as Information Officer for the American delegation to the 10th Plenary Session of the Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East, which was being chaired by, at that time -- at first, by Ambassador Crowe, who was then ambassador to Ceylon -- but about the third or fourth day of the conference he was stricken with a mild heart attack, which proved to be not too serious, but which eliminated him from the running for the rest of the conference. And the chief delegate from Washington -- I think it was Dr. Merrill Gay -- took over as leader of the American delegation throughout the remainder of the three-week session.

During that period of time, some way or other, I managed to contract hepatitis and by the time I got back to New Delhi I was acutely ill, and rather dangerously so. I was examined by two doctors from the embassy clinic and they decided not to move me to Dhahran, which would have been the nearest hospital; that I would be better off taking my chances staying right in bed at home, which I did for three months and eleven days, then recovered slowly and returned to partial duty until, finally, it appeared that I was not going to make a complete recovery while in the tropics. And so I went home rather early in the second tour. I would say it must have been a good ten months before the natural termination date.

R. SMITH SIMPSON
Bombay (1952-1954)

A graduate of Virginia, Cornell and Columbia Universities, Smith Simpson has served in foreign posts including Brussels, Athens, Mexico City, Bombay, and Lourenco Marques. He also worked for the Department of Labor and the Institute for the Study of Diplomacy. Mr. Simpson was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy and Ambassador John J. Crowley on May 13, 1991.

Q: Then you left Mexico City. You were there from 1949 to 1952. And then you went to Bombay from 1952 to '54. Was this still as a labor officer?

SIMPSON: No, by that time I felt that I ought to broaden out. What I was trying to do in my Foreign Service career, in addition to serving my country and the cause of peace, was to educate myself on diplomacy, to see if it could not be made a more effective instrument of peace. So I wanted to see the process from as many angles as possible. Never having served in a consular post before, I wanted to get that experience and perspective, that insight into the contribution of consular posts to diplomacy. So I requested a consular assignment, and asked for one in the Far East. I may have specified India, because I remember thinking about the different consular posts available in the Far East and I didn't want Japan because I felt that was too Americanized. I think I specified India, and drew the number two post in our Bombay consulate general.

I was in charge most of the time, because the consul general who was there when I arrived, Everett Drumright, was soon hoisted to Washington. His friend in Congress, Walter Judd, who was pro-Chiang Kai-shek, wanted to fill the post of deputy assistant secretary of state for the Far East with somebody who was definitely, irretrievably pro-Chiang Kai-shek. So Walter Judd came to Bombay on a look-see. Drum had me to lunch with Judd, in the course of which Judd said to Drumright, "You're not going to be here for long."

After the lunch and Judd had departed, Drum turned to me and asked, "What did he mean by that?"

I said, "It's pretty evident he wants you in Washington."

So he did and Drum shortly left. There was a long hiatus before Bill Turner showed up. Bill had been counselor for political affairs in Tokyo. His tour had come to an end and, as too often happens to good officers, there was no assignment awaiting him in Washington. He had to hoof it around the corridors to find out what was available. When he found that the post of consul general in Bombay was available, he put in for that and got it.

Q: This '52 to '54 period was a very difficult time in American-Indian relations. The Korean War was on. We felt the Indians were being, to say the least, non-helpful.

SIMPSON: Plus the fact that we had negotiated an arms pact with Pakistan to supply it with arms. This reached us in India as a stunning blow. Not even George Allen, our ambassador in New Delhi, had been advised of it. He read about it in Newsweek magazine.

Q: This was the first. Since then, it's been a fairly steady thing, but this was a real blow. What was the situation as you saw it in Bombay, and how did you deal with it?

SIMPSON: We, of course, bore a lot of the brunt of it in Bombay, because we were a very large consular district, the size of France. There was a lot of government, press and industry in Bombay itself. For example, the Federal Reserve Bank of India was located there. The leading newspaper of India had its head office there, the Times of India, plus others. The textile industry was located there. Labor unions were strong. The Principal communist periodical was published there. So we got severe reactions from all of these sources, government and non-government.

We worked to counter-act the blow through personal relationships, and doing a lot of entertaining and talking over things with the Indians, demonstrating a desire to understand their point of view. We couldn't do some of the things in India that we had done in Belgium and in Greece, such as showing USIS films. The government in New Delhi was too sensitive.

A problem arose over Goa. We were accused by the Communists of having our eyes on Goa for a naval base. Since this erupted in the general environment created by our pact with Pakistan it was dynamite. Since Goa was in the Bombay consular district...

Q: At this time Goa, of course, was under Portugal.

SIMPSON: Yes, it was Portuguese territory and we were alleged to be negotiating with the Portuguese to establish a naval base there. This occurred when I was in charge, so I got in touch with George Allen and said, "How should we handle this? Do you want us to handle it, or will you handle it in New Delhi?"

He said, "It's in your district, you handle it."

So I had a talk with Frank Moraes, who was editor of the Times of India, and said to him, "Frank, how should we handle this?"

He replied, "I think the best thing to do is for you to issue a statement denying it. I will display this in a prominent place on page one, so it will be read."

That was the way we scotched that story. That is the way we operate generally, by talking to people like Frank Moraes and saying, "These are the facts, how can we get them across?" Some Indians, like Frank, were pro-Western and pro-American, and always very helpful in advising us how to do things. We tried to make these moves joint as often as possible. It made them feel needed, elicited a constructive attitude, and nourished a cooperative relationship. We reciprocated whenever we could and filled in with entertaining. Entertainment is no idle affair when done intelligently.

Q: Did you have any problems meeting Indians, people that you should meet? Was it a pretty open society?

SIMPSON: No problems of that sort, but we had another problem stemming from the fact that the Parsis were numerous in Bombay, and they were far more Western-minded than the Hindus. So they wanted to see us, entertain us, mix with us, attend our USIS lectures, and other cultural events. Our problem was to make time for the Hindus without offending the Parsis. But we had to reach out to the Hindus. Few came to us.

Chester Bowles, our ambassador when I first arrived, was well aware of this, and he had given as strict orders as he could to the consulate general to consort more with the Hindus. We were not really under the embassy; we reported directly to Washington. (This goes back to the days when India was a dominion. We had only consular posts then and they reported directly to Washington. This continued after Indian independence.

One problem was that the Hindus have eating habits disturbing to some Westerners. They eat with their fingers, they don't use knives, forks and spoons. So I was often asked by Hindus, "We'd love to have you at our home, but do you mind our eating habits?" And I'd say, "Of course not, not at all. I'll do the same." So I accepted their invitations.

Q: This was a time when we were fighting in Korea, NATO was forming up, we looked upon the Soviet Union..., it was a time of great tension. And we had a secretary of state, Dulles, who was saying (I may be misquoting, but not very much), "Neutrality is immoral." And here you were in the country that was par excellence the neutral country.

SIMPSON: Neutral country with a bias. At least a bias among top officials.

Q: Yes. How were you seeing India at that time, from your vantage point, vis-a-vis the United States and also the Soviet Union?

SIMPSON: We were not subjected to as much of that feeling about our foreign policies and our secretary of state, as our embassy in New Delhi was. In Bombay we were distant from New Delhi. There was a better balance of sentiment and opinion in Bombay than in New Delhi. So that we were aware that the feeling existed, but it was not by any means as sharp as it was in the capital and by reaching out to Hindus we were able to reinforce the more cosmopolitan outlook.

Q: But you didn't have the feeling that you were in sort of a hostile territory, or that there was something endemically biased within India towards the Soviet Union and against the United States?

SIMPSON: No, no. We gathered, in Bombay, that this was largely governmental and came from Nehru, Krishna Menon, and a relatively few people like them at the apex, that this was not a widely spread view in India. I felt relatively sure of that for I traveled rather extensively through my consular district. I felt the American media made too much -- and Secretary Dulles made too much -- of the Nehru-Krishna Menon utterances. Nehru and Krishna Menon were not India in this respect.

Q: Within the Bombay consular district, where you would be meeting officials and all, was there a distance between them and Nehru and Krishna Menon as far as when you talked to them?

SIMPSON: I don't know that I can answer that question in those terms. I wasn't aware of any rift or difference, in the usual sense of those words.

As I traveled around, I found officials, including governors of the states, were amenable to the personal touch. If you met them in a friendly manner, showing a desire to listen to them and understand their point of view, including their political situation, they warmed up to you. Governors of states would come to see me when they visited Bombay, and accept invitations to lunch at our apartment, which was in Washington House. They were very impressed by the fact that an American was interested in what they were doing and thinking.

I can remember on one occasion I visited the State of Saurashtra where a Maharajah had done a great deal for the people, unlike other maharajahs I had met, including constructing a public market so that the farmers of the area had a place to come and vend their products under hygienic conditions and protected from the sun and inclement weather. I was impressed that such a man would have this social conscience, so I didn't refrain from commenting on this. The word reached him, so when he came down to Bombay, he let me know and I had him to lunch at our apartment. Come Christmas or New Year's, he sent a representative of his down to Bombay with a present. It was a silver tea set. I said to the representative, "It is most kind of the Maharajah to offer this beautiful gift but, you know, I'm embarrassed for I cannot accept it."

He was completely flabbergasted. He said, "But you have to accept it. It comes from the Maharajah."

I replied, "I understand, and that's why I'm embarrassed. My government will not permit me to accept it."

He insisted, "You can't reject it. I'm going to leave it here. I'm going to go back and report that I have presented this present to you. And I hope you will give me words of gratitude to relay to him."

I said, "I give you those words of gratitude and I indeed thank the Maharajah most profoundly for his thoughtfulness." And I said, "I'll stop there as far as you're concerned."

People abroad are astonished that we are not allowed to accept presents.

It's very amusing how my assignment there ended. Turner took over in early 1954, and I resumed the position of number two, the political officer. Jack Jernegan came to India for a look-see. Jack was then deputy assistant secretary of state for Near East and South Asian Affairs. After visiting New Delhi, he came to Bombay, and we took to each other. He wanted to know whether I would be interested in an assignment to the embassy in New Delhi. I said, "If you're asking me my personal predilection, I would say no, because that's just a government town and I wouldn't have the range of contacts in Indian affairs I have here and the ability to travel into the countryside and talk to the villagers. But if you want me to go to New Delhi I'll go there." He said nothing further, but shortly after he got back to Washington, I got orders to proceed to Lourenço Marques.

I was in my office, looking out the windows over the harbor and admiring the sparkle of the monsoon on the ship masts, when in comes our administrative officer with a little smile on his face and a piece of paper in his hands. He said, "I have news for you." So he handed me this paper which purported to be a cable from the Department transferring me to Lourenço Marques as consul general. I responded, "Ha, ha, big joke" and tried to give it back to him, because I thought he was reciprocating a hoax I had played on him.

I had heard him say on one occasion that if there was one place in the world he didn't want to serve in, it was Reykjavik. Come April Fool's Day 1954, I had faked a telegram assigning him to Reykjavik. If I had had any thought of the traumatic effect it would have on him, I wouldn't have done it, because he was quite desolated, to put it mildly.

So I felt this was just a quid pro quo. But he said, "No, no, no, no, it's authentic."

So I said, "Well, you'll have to prove that to Bill Turner." We went in to Bill Turner, who had taken over, and the administrative officer persuaded Bill it was indeed authentic. Bill pounded on his desk and said, "I won't have this, I won't have this! I've just arrived here. You're my political officer, and I don't know anything about India. They're not going to do this to me!" Which astounded me, because we both knew how the assignment process worked. If the department had decided to transfer me, it already had somebody backed up as my replacement and somebody to replace him.

I said, "Bill, don't do this," because I knew what would happen. I knew the Department would assume that Simpson didn't want to go. But he insisted. He even got George Allen, who was our ambassador in New Delhi, to support him. George got in touch with the department also, but of course none of their objection had any effect.

WILLIAM L. BLUE
New Delhi (1952-1955)

William L. Blue was born and raised in Memphis, Tennessee in 1914. He attended Southwestern College, Vanderbilt University, and the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy. Mr. Blue entered the Foreign Service in 1941 and has served in Niagara Falls, Ciudad Bolivar, Naples, Kuala Lumpur, New Delhi, Paris, Bern, and Lisbon. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on April 11, 1991.

Q: You then went to New Delhi where you served from 1952-55. What were you doing there?

BLUE: I was in the political section. Most of my time was spent taking care of visitors -- Adlai Stevenson, Foster Dulles, Richard Nixon. I never was able to attend Hindi classes because I was so busy with all these visitors. I was the number two in the Political Section.

Q: What was the situation in India as we saw it -- the American interests?

BLUE: Nehru was in his prime. It was a fascinating period to be there because Nehru was at the height of his power. And, of course, when Eisenhower came in our relations were very cool because of the decision to give military aid to Pakistan. As a matter of fact, when Nixon came he expected to be received with open arms but was only greeted at the airport by the military secretary of the President.

I did do something that the chief of protocol objected to, although he never said anything to me about it. The American Women's Club was making important contributions in many ways to an Indian school for kids of around 5 or 6. We had an embassy bus to take the kids to the airport. When Nixon and Pat arrived the kids presented him with leis. The chief of protocol looked at me as if to say, "You are the son of a bitch responsible for this." At least Nixon didn't know who was responsible for these leis. But he got a very cold reception. By that time George Allen was there. Bowles was there when I first got there. He thought he was going to stay. I don't know why he thought that.

Q: Because Bowles was a Democrat.

BLUE: Yes. Rather controversial figure. In any case, George Allen came right away. To show you how little the White House anticipated the Indian press blackout of the visits, they sent an advance party which indicated to George Allen where and when they wanted the route of the Vice President to appear on the front page of all the papers every morning. And George Allen said, "There is not going to be any publicity about the Vice President's visit. The Vice President and the Administration are in the dog house as far as Nehru is concerned. So don't be surprised if you don't get any publicity at all."

Q: Was there any attempt to call off the trip?

BLUE: No. He was making a trip all around.

Q: Your ambassador for a while was George Allen.

BLUE: I got there in January and George must have come out around March, I'm just guessing.

Q: How long was he ambassador there?

BLUE: He was there until late 1954 and then John Sherman Cooper came.

Q: Then you had two ambassadors there. Bowles had left...

BLUE: Bowles was there about a month and a half after I arrived. He left about a month or so before George arrived. After George Allen left, John Sherman Cooper came in. He was pretty hopeless because he had never been an ambassador. He had been a Senator from Kentucky for a long period. He was a nice man, but he would go to sleep during briefings and we would have to start all over. He was rather elderly. He had just married a woman who had chased him for seven years. My wife described her as the American bald eagle -- she didn't have much hair. So, George was ambassador for most of the time I was there.

Q: And he was a professional.

BLUE: Yes, he was first class.

Q: During this period when you weren't doing your escorting, did you have much contact with the Indians?

BLUE: We had a lot of contact with the Indians and the Indian populace on the whole liked Americans. Bowles was very close to Nehru. I think he was quite effective with Nehru. George Allen was treated perhaps not as graciously as Bowles had been. The people in the Foreign Office were all Indian Civil Service, ICS. They did their job.

Q: Indian Civil Service going back to the British time.

BLUE: Oh, yes. The Secretary General of the Foreign Ministry was decked out in morning coat and stripe trousers. He was really very formal. I had difficulty with the much lower-ranking contact I was in touch with most of the time. He was rather cool and some things we wanted done were not done. The Indians were very independent. For example, we had several congressional visits thinking that they were going to tell the Indians where to get off and the Indians told them where to get off.

Q: It was also during the time of the Korean War in which the Indians, from our point of view, were not playing a very constructive role.

BLUE: They were playing games with the Chinese you see. That cooled relations even more. But I don't remember any unpleasantness. Nehru's principal private secretary was a very close and warm friend of ours. We stayed in contact with him long after we left. He has died but I still write his wife at Christmas.

Q: What about getting around and reporting on local developments?

BLUE: That wasn't a problem. We traveled a good deal. I got down to Madras, to Bangalore, to Bombay and Calcutta. I traveled around with several congressional groups and they were treated well. The only time they weren't treated well was when they were belligerent with people from the government and the people from the government had no intention of being pushed around by a bunch of American congressmen. As a matter of fact I admired them because the Pakistanis were bowing and scraping to an extent that was almost undignified.

Q: Were there any crises or great problems during that time?

BLUE: Goa was always a problem.

Q: Goa being at that time still under the Portuguese.

BLUE: It wasn't solved until around December 1961, just before I went to Lisbon.

The whole question of aid to Pakistan was a major problem. Also Kashmir. For example, I arranged for Adlai Stevenson to go up to Kashmir and stay on one of those house boats. While he was there the Indians decided they could use his visit...I think he called on Sheik Abdula who was working towards independence for Kashmir...Nehru used that as an excuse for denouncing Adlai Stevenson after he had gone. He said he had been consorting with Sheik Abdula encouraging his efforts to bring about the independence of Kashmir. We had very cool relations after that. As a result, the ambassador forbade any of us to go up to Kashmir.

Q: What did we feel about Soviet influence in India at that time?

BLUE: All the people in the CIA, and I suppose with good reason, felt that Mrs. Gandhi, who later became prime minister, was strongly influenced by the Soviets. We were concerned because the Indians tended to use our aid to Pakistan as an excuse for warming up their relations with the Soviet Union. But at that stage I don't recall that the Soviets were giving them anything of importance. I think they were building a steel plant near Calcutta, but the Indians weren't purchasing aircraft or anything like that.

Q: You left there in 1955?

BLUE: I left there right before July 4 and was glad to get out of there. Ambassador John Sherman Cooper didn't want to have liquor for the July 4th party. He said that the Muslims didn't like it. I tried to point out to him that there were not just Muslims, there were a lot of Hindus in India. I also said, "Mr. Ambassador you don't know how expensive fruit juice is." Most of the juice was canned and very expensive. Also I said, "If you don't have liquor lots of people are not coming, and they will know that you don't have liquor. I won't tell them, the staff won't tell them, but they will find out." I think he ended up having a place for those who drank liquor. You know, in Malaya they had a room upstairs where the men would go to have their drinks and the ladies stayed down stairs and drank tea or something.

Q: By the way, you had gotten married.

BLUE: I got married in October of '54 and Joan loved India. She had a wonderful time. We left India in late June. I was to be assigned to London as the Near East representative in the embassy. Meanwhile the Bureau of Near Eastern, South Asian and African Affairs, decided that I had not had a sufficiently broad experience in the Near Eastern area. I believe my refusal to be Indian Desk officer was also a factor in their decision.

ROBERT ANDERSON
Political Officer
New Delhi (1952-1956)

Ambassador Robert Anderson received a bachelor's degree from Yale University in 1944 and served in the U.S. Army during World War II. His Foreign Service career included positions in Shanghai, Chiang Mai, New Delhi, Bordeaux, and Paris, and ambassadorships to Dahomey, Morocco, and the Dominican Republic. Ambassador Anderson was interviewed by Horace Torbert on March 12, 1990.

ANDERSON: But finally, a very good friend of mine found an opening in New Delhi, India, and I was sent out in 1953 and had a wonderful assignment there. It was absolutely fascinating, in the political section. George Allen was one of the more imaginative ambassadors I've ever met. He made me his special assistant. I also was told to cover internal politics, to serve as the acting labor attaché for my two years there (because a very colorful gentleman, named Henri Sokolove, became ill, and had to leave, the AFL and CIO couldn't agree with the State Department on who could come out as the labor attaché until just before I left).

So I had three jobs, all of which were absolutely fascinating because India was still a very new country. As you know, it's a country that has many different languages. The linguistic-states problem, under Nehru, was a very difficult question. How Nehru managed that, I will never know, but he did and he was able to form a single nation out of such disparate groups. And I had to try to cover all of that.

And incidentally -- and this is an historical fact of interest -- while I was there, the first communist government that ever came into power through a democratic election was elected in the state of Kerala, in south India. But I don't need to say any more about that. I can assure you there's plenty of reporting on that one, if anybody wants to read it.

Q: Did you see Nehru some?

ANDERSON: Yes. George Allen was thoughtful. He had me with him on every single thing that you could imagine. He introduced me to Nehru, I went with him a couple of times on his calls. Nehru was a fascinating human being and very calm, unassuming, quiet, but with a mind like a steel trap. He and George Allen got along absolutely beautifully.

Q: Nehru and George Allen?

ANDERSON: Yes. And then John Sherman Cooper came out as ambassador three months before I was due to leave. He told me that I was not to leave until July 5, 1955. My wife and the children had left in March and I was anxious to join them. But he said: "Look, we don't know anybody. We have this July Fourth reception and you're about the only one left that knows anybody," which was true. So I stayed through that and we became very, very close friends as a result of that and saw each other through the years, after he joined the Senate.

Q: Was he a pretty good ambassador? Of course, he didn't stay in India very long. I knew him later, as a senator, of course. He was a great guy.

ANDERSON: Yes. He did not stay there very long and there's a little story about that I want to tell you. I can't say that he stayed there long enough to make any particular mark on United States interests with India; I can't recall any. I was back in Washington as the Ceylon/Nepal Desk Officer and the assistant India Desk Officer, after I left India.

We might jump to that right now, because it involves John Sherman Cooper. He came back shortly after I arrived in '55, and he asked if he could talk with me alone. We went into his office and shut the door and he said: "Bob, I have a difficult problem. I don't know what to do." "President Eisenhower wants me to run for the Senate from Kentucky. But I haven't been in India long enough. What's this going to do to our relations, and what's Nehru going to think of me and think of us, with my leaving so soon? I don't really know what I should tell the president. I really don't know what to do."

And I said: "Mr. Ambassador, if you don't want to run for the Senate, that's one thing. If your concern is about what Mr. Nehru is going to think, I don't think you should be worried about that, because Nehru is very much of a politician, and he knows that if the President of the United States asks you to take on a political assignment, such as being one of 48 senators, he's going to understand that. I don't think that you need to worry about that aspect at all. Plus the fact you haven't been there a year yet, almost. You go back, it'll be another six months before anything really happens; you know that. Then you'll have time to campaign. And I really think that you've got to make up your mind on what the president has asked you to do. And if you want to be a senator, I think you ought to do what the president wants you to do."

And he put his arm around me, thanked me and walked out. He went back, saw Nehru, and eventually came back, to become a senator.

TERENCE A. TODMAN
Bureau of Near East Affairs
Washington, DC (1952-1957)

Political Officer
New Delhi (1957-1960)

Ambassador Terence A. Todman was born in 1926 and raised in St. Thomas, Virgin Islands. He attended the Polytechnic Institute of Puerto Rico and served in the U.S. Army. Ambassador Todman received a bachelor's degree from Syracuse University. His Foreign Service career included positions in Tunisia, Togo, Chad, Guinea, Costa Rica, Spain, Denmark, and Argentina. He was interviewed by Michael Krenn on June 13, 1995.

Q: Now being assigned to India and that area, was that, did you have any familiarity with that area prior to this particular job?

TODMAN: No, but that didn't matter. I'd read about India. I told you that my interest from high school was in learning about different countries. We knew people who came from practically all the countries, because they came by the Virgin Islands. I didn't know anything special about India. The Foreign Service in those days didn't expect area specialization before making an assignment. Later, people started doing that. But for the longest time, you were just assigned and you were expected to learn it while you were there. And it's one of the things that, knowing it, led to an enormous amount to irritation on my part, when later I traveled to Eastern Europe, I was then ambassador to Guinea, and I noticed that we were having a hard time getting anyone to believe that we believed in equal opportunity for our multiracial society. We were putting out a lot of information, which no one paid any attention to. And on my return to Washington I told the then Director General that it seemed to me that if we assigned a couple of officers to positions in these embassies, public affairs officer, assistant political officer, whatever, that their very presence there, as black Americans in official positions, would tell the story far better than all the junk we were putting out. And he said, "You know, that sound very good. I have a friend who has a son who's just entering, (I think it was Harvard, one of the Ivy League universities,) and I will suggest that his son specialize in Eastern European studies, so that when he is finished we can assign him, properly prepared, to one of the Eastern European countries." I said, "What damned nonsense. You pick up people every day who have just entered the Service, you send them for a quick introductory course, and out they go. Why is it that for a black American he has to go specialize in Eastern European studies before he can get an assignment?" The Foreign Service had never done that. We started later. In fact, much of the specialization was done while in the service. If people showed somehow an aptitude for a particular area or language, then they would be allowed to go and do the additional specialization. But there was never any question of your needing to be familiar with an area before you were given an assignment. You were expected to be able to learn quickly on the job. So, my job to Indian Affairs didn't come as anything that bothered me.

Q: During your early years in the State Department, your record indicated a lot of work with the United Nations.

TODMAN: Yes.

Q: How did that come about?

TODMAN: Well I guess about a year and a half after I entered State, the United Nations had a program of taking interns from all of the countries, and we were allowed to compete for that. I competed and was selected by the State Department as the U.S. nominee for an intern program. I accepted very happily and went up there and spent some time on the Secretariat, working primarily with Fourth Committee issues: trusteeship and non-self-governing territories. But I learned from the inside how the UN worked because I was on the Secretariat. In one of the more logical moves made by the State Department, after I completed my internship I was assigned to the United Nations Bureau. That led then to a very long period of activity on UN affairs, a couple of years, and to my making a major difference, because a colleague and I proposed a way to get the colonial powers to comply with their obligations. For the trust territories, the metropolitan powers had undertaken a sacred trust to bring them to self-government or independence. One of the things that struck me very much was that we got a lot of talk about how terrible the people were or how unprepared, but no details of any programs being undertaken to prepare them, just a sense of, "It'll take a long time, but we're working on it." And the idea occurred, well look, if these people were forced to establish some targets that were measurable, two, three, four years, what can we do in this period, not what are we going to do in thirty years, but two, three, four, then you would have something against which to measure their performance in carrying out their sacred trust. And I was able to get that sold to, first the bureau and then the Department of State and the U.S. government. And once the U.S. backed it, we got the UN to adopt it. It was intermediate targets and dates. "What are you going to do within which time?" And once that was adopted, we would ask them to say, "In four years what are you going to do in education?" Then at the end of the first year, we'd say, "Good. On this four year plan, how much have you accomplished? How many schools have been opened? How many people have been trained, how many have entered?" In the second year, "Are you halfway there or how are you doing in regard to your four years?" This allowed us to keep pressure on for performance which had not been there before. And I'm convinced that it forced the metropolitan powers to move ahead and hastened the time of independence for the former trust territories.

And that came about in my second assignment. I was brand new to the whole thing. I remember one incident with the head of the office, Ben Gehrig. I used to present so many objections to things they were doing, going along with the colonial powers, that they sent out a few things without my having seen them. I went in and saw him and said, "Ben, we don't work that way. When these things go out we say that they have been cleared by the office. We have the right to dissent. And I insist that if you're going to say here is office clearance, then you're going to need to put, with Todman dissenting. We've got a job to help bring about independence for these countries, we have a job to get them on their feet and not to go along with what the colonial buddies want." And he said, "Young man, when you were born, I had already written a book about this subject." And I said, "Ben, when are you going to write another book?" I thought it was the end of my career. But it just so happened he pulled out his drawer and showed me a manuscript and said, "As a matter of fact, I'm working on one now." So, we talked about his new book and the kind of thrust that would be given. He had been present at the creation of the United Nations and was a man who knew and believed in it. But the policy of the United States at that time was to follow very, very closely the wishes of the colonial powers.

One of the problems I had later, in Africa particularly, was that the Department expected all of us in the field to check with the former metropole before taking any action of making any statements on our own. If you were in a former French ruled country, then find out what France says before you say or do anything. If British, then check with them first. And I kept insisting that the United States was the world's leading power and we were not there to follow anyone. Instead, we should establish an independent American position which we would then discuss with them. And we should make accommodations to the degree we could so that there wasn't any breach among us. You know, get a concerted position, but at least go in having decided what it is the United States wants to do. And this was a rather revolutionary thing, but it worked. It made a difference in terms of the way the United States was seen in those countries: not as a follower of the French or the British, the two major former colonial powers, but as a country that stood for something, represented something. The result of that was that we had people coming and speaking to us about what was happening. In many of the embassies, we were as well informed, if not better, than the former metropole. I know during my time in Togo, the French ambassador used to ask me what's going on, because the Togolese confided in me since they knew there was a strong, independent position adopted. They didn't have to worry that there was some maneuver going on around their backs. These were the kinds of things where I know a difference was made in American foreign policy and in the shape of events as they occurred.

Q: During your time there working in the UN, just based on you perceptions, were racial problems here in the United States of real interest to these other countries? Did it ever interfere with the work? For example, some historians have argued that during this period that you're talking about often the colonial, the metropolitan powers would come back and say, "Put your own house in order before you talk about how we're treating our people."

TODMAN: That happened often. The United States was not openly attacked very much. But the British and the French often made such comments privately and the Belgians very often. Also, there was, and there continues to be, a major split between the haves and the have nots, the north and the south. And that split was there. And having a minority American there made a lot of difference, because we had access to information that wouldn't have been shared otherwise. It comes down in the final analysis, however, to the ability of the person. Others recognize that the power is in Washington and they are interested in getting access to that and getting it to work in their favor and not just in having a nice buddy relationship that doesn't produce anything. So, sometimes you got that separation in the approaches. If you could combine them, then you had an enormous amount of power. But the tensions were there right from the beginning and there was a feeling that the majority should be able to do things. But the majority were all the small countries which didn't have anything. Our determination throughout was to resist getting caught in the middle.

Q: Since you were an identifiable presence there in the U.S. delegation were you ever approached by black American groups in the United States, NAACP and so forth, with issues that they wanted to get before the United Nations?

TODMAN: No, they took very little interest in it, at least as far as the issues that I dealt with. Those were the issues that primarily touched Africa because those were all Fourth Committee items: non-self-governing territories and trust territories. There was an occasional show of interest on some particular thing and there was some attention paid to heads of delegations, Nkrumah got some attention and Julius Nyerere did, you know, some of the stars of the dependent world. But I never got a sense that black American organizations or individuals paid a great deal of attention to it. It was a marginal factor.

Q: Well, after you years at the UN, you got your first overseas assignment and that was in New Delhi. Was that a surprising appointment for you?

TODMAN: No, that seemed to make sense.

Q: Right, with your earlier work.

TODMAN: Because I had spent two years working on it. I had written instructions. I had read all of the things coming in. I had met all of the people I had attended all of the embassy functions. I knew the people from the embassy, at least I had a speaking acquaintance with the place. So that seemed an absolute natural, and to me it was the most reasonable thing in the world to do.

Q: Sure. you were political officer there.

TODMAN: Right. Political/Labor.

Q: What kind of duties did you normally have during your time there?

TODMAN: Well, it was both political and labor. I did reporting on the political parties. So, I was supposed to go out and meet leaders of some of the parties, go to Parliament for discussions. I learned Hindustani, which became a big advantage because I could go and report back without waiting for the translations and so on. I was supposed to meet with the labor leaders, attend labor conferences, go to party congresses, basically keep in touch. And we were assigned, there were three or four of us, I guess, we were assigned parties to follow, and you were supposed to get to know the leaders of those parties: what they were planning, what they were thinking, and to give some sense of how this might impinge on the activities of the government and the effect on the United States. In the labor field I did some editing of the materials; we got lots of information from the Department of Labor and from the AFL-CIO. We used to put out a bulletin, on which I did the primary editing, and I went around and met a lot of the labor leaders and found out what issues they were following. One of the fascinating things was that as escort officer for visitors, one of the visitors I escorted was Martin Luther King when he came to India on his pilgrimage. That was during the days of Nehru, I knew a lot of the old Gandhi people. Indira was a little girl. It was a long time ago. It was at the time when the Congress Party was still with the old leaders operating. And it was fun getting to know some of these people. I also got to know the newspaper people and the intellectuals, because that let one see where the ideas come from that political leaders espouse later. It was a fascinating period.

Q: India was often mentioned in the black American newspapers and journals here in the United States as being one of the leaders of the Third World, speaking out for peoples of color. Were the Indians themselves very interested in the racial problems that were going on back here in the United States, or was that something very foreign to them?

TODMAN: As a policy matter it wasn't something that they pushed a great deal. Again, because you're looking at reality, what difference would it make to India? On an individual basis the reaction varied. You had people who came over here and made sure that they were identified as Indians, with the dress and everything else, so that they wouldn't be mistaken for black Americans and be subjected to what black Americans are subjected to. You had others who were very sympathetic. It's quite likely that some of the especially nice treatment we received were reflected efforts to show how totally open they were and the rest of that. I don't make too much of it because, quite frankly, it was too widespread for it to have been something that was planned for that purpose. But again, it was not a major issue.

Q: While you were in India, were there many other black Americans serving in India, the State Department, USIS, Foreign Service?

TODMAN: No, no. I'm trying to think if there were any. There may have been somebody in Bombay, but it was...no.

Q: What were your perceptions, that's a very general question, but just your overall impressions of India? It's obviously a very fascinating nation at that time, with the East-West struggles...

TODMAN: Very much so, very much so. The tie-in with China and close ties with Moscow; the efforts that Moscow were making to get in. The existence of a real democracy, with people free to say and do as they felt. A country that was determined to have its own place in the world, a place it felt justified by its size and its industrial development. A country of greater contrasts than I ever could have imagined, because you had the enormously wealthy people living in splendor that I never could even visualize, and then you had the people who had absolutely nothing. A country of such uneven development; a country that had the most modern technology of the day and was able to produce and was producing and selling everything that any other country could make, including the United States; yet a country that had areas in which you would think that you were back in some other age. They hadn't arrived. The impact of religion, dietary habits, which meant that cows were around, just absolutely amazing. Because of the strong contrasts, you felt the sense of the poverty even greater; greater than I have felt anywhere else. A country with the great obsession against Pakistan; a feeling of fear a feeling of conflict and even in the most reasonable times, when India, the peacemaker, was preaching unilateral disarmament and all of these other noble things, it was prepared to say in the same breath, but "we can't do it because you can't trust those Pakistanis, you never know what they'll do." So, you had this tremendous contrast. A country of an enormously rich culture: the art and the music and the literature, just fantastic. An intellectual ferment that was really a cry for creativity. Also, it was the first time that I had experienced a sense of the difference in the concept of what time is. The Japanese experience didn't prepare me for this. I'm accustomed in the States if you want to get something done, you go out and do it, and it's got to be done now. And in India a sense of, well, maybe it'll take twenty, thirty, forty years, another couple of generations, but we're dealing with things that are four, five hundred years old; we'll get around to it. A sense of old things which, for me, with a desire to get on with the new, provided quite a shock. A country that wasn't well planned, yet one that we had to take fully into account. A very, very hospitable people. The caste system was something that struck one very much. If something fell to the floor, only a person of a certain caste could pick it up. That business, the stratification, was something that made a major impact on one. But the contrast, contrast, contrast.

ROGER C. BREWIN
Bombay (1953-1956)

Roger C. Brewin was born in Columbus, Ohio. He entered the U.S. Army in 1944. He received a bachelor's degree from the University of Miami in Ohio in 1948 and a master's degree from the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies in 1950. Mr. Brewin joined the Foreign Service in 1951. His career included positions in Switzerland, India, Bolivia, Paraguay, Iran, and Washington, DC. This interview was conducted by Charles Stuart Kennedy on February 9, 1990.

Q: Then you were in Bombay from 1953 to 1956. That must have been quite a jump from Zurich. How did you find matters in Bombay?

BREWIN: The post had been just been devastated by a 1953 reduction-in-force (RIF) which abolished three or four officer positions. Bombay, like the other two Consulate Generals in India, was a fairly large post even after the RIF. It had its own traditional political reporting, not too closely superintended by the Embassy; it had a Consular Section; two or three economic officers. This was a point in India's history when the issue of linguistic states were erupting and when the state of Bombay in the political sense was very much in doubt. It was uncertain of what state Bombay would be the capital. There were fairly extensive riots, quite extensive and violent.

People were killed solely because of the language they spoke. Finally, in Bombay State there was a Chief Minister, Morarji Desai, who a couple of decades later -- although unforeseen in the 1950s -- was later to become Prime Minister. He ran the State with an iron fist, had varying interests, including foreign affairs strangely enough. Bombay was an interesting place. During the two and half years I was there I started in consular work and ended in the Economic Section.

Q: What were our economic interests in Bombay?

BREWIN: A major function of the Section was its liaison with the large American community. It was not as large as the British community, but it was large enough. There were two large American oil companies, which have since then been nationalized. The secondary function was economic reporting. We had four very good Indian employees who did the bulk of the economic and commercial reporting. They had been at the post for a number of years. India at the time was poised to decide the future course of economic development -- a route of substantial laissez faire in the private sector or a route involving substantial central economic planning with allocation of resources by the center. This debate which occurred primarily in Delhi nevertheless had its repercussions both in Bombay, Calcutta and Madras.

Q: Did you have any problems dealing with the Indian officials?

BREWIN: Not really. There were one or two celebrated protection cases in which we felt that the government was being too arbitrary and extreme on blameless American citizens. Both cases involved the ugly issue of race and color. There was an American magician who had a show in Bombay. I had seen it a night or two before the incident. I had been called to the stage and asked to cooperate with the magician in the deception. I did what he said. It was perfectly plain to me that the lady was not being sawed in half. Two days later, one of the Indian in the audience was called up by the magician. He refused to cooperate in the deception. He insisted that he and the audience were being deceived. A shouting match occurred between the Indian and the American entertainer. The magician was upset that the Indian was ruining his act. In the end, assault charges were filed by the Indian. The Consulate's position was as long as the case was being pursued in the Indian courts, the American should have his day. We didn't think that there were any foundation for the assault charges and thought that the whole thing should be forgotten. The Chief Minister told the Consul General that he didn't care whether the case would come before the Indian courts or not. He thought that the days when the white man could push the Indian were long gone. He was going to order the magician deported from India forthwith. That would be the end of the case, regardless what the courts might say in the future. The C.G., William Turner, felt compelled to write up the whole thing as a biographic sketch on Chief Minister Desai and observed at the end of his piece that if Desai were ever to go to Delhi as a minister or Prime Minister, the United States might well have some problem with him. He did become Prime Minister years later and we had fewer problems with Desai then we had with Indira Gandhi or Nehru.

Q: Did you have any feeling about the relationship between this rather large Consulate General and our Embassy in New Delhi?

BREWIN: Basically, I think they were good. Turner and his predecessors felt that they had as much latitude as they needed to call things as they saw them in Bombay, both in economic and political terms. There were some tasks that naturally the Embassy had to pursue for us -- e.g. the expulsion of General Motors. This was a matter on which the Embassy could speak for the United States in the halls of the Indian Ministry of Commerce. But in general, we had enough room to call the situations as we saw them. We were certainly not interfered with in the pursuit of trade promotion opportunities or in political developments in the area.

Q: Did you see any effects of the McCarthy period?

BREWIN: Not particularly in Zurich. There were two or three passport cases -- American citizens whom the Department had deemed should not be living abroad because of their political opinions. One of these was a China scholar and although the post was never explicitly told why he should return -- we had to amend his passport to limit its use only to return to the U.S. -- it was presumed that he had friendly view of the Chinese communists. He objected and stayed in India notwithstanding the limitation. Another passport case concerned a naturalized American of German origin. It was quite clear from the messages we received that he was a suspected member of subversive organizations and having engaged in subversive activities. The third case was about a woman who although not politically tainted as a Court might see it, had been subject of a number of messages from security officers in the Embassy concerning her conduct especially vis-a-vis Indian males. she was given a passport valid only for return to the United States. She pursued her case to the Supreme Court and won. This was a period in which the Department lost a whole series of cases in the area of passport issuance discretionary authority. We had a couple of days in the Indian Times.

Q: I assume that India, being somewhat neutral, left of center period at that time, was a natural attraction which meant that you probably had more of these kinds of cases.

BREWIN: That may well be. In the case of the naturalized American citizen of German origin who was a scientist and was employed by the Indian Atomic Energy Commission, became so angry that he stomped into my office one day to renounce his American citizenship and did. It was an unfortunate case because I can't imagine in retrospect that he could have been a real threat in any sense.

STUART P. LILLICO
Information Officer, USIS
New Delhi (1953-1955)

Stuart P. Lillico was born in Seattle, Washington in 1909. After graduating from the University of Washington, he joined the United States Information Agency in 1953. His career included positions in India, Ethiopia, Zanzibar, Rhodesia, and Japan. Mr. Lillico was interviewed by John Hogan in 1988.

LILLICO: I was in India almost exactly two years. I went out just ahead of the McCarthy troubles and had a series of jobs around USIS New Delhi until late in '53 when some of the editors of the USIS magazine, the American Reporter, came home.

Then I took up the job as editor of the American Reporter. I kept that job until '55 when my wife had a medical emergency. We came on back to the states at that time.

Q: Now, Stu, tell us something about American Reporter, in New Delhi.

LILLICO: The American Reporter was originated during Chester Bowles time as the U.S. ambassador in India. It was an effort to put the American point of view in front of the people of India. Traditionally, they had been dependent on either British newspapers or, since their independence, on Indian-owned papers. They were extremely conservative, and poorly informed on the United States. So Chester Bowles who was very much a public relations man, started this magazine.

The first effort was in English. Then, over a period of a couple of years, up to eight different language editions were established. By the time I took over as editor, we had what was said to be the largest circulation of any publication in India -- something like eight hundred thousand copies.

As we used to say, it was a daily paper issued twice a month. It was tabloid size with articles furnished by IPS and some of our own local writers. Quite a few special writers, American newspaper people, did articles on order. Others did articles on their own particular interest back in the States that we wanted to present to the Indian people.

We did the editing in English and then turned it over to translators to do into the other Indian languages. Part of the printing was done in Bombay; part in New Delhi and, in the latter days, some of it was done as I recall in Calcutta.

We had an American staff of two editors. Howard Needham was, in a sense, the production manager and I more or less was the managing editor. The PAO, of course, was our overall boss. We did work quite closely with the Embassy people, although after Chester Bowles left, the DCM and the succeeding Ambassador had less feeling of urgency on the American reporter so they gave us a minimum of direction.

Q: You edited this newspaper for how many years?

LILLICO: For just about two years, I think it is safe to say that Howard Needham and I were the first professional newsmen to run it. Previously, it had been run by primarily public relations and Madison Avenue types rather than professional newsmen. The character somewhat changed when Needham and I were doing it.

EDWARD INGRAHAM
Madras (1954-1956)

Edward C. Ingraham was born in New York state in 1922. He received his undergraduate degree from Dartmouth College in 1942 and subsequently joined the war effort and served in the U.S. Army overseas between 1943-45. He entered the Foreign Service in 1947. In addition to Islamabad, his posts included Cochabamba, La Paz, Hong Kong, Perth, Madras, Djakarta, and Rangoon. He was interviewed on April 8, 1991 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: From Perth, you still did not go back to Washington for an assignment. You were still within the Asian area weren't you?

INGRAHAM: I went to Madras. Why Madras? Well, we saw a movie when we were in Perth, John Renoir's The River. It actually was about Bengal and it gave us thoughts about exotic India, where we had never been. So I asked for India. In those days if you asked for India you got it. We requested Bombay and ended up in Madras. There again an utterly delightful experience. Madras was a consulate general. We had a Consul General. I was the number two, substantially farther down. We had 3 or 4 other officers and a separate USIS post.

Our mission was to follow what was going on in south India, which, as we kept emphasizing, was a totally different world from the north. There was always a certain amount of built-in tension between Madras and New Delhi.

Q: They looked down upon you?

INGRAHAM: Well, our Consul General kept trying to make the point that south India was different. The southerners speak different languages, are from a different ethnic group, from a different culture. They see themselves as Indians but also as Dravidians. They look upon northerners as fellow Indians, yes, but also as foreigners. There was a good deal of ethnic pride in south India at that time. If you spoke Hindi in the street, they would glower at you and small boys might even throw stones. We had a Hindi-speaking officer who was assigned to Madras so he could practice his Hindi. It didn't work.

Q: Who was the Consul General?

INGRAHAM: Hank Ramsey. He died in California two or three years ago.

Q: How did he run the post?

INGRAHAM: I think very well indeed. He gave us our heads. He was the boss, no question about it. He would say, "You do this and you do that." He would keep us all moving. He would also clue us in on whatever was going on, too. We would meet daily to discuss what was going on. He was a good man. We were following the very lively politics of south India. This was just before the big realignment of the Indian states along linguistic lines that took place in 1956.

Much of the agitation and the political activity in south India was aimed at influencing or pushing for linguistic states. All the Tamils would be in one state, the Malayalam speakers in another, etc. Up to that time it had been divided along the old British lines.

It was a revelation of sorts to me because, having been in another developing country, Bolivia, it seemed to me that for the first time I was in a place where we were really in touch with the local political life. For the first time we were reporting what was actually happening rather than just reporting on the little European sliver at the top.

Q: What would you say was the predominant attitude of the Americans towards the Indians and the Indians towards the Americans in your area? We had gone through a rough patch where the Indians had not been very helpful--the Korean business. Was Karela in your district?

INGRAHAM: Yes it was. Karela was the first communist governed state...as far as I know the first state in the world where the communists had been voted in in a free election. Bengal might have been but I think Karela was.

Q: Maybe San Marino.

INGRAHAM: San Marino may have been, but Karela was a substantial state with maybe 10 million people. The best educated people in all of India. And the highest number of Christians, most of whom voted communist.

I think we at the Consulate General were far more sympathetic toward the Indians because we were there. This was the time of Foster Dulles, who felt neutrality was immoral and that if you weren't with us you must be at least partly against us. We had to operate within those strictures. But at the same time, I think, all of us were, at least in Madras, far more sympathetic to the Indian side. At the same time, we would argue with them. I remember giving speeches here and there pointing out the dastardly deeds of the Russians and getting very tough questions from the Indian audience.

Incidentally, English was the language of communication in south India. Almost all the Indians right down to the village level knew at least a few words of English. So our lack of knowledge of Tamil or Malayalam didn't cut us off from people. It was a fascinating period.

Q: Were you under any pressure to do anything about the communist state there?

INGRAHAM: In a way we were. We were to keep a very close eye on Karela and report what was going on, particularly anything that could be used to show what swine they were. Fortunately, it was a very well run state before the communists took over and they didn't ruin it. They actually ran a pretty good government. Yes, they were communists, but I can remember taking a trip through Karela in 1955 or maybe early '56 and being fascinated not only by the problems of the state (which was grossly overpopulated) but by how well they were coping with the mess and--I suppose Bolivia was in the back of my mind--how the poverty seemed to be reasonably well shared. More so than in, let's say, Madras or other parts of south India. Although even in Madras, where poverty was extreme in some places, you didn't have the feeling of a little class at the top running everything and exploiting the people on the bottom- everybody was poor.

From then on I knew that this was the part of the world that most fascinated me and I had no intentions of leaving.

Q: You left Madras in 1956. Then you went where?

INGRAHAM: I decided I wanted to be a political officer. In Madras I was a jack-of-all-trades. We had a political officer, the one who spoke Hindi, and an economic officer. I did some of the political reporting and also rode herd on the consulate. I was the consular officer, but we had a couple of...this is something common to many South and Southeast Asian posts...Indian employees who had been with the consulate for many years. One of them knew far more about visas than I did and probably as much as the Assistant Secretary who ran consular affairs back in Washington. They had worked for the consulate forever, their loyalty to us was total. They considered themselves part of the family. When we had in-house parties we would include them. They ran the consular section. At first I remember saying, "I had better check out everything very carefully," having come from Hong Kong (where shortly after I left a number of Americans in the immense consular section had been transferred--one direct from Hong Kong to Atlanta Federal Penitentiary). So I watched the consular work closely in Madras. Everything proved to be absolutely impeccable, so from then on I relaxed and let them get on with it. I would do some political reporting, this and that. At the end of the day I would sign 15, 20 or 30 consular documents absolutely secure in the knowledge that they were properly prepared. That was another virtue of life in Madras.

CHRISTOPHER VAN HOLLEN

Political Officer
New Delhi (1954-1955)

Political Officer
Calcutta (1955-1958)

After receiving a Ph.D. in Political Science from Johns Hopkins University, Christopher Van Hollen joined the Foreign Service in 1951. He served in New Delhi, Calcutta, Karachi, Murree-Rawalpindi, and Ankara, as well as at the Department of State Secretariat, NATO Affairs (RPM) and the Bureau for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs. From 1972-1976 he served as Ambassador to Sri Lanka. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on January 23, 1990.

Q: From 1954-55, you were in Delhi and from 1955-58 you were in Calcutta. How did you get into the Indian circuit?

VAN HOLLEN: I became interested in India because of the belief in that period that this country in its post-independence days would become an increasingly important power in Asia. India emerged under strong leadership with Jawaharlal Nehru as the Prime Minister. India played an important role in the non-aligned movement which was important in those days with Nehru, Sukarno of Indonesia, Nasser of Egypt and Tito of Yugoslavia as the major leaders. I was drawn to India by what I anticipated as the emerging importance of India internationally. This did not turn out to be the case. I would say that India's role internationally and India's position in U.S. foreign policy priorities has not been as high as I had anticipated in the mid-50s. There were people during that period -- Chester Bowles, in particular, who was twice Ambassador to India -- who put a great deal of emphasis on India's international importance and who saw India as a key competitor to the People's Republic of China. They emphasized the need for the U.S. to take into account India's global importance, not just regional. Chester Bowles exaggerated this importance and in the eyes of many, India has not achieved the international role that it had aspired to in the 1950s or others had expected of her.

Q: As a member of the entrance class of 1955, we looked around the world, looking for places that would be exciting and at the same time, would not become a back-water.

VAN HOLLEN: This was undoubtedly a calculation too from a career point of view. After I had finished my tour in the Secretariat, the question then became "What post should I seek which would be substantively interesting and would also be a positive post from the point of view of career progression". I was as interested in that as anybody. Looking back, I don't know that people who had gone to South Asia in the Foreign Service have in relations to the geographical areas moved ahead all that fast. It is hard to judge.

Q: The compass keeps swinging from one point to another depending on the time. The Soviet specialists used to be that stars at one time, but probably have not done as well recently. What type of work were you doing in New Delhi and then Calcutta?

VAN HOLLEN: I was basically a political officer. Let me say that originally, I had wanted to go to Calcutta rather than New Delhi, but I started in that latter until an opening came up in Calcutta and I was transferred there after only serving in Delhi for eight months. I was not very happy about it at the time because by then I had become adjusted to the Embassy and enjoying myself, and then all of a sudden, orders came from Washington saying "You are transferred to Calcutta". People who sent the orders though undoubtedly that I should be happy, but initially I was not because I was very happy and satisfied with the Delhi assignment.

It turned out that Calcutta was a very stimulating post. It was not in the Capital and therefore one had an opportunity to get in touch with a number of people who were not part of the Indian bureaucracy or who were not part of a very large diplomatic corps. It was a very exciting place -- politically because you had to cover all the Eastern India and you also covered the relationship between East India and East Pakistan (now known as Bangladesh). The political officer in Calcutta in those days was also duly accredited to Nepal. You also had, at the height of the cold war and the Sino-Soviet cooperation, to cover a whole host of East-West political battles which were being fought out in Calcutta. The politics there were very volatile.

Q: As a non-expert at this time, how did you report Indian politics?

VAN HOLLEN: One of the great joys of serving in India was the fact that it was in fact a new democracy. You did have easy access to all elements in the Indian society both in New Delhi and Calcutta. There was a general hesitancy at that time in dealing with members of the Communist Party. We were not prohibited, but it certainly was not encouraged. I remember that I did have an opportunity to have a number of contacts with members of the Communist Party in West Bengal. I felt pleased that I was able to talk to them about political developments. The task there was to report on domestic political developments in four large East India States: West Bengal, Bihar, Assam and Arissa. In those days, much more than now, there was a great deal of emphasis on keeping Washington informed on the political developments in individual Indian States. With budgetary constraints and personnel cut-backs, that is less so today, but as a young officer in my thirties, I would travel outside of Calcutta to these other jurisdictions, often with my wife and talk to Chief Ministers, Cabinet Ministers and others.

Q: What were our major concerns in India?

VAN HOLLEN: On the broad international level and in terms of US-India bilateral relationships, our main concern was that India, while professing to be non-aligned, was in tilting toward the Soviet Union and China, in a period during which those two countries had a close relationship. It was a period in which Krishna Menon, the Indian Foreign Minister, epitomized non-alignment and anti-Americanism, at least in the eyes of a lot of Western officials and the American public. So in the international and bilateral fields, the concern was that Indian policy not undermine American objectives which were to a substantial degree designed to develop a containment policy vis-avis the Sino-Soviet block. Domestically, we were concerned about the Indian drift to the left. India has had for many years significant Communist Parties of various types. The Communist Party in West Bengal was particularly potent as was the Communist Part in Karama in West India. Therefore, in terms of domestic reporting, it was focused on the question to the extent that East Indian governments were likely to move to the left, meaning Communist elements gaining power. These were the two concerns.

Q: You might say that the over-all policy even in Calcutta was part of the Cold War.

VAN HOLLEN: That is correct. It was in the mid 1950s and the Cold War was the dominant concern. We worried that the Communist strength, which could be seen in the close relationship between the PRC and the Soviet Union, would expand into South Asia. It was felt that India because of its "soft" non-aligned policy and because of the strength of the indigenous Communist Parties was a prime target for the expansion of Communist influence. It did not turn out that way, but that was the concern.

Q: How did you and colleagues see these dangers?

VAN HOLLEN: I would have to review my own reports. I don't remember them in that much detail, but my feeling is that I was careful not to over-emphasize the "red menace" because India had enormous strengths through the Congress Party which was the vehicle for Indian independence. It had a very effective leadership cadre, not just in New Delhi in Jawaharlal Nehru, but in a number of the State governments. While there was concern about the growing strength of the left, in retrospect certainly that seems to have been overly stated. I hope that my reporting was as balanced as it might have been under the circumstances.

Q: We are all creatures of our times. What was your impression of the officials you met. How did they view the U.S.?

VAN HOLLEN: Like so many other matters, it is hard to generalize. In India, you had a very broad spectrum and you could talk to people on the right who were very concerned about what they saw as excessive Communist and left-wing power in India. You could talk to people on the left who were critical of corruption in the Congress Party and who believed that the United States, in part because of its support of Pakistan -- that was a very important element in the picture then -- was acting against Indian interests. There was abroad enough spectrum in India so that one can't say that then prevailing view was X, Y or Z. There were many view points and that is what made it so fascinating to serve there.

Q: Were you able to report much on East Pakistan -- now Bangladesh?

VAN HOLLEN: We didn't report all that much on that from Calcutta. Sometimes we would report on border clashes. I went up to Dacca once or twice. We sometimes took turns taking the diplomatic pouch from Calcutta to Dacca. I can remember going with the pouch meeting the Consul General -- who was a man by the name of Doe Williams, who sometimes dressed as if the British had never left. He would wear a white tunic, white shorts, white stockings to his knee and a pith helmet. He would receive very kindly and serve gimlets, made with Rose's Lime Juice. We would spend the rest of the day in Dacca and then return to Calcutta. We each did about once every eight months. So there was a contact between the Consul Generals in Dacca and Calcutta. We did some reporting but most of the Indo-Pakistan reporting was done by New Delhi.

Q: How were the relationships between Delhi and Calcutta? Were they reporting one India and you another?

VAN HOLLEN: We had a lot of autonomy in Calcutta. I was lucky enough to receive several commendations from Washington for my reporting which gave me a certain amount of self-confidence that I was doing at least what Washington wanted. Copies of the commendations would go to the Embassy. So I did not feel, as some constituent posts have felt, that we were kept on too close a leash by the Embassy in the Capital. On the contrary, I felt that we had a lot of freedom and autonomy in terms of picking political reporting priorities and in terms of trying to get out to develop the information. Having said that, we did operate under certain guidelines from Washington. At least once a year, you get guidelines from Washington on the kind of political reporting that it was particularly interested in. This was helpful. That kept one focused in the reporting, but beyond that I did not feel under severe constraints.

EMERSON M. BROWN
Bombay (1955-1957)

Emerson M. Brown was born and raised in Reed City, Michigan. He received a teaching certificate from Olivet College. His Foreign Service career included positions in Bombay, India; Bonn, Germany; the Hague, the Netherlands; Ottawa, Canada; and Washington, DC. This interview was conducted in February of 1990.

Q: I have you going to Bombay from 1955 to 1957. What were you doing there?

BROWN: I started off as the second economic officer and in the middle third of the tour, for eight months, I was the consular officer, I ended up as the senior economic officer.

Q: What was the situation in Bombay at that time?

BROWN: Oh, Bombay, well it was wonderful, really. India was just beginning the second five year plan -- I think that's the case. And they were full of socialist beans and development beans. The Reserve Bank of India headquarters is at Bombay, and the senior staff had organized an economic discussion group. At that time, every big name in the business came to India to look at the five year plan. I met Galbraith, Nicholas Kaldor, Joan Robinson, and other names that don't register so well now -- for example, Rosenstein-Rodan, a leading development poling economist. Fantastic!

The Indians of course are bright -- talk your head off. The women are beautiful. In India you had everything from utter opulence to people living in the street.

Q: How did you view the Indian economy at that time?

BROWN: Well, in Bombay, you are an optimist. And it was justified.

Q: Then in Calcutta, you're a pessimist.

BROWN: I guess. I never saw Calcutta but I would guess that would be the case. But Bombay -- the PL 480 program got going in a big way while we were there. This was surplus wheat, and Bombay was a big port for it. I had good relations with the Bombay port labor leaders in particular. I knew the shipping guys. Real pirates!!

An example. Do you know what a T-2 tanker is? It was a Federal Maritime Commission tanker built before the war. It had steam turbines, and dynamos, which delivered electricity to electric motors. Wonderful ship, about 15,000 tons, which at that time was big. And this particular outfit, I think they were headquartered in Baltimore, had gotten hold of some T-2s and started shipping wheat in them. They had portable blowers that they could use to unload wheat at Bombay. They loaded wheat in Washington, up the river.

Q: This is the state of Washington?

BROWN: Yes. Up the Columbia River. Loaded 300 tons more than the insurance allowed, because they had virtually empty bunkers. Then at the mouth of the river they bunkered, and until they burned that 300 tons of fuel, they were an illegal ship. So about the first two weeks out across the Pacific, they were illegal.

The Suez Canal had at this time been blocked by Nasser. These T-2s went around Singapore, came up to Bombay, unloaded the wheat. They went empty up to the Persian Gulf, loaded crude. They went around the Cape of Good Hope to the east coast of the United States, unloaded the crude, loaded product, went down through the Panama Canal and unloaded the product in Los Angeles or San Francisco and went up and got another load of wheat.

The ship was empty only from Bombay to the Persian Gulf, and from California to Washington. They paid for the ship on every voyage. Really wonderful.

Bombay was really active in those days. Local industry was beginning to take off. Lots of political ferment because the Maharashtras wanted a separate state, a state of Greater Maharashtra, whereas Bombay at that time had incorporated both the Maharattas and the other big ethnic group, the Gujaratis. There were riots while we were there. Burned buses. People killed. But I guess we were never in any serious danger.

It was a great tour. I met my first real consul general. An old Rogers Act guy who was proud that he had been a consular officer before the Foreign Service Act.

Q: That was in 1924, was it not?

BROWN: Yes. His name was William T. Turner. This is another way of saying he gave me a good efficiency rating, but I found him just great.

Q: Did you find the Indian authorities... Could you work easily with them?

BROWN: I had no trouble with them at all. But of course this was back in the days when we had all the chips. We took a certain amount of criticism because of the Krishna Menon -- John Foster Dulles confrontation in those days. John Foster Dulles, the lawyer as well as Secretary of State, said that "Well, technically Goa is part of Portugal." That took a little walking-the-cat-back-home, as one used to say. But personally, we had wonderful relations with the Indian officials. The chief minister at that time it was Morarji Desai, a good guy, particularly from our point of view. He was very effective, if a bit nutty (he drank his urine every day). A strict Gujaratis, he wouldn't be vaccinated. This was a problem, because you always want to get the chief minister off to the States on an Important Visitor Program. We finally had to get a waiver on the smallpox vaccination to get him to go.

DAVID S. BURGESS
Labor Attaché, U.S. Department of Labor
New Delhi (1955-1960)

David S. Burgess was born in New York, New York in 1917 and spent nine years of his youth in China. In 1939, he received a bachelor's degree in history and economics from Oberlin College. He also graduated from Union Theological Seminary in 1944, and became an ordained minister of the United Church of Christ. In 1947, Mr. Burgess became a full time labor organizer. In addition to serving in the U.S. Department of Labor, he also served in the Agency for International Development, the Peace Corps, UNICEF, Harvard University, Habitat for Humanity, and was minister to several churches. The following is from a self-interview on April 7, 1991.

BURGESS: The FBI field investigation, as I discovered thirty-three years later, almost knocked me out of contention for this position. This investigation took place at the end of the McCarthy era. After I had read 275 pages of my 400 page FBI file in 1988, I learned that top FBI and State Department officials had opposed my nomination in 1955. I now wonder if the FBI should have the power of declaring a person eligible or ineligible for any position in the Government. It would appear that anybody with a liberal, labor or agitator background had difficulty getting FBI clearance at that time. I don't know how many other people were knocked out by the FBI I was lucky because I had the support of Walter Reuther and to my surprise the support of Senator Walter George of Georgia (the Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee), who wanted to run for re-election in 1956. He went to bat for me in part, I am sure, because he thought that the AFL and CIO would endorse him if I were cleared and became the Labor Attaché at the American Embassy in New Delhi, India. In 1956 after I had gone to India, Senator George withdrew from the Democratic Primary and as a result former Governor Herman Talmadge won the primary and was elected to the US Senate in the General Election of 1956. I was finally cleared on November 1, 1955, and I was sworn in as a reserve Foreign Service Officer on that date.

For several weeks I took special training including courses at the Foreign Service Institute. I was briefed by the International Division of the Labor Department and by top labor attaché officials in the State Department. I visited some officials at the AFL and CIO headquarters just before the amalgamation of these two labor federations. I attended the unity convention of the AFL and CIO held at the 71st Armory in New York City. I was very alarmed at the convention where I heard a speech by President Meany condemning neutralists - that is the Nehru, Nkrumah, Sukarno, Lumumba and others whom he called fellow travelers and Communist stooges. As a result of his speech the INTUC Labor Federation in India, the labor affiliate of the Congress Party and the HMS labor federation affiliated with the Socialist Party, threatened to withdraw from the ICFTU. Before I left Walter Reuther told me that he hoped to come to India to prevent this from happening. He came to India in April of 1956 on this special mission.

Alice, I and four of our kids arrived in New Delhi just after Christmas of 1955. After a month living at Hotel Cecil in Old Delhi, we finally found a home in Friends Colony, south of the city. We were among some of the first Americans to live in this colony. We enjoyed that experience for the next five years very much. My first task in this new job was to try to repair the breach that had resulted from Meany's speech at the first AFL-CIO Convention. Walter Reuther finally arrived in April of 1956 and stayed for a month. I took him all over India. He was introduced to Communist, socialist, and Congress labor leaders. He made a tremendous hit. He spent three hours with Pandit Nehru, the Prime Minister. He told me that he was considering the possibility of sending labor union advisors to work with the HMS and INTUC unions. Partly as a result of Walter's trip, the leaders of INTUC and HMS decided not to withdraw from the ICFTU and I was very happy about that.

After his trip to India, I began to realize that there were basic differences in international philosophy and action between these two powerful men, George Meany and Walter Reuther. Meany, in my opinion, was working too closely with agencies of the US Government such as the CIA and the Department of State. He believed that labor unions abroad should be less political and more economic as they were in the United States. He did not look kindly on neutralists such as Nehru and others. Walter Reuther had a much more tolerant attitude towards Third World labor unions and their growth in developing countries. His main concern was how to strengthen these unions, how to help them in the bargaining process. He agreed with Meany that trade unions in India should not be too closely associated with political parties but that wasn't his main criticism. Walter's main criticism was that the Indian labor leaders didn't do solid organizational work; that they didn't prepare themselves for contract negotiations and that they were more dependent on agitation against than they were in negotiations with the employers.

About a year later, I wrote a classified confidential memo to the State Department that stated that our government and the labor movement had to choose between the philosophies of Meany and Reuther. I also realized that Jay Lovestone, Irving Brown, Goldberg and other people - who molded Meany's view of the world - had a certain point of view towards communist nations and 3rd world neutralists. Walter Reuther, who had his difficulties with Communists within the U.A.W., was strongly anti-Communist, but because of his connections with the socialist labor movements in Scandinavian countries, France and Germany and the Socialist Party of our own country, I believed that Reuther had a much more tolerant and helpful attitude toward labor unions in India and in other developing countries. I am sure that Meany knew the contents of my confidential dispatch because he and certain AFL-CIO leaders had access to certain State Department classified materials. He probably was suspicious of me because Reuther had nominated me to the post of labor attaché at the American Embassy in India. This dispatch probably confirmed his worst suspicions about me and led him to inform the White House in 1961 or early 1962 that he was personally opposed to my nomination to any high post in the Kennedy Administration. His opposition dogged me during all of my eleven years as a Foreign Service Officer.

As to my general situation within the Embassy, it couldn't have been better. Looking back on my final years in New Delhi I think these years were almost idyllic. We had two excellent Ambassadors during those five years. The first was former Kentucky Senator John Sherman Cooper, who later became Senator from that state again. He was a fine person, who really understood India. He was succeeded by Ellsworth Bunker, who was also an excellent ambassador. I was given great freedom by my immediate superior who was Ted Maffitt, the Political Counselor and his later successor. I traveled all over India. My travel budget during these five years exceeded the total travel costs of all my political section colleagues within the Embassy. These were the golden years. I was my own boss. I was a team player within the Embassy but I enjoyed great freedom in my work. I was probably known by more Indians outside of Delhi than any other American during my five years in India. I went to every single state of India and became a friend of labor leaders, state and national government leaders, employers, politicians who were also labor leaders, and the various unions affiliated with the Socialist HMS, Congress INTUC, and Communist AITUC federation led by then Parliament Member Dange from Calcutta. I became acquainted with these folks and eventually gained their respect. I was assisted by a full time secretary named Barbara Griffith and an able full time local assistant named P.K.V. Krishnan. Sometimes I had an assistant labor attaché officer in my office.

The head of the CIA at the Embassy, after I had been in India for two months, came to me and said, "I don't know how the hell you got in the State Department." I said, "Well, I got in." I resisted requests from some of the CIA associates at the Embassy. Later in 1959 in the State of Kerala, I refused to be the carrier of money to bribe labor leaders there during a parliamentary election. The Communists won and have been the ruling party there for many years. The CIA chief at the Embassy was not overjoyed with my refusal. I refused to be associated with CIA operations within the Embassy or outside the Embassy during my years of service in India.

Reuther's visit in 1956 had many good long term results. The members of the National Security Guard in India - those who closely guarded Reuther during his four week visit - told me that he had received the "warmest reception of any American in India since Independence" in 1947. The trip was a smashing success. Reuther was able to persuade the Ford Foundation to underwrite sending trade union leaders from Scandinavian countries and America to India. When Irving Brown as the official representative of the AFL-CIO President came to India a few weeks later I was sitting on the dais with the Labor Minister Khundabhi Desai at my side. This was a summary of Desai's remarks while we were both listening to Irving Brown speak. "Reuther's approach to India is the correct one. His main message is to tell us what the American labor movement does and what the American people have achieved and at the same time he gives some mild advice to us. Brown does it in reverse. He spends little time telling us what goes on in America but gives us extensive advice." Desai later remarked to me that the reason for the success of the Chinese and Russian success in India is the fact that these nations used "the Reuther approach."

I remember going to Walter's house near Detroit during my home leave in 1958 and advising him that it was very well and good for him to criticize the international policies of Meany and Lovestone and Brown. The difficulty was that he, Walter Reuther, and some of the liberal unions in America were not sending their representatives abroad to India and other Third World countries. Until he could get a group from his own union and other unions to come to India frequently, liberal labor attachés like myself were not protected against criticisms and attacks by AFL-CIO President George Meany and his major international policy adviser Jay Lovestone. My warning proved to be prophetic as I learned when I returned to America in 1960.

In 1958 when Nehru visited the United States, Walter Reuther and Mrs. Roosevelt had planned an informal tete-a-tete at someone's house in Washington. In a letter to me Walter Reuther wrote, "Mrs. Roosevelt had worked out a small dinner at which she, Nehru, Chet Bowels, Adlai Stevenson and I were to have a down to earth chat. This unfortunately was messed up by the two striped pants diplomats present. We were forced by the State Department to expand the dinner invitations to include these people. The down-to-earth talk never took place."

I think one of the most fortunate results of Walter's trip was his ability to persuade the US steel industry and the United Steel Workers Union, AFL-CIO, to send technicians to India and also to train Indian steel technicians in American steel plants. In July 1957 I wrote to Walter and Victor and the State Department that 115 steel technicians would arrive in New York City on August 7, 1957, and a second group of such technicians will begin formal training in December of 1957. Then I listed the factories that they were trained at and the US educational institutions that they were connected with. These trips were a direct result of Walter's trip to India in April 1956.

In 1957 I was present as one of the American delegation members at the Asian Conference of the International Labor Organization (ILO). Very little came out of the formal discussions at the conference. I met with some European trade union representatives who were there and we came to the following recommendations which I conveyed to the State Department and various international secretariats. 1) Michael John, President of the TATA Workers Union - INTUC, needs some immediate financial assistance and a trade union advisor from America to work with him in his attempt to strengthen his own union and to organize steel workers at the three new steel plants built by the Soviet Union, West Germany and Great Britain. 2) a representative of the ICFTU should be sent to Indonesia to assist the emerging labor unions there. The name of George Weaver, a US labor official then in Singapore, was suggested for a six months assignment. 3) a report written about plantation workers in Kenya by INTUC plantation organizer M.M. Sharma was most critical of AFL-CIO funds given to Kenyan unions. These unions, Sharma wrote, were not sophisticated and their leaders may use these funds for secondary purposes. After this conference I concluded, "Finally I am convinced that there is little profit of us labor liberals to be over critical of Meany-backed Lovestone operations abroad until we are able to recruit and train some representatives from the more liberal international unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO who will be willing and able to work abroad in a variety of capacities. At present such chaps are few in number and I see few signs that these international unions are doing very much about this recruitment."

In 1958 I made a trip to the three new steel plants that were being constructed, one by British money, another by West German money, and another by Russian money. In a letter to my own mother in January 1958, I wrote after a visit to the Russian-built plant in Bhilai, "The Russians are winning over the Indians not by an ideological approach but by friendly methods. For example, two young Indian steel technicians who had been trained in Russia told me that they never heard politics discussed during 14 months there. The Russian engineers in Bhilai, most of them are simple sons of toil, follow the same line. The construction of the steel plant at Bhilai is already two months ahead schedule. The Russians at the beginning of the construction flatly refused to take sole responsibility for the construction of the plant. Unlike the West Germans at the Rourkela Plant and the British plant who were turning over their completed factories in so-called 'turn key style,' the Russians have made it most plain from the beginning that they are here only to help rather than to direct. Consequently no Indian technician is technically under a Russian. In the end the ever proud Indians much prefer taking the responsibility and getting help from the Russians who came as equals and 'fellow Asians' as they call themselves rather white superiors. It is obvious to me that the Indian technicians going to Russia are given superior training to those technicians going to the United States. In Russia, I have been told, the Indian technicians are allowed to operate the machinery in training. In the U.S.A. they are only observers rather than participants."

I worked within the Political Section of the Embassy. I worked with other sections too, also with the AID Mission very closely, known as ICA at that time. I was instrumental in getting a labor advisor there to the ICA or AID Mission named Bob Walkinshaw, a staff member in the Boston office of the United Automobile Workers Union, AFL-CIO. He and I worked very closely together for over a year and he remained there after I went back to the United States in November of 1960. I worked closely with the USIS that put out a publication about organized labor. It was a monthly magazine which was circulated all over the country. It was very well received and I was very proud of that. It told much about the labor movement and about labor-management relationships in the United States. I don't feel I had any difficulties carrying out the assignments because of the support of the two Ambassadors I was graced with during my five years there. I was the host to AFL-CIO Vice President Joe Keenan and other members of the labor movement after Walter's visit in 1956. I took them around India. Joe Keenan and I became very close friends until his death.

In 1958 I wrote a letter to a friend containing my conclusions about the situation in India. Quote, "The curse of India is the people's dependence upon their superiors whether they be a land-owners, employers or government officials. The joint family system and the caste system are the root causes of this condition. Of course centuries of colonial rule contributed to the condition. Right now the Government of India has launched the Second Five Year Plan in the head long race to defeat economically Red China to the north. In the area of labor relations national leaders are too inclined to believe that the restriction of the right to strike and the insistence on 'voluntary discipline' are the ways to force the working people to cooperate with the Plan. They forget that the average industrial worker feels like a cog in a machine, has not heard about the Second Five Year Plan and if he had heard about it, he sees no connection between himself and the Plan. It is my belief that the Plan cannot succeed without the cooperation of labor. Workers will not become nation minded until they are encouraged to join unions of their own choice, and to work with private employers and public sector employers through these unions. Essentially although I am aware of need for more physical resources and capital in this country, I am convinced that India faces a crisis in the whole area, for want of another word, of volunteerism. There can be no salvation of this country unless Indian citizens both high and low are willing to assume responsibility for their future and unless national leaders realize that even with a National Five Year Plan, there must be freedom of choice and a certain willingness to allow people to make mistakes and to benefit from these mistakes."

I was greatly impressed with Jaya Prakash Narayan, one of Nehru's closest colleagues during the fight for independence against the British. In 1952 or 1953 Nehru offered him the position of Deputy Prime Minister. JP, as he was popularly called, turned down the offer and shortly thereafter became a leader in the bhoodan movement headed by Vinoba Bhave for the distribution of lands to the rural poor. By 1969 the movement had been instrumental in distributing more than four million acres to these poor. JP was active in this movement and the affairs of the Socialist Party of India during my five years in India (1955-1960). We became friends and in 1957 he invited me to spend three days at his ashram near a poor village in the heart of the State of Bihar, which was one of the most poverty-stricken states in India. My lengthy despatch describing my visit and analyzing the role of JP in India puzzled my political counselor Ted Maffitt and Foreign Service Officers manning the India Desk of the State Department back in Washington. They thought that I had been dazzled by this sometime mystical leader of the poor in India and had overrated his importance and influence in India. Most of my critics had never met him. Most of them did not understand that JP remains one of the best men I have ever known. The last time I met him was in Bangkok, Thailand, in early 1971 just before the outbreak of the civil war in East Pakistan - a war which resulted in the defeat of the Pakistani Army and the emergence at the end of 1971 of the independent nation of Bangladesh with the assistance of the Indian Army. JP had come to Thailand to meet with the King of Thailand, the Prime Minister, members of the military and the Parliament. JP was there to convince them that the battle for an independent Bangladesh deserved their moral and financial support. After talking with him, I left confident that he would succeed in his mission. I never saw this impressive man of the spirit again before his death a few years later.

In October 1958 I described the troubled labor situation in Kerala in these terms after the Communists had captured the State Government. "After the initial period of peace and tranquility, the Communist (CPI) Party administration of the State has been running into more and more trouble. The students of the state went on strike when the state upped the rates for boat travel and the CPI Administration was forced to back down. In two strike situations the police controlled by a Communist run state administration have opened fire on plantation workers. This has not helped the Communist reputation. The latest crisis involved a strike of the Communist-controlled Plantation Workers Union in the tea and coffee area of the high ranges of Kerala. Planters were threatened; workers were intimidated; and the Government of India was asked to intervene by the planters. I was able to see the government, labor and plantation officials who during the current crisis went to government offices in Cochin and Trivandrum in order to air their troubles and to convince the government officials that their intervention was most needed. Back of this situation was the fact that the 19th Century method of living in the grand English style is now a thing of the past for most planters, even though many of them still live according to 19th Century standards and still call local people natives. The Central Government is having more difficulty with the situation. The Government wants to protect the planters in order to convince the West that capital investment in India will be profitable. At the same time because of the long history of colonialism it does not want to be associated too closely with the planters of Kerala."

I think that some of my best writing was an essay which I wrote for the Department entitled, "Can Hinduism and Hindu Culture Provide an Ideological Foundation for Democracy in India?" I concluded the long essay with an answer of "no". Modern ways would not come to India, I concluded, because "the reformation of Hinduism has not yet taken place. At present there are few Indian intellectuals who seem to be concerning themselves with Hinduism as such, to say nothing of reforming or finding within the record a past example of wisdom and truth of Hinduism, records which could be a light or guide now. If India really wishes to become a formidable and at the same time a democratic rival to the strong aggressive and totalitarian China, she must import some ideology and techniques from the democratic West. Unless this nation is able to discover a new and distinctive democratic faith which has definite, indispensable linkages to the democratic elements of her past, her efforts to imitate the developed democratic countries of the West will fail. India must find her own soul, her own faith and her own distinctive form of a democratic ideology if she is to save herself."

In mid-1960 a few months before I was scheduled to depart India, I was asked by the Government of India to negotiate a settlement of a nation-wide strike in August of that year called by postal workers, railroad workers and other workers in the public sector. I tried the best I could to talk to both of the contending parties but unfortunately the Home Minister under the Central Services Maintenance Act of 1956 declared the strike illegal and proceeded to arrest the strike leaders before I had met them and key government officials. I had had permission of Ambassador Bunker to assume this role at that time.

With my wife Alice and our five children - our youngest son was born in New Delhi in 1957 - I left India on Election Day 1960. I wrote a final despatch with the following conclusion: "Fearing that the leaders of Pakistan might launch a holy war against India as a means of preserving their power and creating unity among their divided and poverty-stricken people, the Government of India is not only critical to America's arms aid to Pakistan but also is charging that America is a nation which puts its primary faith in armed might, atomic bombs and gunboat diplomacy. Added to these governmental criticisms of America is the popular view that America is rich, materialistic, devoid of culture, gadget-ridden, and populated by people who have no understanding of India's problems. These critics fail to realize that the fundamental greatness of America is not in its impressive material accomplishments. It lies instead in the ability of most Americans to face her own nation's problems frankly such as economic inequalities and racial discrimination. It lies in America's essential equalitarianism and in the dignity of the individual in most parts of the country, factors which are in most striking contrast to the great chasm of inequality dividing the rulers from the ruled in the totalitarian countries of the USSR and Red China. We have the Bill of Rights, which in many ways has become the foundation stone for the struggle against colonialism in India, Asia, and Africa. We have built a great country because our liberties have made cornerstones of our society."

EDWARD E. MASTERS
Madras (1955-1958)

Edward E. Masters was born in Ohio in 1924. He received a bachelor's degree from George Washington University in 1948 and a master's degree from the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy in 1949. Mr. Masters served in the U.S. Army for three years and then joined the Foreign Service in 1950. His career included positions in Germany, Pakistan, India, Indonesia, Thailand, and Bangladesh. He was interviewed on March 14, 1989 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: How about in Madras? What role did the consulate play in Madras? This was in India?

MASTERS: Yes, and again, it was a tough time. India had moved more toward the -- not affiliated with, obviously -- but more sympathetic toward the communist superpowers.

Q: You're talking about 1955 to '58?

MASTERS: This is '55 to '58, right. We had visits, while I was there, of the top Soviet leadership -- what was it? I guess Bulganin and Khrushchev at that time. Our consulate general was on the main thoroughfare in Madras. I remember being out on the balcony, watching this big entourage go by. Then we also had a visit by Zhou En-lai, and the top Chinese communist officials.

We were much on the defensive. We were criticized as trying to impose our will on Asia; being neo-imperialistic, and so forth. And, of course, we were also criticized for failing to recognize what India saw as the value of its neutrality.

Hank Ramsey -- who was consul general for most of the time I was there -- was a broad thinker. He spent a lot of time worrying about global issues, and where India fit in. I was more down in the trenches, looking at what was happening within these key four southern states of south India. They were then called Madras, Travancore-Cochin, Mysore, and Andhra Pradesh. (The names changed later, after the linguistic reorganization.)

I did a fair amount of traveling; travel funds were not as limited then, thank god. I traveled fairly widely in south India. [I] got to know the local leaders; [I] got to know the local problems, and so forth.

Two very important things happened during the time that I was in there, particularly in '56 and '57. One was the linguistic reorganization of states, where the boundaries of the states of India were almost totally redrawn to reflect the linguistic divisions; so that each linguistic group, in effect, had its own state. That involved regrouping of the population, and was a very dramatic development.

Then the second major event was the 1957 Indian elections, which were based on the linguistic reorganization. But the particularly interesting part was that for the first time the Communists won a majority in the state of Kerala. We were told that -- I think except for San Marino, or some fairly small place -- this was the first time that the Communists had been voted into power in a major -- not a country -- but a major political unit.

So they came in, in Kerala, because of a lot of problems in the state. It was the most literate state in India, but it was also one of the poorest, if not the poorest. And the people were not only poor, they knew they were poor, and they were literate enough to know that there was a better life. It was highly Christian, also. And the result was that they -- I guess in a move of frustration and desperation -- voted for the Communists.

I got to know the communist leadership. A very interesting group came in, and I called on them several times during visits to Kerala. And I usually got a better reception from them than I did the Congress Party leaders, who were in power in the other states. Not necessarily that the communist leaders in Kerala liked Americans, but they were out to show that they were moderate; that they were responsible people. Similar to the Congress leaders, only more efficient -- I think this was the basic line they were trying to push. And certainly -- not necessarily anti-American.

So I used to have good talks with them, and tried to assess their policies. [I] wrote what I thought were some interesting reports, about how the communist government was consolidating its position; what the makeup of these people was; and so forth.

I remember writing a biographic profile of Chief Minister Nambuodripad at one point. I have no idea how valid it later turned out to be, but it was interesting to do it; to try to get into these guys, and see what made them tick.

Q: Was there any particular pressure on you to report the right way about the communist takeover? We must have been rather apprehensive about this.

MASTERS: Yes, we certainly were. But I don't recall feeling any great pressure. My own inclination was to view it with concern, certainly. I felt, and I think all of us did who were in India, that this was a tremendously important country. One which was moving in the wrong direction; moving away from us. And that we should -- first, have a better understanding of what was going on; and secondly, we should do what we could to try to stop the drift of India toward the Communists. And, in effect, to reduce the strength of the Communists within India.

HAROLD M. JONES
Advisor, USAID
Bhopal (1956-1963)

Harold M. Jones grew up in Virginia, and earned a bachelor's degree from Virginia State in agriculture education. He was interviewed by W. Haven North in 1997.

Q: So what was this job you were applying for?

JONES: I was applying to be advisor to the Minister of Agriculture of India, specifically to help set up a farm machine, tractor and testing center in central India, in the state of Madhya Pradesh. Everything went along, and I wrote a letter to the president of the college and got released for two years and told him that if things went well I might not come back. He said all right. I never did get to see my chief head of the department about sending the application and results. I left Tennessee State and went to India.

Q: Did you spend any time in Washington to get some orientation?

JONES: I had two weeks' orientation in Washington. My wife, Loretta, came up for a few days at the end of that orientation because it was near the early part of January.

Q: What year was this?

JONES: 1956. It was January and the girls -- we had six of them then, still in school, at different levels and we didn't want to break them away from school until June. So my family didn't join me until mid-June.

I went on to New Delhi, where I had two more weeks' orientation, more Indian-oriented and with more Indian participants in the entire program. After orientation, I was issued a new station wagon and I drove about 500 miles south to central India to a place called Bhopal. My orders indicated my post to be Bairagarh, which was down the hill from Bhopal a couple of miles. Of course my family had to stay in Bhopal, since there was no place at the project for them to stay, and I would have to see them on weekends. The project site turned out to be Budhi, sixty miles from Bhopal.

When I got to Bhopal, I saw two Americans, a husband and wife, living there. He was an extension specialist from Montana. They gave me the mail. I went over and sat on the steps of our building and opened the mail. It was from a man named Mr. Elam, who was the supervisor for agriculture education and teacher training in the 17 southern black segregated colleges. Teacher training had to do with training vocational agriculture teachers for high school. My boss at Tennessee State was the teacher trainer. Once when Elam came to look around, I accompanied him to west Tennessee and other places and he did not seem very happy with my boss's work. I think it was kind of a political move to get him away from Tennessee State, and assign me the job by annuity, Flowers to take the Indian job. The letter from Elam read, "We got rid of the wrong man. Come and see me after your two years are up in India." So it was kind of a coincidence that I got in with AID. But that's how it all happened.

Q: What was the project you were supposed to work on? Was this a countrywide project?

JONES: This was a government of India project under the Ministry of Agriculture. It was to convert a jungle warfare training camp of World War II into an agricultural, farm machinery training and testing center.

Q: But this was just one institution you were working with?

JONES: It was just one institution. This was a part of the U.S. total assistance program to India. And this was a relatively small, one-person project. I was the only technician there. I was to advise and assist with the development of the project.

Q: Remember the name of the overall project?

JONES: It was the Farm Machinery Utilization Center.

Q: But was that just for that place?

JONES: The idea was that it would serve the whole country, training people how to operate, maintain, order, and standardize agricultural equipment. It was a tough assignment.

Q: What did you find when you got there?

JONES: I found a few shells of old buildings scattered about a very thick jungle, and were being rehabilitated. The building that they gave me was small, but adequate for a bachelor. It had been whitewashed with the roof repaired. Outside was a dug well that I drew my water from with a bucket and a rope. Back up a little bit....US had bought and had shipped to the location $120,000 worth of agriculture equipment that had been manufactured in the United States. Most were still in boxes and had to be assembled before it could be used. We got busy and got it assembled with a staff of young mechanics and Indian engineers.

Q: So there was a staff to this center?

JONES: Yes, there was a staff. A lot of the staff was in place, but there was a gradual adding of staff as the center developed. Interesting enough, to give you how jungly and wild the place was, I was told by one of the local citizens that they had walked by the place that I was to live in two weeks before I got there, and there was a big male Bengal tiger standing in front of the building.

We plugged along. After I arrived in Bhopal, the next day I decided to drive to Budhi, finding out that my post was 60 miles away from the place that my orders said they were. I met the then officer in charge of the place, a south Indian named Rao. We had a long chat. He showed me what was going on and introduced me to his staff. I asked him, "Have you ever been to the States?"

He said, "Yes, I spent a year there." "What do you think about the States?" "I think you people have lots of nice materialistic things that you provide for consumers, and a lot of them are useful. But I find spiritually you people are babes in the woods."

When he said that, I looked around and there was nothing but jungle, and I said, "We're all babes in the woods out here."

He said, "You know, when we come back to this country we must go through a spiritual cleansing, I'm now at the end of my spiritual cleansing, a series of exercises that cleanses me spiritually after being in the West, where the spiritual part of me was contaminated and we have to get that cleaned up when we return."

Q: He was a Hindu?

JONES: He's Hindu, of the highest Hindu caste. So I talked to Rao about what the center was to do and what he thought should be the approach to setting up the center and getting a program going. He starts spouting out -- he was, I think, a mechanical engineer, I'm not quite sure -- he lectured so much about machinery and principles of machinery I felt a little bit lost. I thought this man has a great capability. Why on earth have I come 10,000 miles to instruct an assistant with establishing a machinery training center, when this man seems to know everything about it. I was a little bit disturbed. When I rode back to Bhopal I said to myself, I wonder if he's a guy who just talks, or whether he's able to put anything on the ground, whether he can do it, the hands-on stuff.

I said, maybe that's the difference between Rao and myself. I think I can do it. I found out as time went on that this was exactly the case. He was a well-educated engineer but didn't know anything about the practical aspects of farm machinery.

I came back the following week to work. My main counterpart was a fellow named Mohan Taneja. Taneja was from the Bataan country in northwest India but had finished the Presbyterian college at Allahabad, where many of the faculty members were Americans. They taught farm mechanics at that school. I got together with Mohan. He was a very active, energetic, pushy type. I said, you know, this is the guy to link up with and just forget about who's in charge, and we'll go ahead and do things.

When I got back to work on the job, the second week, Rao said, "The Minister of Agriculture wants to see you in New Delhi." I said, "Is he in a hurry?" "Oh, yes, he's in a big hurry." "Why's he in a big hurry?" "They want this center opened by the first of July." This was in February. I said, "Well, give me a chance to get with Taneja to figure out a few things, and then I'll give you a date to get me an appointment with the minister in New Delhi."

I got with Taneja and we decided on some things that the Minister has to do before this center could open. There were other things that they should do after the opening to improve the quality of training. Rao took the initiative and called up the Minister and got me an appointment. I got on the train in the evening in Bhopal and rode that 500 miles overnight to New Delhi arriving the next morning and immediately went to the hotel to get cleaned up a little and got some of the dust and dirt out of my eyes. I went to see the Minister of Agriculture the same day.

When I arrived, the permanent secretary was -- as one often saw in Indian offices -- hid behind a stack of dog-eared files. He saw me and looked up and I said, "I'm Harold Jones, coming from Bhopal, from the tractor training and utilization center that you're setting up there." He said, "Oh, yes, we were expecting you." He called the minister who soon arrived. We shook hands and we sat around a table. I said, "Mr. Minister I have 10 things on the list that were worked up by the chief instructor and I at the center. Five of these things, we think, must be done before the center can open. Five others we wish you would do shortly after the center opens to keep it going and to build quality training as the center expands." I read them.

Q: What were they for?

JONES: They were the kind of things that most any facility would have to have put in place, classrooms, supplies, teaching aids, etc. A lot of help was needed to clean away the trees before the monsoon. You must provide the means to do these things. I asked, "Can you get these five things done reasonably soon?"

The minister looked at the permanent secretary and didn't say anything, but came back to me and said, "Can you open the center by the first of July?"

I came back to him and said, "Can you get these things done between now and the first of July?" This was repeated for three times. Finally he gave that usual sideways head motion to the permanent secretary, which I took to mean yes, and then he finally said, "Yes, we can do that."

They had agreed to do all the items requested. I told him I appreciated it and invited him to come down and see the center sometime. Then I left there and went on over to AID and checked in with the TCM (Technical Cooperation Mission) office and Dr. Frank Parker, who was the agricultural officer. I told him about the project and he filled me in a little bit more about what they expected the project to do. I got on the train and traveled overnight back to Bhopal.

Q: So you were fairly independent in your operations?

JONES: Very much independent.

Q: AID wasn't trying to tell you --

JONES: AID was minimally involved. In fact, only one -- TCM (Technical Cooperation Mission) -- person ever saw the project. That was because Senator Allen Ellender, from Louisiana, visited the project. The director had to accompany him, so he got to see the project.

Q: Who was the director at that time?

JONES: Houston. Howard Houston, I think. Anyway, Taneja and I went ahead and set up a training program, got the farm machinery assembled and ready to go into action. Notices were sent to all states, apprising them about the training program. They were invited to send applications for people that they wished to sponsor for training. As a result, we received 400 applications for only 20 seats for trainees. That gave us a great chance to select the best out of 400. We went on ahead.

Q: From all over the country?

JONES: From all over the country, in every state in India at that time. They responded right away. We spread out the selection as much as possible. We got together and set up the whole program of these courses, and gradually filled in all places for those different courses that we decided to conduct. When the officer-in-charge came back into the picture, we figured that he may be as much of an impediment as he would be a support. So Taneja and I got together and went ahead and set the program up. When he got back into the picture, all of these things had been done and he hadn't kept abreast of the happenings.

Q: Why wasn't he there?

JONES: He was there, but he didn't seem to be that much concerned. Either that, or he thought what needed to be done should be left to myself and Taneja and me one or two of the other instructors there.

Q: How many in the faculty?

JONES: We had about seven instructors, one chief instructor and myself, several mechanics and equipment operators.

Q: What was their training? Were they also academic engineers?

JONES: Several of them had had some practical training in different kinds of mechanics and they were willing to get down and get a few things done.

One of the things that had to be overcome in India was the attitude towards education. It didn't matter whether your training was technical or not hands-on. Tasks were not for the educated. This was education for education's sake, nothing else. The educated saw themselves alone, doing things to get their hands dirty. The hands-on doing was generally missing. We had one who felt that way and when they saw me moving around, supposedly the big educated advisor from the United States, doing things, trying to put things together, and getting my hands dirty trying to make things happen, attitudes began to change. One of the instructors came to me and said, "I notice you're around here in all this heat and dry weather full of energy and going about like you were 15 years old. You know what I think it might be? I think it might be that lemon that you use in your tea."

Whenever we had tea, I wouldn't take milk with it. They all drank milk with their tea. I asked them to put lemon in my tea. He said, "I just figured out why you do that and why you have so much energy. It's that lemon you put in that tea. I'm going to start using lemon in my tea." He started to come around and finally they all came around to do the needed tasks.

Q: What was the living conditions like?

JONES: Living conditions were rough. No electricity, no bathroom. My quarters was a small A-roof stone building with a partition. I used one side for cooking and boiling water, and the other part to sleep. The table that I ate on, and did my paper work, was one that I built from the crating material that the equipment came in from the States. And for my bathroom, I had a tin tub and a stool with a hole in the middle of it with a pot underneath sitting in one corner of the bedroom, which was emptied each morning and cleaned. I used candles and had a kerosene lamp for night lights. That's about all.

Q: What was the climate?

JONES: Climate at that time ran from 110 to 120, zero humidity. I drank several gallons of water a day and never any a bit of moisture on my skin anywhere. AID had issued a kerosene refrigerator. If you want an extra something to pull you down and get you aggravated, light a kerosene refrigerator in that kind of temperature. Every now and then, I had ice cubes. I had a kerosene stove for cooking. My driver, a young Muslim, decided that he would clean my kitchen and wash dishes, and so forth. Outside where I lived was a dug well with a rope tied to a bucket for bringing the water up. I called it running water -- I ran from the well to the kitchen with it. That was the water system.

Q: Did anybody give you any orientation or preparation for living in a condition and situation like this?

JONES: No. This was far worse than what I experienced in rural Virginia as a youngster during depression years. It was not a good condition. After one year, there was generator that provided lights until about midnight, when it was shut down.

I did everything imaginable to try to get a little relief from the heat and dry weather. In India, offices were cooled at that time by using something called “Khas-Khas.” Khas-Khas was a sweet smelling grass root that was dug up, dried and put over big wooden frames and set outside the open windows. Someone would dash water against the Khas-Khas all day long, and as the hot breeze blew through, the hot air was cooled slightly. At least it had a good pleasant odor to go with it.

Q: Because it was so dry, this was....

JONES: Yes, that’s right. I put Khas-Khas over my window, and I dipped my mosquito net into buckets of water and hung it back on the rack over my bed. The dripping water evaporated, giving enough relief for an hour’s sleep in the night. But for the most part, I got to sleep at four o’clock in the morning, when the air cooled slightly. Then got up about 6:30 or 7 to go to work, but this soon began to take its toll on me. Then after my family came in June I’d go to Bhopal on weekends to be with them. This went on for four years, roof sleeping there was very comfortable.

The other part of living was getting things to eat. I had my shotgun and rifle with me, so I went to the jungle and shot a few antelope and deer and a peacock once in awhile. That was my meat supply, and the family’s meat supply, the whole time we were there.

Q: At anytime did the TCM office in New Delhi ever want to know what’s going on and how you were doing?

JONES: No one bothered that much about checking on the project. I was out there alone battling and toiling and trying to get things going.

Q: Did you have any kind of a supervisor?

JONES: Nobody came down. I told you, Howard Houston was the only mission person to show up at the project.

Anyway, those awful living conditions was the thing that was knocking me harder than anything else.

Q: But what about for your family in Bhopal?

JONES: Well, the family in Bhopal had been able to get a rented place on the palace grounds of the former princely ruler from the days when Bhopal was a princely state. It was a Muslim state and they called the ruler, a Nawab, versus a maharajah for the Hindu states. We had what was called his weekend guest house. He had two big weekend guest houses on the palace grounds. One was rented to an extension advisor and wife from Montana, and we took the other one. My family lived there. It was a big place with about eight big rooms, eight big bathrooms, which were almost as large as any of the rooms, but with no hot water and no kitchen, because in the days when they had guests, the food was cooked in another place and was brought in and served. So they didn't need a kitchen. I had to design a kitchen. AID sent us a kerosene stove and kerosene refrigerator, and we had shipped our own deep-freeze. There were problems with keeping it operating because of different current voltages. We had running water but no hot water, which meant we had to boil all of our drinking water and to bathe, we had to heat the water.

Q: With a kerosene stove, that's slow going.

JONES: Kind of rough going. I converted one of the bathrooms into a kitchen by building a long workbench over the bathtub and a storage cabinet over the toilet stool, pushed the refrigerator in one corner, deep-freeze in the opposite corner, the kerosene stove required patience but was modestly efficient. We were in business. We carried on that way the whole time we were in Bhopal, which was four and a half years for me and four years for the family. One room was used for the family school. I made the desk and seats from the shipping crates and procured a blackboard in the local town market. Loretta taught the six girls, ranging from kindergarten to junior high for four years.

At the center, we struggled along. Finally, the government had what they called a Central Tract Organization. They had borrowed $11 million from World Bank to set it up. CTO had big heavy equipment mainly to clear land for agricultural purposes. They operated in many places, clearing acres of grassland and bush for farming areas.

A group of those tractors were sent to the project site called Budni. Budni was as remote as you can get. When I got there I called it the one-step post. Which went on to say that one step backwards and you'd fall off the earth into eternity. There was nothing beyond Budni. I didn't believe there was. That was a bit of exaggeration, but not much.

Q: You mean there weren't any villages around?

JONES: Well, there was one small dirty village 200 yards from the center where one could get a cup of tea, basic staples were sold: rice, beans, cloth and some hardware materials. Otherwise you'd have to cross the river to get something that was reasonably edible and fresh. I used to go across the river to a place called Hoshangabad, located along the Narmada River. The Narmada River was central India's most holy river and its the only river in India that runs to the west coast. To get across that river I used to drive the Jeep station wagon. Sometimes I'd walk. A flat bottomed boat was just large enough to accommodate the Jeep, the wheels almost sticking over the edges, and it would be propelled to the other side with about eight men with poles pushing against the bottom of the river.

Q: How wide was the river?

JONES: The river was probably an eighth of a mile. I'd go there because there was a little village where fresh vegetables, tomatoes, and other fresh things were sold. They supplemented the meat that I'd got from the jungle.

Q: But this was not a heavily populated area, then?

JONES: No, it wasn't heavily populated. Not at all. We managed to survive. CTO came in and cleared about 200 acres of the bush country with the big heavy dozers, and pushed it all up in wind rows. At least there was enough land there to group crops and to allow us to utilize the different kinds of machinery for training.

Q: This was part of the training center.

JONES: This was part of the training center. On the first of July, the center opened. We had it opened right on time and it's been running for the past 40 years.

Q: Your 40 students arrived?

JONES: Oh, yes, every class was filled. Then we set up two other courses, giving us a total of three courses going simultaneously. One was six months and there were two for three months each.

Q: You designed the curriculum?

JONES: I and the chief instructor. I worked with him for setting up the curriculum. He was a good type to work with and he'd had exposure to the US missionary types of training at the Presbyterian college, which to some extent copied the land grant college models in the U.S. Not quite, but not without the U.S. missionary work ethics.

Q: What were the three courses?

JONES: Well, we had a course on farm machinery utilization and maintenance, another course on repairs and a third course on special machines and skills.

Q: What kind of equipment were you working with mainly?

JONES: Well, we had a variety of US-manufactured equipment. We had grain drills, threshing machine, weed control equipment, cultivators, and plows for plowing up the land or lightly tilling the soil. There were a number of pumps for irrigating. But there was no water available. At the end of the training center area, a stream ran through during the monsoons carrying large quantities of water. I suggested to the officer-in-charge that a couple of the dozers be sent there to push some dirt across the stream in kind of a dam form and that would hold enough water after the monsoon was over that would allow us to irrigate small plots. But they said, "We don't have pipe nor money to buy any. What do you do? I took a walk through the areas of the old jungle warfare training camp, and there I saw old two-inch pipe lines used for their water system. I demonstrated how to use a blowtorch and heavy pipe wrenches to disconnect some of the pipes.

They were hooked to the pumps, attached to tractors which pumped water up the hill to level ground. Crops were grown by irrigation as a teaching demonstration on an approximately ½ acre area. I assisted with the entire operation, which was totally improvised. This was a good example of doing the best with what was available. It was an effective little demonstration.

Q: Were these students ones that would have access to this kind of equipment when they would finish this training?

JONES: Well what was happening was that a number of government farms were being run with some fairly modern equipment, and they could use these trainees. Others were employed by small equipment manufacturers. At that time, India's main form of power was bullocks. They pulled everything similar to what we did in this country a hundred years ago. They had primitive kinds of equipment that had been there for hundreds of years. But then there were a few entrepreneur types of manufacturers that were beginning to try and design and build a better type of farm equipment for bullock power that would be more effective in the farming operation. They took on some of the trainees to help with manufacturing and demonstrating to farmers.

Some of the people who had had some of the basic form of mechanic type training went with these manufacturers, and others went back to their village farms and tried to encourage improved methods. We even went to the point of trying to design and bring into being better hand tools for chopping weeds and cultivating. There was not much of a problem of placing the people who had attended the courses.

Q: Did it grow beyond the 40 students? How many students did you eventually have during your four years? Was the enrollment only 40 each year?

JONES: It started expanding. I don't know what it expanded to. When I was there we had approximately 140 students per year. When I was there in 1996, the yearly output had been as high as 1560 per year. At least six courses were being offered, along with a vigorous testing program.

Q: And they lived there on school grounds?

JONES: They had a dormitory in one of the old buildings that were left from the World War II jungle warfare training center that was converted into a cooking and feeding and dormitory facility. It wasn't all that great, but livable. They had a few portable tanks for water supply.

Q: You weren't so much involved in the administration of the school?

JONES: I wasn't involved in the administration. Indians handled that very well. The officer-in-charge had an administrative officer, who had two administrative assistants and there were several clerks in the office.

Q: How did you find the students?

JONES: The students were very enthusiastic and willing to learn. Many of them wanted to learn how to do things. Once in awhile some of the traditional types didn't think that this was the kind of thing that they ought to be doing, so they didn't apply themselves well. They thought that the more machinery was used, it meant that people would lose their jobs and wouldn't have a way of making a living. That kind of attitude was common across the whole country, which isn't unusual. The other thing that was a bit of a problem, as far as I was concerned, was the starting time. The morning temperatures at about sunrise were bearable for field work, but the government working hours was of such that they didn't want to change. I got together again with the chief instructor, whom I knew to be progressive about things, and we ended up sometime going to work at 6:30. So with no declaration by government or anybody in terms of changing working times, the students were willing to do that. When it got hot they'd come in and cool themselves. Then later on, toward sundown, field activities were scheduled.

Q: You must have done a lot of teacher training, teaching the faculty.

JONES: A lot of the teacher training of the faculty was mainly in helping with assembly of equipment. They had a trouble putting it together, assembling the equipment and grasping the general principles of operation. I did a lot of demonstrating of how to do things, for instance, checking out the accuracy of a grain drill in terms of planting seed. It is called for calibrating and adjustments. I did an awful lot of that. We had one or two Indian instructors who had worked with power equipment -- a round tractors and pumps -- and they were very useful in helping to get that over to the rest of the faculty. Improved teaching methods were emphasized from time to time. Problem solving played a key role in the training.

Q: Were the student body and the faculty of mixed background or were they all --

JONES: Very much mixed background. Some of the instructors may had gone through certificate level training for agriculture but had little exposure to agriculture mechanics other than primitive aspects in use at that time, using the bullocks.

Q: What about their religious and cultural background?

JONES: Muslims, Hindus and Christians made up both the faculty and student body. Their religious and cultural orientation came out mostly when we had the animals from the jungle destroying the crops that were being grown, particularly the corn and the wheat. The wild boars and monkeys were the biggest problems. Monkeys are sacred to many Indians and the officer in charge realized that this could be a problem. But he was able to get a permit from the government to buy a couple of shotguns to shoot monkeys. But he would have difficulty to get anybody to shoot monkeys. So they thought that since I was from the West and didn't mind, since I had my own guns.

I told the chief instructor confidentially, "You know the quickest way to heaven, or the quickest way out of here back to the States, is probably to shoot a monkey. I'm not going to shoot any monkeys."

He looked around and got a local person that would come in and shoot a few of the animals. This was totally against the Hindu religion, but none of the students protested.

Q: All these people were Hindus?

JONES: They were from everywhere and mixed culturally. We had some big Muslim operators who they didn't mind. But the nearby village area was predominantly Hindu and whatever happened there in that village that was against their religion, would likely result in protest. No cultural or ethnic outbursts occurred during my four and a half year stay.

Q: But all these people of different backgrounds got along?

JONES: Oh yes, they got along very well. They seemed to have realized that we've come here to be trained about certain things. Everybody took to it as something new and something different with the hope that this would open up at least some job for them or a future that would allow them to get a job to earn a living.

Q: Were there any major incidences or crises that you faced or was it all just one big crisis?

JONES: Just one small crisis. I didn't come up against any particular problems. I did run into one government official at one time. A villager would often come and ask me if I would shoot a tiger or leopard for them that was killing their cattle or coming into their village. One villager went to the jungle with his bullocks near the training center to cut some wood for his village for cooking purposes. While he was out cutting wood and trying to get a load for his bullock cart, a tiger came by and killed one of his bullocks. He asked me if I would come out and shoot the tiger, before it killed his other bullock. This was his life, his livelihood. This pair of bullocks meant everything to him and his family in terms of making a living and doing things he had to do to survive. So I went out and found the tiger chomping away on the bullock. I shot and killed it.

A week or two later, a letter came from the state government forester, saying that we hear you shot a tiger in that area and what we are concerned about. We had spotted that tiger for the King of Nepal. The King of Nepal was coming down, and we were going to take him there for a tiger hunt.

When I went into Bhopal over the weekend to join the family, I stopped at the Forester's office. He was a tall, mixed gray south Indian. I told him the story, why I killed the tiger, and that I had no idea it had been spotted for the King of Nepal. I said, "If you want the King of Nepal to have a hunt, you contact me and I'll show you where two or three tigers live there that he can shoot. And frankly, when I went to shoot that one, a few hundred yards away, two others were coming to join him. They saw me and ran away." I said, "There are a lot of tigers out there. You get in touch with me and I'll show the king where he can find a tiger."

So he was satisfied and he appreciated me coming by to talk with him about it. That dissolved the case. The king never came.

Q: But there was a large tiger population in that area?

JONES: A big population. They were killing people's livestock and leopards were doing the same thing. Leopards were killing their goats and dogs. There was always a problem with the big cats and what they came to prey on in the villages.

Q: This was well before the concern about preserving wildlife?

JONES: Well before. In fact, when I first went there, peacocks were wild like turkeys, and could be shot in that Muslim state without any repercussions. It was very dangerous shooting them in Hindu villages, though. But since a lot of Muslims lived in that area, they had become wild. For our Thanksgiving dinner for several years in India, we had peacock . Very little had been said or done about preserving wildlife in those days.

The mixture of religious beliefs there meant that one had to sort of walk in between them, and to maneuver for one's safety.

Q: All the people spoke English?

JONES: All of the people at the center involved in administration and repair assistants spoke English. There was no problem with language, so far as I was concerned. My driver spoke Urdu and Hindi.

Q: And the students?

JONES: Students didn't speak English that well. Some of them did, but we had such a great leeway in selection there, that we had enough information on the forms to indicate whether or not they could get along in English or Hindi or whatever the case. But we had people on the faculty that could speak practically any of the major languages in India.

Q: Did you learn any of the languages?

JONES: I took some courses in Hindu, but not enough to carry on a conversation, but I could ask directions to places and speak to people and meet people, but nothing outstanding.

Q: Did you understand why you were there, apart from your technical role in training, why the US was sending somebody 10,000 miles away to work in this community?

JONES: I didn't think too much about US interests and US concerns. I thought I realized that US was highly concerned about India as a country, because of the massive assistance being given all over the country. Rockefeller Foundation was there, Ford Foundation was there and other U.S. organizations. I saw it as a major international effort, really, because other countries were there trying to get India moving in terms of its economy, in terms of its political objectives and whatever they had in mind to do, to develop the country.

But the situation I and my family were in was of such that missionary zeal was needed to deal with it. Even if I had paused a little bit, I hardly found time to think about much more than my job and what my family had to deal with living in Bhopal. So I never thought beyond job and family. But we were sensitive to and aware of the need to maintain a good U.S. image. We were proud of our actions in that regard. In Bhopal we were referred to as a new kind of "Rajah." All over India I could see things happening that I thought eventually would come together and India's agriculture and some of its rural development, would push on into bigger things, once these factors came into some kind of confluence.

Q: Such as?

JONES: Well, there was irrigation/hydroelectric dams being built, fertilizer factories being built, steel mills were going up, land grant college types were being established. All of these happening at the same time. Big extension programs by a Ford Foundation, and Rockefeller Foundation was doing research and development in agriculture. One could see all these things moving toward each other, and coming into some kind of confluence, and that's exactly what happened as the years went by. Agriculture production soared. India was able to take advantage of the Green Revolution.

Q: Did you have any connection with any other agriculture programs we were sponsoring there at this time?

JONES: I visited several of the university's projects there, interacting mainly with their agriculture engineers. I made a number of trips there to various locations exchanging ideas. In fact, several of the agriculture engineers with the universities came to the center at Budni, where I was assigned.

Q: Which University project?

JONES: Ohio, Illinois, Kansas, Tennessee.

Q: Working where?

JONES: Ohio was working in the Punjab. Illinois was working at a place up called Tarai in Uttar Pradesh state. Tennessee was in the Bangalore area and Kansas was in Andhra Pradesh. I visited all four of them several times. We discussed new equipment design ideas and things that they might include in the agriculture engineering curriculum. Because I had had that experience dealing with the basic kind of stuff that people were interested in. I went to Udaipur, where an agriculture engineer of Ohio lived. There were four of those university contracts in India. Missouri came in later.

Q: How did you find their programs?

JONES: They varied from place to place. I thought the place at Tarai near the foothills of the Himalayas were probably making the most progress. They had a huge state farm there where things could be done other places. I think they faced different problems depending on their location and people's attitude towards being helped. But they all turned out to be wonderful institutions and all five were established. I think they made one of the greatest contributions that could be made in the area that I was working, farm mechanization, by producing agricultural engineers, and these specialists. When I went back to India last year, I was amazed at what the agricultural engineers had done and the organization they had for doing things to improve India's agriculture. India followed up by establishing 15 additional colleges, giving a total of 20.

Q: Like the one you were....?

JONES: No. I was assisting with an institute less than college level. But the one that I was connected with was used as a model to establish three other centers in different places in the country.

Q: These were sort of pre-university level vocational schools?

JONES: Yes. The one where I originally worked later changed from a center to an institute.

Q: What was its full title?

JONES: Central Farm Machinery Training and Testing Institute. This is its present title. The title changed over time. It went on first from Farm Machinery Utilization Center, to Training and Utilization Center. As the center grew with greater impact on agricultural production, titles changed.

Q: What was the situation at the institution that you saw recently?

JONES: When I went back in February, the only thing I could recognize are the hills and forest in the distance. Everything was completely new, completely redesigned and functioned very well in terms of competent testing and training. They had divided into two wings, a testing wing and a training wing. They had trained more than 23,000 students and had done tests on nearly 700 different kinds of machines, all in terms of standardization to make equipment more suitable for Indian agricultural conditions. Seven tube wells had been dug for irrigation and running water for the center.

Q: Was there anybody there that you knew?

JONES: Nobody was there that I knew. The first clerk who was there when I arrived lived in the village nearby the place. He had retired in the village. I told somebody later on if he had retired in the village at the time I was there they'd have called him a crackpot for retiring in such a place. The chief instructor that I found there 40 years ago was located in New Delhi. He was our host for the whole time we were there. We had a grand reunion. His son, trained in the U.S. in aeronautical engineering and business administration, was doing finance consulting in New Delhi.

Q: He had moved up the line in terms of position?

JONES: No, what happened was that he had worked at the center for a number of years, then joined FAO and worked in Africa, retired from FAO, and was living in New Delhi. I called the officer-in-charge -- our first director, named Zachariah, in South India. I didn't contact Zachariah personally. I called him on the telephone and we chatted for about a half hour. Coincidentally, his little girl when he was director is now a medical doctor in Connecticut, and was visiting my family in Washington when I was talking to her daddy from New Delhi.

I've been in contact with these people since I left India, either through Christmas card greetings or a note once in awhile. So I've kept up with them.

Q: What were the agricultural conditions around the school when you were there?

JONES: Scattered around the area were very small subsistence village farms using hand tools and bullocks, growing mostly basic grain crops, pulses, and a few vegetables.

Q: But in any of the surrounding areas there was no farming going on?

JONES: Well, there were small village farms. But the people grew hardly enough to survive. But in terms of farming and farming country, across the river six or seven miles away, was the wheat research station. I spent a fair amount of time working with them to improve their bullock powered equipment. I helped design things they could use in their wheat research, particularly with land leveling equipment for more effective irrigation.

They were using all bullock power. I went over and met the director there and he and I hit it off well. I said, "You know, you're up against a pretty uneven situation here. That land that you're trying to irrigate, you can't get water to flow evenly over it. I could design a few simple wooden type implements that you could hitch behind bullocks and pull across that land and move some of the high spots into the low spots and you'd have a much better flow of water."

So I did that. We got them across the river in spite of having to put them on a flat bottom boat to be pushed over by poles. They found out that they worked very well to the extent that the government made a film of it.

When I was in Kenya, I was invited by the Minister of Agriculture to come and observe a film. To my surprise, it was the film of the work I had done at the wheat research station in India. That was the extent to which any kind of government farming was being done in that area.

Q: Was there any impact of this farming program of yours on the area? You cleared this land, but --

JONES: Well, a number of farms would borrow that equipment, not so much to irrigate their land, but when the monsoons came, it was better leveled they didn't have water pockets standing in different places in the field. But not a lot in terms of impact around that area at that time. But I understand now that that kind of thing led to people wanting to do things differently, better and more efficiently.

Another thing that occurred while I was there...USAID had spent $12 million buying large size farm equipment for community development, but they didn't have anybody there who knew much about it. Consequently, it was prorated and issued to the different states, and went to the state headquarters and that's where it stayed. I found some of it in Bhopal, and I went to the chief of agriculture officer and I said that some of this equipment ought to be put to use. So he allowed me to take a couple of the big stationary threshers that we used in this country to thresh wheat early in this century. I took them to a number of villages and demonstrated the first mechanical threshing of wheat in that area.

I hooked up with a Canadian missionary and I took one of the stationary threshers to their place and demonstrated it. They liked it and asked to keep it. Villagers were delighted to see how their grain could be threshed without being trampled under the bullock's feet. For hundreds of years, the age-old practice was to trample it under a bullock's feet, grinding the straw to bits, and tossing it into the air to let the chaff fall away and the grain fall to the ground, after it had been well-flavored with bullock urine and manure. This went pretty well. Many of the villagers couldn't stand to see a grain of wheat being wasted. When you use the machines you don't get 100 percent efficiency, you lose a few grains. They'd scratch around on the ground looking for the few grains that would fall, careful not to waste anything. But the idea caught on and resulted in manufacturers building hundreds of small threshing machines. You go across rural India and most villages do threshing with machines. They range from huge self-propelled to small stationary types.

Q: Well, is there anything else on that assignment that you want to emphasize?

JONES: I connected up with extension people as well and often went to the extension meetings in towns not far from there. I would visit with them to get my points in about the extension program being more involved in trying to bring about the use of mechanical devices to increase agricultural productivity, and to increase labor and efficiency. I traveled over much of the state in that regard. The conditions found everywhere were very primitive.

But the British had done a pretty good job in setting up guest houses, so one had some kind of accommodation to depend on. I also took a couple of trips to Cuttack, below Calcutta on the east side where rice research was being done. I helped with equipment design and utilization there for planting and threshing rice.

Q: When did you leave?

JONES: I left Bhopal in September 1960 and was transferred to New Delhi.

Q: What was your job there?

JONES: My job there. They weren't quite sure what to do with me. Finally, they gave me an assignment to see if I could move about over the country and get the ministers of agriculture and agriculture personnel to use more of the community development equipment that they had been spread over the country. That job I did for one year. In one year of bumping around, I drove cross country 25,000, trying to get that equipment into use. I went to every minister of agriculture in the country.

Q: Did you have counterpart with you on this?

JONES: I didn't have a counterpart. I worked with many of the governments that had either a mechanical type person or some kind of engineer in their state department, and I worked primarily with them trying to get them to understand the principles of operation and demonstrated how certain pieces of equipment could be used.

I don't know if that was an astounding success if you think of $12 million worth of equipment. But during the first year, I got about a million dollars' worth in use.

Q: This was a time when community development was a big thing. What did you think about it?

JONES: Community development was a good thing, no question about it, in principle, but I don't think AID had the kind of approach, particularly in India, that was appropriate to the conditions. There was a tendency to want to do things in a big sort of way. You couldn't do things in a big sort of way in India at that time. You had to start small and grow incrementally.

Q: What do you mean by a big sort of way?

JONES: Well, for instance, this farm equipment. Whoever was in charge of community development in New Delhi at that time decided they needed bigger, more efficient farm equipment to get agriculture going in the communities, so they bought this equipment and it just sat there. There was no way Indians were going to translate a bullock drawn plow and a bullock-threshed wheat crop and to a big stationary thresher that broke up the wheat and threshed it. You can't make that kind of jump. In the first place, they couldn't afford it. You had to deal with things that were doable and affordable and build incrementally toward bigger things. You had to build attitudes as well as practices. That was a primitive system, a very primitive system. But it had been there for thousands of years, people knew what they could get out of it. And what they could get out of it was dependable survival. They trusted it. To interfere with that in the way any new community development, there was resistance.

Q: Did you find the people weren't prepared to take risks?

JONES: That's right, because they had depended for years on this minimum input, minimum output, survival system. They just didn't do it. That was the biggest exposure I had to community development in my time with AID, but I could see that in India it's going to take time to get this thing moving in terms of developing any kind of community spirit and attitude.

Q: Did you get any feel for how the program, how people were involved with the program at all, how that process was supposed to work?

JONES: I didn't get that much appreciation for the community development people that AID had outside of the headquarters. I knew the community development people at the headquarters level. But I didn't have any contact in the field with the people working with the village people to see what was being done there to move the people. But the attitude I saw at headquarters was just buy something, send it out there and hope that it is put to good use. The contact I did have with the villagers told me it was not working.

Q: But traveling all over India, did you develop a view about agriculture, the situation and prospects?

JONES: Well, I could see the little things happening as well as the big things. I named a few of the big things that were happening. But I could see a few of the extension people working incrementally and this in the time would probably lead to larger kinds of efforts and larger outputs.

I'll give you another example. I went to work with the Ford Foundation. I went to one Indian community where CARE had been involved. CARE had decided to give 100 sets of improved farm implements to the village people. These were implements to be bullock powered. I did a survey on utilization of these implements by the local farmers. The local farmers took to them right away, and used them well. But when I did the survey, every piece that CARE had given them had been put away in storage. I asked why was that so. They said, "The implements were good and they do a good job, we like them, but they're worn out." They didn't have any replacement for plowshares or for the cultivator shovels to control weeds. CARE hadn't bothered to see that they had replacements. There were village blacksmiths. They showed me one. I said, "There's no reason why these village blacksmiths can't be equipped to make these replacements." I looked at his little devices for heating iron and shaping it, but his biggest problem was he didn't have any way of giving it a finished shape after the blacksmith stage. I said, "You've got a grindstone here and you've got a pulley on it. We can rig up this grindstone in such a way that it'll give you enough grinding power to shape these things." I took an old bullock cart wheel and made a pulley out of it and put a leather belt down to the pulley on the new grinder. A young boy turning it was able to give the grinder sufficient revolutions to grind and shape metal.

But he says, "I don't have any metal." I said, "Well, I think you can find metal at that scrap metal place in town. He lived a couple miles from town. I said, "Why don't you go down and take a look?" He went and took a look and he came back to me and said, "They'd charge me money for it. I don't have any cash." He said, "What I do for the village farmers, they pay me in grain and a couple buckets full of beans. But I don't have any cash, I've never used cash."

I said, "Well, this is a problem." I got some extension workers in that area together and told them what this was all about. But, you see, at the same time, AID was accumulating local rupees from the PL 480 grain sales. And they would allow us in the field to have an account at a local bank and we could spend it on things of this sort. So I went to the controller in New Delhi and asked him to put a few thousand rupees in the local bank and I could authorize the blacksmith to procure a few pieces of scrap metal for replacements for the CARE implements, which were put back into use. That's the first time the village blacksmith ever handled any money. In a sense, I introduced capitalism for the first time into that village.

This is the kind of fundamental thing that often had to be done. Not to be critical, but many of the people who came with AID in those days came from urban backgrounds and they didn't have a clue what poor, devastated Indian villagers were up against, what they had to overcome. They had no appreciation for it. You didn't have people with the kind of practical approach that met the conditions that they were facing. It so happened that I grew up in rural Virginia and much of my work as an agriculturalist was with poor, black farmers in small places with little money, where resources were scarce and you had to be truly resourceful and do a lot of things for yourself and for each other in order to survive. With that kind of background I thought I fitted in reasonably well with the Indian situation.

Q: Was this a time when India had major famines and had to be helped by massive PL 480 assistance?

JONES: U.S. PL 480 provided five million tons of food grains, enough grain to feed and to keep 65 million people living for three or four years. Otherwise, they'd have faced starvation.

A result of some of the projects that AID was involved in and things I mentioned that India was doing with help on many fronts combined to provide chemical, biological, and mechanical technology, needed to convert agriculture food grain production from an import deficit situation into an export situation.

Q: So you would say that foreign assistance had had a major impact?

JONES: No question, foreign assistance had a major, major impact. Practically every one of these items that I told you that were being constructed or were being put in place, was being done with technical assistance, including Russian, U.S., Germany, UK, and many others. No question about the impact of foreign assistance. I don't know how long it would have taken India without assistance to produce enough food, feed and fiber to meet the needs of its people. Maybe 20 to 30 years longer.

Q: Maybe that's done well for the Indian side of things. Well, you left India and what year was that?

JONES: Maybe I should back up a little bit and tell you a little bit more about working with the British. Before leaving the training center, I assisted the government to get $20,000 from the British to fund the testing component at the center. After I finished with this equipment inventory and getting some of it utilized, I was appointed liaison officer with the Ford Foundation. Ford Foundation had a number of major district projects.

Q: You left AID?

JONES: No, I was still on AID's staff, but was liaison between AID and Ford. I think it happened because the people at AID and Ford realized the approach that I had taken in central India could be duplicated effectively in the Ford Foundation district projects.

The big project that was closest to us in New Delhi was at a place called Aligarh, where the Muslim University was located in India. They had a big extension element in that district. I went there and looked at their workshop. It was in this area that I told you about the village blacksmith that I worked with.

Ford was trying to demonstrate some improved farming practices on crop production. So I decided that what was needed were some good demonstrations. They could observe improved, affordable practices that were better than some things that they were doing. One of the things was that I had observed was that farmers were irrigating the plots of land, spreading water over it, letting the moisture evaporate until the land was pliable enough to plant their seed. I saw this as a waste of water, and waste of time, because I knew some places in the U.S. where they were planting rice, maybe in Arkansas, and other places, in dry land. There's no reason why Indian farmers couldn't plant rice or wheat in dry land and then flood the water on it and the crop would germinate and grow, saving time and moisture.

So I decided at the District Headquarters where there were plots, I would do this, beside two plots that were planted the traditional way. I invited a group of farmers and explained to them that this was what I had done. They looked at the crop plots which looked better than the plots done the traditional way, plus they had saved water and time doing it. A couple of the farmers came to me and said, "Do you think we should try this?"

I said, "You make your own judgment." This is exactly the way I did it, and the people at the extension office can verify that this is the way I did it. These are the people that come out to see you every day, and they would verify that this is how it was done and this is how it looks. You go home and try it.

Next time when planting time came around, one of them came back and said, "Jones-san, me want to show you my crop."

I said, "Well get in my jeep, we'll run over there. He was as proud as he could be that he had done it this way and his crop was looking good. He had saved water and time and the crop was off to an excellent start.

I guess what I was trying to say is you had to demonstrate things and things that you demonstrate must be affordable at that particular time until you can get things moving through the use of improved practices. That's another example of what I had done in India working with the Ford Foundation in addition to the blacksmith story.

Q: Was that replicated in other places?

JONES: Oh, yes, it was replicated. It was becoming a habit then. I was called up once to the Illinois University project, because they were planting sugar cane and the farmers were complaining that the cost of planting an acre of sugar cane was so much that it cut too deep into their profit. It took about 200 people to plant an acre in traditional fashion. I went up to look and they were hauling the sugar cane on bullock cart. They had people making furrows with the tractor.

I said, you know you can beat this method. You can save 12 or 15 rupees just on planting I showed how to space the rows so that two cartwheels go down the row and a third row in the middle. You can have funnels that run from the cart down to the furrows and just slip the cut sugar cane into the funnel, slide down into the furrow. Two people can do this sitting on the back of the cart. They calculated that saved about 15 rupees in the planting along.

So I asked some of the farmers what they thought about it and some of the local people what they thought about it. They said it's good. We'd like to do this, but it puts so many people out of work. You've got two people on a bullock cart -- a driver, and a tractor and driver, doing the same thing that about 200 people were doing. So they didn't take to that right away, but later on I understand they were using more mechanical devices for planting sugar cane.

Q: But that brings out a fundamental issue in technological change, doesn't it?

JONES: Right, it does. But interesting enough, just before we left India, I had done a few more useful things. Then came the industrial fair. The people at the Embassy who were concerned about the U.S. display at the fair were thinking showy, colorful. I got concerned about it. I don't remember what they had in mind, but it certainly didn't suit anything I thought was right for India.

Here I would like to mention a family happening: our seventh daughter was born at the Family Hospital in New Delhi.

I went to them and said, "You know, what you're talking about makes no kind of sense for this rural oriented India." Most of the population depended on farming for their livelihood and their well-being. They said, "What do you suggest?" I said, "If you can come up with some kind of a device that can quickly turn a piece of metal into a plowshare, that would fit their plows, would be the greatest exhibit that you could put on. You'd have crowds of people looking at the display all the time."

They rethought the idea and came up with a big electric hammer, a huge thing. It must have weighed tons. It was set up as a demonstration. A person could take a piece of mild steel and move it in such a way that in a matter of minutes a plowshare was done. When they put that display on, there was never enough standing room.

Later on, a friend of mine whom I'd worked with that was making small farm implements at Allahabad near the college, came to me and said, "You know, I'd like to have that piece of equipment. Can you find out how much it costs?" I said, "I'll talk to people and they might even give it to you." But they didn't. They said, "We could let him have it for $5,000."

I went back to him and said, "They'll let you have it for $5,000."

He said, "I don't have that much money."

"How much do you have?" "I have the equivalent of what would be $2,500 and I would have to hustle around to get the other $2,500. But I talked to the Presbyterian missionaries and they're willing to give me a trip to the States so I can go the Presbyterian churches and raise the rest of that money.”

He went to the States, and returned with the rest of the $2,500, plunked down the $5,000 and got the machine moved from the fair grounds to his workshop in Allahabad. He was banging out plowshares that would cover the whole countryside in a very short time.

Anyway, with all this under my belt, I was getting ready to leave India. We were accompanied by Doug Enismenger and his wife, who was the head of the Ford Foundation in India. I couldn't imagine why. I got ready to get out of the car at the airport and walk up to Customs and he said, “Why don't you come back and work for the Ford Foundation.”

I said, “I'll think about it.” I went home and thought, I've got too much time with AID (government) and I don't want to risk that, and not knowing what Ford's offer would lead him to, I wrote back and told him I decided to stay with the government. He wrote me a letter back, said, “Needless to say, I'm sorry. All the best.”

The Marshall Plan had done an excellent job of restructuring the war-torn economies of Europe after WWII. The success had prompted the U.S. Congress to pass legislation to provide monies assisting the economic development of many newly independent third-world countries. I had often thought about leaving my faculty position with the department of agriculture at Tennessee State University to join the hordes of technicians being sent world-wide to assist in third-world development. My salary was not especially high. Occasionally we had to resort to pawning the family's silverware to keep up with growing family expenses. Though I knew working abroad would offer increased pay, I had discarded the notion as many times as it had come to mind. My thoughts were laced with media images of the Third World. Disorder. Chaos. Strife. Dire poverty and deadly diseases, imminent internal conflict and strife. The thought of raising a family there, already up to six daughters, was too daunting. I shared these reservations with my wife, Loretta. None of these doubts were expressly communicated to the children.

One day at the university I was in my boss Walter Flower's office.

“Say Jones,” he greeted me. “Maybe you'd like to try this,” he said as he reached over his desk to pass me some papers.

“What is it?” I asked.

“Take a look and let me know what you think.” Flowers leaned back in his chair and thrust his cowboy boots across the corner of his desk.

“Thanks,” I replied, “I'll take a look and get back to you in a day or so.” Just to get an appointment and find Flowers actually at his desk was an event in itself. I had been on his staff since I had left an agricultural faculty position at Fort Valley State College, Georgia, in 1950. Chief Flowers, Dean of Agriculture at Tennessee State University, Nashville, was the most sought after individual on campus. I wasn't quite sure why, but Flowers was close to the university's president. He was a master at evading people and missing appointments. Lots of patience, skill and intuition were required of his staff and others to catch up with him. Chief's secretary, Mary, had become very skillful at supporting his evasive habits. "Is Chief around today?" people would ask. Her standard reply was: "He's around all right, but he's not around here." In spite of the fact that every day brought new reasons to dislike him, I found it difficult to become disaffected with Flowers, like most of the other staff members. His charm, disarming personality, and his repertoire of tall tales conspired to dispel any ill feeling one might harbor towards him. He always seemed to want to project the cowboy image. He wore the boots and sometimes the hat, but his Mississippian birth and background always showed through.

The papers Chief had given me were application forms sent to him from the U.S. Department of State, encouraging him to apply for the position of farm machinery advisor to the Ministry of Agriculture of the Government of India. More specifically, the incumbent was to advise and assist in the setting up of a farm machinery training and testing center at Budni, a remote corner of central Madhya Pradesh State, in India.

It had finally happened! After so many months of indecision something concrete presented itself. A torrent of new thoughts rushed through my heads. I had to weigh our present job prospects against future prospects. Was a pigeon in hand better than the many pigeons I hoped to catch? What did my job at Tennessee State hold for me? What about Loretta's job future? Loretta taught remedial mathematics and her salary helped meet family costs. But her chances for staying on looked dim, since she was recently called on the carpet for giving one of the school's top women Olympic prospects, Wilma Rudolph, a failing grade in remedial math. Loretta stood her ground and would not change the grade. The administration was unhappy. There goes the extra money, I thought.

As to my own position, I too discovered that I had to compete against financial preferences for the athletics department. When I had been initially hired, I was told to establish in the Department of Agriculture a Division of Agriculture Engineering in conjunction with the School of Engineering. My office site consisted of only a hulk of a building. On cold, wintry days the wind often blew in snow flakes through the broken window panes. I made substantial improvements with the help of student labor. We heated the classroom with a wood stove that I had built out of a fifty-five gallon oil drum. Wood had to be collected by me, the instructor, and the students. While this was better than nothing, the stove heated the room very uneven. Students on the side of the room farthest from the stove were freezing, and those closest to it roasting. This was not, needless to say, conducive to learning. This was Tennessee State for African-Americans in 1955. The college entrants from Tennessee's African-American high schools were terribly deficient academically and positive attitudes towards applying themselves to scholastic pursuits were sorely lacking. My department had been promised funds but never the likes of those actually allocated to the athletics department. Even though the university's president was a trained agriculturist his main thrust was athletics. He often said, "Black schools have to get well known, then they can get good." His vision of getting known was through the football, basketball, and women's track teams winning the state and nationwide competitions. They had dominated the annual AAU (Amateur Athletic Union) meets for several years. But his plan for getting good otherwise was less obvious. Athletics were thus pushed to the forefront and other academic interests came second, third, even fourth. I knew that my department would never get the required funds. In this kind of situation I began to feel like a volunteer with a stipend. So why not move from slow developing situation to another in India, I thought. After weighing the pros and cons, I decided for the pros. All I needed then was family sanction.

The family responded enthusiastically. Everybody agreed that they wanted to go to India, in spite of not knowing anything about the big sub-continent. The girls were enthralled about the prospect of going to school at home. Loretta was prepared to forego beauty parlors that treated African-American hair. "There's no one who could do my hair over there in India." Mr. Flowers had fretted once to Loretta. That did not daunt Loretta. We were accustomed to being resourceful. It was decided that we would try it for two years and see what happened after that — que sera sera. Several trips were made to Chief's office to tell him what I thought about the papers from Washington, but he was never there and I never got any closer to him than Mary's stock answer, "He's around alright, but not around here." The application was submitted. Shortly thereafter, Mary Nichols called from Washington saying, "You have been accepted for the job in India and I have mailed all the instructions for you, and the family to make preparations for departure." All this had transpired, plus a letter from the university president granting me a two-year leave of absence before I actually got a chance to talk to Chief about the decision.

The preparations began with physical examinations at the nearest government facility, which was the Smyrna Airbase, just outside of Nashville. Several trips there confirmed that all parts were functioning up to normal standards, and I was given enough inoculations to bring on the pin-cushion syndrome.

With final details in place I was set to leave ahead of the family for my orientation in Washington, D.C. On the day of my departure, the girls came en masse to demand that I tell them something about India before I left.

"I shan't be able to tell you much because I haven't thought that much about it. But I will make a deal with you I'll tell what little I know if you older girls will agree to get the encyclopedia to read about India and share it with the younger sisters." They agreed.

"India is a long way away," I began to tell them, "more than 10,000 miles which is nearly half way around the world. I hear many many people live there. They have lots of floods and famine, but no floods in the place where we will live. Many people are poor and hungry and sleep in the streets in the big cities. People have many different kinds of diseases and unfortunately there are few hospitals, and not enough doctors to give them good treatment. They live in villages of many houses which are made from mud and cow dung. Millions of women dry cow dung into cakes and use it to cook their food. There are also lots of nice things and places in India, good beaches, good mountain resorts and lots of nice buildings. There are people with lots of money, rich people who live in palaces and very nice homes, all of whom have servants. We will have some too. I expect. But many village people are very poor and hardly have enough to eat. Much of my work will be with the poor people, farmers and village folks helping them grow more food so they can have enough to eat.

I thought it best not to mention what I had once heard about India while attending a lecture by Dr. Howard Thurman, the renowned religious leader then of Howard University. He had recently returned from India and spoke of the whole catalogue of human miseries. Particularly the caste systems and the plight of those at the bottom, the “untouchables.” He referred to them as cringing and demoralized people who were able to carry on in part because they had heard that somewhere between them and the bottom of the human scale of suffering were the black Americans. I had discussed this with Loretta, who thought it was not necessary to relate this to the children.

If she could arrange it, Loretta was to come to Washington after my orientation for a final farewell before our six-month separation. Even so, our Nashville parting was difficult.

“Loretta, soon the family will take their first trip by air, halfway around the world. You must be brave for the girls’ sake,” I said with my arms around her. “If we are successful with India and are bitten by the foreign service bug, there may be lots more time in the air.”

She gripped my hand and with a tear falling on her cheek, she said, “I’ll be brave.”

Holding each other close for a few minutes, we said nothing else. Then all the girls gathered for a round of hugs, kisses, and promises to write. With a concert of goodbyes, I was off to Washington.

The old DC-3 lumbered through the Tennessee mountains into Virginia, through snow showers, strong winds and local visibility. The trip seemed unending, and the thought of eventually having to fly over 10,000 more miles was less than appealing. Finally the wheels were down, almost touching the waters of the Potomac River, before they grabbed the tarmac. What a relief. There is nothing to beat the feeling of having your feet on solid ground.

Flagging a taxi on arrival, I settled in to admire the monuments along the route. Instead, I found myself a captive audience to a social commentator.

“I get so mad with them raising my taxes all the time,” the driver proclaimed.” I guess you have to blame this on all the women who keep on getting pregnant, having all these babies and going on welfare and we hard working people have to bear the bill. I’m damn tired of it. Why does a hard-working taxi driver have to pay for somebody else baby when someone else had all the fun helping to bring them into the world?”

“That’s the way the system works,” I commented absent mindedly.

“I reckon so,” he sighed as pulled his official looking cap down over his brow.

“That’s the Lincoln Memorial just in front of us, isn’t it?”

“Yes,” the driver replied. “He sure was a good old man and helped us black people out a lot. Hadn’t been for him I might still be in Georgia hoeing Mr. Charlie’s cotton. Yeah, we owe a lot to Abe! He was one of them better white people of his day. But they killed him, you know, he got ‘sassinated right here in D.C. at the Ford Theater. Anybody that was good to us in those days, stood in danger.’

A few minutes later we pulled up to a sprawling building that filled a city block.

“Here is state! Your fare is $4.50,” he announced as he recorded the ride in his log. I tipped him a dollar, for which I was profusely thanked.

Awed by the massive structure, and with baggage heavy enough to add to the unbalance, I lurched through the swinging doors and up to the information desk. I began to get the feeling that the whole of Washington had a roof over it. After checking my credentials, orders, and identification, the desk person began to direct me to a room on the third floor.

“You are here” she pointed out on the building plan, “and this is where you want to go.”

Then the trouble began. This was a big place! The signs, arrows, and numbers began to confuse me. Being a woodsman, I always used the sun, land marks, or even moss on trees to find my way. This place was too orderly, with endless corridors and elevators that deposited one on identical floors. I began to wander, pushing button after buttons often the wrong ones, and traversing corridors which seemed to lead to the same place. The more I asked people where room 3311 was, the farther from it I became. I sat down on my bags to rest and began to think how best to punish the architect for coming up with such a design. Suddenly the answer: bring him back to this place, put him in the middle of the building, and make him find his way out. Yes! A fitting penalty for his sins. Just then a young man came down the corridor with a handful of files. “Where is room 3311?” I inquired.

“You’re very close, just down the hall on your right.”

As I entered the evasive “3311,” I thought, my point of light at last!

Mary Nichols, the recruiter, was quietly pleasant with a slight smile. She had a good start on middle age, and her blond hair was mixed with gray. She had always referred to herself as Mary Nichols on the phone and in the letters I had received in Nashville, so I didn’t know whether she was a Miss, Ms, or Mrs. She gave me the packet crammed with information and explained how the next two weeks would be structured. I would be attending seminars with people from many different backgrounds: historians, diplomats, economists, sociologists, Europeans, Americans, Indians, the lot. She had made reservations at the National Hotel, which was within walking distance. Her instructions for getting out of the building seemed much simpler than those I had received for getting in. She stood up and graciously wished me all the best, promising to guide me through the maze of paperwork and activities. She could now carve another notch on the corner of her desk for a successful recruitment.

The National Hotel had probably been in Washington longer than dirt. From the looks of the lobby it was by no means plushy but livable for a couple of weeks. Generations of paint seem to have given it some extra strength. Steam oozed out of the radiators and pipes clanged and popped at times. Every step was accompanied by a squeaking floorboard. One could imagine that George Washington might have slept here. But it was clean and comfortable and I was going to be too busy to mind the little inconveniences.

Washington - The Orientation Capital

Orientation went by in what seemed like minutes. It loaded me with enough facts and figures to last the rest of my life, although we had only signed up for a two-year assignment. Indian history, politics, economics, traditions, and mores were all talked about. U.S. government officials, Indians living in the U.S., including some from the Indian Embassy, and hordes of specialists came to give of themselves and their knowledge. They kept repeating “You are all U.S. ambassadors to India and you must act in that image at all times. The fact that you will live in other cultures means that you will never be totally American again.” No one mentioned how much American would be left over after exposure to other cultures over time. Nor was mention made of minority Americans who had already lived on the fringes of their own country’s culture. Nor were the vast inequities of living standards among India’s social classes referred to, but my own experience in the U.S. prepared me for that. Nevertheless, by the end of orientation I was full of facts and figures as an inflated life jacket.

To top this off, I was advised at the end of the last session to report to room 3644 for any further clarification I needed about India. This I did.

“I’m Harold Jones sent here by the orientation people to get you to put the finishing touches on my knowledge about India.” My first and second impression of my instructor was that she would be an excellent candidate for the Miss America Contest, of the first order.

“My name is Marie and I am delighted to meet you, Mr. Jones.” She stood to shake my hand with a firm grip. “I am afraid I can’t tell you much about India. You see I joined the agency only two weeks ago.”

“Where did you come from?” I asked.

“I’m from Crossville, Tennessee.”

“Interesting, I’ve passed many a time through your town. I’m from Nashville. At least we have that in common.

“I wish I knew more about India to tell you,” she lamented.

“Maybe my grandmother was right,” I said. “She used to tell me after living for ninety years that ‘Every devil must figure his own salvation.’ Anyway, it’s awfully nice to meet a fellow Tennessean. When I return in two years, maybe I can tell you about India.” We shook hands and I wished her all the best in her new assignment.

“You too,” she returned. This last point of light at the Department of State had shone rather dimly, with respect to her knowledge of India. But she lit the place up with her presence.

Loretta arrived by train to spend three days with me before my departure. She made her way to the National Motel after a racial hassle with taxi drivers at Union Station. After a compassionate embrace, she brought me up to date.

“I had mixed feelings about coming because all the girls got the measles, and the twins are still recuperating. But they’re in good hands, so I thought it was safe to come.”

“You’d better have, or you would have been in real trouble.” I said as we headed back to the hotel.

Over the next few days, I filled Loretta in on what I had learned in orientation. We planned and speculated, sharing our excitement and apprehension. The last evening was a passionate farewell, prompting Loretta to say forlornly, “Maybe I should go with you now. Six months is a long time to wait.”

“It will be six long months for me, too” I affirmed. “I sure hope the airlines will let us put those life jackets on while crossing the Atlantic, and not keep them under the seat. I won’t be happy until all of us are together again.”

The Lumbering Four-Motored Aircraft

January 1956, marked the beginning of my arduous journey to India. It started with a local flight from Washington to New York, then a transfer by helicopter to the international airport where I boarded my transatlantic flight on KLM, the Royal Dutch airlines. As the glow of New York’s artificial aurora borealis faded, I tried to prepare myself for what lay ahead. I would have to endure nearly three days of changing altitudes and time zones, cramped quarters, and the constant rumbles and vibrations of the four-engine prop plane.

There were a few bright spots to distract me from the Atlantic’s pitch-black horizon. I was traveling first class, as was standard for foreign service employees in those days. This meant a continuous deluge of sumptuous food and drinks and a pillow fluffing administered by one of the world’s loveliest young women.

After thirteen hours in the air, we struggled through a dense fog to land in Scotland for refueling. Then we were up again, crossing the English Channel to Amsterdam. The sky brightened and the flight became smooth, even pleasurable. Schipol airport, home of the flying Dutchman, was framed by the Atlantic Ocean on one side and the flat windmill and canal infested countryside on the other.

I could look forward to a twenty-four hour layover in Amsterdam. All I knew about Holland was what I recalled from primary school geography and fairy tales — wooden shoes, windmills, and the story of the boy who prevented a national disaster- by plugging a hole in the dyke with his finger. Soon I would be able to compare the real Netherlands with what I had read of it from “Other Lands,” my geography textbook in the late 1920s.

The urban spread of Amsterdam looked especially well laid out and orderly. The landing was smooth and welcomed. While proceeding through customs I had my bags examined by a very young looking, personable man.

I said to him in a friendly tone. "I didn't think a nice country like your Netherlands would have these kinds of checks on people coming in and out." He came back with, "Oh yes, we have to have a little McCarthyism also." Apparently I was not seen as a suspect, for he smiled and waved me through. I took the airport bus to the hotel for some food and rest. Lunch was well prepared, tasty, and served in a pleasant atmosphere of soft violin music. After a short nap, I was ready to browse a bit around Amsterdam.

I got a feeling of compactness and efficiency on my tour of Amsterdam, The people were determined and knew where they were going and how to get there. Old-world charm abounded in the below-sea level historic city. The people were warm, hospitable and cheerful bustling around day and night on bicycles, footmobiles, and boats in this city of bridges and canals. The city was remarkably well kept and the canals provided much of the means of transportation in this city of bridges and canals. The people were warm, hospitable and cheerful. I wondered if they had ever taken a bridge census. It would take a lot of counting for the bridges that connected the city's several hundreds islands reclaimed from the sea.

Amsterdam-Cairo-Lebanon

The next afternoon, my "flying Dutchman," heavy and clumsy, lifted under a bright sun Suddenly the phenomenally flat countryside of windmills and canals stretch-d out in all directions. My window view of towns and cities, rivers, lakes, farms, forest, and a constantly changing skyline held me fascinated. The second leg of the flight took us across the Swiss Alps and over the Mediterranean to Cairo. Night fell as we approached Switzerland, turning the panorama into patches of sparkling lights amid darkened hills. Our refueling stop in Geneva was routine and, back in the air, the sumptuous candlelight dinner, the soft music and quiet ambience did wonders to relax me. A bright neon allowed a spectacular view of the Matterhorn, with its unrivaled grandeur. Simply contemplating its majesty is enough to immobilize a human feelings of arrogance or superiority.

As we approached Egypt, clouds and fog forced our flight to be rerouted to Beirut for servicing. Our plane was already banking for Lebanon when the pilot announced the changed plans. The mention of Lebanon sent my thoughts back to Sunday school and days in rural Virginia, and the Bible's mention of the Cedars of Lebanon: "And say, thus saith the Lord God; a great eagle with great wings, long winged, full of feathers which had diverse colors, came unto Lebanon and took the highest branch of the cedar," (Ezekiel 17-3). "King Solomon obtained wood from these cedars to build his beautiful temple in Jerusalem," (1 Kings 5: 6-10).

Soon we were over the eastern shores of the Mediterranean, the snow-capped Lebanon mountains parallel with the coastline. Their foothills nourish the roots of biblical cedars. The beautiful capital city, Beirut, was just ahead. Once we landed on the tarmac, the summer heat melted my memory of snowy peaks. Flies and other signs of uncleanness did little to cheer up the lethargic, wilted, and aggravated passengers as we disembarked into the warm, humid airport.

Only warm Coca-Colas were available for refreshment, adding to the wilt. Maybe this was what they had referred to back in orientation as “culture shock.” Overwhelmed by heat and exhaustion, we passengers sat dejectedly in silence.

I felt a tapping on my shoulder, and I turned to face two men whom I had seen on the plane.

In heavily accented English one asked, “Aren’t you getting off here with us to go to Syria?”

Caught totally off guard. I haltingly replied, “No, I’m headed for India.”

“We are sorry, we thought you were Syrian,” the other said as they moved away.

“Passengers are requested to return to the aircraft.” This announcement injected new life into the listless passengers, who seemed delighted to scramble aboard. All four engines roared into action and the aircraft was let loose down the runway, accelerating past stationary landmarks, and finally lifting into the warm air for Karachi. My seat companion was a dainty, elderly woman, who, at regular intervals, shifted her small, flat-top hat over her gray hair, making sure that it maintained its proper angle.

“Where are you from?” I asked.

“New York, yes. I am from New York.” she said in a thoughtful tone.

“Off to where?” I questioned.

“Every year I take a trip around the world by air,” she calmly replied, readjusting her hat.

“You are not afraid to do that?” I asked.

“No, I am not! You can’t get anywhere being scaredy cat. You see, I like this airline and all of its nice people,” Leaning closer to me she whispered. “Have you ever seen anybody more efficient than the damn Dutch?”

“They are good,” I replied. “May I ask your name?”

“I’m Gracie, Gracie Thompson.”

“I’m glad to meet you, ma’am. My name is Harold Jones. I’m coming from Nashville, Tennessee.”

“So nice to meet you, Mr Jones. Nashville!” she exclaimed. “I once went there. Heard much about Grand Old Opry, Minnie Pearl and all of them folks and my curiosity got the best of me, so I decided to go South for the first time, just to see that place where they make all that country music. I enjoyed it, but you know it doesn’t take much for me to get filled up on country music. You like country music, do you?” she asked.

With no hesitation, I answered, "I like all forms of music: country, classical, spiritual, down the line."

"Where is this trip taking you to?" she queried, as she again patted her hat.

"I am off to India for two years"

"India, for two years. What on earth for?" she asked. looking at me in disbelief .

"I've just joined the U.S. Government's Foreign Service Assistance Program. I will be assisting the Indian Ministry of Agriculture in setting up farm machinery training and testing center, in a remote jungle area in central India. The place is called Budni, really in the bush."

"You going out there alone?" she asked.

"No, my family will come later when school is out in June."

"Do you have a big family? You don't look old enough to have much of a family."

"But I do. I have six daughters and a wife." I explained.

"With six daughters, I certainly hope there's a wife," she said and laughed. "No sons?"

"Nope, no son."

"I hear it's the man's fault when the children are all girls. Are you going to keep on trying until you get a son?"

"I wasn't trying the last time when we got the sixth girl. I stated. "It just happened, ma'am. We're looking for a way to put an end to having children. You see, we had planned to have four, but the fourth came as twins, making it five. This threw our plan right out the window. We then went to six." Both of us laughed.

"Have any good suggestions how I could put an end to this children thing, not have anymore?" I asked her.

Gracie laughed and said, "There are known ways one can prevent pregnancies. I'd think you must have heard of some by now, haven't you?"

"Yea," I answered, "but they don't seem to work for us. At least they have not up to this time. Seems like all I have to do is hang my trousers on the back of the chair in the bedroom and my wife gets pregnant."

"I certainly can't help you from my own experience," she said. "We never had any children. My husband passed away a few years ago I never became pregnant during the forty years we were married. We never found out whether it was his fault or mine. And here you are with six and can't seem to turn off the faucet. Life can be so uneven, so unfair." A forlorn look came over her face. "And here you are going out to India with all those children. I have seen some of India's teeming millions in Bombay and Calcutta living under sub-human conditions. It is beyond the imagination! If I had a family of young daughters like you, I would have to search my conscience thoroughly, before deciding to take them to India. You are a brave man. Godspeed," she added.

"You see, U.S. assistance is all about helping the poor people of the world, like those you spoke of. Those kinds of people have far more meal times than they have meals. We hope that what I and others have come to do in agriculture production, over time, will make it possible for more people to produce more food. As long as they have food, people can live in caves, but without it they can't even live in the best of hotels."

"To that all I can say is the best of everything. You certainly seem to believe what you say," she added, giving one more adjustment to her hat.

"It's been a pleasure talking with you, ma'am. Continue to have a good journey around the world. I see we're near Karachi, where I get off to transfer to a flight to New Delhi."

"The pleasure's mine," she said, turning to gaze at the approaching landscape. The red, tile roofs of the Pakistani city and its mosques and minarets seemed to be just beneath the wheels of the plane as it glided gradually down to the runway for a smooth landing. The "dam Dutch" had done it again. As we taxied to the terminal, I was lost in the thought of Loretta and the girls' so far away and still having to come by the Royal Dutch Airlines to Karachi without me.

The Desert Dance

For the final segment of the journey, I transferred to an Indian Airlines DC-3, WWII vintage, piloted by two turbaned Sikhs. So too was my seat mate, dressed in neat western clothes, with a classy looking turban, and a tightly pulled shiny beard. He spoke to me in what I assumed to be Hindi. Seeing me struggling to respond with a puzzled look on my face he came to my rescue in English.

"You are Hindustani, aren't you?"

"No, I'm American," I responded.

"Sorry, you look so much like one of us."

"There's some American Indian in my family. I'm Harold Jones, headed to Bhopal." I explained the purpose of my journey.

"Delighted to meet you Mr. Jones, my name is Ball Singh. Let me be the first to welcome you to India. We need all the help we can get from people like you."

The noisy twin-engine DC-3 lifted off the tarmac and headed for the Indian border. Buoyed by the hot desert air as it began to skirt the edge of the Great Indian Deserts the plane began flopping about like a drunken duck. One had the feeling of being thrown about rather than being flown. Vast areas of this plant-sparse, sand-bullied landscape showed minimal animal life or human habitation. Only small villages and herds of goats raising trails of dust, could occasionally be seen.

“We are nearing our first stop, Jodhpur,” Mr. Singh informed me. “See the hill and rocks in the distance, and the lake there with the buildings? Those are the palace grounds of the Maharajah of Jodhpur. The palace is reported to have 250 rooms built back in the 1920s. Maharajahs means ‘great kings.’ They no longer rule these territories since we gained our independence. We now have state and central governments for governing the country. The palaces are used to live in, but mostly for ceremonial purposes. The Maharajah here is but a young boy and I believe is at the private, preparatory school for boys, called Eton, in the UK.” Mr Singh explained.

“Thanks for all the information. You seem to know your country well,” I commented.

The DC-3 danced down, swaying from side to side in a crosswind and scattering thin layers of sand on the tarmac from the sand dunes at its sides. The few minutes at the sand-dusted airport with minimal facilities did little to ease the wooziness brought on by the jostling flight from Karachi. No one got off or on. Only a few bags probably mail, were loaded on and the desert dance was resumed until we reached Ajmee, the last stop before the 200 plus miles to New Delhi. The landscape showed a much stronger expression of plant life, nothing suggestive of an Amazon, but sufficient enough to increase the frequency of village life and animal activity. As the sun moved just over the edge of its horizon of sand Ajmer came into sight in a rocky valley, a lake was visible with a collection of good looking buildings lining its shores. Mr. Singh explained it was one of their ancient cities and that the wall surrounding the city had five entrance gates. He told me of a tomb in the city for the Muslim Saint Kwnaja, revered as a place of pilgrimage.

“It’s also a center of education with Ajmer College which is linked to Calcutta University and Mayo Rajkumar for the education of noble Rajputs.” Again I thanked him and praised his knowledge of the place.

The brief stopover was as uneventful as that in Jodhpur with the exception of taking on two passengers. One was a phenomenally beautiful Indian woman, wrapped in a sari which seemed to have “expensive” written all over it. Exuding a look of royalty, she had unlimited powers for generating wistfulness in any man. With daylight almost spent and the desert air temperature becoming considerably more pleasant, the DC-3 was off for the last leg of the big journey. I was secure with the thought that the trip was not as long as it had been and not as short as it was going to be. The flight proved to be much smoother and we were nearing the end of a long journey. My spirit soared to exaltation, which all but took me through the roof of the aircraft as New Delhi came into view. Its lights retread out endlessly across the flat plains. The metropolis was dimmed over by thin blue clouds of smoke drifting lazily from the thousands of wood and cow dung fires cooking the evening meals. The dependable “drunken duck” came to a bouncy rest on the tarmac of the New Delhi Airport. Eternity, lay behind me.

“Mr. Singh, you’ve made my introduction to India a pleasant one. I enjoyed sitting next to you. Hopefully, fate will see fit to have our paths cross again before I return to the U.S.” I said as I shook his hand.

He replied, "It has been my pleasure. If you are ever in Amritsar, I have a small cloth business there. You would be most welcome." We bid farewell.

The Newest of Delhies

At the terminal I was met by a contingent of American technical personnel assigned to various agricultural projects, headed by Earl Julson, a personable extension specialist from Great Falls, Montana. He had broad-shoulders, noticeably large hands, and a distinct Burt Lancaster look. His mouth tended to go askew as he smiled with almost every comment. Earl, along with a U.S. Embassy-employed Indian, who was apparently well-known to the custom officials, whisked me through customs rituals. The other eight or ten members of the welcoming party showered me with warm greetings, which gave me a genuine feeling of their sincerity, with one exception. During the introductions, I overheard one the party say quietly to another, "I hear he has a very large family. That's all India needs these days is another large family, especially all girls." Though it took some effort, I concentrated on all the genuine welcomes and let this remark pass without retort. I later learned that arrivals and departures of American personnel were taken very seriously and everyone was treated as a member of one big family. As we rode into town, Earl let me know that his family would not come for a while yet and that I would be staying with him in a bachelors setup.

"You've arrived a few hours ahead of one of India's biggest annual events, the Independence Day celebrations. It starts nine A.M. tomorrow morning, just a short distance from where I live," Earl informed me.

"They shouldn't have done it. I didn't expect such a welcome, but it's very decent of them," I commented.

"These are very considerate people," Earl replied as we both laughed.

Shortly, we were having dinner at Earl's quarters in a duplex housing project. Strictly bachelor style, the dinner was a potpourri of wild game and vegetables cooked beyond recognitions. It didn't taste bad. Thanks to the seasoning that came to its rescue. The graciousness and enthusiasm of my host made up for his lack of culinary skills. After some small talk about living in Indian, my eyelids grew heavy. Earl suggested we get a good night's rest, since I was worn down from the travel. The next day would be full attendance at the Independence Day parade, followed by an afternoon hunt in the Punjab.

First Day In India

My first sunrise on the sub-continent of India shone dim through the ever present morning hale of smoke that hung upon the cool morning air. Beneath the smoky haze, the city of New Delhi was ablaze in mosaic splendor, heightened by millions of blossoms woven into garlands of every conceivable color. The Independence Day celebration had begun and Earl had worked us into an enviable position to view the parade. I watched this spectacle in awe of the Masses of humanity, animals, vehicles, and military equipment. School children were clad in all colors of school uniforms, bands were draped in gold and navy uniforms, together with colorfully regimented elephant, camel, and cavalry brigades. It went on and on. Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru passed on foot barely a few yards from us. Smiling incessantly and possessing a humble, friendly, and unruffled demeanor, he slowly moved among the masses, shaking hands, giving special attention to the children. India's teeming millions had become a reality to me. They all seemed to be there.

It took a special kind of adroitness to avoid being trampled when the parade was over. Earl's experience came in handy for getting us back to his place. After a cold drink, a bowl of Earl's warmed-over stews, hard-crust rolls, and some black Montana-brewed coffees strong enough to jump-start a car, we were ready for the afternoon hunt. Earl supplied me with a shotgun and we stowed the water jug in his Jeep. We were heading north to a location he had hunted before, crossing the Jumna River to reach the Grand Trunk Road, a major artery that ran from Kashmir to Calcutta. That day it was jammed with holiday travelers, as well as the usual traffic: trucks, cars, bullock and horse carts and bicycles.

Eventually we left the congestion behind, reaching open countryside. Turning off the main road, we followed an irrigation canal through farmland and villages, giving me my first look at India's rural poverty. Irrigation and farming tools were at their most basics and living conditions were impoverished. There was little activity due to the holiday, aside from tending to domestic animals and the perpetual collection of dung for cooking fuel. "About sixty percent of India's domestic fuel is cow dung," Earl commented.

Beyond the farms was an area of gullies coffered with scrub plants, a popular grazing spot for the chincara, or ravine deer. They are small, fawn-colored antelope, with both male and female sporting horns, so one had to take care to avoid shooting a doe. Earl explained their habit of bolting when startled, only to halt after fifty yards to look back, made them rather cooperative targets.

Earl perched atop a ridge while I scouted the ravines. It wasn't long before we had each bagged a buck and were heading back to New Delhi in the twilight, making much better time on our return trip. At Earl's place we salted the hides and prepared the meat for freezer storage. Over a dinner of liver and onions we exchanged hunting stories from Montana and Virginia. Then I had to give in to exhaustion, ending a memorable first day in India.

Being Stuffed With More About India

On my second day in New Delhi, I began a two-week orientation intended to prepare me for my field assignment in Bhopal. The priority for the day was spending time with Grace Langley, the organizer and animator of the program. Grace was a very striking, personable lady from Minnesota. According to Earl, she had been an assistant to Senator Hubert Humphrey of the same state. Grace went straight to the point, gave a clear succinct picture of the structure of the orientation, and handed out packets containing detailed instructions for the next two weeks.

"I hear you're staying with Earl Julson," she said as I took leave. "Our bus will come for you every morning."

“Thanks, I look forward to an interesting two weeks.” I responded.

On my way out I met Eddie Daniels, an economist from Kentucky and also a newcomer. He had already seen Grace, and agreed heartily with my praise of her. We seemed to hit it off right from the beginning, maybe because we both saw humor in most things, and laughed at of each other’s jokes. Eddie was about five feet, seven inches tall and his graying hair had distinct cowlicks on each side and was thinning on top. For the most part, he carried a very sober look which, without the slightest provocation or warning, could burst suddenly into a smile and loud laughter, easily followed by some sort of earthy saying or joke. He showed me a picture of his family, and his children looked quite young to have middle-aged parents. I already had six and was considerably younger. He had no doubt spent more time pursuing academic accomplishments, having a Ph.D. in economics, than thinking about marriage and procreation. But by own standards and biases, he was headed in the right direction, starting with two daughters.

The rest of the day was spent meeting the members of the U.S. development assistance family, referred to as TOM (Technical Cooperation Mission). Heads of divisions, their staff, and mission support services personnel were warm, friendly, and impressive. I had the feeling I could count on the system to give the needed support in the field and that I could concentrate on the project to which I was assigned.

None was more striking than my agriculture department head, Dr. Frank Parker. An experienced agriculturist, he was tall, straight, and white-haired, with a constant, gentle smile that seemed linked to his eyes. He was clearly one of the most impressive in the mission: confident, encouraging, and quietly personable with a gentle sense of humor. He gave me a rundown on India’s agriculture program and what my project was designed to accomplish. He had an incredible knack for making one feel good about being on his team. The office support staff of Indian secretaries had strikingly good looks, warm personalities, and were competent. My eyeing mechanism had been fully exercised. I thought of Loretta’s all too frequent reminder: Be strong and resistant, eyes on, hand off, and remember, I always put the blame on the man and never the woman. The limits were clear.

The bus came regularly each morning like a school bus to pick up the orientees. Near the end of the run, Grace, the coordinator, would board. On the first day, I had taken my seat beside Eddie Daniels and we had decided that there should be a special way to recognize Grace’s presence as she boarded the bus, something that had a devilish touch but expressed our sincere appreciation for a top-notch coordinator. We decided to have the group sing: “Amazing Grace how sweet the sound to save a wretch like me. I once was lost but now I’m found; was blind but now I see.” Being the kind, pleasant person she was, Grace gave a slight bow and smile of recognition of the group’s off-tune singing. It also seemed to have a wake-up effect on us all.

In some areas the two-week program repeated my orientation in Washington, but was more specific. Indians coming from universities, government, religious groups and other private organizations dominated these presentations. U.S. Embassy personnel taught us in on how to behave and how to preserve and build the American image while contributing to India’s development. India desperately needed to become self-sufficient in basic food grains; for years it had suffered a deficit. The Indian professionals, sociologists and historians as well as the bureaucrats, provided insight on how to survive and adapt to India's social Patterns. Their information left me with the impression that the farther you set from the Department of State Headquarters in Washington the closer you were to reality. Maybe that's the way it's supposed to be. We had the advantage of being in the midst of it all, and the field trips we made brought the whole picture of India into an even sharper focus. The contrast between rich and poor became evident on a trip to Old Delhi, where gold and silver were being fashioned into exquisite jewelry alongside dirt and poverty where the sunlight never entered. Dark, one-room hovels, sheltering as many as twenty people, on streets so narrow that two people had to turn sideways to pass, stood next to the grand and glorious monuments of old. The most impressive of these were works of Shah Jahan, the seventeenth century Mogul emperor and founder of the City of Delhi: the Jama Masjid, India's largest mosque, and the Red Fort, a magnificent sandstone structure. I had never seen such exemplary architecture indicative of Mogul refinement. Salmon pink in color, it was for me a picture of enchantment, and definitely one of the extraordinary sights of India.

In Old Delhi, people seemed to lose their identity and blur into one mulled mass that moved like a monolith. The cows, in sacred immunity, roamed or lay in the streets. They seem neither tended nor owned, nibbling from food stalls or patches of grass, and impeding traffic. The main road, the Chandni Chauk, a wide thoroughfare, had nearly a mile long strip of warehouses and shops, where a staggering mountain of gold, silver, and embroideries could be purchased. Our tour took us along the road runs from the Red Fort to the old walled city, with even more ancient monuments. Eight capital cities had been founded overtime in the Delhi area. Few things in the area were more striking than the mausoleum of the Emperor Humayun, the Qutab Minar, a 238 foot tower from the twelfth century, and the iron Pillar of Rsja Dhavs, which is 319 feet tall.

The many scholarly presentations given us during orientation were hardly a thumbnail sketch of the vast history of India. But we had been stuffed with enough information, including dos and don'ts, that would take a lifetime to use up. The time came to move on to Bhopal and Budni, the "doing" end of why I had come to India. I was ready, keeping in mind my grandma's words. "Every devil has to figure out his own salvation."

After two weeks of Earl's and my cooking, and a good number of invited-out meals, I showed no signs of the much talked about affliction of dysentery, better known as Delhi Belly. I was assured that it was simply delayed, because as sure as night follows day, no newcomer was spared. There is even a more devastating variety called amoebic dysentery. Fortunately my initiation to India included neither.

With a newly-issued green Jeep station wagon, DL371, a cache of the U.S. Embassy commissary items, and my air freight containing among other necessities, my trusty Springfield WWI, 30-06 rifle and a shotgun, I was ready to start my trek south to Bhopal. The familiarization with the ICA administrative structure and its support system had given a feeling of confidence that field people would be properly looked after. My 400-500 mile journey to Bhopal, the capital of central India's Madhya Pradesh State, had finally begun.

Driving On The Wrong Side

Driving on the wrong side, the left, that is, of India's bumpy, dusty, pot-holed fareways, one soon got the idea that every inch required weaving and veering amid waves of animals and what someone once referred to as "unthinking humanity." Evidently, there was an unwritten law that gave the country's mobile big-mass a right to share the road, and to take their share from wherever they wish. The first priority went to the millions of almond-eyed, large, white bullocks with colorfully-decorated horns and necks, often seen in cart convoys of fifty or sixty, all following the lead cart even when the drivers went to sleep. Bullock-powered carts carried the bulk of the country's cargo. An occasional Arabian one-hump camel with an unromantic snooty look plodded along on broad-toed cushioned feet. They were hitched to a four-wheeled cart, higher at the rear, with shafts and straps that seemed to defy the laws of leverage, with carves stacked higher than the camel's head. Herded and unheeded cattle, buffaloes, donkeys, sheep, goats, and loose fowl all had equal rights to the center of the road. People on bicycles and foot seemed to hold second priority, and the third place went to trucks and smaller vehicles. Increasingly, motorized vehicles were gaining in prominence and challenging the more traditional means of transport.

Monkeys of many kinds played along the tree-lined roads. The only critters that reacted to car or truck horns were goats. They jumped off the road if they could find the room when blown at. The rest exercised their rights and moved as the spirit dictated, but the spirits didn't do much dictating. Bumping rear ends and rubbing sides was a constant amid the mixture of movements.

India built its roads with dirt from along the side thrown up on the roadbeds to give it a slight raise. In February, the dry season, the roadbeds turned into loose particles which seemed to delight in flying into the air when stirred by the slightest breeze or traffic motion. The big Mercedes and British Leylands trucks cause the roadbed to gradually become airborne, temporarily blinding all travelers.

Once visibility returned was and the Jeep was not bumping up against some animal's rear end, I was able to observe the passing landscape. Scattered across the flat plains between New Delhi and Agra was village after village with clusters of mud-walled houses. It is estimated that seven to eight-tenths of India's millions of Hindus, Muslims, and Christians still live in the countryside. I came to know them as mostly simple, peaceful, illiterate farmers, endowed with hand tools, draft animals, and small acreage. The villagers constructed their mud-walled homes and compounds from dirt dug from a common pit at the edge of the village compound. The first monsoon rain filled the holes, which became the village water reservoirs. In it people wash their clothes, dishes, pots and pans, watered the animals and bathed. Its water was used for drinking, cooking, even the call of nature got answered in the same vicinity. In early February, more than halfway through the dry season, the ponds were mostly used up and the water turned murky and rank covered with its green scum.

Green patches of crops spread from the village and gave a little relief from the brown dusty countryside. A few sparsely scattered trees about the farmland and villages provided shade for the farm workers from the scorching sun of the dry season and broke the monotony of the open plains. The first, tiring 125-mile segment of my drive in India brought me to Agra, the site of the famous Taj Mahal and Akbar's Tomb. A much needed lunch break at the town's tourist hotel came to my rescue none too soon. It was a pleasant place with old, snarled shade trees and neatly arranged gardens struggling against the dusty dehydrating air of the dry season. Maintaining this semblance of flowering beauty was a corps of men with watering cans.

I had arrived in the middle of lunch hour. The young Indian maitre d' sized up my dusty condition quickly as I stood in the dining room entrance. He came over and said, Perhaps Sahib, you would like to use the men's room. You seem to have collected much dust in your travel. It is just around the corner to your right, he said and pointed. Some beating and shaking got most of the dust out of my clothes, and with water and soap I flushed away several layers of dust from my hair, neck, face, nostrils and hands. I felt lighter and refreshed. My appetite needed no further stimulation. The big, white-walled dining room had high ceilings and was furnished with lights and fans. The refreshing ambiance eased my nerves, sorely tried by the hassle of the road. Only a couple of wealthy-looking Indian men and a half dozen Europeans were dining. They were hardly enough to keep the white-uniformed waiters busy. At least half were standing around. I ordered tomato juice and chicken with vegetables, rice, carrots, gram (chickpea) and gravy. This was followed by hot lime tea and biscuits. I skipped dessert, which I had been told was the wise thing to do, since it had the risk of dysentery. The cooking was bland British-style, but the chicken nonetheless was quite tasty, although it required some extra chewing.

From Agra it was on to Gwalior approximately seventy miles away. South of Agra the volume and variety of traffic had lightened, but there were at least two funeral processions of a few hundred people and a wedding party. The bride rode in a covered, slow-moving, bullock cart hidden from view, and was followed by long throngs of people, all playing havoc with my average speed. As the road sloped down, I arrived at the one major obstacle of my trip; the Chambal River. One could be delayed for hours waiting to cross by flat-bottom boat. At the river bank traffic was backed up with trucks, cars, more bullock carts, and herds of sheep and goats, giving me concern that nightfall could catch me here. The roadside and riverbank were strewn with signs of those who had spent their nights waiting. People milled about buying food from vendors, bathed in the river, drank, filled all sorts of containers with river water, watered their animals and kept them corralled for the crossing. The flat-bottom boat, partly poled and partly engine cowered, kept shuttling back and forth over the few hundred yards of water with loads fitted as tightly as sardines in a can. They hardly kept abreast of the growing accumulations on both banks of the river.

"How much longer will it take?" I asked a couple of Sikh truck drivers leaning against their overloaded Mercedes truck.

"With no ferry breakdowns, at least two hours," they replied. "We won't have to wait like this a year or two from now, God willing. The government is to construct a bridge a hundred yards down the river."

Two hours passed. The Sikh's prediction was right on. I was beckoned to drive my Jeep along the left edge of the ferry with hardly five inches to spare. Nervous in this precarious position, I was ferried across. The wet slope of the far bank called for considerable acceleration and four-wheel drive. Suddenly I was driving along the Chambal river ravines, a great expanse of crisscrossed hills and hollows twelve to fifteen feet deep, and reputed to be a hideout for dacoits (robbers) who often preyed upon travelers. Their exploits and uncanny moves to elude the police were well-known and often a topic of conversation at all levels. Several people had told me about them in New Delhi. Not until the ravines were well beyond my rear view mirror did my feelings of foreboding ease off. With only an hour or so of daylight left, the remainder of the trip to Gwailior was relatively traffic-free and less demanding.

Gwailior, a City of 200 to 250 thousand was known for its high-quality, colorful pottery. At the first service station I filled up and got perfect directions for finding Mr. and Mrs. Bell, a couple from Arkansas with whom I was to spend the night. Mr. Bell was an extension specialist. The straight, wide tree-lined tarmac west of town led me to their European-type residence, no doubt a leftover of the British days. His green Jeep station wagon, the same as mine, and a standard TCM mission issue for field folk, pin-pointed their house on a small road right of the thoroughfare. I had phoned ahead from Delhi headquarters so the Bells were expecting me, though I was a bit late, understandable in India. They were in the midst of a devoted British ritual, afternoon tea. Both came to the closed gate with their dog to welcome me, the dog being less than cordial, but under control. Mrs. Bell immediately called her male Indian housekeeper to take my teas and show me my very clean and neatly arranged room. It was a great relief to find that their shower was working. With layers of dust gone I felt almost human again. I joined them for tea on the front porch of their very adequate, single-story bungalow. The setting sun shone through a wall of bush and trees laden with climbing vines casting long evening shadows and dust-specked rays across the entire front of the house. The home-made chocolate chip cookies, Mrs. Belle's handiwork, made this tea time a special high. Much of the conversation centered on our respective families. The Bells were approaching the senior citizen status and their children were grown. Small talk continued until nightfall, including a lot of advice regarding servants, until a bell announced that dinner was ready. Mrs. Bell was quick to admit that she had helped with the preparation of dinner. Her servants were gradually, but reluctantly, changing over from the somewhat insipid British version of cooking, to Arkansas culinary arts. Our dinner was a same stew of antelope, potatoes, carrots, served with local greens, gravy, home made bread, cookies and ice cream for desert all tasty and enjoyed by candlelight.

The Bells seemed relaxed and very comfortable living in India, probably a bit lonely and less than fully integrated socially with the local residents. They spoke of their visits to the Maharaja and the Marharani, useful contacts. He was reputed to be a very fine gentleman and still very popular with the people who were happy and prosperous during his rule prior to India's independence. Yet acceptance of the basic elements of the American agricultural extension approach was not going like wildfire, as Mr. Bell had hoped.

The next morning, after a breakfast of scrambled eggs, toast, jam and coffee, Mrs. Bell presented me with a teas of her chocolate chip cookies to take along on the last leg of my trip, about 240 miles. The Bells led the way until I was through town and on the right road south towards Bhopal. A toot on the horn and a wave beneath a pleasantly bright morning sky, and I was off.

The Last Leg To Bhopal

All of a sudden India was showing the spaciousness of a totally different landscape. The flat plains had turned to hills and valleys full of trees and bush, with small to massive rock outcroppings and a few low-lying wetlands where various wild waterfowl bathed. The tarmac road, though chipped and pot-holed, was comfortably free of traffic as it snaked its way south in the direction of Bombay. Some of the long unpopulated stretches gave me reason for concern in case of breakdown. I encountered several forty to fifty bullock cart convoys. An American soldier stationed in India during WWII had told me that these convoys traveled all night, all carts following the lead bullocks while the drivers slept. Sometimes, in a prankish mood, the GIs would turn around the lead cart, all other carts following, in the opposite direction they were traveling. The innocent frustrated drivers must have blamed the spirits for their predicament the next morning. The GIs never followed up to see the unhappy results of their joke.

I passed several towns along the way before coming into Guna, where I could top off my gas tank and relax under a big banyan tree for a few minutes. Back on the road I observed partly deteriorated stone palaces of former eras situated on higher ground and perhaps still occupied by deposed princely rulers and their families. I reached Biaora, a small market area and my turnoff point for Bhopal. A small mango grove a few hundred feet off the dusty gravel road looked innocent and safe enough to have a drink and a bite to eat. Hardly had I stopped the Jeep when there appeared at least a half dozen people gathered around to look. I had been told that in India where there are no people, there are people. They tried to speak to me in Hindi, but my puzzled look and unresponsiveness seemed to give them the answer. I explained that I was American and was headed to Bhopal. I started up again. Soon I was billowing dust on the narrow circuitous road to Narsingarh, where the town's most prominent landmark, the palace, stood tarnished with its moldy, darkened exterior. The remaining road to Bhopal was the worst yet. Ruts and rocks kept me shifting back and forth across the road searching for the least damaged patches. Many had come before me and set the pattern for driving over this stretch of road. Finally, the last two miles of the more than 10,000 mile from Tennessee were in sight. I saw Bhopal in the distance, perched on a modestly raised plateau above a lake, the palace grounds being visible at the highest point. The palace grounds were my destination. I spotted an old bearded man, seemingly content with the world, sitting on a stone beside the road. I inquired of him how to reach there.

Bhopal Palace Arrival

I drove through the gates leading to the Palace grounds. I passed a mosque. I stopped and got directions from a young man standing at the mosque entrance to where the "Amereicans" lived. On the way I was beset with mixed feelings. I had never been on palace grounds. How did one behave in such a royal setting? What kind of image were we likely to give to the door villagers whom we had come to help? I knew that India had already set in motion a policy to narrow the economic gap between its super rich royalty and its poor masses. I made up my mind we would make the adjustments and maintain a balanced image across the social spectrum.

The palace road ended at a pavilion. It was the home of George and Velma Puckett. George was an extension advisor to the State of Madhya Prsdesh. Bhopal was the capital. George and Velma, without children, greeted me on the steps accompanied by their two dachunds. "The building on the other side of the roundabout is where you will live." George pointed out. "Come inside and we'll have some coffee and chat. There's only one thing better than a cup of coffee and that's another cup," George added.

I saw what he meant as he chugged down his first cup, black and steaming, followed immediately by another. To my cup I added some sugar and milk, which was apparently against George's coffee creed.

"Ever try making a custard out of it?" he joked.

"I drink coffee for what you can put in, and not for the coffee itself," I countered.

"I was out to your training center location in Budni some weeks ago," George said, turning to more serious topics. "Just a few paces from what will be your quarters stood a huge male Bengal tiger, as motionless and regal as a stone carving. It is really wild jungle out there. Did you bring any guns with you?"

"Yes, I have an old, note old, WWI 30-06 rifle and a 20 gauge shotgun," I responded.

"They don't recommend anything that light if you plan to hunt tigers," George added as he puffed away on the rest of his cigarette.

"Well, George, if I decide to go after tigers and leopards, and if I can get close enough to make a solid hit in the right place, using soft-nose or silver-tipped ammunition, they will tumble."

"I hope you're right, but it's dangerous business, even with the big guns which have the extra shock power. I have a .375 caliber, the lightest they recommend for tigers," he warned.

Velma broke in, "Oh, we forgot to tell you. There's already some furniture sent down from New Delhi and a guest kit already in your pavilion to help you get started. Why don't you come over tonight for dinner with us and come back for breakfast tomorrow morning?"

"Thanks, that awfully kind of you. I shall be more than happy to join you and talk a bit more about the place and people here. Tomorrow I plan to run out to Budni to pay a visit to the first and newly appointed officer in charge of the training center."

"One more thing," said George, "Tomorrow morning after breakfast, I can take you up to meet Mashuq Ali, the key administrator to His Highness the Nawab, to do the necessary paper work for the rental of your pavilion. The cost is $65.00 per month; utilities are extra. Mack, the Nawab's private pilot, and his servant, Seamy, are living in the back end of the Pavilion, but they are looking for a place to move to and may well be gone by the time your family arrives, which we understand is six months from now."

"That's right, Loretta and the girls will join me in June. Thanks for all your help. I look forward to being with you tonight for dinner," I confirmed and rose to leave. "By the way, some mail came here for you," Thelma said, handing me some letters.

Thanks so much, I see one from Loretta and the girls. I'm anxious to see how they're getting along."

I made it as far as the front steps of the pavilion then plopped down and ripped open the letters. Loretta and the girls were fine and making progress in their preparations for moving to India. Innoculations and check-ups were going well with one exception. Carol, number three, pitched a few tantrums when the nurse approached with a needle. She finally gave in, but not before swearing she would someday become a nurse just to get even. News from home overshadowed my travel weariness.

The other letter, with a U.S. Department of Agriculture seal on the envelope, was a bit of a mystery. It was from Mr. Elan, the supervisor for the African--American Vocational Agriculture Teacher-Training program in the seventeen southern and southeastern states, which had segregated school systems. The letter read: We got rid of the wrong man. Good luck on your two year tour in India. Contact me when your two years are up.

Got rid of the wrong man. What did all of that mean? Then I recalled that I had accompanied Mr. Elam on one of his trips to West Tennessee. He seemed unhappy with the work of Chief Flowers, my old boss who was also in charge of the teacher-training program in Tennessee. Quickly it dawned on me. The application for the job in India which Chief Flowers had given me, and had resulted in my now sitting on those steps in Bhopal, had been meant for him. Innocently, and without a clue of the politics involved, I had gotten the job.

No doubt Elam had instigated this ploy from the federal level to entice Flowers from his state job. Chief might have had some idea of what was going on, and in passing the application to me, made me the wrong man to which the letter referred. It was thus by coincidence that I had joined the Foreign Service, and that proved to be the biggest and best one in mine and my family's life.

After a cursory look over the pavilion, its vastness left me with a lost and empty feeling. Exactly what had this building been used for? The slightest movement inside created echoes that bumped about the ceilings. The lights and plumbing worked well and the place was clean. Beds were in place, sent down from New Delhi by the Technical Cooperation Mission's support services. I had a good sleep my first night. In spite of the feeling of being in a big, roofed-over piece of outdoors, I felt secure, thanks to the palace grounds being guarded.

Late in the evening, I was visited by a young Indian lad, inquiring whether I needed a driver. He possessed a driver's license, a high school diploma and several other papers that were quite worn and dirty. Each told what a fine young man he was. After a short interview, I decided to give him a try. His English was good and he spoke Urdu and Hindi. Quite diminutive, he would no doubt need to sit on a couple of pillows to see over the steering wheel. He was a handsome lad, aggressive, self-assured, and intelligent. His apparent dedication to the Muslim way of life seemed total. His name was Abdul Rafiq Khan (Rafiq means Friend.)

Come tomorrow about 10:00 A.M. and ride with me out to Budni, I told him. "I'll give you a road test to see how well you drive."

Dinner afterwards with the Pucketts and their other guest. Paul Hassar was a good chance to get filled in on what it was like to live in Bhopal and on the palace grounds. Small talk about servants, together with the latest gossip on His Highness the Nawab and his two wives, made up most of the dinner conversation. Much of the focus was on the younger wife, the junior Begum, who deviated too from the public's expectations of royalty. She was said to be a local commoner, a dancing girl with Anglo-Indian looks, and lacking the social graces for royalty. In spite of the public's obvious disapproval of her shortcomings, the Nawab provided her with attention and material needs in keeping with her junior royal status. The senior Begum, a descendant from Afghanistan's royal family, apparently met with everyone's approval.

The number-one gossip link between the Pucketts, the palace and local happenings was Paul Hanger, the other dinner guest. From Germany, he was the palace grounds engineer. When he spoke, which was plenty, his strongly accented English and his insider knowledge commanded an attentive audience. His ruddy face, golden wavy hair and white flashy teeth went well with his strong physique. He gave an interesting run down of the royal family's history, their good side, quirks, and quaint actions. For the most part, Paul had the center stage. To me he was an adult version of the Katzenjammer kids, those mischievous young imps of the 1920s and 30s comic strips, or Dennis the Menace. Paul often betrayed the royal family's trust, as when he was assigned to escort home guests who had over imbibed at the Nawab parties. He sometimes fueled the rumor mill of the conservative Muslim community by purposely switching spouses of the drunken couples.

Velma was the number-two gossip link. George got in a word sideways every now and then. I mostly listened. My few comments about my experiences in Germany slowed Paul down and caught his attention. Velma was proud to show off her cook. Aziz. She had taught him to bake good bread, loaves, rolls, and buns. Her training had hit the target and saved him from the art of butchering food the way the British had earlier taught him. Tall and slender in stylish Muslim dress, including a head piece, he served with pride a variety of well-prepared vegetables. The meatdish was nilgai {blue cow}, a large Indian antelope. Aziz had a modest, continually pleasant smile, which my copious compliments on his cooking and serving never failed to affect. My refusal to drink coffee at night didn't seem to sit well with the rest of the heavy coffee drinkers around the table. Aziz was too happy to prepare for me some tea with lime. George's assault on the coffee was extreme and his hands shook slightly as he lifted his cup, betraying his dependence on coffee and cigarettes.

The evening was interesting with its local news, information, and gossip as seen through a foreigner's eyes. I enjoyed it, but succumbing to my weariness, I was the first to turn in, thanking my host and saying good night to Paul. I trudged back across the moonlit, flowered walkway for my first night in the vast rambling pavilion. My long day ended in a night that went without any interruptions.

Upon completing the usual morning routine of shaving, cold water showering, and minimal preening the next day, I went to breakfast with George and Velma. I was very pleased to find eggs, hashbrown potatoes, toast and jam, and (guess what?) plenty of coffee. Without it, I don't think George could have found his Jeep keys. Velma quizzed me on the plans for the girls' schooling. Back in U.S. Velma had been a Primary school teacher. I told Velma that Loretta was also a teacher and planned to set up a home school for the girls.

“That kind of things always intrigued me.” Velma remarked, and I have often wondered how a mother/teacher combination on a sustained basis would work out.

“We aren’t sure how it’ll all turn out, but we don’t have many other options. The school material will arrive by air freight, and I’m going to turn one of the rooms into a classroom before the family gets here,” I explained.

The morning stroll to the Nawab’s palace with George was pleasant and exhilarating. A brilliant sun out of a deep-blue, cloudless sky sent rays through the trees and shrubs. One could discern that some of the palace’s ostentatiousness was beginning to fade. The bright green mosque, still much in use by the town’s public, was well maintained. As we passed through the main gate of the palace grounds the bronzed monarch himself, riding high in the operator’s seat of his red tractor, whisked past us and gave a semblance of a nod.

“That’s His Highness, the Nawab,” George noted. “He goes regularly to his farm these days where he does much of the work with his tractor.”

As we approached the palace, a gracious, most gray-haired lady sat relaxing in a rocker on the veranda with a shawl about her shoulders. She retained much of what must have been phenomenal good looks with a strong aquiline nose and pleasant face. She gave a pleasant “good morning,” and nodded as we climbed the steps.

George leaned in her direction saying. “Your Highness.”

I nodded and said, “Good Morning, Your Highness.”

“That’s the senior Begum,” George whispered.

We walked down the corridor lined with a number of items denoting past eras. One of the bigger and more eye catching was a grayish carriage with two extensions jutting out from each end for resting on men’s shoulders. George explained that it had been used to transport the Begums to public events and audiences with the townsfolk in the streets and public squares during their 200 year rule of Bhopal State. The Nawab was the first male monarch in two centuries. The one-way glass in the carriage allowed the Begum to see the people, listen to their concerns and complaints, and respond without being seen. This was in keeping with the Muslim way. Especially the women of high status were not to be seen in public places.

Climbing the stairs to Marshuq Ali’s office on the second floor presented a crammed display of hunting trophies. Many had lost their color and lustre, but they told the story of the grand hunting days of the monarch.

Marshuq Ali was partially hidden at his desk behind stacks of frayed and worn files. He greeted us with Salam U Lakum.” Mr. Jones, I assume, we have been expecting you. Welcome to India.”

“Thank you very much. I’m Harold Jones,” I responded as we shook hands. ‘It is nice to be here. We appreciate you allowing us to reside here on the Palace grounds. My wife and six daughters will join me in June.’”

“We must make things comfortable for our American friends who have come to help us. Marshuq Ali was a tall, gaunt, sunken-eyed, eagle-nosed gentlemen, who ran the business end of the palace. Muslim in every aspect: dress, mannerisms, religious dedication, and rationale. Somehow, I got the impression nonetheless that he might have a devilish streak near the surface. The rent agreement was simple. I paid the monthly rate of $65.00 and the electric bill. The palace was responsible for the maintenance.

Royalty And The Palace

Ten years before our arrival the Nawab lost his power, but not his palace, to Indian Independence, together with over five hundred other princely rulers. The Nawab had been the only male in the royal lineage for two hundred years. He had two daughters, one living in Afghanistan. The family was receiving a Privy Purse from the government to maintain their previous life style, and had been allowed to keep a portion of their land holdings. Rumors had it that our Nawab got $35,000 per month. The Bhopal Palace grounds were still highly livable, but a creeping shabbiness was visible. The main quarters of the palace had taken on the air of a museum, filled with a collection of interesting objects from other eras. The number of occupants had been dwindling, leaving more rooms than people to stay in them. The senior begum still lived there along with the junior begum. Respect for the family was still high but signs of their royalty seemed to be fading. The Nawab still had five, little-used planes, twelve vehicles, and an English pilot. His many hunting trophies were dusty and corroding. Prostate surgery in France and progressing age gave cause for him to order the removal of ceiling and wall mirrors from his pleasures playhouse down the hill from the palace, according to Paul Haggard, his German engineer. The 200-man hunting staff had been reduced to near zero. His Highness seemed content to spend lots of time driving a tractor at his farm a few miles from Bhopal. He had built a farmhouse, at the end of a lake, which from a distance, looked like a ship. The farmhouse was literally a game trophy museum. The stairs, balustrades and uprights were made entirely of deer horns. Animal heads looked at you from every direction. A few paces away from the country home was a village of abject poverty, populated by women.

“Why this?” I asked once Rafiq, my driver.

“This is where the ladies all lived to make the men happy when they visited His Highness.”

“What do they do now?” I inquired.

“Mostly they serve any men for small money.” he replied.

A remnant village of women who served guests’ needs in earlier times was still trying to survive on earnings offered from the world’s oldest exploitation. That the Nawab had established such a service for his guests brought to my mind the saying, “The advantage of being rich and famous is to be able to do things that don’t make sense.”

The Sixty Mile Last Leg

Rafiq showed up on time, 10:00 A.M. He wore a baggy, locally stitched khaki uniform and a dark-blue beret. There was a bit of disappointment on his face when I said, "Show me the way to Budni, I'll drive and I shall give you your driving test on the way back." The road down the hill from the palace made one moderate turn before turning up hill into town. I took the narrow, dirty city streets with open sewers running down each side through town until I reached a tarmac strip too narrow for two vehicles to pass without dropping off its badly chipped edges onto the rough bumpy shoulders. I drove through mostly flat countryside, crossing a causeway over a small glistening stream. A few slight bends, a modestly steep hill with rock outcroppings, and shrub bush were the only variations in the twenty-two mile ribbon of tarmac. Young green wheat and gram fields stretched out on both sides to rocky, distant hills. A few rasped, dirty children from several of the improvised huts watched over their animals who nibbled away at the sparse grass and bush at the ease of the road. The tarmac strip ended at a large village where a dilapidated sign read "Obaidullagang." It had a good-sized school, some shops, houses, and a police station. Following a ninety-degree turn onto a rutted gravel road, we came quickly to a stop. The iron gate at the railroad crossing was closed. Twenty minutes passed, and the train had not come. This I thought was carrying safety a bit to the extreme. Rafiq made some inquiries and reported back to me. People were arguing with the gateman but to no avail. Apparently the gateman felt a special obligation to keep all travelers safe and unharmed. This attitude was attributed to an encounter he had with Mr. Nehru. Once when Mr. Nehru, the Prime Minister, and his entourage had arrived at the gate, one of the Prime Minister's assistants requested that the gate be opened. The Veteran refused. Mr. Nehru thereupon congratulated the gatekeeper and gave him a small reward for being a firm, dedicated employee. The moral of the story was that once the gate was closed, even if the Bombay-New Delhi Express has not even left from either end of its run a few hundred miles away, there was only one thing travelers could do; wait.

We finally continued our journey over rough dirt roads, snaking through jungles on both sides. We passed over several wooden bridges high above sluggish streams. They creaked and shook from the weight and motion of the vehicle. Not realizing that the plains we had crossed were elevated, I was surprised when we suddenly began a decent via hairpin curves to a distinctly flatter, lower level. Halfway down, Rafiq pointed out an area carved in the hillside where hundreds of decrepit cattle were kept, called Pinjrinpoles or gaushalts. He said the owners paid an eleven-rupee entrance fee for each animal to spend the rest of its life there. They roamed about the jungle all day, feeding on the grass and shrubs. At night they were corralled into thorn bush enclosures to be protected from marauding tigers' leopards, and hyenas.

The dirt road ahead seemed to go right to the top of the trees to meet the horizon in the distance. The jungle had begun to recede as villages and farms appeared. The crops were more wheat and gram, the basic food grains of the area. An occasional village pond could be seen.

The last few miles had more bridges across ravines and were lined by bamboo clusters and dense jungle. Another railroad crossing, this time with an open gate, and a left turn brought us into the village of Budni. There was a fairly well-kept elementary school and a whistle-stop railway station. The rest was a jammed series of dirty shops crowded with basic amenities: kerosene, cloth, some hardware and basic food staples. A few tea stalls rounded out these minimal retail offerings. Being without was obviously a way of life, no different from most of the rest of rural India. A few more paces down the road. I came to the place on the other side of the world for which I started out six weeks ago. My first impression: Budni was definitely a one-step post. One step backwards and you would drop off the ease of the world into oblivion. There could be no place less basic than Budni.

After driving through the training center's main gate, we alighted from the Jeep with relief. Mr. E.G.K. Rao, the Officer-In-Charge, walked up to greet me.

"Welcome to India and to Budni. We are delighted to have You, Mr. Jones."

"Thank you, Mr. Rao, I'm delighted to be here," I shook his hands warmly.

"How do you like India so far?" he questioned.

"It is also way from where I started, but I'm sure we'll enjoy being here. My wife and six daughters will join me in six months when school is out in the USA."

Rao was a south Indian Brahman with a round, pock-marked face, a middle-aged bulge, and had short, curly, salt-and-pepper hair. He wore a flowing dress of white, thin, starched cotton. There was just enough of a pair of sandals on his feet to stop contact with the ground. Rao introduced me to his administrative officer, Mr. Varma, and Mr. Gansuly, the chief agronomist. Both extended pleasant welcomes.

"It is a great pleasure for me to meet the both of you" I said as we shook hands.

"Why don't we walk around a bit to see some of the place, and meet some of the staff before having some tea," Rao suggested.

"That's quite all right with me," I replied enthusiastically.

"Those are your quarters just ahead. We have done some renovating to make it livable for you. There is no electricity, running water, or indoor toilets. However, we do expect to have a generator for lights at night within a year. In two to three years we plan to have the center electrified."

Here I am two notches below living conditions of my boyhood in rural Virginia, I thought. The partitioned building, with a little ingenuity could be turned into a crude bachelor's quarters for the five-day work weeks I would spend at the center. All of the U.S. financed equipment, approximately $120,000 worth for research and testing, had arrived. The young, technical staff of agriculture school graduates were struggling with the assembly of the equipment. Mr. M. L. Taneja, the chief instructor, joined the tour. He was a pleasant man of average height, a sturdy athletic type from the rugged Patan country on the northwest frontier of India. He seemed to be the practical mover and shaker of the place, perhaps because he was a graduate of the Presbyterian missionary agricultural college at Allahabad, known for its practical work-ethics approach. I sized him up as the person to cultivate for setting the center's program established. The center consisted of no more than the remnants of old buildings left over from a jungle-warfare training camp used during WWII. Thick jungle still surrounded the outpost that housed the program's operation, staff, families, and trainees.

The tour ended back at Rao's quarters, where sitting on floor pads and propped up with bolsters, we engaged in one of India's favorite pastimes, having tea. The tea leaves were boiled in a pot with milk and sugar already in, and was strong enough to walk around and serve itself. I didn't care for it, but politeness prevailed. The biscuits, cookies to me, helped to cut the tea's strength. I even indicated that the tea was good. With the sipping in full swing, Rao went into a relentless chatter about the center and his prowess as a mechanical engineer. Much of the dialogue centered on the application of basic, mechanical engineering principles to farm machinery. He seemed to have all the answers to all the things about which I thought I had come to advise and assist. Why do they need me? I thought. I was beginning to feel inadequate. Why had I come 10,000 miles to have a counterpart of such great capacity. I wondered if this was a display of more saying than doing. Could there be a gap between rhetoric and doing? On the other hand, was there a greater capacity to say it than to do it? Could there be a rhetoric/doing gap? Let time and performance bring out the real truth, I concluded.

"Mr. Rao, have you ever been to the States?" I questioned.

"As a matter of fact, I was there for more than a year," he said. Pulling off his sandals and rubbing between his toes.

"What do you think of the place?"

"Technically, you are very far ahead, and I must say lots of good consumer items are available for the people. But spiritually I find the States terribly deficient. You see, when we visit the West, U.S. included, we must undergo a spiritual cleansing on return. Overtime we go through a series of rituals to regain our spiritual level. It has only been a short time since I completed my series to get me back to my accustomed spiritual level. We look at you people as advanced in the physical world of technology and materialism, but spiritually you are babes in the woods," he commented.

"We are all in the woods here at Budni, and it's going to take a lot of doing to get us out," I jokingly countered, but I got no reaction from anyone.

"Enough of the spiritual talk, Mr. Jones, I would like you to know that the Ministry of Agriculture has set July first, four and a half months from now, as the target date to formally open the center for training. This means we must have all the physical facilities in order, training programs in place, trainees selected and ready to begin. The instructors have been appointed; most of them you met today. Mr. Taneja is the chief instructor and is responsible for organizing and conducting the training Programs." Mr. Rao announced, as Mr. Taneja gave the now familiar, sideways Indian head nod. "By the way, the Central Tractor Organization headquartered in New Delhi, has a field office by the airport in Bhopal, and will send heavy equipment here to clear 200 acres of land for our farm machinery training and testing area."

“Gentlemen, I feel good despite the tiresome 10,000-mile trip to reach Budni. I’m glad to meet all of you. It’s good to get a first-hand feel of what we shall be trying to accomplish in the next few years. The July target date for opening appears to be reasonable. When I return next week, we can have a closer look at what needs to be done on this and what support the government in New Delhi should give to help us meet the deadline. I look forward to working with all of you and I know we’ll get the job done. Thanks for your hospitality. The tea is a little strong for me, but we can work on that over time.” They all laughed at that.

Return To Bhopal

Lengthening shadows were beginning to claim their daily place in the landscape as the sun hung momentarily on top of the distant hills. We were on the way back to Bhopal with Rafiq at the wheel for the first time. I was beset with a mixture of delight and apprehension. I watched closely how he maneuvered the rough spots, curves and hills. His way of handling the brakes, clutch, gear shift, and accelerator were under derailed scrutiny. Vehicle speed and clutch handling were the only thing that elicited criticism from me. He seemed to sulk a bit, but all and all he was doing quite well. Once I could relax, I focused on the delights of my new environment. A variety of wild game were on display in their natural habitat. The daytime feeders were beginning their retreat, while others began their night Prowl. Rafiq kept up a dialogue about them and their habits. Little wonder, much of his knowledge had come from his father who was an important member of His Highness, the Nawab’s hunting staff during the great days of his jungle forays. Several groups of Indian gazelles bounded from near the roadside across the cultivated areas, with their long graceful leaps. A black buck with white undersides and long, back spiraled horns accompanied with pride his light-brown herd of females. The heavily wooded area, about twenty miles long, brought on a display of several groups of langurs. These long-tailed, gray monkeys with shiny black faces and thin lips artistically framed with gray hair, resembled the serious faces of well-trimmed dignified gentlemen. Their short-lived curiosity gave way to long, ground-consuming leaps. They were as comfortable on the ground as in the trees. The females carried their babies clinging to their chest between the front legs. This in no way hindered their agility. Several sambhars, a large, six-pronged native deer with an erectile mane, accompanied by a group of smaller hornless females showed up several times. Their uniform brown color is the same for both sexes. Then a herd of ten to twelve spotted deer bounded across the road. A short distance away, they immediately braked en masse, turned, and looked. Rafiq yelled, Cheetal! Their hides are decorated by nickel to quarter-sized white spots on a fawnish-brown background. They resemble the American whitetail deer fawn, which loses its spots with age. The spots of the cheetal, however, become more prominent and beautiful with age. A male with six-pronged, thirty-inch antlers, two young bucks, and a number of does observed us with still attention. Spooked, no doubt, by our voices, smells, and movements, they gave a high-pitched yell and bounded away gracefully like Santa’s reindeer.

Several pairs of four-horned antelopes dashed across the road with lightening speed. At a safe distance, they slapped on their anti-lock brakes, being overcome by curiosity, and turned to look back. I was fascinated by their horn arrangement: two on each side of the head, with the rear two an inch or more longer than the front two. Called charsingha in Hindi {char-four, singha-horn), the little brown antelope is unique.

“The best meat,” Rafiq yelled, as they dashed away.

Wild peacocks, sour fowl, green pigeons, and small partridges appeared frequently as we went along. Rafiq noted that the small partridge or button quail were very much liked by His Highness, the Nawab. They help him do better with his women, he smiled. They were thought to be an aphrodisiac. A clumsily flying hornbill would at time show up along side the vehicle, adding a dash of color, piercing the air with its peculiar call.

Nearing the old cattle home we began our treacherous climb to the under plateau, and we encountered a sea of decrepit cattle hobbling back to their night shelter. They had scars, deformed legs, broken horns, leaking wounds, swollen udders; a livestock producer’s nightmare, but a veterinary apprentice’s training ground. As Rafiq slowly maneuvered past them, rubbing up against some and blowing his horn to get them to the side, he observed. “Many fat tigers and leopards live in this jungle making fodder of the cows.” The steer curves were skillfully negotiated by my trial driver. Rounding the curve at the top of the climb, a herd of wild pigs trotted along on the driver’s side. Rafiq spotted them, and without signaling, swung the vehicle to the right into an opening off the road. Sufficiently far away from the pigs, he steered back to the left side of the road.

When I questioned about his action, he said. “It is not good to run over the ground where pigs have crossed, if you avoid it. I was trying not to let them cross the road in front of us.” The real reason suddenly dawned on me, the Moslem aversion towards pigs.

“What if they would cross in front of you and you could not drive around them?” I questioned.

“We stop, let them run until they are out of sight, then we drive on. But if we have a chance not to let them cross in front of the car, we must do so,” he responded.

The famous railroad crossing was coming into sight. Off in the darkening distance a large cow-like animal stood motionless. Rafiq spotted it. “Nilgai over there,” he pointed out. “He is a very big Indian antelope and makes lots of meat,” he explained. High in front and sloping to the rear, he had two stout six to, eight-inch pointed horns, a short tail whisk, and feet that seemed to be clothed in white socks. Apparently he was determined to cross the road as he trotted in our direction. His short, stiff, black mane and cumbersome movement made him appear like a cross between a cow and a horse, suggesting a product of legislation, rather than a creature of nature’s design. He gathered speed and dashed across the road in front of the vehicle.

The railroad gate was open and we were back on the tarmac strip to Bhopal. Halfway down a straight stretch parking lights of a car shone in the distance as twilight disappeared from the sky. Rafiq pulled off on the shoulders and stooped.

“Why have we stooped?” I queried. There was no answer.

When the car had gone by, Rafiq answered. “His Highness, The Nawab, of Bhopal, passed.” He had pulled off in respect to His Highness.

“Rafiq, I have seen many shikar between here and Budni. I have for a long time been a shikari. I have brought my guns with me,” I told him.

“You a shakari?” Rafiq excitedly responded, repeating the word for hunter. “I will show you many good place to go for shikar.”

“Thank you. We shall see.” That was enough to set him the job, plus his good driving of course. Back at the pavilion, I told Rafiq, “there are a few things we need to talk about, like driving off the road for His Highness and driving around pigs and a few other small things about handling the vehicle.”

“How did I do?” he asked.

“You have the job, come back tomorrow,” I responded. He gave a big smile, a bit of a foot shuffle, bowed with thanks, and was off. This was the beginning of seven-and-a-half-year relationship that turned into a close friendship as time passed.

Bush Living - Budni The Work Place

On Monday, the twentieth of February, 1956, I started my official task: to help convert 200 acres of dense jungle surrounding a WWII jungle-warfare training center into a farm-machinery training and testing center. To me, this task had the ring of turning swords into plowshares. My initial visit to the Budni site left me with many questions: What could one technician in the remotest area of this vast sub-continent do? Why had the Indian government decided to build this center? What long-range significance or benefits would this center have on development of the agricultural sector and the economy of India?

No sooner had I arrived when Mr. Rao, the Officer-In-Charge, informed me that the Minister of Agriculture had requested my presence in New Delhi to discuss the project. I had a feeling that the minister wanted to be reassured that the center would open on schedule. I told Mr. Rao that I needed a few days to review and evaluate the situation, including having discussions with Mr. Tannin, the chief instructor, in order to determine what we had yet to accomplish and what the ministry could do to facilitate it. After some deliberation, we listed ten “must” items that the ministry would have to perform at their end. The first five had to be accomplished before the center could be opened, and the second five had to be done immediately thereafter to insure quality training. Rao then arranged an appointment for me on the following Monday morning.

Riding overnight on a clacking railroad car from Bhopal to New Delhi was not conducive to sound sleep. My compartment mate was Pritim Singh, a Sikh gentleman beyond middle-age. Congenial and talkative, Pritim welcomed me to India and apologized for the noise and dust as if he were responsible for them. The pitch-black night was pierced only by the dim, intermittent lights from the towns, and we tried to ignore the sudden jerks, noisy braking, and voices beneath the windows whenever the train pulled into a station. As Pritim settled into the bunk above me, his bed sagged into my air space, about a foot above my nose. The pleasantly cool, February air came through the open windows and apparently helped Pritim sleep well. He snored fitfully and periodically broke wind, unaccompanied by the “excuse me,” which he had offered earlier in the evening. As for me, I slept fretfully.

When dawn finally arrived, Pritim descended from the top bunk and replaced his loose, billowing sleepwear with a robe tied at the waist. He started his morning ablutions, which included grooming his hair and beard and wrapping his turban, insuring that both tasks met century-old standards. This was my first encounter with these operations. I was convinced of the patience and skill required to handle this intricate task. Tradition requires that Sikh men allow their hair and beard to grow uncut. The beard is groomed with hair oil, that makes it shiny and manageable. Then it is rolled tightly against the chin and secured with a net Pritim accomplished this deftly, then swept his waist-length hair into a bun on top of his head and tied it with a strip of cloth. The crowning touch was a length of fabric that, when unfurled, reached from Pritim’s head down past his feet to spread across the compartment floor. With one end tucked around his top knot, he wound the cloth until he had shaped it into a turban. The wrappings rivaled those on a finished maypole. In contrast, my morning ablutions were simple: a quick face wash in the basin, a shave with a battery-operated razor, and finally a lick with my hairbrush and comb. I was ready for the day.

After forty-five minutes of starts, stops, squeaks and jerks, the train finally arrived at the New Delhi Station shortly after sunrise. Pritim Singh and I went through our glad-to-meet-you and good-bye rituals before disembarking from our dusty sleeping compartment. A half dozen taxi drivers with little boy helpers, and thousands of flies, swarmed around. The former trying to get passengers and the latter food and blood. An Indian railroad station is not just a place to embark and disembark from trains, but a living community. People beg, eat, sleep, wash, tend to children, barter, harangue, and perform religious rituals amid the bustle of travelers. Holding on tightly to my baggage, I weaved in and out of the crowds, selected a tonga (two-wheeled horse-drawn taxi), and was soon on my way to the Hotel Claridge, bouncing to the clackety-clack of horseshoes against the pavement. The rear end of the little horse had more scars than a Swiss watch has ticks, and the driver was using his stick as vehemently as a jockey urging his horse to the finish line.

“Why do you hit him so much?” I queried.

“He no go fast unless he get stick,” the driver replied.

We arrived at the hotel and I gave the driver an extra couples of rupees and suggested that he treat the horse better.

“Yeah Sahib, yeah Sahib, I will,” he replied, but I wouldn’t have bet on it.

After checking in at the hotel, I had time for a quick shower, breakfast, and a short nap before I left for the Ministry of Agriculture.

The meeting was held in the office of the Permanent Secretary. As I entered the office, he emerged from behind several high stacks of dog-eared files on his desk and shook my hand. I had seen a little of this file dilemma at Budni, but apparently at the government headquarters it was on a grander scale. The Permanent Secretary introduced me to the Minister of Agriculture, a short man whose facial features strongly resembled a cross between an owl and a frog, with a continuous smile. As we seated ourselves in wooden, hardback chairs, the Minister remarked, "As you know Mr. Jones, the target date for opening the center is July first. Will the scheduled date be met?"

"With certain actions and decisions, Mr. Minister, made from your office as well as at the Budni site, the center could open on the target date. I have a list of ten tasks that we developed at Budni that require action on your part. Bear with me while I read the list." They listened, I think, as I described what Taneja and I had determined, but no discussion ensued.

After a significant pause, the Minister said, "Will the center open on July first?" It was becoming more and more apparent to me that a political commitment had been made to open the center on a certain date.

"Will your ministry accomplish the first five tasks set forth by mid-June?" I questioned.

He repeated the question three times and I gave the same reply three times. Then the Minister and the Secretary looked at each other, and slowly made that sideways nod that meant "yes."

"Does this mean you'll do all ten tasks set forth on the list in a timely manner?" I queried.

"Of course," they replied.

"If we receive your support to establish and operate a quality training and testing center, the center will open as targeted," I assured them. They listened attentively to my version of the time-phased development program being considered at Budni, which was to be operated with a practical technical, hands-on approach for both animal and motor-powered farm machinery and equipment. Over time the center would set the stage for increased application of machinery technology in India's agriculture.

After a profusion of thanks, handshakes, and well wishes, I was ready to return to Budni.

"Mr. Minister, I realize you have a busy schedule, but please visit us at Budni when you can," I said as I turned to leave.

"I shall," he assured me.

I had held my ground and they finally acquiesced to our terms.

Before leaving New Delhi I met Dr. Frank Parker, the U.S. Mission's agriculture officer, to bring him up to date on Budni, and assure him that things were going on planned. He advised me to keep him informed and that we should get together for lunch on my next visit. My last stop was at the U.S. Embassy commissary to purchase a few essential items not sold in Bhopal. It was now ready to be rattled back to Bhopal overnight. By a stroke of luck, I had the sleeping compartment to myself.

Lonesome

“What is hell — Hell is oneself. Hell is alone, the other figures in it merely projections. There is nothing to escape from and nothing to escape to. One is always alone.” —T.S. Eliot, 1950.

I had arrived at my place of work. The site was called Budni, remote and deep in the bowels of central India, a tropical Siberia surrounded by heavy brush jungle. A few hundred yards down the road was a one-whistle train stop and a destitute village of dingy shops that sold basic food grains, kerosene, cloth, sugar, and teapot stalls with dirt caked all around. Quickly, I sized up Budni as a one-step post. One step backwards, and I would step off the universe and float into eternity. I felt nothing lay beyond this place.

I soon learned that in Budni one could be subjected to two major kinds of blues: the hot, dry-weather blues, and the high-humidity, monsoon blues. Not much lay between these extremes. And in this habitat, I soon became a victim of a serious case of the loneliness blues. The temporary duration of this condition in no way affected the vital intensity of my experience. I understood most people undergo these feelings as a result of perceived deficiency in the social networks of their life. In my case, I had been temporarily cut loose from all that makes for a sense of belonging, family and community. Separation from my family had been inescapable as the girls had to remain in the States to finish out their school year, and I had to make money for the necessities to maintain the home: a piano, sofa, and king-size bed for Ma and Pa.

Everything in my new world was abruptly strange and different. My life had become extremely remote from any past experience. I arrived in the soaring heat and aridity of an Indian summer. In such an isolated place, Indian culture was quite difficult to break into for socially meaningful contacts that might have restored some of the loss in my sense of connection. I knew to be lonely was no sin and that the local people would voluntarily offer little to make me feel a part of them. Their customs and conservative ways did not allow them to meet me halfway. Many of the center's new staff were young married couples living under difficult conditions. Others felt I was too removed from their class to socialize with me. Their living conditions at the center were entirely too austere to think of sharing and socializing with a stranger, albeit advisor, such as myself. Their meager government allowances were barely sufficient for their own survival.

Thus during the week, social engagements were few to non-existent. The social contacts I had were centered around sipping tea with cookie biscuits in the late afternoon with the director and chief instructor. I must admit some of my own initial mindless reactions did not ease the strain in my relationships. I must have been obnoxious in my declination of the customary tea they so cherished. The strong tea, boiled with milk and sugar made browner than usual from foreign sediments in the sugar, was a bit much for me to take. I requested lime or lemon with my tea instead. Still, I felt my demands were almost immoral in the social scene, although they seemed happy to accommodate.

Beyond tea, no one ever invited me to a meal. Did they feel their own dishes were unpalatable for me who could not even consume a regular cup of tea? I think they assumed they could not offer me cooking competitive to that food I could prepare in my own kitchen for my own tastes.

To improve my condition, I knew I had to engage in the difficult process of making friends in a totally new and different maze of an environment. I felt their friendship had to be earned and that I had to take most of the initiative. On my part, I often shared the meat I hunted from the bush with the staff who were non-vegetarian, that is the Muslims, Punjabies, and a few Hindus. Yet I could not completely and comfortably break through that invisible barrier that divided us. I felt my greatest loss was the lack of a family circle. After all, family networks were the key to how the Indians survived in their own culture. My physical environment, the harsh climate, insects, lack of conveniences and insomnia conspired with the haunting thoughts of my family and Loretta's companionship to eventually throw me into almost intolerable despair.

Sleepless nights in Budni emptied my emotions and physical vigor. The hideous heat propped open my eyelids seemingly all night. My insomnia kept my mind racing on what I was missing most in life. My thoughts turned constantly to the family. Over and over I wrestled with questions on their well-being: How is the family doing? How they might be making out in preparing for the long arduous trip abroad to join me? A photograph clutched to my chest might have helped, but I had none. I had no radio, TV, or books to give me some distraction. My only diversion was to step to the window or outside and admire the starlit heavens, capable of producing wondrous views on a cloudless night.

But fatigue from the day's work forced me inside to my sagging cot for rest. There on the cot, I twisted and turned in an attempt to fend a cool spot. The day-time temperature lasted deep into the night, making sound sleep impossible until just a couple of hours before daylight. I screamed inside. How was I to find a solution to my torment?

Sleep was fast becoming just a sweet memory. My worry over my lack of sleep compounded my lack of sleep. I had never taken and did not have sleep-inducing drugs. I had to grin and bear it. But my whole mental process at night was becoming diseased as I whirled down in a spiraling vortex of gloom. I had to get a grip and find a distraction to the stabbing wakefulness. I wondered how I was ever going to find a solution to my deprivations.

In one attempt, in my typical practical fashion, I built upon traditional technology to handle my situation. Across much of the country, Indians used a method based on the natural principles of evaporation to help cool air. Khas khas - dry, aromatic grassroots - were installed on frameworks in my windows. They had to be kept drenched in water to be effective. Dry air passing through the loosely woven material cooled the air, if only slightly. The pleasant scent helped make the experience worthwhile. In public buildings, a carp of water slingers were hired to maintain moist khas khas.

But I had no water slingers and brought a substitute to my rescue. I built wooden box tanks with holes in the bottom to fit over the windows. The holes allows water filling the boxes to drip over the khas khas. However, the water had to be replenished too frequently through buckets from a well outside my quarters. This activity proved too tiring and disruptive for nights already ruined by my condition. Instead, I soaked my mosquito net in a tub of water, then draped the mesh over my bed. This method gave me about thirty to forty minutes of relief.

There was little in my mind's storehouse that I could do. But then the counting began. I counted jumping air conditioners, swirling fans, and jugs of ice cold water. Several times over I would count little demons dancing and dripping with icicles. After that I tried counting backwards from a hundred in twos and threes. Then I would see them — the image of a woman with six little girls slowly descending the staircase of an airplane, then charging ahead to greet me. But the phantoms failed in the end. Internal pressures began to build.

I looked forward to the daytime when my enthusiasm for the job and the consumption of several gallons of water daily made the heat tolerable. Days were filled with newness — new people trying to do new things. I learned about them as they learned about me. I discovered how and why they accepted or rejected my suggestions and reached compromises. We combined to put new pieces in place daily, an activity essential to starting the center.

But at night the demon of loneliness returned, swinging its monstrous head. I tried to recall solutions from my psychology 101 in college to deal with the combination stresses induced by weather and loneliness. No luck was to be obtained traveling down that road, however. I was isolated from everything except total darkness. I could not share my problem with a sage authoritarian figure or anyone else. I dare not raise the topic. And after all, I was the one in the role of dispensing advice. I felt complaints about living difficulties were the last subjects they wanted to hear from me. I came to give help, not seek it. I did not want to risk my good standing with a show of such vulnerability.

I simply could not rest my body or my mind. But I fretted that my nocturnal disasters would eventually affect my performance and self-esteem during the day, leaving me a haggard, dreary shell for the day. I tortured myself with questions. What would my lack of sleep lead to? How much damage could this intolerable weather, sleeplessness, and unanchored social sense inflict in combination in the long duration? These disturbances could be sickening, corrosive, and a hindrance to the quality of my professional performance. My entire reason for being there could be destroyed. I despaired in a deep-seated pain.

I was aware that my position was a matter of change and adjustment. But I direly needed to hasten this process. The government was urgent about opening the center by June first. But how was I to cancel my blues or at least keep them under control to meet these professional demands? Being cut loose from family and community must be the problem of any advisor assigned to a strange, remote location, I reasoned. I just had to find the cure.

I realized that dwelling on my condition only deepened by sense of my predicament. I thought one way to acquire a positive view was to focus on the better times I anticipated. I repeatedly told myself the weather was going to change to the monsoon before the end of June and my family would be arriving in early June. The monsoon would herald a different world and maybe a new set of problems, but at least the chance of gaining a better quality of sleep would be improved. This change would thus equip me to handle my stress better. I brightened at the thought of regaining the family connection and companionship with Loretta and the girls. But these reflections proved insufficient for the moment.

An epiphany struck. "Have faith," I said. I realized I needed something to believe in far bigger and beyond myself. I knew I had faith in God or some higher logic in life. Everyone needs that belief. I needed the steadying effect of someone's hand on my shoulder, someone higher than even Loretta.

Eventually, I augmented my schedule with excursions into the edge of the wild brush in the afternoon to observe the plant and animal habitats. This activity tended to ease my pressure and placed me a different frame of mind for coping with my lonesome, restless nights. The environment gave me another object on which to reflect and reframe images in my mind. I used the pressure to turn my thoughts into more positive thoughts to make my personality coalesce again. These excursions included visiting the terrain opposite the center where the Vindhya Mountain range abruptly stopped. There I observed the bird life along the steep rock face. Many ornithological types made their home there. Lying in the dark at night, I would recall the birds' habits and other activity: how they nested, how they soared on the air currents, dived to capture prey, sang, and displayed rich, feathery coloring.

I tried giving myself pep talks. I am doing okay, I told myself. I can handle this problem. I can't let it get the best of me.

I expanded my work contacts and found more outlets to put my ideas into action. I journeyed across the river to talk with personnel of the wheat research station to learn about their activities and problems. The staff was attempting to find more effective ways to use water for irrigation. I offered and built some models of bullock-drawn implements which leveled land for agriculture. These tools were successfully constructed and effective in performance. Even a film was produced, showing the implements in action and how they led to better and more economical water use.

By now my dwindling self-esteem had been restored. I had made new friends, increased my social contacts, and gained some sense of being a part of the community. I felt an emergent sense of my ability to constructively contribute to that community.

Time was approaching for me to make a trip to Bombay to meet the family. The center opened on time and the training program was launched. Faith and slugging it out had united my splintered parts. My progress was wonderful despite the fact that I was not completely satisfying my sleep requirements.

In early June, I made fast tracks to Bombay to meet the family. A palpable sense of joy came over me as my number one deficiency fell away at the sight of the family. The adjustment had been tough, but I had made it!

Living Alone Mostly- Four and Half Years

It would literally be a long, lonesome dry spell before Loretta and the girls arrived in Bhopal. I had nearly four months to bake until the monsoon began in earnest. Every sun-bullied day had an assembly-line pattern of temperatures ranging from 100 to 120 degrees Fahrenheit and humidity close to zero. The air was relentlessly arid. Despite the weather, I felt I had to keep my promise that the training center would open on time, and spent the week days in Budni under rather lonely and primitive conditions. I lived in a sparsely furnished shell of a partially restored building with exposed rafters. The floor was laid with ill-fitting slabs of gray flagstone, held together with weak concrete. New cracks appeared each day. The five rectangular windows had half-inch steel bars, top to bottom, spaced four inches apart to keep out nocturnal growlers: tigers, leopards, hyenas, and bears. Cats, bats, and rats had access to the house, unless the heavy, wooden, battleship-grey blinds were closed. When shut, I felt as if a plastic teas had been placed over my head and I was suffocating. Furnishings were sparse: a chest of drawers, a metal frame, single bed with a sagging mattress and mosquito net, and a crude table and bench which I had constructed from shipping crate lumber. The table did double service as a desk and a dining table. Standing in one corner was a crude closet, open on the sides and closed at the ends, also made of crating material. Here I hung my wardrobe.

The bedroom and dining room were separated from the kitchen by a crude, whitewashed stone wall. The kitchen equipment consisted of a kerosene stove and refrigerator. The stove worked quite well, but the refrigerator ran on a lick, a promise, and a prayer. It occasionally provided a cool drink, and it slightly retarded food spoilage. I did all my cooking and water boiling myself and learned to manipulate the stove's quirks so that it served me well for over four and a half Years. Of course, cleaning and changing the wick were essential to maintaining the kitchen appliances, and I did this on a regular basis with Rafiq's assistance. Rafiq freely and willingly cleaned the kitchen, including washing dishes, scrubbing the floors, and cleaning the refrigerator and stove. I would never recommend to anyone to try to keep a kerosene refrigerator operating and cooling under the severe weather conditions of India's dry seasons. One has to have the patience of a mother elephant completing her pregnancy.

Only once in my life did I see water freeze. Water I had stored in a glass jar had approached freezing point, and when I removed it from the fridge into the dry, hot room air, the condensation on the jar evaporated so quickly that the temperature lowered just enough to cause the water to freeze. Like a slanting shower of rain, the freezing process moved from one side of the jar to the other. I had just witnessed one of life's sweetest little delights, a jar of frozen drinking water in my hand, in the midst of Central India's dry season.

My bathroom consisted of a tin tub in the corner and a potty chair with a hole in the center and a small bucket underneath. No curtains hung in front of my convenience corner. Each morning the sweeper (custodian) came by and disposed of the waste and cleaned the container. I did have running water. I ran to the open well, tied my bucket to a rope, and dropped it in. I had to drag it across the surface a few times to fill it and then drew it up. Pouring it from one container to another made it running water.

For lights, we had four kinds: daylight, twilight, lantern light and candle light, not necessarily in that order. At night the entire center would have been in total darkness if it were not for candles and the cooking fires. When these sources of light were put out or burned out, the beauty of the firmament and its billions of distant stars was accented. Let there be darkness, and there was darkness!

The delicate mantle of my kerosene lantern was often shattered by big flying bugs drawn to their flames, and resulting in lights out. Thus, I preferred to use candles. After a year and a half we got a big generator installed at the center to provide electric lighting until midnight. Twenty-four hour electricity finally arrived at the center near the end of my four-and-half-year tour.

The Family Arrival

Four and a half months after I arrived in India, it was my family's turn to transplant their home to another land. Loretta — courageous as a soldier and enthusiastic as only a mother could be — packed up and journeyed three days - three nights with six young daughters, one less than a year old, to join me.

They were truly a welcome sight as they struggled down the steps of the aircraft at the Bombay airport helping one another and testing the patience of the other passengers. They all wore rumpled but fashionable navy-blue jumpers, a product of Loretta's handiwork and her dependable, portable sewing machine, a standard piece of luggage for the next twenty-one years. My six months of bachelorhood had ended. Waiting for them to clear customs seemed to take a lifetime. Once they were through, we greeted with a profusion of hugs and kisses in the steamy monsoon heat. There is no joy more fulfilling than a family unites halfway around the world in a strange land. Overcome by hordes of coolies, I appointed several to load the luggage. We successfully boarded the Hotel shuttle bus but left little room for other passengers. Rain fell in sheets and the vapor on the windows blurred the street scenes. The great buildings of Bombay's once rich European heritage had to be seen some other time. Water gushed from the gutters and overflowed into the streets. "Daddy, does it rain like this all the time in India?" one of the girls asked.

"No, sometimes it doesn't rain for six months," I answered. "This is what is called the monsoon season, when most of the rain comes."

Registering at the Taj Mahal Hotel was slow, but finally completed. This well-known landmark still showed signs of its nest beauty. The deleterious effect of time had kept a step or two ahead of the effort to maintain it, but it was comfortable and provided a nice retreat from the rainy outdoors. After a huge pot of steaming tea, and dainty open-faced cucumber sandwiches, plus a bit of exploring about the hotel by the girls, we put them to bed. Then Loretta and I had time for ourselves.

Loretta talked about the family's first air journey, which proved far from smooth. Well over the Atlantic Ocean, she had seen one of the aircraft engines on fire, but hearing no announcement from the captain, she thought all was well, trusting that the crew knew what they were doing. She assumed that the plane was ready for landing at its next stop. She then awakened the girls, combed their hair, and freshened them for the landing. Then an announcement was made: "We regret to say we have to return to New York due to engine trouble. There is no need for alarm."

"Since I took it in stride, showing no alarm, the girls did likewise. Loretta explained. "I had long learned that if I remained calm, the children usually followed suit. They were also probably too tired from a full day to be scared. In New York for the second time, we spent the next thirteen hours at the Plaza Hotel. Airborne once again, we encountered a few minor disasters. My blood pressure shot up momentarily when the hostess gave Estrellita a piece of hard candy which caught in her throat. Choking and gagging, she was pressed, probed, and hit between the shoulders until it hopped out. There was no after effect. During our first stop at Prestwick, England, the wind snatched her hat as we walked from the plane. Some onlookers saw her plight and went hat chasing, but each time they got within arm's reach, the wind pressed its claim, ending up with the hat for its own disposal. For the rest of the trip she was the saddened, hatless one, which did little to curb her wandering.

“Arriving in Amsterdam, we learned that our connecting flight was waiting on the runway to take off. A hurried change of planes and we were on our way to Geneva, where we would have dinner. On the ground once again, all the other passengers on our flight had been seated by the time we arrived in the dining room. The waiters hurried over and began serving us with great flourish. Suddenly service slowed and stalled. This strange turn of events was later explained by the airline hostess. After noticing the extra attentiveness lavished on us, airline representatives realized they would be charged extra. The waiters assumed we were the family of some wealthy oil magnate or royal family from the Middle East, because we weren't dark enough to be Africans and not clear-skinned enough to be Caucasians. Once it was made clear we were just late arrivals, we were demoted to our Peon status with adequate but regular passenger treatment.”

“Off again, we crossed the Alps at night, and saw daylight just outside of Cairo, Egypt, where we landed for breakfast. Wilting from the moist heat, we were bussed to the City. Before disembarking our passports were collected, no reason given. I trembled at the thought of being held hostage. From the bus stop, we walked up a narrow street to the restaurant. Seeing the men in their robes and fazes, one of the girls remarked, ‘Mama, these men are still wearing their nightgowns.’

“No, baby, those are their regular clothes here. We're no longer in the West, this is the Middle East where the people dress differently’, I told her. Breakfast was served: cornflakes with warm milk, toast, juice, eggs, bread, tea and coffee. The eggs were hard and rubbery, if rolled into a ball and hit with a firm swing, they would have competed in distance with any golf ball.

“Back at the bus, our passports were returned, much to my relief. From Cairo, we flew to Karachi, where we spent the night. A Pakistani, apparently assigned to look after us, met us as we disembarked from the bus at the KLM airport facility. In loud English he announced to us, ‘Don't drink the water! Don't drink the water! I get good water for you.’ Later, he came with bottles of soda water. He sat down and began to talk to the girls, asking about the U.S., their names, et cetera. After the girls washed up and were tucked away, he said, ‘Madam, maybe you like good Pakastani bath?’

‘What is Pakastani bath?’ I inquired.

‘Very good thing. I bring nice warm water and while you sit in tub I pour water over you,’ he explained.

I told him, “No thank you. You bring water, leave it, you go, I'll bathe myself.’ He brought in the hot water and left. We had communicated. Early the next morning he was his usual attentive self, making sure we enjoyed our breakfast. He was there to help us board the bus. Looking back over my shoulder as I boarded the bus. I said, 'Maybe the Pakistani bath next time.' He smiled.

"From Karachi we flew non-stop to Bombay, and here we are." Loretta and I had some catching up to do and then came the long hard sleep.

Next day the late afternoon brought light drizzles and spells of sunshine. It was dry enough to walk along the waterfront to the big stone, Bombay gate. Despite the wind and mist blowing in from the Arabian Sea, the girls were ecstatic with their first good glimpse of India's most westernized city, except one. She was quietly turning over in her mind the scenes she had witnessed on her way from the airport. For through the windows she had caught a glimpse of an entire family, half-naked, lying on the side of the street. The experience did not depress her, but struck a chord of lively conscience that was to accompany her for a lifetime.

Dr. and Mrs. Ernie Neal, the rural development officer for the U.S. Mission in New Delhi, were visiting Bombay and came by the hotel to welcome Loretta and the girls to India. In the small world of African-American colleges, he and Loretta had a number of mutual friends, which became the subject of an extended dialogue. I didn't remind him of his earlier statement. "All India needs is another big family of girls," when I met him on my arrival in New Delhi in January.

The next day, the long journey ended when our Indian Airlines flight landed at the barren airfield in Bhopal with one wind sock in place of a control tower. Rafiq was there with the faithful, green Jeep, which took us to the palace pavilion, our home for the next four years.

Our Pavilion Home

A dazzling white exterior gave the pavilion a strikingly tranquil appearance. The breeze prompted the shadows of mango trees to shift against the walls. It seemed conscious of its place in the royal getting. It was a very pleasant place in spite of buffalo and goats roaming about. Located high above a ninety-nine acre lake it was surrounded by several large mango trees and big, shady date palm trees. Across a flowered round-about was another twin pavilion, both having been built in the 1920s by the Begum for guests. Marble steps led one to a portico graced by four large Romanesque columns. Entry was through heavy wooden doors with twenty-four panes of glass. Inside the rambling single-story structure were eight rooms spacious enough for any of the girls to run away from home without having to leave the building. My usual competition for bathroom access in a household of females completely dispelled by the house seven washrooms — no more standing in line with agonizing patience.

All floors throughout the house were tiled in diamond shaped white marble. In the center of the house was an open skylight that allowed maximum airflow into the windows of the rooms. A wall-placed drainage system kept ponds of water from accumulating but strong winds at times brought in dust, leaves, and other debris. Each room opened into a covered walkway that ran the length of the house. If these walls could talk, some bizarre stories of excess would be told of their royal occupants.

Our problem was how to turn this more than adequate space into a home fit for a family. The most pressing need was to set up a kitchen. No provision had ever been made to cook inside the pavilion. Food for the Nawab's guests had been prepared in another building and carried to the guest houses. Only the bathrooms had running water, but only cold. This left us with no option but to turn a bathroom into a kitchen. My basic woodworking skills came to our rescue. I had dismantled and saved our shipping crates, and with this lumber I built a counter over the bathtub, enclosing the sides for storage. Side extensions were attached to the sink, and the toilet bowl is boxed in by a storage cabinet. Our deep-freezer, kerosene stove, and kerosene refrigerator completed the kitchen setup. We were in business to boil, chill, chops and wash.

The entrance from the portico became the living room and home to the piano. The pavilion furnishings, together with thong provided by the Embassy in New Delhi, created a non-matching but adequate living room set. One large room accommodated all the girls, each with sufficiently demarcated space to minimize territorial dilute. Loretta and I had our own bedroom. We were close enough to the girls "dormitory" to keep an ear on what was happening and to get to them if need be. Rooms in the back and along the site corridor were used for the steady stream of visitors passing through Bhopal.

A great variety of biological specimens constantly shared the pavilion with us. None were more prominent than the little bug-catching geckos. They were so prevalent that I felt like asking them to pay rent. But having seen the variety and number of insects they consumed, I felt better about their free-loading. No living specimen is more innocent and determined than these little translucent creatures. They constantly drove themselves over the ceilings and up the walls. On occasions they drove us up the wall. To watch them spot their prey, flies, mosquitoes, gnats, ants, et cetera, track it down, and lash out a lightning-fast tongue to devour it is one of nature's interesting prey/predators displays of keeping the balance. "Tigers" of the walls they are. At times their suction pad feet would let them down literally, for during the excitement of catching their prey, they would fall with a hard plop on the marble floor or onto the bed, still holding on to their catch. Knocked out momentarily, they soon got it together and scampered back up the walls to continue their upside down pursuit, gave a big gulp, and another course had been added to the daily meal. There was always the possibility of one landing in our soup at mealtime, particularly when we had dinner guests. Chameleons also showed up without invitation. This angular-headed lizard, each eye moving independently of the other and matching skin color with its surrounding is one of nature's great fascinations in deception. Its snail-like pace gave the impression that it would never get to where it was going. This too could be another dimension of deceptions, the prey probably thinking that it will never get there. How such a lightning-fast tongue for catching insects got mixed up with such a slow creature is a true mystery.

Toads during the rainy season laid claim on their share of the place together with boosted insect populations. They hopped about freely and harmlessly. The sudden onset of the dry season sometimes caught them with no chance to hide away in a moisture-laden spot. Some were left as dried, mummified forms, minus their hop of course.

What caused real worry for us were the poisonous snakes and scorpions that crawled into the house. We warned the girls not to be friendly with such visitors. The second oldest daughter was made responsible for stuffing old, folded newspaper under the door at night to discourage scorpions. A morning ritual consisted of shaking out the bedroom slippers to make sure no stingers had managed to by-pass the newspaper barriers. The cobra for the most part stayed away. Kraits, a very deadly snake, had a strong inclination to crawl inside. Once, upon returning from an evening out, we spotted one struggling to squirm across the beige tuft of our carpet. Needless to say its life span was made short with the end of a bludgeon. An on-going dialogue kept the girls snake-wise as well as how to use the anti-snake bite kit supplied by the U.S. mission. We were very grateful for our snake-bite-free four years in Bhopal. India loses hundreds of people each year to snake bites. Only once did I have a scare. The household helper, Lal, had been bitten by a poisonous black scorpion. I rushed him to my Jeep, threw up the hood and held the injected finger to the pole of the car battery to burn out the poison. It was painful but life saving.

During the day there was little hope of escaping the sweltering temperatures. We awaited the night with great anticipation for there was cooler air to be had just twenty feet above the ground. Evening brought a mass migration to the roof, which was a flat expanse surrounded by a three-foot high parapet, thankfully above the mosquito zone. To the extent of her size and age, each of our daughters was accountable for the nightly ritual of getting her things in place for sleeping on the roof. Occasionally we had breakfast there too, a special sunrise treat. I was the weather forecaster during the approach of monsoon season. Cloud formations and distant lightning and thunder always gave cause for alarm among the girls, causing several interruptions of the weatherman's sleep during the night. "Is it going to rain? Do we need to go inside?" came alarmed questions from all corners of the roof. The weatherman had a tendency to wait right up to the last minute, sometimes after a few drops of rain had fallen, to announce, "We had better get inside." This way, no one needed convincing.

Our other escape from the heat was across the road from the pavilion: the lake. It lay at the bottom of a steep slope. At the top of the slope was a fifteen by forty foot catwalk, which was beginning to share in the shabbiness of the other palace structures. But its aging, mold-stained marble flooring with it rusting, ornate cast-iron rail did not discourage our enjoyment. Here evening teas and small receptions could be held in the cool air as twilight gave away to bright evening stars. The lake waters mirrored the surrounding hills. The city lights along shore, and in the monsoon white masses of clouds constantly passing overhead. As a place to escape from the dust and irritations of the sun-scorched day, there was none better in the area.

Executive Household Assistants

No story about Indian servants is more widely known among expatriates than the one of the memsahib (wife) complaining about the breakfast toast being cold. As the story goes, the cook showed up the next morning with his own solution to this national disaster. He came into the dining room and took up an erect posture with his arms held tightly against his body. When questioned by the memsahib about the strange stance and behavior he replied, "I am keeping the toast warm." He had a slice tucked under each armpit.

In the diplomatic circle of receptions, small talk about servant behavior was and still is a major topic. Many of the true stories leave no room for exaggeration. India is a servant society. Servants have servants, and these servants have servants. Every newcomer goes through the trauma of coming face to face with "professional" servants for the first time. Loretta was no exception.

They came in a steady stream carrying motley letter of recommendations from earlier sahibs and memsahibs that often dated well back to the colonial period. Most of the papers no longer resembled paper. Key words were obliterated by holes worn at the folds. Several generations of dirt seem to be the only thing holding them together. Each servant who came was as dirty as the others. All were the epitome of innocence and honesty. They couldn't possibly have a dishonest bone in their body, nor could they think of the word "cheat," even in Hindi. We had to learn by trial and error. In Bombay at the Taj Hotel, the grapevine made us known, and a few men appeared at the hotel door with high recommendations. We decided on only one, Joseph, a short Dravidian sporting a white Muslim cap and a buttoned-up jacket, the uniform of colonial servants. He promised us he could cook, wash, clean, and he was prepared to leave his family 500 miles behind to take the job with us in Muslim Bhopal. Once in Bhopal where he had no ties or friends, he soon grew tired of being in a large family of women who were trying to get him to change his long imbibed habits, e.g. not to use the same linen cloth that was his constant companion on his shoulder for dusting and furniture polishing up the silverware before he laid down each piece for setting the table. When he announced his departure back to Bombay to seek his fortune anew, we decided to rely on help with ties in Bhopal. After considerable dickering, Loretta selected three: a cook, dhobi (laundry man), and a cook-helper/house cleaner. Things always went well the first few days. Then memshaibs tended to let their guards down and began to downplay all the awful stories heard on the cocktail Circuit. We in Bhopal were so far removed from the formal cocktail happenings that we had no way to keep up with the latest. But we did find out that the first few days of good impression soon wore thin. A wall-climbing for the average housewife was just around the next day, and close supervision was continual in order for Loretta to keep six daughters as well as ourselves in good health.

On the books, India's caste system has been totally abolished. But servants are more in a traditional rut than the necessary. They don't read books. A practice as old as India itself, servants don't touch each other's work. We found a greater flexibility of attitude in this regard among Muslim servants than among Hindus. Two of ours were Muslim and the laundryman was Christian. This finely tuned division of labor is often the reason for some households to have up to twelve servants. Too many foreigners tend to compare Indian servants with those of their native country. We often thought that our house helper back home, an eighteen-year-old girl, could do the work of a half dozen Indian servants. However, the low levels of nutrition, and the lack of other basic human needs together with the hundred plus degree temperatures are obviously not taken into consideration when making such claims.

As sure as there is something that could go missing, sooner or later it was in fact. When Loretta found something missing she called the servants together and told them what it was and asked them to look around and find it. Most of the time one or the other would discover it, or it would be left in a place that a member of the family would surely see it. For some unknown reason, the blanket and sheet missing from the baby's bed never returned. Repeated reminders and memsahib's chastening threats came to naught. Ismail, who had been brought up ever since a boy as the servant of an old British civil retired in Kashmir, had learned the art of making a dining table with fantastic napkin foldings. Ismail once indicated in his self-taught English that he always collected something from his sahibs and memsahibs to remember them by. We often wondered whether or not the baby's blanket had been added to his memorabilia, because it was never returned.

When the servants had something they wanted to ask the sahib or memsahib, instead of coming out with it, it was often acted out. A sad expression, a dull response and slacking off with their daily routine were signs we learned to interpret. Their hope seemed to be that we should drag it from them.

“Ismail, what’s wrong? You seem like something is bothering you,” Loretta inquired.

“Memsahib, my heart is today very sad. My brother maybe passed away. He bit by snake,” Ismail answered.

“What happened, Ismail?”

“He working in rice field early morning. When he go to pick up bundle of rice to land on hillock cart and both hands go under rice bundle, the cobra bite his finger. Hospital few miles away in Sehore and bullock cart taking too long to get there. My brother turn very black and puff like a balloon before he get reached. Doctor says he finished.” Ismail closes his eyes and lays his head on his hands “I need off for afternoon to go Sehore,” he added.

“We are sorry, Ismail. May Allah blesses him,” Loretta replied. “You may go to Sehore.”

“Shukriya! Sukhiya!,” he thanked her as he bowed and touched his clasped hands to his forehead.

Dr. Mama

A Britisher once commented that the average foreigner had only enough disease resistance to last about three and a half years in India. Our home location, away from the public and town filth, and with generally higher standards of sanitation at the palace grounds, minimized the family’s exposure to illness. Furthermore, recommended prevention measures were followed to the letter. All of the drinking water was boiled, fresh vegetables were Detol disinfected, and foods were well-cooked, especially meats. Although all the meat came from the jungle, there were still possibilities of tapeworm infections. At the slightest sign of illness, and before the victims could squeeze out their complaint, the family doctor of preventive medicine, Loretta headed for her frayed copy of Family Physician to match the symptoms with recommended treatment. The victim was then administered home-concocted remedies. It certainly must have worked, both at home and on trips. The entire family stayed relatively healthy for the entire period of foreign service. However, I was in a much more vulnerable position to contract any one of number of illnesses common to Indians and foreigners. Living alone for stretches and traveling extensively for work brought me in constant contact with less stringently prepared food. Sharing in the meals and snacks associated with social and work situations was unavoidable. Many of the Indian offerings were very tasty. Strangely enough, the only major bout with illness came on Thanksgiving weekend. Luckily, I had bagged a big, wild peacock for Thanksgiving dinner before the fever set in. As far as I could tell the illness resulted from a small cut on my hand, in which I got some dirt I don’t think there is anything more rife with infections than Indian dirt. I had to be spend in a prone position with a local Indian doctor in attendance. He diagnosed my problem to be a fever. Pretty obvious, I thought, I was burning up. But he assured me that the fever would soon pass away and that I would not pass away with it. Loretta. made her diagnosis, but wouldn't venture to say what. She too thought it would pass and not take me with it. They were both right. Encouraging indeed.

Though a bit woozy, I was back in Budni on Monday morning as usual, keeping my sick leave allowance unused. Two bouts with amoebic dysentery in the course of my tour meant having to be subjected to extended periods of listlessness and low energy. This meant incessant spells of embarrassing gas expulsion. Talk about being a walking windmill in polite society! The local people seemed used to it. Maybe they expected it. The twenty-day pill treatment caused as much of a burnt-out feeling as the attack. In spite of the many precautions taken, I truly believe one can get amoebic dysentery by simply breathing the air, something one can't very well avoid. The winds must pick up a myriad of stubborn cysts as it sweeps across open grounds where millions of people leave tons of feces every day of the year. We had been advised that once in the system, these tenacious organisms may go dormant in the liver and other organs without any noticeable effect for years. Suddenly they may burst forth with a devastating attack. In my case, thirty years have passed without any sign of recurrence. Maybe the little microscopic fellows have grown lazy and refrain from causing me to malfunction in order to avoid the threat of medical treatment. I hope so, for I'd prefer to let sleeping amoeba lie.

Actually I had not realized the long-term effect of dysentery until I went home on the first home leave. My doctor, neighbor, friend, and hunting companion met me at the airport and later told me, "Jones, I was aghast when I saw you emerge from the plane. How wasted and drawn you looked. I felt like coming up the steps to help you with your hand luggage." Maybe he should have, because twenty-two hours of flying on top of the twenty-day treatment for amoebic dysentery is enough to make any weak.

Teacher Mrs. Jones - Mother Loretta

"Education is the gleanings from humans and books and laboratories, from field and forests and whispering winds. But it is more. It is learning from promptness and thoroughness, kindness and helpfulness and every form of purity; it is the mastering of mind and spirit, appetite and passion, thought and word and glance. It is knowing that service brings worthy living, that selfishness means sin, that courage lies in doing right. Education is implanting of good habits, the acquirement of efficiency, the development of twenty-four carat character." Anon

"Foreign service messes up the lives of many families, particularly those children who are moved a lot, changing school settings." I overheard these words at my first U.S. Embassy reception in New Delhi. Although they struck a sensitive chord with me, I set these aside momentarily. I was too absorbed in treading my way through the bramble and thickets of cocktail party diplomacy: a smoke-filled atmosphere where drinks and hors d'oeuvres were consumed amid polite small talk, and it was difficult to distinguish the artificial smiles from the sincere.

That phrase, "messes up the lives," came back to mind as I anticipated the arrival of my six children. What was the price of rearing a large family under a series of changing cultural and social environments? How would the broadening of our perception of the world and its people weigh out against the disruption of our lives? The cost of our happiness and security was unknown, but I had already accepted the job. The answer would come only with time, and would depend on how well we could adjust to change. That is what life is all about wherever one is. I assured myself: He can do it! I know we can! Loretta and I had both the commitment and strength to get it done.

Our goal had long been to give girls a good education, no matter what the circumstances. Loretta and I had struggled, I more than she, since her parents could help her more financially than mine to obtain our bachelor's degrees from African-American colleges that were said to be separate but equal. Separate, yes; equal, a big, big no! We had both taught up to college level in segregated school, at a time when career opportunities elsewhere were more scarce than hens with gold teeth. The majority of African-American graduates from both segregated and non-segregated colleges went the teaching route as an end to justify the means. I had completed my master's degree from Cornell University in Ithaca, New York. Loretta had taken two math courses toward a master's degree. At that point, her preference for caring for two children and our lack of finance, combined to keep her from finishing her course of study, but knowledge of teaching methods, classroom organization, and instructional material gave us the qualification and the confidence later to set up and run a home school where formal education was not available. We knew that living in relative isolation in central India would be the ultimate test. After observing Indian students with only a shade tree for a classroom, a slate and crayon for equipment, and in the evenings only light from a dim city lamp for their reading, I was impressed that, even in such meager circumstances, learning could take place. I shared these thoughts in my letters to Loretta back home. We decided to keep the family together, rather than send any of the girls to boarding school as many foreigners did. The local schools were conducted in Urdu and Hindi, so our options were squeezed down to one: supervised home study. Before leaving the U.S., the children were enrolled in The Calvert and Nebraska correspondence schools, acquired the necessary instructional material and books from Baltimore and Lincoln, and arrived in June on schedule after the closing of public schools in Tennessee.

Our school had five to enroll: Anita, Estrellita for entering the first year; Burnetta, the junior-high student who had a combination of public and catholic experience, all segregated; Carol, who had started out in the public school; Christina, who had attended the laboratory school at Fisk University; and Carlotta, the one-year-old formed the nursery school component. Their school experiences had been by and large within the segregated school system of Tennessee. Fisk laboratory school had been the exception a token school off integration within the otherwise segregated system. Fisk, one of the prominent, black liberal arts colleges, had some white faculty. The lab school offered an integrated learning environment for children of faculty members of Fisk, Meharry Medical College, and Tennessee State University, all African-American schools, up to the third year of primary school. For some reason still unknown to me, Fisk was never brought under scrutiny for carrying on its semblance of integration, especially noticeable at Fisk's Christmas programs that were liberally attended by Caucasians.

Carol and Christina spent the remaining primary school years in segregated public schools. They were puzzled as to why the school was like this, but we never discussed it with them openly. The all white school across the street from us did little to dull their curiosity. We figured they would know the true story in time.

In Bhopal, India, we ran a segregated school. It was for African-American females only, a double-barreled prejudice. It was clearly separate and equal to nothing we had experienced before. Any shortfall this engendered could only be blamed on ourselves, Pa Harold and Ma Loretta. This parent-run school was for our own children, no prejudice intended. All the students happened to be African-American because their parents had been categorized that way by U.S. ethnic codes. However, we do spare the blame for all the students being female.

The day-to-day operation of the school was modeled on public schools around the world. Each morning at eight o'clock the girls dressed for school, gathered their books and homework, and went through the routine of leaving home. Saying, "Goodbye Mother." They walked around the big, flowered round-about (British for traffic circle), between our guest house pavilion and an identical one facing ours, which was occupied by an American couple, and their two friendly dachshunds. The big circle completed, they climbed the dozen or so white marble steps of our pavillion, and greeted their teacher with "Good morning, Mrs. Jones!" Just inside the door was the piano, where they sang "God Bless America," or "America The Beautiful." This was followed by the Pledge of Allegiance. Then they proceeded in orderly fashion to the classroom and arranged themselves for study. Mrs. Jones, the teacher, moved about the classroom giving assistance and encouragement to each of her six students as needed, some needing more than others. At noon, Mrs. Jones became mother and assembled her daughters at lunch. For the rest of the hour they were free to do as they pleased, play, nap or whatever. The sole nursery school student always napped. The afternoon class continued from 1:00 to 3:00 p.m., ending with the students setting their desks in order, tidying up, and gathering their books. With a "Good-bye, Mrs. Jones" spoken in concert, the school day came to an end. They again trekked round the round-about and back to the pavillion where they greeted Mother, who welcomed them home. She remained their mother until school time the next day.

All completed lessons and tests were regularly mailed to the Calvert Correspondence School and the University of Nebraska, stateside to be graded. Anxious looks were always on the faces of the students as they received their grades, comments, corrections, suggestions and encouragements from their counterpart teachers in the USA. "Mrs. Jones" reviewed the returned lessons for any clarification that might be needed. All were anxious to go to school, which was just as well, as we couldn't afford a truant officer anyway.

There were lots of pluses for our family school. Plenty of individual attention could be given to each student and their successes affected their schoolmates and their siblings all at the same time. Certainly there was no shortage of parental involvement in the children's schooling. Combining the role of parents and teacher challenged our ingenuity, wisdom, and not surprisingly, our patience. We wondered sometimes what would have happened to Job's patience if he had to stretch it into being a parent-teacher in a formal home-school setting.

The school was never without a few uninvited guest which sometimes created a scare, but often stimulated the learning environment. The sudden arrival of frogs and toads assured prompt scientific inquiry. Often a bird flew in, perched on the wall ledges, looked for a place to build a nest, preened or pecked at some insects before flying off. Or, a slow-moving chameleon came through the door or open window, with his independently moving eyes, angular head, and prehensile tail. Its mission was to catch small insects with his agile, lightning-fast tongue. One visiting chameleon was once introduced to our cat who stood over it with curiosity. The frightened fellow threw his color changing mechanism into gear and ran through his whole repertoire to throw the cat off. The cat must have been unimpressed, because she just walked off.

Less welcome was the scorpion with its lobster-like claws and long curved tail capable of inflicting devastating pain. Anyone with anything with which to strike a blow went into action with caution of course. Also nobody's friend was the krait, a small, brown-banded snake whose venom was lethal. Its arrival commanded real caution and concern to destroy it. Some of the men servants had to be called in on these occasions, and despite their own fear they managed to set the job done. Geckos frightened our students at first but they gradually warmed up to these harmless lizards. Their soft translucent bodies patrolled the walls and ceilings in pursuit of insects. These and other creatures, whether delightful, disruptive, or dangerous, brought to the classroom a knowledge of biology in action. Loretta often took advantage of these intrusions momentarily diverting from the specific subject at hand to give brief lectures on the importance of these creatures in the natural scheme of things general information on their importance in the natural scheme of things.

The shortfalls of our school, even when compared to the separate-but-equal system we had known at home, were obvious. Equipment and resources were sorely lacking. Desks were rough, unfinished, and uncomfortable. They had been constructed by me from freight crating materials. Tools for science were limited to a microscope and slides. The library consisted of two sets of encyclopedias and fifteen volumes of Childcraft, accumulated by the family over the years along with a children's Bible, with copies of Reader's Digest, Ladies Home Journal, and the Nashville Banner, our home newspaper that sporadically found its way to India, often moist, frayed, swollen and faded, no doubt dammed up at some point until someone had pity to send them. The news was always stale, which was true of any news coming to Bhopal.

More prominently absent was the opportunity for social interaction, which educators consider a basic necessity to a balanced education. A neighboring family, also from Tennessee, had three children studying by correspondence, but they left after two years. Though we would get together with Indian, British, and visiting American families, and even the two oldest girls were invited to the masquerade ball by the Nawab's grand children visiting from school in Switzerland, and an occasional swim in the moldy outdoor pool or to tea with the Begum to taste her wonderful self-made goat cheese, it was not enough to develop lasting friendships. In addition to the cultural and social differences, language presented the greatest barrier. There was no chance for the children to participate in competitive sport or school activities requiring team work and cooperation of their age group. They got along very well with each other and with visiting children, making us their own badminton and table tennis teams but there just weren't enough other people to gauge their social progress in setting also with others. We were also concerned that they learn responsibility and independence outside the classroom, but there was only their large bedroom to keep organized and the pets to take care of. Otherwise, housework and cookies was done by the servants. Only the two-hour afternoon break for the cook and evenings when all went home were they free to barge into the kitchen to learn baking cakes and bread and ice-cream making from their mother.

Diversions consisted of trips to the market to buy and barter with the merchants. This was a lesson in itself and totally different from walking into a store back home where the stamped prices on the items ruled out positively no customer/clerk exchange. Other periodic diversions were the receptions we gave for the graduating classes passing through the training center where I worked. The girls participated quite willingly and graciously in the preparation and serving of refreshments during the reception, our tiny version of diplomatic function. These receptions were concluded with group photos of the students and family, which are preserved in our family archives.

As time went along, individualized patterns of behavior began to emerge among the girls. None comported herself in an unacceptable manner, though in the beginning one was close to the edge. Before we had moved to India, our eldest, Burnetta, had been a well-rounded, junior high student, with above-average grades and a clarinet in the school band. After I left for Bhopal to start my job and prepare for the family's arrival, her grades went down to average and stayed there. She never pulled out of the slump and tended to be somewhat of a dreamer after arriving in India. But there was no way to tell what was on her mind. She never asked questions about anything, neither did she complain. If curiosity killed the cat, she hardly had enough to disturb one from its nap. She followed the school routine religiously, but netted mostly Cs. An excellent hostess, she was at the apex of her delight whenever there were house guests or a reception —happy, smiling, congenial, contented, composed. At the top of her list of things she enjoyed was being well-dressed and looking good. Possibly, the affectionate glances thrown in her direction by our twenty-year-old Muslim driver provided some motivation for glamorizing herself, but we concluded that this was a typical adolescent - phenomenon that would have occurred with or without an audience.

If curiosity could be used as measure for determining whether our two eldest were sisters, the conclusion would have been reached: not related. The second eldest had the potential to become a cat lover's most disliked person. Her curiosity was enough to kill a small town of cats. I was always on the defensive trying to come up with answers to her questions that would make sense to her. When she was barely three years old, she asked. 'what holds that tree up? She was speaking of the big oak tree in our yard in Nashville. I found myself in the pose of The Thinker as I searched for a suitable explanation.

"Part of that tree is buried under the ground. That part is called roots. We can't see them. Put your feet close together, I demanded of her." With a little push from the back I demonstrated how easy it was to push her over.

"Now spread your feet farther apart," I required. She was then pushed from the side. See it is much more difficult to push you over when you spread out. The tree roots spread out on all sides, like your feet were, far from the tree and attach themselves deep in the ground so the wind can't push it over.

"Can we dig and see the roots?" was the next question. We did.

“Why did all the leaves fall off that tree, except those two up high?” was the next inquiry.

“Let’s go inside now,” I commanded. “We shall talk about that later.”

“Don’t forget,” she said as we walked through the backdoor.

Her curiosity never seemed to let up. By the time she had finished the fourth grade, right before leaving for India. She had decided she wanted to study law, a goal she kept throughout her home-school training. She remained studious and knew that to obtain her goal in life she had to be educated. She comported herself as self-appointed teacher and mother number two, determined to keep her other sisters in line, organized, and participatory. Her grades and work quality were exemplary. All of this won appreciative praise from Loretta, mother/teacher number one.

The third oldest of the student body was a non-conformist. She was highly energetic but was determined to spend her energy in ways other than on books. She cared not for the routine and strict discipline of the school. She was good at pretending to be studying, but when questioned about what she had read, her response showed that she had not read the material or had not understand it. “I don’t want to be fooling around with those numbers in math,” she would assert. Clearly, she needed extra attention, sometimes at the expense of the other girls. Giving her extra work reduced her diversionary tendencies. The Bible stories read at Sunday morning breakfast and retelling of the movies Loretta and I attended Saturday nights were the only things that totally captured her interest.

Being the middle girl she seemed to have trouble deciding whether to side with the two older sisters or to go with the younger ones. What the other girls loved, she loathed. Budu, our female rhesus monkey, was dear to the heart of the whole family. Carole abhorred it. Budu knew it, and was usually adept at showing disdain for her. She would Give Budu a sly look out of the corner of her eye and keep her distance. Adventuresome, she was more at home down by the monsoon-created mud holes or the shores of the lake catching bullfrogs. She was frequently successful and no one appreciated her efforts more than Squeezy, our Pet Python. The frog catch seemed to be a gustatory delight for him(we were never sure which).

Soon, a change in her attitude toward studying began to emerge. Sometimes when playing with the younger girls outside, she would tell them things she wanted to do with her life. Gradually, she became also an avid reader, going through books and other reading material like wildfire. She liked her newly found image as a source of information on a great variety of subjects.

Our youngest students were the twins, first graders. As fraternal twins their thinness went little beyond being born during the same birthing. They have enough of the same gene mix to look like sisters. One has always been physically larger. The often pronounced concern that twins have each other’s emotions, problems, in their case was not true. The smaller twin showed deep concern for her sister’s welfare, at least emotionally. The larger twin did not respond with the same depth of concern on this level. The small twin had a high self-esteem with a matching strength to vocalize. Listening to her at times, I was prompted to say, “If she is ever able to synchronize her ability to vocalize with her thoughts, she will be on her way. She clearly wanted to give the impression that she was a good student. She was a good average student, but tended to depend on her sister to set her through the more difficult problems. The larger twin applied herself consistently resulting in good grades, but on social occasions she seemed to depend on the other for fitting comfortably into the social mix. Overall there was more of a balancing of dependency between them than first met the eye.

Nestled in the corner of the classroom was our one year old in her playpen, Carlotta. Easy to care for, she got lots of attention from her sisters and was quite content with her play routine. As she matured, she revealed a cleanly competitive spirit. Being at the bottom of this skyscraper Of sisters, she seemed to be saying. "I must fight to set a share. While pleasant and amiable, she continued to let her sisters know that she was not to be left out. One evening about dusk as the girls were out walking they decided to play a trick on her. They ran ahead of her then hid in the bushes. Poor Carlotta feeling abandoned and lost, arrived crying at the door, much to the chagrin of their mother. The other girls merged from their hiding place laughing at their own joke. But the tables turned. An angry mother ordered them straight to bed after a supper of bread and water.

An accomplished pianist. Loretta was firm about adding music to the curriculum. With the arrival of our piano in our sea freight, lessons began. A clarinet and two violins made up the remainder of our instrument inventory. Loretta had collected sheet music for various levels of competence since college. Our collection of records (classical and pop) widened the range of music available. The radio reinforced our collection, tuning us in to high-pitched India music for which an appreciation gradually grew. Our three senior students already had varying magical starts to build on, and the younger students got a chance to discover their musical interest and talents. We wanted the whole family to appreciate music, to feel happiness and pleasure in the sound of music. To raise the music appreciation level of the whole family was a hoped for spin-off to feel the happiness and pleasure in the sound of music, and to understand its meaning.

Our musical efforts made a relatively isolated life less monotonous, providing relaxation and entertainment, and it increased family sociability with a chance for the girls to cooperate in a group activity. Loretta often organized group made up mostly of the more accomplished students. At the beginning of these musical forays, the sounds bordered on "every note threatening to be a tune," a definition someone once gave to classical music. But the group made steady progress and lots of pleasure came out of their participation, both for themselves and for the rest of the family. Their rhythmic beat of sound had many of the recognized features of good music. Loretta gave each of the girls individual piano lessons, which most took quite seriously, some continuing into college. The violinist gave up after several years and the eldest student mastered the clarinet and piano, and later gave piano lessons. Loretta herself derived great pleasure from singing "Indian Love Call" while accompanying herself on the piano. Late at night while I was away in Budni she would, after all the girls were in bed, play the plaintive notes with such emotion that our neighbor in the other pavilion, who was often without her husband, felt shudders down her spine. She eventually pleaded with Loretta to confine playing that song during the day.

Stitching cloth into useful items was our second-most important extracurricular activity. Among the twenty-two pieces of luggage accompanying Loretta and the girls was our 1940 electric sewing machine. More than half of the dresses ever worn by the six girls and Loretta were products of our portable Singer. Mother, an accomplished seamstress, had stitched them all. Still fresh on all the girls' minds are those lovely dresses mother Loretta had stitched until the wee hours of the morning for their travel from Nashville, Tennessee to India. All the same color, style, and design. The amount of uncut cloth we brought to Bhopal suggested that a dry goods store in Nashville must have still been restocking. During our first years in India, all the girls were quite content to be dressed alike, particularly after so many individuals heaped compliments on them for how good they looked.

Soon enough, the girls wanted to establish their own styles, which served as impetus to master sewing. All went through the basics of how to operate the sewing machine, how to cut material from patterns, and make alterations and repairs. Several went on to make their own designs, producing garments from start to finish.

Religious education was given primary attention. Loretta and I had both come from strongly religious families. As my grandmother instilled in me "Each devil has to figure his/her own salvation," I found it a good thing to show each devil the different choices available. Just as Loretta had gathered the children during the week days around her to impart the secular education, I gathered them around on Sunday mornings to read the dramatic stories of the Old and New Testament. Through contact with colleagues and my Muslim driver I learned too that India is in itself a living book of religious knowledge from the deep wells of which much moral and ethical wealth can be drawn. So I shared with the daughters what I had come to know and imbibed them with a deep tolerance of others' genuine beliefs.

Eventually our little school gained attention across India. One of the leading magazines of the day, called TREND, published in Bombay, came to interview us. The article appeared with the following headline: "IN BHOPAL IS A UNIQUE ONE-ROOM SCHOOL WITH JUST SIX PUPILS AND ONE TEACHER." Following are some quotes: Loretta recalls: "Holidays for the whole family posed a major problem back in the states. Harold could not always get away from his work when school was closed. Now, whenever he can get away the whole family takes a holiday and we move the school along with us or put in longer hours in class to make up the lost time."

One of their American neighbors said: The Jones school is typical of the little, red school of rural America. Every morning when I stand in the garden and listen to the children singing in class, I feel I am back home."

Educators have long said that "the difference between a good school and a great school is parental involvement," no doubt in reference to public schools. If there is a grain of truth to this, what we had established — a school where the parents and family are the PTA, school, and superintendent — must be rated super great. Its day-to-day operation was all-parental, though mostly one parent was involved, Loretta being the mother/teacher. It is a general consensus among school educators that what children do in one place affects what they do in many other places they may find themselves. Success at the school place makes them more amenable for getting along not only with other family members, but with those outside the home. "The home child and the school child is the same child," educators often say. Nothing could be truer in our case. But in our remote corner of India, we had scrambled all of these good philosophical things together. We knew that the children would each of experienced educators claim is gained by students who go through the normally unfolding steps of growth in public school. We had only ourselves and our personal philosophies to guide us. Our first academic aim was to prepare the girls for reaching the big goal of meeting university entrance requirements. The correspondence schools had guaranteed that if all lessons were completed with average to good passing grades, there would be no problem with university entrance any where in the U.S. Our hope ran deep to turn out students who had a good start on being well balanced and who would gain much from their wider exposure to other cultures and locations. Beyond qualifying our students for college entrance, we realized that our school, like life, was an exercise in praxis, not just an institution for theoretical learning. It was a tight situation where children and parents were involved in an educative process, both in and out of the formal classroom setting. We were sensitive to what educators refer to as the differences between instruction and education. Instruction means training in skills referred to as the three Rs: reading, 'riting, and 'rithmetic. Competency in the three Rs is thought not to be enough to assure a so-called successful individual. Education, on the other hand, is said to have a lot more depth. It is supposed to extend people so that their skills, talent, and attitudes are developed for their welfare and for that of all others. The key to education then is the competency to be warm and loving, when this is consistently up front, competency in the fourth and most important of the Rs is achieved. This R refers to the relationships with other people. Living in peace and harmony with others is said to be the true function of education, which still has a long way to go. Knowledge in itself is not worth much unless it is put to wise and prudent use. For adults and children to make good use of knowledge they need sound mental health, a prime requisite for living in harmony with others. To create this state of being, students need what is sometimes called "emotional vitamins." These are the unbottled vitamins like: Love, Acceptance, Security, Protection, Independence, Faith, Guidance, Control. Nothing is more important to the balance of a child than knowing that their parents love them and enjoy them. All children must know that they are accepted, liked, loved for what they are, as they are, and not just when their behavior complies with parental ideas of how they should be. The feeling of belonging to a family group is necessary to gain a feeling of security, to know that in a time of crisis parents and other family members will be on hand. Security cannot be at one's side all the time, but one needs enough of the feeling of security to make insecurity bearable. Dependency is unavoidable in the lives of all children. At the same time they need to know that they are independent and will be allowed by their parents to grow up and be encouraged to try different things. The existence of confidence in their ability to do things for themselves should be made known to them. This helps them build strong wings for leaving the nest. Faith and belief in moral standards and human values is an essential vitamin for all children. Kindness, courage, honesty, generosity, justice, and sharing are essential ingredients to live by in any society. Guidance is needed to convince children how to behave towards people and things. Role models who show by example how to interact with others can provide the best guidance. Control is basic to any society. Without it chaos is the result. Children need to know the limits and what is permissible. It is important for them to feel that to give vent to anger, disagreement, jealousy and other destructive urges cannot be let loose without penalty. Years later one of our daughters related to us the following comment of a budding suitor of hers at university on her sisters and their glowing memories of the Bhopal home school: I felt somehow our faith in home education was rewarded: "All of you are so generous and just because your parents took responsibility for the totality of your upbringing."

The Center Opening

Meanwhile progress towards opening the farm machinery center was on schedule. Mr. Taneja, other staff and I, established both a three and a six-month training program. He sent out to all Indian States announcements and invitations to apply. For the twenty slots available in each course, we received over 400 applications, giving us an opportunity to select dedicated and good students. Dr. Rao, Officer-In-Charge, was not following the overall progress very closely. Three months passed before he raised any questions about the preparations. When he did ask, he wanted to know where we stood in the schedule for opening the center. The chief instructor and I had already conspired to set around any of his ideas that might slow us down. His main concern revolved around which basic engineering principles should be emphasized in the training. Mr. Taneja responded to his concerns by explaining the training would simply emphasize practical aspects of operation, maintenance of tractors and tractor-drawn equipment. Adjustments in the training program would be made as experience dictated. Furthermore, it was too near the opening date to make significant changes. Our approach proved to be a good one later on.

The big iron monsters arrived in Budni on schedule. The D-8 Caterpillar tractors were delivered on flatbed trailers that had squeezed their way over narrow, rough roads, and began to clear two hundred acres of dense jungle for our practical training area. Two D-8 Caterpillars, each hooked to a long heavy chain of a calculated length, moved in parallel and created a U-shaped loop. Each link weighed 125 lbs. The chain was further weighted by heavy iron balls spaced along it. All trees coming within the loop were uprooted and felled: monana, teak, both valuable in furniture making, and banyans used in construction due to their toughness. The dozer blades pushed the downed trees and vegetation into windrows to decay and return to the soil from which they had come. From dust to tree to dust, or more accurately, from dust to tree to dust to rice and wheat for our program to help India feed its growing millions.

Each problem solved had its way of generating other problems. This endeavor unfortunately created a mini- ecological disaster. Budni became a prototype of what happens when humans compete with flora and fauna for survival. With the destruction of the forests, the monkeys became our number-one pest, eating the grain crop planted in the cleared areas. This prompted the director to ask for special permission to purchase two shotguns to control the monkeys. But this solution had the potential for a disaster because many local people viewed the monkey as sacred. When it was hinted that I might be the one to shoot the monkeys, I thought “No thank You!” Despite the fact that I had enjoyed hunting tigers and game animals, I would never entertain the idea of shooting a monkey. Nothing could produce a one-way ticket to heaven or out of the country taster, than the wrath of local religious groups. The monkeys continued to eat, one or two were shot by a local on the quiet.

A small but colorful ceremony with ample government representation from the Ministry of Agriculture, was held for the opening of the Farm Machinery Training and Testing Center on the first of July 1956.

Monsoon

Big, white, billowing clouds projected themselves like leaders of a marching band, followed by gray, moisture-laden, floating ghosts, which spread the pleasant smell of wetness over a bone-dry landscape. These formations ushered in the monsoon, pushing aside the punishing dry season for the arrival of spring. The eternal cycle of monsoon-dry season-monsoon demanded severe survival adjustments. Ready or not, here we are, each season seemed to say. All that is here, all that leaves and returns is a part of this parade. India is monsoon, monsoon is India. Rains come as morning, afternoon, or night showers, or in torrents lasting up to twelve hours, causing flash floods. Keeping dry and saving the essential things of life becomes one big scramble, as a roof may cave in or the mud walls of village homes may collapse. The fight against keeping weeds out of the crops in the muddy fields can be never ending. Road transportation can be delayed for hours, cutting into the normal flow of supplies. Insects, scorpions, and snakes come out from everywhere, exposing everyone to the dreaded malarial mosquito and the other painful bites and stings of the season. Roof leaks and rain blowing through open windows often had me sweeping out large puddles of water and dragging my bed to the only dry corner of the building. Then, like a faucet being cut off, the rains stops for six or more months. Heat and low humidity take every drop of moisture out of the landscape, and all living things suffer from the lack of water. Polluted and unfit drinking water often is the cause for cholera outbreaks.

No matter what the seasons brought, my life was devoted to expansion of the Training and Testing Center. We concentrated on improving the buildings and curriculum and experimented with simple and more advanced farm equipment models. I assisted a workshop in Bhopal to construct a small, power-operated threshing machine and spent an inordinate time testing and modifying it at Budni. We also began to extend simple technology to villages and small implement manufacturers. I built two models of bullock-drawn equipment for the wheat research station across the river, to demonstrate how land leveling could enhance better water utilization for irrigation. A film was made on small-farm irrigation, depicting the use of this equipment. I had the opportunity to view the film ten years later in Kenya.

In the meantime, Shri (Mr.) Vedantia temporally became Officer-In-Charge, replacing Shri E.G.K. Rao. Shri P. John Zachariah replaced Shri Vedantia as the first director of the center.

Bhopal The City

Bhopal is the capital of Madhya Pradesh State (Central Provinces) which constitutes a very large Portion of the mid- section of independent India. The city lies on the shores of a ninety-nine acre lake. Its narrow streets are lined with open sewers, from which rose a stench that took some getting used to. The custom of chewing pan, a nasty mixture of betel nut, lime, and spices wrapped in a betel leaf, resulted in red spittle splattered over most surfaces. The whitewall tires on our station wagon had to be scrubbed after every trip to town to remove the stubborn red stain. Whenever the locals offered me pan, I pulled out my chewing sum and said, "I'll stick with my Amereecan pan."

Scattered about the edge of town in the direction of the palace and around the government buildings were better kept areas. A few modest to palatial homes were built on the outer perimeter of town and near the lake's edge. The lack of stop lights, parking meters, or traffic jams compensated for some of the perils of city navigation. Bicycle and foot traffic were dominated by men. Some Hindu women dressed in western clothes, or saris could be seen, and Moslem women were totally covered, seeing the outside world through eye slits in their burkas. No cover-up could be more complete. School children wore uniforms.

There were no finished clothing stores. Cloth of great variety and quality, sold by the yard, was readily available in many shops to be worn for saris, or cut and sown into finished clothing. Equally available were stitchers, who turned cloth into finished clothing. We had no need for the services of stitchers or tailors, since Loretta, with her portable Singer sewing machine, could do it all. We needed only cloth and thread.

Services and finished products were meager. We were able to obtain powdered milk from a provisions store that sold a liaised number of goods from Bombay and abroad. It was called the Bombay Store. We needed milk for cooking, cereals, for homemade ice-cream, and to nurse our younger pets. On trips to New Delhi we stocked up on powdered milk when available, but the U.S. Embassy commissary tended to carry more booze than milk. A flour mill on the outskirts of Bhopal provided a supply of protein-enriched, brownish flour. I honored an invitation to visit the plant, run by a Bombay business family. They generated as many weevils as they did flour. The walls and floors in the grain storage area literally crawled with brown specks, at least an eighth inch deep. The management did not seem concerned, hence the unplanned protein enriched flour. Sugar was available, light brown, and brown, and brown brown. The intensity of brownness depended on the amount of foreign material it contained. We boiled the light brown variety — which was sold as white — let the sediment settle out, and poured off the clear syrup. Some years later the younger girls were to discover that not all sugar was not brown syrup. Rice and gram were available. Extra washing was the norm before cooking the gram and rice. Fresh vegetables, such as potatoes, greens, cabbage, and tomatoes, were seasonal. All fruits and vegetables were heavily disinfected before storing or cooking.

Mangoes were seasonal but limes were available most of the year. Limeade was our breakfast drink and beverage throughout the day. Our maximum lime consumption for one week was twenty-two dozen, perhaps a world record. Later Coca-Cola, in its quest to colonize the world, occupied India, rivaling the British. An old, worn-down ice plant provided ice enough to supplement that from our deep-freezer, to allow Loretta to make homemade ice-cream flavored naturally with local fruits. Frequently, this was shared with our Indian friends and acquaintances, who were pleased to see local ingredients used and often requested the recipe. Of course, we had plenty of Jones girl-power to hand-turn the ice cream maker. On one of our home leave visits to Nashville, a salesclerk, tried to sell us the latest in electrical ice cream freezers, but when a unified shout of “and miss out on all that good hand cranking?” she backed off. Needless to say, we purchased the hand-cranked model.

The Bharat Talkies — the local cinema — was the downtown place most frequented for entertainment. On a dimly lit street beyond the town center, it was not a place of shine, glitter, or artistic decor, but was rather dullish, fitting in well with the town character. It was not very clean and the air not exactly scented with Jasmine. The seats were hard but bearable. Red stains from pan chewers were common, but there were no buzzard roosts as were once provided for African-Americans in the U.S. south to separate races or castes. Prices were competitive but there was no freshly popped popcorn, so we carried our own snacks. In spite of the theater’s appearance, we spent much of the week anticipating Saturday night, the only night films were in English, and we attended regardless of the content. After the movie, we often came back to the pavilion with Indian friends who had accompanied us, and topped off the evening with some cookies and homemade ice cream. When a film was rated for adult audiences, the girls stayed home and Loretta, a fantastic story teller, described it in detail at Sunday's breakfast. The girls frequently spent Sunday acting out portions of the movies. At the dining table the conversation flowed from the movies to worldly affairs. Relating my experiences during the week at the remote work place about tigers, leopards, and snakes, visits to Indian villages and the recall of WWII and Korean War stories, helped fulfill their never-tiring curiosity.

A three-ring circus spent one week in Bhopal, a great and welcome diversion. They put on an excellent show. We spent much of Sunday afternoon with our Montana friends, Dr. and Mrs. Keyes and their three sons stationed thirty miles away in Sehore. They had shared our pavilion until their house was ready in Sehore. Our light snacks and the great show made us feel pretty close to being back home. Christmas also had a special touch in Bhopal. For the first time we encountered Boxing Day. The British custom had permeated deep into the Indian culture. On the twenty-sixth we awoke to find a stress of visitors queuing up before our front door on the portico. Rafiq explained to us that Boxing Day had raised high expectations among the people. All public service employees — post, electrical, water — plus anyone who had on a social uniform of some sort, expected little boxes from the sahibs and memsahibs. These were in fact the “baskeesh” (a few rupees) of thanks for the year's services and non- services. At first we had nothing against the custom, but somehow it seems too materialistic for the nature of Christmas. So we modified the custom with equal success. We set up tables of goodies and tea with sugar and milk from early morning to sundown under the large mango tree to the left of our pavilion entrance. A steady stream of public utility employees, this time with wives and children, came to share a repast and talk. Our girls took the role of servants on this day. We made one exception on Boxing Day. We always kept an envelope ready for the strong, bow-legged, Dravidian dark gardner, Moti, who without our ever asking always took the imitative to weave a beautiful wreath for our front door. He always presented it without uttering a word, but with bright eyes and a huge, contented smile. We also told the girls that Christmas was different too in another way than in the U.S. In Bhopal, Santa Claus, whom we soon came to call Father Christmas in good British-Indian English, was poorer. The girls took the challenge. They worked hard in the weeks before Christmas making their own gifts to help Santa out. One, for example made out of a string of light bulb boxes an ingenious train for the younger sisters. The Christmas tradition started in India left lasting impressions on the girls even up to this day. The palace ground officials allowed us to cut a few limbs off one big evergreen tree resembling a Pine, which I converted into a semblance of a Christmas tree. The girls generated some colorful design from various colors of paper to decorate the tree.

Services

Several trained doctors were available in Bhopal. However. I felt a little squeamish when one told me that despite the fact that he had obtained his medical degree from a school in U.S. and that he applied the latest available scientific knowledge in his practice, in his own mind he had not yet accepted the germ theory. Religious and traditional beliefs were no doubt the culprits. What a contradiction in the eyes of us westerners. Fortunately during our four and a half years we had to call a doctor only once, when I experienced a high fever over one weekend.

A big sign with a painting of a large set of pink false teeth stuck out from a small rundown building on a narrow, dirty street. It signaled the office of a dentist. It was the Chinese who said centuries ago that one picture was worth a thousand words, and in fact the dentist was Chinese. I had broken a tooth on my partial plate, and in a matter of minutes he had it repaired. He then offered to build me a new partial. I saw the sense in having an extra, so I agreed. It was finished in one day. It looked and felt good and cost less than five dollars. I told him I had never seen a Chinese dentist before. He said that many of the Chinese in India were dentists. I asked about his training, and was told that in China, dentistry is a craft passed down from father to son.

None of the services were more quaint and adoring than those of my barber. A few doors from the dentist, tucked away in shanty-like building, was his dingy, but orderly barber shop. There was a baby-like high chair, straight razors, straps, mirror, hand clippers, combs and brushes. A hand basin with soap and water served to make foam for shaving and cleaning instruments. Oily, caked-on dirt had accumulated throughout the shop. Mounted on all walls were pictures of notables, and framed under glass was an inexhaustible collection of hair samples he had cut over the years from distinguished people. Dates and names were attached. He had kept a few curls from maharajahs, kings, Viceroys, visiting British officials, administrative officers, and popular politicians. I don't think my status was high enough to qualify for such distinction. He was able to understand how customers wished to have their hair cut, and tried hard to please. I was satisfied with his workmanship. However, after the first severe case of barber itch and other hairline infections, I had to rush home to administer my own sanitized prevention methods, mostly rubbing alcohol, hoping to beat the microbes before they became firmly established.

The Family and Bhopal

From a material standpoint, our car, our household, possessions, and our appearance, though minimal by American standards, created in the minds of Bhopalis an image of great wealth. Yet the respect we showed for people, regardless of caste or position, earned us the designation of a new kind of Rajah. This meant that although we lived like Rajahs, we didn't act like them. Periodically, the girls out on a meal or special reception to serve government officials or local private citizens. They did the same on special occasions for our household assistants, serving them and their families.

However, a family of girls in India is considered a disaster. Partly responsible for this attitude is the Hindu dowry system, money or goods paid by the bride's father to her groom's family in an arranged marriage. Social position is judged by the size of the wedding and the amount of dowry. Baby girls are sometimes murdered or aborted in order to avoid the burden of their future financial oblations. Wives are sometimes beaten or burned after they have moved into their in-law's household if the dowry is considered insufficient. Families borrow heavily and so deeply in debt to marry off their female children that many never recover. Even when a father is prosperous, marriages can still lead to ruin, since pride and custom constantly urge him ahead of his resources. All of this is reflected in the India adage, "Even a king will go bankrupt if he has five daughters." Not having the means of a king, I stagger to think what would happen if he had seven! As the locals saw it, I was in for a life of hardships, financial devastation, and sacrifice. Not a total misconception, but not for the same things Indians had in mind. For us parents there was always total sympathy from our Indian friends, though I assured them having many daughters is not nearly as much of a calamity in the United States.

The Muslim dowry system would have suited us better, since it obliges the bridegroom family to pay the bride dowry. But the social prices in the minds of us parents was much higher: total envelopment in a Burka in exchange for financial improvement.

A Congressman With a Fool-Proof Camera

Budni was no place to expect traveling “heavies” to visit. Even the U.S. Mission officials from the New Delhi office didn’t bother to come. However, the embassy had sent word to Bhopal that Senator Allen J. Ellender of Louisiana was visiting India and had expressed his desire to see the Budni term machinery training and testing project, which had been open for less than two months. There was no explanation for the purpose of the visit. Could it be that he was looking for ammunition to prove that overseas projects were unnecessary expenditures? He was, after all, Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Arrangements were made at the government guest house for the Senator and two AID mission officers from New Delhi who were also visiting for the first time. Their chartered DC-3 which must have cost a few taxpayers dollars, landed at the Bhopal airport, where the Nawab’s five private planes were still hankered. Welcomed by several Madhya Pradesh state officials, the senator, in his trademark fedora hat and pin stripe suit, hit the ground politicking. After introductions, he exclaimed how happy he was to be visiting the world’s largest democracy. Jokingly, or maybe not so jokingly, he made several host officials honorary Democrats by pinning a party button on them. The officials and crowd seemed to enjoy the antics in good humor.

Chatting constantly, with an occasional question about our work in India, the Senator took the sixty mile trip to Budni in stride. Much of his talk was about the other ninety-eight countries he had visited around the world. The latest on his list was the Soviet Union, where he saw some encouraging developments in housing, hospitals, and community development. He seemed to think that life in that country was not nearly as dismal as was often portrayed by the non-communist world.

Introductions of officials at the training center resulted in the making of more honorary Democrats. From the beginning of the tour to the end, the senator’s 16mm movie camera ran constantly. He delighted in it as much as a child with a new toy. He called it foolproof, because he had only to aim and push the button. The Department of State had furnished the camera for his trip. As he filmed, he barraged us with his opinion that much of the $120,000 worth of equipment furnished by the U.S. was out of touch with Indian farmers’ needs. He focused his criticism on a $122.00 wheatland plow, used by Midwestern wheat farmers in their large operations. Seeing that I was under fire, his pilot spoke softly to me about the senator’s monologue. It’s costing more to fly the old so and so one hour in that plane than the cost of that plow. I’m sure he was vaccinated with a phonograph needle and there is nothing you can do or say that will cause him to put his mouth in park. Just don’t worry about it.

My attempt to explain that the equipment was bought on a trial-and-testing basis fell on deaf ears, neither slowing or changing the direction of his discourse. But it was all done in a pleasant, jovial manner and with what some say is high-political style. New to this business of development assistance, I was perplexed at the Indian and U.S. officials tendency to rush around like unguided missiles when a congressman made a request. There is a lot to be said for ignorance being bliss.

After the tour, Mr. Rao and his staff offered their standard recast, strong tea and biscuits. The Senator seemed to relish it and praised the center's establishment. For some reason, every half hour or so he mentioned the wheatland plow and its inappropriateness for India. But he promised to send the Officer-In-Charge, a copy of the 16mm film. At dinner that evening, the senator continued to relate his travel impressions, and everything went smoothly. The next morning our trip through the countryside of Bhopal gave the senator an expanded exercise for his foolproof camera, and he agreed to my request that he write my parents about his visit, which I thought would delight them. I saw him off at the Bhopal airport with great relief.

Within several weeks, a package marked "U.S. Senate" arrived. With so little to do in Budni, the prospect of seeing a film of our fledgling center and its staff had caused excitement to skyrocket, and some of the community folk had been invited to attend. Luckily, the Officer-In-Charge decided to preview the film, only to discover our copy was completely blank. Suspecting the original to be the same, I concluded that the State Department's ability to pick a foolproof camera for a non-foolproof operator was clearly not foolproof. Or had the Republican administration overestimated the Democratic Senator? Was it intended? If so, it worked.

A year or so later, during my first home leave, I stopped at the India desk in the State Department. The officer immediately brought up the senator's visit.

"What did he have to say about it?" I inquired.

He was still talking about that $122.00 wheatland plow that was not suitable for Indian conditions.

"What was the response here to his comments?"

"We simply forgot about what the old codger was saying. It's insignificant. You too should forget about it," the desk officer advised.

"I never thought that much about it in the first place," I countered. His letter to me stated that he planned to make good use of the information he gathered on his trip, particularly in connection with future appropriations for our foreign-aid programs."

However, the senator did keep his promise to write my parents in Virginia about seeing us and the good work we were doing in India. That's quite an accomplishment for a politician! Following is his letter to me:

Houma, Louisiana
November 16, 1956

Dear Mr. Jones:

I was very grateful for the courteous attention you showed to me when I visited the extension projects at Bhopal last August. I was very interested in every thing I saw there, and I certainly appreciated the efforts of you and others in charge of the project in furnishing all the information I obtained.

I feel that my trip this year was an especially enlightening and rewarding one. I plan to make good use of the material I have obtained, particularly in connection with future appropriations for our foreign aid program.

Again thanking you, and with kindest personal regards, I am

Sincerely Yours,

ALLEN J ELLENDER U.S. Senator.

Pets - The Menagerie

Pets occupied a unique place in our family life in Bhopal. Truly treasured members of our pavilion house, they brought to everyone immense joy and at times sadness. Each one coincidentally happened to be female, furthering the family syndrome. Oh yes, there was one exception, the Python. We were never sure of its sex. Our menagerie, in both variety and number, would rival a small town zoo. They played an important and delightful role in our family life in Bhopal. Appreciating the value of animal companionship observing and learning their different behavior patterns, and the responsibility of caring for them, were lessons from which each of us benefited. Everyone's favorite was equally catered to. The seven-foot python was probably the least loved.

Gori, a small, black-and-white terrier with one ear slightly bent down and a pigeon-toed left foot, was alert and intelligent. She epitomized the adage, "A dog is man's best friend." though it was the girls to whom she was devoted. Wherever the girls were, so was Gori. She had only about three inches of tail, which was constantly in motion during all of her waking hours. We were never able to get any information as to Gori's roots. She was clearly the fox terrier breed. Her behavior was classic, loving and protective. She was the leavening factor in keeping the rest of the menagerie's temperament on an even, tolerant keel. When they bristled or showed resentment for each other, she would walk up, and sniff them as if to say. "We must recognize everyone's right to be there." She once rescued Cathy from an attack by an Alsatian dog by jumping on his back and sinking her teeth into his skin. She kept peace among the other pets and protected them from intruders. Gori actually belonged to Mr. Rao, at the Budni training and testing center. He had shipped Gori from Madras to Bhopal by rail, and had asked me to intercept her at the train station, since he would not be able to get there for her arrival. Though he knew we had her, he made no mention of reclaiming her and neither did I. The girls had become truly attached and Gori fit right in. Not until two and half years later, did Mr. Rao finally came to claim her, at the family's deepest regret and sorrow. It brought home the lesson, "All good things must come to an end."

BOODU was a brown Rhesus monkey. My driver gave her the name to indicate how silly he found the monkey. She never did less than wild monkeys are expected to do. With her speed and agility, she was a big tease and somewhat of an annoyance to all the other pets and indeed the people of the house, too. She liked being loved and petted and had a very keen sense of those who had the slightest dislike for her. Clearly she realized that she had little claim on Carol's admiration, our third oldest. She watched Carol very closely and stayed out of her way. A favorite pleasure of her's was to ride on the bundle carrier of the Christina bicycle with total ease and contentment, grasping her delicate hands around the pedaler's or the second passenger's waist. She hated being washed in the bathtub, screeching at the top of her lungs whenever Christina approached her with soap in hand. The reason for this antipathy was discovered by accident. Instead of filling the tub with cold water, the girls one day poured into the tub heated water remaining from the dhobi's supply. It was almost impossible to pull Boodoo out of the bath. She swam and dried with pleasure. Hereafter during the monsoon, the girls took her to the buffalo's mud holes to allow her to show off her swimming prowess. Boodu was more familiar with the kitchen than the cook. She was a big sneak, always looking for morsels to stuff into her mouth, making her elastic jaws jut out like Dizzy Gillespie. She was a veritable storeroom on the move, and move she could. We knew she had acquired some forbidden item when we observed a brown blur streaking from the kitchen. During the day she had to be staked out by the tree where she was content to pluck at the bark, looking for small busses to snack on and conduct her toiletry as needed. Although she slept in a large cage I had built out of freighting crates, she clever enough to pick the lock on the chain holding her to the large shade tree. While loose and free to roam one day, her curiosity took her exploring up an electric pole which serviced the pavilion. When she reached the top she made the fatal mistake of grasping a live wire in each hand to swing between them. She was immediately electrocuted and fell to the ground bluish and lifeless. Two boys in the neighborhood found her and delivered her corpse to the girls. Family bereavement again hit a very high pitch. Boodu was given a dignified funeral with a simple wooden cross to mark the grave.

At the time cats were admitted to our menagerie the girls were just learning the gods and goddesses of Greek mythology, relating the proverbial curiosity of cats to their new-found knowledge. The girls baptized the cats. Pandoras were a series of cats of pure or mixed Siamese lineage. The three with us in Bhopal had the physical appearance of the more common seal-point Siamese. They thus had light-colored bodies with dark-colored ears, face, feet, and tail. The darker areas are called Points. Other variations of the Siamese include chocolate-point, blue-point, and lilac-points. We suspected that our first litter of Siamese cats had their more recent roots in England. However, the series of litters born in Bhopal and fathered by stray tons of dubious purity shook the Siamese features to the rafters. Even though the offspring were not purebred, these marvels of strength and balance were always a pleasure to have around and watch. Although credited by some as being more independent than other breeds of cats, our Pandoras didn't conform enough to convince us of this accusation. They were friendly and faithful companions and responded gratefully to good treatment. Bhopal offered a constant parade of creatures that kept their curiosity and hunting instincts totally riled with excitement. Birds, lizards, chameleons, moles, mice, crickets, frogs, screeching shrews and snakes were their constant victims. Our Pandoras had the more mournful meow which is credited to their breed, and is said to be an attention-getting technique. They were quick to purr when pleased, but ghoulish when unhappy or angry. The arched back, hair standing on end, and puffed up tails were consistently displayed in response to the various creatures running around the pavilion. As time passed, familiarity and the lack of any real threat from their encounters, they began to take things for granted, easing their anxiety.

No matter how domestic their situation, they remained cats first and always. Their swift, soundless, padded feet were their chief weapons for stalking their prey, often playing with their victims by tossing it about and recapturing it as it tried to escape. When bored with this part of the act, the captured is abandoned or eaten though the meal did not stay down if it didn't set well with the cat's stomach. Cats, no matter the size or type, are principally meat eaters. We left them to their own devices on that score, but supplemented their diet with milk, either powdered or fresh from goat, cow or buffalo. Proud and fearless, our Pandoras adjusted well to whatever the conditions. Our cats and dogs showed far less aversion to each other than most, always snarling and quarreling. They came as close to living in harmony as cats and dogs can.

Twitchy never seemed to know she was a rabbit. She came to us from an Indian acquaintance, little more than a fluffy, oversize powder puff. There could never be a better example of living in harmony amid a collection of big-types so totally different from herself. She had to put up with a dog, cats, a monkey, a python, a tiger, and all of us. Whatever food was out for the other pets Twitchy shared, including meat. Never in fear wherever the others gathered, her hippety-hoppy motion eased her up among them. Twitchy's peculiar flair for music set her apart from the rest of the pets. Whenever the piano was being played, which was very often, she would hop to the middle of the floor facing the piano and sit up straight on her hind legs. From this meditative posture both ears went into a twitching, quivering motion. Every other part was as motionless as a stone. There wasn't even a blinking of the eyes. Only when the music stopped did her ears turn off like windshield wipers. Whether the piano music went on for a short spell or was extended didn't seem to matter. She adjusted her attention or participation span accordingly. As the last note on the piano faded she relaxed and went back being a rabbit. No matter how far away or what she might be doing, the first few piano notes brought her hurrying to her favorite spot. We were baffled by this strange action, but the Indian explanation was that she had been associated with music in her last life. She might even have been a pianist. Somewhat of a backward step, we thought, on the road to spiritual perfection. We never had the gumption to accent reincarnation as the last word, but it was interesting and something to wonder about. The great propensity rabbits have for procreation aroused our sympathy for Twitchy's predicament among such a group of non-appealing companions, all female. We bestowed much affection upon her to make it up to her.

Squeezy was a seven-foot python youngster of indeterminable sex, though odds were it was a female. It had lived in a windrow of trees, bushes, and dirt created by the D-8 caterpillar tractors that came to Budni to clear away the jungle trees and bush. These decaying heaps became the homes of many creatures: mice, rats, insects, frogs, snakes, and lots more. They were incubators for termites, ants, and other types which hastened their decay. Squeezy no doubt found it a good place to catch frogs, rats, and other creatures. While sitting one morning on one of the pushed-over trees, I saw the head of a python push out from under the debris. His fascinating color markings and sheen was a slithering thing of beauty. A big wood rat had just run out, went forward a short distance, and dashed back under the pile of rubbish. I think Squeezy must have been on its trail not being poisonous, and not large enough to attack and squeeze me to death, I decided to capture it. Quickly, I shaped a forked stick I could push down over the back of its head. As a young country boy I had caught snakes that way before, but nothing nearly as stout and long. Patiently, I watched it ease away from the stacked trees. It seemed unaware of my presence, engrossed in the pursuit of its prey, perhaps the big rat that had gone by. It seemed to be smelling along the ground as if to pick up the trail of the big rat that had gone by. As it moved into a clearing, I got between it and the heap, and was able to gush the stick down over his head. It curled, twisted and wrapped himself around the stick. Unsure of what to do next. I grassed the soft portion of its neck behind the head between my middle and fore fingers. It curled tightly around my arm above my elbow. I started to lose my grip as it squeezed my arm muscle, but just when I thought I had lost the battle, it suddenly relaxed. I am not sure why. I walked to my quarters and placed it in a closed wooden box. Here it stayed until the next day when I returned to Bhopal for the weekend to join the family. I wondered all the way home how the girls and Loretta would feel about the newest addition to the menagerie. Soon enough I got the answer.

“Why on earth did you bring a python home?” they cried.

“They’re harmless at this age and we can let it go whenever the vote is in favor.”

Carol blurted out, “I can catch bullfrogs to feed it.” She had made an art of catching frogs from by the water’s ease down at the lake by using the technique of tying a small red rag to the hook on her fishing line. She dangled it in front of a frog’s nose and, presto! She made a catch. Frogs and sometimes a small rodent became Squeezy’s daily bill of fare. We never watched it swallow one, but they disappeared from the box and Squeezy seemed to thrive. Too bad it could never socialize with the rest of the menagerie. Although it never gained more than partial respect from the family, there was a sadness when Squeezy met its fate. Escaping unnoticed from the cage, it crawled across the palace grounds towards the mosque. We learned this when several small boys came down the hill to the house with a dead python. they had seen Squeezy near the mosque and beat it to death with sticks. Obviously it had not done a good job at convincing the youngsters that it was the Jones’ pet python. There was nothing left to do but to hold our second pet funeral, with all the girls participating. Squeezy had gone where all dead snakes go.

“Daddy, is there a snake heaven?” they asked.

“Probably so,” I answered solemnly.

Cathy, the Bengal tigress, was clearly the royalty of the family pet group. She joined the menagerie during our second tour. Cathy was short for Catherine I, wife of Peter the Great, and Empress of Russia, whom the girls had just learned about in school. It has been said, “God made cats so that people would know what it was like to pet a tiger.” We had both, and sometimes they could be found snoozing side by side. Our day-to-day comparison clearly corroborated that cat behavior is the same, regardless of breed, size, shape, color and circumstance. From the other pets, Cathy got the respect she deserved, but none stood in fear or awe of her.

I found Cathy, only a few days old, on one of my tiger hunts. We got her started by feeding her milk from a baby bottle, which she adjusted to with ease. In a matter of weeks. she came running at the sound of the plastic bottle being tapped against the floor, our signal for feeding time. Flipping over onto her back, she would extend her front feet straight up. The bottle was placed in her paws and in less than a minute she dropped the emptied bottle. Then she bounced back on her feet and was ready to carry on her typical cat routine. We almost lost her when she lost enormous weight through dysentery. Relying on her medical book, Loretta decided to feed her charcoal. To our great relief, it worked. Wild meat was a supplement to her diet, with charcoal pills thrown in to control dysentery. We were all amazed at how her character changed when she was eating meat. She took her meat to a corner and would not allow anyone to approach her. The meat seemed to kindle aggressive behavior and the instinct to protect her kill. She went into blood curdling growls and snarls with teeth skinned back and ready for attack. When the meat was finished, she immediately went back to her quiet house cat manners, twitching her tail and rubbing her head gently against anyone's legs. Then she was ready to hop up on the foot one of the girl's beds and stretch out for a nag. In seven months the milk/meat/charcoal diet turned her into a tiger the size of a full-grown police or Alsatian dog, only she was much heavier. Standing on her hind legs, she easily put her front paws on Loretta's shoulders.

Life with Cathy was a delightful experience for the family and friends. However, she did cause some consternation for visitors. Once outside on her daily routine of stalking and jumping at things in cat fashion, two young Indian boys came by and started to tease her. A warning had been given them several times not to incite her. She tried to ignore them, but they persisted to the point that she charged them. They ran but she caught one by his leg. A superficial injury resulted, and he was taken to the local infirmary. Word quickly got around that it was not good to tease the tiger. Cathy eventually became just another member of the household. Consequently when friends or visitors came we neglected to tell them there was a tiger in the house. When she walked through the doors unannounced. People's reactions took many forms, including fearful facial expression, making ready to run, or hiding behind the sofa. None quite outdid one Britisher who had recently come to Bhopal without his family. He had heard we had a piano and dropped by to play. While in the midst of a number, Cathy walked up and stood in the doorway near the piano. He immediately took to the air and landed on top of the piano. We calmed him down, apologized, and got him back on the stool. When he got back to playing, Cathy came and laid sentry at his feet under the piano. He then got the idea. What a great picture this would make to send back to his wife in the U.K. with a note: This is India for you. We obliged with a camera shot but never had a follow up resort as to how it went over with his family back home. We wondered if the photo kept them in London.

Our First Home Leave

We returned to the U.S. in June, 1958, after two years overseas, for our three months home leave in Nashville. The trip home began by driving our tightly packed station wagon from Bhopal to New Delhi, where we left our car with friends. We flew on BOAC to London and due to the vagaries of air travel, we missed our connecting flight on Pan Am to New York. The offending airline, BOAC, was obliged to put us up and arranged rooms for us at the Westbury Hotel.

The girls were ecstatic. The mattresses and covers were made of rich down feathers. In the dining room they were introduced to their first alcoholic desert in the form of a beautifully decorated chocolate cake flavored with liquor. Upon placing that first bite in their mouths, they donned some humorous expressions, and used lots of facial muscles to force down the morsels of unexpected taste. We spent most of the day at the hotel before I called PAN AM and told them our story. This led to a rip-roaring brouhaha with the BOAC representatives. PAN AM had a flight which left about the time of our arrival, with which we could have connected, but BOAC had led us to believe there was no PAN AM flight. After threatening to write a letter to the CEO of BOAC, we received a profusion of apologies from the British representative.

Both airlines had evening flights to New York, departing about the same time. We received a series of telephone calls from representatives of each airline, trying to persuade us to fly with them. Eight first class tickets were at stake. We finally decided to fly PAN AM and informed BOAC of our decision, because they had misinformed us about the morning PAN AM flight. We arrived at the airport and were met by officials from both airlines intent on blaming each other for the mix-up and confusion. Finally, the BOAC representative departed in a huff, beating an elegant retreat. At boarding time, the PAN AM representative escorted us to the huge plane and directed us to what was called the "Elite Suite," or "Presidential Suite," located at the front of the plane. The suite was a two-level circular arrangement, connected by a spiral staircase. Each of us had a bed, secluded and separate and first-class service. The luxurious flight back to New York was our most pleasurable. We landed in the morning, June ninth 1958, knowing how Presidents travel.

Our Nashville neighbors and friends gave us a big, gracious welcome. Most of our vacation agenda was spent sprucing up our house, shopping, visiting friends and neighbors, showing slides, and displaying a few of my hunting trophies. I was invited to appear on WSM-TV's Noon Show with Jud Collins. Collins interviewed me about life in India and displayed two of my tiger and leopard rugs, complete with heads. Collins closed the show saying, "This is something for you Tennessee rabbit hunters to take note of," as the cameras zoomed in on the head of the large tiger. Mrs. E. Perry Crump, wife of Dr. Crump, who headed Pediatrics at Meharry Medical College, and our neighbor, made the initial contact with the TV station which led to the invite. After packing our air and surface freight, we completed our home leave, and on September first, we left New York on PAN AM to return to India.

We landed in Rome for our connecting flight and as we attempted to proceed to New Delhi, we discovered we did not have visas to re-enter India. It hadn't even occurred to us to check their expiration date, since they had been sent back to Department of State in Washington for renewal. The airline recommended a good hotel in Rome while our passports were submitted to the U.S. Embassy for updating. Being a weekend, we had to wait until Monday to get our visas. However, while standing in line at the airport, we ran into Larry and Ester Lewis whom we had known from Manassas, Virginia, when Loretta and I worked at the Regional High School there eighteen years prior. They had joined AID and were on their way to Turkey. The few happy moments of nostalgia with them were among the brightest of our stay in Rome. For the girls it was an extra treat to explore the city Cicero, Brutus and Caesar had once strolled and stormed as told in their history books, and they could verify for themselves the types of architectural columns they had to memorize from their art books. We resumed our trip after renewing the visas and arrived at Palam Airport in New Delhi, September eighth 1958. We spent a couple of days in New Delhi at the Claridge Hotel. I picked up our station wagon, touched base with the AID Mission, and visited the embassy commissary to purchase food items. Our usual pre-dawn morning start allowed us to complete the 500 mile long, dusty, tiresome trip to Bhopal by midnight.

Road Trips

In India, road trips had the potential to be hazardous due to heat, poor road conditions, and limited services. Happily, we had little trouble despite the fact that it took at least fifteen hours to travel to either Bombay or New Delhi. The trips gave us all a chance to see the country's diversity. AID agricultural personnel throughout the sub-continent gathered yearly for a conference, usually in New Delhi, although we did meet once in Hyderabad and Bangalore, where the weather is more temperate. Wherever the location, employees and their families amassed at a first-class hotel, giving the wives and children a chance to make new acquaintances. For the most part, our family and John and James Ella Bull, from Alabama, were the only African-American families. On our first trip to New Delhi, we had the opportunity to meet Marion Anderson, America's prima contralto, who had come to India for a concert. After getting her autograph and handshake, the girls didn't wash their hands for the rest of the day.

More than once we took time to visit the Taj Mahal on the banks of the Yamuna River in Agra. The tomb stands in a garden, its image perfectly reflected in a long pool at its entrance. The Mogul ruler, Shah Jahan, erected the white marble monument in memory of his favorite sultans. Requiring the labor of 20,000 workers over twenty-two years, the Taj is probably the most beautiful example of Moslem architecture. Its magnificence has earned it many endearments: "a poem in marble," "the marble queen of sorrow," and "romance in stone," to name a few. With our shoes removed, we entered to admire the interior's mosaics of precious stones, arabesques, and prayers from the Koran written in black marble, decorating the columns and ceilings. One room contains two monuments visitors can see through a screen of carved alabaster. The bodies of Shah Jehan and his wife, Mumtez, lie in a vault below.

On one of our trips to the Taj Mahal, we received a royal welcome. As we proceeded along the streets of Agra, crowds of people lined the streets, cheering vigorously. Not an uncommon event in India, we assumed some important official would soon be passing. We drove unimpeded up to the guarded entrance to the Taj Mahal. A guard rushed up to the vehicle and opened both doors. To his amazement and our embarrassment, we were not the expected guest the crowd and officials had assumed, and for whom the preparations and cheering were intended. They were expecting the King of Saudi Arabia. We rationalized the incident by saying, "maybe our dry-run made all the actors perform better when the King did come." Without hesitation, we were happy to ease the apprehension of the guards and to high-tail it out of the entrance as fast as possible.

We made another trip to New Delhi at the invitation of our Embassy to join in the festivities honoring President Eisenhower's visit. We had made our usual, tightly packed, 5:00 AM start and were within 150 miles of our destination when we approached a small town. Masses of people were heading toward us, and bystanders lined both sides of the road, leaving hardly enough room to drive through. As we moved slowly through the crowd, a small girl suddenly darted in front of us. She was hit by our front bumper, which cut a small gash in her forehead, and fell down screaming. Like a flash flood, the crowd flowed into the road around the station wagon, not allowing us to move. Screaming in Hindi, one big, lightly clad man leading the crowd came to my side where the window was partially open and thrust a big dasher against my face. All of us remained quiet but there was enough adrenaline flowing to float the Queen Mary. Luckily, the police saw what was happening and came quickly to our rescue. The crowd was dispersed. I offered to pay the girl's parents through the policeman for her treatment at the nearby dispensary.

"What would you suggest as a fair amount?" I asked.

"Oh, give them thirty-five or forty rupees," he replied, which is about five American dollars. After all, she is just a girl. He then added. "It is much more important that you get on with your trip to Delhi to honor your President Eisenhower, than worrying about hitting a girl." He had assumed correctly, the purpose of our trip. "Thank you for your help," I said.

"We are happy to be in place to help you. It could have been a nasty incident, not uncommon when crowds become aroused. All the best, and have a good journey," he said, as we drove away, feeling much less festive, but greatly relieved that all involved had survived.

Nature's Display

Pursuing and studying flora and fauna consumed much of my spare time, and in the process I caused a wealth of jungle lore. Clearing 200 acres for the center's crop fields had destroyed part of their habitat, but the animals were able to retreat further into the jungle and readjust. The area was a bird -watcher's paradise. One could see many birds of beauty, like the peafowl, bee eaters, doves, green pigeons, kingfishers, rollers, weavers, and the strange looking pied hornbill, to name a few. Some were known for their melodious songs such as the fly catchers and rollers, while others had the job of aerating the soil with their scratching, normally spur fowl, thrushes, and peacocks. The ones intent on keeping the insect population in balance were the fly catchers, bee eaters, weavers, and partridges. A bird watcher could also feast their eyes on such winged predators as hawks, kites, eagles, and owls. The huge, strong-beaked vulture could be seen often taking advantage of the thermal current: to soar out of sight or dive with folded wings down on a dead carcass. No group of living things in India display a greater proficiency of purpose than the Indian vulture.

Watchers could also see a wide diversity of animals that lived on the ground. The deer and antelope displayed speed, grace, and beauty, while primates added human likeness, stature, and agility. Pigs, bears, and porcupines aerated the soil. Monkeys, langurs, deer, squirrels, and peacocks warned others of danger. The scavengers like the hyenas and jackals could be seen cleaning up the areas. The tigers and leopards, together with a group of smaller species and wild dogs made up the four-footed predator group. All of these creatures of the air and ground, worked in a complex mosaic to maintain the balance of nature.

Legless and legged crawling creatures were also in abundance. Poisonous snakes included cobras, kraits, coral, and vipers. Non-poisonous snakes were pythons, grass snakes, and rat snakes. Scorpions in black and white varieties were omnipresent, ever lurking in or under stones and unworn shoes. Another large group of birds, bugs, frogs, snakes, terrapins, and turtles lived in and at the water's edge. I encountered these creatures either in the living quarters, around the centers' compound, or in the jungle which bordered the center area on all but one side, which had been cleared for cultivation.

One of my more fascinating observations occurred in the late afternoon as I rested against a tree a few yards from a waterhole. My legs were straight out in front of me with my rifle laid across them. A group of thirty-five or forty velvet monkeys came swinging from limb to limb for a drink of water. When they spied me, they started making loud noises, warning each other of my presence. Eventually, they calmed down and quietly sat among the branches, reluctant to approach the waterhole. Twilight was quickly approaching, and a large male decided to risk climbing down a few feet from where I was sitting. I had my hand under my chin in the nose of Rodin's statue, the Thinker. Leaning his back against the tree that he had descended, the monkey put his front paw under his chin emulating my position. Then he walked away, nicked up a stick and laid the stick across his legs as my rifle was laid across mine. There he sat perfectly motionless, but with his eyes intently focused on me. He gave a few squeaky sounds, apparently to tell the pack I was harmless and to come down. The entire group quickly descended the trees either by jumping or sliding down and gathered about the waterhole. As they drank, they kept their eyes on me. The leader finally tossed his stick aside and slowly sauntered over to the waterhole to drink. At his signal, the whole group climbed the trees and disappeared. Probably to their sleeping quarters for the night. Monkey see, monkey do had come alive in this most appropriate setting. Observing nature's system of check and balances was like reading a book with no beginning and no end, and my time at Budni was only a few interesting paragraphs in this great story.

The Film Makers

My work, the serenity of Bodni, and my nature studies were shattered when a movie-making company descended upon us to shoot a film. The training center, which was the only place that had any semblance of accommodations became their operating headquarters. This forced us in daily proximity to India's top stars of the late 1950s, playing badminton, sharing tea, and conversation and observing the filming. The major participants were Dilip Kumar, India's top male star, Ajit, Johnny Walker, the comedian, and Vjantamala, the top female dancing star, a very attractive woman, who was chaperoned by her vigilant grandmother. The movie, Naya Daur, was about tonga wallas (horse-drawn taxis) competing against busses and other modern motored modes of transportation. To stay in business, the horsemen cut a road cross-country on which the buses couldn't go, which greatly reduced their traveling distance and allowed them to compete.

One of the few trips that brought my family to the center occurred during the filming. This provided the girls a chance to meet and have their picture taken with Dilip Kumar, their first encounter with a real-life India movie star. It was my first opportunity to observe how skillful the movie makers are at creating makeshift scenes and giving them an aura of authenticity. Interesting, the movie was shown twice fifteen years later in Nairobi, Kenya when we resided there and is even available today in video in New Delhi. "They made good films in those days, better than today's," commented the shop assistant as my daughter asked to his surprise thirty years later for a video copy to present me on my birthday.

Central India's Holy Water

To go anywhere south of Budni, the Narmada River had to be crossed by ferry. Sometimes a crudely made sail was hoisted to propel the craft, but more often it took the efforts of six men to pole the passengers across. When the water level was high, and the monsoon winds stronger, the ferry traversed the river on a diagonal course to maneuver the current. During the dry season, the river was at its lowest, and the boatmen could pole straight across with no problem. The town of Hoshangabad was spread along the opposite shores, and was the only nearby source of fresh vegetables. I made the trip weekly as a pedestrian to the market. I also crossed with the Jeep on numerous business trips, since the boat could accommodate a few vehicles at a time.

The Narmada is central India's major river, and is the only one that flows to the west coast. While not as well known as the Ganges or the Jumna, it is perhaps the holiest, said to have sprung from the body of Siva. To get the full spiritual benefits from these other rivers, one has to bathe, drink and make other uses of the water. But in respect to the Narmada, some say just to behold it is sufficient to meet all religious needs. Certainly the day-to-day human drama in the river and along its shores was and still can be fantastically interesting to an outsider. I often moved slowly and quietly along it, or sat on its shores to observe the importance it has as a place to worship, bathe, wash clothes, water and clean animals, cook and eat, even give birth. Funeral pyres were constantly constructed for cremation of the dead. During the monsoons, it was extremely difficult to keep the fires hot enough for a complete burning to ashes, and as a result, many bodies were thrown in the holy waters only partially cremated. River turtle then fed on the remains.

Cattle, buffalo, goats, and pigs showed as much delight as the people when relaxing in the river's shallows. Dozens of buffalo submersed themselves with only their glistening nostrils visible above the water. Chewing lazily on their cud, they seemed to challenge creation's design for relaxation. The grotesquely scarred trees along the eroded riverbanks housed thousands of flying foxes (big, fruit-eating bats). All day they hung by their feet, the epitome of serenity. Twilight triggered their instinct to take to the air. Literally blacking out the evening sky they made a series of sweeps up and down the river, scooping up water in midflight. Then they flapped away on their ribbed, leathery wings to feed on their favorite fruit of the season, to the dismay of many farmers. Dawn brought them back to compete for a perch as they rejoined the pace of river life.

The Holy River Boss

Among the more colorful characters I met during my seven plus years in India was Shrimati Dubai, the Narmada River Boss. A Hindu of about fifty years old, she probably would not live long enough to be as old as she looked. Her seemingly neutered appearance was most likely due to the brutality of the seasons, the strain of eking out a living along the river, and a poor diet. She ruled over the forty odd men who poled her flat-bottom ferry boat loaded with river traffic, tended her animals, and worked her plots of vegetables on the damp sands of the river's edge like the potter's widow of Kipling's Akbar Bridge. In spite of her being a bit shy with me, due mostly to her rudimentary English, which was light years ahead of my Hindi, we developed a very pleasant relationship. Our conversations ranged from vegetables to philosophy.

“Amereecans, I find, are quite good and nice people. I remember some of them well from the jungle warfare training center in WWII,” she said one day, as she tucked her sari around her bare, wrinkled midriff.

“We Americans believe in trying to make the world a better place to live.” I countered. The several times I talked with her, making the world a better place was the eventual direction of our discussion.

“That is a worthwhile goal for any civilization,” she began. “But some of us Hindus, and I have said this before, believe that the world is made up equally of good and evil. No matter how much we worry, how much energy or money we expend, man will only be able to shift the balance slightly. Say fifty-two percent good, forty-eight percent bad, and vice versa. If you consider the efforts of religion, human-made laws, regulations, people in prisons, police and the military and what little progress is made towards reducing wrong in the world, I think you will agree with me,” she asserted.

“I certainly hope that someday humans can upset the balance by more than two to four percentage points. You do make a strong argument for your assumption. Personally, I have a greater faith in humans to make right reign over wrong in the long run.”

“I am not sure how long we have to run. But humans are the reason. If they could ever overcome themselves, there may be some hope. Getting right that much ahead of wrong is a long way off. It is way beyond the horizon of your and my time, and the horizons of many generations after us.”

“Madam Dubai,” I interrupted, “let me change the subject to something more practical and close at hand. What would you say if I asked you to sell me one of those good-looking watermelons along the shore over there?”

Smiling, she said, “Mr. Jones, I wouldn’t dare think of selling you a melon. It would be my pleasure to give you one.” At the flick of her wrist one of her workmen had it there in a flash.

“I am grateful,” I said and I cupped my hands and held them across my chest in typical Indian fashion. “Madam, I have brought with me from America some vegetable seed. When I pass this way again, I’ll give you some of them to see how they do here in your garden.”

The seed was delivered. Some did well, carrots and melons especially. I made numerous safe trips across the river under Madam Dubai’s supervision. Whenever I waited for crossing or had tea with her under a tree on the riverbank, we exchanged simple day-to-day points of view from our vastly different beliefs, education, and experience. Needless to say, we never agreed one hundred per cent, but we always respected each other’s position.

The melon was crisp and sweet, truly a rare treat in my remote outpost, and valued for the spirit in which it was given.

The Freelance Photographer

The stranger climbed down from the horse-drawn tonga, fumbled through her cloth teas, and handed the driver the fare. His smile and the profusion of shukriyas indicated that the tin was more than adequate and much appreciated. Numerous cameras and attachments hung from her neck and shoulders, swinging with every move. Otherwise, she was traveling light, and wearing a washable skirt that flared below the knees, a good choice for India's humid wet season. Loosely fitting Indian sandals flapped as she walked. A little less than blonde, her complexion showed no semblance of melanin and suggested that it would turn red, blister and burn, rather than tan when exposed to India's strong tropical sun. Her facial expression was serious, with only a glimmer of a smile. She climbed the back steps of the pavilion where I had gone to wait after seeing the tonga drive up.

"You are Mr. Jones, I assume?" she said, dropping her bag to extend her hand. "I am Marilyn Silverstone, a freelance photographer."

"You're right, I'm Harold Jones. Welcome to Bhopal," I replied as we shook hands. "Come and meet Loretta and the girls." I took her bag and led her to the front portico.

"You're probably wondering why I'm here," she said as we walked.

"We have had a string of unannounced arrivals since being in Bhopal. Let me call the family together so you'll only have to explain your mission once."

Everyone gathered in our open-air living room to meet the new arrival and hear the purpose of her visit.

"I am a graduate of Vassar college, and I work in New York as a photojournalist. I am traveling in India in search of interesting material, and I thought an American family working in development would make a good story. The people at the Indian TCM mission headquarters in Delhi suggested your family in Bhopal as a potential subject for my photographic essay. That's about it, and here I am!" she declared.

"I'm not sure how typical we are, especially since we have all girls. How do you see the story you want unfolding? What do we do and how and what do you do?" I inquired.

"I observe whatever you and your family do from day to day, no matter what it is, and I'll simply keep my distance, take pictures, and make notes without disturbing or interfering in any way. That goes for family's activities as well as your work and leisure routine, Mr. Jones. I want to see some normal days in the life of the family without any change or preparation to accommodate me. I would like to hitch as many rides with you Mr. Jones, wherever you go, but the more you can forget I am here, the better." she explained.

"Sounds like a workable arrangement. We can provide comfortable living quarters here in Bhopal. At Budni it will be necessary to rough it a bit. There are already eight of us around the table here. Nine will not make much difference. You are welcome. At Budni I do my own cooking. If you are game for taking a chance, fine. I usually eat alone and it would be a pleasure to have company. There are lots of mosquitoes and mud. The wrenching daytime heat and humidity during this season can make things very sticky and heat rash is easy to come by. At the moment, my work schedule is split between Bhopal and Budni. Here in Bhopal I'm working with a local workshop to build a small grain thresher for use on small farms. It's a joint project by myself and a Ford Foundation agricultural engineer. Two to three days a week are spent at Budni. Luckily, you will not have to put up with my cooking for a full week! What happens during our time off we play by ear. Could be a tiger or a meat-gathering hunt, Saturday-night movie, or the circus now playing in town."

For the next ten days Marilyn was our shadow. She didn't say much to us. However, she talked to the local people who knew the family and/or worked with me. She was determined to keep up with me. At Budni in the fields she was sometimes in mud up to her ankles trying to keep her equipment in order and her sandals from being pulled from her feet by the sticky black cotton soil. What a far cry from moving about New York City, I thought.

With the added weight of her equipment, she once called for a push as she maneuvered to climb a tree up to a machan (platform) I had roped to a limb on a weekend tiger hunt. I was unable to shoot the tiger that had been troubling villagers, but the foray did expose her and her camera's lens to a close-up view of an isolated, poverty-stricken Indian village and its friendly people. Never grumbling, she went where I went. Though we discussed many issues during our off-duty routine, nothing was ever mentioned to indicate how she was doing or what she thought of the family activities or my work routine. We had not the slightest clue of what would come out of Marilyn's Bhopal adventure or what would happen to it all.

"I think I have a good view of your role in agricultural development in India and how your family copes with living here," Marilyn announced on her final day.

The girls saw to it that she did not get away without signing the family guest book. In the column labeled "Remarks" she wrote: "The sauce is Hal, and I look forward to seeing you all again. Thanks. After a round of embraces and best wishes, I drove our temporary shadow to the railroad station. Her impressions remained a mystery.

Slightly more than seven months passed before we had any word about Marilyn's efforts. We were pleasantly surprised when we received a big brown envelope containing the March 1960 issue of SIGN - The National Catholic Magazine, with my beleaguered face spread across the cover. Below the picture was the words: "Harold Jones American Abroad." The story within was entitled, "American In Action In India."

It was Marilyn's first magazine cover story and the magazine's first story on a Protestant. Following are excerpts from the article:

"Harold Jones, an agricultural technician from Virginia, is engaged in one of the major revolutions of our time: the struggle to make India capable of feeding itself before being overwhelmed by its soaring population. The task of building up an economy to support 415 million people is stupendous and needs the help of an army of technicians like Jones. He was sent to India three years ago by the Technical Co-operation Mission of the U.S. International Cooperation Administration (which has 3000 experts working in underdeveloped countries). Jones is a farm machinery advisor at an agricultural training center at Budni, where young men throughout India come for three-month courses. He teaches Indians how to irrigate land, drive a tractor, and even the use of such simple devices as a pitchfork and a plumb bob line for stringing fences. With a patience and gentleness that have endeared him to the surrounding community, Jones explains the principles of machinery so that students can apply what they have learned when they return home. ‘They need to get started,’ Jones says. ‘You get ‘em thinking, then they come up with some pretty good answers.’ Says a village elder, ‘Jones is the first man who has made people here like Americans.’ ”

The Joneses Mix With Indians

“Harold and Loretta Jones and their six daughters, ages seventeen to four, live in Bhopal in an old pavilion which has plenty of insects and no hot water. The training center is sixty miles away, and Jones is gone all week. He lives on canned food and game he shoots in the jungle; his prowess with a gun and fearlessness when wild animals are loose have boosted his prestige. His wife teaches their children, who are made to follow strict school hours, opening with the singing of the ‘Star-Spangled Banner’. The Joneses mix in the community life of Bhopal; they go to a weekly movie and visit with friends. Despite the frustrations frequently encountered on his job, Jones stays calm and accomplishes a collection of small things, and in the process he has learned a lot about the Indian character. He has a M.S. from Cornell, and would like a year to brush up in the U.S., then return to a foreign posting. ‘This is going to be my life.’ ”

Two years later I ran into Marilyn in New Delhi. She was residing in Bombay, doing photography and writing. I congratulated her on the fine Sign Magazine article and how much we appreciated it. As the Years went by we periodically came across her photos in Time, Coronet, and National Geographic magazines accompanying news stories out of India. Fifteen years later, I was standing in line behind a young lady at Barclays Bank in Nairobi, Kenya, and began a conversation. She was heading to the Seychelles Islands in the Indian Ocean off the coast of East Africa. She declared herself to be a freelance photographer, which prompted me to ask if she had ever heard of Marilyn Silverstone.

Enthusiastically she responded. “Indeed I have! In my profession, she’s considered the dean.” I told her how I had met Marilyn. “Marilyn, wherever you are, all the best.

Special Moments At Budni

Two Trophies- One Shot He was thin and looked like a boy in his teens. His wide-brimmed hat with its leopard skin band, safari jacket, back-pack and rifle gave him the appearance of a serious hunter despite his youth. As I watched him come up the road from my seat on the veranda, my curiosity rocketed. Who could he be? Where is he going. He looked western enough, American or European. But no one comes to Budni unless they are ordered, even then reluctantly. His pace slowed and he entered the gate of the training center.

“Good afternoon,” he said. “Could you tell as where I might find Mr. Harold Jones?”

“Good afternoon. I’m Harold Jones.”

“Good” he responded. “I’m Wilson Giles coming from Indonesia where my parents work with AID. I hitch-hiked from there to hunt here in India. The Embassy people in New Delhi told me that you would be the person to hook up with for tiger hunting.” He stepped onto the veranda with worn dusty boots.

“You must be a very brave young man to hitch-hike all the way from Indonesia to hunt.” I said in amazement. “Have a seat, put down your rifle and pack, and relax.”

“A cool drink of water would do more for me right now than anything I can think of,” he answered.

“My kerosene refrigerator has been functioning quite well today and I happen to have chilled some boiled water.” When he finished drinking, my cold water jug was very close to being empty. During India’s dry season when the temperature can reach to dehydrating 120 degrees fahrenheit a drink of water can mean the difference between life and death.

“You say you’ve come to hunt tiger?” I inquired.

“I’d like to get a tiger for a skin rug, and a trophy head of a cheetah, the Indian spotted deer. I would consider that a successful and a worthwhile hunt in India,” he declared.

“That’s a pretty a tall order,” I stated. “They’re both here in the jungle, though it might take some doing and a bit of good luck to get them. How much time you plan to spend here?”

“Several days if necessary,” he replied.

“You caught me at a very busy time. I won’t be able to be with you as much as I’d like, and I go home to Bhopal for the weekend tomorrow afternoon. I can show you some water holes where many animals go in the morning and late afternoon. With patience and a good hideaway, you may have some luck. In fact, this may be the best time to show you a spot where you could sit until twilight. What do you think?”

“I’ll have to depend on your judgement. I know nothing about the area.” he admitted. The area I had in mind for him was only five to ten minutes away by Jeep. We loaded his gear and took off, driving over several dry stream beds and nest heavy bamboo groves. Then we parked the Jeep and took a three minute walk to the water hole. A bamboo cluster nearby provided seclusion to Wilson and his rifle. I gave him some tips on positioning himself for a good view of the most likely approach to the waterhole.

“I’ll return early evening,” I assured him. “Good luck!” Not knowing anything about the young man’s woodmanship, his ability to handle his gun or to deal with a dangerous wild animal, I was quite worried. I had accommodated him, and now I felt responsible.

Signs of twilight signaled that it was time to check on Wilson and retrieve him from the jungle. As I headed down the straight stretch of road from the training center, a figure appeared in the distance carrying an extra load. First to come into view were the antlers of a deer. The figure had a pouch tied to a pole across his shoulder and rifle in hand. As I came closer, I could see it was Wilson with a smile on his face bigger than all outdoors.

“Say, tell me what happened. What is it you have there?” I asked.

As he dropped his bundle to the ground, I could see a tiger skin and the deer antlers, but I thought I had to be seeing things. It couldn't possibly be what it seemed.

“It was a miracle! Twenty minutes after you left me, I heard this crashing noise that sent my heart racing like never before. I grabbed my binoculars and I could see a tiger dragging an antlered animal towards the water hole. Eventually it reached the edge, released the dead deer and took a broadside stance, giving me a perfect target. I slowly took aim and squeezed the trigger. The tiger leant a few times and fell flat on the ground. What was I to do? Was the tiger really dead? Should I shoot him again? Or dare I venture from my bamboo hideout? All these questions crowded my mind, but I had no answers. I was paralyzed. I did nothing but sit there, trying to calm down. Ten minutes passed before I crept slowly toward the tiger, with my rifle half up for a quick shot if necessary. There was no sign of breath or movement, so I picked up a stick, tossed it at the tiger. No response. I nervously moved close enough to see that it was a tigress and the shot had been fatal. She lay in a puddle of blood. At last I felt safe, though I hoped that a mate would not show up. The deer she had been dragging, as you can see is a cheetah with a good trophy head. I immediately went to work to skin out both of my trophies. I don't know how to thank you for putting as in the right spot. But I still find it too fantastic to believe. A few thousand miles of hitchhiking and one single rifle shot to get the two trophies I have so longed for. I am still on cloud nine!”

“We'd better get back to my place. You need to salt those skins and place them in the shade to dry out. Luck and fate certainly figured in what you accomplished today. This might well be one for the books!” His backpack sleeping gear got him through the night. Wilson rode with me back to Bhopal the next day when I went home for the week end. We packed his salted skins in a bundle attached to a handle for easier carrying. I took him to the Bhopal railroad station for a night departure to New Delhi. I never heard from him again.

The King's Tiger In the midst of feeling exhilarated about how well things were going, though not without difficulties, the center's clerk handed me a letter in an official government envelope from the Conservator of Forests, Government of Madhya Pradesh, Bhopal. What had I done to warrant mail from the state government? Consternation came over me like an avalanche. The letter read, “Sir Jones. It has come to our attention that you have shot a tiger in the Budni area that we had demarcated for the King of Nepal. He is to come there [no date indicated], as a guest of the Nawab.” My anxiety heightened as I continued to read. “You did not have permission to shoot a tiger, nor had you purchased a hunting block. We shall have much difficulty keeping our promise to the king. We would appreciate hearing from you. Sincerely, Chief Conservator of Forests.”

I replied with the following letter: “Please accept my apology for killing the tiger demarcated for the King of Nepal. One day a villager came to the center and pleaded with me to shoot a tiger which had just killed one of his bullocks. He had gone into the forest to collect wood, leaving his bullocks out to graze and returned to find one of them dead. He was afraid that the tiger would come and kill his other bullock. I returned with him to the site, found the tiger eating his kill and shot him. I thought I was doing a good deed for a person who depended so much on his bullocks to make a living for himself and his family. If I have done something wrong, please again accept my apologies and I am willing to make amends financially or otherwise or by any measure you wish to impose. In regard to the king's tiger, before I shot it, two other large tigers were walking up to share the kill. They ran away when I shot the one eating the dead bullock. I would be glad to assist you or your personnel by showing them the territory which the tigers prowl, where they drink and so on. Sincerely, Harold M. Jones."

When I returned to Bhopal that weekend, I called upon the conservator. He was a kind, courteous, middle-aged man from South India. We had tea and I assured him that I could put the king and his assistants in proximity of the tigers. The conservator expressed his appreciation for my coming by to see him and my honest response to his letter and willingness to assist, when the king came to Budni. The king never came.

The Cobra Freeze Nawal Kishore was a shy mechanic-driver assigned to the Budni center. Dedicated and loyal to his job, he exuded a quiet contentedness. His smile always seemed to maintain the same intensity, even when he looked at you out of the corner of his eye. I had never seen his wife, but I knew where they lived. Their a-roof, one-room spread was small but not uncommon for the artisans assigned to Budni.

The pre-monsoon rains had come to the Budni area in sufficient quantities to give a wake-up call to many of the creatures which go into a partial hibernation during the brutal death-dealing dry season. The amphibious types, such as snakes, beetles, and flying termites are the more notable of these groups. No less bothersome are the scorpions, both black and white. This is the time of the year when extra precautions are taken against the potentially lethal inflictions from some of these creatures. While the rains offer some relief from the devastating heat, it also brings the nuisance of the crawling, hopping, and flying creatures. One sometimes wonders if the trade-off is worth it, but that is the way it is in monsoon country.

The welcome breezes stirred my mosquito net most of the night, making for much more comfortable sleeping than the restless nights of the dry season. In the midst the soundest sleep I had ever had in India came a banging at my loose wooden door.

"Who is it?" I yelled out.

"I am Nasal Kishore. I have much trouble. Could you help me?"

I eased out from under my mosquito net, and released the latch off the door. No night could be darker, for there was not the smallest light in the area.

"Nawal, what is the problem?" I asked.

"My wife attack by cobra. She sleep on bed and wake up and see cobra standing high and waving back and forth," he said, moving his hands in imitation. "My wife go out of sense, stiff like a piece of wood. I slip out without hitting cobra. He might bite her if I hit at him. I come to ask you to shoot the cobra. Quick, he may kill my wife!”

“You think he is still there?” I inquired.

“Yes,” he excitedly confirmed.

I quickly slipped on a shirt, shorts and shoes, grabbed my twenty gauge shotgun from the corner and a shell from the nearby table. I followed Nawal through the darkness, a few hundred yards over to his place at the edge of the woods. The door was open. A nearly burned-out candle glowed faintly from a table in the middle of the room, illuminating the frozen form of his wife on the bed. The cobra was there still in striking position over her. I moved slowly along the wall, reaching an angle that would allow me to fire without hitting his wife. Though a bit excited, I was confident that a scattered shotgun blast would do the job. I flipped off the safety latch and fired from the hip. In the close quarters, the blast sounded like a major explosion. The cobra slumped on the floor like a limp rose and remained motionless. Nawal’s wife didn’t budge. I picked up the candle and moved over to investigate. The blast had cut off the cobra’s head as clean as the swipe of a sword. Yet there was a large clean hole in the wall beyond where the snake had been. What had happened? a number six shot would not blast that kind of hole. Then the realization hit me. I had by mistake picked up a slug instead of a shot-loaded shell. Both were side by side on the table near my bed. This accounted for the big hole in the wall. It was by pure accident that I had decapitated the cobra shooting from the hip. But all had ended well. However, the sound of the blast had not brought Nawal’s wife out of her trance. Nawal shook her a few times and she slowly gained consciousness. The trance most likely saved her life for had she moved, it is likely that the cobra would have struck. In India it is said that a cobra can kill by biting a person’s shadow. I trudged back to my quarters in the dark feeling a bit heroic.

The next day I happened to go to an all-girls school to talk to the lady principal about establishing a school garden. During our conversation, I related the previous night’s experience feeling quite sure she would say something like: “You are a brave man, Mr. Jones. That was a good deed.” But instead, she took all the wind out of my sails and left me feeling flatter than a runny pancake when she responded: “What a pity! Who would want to shoot something as beautiful as a cobra?” She was Hindu. By my standards, and I am sure Nawal’s and his wife’s, it was a good deed.

Wild dog heat The wild dogs of India, known as Sona Kutta (sold dog), is an excellent example of canine beauty and ferocity. Golden chestnut in color, with a bushy black-tipped tail, it is one of the most interesting animals of the tussle. Its very high intelligence and the communal organization of the pack, places the wild dog on a different plane than other animals. They travel in packs of six to two dozen, and they normally weigh anywhere from thirty to forty pounds each. Unlike other carnivores, they sought in India their food during the daylight hours. The tranquility of the jungle was frequently disturbed by these roving canines. They caused unrest among the other denizens seeking food and rest, forcing them to seek new territory. The tiger and more formidable animals were no exception. The local people told me stories of tigers being killed by the highly efficient wild dog packs. Their gang action seemed to disregard all recognized animal customs of the jungle and theirs could be looked upon as being the Huns of the woodlands. The slow, remorseless hunt of a pack of wild dogs in the heat of the day is no comparison to the sudden spring of a tiger or leopard and the quick death that follows. I had heard no stories of them attacking humans, but they certainly were given credit for boldness in their presence. They seemed to regard human as a curiosity upon encounter, and then move on to their lawless pursuits. I had seen some pairs at various times in the jungle. They appeared calm and curious, and no doubt viewed me as something new, different and ugly enough to warrant closer study. Standing on the opposite side of a dry, sandy stream bed, I watched two leap in the air and just miss a peacock as its fast beating wings clawed at the air to lift itself out of their reach by a hair, as they calmly watched it fly away. I took aim with my rifle and just nicked one of them. They dashed away in the jungle, the slightly injured one whining.

Once about noontime, I walked along a meandering streambed. It was laced with frequent waterholes. Rounding a bend, I heard what seemed to be the brutal images to flash through my mind. Was I to end up as wild dog meat? Instinctively, I raised my 30-06, and started firing as I turned in a full circle. The first shot was aimed at the dog crouching in front. Then I swung clockwise while sparks and ricocheting bullets spewed into the night, as I emptied the magazine. Judging from the squeal-like noise of the dogs as they vanished in the twilight, at least two had been hit. Hit or not was unimportant: just the fact that they had run away was a welcome relief. I had escaped the flesh tearing teeth of these vicious creatures. It was truly one of the big scares of my years, including WWII maneuvers. I spent no more time getting away from there than the dogs had. A quarter-mile walk up the main road to the center save me a chance to calm down. Some of the staff had gathered, wondering about all the shooting, and were amazed that I had survived. The local villagers must have thought that the jungle warfare center had been reactivated for its original purpose.

Finish At Budni

The training and testing center had began to take its place in the gigantic effort to feed India's burgeoning bio-mass. Personnel changes had been smooth and without negative impact. Mr. P. John Zachariah had replaced Mr. E.G.K. Rao as director. Mr. M.L. Taneja, chief instructor, had transferred to the Rice Research Station at Cuttock to do research on farm machinery applications for rice growing. I had visited him there on two occasions. Other than a few changes in instructors, the original staff was still intact.

The center was a relatively small but a significant link in the multiple-imitative attack India was taking against its food production-import dependency gap. Coming from the USA alone were sixteen million ton of wheat and one million tons of rice requiring 600 ships, the largest assemblage since WWII, to help India weather its food shortage. For more than two years 60 million Indians were sustained entirely by American food shipments. The center was setting the pace for determining the most suitable agricultural hand, animal and engine powered machinery and equipment for India. The chief objective of the center was to train a corps of personnel to handle equipment importation, determine the most suitable types for India to manufacture, and set up distribution, operation and maintenance centers. Simultaneously with massive amounts of development assistance, India was building hydro-electric dams for electric power and irrigation, steel mills, fertilizer factories. AID and the Rockefeller and Ford Foundations were extensively involved in India's educational, research and extension institutions. The plan was that all of these forces would conjoin to impact on the country's food deficit problems.

The major attitude gap between knowledge and know-how as well as show-how, due to attitudes, was beginning to close, because of hands-on approach being taken on many fronts. At the Budni center we had emphasized this approach from the beginning. In the highly applied science of agriculture, where the generation and application of technology is essential to increased production, know-how is a must. I encountered many educators who taught only theory and did not engage themselves in manual activities because of their place in India's social ladder. However, my esteem for physical action and the ability to demonstrate the application of knowledge did more to win local respect than anything else. India's training methods, in a sense, had short-changed its students in both attitudes and skills needed to apply knowledge in a practical sense. To some extent this was a trait acquired from the colonial education system. In our approach, of making the best use of what you have was often stressed and demonstrated. Several water pumps had come with the U.S. financed equipment, but had never been used. The reason given was that no pipes were available, and no currency to purchase them. However, there were lots of pipes left over in the jungle from WWII days, but still connected. I demonstrated how they could be disconnected and used to deliver pumped water from a nearby stream, which grew into an excellent small irrigation training model. To induce more lively participation from students in the classroom I suggested classroom conversation to discuss problems and selection of the best solutions to fit. While the training program had progressed very well and the effect was spreading in most states through better design, maintenance, and utilization of both mechanized and bullock drawn equipment, the testing program had lagged. The staff was now in a good position to begin a testing program having had extensive experience handling various types of farm machinery and assisting small manufacturers with design of improved models. The Indian government would not or could not provide the finance necessary to procure basic testing equipment. I had spoken to several British persons about the situation. They put me in touch with their organization that provides technical assistance. The necessary paperwork was completed and submitted through the Ministry of Agriculture and the $20,000 grant for testing equipment was approved just prior to my departure from Budni.

With supportive policy and marketing systems in place, the many development efforts across the country eventually came together and brought dramatic food production increases. But India for a long time will be faced with the formidable task of keeping pace with its enormous population growth. Budni became the model for three other centers. The government of India established later in the south, north, and Assam.

Saying Goodbye To Budni

Presentations, including a bust of Mahatma Ghandi were made to me during an elaborate going-away reception. The following poem was read to close out the party .

AU REVOIR Mr. JONES
Adieu, Jones adieu.
You are separating from us today
Even though you are leaving this Centre,
We will remember you forever,

We believe that you will not forget us,
It's due to your hard labor at this Centre,
Every second of your stay,
You have laboured for the benefit of the Centre.
You never worried whether it was day or night,
But it's a fact that you were completely immersed in it,
The job was hard but you managed it.
You have upheld the name of your country,
You faced everybody with a smiling face.
With no wrinkles on your forehead, with simpleness, good manners and a clear heart.
Anybody who met you once,
Has always heard you in obedience.
This is all due to your good manners,
We used to talk to you frankly,
We were proud of your friendship,
You never had the feeling of a boss.
Respect for you comes foremost in our minds,
Love for you in the heart of everybody,
We pray that you should be happy and prosperous in life
And earn a good name wherever you go.
All friends are telling me,
Who will give us shikar meat when Mr. Jones goes away?

Hunting

The country life is to be preferred for where we see the works of God, but in the cities little else but the works of man, and one makes a better subject for our contemplation.- Reflections and Maxims of William Penn.

Hunting wild game in the forest was one of the ways Native Americans obtained food along the James and Chickahominy Rivers, home of the Chickahominy Indians for many centuries. I grew up near those rivers, in Charles City County, Virginia, and was a product of a heritage that included customs and traditions of primal survival passed from generation to generation. The custom of supplementing the diet with wild meat was an integral part of my community, especially during the depression years. Acquiring food involved agriculture, hunting, and fishing, all requiring much preparation. Children and adults grew vegetables, planted field crops, raised farm animals, and regularly gathered nuts, berries and fruits from the forests. Food preparation included pickling, salting, smoking, preserves, jams, and drying for the winter.

Of all my family chores, pursuing small animals in the nearby forests, fields and streams fueled my interest and adventurous nature. Known widely for my love of the forest and my keen desire to learn all about the animals that it sheltered, I eventually acquired the nickname "Nature Boy." At an early age I knew the names and habits of all the birds in the area. I could identify them on sight, by their call, song and flight patterns as far as I could see them, their nest design and egg shell colors. My journeys into the forest began at an early age and increased in stages.

In stage one, using a sling shot or gravel shooter, I chased birds and later, squirrels and rabbits. Ammunition was small rocks propelled by stretched rubber bands, cut from old inner tubes. At close range, my good eye-hand coordination resulted in a bird, squirrel, or less often a rabbit as a relished game dish for a night's dinner.

Stage two consisted of forays into the forest accompanied by ours and the neighbor's dogs. Before school, often in the pitch dark of frosty mornings, a couple of whistles and yells summoned six or eight of them for a rabbit chase, and they sometimes succeeded in cornering one in a hollow tree or a hole in the ground. I would then recover the animal by either tightly poking into the hollow of a tree twisting it into the rabbit's fur and dragging it from the hollow tree or by pushing leaves into the hole and setting fire to them generating smoke to render the animal unconscious making it easier to retrieve it.

Stage three started at the age of fourteen and involved the use of a single shot 12-gauge shotgun and hunting dogs. I first fired this gun at a squirrel's nest, resulting in a blasted nest, a busted bleeding under lip whose scar I bear today and no squirrel. My yearly hunting years were during the depression when to shoot and not hit your target was considered wasteful. Obtaining extra shells required some extra hustling on my parents part for the vice was six shells for 25 cents. "How many pieces of game did you bring home and how many shells do you have left?" was often the first question my parents asked. As the years passed, the skill and accuracy with which I handled the gun brought me quite a reputation and the many hours I spent hunting substantially boosted the family food supply with minimal ammunition being wasted. Easing the family hunger pangs was high priority.

As the depression eased and I entered adulthood, hunting became less of a means of survival and more of a sport, a way of staging intimate with nature and learning about the wild creatures that shared it. Any gustatory delights from hunting was now a bonus for my family and later my own family.

Nearly four decades after my first hunt, my own family of eight and I found ourselves in the heart of India, in the midst of vegetarians. For hundreds of years millions of Hindus and Buddhists held religious beliefs that forbade meat consumption. The Hindu's belief in the sanctity of life prevented them from killing even the tiniest living creatures. "We are not able to give life, so we have no right to take a life, they declared." Most Hindus and Buddhists are teetotalers and did not eat animals or their products, like eggs, milk, or cheese. The minority that do eat animal products rationalize their behavior by saying this in no way had anything to do with taking a life. My family and I had never known any vegetarians nor, before going to India, nor had we discussed the topic. While we realized some adjustments in our way of life would be necessary we were not prepared to change our omnivorous eating habits. and I realized that hunting would be the only means of providing a fresh, safe supply of meat for the family. Our family division of labor made it my responsibility to harvest, dress and package the meat for the freezer, an appliance for which we were most grateful. Without it we might have been forced to become vegetarians. This situation took us back to the days of yore when husbands hunted and brought home the meat, while wives kept homelife intact and harvested vegetables and grains.

Fortunately, we were living in a Moslem dominated community which was less sensitive to meat consumption than Hindus. The Moslems hunted and ate wild and domestic animals. Their only prerequisite for eating meat was the execution of halal, a spiritual ritual performed at the time of killing the animal. This ritual originated in the days of Mohammed when numerous people unknowingly ate decaying or spoiled meat and died. The throat of the animal is slit and while the blood flows a prayer is said to make the meat edible. Halal can be performed by any Moslem. Rafiq, our Moslem driver made sure he performed the ritual on all the animals I shot. The meat could then be shared with his family and friends. Rafiq showed great disappointment if no blood flowed when he cut the animals throat. He only needed to see a few drops as he prayed. However, this ritual was never performed on a wild boar because Moslems have a strong religious aversion to pork and any of its by-products. We respected this religious tenant when sharing meals with them.

In modern India, the prestige of hunting reached its peak during British rule. The princely rulers--maharajahs and nawabs--considered it the cream of all worldly sports. Many rulers maintained that hunting was the exclusive right of royalty. Non-royalty could only shoot a tiger with the consent of the Begum or Nawab in Bhopal, one of the Moslem principalities was for many years a hunting reserve for the Nawab of Bhopal and his guests. It was frequently said that the only activity that rivaled hunting was in the harem where both concubines and wives were trained to be demure and permissive.

Many rulers had an elaborate organization for hunting with distinct divisions of labor, often involving several hundred people. One told me, "I don't mind roughing it but I do appreciate a few comforts on shikaris [hunting trios]." Special crews set up and operated camps, serving alcoholic and non-alcoholic drinks, and elaborately prepared food, eaten on fine china. Portable showers and plush pillowed sofas and chairs were provided. Gun bearers transported and maintained expensive ammunition and hi-powered weapons which were kept loaded and ready at all times.

Royalty had several favorite hunting methods designed for minimal risk and effort. In one method elephants were used to transport supplies and people. From a howdah, a roomy box on the backs of elephants, hunters often shot tigers. Forming semi-circular arcs across an area of the jungle that contained a tiger, the servants screamed and beat drums to drive the tiger and other animals into the hunter's shooting range. Assistants on elephants would sometimes help to herd tigers in the desired direction.

Another favorite technique for hunting tigers involved a machan, an elaborate timber platform constructed in a tree or on the ground to provide comfort and safety while the hunter waited for the game to appear. Meanwhile the party would sip a beverage or eat if the wait was long.

The method for night hunts used either a live buffalo or goat as bait which was tied to a tree and affixed with a bell to alert the hunter who might be dozing in the machan. Flashlights were often attached to the rifle or someone in the machan focused a spotlight when the game arrived to claim the bait.

World War II technology Produced the Jeep, a blessing and a curse. This vehicle allowed men to Penetrate more easily the jungle interior and wildlife's habitats, thus beginning the decimation of the big wildcat populations and the many species on which they depended for survival. Prior to WWII the footmobile and domestic animals were the only means of transportation into the deep jungles, limiting man's access to its wild life areas. The advent of the Jeep made wildlife the losers in the competition with humans for land. In addition, malaria control programs involving the cutting of vegetation contributed to the reduction of wildlife. New lands were opened, cutting deeper into game areas.

Reportedly, our Nawab of Bhopal had a 200-man hunting staff--drivers, spotters, beaters, bearers, campsite crew, and machan builders. He replaced his elephants with Jeeps and shot thousands of animals of all kinds---predators, hoofed types and a great variety of fowl. His palace and country home contained massive trophy displays of all kinds--skins, horns, heads, rugs and whole mounts. On one of his birthdays, during the height of his rule, so I was told he set out to establish a record for the largest number of tigers killed in one day. To be number one, he had to surpass the record of ten bagged tigers held by one maharajah. Men scattered over Bhopal's countryside to spot the animals, and to plan a strategy for driving them in record time within shooting range of the Nawab. Elaborate machans were constructed all over the state and the entire population rallied behind their leader to make him a national champion. On the eventful day, the Nawab moved hastily from kill to kill, but at the day's end the maharajah's record was still intact: the Nawab had killed only eight Bengal tigers.

Many of the Indian royalty had killed hundreds o tigers during their hunting careers. It as estimated by one British naturalist. E.P. Gee that there might have been 40,000 tigers in India in the early twentieth century. A maharajah of Gwailor, often mentioned as a great hunter and is credited with more than 700 tiger kills. The ruler of Guaripur shot more than 500 in his grand home time. But apparently the grand home of them all was the maharajah of Surguja, who was still living when we resided in India and was said to have killed over 1100 tigers. The British colonists also did their share in reducing the wild cat species of this sub-continent. One colonist bagged approximately 300 tigers during his civil service tenure of 25 years: another shot 173 in one year. Yet another is said to have poisoned a great number during his time. Villagers, over time, particularly during the middle of the 19th century, killed a few thousand tigers and leopards. The famed Jim Corbett, British game hunter and author, warned in 1946, ten years before our arrival that only 3000 to 4000 tigers were left in India. A more accurate count in 1969 put the number at 2500 and declining.

When India became independent from Britain in 1947, the princely rulers lost their absolute power over vast portions of the country to newly established central and state governments. Hunting privileges fell within the public domain and open access to the princely hunting estates resulted in unmitigated slaughter of wild life--tigers, leopards, and their prey. Anyone with means could hunt and collect animals from the jungles and plains. At the time of a hunting block purchase, the government forest departments authorized specific limited number and kind of animals which one could take from a block area within a specific time frame. However, there was no policing or other follow-up controls, and people exceeded the established limits. At the same time, guns became readily available and people shot wild animals for crop protection or coached. Commercial hunting firms were established to cater to the romantic side of the sport for wealthy globe-trotting foreigners who came to India for big game trophies, especially Bengal tigers and leopards. Some of the hunters pursued the heads of buffaloes and the royal antlered deer like the sambhar, barasinga and cheetal. These firms were contracted to place the game within killing range for about $6000 for a two week stay. Although the companies usually fulfilled their obligation, the hunters were not always successful.

Our stay in India offered me my first sustained foray into the arena of big game hunting, naturally without the background of royalty, prestige, renown or the big capital means. Nothing spoke the truth more clearly about my economic situation than my weapons—a 20-gauge shot gun and a fifty year old World War I vintage 30-06 Springfield rifle. These meager weapons solicited serious warnings from the big game experts regarding their inadequacy against big game, especially tigers. Additional advice came from the modular book of hunter Jim Corbett. His stranger than fiction books included Jungle Lore, Man-Eater of Kumaon and The Temple Tiger. Friends had given me these three books with advice that I should do some serious reading before I attempted big game hunting. The books are quite scary and after reading a few chapters I put them aside and decided to learn from my own hunting experiences, and not clutter up my mind with the fear these books had generated. After some blood-curdling experiences where only my guardian angel made the difference between my still being alive and not being mauled or killed by a tiger. I read all of Corbett's works, with a clearer understanding, but with no less excitement. If I had to do it over, I would read all of Corbett's books before attempting big game hunting. However, I did bring to India considerable woods lore, a keen eye and some adroitness in handling my ancient weapons, boundless energy, and a love for the great outdoors. I had a keen desire to broaden my horizons of jungle lore, to obtain some trophies, and to provide a dependable supply of fresh safe meat for a family. In addition, I helped the villagers, when requested by killing crop-destroying wild pigs herds, antelopes, cattle and man-eating tigers and leopards that threatened their livelihood or themselves.

A sixty mile trek separated my work place, Budni, from my family in Bhopal. For four years on every holiday (Indian and American) and weekends, I made this trek, leaving Budni on Friday evening and returning on Monday morning. Thirty of those miles were through dense uncle home to a game and varied population of wildlife. These early morning and evening trips provided me with the opportunity to see and bag a variety of wild animals, including five species of antelopes and deer ranging from twenty five pounds to several hundred. One of the main differences between the deer and the antelope is the shedding of the horns. Male deer shed their horns annually while the antelope never shed theirs. Female antelope often have horns less developed than the male, but female deer have none. The quality and taste of their meat is very similar but without the strong gamey taste of their North American counterparts. On my trips I often saw and killed many different kinds of fowl—green pigeons, partridges, spur fowl, wild peacocks, and ducks. Some of which I usually consumed during the days of the week I was a bachelor. For our entire four and a half year stay in Central India, all the meat for the family's supply and guests, which was considerable, was generally bagged on Friday evening or on the eve of holidays as I trekked from Budni to Bhopal. For Thanksgiving dinners the piece de resistance was peacock instead of turkey. Peacock breast was certainly no competition for the plumb breast of butterball turkeys but its light and dark meat is quite tasty. The peacock had not yet been declared India's national bird. Our freezer was always stocked with fresh game meat including wild boar. A few 200 to 300 pounders of wild boar per year gave us a chance to prepare our own variety of sausage, souse, and choice pork cuts.

The Cattle Killing Tiger That Came Early

Early one Saturday morning during the dry season, two villagers clad only in dhotis (a loin cloth pulled tightly up between one's crotches and tucked into one's waist, giving the appearance of baggy-legged mid-calf pants and worn by Hindu men) and turbans of soiled cotton, squatted on their wrinkled, spindly legs on the back steps of our pavilion. They quietly proceeded to remove their stiff mud-hardened shoes in order to clean dry between their toes with their fingers. When they recognized that someone was standing above them they quickly stood, bowed, and with hands together greeted me with "Namaste Sahib."

"Namaste" I replied raising both hands together in front of me. "Qap-kaa Naam Kyaa hat" (What is your name?)

"Mera nam Suni Lal," one said, while the other said. "Mujhee Amrit Kehtee hai." (They call me Amrit.)

Greetings over, the villagers launched into an excited barrage of Hind. Despite my language limitations, I knew they were talking about a tiger. Fortunately, Rafiq was around the other side of the building removing a week's supply of dirt and grime from the green Jeep station wagon. I stuck my head around the corner of the building, and called for him to come. He dropped his wet rags and joined us.

"These two villagers have been telling me something about a tiger. Can you talk with them and tell me what they are saying?" I asked.

Rafiq conversed with them for a while and then turned back to me.

"They have heard that you have a gun and ask if you can come to their village to shoot a tiger that has been hounding them for several months. It has killed over thirty of the cattle in a three-villages area and the people are afraid to leave their homes. The tiger sometimes comes late in the afternoon, and sits in the middle of the road leading to the village to wallow and plays in the dust. This prevents the people from bringing their herds of sheep, goats and cattle in from the fields. Bullock carts returning from the market and women carrying wood and water to their homes have to walk long distances to avoid the tiger. Some farmers have lost one or two of their bullocks, and can't afford to replace them. They say the tiger comes to a water hole around 2:00 P.M everyday."

Through Rafiq, I told the villagers that I was going next door to speak to another sahib, who had a gun, and ask him to join us at their village to learn more about the tiger's habits. I rushed next door to Andy Renshaw's house. He was admiring the lake from his front verandah. As I told him the villager's story, his enthusiasm flared like an oil well on fire. Earlier in the week someone had told him about the same tiger and he had intended coming to relate me the same thing.

“If we can, it would be good to help restore normalcy to those villagers’ lives.” Andy noted.

“A trophy with a good cause attached to it, wouldn’t be bad either,” I nodded.

We loaded our guns and canteens into the Jeep, and with our drivers, Rafiq and Majid, and the two villagers, we drove through Bhopal and headed east for the village, approximately five miles away. The dry season’s sun, which felt like an acetylene torch, was heating up the dusty dry air. Soon we turned off the main road onto a narrow rutted, bullock cart trail. The Jeep created billowy dust clouds as it bounced slowly along, rendering the rear view mirror useless. The fine dust particles seeped through every crack and crevice of the Jeep, turning its interior into a veritable dust bin. Shrub bush, some palmetto-looking plants, with needle sharp points, and occasional large trees lined the left side of the trail. Open farm and grazing lands were on the right. As we slowly drove along, one of the villagers excitedly pointed out the direction of the tiger’s lair. All heads turned to look. Just ahead slightly off the right was their village, and we were spared further suffocation by dust.

Our arrival at the poverty stricken-village was an event. Children, many naked, suffering from diarrhea, and batting flies swarming around their infected eyes, instantly surrounded the Jeep, making it difficult to disembark. Men and women stood close by chatting among themselves but with their eyes riveted on us. One of the village elders gave a command and the crowds withdrew slightly, giving us a bit of room to maneuver. Our first obligation was to pay our respects to the village’s headman. Under the only big shade tree, we were officially greeted, and thanked for coming to help them. As we listened to the headbands version of the situation, the elders periodically signaled the crowd to maintain some distance. Some backed away. Rafiq interpreted the headman’s story. Their great fear was that the tiger would become a man-eater. He had killed 36 cattle in the three village area. Village life had been badly interrupted--people would not take their herds of animals to graze, collect wood or fetch water. At the end of the story, we were offered tea, which we diplomatically declined because we needed the time to study the tiger’s movements and plan our strategy for killing him at the water hole later that afternoon. We promised to celebrate after we had successfully eliminated the tiger. The village headman agreed to allow two men who knew the area to accompany us into the jungle. The six of us, Rafiq, Majid, Andy, two villagers and I-- in single file with one villager leading the way walked slowly into the jungle towards the waterhole. The breezeless 100 degree air under the canopy of jungle brush and trees began to take its toll. Perspiration began to drip from under our pith helmets, and wet spots began to appear on our khaki shirts. We made our way slowly until the leading villager held up his hand and said, “Mullah” (ditch). We had come to a large dry stream bed cut six to seven feet deep by repeated monsoon rains. Slowly we climbed down the embankment on to the trampled sandbed. The lead man spoke again, “Pani,”(water) as he pointed downstream. Quietly and uneasily we inched along Suddenly the lead man stopped and pointed to a waterhole.

“This is the water hole? I don’t see any water,” I complained disappointedly.

The villager kept pointing to the hole as we gathered around him. Nothing could be closer to being a non-waterhole. In a small, sandy depression about the size of a water pail, was less than a gallon of water beneath a thick coating of green algae. I couldn’t believe we were at the right spot. Rafiq questioned the villager, who continued to affirm that this was where the tiger comes. Andy and I looked at each other and worried that this could be a “wild goose chase.” Had the villagers told us what they thought we wanted to hear? As despondency enveloped us, one of the villagers who had stepped a few yards away started yelling, “Skier! Sher!” (Tiger! Tiger!) He had discovered two pug marks of a very large tiger near the edge of the streambed where the sand was undisturbed. Excitement took hold! It was difficult to imagine that any self-respecting tiger would come to a near non-water hole to drink, but obviously the tracks indicated that he had been there. But when and why?. Perhaps he had no other option. It was deep in the dry season and our face water everywhere was very scarce.

Andy and I needed to select trees overlooking the minuscule waterhole, where we could wait safely later in the afternoon to see if the tiger would appear. I walked upstream, checking each tree for ease of climbing and a sturdy limb where the tree trunk could provide a good back rest. Andy walked in the opposite direction looking for the same kind of perch. I spied a low-branched tree that showed considerable promise, though it wasn't entirely safe from a tiger's leap. I struggled up the right bank of the nullah. With my trusty 30-06 I climbed the tree until I located a limb that offered an ideal seat. After a lot of twisting and turning, my backside meshed perfectly with the limb and trunk, and I decided that this would be my lookout that afternoon. I was not sure where Andy had gone, but the rest of the group had climbed the opposite stream bank, and all were relaxing behind a big tree. I could hear them mumbling. Very comfortably situated, I glanced at my watch. It was 10:30 AM. Out of nowhere shocking as a nightmare, came a huge Bengal tiger moving through the bush as quietly and softly as the sun rays. It was only about forty feet away. Tiger fever hit like a bolt of lightning. My heart pounded loudly and rapidly, and throbbing pains shot through my kidneys. I had absolutely no power of recall of any previous experience to deal momentarily with this first instant shock. The tiger standing on the opposite bank was about fifty feet from the others crouching behind the big tree. It gave the false appearance of looking me square in the eyes. As it approached the bank's edge it slowed its gait, carefully looking right and left. Time seemed like an eternity - longer than a life time. Now the tiger was only 25 feet away and staring in my direction without blinking. I was sure that at any moment it would actually focus on me then dash into the jungle out of fright. Instead it lowered his head and slowly started down the embankment, carefully surveying the landscape. With its head lowered, his eyes were no longer aimed at me, but I still felt the blood-curdling tension of the moment as my heart raced and my body froze. As if stalking something, it stopped several times before finally reaching the streambed. It inched slowly and gracefully towards the water hole, then made a 45-degree turn which gave me a broadside view. With barely enough presence of mind I eased my rifle to my shoulder, making sure the loose leaf sight was pushed into alignment with the front sight. I aimed at his front shoulder and squeezed the trigger, shattering the jungle silence. The tiger leaped high into the air, fell back on the sand, danced momentarily, and began to bite on its hind legs before finally giving up life. I was never more astounded. Shouts came from the jungle and from Andy who was down stream

“What happened, did your gun go off accidentally?” Andy yelled.

“The tiger came, I shot him! He is lying here on the sand,” I yelled.

“Are you sure?” Andy shouted.

“I am sure, he is lying here in front of me. Stay where you are until I am sure he is dead,” I yelled. Because no signs of life were visible, I descended the tree and nullah bank and shook the “Big Fellow.” “He is finished” I called, “You can come out now.”

The villagers danced and chanted on the bank. Andy approached the tiger, touched him and looked at his teeth in disbelief. The rest of the group descended the bank and gleefully stroked the king of cats.

Rafiq and one of the villagers set off for the village to enlist some help and to bring an axe and the camera from the Jeep. When they returned, Andy and I took turns being photographed sitting or standing by the tiger with our rifles. Rafiq and Majid were photographed beside the tiger, which measured nine feet and ten inches, from its nose to the tip of its tail. Having eaten well over the past several months, it was a hefty 350-pounder. Two villagers tied the animal's feet together, while another cut two poles, then slid them between the legs. Four men, each with a pole end resting on a shoulder, hauled the big cat to the village for viewing. With telegraphic speed, the word of the killing spread across the countryside, luring hundreds of local residents to a colorful impromptu celebration. Chanting and dancing the villagers admired the dead tiger. After much jubilation and gracious acknowledgments to us, the tiger was loaded on the Jeep and we prepared to leave. Due to the tiger's early appearance at the waterhole and its sudden demise, the villagers had not had time to prepare food or tea. But it was a good feeling to see them rejoice that one of their great fears had been alleviated, and a degree of normalcy had been restored. Heaven knows their poverty-stricken lives did not need the added burden of a cattle-killing tiger that had the potential of becoming a human-eater.

Back in Bhopal, we skinned the “big fellow” and salted the skin for drying and preservation, before sending it to Van Ingen and Van Ingen, a Dutch family-owned taxidermist business in Mysore. Ten quarts of stiffish, bright yellow, tiger fat was distributed to the local townsfolk. At that time, tiger fat cost approximately $2.50 to $3.00 per ounce in the local market and the locals considered this fat to be nonpareil for curing whatever ailed one. Many locals were ecstatic to have just a pinch for free. They felt if you had an ailment and tiger fat did not cure it, you weren't ill. I kept a small jar of fat in the Jeep's glove compartment. Little did I know that one day it would save me from a life-threatening situation. After that incident, I too bordered on the belief that tiger fat could cure anything.

The Tree Tiger

Hank Hannah and I were having lunch at the home of J.A. Stevenson, the Vice-Chancellor of the Uttar Pradesh Agricultural University. We were engaged in a lively conversation about the progress in establishing a land-grant type of institution in North India. Mr. J. A. Stevenson, a slightly rotund, dark-haired, articulate Anglo-Indian, had recently been appointed to his position and, he dominated the conversation. Hank Hannah was the Chief-of-party for the University of Illinois team, which was assisting in the 4600 hectare Tarai State Farm project. The purpose of my visit was to provide ideas for establishing the Department of Agriculture Engineering for the university.

The trip to Tarai State Farm had been long, dusty and tiring, and I heartily consumed the toothsome meal of curried meat and vegetables set before us while listening to Stevenson and Hannah. Slow-turning ceiling fans stirred the moderately cool, dry air. Several servants, dressed in white starched uniforms with white towels across their arms, stood nearby, moving only to chase flies away and await the next order from Sahib Stevenson.

The unexpected sound of horse hooves just outside the open window stopped the conversation. A horse and buggy driven by a tall aristocratic-looking Sikh stopped at the front entrance opposite a flowered round-about. A short, khaki-clad young man quickly alighted from his stand-up position in back of the buggy to hold the horse's bridle as the driver disembarked. One of the servants uttered a few Hindi phrases to the vice-Chancellor, who gave a nod and a couple of hand signals, sending the servant scampering to open the door for the gentleman. The turbaned gentleman, sporting a well-groomed salt and pepper beard, stood tall and lean in the doorway. As he entered the dining room, he apologized for interrupting our meal and introduced himself as Pritam Singh. We rose and shook hands, and he accepted Mr. Stevenson's invitation to have a cup of tea. Mr. Singh seated himself at the table, then spoke with agitation.

"I have an emergency on my hands, and have come to see if you gentlemen have a rifle and could help me!" The three of us looked at each other, then I said "I have a rifle in my Jeep. What is your emergency?"

"I wonder if you could come with me, not far away from here to shoot a tiger my circumstances are this: I am a farmer in the area and have a crew of workers, mostly Burmese. These fellows set snares to catch animals, mostly deer, for meat. Early this morning three of them checked their snares and to their surprise, they found a fairly large tiger cub. Money signs danced before their eyes because they know that wildlife dealers who sell tigers to zoos and circuses will pay $300-400 for a tiger cub. This would be the largest amount of money these farm workers would have at one time. The three workers approached the cub, which had a noose well secured around his neck and attempted to tie his legs together to carry him to the village. Unbeknown to them, the mother tiger was crouched in the high grass and ferociously charged them. Miraculously all the men escaped by scampering up a nearby tree, out of the reach of the tigress' jaws and claws. When the men did not return to the farm for several hours, I sent three other farm hands to search for them. They, too, did not return in the expected time.

About an hour ago, a neighbor came by and told me the following story. He heard shouts in an area near his farm and he went to investigate. He found six men sitting high in a tree, yelling. When the yelling men saw him, they told him not to come near because all six of them had been treed by the tigress who was shuttling between her cub in the snare and the tree in which they were sitting. Their predicament had worsened because the tigress had just been joined in her defensive duties by her mate. Therefore, I need someone to shoot at or kill one of them. A shot may scare the tiger and tigress away, but if not, I would prefer the male be killed, leaving the female to care for the cub in case he escapes the snare. I am assuming that the farm workers will not be able to get the cub as long as the mother is around. No one has ever been known, to my knowledge to take a tigress' cubs without killing her. "I need my six farm workers back," Mr. Singh concluded.

“Let me finish my lunch and I’ll investigate the situation,” I responded.

As Mr Singh departed, he said, “I’ll leave my servant, who is reliable and knows the area well. I now must go. Thanks, but be careful, it could be a dangerous situation.”

“Tigers are a big problem in the area. There are many of them, and the grass is extremely dense. We lose 8 to 10 people each year to tigers,” added Stevenson.

Fifteen minutes later, I finished lunch and walked to the vehicle. Hari Lal, Mr. Singh’s buggy assistant, climbed in the back seat, assuming this to be his place.

“I’ll need you in the front to show me the way,” I said.

He seemed delighted to be needed and scrambled into the front seat. By now it was clear that I would have to communicate through gestures, broken English, and Hindi phrases. After driving a mile or two on a gravel road, Hari Lal gave a signal to turn left cross-country into an ocean of luxuriant elephant grass that was taller than the Jeep’s roof. We had to move at a snail’s pace and I feared that the vehicle would get stuck in a hole or smash against a rock or tree stump. Only the upper portions of large trees, mostly mangoes, could be seen above the undulating grassy plains. Slowly the four-wheeled drive vehicle pushed a path through the giant mass flushing out moths, butterflies, grasshoppers, and birds like a fire. Hari Lal seemed confident about the direction. The grass screeched and rubbed against the surfaces of the vehicles like scratching finger nails.

Hari Lal spotted the tops of two large trees a few hundred yards away, and pointed “The men may be in one of those trees over there.”

The men were indeed sitting con the high branches. Half of them had been languishing under the sun for more than eight hours, without food or water, knowing if they descended from the tree, somebody would lose a life, and it would not be the tiger and tigress. Hari Lal, yelled to them and their spirits soared. The men guided us to a place where we could monitor the tigers movements and see the snared cub. I maneuvered the Jeep under a low hanging mango tree which provided us with coverage. I laid my rifle on top of the Jeep and climbed through the window onto the roof. Then I swung onto the limbs and climbed the tree, avoiding, the risk of walking through the dense grass . Hari Lal handed me the rifle without leaving the vehicle. After some shuffling and twisting, I found a comfortable yet stable position that would withstand the rifle recoil. From this position, I had a clear view of the weary farm workers, and some visibility to my left. Hari Lal climbed onto the Jeep’s roof, and talked with the men, who reported excitedly that the tigers had moved away in the tall grass, when our Jeep arrived and were somewhere left of our tree. We expected the tigress to return if she heard the cub growling as it struggled to get free of the noose, so Hari Lal told the treed men to be perfectly quiet.

The evening shadows lengthened and light breezes stirred the dense grass, creating rhythmic sounds. Birds flitted in the air, scrounging for their evening meal. Suddenly the grass beneath my tree rustled, and I recalled that tigers are often compared to ghosts, they simply appear without warning. Looking down through the dense foliage, I glimpsed a flowing form, reddish in color and slashed with black I smelled the strong, familiar odor of a tiger, and was instantly engulfed by shivers of fear that ran through me like electric currents. It is just not possible to see one of these magnificent beasts in their natural habitat without a quickening heartbeat and a sense of awe. Appearing as abstract art through the shimmering tree leaves and tall grass, the powerful mass moved near the drip-line of the far side of the tree. With nerves tingling, heart racing, and pains shooting through my lower back, I slowly raised the rifle to my shoulder, adjusted the sights and I aimed at what I thought was the front end of the male tiger, knowing that it was a bit risky not to have a clear view of the vulnerable spot. Carefully, I squeezed the rifle trigger. The blast thundered in the silent dusk, echoing against the distant verdant hills. In a flash, the tiger disappeared into the tall grass.

The men in the tree, shouted “Skier! Sher!” (Tiger. Tiger), and pointed in the opposite direction. Hari Lal questioned them, then translated that at the sound of the gun, the cub lunged, freeing itself from the snare and galloped off with its mother. This confirmed that I had shot at the male. Recovering my composure, I handed Hari Lal my rifle and descended the tree onto the Jeep’s roof. The six men gradually came down from the tree, being extremely happy that they were no longer hostages, but disappointed that their instant wealth had vanished. They gathered around the Jeep, smiling and chattering. With a mixture of fatigue and gratification, the six men thanked me in typical Indian fashion, of hands clasped in front of chest, bows and sukriyasst (thank yous). I returned their bows and watched them vanish as the last of the sun’s ray glistened against the billowing elephant grass and mango tree leaves. It was too late and risky to venture into the tangled mass of vegetation to see if the tiger had been wounded. But the hunter has a responsibility to his/her prey, as J. W. West author of a British hunting manual aptly put it, “Let it be said that when a tiger is wounded, and has to be finished off, every white man, (I assumed this applied equally to black men) goes in and takes the risk without hesitation, many a good fellow paying the extreme penalty, may they find good sport in the happy hunting grounds.” (Shikar notes for Novices by J.W. West.)

Hari Lal and I got back into the Jeep and followed the path it had cut earlier through the elephant grass. When we reached the road, we departed company after agreeing to return to the site the next morning.

Upon returning, I showered and had tea with Stevenson and Hannah. They listened intently as I described the details of my adventure.

“What about the tiger you shot at?” Stevenson inquired.

“I plan to visit the site very early in the morning to see if there are any signs that he was wounded Hari Lal agreed to accompany me.” I replied.

“All my life I have heard that the hunter must follow a wounded tiger and kill it,” Stevenson added.

“That’s’s right,” I said. “I will do that. I am told there are many tombs in India of hunters killed by tigers. I’ve heard what Louis Gordon’s epitaph read: ‘Killed while following up a wounded tiger with a gun he had forgotten to load’ I have seen my driver’s father, once a member of the hunting staff of the Nawab of Bhopal, and a living reminder of the severity of injuries inflicted by tigers can be. He has a terribly distorted, withered and useless leg, that was bitten right through the bone, as he climbed a tree to escape a charging tiger,” I responded.

In spite of being very tired, I had a restless night that seemed endless. Finally, the neighborhood roosters announced daybreak, none too soon for me. The guest house cooks had tea, eggs and toast ready. Hari Lal arrived at 7:00 A.M., and under the brilliant sun we headed back to the mango tree. The cool breeze ushering in from the foothills of the Himalayas seemed to shake the trees and grasses awake as it passed over them. Even during the dry season in Tarai country, the rolling hills can support heavy farming, as well as large trees and vast plains of waving elephant grass. Each day is a carbon copy of the previous one. From November to March the area’s climate has no equal. Blessed with massive amounts of water, surface and artesian, draining from the top of the world, the region gives rise to a great variety of flora and fauna. Prey and predators maintain the balance of nature.

A symphony of bird songs cascaded over the country side. This, our third trip over the trail was much easier and more relaxed. As we traveled through the tall grass, pairs of red jungle fowl, cock and hen, flapped frantically as the air lifted them momentarily above the elephant grass. Quickly they settled down after a short glide downwind. These beautiful birds, both gray and red species, are said to be the ancestors of today’s domestic fowls. As we proceeded, a wild-eyed hog deer, with bristling, short antlers, darted across our path and disappeared from sight as quickly as it had appeared. We glimpsed a number of small creatures, who provided much of the bill-o-fare for the tiger, leopard and wild dog population. In the distance a big brown hawk, with slowly rhythmic wing beats, skimmed lazily just above the grass tops, yet fully alert and ready to capture a less watchful creature for breakfast. While seeking a meal many animals become a meal. Few of nature’s creatures are better at taking advantage of other’s mistakes than these sharp-eyed birds of prey.

We came to the end of our grass trail, at the mango tree. With my rifle in hand, I examined the vegetation in the direction the tiger had run the day before. In these remote grasslands and with no back-up gun, it would have been an understatement to say that I felt uneasy. The lay of the grass suggested that the tiger could have been off balance and stumbling. After several slow tip-toeing steps into the grass I spotted a very small speck of blood on a blade of grass. The tiger had been hit, but was it blood from a solid hit or just a superficial wound? My foreboding heightened, I checked my old rifle to make sure that the bolt and the cartridge ejector were functioning properly. When I pulled the bolt back the cartridge in the chamber did not move with it. In complete shock, I examined the rifle closely and discovered that the ejector in the end of the bolt had snapped. Nothing could have been more devastating. The Cordon Lewis epitaph flashed before my eyes. Hari Lal and I slowly walked to the Jeep with absolutely no defense against a tiger attack. Suddenly, a tiny ray of hope came to mind; I remembered that more than a year before, I had stripped an even older 30-06 rifle and placed the bolt in the Jeep compartment. The chance of this bolt fitting and functioning properly was about one in a million. The bolt was dusty and filled with grit from many miles of India’s roads and cow paths, and needed special cleaning. I whisked off most of the dirt with a couple of dirty rags and a small brush I had in the tool box. With a few drops of engine oil from the vehicle’s dip stick I lubricated the bolt. The moment of truth had arrived. I slipped the bolt into the rifle. It was a perfect fit and withdrew the cartridge when I pulled it back. To be doubly sure, I fired a round into the tall elephant grass. My elation and confidence soared higher than the distant Himalayas.

Hari Lal and I cautiously returned to our search half-step by half-step, listening and scanning every square inch of the thick over-our-head- towering elephant grass. The blood stains on the grass became less apparent as we continued walking. Finally, we could not see any blood. The only sign of disturbance was the grass pushed aside as the tiger struggled through it. After thirty minutes of creeping and watching we had only traveled approximately a hundred yards into the unrelenting grass. As we continued onward, we heard the sound of gurgling water ahead. Soon we were on the banks of a swiftly flowing, clear stream coursing its way between banks lined with black boulders, a few small trees and scrub bush. No sign of the tiger was visible in the thinning grass, nor was their evidence of its crossing the stream. It could have easily jumped across if not badly injured. I was able to make Hari Lal understand that he should ford the stream to locate any trace.

Wearing shorts and no shoes, Hari Lal grabbed some small branches that were overhanging the stream and lowered himself down the slick bank into the water, which came up to his waist. He just stood where he was, and despite my motioning him to move across, he remained motionless and a very confused expression appeared on his face. He then began to move first one foot then the other as if to get a feel for the depth of water or to get a good footing. Then with a cry of surprise, he waved his hands, shuffled his feet and shouted in broken Hindi and English, “Skier’ Sher!” Hari Lal was standing on the tiger. What another stroke of lucks I thought! The spare rifle bolt had been a perfect replacement for the one that malfunctioned, and now we had selected the right place for Hari Lal to enter the stream and land on the drowned tiger. It all seemed too much to be true. I tossed Hari Lal the short piece of nylon rope that I carried as part of my standard hunting gear. Submerged in the water, Hari Lal successfully tied the rope around the tiger’s neck. He then scrambled up the bank with the other end of the rope. The water gave the tiger some buoyancy, so we floated it down stream a few feet where the bank was less steep. With relatively ease, we pulled the tiger onto the bank. Cold and well preserved the carcass was clean and fresh-looking. It had been shot through the rib cage. Highly exhilarated, I started skinning it with my razor-sharp Louisiana muskrat skinner, a three blade pocket knife, which I carried as religiously as the orthodox Sikhs carry their kirpan (a knife). Methodically, I removed the winter pelt, the black striping over a rich reddish-yellow background much more colorful than any I had seen in central India. To wash the skin, we pulled it through the clear stream water and then rolled it up for transport.

Needless to say, the return trip through the elephant grass was made with much less trepidation. Under the shade of the mango tree beside the Jeep we unrolled the skin and rubbed in a good amount of salt to preserve it until it could be thoroughly dried (I always kept a bag of salt in the Jeep). Hari Lal was very excited and pleased, as this had been an experience of a lifetime for him.

“My Sahib sends you much sukiryaa (thanks). He very happy all the men back to the farm. The men too happy you came to help them down from tree.” Hari Lal explained. He gave a “Namaste” (goodbye) and seemed to exude a ring of light above his head as he disappeared through tangle of waving elephant grass on his way to the farm. The one hundred rupees I gave him for his assistance, more than a week’s pay, gave him a boost.

I pondered the episode as I drove back to the vice-chancellor's house. Three innocent farm hands get a snare to catch deer. Instead, six men were held hostage by two tigers defending their cub; 10,000 miles from home in the vicinity of the top of the world, I came to their rescue. Two unusual strokes of luck allowed me to become the proud and uninjured owner of a rare-hued tiger skin. It all seem to be guided by fate, and seemed like a dream. Call It natural luck, or a guardian angel not being away from his/her post, something intervened at critical moment to keep Hari Lal, the farm hands safe from harm and me safe from harm. After all, my mission was technical assistance to agricultural development and any good farmer needs employees on the farm and not up a tree.

Cathy the Great

Cathy's entry into our lives was due to Mr. Bradfield's tiger hunt. Brad, as we called him, was a slow-moving, slow-talking Texan whom I had met through a mutual colleague, another Texan named Ted Elder. Cathy, on the other hand, was a Bengal tigress cub. Brad and Ted both worked in New Delhi, about 400 miles north of Bhopal. Ted had made two trips to Bhopal to go on safari with me, and under my guidance he had successfully killed a large tiger on his first trip, and a large male leopard, whose coat was rich and dark, on the second. Both animals had been bagged within a few hours. When Ted returned to New Delhi, he bragged about his safari adventures, whetting Brad's curiosity and desire to go hunting with me. Texan friends, who have similar interests especially braggarts like to be evenly matched, if not top one another. I am sure Ted did not omit anything. If anything, he added to my reputation as a woodsman and big game hunter. Ted loved to exaggerate, particularly when he talked about his hunting successes "I have little respect for a hunter or fisherman who is not a big liar," he would frequently state. Ted's and Brad's wives, Cecil and Mary, saw each other regularly. Cecil could never resist showing off Ted's trophies, the skin rugs and her gold-trimmed "lucky-bone" brooch to visitors. The "lucky bone" is a two or three inch long, crescent-shaped, floating bone located in the shoulders of tigers and leopards. Indian craftsmen do an excellent job of setting them in gold or silver filigree. They make great conversation pieces, especially if the husband bagged the tiger or leopard.

Brad called several times asking when he could visit Bhopal and go on a safari. We finally settled on an Easter weekend. Brad and Nyah, his driver, arrived Thursday night. A slight breeze crept across Bhopal's arid countryside on Good Friday, providing faint relief from the heat. The outdoors had been drained of every molecule of moisture by six months of a bright, searing sun. All living things, including human beings, were waiting for the monsoons. Our hunt could not begin until late afternoon when the heat abated. As dusk slowly approached, night prowlers awoke to start their nightly vigil of stalking and using their finely tuned skills to kill for a meal. Brad, Nyah, and I loaded guns and water cans into my Jeep and climbed in. I drove over a bumpy, dusty bullock-cart trail for about fourteen miles to a small spring, which usually carried imperceptible trickles of water throughout the long dry season. I knew this spot to be the place for animals to drink, lounge, and graze on the sparse greenery. Both predators and prey of foot or wing took chances with their lives for a drink of water.

Eventually we stopped on a small knoll. As we stepped out of the Jeep, we heard the calls of a long-tailed peacock, sitting high in a nearby tree. These sounds were followed by barks of cheetal, India's spotted deer, and in turn their barks were punctuated by the hacking calls of langurs, the gray, long-tail, black-faced monkeys. These animals had spotted a big wild cat or cats and were sending out signals, not unlike the motorist who blinks his headlights to indicate the highway patrolman hidden away in a cove down the road. In the jungle it is not just a warning to avoid a ticket, but a life-and-death alarm. Animal danger calls are completely different from those for mating or congregation and I had become an expert at distinguishing them.

Faint odors of a tiger or leopard were apparent. But were these odors from the actual animals or from the bark of a nearby native tree that exudes a near perfect duplication of these animal odors? We proceeded cautiously until I could verify the source of the odor. To our right was a matted, low-growing bush. A small, moist depression ran through the center. At the far end of the depression, we observed several large tiger pug marks in the soft soil.

"That's a big male," Nyah, said softly with some apprehension in his voice. The bush had been an ideal shelter for some wild cats, with a natural leaf roof just tall enough for one to slide under and maneuver out of sight. Next to a small water supply, the bush was an excellent escape from the scorching dry season sun, a good place to stash a kill from flies, vultures, and other scavengers, give birth, or sleep and laze away after an over-stuffing meal.

From the bush we moved in the direction of the cheetal calls, which were intermittent. Slowly and in single file, we walked north through a mullah about six feet deep and banked with dry reddish dirt. Sand patches made walking difficult at times.

With eyes as big as pool balls, Nyah nervously whispered, "Suppose the tiger jumps down on us in the mullah; we would all be mauled to death."

I gave him the hand signal to keep perfectly quiet. We could see over the edge of the mullah, although at times our heads were below ground level as the depth of the ditch varied. Tiger odor permeated the air, accelerating our adrenaline flow. We spotted a herd of cheetal on a nearby slope. Their head and eyes seemed glued on something in the distance to our right, but the mullah was beginning to curve away from them. Signaling the other men to stand still as statues, I climbed out of the mullah quietly and slowly creeping along the bank. Suddenly I spied a large Bengal tiger some forty yards ahead, sitting stone-still on its haunches. With its back toward me, I watched its tail twitch slightly as it concentrated on a quick meal so near its grasp. I eased back into the mullah and motioned Brad to follow and be ready for a shot at a tiger. Crouching and moving at a snail's pace, we quietly made our way through the ditch without being detected, thanks to the cheetal who were occupying the tiger's attention. Brad and I changed positions as we raised our heads above the mullah banks. Slowly and quietly Brad raised his .375 rifle to his shoulder. The cheetal spotted Brad, gave a barking noise and, resembling Santa's reindeer in flight, leaped gracefully into the bush. The tiger remained still. Quickly adjusting his rifle, Brad carefully aimed and squeezed the trigger. Like a small exploding bomb, the big rifle boom created triple echos, each one reflecting from a surface a greater distance away, as the sound gradually dispersed across the jungle. The tiger leaped high into the air and quicker than a wink, the yellow-black-stripe flash disappeared into the bush.

“I’m sure I hit him,” Brad exclaimed as he nervously pulled out and lit a cigarette. “What do we do now?”

“Nothing,” I answered. “It’s too dangerous to follow up a potentially wounded tiger in the dimming light of dusk.” I advised.

Hurrying back to the Jeep to beat the nightfall, we decided to return early the next morning, the Saturday before Easter Sunday. The trip home was filled mostly with silence, regret, and nervous speculation. The occasional scampering deer, antelope or wild pig, and the call of peacocks offered little to ease the disappointment.

When we arrived home, Nyah went to visit a friend and Brad and I dressed for dinner. Our dinner conversation focused on plans for the next day. We decided that we needed an early start to discover the fate of the tiger at which Brad had fired. We assumed it was wounded and if this were true, we would have to track it and put an end to his suffering. We retired for the evening.

Just prior to daylight, and before the bird songs burst forth from the nearby mango trees, Brad was nervously pacing the outside verandahs. After overhearing Brad’s slow Texas drawl asking Ishmael about the status of coffee, I quickly rose, washed, shaved, and dressed.

“Good morning, Brad. How was your night?” I asked cheerfully as I stepped onto the verandah.

“Sleepless, absolutely sleepless. I couldn’t get my adrenaline flow down to normal all night. Never thought I would ever have a night counting leaping tigers to help me sleep. A couple cups of hot, black coffee should get me off to a good start for today’s pursuit I hope we don’t find a wounded tiger,” Brad drawled.

“Everything will work out, but we must be very careful,” I responded.

“I’ll follow you,” Brad asserted.

Ishmael soon announced that breakfast was ready and we went inside. After breakfast, Brad, Nyah and I drove to the spot of the previous day’s shooting. Cloudless and bright blue with a moisture-robbing sun, the morning was another in the succession of many during the dry season. The monsoon rains were still one to two months away. An occasional destitute villager walked along the dusty trail. Once in the jungle we passed many of the creatures on the move which depended on daylight for their survival. Back in the dry nullah we progressed in spurts, pausing to listen and observe. All we heard was the rustling leaves, stirred by the early morning, omnipresent “seven sisters” birds, congregating in their typical style. According to landmarks we were approaching the exact spot on which the tiger had been. We climbed out of the nullah and proceeded along its banks to find the exact spot on which the tiger had been sitting. There were no signs of blood or injury, just marks where the tiger had dug its strong claws into the soil as he dashed into the bushes.

“What do we do now?” Brad inquired.

“Let’s skirt the edges of the bush canopy over to the right,” I replied.

We had to crawl, putting us in a very dangerous position. From the edge of the bushes we saw a small patch of dull tiger stripes, far too small to be a whole tiger. Nyah volunteered to crawl a little closer.

“It looks like a small piece of dried tiger skin,” he said softly and nervously.

As we all pondered the patch, it suddenly squirmed, causing Nyah to retreat at break-neck speed. What was the patch? All eyes were glued onto the patch; all minds were pondering the possibilities. Another close inspection revealed tiny tiger cubs entwined and nestled in a small leaf-lined depression. None of us had ever seen such a sight. I’m not sure many people have, especially under these circumstances. We retreated again, speculating that Brad must have shot their mother, who was trying to catch a meal and that the tigress must be dead or severely wounded; therefore it would be safe to retrieve the cubs, saving them from starvation. Once again Nyah immediately volunteered to crawl the ten to fifteen feet under the bush to retrieve the cubs. Brad and I “covered” him just in case our supposition about the tiger was inaccurate. At less than a snail’s pace, Nyah crawled up to the cubs. He was visibly nervous, and slightly shaking. So were Brad and I. Then like a hawk, Nyah grabbed two of the cubs by their neck. The cubs burst alive, snarling and spitting. Instantaneously, the tigress’ loud roar exploded from under the low-hanging canopy. She had been watching from a deeper part of the bush. Our calculations could not have been more inaccurate. She was there, very much there. If she charged with blood-curdling fury, it would surely spell the end for Nyah and probably ours as well. Brad and I rapidly backed away from the bush, dropped on our knees and aimed our rifles in case she charged out of it. She did charge to the edge of the bushes, shaking them as violently as a hurricane, but then retreated. Nyah, like a streak of greased lightning, flashed out of the thorny bush with a cub dangling from each hand. He had escaped by a hair’s breadth the killer claws and fangs of the tigress. Brad and I, tense as steel and feeling more like running than being brave, continued to aim our guns as we waited for the tigress to emerge. She never did, she just continued to roar and finally even ceased that. We slowly backed away from the bush, then quickly turned and headed for the Jeep, a couple of hundred yards away.

Leaning against the Jeep in shock was Nyah, literally scared out of his wits. His vise grip on the cub’s necks had rendered them breathless and unconscious, with their eyes literally popping out of their heads. It took a couple of light blows about his neck and severe shaking before Nyah regained his senses. We persuaded him to release his grip on the cubs, one male and one female. By blowing into their noses while shaking them we revived them. They started kicking and snarling. They were the size of an adult house cat, with their eyes only partially open. I took a cardboard box from the Jeep, lined it with leaves and grass, and put the cubs inside. We were still shook up, but Nyah was by far the worst, so we helped him into the front passenger seat. Brad sat in the back, keeping an eye on the cubs, and I took the wheel. I reversed the Jeep to turn around, but it jolted to a stop. What had I hit? We climbed out of the Jeep to discover a jagged stump had punctured the fuel tank a steady stream of gasoline gushed from the tank, threatening to drain it in record in time. “Not this!” I moaned to myself. Had our luck run out? We had been so close to the edge all morning. How to stop this dreadful leak and avoid a ten-to-twelve mile trek or a bullock cart ride to the main road to get help? Suddenly my country-boy resourcefulness surfaced. I remembered how we used to temporarily repair small leaks with soft soap. The problem was, there was no soap. But I did have the mayonnaise jar of stiff yellow tiger fat in the glove compartment a quick twist with a stick removed a sizable glob from the jar. Instinctively, I reached down at my feet and got a handful of the black clay soil and mixed it with the fat. When moist, this kind of soil swells, giving it some sealing power. I molded the mixture into a patty, squirmed on my back under the Jeep and pressed the patty hard against the spewing hole. Like magic the gas stream was reduced to a small, fast drip. The next problem was how to keep the pressure on the concocted sealant while jolting over the bumpy road, and the tourniquet principle came to mind. While keeping pressure on the patch, I freed my handkerchief from my back pocket and tossed it to Brad to tie his handkerchief onto it for more length. Nyah, who was quite calm by now, tied one end of two handkerchiefs to a bracket on the front side of the tank, and the other end to the bumper bracket, and pulled it tightly against the patch. Brad cut a small stick, which I forced between the handkerchiefs and tank, and gave it several twists, to tighten the tourniquet further. This reduced the leak to an occasional drop

“This certainly must be one for Ripley’s Believe It Or Not, Brad,” proudly proclaimed.

“My grandmother always told me you have to do the best you can with what you have,” I said.

“That’s well and good as a philosophy, but I’m sure she never thought you would be 10,000 miles from home, in an Indian jungle repairing a punctured gasoline tank with tiger fat and clay. I don’t believe it either,” Brad said with relief.

As we rode along the bumpy dirt road, we counted our blessings and pondered events. Why did the tigress stop her attack? Was she wounded? Was it because we had left the third cub? Nyah quietly pondered why he had escaped a worse fate.

“Maybe the local people are right when they say tiger fat will cure anything,” he mused. I tended to agree, especially if they would let me throw in a handful of black cotton soil. The cubs rested peacefully all the way home. When we arrived, Loretta and the girls gathered around the surprise package, which contained their substitute for an Easter Bunny a mixture of delight and trepidation swept over their faces as they looked into the box. Any attempt to touch the little closed-eyed, striped bundles brought out snarls, spitting, and vicious angry noises.

“How do we care for it?” they queried. Loretta warmed some milk, put some in a cup and some in a baby’s bottle, something of which we never seemed to be short I put my finger in the warm milk, pulled open the female’s snarling jaws and put my finger against her tongue hoping she would lick the milk from it. I did this several times to no avail, when suddenly the female cub began to lick and suck my finger. Loretta immediately replaced my finger with the nipple of the bottle and the cub sucked it, as all our six babies had done before her. She was truly a suction pump in action. The girls christened her Cathy, for Catherine the Great of Russia, about whom they had been studying in their history class. Brad’s cub took the bottle more easily, was also fed, then cozily tucked away into a well-lined box for his 400 plus miles journey to New Delhi. He had not yet been named.

“Mr. Bradfield, we are depending on you to keep us informed about your cub. We want to know his name, too,” the girls requested.

He promised to do so. Although he did not return with trophies that matched Ted’s, his hunting trip proved to be unique. The pluses and minuses of raising a tiger in his household were an ongoing adventure, making Brad’s safari as memorable and rewarding as any of Ted’s or mine. The story of Cathy and her brother’s capture soon spread around but fell on unbelieving ears. The Nawab and members of his hunting staff, who had shot hundreds of tigers, refused to accept it. “It is not possible to take a cub from a tigress without shooting her, inflicting some casualties, or both,” was their usual response. The professional hunters were no less convinced. “That simply can’t be done,” many asserted.

Cathy took the bottle for the next seven months as she grew into a big tigress. Heat supplements and charcoal pills to control dysentery became part of her diet. She never seemed to look back. Working hard at it, she barely managed to keep her body growth in near proportion with her oversized big feet. Brad didn’t keep his word. A mutual friend of ours later told me that his cub was healthy and growing into a nice looking tiger. We never heard about its final disposition.

Other Pursuits

While at Budni, a nearby village headman requested me to shoot a leopard that had the people in a total state of fear. During its nightly visits to the village, it entered their thorn-bush- fenced corral, and took away their goats and young calves, paralyzing the people with terror. Occasionally it snatched a village dog before the front door of homes. I made several late-evening trips to the village to see if I could learn something of the movements and behavior of this cunning cat. Leopards are smart, sensitive, and tricky. While I talked to a villager one evening, it snatched a small dog from a veranda and dashed into the jungle. We recovered the dead dog and used it as bait the next night, but the leopard stayed away. For nearly a month, I attempted to pursue this animal that kept the village homes buttoned up at night as tight as a bass drum. About dusk one evening, Rafiq and I were driving up the bullock cart trail to the village, when a sparkling set of eyes reflected in the headlights, and then scampered up a steep bank beside the road. When we reached that spot, I could see the shoulder of a leopard protruding above the top of the slope. I took a quick aim, squeezed the trigger, and a leopard leaped into the air, danced about, and then tumbled down the slope into the ditch by the Jeep door.

We waited for a few minutes to make sure it was finished. It was. All we had to do was to open the door, reach down, and drag it into the Jeep. The tightly locked village homes unbarred their doors, and all went immediately into a celebration, another night of alertness, but this time in merriment. Their abject fear had disappeared. More people touched my feet to show their appreciation for my help than I could count.

I encountered four other instances of leopard’s eyes showing up in the head lights as I traveled from Bhopal to Budni or on other road trips. None escaped.

The bears in the Budni area were relatively small and their color ranged from black to a ginger brown, but they were seemingly of the same species. Moving about the wooded area and at the edge of the cleared farm area during late evening or early morning over a period of five years I saw five of them. Early one morning walking down a jungle path I came up upon one crouched as if he was ready to spring only a few yards away. Out of immediate fear, I made a quick rifle shot that bagged him.

On safaris accompanying other people, I had spells of fantastic luck. My Texas hunting buddy, Ted Elder, came to Bhopal for a tiger hunt. On the first evening we drove along a narrow trail through the woods for about two miles, with a stream on our left, and staked out a buffalo for tiger bait. On our way back to the main road, a huge Bengal tiger was caught in the head lights, crossing the trail. I turned the headlight in its direction, and Ted got out of the vehicle, walked behind the tiger for a short while until he got his gun in the right position, and shot it. I told Ted if he got any closer to the tiger, he would surely take his gun. Ted said, "I didn't think I could get too close to the son of a gun."

On a second occasion, he came to go leopard hunting. We drove to the edge of the jungle at sunset and were speculating as to where we should stake our bait. Suddenly, a huge, dark-skinned leopard trotted out in front of us and headed down the road. Ted got out and followed him a short distance, and when he turned right to head across an area relatively clear of bushes and undergrowth, a single shot from his .375 rifle dropped it instantly. One of the shortest safaris I have been on.

George Puckett, my neighbor across the round-about, wanted a tiger trophy too. So I agreed to accompany him. We crisscrossed a scrub bush area several times where the villagers said a tiger often roamed. With the sun setting and daylight dimming we decided to move towards the main road where the vehicle was parked. Walking down a narrow path with George following, I spotted a huge tiger sitting under small bushes ready to spring. I dropped back, pointed the big cat out to Puckett and urged him up front with his big 375 cal rifle. I thought it would take him forever to line up the animal in his scope sight. He finally did and the blast from the gun literally shook the bushes, but the tiger ran off. We trailed it to a dry stream bed where we found some drops of blood. By this time George's nerves were on the verge of cracking and he said, "According to Jim Corbett, the noted British hunter, under these conditions, one should take time out to light up a cigarette." George sat on a rock, lit up, and nervously puffed away. In a more calm mood, he asked, "What do we do now?"

"It's getting too dark to pursue it further. I suggest we go home and come back tomorrow morning," I advised.

We returned the next day, picked up the trail, and found the tiger lying on a small mound of dirt too weak to charge, but not too weak to snarl and roar as if it were ready to attack. George, struck instantly by tiger fever, seemed in no mood to go closer to finish it off, in spite of my attempt to persuade him that the tiger was not mobile. I finished him off with a shot in the neck.

Ray Davis, our chief agriculture officer from New Delhi, journeyed to Bhopal to go on a one night tiger hunt from a machan. Using two of the omnipresent village charpoys (sleeping bed), I secured them side by side to the limbs of a large tree with nylon rope. The evenly spaced limbs that grew close to the ground made climbing relatively easy. We used a young, sickly buffalo from a nearby village for bait, and lashed a bell about its neck and staked it out. Then I lifted our rifles, water, and light snacks by rope, and we both climbed the tree. The breezes rocked the tree at intervals, but otherwise the night was one of deafening silence. Both of us began to nod. About midnight, the buffalo rustled as if frightened. Davis turned on his flashlight strapped to his rifle, and tiger eyes flashed like headlights. He quickly zeroed his rifle sight on the tiger and let go. The boom seemed to echo several times against the big hardwood trees. The tiger ran off and as many hunters would say, Davis said, "I'm sure he was hit. I don't see how I could miss him." Our only hope to find it would come after daylight, after we removed our gear from the tree. Laying on the banks of a sluggish stream partially bloated, about two hundred yards away, we spotted our spoil. He got the usual treatment of being skinned and salt rubbed into his hide.

I was beginning to get worried about my reputation for short, painless, successful safaris getting out, and being flooded with requests from New Delhi. But such luck at least took a temporary break when Robert Wallace and his son George from Pullman, Washington, and stationed in Pakistan, drove from there to Bhopal on two occasions to hunt leopards and tigers. My usual luck of accompanying others on safari had momentarily petered out and their net on both trips was one leopard.

Lady's Remains For Bait

Jim Corbett, the famed British hunter and author, once wrote: "There is no more terrible thing than to live and have one's being under the shadow of a man-eater." My one-time experience of shooting a tiger that had killed a woman was as close as I had come to realizing the significance of that statement. Although in deep fear while trying to catch up with the killer, I realized that it must have been only a fraction of the intensity of fear that grips village people when dozens of their people are killed by "man-eating" tigers. Stories, true and exaggerated, of man-eaters constantly circulate among rural people who are illiterate, superstitious, and are firm believers of rumors and tales regardless of their validity. A story of that time, from far south of Bhopal, told of a tiger that had killed sixty people. There was little one could do to convince them that if a tiger killed only one person, it was not necessarily a man-eater and is not likely to kill again. I had this confirmed when I was requested to come to the village shakapur and shoot the tiger that had killed a woman. I consented, but the surge of dread of taking on the task was no doubt as intense as that of the villager upon discovering that a person had been killed by a tiger. Whether it is a validated man-eater or not seems to have little bearing on their feelings and fear. With no protection against the powerful animal, they were not inclined to listen to any argument that the tiger may not be an habitual man-eater. Take no chances, quickly becomes their creed when a person is attacked and killed by a tiger. Tigers are not natural pursuers of humans, but extreme hunger, or tasting as a cub human flesh killed by the mother eating carrion which contains human flesh, an old age and discrepancy preventing catching natural prey can cause them to become man-eaters. Villagers were not willing to analyze whether the tigers were a serial killer or not. Their one wish was to have the culprit destroyed.

I drove to the village over a bullock cart trail about two miles off the main dirt road. The headman village man who had already approached me came out and welcomed me, and offered to show where the half-eaten body was located. It was gruesome. My first nervous thought was to stake out a buffalo calf as bait. When I asked the villager to provide one, he told me to use the rest of the dead lady's body. This was a bit more than I could handle, sitting over a woman's dead body waiting for the tiger to return, and told him that I would prefer to move about the area later to see if I could pick up signs of the tiger's presence, in spite of the surge of nervousness and foreboding from the thought of tracking down a woman-eater not yet authenticated. Whether to pursue the killer or not gave me a gnawing concern.

A day or two later, one sunny, bright mid- afternoon, the thought hit me to drive to the village and look around for signs of movement, still with the feeling that this could be my most risky undertaking yet, especially with no backup gun. Slowly and cautiously, I moved about the sparsely wooded area, staying mostly in the scrub bush and near the dry, sandy streambeds. As I moved down a small, sloping foot path, leading to a winding, dry streambed, I spotted tiger stripes. A closer examination revealed a huge tiger looking straight at me and seemingly ready to spring I quickly whipped my rifle into position, took a fast aim, and with a gentle trigger squeezed the blast sounded across the countryside. The tiger soared high above the bush and ran down the footpath and out of sight. There were no signs of blood, but claw marks on the path showed it was headed for the streambed. When I came to the soft sand, I spotted fresh pug marks that seemed to indicate a staggering or unsteady gait. It was too late to pursue the animal. I went by the village and chatted with the village head, whose main concern was about my intentions to follow up I assured him I would return the next day because I felt that the tiger had been wounded and could be dangerous if people ventured into the area. I suggested that he inform the people of other nearby villages and encourage them to stay away from that wooded areas.

I had a restless night, seeing the partly eaten body of the woman, and wondering what might be my fate if I followed the tiger. The sun had moved high in the sky by the time I left the next morning. I went to the streambed and picked up the pug marks where the unsteady gait seemed more exaggerated as it went along. The streambed forked, leaving a small island in between. From this point I spotted a curled-up tiger on the island. When I moved closer with my rifle half in position, it looked at me but seemed too weak to muster a killer charge. A quick shot caused it to roll over and tumble into the streambed. A ten-minute break sitting on a nearby boulder was long enough to get my nerves back to near normal. With my trusty muskrat skinner, I went into action to remove the skin and head I saw no signs that would lead to the conclusion that it was or would soon have become a serial killer. It was in good condition and had an excellent set of teeth. There was a quarter-sized pus pocket in its front left leg caused by a quill fragment from a porcupine. That might have eventually led to a deteriorating condition that would cause it to kill even more people. My arrival at the village with the skin brought villagers rushing in from their daily tasks like ants at a picnic. All came to see the skin, and the celebration was on.

The 13th - a Psychosomatic Cure

Of course there were less fruitful expeditions, but they were exciting nonetheless. One such trip worthy of note was with my avid hunting companion, Ted Elder. I had planned the trip with the hope that it would cure a painful psychosomatic condition in my lower backside, resulting from the pounding of 25,000 miles of Indian roads.

Night had fallen, and after a short stroll Ted came back to the campsite. He went to his footlocker, unloaded and laid down his rifle, and brought out a full bottle of bourbon. He took a swig and immediately spat it out, spraying his boots and the rocks he stood on. He dashed over to his diminutive south Indian cook, pointing his finger menacingly.

“Thomas, there are three things you can’t do for me,” Ted shouted. “Drink or tamper with my booze, fool with my old lady, or wipe my behind. How many times have I told you not to take whiskey off the top of a new bottle and then top it up with water?”

Apparently, Thomas had just finished doing just that when Ted walked up. The tiniest alteration of Ted’s bourbon was a cardinal offense to his sensitive liquor taste.

Thomas dropped his head, sulked, picked up his soiled bag, stuffed it tighter, and said, “I quit, I no longer work for you.” He started up the rocky slope towards the gravel road. We were at least fifteen miles from nowhere.

Ted came over to me and sat down on a rock. “He does this all the time. He’ll be back in a few minutes. He’s not crazy about the dark and he knows that tigers and leopards roam about at night.” Gone hardly long enough to get out of sight in the deep darkness, Thomas came creeping back, dropped his bag and went over to Ted, and started unlacing his boots.

Ted jumped up and shouted, “The other thing you can’t do for me is to take off my boots! Get me something to eat.”

Thomas heated the canned pork and beans, sliced some cheese, stacked the crackers, and had the pot of black coffee simmering over the glowing wood coals between carefully arranged rocks smiling, he served Ted, me and my driver, Rafiq. Ted’s rage fell to a more tolerable level at the prospect of dinner.

Late that afternoon after our 400-mile drive from New Delhi, I selected this campsite, which was roofed over by a heavily foliated banyan tree, and encircled with rock masonry. It had probably been one of the choice campsites during the Nawab’s hunting days, for it was equipped with a ten-foot diameter platform three feet high. Equally attracted to the tree was a great variety of birds that lodged among its Protective branches. It soon became obvious that the tree’s foliage did not provide us with protection from the birds’ droppings. That would be too much to ask for; after all, we were the trespassers. I was reminded of the expression often heard in India regarding Prime Minister Nehru’s effectiveness: “The Prime Minister is like the great banyan tree, thousands seek shelter beneath it but nothing grows.” For several days we were to put up with this shared relationship.

A cacophony of night sounds from the wilder segment of India’s burgeoning jungle bio- mass was in full swing But none of us tired. worn-down travelers could be distracted from the call of Morpheus, the Greek god who shapes dreams. Ted and I had already set up our folding army cots, mattresses with one-inch foam rubber. It was too far into the dry season to worry about mosquitoes Thomas and Rafiq preferred the Jeep wagon as their best chance against marauding carnivores.

The residents of the big banyan tree burst into song at the first sign of daylight, aided by return calls from their respective types throughout the jungle red was first up, washing and shaving Thomas had the coffee steaming, Ted gulped down two cups, adjusted his hearing aids, threw his rifle across his shoulder, and took off down the road past an old cattle corral on the hill where moos, grunts, and moans were contributing to the morning sounds. His habit of walking off into the jungle alone became my main worry. Even with his network of wiring and his hearing aid turned up high, he still couldn't hear. He depended mostly on reading lips. If we ever encountered trouble, got separated, or attacked, there would be no point calling out to him. There were few readable lips in the jungle. Tigers, leopards, and wild dogs use their lips only to surround mouthfuls of prey, and if Ted was that close, it would be too late for him to reply. Fortunately, he always found his way back.

After a breakfast of eggs, canned wieners, and hot tea, I spent my morning gazing at birds in the banyan tree, which was a veritable bird watcher's paradise. That day I counted thirty species. Ted returned about 10:00, and we decided we needed to replenish our water supply. This meant a trip to Bhopal by Rafiq and Thomas. They returned with enough ice to restock the coolers, and some six packs of carbonated apple juice drink. When the day's heat passed its peak, I left to scout the area for a spot where Ted could get a clear shot at a tiger. I followed a narrow overgrown track up a steady incline for about three-quarters of a mile until it ended abruptly. A short distance to the left, I spotted a shabby, three foot high circular structure. It had a stone base, and was partially enclosed with weather worn, termite-eaten bamboo, but it had good potential, requiring a minimal rebuilding effort. A diversion on the way back to camp led me to a small active spring oozing out of a hillside. Around it were animal prints, including a couple of old pug marks of a tiger Back in camp I talked about my find.

Rafiq chimed in with, "That enclosed machan you saw is one the Nawab used when he was a good hunter. Maybe it's still a good spot for tiger."

We decided it would be the place for Ted to spend the night along with a buffalo calf for bait. Rafiq hustled about and was able to buy a young buffalo from the villagers, complete with a bell around its necks. Before sunset the camp crew reinforced and cleaned out the enclosure. With a bag lunch and a canteen of water. Ted crawled in and located a good slit for viewing and shooting. We staked the buffalo, gave it some grass to chew on, and left Ted on his own for the night.

With daylight in full blaze the next morning, I drove the Jeep within a hundred yards of Ted's machan. With rifle in hand, I slowly walked to the site Ted was sitting on the front edge of the stone wall, and the half eaten buffalo carcass lay out by the stake with the rope still tied to it. Obviously, a tiger had been there, killed the buffalo, eaten his fill, and had left. I continued to look but saw no sign of a tiger. I was within arm's reach of Ted, before he knew I was there. When he saw me, he braced up slightly, but had a sadness on his brow worse than if he had lost a loved one.

"Ted, what happened?" I asked loudly, looking straight at him in case he had to read my lips.

"The son of gun came here, killed the buffalo, and when I woke up this morning I saw what you see out there now."

“Didn’t you even hear the bell when the tiger attacked the buffalo?” I asked.

“Hell! I haven’t heard a bell in thirty years,” he responded sadly. Ted’s morale was lower than his boot soles. We collected his bedroll and rifle and walked slowly to the Jeep. The vultures had already loaded two nearby trees, waiting for us to clear out. They cleaned up what was left before we turned the Jeep around. Ted’s day was off to a sad start. Only after a couple of good swigs of his bourbon did he brace up a little.

Shortly after breakfast, I followed a nearly erased footpath which passed within a few yards of the spring, well hidden behind a cluster of bamboo. The sunlight was still young, but well on its way to its burning maturity, slight breezes stirred the dry leaves a group of seven sisters, robin-size brownish birds, scratched in the bush to my left. They traveled in sets of seven, hence the name, and continually chatted as they searched for bugs and other morsels. They were the biggest jungle noise makers that morning.

As I approached the bamboo cluster, I detected a slight movement and heard a low growl to my right. I kept inching along, and through the small opening in the bush I discerned wet tiger stripes amid the shaded foliage. It must have been cooling off in the spring, and hearing my arrival, took cover. The water, no doubt, had rinsed off the usually strong odor tigers have preventing me from picking up his scent.

I had reached the end of the bamboo cluster where I could better see its movements, but the bush was entirely too thick to risk a shot. Up ahead and in the direction it was moving were two large trees with an opening between them. Dropping on one knee, I moved the rifle sight over to the opening. Shortly the big wet cat entered the clearing. With a quick aim, I squeezed the trigger. The blast echoed across the jungle, and the tiger went down, biting its hind legs momentarily. Then, like a bolt of lightning, the striped bundle of fury came straight down the hill at me. My heart raced and my hair must have stood on end under my pith helmet I had not reloaded another round; it had never even occurred to me. In seconds it was within springing distance a flash of immortality and eternity clouded all I had left of thought. By now it was bigger than a eighteen-wheeler and traveling twice as fast. For some reason which I’ll never fathom, it made a ninety-degree turn so close to me that its tailed whipped against my right leg. Whew! It kept running at full speed down the slope and out of sight.

My right leg trembled like a leaf in the breeze. Then the whole of me became one big shake, which receded as quickly as it had come. It had to have been divine intervention, I was convinced. Once again my guardian angel was on duty.

Quickly I collected myself, reloaded my rifle and got on its trail, observing every inch of the ground. Splatters of blood on the dry leaves led downhill to a small dry streambed of gray slate. Patches of sand along the edges were also spotted with blood, and marked by toe prints of a fast-moving tiger heading upstream. Further on, I found a puddle of blood with tiger hairs around its dried edges, so I knew it had laid down briefly. After about a mile, I rounded a bend and caught a glimpse of the tiger a hundred yards ahead, stretched out on the rock licking its paws. It was too far away to hazard a shot without a rifle scope. The thick bush and rocky stream banks made it too difficult to sneak out and get within range without being detected. It must have sensed my presence, since it raised his head and glared straight at me. I had my first good look at it, which confirmed my suspicion that I was dealing with a large male. With his eyes glued on me, he slowly rose and disappeared behind a cluster of blackened boulders along the streambed. I crept to the rocks with my rifle raised and came upon a cave, the mouth of which was blood stained. Tossing a few rocks against the sides of the cave entrance did nothing to arouse him, and I did not risk firing into the cave. My thoughts were that I had followed the wounded animal as diligently as a hunter should, and I was not sure I wanted to tangle with an injured tiger without a backup gun, as I had unwisely done too many times before. Possibly, my luck for one day had been fully consumed. My thirteenth tiger had gotten away, and with divine intervention, I too had miraculously escaped.

Back in camp, I related the story to Ted, Rafiq, and Thomas, who were both excited and thankful that I had come out unscathed. They had heard my shot and had been eagerly waiting my return. Ted was still down on himself for sleeping through the tiger's visit the previous night. For the two of us, it had not exactly been a dream day in the jungle. For me it could have been much worse.

Shortly after sunrise on the third day I decided to sneak back to the hillside spring. This time I neither saw nor heard any movement as I approached I figured if the tiger- were still strong enough, he would return to lay in the water to heal his wound and protect it from flies and other pests. Peering through the bamboo, I saw that the hole looked freshly disturbed a close inspection revealed that the tiger had been there only moments before. Hairs and pug marks were pressed into the mud, and the water was stirred and muddy. He had either heard or smelled me coming and moved on. Maybe some mutual respect had set in. Dripping wet, he had left a path of wet leaves which led straight up the hill for about ten feet. A mild attack of tiger fever came over me as the thought sprang through my mind that he might be hiding close by, plotting revenge, even though I knew tigers attack straight on and don't hide out, or sneak up from behind as leopards are known to do. A cautious check of the nearby bushes revealed that he had left the vicinity, apparently in fair to good condition, leaving me with no more than to do the same.

Back in camp, Ted and I spent most of the day lazing. We went out to shoot a couple of antelopes for meat. I took a shot at a wild dog trying to make a lunch out of a long-tailed peacock. Crouching and sliding along on its stomach, he sprang at the peacock and just missed as the big bird dug his strong wings into the hot dry air just in time to escape, squawking loudly away into the jungle. As the dog stood there lamenting its miss, I fired from about fifty yards, just nicking it. It too ran off into the jungle screaming.

There had been a gradual reduction and finally a disappearance of pains in my back side. Early the next morning I decided to run my own psychomatic test. With the Jeep loaded, Rafiq was asked to drive off down the road for a few minutes, return then blow the horn before picking us up for our trip back to New Delhi. The horn no longer triggered my back pain as had happened over the past several weeks, when the vehicle's horn blew at the front gate to transport me to the office. It had gone. Horns no longer triggered pain. The thirteenth tiger and all connected with him had effected a complete cure of my psychosomatic condition.

A Night In a Machan

I was preparing to spend a night in a machan between Budni and Bhopal, in hope of bagging a leopard or a Bengal tiger. Rafiq and I, along with a small buffalo for bait, had arrived at a location in the jungle where the large treeline gave way to tangled, low-growing bush. While the dimming daylight bathed the jungle, and the sun lowered itself behind the tree line, I selected a climbable tree of about twenty inches in diameter and forty feet tall. To its stout limbs I planned to attach a platform about halfway up to hold me and my gear. My machan would not be as elaborate as the royal version during the Raj years. I was going to use a charpoy, the ubiquitous cot of India on which all kinds of backsides reclined. Charpoys had lightweight wooden frames on to which a woven rope was strung to make a taut, hammock-like mattress. I tied one end of my rope to the charpoy and the other to my belt at the rear, climbed about twenty five feet, then pulled the charpoy up after me. I set it across some level branches, lashing it down securely. Several more lines I extended to overhead limbs to secure against rolling off the cot. On my second climb I hoisted up my equipment: the bedroll, rifle, water bottle, a few tools, and some dried snacks. After I was well situated, Rafiq tied the emaciated buffalo to a small tree, leaving it a mound of straw to munch on. Then he returned to the main road in the Jeep, where he would remain for the night.

Twilight, as usual in the tropics, came and went quickly, taking with it the last daytime sounds of the langurs, wild dogs, peacocks, and other birds. Full moon showered the jungle with soft light then sunk out of sight. Pitch darkness was upon the jungle. I felt secure on my perch, but a night alone in a machan is not for those leery of ghosts, ghouls, banshees, or haunting sounds. My own feeling is that there is nothing out there but the natural order of things where lives depend on what they can scrounge in the darkness to survive.

Most beings out there, I figured, had no interest in me. I had no reason to curse the darkness, and I had purposely left behind candles. I admired the stars that winked through the gently swaying branches on my first night solo in India's jungle. The buffalo gurgled as it chewed its cud, the essence of contentment. I was cozy and drowsy, but the night had an eerie quality. The silence was overwhelming, and the call of the owls, sambhars, and cheetah, and the hackles of langurs warning of the prowling cats, only deepened the silence when they faded. I couldn't help thinking of Loretta, and the miles that separated us both from the continent we called home. As I contemplated my nearly total union with nature the strains of high-pitched chant floated faintly through the jungle night. Aided by the hypnotic rhythm of the village drummers, I drifted off.

I awoke to the rustle of leaves, as if something was kicking them about. The sound came closer and closer but the buffalo did not stir or show concern, indicating that it was not a big cat on the prowl. It passed directly under the machan, and I hoped that whatever it was, it had no intentions to climb the tree. As the rustling receded, my curiosity could no longer be held in abeyance. I took a quick look with the flashlight and revealed two porcupines in an amorous position. I couldn't imagine a more prickly affair, and concluded that true love has no fear of spikes and spines. My luminous watch dial showed ten o'clock. A small, flapping creature made a couple passes through the tree, no doubt a bat. Some moments later the slapping sounds of larger wings suggested, either an owl or nighthawk. The wind had died down, then the heat and silence engulfed my senses and I dozed off despite the perspiration gathering on my forehead.

Again I was awakened, this time by the howling of an approaching wind. A dead tree limb crashed to the ground. Gusts rocked my tree from side to side, causing the charpoy to strain and screech against the limbs. I nervously held on as the wind buffeted the grove. To allay my concern, I began to think up a message to send to society in regard to living in trees. "Continue with the business of civilization, because living in trees is not all that promising."

Eventually the turbulence abated. I was able to rest for an hour or more, until the distant but nonetheless spine-chilling roar of a tiger wrested me from sleep. This continued periodically a half dozen times and the deep rumbling sounds reverberated in the still, night air. Two and half hours later the growls of a big cat were mixed with squeals and snorts the sounds of a typical tiger attack on a wild boar. The noise flared repeatedly for thirty minutes, suggesting a strung-out battle between these arch enemies. The massive neck of the boar is a problem for the tiger, which captures its prey by twisting or biting through the back of the neck. The boar is also capable of inflicting some serious injuries with its sharp, gashing teeth. According to local lore, the tiger usually wins, but not without a price. In time, the grunts and squeals of the boar weakened and finally faded, suggesting that the tiger had landed a TKO.

Below me I heard the jingle of the buffalo's neck bell, but it had risen only to stretch and relieve itself. After nibbling on a few mouthfuls of dry straw it curled up to sleep. The chances of the buffalo fulfilling its potential as bait were diminishing. The air had begun to cool slightly, signaling that dawn would soon break through the darkness. The morning star shone brightly through an opening in the tree cover. After a near sleepless night, I nodded out and when I awoke rays of sunlight shone through the open jungle spaces. It was all over, I consoled myself. The feathered family of the jungle provided a variety of unblended sounds, with the loud call of the peacock dominating.

I stood up on my charpoy, and reached for the limb overhead to stretch and yawn. Suddenly a huge Bengal tiger burst out of the dense bush and hit the buffalo, slapping it to the ground. It sunk its teeth into its neck and held on, twitching its tail as the buffalo kicked, trembled, and gave up the ghost. I raised the trusty 30-06, took aim at the tiger's left shoulder, and squeezed the trigger. The silver-tipped projectile hit the target and the tiger sprawled over the buffalo, losing its grip on its neck. It twitched its tail a couple of times, then was still. It happened so quickly that my adrenalin didn't surge until after the shot. Tiger fever set in as I stood watching for any further movement. I began to gather my regalia, keeping one eye on the tiger. This gave me time to calm down and make sure the shot had been fatal. It was.

I vacated the tree and pulled the tiger away from the buffalo. With my famous Louisiana muskrat skinner knife, which I was never without, I skinned my prize in forty-five minutes. Then I went a short distance to cut a pole from a sapling, on which I tied the rolled up skin. When I returned, four huge vultures were tugging over the skin and dragging it along the ground. Nature's instant, efficient clean up crew had lost no time doing their job with the best of tools, their strong sharp beaks. They had dragged the skin ten feet, and when I tried to pull it away from them they refused to let go. I waved my stick and hit the ground beside them as we tugged against each other. I literally had to hit one with a light blow before the rest broke their hold allowing me to recover the skin. After such a hassle they simply stepped aside and watched. I was puzzled at first that they chose the skin over the carcasses. Then I realized that the bright orange skin is what they had spotted from the air, not knowing that it was empty.

With my bedroll, skin, and rifle, I walked out to the road to find Rafiq still curled up on the back seat of the Jeep. I put the head of the tiger up against the window and banged the sides of the Jeep to awaken him. A mad scramble ensued, and he was more than relieved when I showed myself. He took it all in good spirit, but was disappointed he did not hear the rifle shot. He went to fetch the charpoy and to remove the bell from the buffalo. He came back saying he had to fight off the vultures to get to the buffalo. I related the night's events as we spread the skin on the grass, gave it a good salting, and rerolled it. To experiencing the abiding quietness of a pitch black night in a machan, with the drama of the winds and the wild life, touches both body and soul.

Meat Harvesting

My India-wide travel schedule continued, though I returned to New Delhi most week ends. Our meat supply still came from the jungle and plains, obtained while returning from trips or short forays. Much more duck and goose meat was being consumed than previously. Daybreak Saturday and Sunday morning often found me and a friend in waders walking through waist-deep water beyond New Delhi's International Palam Airport. Monsoon rains flooded low-lying grain fields of sorghum, millet, and corn, and migrating water fowl stopped to feed. We had to carefully measure each step out into the submerged, unmarked irrigation wells fields to avoid the unmarked irrigation wells. A misstep into one of them would likely mean being permanently ducked.

To make sure they would never be accused of letting daylight sneak past them, the village roosters announced its arrival all over the countryside. Second in line were a few well-spaced quacks of the blue or green teal flying sixty miles per hour down-wind, offering nothing more than a dark speeding image as a target. Big flocks of flapping, cumbersome pelican flew past in silhouette, with drawn necks and food pouches tucked away. They could be mistaken for geese by the less experienced hunters, who felt the pangs of disappointment when they found the goose they had shot was a pelican.

Appearing next on the horizon were mallards, pintails, canvasbacks, teals, shovelers, several varieties of geese, and occasionally India's rare pink and chocolate duck. The brown, downed crop stalks provided excellent camouflage under a sky streaked with smoke from dung-fueled cooking fires. At intervals the peaceful scene would be shattered by jets landing at the airport.

Not all of the pleasure came from bagging a few ducks and geese, but also from watching the morning regimen of nature's creatures. Hustling to make a living from the swamp were snakes, turtles, terrapins, fish, and flying and wading birds. Duck hawks patrolled back and forth in search of still or flying prey. Once they spotted a potential target, immediately their wings folded, and they went into a plunge at more than a hundred miles per hour, grasping their prey with piercing claws or knocking it out of the sky as a cripple no longer able to fly, literally making its prey a sitting duck. More often smaller breeds were scooped out of midair.

A snake striking at a frog who was snatching at bugs, demonstrated that if there is something to eat, there is something to be eaten by. Everything lives at the expense of something else. Man is not an exception.

A half dozen different kinds of ducks and a couple of geese were my usual bag. Eighteen in forty-five minutes was my record during two and half years hunting this spot. Our deep freeze seldom had legs than six, and at most seventy frozen waterfowl. Needless to say, we and our friends became connoisseurs, preparing these birds in an endless variety of ways.

The Transfer

I had received orders from TCM that our transfer from Bhopal to New Delhi would be effective September 1, 1960. We had about a month to close out in Bhopal. With packing, shipment, receptions, and good-byes completed, the time had come. As usual we got an early morning start for the long wearisome trip. Greenery and lingering moisture from the monsoon rains made the trio less dusty than usual. Both the station wagons, Mercury and Jeep, labored under the load of pets and people. The Mercury carried two adults, six daughters, three cats and a tiger, plus food baskets, water ins, and every child's special keep-close-to-me item. The one item that one of the daughters sadly had to leave behind however was the large wooden box laden with soil and the long growing vine for a watermelon that had sprung from a simple seed she had planted herself and meticulously nurtured for months in the open, inner veranda of the pavilion. Rafiq, driving the Jeep, followed with stacks of baggage. All cargo was special, but none more so than Cathy, as she took her place on the folded-down seat by the right rear door. No tigress ever displayed more of an air of royalty as she sat on her haunches, serene and totally absorbed in the changing scenery. She was truly the least bothersome female passenger of the six who rode with her. We all loved Cathy. But it was Cathy who was the model of good behavior. At rest and eat stops she hopped down, walked about, relieved herself, went into some stalking postures and lumped at anything that moved. Always ready to finish off her bottle of milk, she was again at peace with the world and ready to ride. Hopping gracefully back on her special seat, her regal posture and perfect deportment was resumed. Cathy got most of the attention when we stopped to have refreshments and visit with the Bohis in Agra. Wayne, Norma, Becky and Jennifer Bohl had visited us in Bhopal. He was one of a two-man team in India collecting species of same birds which showed surmise for being established in suitable areas of the U.S. Cathy seemed to know she was among strangers and that good behavior was in order. After about an hour, it was late in the afternoon and we started on our last leg of the trip. Our friends gathered around to see us pack in, with all eyes on Cathy and how she would ride. We had said good bye, turned around and were pulling out of the driveway when Mrs. Bohl yelled, "Wait a minute!" She then dashed into the house, and returned to thrust a book through the window, saying "This is for the mother of Cathy, the tiger psychologist." The book was Born Free, by Joy Adamson.

The 450-mile trek ended at the One Mansinsh Road Hotel, in New Delhi, after the reception desk had closed. The night guard had instructions nonetheless and led us to our reserved rooms. While he never said anything about Cathy, he kept his eyes glued her way. We moved into our two double rooms, tiger and all. After removing a few layers of dust, everyone was within minutes flat out. Cathy was no exception. The lone hard day had exacted its toll.

Tigress In The Hotel

Early the next morning there was a knock at the door. The sweeper appeared at the door with an early warning signal. "Mr. Singh, the hotel manager come. He heard about you tiger in the hotel. He very angry. He soon coming up stairs."

Quickly a thought came to mind to beat Mr. Singh to the punch. Slipping my robe on as I headed down the steps, I saw Mr. Singh in a hurry, on his way up with an excited face. From above, I said sternly, "Mr. Singh, I checked into your hotel late last night, with a tired wife, six fretful daughters and a worn out tiger. I am terribly disappointed that you had no place to accommodate the tiger. What kind of hotel do you run anyway?" Mr. Singh was completely disarmed.

He apologized profusely, then declared. "I did not realize you had a tiger. I have just the place you need. There is a cottage out back with plenty of room for all of you and the tiger will have room to run around in the yard. I'll send my people up to start moving you right after breakfast."

This was an excellent arrangement, complete with housekeeping facilities and space for the girls and Cathy to run about. The screened-in veranda was perfect for having tea, and for Cathy's sleeping quarters. This was our home for about ten weeks before we were due to take home leave.

School - Prime Minister Nehru-Cathy-Home Leave

Although we would be going back to the U.S. in a few months, Loretta lost no time enrolling the girls in the American International School in New Delhi. The three youngest had never attended formal school, only Mama's home school. With eagerness and enthusiasm they seemed to welcome the challenge. Mrs. Jones, the one-woman teacher, principal, and PTA, retired to become mother, transporter of children, and PTA member. Although she surrendered the main control of her daughter's education, she maintained high standards for their attendance and homework.

My role in the education process remained advisory, reading and commenting on the literary essays and borrowing the office's portable typewriter occasionally so that Christina could bang out longer term papers into the wee hours of the morning. Not to be left out, Cathy was adopted as the mascot of the Taj Tigers, the school's athletic teams. Her reign was to be brief, for our impending departure and her increasing size required that we find her a more suitable home. This prompted the following story in the Taj Times, the school paper: "SCHOOL LOSES MASCOT". The Taj Tigers are soon to lose their real-live tigress mascot, Cathy. She is to be donated to a zoo or some other such organization when the Jones family, her owners, go on home leave.

"The six-month old tigress was found in the jungle of Bhopal on April 16 and brought to Delhi in September. Cathy, who has attended one baseball game, the Taj Tigers-Woodstock game on October 15, will be given away sometime before November 7, 1960, the departure date for the Joneses."

“Cathy has some unusual habits. She picks up her ears when a child passes. She also likes to drink from a baby bottle. Cathy, who has learned to respond to her name, is said to like Mrs. Jones best of all. Whenever Cathy is eating raw or cooked meat she does not like to be disturbed.”

“The family fox terrier used to play with her, and their Siamese cats once fought Cathy. Cathy likes to Play with soft things. She once had a rubber pig which she ate to pieces. She also loves to be rubbed under the chin. The tigress cub, who sleeps on the Jones’ enclosed veranda, is taken care of by the whole family.”

With the school routine established, and Loretta’s mastery of streets and traffic well in hand, the family had settled in as far as the office car took me to and from work, and I spent the days preparing for my new assignment after home leave, and attending session meetings. I had not had such an ordered and centered lifestyle since 1956 prior to arriving in India alone. What had happened to my world? It seemed to have tilted on its axis and was rotating counter-clockwise. But it was nice to be home more with the family.

Prime Minister Nehru

To climax our stay, the girls had gotten together and sent a Loretta-prompted letter to Prime Minister Nehru saying that they would like to present him with a tiger cub. This was done unbeknownst to me. Shortly afterwards we were invited to have dinner with an Indian family and became suspicious when they insisted that all of the girls sign their names as we left. We thought this could be for a comparison of signatures on the letter sent to the PM.

In the meantime we had been hounded by the head of the U.S. two-man bird collecting team as to what we should do with Cathy. We thought he was intervening on behalf of a local wildlife dealer who sold to circuses and zoos. It was our guess that the local man had done a favor for the U.S. and to facilitate his work in India. Getting us to turn Cathy over to him was his way of reciprocating. With no response from Prime Minister Nehru, we hoped that a CBS man who had come to collect a white tiger from a maharajah would also take Cathy with him. We were unable to contact the CBS man, so we agreed to let the Indian wildlife dealer take Cathy the day before our departure. He informed us that Cathy would be sold to a zoo in the Netherlands. She had become an unwilling dropout from the International School and her role as mascot.

The last day had come. We all were losing a loved one. Chicken Little’s sky had truly fallen on all of our heads. Tears flowed in torrents as we watched the wildlife dealer disappear out of sight with Cathy walking on a leash on a clear, cool November day. Instantly, a family resolution was passed to visit her in the Netherlands. The image of Cathy being led away hindered the arduous task of setting our usual twenty-two to twenty-four bags packed and stacked on the veranda ahead of departure time.

The next morning, while scurrying around tidying up loose ends, we were amazed to see a long, black, shiny limousine drive up in front of the cottage. What is this all about? we wondered. The most we expected was a simple van to take us to the airport. A chauffeur hurriedly dismounted and walked up to the cottage veranda.

“Good morning,” he began, “I’m a driver from Prime Minister Nehru’s office. I have come to collect Mrs. Jones and her daughters and their tiger to be presented to Mr. Nehru and to have tea with him.”

Completely caught off guard, we finally managed to say, “We got rid of the tiger yesterday because we are returning to U.S. today.”

“What happened to the tiger?” he inquired.

“We gave her to a wildlife dealer,” I answered.

“Where is he?” he demanded.

“We have no idea. Yesterday afternoon he came and walked off with the tiger on a leash. He did not tell us where he was taking her. Earlier he had told us he would ship her to the Amsterdam zoo in the Netherlands.”

“I would like to find him, get the tiger, and take you with me to the Prime Minister.”

“We are terribly sorry it happened this way. To have been able to present the tiger to Mr. Nehru and share tea with him would have been one of the great moments of our lives. Please express our regrets, appreciation, and best wishes to Mr. Nehru. Our transportation to the airport is expected any moment now. Thank you for coming.” Loretta answered. The chauffeur departed. What a moment to miss, we thought, especially for the girls. Loretta and I had tea with the Prime Minister during one of his visits to Bhopal. However, a second time with the girls would have been very special.

Home Leave Number Two

Mentally set for the most direct twenty-two-plus hours flight from New Delhi to Nashville and the usual big family hassle, with customs, head-count and baggage enough to fill a medium-sized warehouse, our out-of-sync bio-rhythm journey was on. Jet flights had now replaced the lumbering, propelled, four-engine aircraft, a pleasant bonus. This trip was in keeping with our home-leave pattern, alternating with summer and Christmas, which allowed for the least interruption of the school year and gave us the chance to spend a holiday at home and to be updated on the latest Americana, every two to three years.

Just to see a live, decorated tree was a great Joy. The best we had been able to do in Bhopal was a few green limbs cut high tree an aged, distorted casuarina tree after getting special permission from the Palace office. As it had been in all previous years, it was my job to go into the forest to cut, deliver and decorate the tree. A Joyous Christmas was had by all. After contacts with kith and kin, and shopping for things not available in India, which then had to be packed and shipped our home leave vanished like vapor.

Back In Hindustan

We were never sure what the side effects were of upsetting our bio-rhythms. Whatever they were, we had by then a substantial accumulation of them having completed our fifth trip between Nashville and New Delhi. Home leave had provided a cushion against the sorrows we felt moving from Bhopal to New Delhi. Our Jet lag and memories of the loss of Cathy combined to make us hostages of lethargy at One Hansinsh Road. The need to find a new home and get the girls conditioned for school soon shook out the drag, and our daily routine was re-established.

After a short stay in our temporary quarters, house hunting had landed us in the Defense Colony community, so-called because the Indian government had made plots there available to servicemen to construct new homes. Our two-story, pale-yellow house stood well above some of the adjacent homes, but gushed tight against the lot's boundaries, leaving a narrow strip of yard on one side and just enough area in front for some grass and shrubbery. The driveway and garage left no space between the adjoining property line on the other side. Captain Balwant Singh, a very congenial naval officer, was the owner. But like all landlords in New Delhi, he knew more about U.S. government workers' housing allowance than we did. Accordingly, rent costs were set at the allowance level or slightly above. In spite of our serious attempt to negotiate, we had to supplement the rental allowance. The house was new, an architectural centerpiece by Carl Van Heina, and quite adequate for us, a not too common find within our allowance.

Continuing the tradition started in Bhopal for having separate rooms for the girls to study and read, we set aside one of the rooms off the dining room as a library-study with shelves full of books accumulated ever since Loretta's and my college days.

There was no semblance of a striking rear view. The barren lot in front was twice the size of a football field and had several shanties scattered on it. It served as one vast latrine. And what an extra ordinary view it could be at times! The early morning scene was of fifty to a hundred bare bottoms relieving themselves, with small brass pots filled with water for the after-act cleansing. Thank goodness for curtains. When gusts of wind blew across the dry area, my imagination ran wild with what the air might contain that we were breathing. Frequent blowing and cleaning of our noses was our only defense. Christina with her tender sixteen years saw a child born in one of the huts hastily constructed with leftover bricks and a jute sack for a roof. She recalled her first jolt into a world of less privileged than hers on the way to Bombay City from the airport years ago. Again she challenged me with her cosmic curiosity. "What are we going to do to help the child? What if I had been born over there in that field?" I left her to find the answers.

The house was located directly under the straight line that the crow flew. The early daylight and late afternoon skies were filled with a city-block expanse of thousands of black, flapping wings stretching as far as the eye could see. The migration lasted thirty minutes or more, the crows heading out to the farm lands to feed all day and returning in the evening to roost in town. Where they found enough room in New Delhi to spend the night, and who cleaned up after them, I never learned.

The Girls' Participation

Comforting to us was the fact that the girls were having an opportunity, some for the first time, and others after four and a half years of interacting with others in school, making friends and participating in school activities. They all adjusted well after having been steeped in the importance of maintaining a routine at their home school in Bhopal. Report cards ranged from B averages to all As. Mama didn't let them rest on their Bhopal laurels. Christina became feature editor of the school newspaper, and Anita and Estrellita served as class president and reporter. All soon developed close and rewarding friendships, in spite of having lost Cathy. There were never any problems of promotion to the next class. The overall performance in each case paralleled that of the past four years in the home school.

The church serving mostly the American community provided another focus of activity for the girls. Regular services, playing piano for Sunday school, and other youth programs kept the girls from having to repeat the Bhopal experience of minimal social interaction outside the home.

Pets Down

With our pets down to the Siamese cats only, an alltime low for us, I had an opportunity to add another. One Sunday morning while looking out of our bedroom window, I noticed a mongoose going into a road culvert. The far end of the culvert was choked with dirt. I figured it had to come out the way it went in. Rushing outside, I placed a box over the open end. Then I turned an empty five gallon kerosene into a trap. I cut out one end, then reattached it with strings poked through some holes that I punched. This gave the trap a swinging door. After more hole punching, I ran a string from the door through the can and out the back end, so I could pull the door inward. I nailed a small wooden block to the front of the can to act as a doorstop. With the door pulled open, I placed the can over the opening of the culvert. One of the girls hit at the culvert with a stick, and the mongoose ran out into the tin. I released the string and the door swung shut against the block. This resourceful boyhood operation took ten minutes. Snorting violently and biting at anything it could set its razor-sharp teeth on, the captive was successively transferred to a box which we covered with wire netting. After it calmed down, we managed to get a collar on it to which we could tie a leash. It was a mature male and did not take kindly to domestication, although captured young mongooses are reputed to tame easily and make good pets. The mongoose is known for its ability to kill snakes and rodents with lightning speed. It attacks similar to a tiger, having carnassial teeth, a pair on each side which perform like scissors to slice through meat when its ferocity is up. The cobra and mongoose were often a source of entertainment in India in street or road shows. I have seen the mongoose circle a raised, hooded cobra until there is a chance to apply his lightening-fast moves for the kill. Between the girls and the mongoose there was respect but little love and affection. His stubborn, relentless resistance to domestication prompted our letting him go.

On The Road Again

Soon after our arrival in Delhi from home leave, parenting had again become the major responsibility of our household executive, Loretta, for my new assignment again took me to the road. I had to travel back and forth, up and down and across India to locate and to persuade state officials to utilize some of the twelve million dollars worth of agricultural equipment which had been purchased by the TCM Mission for community development. My survey of about forty percent of the equipment revealed a hundred percent non-utilization. During my survey, I was once asked by a Sikh gentleman in the Punjab State a series of questions. His rapid-fire responses promoted me to stop and ask: “Why are you so forthcoming with answers, when I’m a total stranger to you?”

He answered, “You have an affidavit face. I trust you,” he responded.

Affidavit face? That’s a new one, I thought. Sounded good though.

The twelve-month assignment meant traversing India to the tune of 25,000 miles taking me to nooks and corners of the country, from the foothill of the Himalayas to the last square foot of the sub-continent at Cape Comorin. I called on nearly every state government’s agriculture ministry. The effort resulted in slightly more than one million dollars worth of equipment being put into use. But what was more important was that a much broader understanding of how it could be utilized was realized. My Budni experience had stood me in good stead.

When I had worked at Budni I had seen some equipment laying idle without having any background knowledge of why it was there. Since it was not being utilized, and had the famous AID hand clasp insignia, underscored by: “Donated by the People of The United States,” I had been prompted to demonstrate its utilization to a number of local officials, missionaries, and village farmer groups as an extension of my Budni center responsibilities. My objective had been to show that there are better ways of doing what had been done in the villages for hundreds of years. The big stationary grain thresher, utilized in the U.S. more than fifty years prior, demonstrated the principle of machine grain threshing and cleaning versus trampling the straw and grain under the feet of cattle for separation, then winnowing the chaff from the grain by tossing it by hand into the air after it had attained a substantial bullock urine and feces flavor. The machine’s size was the prohibitive feature to widespread village use but it did demonstrate a principle by which smaller more suitable models could be built locally. Within a few years, small mechanical threshers using the same principle were built in India and enjoyed widespread use.

One of my scariest experiences in India grew out of one of the demonstrations. While I was towing a stationery thresher behind my Jeep, the hitch busted near a village where the spring festival Holi was being celebrated. A large crowd was coming in my direction, singing, dancing, and dousing each other with colored water, as is the custom, and dashing off to avoid return fire. Hot, sweating, and irritated, I kneeled down over the broken piece trying to repair it. The crowd had shifted to the other side of the road and was passing. Suddenly, I felt wet hands raking across my sweat-filled eyes. Temporarily blinded, I sensed someone running away. In an automatic response, I threw the hammer I was holding. Out of nowhere the angered crowd closed, shouting and pointing their fingers at me. They then produced a person with an injured elbow, pointing at it and accusing me. Apparently the hammer had found its mark. My apology and use of my weak Hindi did little to ease their rage. Two nearby police came to my rescue and sent the crowd on with their celebration, all except the injured person. After retrieving my hammer, I offered to take him to the nearest hospital. At first he angrily refused and said he would find his own way. I had hit the young village doctor. When we reached the hospital his elbow was bandaged but found not broken, and he had become much more amenable. With some help from Rafiq, I was able to tell him who I was and what I was doing. He apologized profusely. My whole day was one of total regret. You are here to help not to hurt, my conscience reminded. I invited him and his wife, who had accompanied him to the hospital, to have tea with us at the palace pavilion, which they did.

Later I stopped at his village several times when passing through on my way to work. We became good friends. He told me later that he had summoned the police and appealed to the crowd not to be revengeful because he was to blame, not knowing who I was.

or me, it resulted in being away from home about seventy percent of the time, rivaling that of the past four and a half years in Central India. One of my trips took me to Bhopal for an overnight visit. Our pavillion there had been turned into a hotel. I registered there, and by coincidence was given the same room Loretta and I had used as our bedroom. Through my travels I realized that riding over India's roads and trails and open country is equivalent to a lot of hammering to one's sit posterior and its connective tissues. The results: an excruciating painful posterior condition. The most painful attack coincided with the end of the one-year assignment. Within several day of sitting in an upholstered office chair away from the jolting, the pain subsided, except when riding to and from work. At night and weekends there was absolutely no pain. But the sound of the horn of the office car at the front gate to pick me up brought back the awful feeling. This went on for several weeks without change. It had become psychosomatic. The pain lasted ten to twenty minutes into the ride to the office before it eased somewhat. This condition persisted, until I decided to take a week off, to go camping, trapping, and hunting in the jungle of Central India. This cured my psychomatic illness.

The Plus-One Trip

In October of our second year in New Delhi, we made arrangements for a family vacation within India. We left home in plenty of time to complete the 170-mile trip to the foothills of the Himalayas well before dark. Stuffed tighter than jigsaw puzzle pieces with eight passengers, the eight-cylinder Mercury station wagon took it all in stride as it had so many times before. After a short delay at the Jumna River Bridge, where the road and rail traffic used the same crossing, we were on the Grand Trunk Road heading north for Simia. Much of the trip was across the flat, Gangetic plains, India's major bread basket. The countryside was distinguished by a network of irrigation canals, hundreds of shallow wells with animal-powered water lifts, new green fields large herds of grazing sheep goats and cattle, and a variety of wild antelope. We passed numerous villages and ancient ruins, as well as many shrines still in use. An occasional distant rise in the landscape broke the monotony of the plains. Buzzards rode high on the air currents, searching for fallen animals. Several times they could be seen in piles like ants, devouring a carcass. They came together fast and in such great numbers that even the laziest of animals could be stripped clean in minutes. In one instance a huge flock covered the entire roof of a slaughterhouse, and a cave-in seemed imminent.

Traveling on the Grand Trunk offered the usual bumping of our rear ends. Constant rocking and rolling gave the vehicle and its load a total bashing. At times it seemed as though we were being thrown to our destination rather than riding there. No part of the vehicle got more of a workout than the shock absorbers. This all led to my coining of the expression: "As busy as a shock absorber on the Grand Trunk Road."

After close to five hours of rocking, rolling, being thrown around, and a few rest stops, we had come to Chandigarh, the newly constructed capital of the Punjab, a monument to the architect Le Corbusier. This is the only state in which Sikh religion is dominant, and Chandigarh was built to pay homage to its founders. Unfortunately, we had to just refuel and keep moving. The last thirty miles or so was a constant climb on sharp curves past scary, craggy drop-offs, and through magnificent, forested mountain slopes.

Finally, we had reached Simia, the capital of Himachal Pradesh, a landscape of lush hills and valleys. Large public buildings were located in the city center, and European-style homes were spread over a crescent-shaped ridge five or so miles long. Simia had been the summer capital of British rule, and since independence, also for segments of the Indian government. The air was cool and damp and the residents dressed accordingly, giving the city an ambience of a Swiss resort. The population fell to its winter levels of about 20,000 versus 80,000 during the warm summer months. One reason for visiting Simia during the hot months, I was told, was to see and be seen. This was, in part, a reference to the constant parade of well-dressed, sari-clad and otherwise well-to-do eye-catching ladies who caused male head-turning to become a phenomenon of perpetual motion. I vowed that some day I would return when I could stretch to the limit Loretta's mandate, "Look, but don't touch."

We made our way from the bazaar to the other side of the hill to the bed-and-all-meals home of Mr. and Mrs. Singh. He was a member of India's parliament, but spent much of his spare time at their mountain home. We had made arrangements to stay three or four days but we were never able to get an exact price quote. This gave us considerable concern as to whether we had enough cash with us to pay the bill or whether they would take a check.

Mrs. Singh, a genteel, gracious, motherly type, met us when we drove up and sounded the horn. She did a good job of not showing surprise and of accepting such a crowd as ours and the heaps of things we carried. Like most dwellings in Simia, ours had an endless view of the great mountains of India, China, and Tibet. A tasty and well-prepared welcoming dinner was served family style, with all of us sitting around the table with the Singhs. They persuaded Loretta and me to taste their homemade wine after the children went to bed. We sat around the blazing fireplace with a grogginess slowly overtaking that soon prompted us to turn in. We slept so soundly that little of what went on was very clear to us the next morning. However, there was strong evidence that we had engaged in the kind of activity that had added up six offspring over the years thus far. We awoke still in the familiar position, limp and totally relaxed of course, and the condom that I did not remember putting on had come off with a good chance of having spilled in the wrong place. Loretta was still too sleepy to discuss it. Thoughts of inordinately small cells of life flashed through our minds the next day, wondering if the unplanned had happened. Had it truly become the Plus-on trip?

The second day, Mrs. Singh accompanied all of us to the bazaar to shop. Loretta and the girls were a bit suspicious when she discouraged them buying things that caught their eye. Her attitude set us wondering whether or not she knew how much money we were carrying. The less we spent, the more we could afford to pay them for our stay. The sum of our purchase was a pair of small white marble elephants and some little packages of Indian candy for the girls.

Reading, radio, games, climbing the hill behind the house, and keeping warm and cozy around the fireplace occupied much of the time. There was an over abundance of spectacular views. We began to notice the snow-line coming closer each day pushing cooler air ahead of it, which demanded increasingly heavier clothing. Out of habit I carried my 20-gauge shot gun on short walks, hoping to add pheasant to the menu. Twice I flushed the same pheasant close to the house. Since it was slow to take off I got the impression it was tame, so I didn't shoot.

Within walking distance of the house was the monkey temple. Monkeys were spread over the temple in every possible posture; climbing, lounging, grooming one another, relieving themselves, carrying their young, and rushing up to people for a handout. The temple and the monkeys seemed unattended and the troop showed all signs of primate miseries. Some of the older males manifestly threatened to attack unless food was given to them. We kept our distance. The temple was built to pay homage to Hanuman, the monkey god, of Hindu mythology. In the Sanskrit epic, The Ramayana, Hanuman and his fellow monkeys built a bridge across the strait of Ceylon, assisting Rama's rescue of Sita, his consort, from the demon king.

At the house that night, I attempted to get some idea from Mr. Singh for what the total bill would be.

"Don't worry about it, it will be within your means," Singh replied. "Furthermore, we totally trust Americans. I think they are the most honest people I know. My experience with you folk corroborates this belief.

"Some years ago a young American man was passing through New Delhi and ran into money problems. He came to me, he said, on a friend's recommendation. After some talk about his money problems, I loaned him 10,000 rupees, strictly on the basis of his signature and promise to pay. Some years went by without any word from the young man. I took up the matter with the U.S. Embassy, but never got any encouragement that my money would be returned. After a busy week in Parliament, we decided to spend a few days here in Simia. Early one morning, someone knocked on my door and there he was. After apologizing for the delay, he went into his shoulder bag and counted out 10,000 rupees with interest. I thanked him and invited him to breakfast. He only thanked me profusely and departed, saying he needed to return to New Delhi as soon as possible. He sped off in his taxi. Only an American would do something like that," he concluded, looking me straight in the face.

The mountains in the distance had become a vast expanse of white and the snow line was just a few days from Simia. The next morning, we got the car packed even tighter than before, due to heavier clothing. Nervously, I went to settle with Mr. Singh. After paying the bill, we had just enough left to buy gasoline back to New Delhi. We always wondered whether an inventory had been made of our cash during our semi-drugged condition the first night. It was a great relief to have had enough cash to pay the bill and not have to come back years later.

We headed back down the twisting, thirty-mile run to the flat lands. The first time I applied the brakes to maneuver a curve they failed to respond. Amid shouts of, "Daddy, slow down!" I pumped the brakes madly until the car finally slowed, diminishing our chances for an upside-down view of the ravines and forested slope. With a better feel of how much pumping was required, I finally was able to get the vehicle speed and braking back into balance. Once all was under control, passenger excitement drastically reduced. We had a safe return, taking a bit longer to be bumped/thrown back south than when going north. Two days later the newspaper reported that two inches of snow had come to Simia.

We had indeed taken a Plus-one trip. All the telltale pregnancy signs Loretta had experienced five times previously gradually reappeared after a six-year hiatus. When we announced it to the girls, Christina spoke up saying, “Why are we having another child? I thought you didn’t do that any more.” The rest were mum. So were we.

Our driver Rafiq said, “I didn’t think people your age do that any more. In our place, you become only companions when you are that old.” What does he mean that old?, I wondered.

Ford Foundation Liaison

During my final two years in India, I was assigned as AID’s field liaison officer to Ford Foundation’s Integrated District Program, at Aligarh in Uttar Pradesh State. There, I completed a utilization survey on 100 sets of improved agricultural implements distributed by CARE to small farmers in the district. They were simple bullock-drawn implements: a moldboard plow, cultivator with shovels, and a planter. All were designed to be more efficient than the indigenous counterparts. My findings were as follows: a.) All farmers liked the new implements and had used them extensively; b.) All sets were in storage because there were no replacement parts; c.) All farmers were back to using indigenous implements; d.) Farmers would continue to use CARE models if repaired.

My conclusions showed it was worth the effort to have the needed parts, mostly plowshares and cultivator hoes, made locally by village artisans. This would increase the district’s self- efficiency as well as improve its farming practices. I sought out the area blacksmiths and spent time with Suni Lal, whose business was repairing the age-old implements that we hoped to replace. At his workshop, I demonstrated some revisions of his equipment, including speeding up his grinder with a cart wheel as a pulley, which was essential to shaping and finishing his fabrications. This enabled him to make replacements for the improved but worn-out plowshares, hoes, and other parts. Suni Lal was receptive, but had no regular source of steel, so I suggested he investigate the stock at the Aligarh Junk Yard.

I thought all was well until he came to me at the district headquarters a short time later. He had one problem: cash. I had failed to realize that there was no cash exchange between the farmers and the village blacksmith. He was paid for his work in grain, and had never handled money. Luckily there was a solution to this dilemma. U.S.-controlled, Indian rupees, generated from U.S. grain exports to India, could be used in U.S.-assisted development activities.

I established that this was a legitimate need, and set up an account in Aligarh, from which I could draw on a small portion of these funds. Receipts and accounts were submitted to the AID controller. My initial cash outlay was to purchase some scrap steel to get Suni Lal started. Meetings with extension workers and village leaders were held to explain that when parts were made for farmers, they would have to pay enough cash to replace the cost of materials; e.g. a meager amount for a piece of scrap metal, a few traditional farmers resisted at first, but after seeing what could be produced locally, and what it meant to their farming operations plus their strong desire to keep in style, they conceded. After a few thousand years, the germ of capitalism had finally reached down to the village blacksmith level.

There were many facets of the district program, including a workshop for teaching farm mechanic skills and maintaining project equipment. Agricultural extension was key. Even a songfest, an idea that emanated from a Ford Foundation extension advisor, was sponsored as a means of communicating improved agricultural methods and information to farmers. A large audience of villagers came to listen to compositions by a variety of groups who sang and played instruments. All renditions were supposed to carry a convincing message, much like today's rep groups. Judges determined the most effective performance and prizes were awarded. Starting in the morning, the program went well into the night and I am not sure the thing ever ended. We had failed to limit the number of groups, and didn't realize that in Indian music each song is repeated over and over. Every group took more than twice the allotted time. Entertainment had overshadowed the purpose of the songfest.

We dared not leave it all to singing. Field demonstrations at district headquarters used methods well within the means of cooperating farmers. Many Indians found it less taxing to stick with the music, but I often reminded them that I had never heard a song that had the power to increase potato or wheat production. One conversion lecture was aimed at the practice of flooding wheat fields before planting, then allowing the plot to dry out enough to seed. I had tried to convince the farmers to plant their grain crops in dry soil, then flood, saving water and time. Not until I had demonstrated the technique using both methods and having them observe the results at different stages of growth were they persuaded. The dry-planted plot surpassed the plots that were flooded and then planted. They had actually seen the convincing results.

We didn't ask farmers to do anything we could not demonstrate or was not within their means. Teaching simple practices and underlying principles to the area agricultural extension workers and helping them plan their work programs turned out to be relatively effective. One of the barriers to effective implementation across most of India was the attitude of the educated towards manual tasks. Being educated meant an escape from manual labor and setting one's hands dirty. Many felt that being in agriculture meant being equal to coolies (unskilled laborers who did heavy work for little pay). In the highly applied science of agriculture, such feelings have no place if extension is to be effective. I once attended an extension training seminar where an Indian with a Ph.D. from the University of Illinois was to open the program by being photographed holding the handles of a bullock-drawn plow. He hadn't shown up, and the seminar was held up for his arrival. He never came. Finally he sent word by a runner to start without him because in my position and at my educational level, it is not necessary in our society to be photographed holding plow handles.. I fumed under the collar. It would take time to change attitudes.

Being assigned to Aligarh brought back weekday bachelor living. My weekend commute from the field office to home and back totaled 160 miles. Parenting and the upcoming need for increased parenting was once again thrown on Loretta, who was moving rapidly towards giving birth for the last time, for sure.

Two to three of us bachelors lived in a modern, two-story house, sharing housekeeping tasks. The house was tucked away among trees, shrubs, and vines which gave it maximum insulation against the torturing sun and heat. Periodic jaunts into the nearby plains country were taken to procure any of the several varieties of antelopes for meat, to be shared with the family at home. Locally produced vegetables and some staples from the U.S. commissary in New Delhi kept us well nourished. Competitions on the tennis court, among ourselves and India counterparts, occupied much of our spare time.

During one late afternoon drive, I thought I was seeing ghosts when I spotted a figure ambling up ahead resembling Paul Hassar, the German ground engineer at the Palace in Bhopal who had been our constant visitor, and treated us each Christmas by singing “Oh Tannenbaum” in German. When I pulled up and saw it was Paul, he dashed over to the vehicle saying, “I didn’t know ghosts drove Jeeps!” We embraced in Moslem fashion.

“We ghosts get around in however we can,” I responded. “I’m assigned here now with the Ford Foundation, working down the road at the district headquarters.”

“Ferocious me, what a coincidence!” Paul exclaimed.

“And you Paul? I thought you were still in Bhopal.”

“I left about a year ago after the Nawab passed. I thought I should move on. I’m ground engineer at the university here.”

“Hop in, I’ll run you wherever you’re going.” Still a bachelor, Paul had a very adequate bungalow a short distance from the main campus that he shared with a couple of young men he worked with. Some tea, and reminiscing of Bhopal, filled the rest of the evening. I dropped by to see him several times during my stay.

The U.S. Exhibit at the New Delhi Industrial Fair

Dulal and Rose Bopujari were a diminutive handsome, Assamese couple, both strikingly beautiful by the most discriminating standards. Both were graduates from the Presbyterian-supported mission agricultural school at Allahabad. Our mutual interest in promoting the manufacture and utilization of improved animal-powered implements had brought us together several times. I had been a guest at their home and visited his small factory at Allahabad, where bullock-powered implements were being made. They had both been our dinner guests in New Delhi. I had spoken to him about a particular piece of equipment to be demonstrated by U.S. at the 1962 New Delhi Indian Industrial trade fair. I stated how simple agricultural equipment could be produced on a mass scale at the Industrial Trade Fair my discussion with officials at the U.S. Embassy about a U.S. equipment exhibit, at the New Delhi Industrial Fair. The demonstration which resulted was transforming a piece of round mild steel into a moldboard plowshare to replace the centuries-old traditional type. A big, high-speed electric hammer was set up with the capacity to do the job properly in minutes, compared to several hours by the current methods, a constant line of spectators were enraptured by what was being turned out before their eyes. Both villagers and urbanites readily identified with the meaning of the plow and its place in India's agricultural production cycle.

Dulal, an innovator, had been swamped with dreams of having the machine that would multiply his output several times. He had come to me inquiring how he could procure the piece of equipment. Contact was made on his behalf with those responsible for the U.S. segment of the exhibition to determine what would be involved in the procurement. I expected them to be delighted to keep the machine in India. It was available at a price of $5000. Dulal had about half the amount and felt he could make a trip to the U.S. to solicit help from the Presbyterian Church to raise the remainder. I assured him he would have ample time once he committed himself to buy it. After all, the multi-ton hammer was not an item that would generate flocks of anxious competitive buyers. His fund-raising journey netted the cash needed to buy for the equipment, its dismantling, transport, and get-up in his workshop. This was a gigantic undertaking, given the excessive weight and the inadequacy of Indian mechanical aids for handling heavy items. Within months Dulal had plowshares literally pouring out of his shop, together with a number of other equipment parts.

Plus One Arrival

Before I could pull completely into the driveway at 505 Defense Colony, I was met by a chorus of excited Joneses shouting, "Mama went to the hospital to have a baby!"

"How did she set there?"

"Mrs. Sprague, our next-door neighbor," they replied.

"When?"

"This morning."

We had calculated that she would go to the hospital during the week end, Friday evening to Monday morning when I would be home. She went there Friday morning. I had arrived late in the afternoon.

Repeatedly the girls declared, "We hope it's not a boy. It would be too much for a young boy to survive among this many girls." I too had begun to wonder, given my twenty years in a house of all females.

"Let's not worry about the sex, but instead hope that it's well and healthy," I responded.

Predictions by neighbors and friends that it would be a boy ran as high as eighty-twenty. This will be your first son was often adamantly declared. First and only, if a boy, I thought.

The first word at the desk when I arrived at the Holy Family Hospital in Delhi, after telling them my name was: You have a fine baby girl, wife and child are doing fine. The last one had been added.

Loretta was exhausted but smiling and awake when she saw me standing over the bed, as I held her hand and kissed her forehead with the reminder, “Your capacity to forecast is atrocious. This was supposed to happen after I arrived from Aligargh.”

“I tried hard, but couldn’t make it work,” she countered.

The little one was resting well and had no idea who I was. Once again we had added to the species not by spontaneous generation, as the girls tended to believe, but rather by the cooperation of two individuals in a state of rejuvenescence. As had been the case with the six before we readily agreed on a name. I had done all the naming except Carol. This one had to be called Loretta Jr., to signify an end to our string of offsprings, a must for us. Loretta, the beginning, agreed; Loretta Jennifer Jones, the ending had no vote. Alas! with her name, we brought to a halt the flow of offspring which had started in August 1942, and ended August 3, 1962. Twenty years can teach so much. Loretta’s accumulated experience of caring for babies automatically kicked in, in spite of a seven-year hiatus. The longstanding unevenness of sharing parenthood was still with us, since my being home only on weekends and holidays would last for at least another year. Placid and good-natured the lost little time becoming all joys and smiles. Constant attention from her older sisters was clearly appreciated but did little to slow her fast-growing independence.

The Oldest To College

The first run in our close-knit family fabric began only weeks after the last stitch had been added. Like colorful kites, the time had come for them to start flying off to college. A gradual unraveling, it would take thirteen years to complete. No matter how good the workmanship, the time is relatively short before the unraveling starts. The wish to hold on to them as long as possible is contrary to the order of things. At least ours would not be instant. Number one, Burnetta, had completed the twelfth grade at the American school in New Delhi and was accepted at Fisk University in Nashville. She had only four years of formal schooling under the Mother-Mrs. Jones arrangement, albeit some of the more critical of her pre-college study. We were for the first time up against the discomforts of being too far away to give her timely, critical, family support. Knowing that she would be near and in contact with some of our dearest and closest friends was comforting. One of her classmates would be Betty Treherne, the daughter of our long-time friend and neighbor, Dr. Treherne, who was head of Gynecology and Obstetrics at McHarry Medical College. He had been responsible for getting our family planning out of kilter when he delivered the twins, bringing the total to five instead of the preferred four. Faculty friends at Meharry, Fisk University, and Tennessee State University had given us assurance that Burnetta could rely on them if need be. Keys to our vacant home were with the Trehernes and available to her. However, we learned that she was a bit unhappy once when denied the keys, due to suspicion that a student invasion, with less than best intentions, might take place. We stood by Mrs. Treherne’s decision. News later reached us that there had been a house break-in. Students were suspected.

Representing the family, Burnetta made a presentation of a mounted Indian tiger, as mascot to Tennessee State University Tigers during their annual Thanksgiving football game. I had shot the tiger in central India, then had it mounted and shipped. The student body contributed to pay the $500 price tag. Otherwise her freshman year contained the normal share joys and irritations. Her grades were average.

A Touch of Diplomatic Action

New Delhi, being the capital and center of diplomatic playtime, meant that we became more and more steeped in receptions, dinners, and other functions. Loretta was caught up in this much more than I, since my time in town was limited. However, our guest book signatures grew rapidly, a total of ninety over a two-year period. World-renowned persons were regular visitors to New Delhi. During our time they included Queen Elizabeth, Jacqueline Bouvier Kennedy, her sister Lee Radziwill, and Vice President Lyndon Johnson. We felt privileged to see and be close to them, especially the queen on her arrival. We were simply one in the crowd, but received an invitation from our embassy to attend her departure ceremony. Loretta, Christina and I arrived at the appointed time, but no one was at the entrance to direct us. Spotting the American Ambassador and other Americans. We went straight to them. Other foreign representatives were at their appointed seats. The queen and her group were at the front, and we noticed other people entering, going first to the queen, and then to their appointed places. Loretta nudged me, saying we had committed a faux pas, and should go immediately to the queen. We did, but did not curtsy. She graciously greeted us with niceties, but then casually mentioned that we had greeted our mission people before coming to her. There was no reprimand. Instead, we think the Embassy crew preferred us greeting the Ambassador first. Little did we think our second-oldest daughter, who greeted the queen, would one day be awarded her doctorate degree from the University of London by the Queen Mother.

Good-bye to India

May had been at first freakishly cool, but more than half gone. New Delhi was back to being nature's closes thing to a furnace. The school year was over, all were promoted to the next higher grade, resigned from extra-curricular activities, and were busy closing out seven and a half years in one of the world's most interesting countries. Little Loretta was close to one year old and the smiling and independent ruler of her playpen, but too young to share in the memories of the family's great moments in India. Hers would start with Africa. We all knew it was time to move on, but to leave was more wrenching than we had anticipated. During our exhilarating and difficult moments amidst the heat, dust, bugs, and amoebic dysentery, we had made some lifelong friends. The unfamiliar things had become routine. There was no getting out of India without engaging in dinners and receptions both in Delhi and Aligargh. The inscribed brass bucket given as a memento from Aligargh read: "To Harold M. Jones in Grateful Appreciation For Your Valuable Service and Advice. From The Aligargh District Intensive Agricultural Project Headquarter's Staff - May 11, 1963."

It was time to say good-bye to India, our many friends, and its myriad of fascinations and problems covering every aspect of the human condition. We would miss its monuments to tales of great history, its unmatched ecosystems, the growing elements of modernity existing side by side with old traditions and customs in which class and caste were clearly still distinct. In a small way, we had helped to put in place some bits of agricultural production technology necessary to close the gap between meals and mealtimes for its escalating millions.

Saddened were the hearts of our household help, Lal, who had accompanied us from Bhopal, and Rafiq, the driver, as we piled our warehouse-load of luggage in the van and pulled away from 505 Defense Colony. Among our AID co-workers who saw us off to the airport was Dr. and Mrs. Douglas Ensminger, head of the Ford Foundation in India, who had offered me a position in their India program, which I promised to consider. The Pan Am 707 lifted through the heat-laden, cow-dung and wood-fire scented air, dimming out the vast expanse of New Delhi's lights as it climbed into the black star-spangled night, with its nose pointed towards the Middle East.

CARLETON S. COON, JR.
Economic Officer
New Delhi (1956-1959)

India Desk Officer
Washington, DC (1965-1968)

Carleton S. Coon, Jr. was born in France on April 27, 1927. He served in the U.S. Army from 1945-1946 and received a bachelor's degree from Harvard University in 1949. His career in the Foreign Service included positions in Frankfurt, Damascus, New Delhi, Rabat, Kathmandu, and Washington, DC. Mr. Coon was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on October 26th, 1989.

Q: All right. Then you moved to New Delhi.

COON: Yes.

Q: This was from '56 to '59 as Economic Officer. What was the situation in India at that time as we saw it?

COON: I might mention, because it was one of my more brilliant memories, that my wife and I chose to drive there from Damascus in a Ford station wagon. This was considered very crazy, and at first was vetoed by the State Department, but I lobbied while I was back in Washington, got permission to do it. It took us a lot longer than we expected and I spent half my time underneath the Ford, rather than in it, trying to fix its shock absorbers and one thing and another...

The only paved roads I saw between Iraq and Pakistan were in the cities, so we were somewhat notorious on our arrival in Delhi. And I was in the Economic Section and I was supposed to report on industrial development, five-year plan matters, and population, and stuff like that.

Q: In India, what were the sort of major developments going on in India at the time you were there, that were of interest to the United States?

COON: There had been a war with Pakistan, the first major war, and the Indians had been aided by the Russians, and the Pakistanis by the Americans. And there was a great deal of feeling about American arms aid to Pakistan. The country had basically been pro-western, pro-American until then but was full of very serious doubts as to its future orientation. Nehru was very much in the ascendancy. He was making marvelous speeches all over the place, was furnishing me with a wonderful case study in how you pull a disparate bunch of people together and instill a sense of nationhood in them, and get them to work together. The democratic processes was still rather new and were shaking down. I mean the political process, the judiciary and so forth, was in place from the British days. A lot of things were in place from the British days, railways, administration, a whole lot of things. But how does a country of 450 million -- I think about in those days, or maybe 350 million when they were independent. How does a country of 350 million, soon to be a billion people, govern itself in a democratic fashion?

And I did examine in depth some questions. I wrote an analysis, for example, of what socialism really means to the average Indian -- something quite different from what it means to the average American.

But basically I was running around the country a great deal. I was traveling a lot and looking at factories, and looking at various developments here and there.

Q: What was your impression of the Indian economy at that time? I mean you were looking at this, you could see it was already approaching a half a billion people and nothing was stopping it. It was still a relatively poor country. What was your impression about its future on the economic side?

COON: I find it hard to separate out my impressions at that time from my impressions subsequently because I've been involved in Indian affairs so intermittently ever since, and not just from a Kathmandu perspective. But I don't recall believing anything at that time of a fundamental nature that I've had to change since then. I mean nothing has happened since that has really surprised me in terms of my basic analysis. For example the gradual but increasingly rapid emergence of a modern India sort of sitting on the shoulders of traditional India. So you had hundreds of millions of people in the villages living -- the women gathered and gossiping around the well -- and essentially a bullock driven economy. Not much different from the kind of life style of a couple thousand years ago, and not improving very much except for certain elements of public health which made it possible for the population to increase much too rapidly.

And then you had an industrialized urbanized educated India with an elite sitting on top. A lot of rather restless factory workers and dispossessed urban people. And it was a totally different society which was rather like American society in that American society was fed and formed by a process of immigration, but from outside. Whereas in India this society is being fed by immigration from within the country. And that picture has stayed with me, and has stood me in good stead since then. And I think that is a structural view of India that makes sense and holds up over the years.

Q: How did the two sorts of official societies get together? I'm talking about the American diplomat, and the Indians. I mean here you have in some ways, as somebody from the outside described, as two highly vocal groups full of advice for the other. They often got spurious advice, and they're really rather disparate in a way, aren't they?

COON: No. I think what you need to do in dealing with an Indian official is to forget your restraint and let yourself run off at the mouth. They love it. I remember I went to Bhopal, and I was going to see the Secretary of the State Planning Commission. I had set up an appointment with him and I went around to his house and he carefully served me some tea. We sat down and he said, "Now, Mr. Coon, before we start on planning I want to ask you a question. What is the meaning of life?" So I answered that, took me about 15 minutes, then he had about 15 minutes, and we got along fine -- a wonderful time. Since then, since I've been on the Indian desk on several occasions, I've had occasion to argue at great length with my Indian diplomatic friends about various aspects of our policy, and their policy. And I find sitting down and making a very articulate persuasive presentation involving kinds of legalistic arguments, and Brahminical arguments they hadn't thought up before, really appeals to them. And they'll come back and they'll come up with new arguments which their government hasn't sanctioned and you'll have at it. And by the time you get through, you'll go away and you will be in complete agreement as to what good fellows you both are. Even though neither one of you has budged a bit from his government's position. But you will go away with a better feel for what makes the other fellow tick, and that is important.

The Indian diplomat tends to be rather full of rhetoric, and in the last analysis he gets into a discussion like this, and the discussion becomes more important than the substance. It's more important to him to have a good bull session, than it is to score points. Americans who are capable of that kind of verbal effervescence, seem to get along quite well with like-minded Indians. I mean certainly I give myself a credit for a high content of BS, but I'm nothing compared to the great master of all times in that department which was Chester Bowles. And Chet got along fine with the Indians. He got along too well with them.

Q: Well now, let me ask the obvious question; you have the quintessential Vermont Yankee there -- Ellsworth Bunker -- whom I would think would be just the reverse. How did he get along with the Indians.

COON: He got along fine with them, and that's a very good point. I never quite understood it because he was very laconic, very shrewd, tight-lipped but...I guess they valued him because he was effective. The smarter ones knew that he was effective; the same reason they didn't really value Chet, for all they loved him. Because he wasn't effective in Washington, and Ellsworth was.

Q: Maybe an essential point that we're talking about is, how did you in the embassy -- I'm speaking of the embassy as such, and the officers in their field -- feel about dealing with Washington. Because we were at the time when we were almost always at odds with the Indians because the Indians were doing things in the Third World that we felt were wrong and in a way there was almost a sense of betrayal that they weren't on our side, and they were siding up too often with the Soviets. Were we trying to understand what they were doing and trying to pass that on to Washington, or did you feel that we were just reporting on what these beastly Indians were doing?

COON: Well, the area in which I was supposed to report really was way outside the domains that you're talking about. I was supposed to report on whether in fact they were putting in heavy weapons, or having a machinery plant up in such and such a place with Soviet aid, and how it was coming along, and what was the outlook for such and such a dam project. And what were the contours of the second and third five-year plan, what were the dynamics. I mean, what was the process that helped them determine how to allocate their resources. So I was working on that side of things pretty much.

I did mention that I did a report on socialism. I think I got pretty good marks from the embassy for that one. Ellsworth noted, and liked it, and Carol Laise who was then in the Political Section, took particular interest in it. I mean it was the first time she'd noticed me, and then I think it was probably good for my career that she did. But in that I tried to explain socialism in terms of what had happened in the Indian villages. And the equation in the Indian village mind between the village banya, who was the money lender at notorious rates, and capitalism. And what happened in the 19th century was that the banyas took their money from the villages and moved into the cities and established factories. And the villages started getting over populated and as excess population drained off from the villages into the cities they found themselves working in factories for the same banyas at the same extortionate practices. So this business of anti-capitalism had very deep roots.

And when the Americans came in, they came in with a totally different set of business practices, and ethics, but they came into an area, and to a public opinion that had already been pretty deeply polluted by these other events. And they couldn't understand why they weren't making out. There was a lot more to it than that, but essentially I was trying to explain something about India to the U.S. government, and it worked. It was helpful. That despatch has been quoted and was used in various ways.

Q: There was a feeling then that the embassy was playing a role of almost intermediary between these...

COON: Not intermediary, interpreter. There's a difference. Interpreter, yes. Intermediary, no. I don't think, certainly not during Ellsworth's time, that we found ourselves as an embassy in the position of advocacy. I think Ellsworth managed to avoid that. With Chet it was different, of course. Chet was totally an advocate of the Indian position. And as I say, he was less effective and credible in Washington as a result.

Q: Just touching on the Indian arms business. Communist China had attacked India up in the Himalayas, and had defeated them rather soundly and we were organized in an emergency arms aid program to them. Had this helped things with us with the Indians, turned things around at all?

COON: It helped enormously for a little while. But John Kenneth Galbraith made one of the great classical misperceptions of South Asia. I don't suppose you'll get this coming out of him, but certainly it was my perception, from where I sat, and I think a detailed study of his policy messages to Washington would bear out that his basic approach was that, "We have built up capital with the Indians by arming them against China. We have built up capital previously with the Pakistanis by arming them against Russia. Now is the time for us to cash in our chips, and get a Kashmir settlement that once and for all will get rid of this animus between India and Pakistan." Well, you can see the magnitude of the misconception. The animus not being based solely on Kashmir. Kashmir being as much a symptom as a cause. And the sheer arrogance to think that we had enough chips to effect something this basic. But Kenji for all his brilliance, and he is a brilliant man, and he's a very likeable man. He is a very articulate, and humorous guy. As an individual I find him enchanting. But this was a colossal error on his part. And he has enough of an ego so he would not suffer being told that it was a colossal error. He somehow saw the Kashmir problem as a kind of fiendishly complicated jigsaw puzzle, which only he had the intelligence to solve. So he sat there with maps, and charts, and generals, and statesmen, and so forth, and he snookered the British High Commissioner into joining his camp. And he coozied the Indians and the Paks up to a certain point where Nehru suddenly...Nehru went along with this for quite a while just to keep Kenji happy and to keep the arms coming from America because he needed them badly at that point. But as soon as Nehru saw that Kenji was getting into a position where he could do something affecting Indian interests, basic interests, as India perceived them, Nehru wasn't there anymore. He pulled the rug out from under leaving Kenji spinning. And the dispute simmers on. The goodwill that we gained from arming India was very rapidly dissipated.

The other thing Kenji did, he did manage to ram this through to a successful conclusion, an air defense agreement between India and the United States where we could come to India's defense. It was almost but not quite a treaty alliance, or a security treaty alliance relationship. It wasn't quite that because the Indians, even in their moment of maximum desperation, were not about to sign up as military allies of the United States. But it was a lot closer than they were comfortable with but Ken managed to get them to sign that. That was '73, I think. In '76 was it, it was not very much later after Tabriz when I was back on the India desk...it was only a couple of years later, after the air defense agreement had been signed, that I accompanied some National War College group to talk to some high Indian brass...

Q: You talking about '66? I have you on the Indian desk from '65 to '68.

COON: The air defense agreement was before I went to Tabriz. That was '63, and when I came back I was on the India desk, '65-'66. It was in that period. I'm sorry. I'm mixing my '60s and my '70s up. I had this occasion, in a couple of years it was as though the air defense agreement didn't exist. No, it was later than that, it was in '68. I was a student at the National War College. They had a top Indian general who was there talking to the National War College and the students gave all the pre-programmed questions. Then I asked him about the air defense agreement. He was totally startled, totally lost his composure, and he pretended he couldn't remember it. It became a dead letter, in other words, almost while the ink was still wet.

So those were Kenji's two achievements, and the way he blew the credit we got. It was by an unsuccessful attempt to ram a Kashmir solution down the throats of the unwilling Indians and Pakistanis, and through the conclusion of an air defense agreement that was dead the moment it was signed.

Q: Looking chronologically you went to Tabriz as principal officer.

COON: Yes. I had about seven or eight, nine very vigorous months working on this arms business for India, and then I went to Tabriz.

Q: On the Indian Affairs, did you find...just to give somebody whose coming from outside a feel between the two desks. You're saying Pakistan, Afghanistan on one side, and then there was another. You were in charge of the Indian, Nepal, and Ceylon side. How did the two organizations work together? I mean, were there problems tending to...

COON: Bruce and I always got along fine. We didn't have any problems -- occasional problems with Sid on something or other, but that was not Indo-Pak, it was econ-political. We didn't have anything serious there either. No, the office as a whole presided over this situation. And then the office was subsequently broken up by the Country Directorates System into basically a Pakistan Country Director, and an Indian Country Directorate. And everybody agreed that this might be a good idea in West Africa or someplace, but a lousy idea in South Asia because it meant that inevitably advocacy penetrated a level higher in the Department. And it did tend to work that way.

Q: Were there any major problems at this particular period?

COON: We had the perennial problem of arms aid to Pakistan. I think Chet Bowles was there, yes, during this period of '65-'66-'67. I think that was Chet's second incarnation there, and he was, of course, constantly trying to remind Dean Rusk about India being the world's largest democracy, and our stake in India, and what were we prejudicing it all for, for this army of Pakistan.

Q: What was the rationale, and how much did those of you who were looking after the political side, subscribe to our strong military support of Pakistan which obviously was souring relations with India?

COON: I never got too worked up over it. I argued rather vigorously with my Indian friends that they should understand this, and that they should swallow it, and that they were much bigger than Pakistan, and much stronger, and that this wasn't going to hurt them. They argued that it was hurting them, and that Pakistan was the enemy, and I just didn't understand the ancestral antipathies. Whereupon I would explain that I did understand them and give my interpretation of them, and we get off into that. And then we'd end up good friends but not changing.

Q: What was our rationale, and how well founded was it, of putting so much arms into Pakistan?

COON: I think our Pakistan policy has always been one of the more complex national, bilateral policies, that we've had in the Department. Pakistan has so many facets, and so many different ways it impinges on U.S. interests that balancing them out has always been a very, very tough thing. And, of course, early on, in the '50s our rationale was the Cold War rationale. Here we saw Pakistan standing stalwartly facing the Soviet threat, and pretty much blind to the fact that Pakistan was stalwartly facing mostly the Indian threat as they saw it. Later on the thing got complicated as nuclear proliferation became an issue. And I did have a considerable role to play in the late '60s, the period we're talking about, as sort of the Indian nuclear guru and I got to know a whole lot of people who were in the non-proliferation business, and helped advise them on how to keep the Indians from developing the bomb. And our policy worked during the '60s. It wasn't until a little later that Indians went and got the bomb. But that's another story.

Q: We do keep hopping around...

COON: That's my fault.

Q: No, no. It's mine. I would like to dwell on this but I know there's a time constraint here.

COON: My only constraint is I've got a house guest arriving about 11:00. Other than that my time is yours.

Q: We'll move to...you were in the War College. Let's talk just a little about the nuclear side. Did we feel in India that they were on brink...what could you, at the desk level, do to stop nuclear proliferation?

COON: The first thing, and the most important thing I could do was, stop the U.S. government from threatening the Indians with retaliation of various sorts if they did go ahead with the bomb. Because they would have gone right ahead just to show that they weren't subject to U.S. blackmail. The second thing I encouraged, I wasn't exclusively responsible for this: I encouraged a meeting of peer groups on both sides -- scientists, economists, strategic thinkers, and so forth. They organized a series of basically non-government think tanks. I think the first took place in Poona around '68, in which eminent American scholars got together with their Indian opposite numbers and discussed the pros and cons of Indian nuclear weapons programming from India's point of view as they saw it. The Indians respected this kind of thing, being consulted as equals and having their two-bits in. And they were equals. I mean, hell, they could argue with us 'til the cows came home.

This negative approach of not threatening them, this positive approach of intellectual discourse outside the strict inter-governmental framework, I think was reasonably effective. The Indians themselves were very divided as to whether to go ahead with the weapons program or not. And a negative approach did not strengthen the proponents, while the positive approach did strengthen the other.

Q: Who were on the negative side within the Department, or within the government?

COON: Do you mean the Indian Government?

Q: No, our government, on the negative side of trying to use the threatening position?

COON: I think it was tending to be a kind of visceral reaction of some of the "hard nosed" managers of foreign policy up at high levels -- "God damn, if the Indians are going to do this, they ought to know that such and such..." But it really wasn't a big enough issue to command their undivided attention, as they were always busy doing something that was capturing headlines, and this was not capturing headlines. I can't give you an office by office rundown on this, but ACDA was always off in left field someplace.

Q: That's the arms control...

COON: They required more educating than most, and SP was pretty good at that point.

Q: SP being?

COON: Policy Planning. I think it was Ray Garthoff or somebody was up there at that time. And there were various other power centers that were concerned with this around the Defense Department, the NSC, and various parts of the Department. I dealt with all of them, and then they would deal with each other without me on other things, and then with me on the Indian nuclear thing. On the Indian nuclear thing I packed a good bit of clout because I was the only one that knew the subject at hand.

EUGENE ROSENFELD
Information Officer, USIS
New Delhi (1956-1960)

Eugene Rosenfeld began his government service in the Census Bureau. When the 1940 Census was over, his background in journalism led to a position in the Office of Emergency Management (later called OWI). Mr. Rosenfeld's career included positions in India, the United Kingdom, Tanzania, and Ethiopia. This interview was conducted by Jack O'Brien on November 28, 1989.

ROSENFELD: I was offered the job of Chief Information Officer in India -- New Delhi -- I was delighted and so was Chris.

By this time we had four children which I think caused some people to say, "Hey, you can't take four kids to India at this stage of the game." We said, "Well, we will worry about that. We think we can do it," and we did.

We went off in, I guess it was, April of 1956. We arrived in New Delhi. It was 118 degrees at the airport. Every one of us was sick except me. Fortunately, Abe Rosenthal, the NY Times correspondent, who was an old friend from U.N. days, and his wife Ann, were at the airport to meet us -- we had told them we were coming.

They had provided an ayah and a bearer and a car, so we all -- there was somebody from USIS there with me -- went off to a hotel that was less than acceptable. I will not give the name of the administrative officer who did this. When I complained about the cramped, non-air-conditioned quarters, he replied, "Well, I was just trying to save you some money." He really meant his budget, because temporary housing could have provided for far better accommodations for a good period. At that time, in our condition, we were not interested in saving money. As a matter of fact, after about a week of it I was ready to pay our own way back. We were so sort of depressed and scrunched, but this is something for everybody to remember. Coming into a tough assignment -- and I do not know if they are still as tough as that, maybe they are -- you have got to stick it out, because this is the discipline of the Foreign Service, even having to attend or give a reception when it is 98 and you have got to stand up there for two hours shaking hands with people you do not know and you probably will never meet again. That is important to do. It is a discipline that helps keep you straight.

Anyway, the Indian assignment began to shape up pretty quickly. I was supposed to replace Bill King, who was the Chief Information Officer, and there was about a two-week overlap, of which Bill graciously gave me fifteen minutes to tell me what to worry about. He didn't really tell me even that. He just told me what a lousy place it was and what I ought to watch out for, but not anything to do with the job.

It was not a very -- it did not look to me like a very happy post, although the PAO was a very good guy but he had his own approach to things, which was very relaxed and not really very directional in terms of the people who were working for him -- but a lovely guy, anyway. I guess I learned something from him, which is: be relaxed.

After three months I went to him and I said, "Tom, for God's sake, what am I supposed to do here? I am under three feet of water and I do not know where to go. I have eight Americans responsible to me. I have a budget of about $10 million and five hundred Indian employees scattered all over the place. I don't know what the hell is going on."

He said, "You are doing terrific, Gene. Hang in there."

I said, "Come on, Tom, tell me, where am I going wrong?"

He said, "Oh, no, that's okay. You're doing okay."

As I said, a lovely guy, but no help at all. PAO's have to lead. The deputy -- he may have read a newspaper at one time but he didn't really know very much about information at all. Decades before, a missionary social worker in Bombay where his main job was to try to convert the prostitutes into the straight and narrow, but he was a decent guy who eschewed all forms of liquor, so when he had a representation thing he would provide rather weak orange juice. People who were there at that time will know who I am talking about.

It should be something that we should remember, that the Agency should remember, in sending somebody out. I don't suppose it is a problem anymore, but this business of overlap should be taken seriously. If somebody is going out to a new post, especially a young or uninitiated officer, he ought to have sufficient time with the incumbent and that the incumbent ought to be under strict orders, no matter how difficult, how much he wants to get out of there and how difficult it is to get things packed and all the rest of it, that he must have to devote a significant amount of his overlap time to getting his successor on track.

One of the things I discovered pretty quickly in India was that the political office and the embassy were absolutely stupid when it came to dealing with the press. Abe Rosenthal and Jimmy Greenfield, who was there for Time, took me aside pretty quickly and said, "You had better do something about these guys. They haven't got a clue. They don't know what is going on. If they do, they are not going to tell us anything. We simply cannot have any kind of feeling for what they are trying to do if they treat us like we are a bunch of spies."

So I felt that this was very, very important to do and I began to try to educate political officers. Maybe this is something that still needs to be done. I have a feeling that political officers are a little bit more sophisticated about this now, don't you, Jack?

Q: Yes, yes, indeed.

ROSENFELD: At that time after setting up an interview, you would bring a newspaper man in and the officer would be sitting at his desk reading a telegram, and as soon as we walk in he takes the telegram and puts it in a drawer, turning it over, hiding it from sight, which is not exactly a good psychological beginning for a discussion on important political matters.

John Sherman Cooper was ambassador when I arrived, but he was not in India at that time except for about three days to say goodbye. He was back in Kentucky running for the Senate.

There was a career officer in charge who really did not have any feeling at all for press relations even though he had to run this embassy at a difficult time. We were in bad shape there because of the Dulles arms-aid-to-Pakistan policy, so we were on a rocky road.

Ellsworth Bunker came in early 1957 and was very forthcoming with me. He asked me what I wanted him to do and I told him. I said, "I think you ought to get together with the American press at least once a week and once a month with the Indian press. You can have it off-the-record if you want, but you should have it a very outgoing relaxed thing, because, frankly, you are going to learn more from them than they are from you. You are going to be able to ask them questions about what's going on because they are out on the street, they are talking to people, they are talking to cabinet ministers, they are traveling up and down the country and they are going to give you a lot more information than you may be from your own political officers in certain areas. I am not running down the political office, I am just saying this is an additional dimension for you to get."

He agreed, said it was a good idea. So we established what became an institution. Every Wednesday the guys came in. Now, this turned out to be very good except one time.

This is one of those stories you can either use or throw away. It is a story that I remember because it was important to me. It was -- let's see, in the U.S., 1958 was an off-year so the newsmen wanted to get the ambassador's feeling on the congressional race.

They asked, "How do you think it is going to go? Do you think the Democrats are going to get a majority or the Republicans, or whatever?" He said, "I don't know. I can't really tell. All I know is that I try to keep my host country informed of as much as I know."

He continued, "I remember when I was ambassador to Italy and Mr. De Gasperi, the prime minister, called me in and wanted to know what was going to happen at the time of the 1952 election. This was when Taft and Eisenhower were competing for the Republican nomination. "He knew that Eisenhower was pro-Europe and Taft had been making a lot of strong statements about cutting off aid. So De Gasperi asked me, 'What is going to happen?'"

Bunker continued, "I just told him, don't worry about it. No matter who wins, the policy has been set. Aid to Europe, especially to Italy, will continue because of the political factors that exist in the United States today."

Then he said, "Fortunately my bluff wasn't called. Eisenhower was elected."

Everybody thought that was a good story and that was it.

Next week one of the guys who had been out of town asked: "Mr. Ambassador, what do you think is going to happen in this upcoming election?" Bunker went through the same story again with the same group of guys.

The following week, believe it or not, the same thing happened and he told the same story again. So the DCM looked at me and I looked at the DCM and he said, "You are going have to try to tell him, Gene." I said, "No, I'm not. You're his number two. You are going to have to tell him that he just can't tell that story anymore."

The following week he told it again! When I got back to my office there was a call for me from Pat Killen of the United Press. Pat said, "Gene, what was that wop's name?" I said, "Pat, go bleep yourself." That was the response of a tactful, diplomatic Foreign Service Information officer!

Anyway, that was funny. What was not so funny was Arthur Goodfriend. You may remember Arthur Goodfriend.

Q: Very well, yes.

ROSENFELD: Arthur Goodfriend was a total disaster. He thought he was going to save the world and damned near destroyed us in the process.

By then Ken Bunce was PAO. A finer guy and a more devoted and conscientious one never lived. He really worked hard and he knew what he was doing. He had been a history professor and when he had a USIS-India staff meeting he would take his watch out and put it on the table and he would proceed to talk for 55 minutes, at the end of which he would say, "Any questions?"

All of us knew Ken and all of us loved him because he was such a decent guy. Then, here comes Arthur Goodfriend with his absolute knowledge that what he was going to tell was gospel, was the truth, was the necessity for this post to follow, that it was important for us to reach the masses.

Now, in India at that time, the "masses" only ran somewhere about 450 million to 500 million people. We figured that we were going to have a hell of a lot of problems just reaching the "elite", because we figured they amounted to four or five million.

Dr. Goodfriend was absolutely certain that he was going to turn everything around, make America the beautiful and beloved to the Indian masses. Of course, he was full of crap and created an enormous amount of tension in the sense that he was seeking to subvert people away from the program that we had conscientiously, devotedly -- midnight oil -- organized so that we all understood what our function was. Goodfriend wanted to throw all this out and concentrate on "reaching the masses."

Anyhow, another thing that bothered me was my concern at CIA involvement with certain newspapers -- bribes, peddling highly tendentious material, buying off newspapers -- of course, without telling us anything about it. I mean, somebody in the USIS Delhi office would come up and say, "Hey, look at this story (in the Umbala Gazette or wherever), did you ever see this?" I looked at it and said no, I didn't think that was one of ours -- a pretty good story, though, very anticommunist. But I suspected something unorthodox was going on. And I began to resent it.

I was in a quandary, I could go to the station chief and say, "Hey, why don't you stop this stuff? It is not doing you any good. All it is is creating problems for us and it just makes it obvious." For one thing there was this venal but communist-leaning tabloid down at Bombay, a scandal sheet called Blitz that was throwing everything back at us, including Soviet disinformation, forgeries. But we were under orders; you don't talk to the CIA and you don't deal with the CIA.

I discovered later that that is a lot of nonsense, but those were my orders at the time. This is something -- I don't know what is happening now in the Agency. Jack, do you have any inside information as to whether the CIA has placed people with USIS?

Q: I am not uptight with that, Gene, but certainly during my assignments overseas I felt complete freedom and liberty to discuss anything with any of the station chiefs that I have known.

If I did have instructions on that matter I ignored them, frankly, because it was simply impossible to do business without exchanging notes from time to time, at least.

ROSENFELD: That is not what I mean. I completely agree with that. If you came up against a situation where you think a CIA officer or station chief can give you some lead-ins on what is going on, so that you can do your job better, I see that as okay, but I remember there were specific caveats, don't let the CIA try to get you to do something for them. That was something that we had to be very careful about.

On the other hand, I always felt that the less we had to do with the CIA the better. I mean, if we wanted to keep our virginity at least. Maybe I am wrong. Maybe I was being too naive about these things.

Q: A basic rule -- which I think might apply in the future as it has in my case in the past -- is that it is not, repeat not, necessary for the PAO to know everything that the other side is doing, the other side of the embassy. It is very good at times to be able to say honestly, "I don't know."

ROSENFELD: I agree. I think that is generally standard practice.

Q: Normal curiosity sometimes leads people to say, "Well, I want to know more about it" even though it does not impinge on his own territory.

ROSENFELD: Impinging on territory is what I am talking about. I think that is dirty pool. I don't think it helps anything. I don't think it won us any points anywhere.

Now, for instance, turning it around a little bit, I got a call from the reception/desk that there was a newspaperman here to see me, and the receptionist said, "He wants to see the head man." I said, "Well, you had better tell him to see -- better check with Ken Bunce."

After a minute or so she called back to say, "Mr. Bunce says since this man is a newspaperman I think you should see him." I said, "Fine, send him in."

It turned out that this young man -- let's call him Ram -- was a reporter with the Communist Party paper and working in the Communist headquarters. He was unhappy because of several things. One of them was that a member of his family had been considered disloyal by the party and had been severely beaten up or even killed, as far as I can remember. To make up for this overdone discipline the party said, "All right, Ram. You have got your younger brother who is out there in one of the provinces. We will send him to school. We will send him to college," which they never did.

The third thing that bothered Ram was that the editor of the paper had an air conditioner in his office, and that was not right for communists. Communists should be "of the people" and should suffer like the people, and he discovered that the editor was making more money than others on the paper, and that wasn't right, because everybody should make only fifty rupees a month, or whatever it was.

So I said, "Look, for one thing, I think it is not very smart of you to come in here, walk in here, because if your party is being rough on you I think you should avoid being seen publicly coming into our office.

"However, let me suggest something. Why don't you come around and have tea with me tonight at my place?" I gave him my address and he came over and he talked and talked in my air-conditioned bedroom, which he didn't seem to mind because after all, we were Americans. The other rooms were not air-conditioned!

He told me several stories about what was going on in the Communist Party headquarters. It sounded legitimate to me; I said, "Well, look, I think that you deserve -- that your brother deserves, to get some attention and go to school. I am going to see what I can do about getting him some help so that maybe you can feel better about that and feel better about us and that we can be trusted. We do not want anything from you but we think that you are a deserving fellow, so why don't you come around here again tomorrow night?"

The following day I went to the CIA station chief and related the story and suggested that he pick it up from here. I didn't want to have any more to do with this. "This is over to you."

Well, it turned out, as far as I could learn that this guy provided inside information of communist party activities from the headquarters for at least five years. It was a hell of a good walk-in. It was a great catch and I only did what I felt was needed. They did provide the guy's brother with tuition to go to college. I think we made a friend.

Q: It was a bridge.

ROSENFELD: This is the old story, evidence of effectiveness. How many Communist Party cards have you torn up today?

Q: That is right.

ROSENFELD: You can't prove that. But, it is the kind of thing that could happen in a place like India.

Q: I am told you had a total of four-and-a-half years in India on that assignment.

ROSENFELD: Yes.

Q: Your next job was where?

ROSENFELD: One more India reminiscence. Ed Murrow came out to India. He was just on his sabbatical, you remember, in 1960. He had had a fight with CBS, with Bill Paley, and he had been in the Middle East and he showed up in India. I heard he was in town. I called him and told him who I was from USIS, and asked, "Is there anything we can do for you?"

This is something I suppose that most people do. If they don't they ought to. This is something that, no matter who comes into town if he is a decent newspaper man he ought to be called up. He shouldn't have to wait to call us. We should have good intelligence, perhaps information from other newsmen or other parts about who is coming in, one way or another and call the guy and let him know. You make a lot of points that way.

Anyway I asked Murrow if I could do anything, he said, "Yes, I want to talk to you." So he came over and he talked to us for about a good hour-and-a-half. Ken Bunce came in and said hello. Ken, being not too much at ease with newsmen, sort of backed off. I think he was working on the budget or something. John Lund was the deputy and he and I talked to Ed.

At his request, we briefed him very fully about what was going on in India. That was a very important job for us.

Then I asked him, "What about U.S. politics? What is going on back there?" He said, "I haven't been back there for months," but he made it clear he was a Stevenson man.

I said, "Well, what about this guy Kennedy? He seems to be moving up pretty fast." He said, "Well, I'll tell you; last summer he called me up and wanted to talk to me, so I went up to Hyannis and we sat out in the back yard and killed a bottle -- " mostly it was Ed killing the bottle, I think, but Jack didn't mind having a drink or two.

He said, "I came away from there still -- admittedly -- I still think Adlai would be better, but I came away from there not really liking this guy because he seemed to be so sure of himself. He seemed to think that there wasn't anything he couldn't handle and there was nothing that he didn't have an answer for. So I am still hoping that Adlai will get the nod."

CAROL CLENDENING LAISE
Political Officer
New Delhi (1956-1961)

Carol Clendening Laise was born in Virginia in 1917. She received a bachelor's degree from American University in 1938. She worked for the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration and joined the Foreign Service in 1955. Her career included positions in India and Nepal. Ms. Laise was interviewed on April 17, 1989 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

LAISE: I transferred into the Foreign Service in 1955 and in 1956 I went to Delhi.

Q: How did this assignment come about?

LAISE: In large part because of my interest in going to Asia and, quite frankly, having had considerable experience negotiating with other nationals in the United Nations and in UNESCO, I was conscious of where a woman could be effective and where she couldn't. India seemed to me to be a place that, first of all, I was interested in and, secondly, I had very satisfactory dealings with the Indian delegates in all the organizations. They had the background of British administrative experience and so it was easy. Their concepts were not strange and it was easy to negotiate with them.

Q: In my small dealings with Indians -- I've never served there -- I've found them absolutely maddening when you try to pin them down on certain points. They probably felt the same towards me.

LAISE: I must tell you another factor which was that the UNESCO conference was convening in Delhi in 1956 and the Department was persuaded that it made sense that I should go out for that and then stay on.

Q: In 1956 how did you see American interests in India at the time? What were our concerns there?

LAISE: I arrived during the period of the Eisenhower Administration and, obviously John Foster Dulles didn't have much use for neutrals. I think things were changing, attitudes were changing in Washington, about the time that I went out. There was a very great interest in the United States in seeing a democratic country with the potential that India had succeed in its efforts and development along democratic lines as a model, in contrast to the communist Chinese.

Q: Were the embassies briefed to bring these neutral Indians to realize the value of joining the United States in an anti-Communist front?

LAISE: No, I'm saying that period had seemed to me to have passed because with the leadership of ambassadors such as Ambassador Cooper and Ambassador Bunker and the evolution of perception of our interest, there was greater willingness to accept the fact that a non-aligned country wasn't necessarily against us and surely it was far less costly than being aligned with it.

Q: You were there from 1956 to 1961 and you went to the political section. What were your responsibilities in the political section?

LAISE: Initially, it was for reporting on internal political developments which, of course, was very interesting. I used to attend the Congress Party sessions.

Q: This is the Indian Congress Party.

LAISE: Yes. I would follow the domestic political scene mainly because the question existed then, as it still does, as to whether or not India would be able to survive as a united country and was it politically and economically viable. There was a great interest back here in Washington in knowing how they dealt with internal conflicts and what the emerging problems were that would lead to what the Indians called the vociferous tendencies to overwhelm the stability of the Indian state.

Q: These interviews are designed for people who are interested in American foreign affairs but perhaps don't know too much about how we operate. Here you are, a political officer in a tumultuous democracy, a huge country. How did you operate?

LAISE: Basically, I developed relationships and attended open party meetings to maintain an insight into where the balance of power was, what the underlying issues were, and how serious the language problem was. After all, they had parliament there and so one cultivated relationships with members of parliament to get their insight into how all these problems were being dealt with. We in the Embassy attended national events which would give us further insights such as at the Congress Party meetings. I knew officials of the Congress Party fairly well, but since we had consulates with political officers in other parts of India, we didn't try to follow the details in Bombay or Madras or Calcutta because our consulates followed that. Essentially, we factored those perceptions into a national perception reports that we did regularly, and particularly at the time approaching elections.

Q: When you say "cultivate," how does one cultivate a relationship of this nature?

LAISE: Indians are very open and willing to talk. The best and most useful of doing it is to go and call on them or invite them around to your house for tea or coffee. That's a much more popular way of social interaction, at least among the Indians I'm talking about where you are basically dealing with members of parliament, than with what we usually think of in terms of evening social occasions. Also, India had a very extensive press. The Indian journalists were extremely informative. I remember the ambassador used to hold periodic and regular informal press conferences with the Indian press just to keep them informed of the U. S. policies and to explain to them questions they had so that before issues grew up between us, they the background. I always attended those. Because India is an open country and a democracy, between the press, the members of parliament, and then traveling in the consular district which Delhi covered -- the state government that I was most familiar with was the Punjab which now, as you know, is the source of great problems in India.

Q: There is a separatist Sikh movement going on there.

LAISE: At that time, while the Sikh were very prominent in local politics, they had not split off from the center.

Q: Did you have any dealings with Krishna Menon who was the stormy petrel of Indian politics who drove various administrations up the wall? At one point, he was Minister of Defense.

LAISE: Yes, he was. I did, indeed, know Krishna Menon mainly because I knew him here at the U. N. before I went to India. His attitude was extremely interesting. When I first met him in India, he asked me whether I was a political appointee or a career Foreign Service officer. I said that I was a career Foreign Service officer, after which he had nothing to do with me. [Laughter] He thought we were useless, that the bureaucrats were not ones that he could successfully exercise his charms on. He just didn't think much of professionals.

Q: Were there any other figures who were prominent at the time that you dealt with particularly?

LAISE: I knew Mrs. Gandhi. At that point when I was there she was simply the daughter of the prime minister. I got to know some of the old Congress Party leaders who had helped in the independence movement. [One of them] was also a member of parliament and was a neighbor of mine [and his name was] Acharya Kripalani. He appears in the film on Gandhi. He was a prominent Gandhi-ite.

A member of the opposition I knew quite well was Minoo Masani. After I came back to the Division of South Asian Affairs, I arranged trips for both leaders and delegations of the parliament and grew to know them.

I guess the person I knew best was the president of India because I had known him in UNESCO.

Q: How did some of these figures feel about the United States? What was their attitude? It had moved away from a confrontational policy but it was not a very close relationship.

LAISE: It's been a prickly relationship all along, perhaps because we have a lot of things in common. [Laughter] It's not easy for two democracies, two large one, to get along with each other very well. Both of us are sensitive to criticism and that makes it difficult. Basically, I felt that Indians have always had a friendly feeling about the United States, but we have gone on several swings of the pendulum. During the period of the Chinese attack on the Indians in 1962 at the same time as the Cuban missile crisis, I was recalled by Galbraith to India to help out because I did know so many prominent Indians and the embassy had just turned over. He needed as many people to establish contact as he could. The present name of the president of India is Radhakrishnan, and Radhakrishnan was one. He was president at that time. General Thimayya was one of the chiefs of the Army staff that I knew quite well. I had many contacts that he needed at that point, so I went back. The interesting thing was that the Indians then were saying, "Oh, for John Foster Dulles," because here they were under attack by a communist --

Q: This was the border war where the Chinese had taken quite a bit of territory and the Indians had not fared very well.

LAISE: They didn't take a lot of territory. They invaded, but much to the astonishment of the Indians and not to the astonishment of our Chinese analysts -- when I arrived in November of 1962, the Indians were certain they were coming down to Calcutta. They were in a panic, but instead, the Chinese having made their point, withdrew beyond the McMahon [Phonetic] line. They didn't take any territory, but at that point India was wanting the United States to be so anti-Communist that we would pour a lot of military equipment in to India. We were much more measured in our response, (a) because our estimate of the Chinese threat was different from theirs, and (b) because of the effect in Pakistan. At that point the United States was responsive, and Kennedy was seen as very sympathetic to the Indian cause.

Then things went backward again during the Indo-Pak war of 1971. I was in Nepal at the time, but the Indians have never forgiven us for sending the aircraft carrier "Enterprise" into the Bay of Bengal. The Indian ambassador in Kathmandu, who again was a very old friend, a very distinguished Indian, said he never, in his wildest dreams, thought the United States would threaten India, and this would never be forgotten.

Q: Going back to the time that you were in India, 1956 to 1961, how was the embassy viewing Pakistan?

LAISE: That was a period in our relationship where our embassies in Pakistan and India were working in team work. It was also a period when the relationships between India and Pakistan were not so strained. You see, the Chinese first moved into Indian-claimed territory in the west, not the east, in 1962, but the disputed territory in the northwest area of India, the Chinese had moved in. When the Indians discovered it -- this was in 1959 -- Krishna Menon came immediately to Ellsworth as ambassador and made an urgent request for airplanes to get supplies up to the area to get them better prepared and to establish a presence there to reinforce their claims, because they didn't know what the Chinese were going to do. The United States did respond with planes very quickly. This was a period of our relationship with India.

Also it was a harmonious one in our handling of the Tibetan refugees. You see, 1959 was also the time that the Dalai Lama came across and the Tibetan refugees began to come in large numbers. The Indians initially were very leery of our helping because they were afraid we would turn it into an anti-Communist exercise, beat the drums, etc. They obviously wanted to assist the refugees and keep native Tibetans friendly to the south rather than to the Chinese. We had a common goal, but they simply didn't want to beat the drums on the whole matter. At that time they did not know whether they could ever bring the Chinese around to reconciliation on the border issue.

During that period of time we did assist a great deal in Tibetan relief, but we did it very quietly through private organizations and did it in a way that the Indians appreciated. It didn't appear as though we were trying to over-trump them. So our relationship in that period of time with managing third-country problems, i.e., Tibet and Pakistan, I think was a reasonably harmonious one.

Q: The ambassador during that time was Ellsworth Bunker most of the time you were there. Aside from the fact that he later became your husband and looking at it as a Foreign Service officer, how did he operate? Each ambassador operates quite differently, and Ellsworth Bunker is one of the major figures in American diplomacy.

LAISE: As in all of his diplomatic assignments, his hallmark was to take his time, set his own pace, and develop the trust and confidence with the leadership throughout India, because he traveled quite a lot. He was there four years. He had the reputation of being absolutely clear and honest in reporting his government's views and not softening them to what the government might like to hear. Equally, he was considered sympathetic to the Indian situation and that, therefore, they could count on him to report back to this government accurately as well. His method was one of interest of building everything, as one Indian said to me, "a person without sides," so that they knew that he wasn't saying one thing to one individual and another thing to another individual, one thing to their government and another thing to our own government. They knew that he was dependable in representing them to the United States and the United States to them. He didn't have to prove himself.

Q: I always think of Ambassador Bunker, for whom I worked at one time when I was in Saigon where he was ambassador, as being someone who takes his time but is very solid, a good Vermonter. I think of the Indians as being rather volatile, of being more emotional and moving back and forth. Wasn't this a play in contrast, or was it, that in actually with the Indians on a diplomatic basis, a much more solid way?

LAISE: Let's not forget that the Indians, particularly in government and with whom he was dealing, were very much influenced by their experience with the British and their education with the British. Most of the Indian Civil Service (ICS) officers and some of the politicians and Nehru himself had been educated in England. There was a tendency to see America through English eyes which meant we were that loud and noisy but charming -- there was a bit of a feeling of looking down their noses. They respected the British aristocracy and the British reserve. Another aspect of that respect was a lot of tolerance on the part of the British of this volatility you mentioned and of the criticisms. After all, anybody who is brought up and served in the Oxford Union or the London School of Economics, enjoys the exchange and criticism and sharpness of the dialectical process. So they developed this with the British and the British are very tolerant of it but we aren't. [Laughter] Ellsworth is, so he was basically seen as one of America's aristocrats who could see all these things in perspective and was tolerant of their idiosyncrasies and mistakes, and he didn't hold it against them. He did just fine, the noblesse of British worked very well. [Laughter]

This is an additional interview of Carol Laise by Ann Miller Morin conducted in 1985.

Q: You already knew Indian people from your other situations?

LAISE: From being colleagues on the U.N. delegations, not only in the educational field, but in the political field and the journalistic field.

Q: Would you like to tell us something about the scope of your duties as a political officer at a large embassy?

LAISE: I was there for four years. The first two years were primarily on covering internal matters in India. This was a good way of getting to understand India. Now by this I mean the political section usually, in a large embassy, has somebody trying to understand domestic developments and the effect of international relationships on their policies and their stability and their evolution as a country. Since India was relatively [new], well, the year I got there it was just barely ten years old, it was still evolving its many institutions and political systems. So that essentially I was in the position when I first went -- working with Douglas Heck, for example, who was a very good mentor in education -- to follow the fortunes of the Congress Party and then the evolution of the parliamentary system. Now of course, this meant attending party conventions to understand the programs and the point of view of the ruling party in matters that affect [them]. So we attended Congress Party sessions. This meant getting to know all the members of Parliament and Indian leadership, seeing them in their own environment, trying to understand the dynamics of their political system, and reporting it.

Then the last two years, I guess, that I was there, I focused more on the international matters, in which India and the U.S. were in communication. That involved more representation for the government in Delhi and less travel into the countryside. To understand the Indian dealings, political systems and the policies that evolved from it and what its elections meant, we used to follow their elections as well. It was in that context that I got to know Mrs. Gandhi, of course.

But then later on, I moved into handling some of the international issues of India and the West, the most notable one being the driving of the Dalai Lama to India in 1959, and all the Tibetan refugees with which the United States played a considerable role. (Initially, of course, India was leery of United States involvement with the Tibetan refugees, because this was politically such a hot subject for them in their relations with China. I must say that the United States handled it very subtly and understood their position, and essentially what was created were nongovernmental channels through which assistance to refugees could be funneled. I think the Indians came to trust us in that regard.) Then, of course, with the increasing Chinese pressure on the northern borders of Nepal, Sikkim, Bhutan, and Ladakh, it meant the Indians were requesting military assistance. This led to the Chinese attack in 1962 in Bhutan, when we actually sent a military mission out there to help them.

Q: I see that you got the Commendatory Service Award in 1960. What specifically was that given to you for?

LAISE: (Pause) You know, I don't remember. (Laughter) But I suppose . . . (Q: Reporting, perhaps?) No, I suspect that it had to do with a combination, perhaps. President Eisenhower's visit to India in 1959 was the first visit of any president of the United States to India, so therefore, it was very, very important.

The male members of the embassy were so involved in planning the visit in absolute detail, serving as control officers and so on, that I was the only one left in the embassy who was worried about what they were going to talk about, namely the issues. So I think it may well have been for my role in helping to shape policy with regard to the Tibetan refugees, with reporting on the meaning of the Chinese activities on the border and its implications for India and the United States which culminated in the president's visit in 1959, and my role in the presidential visit. I guess that must have been it.

Q: How many people were in the political section in New Delhi at that time? Was it a large section?

LAISE: Well, let's see. (Long pause) I don't know what you'd consider large, really. I suspect that there were three first secretaries and probably two seconds.

Q: So you were at what level? You were a first secretary but you were number two?

LAISE: The political section was split between those following the domestic involvements and those following the international. It wasn't in any sense hierarchical.

Q: I was thinking specifically of efficiency reports. Did you have to write efficiency reports for the more junior members?

LAISE: I was always with my political counselor and he wrote all the efficiency reports.

Q: Did you feel any bias from your men colleagues or were you just "one of the boys?"

LAISE: I don't put it that way. (Chuckles) No, as I say, I think I was extremely fortunate in that I was given every encouragement. The minister at that time was Win Brown and the counselor was Edward P. Maffitt. My colleagues were all extremely helpful and they shared alike. The only problem that I ran into in India was, (and it wasn't a problem, it was just a nuisance) given the tendency in political circles to somehow assume that women in political sections were spies, I had sometimes hit the Communist press, or the Communist-supported press, as being Mata Hari in the U.S. embassy at Delhi.

Q: Oh, for heaven's sake!

LAISE: And it still goes on.

Q: Does it really?

LAISE: It comes back again and again. In fact, whenever there is a big CIA plot, they go back to their files -- it totally comes from the left -- they dig up stuff that then gets repeated and repeated and repeated. One certainly gets the notion of the lie, and it's now been built up that somehow or another, because of my activities in financing the election of one of Mrs. Gandhi's opponents, who was variously ascribed to different provinces, I was thrown out of India!

Well, the first really major story on this erupted after I had left India. I remember coming back from a trip on a senior seminar, and going to a party at the Indian Embassy, and the ambassador who was a very good friend of one of the Nehru family, sort of gleefully holding up his story from the Blitz about my being the Mata Hari of the Indian Embassy. They changed the spelling of the name, but it was very clear who they were talking about. As far as I recall, from the way that the Indian press sort of dug it out, a European woman, (and they include us in that category) was seen to be campaigning for Ashok Mehta who was a member of the opposition in the state of the UP [Uttar Pradesh]. Then they go through the list of the embassies to see where there is a woman and find that on an old embassy list my name was on the list as first secretary, political. So they then produced that as the story.

Galbraith at the time was ambassador, and raised the question with the editor of the newspaper about this. He said, "Well, why didn't he check his facts?" There was no truth in it. I wasn't even in the country. He shrugged his shoulder, and said, "Well, you know, it makes it less interesting," and dismissed it. Then an opposition newspaper dug out the story of what really happened. A member of the same party as this gentleman in the opposition, an Indian, of course, was married to an Austrian, and they were campaigning for him. She was the one who started this in the first place. But then it didn't die there. No, it was raised then as a question in parliament and Mr. Nehru responded and dismissed the whole thing, and said, "What an irresponsible paper this was anyway." And that ended that, but you see, that ended it as far as the substance was concerned, but then the custom is for it to repeat itself in various versions until it just becomes a legend. So it still gets regurgitated. I got a copy of it from someplace, somebody in India, only within the last year.

Q: Really, twenty-five years later!

LAISE: Yes, isn't it amazing!

Q: Ridiculous, yes, terrible. It's been suggested that FSOs have to function in two different ways, one way in the States and one way overseas. Overseas, you're doing the reporting and so forth, but you're not responsible for policy, which is done here. And I have heard it said that often overseas, you have to be more "feminine." That is, the men do too, because they must be conciliatory and so forth, and not make waves.

LAISE: You're not implying that men should be more feminine?

Q: Yes, yes, actually in this context.

LAISE: I don't consider grace as purely a female quality.

Q: I don't either, but is it possible that because women are brought up to be more conciliating, it makes for greater success overseas, and less success back in the Department? Do you think there's any truth to that?

LAISE: (Pause) You know, quite frankly, I don't accept the thesis to begin with, and I certainly don't accept the division of it on a sex line. Nobody, I think, demonstrates it better than my husband. I do not consider that courtesy and the qualities of consideration, that are a part of seeking to reconcile differences, are in any way antithetical to the need to be firm and effective in holding your opinion or advancing your point of view, whether in the bureaucracy at Washington or in foreign cultures.

Q: No, I quite agree. I think I'm giving you the wrong idea. Putting it briefly, I guess, it is, do you have to switch gears when you go overseas, just within yourself, of course? Back here, doesn't one have to be more aggressive to get ahead? Because there is a final arbiter here, and things get bumped upstairs and upstairs and upstairs, until somebody makes a decision. Do you think you function the same way here as you do overseas? A male ambassador brought this up to me, and suggested that I ask it of women to see how they felt, which is why I'm putting it to you. He feels there are two different ways that an FSO functions.

LAISE: I think it is a perfectly natural thing, that when you're functioning in your own culture, the givens are understood and you don't have to explain yourself, you can proceed at a speed without having to worry about perceptions as to how you're viewed. Whereas in a foreign culture, even a culture from a common background such as England, you have to function with some understanding of the norms of that culture. But it isn't a conscious thing. It's no different from what you are in your family and what you are in the broader social world. What I'm trying to say is that they are not ones that are consciously calculating and create strains. No, you're just playing a different tune of the same music, and the same notes are used. Therefore, I think the basic grounding of qualities serves well in both places. It's the notes that you emphasize that are important in terms of success, I'd say.

Q: Would you repeat the remark you made yesterday about a first secretary's job?

LAISE: I guess, as you were leaving, I remarked that I thought it was the best job in the service, because, at least in New Delhi, it was high-enough ranking to be included in interesting social functions, but not so high that one had to engage in representation for its own sake and go to a lot of social functions that were pro-forma and not very interesting.

Q: (Chuckles) I thought that was good to have for the record. Were there any other women officers at the post when you were there?

LAISE: No, I don't think so, when I was there. There were, during my period of service in South Asia, either in New Delhi or in Washington. When I was in Washington (I was deputy director and director of the Division of South Asian Affairs), there were a number of women, but we did not serve concurrently. One was Jane Coon, who is now an ambassador, and the other was Anita Love, who was an economic officer, but I think she didn't stay in the service.

Q: And naturally you had your own secretary, as you do in all jobs. There was no problem with a woman secretary, was there? She didn't feel that she would rather be working for a man or anything of that sort?

LAISE: You're talking about Delhi? Well, first of all, I didn't have my own secretary. We shared a secretary; I usually did with another officer. I really couldn't tell you. In any case, she was working for a man as well as a woman. I certainly didn't have any sense of a problem.

Q: Could you tell us a little about the role of women in India? That would be in the sixties.

LAISE: Well, of course, the women were encouraged during the independence movement to play a role in the Congress Party. There were many prominent women in the Congress Party. As a consequence, when India achieved its independence, there were women in prominent positions in the Indian government; there were women in their Foreign Service. One of my best friends, Indian friends, was one of the first women, if not the first, in the Indian Foreign Service, but she had to resign, as ours had to do up until the seventies, when she married. That no longer obtains in the Indian Service any more than it does in ours. So Indian women were encouraged to have a professional role, and I had a number of Indian friends who were in journalism and radio and in the foreign service. Education, health and social welfare were the areas that I can think of quickly.

You see, at least in the families in India where they were of the educated elite, shall we say, there was a structure that enabled women to work and at the same time have families, because with the joint family system there was a support system for rearing children that made it easier for women to enter professions than sometimes it was here, where choices had to be made very often on economic grounds because of the inability to afford the kind of help that was necessary here. Whereas in India, at that time, at any rate, both the joint family system and the availability of servants made it possible for children to be properly looked after and reared while the parents were working.

Q: When you say "joint family system," is that a multi-generational family? Exactly what is that?

LAISE: Yes, no, no. It's an extended family system that's characteristic of many of the Eastern cultures, and probably also Latin American, where extended family not only very often lives together in the same area, but the responsibilities of the young to the old, and vice versa, is very much practiced.

Q: And there is a universal system of education for girls in India?

LAISE: Oh yes, there is.

Q: It's rather strange, isn't it, if you stop to think about it, because it would seem that they have evolved even more than the British women under whom they were for so many years.

LAISE: Well, of course, it's true in Britain today, too. There's universal education and India, after all, achieved independence in '47, and I think the pattern adopted was based on the liberal practices, the progressive practices of the Western democracies. The aim was certainly universal education. That does not mean there is universal education, largely, in many cases, for economic reasons. But there certainly is no sex bar.

Q: No, I just had been under the impression that higher education for women is not the norm in England, whereas it seems to be in India, or is that an erroneous assumption on my part?

LAISE: I am no authority on this subject, but my impression is that higher education is harder to come by in England for men and women. A tradition, as in the United States, of swelling ranks of students going to higher education because of a state university system and the community colleges and so on which make it economically possible, just didn't exist in England. So that there's not the same sort of tradition of young people going to college for higher education as there is here. But education in India is very much sought after, because it was viewed as an avenue to better jobs, and education is also highly valued in their value system. The Brahminical tradition puts a high premium on education. Therefore, there is, I think, much more of a move in India of students toward higher education. The universities proliferated, in fact, to such an extent that they were giving in to pressures for admission and very serious questions have arisen about the standards of education in India. But that is a different question.

Q: Are they state supported, these new universities?

LAISE: Yes.

Q: Did you have a very active social life as a first secretary?

LAISE: I don't know quite what you mean.

Q: Visiting Indian families, families of diplomatic peers, that sort of thing. Were there a great many formal dinners and receptions that you had to go to?

LAISE: Let's put it this way: there certainly was the opportunity for it. However, keeping in mind that my first two years in India were in the area of understanding the evolution of Indian democracy and policies, my social life was more related to Indian functions and Indian friends than to the diplomatic community. In fact, there was a very large diplomatic community, and I elected to give less priority to social life in the diplomatic community and really found my place, in both work and pleasure, in the Indian community.

Q: You have said you traveled a great deal. That must have been very interesting too.

LAISE: I traveled by car and by train.

Q: They have a very good train system, don't they?

LAISE: Wonderful trains. Yes, in fact, that's a good way to see India.

Q: Did you come back to Washington very often while you were there? Just once on home leave?

LAISE: Just, I think, once on home leave. I had promotion board duty in connection with home leave in 1958, I guess it was, so I was home for longer than the usual period of time. But my recollection was that I came home only in connection with home leave and that assignment.

Q: Are there any other recollections you have about your stay in India you'd like to share?

LAISE: (Pause) Reflecting on our conversation yesterday, I think one point perhaps is worth making about the Eisenhower visit. One of my concerns, which I think got reflected in my reporting perhaps contributed to an ultimate outcome that transformed that visit into the kind of long term success that served the U.S. interest. I was very struck during the course of that visit by the fact that, since the president was in his last year in office and it was a Democratic-controlled Congress, when he came, he was not able to offer anything to the Indians of a concrete nature, to undergird his protestations of friendship and concern for India's security.

I might say that the visit came at a psychological moment that transformed it into a great experience. India, adopting a non-aligned policy, was feeling very lonesome at that stage, given the fact of the incursions that the Chinese had made on its borders in the North in 1959 and the driving of the Dalai Lama out of Tibet. That was on the one hand; on the other hand, the familiar support and prop that India had always looked to in Great Britain had become a diminishing value as a result of the decline in British fortunes after World War II and the attempt of Britain and France in regard to the Suez Canal. Both of those factors caused Britain to appear in Indian eyes as less of a bulwark in their calculations, and caused them to turn more attention toward the United States.

Those two factors meant that when the president of the United States paid his first visit to India, the president being such a well-known hero as President Eisenhower, the outpouring of enthusiasm was absolutely overwhelming. It was very difficult for us to get to the airport even to meet him because of the blockage of the road with the crowds and the traffic. And indeed, nobody of importance would have been there on time if he had not been delayed in his arrival by a holdup in Afghanistan. Then he rode in with the prime minister and the president of India to the center of Delhi at Connaught Place. The crowds were just so great that the entourage could not move. Our security people were, of course, wild. Mr. Nehru got out of the car and used his stick in a good humored way to push the crowd away so the car could get through. I've heard my husband say that the president had never seen anything like it. It was a great experience.

But to continue with the substantive aspects of his visit: During that period of time, I entertained some of our newspaper correspondents who were accompanying the President. They were extremely distressed at the sort of platitudinous nature of his speech to the Parliament, proclaiming friendship for India and understanding of its problems without any follow through in a concrete sense.

Yet on the other hand, the Indians were just overjoyed with this, the approach of the president in proclaiming and saying the things they wanted to hear without coming as "Greeks bearing gifts," because that would have made it very embarrassing, and in their terms, would have detracted from the sentiments expressed. So it was my task and the task of the embassy to convey to Washington and to keep reminding them after the President had left, the fact that while the visit was a wild success and viewed all the way around as outstanding, the sentiments voiced had conveyed to the Indians a pledge of friendship. To them, the terms of friendship meant that one understood enough to follow through with the kind of specific and tangible gestures that would help them over some of their problems. Therefore, there was joy that we did not come as "Greeks bearing gifts," but there was expected return farther down the line.

The message got through, and the result was that six months after the president's visit, the administration and the Congress did approve a four-year PL 480 program for India to enable it to conduct some agricultural reforms that were needed by assuring them a supply of grain for four years. I think it amounted to a shipload of grain a day for four years to keep their stores of grain high enough to enable them to take some stringent measures in agricultural reform. But that was seen as a kind of responsiveness to Indian requirements that a friend could make, the kind of friendship that was pledged by the president.

Q: Yes. That must have had quite an impact all around, I should think.

LAISE: Yes, it was an unforgettable experience for everybody who was there. Now there was another visit, and as long as we're continuing to deal with the substantive problems, I might as well go on with this, and we can turn later to some of the living aspects. The other memorable visit was the visit of Vice-President Johnson in 1961. He had been on a mission at the instance of the president, in Southeast Asia, and on his way back to the United States, he stopped in India. It was a very brief stop, but it was a very memorable stop. I believe it was the stop when in Pakistan he invited the camel driver to visit the United States.

Q: (Chuckles) I remember that, yes.

LAISE: Which had all kinds of repercussions. In the case of India, he visited the Taj Mahal and a village very near Agra. My most vivid recollection was more social than substantive. A reception was given for him at the embassy residence. The ambassador was then Ambassador Galbraith. Since at that stage I was the member of the embassy staff who had been longest in place and knew the most, had the widest acquaintances as a result of my work and travels in India, the ambassador laid on me the responsibility to introduce the vice president to everybody important in Delhi, because there was not a receiving line. He came late and he came into the garden, and all of the guests were collected in the garden. It was a very difficult job, because the custom, and it seems to be a custom in an occasion like this, that when an important entourage comes into a party, everybody falls away so they're not within reach to introduce. It was a very difficult experience of darting into the crowd and trying to pull people into the circle, to introduce them to Vice President and Mrs. Johnson. But it was, I think, on the whole, a thoroughly satisfactory experience all around, but it was a little nerve-racking at the time.

Q: Oh, I can imagine.

LAISE: About the living arrangements, the whole time I was in Delhi, I lived in a part of one of the lovely old bungalows that the British had built there, in a tree-shaded area of New Delhi not very far from the embassy residence or the embassy. It had a garden. It was divided essentially into three apartments, and initially, I had the smallest apartment.

I remember when the chargé, Fred Bartlett, and his wife came to visit on a social occasion when I was entertaining some Indian friends, he was pretty shocked to see the arrangement. He thought it was not suitable for a first secretary, because you had to walk through the bedroom in order to get into the living room, the way that particular apartment was structured. I think he instituted action to see that I moved to a larger apartment on the front of the house when it became vacant, which was perhaps more appropriate for entertaining. It had the disadvantage of not being on the garden side. However, I did have a patio where I could entertain out-of-doors, as well as in. But it was a modest type of an apartment. I had a cook/bearer, the same one the whole time I was there.

I did do a great deal of informal entertainment, mainly related to bringing Americans, visiting Americans very often, and journalists and academicians, and Indians together to discuss issues and development, economic problems in India, and political trends in India. But usually it was the kind of entertainment related to developing a better understanding of their political institutions, their aspirations and their economic development, in order to be able to make my contribution to reporting to Washington on matters that were of interest to the United States, relating to the kind of policies the United States was following, particularly in the aid field.

Q: What sort of parties did you find were most suited for this?

LAISE: There was a range, depending on the circumstances. The working hours in India, and this is also true in Nepal when I later went there, usually were ten to five with no break for lunch. This tended to mean that coffee hour before work was the time when I would call on members of Parliament or they would drop in on their way to work, and equally tea at the completion of work. It was an appropriate form of entertainment, because as you know, many Indians have different dietary requirements and strictures. And also, it was a basis of meeting which could be mutual. In other words, if I were to go to their places, it would be for tea or coffee, and no obligation was incurred on either side. So a lot of it was that.

For those who functioned in hours that were more along the lines of the West and had a lunch break, which would be a different group of people, and especially visitors who wanted to meet their counterparts, lunch was a very open way in which to entertain. Dinners usually were informal. Buffet dinners were very much more the custom in India than the sit-down dinners, partly because it was a cooler way of spending those hours. And also because I had a very small dining room, so the parties were never large, and provided an opportunity for a real exchange.

Q: And you had representational allowance, I presume.

LAISE: No, the embassy did. You would put in a claim, and get reimbursed if the number of foreign visitors exceeded the number of Americans present.

Q: You weren't given a set amount then?

LAISE: No.

Q: The embassy owned the apartment, or rented it for you?

LAISE: It owned it.

Q: Did you find any particular problems that were unique to a woman living alone overseas?

LAISE: (Long pause) Well, I really didn't encounter anything special that I can recall, except one thing that I think is not surprising in a traditional society, as India is and was, and where form is quite important. I think one had to be aware of the fact that a woman living alone, and especially a Western woman living alone, had to observe certain proprieties, for there was a very great tendency to assume that the activities going on reinforced their notion of the promiscuity of the Western women.

Q: Yes, yes, you had to be very aware of that.

LAISE: I think one had to be very aware of that because of the patterns and the customs. It meant the importance of great discretion in one's entertaining style and also in one's conduct.

Q: Well, in connection with that, were you supposed to have a host to be your counterpart when you entertained, or was that acceptable that you would be the sole host of the evening?

LAISE: There was no requirement of that. Since at that time innocent Indian women didn't socialize at Western parties as much as perhaps they might today, for whatever reason, there never was any shortage of male guests to fill out a dinner party, let's say.

Q: What about your health while you were in India? Did you experience any particular problems there?

LAISE: No. Of course, I had dysentery; both kinds, bacterial. . . and what is it? Bacterial and amoebic. But, you know, I got over it. It never plagued me very much, and it never plagued me subsequently.

Q: Did you find that. . .or can you make such a judgment, that the women were healthier or less healthy than the men at the post?

LAISE: I don't have any idea about that. I don't have any impression of any great problems in the professional service or in the embassy staff. I don't recall if there was tremendous problem with illness.

Q: How were you treated for your amoebas? Were you treated at the post by the doctor?

LAISE: Yes, yes.

Q: I guess the State Department is quite an expert in amoebas.

LAISE: Yes.

Q: When you traveled, were you alone or did you go with other people? Was it considered proper for you to travel by yourself, or safe, I should say.

LAISE: Well, I never felt unsafe in India. But most of my traveling was with friends. I went on various holidays in the North, in the Himalayan region, with Indian friends, or traveled by train with an Indian friend with whom I was very close. I mentioned her before, she had been in the Indian Foreign Service. She opened up a great deal of understanding of part of India that I normally would not be able to contact because of lack of language. She herself was, in addition to being a career officer, or had been a career officer, also a sociologist and a person of great distinction in her field, and had a great feel for Indian art and Indian philosophy and culture. So I was very privileged to have a friendship with her, and to have been able to see rural India with and through the eyes of someone who related very well to women and who understood their traditions and their values and was able to interpret it in a context for me.

Q: Oh, that must have been a wonderful . . .

LAISE: It was a marvelous experience, yes.

Q: And you went to the Taj Mahal. Is it as lovely as . . .

LAISE: Yes. Beautiful. This Indian friend, I might say, has for several years been at Radcliffe at the Bunting Institute. So they know her very well there. Her name is Rama Mehta.

Q: Like Zubin Mehta? What sort of things did you do for recreation?

LAISE: Golf. That's where I took up golf for the first time, the most beautiful golf course in Delhi. First of all, it's very centrally located, and it's in and around a lot of old mosques. In the early morning the birds would just sing. The sound of the birds and the beauty of the birds is in addition to the golf game, so that just walking was fun, quite apart from the golf. Golf and tennis were the major sports.

Q: Swimming?

LAISE: Not very much, because, well, again, there's the problem with the water. So it didn't make much sense to take all these precautions about water and then go swimming.

Q: You had to boil water? That sort of thing?

LAISE: Yes.

Q: When you did entertain, did you have to outline for the cook what he should do, or was he able to . . .

LAISE: Yes, always. You had to give them the menus, yes.

Q: Did you ever go to the Vale of Kashmir and stay on a houseboat?

LAISE: Yes, I did. That too was beautiful. However, my stay there was very short and quite tragic, because again, I went with this friend that I was mentioning. When we arrived there, we got the news that her father, who happened to be there, and a prominent Indian, had died of a heart attack that morning. And so it basically consisted of dealing with a very sad situation. So my association with Kashmir is not the same as . . .

Q: Not the most fortunate. (Pause) I don't think I've brought it up before: Did you have a mentor all the time you were working in the department, or did your career evolve by itself?

LAISE: No, I think it just grew like Topsy. But I have to say that I did receive great encouragement from various people that need to be mentioned. Initially, in the Department, the two that stand out in the Bureau of United Nations Affairs are Bill Hall, William Hall, and Walter Kotschnig. Then Fran Wilcox certainly was one who gave encouragement.

Q: Is Fran a man or a woman?

LAISE: A man.

Q: Francis Wilcox. It's difficult with the name of Francis.

LAISE: Yes, he just died recently of a heart attack. He was aide to somebody who's head of the staff at the Senate Foreign Relations Committee under Fulbright, and then he became assistant secretary of state for the United Nations. (Pause). In Delhi, I think it was particularly Winthrop Brown. He was the minister, the DCM [deputy chief of mission].

Q: I see. Did you find that your work in the States, all of the many interesting jobs you had, were very relevant to what you did overseas? Or did you have to learn a whole new set of work skills?

LAISE: Well, I guess they weren't all that different; the emphasis was different. If we go back to, say, when I started in the international field, in UNRRA, I was mainly involved in what we in the department would call program management. Whereas when I moved into the department and in the embassy in New Delhi, I moved in a different direction. The skills required in the Bureau of the United Nations Affairs were intellectual skills of writing and conceptualizing and justifying actions on the one hand, and on the other hand, negotiating and political -- what do you call it? I don't want to say political bargaining. Political, (Pause) well, that's really what it was, I suppose, trying to resolve differences in approach and differences in semantics, and resolutions, and that sort of thing. It was very much developing the contacts as well as being able to persuade others to compromise, to meet agreed solutions.

Then in the embassy at Delhi, it was very much a matter of developing relationships and writing skills and analytical skills, to be able to synthesize for Washington information that related to policy matters affecting U.S. interests. So that's as I see it. Those were the skills that were required, and they were perhaps used in a different sense in all these places but essentially they all involved the major skills that are required in our profession to rise to the top. It covered the spectrum between the program management skills, the interpersonal relationships, and the intellectual skills. I will say that certainly there was more development of the intellectual skills in the Department than in the UNRRA assignment.

Q: Summing up, how would you describe the Indian experience, both personal and professional?

LAISE: I think it's obvious from what I have recounted that the Indian experience was a very challenging one. It was one that afforded personal growth by my good fortune in my friendships. And certainly the quality and the depth of the Indian culture constitutes a challenge to anyone coming from the West. In extending myself to understand, it also required of me to understand our own culture much better. Therefore, it was the kind of challenge that developed greater depth in my understanding of my own culture as well as the Indian culture. And then it brought with it some very deep and continuing friendships.

As far as the professional experience is concerned, I think it is equally evident that we always had outstanding leadership in our embassy in Delhi while I was there. It ranged from Senator Cooper to Ellsworth to Galbraith. I learned a great deal about the conduct of bilateral diplomacy, both the importance in presenting U.S. views, of accuracy, the importance of integrity in relation to the reporting, not only of the U.S. scene, but also being faithful to the understanding one has of the Indian scene, and reporting that with honesty.

(Pause) Also, the embassy at Delhi had a dimension, a large dimension in those days, that was important to understand and develop, you know, broaden my experience, in that a great many of the economic and commercial interests of the United States had to be funneled through the embassy rather than, as in other countries of the world, taking place between business organizations without any regard to the embassy. This grew out of the nature of the Indian system and the highly centralized control the Indians exercised over their economic policy. It meant that the embassy was called upon to open doors and to assist in developing policies that would improve the commercial relationships between India and the United States. So that this equally brought certainly the economic dimension into my job, not only the commercial dimension, but then we had very large economic development programs there in that time. And so, the economic development aspect of our role in India was extremely important.

Indeed, I was there at a period of time when India and U.S. relations were perhaps the best that they have ever been. India was seen in U.S. calculations as being an important democratic alternative in economic development to China. Therefore, it constituted a model, a potential model of economic development along democratic lines that were very important to our interest to foster. This meant that that period of time was a very creative one, as well as a very, on the whole, a very beneficial one in our relationship.

ALBERT ASHTON LAKELAND, JR.

Consular Officer
Bombay (1956-1958)

Political Officer
New Delhi (1959-1963)

Indian Affairs Officer, Bureau of Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs
Washington, DC (1963-1965)

Albert Ashton Lakeland, Jr. was born in Baldwin, New York in 1929. He received a bachelor's degree in English from Princeton University and a master's degree from Columbia University. He served in Bombay and New Delhi, India, as well as in a number of positions in Washington, DC. Mr. Lakeland was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on July 27, 1992.

Q: This was 1956?

LAKELAND: Yes, 1956. I entered in March, 1956 and after a very short time filling in and then FSI, I went in the beginning of September 1956. I was a consular officer there, which was a great assignment for a brand new officer. I was totally unprepared in the sense of being trained for what I had to do. Except for one thing. They did give at FSI a very useful course in visa work. I guy named Mr. Auerbach.

Q: Yes, Frank Auerbach. I remember him well.

LAKELAND: Well, you probably had him too. Other than that the training was really nothing.

Anyway, that was a job that is now being done by four officers, including a senior officer. We were in an old rented building and the consular office was separated from the rest of the Consulate. I was up there all by myself with a staff of four Indian locals and did actually half of the consular work for India, because Bombay was the main area. I had some very interesting and somewhat amusing experiences.

Q: Could you tell some of them?

LAKELAND: Yes. As you know Bombay is a major port. The United States had just begun a gigantic push to get PL 480 wheat into India. We had at one time over 40 American ships waiting to get into the harbor, much less in the harbor. All the berths were tied up with grain ships, but we had such a backlog. There were obviously going to be some seamen with problems.

There were two that I particularly remember. There was a fight on a ship between the first cook and the second cook and the first cook ended up slicing up the second cook and putting him on the stove and cooking him or whatever. Fortunately, for me, the captain notified the Indian police, which he really should have. They came and arrested this guy and put him in jail. The next day they came and told me. The ship was owned by Isbrandtsen who then was a non-union line. They were very aggressive.

Q: Very tough. They were going into China when we were telling people not to go into China. It was a very hard-nosed outfit.

LAKELAND: Anyway, the crucial thing came when the ship was ready to depart and there was a hearing set. It cost something like $2000 an hour for ships and there was a delay for this trial. Isbrandtsen raised hell with the Department as to why I hadn't asserted jurisdiction? Under the old regulations the consul can assert jurisdiction provided the local authorities had not taken jurisdiction. Well, I didn't even know that I could have. Their captain had called in the Indians before I was informed.

The ship is waiting to go and they are having a felony trial before the chief magistrate in Bombay. They put out on the guy and he is all cut up and there are witnesses, etc. Then they call the accused and asked how he pleaded. He said, "Not guilty." So the prosecutor and the magistrate look at me and I say, "What do you mean, not guilty? Look at the man, he is all carved up." He said, "I am not guilty and plead not guilty." So the magistrate says, "Take this away and get something better." So they come over to me and say, "Tell that man to plead guilty." I said, "I am here as an observer and can't tell him to plead guilty to this kind of thing." They go on and say, "You have to do something, you are the American Consul." I say, "Vice Consul." This goes on and on so I finally say, "Well, look, if the matter is not adjudicated here, it can then be pressed in a Coast Guard court back in New York and you probably would be better off that way. At least you could probably get the charges...." The captain didn't know anything about that, but it turned out to be true.

They did some huddling and agreed to withdraw the charges. They called the accused back up and the magistrate then says, "Now, are you sorry that you stabbed that man and almost killed him?" "Well, I guess so." "All right, take this man..." And the ship gets out of there.

Another incident, there was an American seaman who died in a brothel in Bombay. There is what they call the cages there. He was Hispanic. Apparently his widow had a lawyer who thought she was going to get a big deal out of this and raised all kinds of stuff. When the notice of death went back there hadn't been an autopsy report. This lawyer was raising hell with the Department. The Department, of course, got scared and began bombarding me with telegrams. We kind of soft peddled it.

It ended up that he got the police report and the certificate of death and it was stated very graphically...so and so died in brothel number 44. The prostitute said that he was feeling ill and went for his pill. Apparently he was 70 years old and had a heart condition and died in anticipation.

One other interesting thing that I thought was pretty ingenious. Air India was seeking to open an office in New York. We had just had a breakthrough with an agreement with Air India landing rights. India had never signed a treaty trader treaty with us so they were unable to get a visa for their manager to go open this office. It was beginning to cause some difficulty. Their headquarters were in Bombay but they had been trying for this visa up at the Embassy and had been formally refused. To make a long story short, the man, himself, had been born in Kashmir. One parent had been born in what subsequently became Pakistan and one parent had been born in what subsequently became India. There was a loop hole, the Asia Pacific Triangle Corps. In the old days 100 visas were reserved for parents born in two or more separate court areas. The quota was under subscribed. I issued him the visa and became a hero. There was consternation in Delhi and cheers in Washington that we had found a solution to this problem through the partition of India.

I started learning Hindi while I was there, sort of in my own. I was ordered back for area language training. When I got there, there were only three students and two instructors. One was Pakistani and one was an Indian. With three students and two instructors they sort of had no choice but to split us up into two groups. Since I had already served in India and perhaps had a leg up, I ended up having private instruction. I finished, actually, both the Indian and Urdu material about three months before the course ended. Partly because I thought it wasn't really adequate. How could you have a course where a student could exhaust the material in less than the time, much less two courses.

I did a research paper. The head of FSI language school thought this was a big thing so he offered me a choice. I could either go the second year out at Berkeley for a year of area studies, which was normally the deal, or a special deal. He offered me three and a half months of detached duty in India with per diem and more or less unlimited travel funds with a job promised in the political section in the Embassy. So naturally I chose...

Q: Before we go to that I would like to go back to Bombay. What was the political situation as you saw it in Bombay and what were the American interests?

LAKELAND: I went there in September 1956 and United States relations with India were tense, to say the least. Beginning in 1957, something of a breakthrough occurred because the United States more or less decided to bail out the Indian second five-year plan. That was not entirely altruistic. A big part of it was PL 480 wheat which we wanted to get out of our granaries. So relations which had been quite tense, particularly...

Q: Kashmir problem and the non-align movement when Dulles was feeling that if you are not with us you are against us.

LAKELAND: Yes. What happened after Stalin died was that the Soviets made a big move towards India. Bulganin and Khrushchev came to India, struck an arms deal, and did all kinds of stuff. The Indians seemed to be moving close to the Russians. In fact they did move close to the Russians. Nehru, you know, was very prickly towards the United States. He did not like to be part of our global strategy. So it was sort of the height of the cold war period and India was, at that time, regarded as a key battleground between democracy and communism.

The Kashmir issue was very, very emotional in India. It is really very raw ethnic...sort of like Serb and Croatian feeling.

So that was the political situation. The United States was respected and somewhat feared, but not really beloved.

Oh, one other little thing. My first brush with the CIA occurred there. As consular officer I got to know a major Indian mathematician, who was really a world class mathematician. He had happened to have done graduate work at Princeton where I went as an undergraduate. When I got him a visa he sort of befriended me. I suppose because of the old school tie, I was not a mathematician. He was a very interesting fellow. He also was interested in politics. I got to know him socially fairly well. Then he became the secretary of an Indian delegation which was the first non-bloc delegation that toured the major scientific institutions in the Soviet Union. He went to...a lot of these really closed places.

I mentioned this to the CIA chief and they wanted to interview this guy. I said that that was up to him. I said that I was not going to bring him to them, So they gave me a long list and asked if I would ask him these questions. So over lunch one day I started to ask him all these questions. Finally he said, "What is all this about? Who did you get this from? Did you get this from your CIA?" I said, "Yes, they asked me to ask you." He said, "Well, give it to me and I will fill it out, but I don't want to do it here." He did it and I think later they were able to establish some kind of relationship with him. They pressed hard. That was my first wake-up experience with the Agency.

Bombay was something of a bastion of the opposition within India. It was more pro-business, pro-American. I wouldn't say it was an anti-Communist bastion, but the men who more or less could challenge Nehru were centered in Bombay.

Q: What was your impression as a consular officer in dealing with the Indian bureaucracy? I have never served in India but it has always struck me as being a very officious, difficult group of people to work with.

LAKELAND: Actually, that was not my experience at all in India, mainly I suppose because I really had minimal and rather routine contacts with the Indian bureaucracy. We would get police clearances and things like that. A few incidents with the port people. As vice consul in the consular office I really had no problems with the Indians.

One other thing that happened, an American who worked for TWA got caught smuggling 44 pounds of gold into India, confessed and got sent to jail. I did go up and visit him in jail one time, but there was no problem there. Indian jails in those days were relatively decent places because almost all of the leading Indian politicians had served a lot of time in jail. So their jails were fairly spruced up in those days. Not places where you wanted to spend your vacations, but they weren't filthy, with poor food, etc.

No, I had no problems with bureaucrats in Bombay. There were a lot of very wealthy young businessmen who had studied in the United States who loved to invite Americans to parties. In fact it was a great place for a young officer in terms of being wined and dined by rich Indians.

After my language training I went up to Delhi and ended up spending a lot of that time in UP, Uttar Pradesh, the biggest state in India. It was the home state of Nehru. It was the political...sort of like the combination of New York and California, politically of India. And it was also the center of the Hindi speaking belt, not all of India speaks Hindi. I spent most of my three and a half months up there.

Q: What a wonderful way of learning. Sounds enlightened.

LAKELAND: Well, it was and they never seemed to have repeated it. I would spend my day getting up and reading the Hindi newspapers, going down to the coffee house where I met journalists and politicians. I made excellent contacts that really stood me in great state later on. So many of the senior ministers from the central government had come from there or later came from there. Then I would go to a Hindi movie at night. I really got so that I was one of the few Americans who was pretty good in Hindi.

In Delhi, almost all of the Indians who Americans deal with speak English. When they don't want Americans knowing what they are talking about they speak Hindi. For conducting your business, Hindi is not a necessity, particularly to people who deal with the Foreign Office. But as I discovered, it is a tremendous asset because you get all of the asides and all of the by play whenever they don't want the Americans to know what they are talking about. Also their English makes much more sense if you know Hindi because they are frequently translating into English rather than speaking it.

My language background led to one very interesting and amusing assignment. I was the Hindi interpreter for Lyndon Johnson when he made his...

Q: He was Vice President.

LAKELAND: He was Vice President. He made his famous world tour through there. I discovered later that he had been a bear on Foreign Service interpreters. Two of them had been tossed out. One in Thailand, I think, and one in Vietnam. It was an amazing experience. The man was a colossus of energy and determined with an agenda of his own. He came there with a 707 plus a 707 load of American journalists. I was thrust into this job.

What would happen is, we had this sort of motorcade and he would be in the first car with Ambassador Galbraith. Then there would be a security car and then myself and then Lady Bird and Mrs. Galbraith. Wherever Johnson saw what he thought was a crowd he would jump out and start talking. Well, in India there is almost a crowd everywhere. I would have to leap out and try to catch up and listen to what he was saying. He would talk until he reached a point and then would stop. I then had to ad hoc translate for him. It wasn't technical translating so I was able to handle that part, I guess, pretty well.

He stayed there three days. He wanted to go down to visit the Taj Mahal, but they needed sort of a cover for it since he had all of these press people. They cooked up a visit to what I called, an underdeveloped and overdeveloped people. One village was kept poor and nothing had been done for it. Then they had a village that showed off their community development projects. It was in late April and on our way between the underdeveloped village and overdeveloped village...it was 117 degrees in the shade that day and we were driving along this great cloud of dust and Johns saw an Indian walking past this well. He decided to stop the music. So a giant party surrounded this Indian peasant. There were Indian security and officials and Indian and American journalists and 6 foot 4 Lyndon Johnson and me standing next to him sort of bellowing at this poor Indian.

It turned out to be quite a comic situation. This guy was just taking a shortcut and it wasn't his place at all. This well was one of these Persian well where they use bullocks and run down a rap and drag up giant skins of water, but it wasn't in use that day. So Johnson went into his routine about how when he was a boy in west Texas he used to have to water the cows. He got a bucket and got it down into this thing. He is saying how much water cows drink on a hot day. This guy says, "Cows don't drink a lot of water." Johnson couldn't understand it and the Indians are trying to keep a straight face and I am trying to keep a straight face. I said, "Well, the Indian cows aren't as thirsty as American cows." Then Johnson would say, "Well, it is still a lot of hard work doing that." The guy says, "It really isn't, the bullocks do all the work." So I am doing my best, faking it and Johnson finally says to this guy, "Now, you, the typical Indian man on the street, I want to bring a personal message from you to President Kennedy. What in your personal opinion is the best thing the United States could do for India?" So I translate this. No reply. I ask again. And he says, "I am just a little guy. I don't even know who President Kennedy is." Finally I harangued him into saying that he would like to have electricity in his village. Johnson had been making this oration about rural electrification program having been successful under the New Deal. So I said, "Yes, if America could only help to bring electricity to the village." At that point Johnson decided he had better quit while he was ahead. He beamed with great satisfaction and off we went to the overdeveloped village.

Indian people in general tend to affect a very, very meek exterior, especially when dealing in their official capacity. There was this woman in the village who was head of the development program there. She is giving her long spiel in a very restrained whisper and round about way. Johnson is getting very itchy. He wanted to get back to the plane and back to Delhi and have a beer. She is in her spiel and Johnson is getting really restless. Finally he said, they had some handicrafts on display, "Bird, don't you thing that rug would look good in front of our fireplace?" "Yes Lyndon," she said. "Lakeland, buy that rug." The rug is not for sale, it was just on display. I asked how much they would take for it. He said, "You have money, you pay them." So I buy this thing and the women starts her spiel again. Johnson says, "How about the other one?" Bird said that that would look good too. So he tells me to buy it and then tell the women that we had to go. So I buy the toe rugs and off we go back to Delhi.

When Johnson was leaving, his secret service detail came up to me and said, "The Vice President would like to see you." I thought, "Oh, shit," because he was rather skeptical of the Foreign Service. But he patted me on the back and said, "You _____." I guess I was supposed to be very pleased. Later on Galbraith called me in and said, "You made a big hit with the Vice President." I said, "What did he say?" He said, "Galbraith, I don't know what your man Lakeland was telling those Indians, but they sure did like it."

In Delhi I was a political officer. I covered first north India and did a lot of traveling and got to know a lot of Indian politicians, most of whom were my father's age, very senior politicians. It was like dealing with virgin territory. If you were a young officer in Paris you would never be able to get near these people. You wouldn't even get to their private secretaries. But governors of states and their ministers, the chairmen of the Congress and the opposition parties, I got to know all of these people quite well. They were very flattered that somebody from the American Embassy was interested in them. In their minds, because they are very status conscience, they decided that I was the third man at the Embassy. There was the Ambassador, then there was a First Secretary and then a Second Secretary. I was the Second Secretary. So that is how they reconciled relations with me.

Later I became head of the internal reporting for all of India. We had the India-China war in 1962. That was a really major event where China and India actually went to war and India turned to us for military assistance. It then led to the 1965 India-Pakistan war. There was a great change in America's relationship with India and the role of Americans in India. It really crested at that time. It later disintegrated back down to where it had been or worse, but that was sort of the plateau of Indo-US relations.

While I was in India, I served under three Ambassadors, all of whom were eminent men, political appointees. Ellsworth Bunker, John Kenneth Galbraith and Chester Bowles. I found that of them, only Galbraith was interested in Indian politics. He believed that he could win over Krishna Menon.

Q: He was Minister of Defense wasn't he?

LAKELAND: He originally became famous or infamous as the Indian representative at the United Nations where he clashed with the United States.

Q: He was the symbol of everything America disliked about India for some time. It still rankles with a lot of people.

LAKELAND: Yes, he had a gift for vituperation and nastiness. He was a brilliant man. A considerable gift to the English language. A great maneuverer and intriguer. He was called to become Defense Minister by Nehru. Galbraith thought that because the Kennedys had come in and there was a new era and they had some mutual friends in the left wing of the Labor Party, he could work with Menon. But that did not work out at all.

But generally speaking, not only did our eminent political ambassadors but our Foreign Service people really spent a lot of time in India without even leaving the United States if you ask me. Now I don't know which is right. Whether Foreign Service people should just be Americans in a foreign country representing their country, thinking like their country, interested in really reflecting Washington and the United States, or the degree to which they should seek to get a much more fundamental grasp of the country that they are in. Especially a country as different as India. India is totally different. It is a completely separate civilization. Independent of Western civilization. There are only three or four in the world that still exist. Chinese, Indian and maybe Islam culture. Its own music, its own morality, its own philosophy, its own way of looking at things. Totally different society.

Our politics have really failed in India. We got very little for our effort and our money out of India. Our goals in India tended to be somewhat fatuous. There was a misconception that India was about to turn communist. There was also...I remember Ellsworth Bunker, who was a great gentleman and a fine man and devoted public servant, had real blinders in dealing with India and with Nehru. When he saw Nehru he saw a graduate of Harrow and Cambridge, a gentleman, and very much believing that underneath it all here was a western gentleman who would be with the US in the heart of his soul. He was only nasty to us because he had to be, which was not true in my view.

Nehru was a dedicated more or less Marxist. He was basically Marxist in his thinking. He was a democrat but he never had his democratic principles challenged because the peculiar political circumstances allowed him to operate as a democrat without a threat to his autocratic power. He was not friendly to the United States. He really believed that the Soviet Union was a more natural friend of India than the United States. And certainly his daughter, Indira Gandhi believed that.

The United States in 1957 made a fundamental decision to bankroll India's five year plans feeling that the alternative would be a communist revolution. I think that in retrospect that turned out to be a real mistake for India and the United States. It was really a Brezhnevian kind of regime. The kind of Romanian, Eastern European, Yugoslavia, and Soviet state economy which sort of guarantees poverty. India was not a communist society, but it was a statist society and its economy was real socialist/Marxist oriented. All the commanding heights of the economy were to be in the hands of the government. All the steel mills, the trading, the oil, the aircraft, etc. If you look at the economic progress of India, where it was say in 1950 and where it is today, compared to many Asian countries...India had a larger GNP than Japan in 1950. Per capita GNP was greater in India than in Korea in those days. India really got off on a wrong path and I think, particularly in retrospect, although I tended to feel that way when I was an officer there, we should not have bought into subsidizing this big public sector which was really a way of maintaining the status quo, controlling the country. They eventually preempted the business community through this licensing monopoly system that they had. If you gave enough money to the Congress Party and hired enough relatives and the right Ministers and civil servants you were guaranteed a monopoly business position. So the Indian business private sector never made the contribution that it is capable of making. Indians are very capable businessmen. But India has lagged economically.

Q: Well, within the Embassy were there any voices saying let's stay out? What was the alternative for example?

LAKELAND: The alternative was to tell the Indians that if they want major assistance it would have to be channeled through the private sector. Now if you think you don't need it and can stay in power without it, more power to you. But why should we have subsidized a left wing socialist economy which was gauging us on almost every issue in the world, merely because there was an implied threat that they might go communist unless we did it?

Q: Was there any sort of division within the economic section or the political section while you were there about wither India and what American policy was?

LAKELAND: Not that I was aware of. Occasionally you would get some peeps out of AID, occasionally out of the Commerce people, hut generally the word was that it was a five year plan. The Indians seem to have fairly impressive senior civil servants. Our officials who were dealing with the top level of the Indian civil servants tended to be impressed with what they were saying. "Well, we have to do this, once we let up, once you have control it leads to more control, to more control, more control." There was a tremendous reluctance to say, "Wait a minute, once you accept the first control then all the others follow." The Indians screamed that it would be imperialistic if we interfered in domestic affairs.

When Kennedy came in there was a feeling that the United States can work with these third world socialist countries. Galbraith certainly went there with that view. That there is nothing wrong with building third world democratic socialism. And it was not really challenged. In fact, the only real challenge came in sort of muted ways. The only way that this became attacked was when the India-China crisis reached a head. Nehru and Menon were very reluctant to give up the idea of third world solidarity. The Nationalist view and the anti-Chinese view then sort of became the pro-American view were more the Indian right wing, which had been very strong at the time of independence. In fact it dominated. Nehru really became Prime Minister almost by accident. These guys had a chance to challenge Nehru and Menon in 1962 and to some extent they did challenge and forced Krishna Menon out of office. Every once in a while there is a faint movement towards free enterprise and then it generally goes back into this socialist bureaucracy which is maybe 1 percent gain in the standard of living. I think the overall conditions in India consist of a lot of acute problems which haven't been addressed.

Q: You were saying that the Americans who went there sort of remained Americans and didn't get out to see the people, but at the same time...again I am talking as a retired Foreign Service Officer who never served in India...one had the feeling that people who went to India got sort of absorbed by the Indian and pretty soon became ardent proponents of whatever happened to be going. The disease is called localitis. And India, to me, has always been one of the prime examples, but, again, only from a far.

LAKELAND: I think certainly the Americans who served in India tended to take the side of India vis-à-vis Pakistan and vice versa, the Americans in Pakistan took the Pakistani side of that issue. And I think that the American Embassy people tended to deal with the elite of the Indian bureaucracy, who were very plausible people. Once you buy into...there are certain premises that we run the country but we have to run it this way, otherwise it would get out of control or otherwise the poor people wouldn't be heard. They had plausible things that were never vigorously challenged. And I guess Foreign Service officers aren't there to vigorously challenge the assumptions of a government. It was a vested interest in the relations. There tended to be a corps of old India hands who had their contacts with the experts and could intermediate with the Indian establishment. But I don't think that was who they were intermediating with. A Delhi elite establishment many who had been educated abroad, but left wing socialist in their economic feeling. Indians managed to establish the fact that because the United States favored Pakistan we tended to treat India in an imperialist way and that India had to defy us because we were arming its deadly enemy and that is why it was friendly with Russia. That view was rarely, if ever, challenged. Sometimes in Washington it was challenged, but I never knew it to be challenged in Delhi. Not vigorously.

Chester Bowles had a vision that India was like the United States in the 1820s. There was a populous school and a federalist school. He constantly was trying to...whether we were going to have Jackson or an Adams. He is a marvelous man, Chester Bowles, but he had such a crazy view of what was going on in India because the analogy couldn't have been less apt in my own view.

Another kind of amusing thing was the Jacqueline Kennedy visit. Jackie Kennedy's sister, Lee Radziwill, lived in London with her husband, Prince Radziwill. The Maharajah and Maharani of Jodhpur, great international jet setters, spent summers in London. They invited Lee and Jackie Kennedy to see them in India. It turned out that it couldn't be just a visit, it got into a state visit. It escalated up... Nehru made a decision that Jackie Kennedy would be given the exact same protocol treatment as Queen Elizabeth had been given when she visited India. So this thing really got escalated into a really big deal. Instead of going only to Jodhpur it became a national tour. But there was a three-day tour in Jodhpur.

I was assigned control officer for the Jodhpur stop which was divided into a day and a half official visit and a day and a half private visit. To complicate matters the Jodhpur family were the leaders of the Indian opposition. The Maharani of Jodhpur was the Parliamentary leader of the largest opposition party in Parliament and had outpolled Nehru in the 1962 elections. For the first time Nehru didn't get the highest plurality in India.

To further muddy the waters, when Queen Elizabeth had visited Jodhpur six months or so before, to sort of stick their finger in the eye of the government, the Maharajah of Jodhpur staged a feudal which was the direct feudal relationship between the Maharajah and the Queen. He had excluded also the public from this thing and then held another reception to which he invited his friends and sold tickets.

So the powers to be were very, very furious ...well, let me put it this way, it was a very touchy visit. We had endless negotiations about every step and minute of what would take place during that visit.

Anyway it sort of went. I am going to tell a sort of out of school tale. At the end of this three-day visit...it was the last stop outside of Delhi, and that ended just at sundown. There was a dinner at the Embassy that night, which was the biggest social event of the Embassy. All the officers who had been control officers were invited to the dinner even if you were only a second secretary. To get a ticket to this dinner was the biggest thing not only in the American community hut in Delhi and I had a place. I was very much looking forward to it.

There was this elaborate departure ceremony from Jodhpur with an elephant and all this sort of stuff. Just as I was about to board the plane, 6 foot 8 inch John Kenneth Galbraith claps me on the shoulder and says, "Pete, come here." He says, "You are staying here." I said, "Why?" He says, "Because your job in the morning is to get Lee Radziwill back to Delhi." I said, "How am I going to do that?" "We are sending down o special plane for her. She is going to stay over with the Maharaju and the Maharani. The plane is going to be there at 8:00 to take off. I want you to have her at the airport at 8:00 tomorrow morning." And off he went, and off everybody went. Here I had to stay in Jodhpur to collect Lee Radziwill.

So I went over there the next morning, I guess around 7:30. They were having breakfast hut there was no sign of Lee Radziwill. They offered me breakfast. I said, "Well, you know we are supposed to catch this plane." The Indians were sending in a bomber! No sign of Lee Radziwill. About 8:00 this door opens and out walks Lee Radziwill arm in arm with an Italian journalist. She said, "Oh, by the way, Luigi is going back to Delhi with us." I said, "Oh, I think I can arrange it with the Indians." But I knew there would be a manifest for this Indian bomber and I didn't know if I could just add o name to it or not. But it all sorted out.

Q: What was your impression of Ambassador Galbraith and how he operated?

LAKELAND: I think he was probably the most effective of the three or even though in some ways the most misguided, if you will. He fought hard for the United States to finance one of these, what has turned out to a white elephant, public steel mills, and lost. But he presided over the change. India and China got into a war and there was a great flood of goodwill and the United States really rode high. They asked us for military assistance and all kinds of things. He was a sharp man and he was interested in my reports on what is going on in India, who is doing what to whom, etc. There is so much that is personal in India. It goes back so many years when they were in jail together, or when factional fights in 1937 turned out to have been...very, very formative in India politics. I would write these things and he would love them. None of the others were interested in this sort of stuff. He also had a famous DCM. I don't know whether you ever knew Benson Ellison Lane Timmons III.

Q: I know of him.

LAKELAND: One of the most extraordinary Foreign Service Officers I have ever known. He was the bete noire of the Administrative part of the US Foreign Service. He was a man of enormous energy and a man of tremendous organization and detail and control. He left the running of the Embassy to Lane Timmons. Now under Timmons and Galbraith, partly because of the war, Delhi sent more telegrams then any other Embassy in the world at that time. More then London, more then Paris, more then Bonn, more then Tokyo, etc.

Timmons had a particular management style. He had an inner core of officers that were very much in his confidence and he really collected, almost as a personal staff around him. I had the good fortune to be one of them. My relationships in working was great. However, more than half were sort of in the outer circle. They were given sort of a hard time. The administrative section was always too little and too late with everything.

Timmons was there from 7:00 in the morning and he read everything that had come in during the night. Then he would go down there and hang over the code clerks as they were decoding more cables as they came in. He would have all these cables and anybody who came into the Embassy, I guess we started about 8:30, he would see somebody coming in and no sooner were they at their desk then he was on the phone saying, "What are you going to do about such and such." The guy hadn't even seen the telegram. But that was his style.

Delhi was a very social place. You always went to two or three cocktails parties, a dinner or two. But every night before he went to bed he dropped by the Embassy and read again. So he was up on everything. And for a junior officer, I was still a second secretary, to he one of the favored few was very heady experience. Galbraith also had his favorites which more or less overlapped, but not entirely. I happened to have the good luck to he also one of his fair-haired boys. So I was within a fairly small magic circle. So to me it was a time when you could get things done and get the attention of the top people there. I could approach the Ambassador directly and certainly could approach Timmons directly. This didn't always sit too well with our counselors as I found out later from n y efficiency reports.

My view...I went to some length to explain it, because from the perspective of some other people who served there they would have had quite a different view and quite a different experience. But I found that it was a liberating, very energetic, can-do kind of experience. Galbraith would send a cable to Washington on almost anything at any time.

I made a contact with a very large number of senior politicians who were not approached...Nehru was his own Foreign Minister and most of the cabinet officers, if they dealt with anybody it was the head of AID and usually they dealt with bureaucrats. I got to know a lot of these men quite well just because no other American, I suppose, ever talked to them. I would mainly go to talk to them about politics. I used to go and visit cabinet members in their office mainly to talk about politics. I also got to know a group of people who controlled the executive committee of the Congress Parliamentary Party. The Congress Parliamentary Party selects the Prime Minister. These people had a number of grievances. They tended to be anti-Nehru people. People who had lost out or who Nehru had allowed to be pushed out. This was the niche they found. some of them were Cabinet ministers too. They tended to be a more conservative group, anti-Communist and very intensely anti-Krishna Menon group. These people used to consult me all the time. They asked me really seriously whether I thought the United States was going to give arms to Krishna Menon. I told them that I really doubted that the United States would give arms while Menon was still the Defense Minister. I didn't think the United States would have any hesitancy but I didn't think they would be inclined to provide our arch enemy with the means for his political salvation.

Q: We are talking about after the Chinese Indian war had started.

LAKELAND: Right. It had started. So this was taken, I later learned, as an official signal. They confronted Nehru when Parliament was reopening. They met with Nehru in the morning and demanded Krishna Menon's resignation. They said that among other things they had learned that the United States was not going to give any assistance while Menon is there. And Nehru fudged and tried to have Menon as Minister of State for Defense Production. And they weren't having that. So two of them went back to see Nehru again just before Parliament opened and said to him - they told me and I think it leaked out in the press later confirming it-that perhaps he didn't understand that we are not going to have him as Defense Minister in any Prime Minister's cabinet. And so, they gave him an ultimatum...get rid of Menon or he challenged for the Prime Ministership. And Nehru backed out. He announced when Parliament opened his acceptance of Menon's resignation as Defense Minister.

I later found out reading Galbraith memories of his years in India, that...

Q: Called "Ambassador's Journal."

LAKELAND: Yes. ...that he had been engaged in this private fierce war in Washington with the Pentagon and insisted that we not hold up military assistance for Menon's resignation. And had eventually carried the day, but fortunately the timing was such that Nehru announced Menon's resignation hours or days...I think it was the next day that the United States announced this massive military assistance to India.

You realize that here am I playing with history a little... I wasn't flying totally blind, at least in my own view. Timmons had asked me about this question. Obviously there had been some "EYES ONLY" or "NODIS" traffic going back and forth. He said, "What do you think about this?" And I said, "I think very strongly that it should be this way because of all our friends, etc." He said, "Look, you ought to write a memo to the Ambassador explaining the political situation here in India and what its implications would be in giving arms." So I wrote a memo laying it out very clearly that we should not do it...you know, recommending it very strongly. Timmons took it and gave it to the Ambassador and I never heard anything more. Then the Indians asked me. All this is going on in fairly tight time frame.

The Ambassador took my recommendations generally on political things, but in this case it turned out that he hadn't. But I had not been informed that he had made the other decision. But I had been asked for my recommendation, had put it in and had gotten no reply, either affirmative or negative. And when asked, I said that I don't think the United States will be doing this. This stiffened these guys and they confronted Nehru and that was the thing that pushed Menon out of office.

The United States decided to turn this thing into a great effort to solve the Kashmir dispute, which turned out to be a mistake. Harriman came out to crack heads and force the Indians and Pakistani to settle.

Q: Harriman was Assistant Secretary for East Asian Affairs.

LAKELAND: He was then Under Secretary Political/Military Affairs. Anyway, that operation turned out to be a big fiasco. I experienced the kind of amusing thing that happens to Foreign Service officers from time to time where the high and the mighty get their comeuppance when they step on the toes of a Foreign Service officer. I was given the job of taking Harriman over to Parliament to meet Nehru. He was having these big discussions with Nehru. We got into the Ambassador's limousine. Now in India they drive on the British side. I used to go to Parliament almost everyday and knew that when cars come in there they are going to open the door on the left hand side and there is little room to open a door on the right hand side. So I got around and sat in the right hand side going there.

Mr. Harriman took great umbrage about this. He asked me what I thought I was doing sitting in the place of honor. I tried to explain to him that when we arrive at Parliament you really want to be on the left hand side because of the way you enter. He said, "Don't argue with me young man. This is the flag seat. You get over there and I don't want to hear another word about it." I said, "Okay." He was in a terrible mood about something and he just wouldn't listen.

Well we drive up in this narrow space and this Indian in his full guard uniform opens the door and I am sitting there. Nehru is holding out his hand and I step aside and Harriman is across the way sitting there stony faced. He didn't know what to do. It would have been very difficult for him to slide across because of the big bump in the floor. So he is sort of sitting there stony faced waiting for somebody to open the door. Finally somebody comes in and gets his door partly opened. He gets out and is standing there on the other side of the car looking very uncomfortable and flustered. He comes around behind the car and I am standing aside there and he just shot me a dirty look. He never said a word about my being right or anything like that. He was blaming the whole thing on me. But I must say that I took a certain pleasure in the event.

Q: We have to find our pleasures where we can.

LAKELAND: One of the things from my personal memories...Nehru was getting old and starting to get ill. His political reputation had been considerably eroded by the China-India war. He had been first of all against military expenditures. He wanted the military established to be very small. India didn't need a defense establishment, the Chinese were to be trusted, the Americans were to be trusted, etc. So a great subject of interest and speculation over the years was after Nehru who?

So a lot of my last year in India was exploring this idea. I came up with the idea that a relatively...an Indian politician who was not well known to the Western world at all and not featured in the foreign press at all, Lal Bahadur Shastri was really the logical choice. You give all the dynamics of the left and the right and they could agree on him.

So I went around and talked to a lot of Indian senior politicians about this. They loved to talk about their politics with any American. I said, "What do you think? Do you think that Shastri...I think when it comes down to it that he is the logical choice." So I made the prediction that he would be the one. When Nehru did die, relatively shortly after that, it was a big coup that I had discovered who the next Prime Minister was.

I'm also convinced in my own mind that I simulated a lot of the thinking among the Indians that "Yes this is a solution." Unfortunately Shastri only lived for about a year and a half.

Q: He died in Tashkent.

LAKELAND: Yes, in Tashkent. Anyway, after Delhi I was summoned back to the India Desk office.

Q: This was in 1963.

LAKELAND: Right, September 1963.

Q: You went to the India Desk where you served from 1963-65. What did the India Desk officer do in those days?

LAKELAND: Those were my two by far most frustrating years in the Foreign Service. To me it was the Foreign Service at its worse. I am speaking subjectively.

Q: That is what these interviews are about.

LAKELAND: Remember what I said about how things were really great for me personally as a relatively young officer, class 4 officer there in Delhi and particularly under Galbraith and Timmons. I am dealing with cabinet ministers and heads of the party. I knew the heads of all the parties. Within the Embassy the chain of command was not oppressive, direct access to either the Ambassador and the DCM was available.

I found that the SOA (in the NEA Bureau there were three divisions, one was called South Asia (SOA) and included India, Pakistan, Ceylon, Bangladesh, Nepal, Afghanistan) was really a very bureaucratic operation. I had the unfortunate, I guess it was the reverse of my good fortune in Delhi...my immediate superior was a man who excelled at all the routine skills of the Foreign Service. And I really think lacked the non routine. But he was a very good bureaucrat for organizing and producing routine work and decision consensus clearance, etc. He was somewhat resistant to new ideas. Anything that upset the consensus. There was hound to be some...you know I am used to wheeling and dealing in high policy and whatever. I felt my talents tended to be much under used. Essentially, it turned into something of a two year battle where I was more or less pitted against the rest of the office and bureau because I had become convinced that India and Pakistan were on collision to go to war. And that this would really deep six more than a decade of US policy and umpteen billion dollars that had been poured into both countries, particularly India, to ward off such an event. I was convinced that this was going to happen because a number of things had been set in motion by the India-China war. There was a consensus that India and Pakistan always pulled back from the brink. This was a dogma. It was the word and India and Pakistan would go to the brink of war but would pull back. A large part of my experience was interpreting events and saying, "We are going to a war."

Q: What were some of the things that brought this about?

LAKELAND: Well, India decided to try to consolidate its hold in Kashmir beyond the status quo anti. Nehru had had a sort of puppet thug in there and his regime collapsed and they had to take more direct control. The more India decided to more directly integrate Kashmir into India then it had been previously, that set the Pakistani going. In addition to which India was massively arming. The theory was that India now needed an army not only big enough to check Pakistan, but equally to check China. The Paks saw this as "we know who this army is going to fight and it is not going to be China. But before the Indians can really get going...this is our last chance. The Indians are trying to foreclose anything new on Kashmir. They are going to go beyond even what their previous "aggression" was and fully integrated constitutionally in India. And they are going to have this great big military buildup which is going to end up sitting on our heads."

The Paks felt that it is now or never for them. The Indian military, smarting from their rather humiliating defeat by the Chinese were kind of spoiling for a fight with the Paks.

So you have some very important new elements in the situation. It just, to me, added up that the Paks were going to push it beyond where the Indians would take it and the Indians were going to push it beyond where the Paks were going to take it and there was going to be a war.

Sort of fighting that bureaucratic battle was really quite an unpleasant experience, because it wasn't appreciated at all. In fact...I couldn't get out of the job, when my two years were up they didn't want to let me go even though I am in constant battle. I had to find my own replacement, find my own next job.

I finally left on August 15, 1965. I hadn't gotten my efficiency report in July when they normally are done. On my last day I got my efficiency. I will never forget something in it. There was the usual stuff and then "However, Mr. Lakeland's usefulness to the office and the bureau over the past year has been very constrained by his insistence upon pressing the warning of the dangers of a Pakistan/India war thereby making the achievement of a bureaucratic consensus more difficult." I was a naughty boy.

About five days later the war broke out. After it was all over, and the promotions came out, I didn't get promoted. So I went to the Boards and asked them what happened. "Well, you were judged in the middle of your class." At that point I thought, "Look, I am willing to say that if you stick out your neck and you are wrong you are going to get your head cut off, that is fair enough. But when you stick out your neck and you are right and you get your head cut off, I don't like it." So at that point I made up my mind that I was going to start looking for something else. That is why when I got an offer from Senator Javits a couple of years later I took it. It turned out to be the greatest thing I ever did.

But that experience really soured me on the Foreign Service. It is not fun fighting with your superiors and trying to make it an argument of substance. I found those years very frustrating and most of the work was very routine, low level kind of work.

Another anomaly, I was also placed in a very difficult situation. I was still at the Embassy when Bowles came back, but I left a couple of months after he came back and took over. He had formed an impression of me that I had been one of his fair-haired boys because he was told by people that I knew a lot about India and that I got along with Indians very well.

Actually I had a very different view of India from him. He had a very romanticized view. He and his wife used to walk around in saris and this kind of stuff. So he and the Bureau and also the office had major differences of opinion. He wanted this big new thing. He abolished the political and economic sections combining them into a political/economic section. He did all kinds of stuff and he really thought that we were dealing with the Indian populous and we had better do this, that and the other thing. He made an enemy of the head of the Congress Party, who was the king maker. He took him on because he didn't like the bosses....

He and Phil Talbot, who was Assistant Secretary of State, and the general bureaucracy were on different wavelengths. He had just been Under Secretary of State and believed himself to be very much a Washington political figure who had been right about Vietnam and had been ousted. So he used to come back to Washington almost every two months or so. I was designated to be his special assistant while he was back.

It put me into a very difficult position because he regarded me as his trusted agent and the bureau regarded me as their spy to tell them what he is doing because he is operating on his own. We are going around to see everybody...going to see Rusk, Ball and McNamara, Orville Freeman of Agriculture and Carl Rowan, head of USIS. He is wheeling and dealing for India and I am his special, trusted assistant. He is a very open man and when I go back everybody asks me what he said. I was in a major dilemma. I could not satisfy either side in this situation.

But I did get to go in Washington to a lot of very interesting and high level meetings and experiences...I was used to that kind of stuff in Delhi, but as a desk officer you never got it. He would come into town and he and I would go to see Dean Rusk and talk not only about India but about everything. George Ball and McNamara, the whole smear. It was interesting. He had a rosy view of India's political situation and, of course, did not believe there was going to be a war, and if there was a war it would be totally Pakistan's fault. I had a different view of that and was saying a different view of it back in Washington. Because I had been a good political officer in Delhi one of the ways they figured they could sort of use me...because I didn't fit too conveniently in the slot I was in, they assigned me to the job of politically second guessing the Embassy's political reporting. Reinterpreting what was going on because they didn't have confidence in the Embassy's political reporting. The negative would be politically reported and the stuff that was positive would be overblown.

So I had a rather miserable two years there on the Desk. I had one experience which is typical of Foreign Service officers, more mainstream. I was the notetaker whenever the Indian Ambassador came in to see the Secretary of State or the Under Secretary. Just before the India-Pakistan war there had been some skirmishing and the Paks sort of made a deal with the Chinese that the Chinese would rattle their saber to pin the Indian divisions down in the east so they couldn't be transferred to build up against the Paks. The Chinese dully rattled their sabers saying that if India invaded Pakistan we will move in the east.

B.K. Nehru, who was Nehru's cousin and the Ambassador, came in to see Rusk to make an extraordinary request which never really surfaced in history. Knowing the way the Indians talk and knowing the thing, you know, and the Indians leave and you come around the corner and it is there. So I am sitting there writing just as fast as I could write trying to get every single word because I knew B.K. Nehru was coming in to ask the United States for a security guarantee that we would intervene militarily if China resumed hostilities with India.

Now this is something the Indians said they would never do. They would take military assistance but they had begun to get snotty, they didn't really need it. They had gone way back again to being arms length...we'll do you a favor and on our terms take some military assistance. Here they came in asking us to come in and chase the Chinese out if they come back in again. I was very sensitive to what he was leading up to and I am literally writing as fast as I can in order to get every single word. So when he is finished there is sort of a pause. I look up and Secretary Rush says to me, "Did you get that down?" I felt like saying, "What the hell do you think I have been doing scribbling getting writers cramp?" He was a little surprised by the request and to have a notetaker there at an historic moment.

So the United States did issue a muted warning and did send a carrier into the Bay of Bengal, but it all sort of faded away. But that incident never got into the history books.

Q: I heard reference to it some other time, at least at a later date there was talk about a sort of assumption on the part of some Americans and some Indians that there was an agreement.

LAKELAND: Yes. And the government of India officially denied it and we said nothing. There was an Indian who later on had access to this and surfaced it in a way on a trip to the United States that raised some great interest and the Indian press went wild over it and the Indian government absolutely denied it and we never said a word.

But I was there. I came back down and they all wanted to know what happened. I said, "Wait, let me write the telegram." So it went out as a "NODIS IMMEDIATE" to Delhi. Then Nick Veliotis, who was a political/military officer in Delhi, never saw the telegram. The DCM later asked him, "What are we going to do about this?" And he said, "What about what?" He finally, with great difficulty, got to read the cable. I guess they held it in the front office. Being a notetaker you can be there at interesting times.

From there I went to another very interesting assignment. Well, to get off the Desk, this is a very interesting thing because it supposedly is out of Foreign Service experience. My tour of duty is up. It is time for me to move on. I ask what is up and get a job offer in another Bureau. They say, "Well, we are not going to release you until we get a replacement for you satisfactory to us." I said, "What does this mean? Personnel assign officers. They have guys in Delhi. I know two guys in Delhi who are perfectly capable of handling this job." "No," they vetoed all the NEA Personnel nominations. Now this is ridiculous. This is a crummy little Desk Officer job. And we had been fighting for two years anyway. And I was really kind of desperate to get out of that place.

Now there was an Indian analyst over in CIA who was well liked and well regarded. I asked whether they would take Herb Haggerty. They said, "Oh, yeah, Herb we would take," not thinking anything would come of this. So I persuaded him to resign from the Agency and come over and become a desk officer. He got a Reserve appointment and later became an FSO and took my place. That was the only way I could get out of that damn job.

VERNON C. JOHNSON
Agricultural Program Assistant, International Cooperation Administration
New Delhi (1957-1959)

Dr. Vernon C. Johnson was born in Mississippi in 1918. He received a bachelor's degree from Southern University in 1948 and a master's degree from the University of Wisconsin in 1954. He served overseas in the U.S. Army from 1942-1946. His Foreign Service career included positions in India, Nigeria, Uganda, and Tanzania. Dr. Johnson was interviewed April 12, 1994 by W. Haven North.

JOHNSON: This was 1957 and, I believe, it was the International Cooperation Administration (ICA). Any way, I received a reply to my letter saying the position in Guatemala was filled but that a position was open in India. After follow-up I was employed and assigned the position of agricultural program assistant in New Delhi. As it happened, this was a very low level position not withstanding my degree, but I was determined to make the best of it.

Q: Had you known anything about Point Four type work before?

JOHNSON: I had skimmed articles on development theory, etc. since much of the subject-matter was related to agricultural economics. It was a new adventure, nonetheless, but I said "well look, it sounds O.K. so I'll give it a shot." The mission in India was called the Technical Cooperation Mission (TCM).

Q: Left over from the Technical Cooperation Administration (TCA) days or Point Four.

JOHNSON: That's right, so I worked in India for two years.

India was a most interesting country. Independence had come and the country had been partitioned to create Pakistan. It had just emerged from terrible internal fighting between Muslims and Hindus. Language issues, food shortages, and population pressures were among India's many problems. Among the basic institutions, there were several universities, but they had little to do with economic development. They were in the tradition of the British university to highlight the professions (law, medicine, etc.) and to teach but in the meantime far less on subjects having to do with economic development.

Q: These were universities in general or agricultural universities?

JOHNSON: When our Mission decided to assist at the university level, we selected those that taught more agricultural courses, but even at such institutions agricultural research was weak. You may recall that one of the most successful of AID's projects is the university development that we fostered in India in which features of our land grant system were introduced to these universities in India. We sent literally hundreds of Indians to the U.S. to earn U.S. degrees. Each Indian university was assisted by, and attached to, a "sister" U.S. university -Ohio State, University of Tennessee, Missouri, Kansas State, etc. I was one of the persons who drafted the first PPA(project paper) to support these universities in India. In such papers we laid out the project purpose, objectives, courses of action to be taken, U.S. costs, how much and how many of each resource to be provided, numbers of Indians to be trained, responsibilities of the Indians, etc.

Q: You were there when this university project was started?

JOHNSON: Yes, even before it was started. Because the main purpose was to upgrade agriculture. The Agricultural Division of the Mission rather than the Education Division was assigned this project. Our Mission like other A.I.D. Missions had agricultural, education, health divisions and, of course, administrative units. I have some of the old papers downstairs covering our assistance to the Indian universities.

Even these universities, which are now successful and are making a real contribution to development, went through a long transition period of 15-20 years before their impact was felt. It was not until U.S. trained Indian scholars filtered into high positions at the universities and into government positions where support decisions are made and until an institutional structure was laid that change became a goal in itself. When all of these things began to come together, the universities became very progressive in doing agricultural research work and other work in development. So even if you do the right thing, nothing much happens until a lot of variables come together so that a critical mass is formed around a particular intent; that certainly was the case in India. So that was my first post.

Q: How long were you there?

JOHNSON: I was there only two years-1957-59.

Q: Did you have any particular impressions of India; did you get out into the rural areas and the farming communities? What was your impression of Indian agriculture at that time?

JOHNSON: Yes, well compared with American agriculture, it was antiquated, bullock powered, more people than you have ever seen, rural villages everywhere. However, the production of food was spotty. As for production complements, there were tube wells so that irrigation covered thousands of acres. With U.S. assistance, fertilizer plants commenced production. There was also a railroad system that could move goods. It was one of the best in Asia, at the time. So transportation did not present the kind of problems that was experienced in a lot of other developing countries. India had some things going for it that were quite beyond anything that I later experienced in Africa. And therefore, it is misleading to make a comparison that the Indian case is good example of what can be done in Africa. I never took this idea as being very helpful.

Q: Wasn't that the time when people despaired of Indian agriculture; that the country would never feed itself?

JOHNSON: Very few gave the country much hope; it was a big country steeped in tradition; religious elements including the caste structure was said to hold back development. The historical make-up of India was considered to be a constraint to development. There was some despair at the time and it took twenty years to work through it; to get people educated, to put the right emphasis on development, to put capital into agriculture and other elements. As noted, we helped to establish the first fertilizer plants in the country. Steel mills came in at that time; the Germans assisted as did the Russians. The Americans helped to improve several that were already in the country, e.g., the Tata Plant, that kind of thing. So India strengthened its infrastructure, but it took time to develop and to mesh other elements of development into a growing country. India's products are now featured on the New York Stock Exchange here and are doing very well in that market. They found a way. Population has grown by 200 million people over the past 25 years; yet, they found a way to feed themselves.

Q: Did you work with the Indians; what was your relationship?

JOHNSON: Well, of course, there were Indians within the A.I.D. organization; they were among the best local employees anywhere, in terms of knowledge and ability. The typist in our office could do 90-100 words a minute on manual typewriters and had a memory of elephant proportions; he was a person who remembered the name of every person we sent overseas for training; and, on every other subject, he made a point of not having to go to the files. So we had excellent people to work with in India. In the rural areas we had, of course, our counterparts and we visited villages together to observe farming practices. The counterpart system has had its flaws in India as well as elsewhere. But we did the useful things that A.I.D. does well. We knew what was going on and that kind of thing and had some success in bringing change.

Q: Were there many direct hire agriculturists (A.I.D. employees) as well as the university contractors?

JOHNSON: Most were direct hire; but there was a considerable number of contract people as well.

Q: How many would you say?

JOHNSON: I'd say 150 something like that, plus contractors at each of the assisted universities. You may recall, however, in the Nixon Administration, direct hires were reduced to persons called "generalists." Contract employees were from universities and PASAs (Participating Agency Service Agreements with U.S. Government agencies). They did most of the technical work. This was unlike the technical work in India which was mainly done by direct hire people.

Q: What was your impression of the Agency's development policies in those days?

JOHNSON: As I said, I went there with no clear conception of where the priorities should be. But, I think, the most lasting thing is the institution building that we did. Other work was useful; we had a large Mission; it was well staffed; it was well funded considering the time. India was one of the countries that was reasonably high on AID's priority list; we thought it was a good place to test ideas about development.

Q: Apart from the institution building were there any other dimensions of the development policy or strategy at that time that were particularly distinctive?

JOHNSON: Well, we had the education division, the health division: all of these were elements of our development work there that went very well. We associated ourselves with clinics. Most assistance took the form of resource transfers. Development loans were just appearing on the horizon. Food aid was a major program; it had come into prominence during the late 1950s. You can imagine that in a country like India famine was weighed by the size of every crop harvest.

Q: Did you have any contact with the Embassy or the Ambassador or sense of U.S. overall policy?

JOHNSON: Not at my level. I was functioning as an Agricultural Program Assistant whose duty was to grind out the paper. Except for Indian friends and Indians in agriculture as counterparts my contacts were limited. At higher levels, our Food and Agricultural Officer, for example, actually had his office in the Ministry of Agriculture, not in A.I.D. That was Dr. Parker. That proved to be a very fruitful way because they trusted him fully.

Q: The relations with the Indian bureaucracy was on good terms?

JOHNSON: The Indian civil service had many good people but the bureaucracy itself was ponderous with many flaws. The caste system had a deleterious impact on almost everything that occurred in India. Some people in positions of influence were competent while some were not; so there was a variation in the quality of people who were in charge. Indians were always very zealous about their sovereignty; despite that fact that the U.S. was providing assistance, there was always a question of how far as a foreign entity we should be trusted. Therefore, ours was a particular relationship.

Q: In other words there was considerable sensitivity if you pushed too hard on policy issues.

JOHNSON: That's right though many strong friendships existed at personal levels. My Indian experience was my first one and a useful one. After thirty years, I still correspond with people that I knew there. Many were Indian agriculturists who were trained here and who worked in the A.I.D. office at the time.

Q: Anything else on the India experience?

JOHNSON: No, in summary, I think it was a country of great importance. Later we began to dampen our assistance there, but, I think, they are grateful for our help during their early days of independence. Currently, India is doing much better economically. It is a democracy with a market economy and a good university system, so perhaps A.I.D. should receive more credit than has been given.

MILTON LEAVITT
Cultural Affairs Officer, USIS
Bombay (1958-1960)

After serving in the Air Force in World War II, Milton Leavitt worked for IIE (a predecessor to the U.S. Information Agency) in Legaspi and then at Amerika Haus in Munich. He also served in India, Colombia, Peru, and Thailand. This interview was conducted on February 26, 1989.

LEAVITT: When I finished that assignment, I requested an overseas post again. I had a medical problem which wasn't serious. This was a residual from my prison camp days, a liver problem, which I cleared up. Then I went to India as a Cultural Affairs Officer in Bombay. Dan Oleksiw, at the time, was the branch PAO. There again, Bombay was an interesting and exciting assignment. We traveled extensively throughout the Bombay area with our mobile units, traveling exhibits, and speakers, and so on. India was a new experience for me. It was a part of the world that I had not been to before. I had been to the Far East and Europe by this time, but India was new and exciting, and very, very rewarding.

Bombay was the center for printing for USIS at the time, SPAN magazine and a lot of publications came out of Bombay. We had the entire building to ourselves on Queen's Road, if I remember correctly.

Q: The was during Nehru's incumbency, wasn't it?

LEAVITT: That's right.

Q: How did you find the attitude of the Indian people? Nehru was always sort of at arms length with the U.S. Government, and he didn't seem to adhere too much to the American viewpoint. I wondered if you found any reaction on the part of the Indians?

LEAVITT: Bombay is the city in India to which important cultural events come. So we worked closely with the Bombay music group and other organizations to help bring in these cultural activities. We didn't find any of the "anti" feelings in Bombay, not even in the outlying areas where we traveled quite extensively. Now this might not have been true of Madras or Delhi or Calcutta, but in Bombay we had no problem with that. Madras was quite cooperative and worked closely with us and we worked closely them. We had a very compatible relationship with Indians, at least the whole time I was there.

Q: Was the general population of the Bombay area again supportive of Nehru politically or did they pay much attention to him?

LEAVITT: They were quite active politically, and I'd say the Parsi group especially was quite active. They were quite aware politically of what was going on, and I think they were very pro-Nehru. When he came to give a speech on the beach area, hundreds of thousands of people would be there. Of course, there are hundreds of thousands of people all over the place anyway, but he drew enthusiastic audiences all the time.

Q: What period was that when you were in Bombay?

LEAVITT: That was up through 1958-1960. I was then returned to Washington, and again, I had a medical problem which was cleared up. But I had a stateside assignment for about a year with the International Visitors Program. That was a very interesting time for me. I worked closely with two people whom I remember quite fondly. One was Norman Cousins, who went to India for us, and Henry Kissinger who went to Pakistan and India. And I can recall how impressed I was with Henry Kissinger at the time.

Q: He was still a Harvard professor.

LEAVITT: He was a Harvard professor at the time and married to his first wife. He was connected with disarmament. He had just written a book on disarmament or something at Harvard at the time. He went through and lectured for us in India and Pakistan, and Norman Cousins also lectured for us in India.

I remember a very cute little incident with Cousins. After he got back, the Agency owed him quite a bit of money for per diem, not travel, but per diem. I called him up and I said, "Where can I send the check?"

And he said, "Gee, I was wine and dined no matter where I went." He said, "I really don't deserve that money so you better keep it."

I said, "Well, all right." So I gave it back, turned the problem over to administration and what they did with it I don't know. But he didn't want the money. He felt he didn't deserve that money since he didn't have to spend any money. I thought that was quite admirable of Cousins at the time.

STEPHEN H. ROGERS
Economic Officer
New Delhi (1959)

Ambassador Stephen H. Rogers was born in 1931 and grew up in New York. He entered the Foreign Service in 1956, where his posts included in India, France, The United Kingdom, Mexico, South Africa, Washington, DC, and an ambassadorship to Swaziland. He was interviewed by Raymond C. Ewing on July 27, 1994.

ROGERS: I had to go back and finish the A-100 course. Remember at that time they sometimes split it. So I went back to the second six-week portion and learned about consular matters, which I had absolutely nothing to do with anytime since.

As I remember I told the Foreign Service that I didn't mind where they sent me, but I would rather not go to India because it was hot, sticky, crowded and there was disease, etc. So in April, 1959, we left for New Delhi and spent a little over two years in the embassy there in the economic section. We enjoyed it immensely. It was a very exciting experience.

Q: Who was the ambassador there at that time?

ROGERS: It was Ellsworth Bunker. I always think about him when we talk about the difference between career and non-career ambassadors. He was as close to a career ambassador as you can come without being one. He had five or six different missions in his time with the State Department. I had tremendous respect for him. I had a certain amount of contact with him, not a great deal of contact, but enough to see him in action and develop respect for his integrity, his sensitivity to the Indian scene, etc. It was a little bit difficult for us at that point in India for various reasons.

Then John Kenneth Galbraith replaced him about two months before we left New Delhi, so I got to know him a little bit.

Q: That was at the beginning of the Kennedy administration in 1961. You were the junior officer in the economic section and did a range of reporting?

ROGERS: Yes.

Q: And commercial work also?

ROGERS: No, not as such. It was economic issues and economic reporting, a certain amount of contacts, a certain amount of travel to see how the economy was coming. It was the time when Nehru was the prime minister and he believed very firmly in building a base of heavy industry. Of course, we had some problem with that approach, but it went ahead without our assistance. He got his assistance from the Russians and to some extent the British and the French and others. But we pretty much stayed out of these major heavy industry projects because we disagreed in principle to the approach.

Q: We had some assistance programs of our own at the time, didn't we?

ROGERS: Oh, we had very substantial programs. We had a very large mission, TCM, Technical Cooperation Mission. My recollection is it was agriculture, education and that kind of thing. But I don't remember it in great detail. But, a very important part of our program was PL 480. While we were there we signed a very large agreement for PL 480 grains for India with the expectation that this would cover the time until India could be self-sufficient. Well, it took far longer, I take it. I haven't been back to India since 1961. It took far longer than we had anticipated, but finally it seems to have happened, and that is good.

Q: This is a period not long after partition and independence for India and Pakistan, but before the next major war between them in 1965. Did you travel to Pakistan?

ROGERS: No. We were certainly aware of the tensions and the history and all, but we could not, as I recall, we certainly did not, cross the border on land. Flying in we flew from Karachi, so there was that link at least.

While I was there the main focus of concern was on China. There was an incursion by the Chinese into Ladakh in the north and there was a certain amount of fighting there, which I take it sounded far worse back here than it did to us sitting in New Delhi. But still, it was a matter of concern. The Chinese were building their embassy very close to ours in the new diplomatic enclave, Chanakyapuri, and they stopped work on it. Things became quite tense.

Q: Had our new embassy been completed during the time you were there?

ROGERS: The chancery, yes, but the residence not.

Q: The architect for the chancery was Edward Durell Stone.

ROGERS: Right. I liked that building. It had been opened for just three months when we got there. I thought it was beautiful and enjoyed it. A lot of people didn't care for it because it was an open rectangle and you had to walk around the courtyard to get somebody from the economic section over to the political section or other parts of the embassy. I thought it was a magnificent building and was very pleased with it.

Q: Did your wife teach in New Delhi?

ROGERS: She did. There was an American school. She taught about half time because we had a little girl by that time.

Q: Born in New Delhi?

ROGERS: No, she was five or six months old when we went to New Delhi. So Kent could teach...she wasn't really asked, she was sort of told that they needed her. She taught in what was called the old Taj Barracks, which had very high ceilings and pretty surroundings. But she loved it because she could do anything she wanted in her room. There was lots of wall space way up if she wanted to put things on and nobody cared about whether there was going to be a little sticky stuff left over and that kind of thing. So she enjoyed teaching there.

ELEANORE RAVEN-HAMILTON
Wife of USAID Officer, Jacques Raven

New Delhi (1959-1962)

Ms. Raven-Hamilton was born and raised in New York and educated at Rosemont College and the American University of Beirut, Lebanon. After working in the Visitors Center in New York City, she joined the Foreign Service in 1957. Shortly thereafter she was required to resign her commission upon marriage to a USAID officer in 1957. Mrs. Raven then accompanied her husband on his assignments to New Delhi, Beirut, San Francisco and Paris. In 1974 she rejoined the Foreign Service and was posted to Teheran, The Hague and Belfast, where she served as Consul General. She also served several tours at the State Department in Washington, DC. Ms. Raven-Hamilton was interviewed by Edward Dillery in 2009.

RAVEN-HAMILTON: We arrived in India just before the famous visit of President Eisenhower. It was the first visit ever of a sitting American president. Delhi went wild. The excitement was extraordinary. Because hotel rooms were so scarce, we had to stay in Old Delhi, away from most of the action. We stayed in a lovely old government house from the British Raj, now a hotel, out on the "Civil Lines" (a British division of cities to denote areas with civilian buildings and residences). The house had wonderful gardens and high ceilings with fans -- and aggressive monkeys in the garden and some very large bugs. It was like being in a novel or watching a film about the Raj.

In fact, at the hotel, we met another American guest, James Ivory, who went on to make so many famous films about India with Ismail Merchant. We did a lot of things with Jim during the time we were all at the hotel, including going to hear Eisenhower speak to the huge crowd.

Q: Now this was 1959 right?

RAVEN-HAMILTON: Yes, just before Christmas, 1959. After the Eisenhower visit, we moved to a hotel in New Delhi closer to the Embassy. Then we moved to a "bungalow" (an Indian word) that turned out to be a two story building housing four families, three Indian and us. That was a great experience. Sunder Nagar is now considered a posh area of New Delhi. We visited it in April 2010, and it looks very prosperous, indeed. I was pleased to see how some of the nondescript maidans (large grassy squares surrounded by houses) had been transformed with trees and flowers into beautiful gardens. Some houses were unchanged, but our bungalow has been replaced by a very large house built for a single family.

We lived on the second floor, in a three bedroom apartment with a balcony veranda, again very high ceilings, and thick walls. We also had access to the flat roof, part of which was covered -- a great place for an evening dance party. The house was built to protect against the heat in a pre-air conditioning time. In the winter, without any central heating, it was quite cold despite some small heaters. But it was bearable in the summer, even when we lost electricity. We did have air conditioning units in the bedrooms, so we could sleep. However, in the heat of summer, just before the monsoon, the air in Delhi was thick with sand because there had not been any rain since the previous summer. The winds were so high that dust was everywhere, including inside the air-conditioning units. We had ceiling fans in every room, another touch of the Raj. The fans helped but mainly blew around the dust.

I got to know two of the women in our bungalow fairly well. They were Punjabi sisters-in law, and I discovered how strong Punjabi women were. They ran the house and their husbands, but even they probably had little power outside their immediate family and outside the house. Our neighbors all lived in nuclear family arrangements, but were tightly woven into the family of their husbands, whose father ruled the whole family.

Our other neighbor in the bungalow lived a more restricted life. Her family came from a small sub-caste in the middle of the country. Her husband owned a travel agency, but his wife never went anywhere. Their very bright daughter started university, but was pulled out, because, in the culture of their sub-caste, they might never have found her a husband for her if she were too educated. She also should not have been in mixed classes and associating with boys. She told me she loved it and was doing well academically.

But, she was married off -- into a family that mistreated her. Our neighborhood Punjabi women were angry about that. Shortly before we left India, our Punjabi neighbors confronted the girl's father and forced him to intercede on her behalf with the husband's family and also demand that she be allowed to visit her family alone. They succeeded. Just before we left I was told that the girl would be allowed to visit. Those Punjabi women were tough.

Q: How did they manifest that?

RAVEN-HAMILTON: Well, for example, they invited me sometimes, to join a group of women for morning coffee. One Punjabi woman asked me how many children I wanted. I said, "Oh, my husband and I thought we would like to have two children." The women jumped on me and demanded, "What does your husband have to do with this? This is your decision."

Q: Oh, that kind of tough. I see. And you were about to greet a newcomer around this time. Is that right? Your first child.

RAVEN-HAMILTON: Yes, Rob was born July 5, 1960, the day before the monsoon broke.

Q: So you were pretty well acclimated by the time Rob was born.

RAVEN-HAMILTON: We had been there about six months. Rob was born in a very good hospital, Holy Family hospital, run by an American order of sisters, who were doctors, nurses and medical technicians and administrators. His father was able to be in the delivery room for the birth and was given an introduction to the process of childbirth by the American obstetrician-surgeon who ran the hospital, another nun. She explained to Jacques what she was doing and why. When we were leaving Delhi, I was about six months pregnant with our second child. We planned to stop in Afghanistan, Turkey, Austria, France and New York on the way back to Washington. She said, "Don't worry, I don't think the baby will be early. I told your husband exactly what he has to do if the baby starts to come. It is going to be all right, don't worry." Which I didn't, and we went ahead on our indirect travel home.

Q: Did you meet other Indian families?

RAVEN-HAMILTON: Yes, in addition to the three families sharing our building, a lot of foreign and Indian women supported the Holy Family hospital, and I worked with them. An English woman with whom I volunteered became a life-long friend. We had several close Indian friends too.

We also met a lot of foreigners and Indians when we joined the Delhi Gymkhana Club, which was an old institution of the Raj. It used to cater to the British and Europeans, but now has mainly Indian members. It was the kind of place you would find in a film of the 1920s or 30s. High ceilings, portraits of the “good and the great,” many servants in turbans and livery, and all that. There was a covered swimming pool in the gardens, the “Lady Willingdon Swimming Bath,” where I practically lived. It was so hot, and we didn’t have much running water except in the middle of the night. I would collect water then and fill bathtubs and various containers, so we could cook, wash ourselves and clothes, and flush toilets.

It was such a sight in the Gymkhana to see the Indian Army and Navy officers, who were leading members of the Club in postcolonial India. We watched them walking along with their swagger sticks in a way no other group of officers seems to manage. Another vestige of the Raj.

I also met some members of the legendary Indian Civil Service created under the British Raj to help run the country. They were such an amazing group of people. Their training and exams were formidable. I was delighted to have had the chance to talk to a few of them and even more delighted that I never had had to meet their standards to join the American government.

We traveled as much as possible and met Indians, Europeans and Anglo-Indians, many of whom seemed more British than the British. The Anglo-Indians lost their place in society when the Raj ended. They had been educated for a world that no longer existed and had lost their privileges and the jobs reserved for them. Many were impoverished and sadly rootless in independent India. Some spoke to me of England as their home, even though they had never actually been there.

We went to Kashmir at one point and spent two wonderful weeks on a house boat on a Dal Lake (Nagin Lake). That was an amazing experience. Absolutely wonderful. Kashmir is so beautiful!

At that point, Rob was just a year old. I had filled our suitcases with jars of American foods for toddlers. But the cook on the house boat started feeding him curry.

Q: He liked it?

RAVEN-HAMILTON: He loved curry. He ate fish and duck and chicken and curries of all sorts. He absolutely refused to have anything to do with the tasteless “junior food” I had brought for him. We flew part way from Kashmir in a DC 3 through the mountain valleys and then had to take the train from Pathankot, a cantonment town on the Indo-Pakistani border, back to Delhi. It was tense at that time, and Indian and Pakistani troops were confronting each other along the border. We had a very long wait in Pathonkot's train station before trains were allowed to move again. I was pregnant and not feeling very well.

Rob would not eat the baby food, nor would he eat the rather awful "Western" food we had ordered. His Ayah, Kamila, said, "Don't worry; I will take him to the Indian restaurant. Don't you come with me." Rob was as happy as could be and seemed to have eaten well -- but I never asked questions. He drank tea whenever he could possibly manage to get some. He still drinks tea Indian style, maybe not with quite as much sugar now. He still loves curry and rice.

Another trip we made a little later was to Nepal. Katmandu seemed to me to be a Shangri-La accentuated by the giddiness I felt because of the high altitude. On the way back to India, our plane was delayed by several hours, and we lost our hotel reservation in Calcutta. We did not know exactly what to do. It was quite late, and, as usual, when I was pregnant and tired, I was not feeling too well. A young man we met on the plane said, "Why don't you come home with me? My wife is also pregnant, and we are all about the same age." He took us home, and we took them out for dinner. We spent, I guess, two days with them, and he introduced us to Calcutta. We had a wonderful time with them. I was surprised when he started singing a long nineteenth century American sort of music hall ballad that my father used to sing and that I had never heard anywhere else. They were a terrific couple. Although we never saw them again, we kept in touch for a while. I am very grateful for their welcome and for teaching us so much about Calcutta, which I think is an amazing, vibrant city with so many beautiful buildings in the midst of such poverty. I thoroughly enjoy the Bengalis, the literary leaders of India.

Q: Did you miss working?

RAVEN-HAMILTON: Yes, to some extent. Shortly after I arrived in Delhi, about three months pregnant, I was at a party having after-dinner coffee with the Embassy's admin counselor and someone in the political section. They were bemoaning their fate because the assignment of a junior political officer to Delhi had had to be broken. I had learned quite a bit about India by that time, reading as much as I could and talking to people. So, I reminded them of my experience at State and told them that my security clearance should still be good. I offered to work until someone could be assigned to the Embassy. The admin counselor turned to me rather angrily and said, "How dare you ask for a job now. You have made your choice. You knew the rules on marriage."

Q: Another memorable encounter.

RAVEN-HAMILTON: I was so floored; I was at a loss for words. After that, I just stayed away from the Embassy as much as I could. My husband was working with USAID (United States Agency for International Development), and I found that group much nicer. I really liked them very much.

Q: And they weren't in the same building or anything?

RAVEN-HAMILTON: No. They were in another building. I only had to go to the Embassy for shots and things like that.

Q: It didn't do you any good.

RAVEN-HAMILTON: No, and I never mentioned it again.

This was in 1960, and the American elections were coming up. Everyone was interested in our elections. All kinds of people, European and Indian, would ask me about the election. My close British friend, who had read economics at Oxford, and I agreed that, while our children played in the maidan (the little park like space in our neighborhood), I would teach her about American history and politics and she would teach me economics. Our children were the same age and were easy to supervise. So, Mary and I did that, but excitement over the upcoming American election focused our minds. I did not learn much about economics!

Q: Everyone was so curious about our election.

RAVEN-HAMILTON: Oh yes. It was Kennedy-Nixon. People were fascinated by Kennedy, the young man who represented the changing of the guard. The Embassy was able to get the TV footage of their debates, and invitations to watch them at the Embassy were prized. We took as many friends as we could to see them, including Mary.

Q: Reminiscent of what happened in 2008.

RAVEN-HAMILTON: Yes. There was so much interest abroad and a feeling that the torch really was being passed to a whole new generation.

When we were in Kashmir, I used to have long talks with a Kashmiri man who spoke English quite well and was very well informed about the American political system. He asked me questions about the election process and about Kennedy. He really knew a lot of the ins and outs of technical parts of our electoral system, even asking about voting in the electoral college. I was impressed and asked him what he was reading to have kept up so closely with our elections. He replied that he listened to the radio, but he did not know how to read. His granddaughter read the newspapers to him every day. Here he was, illiterate in his own language, and he practically could have taught, in English, an American high school class about the American political system.

Q: Amazing, and all second hand through the newspapers and radio. Did he listen to Voice of America or BBC?

RAVEN-HAMILTON: BBC probably. Maybe both and Indian news. I don't remember anymore. I was stunned when he said he couldn't read.

Q: How long were you in New Delhi?

RAVEN-HAMILTON: Just two years. Jacques was reassigned to Washington in November. On our way back, we stopped in places I had always wanted to see. Kabul was one. I was fascinated by Babur, the first Mogul emperor, and also wanted to see his famous gardens of which there was not much evidence. One of the interesting things I remember was being outside the big market in Kabul and seeing a woman completely covered in a burqa (head to toe covering) leading by the hand her son, who was wearing a New York Yankees baseball jacket. There was a big market for second hand clothes in Afghanistan. That is where his mother must have bought it. We could not see the Bamiyan Buddhas, later destroyed by the Taliban -- the roads were too rough for me -- but we saw a lot.

Then, we went to Istanbul, a city I had long wanted to see and have visited many times now. We went to Vienna, where we had friends, and then spent several weeks in Paris, where Rob met his French grandmother and his great grandparents and to New York to meet his American grandparents. When we arrived in Washington, Rob and I started looking around for a house.

FRANK E. SCHMELZER, JR.
Political Officer
Madras (1959-1962)

Frank E. Schmelzer, Jr. was born in Massachusetts in 1927. He received a bachelor's degree from Harvard University and a master's degree from the University of Pennsylvania. He entered the Foreign Service in 1956. His career included positions in Germany, India, Afghanistan, Vietnam, and Washington, DC. Mr. Schmelzer was interviewed by Mike Springmann on December 1, 1992.

SCHMELZER: After that I had some more university training. This time it was courtesy of the State Department. First I had nine months of Hindustani at the Foreign Service Institute, then a year of university training at Berkeley consisting of more language and history, etc.

Then I went to Madras as a political officer. Here we begin to pickup another theme. This was in that period of our history in the Foreign Service when it was fashionable to believe that we had to know everything about everything. I was in the political section and I wanted to stay on until the 1962 general elections. The result was that I stayed in Madras for four years.

I remember we made an assessment of every one of the constituencies in south India and there were approximately a thousand of them. We made a projection as to who was going to win in each one.

Q: These were the districts for the...?

SCHMELZER: ...For the 1962 general election. Most of these were for the state assemblies in the four states of south India, but they also included the members of Parliament that are elected from there to go to New Delhi.

Galbraith was Ambassador at the time. I remember the word from the Embassy was that he was wondering why we were going to all this trouble. Why not just wait until after the elections were over and read in the newspapers what had happened?

Well, of course, the answer to that is that if you adopt that more relaxed approach, then you don't know what the election results mean, whereas you do know if you have really been grubbing around beforehand. But I believe we were over-doing it at that time.

During this period in Madras I was fairly aggressive, perhaps overly so. The result was that at one time the Ministry of External Affairs in New Delhi sent a Diplomatic Note to the Embassy complaining about me. They said that I was being too aggressive in pursuing the Communists in south India. But that was not the real reason, I think. I think the reason I got their goat was that I discovered on one of my trips into southern Madras state that the Congress Party had kidnapped some members of the opposition party, the Dravida Munnetra Kazhagam (DMK), or Dravidian Progressive Federation, and kept them sequestered while some of the local elections were going on so that the DMK, could not exercise its majority rights. And thus the Congress Party maintained their control of that area. I made the mistake of letting one of the local officials know that I had that story. I think that was what was behind the Diplomatic Note.

Before I went out on tours I would write ahead and make appointments. On one of my trips to Kerala, where the Communist Party is very strong, I had written to make an appointment with the General Secretary of the Communist Party in that state and had no answer from him, but I went to see him anyway. I don't think he liked it.

Then one time while on tour in Andhra Pradesh I heard that Sanjeeva Reddy, President of the All India Congress Party was in his home. I am afraid I burst in on him and got him out of his bathtub. I was overdoing this.

But this raises an interesting story. Earlier, while I was in New Delhi, I think I came to the attention of the Communist Party. For one thing I was a Harvard man. Now I read one time that the KGB took out files on anybody who graduated from Harvard. I find that hard to believe because it would be excessive, I think, even for them. But there I was working as a clerk in the Embassy. I had all these friends in New Delhi. A lot of Indian Army officers. I used to give all these parties. Maybe I had a little more profile than I should have had for a clerk, particularly in the eyes of the Russians who used chauffeurs, etc. as their KGB agents.

One time I gave a large party. I had a lot of thirsty Indian friends and we decided to have some fun and give a "one million BC" party. So we had a greased flag pole, a couple of girls came in tiger skins, all men were stripped to the waist as they came in. I had a 40 gallon barrel of beer that had been sitting there in the shade for about a week so the hops would settle. Indian beer in the bottle was great but in the barrel it wasn't good. The only people that would drink that stuff were the Indian Army officers. We had a dancing bear and a couple of roast pigs.

So we were having a pretty good time. As the men came in they stripped to the waist, put on a beard, and I gave them an earthen pot of this beer. This began to draw a crowd. One of my Indian buddies and I were feeling no pain after a while and we went over to the crowd and grabbed this one little guy who was looking in at us. We just lifted him up over the fence, stripped him and made him drink a pot of this stinking beer.

Well, we shouldn't have done that. About three weeks later the Communist monthly, "The New Age" had a story about our party..."Culture of the Vulture." It turns out that the little fellow that we had grabbed was the editor of that magazine and he didn't like it.

Q: Was there fallout in the Embassy about that?

SCHMELZER: No, and I thought there might have been, but there was not. They thought it was rather amusing.

I mention this because later, while I was in Madras sometimes some Indians would confuse me with somebody else from a sister agency. I looked somewhat like him. This was confusing to any Communist who might be following the scene. I also was very friendly with someone with a very sensitive position in one of the Indian Services and there was a very interesting arrangement I had with him. We were just friends.

Subsequently, an officer came out from Washington to look for somebody to be sent to Afghanistan. They wanted someone with a little pizzazz because it was difficult to operate in the police state environment there. Based on my record they chose me. So I went up Kabul.

Q: Let me ask you a couple of questions. What was your role in the consulates...Madras and Frankfurt...with the Embassy? Were you running your own independent fiefdom or was it like my experience in Saudi Arabia that whatever you wrote had to be cleared with the higher ups in the Embassy? Did you have your own show?

SCHMELZER: Yes, we did. In Frankfurt we had our own operation, the Refugee Relief Program. We were the largest single unit doing this Germany-wide, although we were getting guidance from the Embassy. In Madras, however, the consulates did their own political reporting and sent copies to the Embassy. We took some guidance from them. They told us what they wanted us to place emphasis on, but, no, we had our own reporting and sent the Embassy copies of it.

Often we had a different point of view than the Embassy. Sometimes we were better informed than they were, too. For example, I remember the question of Goa when Galbraith was the Ambassador and he was reporting back...the consulates would see some of the Embassy reporting, but not all of it...so we knew that Galbraith was reporting back to Washington that Nehru had assured him that the Indians would not move into Goa. We knew god damn well that he would. We had seen troop movements. It was not that we could read Nehru's mind but we just knew Nehru was going to move in. It was just quite clear. And he did. We tried to tell that to the Embassy, but they couldn't do anything because Galbraith was giving them the line. He was just wrong on this and wouldn't take advice from us or his own political officers on that issue.

This, of course, gets to another point...You have heard this before and probably have been subjected to it yourself. I refer to the junior officer who seems to be closest to the ground and sometimes comes up with an analysis or a point of view which the seniors don't like. This happened to me in Madras. After two years in Madras I was well tuned in. I would go home at night and the phone would begin to ring and by 8:00 o'clock there would be 20 or 30 Indians there. Of course, they wanted to drink my free booze, but I just had very good relations with these people. So I was extremely well informed. One result of that was that I knew very well what the opposition party, the DMK, was doing. I would tell the Consul General that they would move way ahead in the coming election and in five years would take over the government in that state. Well, that would make him furious because he was getting the New Delhi line from the governor and the chief minister, that the Congress Party was strong and was going to win the elections and that the opposition party was a bunch of creeps and not reliable, etc.

The Consul General got so mad with me that he would not let me report on Madras state, which I knew so well. I did the other three states. Indeed, I had the best record in India in predicting what was going to happen. But the Consulate "blew" Madras because the guy he made do the reporting on Madras had to reflect the view of the Consul General. I kept telling him that he was making a big mistake.

Q: Did this show up in your efficiency reports?

SCHMELZER: Well, it didn't help me any.

Q: Had you ever sent a dissenting cable to Washington or official-informal letters saying you disagreed?

SCHMELZER: I think that I probably did, I don't remember. I must have sent a letter or two, perhaps not a cable. But you see that sort of thing all the time in the Foreign Service. It is a pity.

I thought I might say one or two things about the foreign cultures you serve in, because I think this is important.

Q: Yes, a lot of people nowadays do not get plugged into a culture. They sit back with their VCRs and do their time and get out.

SCHMELZER: I was fortunate because before I went to India I had already had graduate training and had studied Sanskrit, Hindustani, Indian culture, etc. and had a pretty good idea of what to expect. I had also been exposed to Americans who had focused on the language, the history and philosophy of India and then had been shocked by the reality of the thing when they actually got to India.

Q: You get the taxi driver who wants to take you for a tour of New Delhi instead of going down the road a half mile to the hotel.

SCHMELZER: Precisely. So you know all about this. An extreme example of the importance of this occurred while I was in the Embassy in New Delhi. You know secretaries assigned to the Embassy would usually get one, two or three weeks orientation at the Foreign Service Institute. It was rather short, probably useful, but not always effective as this example indicates.

Two girls had arrived and within two weeks or so they decided to go out on their own to a temple about 25 or 30 miles north of New Delhi during a festival period. There was a big celebration. They went on their own. Most of the rural people who flocked to this temple for the big show were peasants who had never seen white women before and certainly had never had an opportunity to pinch them on the bottom and the breasts, which they proceeded to do. So these women were jammed into a corner of the temple and were pinched black and blue. They finally got out of there and came back to the Embassy the worse for wear. One of these girls was psychotic and should have been evacuated immediately. She stayed on in the Embassy for two years and hated India and Indians and was a focal point of rage and hatred for those two years she was there. It was just so foolish. She obviously didn't learn anything in that orientation at FSI. Had they gone out to that temple with just one male, Indian or American, they would have had better treatment. And, of course, there really should have been two or three males along. That was one instance.

Another thing used to happen often, very curious, at cocktail parties. Let's say half of those standing in the room were Indian and the other half Americans and Europeans. You would notice a motion begin. The European and American would begin to back up. And I would watch this...it would be kind of fun to see it on a video and I bet you would have a circle there. What was going on? The Indian and the Americans have a different sense of space. So while the Indian was trying to get close enough to you to be comfortable in his relationship, the American has to back away to regain his proper sense of space. This creates a tiny bit of tension both for the American and the Indian. The Indian senses that the American is not being friendly and the American senses that the Indian is being too pushy. I caught on to this right away and would not back up. Immediately the Indian would sense that I was a friend, that I was on his side. That was very interesting.

Q: Did this make you more effective because the Indians would automatically open up to you?

SCHMELZER: Right. Absolutely. This was particularly true later on in Madras because I already knew this. When I got to Madras I had no problems at all.

While I was in Madras the Chinese attacked India. The Cuban missile crisis arose at the same time. I happened to be on tour in Kerala that same week. It was very interesting because the Indians for years had been at pains to be neutral, to exploit their neutralism and to trot out this expression "Hindi Chini Bhai Bhai Hai," that is the Indians and Chinese were brothers. Within hours of that attack suddenly everything had changed. The Indians were running up to me in the streets and saying, "You Americans, of course, will come and help us after you take care of the Russians, won't you. The Chinese eat rats you know." It was interesting. Just like that. Here again, the cultural divide. They eat rats! The cultural divide, just like that. Wham!

Another thing about the Indians that was fascinating to me was their skill in argument. Of course this has been developed over centuries, particularly among the Brahmins. They are masters at this. And the Americans are not so good. We had this type of culture until Gutenberg came along and then we began to read, and no longer to memorize things. We no longer have the classical education which we had until the 19th century where they taught you logic and debating skills. Most Americans don't have that anymore. So in New Delhi I would see Americans reduced to tears from frustration. They would not know how to debate with these Indians. I would watch this and be terribly amused because I could see what the Indian was doing. He was comparing Indian ideals against American practice. And, of course, the deck is obviously stacked in his favor when he does that. The trick is, of course, to state American ideals and compare them to Indian practice. Then the Indians would start to sputter. Of course, people like Krishna Menon and Nehru were using the same trick in a sense. It was really quite interesting.

The Russians, and I saw this in Kabul, also had strong cultural divides that were interesting. One of them, was with the Chinese...I think the Russians were really innately afraid of them. I remember one time when I was talking to some Russians about Chinese missile development, and you could smell a change, emanating perhaps from their armpits as if some chemical reaction had taken place. Curious.

In Stuttgart, in 1978 toward the end of my tour, I knew I was going to retire and study music, and I related this to my German friends with interesting reactions. Many had studied music when they were young, had always had a love of music, but had gone on into business, banking, and were married and had children. The German educational system and culture are in some ways more rigid than ours. You could see the eyes of some of these Germans light up. This was something they would like to do, but they couldn't. Their wives would immediately get nervous because they didn't want Hans to even entertain the idea of leaving his good position in the bank to go back to university to study music. It was a threat to them.

You mention this to an Indian and, of course, it was a great idea. To the Indian it was just the most natural thing in the world. Why? Because the Indians had that traditional sense of the four stages of life. You are young and a student, then a householder, then a civic member of society, and then you prepare for the fourth stage. In the fourth stage you go off into a jungle, read the religious books and prepare to die...to climb up the chain of consciousness, etc. In fact once I actually met a couple of Indians who had done this, who were living up in the foothills of the Himalayas. One had been the president of a medical school in the Punjab and the other one had been a professor.

Let me say one more brief thing about India, and these are personal experiences that I used indirectly in my second symphony, which I entitled "Taj Mahal." One of the things that some of us used to do in Delhi was to go out to Humayun's Tomb. I would take a flute and one of the ladies from the Embassy had a guitar and the acoustics in there were so wonderful that a guitar chord would sound just like an organ, and the flute was wonderful too. Another place we visited was Mathura on the Jumna River which is supposed to be the birth place of Krishna. There was a great scene there near his temple. People would go there for the so-called Arati ceremony at evening. They light a little candle and put it on a small piece of bark and float it down the river. They throw chickpeas in the river to feed the turtles, thereby keeping them away from the candles.

In Agra these turtles are not well fed. An American who had been through there told me the following unhappy story. One morning he happened to be behind the Taj Mahal on the river side where some people were washing clothes. One old man took off his turban to wash it and it got away from him. He stepped into deeper water to get it and a lot of these turtles grabbed him, pulled him under the water and ate him alive in front of everybody. These were the same turtles that you would see at Mathura, but here they were not well fed. A terrible story.

Q: Are these the same turtles they are reintroducing back into the rivers to clean up the pollution?

SCHMELZER: Yes, I think so. They have a head the size of your fist. They are a good size.

In Agra...I saw the Taj Mahal there three times in the full moonlight. A wonderful experience. It just seems to float. I mention this for two reasons. One, because I understand now you can't get in there anymore at night, that they have locked it up, which is a pity. It is a wonderful thing to see in full moonlight. It is almost a mystical experience. And I tried to get a sense of that in the last movement of this symphony...a sense of floating.

Q: I was severely criticized in Jeddah for entertaining and in Stuttgart they simply cut off my funds. I got no cooperation from the guy who used to rent out his maid for parties. I eventually packed it in and said, "The hell with it, I just can't do it." I was frustrated. But then nobody else entertained.

SCHMELZER: Well, we certainly did. We always did. In Madras I used to have parties anywhere from two to two hundred people. I was really set up for it there.

Nathan, my principal cook and bearer (I also had an assistant cook and a gardener), had great aplomb and could handle anything on short notice. He also could be relied upon the next day for a full report (X had this many whiskies, Y had so many plates of curry, Z tried to take A into the bush). And as I noted above, prohibition made my ample supply of booze quite attractive. (We also had an ayah, or nurse-maid, after our son was born -- dismissed, unhappily, when she was found to have leprosy).

ROGER ERNST
Development Officer, USAID
New Delhi (1959-1962)

Roger Ernst was born in New York in 1924. He graduated from Williams College in 1948 and the National War College in 1956. He served as an overseas Captain from 1943 to 1947. His career with USAID included assignments in India, Taiwan, Korea, Ethiopia and Thailand. Mr. Ernst was interviewed in 1997 by Arthur Lowrie.

ERNST: In the meantime, at one point, I was at the table one morning when the Ambassador went through the list of upcoming visitors of importance, and he said "Now we have the President's brother-in-law, Sargent Shriver, coming on a tour of exploration to see whether the Indian government would accept the American Peace Corps." And he looked around the table, he said "Ernst, you're the youngest, you're more like The Peace Corps." This was 1961, so I wasn't 40, 37 or something. He said "You take care of Shriver, you be his control officer." And that was wonderful. I made the hotel arrangements, set up the cars, arranged the meeting at the airport, and the itinerary, and I took the notes at the meetings. And the last night Shriver was there, he dined with the Ambassador, and the next morning I was called in and he said, "You're going to set up the Peace Corps in India, I loaned you, I've donated you to the Peace Corps. And I made some reply to the effect, "Well, I'm not in a position to dispose of myself, I belong to Tyler Wood." He said "That's settled." I went to Tyler Wood and I said "What about this?" He said "Well, you do have a choice." I said "What do you think I should do?" He said. "You've got to settle whether you want to stay with AID or go with the Peace Corps. I don't know how long you'll stay with the Peace Corps." And I must have looked perplexed. Wood went to his bookshelf, he was in his home, his residence. And he took out a volume of Winston Churchill's works and he opened it, he knew what he was looking for, he said "I quote Mr. Churchill: 'To few is it given to know their interest, but to all to do their duty.'" He said "Roger, you have to do your duty, your interests will be taken care of." He said "Your duty, probably, is the Peace Corps job, because you sat through all those discussions, some of them just Shriver and you with X, Y, and Z India staff. And you went to the meeting of the Ambassador and Shriver with the Prime Minister. There was only one other Indian there, you know what went on. That's your duty, make it happen." So I spent a year with the Peace Corps.

Q: Did you go back to Washington for orientation?

ERNST: Well, there wasn't any orientation. This was before the Peace Corps existed. We created it. So I negotiated the agreement with the Indian government. Shriver had a vision of 500 volunteers for India. The Indian government had an idea of having 5; the embassy, the political section, was very unhappy about the idea, more Americans would make trouble. They were thinking 25.

Q: Wasn't that the general sentiment in the Foreign Service?

ERNST: Yes. And the Indian government was thinking five. Well, I was rounding up votes, if you will, lobbying the government. And one day I went to see Ras Kumari Amrit Kaur, who was the Minister of Health, wonderful woman, to whom I'd been introduced by a third party. Another story. And I was talking about the Peace Corps, and she said "Do you know, Mr. Ernst, if we take the American Peace Corps, we'll have to take Russian volunteers, too." She was playing on our alleged antipathy with the Russians. I said "Madam Minister, we have no problems with that. We know the sophistication of your Government is such that you can handle any group that comes in here." She said, "Alright." And then there was a meeting with the Prime Minister, and I'll give Ambassador Galbraith the credit for pulling off the agreement. The Prime Minister had been briefed by the Minister of Home Affairs. Half the cabinet - security people, Defense, Foreign Ministry - was against the Peace Corps. The only people for it were the Ministers of Agriculture and Labor, plus the leader of the Socialist party, Ashok Mehta, and the planners.

Q: Not education?

ERNST: Yes. The Minister of Education. But the most were against it. And Mr. Galbraith turned around finally to face the Prime Minister, and he said "You know, Mr. Prime Minister, I want to tell you a story about my childhood, my youth in the province of Ontario. One summer I worked on a farm. And at the end of the summer agriculture had not declined, and public morality had not been abused, because of my presence. I will guarantee that 25 young Americans will not cause a decline in your agriculture.” And the Prime Minister roared with laughter, and he said "Bring 'em. You overrode the Foreign Ministry, the Ministry of Interior, the Defense Ministry."

Q: For 25?

ERNST: We actually brought 26. I went back to Washington, I made the agreements with the Punjab government, got them approved in Delhi, the central government. Learning a little about the federal structure. Back to the States, ran the computers with various of the staff at Peace Corps headquarters.

Q: Gee, you had computers?

ERNST: IBM, those big three-by-ten cards. They had all these kids who had signed up as being interested on cards, and we were looking for land grant college graduates from farms, farm backgrounds. I made an agreement with Ohio State University for training. We picked Ohio State because they already had a number of people who knew India; they had a contract with AID in the Punjab. We were going to use the PCVs as the technical mentors in the extension apparatus of India. We invited 100 to training, 65 came, I brought two people from India to help train and select, so that if there were some who were unsuitable the decision wasn't just American, it was Indian. 35 qualified, we actually ended up with 26. I brought them out to India just before Christmas, and stayed with the program until the following summer when Shriver asked me to become a permanent Peace Corps Officer. He said "You're going to have to take Peace Corps salary and give up your diplomatic status, take your children out of the American school, give up the commissary." I wasn't prepared to do that with my family, two little kids who were five and seven. So I went back to AID. And someone else took over the Peace Corps. Joe Wheeler, a good person.

So, anyway, Peace Corps turned out to be a great success. The volunteers were spread on the Grand Trunk Road between Delhi and Damritsar, in pairs, working with Indians. No one got in trouble. They were constructive. They used their knowledge. They all learned. One of them, for example, Tom Kessinger, is today the President of Haverford College. He came back to India as the Ford Foundation representative. Got the spirit of the foreign adventure in his genes. Another young fellow came back to Washington and became a lawyer working for the Federal Trade Commission, left the Federal Trade Commission, went to the Department of Interior, became the Counsel for Agana, Guam. Still lives in Guam. Another fellow went to finish business school after the Peace Corps, went to work for Kodak, became their West African representative. A lot of payback for America.

Q: More than for the Indians?

ERNST: Well, I think so, yes. I think it enriched our society more than it did good in India. Individual villages were improved. Out of it came some methodologies that were useful, but total impact, not much. And I spent my time, I traveled, I was three days a week in the Punjab, one day a week at the office, and two days a week I went to other parts of India to negotiate agreements for additional programs. I got to see all of India, practically. I didn't go to Assam, and I didn't go to Manipur or Cape Comorin.

Q: You were there how many, three years?

ERNST: Three years. And been back several times. We had wonderful collaboration, I should mention, very importantly, with what are now called PVOs, in particular the Ford Foundation and the Rockefeller Foundation, and with the international institutions, with IBRD. We worked together in a very close collaborative manner.

Q: What about relations with the CIA? The Embassy, and the Peace Corps?

ERNST: There were no relations between the Peace Corps and the CIA that I was then aware of. There were relations, obviously, with the Embassy, and were with the AID program.

Q: I mean, were they good?

ERNST: Yes. Constructive. My own knowledge may be limited, but what I knew did not upset me. One individual who worked in the Food for Peace Program, his assignment for AID, for Food for Peace, Title II, was to follow up on use by the recipients of the food, which gave him a ticket to go everywhere around India wherever there were "work for food" projects, where you got paid in food. He traveled all over India, traveled five out of four weeks, so to speak. And he did a good job for the Food for Peace Program, Title II. What he did for the Agency, I don't know. I never was privy to that. My experience in Ethiopia was a little different, it wasn't uniform, let's put it that way. Let me say, the people who ran the stations were mostly friends. People we respected, enjoyed socially. We respected what they were up to.

Q: Then you left India, you returned to Washington?

HOWELL S. TEEPLE
Information and Press Officer, USIS
New Delhi (1959-1963)

Howell S. Teeple was born in Texas in 1921. He received his BA from Louisiana State University in 1943 and served in the US Army from 1943 to 1945 overseas. His assignments abroad include Seoul, Manila, New York, New Delhi, Adana, Tripoli, Monrovia and Cebu. Mr. Teeple was interviewed by Earl W. Sherman in 1999.

TEEPLE: I stayed in Washington from '54 to '59. USIA [United States Information Agency] Personnel was continually asking me to go overseas during this period. We transferred from State to USIA when they established a separate agency in '53. At one time they had me going to Teheran as information officer, but it didn't work out. In 1959, I was selected to go to India as information officer for USIS [United States Information Service]/New Delhi, and had the designation also as press attaché.

I was married then. I met my wife, Jane, in Washington in January 1957. We got married on June 1st, 1957 and had a nine-month-old baby, James Leland Teeple, when we went to New Delhi in April of 1959.

Q: And this opens up a whole new chapter in your career, does it not?

TEEPLE: Exactly. It was the first post I'd been to overseas married, with a family, and yes, it was quite a different situation for me.

Q: What was the name of the ambassador then?

TEEPLE: At the time we arrived in '59, the ambassador was Ellsworth Bunker, a well-known ambassador, and an outstanding man. It was such a pleasure to be there and to work under Ambassador Bunker. We had three really outstanding ambassadors in India during my period there, from '59 to '63. We had John Kenneth Galbraith following Ambassador Bunker, and then we had Chester Bowles after Galbraith left.

Q: Well, those were certainly three well-known and illustrious figures in American history.

TEEPLE: Indeed. I had quite a bit of contact with the ambassadors, being in the press and press attaché.

Q: Of those three, Howell - we're talking about Ellsworth Bunker and Chester Bowles and John Kenneth Galbraith - of those three, working with them, probably more intimately than some of the others, which one of those three impressed you the most?

TEEPLE: Ambassador Galbraith was very impressive, of course, and he was interested in the press. He liked to have press conferences, and he was such a figure in his own right and had an outstanding reputation as a scholar and economist. He also was well connected with the White House at that time, the Kennedy administration. Chester Bowles was most impressive also. I only had about six or seven months with Ambassador Bowles. We left India in 1963, about six, seven months after he had arrived. Ambassador Bunker was the great diplomat of the three. They were all quite different in their approach, completely different, in fact. Ambassador Bunker was a very smooth, suave diplomat and got great respect from the Indians. It was exciting times in India then because Nehru was alive, and his daughter Indira was his hostess, more or less, because he was a widower. We had a large USIS establishment in India. Ken Bunce was the first PAO, with John Lund as the deputy when I arrived. Then Bill Weathersby came in, and later went on to be ambassador to Sudan and then went back to India as DCM. That is unusual in the Foreign Service - to become an ambassador and then go back as a DCM. Barry Zorthian was our deputy PAO under Bill Weathersby. We had outstanding people with the embassy and with USIS in India during my tenure - 1959-1963.

Q: Yes, among those leaders who were not from the United States, Admiral Mountbatten was there at that time, wasn't he?

TEEPLE: Admiral Mountbatten was in India at the time of partition. He did come out to India, again while we were there, and we met him. Lady Mountbatten used to come out quite often, and she used the same dentist we used, so we would get all the news about Lady Mountbatten from our dentist.

Q: Well, there was some very interesting linkage, was there not, between Lady Mountbatten and Nehru?

TEEPLE: There was. She was a good friend of Nehru's, and he had her out every year as his guest. They were very friendly and there were many rumors linking them romantically.

Q: Yes.

TEEPLE: Those were exciting times in India, and also while we were there, President Eisenhower visited India. He was the first U.S. president to visit India. Unfortunately, just as he was coming, I came down with hepatitis. We had been over to the Maharaja's palace in Jaipur visiting and I apparently got hepatitis there.

Q: So India and the fact that President Eisenhower had come, as we continue:

TEEPLE: Yes, and unfortunately I came down with hepatitis during that time and was unable to work. It was one of the biggest news events of my career, and I missed it, the President of the United States coming to India. As I said, we'd been over to the Maharaja of Jaipur's palace, which he'd turned into a luxury hotel. It wasn't opened to the general public, but they would take people in who were "invited," so to speak. People from embassies could go stay there, and it was a lovely place. They assured us that the water was boiled, but it wasn't, apparently, because I got hepatitis exactly three weeks after coming back from Jaipur and was laid low for the Eisenhower visit.

Q: I ask the question, wasn't it common practice at that time to keep people confined to bed in order to handle hepatitis?

TEEPLE: Oh, yes. I was in bed for six weeks, and the doctor said, "Don't get up except to go to the bathroom." I said, "What about shaving?" He said, "Let your wife shave you." I said, "Oh, no." So I grew a beard. When I went back to the office after six weeks, no one recognized me with my full beard.

Q: Well, isn't that something of real importance for those outgoing officers from the State Department representing the U.S. overseas, that health hazards enter into the lives of virtually every single Foreign Service person in one fashion or another-

TEEPLE: Indeed.

Q: -because of the very limited health facilities people have in those overseas countries?

TEEPLE: We did have an American doctor at the embassy and an American nurse, but the doctor was assigned as the regional medical officer. He traveled throughout the area covering other posts, and we used a list of qualified Indian doctors. There were some good doctors in India, American-trained. My doctor - I remember his name - was Dr. Mehra, who had been American-trained, and he's the one that put me to bed for six weeks when he said, "You've got jaundice." Health hazards were a major problem. Our young son got very sick in India at one time, and it was critical, but he survived. India was a difficult post for maintaining one's good health because of the enormous population and different hygienic practices.

Q: Amoebic dysentery seems to have been something that was so common in so many of these locations.

TEEPLE: We used to call it "Delhi belly." Oh, yes, that was a common occurrence.

Q: On reflection, fortunately there seems to have been, since that time that you and I were overseas, many new medications now available to deal very quickly with common maladies.

TEEPLE: Yes, fortunately all the antibiotic drugs had come to the fore and many other types of medicines which have been a great help to people living in Third World countries.

Q: When you were the IO [information officer] and the press attaché there in New Delhi, did you have a staff of some size? I would expect-

TEEPLE: I had a staff of one American, an assistant information officer, and quite a large national staff. There were two press attachés in New Delhi. There was the press attaché at the embassy, who worked directly with the ambassador, and I was at USIS and handled the local press, the vernacular press, the Hindi papers and Urdu papers and English papers. India had a very active press. It was interesting to work with those chaps. Many were well-educated. They'd been to Cambridge or Oxford, mostly British-trained, and worked on the English newspapers. And then there was a large vernacular press. I dealt with the local press and got to travel around all over the country, visiting newspaper editors to get them to use our materials. I must say, the personal approach to Indian editors paid off and I was able to place a great many USIS press articles and features in newspapers and magazines.

Q: Did you find that the rail system in India was one of really exceptional size and-

TEEPLE: It was excellent at that time. The British had put in the infrastructure during their 400 years of occupation, so to speak, and India had a fine rail system. I understand it's changed since then. We did travel by train quite often, but we flew most places because India's a large country.

Q: What part of India did you find to be of really superior interest or of intense interest? You were posted to New Delhi most of the time.

TEEPLE: I was in New Delhi, and it was a very interesting post. As I said, Nehru was alive. There was a very active press there. We had many foreign correspondents from England, the United States, Germany, France, and Japan, so it was a busy press operation. I think at that time

USIS India was one of the largest Information and Cultural Programs in the world. It had a large American library and a big exchange program, the Fulbright Program. We had a lot of visitors come through the post for lectures and exhibits. It was a very active post. We participated in the World Agricultural Fair, which was held in New Delhi in 1960. We had an American pavilion there which we publicized and promoted. India was an exciting place with so many different cultural activities. We enjoyed India very much. Of course, I was in India during the height of the Cold War and we were very competitive with the Soviet Union in our information and cultural programs. The Russians had a large press and information operation in New Delhi, quite a bit of it covertly done, which made the competition complex and involved.

Q: Did you have much contact with your counterparts from other governments that were represented there?

TEEPLE: Yes, especially with the British. We had good contacts with the British Information Service. They had an active information program also. They also had the British Council, which dealt with cultural and exchange programs as well as library operations. We had limited contact with the Soviet embassy press people and on the surface were friendly with them. Some of the Russian correspondents were KGB [Soviet security service] operatives, working under a Russian news agency, Novosti, and while we were cordial with them, we remained wary of them.

Q: I wonder if you had English teaching programs such as our own binational center programs.

TEEPLE: We didn't have a big English teaching program in India because English was the lingua franca of all the educated people at that time. They kept saying, in 10 or 15 or 20 years, English would not be the dominant language, but it has remained so, I believe, because of the diverse sections of the country all speaking different dialects and languages. For instance, down in south India, the Telugu and Tamil languages are completely alien to Hindi and Bengali in north India, as well as different from Urdu and Gujarati. English has been the glue that's held the country together, so to speak, language-wise. Therefore, the English-language press and English education has been maintained. I don't think English is as strong as when we were there, however.

Q: Considering the great size, the magnitude of the U.S. representation in India, what impression did you have of the people that you were working with that came from the U.S. at the time that you were there? Was it a fledgling group? Was it because of the expansion of the U.S. representation there?

TEEPLE: No, we had outstanding people in the embassy and in USIS, as I mentioned, by the ambassadors who were there, Bunker, Galbraith, and Chester Bowles. The same way, down the line, the career people were very good, some really outstanding people. India was an important post. It was one of the largest American embassies. And in USIS we had equally high-level people. So from that standpoint it was a vital post and very competitive for the American officers assigned to New Delhi.

Q: Considering the experience you had before you went to India and the variety of things in information services that you enjoyed prior to going to New Delhi, did you find those who were sent out by the Department to work with you directly had ample training and that they were able to fit in quickly with your programs?

TEEPLE: Generally, yes. We didn't have too many Hindi speakers. Incidentally, I had to go to Hindi language training at FSI prior to my assignment to India. I spent a year at FSI studying Hindi, and I must say, it was pure torture. I did manage to pass the vocabulary and the conversation tests. I never got literate in the language, of course, but then on arriving in India, I found I didn't use Hindi that much, because the people we were contacting were educated people and all spoke very good English.

Q: Well, in your Hindi training at the Department for that year, how much area study did they throw in with the actual language?

TEEPLE: There was no area studies. I took a separate course in area studies for two weeks, I believe, but the Hindi language was strictly language, and it was intense. It was six hours a day.

Q: That's heavy.

TEEPLE: It was four hours with a lecturer, and there were just one or two others in the class with me; four hours of tutoring, and then two hours on the tapes every day.

Q: That's intense.

TEEPLE: Intense.

Q: Did you feel that there was some success in that degree of time involved?

TEEPLE: Well, I learned to speak Hindi on a limited basis. I wasn't fluent.

Q: Did the Indians respond to this?

TEEPLE: Very much. Yes, they loved if you spoke their language, of course.

Q: They were patient?

TEEPLE: That was a benefit. We did have some excellent Hindi speakers in the embassy and in USIS. We had Tom Pinch, who was very fluent in Hindi, and we had people in the embassy who were very fluent, but they took the two or three-year course.

Q: Yes, one of the aspects of representing the U.S. overseas that I found in my own experience, if I may take just a moment for that, was that anyone who came armed with, for instance, a talent in music, automatically had a ticket into most homes or most target audiences that he might wish to contact. I always regretted that in my own experience, that I had not learned the guitar or learned the piano or something involving music. I don't know if you share that at all.

TEEPLE: Yes, it certainly gave you an entrée into a lot of places if you had musical ability. I remember a chap we had in Korea who was a really outstanding musician. He was asked to be the conductor of the Korean Symphony Orchestra. He was an accomplished musician, Rolf Jacoby.

Q: Well, from that time that you were in India, for what length of time was it?

TEEPLE: We were there for a four year assignment. We had two two-year tours with home leave in between.

Q: I see, you went to India in '59.

TEEPLE: We left in '63.

Q: In 1963. You went where in '63?

SIDNEY SOBER
Economic Officer
Bombay (1960-1963)

Sidney Sober joined the Foreign Service in 1947. His career included positions in Antananarivo, Prague, Reykjavik, Ankara, Bombay, Rawalpindi, and Washington, DC. This interview was conducted on February 21, 1990.

Q: You left INR in 1960 and you went to Bombay, where you served until 1963. What were you doing and how did the consulate general in Bombay operate?

SOBER: I was sent as the number two in the consulate general with immediate responsibilities for economic work. That was interesting. Bombay, first of all, was, and still is (my wife and I were there just a few months ago) a vibrant city. If you detached Bombay from the hinterland, you might look upon it as, westernized is not the word, but modern in many aspects. With a middle class that you could see fitting into a commercial environment in the west. Obviously there's a lot of poverty, and hovels, but a good part of Bombay gives you a cosmopolitan outlook. A fascinating place that we enjoyed very, very much. People were quite friendly. Economic work was okay because it was and still is the major center for American economic interest. It's where investments are, and a big financial center.

Relations with our embassy were fine. But varied. Our first ambassador was Ellsworth Bunker, for whom I had the greatest admiration and respect. The next one was Kenneth Galbraith, and a very different person.

Q: I wonder if you could talk about your impression of him. I understand there was a tremendous ego there.

SOBER: I think saying he had a tremendous ego is a considerable understatement.

Q: Did this impact on what you were doing?

SOBER: No, it didn't really. No, to his credit, never did we have instructions as to what not to do, or what to do. We reported directly to Washington, with copies to New Delhi. I was there, for example, for the Goa takeover in 1961. I was there and happened to be in charge during the whole period of the Sino-Indian War of 1962. That was of considerable interest to the United States. No, I don't recall ever being directed by New Delhi, "do this in a particular way."

Q: How about the Goa takeover. This did not sit very well in the United States.

SOBER: No, it did not.

Q: What happened and how were you reporting it?

SOBER: The dispute had been brewing for a long time. Back in late '55, John Foster Dulles had issued a joint statement along with the foreign minister of Portugal who happened to be in the United States, in which there was some reference to Portuguese overseas provinces. The Indians took that very badly and said, oh you're taking the Portuguese position. The Portuguese had been quite adamant about not doing what the French had done, for example, agree to give back their Indian possessions peacefully. So this had been building up.

What happened in 1961 was that the Indians got tired of the Portuguese adamancy about not giving up Goa. India organized their military, surrounded the area and claimed that someone had fired on them. They said therefore it required a police action, and in retaliation, they had to go in.

Well, it was pretty clear that the Indians had decided enough was enough and we're going to finish this off once and for all. And they did it in very short order.

You're right. This did attract international attention. The American ambassador to the UN was Adlai Stevenson and he had been considered to be very friendly to India. This was the Kennedy period, and Kennedy was also friendly to India. And I think that's why he sent Galbraith there. Another reason he sent Galbraith, I think, is that he was happier to have Galbraith in India than in Washington.

When Adlai Stevenson took out against the Indian aggression, use of force to achieve a political end, it sent the Indians up the wall.

Q: Did that have any repercussions?

SOBER: Oh yeah, they were mad at us, but it was passing. Whatever ill will existed because of that was overtaken surely the next year, by the Sino/Indian War. There was a tremendous turnaround, as you recall. There had been trouble building up for six or seven years, with disputes over the borders between China and India in two regions. One in Ladakh and the other in the northeast frontier region.

The war broke out in 1962. The Chinese thought that they had had enough of threats and disputes with India and thought there was a need for some reaction. They sent their forces over the border. Especially in the northeast the Indians were badly prepared. Krishna Menon, somebody who was not liked in the United States, the minister of defense, was sacked. Lo and behold, Nehru made a 180-degree reversal of course and, in panic, called upon Washington and London for military help. Now that's quite a change, since he was the apostle of nonalignment. It was unexpected. Jack Kennedy (of course I was there and not here, but my guess is that he) spent not more than five minutes cogitating about how to react to this request. He said go, and we sent some military transport planes from Germany, the closest place, with some things like tents and small arms. Nothing that could really affect the course of the war in these far away, very high altitude places. You're talking about the Himalayas and the foothills. But politically it was a momentous turn of course, in India's position. How did it affect us? Well, at the time I happened to be in charge of our consulate and it was quite a development in our relationship with the Indians. I remember being asked to come sit on the platform at various public meetings, when people were exhorted to do their best, the women were encouraged to throw their gold bangles and bracelets into the war chest. There was a tremendous euphoria regarding US-Indian relations because of Kennedy's willingness to do what we could, which was, in the event, not very much.

Q: I've heard it said by somebody else whom I interviewed that there has been this perception in the area that when a republican administration is in the tilt goes to Pakistan, and when a democratic administration is in, to India. And looking at it I can see a certain amount of validity about it. Is this valid?

SOBER: This is a fact that is deeply believed in by the people of Pakistan. In fact, also by people in India. And I think, historically, if you check it out, you can support this. I'm not sure this is a result of a deliberate interest or effort by democratic or republican administrations. But that's the way it has worked out. It's a fact of life, in the political map of the subcontinent, certainly as to what they believe and expect.

Q: Part of this is because Republican administrations tend to be a little more hard line towards the confrontation with the Soviet Union. That's changed considerably now. Therefore Pakistan is more interesting than India.

SOBER: I think you can carry that through to a point where it doesn't work out. For example, Jack Kennedy. Yes, he said, let's help India. He was friendly toward India. He was friendly toward India before he became President. As a senator, not too long before the election campaign, he proposed a resolution which would have pinpointed India as a country to help. Why? Well, he might have liked India but we were concerned about Communist China, and we didn't want China to be seen as the model for third-world uplift. We wanted to have a democratic model. So again it was China, and it was still the Cold War context. And why did he accede instantly to Nehru's request for help in 1962? Remember it was China - a communist country. So he wasn't out of accord with the American procedure. I would jump ahead a little bit. Jimmy Carter also liked India. Remember Ms. Lillian, who had been in the Peace Corps in Gujarat, north of Bombay. In fact he sent her as his representative to the funeral of the President of India. So he was favorable to India. Still when the Soviets went into Afghanistan in 1979, he immediately made some efforts to reconcile with Pakistan. Relations with Pakistan had gone to their nadir. They had never been so low as they were just before then. But he wanted to open up the relationship, because the Soviets had gone into Afghanistan. So there he wanted to do well by Pakistan, because it was in our interest, because it was again in the context of the Cold War. Thus I'm not sure that it's correct to say that there is something inevitable or inherent in the democratic or republican makeup which makes one favor Pakistan or India.

Q: You were then assigned to NEA?

SOBER: Yes, the Bureau of Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs. My first job was one which no longer exists - officer in charge of economic affairs in South Asia. I stayed in that job for a couple of years. Then I was transferred within the same bureau to be the deputy director, and then director, for regional affairs, covering the entire bureau, which as you know includes the Middle East.

Q: Other than reporting on economic matters, did we have economic interest in the area.

SOBER: As for South Asia, no, not really. There is virtually no product of South Asia that is necessary to the United States. Certainly nothing like oil which is essential. We have business interests there. We have AID interests. It was a period when Kennedy had already gone, but there was a considerable interest under LBJ in economic development in the area and particularly in India. It was a carryover from the idea I spoke of before, that India, as the second largest country in the world, might be seen to be an example of successful economic development along generally democratic lines. As a counterpart to China with its backyard furnaces and such. So there was a good deal of interest.

I think the economic element of our interest in South Asia at the time, which is most strongly remembered in the region to this date, revolves around one of those failures of the monsoon in the subcontinent. India had a failure of the monsoon as I recall in 1965-66, and there was a threat of famine as they had ever so often. Recall the enormous famine of Bengal in 1943-44. They appealed to the United States for substantial help. I might say that the euphoria of Indo-US relations that began and followed for sometime after the Sino-Indo War had pretty well washed off by this time.

The United States under LBJ was quite willing to help except that he had some other concerns. The Indians were not being at all helpful on Vietnam issues which more and more were preoccupying LBJ's attention. He also felt that the Indians were not doing enough in their own agricultural system to help themselves. It was a period when self-help was a very big thing to us. So LBJ engineered this policy. We would help India but we would do what we could to make sure they helped themselves. We had what we called the short tether policy. Which meant that LBJ, and the White House, would reserve unto itself, the authority to release segments of PL 480 assistance in accordance with perceptions of how much India was doing to help itself.

Now it was a very important program. Some 10 million tons of grain were shipped to India by the United States in one year, 1966-67. An unprecedented amount of grain. It used to be said that there was an almost unbroken line of ships from the American gulf ports to India.

On the other hand, we did press the Indians to do more than they'd been doing, in the way of self-help. In the way of rodent control, pesticide control, better storage/silage, better transport facilities, easing up on credit facilities to encourage farm production. A wide variety of things. Despite the fact that in many ways the aid program was successful, and widespread famine itself was averted, what tends to be remembered in India, I have found, is not how much we did for them, but what we did to them, as to "political" strings, aid strings, where we were mean and hard. Well, some people might say that that was for their good but it one of those things that didn't leave too good a taste.

I was in the Bureau dealing with these issues.

Q: We were watching the Indian economy very, very closely then. What you were reporting on had a direct impact.

SOBER: I was in Washington, of course, and we got our reports from our people in India. The Agriculture Department here was quite active, Orville Freeman was LBJ's Secretary of Agriculture. He was designated as the key point man here, and we had meetings with the Indian agriculture minister here, Mr. Subramaniam. We sent people over there. We watched pretty carefully what was going on. As we watched we did send very substantial amounts of grain.

GEORGE M. BENNSKY, JR.
Economic/Political Officer
Madras (1960-1964)

George M. Bennsky, Jr. was born in Hickory, North Carolina in 1923 and raised in Georgia and the Washington, DC area. He served in the military during World War II. Mr. Bennsky received a bachelor's degree in foreign affairs from George Washington University and a master's degree in international studies from the University of Michigan. His career included positions in India, Lebanon, and Peru. He was interviewed on January 19, 1993 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: You left NEA and went to Madras.

BENNSKY: I thought I was going to end up in a Middle East post again, which was all right with me. But, that was not to be. My first overseas post in the Foreign Service would be Madras. One thing I have never been able to figure out is the personnel system of the Foreign Service. Anyway that is where they wanted me to go and that is where I went.

Q: You were there from 1960-64. What were you doing when you first went out?

BENNSKY: I went out to head the economics section of the Consulate General. India is so big that the Consulates General are a pretty good size and cover big chunks of the country. We covered all of south India -- four states, Madras, Mysore, Kerala and Andhra Pradesh.

The Consulates General in India perform functions that maybe they don't in a lot of countries. There is significant economic and political reporting, some consolidated by the Embassy in New Delhi and some sent directly to State.

For the first two years I ran the economics section, reporting on general economic conditions and economic development in South India. We would always be getting a cable from the Embassy saying, for example, "We are doing a study on hydroelectric power in India. Provide us with a report on South India -- what they are doing, what their needs are, etc."

We also acted as commercial officers spending a lot of time with Indian businessmen. And there was a lot of traveling throughout South India. The road system was good.

The second two years I was the political officer and number two.

Q: What was your impression of the political and economic situation in your area of responsibility in southern India at that time...1960-64?

BENNSKY: There were several different trouble spots. One was within Madras itself...the whole Tamil issue. Tamil was an ancient language, coming south when the dark skinned Dravidian people were pushed out of the north by the Sanskrit-using Central Asian invaders centuries ago. It was a language with a great deal of depth and poetry. It was a powerful force among these people. They were greatly resistant to the idea that Hindustani would be pushed south against their language. A Tamil based party was becoming a political force against the Congress Party. Over in Kerala there was strong Communist influence.

Q: Yes, an awful lot of attention was placed on that state.

BENNSKY: Those were the two main political issues of a local South India nature. Overall India was the India as I remembered it in World War II. Out in the many villages, people were living pretty close to the ground as they had for centuries. But it was a friendly part of India, more so than up north. I must say in south India the people are very friendly. You would just meet them and in the next minute they would have you in their house. They were just as friendly and open as you could get. English was the lingua franca. After all they had four different languages in the south, and they had to speak something that everybody could understand.

Two things happened while I was in India which were quite important. The first was the Chinese invasion of India in the Himalayan area near Tibet. That drew India together in a striking way. Here were people who were always unhappy with each other, one way or another, because of their different languages and different interests, etc. But not then. People all over the country were turning in their jewelry, volunteering for military service. That was an interesting event to be around, experience and to report on.

The second and most momentous event was the death of Nehru. Before Nehru died, but when it was clear he soon would, the question was who would take over as Prime Minister. Embassy

New Delhi decided that each of the Consulates General should take an in depth look at the issue, talking to everybody with political insight on their particular regions, thinking on the succession.

I headed the political section at that time, so I did the Madras ConGen paper. I talked to all the politicians and businessmen that I knew. I had four tremendous locals in terms of their contacts and knowledge of the politics of their States. We gathered a tremendous amount of information, and I wrote a paper which in essence stated: "The political leaders in the four southern states led by Kamaraj are going to back Shastri and that they were gaining influence with a number of other powerful leaders in other parts of India. Shastri was going to win the succession."

To many the successor would either be Desai, the Finance Minister, or the political leader of Bombay. In any event, as was to be expected, the Embassy received differing views from its ConGens. In fact, in my paper I said that Shastri would probably turn out to be the Truman of India. Actually he did win. You know, it was a very unfortunate thing for India that Shastri died of a heart attack. He was a politician who was unknown, somewhat like Truman, but a very skilled politician who I think may well have had some workable ideas about how to deal with the Pakistani and Kashmiri problem.

Also, Kamaraj, the Madras political boss, who was a tremendous man, about as big as that door, and spoke nothing but Tamil, with influence in Madras that was incredible, as well as all over the country, ended up going to New Delhi, as a sort of overall Congress Party political boss. He was a powerful person. Not educated, but with great skill as a politician.

Those, I guess, were the two big internal Indian issues that happened. A relatively minor event was the Indian invasion and taking of Goa from the Portuguese. I recall Ambassador Galbraith seeking to the end to stop it when we all knew that the Indian Army was not massed on the border for just a show of force.

Another event of significance was the death of President John F. Kennedy. The outpouring of grief in India has to have been seen to be believed. Indians took his words seriously, very seriously indeed.

Q: I remember the state of Kerala. For years that was on our political radar because it had a communist rule. Were we doing anything there to combat this?

BENNSKY: Mainly we did what we could do in terms of economic assistance and we had a big USIS program there. Kerala was one of the more literate areas of India, which is one of the reasons the communists were strong there. Other than aid and information there wasn't much we could do. The Indian Government had it pretty well under control. The governor there was a man named Giri who had been an important labor leader in India during British rule. He was an interesting and strong person. He ran Kerala much of the time under Presidential Rule.

We, of course, had a CIA station in Madras which watched the Indian commies. When I took over the political section I had to read some of their material. It was boring as the dickens. The fact of the matter is that there was never really any danger in India of the communists taking over anything. The real power in that country was the Congress Party. No matter how you cut it, even today, although things have changed some, India is still a pretty damn conservative place. Villagers are conservative, traditional people. They didn't have any guerrilla movements or that kind of stuff going on when I was in India.

An interesting thing there was, to me...the first and last time I really did a political post...that if you got an Indian politician in your house you couldn't keep him quiet or get rid of him. He would talk forever and tell you everything. More than you ever wanted to know or ever cared about. He would keep talking as long as you kept filling his whiskey glass, which he wasn't supposed to be doing, since India frowns on drinking.

There is only one thing I regret about my Indian experience. I wonder if I wouldn't have been better off if I had just spent two years in Madras and gone up to Delhi for two. But it didn't turn out that way.

Q: Then you came back to Washington?

BENNSKY: Oh, I did one other thing while I was on my India assignment which was of significance. I received a telegram telling me that State wanted me to be part of a special mission to Yemen. My Near Eastern friends thinking of me again. This was just after the considerable turmoil and struggle in Yemen. The Egyptians had intervened and there had been a civil war which caused a great deal of consternation to the Saudis. In fact we had air force in Saudi Arabia to counteract the Egyptian air force in Yemen.

I flew to Saudi Arabia for consultations and briefing and to join the other member of the party, an official from AID. We flew first to Aden and then to Taiz in Yemen.

The purpose of the mission was to determine the budgetary assistance need of Yemen and whether such assistance was feasible. We knew one thing, there would be no data. Nobody was going to hand us pieces of paper telling us anything about the government's budget or the country's balance of payments. So when we began our inquiries in Aden, we started asking officials and business people about the trade, finances, etc. of Yemen since Aden was its key gateway. Then we came up to Yemen linking up with one of the FSOs in our Taiz mission. Jim Cortada chaired our mission. Our program was to go to Sanaa and to Hodeida and talk to as many knowledgeable officials and business people as possible to gather information. The AID official I was with said to me, "George, I can speak Arabic up to a point. We are going to do the best we can."

We just moved around the country talking to people who were running this, that and other things in government and commerce. It reminded me of my Near Eastern days as a Treasury Rep. You would go into these so-called government offices only it was a little more chaotic. All around you were Yemenis carrying machine guns and the usual knife. You would sit there drinking tea it seemed interminably. The official would be responding to your questions and out of the blue some Yemeni would come in with a chit which the official would take interrupting the conversation with you and dealing with whatever the chit said. You could spend a long time getting relatively little information. The officials were just inundated with these chits.

Q: And you would sit around and listen to the conversation.

BENNSKY: Exactly, except it was all in nonunderstandable to me, Yemeni Arabic.

Q: I served as economic officer in Dhahran at one point a little earlier on and I know exactly what you mean.

BENNSKY: I was getting frustrated. I couldn't find out what I needed to know to determine or at least estimate the Yemeni financial situation. But one thing was becoming clearer and clearer to me. There wasn't any government structure that could possibly handle budgetary aid.

Anyway we had to gather enough information about Yemen's trade, financial situation, balance of payments, economic development needs, etc. to produce a coherent report. And we didn't have too much time to do this.

Finally we got through our Yemeni interviews, 50 plus I recall, and headed for Cairo to see what the Egyptians could tell us. Actually the Egyptians provided us with significant information. I still knew some of the Egyptian officials, especially on the financial and economic side.

When we got back to Washington, I wrote the report on Yemen's financial and economic situation, including its budget and balance of payments. I was pleased with my assessment and wish I still had a copy. My bottom line was that there was no way that the US should provide budgetary aid. I said, "You might want to aid this country but you don't want to give them any budgetary aid. There was a bottomless pit there, and we wouldn't know where any of the aid went. There wasn't any structure or even anybody in charge." So that idea got shot down. Whatever the US did I don't know because I went back to India.

MARY SEYMOUR OLMSTED
Economic Officer
New Delhi (1960-1965)

Ambassador Mary Seymour Olmsted was born in Duluth, Minnesota and raised in Florida. She received a bachelor's degree in economics from Mount Holyoke College and a master's degree from Columbia University. Ambassador Olmsted entered the Foreign Service in 1945. Her career included positions in India, Iceland, Austria, Washington, DC, and an ambassadorship to Papua New Guinea. Ambassador Olmsted was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1992.

Q: ...About 1960, where did you go?

OLMSTED: Then I was assigned to New Delhi.

Q: You were there for five years, weren't you?

OLMSTED: Four and a half years, yes.

Q: What were you doing?

OLMSTED: I was in the economic section, and I did a variety of different things there. New Delhi was a very large post at that time, and I found that it was the custom there to shift responsibilities within the economic section rather frequently. And people when they entered started doing the grubby work, and eventually moved up to doing more interesting, more important, work. I understood the rationale for it. It was my own feeling after I'd been there a relatively short time, that anyone who tried to make any pronouncements about India was either repeating something that had become an absolute cliché, or was probably wrong. It was extremely difficult to get a grasp of the country.

I had been serving in Vienna, and as I mentioned before, Vienna also was a very large post. There were some interesting differences between them. In Vienna the embassy was very much compartmentalized. I didn't know very much what was going on in other parts, even of the economic section. But in New Delhi I did almost all kinds of economic work, and I was in close contact with the people in the political section, and the people in A.I.D., and I had a much broader view of things than I ever managed to get in Vienna.

Q: What was the situation in India in the four and a half years you were there, '60-'65 approximately? I mean the political situation at that time?

OLMSTED: Nehru was still the Prime Minister, and he was, of course, the person. He had his opponents, and there were people who had influence on him, but yet he was the man of tremendous importance in the country, and he died when I was there. India was such a large country that, as I said before, it was very hard to get a feeling for what was going on. I think that made a difference in my own approach to my work. I was far more willing than I had been in some other posts to do a lot of different things because I thought it was going to be necessary before I ever came to have any real feeling for what India was like.

Q: Just to get a feeling, what types of things were you dealing with?

OLMSTED: In my work?

Q: Yes.

OLMSTED: I was initially doing rather small things, small segmented things. It was only later that I began feeling that I was able, and that the embassy was willing to have me try to pool them all together, and look at what was going on in India broadly. And that was the transition in my work, going from the particular to the general.

Q: In India, as an economist, you had to deal with both the Indian bureaucracy, and Indian statistics. How did you find these?

OLMSTED: Well, of course, a little bit difficult. I spent a good deal of time working on the Five Year Plan, and trying to measure what was happening against what their hopes were for the third Five Year Plan. The statistics were obviously very imperfect. On the other hand, what do you do? Do you just throw them out the window and forget about them. Some of the reporting that I did, and others did, I think was impressionistic, rather than statistically based. But you've got to have some statistics to peg things on even though you realized what their flaws are. I worked mainly with the people in the planning commission, which was composed of professionally competent officers to a large extent. They were intelligent people who were willing to talk about various aspects. They were defensive sometimes, but I didn't find that they were obstructionists.

CIA used to claim that it could get any document in India, "Just ask for it, we'll get it for you." So I put this to the test once and I've forgotten now what the document was, and they provided it for me the day before it was released publicly, which was not what I would consider a major achievement. CIA was very, very active there. I know Ambassador Bowles, for example, had some real reservations about their activities, feeling they were adding to the corruption of the country.

Q: What was the impression that you got at your level from India? Was India a potential enemy, a potential friend, or just a big mass of problems out there? Or what?

OLMSTED: Well, India was a big mass of problems out there. There was no question about that. As Galbraith sometimes said, there was a thin layer of planning on top of the largest operating chaos in the world. There was truth in that. I thought potentially, yes, India could be our friends. Certainly there were people in the government who were anti- American, and there was a left wing which was the Communist Party. And I think that the Hindu culture created certain types of personalities which made people very resentful of the American presence. I sometimes felt that what some of our people were doing tended to turn India away from us quite unnecessarily.

Q: What type of thing would this be?

OLMSTED: Well, trying to tell Indians how to run their business. Now, a certain amount of that was necessary because the Indians did not always make the best decisions. On the other hand, such things as the Kashmir problem were very, very touchy. I saw two American ambassadors try to solve it to the Kashmir problem and that was not to the benefit of our relations with India. No doubt of that.

I served for three different ambassadors there: Ellsworth Bunker, then John Kenneth Galbraith, then Chester Bowles. Three enormously different men.

Q: Could you describe your impression of what they were like, and their method of operation, and how they approached the thing from your viewpoint? First Ellsworth Bunker. He was there until '61.

OLMSTED: Yes. Our overlap consisted of only a few months. I never knew him as well as the others. He was on his way out when I arrived there and consequently neither he nor I saw this as a long- range association. So I can say probably less about him. He was the least aggressive of the three, I thought, in his relations with the Indian government. He was the least inclined to tell the Indians what to do. On the other hand, I thought he had some tendency to sweep problems under the rug, and to tell Washington, and anybody who wanted to listen to him, that all was rosy. And it was less than rosy.

Then when Galbraith came in...

Q: In '61.

OLMSTED: ...in '61, the spring of '61 -- late spring. He was a man of great intellectual arrogance, who was quite willing to tell anyone and everyone how to do their business. He had very little interest in, or sympathy for, the embassy staff and he fired a number of people and brought in his own people. There was a morale problem in the embassy. No doubt about that. The staff meetings were indicative of that. He'd look around the room and his eyes would fall on somebody, and everybody would stiffen. We would wonder what's going to happen to that poor devil. It was sort of a Mogul court atmosphere. Some people cottoning up to him, and others just trying to stay out of his way.

He gave a series of speeches there which I thought were good in that he could say some things in a very polished speech that perhaps would be better accepted than sitting in a minister's office telling him something. And he was respected for being an intellectual, and for having a worldwide reputation as an economist. Those things were for the good. On the other hand, he really got himself a little bit too enmeshed in some things. When the Chinese incursion on the northern border took place, Galbraith jumped in with both feet, with great enthusiasm. He got the American military there. I, myself, always had some reservations that those incursions were all that serious, although any country gets a little nervous when its borders are invaded. Perhaps it did bring India somewhat closer to the United States in that we were portraying ourselves as the great protectors of India's borders. On the other hand, I don't think it was really very long lasting.

Q: It didn't appear to be. Here you had a man who I think...didn't he win the Nobel Prize in economics, or something later on? And here you are an economic officer. How did he impact on the economic section?

OLMSTED: Well, to a considerable extent he ignored it. He got some of his own people in although Bowles was much more effective than Galbraith in getting his own choices into various jobs. I remember writing a rather broad report on how India was getting along, assessing the economic, and to a certain extent the political situation. I finished it and sent it into the Economic Counselor who would ordinarily sign it. Then I didn't hear anything about it, a copy didn't come back that it has been signed. I didn't know what had happened. I think I went on leave, and when I came back I was very surprised to discover that it had returned to my desk with a little note from Galbraith on it. The note said something to the effect, "You're a little more pessimistic than I would be, but this is a good report and it will be useful." And I said to the Economic Counselor, "That's not exactly wild praise, is it?" He said, "Well, you ought to see some of the notes that come back here. You can be very, very pleased with that note." I didn't see what he sent back to other people, but I can believe that he felt nothing but contempt for the Economic Counselor. And I think the Economic Counselor had a very hard job there.

Q: Who was the Economic Counselor?

OLMSTED: Rufus Burr Smith.

Q: It must have been a very uncomfortable situation.

OLMSTED: Yes, and Galbraith had a very sharp tongue.

Q: What was your feeling about his estimation of India? Sometimes you get an ambassador who comes in, particularly from outside, a political ambassador, and particularly one with a big ego, who arrives, and particularly in a large country like India, and sees this as sort of the center of the universe. Whereas, as a very practical measure looking over the last 40 years, India has played a very small role. We've always made due obeisance to the...India being a major democracy, but it hasn't been much of a factor in whatever we're interested in.

OLMSTED: We used to refer to this attitude of politically appointed ambassadors as localitis, an expression I'm sure you've heard. We used to say that Galbraith had galloping localitis. He felt quite free in telling ambassadors all over the world how to run their business. He was quite disdainful of Dean Rusk, the then Secretary of State, and thought the President himself should be reading all of his messages.

Q: Galbraith came from Harvard, and the President had been a student of his.

OLMSTED: And he'd worked on the campaign for Kennedy. So he was very happy to send hot messages about such things as India's takeover of Goa...

Q: Which had been a Portuguese territory.

OLMSTED: Galbraith was very sympathetic towards the Indians about the takeover and sent off some hot messages to Burke Elbrick, who was then the ambassador to Portugal. Elbrick maintained in his cables that good relations with Portugal were necessary because of the importance of the Azores. Galbraith responded that the Azores were just a few acres of asphalt in the Atlantic Ocean, and why should we be bothered with them. So Galbraith earned himself quite a reputation.

Q: He was also, by doing that...the takeover of Goa was not that popular. Because it was a takeover by basically overpowering military force, rather than any referendum or anything like that.

OLMSTED: Yes.

Q: When Galbraith left, did he leave any lasting monument? Or was this just a big storm that blew through, and then moved on?

OLMSTED: As far as I could see it was a big storm that blew through, and then moved on. I think he may have made the Indians do a little more thinking about some of their economic decisions. But how much he really influenced them, I really couldn't say. And I don't think he influenced them, I think he antagonized them on the Kashmir question. And I don't think he got very many brownie points for what he did, either his attitude towards the take-over of Goa, or the incursions on the northern border.

Q: You had some reservations about the seriousness of this incursion of this so-called Indo-Chinese war, which really was fought very high in the Himalayas over a small bit of unpopulated areas. Did the embassy get very involved in our support of the Indians?

OLMSTED: Oh, yes, very much so. We had no advance information about it, of course, and the Indians did not tell us immediately. The incursions took place -- if my memory is correct -- on a Saturday afternoon or evening. And it wasn't until the following day that somebody in the Embassy picked it up from the radio. Our contacts in the Indian Government were not so good that they immediately informed us.

Q: What about the Soviets? What was our feeling towards the Soviets at that time? Were they courting the Indians?

OLMSTED: Yes, they were. I think not as much as they may have subsequently, but they had some very large aid projects. They had an aid mission, and a large embassy there. We saw very little of them socially, or otherwise. The Cold War was very much in evidence. I once visited the Soviet-built steel plant in Bhilai in central India. The Indian staff was obviously very much taken aback by this request for an American embassy official to visit, and they didn't quite know what to do with me when I got there but they did take me around, and I went through the entire plant. And I agreed with the comment that I had heard before I went there, that it was a steel plant built by peasants for peasants to run. It was not a sophisticated operation at all. But I also thought perhaps it was the right level for the Indians to handle, and they didn't have the trouble with it that they had with some of the more advanced steel plants that other countries had built there.

They wanted us to build another steel plant for them to be located in Bokaro. Galbraith pushed very hard to get U.S. financing for it. He pushed too hard. In fact, he got out in front of Congress and everybody else. Congress retaliated by putting a rider on a bill which effectively prevented U.S. financing. Galbraith practically promised that the United States would finance it when Congress pulled the rug out from under his feet. And then in what was a very graceful gesture, the Indian parliament withdrew its request for the financing, and Galbraith got off the hook that way. But it was a humiliating defeat for him although I don't think it bothered him very much.

Q: Did he go back and try to lobby Congress, as often ambassadors do?

OLMSTED: It's a long way to go, and I don't remember that he went back as frequently as an ambassador in Europe might go. But certainly he lobbied at long distance, and he did make some trips to Washington for lobbying. Galbraith is no politician, a brilliant man, but he rubbed a lot of people the wrong way.

Q: Did he use the embassy staff particularly?

OLMSTED: Not very much. He tended to do things himself, or maybe a few of his own close associates, but he really didn't have very many close associates. Not like Bowles.

Q: It was a court, but it was a court with one king and not...

OLMSTED: That's right. He had a DCM, B.E.L. Timmons, who was widely disliked, even detested. Timmons was a bright enough man, but I thought of very little imagination. His idea of the way to run an embassy was to see to it that press summaries were quickly prepared and transmitted to Washington. And he didn't seem to care very much about commentary, or about analysis, or about things like that. He would have had a fit over this press summary if it had been done incorrectly. He was a great man for detail.

Q: ...whether you used a hyphen with cross-section, or whether its two words. That type of thing.

OLMSTED: Yes. He was a great man for the typographical errors, and a great man on detail. But the big picture, he didn't see.

Q: What was your impression of the economic, and also political reporting of the embassy? Were you able to get out and talk to people, or did it get translated very well if they did get out and talk to people?

OLMSTED: I think there was an effort made to get out and talk to people. I did a lot of traveling. I visited almost every part of India. My goal was to spend one week a month out of New Delhi but I never quite achieved that goal. But I saw it was just disastrous getting involved in the diplomatic cocktail circuit, and spending so much time in Delhi talking cocktail chit-chat with the same people. So I made a determined effort to get out and visit different parts, and go to villages and talk to villagers, and try to keep the bureaucracy at arm's length to the extent possible. When someone from the American embassy went out to a rural area, it was very likely that the district commissioner would get a whole train of jeeps and would want to parade the embassy official around to various villages. I tried to get away from that, not always successfully.

Q: Galbraith left in '63. How was this viewed by the embassy?

OLMSTED: With relief. Most of us were saying, "Well, we survived." That was the test, whether you survived Galbraith, or not.

Q: Then Chester Bowles came.

OLMSTED: Yes, a very different man.

Q: How did he operate, and what was your impression?

OLMSTED: Well, of course, Bowles had a considerable advantage over Galbraith in having been an ambassador before, and having been an ambassador to India before. Therefore, he knew a lot of things that Galbraith learned only slowly. However, the disadvantage was that Bowles didn't know quite as much as he thought he knew. He moved into action very, very quickly, and I think probably without careful enough assessment to what had happened since he was there last. Bowles is a man of tremendous creative imagination. I have great admiration for him on that score, but he was not a terribly practical man. I always thought he would have been the ideal person to be special assistant in charge of ideas, and come up with new ideas that other people could select from. But when he did the selecting, as well as creating the ideas, we got some lusus.

Q: Can you give any examples?

OLMSTED: He is a reformer, pure and simple, and he wanted to reform the Indian government in all manner of ways. His technique...not to answer your question immediately...his technique was to call in two or three or maybe four different staff members individually, and give each one of them the same project with the idea that he would see which one was best. He would call the person in maybe Thursday afternoon, or maybe Friday morning, and say he wanted a paper written on this or that, and then he would say, "No hurry about it, just let me have it Monday morning, 10:00." Well, there went another weekend down the drain. We caught on to what he was doing, and at the inevitable cocktail party we'd get together and figure out that we all had the same task. We would divide it up instead of each of us doing it all. That simplified things a little bit, but not a lot.

Galbraith, for example, wanted one of these weekend studies to be made of the...

Q: You mean Bowles.

OLMSTED: Oh, excuse me, Bowles. ...of the restricting impact of all the rules and regulations of the Indian government. India is a bureaucracy among bureaucracies, and there were vast numbers of rules and regulations, but for an outsider to try and go in there and evaluate all those rules and regulations in a short period of time, of course, was sheer nonsense. That was a very interesting idea, and one that had great merit, but it would take months and months of study by a task force to do it. It's nothing you're going to whip up over a weekend.

Another, when he was trying to solve the problems between India and Pakistan, he instructed me, and I'm sure a couple of other people, to write a paper on what kinds of economic cooperation there could be between India and Pakistan which would be to the advantage of both countries, which would put an end to some of the problems, or at least nearly erase some of the problems that both of them faced. Well, that's a very interesting project, and if you set aside the impracticality of it, and just think about what could be done, you can have a lot of fun. Well, I eventually got to the point where I just had a lot of fun with his ideas, and realized that they were going to fall on the floor off the drawing board someplace at a more senior level than mine. But I wrote, with the help of some other people, quite a long paper about possible economic cooperation between India and Pakistan. There were really a lot of things they could be doing. It was fun to work on. As I said before, I had high regard for Bowles' intellectual capacities, but when it came down to practicalities something was a little lacking.

Q: At least it sounds like he kept the intellectual juices of the embassy running.

OLMSTED: Yes, he did, very much so. And he brought in a lot of outsiders, and he made a lot of staff changes. In fact, all the senior positions, I think, were changed to bring in people that he wanted, and we had some interesting people there.

Q: Any ones that stand out?

OLMSTED: Well now, let me see. There was one man he brought in, A.A. Jordan, from West Point. He was brought in as a special assistant and he was very good. He brought in John Lewis from Princeton to head the A.I.D. mission. I think Lewis was very good although I think he eventually became very discouraged. He had written that book, Quiet Crisis in India that caught Bowles' attention, and that's why he got the job I'm sure. I think he found that things on the ground were a little different from the way they looked in the groves of academia. And there was someone in USIS, whose name had slipped my memory, a man of very broad capacities. And he brought in Jerry Green as DCM, who was a great relief after Lane Timmons. There were others but I can't remember them all now.

Q: How did he deal with the Indian government?

OLMSTED: He was always talking to the Indian government. I think that he drove the Indian government up the wall with his incessant advice.

Q: Did you find there was much American business interest in India? What was your impression?

OLMSTED: There was some. American business saw these 500 million people, and thought, "what a potential market" if it ever really pulls itself together. And Bowles was very eager to have American private investment in India, and he pushed hard on that subject. But it was an uphill effort because of the reluctance of the American investors; and because the Indian government was not at all sure it wanted foreign capital invested by American capitalists.

Q: How about the agricultural side? Was this an area where we did seem to be making some positive accomplishments, or not?

OLMSTED: Yes, although I think probably the Ford Foundation did as much as the U.S. government. We had a large agricultural contingent in our A.I.D. mission, some members of which were better than others. A.I.D. doesn't always pick its people too carefully, and there were some that really were accomplishing very little. But the Ford Foundation had been in India for a number of years, and was working very hard, and I think probably did more than the A.I.D. mission did, although that's a matter of dispute.

Q: You were mentioning earlier about Bowles and the CIA. Did you get any feel for that relationship? The CIA's operation in India?

OLMSTED: Well, it was very large, and very invasive. The CIA was everywhere.

Q: What were they trying to do? They weren't really an enemy, or really much of a potential enemy.

OLMSTED: In part I think it's another illustration of CIA having too much money, too many people, and here was this great big country with some communist influence, and let's find out everything that's going on.

Q: Basically we're talking about pay-offs, aren't we?

OLMSTED: Yes.

Q: And again we were probably against corruption all the time?

OLMSTED: Yes, that was something that troubled Bowles, I know. But the CIA was deeply involved in the Indian Government. I can remember an incident when I was having a dinner party for people who had attended the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy. There were some Fletcher grads in the Indian government and there were some in the Pakistani embassy, and a couple at our embassy. I was very much surprised when a CIA officer came into my office one day and said, "I understand you have invited," and he mentioned the name of an Indian government official, "up to your house for a dinner." And I thought this over. I had not discussed this party with anyone at the embassy. I had not submitted a list of invitees to anybody, there wasn't a list lying around on my desk. This was more of a private thing than an official party. I concluded that one of his informants had seen my written invitation on the desk of this man, and the word had gotten back to him that way. The reason the CIA was interested in this man was because he was in the archives, and had access to the most highly classified information in the archives. I was very taken aback.

Q: I'm sure you were. How did you find, from your aspect, the use of our consulates? I mean we had a number there, did they play a positive role in helping on economic reporting, or not? Or did you find it was better for you to go out on the spot?

OLMSTED: We had three large long-established Consulates General in India in the major cities, Bombay, Calcutta, and Madras. All three of them tended to operate as private principalities, and were occasionally reined in by the embassy. When I went traveling in India, we always told the Consulate General that I would be in thus-and-such an area, and some of them would send somebody to travel with me. Well, I liked that actually, it was very pleasant to have somebody to go around with me, and sometimes it was very helpful as well as being socially agreeable. Galbraith tended to ignore them. Bowles pulled them in a little bit more. Bowles paid a protocol visit to each one of them, and I think part of that was to impress upon them that a new ambassador had arrived, and he was looking at what they were doing. I was the control officer for his protocol visit to Bombay which explains some of my gray hair. That was a real dilly of a trip. My boss, the new economic counselor, had fought bitterly to keep me from being assigned as control officer because he thought I ought to be doing economic reporting on his staff. He did nothing to make my efforts any easier. There were the usual administrative details: getting the aircraft out of the military attaché's office, arranging schedules, getting things set up, and working with the Consulate General by telephone largely, and telephone connections weren't always very good. It was a great relief to me when that was over.

I, myself, sometimes tried to draw the Consulates General into the economic reporting. When we would get an assignment from the Department for a certain type of country-wide report, I would try to assign parts of it to the Consulate General. Sometimes it was more successful than others, sometimes they gave it a slap-dash treatment, and it's pretty hard for the embassy to exert authority. Other times they were very pleased and interested in participating in an embassy report.

Q: You left there in 1965. What was your impression of whether India economically when you left?

OLMSTED: I think I probably felt that India would survive, but exactly how was very difficult to foresee. There is a certain strength when you get out to the rural areas. Things have been done pretty much the same way for thousands of years, and for thousands of years they're going to continue. Maybe new seeds will be introduced, and better ways of doing things, but there's a certain sense of the eternal when you get out to the Indian peasantry. But whether India would have the exact same boundaries and borders down the road would be much more difficult to foretell.

Q: When you came back you went to the Senior Seminar for a year.

OLMSTED: Yes.

Q: '65 to '66, and then you went to the Economic Bureau.

OLMSTED: No, I went to NEA to be the senior economic officer for India.

Q: What were your main interests there? What were we thinking about about India in this particular time, '66 to '69?

OLMSTED: The year that I was in the Senior Seminar was a year of drought in India, and the threat of famine, and a very large PL 480 program was instituted.

Q: PL 480 being Public Law and 480 which is mainly food.

OLMSTED: Yes, provision of U.S. food for purchase by third- world countries for local currency. I came on the scene for the second year of the drought and I discovered very quickly that the bureaucracy in the State Department, and elsewhere, was getting awfully tired of hearing about starving India. It was much more difficult to carry my little tin cup around the second year than it would have been the first year, plus the fact Lyndon Johnson was then President and had been concerned that the Indians were not doing enough themselves to bring about the changes that would be necessary for them to increase their own production. He decided the year before I got there to put Orville Freeman, then the Secretary of Agriculture, in charge of the PL 480 operations, an action which cut out the State Department to a very considerable degree.

When I arrived, and we were just starting to talk about PL 480 food for the second year of the drought, I was told that Lyndon Johnson had made this specific designation, and I was to stay out of it. I looked up that designation, I got hold of the original copy, and it was very clear that this was for a limited period of time. It was not an on-going matter. I took that document around and shoved it under the noses of various people who had been telling me to stay out of it and I said, "We are not restricted by this. This is for a limited period, and that period of time has elapsed. There's no reason why the State Department can't play a major role in this."

However, Lyndon Johnson decided that the best way to make the Indians get off the gravy train of the PL 480 food was to make the supplies very uncertain, and therefore he would permit us to negotiate only very short term agreements, one month-two months like that, and he might let time elapse from one agreement to another. I understood why he was doing it, but from the point of view of a bureaucrat who was trying to get food to a country where there were real food shortages, it was a nightmare, just a nightmare. And the people in the Department of Agriculture were feeling very frustrated over the fact that Orville Freeman was no longer running this program, and they were not inclined to be cooperative. Some of the hardest work I ever did for the Department of State was in connection with those food agreements.

Q: Here we were pulling a certain stall, at least from the Presidential level on this, that the Indians were ducking necessary agricultural reforms, and that we had to break this tie...we had to do something about this otherwise...because they could meet their own food needs.

OLMSTED: Over the long haul, of course, they could meet their own needs. I don't think there was ever a question about that, but it was on the short term in a drought year. That was what gave us the power over the Indian government to make them make many, many changes, introducing new methods, and doing things in land reform, and all kinds of things like that.

I can understand why Johnson felt it was necessary to do that, and I think it did have some beneficial effects over the long run. But it's a painful thing to watch at very close hand.

Q: What was your impression of the staff at the Department of Agriculture when you were dealing with this?

OLMSTED: They had some people who were technically competent, I think. Most of them were very cautious bureaucrats who were not inclined to climb out on any limbs, and who tended not to see a very large picture. There was one fellow that we worked with who was a special assistant to Orville Freeman, and he has become very prominent in ecology matters, and things like that since. His name will come to me. Yes, his name was Lester Brown, and he was very bright and very helpful.

I can remember once when Bowles was back on consultation, and I accompanied him over to see Orville Freeman. They nearly got into a fist fight, Bowles was so mad at him over the way the Department of Agriculture was handling matters.

Q: Feeling that it was not being responsive, was that the problem?

OLMSTED: Yes, and feeling that they were encouraging Lyndon Johnson in the position he was taking. The first year I was in NEA, my work was almost entirely with the food for India program. I spent very little time on anything else.

Q: Did that change later? You were there for a number of years.

OLMSTED: Yes, it did. It changed over a period of time. The rains came, and the food situation in India very much eased, and other situations were much improved. And then I turned onto the other things that one does as a principal economic officer with regard to another country. Actually I was responsible for India, Nepal, and Ceylon, and I was able to spend a little more time on Nepal and Ceylon than I had that first grim year.

Q: What was the impression of how the economy of India was working? Was it basically a socialist economy? Or was it a mixed economy?

OLMSTED: Oh, it was mixed. As I've quoted before, Galbraith said there was this little layer of planning on top of the largest operating chaos in the world, and that describes it very well. It was socialist at the top, but the rest of it was sort of tribal capitalist.

Q: Were there any more American business efforts to get American business in there, or not?

OLMSTED: I should say Bowles made more of an effort than Galbraith. I don't think Galbraith was all that interested in American investment but Bowles was, and he made his pitch to a lot of American corporations. Sometimes no more successfully than his pitch to the American government, or the Indian government.

Q: You left there just about the time the Nixon administration came in in '69, didn't you?

OLMSTED: No, I left India in '65, then I went to the Senior Seminar. Next I was in NEA/INC: India, Nepal, Ceylon, and then I left there after three years -- I left there in '69 and I spent a year in an out of agency assignment to the Office of Economic Opportunity, and it was after that I came back to State.

Q: What were you doing in the Office of Economic Opportunity?

OLMSTED: Planning and research was the department that I was in, which had a lot of bright, young people who really didn't know what they were doing. It was kind of interesting in a way but I didn't think that they were very realistic.

Q: It was designed to find solutions to poverty.

OLMSTED: Yes.

Q: It was now the Nixon administration. Was the feeling the Nixon administration was giving much support to this type of operation?

OLMSTED: They did maintain a quite large Office of Economic Opportunity. I was very surprised to find out how large it was, and how much it was doing. But, as I say, I think a lot of the efforts were unavailing. Maybe some good things did come out of it, but there were a lot of impractical ideas that were bought and paid for.

Q: Were you brought there specifically because of your Indian experience -- I mean dealing with a country with major poverty problems? Is that one reason why you were there?

OLMSTED: Well, it was my own interest. I wanted to see what the United States was doing in this field, and came away rather disappointed.

JANE ABELL COON

Consular Officer

Bombay (1960)

Political Officer

Bombay (1961-1964)

Political Officer

New Delhi (1965-1967)

Ambassador Jane Abell Coon was born and raised in Dover, New Hampshire. She received a bachelor's degree from Wooster college in 1947. Her Foreign Service career included positions in India, Pakistan, and Bangladesh. Ambassador Coon was interviewed by Ann Miller Morin on November 4, 1986.

COON: I didn't have enough cutlery to handle more than twelve people. And after I'd had typhoid it was nice to be in a place with somebody else. That's a very depressing disease. I look back on Karachi as just an awful lot of fun and a place where I learned a lot.

Anyway I went on to Hindi training and got ready to go out to Bombay as consular officer. My assignment was made in January, and I wasn't going out until the following summer. I was told not to communicate with the post, because the consul general, who was retiring in June, was unalterably opposed to women in the Foreign Service. He was very much old school. And Personnel said that it would be unwise to communicate with the post until absolutely the last minute before he was leaving.

So it was finally communicated. I guess by that time I'd finished Hindi language, was taking the consular course, and I went to a party to meet my new consul general, who was going out to replace this gentleman.

My new consul general -- I can still remember the party -- said, "Oh, I'm so glad to meet you, Jane. I guess I really ought to tell you what I've been doing today. I had a letter from my predecessor, a long letter, three pages, explaining all of the reasons why a woman could not do consular work in Bombay, so I have been going through the Department today to see if I could break your assignment."

So far he was unsuccessful. But this was literally days before I was supposed to leave for the post. He wasn't in a position to make a judgment himself, and he accepted the judgment of his predecessor that a woman couldn't do consular work. When I think of how many women are in consular work, now. [Laughter]

Q: I know, I know. That's where they're supposed to be naturals.

COON: Fortunately, he was unsuccessful. I went out, but I went out again with that wonderful feeling that my boss thought I shouldn't be there. He had been a long-time economic cone officer, knew nothing about consular work, and it was a one-person consular section, so I was on my own.

It turned out to be really a piece of cake. I mean it was hard learning the job in terms of a one-person operation, but there was no problem in being a woman. In fact, again, it turned out in some respects to be an asset.

What the old consul general had particularly emphasized that it would be impossible for a woman to handle, was shipping and seamen.

Q: Same old story. They use that in any part of the world.

COON: Same old story. Yes. In fact it was probably easier for a woman to handle shipping and seamen than any other part of consular work. I very quickly discovered that most seamen had been raised at the knees of a strict mother, who had beaten into his head that you don't swear in front of ladies.

They'd come into my office, and I had arranged it so there wasn't a handy chair to sit in, so they would stand. They would start complaining about food on the ship, or working conditions. They'd say, "Ma'am, that go-uh. That da-uh. That -- the captain is serving us absolute sh-- ma'am the food isn't good." [Hearty laughter] It would only take them five minutes before they were so absolutely paralyzed by their inability to communicate that it generally solved the problem. The captains were, in many cases, equally docile.

I found that jail visits and that kind of thing were no problem. The Indians were extremely helpful. Usually an American sailor in jail was appreciative of anything you could do, like getting him put on a non-veg diet schedule, rather than a veg diet, and arrange to have some food sent in. So that it didn't turn out to be, again, at all a problem. In fact, as I say, it was probably an advantage being a woman.

I wouldn't trade that consular tour for anything because I think you learn as much as a consular officer as you do in any other job in the service. You learn an awful lot about people.

Q: Yes, I imagine you must. Is it monotonous work?

COON: No. It wasn't monotonous then. By present day standards Bombay would have been a very low volume visa post, so you could spend quite a lot of time on each case. There was a mix of protection and welfare. You know, the odd American who died or was hospitalized. Shipping and seamen. It was before the hippie phenomenon, but you had this wonderful phenomenon of world travelers at that time, who were traveling from England to Australia. Americans going from England to Australia. They were usually very interesting, if a trifle off-beat. If I found one interesting enough I'd have him or her home for lunch. So you met a lot of interesting people.

I traveled in the consular district, mostly by train up through Madhya Pradesh. Made one two-week trip up through central India. Again, I was certainly the first woman consular officer anybody had seen. I was calling on Indian officials and visiting mostly missionaries.

Then the second year I moved into the political position, and I spent the next three years as political officer in Bombay.

Q: What was your housing there?

COON: That's another slight incident. I initially was put into an apartment, a government-leased apartment in an Indian apartment building where we had several flats. Very pleasant, overlooking the Arabian sea. But that was temporary, and I was going to be moved from Jivanjyot into Washington House, a US government-owned building.

Then the very energetic, rather aggressive PAO, who was protecting some USIS apartments, worked out an arrangement where, in the course of the year I would be moved six times.

The consul general called me in to tell me about this arrangement, which again, I'm perfectly certain would never have entered their heads with a male officer. At that point I put my foot down, and I said that was just an impossible situation because I needed to have my own apartment. If you're going to build up contacts, you can't move every two weeks.

Q: Plus the amount of time it takes.

COON: Plus just the amount of time it takes to move. So I think I did two moves. I moved into a one-bedroom, and then ultimately got a two-bedroom apartment, my second year. That made me mad. By that time I guess I was beginning to get mad. Which we all should have done sooner.

Q: I think you were very forbearing if it took till then to get mad. [Laughter]

COON: You just took this state of affairs for granted, as the way the world was constructed.

Q: Your needs were just not important.

COON: No.

Q: Although, of course, you had a very important assignment.

COON: So as political officer in Bombay, I think probably that's the post where I made what reputation I got as a political officer. I traveled widely in the consular district. It was a period of substantial change in western Indian politics, and I made a breakthrough in terms of getting to know the chief minister of Maharashtra, whom no Westerner had gotten to know up until that time. He was very much of a product of middle caste Maratha culture.

It turned out, as luck would have it, the first year I was political officer there, the Indians took over Goa. The "invasion" is one term used; the Indians use the term "liberation of Goa."

Q: Depends where you're standing.

COON: Depends where you're standing. In 1962, at almost the same time as the Cuban missile crisis, the Sino-Indian War occurred. As a result of the invasion of Goa, Krishna Menon had been elected to parliament from Bombay. As a result of the Sino-Indian War, Krishna Menon, who had become Defense Minister, was eased aside. To everyone's astonishment, the chief minister from Maharashtra was brought up to Delhi to be Defense Minister. This was of course, an extremely crucial time in our relations, and I was the only person who knew him.

Q: He'd been one of your contacts?

COON: Yes. I had worked very hard on trying to get to know him and also to size him up and assess his views.

Q: That was a coup for you. The sort of thing young political officers dream about.

COON: That's right. That was a real break. After he was defense minister, I'd only see him when he came back to Bombay. Again, I got to know a lot of Indians, made a lot of Indian friends. I can't think of any difficulties I had with Indians on the account of being a woman. It just didn't seem to be an issue.

Q: There seem to be a great many very important Indian women. Was that true even back then?

COON: There had been Indian women who'd been very active in the independence movement and in the Congress party, and there were a fair number of Indian professional women in a number of walks of life. So it was, I think perhaps, a little more open than --

Q: Than Karachi?

COON: Yes. I had a great consular district that involved Gujarat and Madhya Pradesh and Maharashtra and Goa.

Q: So your consular work really fed right into your political work, didn't it?

COON: Yes. One other interesting aspect: I guess being a woman was an oddity -- and I didn't quite realize what an oddity it was until about 1963. My mother and father came out to visit, traveling on one of the last Anchor Line ships through the Suez Canal, and landed in Bombay and spent about three months with me.

They arrived before Christmas, and my Indian friends were just absolutely delighted to have my parents there. It somehow made me human to have family, to actually be born of woman, so to speak. I realized that it humanized me.

Q: You weren't sprung from the head of Zeus.

COON: Exactly. [Laughter] They just fell all over themselves giving my parents Christmas presents and inviting them out for dinner. My parents, I think, were really quite overcome by the amount of attention they got. But it was clear my Indian friends were just delighted to find that I indeed was human like the rest of them.

Q: Yes, yes. Isn't that fun.

COON: Bombay was my only four-year tour. I think your first tour is special and your longest tour is special, because you get to know a place so much better.

I was transferred to Delhi in 1965. The political counselor who'd gotten to know me and my work in Bombay asked me if I would come to Delhi at that point. Which I did, and I spent two years as first secretary in Delhi. There we didn't have a political and economic section. We had an external section and an internal section. I was in the external section following Indo-Pak and Indo-Nepalese affairs among others. So I traveled several times to Nepal. It was also during this period that, very early in that tour, there was a very bad downturn in Indo-Pak relations over the Rann of Kutch affair. I remember being over at the British embassy with my British counterpart, and the two of us down on the floor with a whole lot of maps, looking at the Rann of Kutch, when the British ambassador walked in, and the two of us sort of leaping to our feet. [Laughter]

Q: Now all this time had you been getting promotions consistently?

COON: Yes, I got two promotions, really, out of Bombay. I was promoted, I think it was after my consular tour, and then I was promoted when I first got to Delhi, which was really based on my Bombay work.

Q: So this would make you about a three now, would it? As first secretary, you'd be a three.

COON: Yes. I was a three.

Q: The old three.

COON: The old three. I was a young -- in age -- a young three, because I made three when I was thirty-five or something like that, which in those days was young.

Q: So it certainly didn't hold you back, being a woman, did it? You certainly got them when you should have, and in fact that's very good to go from four to three in less than three years. Very good. By this time, though, you were building up a very good reputation, because we heard about it in another part of the world. So you must have been doing very well.

COON: That was an interesting period in Delhi, because we had the Indo-Pak War, after the Rann of Kutch, that September of '65. Then in the winter of '66 was the Tashkent settlement, engineered by the Russians between India and Pakistan, and the death of the Indian prime minister in Tashkent, of a heart attack. Something which you couldn't possibly write a novel about. It was extraordinary. None of us had expected the Russians to pull off a settlement, and they did, and then Lal Bahadur Shastri died of a heart attack that night.

Q: That same night the settlement came out? My word.

COON: It was a wonderfully talented external section. Almost everybody in that section has gone on to be an ambassador. Doug Heck was the political counselor for part of that time, became ambassador to Niger and Nepal. Galen Stone succeeded him, and he became later ambassador to Cyprus. Nick Veliotis was in that section, was a colleague, went on of course to Jordan and Egypt. Roger Kirk was our Soviet specialist. Mary Olmsted was across the way in the internal section, and Howie Schaffer, who's now ambassador in Bangladesh. Looking back on it, I suspect Delhi was a little overstaffed with talent.

Q: I should say. But what an exciting time to be there.

COON: It was an exciting time to be in India. Of course at the very end of my Bombay tour, Nehru had died, and that was a transition in India. When Lal Bahadur Shastri died, Indira Gandhi became prime minister. So that was another transition.

Q: Did you feel any fallout from the election of Kennedy overseas?

COON: I was in Bombay at the time. I don't remember any particular fallout from the election. The Indians were generally, I think, very well disposed, because in the history of the subcontinent, the Indians generally felt they fared better under Democrats and the Pakistanis under Republicans, so that I think the Indians were quite positive.

I was in Bombay when Kennedy was assassinated, and the impact was absolutely phenomenal. It was unbelievable. To this day, I don't understand the magic that he managed to project around the world. This chief minister that I mentioned said that he had been up in his village home -- and he came from a real Indian village -- and he said his nephew came in that morning to tell him, weeping, with the tears running down his face. There was a tremendous amount of emotion involved in that.

Q: And as you say, worldwide.

COON: Worldwide. And it spread on the Indian grapevine. I think every Indian must have known in a matter of hours.

Q: Did you have, in Bombay at the consulate general, a period of mourning where you weren't supposed to entertain and go out and so forth?

COON: Yes, we had a month, as I recall; a month's period of mourning. We had a book to be signed at the consulate general. You're never prepared for these things. I remember tearing around, and we ended up with a ledger because nobody could find a proper condolence book. Then we had to rush out and get black crepe, which wasn't readily available, to put around the ledger. Later we arranged a memorial service at the Catholic cathedral. It was just packed.

All the women at the consulate were desperately trying to find something to wear on their heads, because almost none of us had hats. When I came out as a consular officer, I had gotten a white veil and a black veil. Identical veils, one for weddings and one for funerals, so I was equipped. But I remember that period vividly. Every Foreign Service officer remembers, who was overseas. I was woken up with the news in the middle of the night because of the time difference. It was early morning.

Q: It was quite something. In Baghdad, even the Russians came in with tears in their eyes to sign the book.

COON: It was just amazing.

Q: Of course, at that time we didn't know a lot of things that we know now. We've had rude awakenings for many years, with our leaders, haven't we?

COON: He projected a dynamism and a youth and an energy and hope that was just felt all around the world.

Q: Yes, definitely. Well, after that, there is a great gap in your career in Who's Who. Ten years.

COON: All right. I came back to Washington from Delhi. In the course of my Delhi assignment, the India desk officer had come out, actually a couple of times, a man named Carleton Coon.

Q: I see. He was the desk officer.

COON: The first time I met him I was up to my ears in a rather complicated arrangement between India, Nepal, and the United States, where we were attempting to help the Nepalese and also encourage some better relations between India and Nepal. In the course of this effort, we undertook to provide some construction equipment to the Indians. The Indians were going to use it to build an east-west highway in Nepal. This was a road that would go from the eastern to the western end of Nepal at the southern edge where the terrain is not as mountainous, in the plains area called the Terai.

Well, the Indians were skeptical about whether we were going to come through with our construction equipment, and I had been sending off messages, and there had been great negotiations in the United States about breaking some equipment out of Army stores, I think. I was very anxious to get a token shipment at that time of four bulldozers and ten dump trucks.

So I was introduced to Carleton Coon for the first time in the political counselor's office and apparently turned on him roundly, as he remembers it, and said, "Where are my bulldozers and my dump trucks?" [Laughter]

He was astonished because he had seen my name at the bottom of reports as J.S. Abell and didn't know I was a woman. So we met initially over bulldozers and dump trucks. Then he came back on another trip, and I don't remember very much about that trip. I think we had dinner together, but it was strictly as professional colleagues. He was married with a family, and I certainly didn't think twice about the contact.

I was assigned back to the States in February of '67. I had arranged to have furniture built in Delhi before I came back, and after I came back I bought a small house on Capitol Hill. Just a gem of a place, a lovely little place right on Third Street. And I settled and moved my furniture in June.

DANIEL L. HOROWITZ

Labor Officer

New Delhi (1961-1962)

Dr. Daniel L. Horowitz graduated from New York University, completing a Masters Degree in Political Science and Labor Economics. He served as the first Labor Attaché in the American Foreign Service. This interview was conducted on May 27, 1994 by Herbert Weiner.

HOROWITZ: As far as my own assignment was concerned, in the period immediately before my transfer in 1960, I was slated to go to the National War College. This assignment was changed when it was urged on me that instead, I accept an assignment to India, where it was felt the situation was tense as a result of the policies of the Nehru Government in playing a third-world role of neutrality leaning toward the Soviet Union. The trade union picture in India became terribly important as the independent trade unions, the trade unions independent of the Congress Party, mainly Socialist unions -- the Hind Mazdoor Sabha trade union organization (HMS) -- could play a crucial role in whether or not the general political scene swung more definitely in the direction of the Soviet Union. The Hind Mazdoor Sabha, being a Socialist-oriented trade union organization and very much a minority, nonetheless had a very vital importance, because its principal strength was in the transportation field -- the longshoremen, stevedores, railroad unions -- and it counted for a great deal as a result.

In any event, I agreed to go to India and did go there toward the end of 1960. For me, India was a fascinating assignment in that it was the first time that I served in what could genuinely be called a completely different culture. I traveled a good deal around in the country, made associations with trade union people and political people around in different parts of India.

With respect to the HMS union and the concern with its general orientation, the head of the organization was a member of Parliament from Hyderabad, Mahadeov Singh, and so he spent a good deal of time in Delhi. In any event, we got to know each other quite well. Singh liked to discuss ideological questions and general political orientation questions, and we did at great length to a point where I saw him often enough that one of his colleagues, who was generally Western oriented, once in a conversation with me said, "Look, it is hopeless. I know what you're trying to do with Singh. You're not going to succeed because with Singh it is not a question really of ideology. It is a question of color." Well, it turned out actually that this was something of an exaggeration, because with time Singh's general orientation was modified enough that he did in general begin to favor a Western orientation.

One of the things which had an influence on him was a trip to the United States. I had, after some time, suggested to him that he consider a leader grant to visit the United States. I was in Bombay on a trip at about that time, and Singh came through Bombay. We met in my hotel room and discussed the possibility of a leader grant. He had considered it, and he was prepared to accept, but he said, "Look, the only shoes I own are these sandals I'm wearing. I don't own any ordinary shoes. How can I go to the United States without any shoes?" I leaned over, took my shoes off and handed him my shoes. He made the trip, which turned out to be a very good one from the point of view of his exposure to the United States and meetings with trade union people and others. He came back quite impressed, and it had some long-time influence on him.

The principal trade union organization, the Indian National Trade Union Congress (INTUC), was Congress Party controlled and oriented, and the Congress Party, of course, reflected the policies and positions of Nehru and his government. By and large the policy was neutralist. The relationship between the trade union movement and the government was a close one, but one in which the direction of things generally ran from government to party, or from party to government, and to the trade union rather than in general the reverse. The HMS played a more independent role, and in this regard did have greater independent influence.

Because of the very different cultural background that characterized India, I volunteered to stay an extra year. . . -- At that time the assignments were two years. -- . . .an extra year in order to maximize any benefits that would come from my associations. Nonetheless, again, the National War College possibility raised its head, and Foreign Service Personnel decided that I had better go to the National War College that year, the fall of 1962. As it turned out, when I got to Washington in August of 1962, I was told in Personnel that I was no longer scheduled at the War College. This was rather startling to me, because I had had an assignment to the War College washed out three times in the past. The first time had been in 1948, when I was in ILH, and in 1948 the personnel office had slated me for the National War College until they looked at my age and decided I was too young at that time to go, and so I was told, "No, you'll be recommended some years from now." 1953 was the second time that I was recommended by Personnel to the National War College. This time, at the time I was Labor Advisor in EUR, and without consulting me the Executive Director of EUR notified Personnel that I simply could not be spared from the Bureau, and therefore my name should be scratched from the list. I didn't learn this until some years later. The third time was, of course, in Paris as I mentioned, when my assignment was scratched in order for me to go to India.

In any event, when I got to Washington in 1962 and was told that I was no longer slated to go to the National War College, I was quite angry and upset and tried to track down what had happened. I couldn't get any answers until I finally got to the Under Secretary for Management, and he explained to me that this was a decision that had not been taken in the State Department, that the State Department had no control over it, that it was a White House decision, and we'd better abide by it. It turned out on investigation that the decision had been made in a conversation between George Meany, then head of the AFL-CIO and President Kennedy.

JOSEPH F. DONELAN, JR.
Administrative Counselor
New Delhi (1961-1962)

Joseph F. Donelan, Jr. was born in New York City, where he attended City College of New York for a year. His first job with the Department of State was an assignment with the Foreign Service Planning Division. His posts include, Paris, Nagoya, and New Delhi. He was also a comptroller for NATO.

Q: Going to New Delhi, what was the problem? Why did you go and why had the other man left?

DONELAN: John Kenneth Galbraith was the new Ambassador to India. He was a close friend to President Kennedy, he really was. I guess the President, as President's are wont to do, told him he could have whatever staff he wanted. Since Galbraith didn't know me from a hole in the wall I've always assumed that the culprit was his Deputy Chief of Mission, a man by the name of Benson E.L. Timmons, III, more familiarly known later in the Embassy, Bacon, Lettuce and Tomato! I had known Timmons briefly in Paris where he had been deputy chief of the aid mission to France. And I suppose that was how my name got there. So we arrived in Delhi in I guess August 1961, and I was Counselor of Embassy for Administration. That was an exciting time.

Q: How did Galbraith operate as an Ambassador from your vantage point?

DONELAN: Actually, I liked the way "Professor" Galbraith as the Indians always called him, operated. He was the Chairman of the Board, he had a staff and he expected them to operate with a certain amount of initiative and independence, and he had a Deputy Chief of Mission to whom he delegated all of the day to day operations of the Mission. This was the preferred way for a "political" Ambassador to operate, that is by delegating the usual stuff to a career Deputy. Galbraith functioned very effectively; he traveled the country widely; he met with and knew countless Indian officials, and certainly had complete access to the highest levels of government. If the operation had any weakness it was the manner in which his deputy worked; and to a considerable extent the deputy was the one who discouraged initiatives and individual judgments, but this mostly was a result of his insecurity.

It was the conventional wisdom that early in his tenure, the Ambassador was inclined to be overly impressed with the requirements/demands of the Indians, but that didn't last as he quietly adjusted his own attitude after sufficient exposure, and I guess toward the end of his tour he perhaps was more inclined to shake his finger at some of the complaints rather than being convinced of the need. He was terribly skeptical of the professionals and the career Foreign Service Officer in particular. And he may have had good cause for that, but I don't know. He personally wrote short, terse and classic cables to the Department which frequently became conversational pieces. (And yes he had a good personal relationship with President Kennedy, and yes on occasion he would pick up the phone and call him at the White House). In terms of personal relationships, once he decided you knew what you were doing, that was it until you might prove otherwise. I guess I had been there for a week when a disaster cropped up somewhere in that vast country.....

Q: Famine or earthquake or flood?

DONELAN: As a matter of fact, as I recall it was a flood - and areas of India almost always flooded after the monsoon season, and with great damage to life and property. The Ambassador called me and said "We've got to give the Indians $50,000 or $60,000. The United States is rich and they expect us to help out in this catastrophe. So I want you to draw a check right now". And I said "We can't do that". Well, the simple matter of fact is that American Embassies, no matter how big they might be, never have been known to have 50,000 or so dollars hanging around loose in an allotment account which at any given moment could sustain that amount. I did remember that there had been a mechanism provided in the foreign aid appropriation, under which in case of an "emergency" an Ambassador could draw down an amount up to $50,000 without prior approval of Washington. But that had been a couple of years ago, and verification of the authority would be prudent. He didn't like anybody to tell him what he couldn't do, but then I told him if I could have twenty minutes or so to check something out, I thought it might be done. I did check it, it was still a valid authority, and it was done, and the Ambassador called the Prime Minister and notified him of the gift. From then on the Ambassador didn't expect me to do everything right away, but twenty minutes or so later was okay. He was a fascinating man, renowned in his own right as an economist, a forecaster of the '29 depression, a facile writer of books, and a great conversationalist, although some people said he did most of the conversing. But I think he was a good Ambassador and a very successful representative of the President and US interests.

Q: How about your dealings on your side as administrative officer with the Indians because you must have had probably more contact with the Indian bureaucracy than anybody else in the business? How did this work?

DONELAN: I dealt with the Foreign Ministry, and with various other officials of the Indian government on a continuing basis - principally in the areas of immunities and privileges of American personnel in the Mission (Mission being, Embassy, AID, USIS, Military Attachés, Agriculture and Commerce, Treasury and other assorted US representatives, and after the invasion of India by the Chinese Communists in connection with the USMSMI (U. S. Military Supply Mission, India) accreditation and diplomatic status, free entry of personal and official materials, diplomatic pouch, and diverse other instances - e.g., an official American is in an automobile accident - and what to do about it? Etc.

The Indians were always very picky on everything we did in this area, part of it understandable sensitivity, part of it their nature, and their bureaucratic operation, which probably was the worst I'd ever seen (not that we're simon pure), and part of it other Ministries such as Finance, resenting the authority of the Foreign Affairs people. (And that happens in all governments!)

We had a good American School starting up and we needed a lot of equipment, for instance microscopes for the labs in the High School. And they said: "Well, you must pay duty on these things". And the duty of course was about five times the cost of the item in the States. Since they were adamant, we simply changed the name of the addressee, and had the stuff consigned to the Ambassador personally. So the Ambassador got these huge supplies and equipment, and they never fought it. But there was a definite technique in working with the Indians, which once learned, was quite effective. I remember when I first heard the term "red tape", I thought it was sort of a joke, but I learned that it originated with the British in India, and that their students, the Indians learned their lessons very well.

And you can actually see "red tape". Quite contrary to the American penchant for making five copies of everything; the Indians made no copies of anything. They registered documents in and out but they never made copies. As a paper moved from office to office and as each unit or office made its comments or gave an approval or disapproval, the new piece of paper was added to the file so that in a remarkably short time on its way through the bureaucracy, the bundle of paper was tied together with "red tape". So you learned that there was a natural progression through certain ministries from this desk to this desk and to this desk. And you discovered that if you got to know this man very well on any one of these items, he could always call up a document from lower down in the chain. So this is the way it worked. You found out who was closest to the Minister, or the Minister, and you went to him. And automatically you could save three or four weeks on anything that had to be processed through the government.

And then there was the Chinese invasion of India. That was a very busy time for the Counselor of Embassy for Administration. Later on I said that I thought that the invasion of the American Supply Mission to India was much more difficult and troublesome than the actual invasion of India by the Chinese.

Q: How did you as Administrative Counselor, become involved with the Embassy efforts during the India and Chinese War?

DONELAN: The Ambassador could see what was happening - with the Chinese threatening and posturing on the northern borders and the Indians pretty much defenseless particularly in the mountain conditions - although the Indians had made pretty short work in '61 of Goa, the hapless Portuguese enclave in warm southern India.

The Ambassador wanted help and he wanted it quick from the US. The President sent Averell Harriman out with a special mission - which included a four star general, the chief of the newly organized "Strike Command", headquartered in McDill Field, Florida. There were about twenty people in the party which included Harriman's aide, Bill Sullivan, a fairly junior officer at the time, but who later was Ambassador to Manila and then to Tehran.

This was in November 1962 - we were having our little Chinese Communist invasion and the US was having its "Missile Crisis" in Cuba (October '62?). All of the Harriman group and most of the "Country Team" members had Thanksgiving Dinner at the Galbraith's - we all pretty much sat around on the floor, kicking around courses of action and what should be done when. It really was typical of the Indians that in later discussions, they were adamant as to what the planned assistance group should be called. At this point the US quite commonly had MAAG - Military Assistance Advisory Groups - in many countries whose function was to provide technicians and technical training and support, including supplies and equipment, to the host country military., The mission to India was identical but the MAAG name was felt by the Indians to be an affront (to their dignity?) - so it became, as I indicated earlier, USMSMI.

First thing we got on to was arranging radio frequencies for the flow of American aircraft, which was to and did airlift supplies and equipment into the country. This was pretty much handled by Bob Richardson, Embassy Communications Officer. It was decided over the next few days that the group would require a staff of about ninety people. And that's where we were totally involved. When they said they would need office space (obvious) the Ambassador said " Joe, you take care of it." And this was followed by need for temporary quarters, people coming and going on TDY (I leased a small hotel); by housing, which was set aside in a new residential area of town, mostly by pulling and tugging with the Indians, this for the sort of permanent staff, and then of course furniture and stuff to make the houses habitable -which I might add included putting in Western style toilets, and stoves and refrigerators and of course air conditioning, etc. So that's the way it worked. And that was my part of the thing and we did it.

Q: I hadn't realized that we'd had such an extensive military assistance effort in India.

DONELAN: Yes, actually we did, not nearly as large as in many countries, but there for a fairly extended period of time, in fact long after I left the post. As is understandable, politics of relationships was involved; remember that up until that time Mr. Nehru had been very pious about his non-alignment, and was not averse to sticking his finger in our eye on occasion. This was a breakthrough; he needed help and the US provided it. It was a fairly short lived invasion and I believe the Chinese accomplished exactly what they wanted - which was to humiliate Mr. Nehru.

We in the Embassy were watching to see if the Chinese would use aircraft to bomb Delhi - they never did. But we put up blackout stuff and lights were dimmed in the city. I didn't think they had any intention of doing so. I made an observation at a meeting and some people were pretty upset with me for saying I didn't think the Chinese were coming at all. I wasn't pretending to be a military expert, I just felt that the Chinese were too smart to conquer India, because if they conquered India they'd be responsible for all these millions and millions of people. It would simply destroy the whole Chinese Communist movement. But they did march into India, they pushed some military units around, they spiked some artillery, and then left, just like that.

BARRY ZORTHIAN

Deputy Public Affairs Officer, USIS
New Delhi (1961-1964)

Barry Zorthian, a graduate of Yale University, served in the U.S. Marine Corps during World War I in the Pacific. His career included positions in India, Germany, and Vietnam. Mr. Zorthian was interviewed by Cliff Groce on October 20, 1988.

Q: So after VOA, India.

ZORTHIAN: After VOA, India. We had three very exciting years in India -- our first Foreign Service post. India in many ways was an exciting country, in many ways a depressing country. I was deputy PAO. I was supposed to be deputy to Bill Handley, got over there, and Bill Handley was preempted for something else. He became ambassador to Mali and never showed up. John Lund, whom I replaced, left. Ken Bunce had already left. So I was acting PAO for about five or six months, till Bill Weathersby was selected, wrapped up his business, and got out there. We worked for John Kenneth Galbraith, who, again, if he liked you, was a very exciting guy to work with. Full of ideas, very difficult in some ways but also very stimulating. If he didn't like you, he was hell to work with. And he might not like you for all kinds of reasons: you were too tall or too fat, or you didn't comb your hair right or you wore the wrong ties, or he just didn't have much respect for your intellectual capabilities. But we got along fine. Bill Weathersby also got along fine with him. We had three good years in India. The family enjoyed it. India still had enough touches of the Rudyard Kipling era to be great for youngsters. Our children were quite young then. My wife enjoyed it. We traveled a lot in India. And I think we had a hell of a good program. One fortunate thing was, we didn't have budgetary problems because we had so many PL 480 rupees we didn't know what to do with them.

Q: What Henry Loomis used to call "funny money."

ZORTHIAN: Funny money. Well, it was great in India because we did all kinds of things -- book programs, university programs, all the conventional programs, big Fulbright program, English teaching. AID was founding universities. We had the one political crisis there of the China invasion of Ladakh, and that was a pretty exciting time. It was almost the same time as the Cuban crisis here. But there's where the political connections of an ambassador help. John Kenneth Galbraith's ability to go directly to Kennedy got attention for India even in the middle of the Cuban crisis. And airborne assistance -- supplies, equipment, and so on -- arrived in India on big, impressive -- whatever they were -- C-141's, big impressive American transport planes, and of course impressed the hell out of the Indians.

We had a problem in India. The Bhopal steel mill had been turned down -- if I remember, under Dulles -- and that negative impact had to be recovered. Galbraith was very public conscious. He was used a good deal publicly, was respected by the Indians because he was a professor, because of his reputation in the economic field. So those were very good years. And many of our close USIS friends today came out of that period.

WILLIAM HENRY WEATHERSBY
Public Affairs Officer, USIS
New Delhi (1961-1965)

Deputy Chief of Mission
New Delhi (1967-1969)

William Henry Weathersby began his career in 1951 working for a predecessor organization to the United States Information Agency. His career included positions in Cairo, Tehran, New Delhi, and an ambassadorship to Sudan. This interview took place on August 1, 1989.

WEATHERSBY: Well, a vacancy developed in the job of Public Affairs Officer in India. The Ambassador to India, John Kenneth Galbraith, was pressing his friend of long standing, Ed Murrow, to fill the job. We proposed a series of names, and the Ambassador kept turning them down. In one message he said he would like for us to reach outside and get someone of the stature and talents of a Carl Sandburg or a Robert Frost. Finally, a friend involved in personnel work in the State Department called to tell me that Ambassador Galbraith was arriving the next day and one of his objectives was to get the matter of a Public Affairs Officer settled. He realized that Galbraith had turned down about a dozen nominees. He asked if I would like the job. I told him that I would like to go but that Murrow had said that he wasn't ready for me to leave. "Well," he wanted to know, "do you mind if I mention your name to Galbraith?" I told him that it didn't matter.

A couple of days later my friend called to say that Galbraith wanted to see me and made an appointment. We talked for an hour or so, and I wanted to go over the best names we had for Public Affairs Officer in India, but he was interested in a more general conversation.

The next morning Murrow summoned me with all the background on our best candidates for PAO India and told me to wait outside his office until he called me into his session with Galbraith. I did, but instead of calling me in, Murrow came out with Galbraith and told me that the Ambassador had convinced him that I should go to India. It turned out to be an extremely interesting assignment for me, in large part because we had in place a strong USIS program with some able people, including Barry Zorthian, Deputy PAO, and later Lawrence J. Hall in that job.

Q: We had branches in how many cities, do you recall?

WEATHERSBY: We had a branch in each of the four cities in which we had Consuls General, those being New Delhi, Bombay, Calcutta, and Madras. In addition we had about a half dozen centers with libraries in lesser but still important cities. Prime Minister Nehru had allowed these centers back in the early days of Indian independence. Later, when I was back in Washington, the Soviet Union was operating a center in Kerala when the roof collapsed and the question arose as to whether they had permission from the Government of India for the center. Apparently they had not. It became an issue for the Indian press. Of course, there was no written evidence of governmental approval much earlier for the American center in Kerala. Both of the centers had to close.

Q: Did Ambassador Galbraith take an active interest in USIS?

WEATHERSBY: Very much so. His travels through India were planned with USIS, he spoke a great deal, he made himself available to the press frequently, and he was primarily responsible for bringing some outstanding speakers and other talented people to India. He had high visibility in the Indian press and also in our own publications, including the periodical, The American Reporter. He prevailed upon a number of scholars, including some of his colleagues from Harvard, of course, to tour India.

After the Sudan I went back to New Delhi as Deputy Chief of Mission and concurrently Consul General for Northern India.

Q: Who was the Ambassador to India then?

WEATHERSBY: Chester Bowles, the only person I know who served as U.S. Ambassador to the same country twice, first in the administration of President Truman and then in the time of Presidents Kennedy and Johnson.

Q: I had forgotten that if I ever knew it. Of course, he was the Bowles of Benton and Bowles, one of America's great advertising agencies back in the '30s and '40s.

WEATHERSBY: They began the business, as I recall, when they both were fairly fresh out of Yale. In the hard times of the great depression from the crash of '29 they had remarkable success in their new advertising firm. As Chet, as he was generally known, sometimes said, the work had to be very good, but the real secret was in convincing business leaders that in a deep depression there was no way to survive without putting whatever was needed into their advertising budgets. At the outbreak of World War II he went into government as Federal Price Administrator, then as Director of Economic Stabilization, and later served as special assistant to UN Secretary General Trygve Lie. In 1948 he was elected Governor of Connecticut, in 1951 went for the first time as Ambassador to India, and thereafter was elected to the U.S. Congress.

I remember that Ambassador Bowles appraised the work of USIS in one of his numerous books. Let me find it. It's in Promises to Keep, an account of his years in public life. Here it is; he wrote: "Much of the burden for correcting the distorted views of America held by many Indians was on the United States Information Service.....During my first assignment to India, the USIS had published The American Reporter, a twelve- page fortnightly newspaper in eight Indian languages with a circulation of 450,000. When I returned to India, I was delighted to see that this paper was still in operation, still well edited and still dealing honestly with the common problems of America and India. It also reported world-wide developments in the fields of science, education and politics, interviews with recent prominent visitors, and excerpts from speeches by prominent American officials. In 1964 I began to contribute to The American Reporter a regular column, which was also published regularly in papers throughout India with a total daily circulation of two and a half million. In these columns I outlined my personal views on such questions as economic development, economic justice and world politics.

"At least half of our information program in India was designed to reach young people. A particularly effective USIS program was its series of American Cultural Weeks at various Indian universities. These comprehensive presentations of American problems, accomplishments, music, art, and political views often lasted four or five days. To help conduct the various seminars, we recruited wives of Foreign Service officers, Fulbright Scholars and specialists from a variety of fields, as well as our own USIS staff." [Chester Bowles, Promises to Keep (Harper and Row, 1971) pp. 466, 467.]

Q: With his background, he had more than a passing interest in the U.S. Information Agency.

WEATHERSBY: He had a great deal of interest and was very helpful in many USIS activities. For his return as Ambassador his re-entry was from the east and I flew to Calcutta and accompanied him and Mrs. Bowles in the flight to New Delhi, doing some briefing on the way. He was delighted to see that USIS was still publishing The American Reporter, which was begun with his encouragement during his first term in India. Earlier when I was with Ken Galbraith in the far reaches of eastern India -- the Ambassador in a speech had taken pride in saying that he believed he was the first American Ambassador to have the pleasure of visiting Shillong, and an Indian arose in the back and said, "No, Ambassador Bowles was here." I would say that both Ambassadors Galbraith and Bowles looked upon the work of the U. S. Information Agency as an important part of American diplomacy and participated in a wide range of activities.

Q: What were overall Indian-U.S. relations during this period, as you recall, Bill?

WEATHERSBY: Relations generally were good ever since Indian independence. It was recognized by many educated Indians that President Franklin Roosevelt had been an advocate of Indian independence in his talks with Sir Winston Churchill, even though he failed to convince him to preside over the liquidation of the empire. Prime Minister Nehru strongly believed in nonalignment and so have all of his heirs who have been elected to Indian leadership. In the Eisenhower years, Secretary of State Dulles was heavily engaged in putting together defensive military pacts around the world. India turned aside offers of arms and other inducements to join but that would not have greatly disturbed U.S.-Indian relations if Pakistan had not joined and begun strengthening considerably its armed forces. With Pakistan in an alliance with the United States and China building its military might with the help of the Soviet Union, India saw itself as nearly surrounded by potential enemies. In fact, the course of events brought wars with both Pakistan and China.

The difference of view on the values of alignment and of non-alignment was a major cause of friction between India and the United States for many years. There was an important exception to the general supply of U. S. arms to South Asia in 1962 when the Chinese-Indian border dispute resulted in Chinese attacks in Ladakh and the northeast frontier. The Soviet Union had agreed to supply MiG warplanes to India and to aid Indian aircraft manufacturing. In reneging for awhile on the promises, the Soviet Union referred to a serious international crises, which might be taken to refer to the Indian-Chinese border or concurrent problems between the U. S. and the USSR around Cuba. Nehru asked our Ambassador at that time, Galbraith, for weapons, and American cargo planes began flying military equipment to Leh in the high center of Ladakh near the battle areas. Later Nehru said that Indian leaders had been "living in a world of our own illusions." A large request for arms went to Washington but was blocked by Congress.

Through all of this USIS India was engaged in the cultivation of improved relations, and I believe over the years there has been considerable success. Later when Pakistan and India engaged in one of their brief wars, all U.S. arms to the region were stopped, but the supply to Pakistan was later resumed. Over the years India and the U. S. certainly have managed to know each other better.

Of course, U. S. aid to India has been an important factor and was helpful, even though Indians mainly were responsible for a green revolution which achieved self sufficiency in basic food production.

Q: What was your next assignment, Bill?

WEATHERSBY: Next came a temporary job in India as Chargé d'Affaires. That was because there had been another change of administrations in Washington, and after Ambassador Bowles went home President Nixon took some months to name a new Ambassador. Even though I was due back in Washington, when the new Ambassador, Ken Keating, arrived I was asked to stay on in New Delhi for a visit there by President Nixon.

HOWARD B. SCHAFFER
Economic and Political Officer
New Delhi (1961-1967)

India Desk Officer
Washington, DC (1967-1969)

Ambassador Howard B. Schaffer was born in New York in 1929. He graduated from Harvard University and then served overseas in the US Army before joining the Foreign Service in 1955. Overseas, Schaffer served in Malaysia, India, Korea, Pakistan, Cyprus, and as Ambassador to Bangladesh. In Washington DC, he served in the Office of Personnel, as the Country Director for Nepal, India, and Sri Lanka, and as the Deputy Assistant Secretary for South Asia. Ambassador Schaffer was interviewed by Thomas Stern in 1997.

Q: Then, in 1961, you were assigned to New Delhi as an economic officer.

SCHAFFER: Right. I went as an economic officer because in my naivete I thought that having been a political officer in Seoul after having done considerable political work in Kuala Lumpur it would be useful to broaden my skills and experiences. Fortunately, 1961 was before the Department instituted its rigid “cone” system; so I had no problem being assigned as an economic officer--not as far as I know. I might note that one interesting aspect of my career is the limited time I spent in Washington, particularly in my early years as an FSO [Foreign Service officer]. Of my first 11 years in the Service, only one was in Washington and that was in language training. So my naivete about the personnel system and Department bureaucracy more generally came easily.

I had been in Delhi briefly during my journey following my Seoul assignment. But I had no idea how huge the embassy was. It was an enormous mission which aside from the embassy proper had a very large AID staff. AID was established in 1961 as the successor to ICA, the Development Loan Agency and a number of other operations. I remember looking at the Delhi phone book in 1961 and noting that almost every page had the name of at least one American official on it. So we had a very, very large mission.

The embassy was lodged in that beautiful, but not very efficient building that Edward Durell Stone designed as an abstract from Mogul architectural forms. It was presided over by John Kenneth Galbraith who had arrived in April--three months before I got there. It should be noted that there was a considerable wild life supply in the “water court” in the center of the embassy and the renowned “duck ceremony”--when the ducks marched out of the pool every afternoon to their night resting place--was already in effect. Although not directly related to the “water court,” we even had a representative of the Fish and Wildlife Service on the embassy staff. His task was to find appropriate Indian wildlife to be sent back to the U.S. where they were domiciled in various state and federal parks and wildlife preserves.

Galbraith was our ambassador from April 1961 to July, 1963. He was followed by Chester Bowles, who so interested me that I have written his biography. My first DCM was Benson E.L. Timmons, III--known as Lane. He was a very hard-driving martinet who was always cracking the whip. He was minutely involved in both the management of the embassy and most of the substantive issues facing us. He became known by his initials “BELT” and was called by some “La Cinture” [French: belt] in French. After Galbraith and Timmons left, Joseph N. “Jerry” Greene came as DCM. Bowles and Greene were there for the balance of my tour. After I left to become India desk officer, Greene was succeeded by William Weathersby who had been director of USIS [United States Information Service] in New Delhi and later became our ambassador to the Sudan.

As I said, I was assigned to the embassy’s economic section. I served in that job for about eighteen months. I didn’t much like it. I didn’t know much about economics and I wasn’t learning much in the Delhi job. My principal responsibility was commodity reports--particularly on industries. It wasn’t very exciting nor particularly sophisticated. I really didn’t have the background in economics to turn out sophisticated reporting. The best economic reporting in the embassy did not usually emanate from the economic section, but from the AID staff. I had a fairly substantial official relationship with AID, and, on a personal level, I knew some of the staff quite well. Physically, the AID staff was quite removed from the Chancery, with the exception of the titular head of the Economic Section--the Minister--who was also the AID Mission Director. In my days, that was C. Tyler Wood. This physical separation was a barrier to an effective liaison with AID.

I got to know Wood well. He was a wonderful, good hearted man who was also a crafty bureaucrat. He was one of the few people in the embassy whom Ambassador Galbraith - in his sometimes insufferable arrogance - really respected. I think that may have stemmed in part because Wood enjoyed a strong relationship with important power sources in Washington and Galbraith was a man who knew where power rested and had a great respect for those who could effectively wield it.

I worked more closely with Ty Wood later following the outbreak of the Sino-Indian war when the U.S. undertook an effort to rush military supplies to the beleaguered Indians. I was included in a special organization that was established in the embassy under Wood to deal with that problem. At that time, I was theoretically still a member of the economic section, but by then, I had begun to make moves to leave it and transfer to the political section. This was in Galbraith's waning days as ambassador, the summer of 1963. My efforts to shift worked. I had support from my friends in the political section. An appropriate job at my grade level was coming vacant and I made the case that my Hindi language skills were probably better than those of anyone else who might be coming out of FSI. No bureaucrat in Washington said anything and fortunately for me the man who actually ran the economic section--counselor R. Burr Smith--liked me and agreed to the transfer if that was my wish. But there was a problem. Because of the personnel changes in the embassy, and particularly in the economic section, I was informed that the transfer could only take place if I were willing to postpone my home leave for about eight or 10 months. That was fine with me.

When I first started in the political section, I was assigned to the domestic affairs unit and given two major responsibilities: a) to cover developments at the state level within the Delhi consular district--the north Indian states of Uttar Pradesh, Rajasthan, Punjab, and Kashmir and b) to deal with the opposition parties. (In those days of Congress Party domination of the Indian political scene, [the opposition was] a weak lot and could safely be entrusted to an officer who was just getting started in reporting Indian political developments.) My colleague in the unit was Craig Baxter. He had covered the areas that I was to follow and took on the responsibilities of the job on the domestic political side that had become vacant, namely covering the Congress Party and the operations of the national Parliament. I mentioned that I had the brief for political developments in north India. We also had in those days political officers assigned to the three constituent posts--Calcutta, Madras and Bombay; who similarly followed political developments in their consular districts.

The political reporting system changed during my tour. When I first began to work in the political section, I believe that the constituent posts sent their reports directly to Washington, with copies to the embassy. Later, the reports came to Delhi first where they were incorporated into messages from the embassy or retransmitted to Washington after the embassy had vetted them.

I might at this point just interject a comment about Mrs. Jacqueline Kennedy's visit, which took place while Galbraith was still ambassador. It was a very interesting operation. According to reports that I believe are correct, Ambassador Galbraith had been one of the principal promoters of the visit, which (inevitably in those days) included Pakistan as well. I believe he did this not only because he enjoyed these occasions - he loved being in the company of great people or their spouses. But I'm convinced that he also saw the visit--and his role in masterminding it--as evidence of his close ties to the Kennedy White House that would impress the Indians. Since he was seen to be choreographing the visit of the First Lady; he must have seemed to the Indians to be very close to Mrs. Kennedy and, hence, to the president. Much of this staging was designed to show the Indians that he was a person to be reckoned with because he had full and meaningful access to the Oval Office.

The visit went off very well. The important aspect, from our point of view, was that the preparation for the visit became first priority for all embassy staff. Other work just had to take second place for months. Officers were sent to various parts of the country. Some very remote indeed -- to check out accommodations, scout sites that the First Lady might wish to see, and look for places appropriate for public relations purposes. I was not involved in this exploration of India; in fact, I was not a significant player in the embassy in any respect for most of Galbraith's tour. When Mrs. Kennedy came, I was still pretty much of a fledgling. But like everyone else in the embassy, I was drawn into the preparations. I was much impressed by the attention that was devoted to every detail by Galbraith. He even ran a rehearsal dinner designed to ensure that all would go smoothly at the official dinner, which was loaded with VIPs from Prime Minister Nehru on down. This visit was taken as seriously as a presidential visit. It was a very glamorous occasion.

When I was in Sri Lanka many years later, Mrs. Clinton visited Colombo. I must be the only U.S. government employee who was in the subcontinent for the visit of these First Ladies--Mrs. Kennedy (1962) and Mrs. Clinton (1995). The two visits could hardly have been more dissimilar. This reflected the different personalities of the two women and the roles they each played in their husbands' administrations. In addition, over the 30 plus years we Americans have changed our views of the appropriate role of a senior official's wife. Mrs. Clinton's visit was full of substance. She went to U.S. assistance projects; she talked substance to other women who like herself were active in public affairs. Mrs. Kennedy's program was altogether different. She was photographed dancing with maharajas and going up mountains to medieval palaces on the backs of richly adorned elephants.

It is important to note that during the Kennedy presidency, many Indians viewed the White House with great admiration. The Indians have a love of pomp and circumstance, for royalty. I think they saw in the Kennedys their image of a young, vigorous royal couple. I use the words "young and vigorous" quite advisedly because I do feel that part of the attraction the Kennedys had for Indians was their youthful beauty and exuberance. Indians compared this with the tired and aging leadership of Nehru and the other chieftains of the Congress Party.

The visit was obviously a public relations success. Mrs. Kennedy was photographed everywhere. But it was all fluff; there were no serious discussions. She sat with Nehru on the embassy stairs after dinner, but the visit had no lasting impact. It did show the U.S. in a very favorable light and I think one can say that Indian public opinion moved in our favor--and it was wonderfully good for Galbraith in terms of his standing both with the White House and the Indian leadership. Yet soon after Mrs. Kennedy's departure, Indian-U.S. relations sagged once again.

As I said, the opposition parties were not a substantial factor in Indian political life at that time. They had been badly defeated in the 1962 elections by the Congress Party, which garnered three quarters of the parliamentary seats and got approximately half the popular vote. I don't believe that any opposition party was able to meet the 10% threshold; i.e. a party had to win 10% of the seats in Parliament to be declared the official opposition party. In any event, the Congress Party occupied the center of the political stage--in both senses of the term--and the opposition parties were scattered in different parts of India and occupied the political fringes on both the left and the right. For example, the Communist Party in those days used to garner 10% of the popular vote--election after election--but fewer parliamentary seats. Its strength was confined to a few Indian states, most notably West Bengal and Kerala.

My bosses--the DCM and the political counselor--showed some interest in my work. Even Bowles, Galbraith's successor, was somewhat interested. But what really brought me for the first time to the attention both of the front office and the people in Washington who dealt with Indian matters was the trip I took in the late winter of 1963-64 to Kashmir. I had by then been in the political section for about eight months. Kashmir was included in the Delhi consular district and covering political developments there was part of my job.

My first official trip to Kashmir was very important because it was an ice-breaker in terms of the embassy's coverage of the politics of the disputed state. In December 1963, a relic--a hair of the Prophet--was stolen from a shrine near Srinagar, the capital of the state. Initially, the police were unable to come up with any clues that would lead to the perpetrators. Widespread rioting followed, carried out by people who thought that both the theft and the lack of police action had political motivations. The Kashmir government, like all Kashmir regimes in those days (and these), was deeply dependent on the central Indian government for support. Its collapse in the face of the demonstrations gave rise to a very serious political and security crisis in the state. The situation was given wide coverage by both the Indian and the international media. Some of the most insightful pieces were written by a Washington Star reporter, Richard Critchfield, who had somehow managed to find his way into Kashmir. It was a bad and dangerous predicament for the Indians. The Kashmir people used this theft as an opportunity to protest the way they had been treated politically over the years since the state acceded to India in 1947. It was a very undemocratic state of affairs. The state government was very heavy handed and corrupt. The government was run by a political party, the National Conference, which was aligned with the Congress Party. Ambassador Chester Bowles felt that it was important for someone from the embassy to visit Kashmir and observe the scene on the spot. A new government had been installed but our reports indicated continuing tension.

Up to that time, no embassy officer had ever proceeded on what was an avowedly political visit to Kashmir, primarily because of the opposition of the central government. It was feared that since many Kashmiris were opposed to Indian rule, an embassy observer might come away with the "wrong" perception of the situation, particularly if he met with dissident political figures. We also regarded Kashmir as a disputed area. This too kept our approach very careful and low key. Embassy staff had visited on holidays and some of the political officers had taken the opportunity to observe. Some may have even talked to some Kashmiri politicians, but we had never sent an officer on an official visit to discuss politics as we did in all other Indian states. The central government had some reservations about Bowles's idea, but it finally concurred. His position was that it was better for the Indians themselves if the embassy and Washington had first hand analysis, particularly by an embassy officer who spoke the language, than to have to rely on tendentious accounts in the press.

To tell the truth, I was quite nervous about being the embassy's first official visitor to Kashmir. This was by far the most sensitive political assignment that I had ever undertaken. Ambassador Bowles personally counseled me before I left. He didn't provide any detailed guidance; he left that to what he considered my good sense. But he did warn me to be careful. The trip was very long. It was February, and air travelers had to worry whether they would ever reach their destination because of the weather. On the way, I had a very interesting conversation with a prominent carpet manufacturer and merchant, Ghulam Ahmed. He proved later to be very helpful to me in putting me in touch with politically useful people. I helped him by purchasing a large number of carpets.

During my visit, I was able to talk to everyone of importance in Kashmir political life. I assumed that the central government had sent advance notice of my arrival. The embassy had not because we just hadn't had the time. When I arrived at my hotel, I immediately began to call for appointments. Much to my pleasure, every one was willing to see me, both those in the government and those who opposed it. I was able to get around quite freely in Srinagar. I had heard from Richard Critchfield, the Washington Star reporter to whom I referred earlier, as well as from Ghulam Ahmed, the merchant I had met on my journey to Kashmir, about a student activist named Farooq Kathwari. Farooq, who turned out to be Ghulam Ahmed's grandson, had been very helpful to Critchfield, taking him around Srinagar and introducing him to many political dissidents. Critchfield had suggested that Farooq might be similarly useful to me. So I got in contact with him and he was indeed very helpful. He guided me through the university and put in me in touch with other student activists who had participated in the demonstrations that had forced the state prime minister to resign a few months earlier. So I was very grateful to Kathwari. I later learned that because he had helped me, he got in trouble with the authorities. He belonged to a very politically active family--his father had been a member of the "Azad" Kashmir government which ruled the areas of the state held by Pakistan -- and because of his activities on my behalf he was expelled from Indian-held Kashmir and had to go to Pakistan. He stayed there only briefly and then managed to make his way--with some help from me--to the United States. After that, I lost contact with him.

But more than twenty years later, when I was ambassador to Bangladesh , I learned that the former student had become a very successful business man. Kathwari was by then the CEO of the Ethan Allen furniture company, one of the largest manufacturers and retailers of furniture in the United States. In one of the negotiations that Ethan Allen had with the Department of State on the sale of furniture for use in embassies and overseas residences, Kathwari met John Condayan, then I believe a deputy assistant secretary of state for administrative affairs. During the course of the negotiations, Kathwari asked what ever happened to Howard Schaffer, whom he had known in Kashmir before his emigration to the United States. That led to our renewing our acquaintance, in 1985 or 1986.

I am convinced that had I not entered Kathwari's life and developed a mutual beneficial relationship, he would have remained in Kashmir, probably in the family's business, living a respectable life rather than attaining the multimillionaire, big businessman status he now enjoys in this country. It is a good example of the right thing happening for the wrong reason. We are now working together in the Kashmir Study Group that he has organized, and we see one another frequently both personally and professionally.

There was no question that while I was in Kashmir I was under close surveillance by the Indian intelligence services. I didn't allow that to bother me. Indeed, during one of my visits to Kashmir the bearers (servants) at the hotel would point out the security officers assigned to watch me. As far as I know, the government never took any action against any of my interlocutors other than Kathwari. I talked to anyone worth talking to--at least, those who were not in jail or otherwise detained. For example, I did not get to talk to Sheikh Abdullah, the famous "Lion of Kashmir" who had been deposed in 1953 and remained in jail in India proper. Both in Srinagar and, soon afterwards, in Jammu--where the government moves in winter time--I saw everyone I wanted to see without difficulties. That included the recently installed prime minister of the state, G. M. Sadiq, who represented the left wing of the ruling National Conference Party and had become New Delhi's man in Kashmir. The state's home minister, D.P. Dhar, who later became very important in the national government in the 1970s, facilitated my trip by car from Srinagar to Jammu--all plane service having been suspended because of bad weather. I remember writing my report in longhand in the railway retirement room in the station in Pathankot--the first town in the Punjab after leaving Kashmir which was then the northernmost point of the Indian Railways. When I got to New Delhi, I found out that Phillips Talbot, the assistant secretary for Near East and South Asian affairs, was in town. I made my report orally to him and to Ambassador Bowles. As I mentioned earlier, it was that report, which I had typed out in final version in my embassy office, that brought me to the (favorable) attention of the Washington authorities. It also raised my standing with Bowles.

I came away from my first and subsequent visits with a good deal of sympathy for the Kashmiris. The Muslim majority in the Valley of Kashmir feel a great sense of alienation from India. Most of them do not consider themselves Indians and refer to themselves as Kashmiris--not Indians. They feel they have been badly treated both politically and economically. In their view, they have not benefited from their connection with India. When they go south to look for work, they feel discriminated against--both as Kashmiris and as Muslims. Within Kashmir itself, even though they hold the reins of political power, many of the civil service positions are (or were before their flight from the state in the early 1990s) occupied by the minority Hindu community. Some of the Kashmiris are attracted towards Pakistan. The Indians were viewed as the power behind an authoritarian, corrupt regime that remained in power only because it did Delhi's bidding.

Despite the persistent Indian claim about pouring many resources into Kashmir, there was a widespread sentiment--which persists to this day--that much of the money was going into the deep pockets of Delhi's favorites, leaving precious little to the masses who needed the assistance. Major land reform had been implemented in the late 1940s and early 1950s, carried out by Sheikh Abdullah's government before it was forced out with the connivance of the Nehru government in 1953. Therefore by the 1960s, land distribution was much more equitable than was the case elsewhere in India. That was very important in Kashmir because it is essentially an agricultural area. Kashmiris are a small society. The Valley itself, which is the key to the Kashmir problem, is only 80 by 25 miles in size. The Valley profits not only from agriculture, but also from tourism, handicrafts and forest products. Despite the complaints, there were merchants in papier maché, carpets and the owners of house boats who were doing well. Nonetheless, these businessmen felt they were discriminated against by India. No efforts were made to build up a manufacturing base in Kashmir aside from traditional handicraft industries. The government viewed Kashmir as the end of the line, geographically, where it did not make economic sense to invest in production facilities. Furthermore, the transportation system between Kashmir and India was very primitive in the early 1960s. There were no rail lines from India proper either to Jammu in the south or the Valley in the north.

These geographic barriers almost forced the Kashmiris to develop their own culture--the Kashmiriyat. It was different from India and Pakistan. I concluded in my report that the Kashmiris, if given a choice between independence or integration with either Pakistan or India, would support independence if there were strong enough leadership which could articulate the people's desires. Many mentioned to me that they could foresee themselves as the "Switzerland of Asia" with friendly ties with both India and Pakistan. The international community, they said, would be quite prepared to spend large amounts of money for the development of such an independent state so relieved would it be to have been rid finally of the Kashmir problem.

I visited Kashmir officially several times after that first trip. I made it a point to go there twice a year. I retained the Kashmir portfolio even when I changed jobs in 1964 and became responsible for covering the national political scene focusing on the Congress Party. I never felt very optimistic about a solution being found for the Kashmir problem.

I served in India this first time during a major change in India-Pakistan relations. In 1965, the second India-Pakistan war broke out. This of course had a great impact on the Kashmir issue. The Pakistanis had triggered the war in order to win control of the Valley. If initially, I had entertained some dim hope for a resolution of the Kashmir problem - and surely had never been very optimistic-- after 1965 I saw no hope whatever. The Indian attitude was just too uncompromising. It had been manifested vividly in the U.S.- and British-sponsored negotiations between Pakistan and India following the Sino-Indian war, which took place in 1962 before I was given responsibility for following Kashmiri developments. The 1965 war made it clear, as the Indians stated, that Pakistan could not be allowed to win at the negotiation table what it could not win on the battlefield.

Punjab was another issue that I dealt with. It was interesting even in the early 1960s though the more dangerous aspect of the problem the Indian government confronted there did not arise until later, in the 1980s. In the mid-1960s there was a dissident group of Sikhs led by Tara Singh who wanted a separate state for themselves "within" India. They called their scheme "the Punjabi Suba" and periodically agitated for it by fasting and demonstrating. Many leaders and the more excitable of their followers were jailed from time to time. They were dealt with severely by the Indian authorities, who usually managed to keep them under control. Tara Singh, the longtime leader of the Akali Dal, the party that spearheaded the Punjabi Suba movement, was discredited when he broke his fast; he had promised to fast until a separate state was established or he died. He was succeeded by Fateh Singh. Fateh Singh was a very heavy set man. He too promised to fast and went even beyond that; pledging to immolate himself if India did not agree to the Punjabi Suba demand. This led me to follow Marshall Green in the punning department; I told London Times correspondent Neville Maxwell, "If Fateh Singh does that, the fat will be in the fire." He quoted that in his account, fortunately without attribution.

It must be noted that the loyalty of the Sikhs to India in the India-Pakistan war of 1965, despite blandishments from the Pakistanis, led the Indian government, then headed by Mrs. Gandhi, to agree in early 1966 to the creation of the Punjabi Suba they sought. This created a state within India in which the Sikhs were the majority--excluding to a large measure the areas occupied by the Hindu majority in the earlier undivided Indian Punjab state who spoke Hindi. This Hindu group took over the remainder of the undivided state's territory in a new state called Haryana. By the time I left India in 1967, the Punjab was not an issue any longer; the establishment of a new state had "resolved" the tensions. It was only much later that the problem arose again when a demand was raised for an independent Sikh state, separate from India.

So that issue had been resolved--apparently-- in 1966 by a reorganization of states in north-west India. Everyone seemed to be satisfied with these new arrangements. I left thinking that the solution to the Punjab issue had been found. The Hindus in the new Sikh- dominated Punjab might have been somewhat unhappy, but they had their own state--the newly formed Haryana where leadership was in the hands of Hindu agricultural castes--and domination of the Delhi municipal scene (in large measure by Hindus from Pakistan) as well. So I believed that that problem had been solved--very much unlike the Kashmir issue.

As I mentioned, my original assignment in addition to Kashmir was to cover the opposition and Delhi consular district politics. I had those duties for approximately one year. With the departure of my colleague in the domestic reporting unit of the political section, I took over responsibility for Parliament and the Congress Party--in other words, an overview of the national scene.

The opposition parties always welcomed me. They were interested in talking to American officials. We did not have any dealings with the Communist Party--a policy decision that had been made before my arrival that was just about engraved in stone in those Cold War years. To my knowledge, no one challenged that policy and it remained in effect throughout my tour and probably far beyond. We did see everyone else. I was the principal point of contact with these opposition parties, but I knew that CIA [Central Intelligence Agency] had its own sources within many of these groups, particularly those on the left of the political spectrum.

As I have mentioned, the opposition parties had been badly defeated in the 1962 elections--for the third straight time. But the Sino-Indian war, which broke out about six months after the elections--in late 1962--was a jarring event to Nehru's government. He lost a good deal of personal prestige; one of his closest confidants, Krishna Menon, who was the defense minister, was forced out of power. That did not bring many tears to our government which regarded Menon as the "enfant terrible" of India (a status he valued and advertised). These events gave new hope to the opposition. Their hopes were bolstered by victories in some important by-elections in which principal opposition leaders, defeated in the general election of 1962, beat the Congress nominees. So when I arrived in my job, I found the opposition parties much more vigorous and much more hopeful of the future than one might have expected from parties that had so few Parliamentary seats. None of these opposition parties had held power in any state since the victory of the Communist Party in Kerala in 1957. That government did not last very long. Forced out of office with Nehru's connivance, it was superseded by a non-communist regime supported by the national government.

It was different following the Congress Party because some of my superiors had contacts there and I shared the liaison with them. Congress was ruling the roost throughout the country when I came to New Delhi. The opposition was scattered around and what ever influence it might have had was exercised through the contacts of opposition parties and individual member of these parties with like-minded people in the Congress Party.

I am fairly sure that the embassy was surprised by the outbreak of the Sino-Indian border war in October 1962. I really don't know for certain because I did not have access to the more sensitive reporting. I was not very much involved in the embassy's work on this issue. As I mentioned, I became much more familiar with it when I was later assigned to the special unit which had been established to handle the military and security assistance which we provided after the beginning of the war.

It was clear, however that tension was building. Nehru had said, in a much quoted interview, that he was ordering the Army to throw the Chinese out of the disputed area. This area was south of the McMahon line, which the Indians maintained was the boundary between India and China. The Chinese did not recognize this British-drawn demarcation.

As I mentioned, after the war started, I was assigned to work for Economic Minister/AID Director C. Tyler Wood on a special task force handling military assistance. Essentially, we were to stay in touch with Indian authorities and with our military on security issues and later on Indian needs for assistance in expanding their military production facilities. We had had no security relationship with India before this time. We were not an arms supplier to India; we had no MAAG [Military Assistance Advisory Group]. A very few Indian military officers came to the U.S. for training, but that was minimal. In part, our position stemmed from the fact that we were allies of Pakistan.

My unit worked very closely with the Defense Attaché's office and then with a special group that was sent from Washington--the Office of the Defense Representative. I applauded the strengthening of our relationship with India and had no problem with the United States becoming involved with India's security. I thought it was the only thing we could do and I believe that all embassy personnel who were knowledgeable about the issue supported the new policy. There was some disagreement among both Indians and Americans about the extent to which our security relationship should go. As for responsibility for the Sino-Indian War, there was a universal belief among official Americans that the Chinese were the culprits. In this view, it was China that had invaded Indian territory. Whatever the Indians might have done to provoke this was brushed aside. Some people wondered to what extent the Indians would be willing to play a more helpful role in Southeast Asia, where Vietnam was beginning to loom large for American policymakers. In fact, the Indians confined their anti-Chinese and anti-Communist views to their Himalayan border with the Chinese. They did not see it in their interest to join in any kind of U.S.-led arrangement to contain communism in Southeast Asia.

One interesting result of the war was the changed attitude of the Indians toward the United States and its representatives in India. The Indians were grateful for our assistance, although I think that over time they became uncomfortable with the reliance on the United States that the new relationship entailed. But initially, they were extremely grateful and pleased that we didn't exert pressure on them to join a vigorous alliance with the United States. One factor which helped to abate the initial enthusiasm was our insistence that India engage Pakistan in a dialogue about Kashmir. A lot of Indians saw that as our taking advantage of their country when it was in dire straits and forcing them into something that they had rejected for many years; i.e. the surrender of Kashmir to Pakistan.

One other consequence of the war was the large increase in U.S. government officials in India. People in American uniforms were no longer an exception; there were lots of them. We arranged for special American military flights to carry weapons to areas threatened by the Chinese. I think we all experienced a much friendlier attitude on the part of the Indians toward Americans.

The Wood task force was designed to work with Indians to sort out what it was that the Indians needed. We civilians focused mostly on delivery of ordnance plants to give India a greater capacity to build its own weapons. I was selected because I indicated an interest; I thought that the work of the task force would be interesting, which in fact it was. This work lasted 3-4 months. I worked full time on it for that period. I thought its work was very useful and successful.

I think we did the only thing we could have done; we supplied weapons and military capacity. That was the right policy. I think we did expect more in return than the Indians were willing or could have delivered; they could or would not become one of our allies on global issues--or even on Asian issues. They had another foreign policy agenda; they did disappoint Bowles in their refusal to play a helpful role in Southeast Asia. I shared in that disappointment, although I don't think that I was surprised; in fact I don't think I spent much time thinking about the potential quid-pro-quo for our military assistance.

I don't remember Vietnam becoming a problem on a personal level. I was berated much less on the issue than I had expected during the 1961-67 period. By the time I left India, we were heavily involved in Vietnam--and had been for at least two years. Yet there were very few recriminations from my Indian contacts and friends. I did not normally raise the issue with them; discussion about Vietnam was held at more senior levels. No systematic effort was made to persuade Indian politicians of the virtues of our Southeast Asia policies. So I did not feel compelled to raise Vietnam and the Indian politicians rarely raised it with me--perhaps out of politeness, perhaps because of their insularity. Vietnam did not loom very large on their scope.

I was not at all surprised when the Kennedy administration tried to use its leverage after the Sino-Indian war to bring about a better India-Pakistan relationship--specifically, to try to bring about a resolution of dispute over Kashmir. We did try; we did sponsor bilateral discussion between the two countries--I think there were five sessions into 1963. But nothing came of this dialogue, which did not come as a surprise to me.

After six years in India, I came to like Indians on a personal level; that was especially true for some of the people with whom I have continuing contacts. There was, I think, a general difference of views about Indians between officers like me who dealt with political figures, and those who dealt essentially with the Ministry of External Affairs. We who dealt with political figures found the Indians we were in contact with much more congenial than did our colleagues who had to deal primarily with the Mandarins of the MEA. They were not then, by and large, a very congenial group; nor are they today. I built up good relationships with the politicians, most of whom were older than I. I tried to get the junior officers, when they rotated into the political section, to make and maintain contacts with the younger politicians. I thought that system would be useful in carrying out our objectives and would also be enjoyable both for our junior officers as well as for their Indian contacts.

I covered the national political scene for about three years (1964-67). I was meeting on a regular basis--breakfast, morning tea, afternoon tea, dinner--with about 100 members of parliament. These included some very important figures. They would call me sometimes and sometimes I would initiate the contact. It was a wonderful series of relationships. There were some who would come to chat with me on a regular basis--particularly on a Friday evening. I was basically interested in finding out what was going on and reporting it to my bosses and Washington.

I was well regarded by Bowles and Joseph N. "Jerry" Greene, the DCM, for the contacts I had made and maintained. By the end of my tour, I had a vast knowledge of and insight into the Indian political scene. People used to tell me that for someone of my rank, I had achieved great influence in the embassy's front office. I had no way to judge the merits of those comments, but I think my views were carefully considered by my bosses. I think it is fair to say that I probably had more influence in the embassy than my rank (FSO-4) and title (second secretary) would have suggested. It was useful to have an ambassador like Bowles who was more concerned with the capabilities of officers than their rank and titles.

No discussion about Bowles is complete without some reference to the people who worked for him. As I mentioned in my book about him (Chester Bowles: New Dealer in the Cold War, Harvard University Press, 1993), the staff was quite remarkable. Basically there were two elements. They initially eyed each other with some suspicion, but soon came to work very well. Bowles had his own group--as he always had had in prior positions. These were people primarily recruited from outside the government but it included one Foreign Service officer--Brandon Grove--who achieved considerable success in his career. Other people in the inner circle included Richard Celeste--a future governor and now himself ambassador to India, and Doug Bennet--later AID administrator and NPR chief. There were others who had been part of Bowles's entourage in earlier incarnations. Bowles had a great knack for recruiting people. Many of his immediate staff had been prominent in their chosen professions, but nevertheless left their jobs to join Bowles. The best example is John P. Lewis, who had been a member of the Council of Economic Advisors. At Bowles's urging, he agreed to come to Delhi as chief of the AID Mission.

The only common denominator among the people in the inner circle was their intelligence. Otherwise they were a disparate lot. But they all believed in the importance of India and of Indo-U.S. relations, and were enthusiastic about the opportunity the embassy had to play a meaningful role. In their view, the embassy had to be a major player in fashioning U.S. policy towards India in accordance with Bowles's concepts, as well as in influencing the Indians to follow policies along the same lines. Without that commitment, no one in the embassy, neither this “Chet Set” (as I nicknamed them) or anybody else, had any hope of winning Bowles’s confidence.

In my book, I included a long passage on Svetlana Stalin’s 1967 defection; I should say that I was not aware of her presence in the embassy and in fact did not find out about her defection until she was well on her way out of India. Her presence in the embassy was held very closely. She arrived one evening and was gone in less than eight hours. Word did not spread, in part helped by the fact that the embassy was closed, it being after working hours when she arrived. She had taken advantage of a reception which was being held in the Soviet embassy right down the street from us to slip over to our chancery. during the night she left on a plane to Rome. I did piece it all together later for my book, using reports and interviews of those who had been involved.

My book also discusses Indian domestic politics at some length and I will not repeat the comments I made there. But I should note that those politics changed markedly during my six-year tour. Those six years encompassed the Sino-Indian war, which had a profound effect on Indian politics, by significantly weakening Nehru’s position; Nehru’s death--May, 1964; the 19-month government of Prime Minister Lal Bahadur Shastri and his death after the India-Pakistan war of 1965; Mrs. Indira Gandhi’s assumption of power; and the serious defeats suffered by the Congress Party in the general election of 1967, when it for the first time lost power in many of the states. All this provided much room for analysis of the changing nature of Indian politics which was carefully read in Washington. I was asked to extend my tour in Delhi so that I could cover the 1967 election--which helps explain why I had such a long tour in India.

During my last two years in India, as I have mentioned, I was assigned responsibility for coverage of the Congress Party and the national political scene. I was able to maintain a very close relationship with Indian politicians which was possible for a second secretary of the U.S. embassy to do in those days. It was quite remarkable how available the politicians were and, in some cases, how interested they seemed in developing a warm, trusting relationship with a member of the political section of the American embassy. Some of these politicians were pro-Western and welcomed contact with the embassy for policy and ideological reasons. Some saw such contacts as a way to bolster their own egos--it meant something to them because they saw themselves--and I assume that they made sure that others saw them-- as major and continuing contacts with American diplomats. Some undoubtedly viewed such contacts as profitable--not in monetary terms, but as a source of little favors - visas, getting embassy officers to bring back small items for them from the States after home leave, etc. (Few western goods were available in India in those days.) Some may have viewed the contact as a potential basis for obtaining grants to visit the U.S. Others just found it interesting to talk politics with a well informed outsider. Of course, some of them also recognized that I could be a valuable source of information about Indian politics for “them.” So there were many different motives, but I want to stress that the key element making this kind of close and extensive relations possible was the remarkable openness of Indian politics in the mid-1960s and later. So there was an interest in foreign representatives; for different reasons, as I’ve mentioned, and politicians saw such contacts as useful, important and in often enjoyable. They were quite prepared to see me and even to invite me to some of their functions--although most of the invitations to social events came from me.

In some respects, these contacts were heady stuff for a second secretary; in other ways they were not. My predecessors had enjoyed this access, so that I was not pioneering anything new--except on the Kashmir issue. I was simply assuming a portfolio ably handled by my immediate predecessors, Craig Baxter and Albert "Pete" Lakeland. But these contacts, which I developed and maintained assiduously, gave me an importance in the embassy hierarchy that was unusual for someone of my rank--at least that was what I was told. So my work gave a cachet, and at the same time, access to the front office, which was very interested in my analyses of the political situation as drawn from my conversations with various Parliamentarians. I would be used by some of the embassy senior officers to make contacts with these MPs, sometimes to set up a meeting and at other times to convey messages back and forth. So I think my work did raise me above the level that second secretaries usually reach.

I loved my tour in India. With the exception of my subsequent ambassadorship, it was the best job I had ever had--including the tour as chief of the political section in Delhi which I had ten years later. Looking back now that I have retired, I can say that I enjoyed my assignment to the political section from 1963 to 1967 more than any other non-ambassadorial jobs I had in my career. It was an exciting time to be in India. I felt that I was given important tasks. I knew that I was considered an important cog in the embassy machinery--after having caught the ambassador's eye. I took the job with great seriousness, worked very long hours very cheerfully, and enjoyed what I was doing immensely.

I was constantly on the move. My days would often start with breakfast with an important politician, followed by teas in morning and afternoon--rarely did we have business lunches since parliament did not take a mid-day break. And then dinner with one or more of my contacts. I figured that I was regularly seeing about 100 members of the Parliament--roughly 12-15% of the members. It was unusual experience for a young officer and as I said, I enjoyed every minute of it.

I developed bonds with a number of the politicians which hold even today after more than thirty years. When I go back to India, I manage to talk to a number of these old friends. These bonds allowed me to get "inside" stories about important events. Even before I inherited the national portfolio, I had contacts which allowed me to monitor Nehru's health in the period after his stroke--January 1964-- leading up to his death in May 1964. One of my fondest memories is about a high level meeting which I was asked to attend. The ambassador turned to the station chief and asked for an updated report on Nehru's health. The station chief said, "You better ask Howie. His information is better than anyone else's!"

In light of my subsequent career, I should talk at this juncture about our relationships with our embassy in Karachi, Pakistan. The relationship between the two embassies was very poor at the highest level. Each embassy took the side of its host government. It was one of the most egregious cases of clientitis that I ever encountered in my years in the service. Indeed, it was possible with very little imagination for us in New Delhi to write a telegram that would mimic a message that might be sent about a current development in India-Pakistan relations by our colleagues at the embassy in Karachi. In addition to these divergent views on substance, embassy-to-embassy relationship was not helped by the greatly divergent personalities of the two ambassadors--Bowles and Ambassador to Pakistan Walter P. McCaughy during one period and then Bowles and Eugene Locke afterwards. Bowles and McConaughy had known each other in Washington; Bowles thought that McConaughy's foreign policy views were outdated. To Bowles's mind, they resembled the hard Cold War ideas propagated in the 1950s by Secretary John Foster Dulles. Gene Locke, who succeeded McConaughy in 1966, was a political appointee, a wealthy Texan who was a personal friend of President Johnson. His appointment as ambassador to Pakistan turned out to be a way station for Locke; he moved on in 1967 to be deputy to Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker in Saigon.

I recall vividly the stop-over in New Delhi which Ambassador and Mrs. Locke made on their way to East Pakistan. They came to the residence, dressed to the nines in their most expensive clothing, probably straight out of Neiman-Marcus. Bowles, for his part, was wearing his usual loose bush shirt. Mrs. Bowles, as I recall, was dressed in a particularly sloppy sari and sandals--if she had any footwear on at all. The contrast in dress symbolized for me and others the different planes on which the two ambassadors and their spouses operated; their styles were of course also reflected in their embassy's operations and the different ways official Americans related to Indians and Pakistanis in those days.

At my level we had good relations with our counterparts in Karachi. We tried to institute reciprocal visits. In light of my portfolio, I didn't get very much involved in the Karachi-Delhi relationships because I was assigned to cover Indian domestic politics. On one occasion, in 1964, following my visit to Kashmir, I stopped at Karachi on my way back to the United States on home leave to brief the embassy there on my findings in Srinagar and Jammu. I stayed with Don Gelber, with whom I had studied Hindustani at the FSI and with whom I had developed a good personal relationship.

The higher embassy officers, although having good personal relationships with their counterparts in the other embassy, tended to reflect the views of their host government--perhaps not as much as the ambassadors did. By that I mean that they favored U.S. policies that would better Washington's relations with their host governments and paid rather little attention to the impact these policies would have on American ties with the other country.

Bowles was a great believer in meetings that brought together senior U.S. representatives in the region. He had his own ideas about who should be invited to these sessions. He tried as he did in many other ways to break out of bureaucratic rigidities which he felt tied his hands for no valid reason. For example, he invited representative from our embassies in Southeast Asia as well as from the South Asian missions. The meetings were quite useful, but I think for the development of a consistent U.S. policy, it would have been better had there been more exchanges between senior level embassy staffs from Karachi and New Delhi. To the best of my recollection, Bowles never went to Pakistan during this second tour as ambassador. (He had gone there during his 1951-53 ambassadorship.) He should have. He had very decided and negative views on the importance of Pakistan and the value of a close relationship between the U.S. and Pakistan. He might have reexamined these more critically if he had been exposed to Pakistani views.

Of course, all this came to a climax with the India-Pakistan war, which was a disaster for our relations with both countries and led to a prolonged period during which we placed South Asia much lower on our foreign policy agenda than we had before.

Working for Bowles was a rare experience. I think his style had an impact on me. I took his emphasis on informality very much to heart. There was also a marked interest on Bowles' part in encouraging junior staff to learn what the embassy was doing on important matters about which lower-ranking officers at most other embassies are often kept unaware. For example, he had them invited to attend larger meetings where major policy issues were discussed and argued over. In Bowles' days, Embassy New Delhi was a very open operation and I tried to emulate its approach when I reached senior positions. I think such an open atmosphere is helpful to both an embassy's leadership and the junior staff. This approach was operational outside office hours as well. Bowles extended the contact with the junior staff to social occasions, inviting many of them to the Residence for dinners and receptions. This gave them an opportunity to expand their social contacts beyond what might have been expected under a "normal" ambassador. It thus gave them a better understanding of India and of Indo-U.S. relations.

Bowles was a great believer in getting to know India. It was a very important feature of his leadership. He believed that it was extremely important for embassy staff to get out of New Delhi and into the countryside. That goal was clear during both of Bowles' tours. He pushed this policy so far that on official trips outside of Delhi, the U.S. government would pay for the travel of the officer's wife. He firmly fought against R&R (rest and recuperation) leave, arguing that if a staff member felt the need to get away from his post, he could do so without leaving India. He tried to facilitate that. As a result, in the six years I was in Delhi, I never left the sub-continent except for home leave in 1964 and participation at a seminar in Hong Kong in 1966 (when I also visited a number of countries in Southeast Asia). I spent all of my vacations in India or in neighboring countries such as Sri Lanka and Nepal.

I think Bowles, for all of his emphasis on India, was remiss in not learning more about the country. He had a vision of India and would quite easily overlook those aspects of life which did not fit his predetermined outlook both about current conditions and future prospects. In my book, I mention that in all of the years Bowles was in India, he never visited places such as Benares, which were the epitome of conservative Indian Hindu society and culture. He didn't want to know about that aspect of Indian life; it was distasteful to him. He would visit factories, dams--the signs of modernization. It was a remarkable performance which led many to believe that he was a font of knowledge about India--having spent so much time there and having given so much time and thought to the country. But Bowles's knowledge was selective; there were whole areas of Indian life about which he knew little or nothing.

Bowles was not interested in a dialogue with people like myself who might have brought him information which did not fit his preordained views. He felt uncomfortable when people would bring up ideas about India which did not match his. He really didn't want to hear them; so the staff learned quickly that it was not a good idea to initiate a conversation which might have led to some differing views.

My India tour was my first experience in a highly structured society--the caste system. I learned about it and accepted the situation as it was. I obviously had some regrets that things were as they were and always hoped that this societal rigidities might slowly evolve into a more modern society--a better break for the lower castes. But my focus during these six years was on the job I had to do--analysis of the Indian political scene as it affected U.S. interests. I met people from different caste groups of course. It would have been impossible for me to have done my job properly without doing so, though the participation of lower caste groups in Indian politics was much less significant then than it later became. I would discuss the Indian societal system with my contacts at times. I always knew what caste my interlocutor belonged to because that was important in enabling me to do my job right. But I didn't spend much time worrying about the defects and problems of Indian society. It is also true that if you live in India for any period of time, you come to terms with its societal structure and after a while you stop even noticing it--seems strange, but it is true.

After a while, you don't really see the poverty of the country; it just becomes part of the scenery. There was only one exception, at least for me, and that was Calcutta. It didn't make any difference how often I visited that city; it always seemed dreadful. There were some who were not upset by the Calcutta scene; that was particularly true for people who lived there. I always felt that Calcutta was a terrible place to visit, but not bad to live in--the direct opposite of the old saying about New York City. Bengali society is a wonderful, exciting society once you come to know it and are accepted by it. Calcutta is a very active city--culturally, politically, economically. It offers a broad and exciting range of intellectual life; it is filled with interesting, flamboyant, warm-hearted people. But outsiders have an entirely different reaction. They never really become acquainted with the attractive features of Calcutta and are greatly turned off by what they do see in their brief times there. But, as I said, with the exception of Calcutta, I had no significant negative reaction to what I saw and experienced in India.

There was a very good relationship between the embassy's political section and the political officers at the consulates general. I was considered responsible for that liaison and for the coordination of reports which the CGs used to send directly to Washington (with a copy to us). I made a special effort to stay in touch with my colleagues in the CGs; we would have meetings in Delhi supplemented by visits by me to the three posts. Also, the Congress Party--and sometimes other parties as well--would have meetings in different parts of India. I would attend those meetings accompanied by the political officer who covered the area where the meetings were taking place. These meetings and joint efforts helped develop a warm relationships among the political officers in India that was very useful in many ways.

I would from time to time ask these officers to assess certain issues which were important to the national scene. I also asked them to maintain contact with parliamentarians from their consular districts. I would get suggestions from our political officers about which MP's were worth my meeting with in New Delhi. This enabled us to maintain contacts with these key parliamentarians both in New Delhi and in their home districts.

One of our consuls general--Albert Franklin in Madras--was a rather strange guy. He didn't much like this arrangement because he felt that his autonomy was being challenged, but he lived with it. Information flowed very freely among us; we were constantly communicating with each other. We did not use telephones very much in those days. Connections were usually bad, and it took a major effort to make a long distance call. But I had very good feed-back from the consulates general and I was confident they felt the same way about the embassy.

Let me turn now to the 1965 Indo-Pakistan war. A few days before hostilities broke out, it was relatively clear that a chain of events had been set in motion and that there was little chance of avoiding a collision. But before that, I was surprised that tension had risen so high. The first episode took place on August 5 when Pakistani infiltrators entered the Indian-held portions of Kashmir. Some date the war itself from September 1, when the Pakistan Army moved across the boundary which separates Pakistan proper from the Indian-held portion of Kashmir. Some say it began on September 6, when the Indian Army invaded West Pakistan.

But I think it is fair to say that had someone asked me in July whether war would break out between the two countries, I would probably have replied in the negative. By mid-August, it had become increasingly clear that relations were going downhill in a hurry and that there would be a major confrontation.

When hostilities broke out, I was put in charge of organizing teams which were sent to the border areas to alert Americans living there about the situation and to encourage them to evacuate southward. We were prepared to house them temporarily in New Delhi while the conflict was taking place in Kashmir and the Punjab. We had had a warden system--that is, a system which used one American to keep track of several of his compatriots in a pyramid structure, but it had grown rather rusty. Bowles was not interested in activating the system lest we be accused of expecting war; he in fact forbade us to update the wardens' list. So we did not in mid-1965 have as good a list as we should have had. Thus we were painfully aware that we did not have a good enough handle on where American citizens were living in India. Nevertheless, we sent these teams out and that was a memorable experience.

I arrived at the border town of Amritsar the day after the Indians crossed into West Pakistan. I must have been one of the last foreigners to get through. Soon after I arrived, there was a Pakistani air raid. I went further north along the border, urging Americans to evacuate. I had sent embassy officers to other areas to do the same. The area I covered was only a few minutes from Pakistan by air. I got to one town which was the home to a number of missionaries. It turned out that they had been in China a few years earlier and had been forced to leave when the Communists took over. They told me that they appreciated my efforts to insure their safety, but they had been booted out of China already and were not prepared to leave their flock behind a second time. Since they were obviously quite prepared to ignore their peril, I wished them good luck and moved on.

I think in fact missionaries were the major part of the American community along the border. There were also some people who had American citizenship which they had acquired by birth in the United States or residence there, but they were ethnic Indians and were essentially part of the Indian community, not foreigners. The border areas were essentially not economically developed, at least not by large-scale industry, and therefore did not attract the kind of investments which would have brought many more Americans to the area.

Like everyone else, I remember where I was when Kennedy was assassinated. Since it was in the middle of the night in India, I was home asleep. My servants, who heard the news, chose not to wake me up. So I learned of that tragic event from the front pages of the Indian newspapers. It was a terrible shock--to me and all Americans. It was a terrible loss to the Indians because Kennedy, as I mentioned earlier, had become an almost heroic figure in India. There were many Indian hovels which had a picture of Kennedy hanging from their earth walls.

When the news of JFK's death permeated throughout India, there was an enormous outpouring of grief. We had extensive lines of people waiting to sign the condolence book. The attendance at the memorial service was remarkable. People came to me almost in tears; the death really gripped the soul of India. Bowles happened to be in the U.S. when Kennedy was assassinated. He returned almost immediately and I believe he attended the memorial service which took place three days later--on a Monday. I remember the embassy staff working all week-end long sending out invitations. Of course, the tragedy was accentuated by the absence of information about the perpetrator(s); we knew almost nothing about what was going on in Dallas--these were the days before CNN. The news that Jack Ruby had murdered Oswald came as a bolt out of the blue. At one point, while working on the invitation, some of us just burst into hysterical laughter over nothing--we were so tense and so distraught that we lost our composure.

The memorial service was quite remarkable. It followed a special session of the Indian Parliament called to commemorate JFK and to mourn his death. Nehru spoke quite eloquently. The memorial service was held in front of the chancery, on a large stone plinth, where seats were set up.

The event had an interesting consequence. The Communist Party of India was at that time badly divided following strong disagreement about India's position toward Communist China in the wake of the Sino-Indian war. The pro-Moscow wing of the Party decided to attend the memorial service. It was, after all, a period of U.S.-Soviet detente. The other, more radical wing chose not to attend. The question of attendance at JFK's memorial service became one of the factors that led to the break up of the party a few months later.

The Indian reaction to JFK's assassination was quite different from that for example that was manifested after the Martin Luther King murder. The Indians, in general, accepted that the president had been killed by a single deranged man; they did not believe in the "plot" theories. I think they probably compared the JFK assassination to Gandhi's. After King, we had riots in the U.S. Then the Indians began to worry about the conditions in the U.S.; they had the same reaction when Bobby Kennedy was assassinated. They wondered about the stability of our country as well as its culture.

I think that the 1961-67 period was important in India. It witnessed both the high-water mark for U.S. involvement in South Asia as well as a quite sudden cooling off of our interest to the point that our major concern in India became economic development and famine relief. By the time I left, the possibility of India playing a useful political role in the sub-continent which might have assisted the U.S. in achieving its global goals was relegated to the dustbin.

Let me make a couple of additional points. The first, which I stress in my book, was that Bowles was a remarkable man in making his staff feel that it was part of a great enterprise--that they were engaged in something really important in India. The importance of this management style really came home to me when I returned to India ten years later to find that instead of being very much caught up in what was going on and feeling they were engaged in history-making, the current staff viewed New Delhi as just another assignment. That was surely not the case for most of us who served under Chester Bowles.

There is a story which I want on the record, which I did not include in my book because it seemed so frivolous. It is an interesting tale because it illustrates clearly Bowles' approach and management style. One day, he held one of his periodic large meetings attended by many embassy staffers. He was to be in the chair--that was somewhat unusual because most often these sessions were led by other staff members. The topic for this meeting was "New Look in South Asia"--a typical Bowlesian theme. After his presentation, Bowles opened the meeting to questions and comments. After many issues were discussed, the session ended. As I was leaving the room, one of my colleagues--I think it was Nick Veliotis--turned to me and said, "Same old new look!" It was typical Bowles; he had a certain, unchanging vision of India and how it could be helped and improved, which he tried very much to promote with his staff (and everyone else). Nothing could shake it. He did make us feel that India was important, but I don't believe that his vision became the guiding light for many of the staff. Very few of us shared his idea of how tremendously important Indo-U.S. relations were.

I might mention another meeting that also illustrates Bowles' leadership style. The ambassador was from time to time upset with some of his political officers. He was unhappy with the reporting that was being sent to Washington--largely because it was quite negative. Things were not going very well and we reported what we observed as accurately as possible. But Bowles was nonetheless unhappy. He sometimes used the line that one can regard a glass as half-empty or half-full. To encourage us to change our negative ways, he proclaimed at a staff meeting that he had not brought us to India to write history but to make it. He wanted his embassy to be actively involved--and not just be detached observers reporting on developments (particularly when they did not fit his vision of how India should progress). Again, Nick had a comment, "Yes, the ambassador has said that he brought us out here not to write history, but to make it. But he left out one word. What he should have said was, 'I have not brought you out here to write history but to make it up.'"

Q: In 1967, you returned to Washington to become the desk officer for India. First, tell us a little about the NEA Bureau at the time.

SCHAFFER: There was a deputy assistant secretary--William Handley-- in charge of South Asia who reported to Lucius "Luke" Battle--the assistant secretary. Handley had been a USIA officer. Below Bill were two country directors - L. Douglas Heck who was responsible for India, Nepal and Ceylon--NEA/INC-- and James W. Spain who was responsible for Pakistan and Afghanistan. I don't remember including an assignment to the India desk in my list of desired onward assignments. I must admit that I was not sufficiently aware at this stage of the workings of the personnel system. To my regret, I had spent 10 out of my first 11 years in the Foreign Service overseas--the one year in Washington being language training. When I returned from India, I was somewhat disappointed by the NEA assignment; I thought it was pretty far down the bureaucratic chain for an FSO-3. I had been promoted during my last year in New Delhi. I recognized that I had to spend a tour in Washington; in fact at that stage I had no interest in serving anywhere else. I wanted to stay in Washington both for professional and personal reasons.

Of course, I had culture shock when I began to work in the Department. This was driven primarily by the marked change of my position in the bureaucracy. In New Delhi, I had access to the front office and felt that I was an important cog in the machine--I had a unique position. In the NEA Bureau, I was the junior political officer of the two assigned to NEA/INC; I was the low man on the totem pole. My colleague was Carleton Coon--later our ambassador to Nepal.

I performed a variety of political work--contact with other parts of U.S. government on our programs in India, some political analysis, drafting messages for the signature of senior officers, and perhaps most important, the care and feeding of Chester Bowles who was our ambassador for my two year tour on the desk. That was a difficult assignment because Bowles had a predilection for writing long messages about India, always singing the same tune--i.e. the importance of India to the United States. His messages were generally ignored in Washington. So our challenge was to keep the "Old Man" happy in light of Washington's attitude his own continual exhortations to do more for India--a policy which did not find favor with the Johnson administration.

India's less consequential position in Washington goes back to 1965, when the India-Pakistan war was taking place. The Washington bureaucracy dealing with India- as well as those who were only marginally involved but in positions of influence -- became disillusioned with India. They concluded that neither Pakistan or India could be of real help to us in meeting our global objectives. India was too consumed with its struggle with Pakistan to play a global role, especially in our drive to contain communism in South East Asia. Bowles would not accept this view and eventually was almost the sole petitioner for India. He became somewhat of a "nag;" his messages became increasingly tiresome, repeating over and over and over again the same themes. It was up to us to brush him off-- in a nice way. Let me illustrate. Bowles would send a fifteen-page message to the secretary of state--Dean Rusk. Some one in the secretary's office would highlight a few sentences; we assumed that Rusk read them. In the meantime, we on the desk would prepare a warm response--to Chet from Dean. Invariably, the message expressed appreciation to Bowles for the fine job he was doing. It might also have touched on other matters. But it never responded to the substance of Bowles' message. In other words, it was a warm, dignified brush-off. This was sad since we all knew that Bowles spent a lot of time preparing these lengthy messages. But he seemed to be reasonably satisfied with the pleasantries he was getting back from Washington. We never tried to suggest to the DCM or the political counselor that these messages were not well received; we knew that Bowles would continue to send them in.

I think Bowles was realistic enough to know that he was not affecting the policy-making process--at least not in the way that he wished. The big mystery was why he stayed in India. The answer, I think, was that his options were not that promising. So he stayed on, ineffectually, suffering increasingly from the ravages of Parkinson's, receiving anodyne answers to his messages. But he never wavered in his position. It was a sad ending to an exciting career.

I certainly sympathized with the Washington view that India was not the most important country on earth. I did not think that India could play the role that Bowles continued to envision for it. I think that is was very evident, judging from the way India behaved under Mrs. Gandhi's leadership, that India would not be helpful to us in Vietnam nor in our general interest in stemming the spread of communism in Asia--with the exception of the Himalayas, where India was interested in receiving whatever assistance we could provide to thwart the Chinese.

To the best of my knowledge, Bowles did not use the phone--partly because the connections in those days were something less than satisfactory. Making a phone call from India was akin to an heroic act. That was a blessing for us. Furthermore, and most importantly, Bowles was suffering from Parkinson's disease by this time. It was my responsibility as the officer in charge of taking care of Bowles to make certain that every month he got a supply of "L-DOPA"--an experimental drug being tested at the time for the control of Parkinson's. This was somewhat difficult and Bowles became increasingly nervous as the time grew near when he needed to replenish his supply but no shipment had yet arrived. It seemed to me, in retrospect, that I spent a lot of time on the phone to the supplier of "L-DOPA" in New York to ascertain that timely delivery would be made to New Delhi as required. I don't think Bowles was ever left without, but he was understandably troubled as his supplies dwindled each month. The drug had a temporary positive effect, but eventually proved to be of little use in controlling the disease.

Bowles would return to the U.S. from time to time on consultations. When he was in Washington he would make the rounds seeing friends and other high ranking officials. Those were sad moments because it was becoming increasingly difficult for Bowles to get around--Parkinson's had effected his motor capabilities. It was so sad to see this wonderful old man moving ever so slowly with what he called his "snow shoe" shuffle through the long halls of the Rayburn building and other edifices. He still had access to everyone he wanted to see. He never lost such access, even to those who may have disagreed with him. Bowles was able to see anyone he wanted to, including President Johnson.

My tour on the desk was during a period of relatively calm relations between India and Pakistan. We had no intra-bureau tensions stemming from issues on the sub-continent. The situation in Pakistan changed as demonstrators took to the streets both in East and West Pakistan against President Ayub Khan. In 1969, Ayub was forced from power and was replaced by General Agha Mohammed Yahya Khan. In India the focus was primarily on domestic political infighting with Mrs. Gandhi successfully battling her opponents in the Congress Party. In light of the situation on the sub-continent, we severely downgraded our relations with both India and Pakistan.

Despite the low place of India and Pakistan on the U.S. foreign policy agenda, Luke Battle gave us more time than most NEA assistant secretaries had previously devoted to South Asia. This was due to the fact that in the summer of 1968, a meeting was held in New Delhi between India and the U.S. at relatively senior levels. Our delegation was led by Under Secretary Nicholas Katzenbach; Luke was part of the delegation. That meant that Battle had to prepare himself and learn much more about India than he might have otherwise done. So I think we got enough senior attention. I think that the deputy and office directors--Heck, Spain, and Handley--had good access to the front office; so that if we ever needed the assistant secretary, it was easy enough to get the problem before him.

One of my last tasks on the desk was to prepare Kenneth Keating for his ambassadorship to India. I found him to be rather vain. I think he would have preferred to go to Israel, where he eventually was assigned after India. He considered himself God's gift to women. I and others felt that Keating believed that his masculine charms would be very useful to him in dealing with Prime Minister Gandhi. In fact, those charms did not prove useful at all. Keating had a very difficult and distant relationship with the Indian prime minister; there was no way that he could charm the sari off her. He had a very well developed self-esteem and self-importance. I did not escort him on his calls in Washington as he prepared himself for New Delhi. In his preparation for his assignment, he was assisted primarily by the officer who had replaced Carleton Coon--Grant Mouser. That particular personnel shift was somewhat of a disappointment to me as I had hoped to move up into Coon's position.

In the same vein, in light of my imminent departure from the desk, I participated only a little in the preparations for President Nixon's trip to India in the summer of 1969. I probably worked on some papers, but I certainly was not deeply immersed in that activity. As I recall, that trip was scheduled on rather short notice. Nixon decided to stop in India and Pakistan after the moon-landing-splashdown in the Pacific.

I did participate quite fully in a trip taken by Indian Foreign Minister Dinesh Singh, who visited the United States in May 1969. The whole trip came about in an interesting way. During an encounter a few months earlier, Secretary Rogers had mentioned to Dinesh Singh that he hoped that whenever it was convenient the minister would come to the United States. Singh took that as a firm invitation. We discovered that Rogers was perfectly happy to receive Dinesh Singh, but that there were no funds available to pay for such a trip. I did manage to squeeze out a USIA leader grant for the foreign minister. I was very proud of that achievement. But then we got word that the minister's wife was planning to join her husband on his trip to the U.S. That raised a further question about what we could do for her. I figured that having dipped into the USIA's account once, it was worthwhile to try to do so again.

I said that I understood that Mrs. Dinesh Singh was an important personage in her own right. She had indeed shown great concern for development of vocational training for disadvantaged young women in the Lucknow area in the Singhs' home state. In fact, I had no idea what Mrs. Dinesh Singh had done, what her interests were or anything much about her. We did know that she was a woman of some importance in India, but I did not know what professional or charitable interests, if any, she might have had. But I sent a message to New Delhi saying that it was my recollection that Mrs. Dinesh Singh was an important person and that I had some recollection of her showing considerable interest in vocational training. Just as I hoped, a message came back from the embassy stating that indeed my recollection was accurate. That was adequate justification for USIA to issue another grant so that both Mr. and Mrs. Dinesh Singh were able to come to the U.S. on leader grants.

But there's more to the story. A couple of months later, in connection with Nixon's visit, CIA prepared biographic information on all the leaders and their spouses whom the president was likely to encounter in India. I read the material, which included a sketch of Mrs. Dinesh Singh. Sure enough, she was described as "a personage in her own right who for many years had taken an interest in vocational training for disadvantaged young women in the Lucknow area." That may still be part of her biographic profile; I think she will forever be known for her alleged work in vocational training. So are myths made!! And so do desk officers function!

My first experience with the Washington bureaucracy was of course quite instructive. The most important lesson I learned was that the Department's strongest asset was its knowledge of foreign areas. It was important that State officials have recent experience in the area in which they worked in Washington--as I had had. It enabled me and others to battle other agencies more successfully. Many agencies were involved in India, starting of course with AID, in those days. The fact that I had such a long tour in India and knew many of the personalities quite well was an important asset for me as it would be for any desk officer who had transferred directly from a country to its Washington desk.

I was terribly frustrated by the Washington bureaucracy. I was totally unfamiliar with the Washington tribal customs. Eventually, I got the hang of it. Even after as large an embassy as ours in New Delhi, the vastness of the Washington scene is culture shock. I had had no idea about the number of people who had to pass on everything I wrote. I was particularly bothered by the clearance process--a system which invariably strikes officers new to Washington as extremely frustrating and is a distraction to anyone working in the bureaucracy.

I was told that once there was a contest called "The Clearance of the Month." The prize went to that drafting officer who could get his cable out with the most clearances. One month, it was won by an officer who drafted a message on food aid for India and included in the clearance section the acronym for the State Department cafeteria. He then got one of the ladies who served the food to initial next to the acronym. That added to his score!!!

Our assistance program for India was still considerable in the late 1960s--particularly food aid. Although the worst part of the 1965 and 1966 famine and the relief efforts that it prompted were in the past, assistance was a major element in U.S.-India relations. With the downgrading in Washington of political relations between the two countries as a result of India's unwillingness to play an international role helpful to us, our economic interest in India came to dominate the overall relationship from the U.S. viewpoint. Economic assistance was our principal tool in our efforts to convince the Indians to reform their socialistic policies and liberalize their economy. I had no problem with this thrust, although I did come around to believing that the whole AID program in India was misconceived. Instead of improving relations between the two countries, the assistance we provided became an unhealthy element. The Indians are a proud people; they thought they knew what they were doing--they could have been wrong, but not in their own minds. They did not feel that they needed the constant advice that we were dishing out--certainly not to the extent that some of our active AID zealots (and Bowles) believed warranted.

The donor-recipient relationship is always difficult; In the Indian case, given their views of themselves and their role in the world, it was bound to cause some friction. For example, in retrospect, I question whether John Lewis' presence in India as AID director was entirely desirable. John was very much involved; he believed that he could open useful dialogues with the Indians. He may have managed to do that to some extent, but it fostered an unhealthy relationship. I also came to the conclusion that the aid program in India was far too large given the returns that we were receiving. The size of the program stimulated misplaced hopes on our side and a feeling of dependency on India's part. Neither aspect was helpful in developing a sound relationship between the two countries. But my views, as a desk officer, were of little consequence; I usually did not get involved in the issue of assistance levels.

I did get involved when Mrs. Gandhi would sound off on U.S. policy anywhere on the globe, as she did most famously about Southeast Asia after the 1966 devaluation of the rupee had put her on the defensive about American influence on her government. We tried to explain away her negative comments or took other defensive measures because we wanted to continue a large assistance program to India. I thought that this was not a very healthy policy on our part. But I did find myself, as the desk officer, defending India against attacks from one part of the bureaucracy or another. That was my job: I tried to explain why India did not take as helpful a role as we wanted in both its domestic economic policy and on foreign affairs issues.

We always had some struggles with AID. They had a huge bureaucracy. I think they danced to their own drummer, resisting any efforts by the Department to influence the nature and direction of their programs. We had jurisdictional problems and other bureaucratic problems which often made for a difficult relationship. They wanted to throw their weight around.

In retrospect, my tour as India desk officer took place during a fairly quiet time in U.S.-India relations--despite the Nixon and Dinesh Singh visits. Nothing very important either in the political or economic sphere transpired during those two years.

TERRELL E. ARNOLD
Calcutta (1962-1964)

A native of West Virginia, Mr. Arnold served in the US Navy in World War II and in the Korean War. He was educated at Champlain College, Stanford University and San Jose College. Entering the Foreign Service in 1959 he served in Egypt, India, Ceylon (Deputy Chief of Mission), Philippines, Brazil (Sao Paulo as Consul General) and at the State Department in Washington. From 1983 to 1985 Mr. Arnold served as Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Counterterrorism. Mr. Arnold was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2000.

Q: So then in '61 what happened?

ARNOLD: Well, it was time to move on - two years, you know, for junior officers. They sent us to Calcutta.

Q: From one teeny place to another teeny place.

ARNOLD: Actually Cairo was very good preparation for Calcutta. Yvonne and I became very fond of Calcutta. Marvelous place to live, terrible place to visit, is the way we summed it up. If you lived there, you adjusted to its circumstances and you knew what to do and how to do it. You could live quite comfortably and safely in health terms. We were never threatened by anybody, but health was always at risk if we didn't pay attention. That was the big difference. Cairo, heaven knows, was filthy on the ground, but it was dry, dry, dry, and the moist environment of the monsoonal region of India is a different matter. We got acquainted with it. We learned to live there. We had a marvelous time.

Q: You were there from '61 to...

ARNOLD: Well, the beginning of '62 to '64, because we took home leave in between.

Q: What was your job in Calcutta?

ARNOLD: Again the junior economic officer, but a different situation in that staffing changed. The senior economic officer eventually was Roy Atherton, and the Consul General was Bill Baxter. Bill decided he needed a deputy more than he needed a senior economic officer, so he moved Roy up front, and I became the economic section, which again was great fun. It was a very different economic situation, of course, much lower level of economic development but an enormously diverse and busy economy.

Q: How were relations between India and the United States during this period, and what was the political situation in India?

ARNOLD: The relationship was good between us and India at that time. Radhakrishnan was President, and Nehru was Prime Minister. There was again evidence of competition between us and the Russians for big projects, and the big project that I competed around was iron and steel, whether or not the United States would build the next basic steel plant in India or whether the Russians would do it.

Q: There already was the Tata plant.

ARNOLD: Yes, the JRD Tata plant in Jamshedpur. That was a privately owned Indian steel plant, a very good little operation as a matter of fact. I became very fond of the Tata family. Spent time there, visited with them, walked through the plant, could go back and forth as necessary to do my study of the steel situation. I also went to the iron ore producing areas associated with that plant, all of that. That was part of my education for purposes of whether or not the United States would do the next steel plant. We didn't. The Russians did at Bhilai in the region south of New Delhi. Hard to say how much of a success it was. They did end up making steel there, and they're still making steel there. But the Indian economy did not take off with anything like the speed that we imagined. I think that on this issue we were unsophisticated. I don't think that our leadership back here, especially the Congress, and the public, had any sense at all of how long it takes to transform an economy. We were not even detached enough to look closely at how long it had taken us to get where we were. So we expected miracles and we expected quick results, and when we didn't get quick results, we refused to adjust our expectations. That's where we've been ever since. We don't know how to do this. We don't have the patience for it. Our Congress doesn't have the stomach for it.

Q: What were we doing in the Calcutta area? What were our interests and what were we doing?

ARNOLD: Well, as I found out also in the Philippines, we were interested in food production. We were looking closely at the steel plant possibility. We were looking at promoting trade. I spent a fair amount of time on tour with traditional trades of eastern India; one was tea and the other was jute, and we were very interested in those. There were Boston-based companies in both jute and tea. Ludlow was a Boston-based firm in jute (burlap to most people). Of course, the major tea companies were all involved in one degree or another, ours and the British mainly.

Q: The Indians until really very recently have been going through a period of sort of being self sustained.

ARNOLD: Yes, they have. They were onto that. Very necessary from the point of view of what they could afford to do, and philosophically they wanted to do it. India structurally, philosophically, religiously, economically was more complicated than Egypt could ever be. Of course, it's enormously larger, culturally and linguistically much more diverse. But if you look at the class structure of India and then look at the sub-cultures other than Hindi, such as the Marwari, the Sikhs, the Parsi, you found groups of enormous wealth and power in that country. The political leadership these groups may not have had, but the power behind the scenes they had on a grand scale. The economy and the culture were more complicated by far than the Egyptian situation and, if the Indians chose, they were capable of marshaling resources to do things.

Q: Was this a place where America could sell things?

ARNOLD: Oh, yes. We sold a fair amount of stuff. In fact, we did and do sell fairly actively in India.

Q: I want to talk about this '62-'64 period.

ARNOLD: There was a small, by comparison to now, middle class. The middle class of India today is probably as big as ours in absolute numbers, but it's a much larger society. It was coming along. There was a growing market for a wide range of goods and services. I think it flowered probably more significantly after we left there, however. I've been back a number of times. Some things in my visits have not really changed for the better. I have a pattern that I like to repeat every time I go to New Delhi, and the last time I did that was in the late '80s. I get up first thing in the morning before dawn - I mean five o'clock - and take a taxi down into old Delhi and get out of the taxi and walk around and smell the place, sense the place. I did that over a period of two decades in frequent visits. In these visits there hasn't been much change or improvement in old Delhi. The rest of the country may have been going places, but the bazaar was pretty friendly and I'd go down there to test the breezes.

Q: Did we have projects, sort of AID type projects, going in India at the time?

ARNOLD: We were trying. We had an AID mission, a fairly large AID mission in Delhi, no AID officers associated with Consulate General Calcutta, in fact I was it. That was one of my side portfolios. It was kind of fun as well. We were doing a fair amount in agriculture, and we were looking closely at iron and steel. We were looking at the promotion of industrial activity. We were still in that phase when we thought long-term developmental change occurred through a fairly sizable infrastructure project. We had not yet concluded that all we needed to do was feed the poor. That is where we are now, and it makes us feel good, but it merely serves biological survival needs, not development or growth. We don't have the patience for infrastructure and other big developmental stuff. We don't have the political stamina for the budgets involved. In a very crude sense, our political cycles are too short for this kind of long term development.

Q: How did you find the Bengali intellectual elite there? Were they interested in the United States? It's quite a self-enclosed area, great ferment and all that.

ARNOLD: The Bengali sort of separated himself from the rest of India. Oh, they were quite accessible as people, quite accessible socially. So were all of the others. The ones who probably were the least accessible were the Marwari. I knew them professionally. I knew the managers of those companies that are all parts of the old East India Company that the Marwari had slowly taken over. They were running tea and jute and everything else. I could see them at that level of professional encounter but very seldom if ever saw any of them socially. But the Parsi were very open; so were the Punjabis, as well as the wealthier, more educated Hindi families, and the Bengalis. It's a genuine melting pot, Calcutta, a complex melting pot.

Q: I've never been there, but I'm told that one can get overwhelmed by the poverty that you see in the streets and all that. Was this difficult to deal with?

ARNOLD: Very. The first morning in Calcutta, Yvonne and I arrived on PanAm, which was the way to get in there, at five in the morning. We landed at Dum Dum Airport, went through customs and out to a waiting Consulate car. Our driver took us on a trip from Dum Dum (the famous dum dum bullets were made nearby) along Chitteranjan Boulevard to Chowringee Road in the business and tourist heart of Calcutta. As we drove toward the city in the semi darkness, the first impression all the way along that boulevard was of gray to black objects on the sidewalk all over the place. As we moved toward the city, it became lighter and I began to see what was happening. What we were seeing was an enormous street population that was just waking up. That image of the drive to the airport never changed, except that it got worse. Those images took some adjusting to, and the sheer closeness of people took some accommodation.

Americans, I think particularly, are not prepared spiritually to deal with this kind of proximity. Some other societies manage it quite well. As one sociologist put it, making an opportunity out of a disadvantage, recognizing that you can't avoid getting or being close, how do you make a positive thing of proximity? We didn't live too terribly well until we got accustomed to it. You have to fend people off on the street. They get close, they slap you with their hands, not necessarily with malice or anger, and you just have to learn to live with that. We learned to accommodate it. We had a great assignment, because we learned to live in India, but you had to reach a modus vivendi with extreme poverty and crowding. The most pervasive quality of India was poverty. Poverty there is as extreme as it is anywhere in the world, and you can only fix a little piece of it. You can't fix it all. There was not a family I knew there that didn't involve itself some way in trying to alleviate the suffering on the street.

One of our favorite people was Mother Theresa. She had her mission, and we helped her with time and with donations and with our support. One of our consular officers, Frank Collins - I replaced Frank, as a matter of fact - was very much affected by Mother Theresa, and he decided that the Church ought to pay attention, should be aware of and should recognize the work that Mother Theresa was doing in her mission. He developed and carried the papers back to the Vatican when he left Calcutta to initiate the process of getting her order recognized and confirmed as an order in the Catholic Church. It was a remarkable kind of accomplishment that probably few people even know about. But there was only one way to approach this problem. You had to recognize that the poverty was deep, abiding, and that you did not have either enough spiritual, physical or financial resources to beat it. But then you had to do what you could; and if you did that, then you could be at peace.

Q: You were saying you didn't have the time to penetrate the Raj?

ARNOLD: Or the know how to plug into that infrastructure. The period was virtually the last of the Raj, but the Raj was complex. It was British, it was American, it was French, it was German, it was an expatriate community of some size that sort of in and around, socialized and consorted with the Indian elites.

Q: Well now, with the Indian elites was there a different breed of cat than you'd find in New Delhi? You were dealing more with sort of the business community, you say, than with, say, the Indian bureaucracy, government bureaucracy?

ARNOLD: I had dealings with the Bengali bureaucracy, not terribly satisfactory but not in any way hostile. It was just that I could never find exactly who had the handle on a given problem. One marvelous moment: I went to call on a local minister, a Bengali government minister, to raise an aviation issue when we (meaning Pan Am) were changing our routes through Calcutta. I went into his office and sat down, and he was, of course, very traditional, white cotton dhoti clad (in lieu of trousers), long open shirt outside of his dhoti. He occupied an office that was probably 14 feet high and ten by twelve feet. All four walls were filled with shelves, and all the shelves were filled with files. Virtually half of the files, ranging randomly from floor to ceiling, had red urgent stickers on them. That's the picture. I'm sure that's changed a great deal at least in parts of the country, because some of the best software programmers in the business come out of Bangalore today.

Q: During this period, if I'm correct, you had the Indo-China War up in the Himalayas. Did that impact on you at all?

ARNOLD: It affected the economy particularly, because the tea growing areas were close to the conflict zone. I pursued the same custom in India that I pursued in Egypt, which was presume that I could go anywhere I wanted to go if I just asked. So I went to the heads of the tea trading houses, and this is how I really became acquainted with the Marwari.

Q: The Marwari, what is this?

ARNOLD: This is a cultural, social group, religious sect, very wealthy. It's the business class of India, very rich and very standoffish but accessible at least professionally, I found, with a little help. So I went to them and said, "You know, I have tea as one of my accounts here in the Consulate General. I would like to go visit some of the major tea estates." And they said, "Okay, we will set up an itinerary and we will open the doors for you. You manage to get yourself and your wife - and it is important to take your wife - up there, but we will take care of you when you get there." So we did a series of estates, the first one on the south side of the Brahmaputra River. Naya Gogra, the estate was named, and it was run by an educated Naga tribe member - his name was Nag, as a matter of fact. He ran a Boy Scout troop of young Nagas and used them to demonstrate tribal dances for us. This estate was fairly small, but it was making tea by the then current machine process called Crush-Tear-Curl or CTC. That meant the tea leaves were broken up by machine, then fermented, dried, graded, and packaged. The second estate was a very traditional estate making tea by the hand rolling the leaves, fermenting, drying, grading and packaging. This process yielded the finest, slow brewing tea that is the top of the market, if you are a tea lover. The third, fourth and fifth estates were much larger and very modern, using the current generation CTC machines and a crude but effective grading device called a Java Tunnel. For this, bins were arranged along a tunnel, a powerful fan was placed at one end of the tunnel, crude tea was poured in the wind and blown along the tunnel, falling into bins in accordance with its weight. The stuff that falls at the far end of the tunnel is dust that we Americans get as tea bags.

When we were on the fifth of these tea estates, the Chinese came across the frontier, right off to the north of the Raj Guri Ali, which is the traditional King's Highway between Assam and the Northeast Frontier Area. The Chinese were not far away, because we heard the cannons going off up in the ridges as they began firing. Needless to say, we cut our tea travels short, and the estate manager sent us out of the area on his estate mail plane - my wife riding on the luggage behind the pilot. We were scheduled to go to Darjeeling for a visit, because that's big, important tea country up there, and we did get to Darjeeling. We had a brief glimpse of Mount Everest across the shoulder of the intervening mountain called Katchenjunga, but the Consulate said that it was time for us to come back. The Indian Government was canceling all commercial flights, but we got down off the mountain (Darjeeling is close to 8,000 feet above the plains) and onto the last passenger flight to Calcutta.

Back in Calcutta, the Consulate was suddenly called upon to assist an airlift, supporting the U.S. Air Force and Army ground troops in bringing supplies to India for the NEFA campaign. Diplomatic life is filled with the unexpected, and our airlift had some interesting sidelights. My secretary was a Parsi, Purveen Manekshah, and her uncle was General Sam Manekshah, who was head of the Indian Army, and therefore running the campaign in NEFA. Sam was a very accessible, very presentable, very knowledgeable, English speaking, Sandhurst trained military officer. We were invited often to Purveen's home, and had the opportunity to sit and talk with Sam about what was going on in NEFA. We were bringing in large quantities of military supplies. At that time we were using two facilities that went out of existence not too long after that. One was Chateau Rouge in France, which we lost when DeGaulle pulled France out of NATO. The other was Wheelus Air Force Base in Libya.

Q: All places to get kicked out of.

ARNOLD: Different time, different place, you know, but I remember our communicators coming in and setting up and creating their long log periodic antennas lined up so they could talk to Wheelus. A very interesting little sidelight on that experience: We were doing a good job of bringing in C130 loads of small military supplies. You have to remember that this was right in the middle of the Cuban Missile Crisis, so the fact that we had resources to devote to India's NEFA problem, was a mark of the way we viewed the Indian relationship. That they turned to us is a mark of the relationship as well.

For us the NEFA campaign then took a novel turn. While Yvonne and I had been in Assam we had visited the Kasiranga game preserve. Kasiranga is famous for being the last refuge of the two-horned rhino, the Indian two-horned rhino. The Indians contacted us shortly after that at the Consulate and said they would like to give us a mother rhino named Depali and a young offspring named Rajkumar. We got in touch with the National Zoo, and the National Zoo said they would love to have them but they didn't know how to get them home. We then approached the Air Force and asked, "Can you handle delivery of two rhinos for the National Zoo," and they said, "Yes, of course. We're flying back empty. This is no big deal." So we contacted the Alipore Zoo in Calcutta and began to arrange the transfer. We visited the zoo to meet Depali and Rajkumar, the baby, and he was teething at the time. I let him have my arm up to the elbow to suck on. Thanks to the Air Force we were able to pull it off. The crew of a C130 rechristened their plane Noah's Aerial Ark. Once the decision was made, the Indian wildlife authorities had a host of critters they wanted to give us, I mean birds and other specimens, so the two rhinos and a whole planeload of wildlife left Calcutta for the National Zoo.

Q: Did you talk to the pilots?

ARNOLD: Oh yes. They thought it was the most fun they'd had in a long time. Lear Grimmer was the deputy director of the National Zoo at that time, and you wouldn't know Lear Grimmer from Adam. He was the brother of Mitch Miller - remember Sing Along? Well, Lear came out and escorted his charges back to the United States, and Depali and Rajkumar were brought to the National Zoo. Depali did not survive terribly long after that, but Rajkumar surprisingly is still there. That certainly was an unexpected consequence of the Chinese invasion, because I have no idea how this move could have been made without the Air Force.

Q: After that support there, were doors opened more than they had been?

ARNOLD: Not for us in Calcutta. I think they probably were in Delhi, because we had been a real practical support to Indian authorities at that time, and their military people knew it quite well. But that would not have had the same effect on us in Calcutta as it would have had in New Delhi.

Q: Bangladesh, East Pakistan...

ARNOLD: That was still East Pakistan.

Q: How was that considered from your perspective? Were we concerned about it?

ARNOLD: Well, it was obviously less stable and poorer, if that's possible, than West Bengal. How this was going to sort itself out was a puzzlement to us, because East Bengal and Pakistan had very little in common, and as it developed ultimately, they didn't develop very much in time and didn't stay together. That was a peculiar accident of expatriate decision making about geography. This was not a local decision by any means, and it didn't ultimately make much sense. People from East Pakistan came over to Calcutta for R&R, so, you know, uphill is defined by where you start.

Q: I remember I used to see people getting R&R from Afghanistan coming to Dhahran.

ARNOLD: There you go, probably a sizable step forward. Actually we were perfectly comfortable in Calcutta and didn't find New Delhi all that appealing.

Q: What was the Bengali attitude that you were finding towards both the Congress Party and New Delhi and all?

ARNOLD: To be sure, the Congress Party was there very much, but the Bengalis were pretty standoffish. They wanted to do their own thing pretty much, and Bengali leadership was reasonably smart, I would say, in these terms but more with the Congress Party than separate from it. Nehru came for, I think, a very popular visit while we were there, and we were able to meet him and sit on the platform with him when he made a speech to the Bengali people. He was well received. Back in those days security around a person like that was very light, not even visible. Things have changed. With people who walk up to Indian leaders with bombs strapped to their bodies—we now live in a much, much different time and place. Calcutta was another fun assignment.

Q: Well, it sounds like it.

ARNOLD: We're running two out of two at the moment.

Q: Then in '64 whither?

ALFRED LEROY ATHERTON, JR.
Economic Officer
Calcutta (1962-1965)

Ambassador Alfred Leroy Atherton, Jr. was born in Pennsylvania and raised in Pennsylvania and Massachusetts. He received a bachelor's degree from Harvard University and served in the U.S. Army during World War II. He joined the Foreign Service in 1947. Ambassador Atherton's career included positions in Stuttgart, Bonn, Damascus, Aleppo, Calcutta, and Washington, DC, and an ambassadorship to Egypt. This interview was conducted in 1990.

ATHERTON: Then the fantasy had to end. And so we, having got ourselves thoroughly exhausted by going around and visiting friends and not taking time to get over our jet lag, got on a plane and got even more jet-lagged flying to India.

Arrived in Calcutta and plunged in. I was replacing an officer named Tom Hocter for a contact transfer, which in those days was more possible than it is now. So I was able to spend the first week or two understudying the man whose job I was taking. It was a two-officer section, and the junior officer was Terry Arnold, with whom we have kept in touch almost ever since. It was a big Consulate General. There was a Consul General, and he had a Deputy whose only job was being deputy, named Bruce Butties. We got there just as Consul General Bill Baxter's predecessor, Gordon Mattison, was having his farewells.

We got there just in time to go through a round of farewell parties for Gordon Mattison, which is one way to meet a lot of people in a hurry. It was also quite an introduction to the social life of Calcutta. We discovered that, although the British had been long gone, the British customs stayed behind. Almost every evening there was a black-tie affair.

We arrived there in August, maybe early September; it was still part of the very hot season, and air conditioning was not as widespread in those days as it has become. We were put up, temporarily, in a small residential hotel near the Consulate, which had no air conditioning. I can remember the first evening, getting into my black tie and being soaked through by the time I walked out the door to go to the reception at one of the clubs, a farewell for Gordon Mattison.

We stayed for maybe a couple of weeks in the hotel until the Hocters left. And then we were able to move into the apartment that had been their apartment (it was assigned housing) and began to do the usual things. Where do the kids go to school? Where do you shop? I was getting oriented to the office, but the family was getting oriented to the whole new life from their point of view. The job was, well, to put it mildly, all very new to me, and I was very lucky to have overlapped with Tom Hocter, but even more lucky to have Terry Arnold as the number two officer, who had been there for some time, and who was a better economist than I, even though I had just had a year of economic training, and who already had developed quite a network of contacts.

So I was able to plug into the world that I would be mostly dealing with, which was the business world and the state government's economic departments that had responsibility for food distribution and other matters of special interest to the United States.

There was a big AID program in India in those days. We had a program shipping grain to India. We had technical assistance projects throughout our consular district. Because the embassy in Delhi was so far away and the AID mission was so far away, a lot of the monitoring of these projects was done by consulate personnel going out around the consular district, sometimes with visiting AID officials.

The consular district, of course, was enormous. Everything in India is enormous. We had a consular district of 125 million people, counting the states of West Bengal, Orissa, and Bihar, and a couple of the smaller tribal states that bordered what was then still East Pakistan on the north, running up to the foothills of the Himalayas. And the problem was, in the first instance, to get acquainted with the consular district and with who the key actors were in the economic life of the area. It was a very complex economic system in the Calcutta consular district.

Calcutta itself is a port city, and it's a very large, traditional commercial city. Calcutta was the capital of British India for a long time, and almost all the communities of India are represented in Calcutta.

It's Bengal, the language is Bengali, but there is a large Marwari community, a large Maharashtran community, a large Punjabi community. They all pretty much led their own communal lives, but at the top there was social intermingling.

And there were large merchant houses. The British were still very big in the business world. So it was still a very important city from the point of view of commerce and trade.

But the consular district also included what was basically the Ruhr Valley or the Pittsburgh of India. The heavy industry is largely in that part of India, the steel factories, heavy-machinery factories.

We had to learn about and analyze the Indian attempt to pattern their economy to some extent on the Soviet model. They had five-year plans. They had physical production quotas. They had public-sector heavy industry, steel plants and a very large heavy-machinery plant, where they manufactured machinery to make machines, and there were a couple of older private-sector steel plants nearby, too. So one could compare the performance of public and private sectors. In most cases, the private plants were the more efficient. We had a good chance to observe an attempt to superimpose a Soviet model on an economy that had been, before that, much more free enterprising.

Q: Where actually was this? In Calcutta?

ATHERTON: No. The steel complex, the heavy-industrial complex, is in Durgapur, which is north of Calcutta. And one of the oldest steel plants in the country was the private-sector plant, Tata Iron and Steel. The Tatas were an enormous economic factor in India, with interests in heavy industry, airlines, hotels. They are a part of the small Farsi community, centered largely in Bombay, the Farsis came originally from Iran. They were not more than 100,000 people or so when we were in India, but they were an enormous factor in the economy of the country. They were enterprising entrepreneurs, capitalists.

Q: I've heard them described as the Jews of India.

ATHERTON: I think that is more often applied, frankly, to the Marwari community than to the Farsis. The Marwaris are the merchants, the bankers, the traders. They also were well represented in Calcutta.

It was not a melting pot, because they all kept their separate communities, but it was a place to get to know all of India without ever leaving the consular district.

We did a lot of traveling. We did try to get to know the rest of the consular district. We had a certain schedule of required economic reports that had to be done. A lot of the legwork was done by very able Indian employees of the Consulate, but obviously I was responsible ultimately for the final reports, and I felt I had to have first hand knowledge and to make my own judgements. And so we did a lot of traveling out of Calcutta.

Again, on-the-job training. Most of what I've learned in the Foreign Service has been on-the-job training. Not school training, not even formal training courses, and, except for that year at Berkeley, not even in-service training.

I had a good teacher in Terry Arnold and learned a lot, in a very short time, about how this complex economy worked in the public and private sectors, the commercial, industrial, and food sectors.

Of course, in India, that's the key. If you had a bad monsoon year, you had a food shortage. They had terrible memories of earlier famines, of people dying on the streets of Calcutta back in the '40s. No democratically elected government could let that happen, so they had to be sure they had plenty of food in reserve, and U.S. wheat in particular. PL 480 was a major source for financing Indian food reserves. Because Calcutta was a port, a lot of these grain shipments came into the storage areas in Calcutta. One of our jobs was to keep an eye on this and make sure that it was properly stored. It was mostly a job for AID, but the Consulate was very much used as a sort of extension of AID to do a lot of things that AID people couldn't always come down from Delhi to do. And we would frequently do some of the field surveys on their behalf. We would also go to the inauguration of small AID projects.

The AID program gave us a lot of entree. It opened doors into circles that we might not otherwise have been able to penetrate. And, of course, being a believer in the inseparability of politics and economics, I not only did the necessary economic reporting and analysis, but also was able to get a handle on what were in some respects political as well as economic issues.

West Bengal was extraordinary in this respect. It had its very traditional wealthy class. It also had one of the best-organized, most effective Communist parties in India. While the Congress Party dominated, there was a very active Communist opposition in the West Bengal parliament. In the Indian federal system, the local government has considerable authority. Jyoti Basu, who was the head of the Communist Party, a very able politician and a very charismatic street politician, did eventually become the Chief Minister. But in our days the Chief Ministers were Congress Party politicians.

I had been in the Foreign Service by that time -- '47 to '62 -- 15 years, and three of my posts had been consular posts: Stuttgart first, then Aleppo, and then Calcutta. The only traditional Embassy I had ever served in was Damascus. Bonn was a High Commission in transition from occupation to Embassy. So I never served at an Embassy again until I went to Cairo as Ambassador. But already, in Calcutta, I was on my third consular post. It was a consular post that did everything, because we had such a large district, and we were so far from Delhi.

The consulates in India in those days were like little embassies, really. I can remember one visit by Ambassador Galbraith to Calcutta when I was there. He was replaced in mid-term by Chester Bowles. I can remember only one visit by Chester Bowles to Calcutta. Ambassadors in Delhi didn't much like to go to Calcutta. And so we really were quite autonomous in many ways. Our substantive reporting went directly to Washington, with copies to the Embassy. We didn't have to filter things through the Embassy.

But there were some events during our time which were national events and not just local. The very first thing that happened, literally in the very first weeks of our tour in Calcutta, was the sudden and unexpected invasion by China of the Indian northeastern provinces. The Chinese came across the border into our consular district, in effect. We got there in late summer, and it was fall of '62 when this sudden, out of nowhere, Chinese invasion came across the border. They poured down into the eastern part of West Bengal, and nobody quite knew where they were going to stop. The Indians asked for help, and the U.S. government saw a chance, with very strong recommendations from Ambassador Galbraith, to increase our stock with the Indian government. We were in a period when the Soviets were seen as the special friend of the Indians. But it was to us they turned for emergency military supplies following this invasion.

It was assumed that the airlift, bringing in emergency military supplies, would go to Delhi. But somebody looked at the map and realized that the closest place to unload military supplies for an invasion coming into the upper part of West Bengal was Calcutta.

So Dum Dum Airport was suddenly converted from a civilian airport to receive an airlift of American military supplies, on very short notice. And the Consulate was the only official American institution on the spot to help put this together. So our job suddenly became, in these very early weeks, organizing communications between the airport and the Consulate and the Consulate and Delhi, finding accommodations, liaison with the Indian military command, to whom these supplies were to be turned over.

I think, considering that we were not a very large number of people involved in this, we did remarkably well in helping get the airlift organized. Basically, it was the responsibility of the American and Indian military, but we were the people who helped build the system they could take over, the infrastructure, if you will, communications and all. The Indians then took the equipment and transshipped it at the airport to their own transport planes and off to the front.

Q: I'm curious, what was the pretext for the invasion?

ATHERTON: Well, you know, it's kind of lost in history, but there have always been border disputes over where the border lies between China and India up in the Himalayas. My recollection is that the Indians had been asserting, by forward patrols, their claims to the border being where they said it was. And the Chinese, from their perception, thought the Indians were trespassing on Chinese territory. At least the theory at the time (and I must admit it's been a long time since I've thought about this or even read about it) was that the Chinese decided that the Indians had to be taught a lesson.

There has always been enmity between China and India. There is a very strong enmity, which is one of the reasons why the Indians, I think, looked particularly to the Soviet Union. They felt the Soviets were a counterbalance to the Chinese threat. They've always seen China as the real threat to them in Asia. The Soviets were nearby, and the Soviets gave them military equipment and helped them economically. And they saw this as a way of balancing the Chinese threat. But it was interesting, it was nevertheless to the United States that they turned for emergency military supplies when the invasion came.

Well, the Chinese came quite a long way into India, as a matter of fact. And we suddenly found ourselves dealing with the problem of helping our military and the Indian military liaison and get the system working. Communications were incredibly primitive in just getting messages to Delhi and back. Telephones didn't work very well; we did not have high-speed radio transmission. It seemed forever, getting through to the Embassy and getting responses, to say nothing of the Department. I don't know that we had any direct classified telegraphic links at all with the Embassy or the Department. Our reporting was by despatch, pouch and courier. But somehow the airlift did get put together and worked.

Meanwhile we suddenly found ourselves facing an influx of American missionaries who had all been up in this area and had fled, or had been urged to leave, I guess. Technically, we decided on evacuation and got word out through the grapevine network that had been set up under the E&E plan that they should all come to Calcutta. And so there was an influx of American, mostly Baptist, missionaries, from way up in the tribal country of northern West Bengal and Assam, Tripura and Manipur, who had to be dealt with. Again, we did what you always do in situations like this, you mobilized the spouses. It's not considered very popular to say it any more, but it was two for the price of one.

Q: It's free labor.

ATHERTON: Free labor. So the Consul General's wife, and Betty, and Bruce Buttle's wife, and all of the ladies, and some of the men, too, consular officers, had to work out the logistics arrangements. Fortunately, there were missionary headquarters in Calcutta, and most of them could go to their own missions. They set up emergency sleeping quarters and pretty well took care of themselves, but we had to be there to backstop. We had to document them. We had to find out who was there. We had to make sure that we had a record of them, that nobody was missing in action, in effect.

Q: You didn't take a course in advance on how to do that.

ATHERTON: No, you just learn as you go. It's more on-the-job training. But we had quite an influx of evacuees, some of whom resented having been asked to evacuate. Some of them said, "We wanted to stay with our people, with our flocks." They felt that they had abandoned their little Christian communities to the Chinese, in effect. It was interesting, this reaction. Many of them were resentful that the U.S. government had asked them to evacuate. But who knows what would have happened to Americans in that area, given the state of U.S.-Chinese relations in those days, if they hadn't evacuated.

In the end, the Chinese left almost as quickly as they came. They didn't march on Calcutta, which some people were afraid might happen. They were pretty extended, and they had the Himalayas behind them. The Indians were in their own territory, so I think while the Indians were caught off guard militarily, they probably in the end could have held the line. But the Chinese did not stay. They had made a point, they had given the Indians a lesson. And then they withdrew as mysteriously as they came.

Q: A lesson learned.

ATHERTON: A lesson learned. But that was the introduction to the duties that are not in your job description at a Consulate. A Consulate that size, a large consular office by today's standards, could not have total divisions of labor. Everybody had to do some of everything. I can remember I took weekend duty officer duty and had to deal with the sailors off the American ships who got in jail, or who missed their sailings and came to the Consulate to be documented and financed to get back to their boats or back to their home ports. We all had our share of dealing with consular emergencies on the weekends or during the night.

We lived in a compound in an apartment building which was just a wall away from the Consulate building, and the Consul General's house was on the other side. So it was compound living, which was pretty much the custom in those days. You didn't have individual houses. So we had more than our share of emergency calls, being that close.

One of the other major things that occurred early in our tour there was the assassination of President Kennedy. It was the middle of the night in Calcutta when the Marine guard rang. I was the duty officer, I guess, or the Consul General was away. I can't remember why he called me. He called, and I vaguely remember Betty saying, "He's very tired, can't this wait until morning?"

And the Marine guard said, "Ma'am, tell him that the President of the United States has just been assassinated."

Well, that woke us all up. And we quickly organized all the things one has to do: get black-bordered stationery printed, arrange memorial services, and arrange a condolence book at the Consulate for people who'd want to come and sign. We were totally unprepared for the overwhelming reaction. We had the foresight to set up two condolence books. We thought one would be for VIPs and one for everybody else. And in no time at all there was a line of Indians going all the way around the block and into the next. It was incredible, the outpouring of sympathy.

Kennedy had caught the imagination of India. There was an upsurge of hope for better American-Indian relations. We were seen as doing a lot for them economically by that time. Galbraith had been quite a figure. He was the embodiment of the United States in India, and he was very visible. So there was a reservoir of good feeling there which came out in an expression of grief for the death of our President.

All kinds of people, from the humblest to the dignitaries, all got in this line. Very unIndian, normally, to have the castes mixing that way. We would go out and try to spot people we knew who were dignitaries, and say, "Won't you come up to the head of the line?" And many of them would say, "No, no, I'll wait my turn." Quite incredible.

So we had the period of official mourning and services for the American community. And then back to work after that was over.

I guess the next major event that overwhelmed the routine preoccupations of the Consulate must have been in '63 or '64 when there was suddenly an outbreak of the periodic communal violence between Hindus and Muslims.

This started over a story, which in the end I think proved not true, of the desecration of a mosque by Hindus in East Pakistan. Muslims in East Pakistan turned on the Hindus, so the Hindus in Calcutta turned on the Muslims. There were a lot of people killed and a lot of burnings of each other's communities.

This always happens to the poor. It was not in the well-to-do sections of the city. It was always in the slums and the poor sections.

None of it turned xenophobic, none of it turned anti-foreign or anti-Western. There was a curfew. We had passes, consular people who had to get out could get passes. Never did we feel threatened at all by this.

I can remember we had a cook who was actually Christian, but he lived down in one of the poorer sections of town, and he was afraid to go home one night after work. It was a Saturday, and he wanted to be home because he wanted to go to church the next morning. He was a very devout Catholic, originally from Goa. We did not have a car and driver, by the way, only the Consul General and the Deputy Principal Officer had their own drivers. But Betty got in our car and drove the cook home, through the part of town where stores were burning and people throwing stones. There was absolutely no hostility towards westerners, and she was able to deliver Peter to his quarters, where he felt safe, and drive back all alone to the Consulate.

In retrospect, one wonders, but it never occurred to us at the time that we were in danger. These were Indians killing Indians. And it never did turn anti-western in any sense of the word.

It was a typical sort of Indian explosion, convulsion you might almost say, of which India has seen many. This was nothing compared to the communal riots and massacres which followed partition. But it did lead to a new refugee problem. A lot of Hindus left East Pakistan, who had still stayed on there. In many cases, they were Biharis, not Bengalis. They came across and poured into the Calcutta area, adding to the already large street population. There were still refugees in Calcutta in those days, living in shanty towns around the railroad stations, which is where they ended up after the partition in 1947. Fifteen years later, you still had them there.

Q: No assimilation.

ATHERTON: Children had been born, and people had died, and they still were living in these lean-to shanty towns right around the railroad stations -- Howrah Station in particular, because that was the station that used to connect Calcutta with East Pakistan. And that's where a lot of the Hindus came from.

Q: One always hears of these beggars sleeping in the streets of Calcutta. Are these refugees?

ATHERTON: No, just poor people. A lot of the refugees in fact worked. They lived in shanty towns, but they weren't all unemployed. But you had a lot of people who did not have any place to sleep -- the homeless population. Nobody knew, they never took a census, but it was several hundred thousand, probably, maybe even half a million. You would see them huddled under blankets on cool winter nights, on the main thoroughfares around the big hotels. They would go off and do whatever they do during the daytime.

Very often, if they were able, they would work, and a lot of them were rickshaw pullers. This was the one place in the world, I think by then, where you still had man-pulled rickshaws. In most places, they had converted to bicycle rickshaws. But the man-pulled rickshaw, which had been brought originally to India by immigrants from China, still persisted in Calcutta. You could still go out and hire a rickshaw. When our cook would come back from the market and he had too many groceries to carry or bring on the bus, he would hire a rickshaw. He would always give my wife the accounting for what he had spent on the marketing, and every now and then on the bill there would be something that was all one word, and we finally figured out it said: "rickshawfar," in other words, rickshaw fare.

It was probably the city the most impossible to fix of any city I've ever seen. And yet it goes on. It had a pulsing economic life because of the industrial hinterland and because of commerce and the port. It was a very difficult port, a river port, not on the Bay of Bengal. It was on the Hooghly River, which was one of the distributaries of the Ganges Delta -- one of the outlets of the Ganges into the Bay of Bengal. But it had been a great port. It was still a large port, but there was a lot of silting. They were constantly dredging to keep the channels open so that large ships could get in and out. A very expensive port; turnaround time was very slow.

That was one of the reasons why we had so many problems with the seamen, because their ships would be in Calcutta Port for so long and they would get in trouble. There wasn't all that much to do except get drunk. So there would always be problems. You know, what do you do with a drunken sailor? They come to the American Consulate, if they don't go to jail.

Anyway, I'm getting off the story a bit. But the refugee problem was just compounded by this new influx of new refugees coming across from what was still then East Pakistan.

The next and final crisis of our tour of duty was in 1965, when there was one of the periodic outbreaks of warfare between India and Pakistan. This one was mostly in the east, so we were on the side of the country where most of the military action was, rather than in Kashmir and on the main border with West Pakistan.

We actually had a couple of air raid warnings around Calcutta. A lone Pakistani plane would come over, drop a couple of bombs. Usually they fell in the river. But there would be an air raid warning, and everybody would head for the totally inadequate air raid facilities, unless you happened to have one in your house. There were signs all over the place saying that in case of air raid take shelter in a pukka house. Pukka houses were the strong stone- or concrete-built houses and therefore presumably able to withstand shell fire or bomb concussion blasts more than the non-Pukka houses that were built of mud and were without foundation, and would collapse.

Anyway, this crisis came at a very inconvenient time for us. We had by then been in India three years, and we were coming to the end of our tour. We hadn't had home leave. We had opted for a three-year tour and then home leave and transfer. I had orders to report back to the Department, and we thought, well, we're going to do this right. We've got lots of leave time, and this will be the last chance for a long time for the family to take a boat trip. So we worked out elaborate arrangements, and got reservations for all of this, to go by train from Calcutta to Bombay on the Bombay Mail, the overnight sleeper which is really one of the luxury trains of India.

We traveled a lot in India by train and went by car some, too. Got to know the Indian system pretty well. We knew the south even better than the north, because our two sons went to boarding school in south India, in Kodaikanal, a hill station near Marudai. So every year in May, which was the worst month in Calcutta, we would spend the month at 7,000 feet in the hills in Kodaikanal. Betty and the children would. I couldn't go for that long at a time, but I would go down for part of the time.

Anyway, we decided we would take the Bombay Mail across to Bombay from Calcutta. We would embark on a British steamer coming from the Far East at Bombay, and from there up through the Suez Canal, and eventually to Italy. In Italy we could connect up with an American flagship, because we had to transfer to American flags at the nearest possible place, and that would have been Naples. We had this elaborate trip worked out to join either the Independence or the Constitution and sail from Naples to the States. It was going to take us several weeks. We knew the Department would say, "Well, part of that's leave," and we said, "that's fine." We had a lot of leave coming. It was all allowed under the travel regulations. It was a chance to get the family to rebind, because our two sons had been off at boarding school, and we hadn't been together as much as we would like to have been as a family.

Our daughter, by that time, incidentally, had been out to visit us, but she was in college in the States. I had gone back in '64 to sit on a selection board, and when I was there, met the young man she announced she was going to marry. The wedding was set for early October of 1965, and so our whole trip was timed so that we could get back to the States in time to be in Chicago for our daughter's wedding. And then, most inconveniently, the Indians and the Pakistanis went to war. And the decision was, I suppose rightly made, that they couldn't have people leaving the Consulate while there was a war on.

By then, incidentally, I was the number two at the Consulate, the Department having decided there was no need for a Deputy Principal Officer. That position was abolished, and it was decided the next senior person would also function as the Deputy and would be the Acting Consul General when the Consul General was away. And I was that person....I had just recalled that my tour in Calcutta was coming to an end. We had orders to go back to the States. We had elaborate plans for a long sea voyage by way of the Suez Canal and all of that. Then the war broke out between India and Pakistan, and all the people were frozen in place. We were standing by for the possibility of another evacuation of Americans.

So the first thing we did was to cancel the first leg of the trip, which would have been from Bombay through the Arabian and Red Seas and the Suez Canal and into the Mediterranean to Naples. But we tried to hold onto the second part, which was to have been from Italy back to the States. In the end, we had to cancel all of our plans and fly the whole way, with just a one-night stopover in London, because we had a deadline at the other end, namely our daughter's wedding in Chicago on the second of October. So we finally left, with no time to spare. And of course because of the Indo-Pak war flights had been rerouted. I think we went out on British Air. Normally they flew from Calcutta to Karachi and across that way, but because of the war, they had to reroute the flights. I think we had to go via the Persian Gulf, with a stop in Doha, and from there up across the Arabian Peninsula and eventually to London.

Q: Before you get out of India, what was your role during the Indo-Pak War there at the consulate in Calcutta?

ATHERTON: As it turned out, we didn't have much of a role. The war was far from the city, obviously. We had occasional air raid alerts, and a couple of Pak bombers actually did get across and drop a few bombs, as I recall, up the river from Calcutta. I don't recall that they ever did any serious damage.

But our job basically was to just be there in case there was a need to evacuate Americans. We didn't have any role in dealing with the Indians on this. This was all done through the embassy in Delhi. We reported, obviously, the attitudes of the people about the war from our consular district. We did try to keep Delhi and Washington informed of what the war looked like from the vantage point of Calcutta, and the Calcuttans and the Indians in this area thought about it.

Calcutta had a large Muslim population, and there was always concern that there would be Pakistani sympathizers in that area, so Indian security was tightened considerably, as I recall. But there was no immediate impact of the war on our lives, except that it froze us in place. We couldn't leave.

Perhaps our major contribution, ours being the consul general's and mine in particular, was to resist pressure from Washington to order the evacuation of Americans from various parts of the consular district.

Our reading was that it was not going to be the danger zone, that the war was not going to create that kind of a crisis situation. And as you know, once you've started evacuation, it's very hard to reverse. It takes on a life of its own, and you disrupt a lot of lives. A lot of these were not just the official Americans, they were the private American business community and missionaries. So we did take the position that we did not think evacuation was justified and, in effect, I think came very close to just being ordered by Washington to call for an evacuation. We took the position that this was a call for the people on the ground to make, who had a better feel than somebody sitting way back in Washington. I think, as I recall, that the embassy in Delhi supported us. They said they would take our judgment. Bill Hitchcock was then our Consul General, and he had a good standing in the embassy and a good reputation with the Department. He was a particular friend of Carol Laise, who was then I think the director of South Asian Affairs. And so we prevailed. We did not go through an evacuation. And it turned out that we were right. There had not been a need for it, and it would have been a great expense, and a great disruption, and probably created a lot of ill will among private Americans for panicking. And so, that's my main memory of that period, the resistance to the evacuation and the general sense that the war was somehow far away, and that it was not something we seemed to be terribly caught up in.

In any case, it didn't escalate, and eventually, after several attempts, I got approval from Washington to continue with my transfer.

BRUCE H. MILLEN
Labor Advisor
New Delhi (1962-1965)

Bruce H. Millen was born in Wisconsin and attended Northwestern University. Millen served in the military during World War II and joined the Foreign Service in 1950. Millen served as Labor Attaché in Rome, Oslo, New Delhi, and Ankara. Millen was interviewed by James F. Shea and Don R. Kienzle in 1993.

Kienzle: After Brookings, what did you do?

MILLEN: Then I went to India.

Kienzle: At some point you worked in NEA [Bureau of Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs, Department of State]?

MILLEN: That was between Wisconsin and Brookings.

Kienzle: Do you want to describe your duties as the Labor Advisor?

MILLEN: In NEA, I sometimes thought maybe I was the conscience of the organization. I did my best. I helped the Peace Corps get into the region, because I convinced everybody that I should sign off on all outgoing telegrams unless they involved a policy matter. This meant that about nine-tenths of all the bureaucratic chit-chat could go through without having to be cleared by all the [country desks]. In various ways I tried to make life easier for them. One of the higher ups wanted me to come to work for [the Peace Corps]. I said, "Look, I like the Peace Corps, but I don't like it as a 24 hour [a day] matter. It's going to be great for the Americans who go over. I'm not sure what the long term impact is going to be abroad, but I think it is a marvelous experience for those who participate. But that's not my life." I also warned my special contact about infiltration which lead to meetings between Director Shriver and Allen Dulles.

Kienzle: Were there other highlights of the NEA tour that you recall?

MILLEN: Oh, just the little petty stuff. Actually there were some friendly people there. Some of the people on the India desk were really great: Wes Adams. He was a very liberal guy. And [there were] others. Well, the things that happened. . . Again in a big bureaucracy. Bob Senser was just coming in, and the Department wanted to send him to India. Well, at that time he had a black wife, and somebody up in personnel passed the word that he would be totally unacceptable in India, because Indians would not accept [someone of] color.

Kienzle: Was that true?

MILLEN: Well, some of the Indians were sensitive to the issue, yes, but not to the extent that you couldn't send somebody there. At any rate, I went down to the desk, and I think almost universally Bernie Horgan, Wes Adams--There were about six guys working on the Indian Desk at that time--and they asked, "Who passed out that kind of information?" They said, "Sure, maybe down south there might be a little bit of a problem, but are we in the business of sending people out there to please the prejudices of a few Indians?" So again, somebody up high thinks that he's got wisdom and you get this kind of a response. Well, as it turned out, Bob Senser went some place else. I've forgotten [where]. But these are some examples of the interesting things that happen in a bureaucracy.

Looking back on the NEA experience really revealed some of the weaknesses of the Labor Attaché Program. The Paul Hall issue, for example, bordered on turning into an incendiary affair and yet my Bureau made very little use of the Labor Advisor, me, and I was kept away from the policy decisions. Furthermore, the AFL-CIO, Arthur Goldberg, etc. made not a single contact with the one person within NEA who might have been able to help the unions extract themselves from a very sticky situation.

I recognized from the outset that NEA, because of the political nature of their client states, the Israel issue, etc. represented a difficult area within which to work, and my fears were realized quite soon. Despite the high quality of many members of the staff, and even the desire of some of them to be helpful, the Labor Advisor had little leverage. Doing day-to-day chores were easy, but trouble arose whenever I raised issues outside of the immediate and most narrow definition of my function. For example, through happenstance I became friendly with a Deputy Assistant Secretary at the Department of Interior and uncovered a program designed to foster the development of water desalinization in arid countries. Efforts to raise discussion of the program with NEA were frowned upon within my immediate office and I came close to being reprimanded.

Another instance: A brief memorandum to the NEA Assistant Secretary pointing out a weakness in a speech by the Secretary of State, which appeared in the publication Vital Speeches gained me an invitation to spend an hour with the Assistant Secretary but earned me only demerits from my supervisor.

A report to another NEA Assistant Secretary (after returning from a trip to Iran) about the activities of SAVAK (Iranian Intelligence) which was battling with the Iranian Department of Labor for control over trade union activities was met with instructions to my boss that he did not want such reporting, that after all "I helped establish SAVAK." Later I was to discover that on a subsequent field trip to the general area the Assistant Secretary in question had instructed all missions to supervise all of my contacts. Fortunately, most of the missions chose to ignore the instruction.

One last comment and then we will move to another subject, the posting to India. On two or three occasions the NEA Deputy Assistant Secretary told me of an upcoming meeting with Agency people to discuss labor issues. He apologized sincerely and said he would like to have me present, but the Agency had a rule never to meet when a Labor Advisor was present because they might reveal names of certain U.S. trade union leaders with whom they had dealings. On one occasion I laughed and told him that, if he wished, I could return in a few moments with the names of at least 20 trade union leaders or employees in the Washington area with whom the Agency had regular contact. He looked chagrined and that was the end of that. I have often wondered whether or not Labor Advisors from other Bureaus were subject to the same restrictions.

Kienzle: When did you go to India?

MILLEN: I went to India in the fall of 1962. But you probably don't know that I had been slated to go to Brussels after Brookings. That bubble burst about three weeks later when Assistant Secretary George Weaver from ILAB at the Department of Labor told me that "16th Street" (AFL-CIO) had blocked the Belgium assignment. I was not surprised- understanding the political winds at play in this situation-but I was disappointed.

Kienzle: This was after your tour at Brookings?

MILLEN: Yes, after Brookings. [Before leaving Washington] there was a two or three month period when I was doing a few things in the Department. I got to India in October of 1962 and stayed until late April or early May of 1965. India was not really my cup of tea. On the other hand, I am sure glad that I worked in a country such as India or one like it, so I could really get an understanding of the dynamics of the situation. It was fascinating.

Kienzle: How would you characterize India at that point in history?

MILLEN: Well, in a way, it was sad. The political structure was under great stress, partly as a result of the fact that Nehru was coming to the end of his life and had obviously lost a lot of his vigor and a lot of his capacity to control events in India, to the extent that anybody can. He had lost a good deal of that, and I had the impression that the corruption level was rising. While corruption is endemic in all developing countries, I had the feeling that it was on the rise, and part of it was [due to] Nehru's increasing age. He was a remarkable person to watch. [When you looked into his eyes, you almost felt that you were looking into a person's soul. And the day he was buried, everything, of course, closed down except for the events surrounding the funeral, and it was not inappropriate that earthquake tremors went through Delhi on that day. It was almost in keeping with the event. Something cataclysmic had happened, at least in the life of India, that this man, who was a brave and highly intelligent man, and, I think, for the most part a good man, [had died].

Kienzle: Was there any institutionalized corruption in the Congress Party?

MILLEN: Oh, yes. The Congress Party was just kind of a place for boodle and payoffs, but it is hard to separate out that which is endemic to countries with this level of poverty and this level of diversity and challenge. The first time I went to India, I was on a study trip for the Department of State. I came back and I opened [my trip report] with the sentence, "In the functioning anarchy called India. . . ." And it wasn't until two or three days before I left [India], as I was going through the files, that I found Ambassador Bunker's commentary on my report. He fairly well accepted most of what was in the report, but he said, "I have trouble coming to grips with Millen's opening statement on functioning anarchy."

Shea: It is like what somebody said about the Austrian-Hungarian Empire prior to the First World War. It has a policy of calculated negligence.

Kienzle: Was Ambassador Bowles there?

MILLEN: Ambassador Galbraith was there when I arrived. He gave speeches and was a public figure, but he didn't pay much attention to the running of the embassy. He wrote some very fine essays in the form of cables that were very interesting and deserved to be published, but he was a "stand apart" guy [with] that big ego; nothing mattered [to him] but what he was doing. Once in a while you would feel that he missed the lecture class, so he would call a staff meeting, and after a couple of administrative comments had been made, one of them always being that there had been so many security violations in the last month, Galbraith would pick up the burden and give us these sometimes rather interesting little essays or commentaries. His writing style was fluid and so forth. I got the impression that he must work on his writing very hard, because when he spoke he would use a word, then pull it back and insert another word, and sometimes [do this] even a second or third time. He was very careful with each word, and he seemed [to be] almost listening [to himself]. When I would pick up something that he had written, [I thought] "God, he must spend an awful lot of time editing." His speaking style was just so different from his writing style. Not that the words didn't come out fine, but he searched for the appropriate words. It was an interesting experience. Of course, we were kind of amused when the Chinese attacked India in early 1963; he obviously had so much fun marshaling military support and going out to meet the planes that our military sent over. He also got a great deal of pleasure out of bare-knuckling Krishna Menon. He set it up with Nehru where he didn't have to do business with Krishna Menon during that period.

Kienzle: Krishna Menon was the Foreign Minister during that period?

MILLEN: No. Defense Minister. When Galbraith left, everybody [in the Embassy] was looking forward to a change, because morale was not exactly high, and everybody was saying that it's got to be better [under the new ambassador]. Of course, Bowles came in and nothing much changed.

Kienzle: How would you characterize the labor movement at that time, INTUC, and the Communist Party movement and H.M.S.?

MILLEN: Obviously the Communist Party's labor movement, the All India Trade Union Confederation or AITUC, was a superior group and much better organized. I used to make rough comparisons with the Italian situation. You had the Communist movement, the Congress Party federation INTUC (The Indian National Trade Union Congress), the feisty H.M.S., which was a mildly socialist movement, and the revolutionary socialists plus a plethora of independent unions. Once I put Victor Reuther up to posing a question to the head of the revolutionary socialist trade union movement, who was a very interesting personality. In India, you could cross all these lines. So Victor, who was traveling through the country, asked -- I can't recall the name. -- the leader of the revolutionary socialist union what was so different between H.M.S. and his union that would make it impossible for them to merge. He was very polite to Victor and said, "Well, look, I need these guys from the Communists. Do you think I would be a member of the state parliament, if I worked with H.M.S? You're crazy. I can't do business with H.M.S."

Kienzle: Rampant opportunism.

MILLEN: Not from his point of view. Jatin Chakravarti-that was his name. I remember it now-- was effective in trade union affairs because of his political position; he knew it; and I wanted Victor to understand it .

Oh, God. I got into a little bit of trouble over two people I sent on leader grants [even though] I didn't have much influence over the leader grants. Dave Burgess, one of my predecessors, had negotiated an agreement with the Ministry of Labor, which put almost the entire authority [for the selection of grantees] in the hands of the unions. And we were getting some real bad ones! So I went to the Ministry of Labor and I complained. I said, "I know that you don't personally pick these people, but I wish you could convey to the unions that they have got to pay more attention to the quality of people that they are sending." Then I went to each of the unions and I made my little spiel. One of them said, "What the hell! We don't know what else to do with this guy. He's worked hard." I said, "Well, that's fine from your point of view, but you have to look at the quality factors. You just can't send dummies." In the meantime, we sent one fellow from Kerala, who was a Christian, a big dark fellow, who when he left for the United States was in the middle of a word war that involved some anti-American sentiments. The politics of Kerala are particularly volatile. It is a heavily Communist area and comparatively speaking a highly educated group. So he went, and the Consul General in Madras didn't complain to me, but he complained to Bowles about this kind of a guy going. Then earlier this revolutionary socialist fellow Chakravarti went. He was one of my favorite people. He had been nominated [earlier] and I came along during the processing [of his grant]. There were objections to his going, and I said in a somewhat flip way, "Well, Christ, he has been to Moscow, Prague, London, and China. Why don't we continue his education?" So he went.

Well, both those cases [worked out successfully]. The fellow from Kerala came in after his trip pleased as punch. He would like to go back again and take his wife. He said, "Before I went I thought that American women were loose [and had] poor morals, and that you had an immoral society. I talked to a lot of parents and I talked to some grandparents, and I realized that you are just different. It's not loose morals. It's a different structure than we have." I thought that was quite an accomplishment for six weeks in the United States. And the revolutionary socialist came into my office not long after he returned and said, "Hey! I turned down an opportunity to demonstrate in front of your consulate in Calcutta a few weeks ago." I said, "Well, what about that!" He said, "You know that trip to the United States? [That visit] proved that all of the things that I have been accusing America of in the last ten years are wrong. Unfortunately, I wrote this to a friend of mine and he's got the letter and he's threatening to release it." So I thought that [his change in outlook] was quite an [accomplishment]. I told him, "Look, the price of admission to the United States is not that you never demonstrate in front of our consulate again." He said, "No, I understand that. But I just didn't feel like it." He used to like to come up to my room. He would never drink in public, but he would come up to my room and he liked scotch in moderation.

Kienzle: How influential were the union leaders in the political process?

MILLEN: The process was so muddy and so gigantic it was hard to tell. But when one measures pay scales and the decisions coming out of the Wage Board structure, one must say that they did rather well. When George Fernandez shut down the city of Bombay under a process called a "bund" or general strike two years in a row, reluctantly followed by the Communists, the unions got changes in the state cost-of-living index. The unions had great influence in the banking system and on the docks. They could often pose a threat to public order at time which gave them intermittent power, but not in the daily running of government.

Kienzle: Excuse me, could you define "bund"?

MILLEN: It is like the German word Bund, but it is an active word. It is not a noun. It's an action. It's a general strike. Well, Bombay unions following Fernandez lead that twice. Once, for example, one of their main complaints was that the so-called cost of living index as reflected by their state government figures was inaccurate and that the workers were getting cheated. Well, as a result of this particular direct action, the government set up a committee and they concluded that the index was inaccurate; in fact the government admitted that certain items put in that budget in 1936 had never been changed and the products were no longer on the market.

The [Indians] set up of wage boards, which are an anathema to us. To me they made very good sense. The only way you could ever get some kind of a wage structure was to have a reasonably impartial group study the whole history and more or less lay out the benefits to be paid. Over a period of time the textile industry [developed] a pretty decent wage structure, which could never have been attained through direct collective bargaining. Not those levels. They also had, I think, a wage board for the iron industry. These wage boards were very influential economically, and they came about primarily through trade union actions, for the most part [through] politics. Here again what's politics and what's trade unionism? It's hard to separate them. I think the trade unions had an influence but not on the order of what we would see in a European structure, where you could trace where the trade unions said this and the government said this and you can watch the process go on. Everything [in India] was too oblique and all the lines were dotted and so forth, so it was very difficult to apply any standards of measurement. But yes, the trade unions did have influence, a considerable amount of influence. For example, in the United States, during my days working with CIO, we could never organize the EXXON workers. In Bombay EXXON refineries were organized. Now they weren't organized in the tight compact form that we would have it, but by God, they had influence in that plant.

Once I found an American pharmaceutical manufacture, I think it was Pfizer, which, when I talked to the manager about the fact that the unions in the industry were communist dominated, said yes, he knew that and they were worried about it. And I got him to pretty well agree that if I could get [a non-Communist] union-I was thinking about using H.M.S., because it had a fair amount of strength in that industry-and if we could get a couple of breaks from the employers' side, H.M.S. might be able to break the lock that the Communists had. And this guy said, "I would be willing to take some strikes on it." This was totally foreign to most American employers, because they won't take a strike for an ideological reason. Unfortunately I couldn't put the H.M.S. thing together, so it never did work out.

Unions did have considerable strength in the banking industry.

Kienzle: What about the influence of INTUC given its special relationship with the Congress Party?

MILLEN: Well, INTUC was represented, [for example] over in the Bombay textile industry, and of course in its home location in Ahmedabad in Gandhi's union. That was a local which Gandhi personally organized. Now these organizations had considerable influence, but it was hard to measure the impact and hard to trace the connecting points.

Shea: What about unions organized along religious lines?

MILLEN: That was beginning to develop strongly when I left. The Janata Party and the Hindu revival groups were just forming into influential political elements. They may have been organized at the plant level long before, but you first began to see evidence of them or hear discussions them about the time I left in 1965.

Shea: Do you recall a trade union leader by the name of George Fernandez?

MILLEN: George was famous, and George was fun.

Kienzle: Could you identify George Fernandez?

MILLEN: He was a Goan by origin and started out to be a seminary student. I am not quite sure how he made the connection with trade unionism, but he did in the Bombay area. He ended up having a large proportion of the taxi cab drivers and a lot of others [in his union]. His was an independent union. He was building strength. He was putting fight into the government. During the Chinese invasion period, the government put him in jail for about three months, because it said he had connections with the Chinese Communists. When I told the Consul General I would like to see George in jail, the Consul General damn near shit.

Kienzle: Who was the Consul General?

MILLEN: I forget. Once Phil Bradley from USIS and I set up a one day conference. We didn't have any money. We couldn't even offer lunch or anything. We did get hotel space for the meeting. I invited industrialists, academic people, the trade unions, and so forth. In the morning we talked about collective bargaining and tariffs, in the afternoon about politics. No records were kept. It was just absolutely fascinating. That was the kind of activities that were fun to do in this job. The problem was that I never wrote up my notes and sent them in to boast about what we did. It was just like opening the flood gates. Everybody had something to offer. Ideas were brought up and knocked down, but there was no rancor to speak of between employers and unions.

Kienzle: I think the Indians like a rigorous discussion.

MILLEN: Well, they do. They are great talkers.

Shea: George Fernandez was from Ga.

MILLEN: He was very important in throwing up these twenty-four hour stoppages everywhere, which were organized and had an impact. He once had a meeting, which I attended together with my British counterpart. We got there early, and, of course, the honored guests were invited to sit on the platform, but [in India the organizers] frequently do not have any chairs, and you are put on cushions. The floor is padded and you have cushions behind your back. For someone not accustomed to spending a couple hours [like that] it's pretty hard. Generally one way you told the difference between an H.M.S. meeting and an INTUC meeting was that at an H.M.S. meeting most of the participants came with a Western shirt and pants on. [At an INTUC meeting] many of the Indians came in a dhotis; there were no chairs; and they squatted. They are trained to do that and could spend hours in that position. This was kind of a fundamental [difference] in the behavior patterns of the two groups.

So George invited me to a meeting. I don't remember what the event was. One of the H.M.S. people gave a speech. He was a good guy. I basically liked him, but his speech had an attack against Americans, because we weren't solidly enough behind India in a little war that was taking place up north along the Pakistani boarder. So he used that as a takeoff point to attack the Americans. We were being pro-Pakistani, etc. I read his written speech, which was three or four pages long. When my British friend Gordon came up-I have forgotten his last name-I said, "We're not sitting up here. Let's sit in the audience." He didn't know why I said that. I said, "I'll tell you why when we go downstairs." Of course they weren't attacking Great Britain, I just took it upon myself. I said, "I don't mind sitting here. I don't care if he wants to attack us, but I am not going to sit on that God-damned platform as if I am agreeing with him. If I sit up there, I'll ask permission to speak." So we went down and sat in the audience. Later I had a cup of coffee with George. He said, "Bruce, I have never seen you angry before." I said, "I wasn't really angry. I just didn't feel I wanted to sit on a platform while you guys were attacking us. After all, there are about eight shiploads of American grain out in your harbor right now, and there was no mention made of that. George said, "Yes, I noticed you weren't smiling today."

Shea: What about the coal miners in India. I always had the impression that they were highly organized.

MILLEN: They are pretty well organized. I once went to one of their national conventions, which was held outside under tents and so forth. It was so hot that they delayed the opening until after 5:30 at night. For Indians to call [a delay] it has to be really hot. This was an INTUC meeting and there were about 2,000 delegates.

Shea: What about wages and hours and working conditions in the mining industry?

MILLEN: Oh, I would hesitate to say. It's not easy to make a comparison in the first place. They had their wage boards over the years.

Kienzle: Was there a problem with child labor?

MILLEN: Oh, there always has been. You just see it all over the place. You look around the construction sites and there were kids. Maybe they were not even getting paid, but they were helping their mothers. Women do a lot of the burdensome work on the construction sites there. One of the most impressive things that I ever saw was [when] I was with Victor Reuther on his tour there. We were down in Hyderabad, which is south. We took a trip about 40 miles by jeep to where they were putting in the tallest and widest mortar dam in the world. They would start with these great big rocks that looked like granite. Everybody in the area was breaking these rocks up into little [pieces] for road beds and so forth. People were all over the place: men, women, and little children just chipping away. That was a major source of employment. There must have been 30,000 people just working on rock chipping. They were up to the 200 or 300 foot level when we were there. They were walking on bamboo ramps which go up and down, and men were carrying rocks which must have weighed 300 or 400 pounds hanging from bamboo sticks carried on the shoulders of four to six people. The women carried mud and cement. (End of Side A, Tape Two) There wasn't a machine in use for the first 250 feet. Then they had cranes up at the 250 foot level. Everything came up by hand. It was most impressive. It just staggered me.

Shea: Almost like building a pyramid.

MILLEN: Yes, on that order. I remember we used to get pictures during the Second World War of building airfields in China, and you saw those flanks of people out there. Well, this was the same kind of a picture, except they were going up the side of what was damned near a mountain. Now they did not have authority to put sluices in to make that a power plant. This was to be for irrigation and flood control. But they were putting the sluices in anyway on the assumption that in short order somebody would say, "By God, why aren't we developing power here?" So that gave them a little bit of a head start on that project.

India was a fascinating place, but one of the things that made [my tour there] unpleasant was the atmosphere in the Embassy. For reasons I am not quite sure of, I ran into troubles there almost from the day I landed. And, of course, I wasn't a perfect citizen. I sometimes reacted. I never did see a so-called efficiency report from there, except that I did get a special letter saying that the problems with me even extended into the distaff side of the house, because I had not praised my assistant's wife sufficiently. That was the only solid comment that I ever saw about my days in India.

Shea: What about Ambassador Bowles in all this?

MILLEN: Well, Bowles was a charmer! But he had never left the New Deal behind him. I can see how he would be a terrific advertising executive. He had a real flair.

Shea: I got to know him quite well, because he was not only the Governor of Connecticut but he was also the Congressman from my home area. He was a charmer all right.

MILLEN: He was a real charmer. But I heard him once ball out three consuls general for reporting honestly. He was just furious with them. They were giving very good reports but you had to report according to Bowles, if you wanted to get along with him. He was beyond his prime. He had Parkinson's disease. He died just recently, but he lived a long time and [I don't know] how he kept up the active life he did. He was a hard working guy. I have been at his place when we had small groups and he would almost push people out of the door, because as he said, "I am so tired I have to go to bed."

His main problem was that he so loved the Indians that he just didn't want to ever say anything bad about them. I was present one night and he was saying how soft the Americans were to send our kids to special schools. His kids would go to the Indian schools. Of course, I knew the school that they would go to. They would go to the Modern School for high level civil servants. He went on about the superiority of these Indian schools and how soft we were, and my former wife, not noted for diplomatic skills, said, "Mr. Ambassador, I couldn't agree with you less."
[Laughter]

Kienzle: Did the Ambassador laugh too?

MILLEN: No, he didn't laugh. But what he probably did not recognize was the snobbishness of a large part of the Indian school system for the elites, nor the fact that any seat taken up by one of us reduced the total for Indians. Furthermore, Indian schools followed the British model.

Kienzle: Well, shall we stop here and resume at some later time?

MILLEN: Yes. I think so. (End of Part I of the Interview)

Kienzle: Is there anything else that you would like to add on your assignments in either Oslo or New Delhi?

MILLEN: Well, I can't quite recall what I said about India. I may have said this. India was an interesting experience. I'm glad I was there. It was hard. I was not accepted not by the Embassy, but I was accepted by the Indians. I had good rapport with many academicians, many British, American and Indian business people, and a good share of the trade union movement. I felt like I made a contribution there, but I had an internal conflict in the Embassy which made life hard for me. I got to the point where I was watching my back a good deal of the time, and that was unfortunate. Looking back, I am not in the mood to discuss who struck whom first. Personally, I did feel I did a great deal of creative work in cooperation with AID, but it all ended on this note as expressed by one colleague, "We are afraid to be seen talking to you."

Kienzle: I think we left off last time at the end of your tour in India. Do you want to talk about your subsequent assignment in Turkey?

MILLEN: Yes. I went to Turkey and I was initially assigned as Executive Assistant to the Secretary General of CENTO . Given the kind of unfortunate circumstance I had in India, that [assignment] was to get me back in the shadows where I could hide for a while.

KATHRYN CLARK-BOURNE
Consular/Political Officer
Bombay (1962-1967)

Kathryn Clark-Bourne was born in 1924 in Fort Collins, Colorado. She received a bachelor's degree in journalism from the University of Washington. She later received a master's degree in mass communications from the University of Minnesota. Ms. Clark-Bourne's career included positions in Iran, The Netherlands, Nigeria, and Cameroon. This interview was conducted on August 2, 1995 by Charles Stuart Kennedy.

Q: You were in Bombay from when to when?

CLARK-BOURNE: '62 to '67.

Q: '62 to '67.

CLARK-BOURNE: Our Consular District included Gujarat, Maharashtra, Madhya Pradesh, and Goa. In Gujarat, they speak Gujarati. In Maharashtra, they speak Marathi. In Goa, it's some South Indian language. In Madhya Pradesh, they did speak Hindi but it was so far away that I only got over there once or twice a year. So, I just didn't get to use it. Most of the city people all spoke English. It had been an English colony. So, it didn't matter that much, to be very honest. If I needed an interpreter, my local employees could interpret.

Q: From '62 to '67, you were in Bombay. What was your position?

CLARK-BOURNE: The first two years, I was a consular officer, head of the Consular Section. Then, the rest of the time, I was a political officer, head of the Political Section.

Q: Who was the Consul General at that time?

CLARK-BOURNE: I spent last night trying to remember names. Milton Rewinkel was the first one and Dan Braddock was the second one.

Q: From your perspective, what were American relations with the Indians during the '62 to '67 period?

CLARK-BOURNE: Oh, very good. There were no problems at all. We had Peace Corps. We had AID. We had everything there. We were experimenting on increasing production of wheat in, I believe, the Philippines, and we were bringing the results over for India. We helped them really increase their production of wheat. In fact, I'll never forget it, because there was an Indian woman who wrote a book. In it, she had interviewed a farmer and she said, "Now that you're getting twice as much produce to sell, what are you doing with all the extra money?" He said, "Well, I don't need any extra money. I have a bowl of rice for breakfast, a bowl of rice for lunch, and a bowl of rice for dinner. What do I need money for?" I'll never forget that. It's so different from the average American outlook on life.

But the relations were good. I had no problems whatsoever. I had many, many Indian friends there. As a political officer, I was also a labor officer. I met with the major labor union officials in Bombay, who were socialists, but I was taken in by them. They confided in me on everything.

Q: During this time, I guess, Nehru was still the Prime Minister, wasn't he?

CLARK-BOURNE: Yes, I guess so. Chester Bowles was Ambassador part of the time, and John Kenneth Galbraith was Ambassador part of the time.

Q: These were two of the stars of the Kennedy period in particular. Did you have any reflection of these two strong personalities?

CLARK-BOURNE: Chester Bowles was really liked by the Indians. He had two different tours there. Galbraith was something else. I remember, as consular officer, I was always the control officer for ship visits. And COMIDEASTFOR, Commander of the Middle East Forces...

Q: Was stationed in Bahrain.

CLARK-BOURNE: ...in Bahrain, would drop by quite often. I remember Galbraith coming down once by train. I think he took over seven cars on the train for all of his friends and relatives. He arrived in Bombay and the COMIDEASTFOR had come down on his flagship. Then there was a destroyer.

Q: It was a seaplane tender or something.

CLARK-BOURNE: You're right, it was a seaplane tender.

Q: Large Bay, I think, was one of them. I served in Dhahran at one time and we had these two rather small ships.

CLARK-BOURNE: Galbraith announced that he and his wife were going to stay on the captain's ship during the visit. In that day, a woman staying overnight on a ship was practically unknown. The captain wasn't very happy, but felt that he had to acquiesce to the Ambassador. My problem was that Galbraith was almost seven feet tall and the bunks on ships were short. I remember sending a junior officer down to the bazaar to find big cushions to pile up at the end of a bunk so that he could sleep on it. But he absolutely insisted. That's the kind of person he was. And yet, he wrote magnificently. We loved to read his cables and his telegrams. We'd look forward to them. He really was very talented. But there were two sides to the character.

Q: You were there during the assassination of President Kennedy. How did that...?

CLARK-BOURNE: That I will always remember because I had set out in my car with a bunch of friends to drive up to Kathmandu. That's quite a drive, let me tell you. I was driving a Mercedes 190 in those days, which are pretty sturdy cars, and I remember stopping along the way for servicing. To get up over the border, AID at that time was building a road that went from the border and over the mountains into Kathmandu. I remember that the road en route to the border went out of existence at one point. We tried to cross a stream and got stuck and had to hike to the nearest village to get them to pull us out. Somehow, we got in contact with AID. They sent a jeep down to get us out. We got over the border up to Kathmandu. While there in the hotel, I came down one morning for breakfast and was met by one of the employees, saying, "Your President has just been assassinated." So, of course, we dashed over to the Embassy to find out what it was all about. I was up there for another week before I returned to India.

Q: You were also there during the China-Indian War, weren't you?

CLARK-BOURNE: Yes I was and this was a problem, although the troops were over in the East and we were in the West. We had a blackout and I was ordered to get all the Peace Corps people down out of Gujarat and to Bombay to be evacuated. I remember going up to Gujarat to find them and arriving back in Bombay during a total blackout. But they managed to land the plane. My former husband -- my fiancé at that time -- came out to the airport to meet me. We had to drive back to Bombay without headlights. But that didn't last for too long.

Q: In a way, that was sort of a high point, wasn't it, of Indian-American relations?

CLARK-BOURNE: Yes, I think you're right. It probably was, at least at that time.

Q: As a consular officer, did you have any particular consular problems?

CLARK-BOURNE: This is where we did have trouble with young people.

Q: This was the height of what we'd call "the Hippie Movement," of young people going off as far as they could and running out of money.

CLARK-BOURNE: What they were doing was taking cars into Nepal and exchanging them for drugs and then bringing the drugs down to sell in India. They'd often camp on the beaches near Bombay. I remember working with the Brits trying to get it under control.

As consular officer before I became political officer, we had shipping problems. I'll never forget one involving one of the big shipping companies, a Greek company named Kulakundis employing mostly American seamen, had gone bankrupt. When they arrived in Bombay port, they couldn't leave and their ships were stalled in several ports in the Middle East. The Consulate General was told one night, at about 10 or 11 at night, that the seamen on the ship were revolting.

They'd locked all the officers up in the saloon. I found out about it and called the Consul General. The Consul General said that, as a woman, I couldn't go out on that ship. And I said, "I certainly can," but I promised him I'd take my fiancé with me. We got out and had to climb up the Jacob's ladder to get on. By the way, I had learned in The Netherlands that seamen are respectful of women, but not necessarily of men. This is something that the Foreign Service learned and started assigning women these jobs. I got to the saloon and climbed up on a table and addressed these people. I said, "Alright, you guys, we want you to come ashore. I'm going to find a place for you to stay and then I'm going to find a way of getting you home by air. I want you to let the officers alone." And they went right along with it. There was a YMCA where I put everybody up. Many telegrams went back and forth and we got a chartered plane and finally got them out. They were most grateful. I got letters from unions for months thereafter, thanking me.

Q: What had been the problem on the ship?

CLARK-BOURNE: They hadn't been paid for two weeks. Kulakundis had gone bankrupt and couldn't pay them. So, that was one of the high points as a consular officer.

Q: How about with the young Americans? Were you having people in jail and things of this nature with drugs? How did the Indians handle this?

CLARK-BOURNE: I don't remember them being in jail. I do remember having consulted with the Indians on how to get them out of the country. That's what they mainly wanted. I spent time and effort contacting relatives and Heaven knows what, trying to get them out. It was a long time ago. Some of them may have been put in jail. I just don't remember.

Q: As a political officer, what were your responsibilities?

CLARK-BOURNE: As I mentioned, reporting on labor, as well as political affairs. For instance, they had elections when I was there. I traveled to all the four provinces to interview people from the various political parties and sent in reports. We predicted the outcome of the elections in our consular district and were 100 percent accurate.

Q: What was your impression of the Indian political system from the perspective of Bombay?

CLARK-BOURNE: At that time, it seemed to work. The parties were there. They were all allowed to operate. It was what we would call a democratic setup. They had their elections.

Q: Did you find that you had pretty good access to the political leaders in the area?

CLARK-BOURNE: Yes. There was no problem with that at all. Good access with Indians of all kinds. They had, of course, a big movie industry. The Ivory-Merchant Production Company had its studio there and I was very good friends with Jim Ivory and Ismail Merchant. So, I got to know all the movie colony people.

Q: The Indian movie is so different than the American movie. Bombay, of course, probably turned out more movies than Hollywood, I guess.

CLARK-BOURNE: I would not doubt it. They were horribly long and they had to include everything. We'd go occasionally to them. But, of course, the Ivory-Merchant films were made for Westerners, so they were not that way.

Q: Did you ever get involved in anything equivalent to turf disputes? Were American movies coming in?

CLARK-BOURNE: I never saw anything like that, no. Maybe up in Delhi, they ran into something like that, but I didn't see anything like that.

Q: Were there any other major events?

CLARK-BOURNE: I traveled around quite a bit. I mentioned that, while I was in Tehran, Hope Cooke was there. In fact, when I was there, she had her coming-out party, which was a fantastic evening. I'll never forget it. It started at 10 o'clock at night and they had fireworks at midnight. At the conclusion of the fireworks, there was a display of a peacock spreading its tail, with her name written across the sky. She and "Aunt Mary," Selden Chapin's wife, had gone up to India and obtained the fireworks. I think that's where she met her future husband, the Maharajah of Sikkim. We partied and danced all night and then had breakfast and swam in their swimming pool. It went on most of the next day. Hope was married in Sikkim while I was in Bombay and I was invited. I remember flying across India and up to Sikkim -- was quite an experience.

But, back to the Consular District, I can't remember anything really outstanding.

Q: You were engaged there?

CLARK-BOURNE: I don't know whether you want to know about this or not. I was engaged. My former husband was an American businessman. His family company is the Singer Sewing Machine Company and he covered the whole Middle East. We went back to the States to get married. I took leave and wanted him to come to Washington to meet the India desk officer. Carol Laise was the India desk officer and she said, "Kay, are you crazy?" I said, "Why?" She said, "Don't you know women officers aren't allowed to be married?" I said, "No, why?" She said, "They feel that a husband would not follow his wife around the world." I said, "My husband has more foreign office posts than we do!" She said, "That's beside the point. You'd better get out of town fast, before they pick up your diplomatic passport." So, we dashed off back to India.

Milton Rewinkel was still Consul General and he said, "Kay, why would you want to keep working when you're married?" Well, the memos went back and forth, because I was fighting it. Milton said I could stay on only as a local employee. They kicked me out of my apartment, which was no problem, because my former husband had his apartment. Of course, I received no allowances. Then Milton left and Dan Braddock came on as CG. Dan was very nice and very understanding and tried to back me up. He sent cables, but didn't get very far.

DENNIS KUX
Desk Officer for Nepal and India
Washington, DC (1962-1964)

Ambassador Dennis Kux was born in England in 1931 and raised in New York, New York. He received a bachelor's degree in history from Lafayette College in Pennsylvania in 1952. He entered the U.S. Army in 1952, where he worked as a prisoner of war interrogator. His Foreign Service career included positions in Pakistan, India, Turkey, and the Ivory Coast. Ambassador Kux was interviewed by Thomas Stern on January 13, 1995.

Q: Now we are in 1962. You have been assigned to Washington as Desk Officer for Nepal and the Assistant Desk Officer for India.

Could you tell me what your responsibilities were? You were the sole Desk Officer for Nepal.

KUX: I was the support officer in Washington for our Embassy in Nepal. Basically, I was supposed to know and to be involved in anything that happened in the U. S. Government regarding Nepal -- anything that had foreign policy ramifications. It was an "across the board" responsibility, including the "care and feeding" of the Nepalese Embassy in Washington. There was a steady flow of correspondence with the Ambassador and DCM of our Embassy in Nepal. The Ambassador wrote to the Office Director, Turner Cameron, but I drafted the replies for his signature. At the time Nepal was of interest because the Chinese Communists and the Indians were jousting for influence. Let me put it this way. Nepal, which the Indians consider part of their defense zone, was trying to gain a little breathing space by expanding its relations with China. As the Chinese had bad relations with the Indians at the time -- this was right before the Sino-Indian War -- the Indians were very nervous and we in turn became very nervous.

The organizational structure at the time was as follows: under the Bureau of Near East and South Asian Affairs [NEA] there were four offices, one of which was the Office of South Asian Affairs. Turner Cameron was the Director of that office. He had been DCM in Colombo but was really a "Europeanist." The Deputy Director was Carol Laise, who had been Political Officer in New Delhi. Ambassadors Galbraith and Bunker liked her. In fact, Ambassador Bunker eventually married her. Galbraith had Carol Laise sent back to the Department. I think that the Department "fired" the man who had been Deputy Director of the Office of South Asian Affairs. He didn't move fast enough for Galbraith. The Office covered India, Pakistan, Ceylon as well as Afghanistan and Nepal. There were two subgroups. One was concerned with India, Nepal, and Sri Lanka, and the other one covered Pakistan and Afghanistan.

I was a staff member of the group that dealt with India, Nepal, and Ceylon -- now Sri Lanka. The desk officer for India said, "Well, you are probably not going to be busy full time, so you can work on India on an 'as assigned' basis."

The first assignment I had, which was a bit of a shock for me, was to review and appraise something like six months of political reporting from the Embassy and Consulates in India. The desk officer said, "My God, I couldn't get to it. Why don't you go through this stuff?"

One of the major reasons for the Consulates in India was to serve as "listening posts" or political reporting posts. At the time, we had Consulates in Bombay, Calcutta, and Madras -- the same ones as now, although they do much less reporting. The people who prepared these reports assumed that Washington was listening, but there was the India desk, the main repository and the main "target" for this reporting and nobody read the reports. So, as the junior officer in the office, I read and appraised the reports.

This exercise made me think a little about the value of the political reporting. I realized later on, though I did not realize it at the time, that there is a broader audience in Washington than just the State desk. Perhaps it was too broad an audience, with the CIA, the Defense Department, and the INR analysts all reading the reports. However, we clearly did not need all of the information in the regional bureau of the State Department.

Eventually, I concluded that there was value in the reporting different from what I originally believed. It served as a training ground for the junior officers who were doing most of the reporting. They learned about the country in a way that they otherwise would not have done. They honed their reporting skills. In 1962 we had political reporting officers in each of the three Consulates and in Bombay we had two. They sent in a of material on local and state level politics, in addition to Embassy reporting airgrams.

At a certain point the India Desk Officer left, and I think that there was something like a year's gap until his replacement came. In effect, I became the India Desk Officer, as well as the Nepal Desk Officer. That was at a very interesting time. J. Kenneth Galbraith was the Ambassador, and he would come sauntering through the Department from time to time. He was always handled by David Schneider, the Officer-in-Charge, and Carol Laise, the Deputy Office Director.

A question arises periodically concerning the desirability of having one Office responsible for both India and Pakistan. In fact, from a policy point of view, it didn't make any difference. The policy was set at a much higher level than the Office Director. In 1962, when India and Pakistan had far higher priorities than they do now, policy was set by the top echelons of the administration. In the Eisenhower administration there was a greater emphasis at first on military assistance and military arrangements, a dislike of neutralism, and a tendency toward Pakistan. This shifted under Kennedy. The Office of South Asian Affairs implemented the policy; it didn't make it.

The policy level began at the Assistant Secretary level and there was friction there, which I didn't realize between Phil Talbot, the Assistant Secretary, and Galbraith. If you read Ambassador Galbraith's book, you can see that he heartily disliked Talbot. Phil knew much more about South Asia than Galbraith. He had spent most of the years between 1939 and 1947 dealing with the subcontinent and had a very balanced view. Talbot felt that the United States should have good relations with both India and Pakistan. He didn't jump fast enough on the India band wagon to suit Ambassador Galbraith.

Talbot wasn't "anti-Indian." Rather, he considered U. S. interests in the region as a whole and designed U. S. policy accordingly. The goals of the Kennedy administration were affected by the personalities whom I have mentioned. Ambassador Chester Bowles was on one extreme. He wanted to say, "To hell with Pakistan and let's go with India", when he was Under secretary of State. Ambassador Galbraith also "tilted" toward India, but he was more erratic than Ambassador Bowles. I think that Galbraith took into account, to a greater extent, the interests of Pakistan. Bob Komer, who was the South Asia man on the National Security Council staff, and Talbot were pretty close on US policy. They wanted greater emphasis on the relationship with India than had been the case during the Eisenhower administration. However, they did not want to give up the relationship with Pakistan. There were two reasons for this.

One reason was that, after the disaster of the Bay of Pigs in Cuba in 1961, which came very early during the Kennedy administration, the administration did not want to dump an ally. The ally, in this case, was Pakistan. The Kennedy administration felt that it could lay itself open to a lot of criticism from conservatives. The second reason was of more direct interest. We had intelligence facilities in Pakistan -- electronic listening posts which, according to the intelligence community, gave unique information on Soviet missile and nuclear testing. That was a threat which the Pakistanis held over us, if we leaned too far toward the Indians. That was in the back of people's minds.

There was also the feeling of others -- Dean Rusk, for example -- that you really couldn't count on the Indians. You would be giving up a known quantity in the sense of an ally -- maybe difficult at times but still an ally -- for people [in this case, the Indians] who were considered unreliable. Krishna Menon [former Indian Defense Minister] was still around and was always an anti-US menace. Nehru was fading at this point. In any case, the Indians didn't make it easy for Americans who wanted a stronger relationship with them.

Very early on, one thing that happened, which was probably a tactical mistake, was for the Kennedy administration to greatly expand our aid program to India. That came almost immediately after President Kennedy took office. So we gave away, if you think of it in those terms, a bargaining chip. The aid program had already increased under the Eisenhower administration. It increased further under the Kennedy administration. I don't recall the exact figures, but my recollection is that it was $1.0 billion a year, which was big, big money in those days. Basically, this economic aid underwrote the Indian economic development program. Other countries were also involved, but we were the key.

The office director was really the "mechanic." He carried out the policies set by the assistant Secretary and his superiors. He did not initiate the policies. The Office Director did see Talbot and Bowles frequently. There also was a Deputy Assistant Secretary, who was very important, just because of who he was. I refer to Jim Grant who has just died. He was very much involved in the more important issues. He was into the policy process -- the first level of that process really, really an informal, inter-agency process. It involved Talbot and Grant, for the State Department; Bill Gaud the Assistant AID Administrator for Near East and South Asia, Bob Komer from the NSC staff at the White House, and Critchfield from CIA and someone from Defense. In those days it was a very informal White House. Komer had direct access to the President.

It was not a formal structure, but there still was a process. There was also an NSC process, in the sense that on a number of occasions President Kennedy met different agencies on India and Pakistan. Rusk had experience with South Asia because he spent part of World War II out there. There was also McGeorge Bundy, Special Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs.

There had been trouble all the time along the Sino-India border, going back a couple of years. There were serious clashes. We had intelligence that the Chinese Communists had increased their troop deployments, as had the Indians. However, what we didn't know was that the Chinese would actually strike the Indians. That took people by surprise. Then the next thing that took people by surprise was the poor performance of the Indian Army.

When the word came that the Chinese had struck, as a relatively junior officer I went scurrying around, because I knew how to get the press tickers faster than anybody else. I was constantly running down to the press room or wherever the wire service machines were kept. We got much of our information from the wire services. That was my contribution. I was given the task of writing a daily "Sitrep" [Situation Report] which then went to the Secretary of State and the "Seventh Floor" of the State Department so that the principals would know what was happening.

No task force was set up. You have to remember that this happened simultaneously with the Cuban Missile Crisis of October, 1962. You had the rather strange situation -- and Ambassador Galbraith points this out in his book -- that for a 10 day or two week period there was the threat of a major regional war and the threat of an even larger conflict involving the major powers going on at the same time. The Sino-Indian War was obscured from the general vision by the Cuban Missile Crisis. So the Sino-Indian War was handled by the informal task force composed of the South Asia office of the Department of State and the Pentagon. The immediate U. S. response was to add a person to the India desk to handle Political-Military issues.

The policy decision to provide immediate military aid to India was made in a matter of days; we then tried to persuade the Pakistanis not to take any unhelpful actions. This last goal was basically not achieved. The actions that we took were all handled expeditiously, without a lot of paper work. The results were seen in Presidential messages to Ayub Khan and Nehru, and this correspondence moved back and forth very rapidly during the crisis.

There were two phases of the crisis. The first phase occurred on or about October 20, 1962. The Indian Army was kicked in the teeth, and then there was a lull. Three weeks later, in mid to late November, the Indians launched an offensive. The Chinese were waiting for this and beat the hell out of the Indians. At that point the President decided at a White House meeting to send Averell Harriman -- then the Assistant Secretary for FE -- to India to find out what the Indians really wanted. He went with Paul Nitze and others. This was, I think, the highest powered official American mission that has ever gone to South Asia. Nitze may have been an Assistant Secretary of Defense at the time. Jim Grant also was on that mission as well as Roger Hilsman, Director of Intelligence & Research, Carl Kaysen, from the White House, and General Paul Adams, a four-star general.

There was a separate British group that went out to South Asia at the same time. The Kennedy administration -- more than the Eisenhower administration -- was interested in getting the British and the British Commonwealth in on the act. Secretary Rusk felt very strongly about that -- having "more flags flying." He felt that we should not be alone. Since South Asia had been a British territory, they should be present. So the British sent Duncan Sandys, a cabinet minister at the time.

In December 1962, there was a conference in Bermuda between President Kennedy and British Prime Minister Macmillan. It was decided to provide another $120 million in short-term military assistance to India. The aid provided was split 50-50 between the Commonwealth and the United States, with India and Pakistan each getting about $60 million.

The crisis did end when the Chinese pulled their troops back and, in effect, imposed a settlement. Then there was a dispute within the State Department. I remember that quite vividly. On the China desk, Lindsay Grant, who was the equivalent to David Schneider, said that this is simply a border conflict and that the Chinese were just teaching the Indians a lesson. They were not out to conquer India or get the U. S. involved in major hostilities. On the India desk, I think, we saw events more as the Indians saw them. We felt that there was a fundamental challenge to the democracy and the security of India.

The Kennedy administration had seen these events as an opportunity to strengthen our relations with the Indians, which had been its goal, by providing immediate assistance and by going along with the Indian view that this was a fundamental challenge by the Chinese. The Indians basically panicked. Indeed, Nehru sent a message to President Kennedy, which has never been released, during the middle of the second crisis with the Chinese. It may have been this message from Nehru which precipitated the despatch of the Harriman mission. In effect, Nehru asked for American military, he wanted the U. S. Air Force to intervene, to provide tactical air support, and to bomb Chinese supply lines. The Indians didn't want to use their own Air Force because they were afraid that the Chinese would attack India's cities.

This was what I called Nehru's "Dunkirk" message. The Indian Ambassador to the United States was so embarrassed that he kept his only copy of the Nehru message in his desk at the Indian Embassy. I remember seeing the message when it came in. We were all stunned by it. The crisis receded in a day or so when the Chinese announced their cease-fire, and I don't think that Nehru ever got an answer to his message. The matter spun out into talks and discussions. Gradually, the pressure for action by the Kennedy administration diminished.

The major problem was with Pakistan whom the Kennedy administration did not want to "lose", because of the military facilities which we had there. There was a Pakistani "club" in Washington in the U. S. intelligence community and among the military. President Ayub Khan of Pakistan took the view that the Chinese were not really a major threat to India and that therefore the United States should not respond to India's requests. Ayub became angrier and angrier as we increased our assistance to India. The Pakistanis in turn developed their relationship with China right at this time.

We tried to use the crisis to get a settlement of the Kashmir dispute between India and Pakistan. We did get the Indians to agree to talks, but with much, much difficulty. These talks went on for five rounds, from December, 1962, to May, 1963. They got nowhere. The Office of South Asian Affairs played a considerable role, working with the Office of Policy Planning and the NSC in prodding both India and Pakistan into these talks and doing the backstopping. When these talks faltered in the spring of 1963, there was a U. S.-British plan which was presented and rejected by both sides. Ambassador Galbraith commented wryly that we finally got the Indians and Pakistanis to agree on something! So it was a very busy time in the Office of South Asian Affairs. I was still only a helper.

The working relationships between the India and Pakistan Desks were good. Basically, Carol Laise, the Deputy Director of the Office of South Asian Affairs, was rather pro-Indian. She had a stronger personality than Turner Cameron, and the Pakistan Desk suffered accordingly. I mentioned that some people tended to "tilt" toward Pakistan for a couple of reasons. First, they felt that the Pakistanis had gotten the short end of the stick from the Indians in the Kashmir dispute and had been treated badly. Secondly, they felt that the U. S. had more at stake with Pakistanis, that we had more assets at risk in Pakistan. Thirdly, they liked the Pakistanis better than the Indians. This was the human equation.

Everybody saw Pakistan through the prism of the Cold War. India was seen largely through the prism of the Cold War, but there was a generalized feeling that perhaps transcended the Cold War. That is, there was the view that India was the world's largest democracy and required help, quite apart from Cold War considerations. Certainly, at the top level of the U. S. Government India was seen in terms of the Cold War. The second Eisenhower administration and the Kennedy administration did not differ on that.

I was lucky that I had served in both India and Pakistan and so I personally felt some sympathy toward both of them. I have a feeling that if you served just in one of the two countries, it was very hard not to soak up some of the local prejudices. I had the feeling that India was the right side to support. India is the larger country, so that you could make out a geopolitical case in favor of India if you have to pick one country over the other. Unfortunately, it was a "zero sum" game. In the security area it was very hard to work with both India and Pakistan in any substantial way, because each saw the other as their principal enemy.

This was shown in the reaction of the Pakistanis when we gave emergency help to India. They "went through the overhead," just as the Indians had "gone through the overhead" when we helped Pakistan seven years before [1954] or during the years after that. To some extent, those views were mitigated by our large economic aid programs, which gave us an important stake in both economies. However, basically, it was a "zero sum" game. It probably would have been impossible to establish a large security relationship with India and maintain a good security relationship with Pakistan. That situation still exists today.

I personally did not view that the provision of military assistance as a cause for further heightening of tension between the two countries. I did have the feeling that we had gone over our heads in the case of Pakistan. I thought that we were too committed to the Pakistanis. I was not aware at the time, at my level, of the intelligence side of things. At the same time I felt that, although we shouldn't "ditch" the Pakistanis, we should have a stronger relationship with the Indians -- as frustrating as the Indians were, and God knows that they were frustrating. That was always the problem. They, themselves, were a major hindrance to improved U. S. - Indian relations. They were constantly doing things that annoyed Americans -- taking policy initiatives that annoyed us. These were not personality conflicts. In my own view, I feel rather strongly that nations disagree or nations have trouble with each other because they disagree usually on security interests and not because Minister X and Minister Y can't get along.

Look at Korea. I don't think that the Koreans are easy people to deal with. But they are our allies, and it is my feeling that our national security interests parallel. Similarly, with the Turks. They are not easy -- they're harder to get along with than the Indians, in many ways. However, they're our allies.

So the fact that the Indians are difficult, I think, was not the point. The point was that we and the Indians disagreed on basic national security concerns: the world struggle, for example. They didn't see this as a "Manichean" struggle between good and evil. They saw it as two power groups struggling with each other. Nehru, for his own reasons -- which weren't necessarily stupid or ill-considered -- wanted India to stay out of this struggle and be neutral. I think that the Indians would not have annoyed us to such an extent if, for example, they had done what some of the other countries in Asia did. Those countries stayed out of this struggle -- really stayed out and said nothing. The Indians felt that they had to "stick their noses into it," to act as a great power and to be a "go-between." When you go back and look at the various issues, they really leaned toward the Soviet side, more often than not, and more than I thought at the time.

As I look back on it, this tilt was a surprise to me. On disarmament questions they had a lot of clout internationally and continued to have it until 1962. They really were a major world force. One of the major results of the Sino-Indian War of 1962 was to destroy India as a major factor in international affairs -- for quite a long period. On issues like Berlin, for example, we had trouble with the Russians on access and so forth. Why did Nehru have to make a pronouncement that sounded pro-Russian? That got everybody angry. On the next day, he retracted the statement, but why did he have to do that? Why did he become involved in it at all?

On the other side of the coin, in their own neighborhood, in Jammu and Kashmir, the Indians took what was pretty much a "realpolitik" position. They had the territory. Although earlier, in 1947-1948, they had suggested that the problem be solved by a plebiscite, a year or so later they decided that maybe they didn't want that after all. Thereafter, from 1949 on, whatever suggestion was made to help to solve the issue, it was always the Indians who said, "No." This attitude made US officials feel that the Indians were rather hypocritical on the issue. They preached morality on many other issues, when it didn't concern them. But when it came to their own interests, then they acted the way that other nations act.

In 1962, Kashmir was, in effect, part of India. It had acceded to India. It had a legal relationship with India which was somewhat different from that of the rest of the country. It had more autonomy. I should say there were two Kashmirs -- Azad or Free Kashmir, a part of Kashmir which Pakistan held, and the part of Kashmir which India had. India had the more important part, the valley, which is people usually think of when they talk about Kashmir. In fact, Kashmir is actually a much larger area than that.

Part of the Sino-Indian border dispute was over a section of Kashmir, called the Aksai Chin. This was an area which the Chinese claimed -- very far north, on the other side of the Karakoram Mountains. I think that the Indians had rather carelessly laid a claim to this area. It was a "No Man's Land" where virtually no one lived. It is a high altitude desert, a salt plain. No one, as far as I can tell, really "owned" it. In earlier years it had been no great value to anybody. However, in the mid 1950's the Chinese built a road across it to link up Sinkiang and Tibet. So it became important to them. The Indians didn't even know that the road had been built, even though it was in an area that they claimed.

While I was on the desk, the Kashmir issue was not raised in the UN because of a potential Soviet veto. It came up, I think, in 1961 or early 1962, before I got to the desk. What had happened was that in the 1950's, the issue had been regularly on the agenda of the UN Security Council. After 1954 the Indians had the advantage of a potential Soviet veto in their pocket. That pretty well blocked the UN from doing anything. In 1962-1963, as I said before, we got the Indians to enter into bilateral talks with the Pakistanis. Nothing happened. Then, a year later, in 1964, the Indians released the major political leader in Kashmir, Sheik Mohammed Abdullah, who had been in jail or under house arrest most of the time since 1953. He was a personal friend of Nehru's. In 1964, Nehru perhaps wavered to some extent during the last month of his life. Abdullah went to Pakistan and got agreement from Ayub Khan and Nehru that they would talk about Kashmir. Then Nehru died. It is not clear what would have happened had Nehru lived.

We were not a player in that episode. In 1963 we tried to do something about Kashmir but it didn't get very far. By that time, the India desk was once again fully staffed and I had much less to do on India.

Other things happened in 1963. We decided -- and this was a policy decision by President Kennedy -- to provide a small amount of military equipment to Nepal. The Nepalese had been after us to provide such equipment because they wanted to offset the Indians. They felt a little bit uncomfortable about the idea of the Chinese providing them with military equipment because that would "drive the Indians up the wall." Our Embassy in Kathmandu favored providing the military equipment. I was for it. We obtained agreement within the State Department that the U. S. should do this. Carol Laise, the SIA Deputy Director, was not happy about it even though we were talking about non-lethal equipment -- small amounts of communications gear. However, it was symbolically important. Carol Laise wanted us to tell the Indians about it first, before we proceeded. The Nepalese did not want us to do that, and I did not want to do that -- because the Indians would say, "No." The whole point was to have a policy vis-a-vis Nepal that was separate and apart from Indian desires. We -- the Embassy and the desk -- finally won out on that.

We were interested in providing this military equipment because we were worried that the Nepalese felt so isolated. Nepal is a land-locked country. They were -- and still are -- dependent on the Indians who intervened in Nepalese internal politics. We were concerned that the Nepalese would turn to the Chinese, who were then very active and had a historical claim to Nepal, going back to the 17th or 18th century, as a tributary state. It was in the U. S. interest to prevent the expansion of Communist Chinese influence and to ease the pressure on India which Nepal might apply. During the Sino- Indian War, Nepal had been very loyal to India, although it had been given the opportunity to "kick" India, the way the Pakistanis did.

The policy to provide military assistance to Nepal was a presidential decision. This was an issue which was not of major importance, but it involved India, and there were two sides to the question; so the bureaucracy didn't like to make a decision. The issue was finally joined by a visit to the United States of Nepal's Prime Minister, a man named Tulsi Giri. The King of Nepal at the time, King Mahendra, was very shrewd. He had two "teams" which he moved in and out of power. He had a pro-India team and he had a pro-China team. Nepal at the time was a monarchy, and the King actually ruled. They had a democratic government for a year in 1960, but the King dismissed the democratic government and resumed direct rule.

Prime Minister Giri was regarded as pro-Chinese. Some people within the U. S. Government were leery about him, but he came to the United States and made his case to the President. After Kennedy saw Giri, he decided to go ahead with the small military assistance program. Even before Giri made his visit, we had prepared a memorandum to the President recommending approval of military assistance, but no decision had been made by our superiors on this issue. Phil Talbot, the NEA Assistant Secretary, was at the meeting between President Kennedy and Prime Minister Giri. I wasn't at the meeting. I escorted Prime Minister Giri to the Oval Office and then sat outside in the Cabinet office while Giri saw President Kennedy. I recall that Talbot came out of the meeting and said, "Well, you got your program. The President liked Giri and liked the way you made your case. He said, 'Let's go for it.'" That was the way the decision was made.

After the decision, there was a lot of work for the desk officer in getting the program going. It was not a big one -- about $2.0 million, but you had to work with the Pentagon to get it moving - - getting approvals and so forth. There was a lot of work to do on the economic aid program. That was not a large amount, but it was important for Nepal. The Nepal desk officer in AID and I were constantly moving papers forward, getting approval, and fighting to keep whatever it was that we were trying to do. I considered both assistance programs to be political tools to achieve our objectives in Nepal. The desk's role was not to fuss over the details of the programs but to see that the programs were actually implemented.

One aid project involved a "rope way." At the time the communications between India and Nepal were very poor. The project involved building something like a ski lift to carry goods from the plains over the mountains and into the Kathmandu Valley, the most important part of Nepal where the capital was. This was a fairly expensive project. My recollection is that AID didn't like it. The Embassy in Kathmandu liked it because it was tangible, and there was more political "payoff" in a program like that, rather than education, or malaria control, and other things that AID tended to like. So there was friction about the projects to be carried out under the economic assistance program. The State Department liked visibility and a "payoff." AID was less concerned with that.

I did not have the opportunity to visit Nepal. That was very strange, because I would often be asked about it during meetings and the Office Director and the Deputy Office Director would interject, "Yes, we were there." However, the desk officer had not been there which rather annoyed me as the desk officer.

One other dispute that we had concerning Nepal involved a police program. This was an aid program run by people, some of whom had been with CIA. The traditional AID people didn't like this at all. The Nepal desk was always pushing for the "Public Safety Program." Most of the people running it had a public safety or police background. As I said, some of them had been with CIA, but it was AID funded.

The other thing that I remember was the introduction of a Peace Corps program in Nepal. Peace Corps representatives breezed into our office in 1962 -- just after I got there -- and they said, "We are going to Nepal." The Embassy and the Nepal desk, reflecting Embassy views, said, "Oh, we love the Peace Corps, but, really, Nepal is too sensitive a place. There are too many, potential problems there," and so forth. The Peace Corps people said, "Thank you very much. Get out of our way."

They proceeded to install themselves in Nepal and did very well, and have been doing very well since then. In six months or a year they had a Peace Corps contingent going into Nepal, and it has been one of the real Peace Corps successes. It has been a major success for the United States in Nepal. We on the desk were wrong. We were being the timid State Department. The Peace Corps was right.

I might just add some recollections of backstopping Chester Bowles when he was in Delhi for the second time starting in 1963. Almost immediately after he arrived in New Delhi, we had a big "dust up" with the Indians, when they welshed on an agreement to build a "Voice of America" transmitter in India. This was something that Ambassador Galbraith had rammed through at the height of the crisis of the Sino-Indian War of 1962. The VOA was looking for a transmitter site. The Indians agreed to set up a transmitter in Eastern India. We would use it for a couple of hours a day, and they would use it the rest of the time. We wanted to use it to broadcast to China.

As the crisis abated, this became a political issue in India. It clearly was not in accordance with Indian "non alignment" to have a VOA transmitter operating there. Therefore, Nehru changed his mind. He claimed that he had never signed the original papers and that he was never properly briefed on it. Of course, then there was no question of our proceeding with it.

I was assigned to be the "Action Officer" on this matter. Everybody was angry at Nehru. We drafted an instruction to Ambassador Bowles the substance of which was: "You should go and tell Nehru, We are concerned and that he indeed had agreed and we did not like his backing out, etc." I remember marching that draft instruction around for clearance and taking it into the office of Edward R. Murrow, who was then the head of USIS [United States Information Agency]. He was a major radio and TV news figure, as you recall. There he was seated at his desk, puffing his cigarette. He read through the cable and said in the voice millions knew well, "It looks all right." He cleared the cable, and off it went to Ambassador Bowles in New Delhi. For two or three days we heard nothing. Then we received a message from Bowles, which said: "I called on Nehru yesterday and gave him the most recent book of Martin Luther King's speeches." Bowles went on and on about Martin Luther King. Somewhere in there, he mentioned something about the VOA transmitter. He didn't say anything much about it and didn't follow the instruction.

During his second tour in India, when I was on the desk, Bowles was seen as an enormous wind bag. He sent in wordy telegrams which went on and on and on. He was more of a pleader for India than for the United States. He was a disappointment.

Bowles was not nasty and wasn't difficult at the personal level like Galbraith. He was difficult because he would go to the White House, he would go directly to the President. He couldn't stand Phil Talbot, the Assistant Secretary of the Bureau of Near East and South Asian Affairs, and he didn't like the Secretary of State. He was terribly difficult. He had the Deputy Office Director and the India Desk Officer removed. That was why there was a big personnel gap on the India Desk. He staffed the office with people that he wanted, at the top level. He wanted people that moved in tune with him and serviced him. Bowles didn't operate that way. Bowles convinced himself, wrongly in my view, that he had a great mission in India. In fact, he was being "shuffled off to Buffalo."

Before we finish our discussion on my tour on the Nepal desk, I would like to mention in some further detail the issue of military aid to India. During my last year in the Office of South Asian Affairs that assistance was moving along very slowly. President Kennedy hadn't decided whether to go ahead with a sustained program. The emergency program had been approved, but he hadn't decided on a long term program of military aid to India. The problem involved concern about the Pakistanis, on the one side, and uncertainty about India on the other.

Finally, in November, 1963, there was to be a decision meeting on the subject, with Ambassador Bowles, Secretary of Defense McNamara, Secretary of State Rusk, and President Kennedy. I think that the meeting was scheduled for November 24 or 25. Of course, the meeting never took place. Probably, Kennedy would have agreed to the program at that time. I didn't know this at the time, but I learned from research I did for my book from interviews with Bob Komer, Jimmy Grant, and Phil Talbot, that there was general agreement that the "ground work" for a long term military assistance program to India was set. However, Kennedy died and therefore we never did engage in a long term military assistance program with the Indians. I was not directly involved. Carl Coon was handling military aid. However, I knew about the meeting.

I had lunch that day with Carl Coon at "Kitty and Al's" restaurant, a "greasy spoon place" that used to be across from the State Department on Virginia Avenue. People say that they will always remember where they were when they learned of Kennedy's assassination; I certainly do. We went right back to the office. Turner Cameron and Dave Schneider dismissed everybody and said, "Well, obviously, there's not going to be a meeting on aid to India."

I believe that India-US relations would have been different -- and better -- if Kennedy had been able to approve the assistance program in 1963. It was important for our South Asia policy. We may have been fooling ourselves. Maybe I am fooling myself. I think that we overrated -- not the importance of South Asia, because I think that it is important -- but the role that South Asia played in the Cold War. In effect we walked away from South Asia five years later in 1965.

One of the other remembrances that I have, which is very vivid, is not about India but about Nepal and the Cuba Missile Crisis. As Nepal desk officer, I was sitting in on the briefing held in the State Department Auditorium with all of the resident foreign ambassadors in Washington -- just before President Kennedy spoke to the nation. Harriman briefed everyone on what had happened and then we watched Kennedy on a big TV screen. It was a tremendously dramatic moment.

ABRAHAM M. SIRKIN
Public Affairs Officer, USIS
Madras (1963-1966)

Mr. Sirkin was born in 1914 in Barre, Vermont, and attended Columbia College, graduating in 1935. He was drafted into the U.S. Army in 1941. After he left the Army he served at number of posts with USIA and USIS, including England, India, and Greece. Mr. Sirkin was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1997.

Q: So you are off to Madras in '63 and you were there how many years?.

SIRKIN: Three years.

Q: So '63 to '66. What were you doing in Madras?

SIRKIN: I was Public Affairs Officer for South India. At that time, we had three sub posts and one sort of little library in different parts of South India.

Q: Well, what was the status of our relations '63 to '66 with the Indian Government from the perspective of Madras?

SIRKIN: Well, the Ambassador was Chester Bowles on his second tour. The main issue between the U.S. and India was relations with Pakistan, at least at that time, and there was still a kind of a love affair from the Nehru days with the Soviet Union, at least at a national level. So it was a kind of respect for the democracy on the part of the U.S. but unhappiness with the orientation with the wrong side of the cold war. But very little of that carried over into our activities. That was for Delhi people more or less, but for Madras most of the relations in terms of the United States were very cordial, very friendly. It was a place to go to for education so struggling to get visas to get to the United States aroused very great interest in all kinds of American things.

Q: One of the states you dealt with was Kerala. Was that the one that had a Communist government in it?

SIRKIN: Yes, at one stage there was a Communist government, but a Communist government at the local level doesn't mean very much. They take over, just run the local state government in some ways a little differently than the Congress party and were probably at some point likely to be somewhat cleaner than the congress party that was beginning to get pretty corrupt back then after many years of sole control of the country and the state.

Q: Did you have any problems, demonstrations against our libraries or information places or anything like that?

SIRKIN: Not that I recall while I was there. I knew about them later but, no, there weren't any. We used to run American weeks at local universities where we brought in a bunch of American professors to give a few lectures and even courses, and just generally be on the university campus and they were very popular. As a matter of fact, the only demonstration I remember is when one of our people, the Cultural Officer, was at one of these universities at one of the provincial towns of Madras State the night Kennedy was killed. Kennedy was so popular there a lot of people had pictures of Kennedy along side Gandhi in their houses. There was a kind of a silent demonstration outside the room where this American officer was staying. People would come to empathize him on the occasion of the death of their hero.

Q: Were the Tamils a problem at that time?

SIRKIN: The Tamils were a problem in Sri Lanka not in Tamilnadu. The Tamils ran the state. The State of Madras is now called Tamilnadu and there were a lot of local political battles between the Congress party and the native kind of separatist Tamil party. The Congress party was presumably run by locals who way back when came from the North and the Tamils were the more indigenous people.

Q: Did we have to do some fancy footwork to keep from getting identified as too much a friend of one or the other?

SIRKIN: I think there was a suspicion that all the foreign people are much closer to the better-educated and more English speaking Indians of the ruling party. But, our Consulate developed pretty good relations as I recall. I wasn't in on the other side of the work but just the information side. We scrambled and managed to get some of the Tamil Party people on VIP tours to the States. They had no problem. They were very happy to get the offer. I remember talking to one these guys through an interpreter as he spoke very little English. I don't know how he made out in the States. He was very interested. The South was more relaxed in every way, including politically, than North India. They don't have these Bengali screamers. It's not like Calcutta. Madras is much the quietest of the four cities. It's not like all the rest of them, full of terrible traffic jams.

The biggest issue in the South, where the riots were, was after my time when Indira Gandhi came in and tried to make Hindi the national language. There were actually murderous riots in South India because of the Tamils and the other South Indian languages that were related to Tamil as opposed to the North Indian languages related to Hindi. Knowing the language at an early stage means government jobs. If the national language was going to be Hindi, the South Indians preferred English because then they were on more of an even level with the North Indians. But if it becomes Hindi then it becomes their third language, their second language being English. So Tamil people rose up, students especially, and there were language riots and Indira finally backtracked and it didn't become formally the national language.

Q: Were there any major developments from your perspective during the time you were there?

SIRKIN: Between the U.S. and India?

Q: Yes.

SIRKIN: There were a couple of Pakistani War scares. They even had the air raid sirens once or twice and they grumbled that the U.S. seemed to be closer to Pakistan than to India because of India's relationship with the Soviet Union. It didn't impinge much on our work in the South, nothing like in Delhi, or Bombay or Calcutta.

Q: In 1966, where did you go?

SIRKIN: '66 I came back to FSI to study Greek.

ERNESTINE S. HECK
Secretary to the Consul General
Bombay (1963-1967)

Ernestine S. Heck was born in Oregon in 1940. She received her bachelor's degree from Oregon State in 1962. Her career has included positions in Bombay, Saigon, Teheran, Niamey, Katmandu, New Delhi, Colombo, and Madras. Mrs. Heck was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in December 1997.

Q: I'd like to get this at the beginning of tour. You were in Bombay from when to when?

HECK: I was in Bombay from September of 1963 until early July or late June of 1967, so almost four years, three years and nine months.

Q: Had you heard anything sort of by the State Department grapevine or something, or did you have a grapevine about either the people or the post of Bombay before you went out?

HECK: Well, we had the post report. First of all, I had this awful image of the Towers of Silence and the bones. We had the post report, which told us how many black ties to bring and how many long evening dresses to bring and other information of minor importance. I was so new, I didn't have the money to buy anything anyway, so I had to go with what I had and pick it up later. Very little information. In today's world we do have a lot of information. We have a briefing center that provides all sorts of things - no, not in those days.

Q: I was wondering whether you had run into anybody who had been there and said, "Oh, that's an awful post" or "You don't want to deal with Messrs. So and So."

HECK: I remember a man I worked with who told me to drink Bombay gin, which was a brand name in those days and perhaps still is. I was shocked by that in those days. But no, very little about the post. I knew I was going to be the secretary to the consul general, and I knew that this was quite an honor because it was about four grades over what my grade was at the time. But other than that, no, I had no advance notice and I hadn't heard from anyone and I didn't have any sort of connection, although all that was there when I got there. Somebody did meet me, and somebody had food in the house. There was no information given to me at the beginning.

Q: Looking back on it, how competent were you as a secretary? You had taken secretarial science, but there are certain things. Stenography was the big thing in those days.

HECK: Well, I took shorthand at about 140, and I typed at between 92 and 98 depending on the typing machine. I was good.

Q: That's good.

HECK: I was fast, and I obviously had a degree and I had taken a lot of other courses, and I'm sure that's why they assigned me to this job. Probably the real reason was they probably had trouble finding somebody to take it, which is always the thing in the State Department. But to get a stretch of three grades is unusual. So I suppose they sort of looked at all the cards together and picked out mine because I had the education. I can't think of any other reason for it. I had never asked specifically for India or for that part of the world at that point. Later I became very interested in it, but, no, I was very, very green.

Q: Could you describe the post and some of the people in the post first and working conditions.

HECK: The consul general or the consulate general is located on the sea, on the Indian Ocean, at something called Wonkaneer House. The Maharajah of Wonkaneer was the head of a very small state in Saurashtra in southern Gujarat. This was his town palace. I never met the man or any of his relatives, but I gather that he must have been quite a playboy. The building itself was 1920s', probably British colonial architecture with a beautiful vista of the sea. By the time I got there, the consulate general itself was located on the ground floor in what amounted to an L-shaped building with a side building for administration, and the upper floor of what was a two-story building was the home of the consul general. That particular home - I remember his wife telling me, my first consul general there, and showing me, as a matter of fact, had beautiful, cloudy pink mirrors, and these mirrors had covered the ceilings of all the bedrooms, which is why I say that I assume that this is where the Maharajah of Wonkaneer came to play, but I don't know anything particular about it. We got it apparently at about the time of independence around 1947. We had been located in the city for years and years, as we had been in all of the major cities of India. Our consulates in India go back to the late 18th and early 19th centuries in most cases. But the consulate at that point had a rather large staff - much larger than it does today, I suspect - but much differently apportioned than we have today. In the '60s visa law was such that Indians only were allowed a hundred people a year or a hundred families - I'm not sure.

Q: A little earlier, I was the vice consul in Dhahran and I used to meet Indians, and they'd ask where they were on the list as far as waiting- (end of tape)

HECK: It meant that we had very little consular work of that sort. We didn't issue Visas. Our consular operation for a quarter of India had one American officer. It was a full-service consulate. By that I mean we had somebody from the Commerce Department, we had a CIA sub-unit, we had a rather large administrative section because we did bring a lot of things in for New Delhi as well as for Bombay. The hierarchy was a consul general, his deputy principal officer, and perhaps 26 other Americans. I was the senior of four secretaries of whom two belonged to State and two to the CIA. We had two communicators. Our major interests were twofold. One was business. We had a big American business presence in Bombay in those days including the major oil companies. Secondly, to report on the political stabilization and political situation in the country. Being a political officer in the mid-'60s, early in the mid-'60s, meant covering every single district race in a national election. Forty years later we don't really care about that at all and pay very little attention to internal politics. It's all done more or less in one place out of New Delhi. But in those days we had major attention paid to, as I said, every race in our three states, which were and are Maharashtra, Gujarat, and Madhya Pradesh in India. Life was completely different than it is in the Foreign Service today. We had a few apartments in very nice buildings for our senior officers under the rank of the consul general, and they all tended to look out on the ocean, beautiful. Those of us who were single, including all the single officers, lived in something called Washington House, which is still there. It sits at the top of Kambala Hill. From my balcony on the top of three stories, in those days I could see the ocean and watch the sunset. Today, of course, there are high-rises everywhere and all you see are canyons of traffic and other buildings, but my view in those days was of palm trees with the ocean behind it and the sun setting into the Indian Ocean. It was very lovely. Our apartments were all one-bedroom apartments in this building full of singles. Each apartment was a living room/dining room combination that ran the width of the building which was not air conditioned and which was open all year long to the elements. There was a balcony on one end, and you did have windows to close on the other so that you could close it off if the rain were pouring in, but basically, because of the heat and humidity, you kept everything open. You were allowed one air conditioner for your bedroom, so the bedroom was air conditioned. I still own books, including my Shakespeare text from college, which, when I open them, smell of mildew, because after they sit in bookcases in that sort of thing for almost four years, you never get the smell of mildew out of them, nor do you get the little holes left by the silverfish or all the other things. But anyway, it was fun. Life was much different than it is now. We had no access to commissary. The commissary was in New Delhi, and Bombay was not allowed to use it. We could use it when we went up there. We could go into it and buy things and carry them back with us if we could get them on the train or on the airplane, but we didn't order. So what we did do as a group was to order some things from abroad. We would put in joint orders to Denmark, Osterman, Peterson and Peter Justisson. You got things by the case lot, and we usually concentrated on paper products and things like alcohol for entertaining and special foods for special occasions, Christmas-type things and so on. You couldn't bring anything in that might melt, things like chocolate or candles, because they would be ruined before they even arrived. But things that mattered particularly were paper. You could even buy liquor in Bombay in those days as a foreigner at the ship's chandler's downtown, but you couldn't get decent paper of any sort including toilet paper, which was a commodity held in great esteem. And we ordered meat from Kenya, which would come in by the PNO liners from Mombasa through The Seychelles to Bombay. So we would get food that way. The Indian government at that period did not allow anyone except the consul general to have an automobile, so we all relied on taxis and local transport. I took the bus a lot. The buses, of course, were the same ones that are there 35 years later, so they were in much better shape in 1963 than they are in 1997. But we managed all right. I do remember sitting around on the balcony one evening having drinks and watching the sunset with other singles from the building, and this included people from USIA as well as from State and the CIA, and we fantasized about food and we would talk for hours about a hamburger and what it would be like to have lettuce. We never saw lettuce for four years. Chocolate was also a big commodity to dream about, and you could discuss an ice cream soda with chocolate on it as if it were something to kill for. But I was young, and it seemed like a great life in those days. I wouldn't perhaps like it so much these days.

Q: What about the social life for a young woman in a non-European society?

HECK: It was marvelous. It was really marvelous. First of all, Bombay was and still is the New York of the country. It's much more sophisticated than New Delhi, for instance, which is the capital. It had the movie industry, it had the finance industry, and still does in both instances. It had what amounted to be the beginning of an advertising industry. It was a sophisticated city. It even had a few Indian women - very few, but a few, and they were my friends - who were working women. They were almost nonexistent. I should qualify that. The Christian community and the Anglo-Indian community allowed their women to work, and those were the women who were the office staffs of most buildings, but I'm thinking now about what I would call professional women, young women who were in advertising, for instance, who were from Hindu or Muslim families. There were even a few of those, and that's what was so unusual. But as to the social life, I remember out of the four years I was there I kept a calendar, a diary, for two of those years, and in one year I had five nights at home and in one year I had eight nights at home, and the other nights I was out every single night. There were dinners and parties and dances. We did things as a group usually. It was not necessarily a personal relationship. But there was a market to being young and a single woman in a society that needed extra women at dinner tables and things like that. So I went to diplomatic do's, consular do's. I spent a lot of time with the Indian Navy. I got involved with an Indian officer, and then it became quite serious, but even as somebody without a specific male in tow, there were parties to go to on the carrier. The Becraunt was the only Indian aircraft carrier at that point, and they would hold their New Year's Eve party on the flight deck and there would be dancing and champagne, and it was all great fun. Those days have changed too. In those days there was that and there were opportunities for parties on American ships. India was having a great shortage of food in those days, and our aid program in those days was sending in lots and lots, ships and ships, particularly of grain under PL480. I've forgotten whether we called it USAID in those days or not.

Q: I'm not sure it moved, but USAID had several permutations. This was, of course, a huge program.

HECK: Yes, it was, and the ships came into Bombay because it has the best harbor in India. These big carriers would come in loaded to the gills with grain, and they couldn't dock. They had to be offloaded in midstream, and we would go out on the launches and climb up the ladder. Aside from parties, what I really remember here - we spent so much time talking about food - we would ask them to invite us for breakfast, because they would have things like blueberry pancakes. We could make pancakes, but there were no blueberries to be had anywhere. They would have all sorts of goodies. They would give us Western ice cream at breakfast, just things we hadn't seen for a while. We would just pig out on the food, and then they would let us shop in their little whatever they called it - it was not a commissary, but their little ships' stores where they would have things like razor blades for the crew, but it was stuff that we couldn't get because India was in a period in those days of self reliance and everything that was available legally tended to be made in India, and the quality in 1963 was not anywhere near what we were used to, whether it was cloth to make clothes or sunglasses or razor blades. So we would stock up on things out there. Also, I was very lucky because my consul general, Milton Rewinkel, and his wife, Peppa Rewinkel, were very generous to me, and they took me in like a daughter. I was on virtually all of their party lists, so I got to meet all sorts of interesting people whom I would not have met if I just were left to myself. So I had on one side a very sort of glamorous - what seemed to me to be glamorous - life and on the other side perhaps not so glamorous. First thing I learned was that a single woman, at this point 23, in India was viewed by most Indian males certainly and by families in general as having something wrong. You must be from a very poor family, because why would your father let you travel halfway around the world to work, why isn't he taking care of you, why aren't you married; and so I found out that a few introductions that I had from people in the United States turned out to be situations in which I didn't feel very comfortable. The men would come to meet me, and I knew they were married, and it would only be them and they would want to take me to dinner. Now I think that was probably meant as friendship as much as anything. Then, coming from my background which was terribly small-town and Protestant moral, I found this very uncomfortable. So that was a problem. Perhaps my best Indian girlfriend, her father started to make obscene telephone calls to me at night, and I recognized his voice. I found situations like that which were difficult for me to handle. Much later in my life, a very wise friend of mine, who has also spent a good deal of his career in south Asia, said to me, "Well, you know, Ernie, then you were a young woman and now you're something else, because when Western women reach a certain age, they become sort of a third sex in that part of the world, and you're safe now. Nobody's bothering you in 1983 in India because you're old, but in 1963 you weren't, and that's the difference." I think he may have had a point. I'm not sure. India has changed a great deal in 35 years, but also there is that aspect. Western women alone without male protection in the early '60s were considered to be wanton and sort of fair game for a lot of people, and one had to learn how to deal with it.

Q: Was there concern sort of from the security angle? I'm thinking of compromise by a single American woman working for the consul general being compromised by some male sneaking up on you and having an affair and getting all your secrets, that sort of thing, in the Indian context.

HECK: Oh, I suppose it's possible. At the time, I didn't notice it.

Q: I mean, were you being warned about this?

HECK: No, I was not. On the other hand, I'm sure if I had gone over a certain line, somebody might have warned me. Also, of course, there are very few secrets to sell in the consulate general as opposed to an embassy. We dealt with, as I said before, commercial matters and just some local political reporting and so on. Of course, I had not mentioned before the major role that USIA played there, the public information angle of presenting our ideas, American ideas and American films and so on, was a very big part of our life.

Q: This period of '63 to '67 is a very interesting one in America. In the first place, within two months President Kennedy was assassinated. Did that have any impact in Bombay or not?

HECK: President Kennedy's death had a tremendous impact. I suspect it had that all over the world, most certainly in India and most certainly in west India. I for the next three years was the deputed person to go out and meet Indians of all types and levels of society and education, who came in bearing the most extraordinary range of gifts for Mrs. Kennedy usually, sometimes for the United States in general. These were almost always things that were handmade, and they were about President Kennedy or pictures of President Kennedy, articles about President Kennedy, poems to Mrs. Kennedy or to the children. I have seen his face woven into cloth, painted on things, wood-crafted, just an extraordinary range from the sublime to the ridiculous, but all very heartfelt. We had a memorial service for him in the Anglican cathedral in town. The mob was tremendous. The church was absolutely packed, and there were people outside, and everyone wearing white. White in India is the color of mourning. People stopped you on the street to say how sorry they were. No, the outpouring from India was absolutely tremendous. President Kennedy grabbed the imagination of the world, certainly of the Asian world in a way that perhaps no one else had done, as far as I know, up till that time. I only remember one sort of negative note, and here again it was from some of my British friends, and I think it certainly is not a sign of being British; it's a sign of being young and selfish. By the time I heard it happened on what for me was a Friday night, Saturday morning, I was lying in bed. It was two o'clock in the morning, and I was reading The Portrait of Dorian Gray.

Q: Oscar Wilde.

HECK: And somebody knocked on the door, and I went to the door. I guess I was not surprised. Nothing seemed to surprise me in those days. It would if someone knocked on my door today. It was one of the communications, one of what we call code clerks. It was one of the guys who was a communicator. He stopped by. He said he had seen my light on, and he came in to tell me that President Kennedy had been killed. I put the book down, and to this day I've never finished The Portrait of Dorian Gray, and I don't even want to. To me it was like closing a door. We all went into the office the next morning, and we pulled out the FAMS, the Foreign Affairs Manuals, to find out what we were supposed to do in the case of the death of a President. Certainly I didn't know, and my boss didn't know either, but there is in the book somewhere a whole section on what you do. One of the things that you do is send out black-bordered announcements. Normally one has more time. One knows if somebody is ill. It takes time. We didn't expect a young vibrant man to be shot at the age of whatever, 40-something. So we had none of this stuff on hand, and there was nowhere in town to buy any of it, and so we sat around with what amounted to black magic markers, the equivalent in 1963, and we made by hand black-bordered paper to send these notices out, and we sent them out. After we had taken care of all the normal things, finding a book, getting the book open, putting up the prep.

Q: You're talking about a book in which people sign, a condolence book?

HECK: A condolence book, I'm sorry - and doing all of the things that one does in the death of an official. I began to take care of my boss's social calendar to call people, to explain why things were being canceled or why he could not come; and when it was all over, I did my own. Actually we did our own, because the other secretary and I did this very much as a team. In any case, we were going to have a party, and we had to cancel the party at very short notice. Saturday night was the party, and this was Saturday morning, and so we started calling around, and everyone was very gracious except one of our young British bachelor friends who worked for the P&O steamship line who was very miffed that we would dare to cancel this party that they were looking forward to just because of this silly thing about our President being killed. Didn't we understand that they wanted the party? But that was one instance, and no one else. We were joined by the love of many, many thousands of people in Bombay over the death of President Kennedy. It was a real turning point for all of us.

Q: Were you feeling any reflections from the fact that, I guess it was in 1962, there had been this confrontation with China up in the Himalayas and that the United States had given some support there? Did that ring at all within Bombay?

HECK: Yes, it did. It rang all over. Well, it certainly rang to some extent in Bombay and most definitely among the more sophisticated, more educated people who followed what was happening in the world. I suspect it resonated all over India. India had not expected to be attacked by China in October of '62. The government certainly should have seen it coming. The army was terribly ill prepared, and perhaps the powers that be in New Delhi were aware of it, but certainly the people weren't. When this happened, the issue at hand had to do with disputed borders which had been drawn on the maps both on the northwest and the northeastern borders between India and China, had been drawn on the maps by the British. Of course, they just took a pen and drew a line down a map. It didn't matter when they were ruling the earth, but after they left, it did matter. The Chinese attacked simultaneously in both the northeastern and the northwest areas. In the northwestern area the argument had to do, of course, over disputed borders, but the Chinese really needed the northwestern area that they wanted from India because they were building a road or had built a road and it cut across the great thumb of what belonged to India. The northeastern border may or may not have been a diversionary tactic, but in any case they did attack at both places. The people in India were absolutely shocked. The people hadn't expected it. There had been some rhetoric, but there's always rhetoric and who pays any attention, that sort of thing. All over India people were collecting gold. Women were throwing in their bracelets and this sort of thing to pay for it. The bottom line is that the Indians got their nose really bloody. In the process the United States offered help to Pundit Nehru, the Prime Minister, Jawaharlal Nehru, and we did in fact send some military and other kinds of assistance, about which I know very little, to the Indian government. India knew about this and India was grateful, Indians themselves were grateful. So in 1962-63 when we had helped against their enemy, the Chinese, and were providing food to help them face the problems that they had agriculturally, things were good. The India-U.S. relationship is very closely tied to the Pakistan-U.S. relationship and the Pakistan-India relationship, which brings us to 1965 when there was fighting between India and Pakistan both in May and in September of that year. At that point, I guess, one could say, although, believe me, I was no political officer at that time and I was sitting a long way away, but I would say that with that and our ties with Pakistan, our star went on the descendant for a great period of time with India. But the relationship is a triangular for us always with India, and I'll talk about that at some other point. So in 1963 things were fine. We were very much a friend. India was still licking its wounds from what it had learned in fighting with the Chinese on the Malayan line in the northwest and in the northeast, and we were a friend.

Q: Did you pick up, at the dinner parties working for the consul general at the diplomatic consular parties and all and business class, any feel for sort of the view of Nehru and the United States, his view toward the United States and what we considered Nehru to be?

HECK: By the time I reached Bombay in September of '63, the favorite party game in India was After Nehru, Who? Nehru was by then an old, tired, sick man. The war with China had probably been the final straw that changed him. He did not die until May of 1965, but it was a twilight period for him. It was something of a death watch about him by the foreign press, the local press, less noticeably and less openly but definitely there. A book was written after Nehru, who was, as I said, the subject of a great deal of conversation. So, no, it didn't cross my radar screen at that point. Yes, he was still the Prime Minister, but he was increasingly tired and his daughter, Indira Gandhi, was in effect protecting him from the outside world. Other members of the Congress Party, his party, were jockeying for position. It was a time of transition. So at that point his life was behind him.

Q: Did you get any feel from what you were picking up about India and the USSR, the Soviet Union?

HECK: In Bombay in those days the Soviet had a much larger consulate than we did, but I suspect that they were more appreciated in New Delhi, where they represented the diplomatic force of their nation, than they were down in Bombay, which was, and I think still is, a rather happy, gay, ebullient society, and the Soviet diplomats of those days were not in that category. They in many cases didn't have a lot of English. They did have a lot, I must admit, of regional tongues. They were very good at that, but they were very serious and very dour, as one expects from that period of time. So their influence locally had to do with what they had purchased, and I think that's probably true of most of India until the fall of the Soviet Union in the late '80s, beginning of '90. The Soviet Union, until they could no longer afford it, owned a good deal of the press in India. I mean by that that they supported, surreptitiously but supported, a wide variety of leftist press all over the country. They put a lot of money in Bombay into what I would call a tabloid called Blitz, which was read all over the country. It always had spicy pictures, ala the British tabloids - well, not very spicy by our standards, but by Indian standards pretty spicy - lots of interesting gossip, but always with a really vitriolic twist to anything that had to do with politics. The support was for the leftists in the government, lip service at least and probably more to the Congress Party, and we were enemy number one - well, for the foreigners, as the rightist political types in India were the enemy number one for them internally. At that point in Bombay the rightist parties in the '60s won the Shiv Sena, which is a state party in Maharashtra built around the concept of supporting Maratha people against outsiders from other parts of India, particularly south Indians then who were taking over jobs in the city. That was one of their bugaboos that got a lot of this, and the Swatantra Party, which is more into other things now. I suppose you could say it's the grandfather of perhaps even the BJP or the Bharatiya Janata Party, which is the major opposition in India in the late '90s. But we were definitely the foreign enemy number one. We outranked the British on this, because we were more powerful.

Q: Was there any reflection - you were young and single and going out - in society were you picking up, was there a leftist inclination in the academic institutions, or were the people you were seeing more involved in commerce?

HECK: If there was then, I did not see it, no. The leftist inclination in Bombay in the '60s would have been - it was a class thing, I would have said. There were leftist trade unions. There was a major trade union, and still is - I believe it to be still existent today - that at that point in time was getting a lot of money from the Soviet Union, and it was their trade union, as it were. Trade unions had a major role, still do, in India. A lot of what happened in India in the mid-'60s really came from the London school of economics in London of the mid-'30s. Part of the reason is because Nehru was impressed by this, but it came at the country from other directions as well. So there was a leftist, socialistic sort of bent there aside from what the Soviets might or might not be doing. Of course, in this period the Chinese had been, as it were, rolled up. There was a Chinese community locally in India, and there still is, people who came some time ago as well as reasonably recently, so there were so-called Chinatowns in the major cities, but the Chinese government had been closed with the war, so there was no competition there. We did have quite a strain of various kinds of Arab pressures in Bombay in those days. The Kuwait consulate was very important. The Emir of Kuwait came every year. But there were also honorary consulates or regular consulates representing a number of the countries in the Middle East in those days, and there was a good deal of trade back and forth including, I might add, smuggling. I remember going out at one point to a place called Madh Island. It's not spelled M U D; it's M A D H. But anyway, we were going out to spend some time with a Bohemian Australian artist and his wife who had a cottage on the other side of the island. We took the ferry across to the island. We were met by a bullock cart. We rode in this bullock cart for what seemed like forever - because a bullock cart is not a very comfortable place to be - to the other side of the island, and there we were in this very, very lovely sort of get-away place with a cottage. The cottage was made out of mud and was actually covered with cow dung as a paste that makes the walls smooth. The roof was made of palm fronds and was full of all sorts of things that went bump in the night, and it had a mud floor. We slept outside. We just ate inside of this place where we had a little sort of a campfire built, and Indian wooden stove - I don't know how to explain it. But in any case, we stayed in this what seemed to us to be paradise-lost sort of atmosphere until we walked down to the village. There we were in this country where nobody could import anything, and all of these men were wearing the cloth of choice that year which was Terylene, a shiny synthetic something-or-other with shiny synthetic shirts - terribly uncomfortable in the climate, but that was modern - and they were all smugglers. They had fancy radios, and they had all sorts of electric equipment that we didn't see in the city, because they were smuggling into Oman basically, I think.

Q: And Trucial states too, because I saw the other end of it again when I was in Dhahran. Gold used to go in and all sorts of stuff. This was part of that trade that had been going on before the United States was even dreamed of.

HECK: Absolutely. So there was that sort of smuggling, but there was more legitimate support from the various Arab countries. That remains till this day. One has to remember when dealing with India that the second largest Muslim country in the world is India. So other countries which are Islamic have an interest.

Q: Indonesia is number one?

HECK: And India is number two.

Q: You were talking about economic matters, the smuggling and the economy and all. Were you picking up anything, gnashing of teeth or something, at the consulate general because of the Indian controls over attempts of Americans to develop commercial enterprises and that sort of thing?

HECK: Well, India did not open its doors commercially in reality until about 1991. So between Indian independence in '47 and 1991, it was a very controlled economy. Yes, it was a very complicated thing to be an American businessman. We didn't really have American small business in those days in that part of India at least. The major firms, I suspect, had all been there before the British left, although I do not know that for a fact. They were mainly the oil companies. Esso was there. Was it called Esso in those days? It may have been called Standard Oil. I don't remember what it was in '63, but what is now Exxon was there, and there were three or four others which were big, and the Bank of America and CitiBank were both there. There again, they were later closed out during Mrs. Gandhi's reign in the '70s, but while I was there, they were big players. And there was a rather large Chamber of Commerce, but it basically represented that sort of firm. There wasn't anything else. So the opportunity for American businesses to come in really didn't pertain at that point.

Q: Well, from what you could see, did we tell American business no point in trying, because part of our business is what is called trade opportunities, and this would be a good place to send your goods or set up shop or do this sort of thing? Do you know how we dealt with that?

HECK: I don't think that we got too many of that sort of request, although I was working for the boss, so I didn't see the letters that went back and forth from the economic and commercial people. I just don't know. It's a good question, and I don't have an answer for it. I do believe that at that point Bombay probably had not yet overtaken Calcutta as the major business city, although it might have just begun to overtake it.

Q: What was the role of the consul general in Bombay as far as his influence and all?

HECK: To be a consul general in India is a rather difficult position, because the ambassador, of course, is the ambassador and yet you're a thousand miles from him. So in a way you're the vice ambassador for your region, but on the other hand, depending on what the relationship between the ambassador and the consul general is, he may want you kept on rather short leash. While I was there, our ambassador was, first of all, Chester Bowles, who was there on his second tour in New Delhi and of whose background you are probably aware. He is very much a man of the people. This was the image that he projected. He liked the glad hand, and he liked to get out in the crowds. He liked to ride a bicycle, when he was there on his first tour, with his kids around New Delhi. He was very - I'm searching for the word - not progressive necessarily but very much on that side of society, whereas my consul general, Mr. Rewinkel, of whom I was very fond, had come to this post from a career in Europe. Between him and his wife, they spoke nine languages, European languages, none of which except English they could use in Bombay, but he came from a much more old-school type of foreign service. So there was less than complete accord between the two, and I think he was rather circumscribed by New Delhi. He did a lot of representational type things, both in his own home and that sort of thing, but tours, sort of grand tourné sort of things, where he would go out and show the flag around the consular district, giving speeches and meeting governors and meeting chief ministers and this sort of thing; in other words, the ceremonial role was very much a part of his bailiwick. Of course, like any principal officer, he was responsible for everything else that went on in the place, and he did an awful lot of work with the business community but he had a very able number two who was in charge of the economic and commercial side of things. So I would say that basically his was a role of pro-consul for the American community and American presence. He was the flag.

Q: Those were the days of high Cold War, and were we watching the Communist influence, the local Communist influence?

HECK: Well, very much so in our district. I'm sure they were from Madras watching in Kerala. Our major political problem within the district at that point, aside from just watching these various things going on about whether the Shiv Sena was growing and whether it was driving out the south Indians and so on - our consular district for Bombay includes Goa. Goa had been a Portuguese colony. It's where the remains of Saint Francis Xavier are, and even today it looks very Portuguese in many ways, parts of it at least. The Indians took it over against the Portuguese will a few years previous. This was a major concern of the United States government. Of course, it didn't really matter, I suppose, so much to the American consulate general located in Bombay, India, but it made a good deal of difference in terms of American policy in Europe, because the Portuguese, of course, were very upset and they were trying to gather support amongst their friends and allies in Europe and in the United Nations. So watching what was happening in Goa was rather important for us. You know, I don't even remember what year this all took place, maybe in 1959 when basically the Indians just walked in from three sides and there was nothing the Portuguese could do except leave. It was not a bloody conflict at all. But since the take-over - however one wants to describe it - until 1964, no American diplomat was allowed to go to Goa. So it was a big thing in 1964, late summer of '64 or early fall, when it was decided among Washington, Delhi and Bombay, our consulate general in Bombay, that our political officer would be sent to Goa, and that was our first chance, four years later, to get any sort of feel on the ground for how things were.

Q: Rather obscure political point. I mean one could have made it just the other way, that we paid a lot of attention. These things get rather exquisite sometimes.

HECK: Well, yes, and I doubt very much that anyone in Lisbon cared one way or another or even noticed whether two political officers, one from New Delhi and one from Bombay, actually went to Goa in the fall of '64.

Q: Ernie, how did another place which became rather important to both of us play at this '63 to '67 - talking about Vietnam? How did that play during that period?

HECK: I don't think the Indian press paid much attention to it. My major knowledge of Vietnam - believe me, in this period, Stu, it might as well have been on the moon in terms of my own personal understanding of what was going on. What happened was that the Peace Corps came to India in 1964, I believe. We got Peace Corps Four. The first three groups went elsewhere, but our district got Peace Corps Four, and from then on through 1967 when I left, we had a rather large Peace Corps presence in our district. I don't remember the numbers. I would guess perhaps 100 in the district. As I remember - and this may be faulty remembrance - what they basically did was help farmers. They did an awful lot of work with chickens. I cannot tell you how important chickens were in the district at that point, because, as you know, a number of people in India are vegetarian, but some vegetarians will eat eggs if those eggs are not fertilized. So we were helping teach farmers how to improve the strains and how to have better chickens, and there was also an effort afoot by some of our PCVs, our Peace Corps Volunteers, to market veg eggs. There were veg and non-veg eggs. A veg egg meant that it was a vegetarian egg and there was not a rooster in the henhouse, and a non-veg egg meant that there was a rooster in the henhouse, so people could buy the kind of egg they wanted in case they were vegetarian but would be willing to eat the egg as long as no rooster had been around.

Q: I guess that happens, doesn't it?

HECK: That roosters come into henhouses?

Q: No, no, I mean that a chicken lays eggs no matter what, fertile or nonfertile.

HECK: A chicken just keeps on laying eggs, whether there's a rooster around or not. But what I remember about the Peace Corps was that it was populated with a very nice bunch of young guys. Even as the Peace Corps is today, there were a few people who were further along in their life. In fact, there were even some retired couples, a couple of them. But basically these were grad-student-age people, probably younger than the Peace Corps would get today. It was common knowledge - in fact, they would talk about it - that the reason most of these young men were there was to get out of going to Vietnam, because they wanted to avoid or perhaps they knew their numbers and their numbers were too high on the draft list. But in any case, I remember laughing at the fact that here we had all these sort of nice young boys from Brooklyn and places like that out there teaching these farmers, whose families had been there for thousands of years, how to raise chickens. Probably the only chicken you'd ever see in Brooklyn in those days was frozen and in a store somewhere. They certainly didn't have them running around the streets. I think that they would have been better off with a bunch of farm kids, but basically they weren't farm kids, they were draft dodgers or at least those who wished to avoid military service.

Q: Who tended not to come from the farming or small town areas which tended to be more patriotic...

HECK: And were sending their boys out to be killed.

Q: Be killed, yes.

FRANK P. COWARD
Education Officer, USIS
Madras (1953-1968)

Frank P. Coward was born in New York in 1918. He graduated from Union College in 1942, served in the US Army from 1942-1946 overseas, and received his Master's in Education from the University of New York at Buffalo in 1952. His career with USIA led to assignments in India, Thailand and Burma. In 1993 Mr. Coward was interviewed by Fred Coffey.

COWARD: In November, 1962, the Agency, forgetting that November 11 was a national holiday, gave me an extra day of freedom as the orientation began on the 12th instead of the designated 11th.

In February, 1963, we were assigned to India. I had not anticipated going to India. It was interesting to me as a critique of American education, although I had been entirely privately educated, there was absolutely nothing in my education that prepared me for India.

Q: So in no way did you indicate to the Agency that you would like to go to South Asia or India. You had no preferences?

COWARD: That is interesting because I wasn't even asked whether I had a preference and I had joined having spent a reasonable amount of time in Europe, not only with the Army but also doing graduate work at the University of Lausanne. I assumed we were going to go happily off to Europe. We were two thirds of the way through the orientation and I had heard nothing about an assignment. I asked and somebody thought it was strange that I didn't already know. I didn't. So we were assigned to India, where we went in February, 1963, and stayed for 4 ½ wonderful, learning years.

Q: When you went off to India, Frank, you were already established in how many languages?

COWARD: In two, French and German.

Q: Where were you assigned in India and what was your position?

COWARD: I was assigned to Madras as Education Officer. In India the big push at that time was in education and I would think few countries anywhere pay as much attention to and spend as much money on education as India. This is probably prevalent throughout Asia, but in India it is absolutely noticeable, the amount of money and preoccupation of families with the education of young people.

Q: So the Agency in fact drew upon your professional background as a teacher as an assignment.

COWARD: Absolutely, because we were then reaching out for university students. We selected certain major universities in each of the consular districts and the Madras consular district would have been the size of France and the Benelux countries. Each one of the districts, Calcutta, New Delhi, Bombay, Madras had an education officer. The purpose was to work entirely with university officials, reaching students. In that area I traveled probably two and a half weeks out of every month operating what we called university programs.

Q: What is a university program?

COWARD: Well, a university program was first of all contacting the vice chancellor of the university to find out if he was interested in having a group of American university professors come down and...typically we spent a week, an academic week on the campus. I would have anywhere from three to six American university professors who would be sent out. Of course this had been planned out in our budget request. They would come for a fixed schedule of dates arranged with the university in whatever subject matters, whether history, science, literature, etc., that the faculties requested and the American professors took over the class periods.

We also had entertainment programs for the evenings where one of the big things that we did...We were fortunate in India that it was the time when the musical "My Fair Lady" was coming. That was a natural because it was Bernard Shaw and, of course, all of the Indian universities were British oriented. So this enabled us to have a sure fire...you could sell Bernard Shaw, whereas you couldn't sell all American literary giants. So we would do that sort of thing in the evenings.

The professors would also have bull sessions, or we would bring in people from our own posts to involve students in informal discussions. We took exhibits and a mobile unit. So we had films and exhibits, in connection with the visiting American professors.

Q: Considering the competition for student and faculty attention at universities can you describe what competition you did have? Were the Soviets pretty active in your area? Or other groups that really weren't encouraging American penetration into the universities?

COWARD: Well, there was no serious competition at that time. My memory is that the Russians never did much cultural activities. What they pursued was science and I have no recollection of them bringing in groups as we did. The nearest would have been perhaps the German Max Mueller Bavan and, of course, the British Council. But there were enough universities and enough students and the territory was sufficiently large that I would not say we were ever competitive in that sense. In any event, particularly with the British Council we were very cooperative in our programs. We had very friendly relations with them.

Q: Did you feel that this was a worthwhile program for the US Government to be involved in?

COWARD: Oh, absolutely. It was good both ways in that it brought American professionals out, gave them a variety of experiences and the universities were most hospitable and the students lapped it up. It was a very happy association in those days. That was during the end of Galbraith and during Ambassador Bowles tenure. It was very buddy, buddy. Those were good years.

Q: Did you have other activities other than the university programming?

COWARD: No, those university programs...that was an office in USIS, an adjunct, of course, of the cultural activities, but it was a separate entity. Due to the size of the consular district, the territory to be covered... Andhra Pradesh, Karnataka, Tamil-Nadu and Kerala, our entire area...and, of course, the Madras universities as well. So there wouldn't have been time for any other activities.

Q: What interest did you find other than just the discussion brought by the professors in the United States amongst the university students?

COWARD: The Indian university students, of course, were fascinated...the two cultures were so different. The Indian culture with the family unit being so strong, a paternalistic society, except in Kerala which is a matriarchal society. They were very structured. We used to say that no Indian boy becomes a man until his father dies because the family structure is so strong. They were very much interested in the freedom of choice that Americans had. Particularly in southern India, an area where the arranged marriages and other cultural ties were still very, very strong. Northern India, in the sense of Delhi and Bombay, were more liberal because that is where the big impact of both the British and American cultural activities, social contacts, commercial interests came together. South India had never been a battleground in the sense that northern India had due to the capital and major commercial interests being there. Therefore the most conservative ties in Indian society were in the south.

It made it very worthwhile. The difficulty was that most American professors have a rather missionary approach to life. It was very difficult to get them to listen. In general, they only wanted to preach. I always felt it was a good thing when Jimmy Carter came out and reminded us that this was a two-way road and that we should listen and learn. Of course, that was nice rhetoric but it never really worked because as Americans our tendency is not to listen but to preach and Asian societies are very much aware of our tendency to do just that.

Q: Did you feel that all of our programs in your area were in fact one way, preaching?

COWARD: By and large I am afraid that is what happened. I remember AID was down there. We had some interesting experiences. When Abe Sirkin, for whom I had a very high regard, was PAO, he was very much concerned that we be of service to these people and that we fit ourselves to their specified needs and not take whole cloth Washington's set goals, bring them out and put them on.

I can remember my experience at Carnatic University, an agriculture university, going over and speaking to the vice chancellor because it was felt we should be pursuing agricultural activities and helping them to become self-sustaining. I asked the vice chancellor about a program. I remember him saying, "Now, if all you are going to do is bring out a group of professors to tell us how to operate when two-thirds of my faculty are American trained, I am not interested." "But," he said, "If you will bring out some people who will tell me why when two-thirds of my professors have been American trained and it still isn't working, you have a program." So we organized ourselves on that basis and the Agency sent in a professor from Japan. I can still see Abe Sirkin's face when this professor, with no Indian experience, began to tell the Indian students and professors at the university how things worked in Japan. It was a dreadful moment because it was absolutely what the vice chancellor had not wanted. The man knew nothing about India and instead of cutting the program, which we wanted to do, we were aware that every American professor has a congressman who is a friend and that meant that it wasn't always as easy as it might have been. You didn't have your druthers.

Q: You were in Madras for how many years?

COWARD: For four and a half.

Q: During that period you must have established some very interesting, if not strong, relationships with the universities after they had seen your programs, approach and adaptability.

COWARD: We had very interesting times. One unusual thing we did in working with students...certainly the first time anywhere in the south...we took male and female students from two different colleges up to the Laurence School at Wellington, which is in the Ooty Hills by Coimbatore for a weekend of just plain student activities...getting together, sharing ideas. The principal at the women's college from Madras had said, "If it were anybody else I never would have allowed the girls to go." This was quite an extraordinary breakthrough. They went from two separate campuses. One reason why it worked was that at a Hindu college, and I can't remember which, there was an American nun, Sister Ann Xavier, who was vice principal. The principal was a good Hindu lady. Sister Ann was just the most remarkable person. She went along as an escort for the girls. It was a wonderful weekend and a good experience because we were all trusted. I think all the way around it turned out to be a rewarding experience. Sister Ann Xavier (was her name) was from Maine.

Q: Was this towards the latter part of your assignment?

COWARD: Oh yes, that would have been towards the latter part, after I had established credentials and was known. Most Asians in my experience operate on vibes. They are perfectly aware that you probably have all the credentials, you are assigned to an embassy, you have an official title and all that, but what they want to know is: Can you be trusted? Are you really being honest? Are you being a human being? When they have established these vibes at the warmth level it works. But if the vibes are bad, you are not going to get to first base because while Asians never say no, that does not mean they are saying yes.

Q: Frank, are you emphasizing the importance of the last ten feet of contact, person to person? How important is the individual versus the material you had in hand?

COWARD: My experience is that the individual makes the difference. I came out of teaching, therefore, I suppose I had a makeup which led me to feel that I was supposed to be of service to somebody. So I guess I tended to personalize most of my relationships, but for me personally in the assignments that worked. While it takes all different kinds, I think that kind must be included, although my experience with the Agency suggests that personalization of relationships is not by any measure a priority approach. But where I have seen that happen the happiest relationships, the nearest contacts, the most appreciation, it seems to me there was a quality of personalization that underlay the activity, that underlay the success of some particular program or contact or relationship.

Q: That is an interesting viewpoint. May I ask you then what are the qualities of an Agency officer in your experience in India or elsewhere which will provide the quality of relationships that is so important in exchange of information.

COWARD: Well, that is a little difficult perhaps to define. I can remember when I had my Fulbright in Vienna there was an American girl from New Jersey in our group who was majoring in music as a singer. She made the comment that the differences in singing...if you were to bring out the emotion that was intended in an opera, and I use her New Jersey accent, "Yeah gotta be a Mensch." Everything was in the word "Mensch" and what it means. It has to do with being a human being and understanding that you are addressing a human being and expressing the emotion of a human being. It has nothing to do with your personal prejudice, politics, it is one human being to another. I think that is vital because in the final analysis of cross-culture, that is what you are doing.

Q: Are there any particular incidents, activities, programs within your sphere in South Asia that you would like to mention at this point?

COWARD: I had an interesting experience during the Indian language riots when I had a program including 5 visiting Americans going on at Sri Venkateswara University and I was there as the personal house guest of the vice chancellor, a very impressive person. I was staying at his residence while the program was going on. The campus was under guard because all of south India, particularly university students, was going up in smoke at the arbitrary imposition of Hindi as the national language.

Q: What year are we talking about?

COWARD: This would have been 1967, I believe. People said it was worse in south India than during the separation of India. We had people tied to trees, burned, and, of course, they always attacked school buses and government property.

Anyway, a group of demonstrators came towards the vice chancellor's residence and officials called and said they had ordered the gates closed. Any group in India always picked up all kinds of bystanders. No matter the original question, everyone else has some grievance so they just get into the act, they look for the spark.

Anyway, the vice chancellor said, "Well, what do you want to do make it worse? Open the gates and let them in and I will talk with them." So they came down the drive and Dr. Vaman Rau, that was his name, he had been a minister of education in Hyderabad, listened to them. They said that they did not want Hindi pushed on them because the best English was spoken and taught in south India. I remember he patted the head of a little boy and asked him what he was there for. The boy's reply was, "No speak English, sir."

We did "My Fair Lady" outdoors in a pavilion with troops with guns lined up across the front of the stage in case there was a demonstration. My big concern was getting the American speakers back to Madras. We were probably 70 or 80 miles away. The speakers, each one when he had finished his assignment, would go back in a car. I had one lady from Connecticut University whom I had asked, when she was through doing her lecturing, whether she would meet with the students out on the lawn for a bull session. Her reply was, "I do my job, I don't socialize." Well, she socialized at every road block all the way back to Madras, was very distraught, rushed into the office saying they were all going to be murdered on the way coming back into town.

Well, I had to pick my time carefully so I figured the demonstrators would have lots of enthusiasm in the morning but after mid-noon lunch they all liked a little nap, so with one Indian professor of psychology from Madras, who had an American degree and had gone up with us, I figured we would start back at 12:30 hoping everybody was having a little nap. There were about eight roadblocks and we made it through six. When we came to the seventh we were stopped. We were in a government rented car and I felt I had to do something. My Indian psychologist got down on the floor of the car when I got out to talk to the people who were prepared to paint and break windows. They had buckets of white wash to mess up the car. I am talking to the chap who seemed to be the head of this small group...by no means unmanageable because the rest were having a nap. So finally he said, "Say, 'Down with Hindi, up with English.'" I said, "Well, all right, I will say that provided you will say with me, 'Up with the United States' when we are finished." So we did. It was almost a joke because I shouted, "Up with English, down with Hindi" with them and then they all bellowed, "Up with the United States." Then we shook hands and I got in the car and drove away.

Another time at Sri Venkateswara University, when we had a group of American professors and visitors there for a program, we were to have a luncheon outside afterwards. There were a lot of monkeys around and I noticed that the servants were beginning to put out some of the food for the reception that would be three or four hours later. I mentioned to the vice chancellor when I saw him at his office later that I thought it was a little early to put these things out because there were all these monkeys around and they were going to go right after the fruit. His reply was, "Don't worry, we have other monkeys to take care of those monkeys."

Q: How many years were you there before you felt comfortable in this milieu?

COWARD: Oh, I suppose I was there a good year because it was all brand new. As I said I had no preparation for India. Everything was brand new. That was the challenge. That was the sheer delight of it all because you could do what you could do but you didn't know what you could do until you tried it. The Indians were very hospitable. Those were the good years. There was no suspicion of any kind.

Q: What about your children and family situation ...schooling, housing...how did that work out for you?

COWARD: That was interesting because fortunately my wife was very well adapted to this. Her father had been a Woolworth executive as she was growing up and they were regularly moved around. She had attended 8 different schools. So it was natural for her to be moved around, to cope with change. For schooling, in those days only certain officers, and the university affairs officer was not one, could have a car brought in, you had to buy one on the local market and it was very expensive. So we sent the children, because we wanted them to get into the local culture...as I said one reason we did this was to educate our two young children...we sent them to the Theosophical Society School in Adyar, which was just behind us; our house backed up to the Adyar River and facing us on the other side of the river was the Theosophical Society. They went in a rickshaw each morning to the Theosophical Society. They were there for a year. After that we sent our daughter to a local convent school. Our son went from there to a school in Germany for a year. When he came back he went to a Catholic boys school in Madras. Finally both of them went up into the Khodi Hills to the Khodi Kanal School. So for them it was a very wide experience and at their ages...our daughter when we went out was nine and our son turned eleven shortly after we arrived...there were very unforgettable and valuable experiences that opened their minds. It taught them what it was to be a member of a minority. I remember discussing it with them, explaining that we would be a minority as long as we were in India. When they went to the Theosophical Society they were the only white children and our daughter was the only blond. One reason why we moved her into the convent school was that a blond, blue eyed, white child was such a novelty that people liked to pinch her cheeks and pat her head. Neither one did she particularly appreciate, so we kept her there for only one year. I would do it again if I took children of that age because the academics are not nearly as important as the cultural exchange experience.

Q: You were obviously there during the time of the Kennedy assassination. I know the assassination news rebounded throughout the world and all of us were shocked. How was it in your activity?

COWARD: I had a university program at that time at Annamalai University, south of Madras. The vice chancellor there was Sir C.P. Ramaswami Ayer, a major figure in south Indian history. He had been the Dewan of the State of Kerala and made every effort to prevent it from joining the Union, a monumental individual. We received the news about 7:00 in the morning on a Saturday. It was the last day of the program and my chief Indian local came in and said somebody had told him that they had heard on the early news of the assassination of President Kennedy. Well, I could hardly believe it, but I said that this was something we had to check out right away. So he did his checking and discovered that it was true. I immediately canceled the remainder of the program.

Now this all happened between 7:00 and 7:30. I then received by 9:00 a note from Sir C.P, as he was called, saying that he had convened a memorial service in Convocation Hall for 11:00 that same morning and he supposed that I would like to say a few words after him. It was the first memorial service throughout Asia, a fact that demonstrated Sir C.P. 's caliber. However, I was not at all sure that I wanted to say a few words after Sir C.P. given his qualifications and importance. And in any event as an American citizen this was a tremendous shock, something that I could scarcely believe could have happened in my life time.

I was staying in the college guest house and was suddenly aware of shuffling feet outside. There wasn't a sound to be heard except feet, so I went out on the balcony and one couple who were still there with me was one Dr. Cumming, a close friend and former professor of Dean Rusk's at Davidson College in North Carolina and his wife. We went out on the balcony and all the students were marching silently from the four compass points of the campus to the guest house where we, the three Americans, were staying. There wasn't a sound except those feet. When they arrived they stood in complete silence for probably five minutes and then dispersed.

When we went to the Convocation Hall at 11:00, it was an unbelievable sight. The cavernous building was filled to overflowing. They were standing in the windows, hanging in the balconies, out on the lawn, and coming down the aisle, was a portrait of President Kennedy draped in black. The portrait was probably 3 feet tall by 2 feet wide. Where had it come from? Then we had the ceremony. Sir C.P. spoke and then I did very briefly...about three minutes. And that was the end. It was a very moving ceremony. Throughout south India in the smallest, rural villages, they knew John Kennedy. People who would not have known anything about New Delhi or where it was knew that name and felt somehow involved in this cataclysmic event.

Q: It was a cataclysmic event and a wonderful tribute. Frank, after your experience of four and a half years in India, you moved on to where?

JOSEPH N. GREENE, JR.
Deputy Chief of Mission
New Delhi (1963-1968)

Joseph N. Greene, Jr. was born in New York, New York in 1920. He received a bachelor's degree from Yale University in 1941. Mr. Greene joined the Foreign Service in 1942. His career included positions in Canada, Algeria, Italy, Singapore, Germany, Nigeria, India, the United Kingdom (England), and Egypt. Mr. Greene was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1993.

Q: You went from Lagos to New Delhi as DCM and were there from July 1963 until January 1968. Could you give me a feel for what kind of an ambassador Chester Bowles was, and how he operated, and how he used you?

GREENE: He operated as a political person trying to sell to the Indians and his own government his view of the way Indian society ought to be shaped and sustained -- money and arms -- to defend itself against China. And if need be, against Pakistan. He demanded of his staff fidelity to his causes. I was expected to run the mundane part of embassy business. We reorganized the embassy at one point so that the heads of the economic and political sections were both Minister Counselors and the DCM was a Minister. I got to do more of the unpleasant tasks. Tasks that the Indians would see as unpleasant like arguing with them about whether we would provide high-performance aircraft. We had an understanding with them we would do that if they didn't get any MiG 19s or 20s from the Russians. I was the one who reached that understanding and recorded it. Our airplanes came and a couple of weeks later one of our air attachés saw MiG 20s flying around an air base near Agra. After a lot of consultations, I had to call the Indians on it. Chet couldn't think ill of the Indians, he didn't want to call them on it when they were lying. But the rest of the U.S. government expected someone to do that. Once they even sent the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense to ream them out.

Some of the relationships between India and China, and India and the Soviet Union, affected American relations with India, such as the Indian zeal for developing a nuclear weapon. India refused to sign the Non-proliferation treaty despite our urging. The U.S. government went to some pains to assure that the public and political leadership -- the thinking people who in the end would be party to the decision, understood that one got very little security out of having one or two nuclear weapons. In fact, as we tried to explain both publicly and indirectly, the French experience of force de frappe only made them that much more vulnerable to a preemptive, first-take-out strike. We tried to convince the Indian leadership of this. That was part of an intelligence operation. Twenty-five years later, I'm not sure where the bounds of discretion or secrecy are anymore, but I think it was one of our better operations. Our intelligence people were able to get articles printed in the French press which were picked up by the Indian press. In very subtle ways like that, we were able to get the contrary word around about nuclear weapons. That didn't stop the Indians from eventually exploding a device in the Rajasthan Desert some years later. It said nothing for their military capability but presumably made them feel better in that they showed that they could, although maybe not all that smart to proceed from one nuclear explosion to a weapons system. There were a lot of things useful mutually between the Indian services and ours, and, of course, we shared everything with the British.

There were pretty sophisticated operations directed against China. We had a way of keeping track of some of the Chinese nuclear missile tests with systems based in India with Indian cooperation. Even when things went mechanically or scientifically wrong, they were able to get fixed, or at least concealed without public uproar. Going back to the Russians, I remember one day the Chief of Station came in with a blueprint of the latest MiG. I asked him how he had managed that and he said "it only takes one traitor."

I just wanted to flag for further exploration whenever it is appropriate that we did have these cooperative intelligence relationships, and we also ran some operations to be sure we could find out what they didn't want to tell us when we felt we needed to know. None of this was among Chet Bowles' favorite topics. He felt uncomfortable running intelligence operations within or against India.

Q: How would he deal with it? Did it become almost understood that you would be informed of these things so that he wouldn't get stuck?

GREENE: It was very awkward for me sometimes because the theory that you can protect an ambassador by not telling him, is very dangerous. On the other hand, the NSA (National Security Agency) had a unit there monitoring telecommunications in south Asia and they were under Army Attaché cover. I tangled with them a few times over what they were doing. The CIA station chief thought it was more prudent in the end to have someone in the front office aware of what was going on so if there was trouble, or choices had to be made, the DCM at least could help them deal with such things. The station chief and I had a rather close personal and professional relationship that the ambassador didn't share.

Sometime, with a broad brush, it might be interesting to look at how well that arrangement served us. As uncomfortable as my role was at times, I felt it was the right thing to do.

Q: Here you were, you had a very aspiring ambassador. He belonged to the school which didn't want to touch "dirty" things. You are the DCM; our relationship with India wasn't that close, and we use intelligence gathering to keep on top of things. How did you deal with Ambassador Bowles since almost every ambassador tells his DCM he doesn't want to be surprised?

GREENE: Intelligence operations are one of the easiest ways to be surprised if you don't know about them. I just hoped it would never come up, I finessed it. When something did come up I would suggest to the station chief that he tell the ambassador.

President Kennedy, early in his administration, said the ambassador was in charge of everybody and everything in the field. CIA never really went along with that and were always keeping things from the front office.

In India it seemed to be working in affecting the course of political events, by subtle press placements. Certainly we had to "buy" agents. We had to "buy" the guy who got the MiG blueprint. And, of course, one always has the feeling if they will sell to you, they'll sell to other side too. When Ramparts Magazine blew the cover off the Asia Foundation in the late 60s what had been, ostensibly a cultural, educational effort, funded entirely by the CIA through the Asia Foundation office in San Francisco, caused many people who had wanted to help to back off. It was too hot for them in their own society. Any Indian wanting to play the game was at some risk of being exposed.

Q: You mentioned you had problems with the NSA.

GREENE: The army attaché had clued me into what they were doing. One day it was clear that the Indians were going to be moving troops. I thought it was important to make them think twice about it. One very effective way to learn what was going on was to listen to their communications. I said I could run the diplomatic end of it if I could share in the take on what they were getting from the Indian military communications. They said they wouldn't do it. I told them they were just taking up space in the embassy if they weren't going to be a team player. Of course, they couldn't do anything about it there at post but I did raise a fuss back home and in the end, they told me enough to shut me up.

Q: This is one of the problems of intelligence. Often it is filtered to the highest level where, frankly, they don't give a damn. At the lower level where it can be of use, the folks are cut out.

GREENE: That's right. That is not only to protect the operation from unfortunate disclosure. One of the troubles of having information clandestinely obtained, is that by using it you give away the fact that you know it. All too often, if I tell you what I found out, you will figure out how I got it. And I don't want you to do that. So, in a way it is an inhibitor. Once it all gets back to Washington where it becomes part of a massive effort, the question is, who is screening it?

Back to India. There were three episodes involving Soviet defections which I haven't seen recorded. They didn't seem to be mentioned in Dennis Kux's book, Estranged Democracies: India and the United States. It was very thoroughly researched and well documented account of the relationship during a sequence of American and Indian administrations. There is no reference to the defection of Svetlana, Stalin's daughter, to the American Embassy in New Delhi. She just walked in, told a Marine she was Russian and told him she wanted to go to the United States. He called the consul in to discuss a visa with her, and it came out she was Stalin's daughter and that she was unhappy with treatment in the Soviet Union and India. She was in India primarily because she had taken up with an Indian in the Soviet Union. She lived with him several years but he had recently died and she had brought his body back to be cremated. She had no where to go so she came to us. I think it was only three or four hours from the time she walked in to the time she was driven to the airport for a plane to Rome. She had a passport with her name in it, everything done legally. On the same plane was a senior level CIA officer who spoke Russian. They traveled together safely and routinely. A lot of communications were flying back and forth. It had happened at an early hour in New Delhi so it was mid morning in Washington. By the time the plane arrived in Rome, the cat was out of the bag and all hell was breaking loose. The Soviets were angry and the Italians were embarrassed. She was detained several days in Italy until the Swiss agreed to take her until her future could be determined. The Soviets demanded that she be returned. Eventually, she traveled on to the U.S. I learned about all this when I returned from Manila where I had been attending a Chiefs of Mission conference.

The next time I was in Washington, I had lunch with my old friend Malcolm Toon, who was at that time our Director of the Office of Soviet Affairs. We reminisced about the uproar that episode had caused in Washington, particularly during a time when LBJ and Dean Rusk were very sensitive about their relations with the Soviet Union. They didn't want apparently irrelevant things to upset apple carts they were working on. They were mad at Chet for sending Svetlana on her way. Malcolm Toon told me Dean Rusk had commented that it would never have happened if Jerry Greene had been there. I was offended by that, I really didn't know why Dean Rusk thought that, and that was not a rap I wanted to carry.

Q: It certainly shows the bureaucratic mind, up to and including the President and Secretary of State level. Often there are nasty little bits of life that get in the way of vast political maneuvering. Like it or not, there are those people you just know are going to get to the United States. Bowles was absolutely right.

GREENE: There are two other episodes which illustrate that defection question. Some weeks after the above episode, all the embassies in New Delhi got a circular note from the Foreign Office saying the Government of India had decided that it would be regarded as an unfriendly act if any embassy assisted in the defection and departure from India of a person from another country.

There ensued two defection episodes. The first was a man who spoke Russian. He turned up at the British Deputy High Commission's office in Bombay, saying he wanted to go to England. They weren't aware of his credentials nor did they trust him. The British consulted with us and we suggested that we try to find something out about him. One way or another, the British ducked and he wound up as a houseguest in the American Embassy residential compound in New Delhi. The one thing we had to be careful about was whether this was legitimate defection or whether we were being set up by either the Indians or the Soviets. We wanted to be more forthcoming than the British so we granted him asylum while we debated.

The British and we determined it was best to level with the Indian government. In the context of leveling, the defector wrote Ambassador Bowles a letter saying he thought he would be in danger if sent home because of what he had said and done. He requested asylum and asked to go to the United States. I shared the letter with the Indian Home Secretary. Washington didn't want to defy India but we need a resolution. It eventually occurred to me that the ambassador's written reply should be in consultations with the Indians. I asked the Indian Home Secretary what would happen if, following the Indian government's directive, we turned him over to the Indians. We told him we had an obligation to preserve his freedom and the Home Secretary concurred that they did too. Then it took the Indians a couple of weeks to agree to making such assurances in writing through a letter from Chet Bowles to the defector. We explained to him we would turn him over to Indian custody, he would be well looked after and given an opportunity to decide where he wanted to go. In that connection, we had offered the Soviet ambassador a chance to talk to this guy and he told the Soviet ambassador he didn't want to go home.

The denouement was one of the most painful Christmas Eves I had ever spent. We had a tunnel from the main embassy building to the AID annex. It was elaborately arranged that I would walk this guy through the tunnel and when we got to the other end there would be a car from the Indian Interior Ministry, a driver and one guy in it. He had everybody's assurance that if he got into that car he would be free and not persecuted for his defection. It was only a four minute walk but it seemed to take all night. We shook hands, said good by and wished each other good luck, and it was over. Not long after that, after I left India, he wound up in England. The Indians wanted him out of India and eventually the British changed their minds.

Q: In a good sense, you were also putting India on the spot by making sure that they were on record to take care of the situation.

GREENE: The third episode was even more dicey. I still think it was a case of someone trying to set me up. I was at home with my family one evening, the doorbell rang. I was told a Mr. Miklos was here and wanted to see me. Jack Miklos was our consul in Bombay and I wondered why he hadn't sent word. In came someone whom I had never seen before. He spoke passable English and said he was a Russian named Miklos. He had a passport. He had been working on an agricultural development project and didn't want to work on it anymore nor want to return to the Soviet Union. He wanted to go to the United States. I told him that would be difficult. Then I got on the phone and called some colleagues to come over to the house. I didn't want to go anywhere, so instead of going to the embassy, we did it there, including getting the CIA. If the guy had been sent in by the Indians, it was a good act; if he had been sent in by the Soviets, it was still a good act. By the Indians listening to my telephone, they quickly knew who was in these things. All the discussions with this fellow took place out in the garden where no listening devices could pick it up. All the conversations designed to ascertain his authenticity were conducted by our Russian specialist, Roger Kirk. "Miklos" only asked that we not take too long because he had to explain to his boss his absence. Finally, the CIA and the State Department agreed to send him to the U.S. We arranged for him to pick up a visa at the embassy. He was to go in to the press office. I stayed home during all this. The phone rang and our station chief commented that this one had just gone through the cracks. "Miklos" had said he wanted his visa but also wanted the name of a good psychiatrist he could talk to when he got to New York. At the visa office they asked him why he would want a psychiatrist. He said he had told us about his wife and family, but actually, the wife was male and that he really needed to do something about his homosexuality problem and that maybe a psychiatrist could help him. The CIA and all dropped him like a hot potato. The deal was off. The next day I was leaving on an Air India flight through Moscow on home leave. I thought I would see him on that flight but no one ever saw him again.

Q: Two questions occur to me. I have no feeling for the Indian press. How did you find dealing with them?

GREENE: The Indian Express was a very responsible newspaper not given to sensationalism. The Hindustan Times was a reliable paper. The editor of the Express was a good friend of the ambassador and the embassy. The Delhi correspondent of The Hindustan Times was an intelligent, responsible journalist who wound up as a Nieman Fellow at Harvard. There were inflammatory papers and it was difficult to know what effect they had on the political course of events. Some of the most excitable rhetoric used to come from the papers in Calcutta where the Bengalis are excitable people. The Indian Express was more of a peoples' paper. I thought there was responsible reporting and when we wanted something in particular reported, we could get it in, even if it was about American policy in Vietnam. The Indian government felt we were wrong in Vietnam and that our policy and intervention were not supported by the body politic in the United States. LBJ resented that, of course.

CHESTER BOWLES
Ambassador
India (1963-1969)

Ambassador Chester Bowles was born in Massachusetts in 1901. His career included being the Governor of Connecticut (1949-1951); foreign policy advisor to President Kennedy, a member of the 86th U.S. Congress, and an Under Secretary of State. This interview was conducted in 1969.

Q: This is an interview with former Ambassador to India Chester Bowles in his home in Essex, Connecticut, on November 11, 1969. The interviewer is Joe B. Frantz.

Mr. Ambassador -- it's kind of hard to know what to call you, Mr. Secretary, Mr. Ambassador, Mr. Governor -- you've had too many careers. Let's talk a bit about what you were telling me just a moment ago, and that is Mr. Johnson and Indian aid.

BOWLES: You've started with a big subject. In his long record in Congress Mr. Johnson demonstrated that he was for the aid program, I think, very fundamentally. He supported it in the Senate and also in the House. I first knew him when he was elected to the House and kept in touch after he was elected to the Senate. But after he became President he seemed so focused on the problems here at home, that he did very little for the aid program. As President he continued the AID program but didn't work very hard for it. There was one aspect of foreign aid that I don't think he, as well as many other people, understood very well. For twenty years or so we gave the American people the wrong reasons for foreign aid. I'm not talking about specific programs, but it was as if we always felt we were doing "them" a favor, on a personal basis, and they ought to be grateful to us.

Q: It was a kind of charity in a way.

BOWLES: Yes, and that of course is not what it should be. We told the American people that the world would like us better, which it won't. Nations, like people, don't like those they owe something to.

Q: No one likes the banker.

BOWLES: We also told the American people that it would buy votes for us in the U.N. On the contrary, as a sensitive state when you get aid from America, you're inclined to disagree with America to prove that you're sovereign. We also told them that foreign assistance would be over pretty soon, which was not true. And finally we said that economic growth assured political stability, which it certainly doesn't do. On the contrary, economic progress creates internal conflicts over who should get what share. I remember Dean Rusk saying to me a couple of years ago, with great irritation, "Just tell me one damned thing those Indians have ever done for us." And I said, "They've survived for twenty-two years as a democracy, as a vast common market, independent, and that's a fantastic contribution to a stable world." All you're ever going to get out of the aid program in India is the chance of a viable and independent India; maybe its leaders and people will like us, maybe they won't, but it will be free to operate as an independent nation that will resist outside pressures from any source. That's an awful lot. If you can help assure independence for one-sixth of mankind who live in India, you've done a great deal.

I remember talking with LBJ on this subject one time and I said, "I'm not sure that you understand the aid program in India thoroughly, but I know your grandfather would." He asked, "What do you mean by that?" I said, "Your grandfather was a Populist, an agrarian non-Marxist radical. He believed in lower freight rates and lower interest rates; he believed in schools and more doctors and rural roads. He believed in a better break for the little guy. Now that's all our foreign economic assistance is all about. These countries don't want Communism or any other totalitarian ideology. They're much more likely to be with us than the Russians on these things. They just want a better break. They want to see their resources used to their own benefit."

Johnson asked me to write a speech about this, and I agreed to do it. I heard that he wanted to give it at the Associated Press dinner in April, I think, '66 or '67, but I got through with it too late and missed my chance. It could have been a good speech though, which might have provided a fresh insight. I remember Ted Sorensen one time Jokingly told me never to speak about foreign aid in Nebraska, which is his home state. He said, "They'll lynch you out there if you talk about foreign aid." But I went there, a little nervous, to speak to a large audience in Lincoln, and I opened my speech by saying, "I'm not sure you'll understand what I am going to say, but I know your grandfathers would understand." It was the same theme I had brought up with LBJ. I went on to describe the populist Nebraskans of fifty-sixty years ago, and I concluded, "your inability to understand what I'm going to talk about indicates how far you are away from your grandparents in your perspective and ideas." In this framework, my remarks were warmly received. I think that this idea was also effective with Johnson. He didn't work for the aid program in the last two or three years; but this was chiefly because he felt there were so many other problems on the agenda. My own feeling is we don't have to choose between good programs abroad and good programs at home -- we've got nearly a trillion dollar gross national income. Nevertheless, we know the difficulty of getting these domestic problems through and how difficult it is to keep Congress in line. I go back to the fact that we never really told Congress the whole story. Only on rare occasions have we really been honest about foreign aid with Congress. Each year, rather, it has been an expedient effort to get the bill through at any cost, and wild promises are made that can't be kept. Too frequently, the aid program has been in the hands of the country desks in the State Department, which have used it politically. Instead of striving for economic growth, the objective has been to quiet down this general or to buy that admiral, to avoid a revolution or to encourage whatever you're after. My own belief is that AID's sole purpose is to help the recipient country function better, stand on its own feet, and maintain its independence. There should be no assumption of gratitude expected for it. Our country has no right to say to another country, "You've got to vote with us in the UN." We would have a right, however, to say, "You've got to spend the loan or grant we're giving you in an intelligent way, not waste it; and you've got to see that it goes to the priority needs. You've got to see that your tax program really taxes your people, that your people are allowed to own the land they farm, that you're doing all you can to make the best use of the aid." I've always felt that aid given to countries that just aren't doing their share or their own part in their own behalf is wasted. This is true in large measure in Latin America, where they have taken aid from us, but in the meantime have not taxed their own well-to-do people very much. And a lot of the money we give to Latin America promptly goes abroad to be invested in Wall Street or tucked away in a Swiss bank. This makes no sense. I would have been a lot tougher on demanding economic criteria to prevent this misuse of our funds. Now, India, by and large, is pretty good on this score. Almost no capital gets out of the country. Foreign exchange is very scarce, and they're very rigid about it, very austere. They want it to go for essentials not for luxuries for a few. Put it around another way: If Latin America had been half as tough as India has been, Latin America would have been over the hump long ago. One story concerning LBJ and American aid which might interest you concerns the Food for Peace Program. India in '65 and '66 had two droughts back to back. This was the first time that had occurred in a hundred years. And the horror of it was this: there are always a lot of unseen food reserves in India -- tucked away in family reserves, dealer reserves and government reserves; so when a drought hits they draw upon these reserves. But on the rare occasion when another drought occurs on top of the first, there are no reserves. As a result, the Indians needed about ten million tons of wheat a year, which could only come from us. At one point we were delivering wheat at the rate of three shiploads a day. The schedule was so tight that we called it a "ship-to-mouth" program; it just never went through a warehouse at all. It went right to the villages and towns where it was required. It was very close.

I told LBJ beforehand that such a massive request for assistance was going to come and that a positive response was going to be very crucial. I said, "You've got the authority to go ahead with this program through Congress already." And he replied, "Well, we ought to do all we can, I agree, but I should go back to Congress and talk to them further about it." I said, "Why? You've got the authority." But he, with a much better knowledge of politics than I, proved himself to be right. He called in twenty-eight or thirty senators, and gave them one of the most thoughtful talks I ever listened to on why we should agree to provide the wheat.

Q: You were there?

BOWLES: I was there. He gave an extremely thoughtful presentation on why we wanted to do the right thing. He explained that if we were doing it simply to "stop the Communists", we would appear very cynical. There was not one sign of that sort of view in it. He said instead, "We've got a lot of wheat, and we've got some very poor human beings in deep trouble; we have the power to help them and give them some hope in the future. Shall we do it or shan't we?" And the whole room, including some pretty hard-boiled reactionary individuals who had never shown much interest in people of any kind

Q: Not exactly aid advocates?

BOWLES: The President turned to each one of them -- particularly the ones he expected trouble from -- and said, "Do you agree that we should go ahead with this?" He went right around the room and asked each one of them. And the response was unanimous. There was only one question raised and that was, "Why don't we give the wheat as a grant? Why don't we just give it to them?"

The next day he called in about sixty members of the House, including many of the doubters and rebels, and he put on the same performance. It was excellent.

Now, here's what puzzles me. Later, after the program of shipments had begun, he held this food up on many occasions. He took personal charge of many aspects of this program, when he might normally be expected to leave the details to other officials, such as the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Agriculture and the Director of A.I.D.

Even though he already had the authority to send the wheat and had the arrangements made, he would wait until the last moment before he would personally authorize the wheat shipments. As a result, the Indians found it very hard to maintain a rationing estimate, because they couldn't know what to count on. The American Embassy in New Delhi was in an awful jam, because we couldn't blame LBJ or blame the U.S. Government. Yet we had to explain to India why we weren't giving them wheat, or looked as though we were about not to give it to them. This has always puzzled me; I have never understood why he did it.

Q: You never got any clue as to his method here?

BOWLES: One thing I think that caused it is that he felt, as I feel very strongly, that you should not help nations that don't help themselves. And I think he properly felt that Indians should modernize their agriculture and do all they could to feed themselves. Actually the Indians were making amazing changes in their agricultural techniques and were more eager to be self-sufficient than anyone. But Johnson was fed some utterly false information from some embittered businessmen who could not persuade the Indian Government to let them set up plants there. And he believed them instead of those of us who had full access to the facts.

Now, to diverge just a minute. In the fifties, we also sent wheat to India -- two or three million tons a year -- for the purpose of holding down urban food prices. There's a mild Marxist strain in India, and the "proletariat" of the cities were supposed to be potential trouble-makers. So the Indian government came to us and said, "We've got to curb this worker discontent, and please give us some wheat so we can hold these prices down." This we did. But in holding down price to the consumer, which was good, we held down the incomes of the farmer, which was bad. The farmer had no incentive to produce at all. He had no way to market his surplus production. Therefore, he just raised enough to live on and remained backward. We inadvertently helped to create this situation, from which wrongly emerged the image of the Indian peasant as a hopelessly apathetic person who never tried new things.

Now, my AID director in India, John Lewis, and I and some of my other associates in India, I think to a degree, changed this. As prices started to go up in '64, '65 and '66, the incentive for the farmer went up too. And suddenly this supposed apathetic, dead-to-the-world peasant became interested in seeds and fertilizers and irrigation and all kinds of new things; his mind opened up incredibly. We reported on these changes, but I don't think LBJ ever really took note of them. I think he persisted in the mistaken belief that the Indians weren't doing their part. This was part of the reason Johnson would wait until the last minute and we'd just barely get the food there in time. The result was That everybody would be panic-stricken; nobody would dare speak for fear that LBJ would become irritated and do something unpredictable; it was pretty rough.

In late 1966 I got a little angry about the reports on India's supposed lack of agricultural progress that I heard LBJ was getting and I cabled to him, "If you don't trust my own estimates with what's going on, you ought to get another Ambassador. In any event, please send out some people whom you know you can trust to see for themselves what is happening."

I received an apologetic reply stressing that it was not a question of lack of faith in the embassy but the need to convince Congress." Three or four Congressmen came out, including Jack Miller of Iowa, Poage of Texas, and several others, and they gave exactly the same report we had. After this there was less difficulty getting the wheat through in 1967. But I don't think LBJ ever quite believed the Indians were doing as well as we knew they were doing, or trying as hard.

The last year I was there is particularly interesting. India had a very big crop in '67 -- and '68, too, a huge crop -- following these two disastrous droughts. When I went back to Washington on consultation I was asked how much wheat India would want from us next year; (they had been taking about ten million tons a year) I said about two million tons. The officials I talked with said, "We've got a huge wheat surplus building up, the election is coming along -- can't we persuade them to take more than that?" I replied, "India doesn't need it." But they said, "Well, can't you get them to take another three million tons?"

So I went back -- this was all reversed from the earlier period -- and I told the Indian Government, "You can put the additional wheat in storage, you can use it to hold your prices down in the future, you can use it against future emergencies." And finally, after a lot of talk, they agreed, but not at all enthusiastically. I reported this back to the Department of Agriculture and the State Department in July, 1968. Of course, they were very pleased.

Based on the proposed new shipments, the whole rationing system in India was altered. But come October, no wheat. We got more and more panicky. I wrote to Dean Rusk, cabled Orville Freeman and others, pleading with them to realize what we had gotten ourselves into. "We've urged this wheat on the Indians," I pointed out, "they didn't want it in the first place; but in agreeing to take it from us, they built their rationing system around a certain rate of flow, which is now in jeopardy." They went to the President several times and pleaded with him, I'm sure very hard. They, too, were very upset about it. The Friday before the U.S. election, a group of people, including the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Agriculture, went to see LBJ for one last effort. Without explaining why at all he simply said, "No. This is up to whoever wins the election -- Humphrey or Nixon. I'm not going to act."

They wrote me disheartened cablegrams that night and we were deeply distressed. Then on Monday came a cablegram from the President saying, "Here's your wheat." Now, why, I don't know. Was LBJ playing games with these people? I don't suppose he changes his mind all that fast. Moreover at the last moment we were so desperate we had said, "well, give us at least a million tons of wheat;" but he came through with the full 2.9 million. Also, at that time he had been holding up the AID money for non-project loans, used to pay for fertilizer, copper, zinc, lead and so on. We said, "At least give us a hundred million dollars to start the fertilizer purchase," all authorized by Congress. He said no on Friday; but on Monday he said, "here's the whole $225,000,000."

Now, these things leave me completely puzzled. I don't think Dean Rusk understood it either, although I've never talked to Dean about it since. There's a curious combination of idealism and right motivations in LBJ which I've heard him express in brilliant terms, side by side with his unpredictable, difficult attitudes.

Q: Did he ever project a trip himself to India after you were there?

BOWLES: No, he had been there for one day about in '61 or '62 -- before I got there.

Q: It was in his vice presidential days?

BOWLES: Very briefly. I tried to get him to come. At least before the wheat hold up, which created much bitterness among the Indians, he would have had a warm reception. As a matter of fact, I pleaded with him to come.

India was never very sure about our role in Southeast Asia; they were torn badly between two impressions; one a big white nation clobbering little villages and killing brown people which produced a visceral reaction. On the other hand, the possibility that the Chinese would move into Southeast Asia -- and where would India be then? These two ideas were both in their minds at the same time. As a result, while I was in New Delhi there was almost no public reaction to Vietnam in India at all. Mrs. Gandhi said things that nobody in our government liked very much, but they were about the same things the Pope, U Thant and other respected people said. However,

Mrs. Gandhi was bitterly blamed by LBJ and also by Rusk. But the Indian people barely protested about Vietnam. The biggest demonstration they ever put on against me, my associates and the U.S. embassy consisted of only about 150 people. You could hear that thousands and tens of thousands were coming to storm the embassy, and only a handful would show up.

Q: They get much more intense about what went on in Karachi.

BOWLES: Yes, but now even that doesn't upset them very much. But most of our visitors expected to run into opposition to our role in Southeast Asia. I remember Richard Nixon visited India as a private citizen and said, "How do I answer questions about Vietnam?" I said, "You won't get any." He said, "What do you mean I won't get any? This is the big subject wherever I go." And I said, "Well, it isn't in India," because the Indians, as I say, were sorely torn. They were frightened about our walking away from it, yet they wished we weren't there.

I had regular off-the-record press conferences every couple of weeks. I rarely got a question about Vietnam. I had to bring the subject up myself. There's a latent and very powerful warm feeling in India for the U. S. that we shouldn't forget. A lot of Asians, including Indians, don't like the country "the United States," which they believe is powerful and arrogant, but they like Americans very much. Americans are easy and informal, by and large, and most of them pretty dedicated to what they're doing. And this produces a curious ambivalence.

Q: And they have a kind of kinship in experience in breaking off from Mother England.

BOWLES: Yes. And this is one of the things that hurts them a good deal. They say, "Of all the people that should understand us, it's you. You were a colonial country, and you took a long time to get over your suspicions of the British." I would tell them the story of Mayor Thompson of Chicago who in the twenties said that he would keep the British out of Lake Michigan if he were elected, and everybody applauded greatly over that. The night before election he went further and said that, "If King George tries to get into Chicago, I'll personally throw him out." And somebody said, "King George III or King George V?" He said, "Good heavens, don't tell me there are two of them" This story meant a great deal to the Indians. I said, "This demonstrates that we too took a long time to get accustomed to the British being what they are. We suspected them for generations, much as you Indians are going to suspect the West for generations."

The Indians, I think, were hurt that we didn't understand them better. They said, "We admit that we have a chip on our shoulders and certainly we moralize too much. We're not being logical in all of our reactions, but neither were you." They felt very deeply about this. For two hundred years there were signs that hung on the benches saying "For Europeans Only," and signs outside of restaurants, "No Dogs or Indians Allowed." And there were still clubs when I went to India for the first time that were exclusively white men's clubs. They're all gone now, thank Heaven! But these things hurt them and affected them.

The British loaned us money to build the Erie Canal. Now, if they had insisted on showing us how to build the canal, we'd have thrown them out. The Indians are in that same mood, in fact so is the whole underdeveloped world. You can't go out and buy nations as we've tried to do. Nor can you go out and push people around with armies and tanks. We have to do more to understand what the world is all about and fit into it.

I remember talking to U Nu one time in Rangoon. I told this story to LBJ -- he was very interested in it. We were talking about Russia and China, when he said, "Don't worry so much about Communism; that's not your problem." He said, "Your problem is, are you Americans still relevant, and are the Russians relevant? I'm beginning to think neither of you is relevant to the future. You may be like two dinosaurs that are doomed by history, but who look very powerful at the moment. You've gotten too ingrown with all your tortuous problems and antagonisms to each other; your greatest danger will be that you will be so divorced from what's really going on in the world that you won't understand it." I think this is true to a great extent. We are very well off, very affluent, and as a result, it's impossible for us to understand developing nations and how they feel and how sensitive they are. We find it very difficult to understand the problems of the lower income groups in our own country.

I remember one time when our government was holding up wheat shipments to India -- there were a lot of these times that I suffered through -- and finally the 2,000,000 tons came through just in time. The Communists took advantage of this shipment to attack Mrs. Gandhi, saying that she had sold out to the American imperialists, the Wall Street warmongers, and she had been purchased with these 2,000,000 tons of wheat. The next day Mrs. Gandhi sent birthday greeting to Ho Chi Minh. The two incidents were connected. LBJ, of course, went right through the roof and so did Rusk. I received a bunch of cablegrams in the middle of the night saying, "What in the world has gone wrong with your 'clients' out there?," I understood what it was. It was Mrs. Gandhi's effort to illustrate that India was sovereign, that India could not be "bought." She had to do this. Now, until we are sophisticated enough to understand that sort of thing, we're going to be in trouble. The main thing is to get the job done, not try to shape people to our way of thinking but to help them stand on their own feet. As a matter of fact, I think the Indians are closer to us philosophically in matters of ideology than they are to the Russians -- far closer.

Q: Did you find a tendency in the State Department, except at the Indian desk and so on but over all levels of the State Department, to generalize about Asia rather than break it down into individual countries?

BOWLES: Oh, very much. For one thing, take as an example the way the whole bureaucratic structure theme is divided. The Asia Bureau does not include India. It starts with the western borders of Burma and goes all the way up through Japan. Bureaucratically, India is in the Near East/South Asia Bureau -- along with the Middle East. Well, it really isn't in the Middle East at all, and everything we do should be to help India build a closer relationship to Japan and the nations to the east of her. The British always pushed India west towards the Middle East, The stabilizing force there was the Indian Army, the British Navy and the British diplomacy. Also, all the invasions of India had come from the west through the Khyber Pass. To help turn them around and get them pointed towards Japan, toward such responsibility for the future of Asia and the stability of Asia, had a very high priority with me. But the State Department didn't understand this. Right now, for instance, Joe Sisco, the Assistant Secretary, he's a good person, but I think he has spent only one day in India in his life -- is devoting all his time naturally to the Arab-Israeli struggle. India's getting very little attention. Unless India really hits the skids, nobody will pay much attention to it.

Q: Here's a big segment of the world's population among other things-

BOWLES: When a country as big as that starts to go, it's too late to stop it. It was too late to stop the disintegration of China, for instance, in the '40s. If we'd been able to act in the '30s, it might have been different. But it was impossible for political reasons to act when our help was needed and when it might have been effective. By the time a critical situation hits the front page, it's usually too late to do much.

One test of a nation is whether it can look ahead and plan thoughtfully. It's very difficult to do in a democracy because long range plans often require short term actions which are not understandable to the public and often are unpopular. So the tendency is to put them off, and therefore you fail to develop a long range program. One day Dean Rusk spoke to me of "shaping" our Asian policy. And I said, "We're not shaping our Asian policy; it's accumulating." He asked, "What do you mean?" And I answered, "Well, for example, we have a crisis. Everybody stays up all night and cables are flying in all directions and everybody is exhausted and a few changes made. And then a month later, or a few months later, comes another crisis; again we stay up all night and again a few things are done. And after we've had five crises, we have a policy." But we're kidding ourselves if we think we shaped it that way. Events, and our reactions to them shape our policies. This is one way the totalitarian nations have some edge on us, because they can ignore public opinion of the moment and act in long terms, and we find it more difficult.

However, there is much we can do to cast our actions in longer-range terms. Woodrow Wilson has been ridiculed for many things -- a do-gooder and so on, but Wilson's fourteen points spelled out the objectives of World War I; and they were instrumental in building among the American people a tremendous morale it also gave the Germans the feeling that their defeat would not mean oblivion. Although we couldn't carry it all out, it fulfilled a very big function. The Germans could have fought for perhaps two more years if it hadn't been for that.

During World War II, outside of the vague "four freedoms" we offered nothing. If we had offered to Europe in those years, or to Germany, a United States of Europe with fifty billion dollars of money contributed to rebuild those cities -- something we did anyway- the chance for the Germans to become a free people, and respected, once they got rid of the Nazis, the war might have ended a year or two sooner. But we said, "unconditional surrender," which to the Germans meant oblivion, and they fought all the harder.

I talked to LBJ a lot about this and particularly in reference to Southeast Asia. I said, "In Southeast Asia we need a policy as to where we're going. What are we there for? What are the conditions for us to leave?" I tried to get Kennedy to see this. I pointed out that in Korea we never knew what we wanted there. After Inchon we had no policy. Should we stop at the 38th parallel with our military positions secure; should we go to the narrow "waist" between Wonsan and Pyongyang and dig in there, which we could have done; should we push to the Chinese border or the Yalu River? Or should we attack China? We could have stopped at the thirtieth parallel; our casualties were then about seven thousand dead. Instead we went to Yalu with no thought of where we were going, left the whole thing up to MacArthur -- and MacArthur's judgement wasn't very good politically -- and we ended up with more than 30 thousand dead. More than twenty thousand of them were killed after we made the decision after Inchon. What I wanted to get across to LBJ and also to Kennedy, was the need to think out immediately in long terms what we wanted in Southeast Asia. Would we settle for a neutralized Southeast Asia? Would we put in money to build up the Red River Valley, as well as the Mekong? What role did we want to play there, and for how long? What would be left behind after our departure? I never could get this done; and one reason I couldn't get it done was because in a democracy it's damned hard to do those things. We'll probably survive anyway, but it will not be because of this.

I probably wrote LBJ a dozen letters when I was in India, suggesting alternatives in Southeast Asia. I remember one series of letters particularly in which I said that if the government of Vietnam would offer every peasant family fifteen acres of land -- this was done in Taiwan, where the offer was ten acres and Japan where it was seven -- with simple tools and two bullocks, it could have an enormous effect on the people, who would feel that at last they had a part in the future.

The word came back -- I'm sure these weren't LBJ's words, somebody probably did it for him -- "The trouble with this is that we don't control much of the countryside. So therefore it's meaningless, and it won't have any effect on anything." In reply I said, "Think of the Emancipation Proclamation. In 1863 it had no effect in Mississippi or Alabama either." It was largely a moral statement or purpose, not carefully worked out, but successful in arousing people both at home and abroad as to what we were fighting for. Now here was the same thing. We could have said, 'This is what you people are fighting for. If we succeed in what we are trying to do, you're going to have fifteen acres of land and a chance to live decently.'"

If Eisenhower had said this in '55 or '56 after the Geneva Conference, in my opinion, there never would have been a war in Vietnam after the French left; its people would have had no need for a war. I tried terribly hard to get these things across; I always felt strongly that we were, wrong in being in Vietnam. In 1963 I felt hesitant about going to India because I felt so strongly about this. And once there, I felt that I didn't really have to debate the question because my views were well known. So I simply said, "Don't let's argue about how we got into this mess, let's worry about how to get out of it." The whole South Vietnam question was a tragedy for President Johnson because, as I said to you earlier before we started this recording, I feel he had a chance to become one of our very great Presidents. I think he wanted more than anything else, based on my visits with him, was to negotiate some kind of way of living together with the Russians, which is a primary problem we all face.

Q: If he could have pulled it off, it would have done a lot for the world.

BOWLES: If anyone could have pulled it off, LBJ could have, because I believe he could have been most effective in negotiating with the Russians. The Glassboro meeting was an eye-opener to everybody. Here was this sudden burst of emotional fervor for a peaceful solution to things, both in Russia and here. I think LBJ sensed this and would have been very good in moving with it. But he never had the chance. Prague, of course, was a tragedy. But before that, Vietnam. If you look back at his record in domestic affairs, it's quite remarkable. I think that he felt deeply about the racial question and frankly when he was elected, I hadn't thought he would. But I was wrong on that. I think he felt deeply about it and did an awful lot to bring about the improving conditions we have today.

Q: Did you know him back in your OPA days?

BOWLES: Yes, as a Congressman in 1937.

Q: He was the first Congressman to volunteer in World War II, and then was called back when the rest of them were called.

BOWLES: He supported the New Deal, and I remember that FDR was enormously pleased at his election. Was he elected to the Senate in '42 or '44?

Q: '48. He'd run once in '41 and lost to a squeaker to old "Pappy" O'Daniel, who didn't exactly distinguish Texas.

BOWLES: Well, he won by a very narrow margin in '42-'44 -- I was in Washington --

Q: No. In '48 he won by eighty-seven votes for the Senate.

BOWLES: Causing the "Landslide Lyndon." I knew him then casually. He was one of the two members of the House from the oil-producing areas that voted to support OPA. The other was Mike Monroney. I always felt indebted for that. In the late '50's when I was in Congress, I knew him but didn't have an awful lot to do with him -- saw him from time to time and was always on good terms with him. He frankly surprised me as President. He was much more liberal than I anticipated.

Q: As Vice President?

BOWLES: Yes, and as President too.

Q: You were Under Secretary of State there in the early days in the Kennedy Administration.

BOWLES: That's right.

Q: You wouldn't have had much relationship with Mr. Johnson on that, would you?

BOWLES: No. I saw him from time to time and tried to get some good staff people assigned to him so that he would be able to depend on people, thoughtful people. I did get one or two people assigned to him. When he took his various trips, we sent people along with him also to help. But he didn't play much of a role then; he stayed in the background as the Vice President usually does, except for Mr. Agnew.

Q: He inherited you as Ambassador to India, was there ever any consideration on his part to withdraw, or you to withdraw because you did have a new President, or did this continuity just-?

BOWLES: I asked him, naturally, if he wanted me to stay and he said to me very strongly that he did. I stayed there five years under Johnson. I made up my mind I would stay as long as I could be useful. I also had a lot of capital out there in the way of good-will I had built up over the years, which I was fully prepared to use. I think a person's capital should be spent and not hoarded, and therefore I offered to take on very difficult tasks with the Indian Government.

Like most ambassadors to India, I probably ended up looking as though I was favoring India over every other country -- you become sort of an Ambassador of India to the United States. The reason for this, I think, is because understanding of India is so very shallow in the U.S. that any Ambassador, no matter what he thinks, tries to explain it. The Indians are very sensitive, over sensitive. It's all the more pronounced if they feel you look down on them or don't understand them. So an Ambassador to India is constantly trying to convince the President and Congress back at home that it's different than they think it is. LBJ used to kid me about that once in awhile, and I'd say, "Well, you go out there and spend a month and you'll feel the same way I do."

Q: You had two tours as Ambassador -- once in the latter Truman days. Was there a visible change of policy; in other words, would you compare those two India's that you saw? The first one was much short term, of course.

BOWLES: Yes, two years only -- less than two years. The changes physically were tremendous. Very few Americans today realize the change that has taken place in India economically. India is now a fairly industrialized nation for its people to still ---

Q: You have had a revolution in a sense.

BOWLES: In agriculture a very definite revolution. The changes are quite spectacular. India is very close to being self-sufficient in food, I think within two years, three years at most. It doesn't mean that they'll have all the protein they should have, but it means that they'll have the calories at least. Tea and jute used to be their big exports. Tea and jute have now declined, and yet the exports were up eleven percent last year. Earth-moving machinery, jeeps, generators, railroad cars, locomotives, steel towers, machine tools -- things that you'd never associate with India -- now this is moving along very rapidly.

Q: These are export items.

BOWLES: Yes, their main export items. Sold in the Middle East and also in Southeast Asia. Another change, of course, is that people have a lot more confidence now. And -- a very explosive matter -- they feel much more sure of the promise of their future; therefore, they are going to be much more upset if this promise isn't realized. In 1951, when I first got there, I suppose no more than five percent of the Indian people dreamed that they could someday have a better life. Now ninety-five percent not only dream it, but they demand it and want it tomorrow. The fact that you can't get it tomorrow is one of the great causes of unrest all over the world, and particularly in India.

The biggest problem now is birth control, and the Indians know that. President Johnson understood this; he and I discussed it a good deal. To develop a birth control program is not an easy thing to do. With agriculture, if you get one farmer out of five to use modern methods of farming, you've got a terrific change in your rural area. But if your objective is population control, you've got to get at least eight out of every ten married couples of child-bearing age, or you don't get very far. It's a far bigger task, but they're attacking it with great energy and a lot ~ money. They have an unlimited budget for family planning and a lot of publicity. There are no significant religious or cultural barriers in the way.

Q: There's no feeling that the United States is doing this as a sort of plot to deplete the population?

BOWLES: No, occasionally you get somebody

Q: You get that charge some in Latin America...

BOWLES: but this is not a factor. I've never heard any political leader of any party oppose birth control in India, which is very unusual. But I don't think they're going to be able to do an adequate job until they get an up-to-date contraceptive. One thing that shocks me is we put ten-fifteen-twenty billion dollars into military research, and last year we put six million dollars only in contraceptive research, of which the government spent only two hundred thousand dollars. If you spent fifty million to one hundred million dollars in contraceptive research, attracting top scientists, I think you'd solve the technical problems in three or four years. The answer might be an injection. Once you got an injection, there would be a real chance of stabilizing the population. Until then all you can do is keep population from growing quite as fast as it has been. President Johnson, I think, understood this very well and was in favor of what I was trying to do.

Q: Did you have any great conflicts with LBJ?

BOWLES: Except for the wheat question, I had no real difficulties with him. But I'll tell you one thing that was very disappointing. The war of 1962 between India and China opened up a whole new situation in Asia. It shook up the whole set of relationships. India had kept their military budget low in spite of the fact that Pakistan had built up quite an army, on the assumption that the U.S. would never let Pakistan attack them. Since 1954 we had told them we never would allow them to. Every U.S. Ambassador -- Allen, Cooper, Bunker, Galbraith and I -- had assured them of this. I don't know why I was foolish enough to do so. And so when the attack came, they were spending a little less than one and one-half percent of their GNP on military. They were very poorly equipped -- old World War II equipment. And, as a result, the Chinese Army ran rings around them. We had every reason to move in as we did to help India against China, and in doing that we won an enormous lot of goodwill. Then, however, India decided they had to modernize their military, and they came to us for help. The Pentagon and some people in the State Department were reluctant to give them anything because they felt that this would upset the Pakistanis -- we had a large military base at Peshawar and it was supposed to be terribly important to our future security, although I've always had my doubts about that. There are other places where we could have gotten the same information. But anyway this was the gambit that was used when military aid to India was discussed. When I left Washington for New Delhi under Kennedy's instructions in the spring of '63, he said, "Find out how serious the Indians are about this. I'm inclined to agree with you that we should go ahead with one hundred million dollars of some of our military equipment, but find out and make it top priority." Once in India, I explored, discussed and negotiated. By early November the Indians were prepared to say that they would buy no further equipment from the Communist nations, meaning the Soviets and the eastern bloc, and that they would try to negotiate a ceiling with the Pakistanis that neither side would spend above a certain amount, and they would otherwise cooperate with us if the Chinese ever attacked Southeast Asia. Although they said they couldn't participate directly, they'd help wherever they could.

I went back and almost triumphantly reported this to Kennedy, and he was very pleased. I think our assistance program would have gone through in about two or three days. But just before a meeting on it was to be held, Kennedy was assassinated. I hoped LBJ would go right along with the whole thing; it was all set up; McGeorge Bundy knew all about it, so did Bob McNamara and Dean Rusk. Instead, Johnson insisted that he must personally review the situation.

I then asked General Maxwell Taylor out to India, whom I knew President knew well, to make his own study. He came in early December and made a report similar to mine -- that by putting in one hundred million dollars or less a year for five years the U.S. could help build up an Indian army perfectly capable of keeping China out of India, and also bring India closer to us. By April 1964, I had the whole proposal almost back on the tracks again. In May we had the key negotiations between the Pentagon and State Department and the Indians, and by mid-May our government decided to go ahead again. I felt satisfied that I'd won a victory. The meeting to approve the program was set for President Johnson's office on a Thursday. But Nehru died on Wednesday, the second death of a key man in six months -- and again the decision was postponed.

I returned to India for the funeral accompanied by Dean Rusk and a few others. Before we left, Mac Bundy and others told me that they felt the program was ready to go through, and if I would persuade Rusk, and if they could persuade McNamara, who was remaining in Washington, they could have the cable in my hands when I arrived in India so I could give to the new government the assurance we were solidly behind them. Dean wouldn't even talk about it; he knew what I wanted and he ducked it. And apparently they couldn't get Bob McNamara to go along without Rusk. So the White House said, "We'll wait until the dust settles. Let's see what this new government is like." I replied, "when the dust settles, you'll find India in Moscow buying everything there."

By August this was just what had happened. I don't think it was really Johnson's fault; he was ill-advised. Today, of course, the Soviets are providing India with whatever military equipment it has. Actually India is producing fifty-five percent of its own equipment now, which is a good thing. That's the best answer. What we ought to do is not to give the Indians or Pakistan arms, but help them to build factories to take care of their own needs with no obligations to or dependence on a foreign power.

Q: When the Soviets give military aid like that, do they send along technicians? Is this just part of the package?

BOWLES: Yes, they have sent a great number of technician's -- I imagine there are two thousand of them in India now. India has missile defenses around its cities, which, originally I am sure, the Soviets had a lot to do with. The Indians have a small group of submarines, four, five, or six, which the Russians work on. And complicated machinery such as the MiG-21s. They're actually building the MiGs now in India. They would have preferred to build F-5's with our help. And Canada had a surplus F-5 plant that we could have turned to use for India, the Indians would have leaped at it. They didn't want to deal with Russia. But when the U.S. failed to come through, the Russians offered them the MiG plants on a favorable basis and they had no alternative.

Q: At a sensitive diplomatic post like New Delhi, do you and the Russians get together?

BOWLES: You can't, really. I tried very hard and there were two Russian Ambassadors there during my last assignment who were perfectly congenial people. When I first went to India in 1952, the Soviet Ambassadors wouldn't even speak to me. On one occasion I told a reporter that I was going over to speak to the Russian Ambassador and to see if he couldn't get a good picture of us together. I walked over to the Ambassador with outstretched hand, and as I anticipated he turned his back on me in '52. When I came back in '63, it was different. They were friendly on the surface, but you couldn't talk about any substantive matter. They were nervous, fearful and inhibited. I remember one time, about four or five years ago -- in '64, I guess -- I was having lunch with the Soviet Ambassador alone in my garden, and I said off the top of my head, "China will fall apart someday. It may not be able to solve its food problems; or its fertilizer problems; it's trying to do too many things at once. Even the Chinese, who are tough people, can't carry the load indefinitely. When this occurs, are you Russians going to move into Manchuria? If so, Chiang Kai-shek will try to move into the coastal areas opposite Formosa. Would it be wise for us to agree to some program in advance, some plan to prevent chaos in China and hopefully end up with a benevolent China we can all live with? Could we start cooperating with you on this?"

He looked absolutely aghast. I'm sure he reported to his government that afternoon that a trial balloon was shot up by the American Ambassador to New Delhi. They wouldn't believe an Ambassador would talk about such things without specific instructions from his government.

Q: There's no such thing as a casual conversation?

BOWLES: Oh, no. I tried to encourage our young people to see their young people, and we made some progress on that. But they play a tough game out there -- although friendly on the surface. I have a feeling that they have two policies operating in opposite directions at the same time, one an old cold war policy which calls on them to do all kinds of mean things -- they forged my name to letters fourteen times in one year --

Q: Oh, really?

BOWLES: Yes, At the same time, they move in the opposite direction, "Let's get along with the Americans and if possible, find some means to work with them." There are probably different groups within the Soviet government that operate on these different tangents. Just as often, I must admit, do ourselves.

Q: Well, I would gather also they've got the same bureaucratic problems we have, sometimes of one group not knowing what the other one is doing.

BOWLES: Absolutely. For instance, they used to put out some awful stuff on the radio about American "evil intentions" in India, spreading disease and so on -- incredible stuff! I used to complain to the Russian Ambassador -- I would give him transcripts of the broadcasts -- and he would look quite embarrassed. He practically told me one day, "This is the KGB, not me...you know, we can't control all of these things." I think this probably was true.

Once the Soviet Ambassador told me, "That's a private radio station anyway; we have nothing to do with it." I said, "Really?" And he said, "Oh, yes, it's private." So I wrote a letter to the manager of this radio station saying, "I understand you're a private corporation operating in India. Your Ambassador here assures me that the Soviet government doesn't have anything to do with this; therefore, I appeal to you personally to stop all of this anti-U.S. nonsense over your station." I mailed the letter, and when the Ambassador saw me at a party a little bit later, he said, "That was a good letter you wrote." He laughed about it. He knew perfectly well that it was a game.

Q: Did they try to make propaganda value out of the Vietnam situation in India, or did they pretty well recognize what you've said earlier that the Indians didn't look on that as a matter of crucial concern?

BOWLES: They tried to some degree, but it wasn't a high priority for them.

Q: It wasn't any serious irritant in your life?

BOWLES: No, the Communists in India -- speaking of the "Communists" and "Russians" as being synonymous actually is wrong, because there are all kinds of Communists today, and to use the word too generally I think is dangerous -- but there was a parade on May Day, 1966, and a very good friend of mine watched on the street corner. He took count of all the banners that went by and all the placards, and ninety-four percent of the placards had nothing to do with India at all. "Get the Americans out of the South Indian Ocean," "Down with Imperialism," "Down with Wall Street," "Throw the Yankees and other Barbarians out of Southeast Asia," all issues that mean nothing to the average Indian. The average Indian citizen or farmer wouldn't know what they were talking about. Only six percent of the signs had any relevance to India.

To expand a little on my remark about there being all kinds of Communists in India, there was a wing of the Communist Party that was an instrument of the Soviet Union; that is, the Soviet wing. There's another wing now that's called the China wing, which is closer to Mao. The third group is the so-called Naxabaria, who are even to the left of Mao. They are named after a town up in the Bengal where the peasants took over the land, goaded on by a group of people who were obviously educated in China to Mao Zedong's methods. Thus, the Communist party in India is split three ways, with the Soviet branches relatively stable, much more so than the others. They, I think, would like to work with Mrs. Gandhi if they can; I hope she's not foolish enough to try. She may think she can handle them, and they'll think they can handle her. I don't know who will turn out to be right, but it wouldn't be good for India.

Q: Did you have to shift policy during that period following Nehru's death? There was a lot of confusion before India finally settled back down.

BOWLES: Well, I knew Nehru very well in the early 1950's and saw a great deal of him. He was a remarkable human being who was much misunderstood and unappreciated in the West. He was right, very right, on many things to do with Asia.

For instance, he would not sign the Japanese Treaty in 1951 or '52, because, as he said, "You've made the mistake of making as part of the treaty an arms agreement with the Japanese government, and you'll live to regret that. What you should do is sign a treaty with Japan, setting it up as an independent power, and next day negotiate with that sovereign power a military agreement so they can never say that you forced this down their throat." Well, he was right, we're facing the problem now. He saw the whole crisis coming in South Vietnam. He knew the French couldn't win; he prophesied Dien Bien Phu; he feared that the Chinese would come into the war.

He also saw that Stalin would have to choose between educating his people to become a technologically advanced nation, recognizing that educated people may ask unpleasant and difficult questions, or controlling them tightly, in which case he would not have a modern nation but a very backward one. And he said in '52, "I think that Stalin has undoubtedly decided to opt for an educated nation," and he was right. It took us some years to see this.

Shastri was also an extraordinary man. He was a little like Harry Truman. I divide Indian leaders into two groups: One group I call the Adamsses and the other is the Jacksonians. The Adamsses are people educated in the U. K. or the U. S., therefore very anxious to prove to the Indians that they're not pro-American or pro-West and they go overboard the other way to prove they're not. They have one foot in Asia and one foot in Europe; charming, attractive and bright people, but they're not thoroughly Indian or deeply Indian. Now Shastri was a Jacksonian; his roots were in India. He'd never been out of India until after he became Prime Minister. And there are a lot of those. I have much more faith in that type person for the future.

One incident involving LBJ caused us to lose a lot of ground. Again, I don't know how it happened. I was anxious to get Shastri to come to the United States for a visit, and everybody finally agreed it was a good idea. He wanted to come in October, 1965, and LBJ wanted him to come in May. I tried to get him to shift and he said it would be inconvenient because the Parliament would be in session, but he finally agreed after a lot of talk to come in May. Meanwhile, Ayub Khan of Pakistan had been invited for about the same time -- out of our mistaken notion that India and Pakistan must always be bracketed. I was sitting in my office one day, and a person came in and handed me a bulletin from the radio station in Pakistan, announcing that the Ayub Khan visit was to be postponed, and Shastri's as well. I thought it was a mistake, so I called home saying, "What in the world is this?" -- This was about six days before Shastri's visit -- The answer came back, "this means what it says; that the President is very tired and is overladen and feels he has too many obligations and can't carry them out; and we're sorry to impose his problem on you; we know it's very great, but nevertheless that's all we can do."

That night I had a perfectly horrible talk with Shastri, who was deeply hurt; he was a sensitive man; he felt he had been insulted. My wife had worked very hard to get Shastri's wife to go with him, and she had agreed to go. Shastri was hurt and very bitter, and I had to work awfully hard to restore his confidence.

What I hear happened, although I can't vouch for this, is that LBJ in April sometime said, "I've got too many things on my plate, and we've gotta chop a few things off," and told the State Department to cancel these two visits or postpone them. They were as startled as I was and wanted to talk him out of it. Rusk was away at the time and he cabled back, "Wait until I get back to Washington; I want to talk to the President." When he got back, he was unable to get the President to change his mind. But by this time it was so late that when the President remained adamant, I was given no time at all to make adjustments. Now, if I had a week I could have gone to Shastri and said, "You remember you wanted to come in October, and we wanted you to come in May. We've now had second thoughts, and I've advised the President that we should agree to October because you'll have more leisure." And Shastri would have been greatly relieved and pleased. But, as it was, the announcement came from the Pakistan radio, and it couldn't have been worse.

One of the things that troubled me about President Johnson was that these things didn't seem to trouble him at all. He would just say, "Well, we're giving them all of this money, why should they get so angry at us?" Which again is an attitude that is so deep in our country; and it's very wrong.

Q: No real feeling for the sensitivity of a leader like that.

BOWLES: No. It goes back, as I said and you mentioned before, that this is all charity being handed out to these people from the goodness of our hearts. I think all of you can get out of aid is an independent nation ready to stand on its own feet and defend its own interests, not tied to anybody probably. You take France. In 1946 France was a shambles, chaotic -- I visited France then. The Communist Party was very strong, and the government looked as though it was going to come apart. The Marshall Plan aid saved the day and put the country on its feet. Later we ended up with de Gaulle, who intensely disliked America. Does this mean we were wrong in helping to build up France? Of course it doesn't. I'd far rather build up France and end up with de Gaulle, but with a solid France. De Gaulles aren't immortal.

Q: You forget what the alternatives might have been.

BOWLES: Just give me an independent India, with one-seventh of mankind, reasonably democratic, reasonably open minded ---

Q: Ornery

BOWLES: Yes, they can be just as ornery as they want to be; that's unimportant. But we're not that sophisticated yet, and maybe it's too late now.

Q: Did the assassination of Kennedy give you any great problem in India, or was this just accepted

BOWLES: Oh, everybody was terribly shocked. I wasn't there at the time; I was back home on consultation. My deputy, Jerry Greene, who is a very able man, in my absence managed the ceremonies. There was a huge turnout in front of the Embassy -- thousands and thousands of people. The whole Indian Parliament turned out -- everybody -- the whole Cabinet.

You go into the most remote villages of India and you'll still find pictures of Kennedy; it's just unbelievable -- way, way in the back woods -- pictures of Gandhi and Kennedy. Now, the only explanation I have of this tremendous hold Kennedy had was that he was young, and it looked to be the young generation taking over, and people identified themselves with this breakthrough of a new generation. I think Kennedy had a little more understanding of India, but not an awful lot more. But he was certainly revered all throughout that part of the world, as he was in Europe too.

Q: When you went back you had no great problem though, as I've had in Latin America, of explaining that Johnson didn't plot the assassination? There's no great conspiracy feeling?

BOWLES: No. Oh, crackpots, the extreme left, an article or two in the press, but no general belief in it...

Q: Of course, India had gone through this same thing.

BOWLES: Yes, this is true. But when Martin Luther King died, this had a horrible effect; and when Bob Kennedy died...we had so damned many of these ceremonies in commemorating the loss of these men --

Q: You weren't running an embassy; you were running a memorial service over there.

BOWLES: When Bob Kennedy died I felt we -- Indians and Americans alike -- had all the emotion we could absorb. We simply placed a book there in the embassy for people to sign. These deaths hurt America greatly. We appeared violent; Indians see our movies and our television sometimes; and this makes them feel we're violent people. But I think generally Americans are well liked in India and individually popular, I would say more so than the Russians; the Russians, contrary to all the theories, do not speak ten languages each and prefer sleeping on the ground. On the contrary, they think India is full of hardships, which never particularly troubled me. Very few of them speak English or Hindi, and most of them don't like it there. It's hot and dusty, and they don't bring their families because they believe there are health dangers -- which they grossly exaggerate. America had every advantage in the world in India, and we probably still have, if we'll only grasp them. I'm somewhat discouraged at the moment about our ability to do this.

Q: Were you pretty free to go wherever you wanted to, to --?

BOWLES: Absolutely. Nor was I ever threatened at the time I was in India, I wasn't mistreated, I wouldn't hesitate to go anywhere at night. I felt that I could walk through the slums of Delhi in the middle of the night without the slightest fear; I wouldn't do that in New York or Washington. During my first tour one of my daughters, who was sixteen years old, worked in a hospital every day after school on the other side of Delhi. She had to bicycle back at nine o'clock at night through the whole city of old Delhi; it never occurred to me that this was dangerous for her. I was threatened once by some college students in Calcutta in a mild sort of way, but I opened up a dialogue with them and ended up debating with them; and before we got through, they were laughing and relaxed.

Q: Is Communism to a great extent sort of an intellectual Marxism, or is it pretty pragmatic now?

BOWLES: Well, I think the Soviet wing is just whatever the Soviet Union wants it to be. But they've got their problems, because if they campaign as Communists, bringing fire and destruction and revolution, they don't get elected; the people don't want that. They're mild and moderate, most of them, and they don't like that. There are some riots, but the people generally dislike violence. And so in order to get elected, the Communists have to appear as very moderate and say, "We're living under the Constitution, we'll serve the people and serve them better, but there'll be no more graft, there'll be no more corruption." But once they get in, the hard core which has worked to put them in, says, "Now comes the time for Lenin and the terror." And of course the people who got elected are by that time very sobered by the process. They say, "Well now wait a minute; we'll lose everything we've gained," whereupon the hard core go off the handle; you've got this built-in difference between those who believe at least in the first stages they must work within the democratic system and those that don't.

You see, Marxism doesn't fit Asia. I never get tired of saying this to the Indians, indeed all the Asians that I talk to. In his Manifesto, Marx devoted one sentence to agriculture; and it just made no sense. He saw the urban slums; he did not see the rural slums. Yet, agriculture is the base of every economy. This is becoming apparent to people, and it makes Marx a little out of date. I wrote a column in India for an Embassy publication, which has 400,000 circulation, and which was then syndicated to every paper in India -- we got a big circulation on it. I would say Marx and Jefferson are both out of date, and this was the sort of thing that would make them listen to you, by coupling America with the problem. Marx could only see the cities, and Jefferson could only see the country. Things turned out to be very different than either of these views. Blindly following Marxism must be as silly as blindly following Jefferson, much as we may revere him as a person.

Q: A necessary part of our lives at one time maybe. Were you involved in the rerouting of Stalin's daughter?

BOWLES: Oh, very much involved.

Q: Do you want to tell me about that?

BOWLES: Yes. It's quite a story. In the first place, we didn't know she was in India. This idea of this great intelligence network of ours, this idea that we knew what was going on, was nonsense; we didn't even know she was there. The only Americans who had any contact with her were two young Peace Corps volunteers who lived in the same village with her. They mentioned this "very attractive European lady" as they called her.

Q: They didn't know who she was?

BOWLES: They had no idea who she was. The first thing I knew was -- when I was in bed with a brief case of flu -- My assistant called and said he and two or three of my associates wanted to come to see me about something. They came at seven o'clock p.m. and said that a person describing herself as Stalin's daughter had just arrived at the Embassy, with a Russian passport in good order, and "what should we do about it?" The first thing I said was, "I don't think Stalin has a daughter." And one who was a specialist on the USSR said, "Oh, yes he has,"

I then said, "Let's take some time to think this through." I suggested they put her in my office with a yellow pad on the desk and have her write down for us who she is, and what she wants to do, which would give us time to consider the alternatives. In the next hours she put together a very eloquent sixteen-to eighteen page statement in excellent English, a dramatic story of her life and who her father was and her mother, and why she wanted to leave Russia and come to America.

We then tried to figure out what to do. I put down three possibilities on a yellow pad: One, send her home; we're trying to get along better with Russia: this is a delicate period; this will upset the Russians; tell her just to go away. I didn't see how we could do that.

Two, give her asylum officially which will mean she stays in the American Embassy, which will be surrounded by police and reporters and television cameras with a great public uproar, while the case is taken to the Indian courts. The Indian courts are as basically independent as our courts. Regardless of what the Indian government wanted them to do, they would, I believe, insure her right to leave the country and go where she wished. But this would upset the Russians even more against us, because it would be so well publicized and we, or rather she, would win the case.

Third, get her out of the country as fast and quietly as possible and then figure out what to do later. I asked, "When does the next plane leave India?" My aides said, "for where?" And I said, "Tehran, Bangkok, Kuala Lumpur, Singapore, Paris, London, anywhere but Moscow." And they said, "Well, there's a Quantas plane at one a.m." It was by then about nine p.m. I said, "Get a couple of tickets on it," so they did. I assigned a young officer, a Russian speaking officer, to her, although she really didn't need an interpreter because she spoke such good English. I then sent a cable to the State Department and the White House --

Q: This was their first knowledge?

BOWLES: Yes. At about nine o'clock p.m. in India, eleven in the morning Washington time. I said, "I have a person here who states she's Stalin's daughter, and we believe she's genuine; unless you instruct me to the contrary, I'm putting her on the one a.m. plane for Rome where we can stop and think the thing through. I'm not giving her any commitment that she can come to the States. I'm only enabling her to leave India, and we will see her to some part of the world -- the U.S. or somewhere else -- where she can settle in peace. If you disagree with this, let me know before midnight." No comment ever came from Washington. This is one advantage that non-career Ambassadors have; they can go ahead and do unorthodox things without anybody objecting, where a foreign service officer might not dare do it. We talked to her and said, "Point number one -- are you really sure that you want to leave home? You've got a daughter and a son there, and this is a big step to take. Have you really thought it through? You could go back to the Russian Embassy right now, (she was staying there in their dormitory) and simply go to sleep and forget it, and get up Wednesday morning and on to Moscow, as your schedule calls for." She immediately said, "If this is your decision, I shall go to the press tonight; and announce that (a) democratic India will not take me (they had turned her down prior to her coming) and (b), now democratic America refuses to take me."

Q: That was pretty good blackmail.

BOWLES: Well, she didn't need to do it; I was just trying it on for size to be sure she had thought it through. But she was very quick on this. In reply to the second possibility -- asylum in our embassy -- the publicity would have been great, the Russians would have blamed the Indians, and the Indians would have blamed us, and we'd have all been at swords' points; I think the Russians would have been much more badly hurt. So we gave her fifteen hundred dollars so she'd have money, which by the way, she returned to me within three weeks.

Q: You had no problem getting her to agree to go?

BOWLES: No, oh no, she was eager. I told her, "I can't imagine that you're going to America; we can only guarantee that we will see you out of India to some place where you can live. It may be America, and if not, Denmark, Australia or Sweden or some other place where you will be welcome, we'll see you to a safe place and see you established there."

Q: This was where she wanted to come?

BOWLES: Yes, she wanted to come to America. So when she got to Rome, the government blew up immediately, and said they didn't want to have war with Russia over Svetlana Alliluyeva; and they wouldn't let her stay. We had an awful time getting a delay for even three or four days. We tried to get her into Switzerland, but the Swiss at first refused for the same reason. Finally, at the very last minute we decided she had to go on to Washington at once. There was no alternative. The Washington plane had actually been called for boarding when the word came through that the Swiss would take her temporarily. So my young man took her to France, chartered a plane and took her to Geneva and she stayed there three months. And I suggested to George Kennan by mail that he go over there and see her and talk with her. I knew she had this book she had written -- she had showed it to us. And I said, "She must not be allowed to fall into bad hands among people who will take advantage of her; she's a charming person."

Q: Kennan didn't know her?

BOWLES: Knew of her. I don't think he'd ever actually met her. And Kennan did this and introduced her to the peace and quiet of Princeton, New Jersey. I ate lunch with her there a week ago yesterday. She came up here about three weeks ago; I see her about three or four times a year. She's a good friend of ours now.

Q: She's reasonably satisfied with her choice?

BOWLES: Oh, yes, she's very happy with it. She feels badly about her children, but -- maybe it's a rationalization, but this is what she says: "I knew you had a freedom of speech in the United States, but when I see it in India -- a poor country where they debate subjects and I can pick up any newspaper and read all kinds of different viewpoints and listen to debates in Parliament -- you can't believe what a shock this is to a person like myself. To find democracy even in India which has so many problems, is deeply heartening. I can't go back because if I should go back, I'm already a member of a group of literary people who are criticized by the government anyway, I would write things, then I'd violate the rules, I will write things that will circulate throughout Russia and it will be known and I will be in great difficulties. How will my children be any happier or secure? If I'm there constantly reminding them of my presence and trouble with the government, or if I'm far away somewhere else?" This may to some degree be a rationalization, but she felt that in America she could say what she wished and her children would not be responsible for it.

Of course, the Soviets tried very hard to get the children to turn on her. KGB put together a half hour television show with her children denouncing their mother for being mentally ill and all kinds of nonsense. One network, which should perhaps be left unmentioned, was about to put this on the air when one or two of us heard about it. We called them and said, "For God's sake, this is a pure KGB film, drop it quickly." And they canceled it.

Svetlana is quite a person. I tried to get her to act as more of a bridge between Russia and America; I said, "We've got plenty of people trying to burn bridges, let's get a few trying to build them. If you could describe in another book what Russian youth have in common with American youth, and the common desires and hopes for the future -- what you hope for your children in the future -- you could play a brilliant role here. It could have a terrific impact." But she's in no mood to write that book now. She's very bitter about the Soviets. And if you try to say, "They're trying to modernize, they're trying to ease things a little bit, trying to let some of the steam out of the boiler," she'll just say, "Nonsense !"

Q: She hadn't come to India expecting to stay though?

BOWLES: No, she expected to return to Russia in two weeks, but she went to this little village in the United Provinces where her husband had lived, and this family was very warmhearted and took her in immediately; and she lived there in completely new surroundings. She told me that she read a book of mine there that was in the library about Gandhi and this had a deep effect on her. So she told me, perhaps just to flatter me, that it was the first time she had thought about a whole lot of things. We like her very much, and I think she's quite happy here.

Q: Princeton accepts her -- no problems there?

BOWLES: Oh, yes. She's still sensitive to the fact that she's Stalin's daughter, and she's constantly imagining rebuffs. She says, "People think that because my father was a monster, I must be a little monster myself." But I have told her, "This isn't true; these people are thoughtfully trying to avoid embarrassing you and taking your time. They think you want to be alone and this is a tribute to you and you should see it that way." Actually, she already has many friends.

Q: You never had any real problem in India then once you got her on the plane?

BOWLES: Yes, I did. The Indian Government. Well, in the first place, the Russian government hit the Indian government very hard and said if we'd ---

Q: They undoubtedly suspected collusion?

BOWLES: Oh, yes -- because in their country you couldn't possibly get out of the airport without the government knowing it. And they assumed that the Indian government must have been in cahoots with us or she never could have gotten through the airport. Actually, she sat in the airport for two hours; the plane was late starting. But the Soviets were completely convinced the Indians were in this with us. It was, of course, said to be a CIA gesture and effort. The Indians wrote me a very sharp aide-memoir (memorandum), using some pretty strong language, under pressure from the Russians. And I said, "Please don't hand me this because if you do, I will have to write a sharp reply saying that democratic India wouldn't take her and wouldn't give her freedom and opportunity and so we had no choice but to help her ourselves. I can write just as sharp an aide-memoir as you can, and I promise you I'll do it. Why don't you just withdraw this official statement which will help no one?" So after bickering about it for a day, they withdrew it.

Later I kidded the Soviet Ambassador, saying, "You should thank me from the bottom of your heart; I saved you from an awful mess, because you would have forced this into an Indian court, where you would have lost. It would all have been well-publicized, the whole world would be watching this court case, and you would then be in real trouble." He smiled, and didn't exactly thank me, but I think he got the point. We had occasional defectors coming through. There's evidence of a new spirit among the people in Russia. Svetlana Alliluyeva thinks change will come from the younger members of the Communist Party who are growing up in a different world. She thinks it'll take a lot of time but eventually it will happen. I hope she's right.

Q: Did the Kashmir problem give you a good bit of concern?

BOWLES: Well, it did, yes. In the first place, the problem was never understood. As you know, when the British left India broke into two parts, and the princely states were allowed to go as they wished, provided they joined a country with a continuous border. In an analogy to the U.S., Kansas couldn't decide to go with Mexico, for instance. Kashmir had a border on both nations; it had a Hindu maharajah, and the Muslim leader, Sheik Abdullah, who had been very friendly to Nehru. The maharajah wanted most of all to win some kind of autonomy like Nepal, Sikkim or Bhutan. And so he stalled when the closing day came by which time he was supposed to have made up his mind. The Pakistani, in an effort to force his hand, sent in Pakistan guerrillas who had no trouble pushing aside the maharajah's police force, and almost reaching Srinagar, the capital. At that point the maharajah lost his nerve totally and cabled Lord Mountbatten, then governor general, that he had decided to go with India. The Indians troops immediately and just barely saved the airport and held on. They then took the case to the U.N. People always think Pakistan put it before the U.N. but India brought it there. The Indian army probably in a week's time could have driven Pakistan out. The difficulty is that the Pakistanis always presented the case as a Muslim versus Hindu situation. "The people of Kashmir", they say, "are largely Muslim, therefore, they belong with Pakistan." The Indians looked at it as a test of their secular state. There are sixty million Muslims in India, and if the two million Kashmir Muslims belong to Pakistan because they're Muslims, where do the other sixty million Muslims go? Also, after Pakistan attacked twice, which created deep feelings in India, President Johnson one time asked me, "Why in the world don't they have a plebiscite, just decide it that way?" I replied, "Let me ask you a question. Suppose an American President about 1875 received a letter from the President of Mexico saying, 'We'd like to have a plebiscite in Texas, to see whether it wants to come back to Mexico or remain as part of the United States.' If you were President of the United States, what would you do?" "I would think he was out of his mind," LBJ replied. Well, Mrs. Gandhi is in exactly the same position. Any Indian government that gave Kashmir back to Pakistan would be out in two minutes. Now, there's comparatively little agitation about it. I think eventually there may be an agreement or kind of semi-autonomy for Kashmir like Puerto Rico's relationship with the U.S. That's the best hope. But right now Pakistan needs the issue as a lever to hold the country together, and the Indians can't move because they're caught in kind of a political vise.

Q: Because of the old camel driver incident, the Ayub Khan business to the ranch and so forth, did the Indians regard Johnson as more pro-Pakistani than ---

BOWLES: They believe most Americans are. The Pakistanis are very able people; they're good people. Most of their leaders act more like Westerners than almost anybody in Asia. Here's Ayub Khan with his British Army methods speaking excellent English, arguing with his western counterparts whether you ought to put an olive or an onion in a martini. And our people say, "well, there's one Asian I understand; he speaks my language."

Q: He could have come off Madison Avenue nearly.

BOWLES: Well, sure. He's a brown Englishman. And Indians are not that way quite so much. though some are. Also they played the Peshawar base issue very hard. The base had a function a few years ago, though I doubt it has had much function the last two or three years, and we were prepared to do almost anything for Pakistan to maintain that base. I argued with President Johnson and others that we were paying a terrible price for these satellites of ours. They are in fact setting our policies. The more we gave, the more they demanded of us. After the war between Pakistan and India ended, we almost restored all the damaged U.S. tanks that the Indians blew up. We were on the verge several times of even replacing those tanks which had been destroyed. This, I thought, would be absolutely outrageous. Make one mistake, if you will, but don't make it twice.

Q: In August of '66 you made an offer to provide India with radios.

BOWLES: Oh, yes.

Q: That fell through.

BOWLES: Yes, it did. And it was a good idea too. They were talking about television, and I said, "That will take many years and you've got to move faster than that; why not build a lot of small transistor sets and set up a radio station for each of your three hundred districts, a million and a half people each, and broadcast in the local dialect or language."

Q: They don't have that?

BOWLES: They've got some big stations. You can get radio all over India, but you can't get much television. I suggested that an intense radio network of this kind would make the people of that area feel closer together. The stations could put on weddings, send people out with microphones and recording sets, talk about the crop conditions, broadcast debates about current events. There might be, in effect, three levers; one lever for local programs; secondly, the state lever, and third, the national lever. You could hear broadcasts on each basis. Well, Mrs. Gandhi thought it was a great idea. But at that point it got in the papers, and the Communist Party was operating with its usual skill in trying to take over the communication system of India. This was "an American plot." So it was put aside, I thought very wrongly. I think it may be revised in time. Of course, television is the ultimate answer, but television takes a long time and costs a lot more money. They should move on along in the meantime with this localized radio.

Q: Did you get the feeling that the Johnson Administration didn't pay enough attention to India?

BOWLES: I did very definitely. Half the people of the Johnson Administration who were in a position to make policy had never been to India. Two or three of them came for funerals while I was there but that's about all.

Q: You don't learn much at a funeral.

BOWLES: Until I got to India, the average number of visiting Congressmen per year was seven. One year we got thirty-two. The average while I was there was probably twelve. Most of them stayed three days. And this was just enough to confuse them. They'd see things they didn't expect to see, changes they hadn't anticipated, and they felt unsettled about it. But it's the same way with this new Nixon Administration; very few people get out there. India is far away and strange, it's leaders are sometimes difficult. Of course, the more difficult we think they are, the more difficult they'll be. In India we are dealing with a culture rather similar in its nationalism to Andrew Jackson's America in its early nationalistic days. If they think you like them and generally approve of them, you can argue with them, criticize them, question them, even abuse them, and they'll take it in their stride, because they know you're a friend. But they've got to first know you're a friend.

The Truman Administration, the Eisenhower Administration, the Kennedy Administration, the Johnson Administration and the Nixon Administration have ignored a major nation which I think is going to have in the future a very big impact on the world. I'm not at all sure what will happen to India politically; it is having political difficulties. But its economy is gaining rapidly. But I was never able to persuade the White House and State Department of its key importance. I had a few friends who saw it, but not a lot of people.

Q: Was Dean Rusk fairly approachable on the subject of India, or did he have these rigid ideas too?

BOWLES: No, he held rigid ideas. He was in Asia during the war and saw it then. I spent a month there with him in the '50's when he was president of the Rockefeller Foundation and for a while I thought he understood pretty well, but he didn't have the broad view. He didn't see the whole. He saw only the present problems, although he saw those very clearly -- in an emergency or crisis, he was an extraordinarily able man. But for the long range -- where is Europe going, where is Asia going, what's our relationship to them, how can we get India together with Japan more and bring the two together -- these things he would appear not to be interested in.

Q: Now, you had a relationship along two lines with John Kenneth Galbraith; one, as Under Secretary of State, he was in a sense a representative of yours and then you were his successor also. Did that pose any problem, did he leave you any problems other than ---?

BOWLES: Well, Kenneth is quite an extraordinary person. I knew him first in OPA because he was the first Deputy Price Administrator, and he persuaded me against my judgement to go to Washington to work for OPA. He left shortly thereafter. So we had a long acquaintanceship, never intimately. But I was delighted when he went to India, because he's an economist and I thought he would help a lot on development; he's an agricultural economist basically. I think he spent less time on agricultural economics than he did on politics which he's very interested in. He got along well with Nehru and I think he did well. Ellsworth Bunker did a wonderful job out there, and Sherman Cooper also was a success. We're very lucky with the people we've had there, because it's a place where an individual can have quite a lot of impact personally. They'll listen to you if they like you and if they think you like them.

Q: Does having a woman leader pose any particular problems?

BOWLES: I don't think so. I knew Indira Gandhi very well and saw a great deal of her as a friend. When she became Prime minister she changed and everything became very formal overnight, suddenly she was very hard to talk to. When I went to see her and talk with her, there would often be silences. Once or twice I remember saying to myself, "Well, I'm not going to break this silence; she's going to have to break it." I'd sit there for three minutes and there would be stone silence, and I'd finally capitulate and ask her a question. But I'm sure I could go back now and see her on a quite different basis, much more relaxed. She's very smart, knows very little about economics, but she's very shrewd politically.

Q: Was there any foreshadowing of any essential changes in that brief period you served Nixon?

BOWLES: No, I don't think so. Nixon was out there twice and, curiously enough, he got along there quite well. I think he understands the AID program better than people think; but I doubt that he will do much about it, which is tragic. You see, if we stop now, and there's a damned good chance we will stop, the whole "Green Revolution," which is moving India rapidly towards self sufficiency in food and wheat, based to a large extent on American fertilizer provided by the AID program is going to slow down. It would be tragic if we pull out now. If we could maintain an adequate aid program there for five years, even four years, I think it would go far towards assuring India's success. But I just don't know if we are going to do it.

Q: How would you sum up briefly President Johnson?

BOWLES: That's a big order; he is a complex man. But I would say that his record on domestic legislation was extraordinary; his handling of world affairs very limited; his involvement in Vietnam tragic and costly to him, to us, and to Asia and to the world. More precise analyses would be better left to the historians.

MARJORIE RANSOM
Assistant Information Officer, USIS
Bombay (1964-1965)

Marjorie Ransom was born in New York in 1938. She received her bachelor's degree from Trinity University in 1959 and her master's degree from Columbia University in 1962. Her career includes positions in Jordan, India, Iran, Yemen, Washington D.C., Abu Dhabi, Syria, and Egypt. Mrs. Ransom was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in December 2000.

Q: Whither in '64?

RANSOM: Bombay, India.

Q: That's a good place to work on your Arabic. You were there from '64 to when?

RANSOM: From January of '64 to March of '65. I became engaged in the fall of '64 and was told that, if I married, I had to leave the Foreign Service. I looked in the regulations and never could find anything that was clearly written down, but I asked the authorities in the Consulate in Bombay and they asked the authorities in the Embassy in New Delhi, because they didn't know themselves. I was instructed that I had to resign to marry.

Q: This is one of the great... scandal is not too bad a term for it. It never was really written down, was it?

RANSOM: No. I knew that other women had done it, that I wasn't the only one. It was part of the mentality of the time. I'm appalled now that I just laid down and did it. I thought it was what had to be done. It's what women did. I wanted to get married. It was terrible. I thought later, "What if the marriage doesn't work and I've given up my career?"

Q: Where did you meet your husband, David? I've interviewed him.

RANSOM: We met studying Arabic in a summer course at Princeton University in 1961. Then we saw each other that summer and saw each other the following summer at Harvard, where we both did Arabic again. Then I went into the Foreign Service and he went into the Marine Corps. We met in August of 1964 in India to decide what we were going to do and we decided to get married.

Q: He was a Foreign Service officer then?

RANSOM: No, he was still a Marine Corps officer. When we married, he was in the Marine Corps and entered the Foreign Service just after we married.

Q: Had he been planning to?

RANSOM: Yes. He had taken the Foreign Service exam and then had persuaded the Department to let him finish his three-year Marine Corps stint. He had prearranged his entry for December '65.

Q: You were in Bombay from January '64 until early '65.

RANSOM: Yes. I was Assistant Information Officer in charge of the audiovisual unit, which meant that I had two film units that went around India and showed movies about the United States. I was also in charge of getting permission from the Indian government for U.S. films to be shown in India.

Q: This was before TV was around.

RANSOM: There was no television.

Q: This must have had a pretty good audience.

RANSOM: They were extremely popular. While I was in Jordan, President Kennedy was assassinated. I was in Beirut on vacation when it happened. I learned about it in Arabic first. I saw the newspapers with a black band all around them and looked at the newspaper and read the news. When I was in India, the film, "Year of Lightning, Year of Drums," came out and was shown to huge audiences in India.

Q: This was a production that talked about Kennedy.

RANSOM: Yes.

Q: Who was the Consul General in Bombay?

RANSOM: Myron Rewinckle.

Q: Was USIA in India in those days under any particular constraints from the Indian government?

RANSOM: Well, our films were subject to scrutiny when they first came to be sure that they didn't violate what the Indian government called the "third country rule." It couldn't be critical of any other country.

Q: Was this a problem?

RANSOM: No. I had a wonderful Indian friend who was in charge of censorship and we never discussed the word "permission." Somehow, things always moved through. I don't remember having any problem with any particular film. It was just a matter of getting the paperwork done.

Q: How did you find the Indians?

RANSOM: I liked them very much. Bombay is a very eclectic city. It is very sophisticated and has a very active art community, music, everything, wonderful museums. It was great.

Q: Did you get involved with the movie industry there?

RANSOM: I did. I became very good friends with the MPA – the American Motion Picture Association – representative there in India and some of the other major American film distributors. I also met a number of Indian film producers. They loved to have me come and look at their movies and would ask my advice. Of course, I knew zilch about movie production, but I saw a lot of Indian movies and gave advice.

Q: Bombay is, next to Hollywood, the second largest producer of films. But there is little carryover from the Indian movie to the United States. There is no market for them here.

RANSOM: It's very hard. A lot of their films are not so interesting. I had seen Satigit Ray's films when I was in college.

Q: Those were Bengali films.

RANSOM: Yes. That's very different from the film producers in Bombay.

Q: They were mainly musical, weren't they?

RANSOM: They were musicals depicting love triangles – the conflict between the two male suitors – while the beautiful heroin swung on a swing covered with flowers, singing.

Q: When you decided to get married to David, were you thinking of still staying in the Foreign Service?

RANSOM: Well, I was fortunate. The minute he got word of his assignment – he entered in December of '65 – we had been married a few months and he was assigned to Yemen. Days after he got news of his assignment, I got a call from USIA asking me to work for them in Yemen. I couldn't work as an officer, but they hired me at the highest level they could, which was executive assistant. I could work 32 hours a week. That was great. I don't know what I would have done in Yemen if I hadn't worked. I would have gone crazy. So, I ran an English language program in Sanaa.

Q: You were there from when to when?

RANSOM: From sometime in April 1966 to May 1, 1967.

ROBIE M.H. "MARK" PALMER
Rotation Officer
New Delhi (1964-1966)

Ambassador Palmer was born into a Navy family in Michigan. He was raised both in the US and abroad. He was educated at Yale and Kiev University. He became a civil rights activist and entered the Foreign Service in 1964. He served in New Delhi, Moscow, and Belgrade and held an ambassadorship in Hungary. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1997.

Q: You were in India from what, '64 to ...?

PALMER: '64 to '66.

Q: What were you doing in India?

PALMER: I was doing rotation. I worked for the ambassador, for Chester Bowles, as his aide for a very short time. Then, I worked in the... I'm trying to remember the order now...let's see...I worked in the political section. Then he changed the whole embassy into political-economic internal and political-economic external. I worked in internal on both political and economic issues. I worked in the consular section. Then for my admin rotation, I set up something called the visitor center.

This was the idea of Chester Bowles, who had founded Benton and Bowles Advertising. It was his idea that an embassy in a developing country ought to reach out to visiting Americans of all types, including just ordinary tourists. It should try to help them understand what America's role was in that country. In India he felt that it was very important for us to be helping India. He wanted to have a more consistent effort by the embassy to have materials and programs that educated Americans about India.

Q: What was your impression of Chester Bowles and how did he operate?

PALMER: This was his second time as ambassador, so he certainly knew India and he was very much loved in India. I felt he was a little bit beyond his time in a certain sense. India no longer really wanted to be told how to suck eggs, and he loved to tell people how to suck eggs. He did it with all the good will in the world, but Indians didn't necessarily react to that very well. They didn't always say it to his face.

I was very young and I immediately got Indian friends. I ended up marrying an Indian whom I had met at that time. You could see when you got inside Indian families that this was not something that they particularly wanted, even though they loved him. I mean it was a rather complicated attitude toward Bowles.

Q: I was talking to somebody who was public affairs officer not too long ago. This person was saying that the dealing between the Indians and the Americans is really a dialogue of the deaf. Each loved to preach and was not very accepting of preachment from the other side. Were you getting any sort of emanations of this?

PALMER: Yes, absolutely. At that time Nehru, Mrs. Gandhi, and what's his name, who had been their ambassador at the U.N.?

Q: Krishna Menon?

PALMER: Krishna Menon, who really did not like our foreign policy.

Q: It was reciprocated!

PALMER: Yes, and he loved to lecture us. I dated his niece for a while so I used to go there to pick her up. So I had some contact with him. So, yes, I think that "dialogue of the deaf" is a good phrase to describe our relations.

Q: From your perspective, what was the political economic situation in India during this '64 to '66 period?

PALMER: Well, all the problems that still persist of poverty and hunger, etc. were certainly dominant in the scene, as was all of the ethnic strife. War broke out while I was there in 1965 in Kashmir. Ostensibly, from the KashmiriPakistani point of view, it was local people.

Actually, it was the Pakistani army fighting the Indian army, but the local people in Kashmir were clearly anti-Indian. So the interethnic strains in India were very visible at that time, as they are still. I was in Kashmir when the war broke out. I stayed there for a good part of the war, reporting or doing whatever the hell I was doing. It wasn't clear.

But I would say also very visible were the strong connections between India and the United States, and the fact that we are both democracies. Despite all of the "dialogue of the deaf" business, there are still and were then many things that brought us together and made us closer than we are in certain ways to others.

Q: Were there still residual effects of the Chinese-Indian War? This was what, '62?

PALMER: Right. We had an active intelligence cooperation as a result of that business. Our military mission had grown because we had supplied the Indians with military equipment. So, yes, that was all still very present.

Q: What about the Kashmir problem, which remains a problem? Was there sort of an accepted attitude on the part of our embassy, particularly at the junior officer or senior officer level about who was right, who was wrong, or what we should about it?

PALMER: I think there was at a minimum a clear understanding of the dynamic among the professionals, the Foreign Service group, and people in the agency. Bowles, on the other hand, because he was so immensely pro-Indian, really wanted to suppress embassy reporting on that. When I came back from Kashmir from the fighting, he did not want me to send out a cable reporting on the views of the people in the valley. I had talked to dozens and they all were anti. And so a cable never went. We did some back channel stuff that he didn't know about.

I think that a few people like Howie Schaffer, Nick Veliotis, Roger Kirk, Lindsey Grant, Dave Blea, who was the station chief...there was a very distinguished group of people in the embassy at that time. Brandon Grove. I think all of us understood...I was by far and away the most junior...but anyway all of them understood what the facts were. And I think Bowles probably understood, too, but he just didn't want... it was an inconvenient thing.

Q: Well, did you have the feeling, particularly with our ambassadors...one always thinks of Bowles and Galbraith and a few others...that they, or at least it seems that they kind of fall in love with India; and that they have a coterie, a very important coterie, in the United States who also have this? Yet we're Foreign Service trying to look at this in a practical measure and the two aren't necessarily in synchronization. Do you find that?

PALMER: Yes, and I think it's a terrible mistake that ambassadors do this again and again. It's bad enough to fall in love with a country. That at least I find a little bit excusable and sometimes even beneficial.

What's much worse though is to fall in love with a leadership in a country, a particular leadership, and to promote their interests. That happens almost without exception in my experience, including with career ambassadors and American presidents. There is much too much of a tendency, which Bowles definitely had, to identify with the local leadership at that moment in time.

Q: Were there any sort of strains in the embassy? You did mention the fact that you couldn't get out through regular channels your impressions of Kashmir. Were there any strains in the embassy?

PALMER: Yes, I think there was a general perception, and this is really making the same point again, that Bowles was not objective about our interests and about India. There was a perception that we were to some extent not taken seriously in Washington because that perception pertained. Therefore, there was resentment that we weren't thought of as highly as we should have been, as objective reporters and as a group of professionals pursuing America's interests in an objective way.

Q: This is, of course, always a problem: that if you have, particularly an ambassador, who does fall in love with a country, its very apparent back in Washington. Soon whatever he or she proposes for the mission comes to be somewhat dismissed.

PALMER: Right, and that was definitely the case then. It was also a perception that Bowles had been sent out there during this tour by Kennedy to get him out of Washington. This was because the inconvenient fact was that he'd been right about the Bay of Pigs as Under Secretary of State. Kennedy didn't like that nor did Dean Rusk. So they sent him back to India to get him out of their hair and out of their faces. In terms of his credibility in Washington, that was another inconvenient fact.

Q: Was it a feeling that he didn't have clout with the administration? Of course, by this time it was the Johnson administration. But was the feeling that he didn't have the clout that somebody of his caliber would have had?

PALMER: Should have had. Right. That was very much the impression. And of course he, also, was not unaware of that; and that made it difficult for him. He also had very bad Parkinson's disease, so that was another factor.

But I don't want to sound anti-Chester Bowles. I worshiped Chester Bowles. I thought he was a wonderful man and with much of what he did, I absolutely identified. With his concern about village India, the poverty in India, and the necessity for American health, he was a role model for me in many ways.

Q: Did you find as a junior officer, coming out of the civil rights movement and your activism, that you had a problem internally or with your other officers? After all, if you want to deal with problems of racism and poverty and so on, this is the world's greatest playground for that. Were you running around trying to save the world or save Indians as opposed to being a Foreign Service officer and looking at this rather dispassionately? Was this a problem?

PALMER: Well, I guess I sort of did a little bit of both. The first Christmas I was there as a bachelor and I was very lonely. I found an orphanage to go and spend Christmas in. I didn't know who these people were that ran the orphanage, but I found out about a year later. I then started to spend about two days a week there. As it turned out and as I later realized, it was Mother Teresa's. At that time she wasn't known as anyone in particular.

I worked with her order to establish a home for homeless men and I actually slept in this place. I spent a lot of time in the slums. So, totally separately from the embassy and unknown to the embassy, I did my thing to try to relieve part of India. However, I think that in terms of what I did in the embassy on my official time, I tried very hard to be intelligent. I tried to use common sense and not to get into this kind of pro-Indian stuff.

Q: You mentioned on the Kashmir issue you used a back channel. I've designed these talks also to explain to people who study foreign affairs how it really is. Could you explain the process?

PALMER: Well, it was possible to do letters, long letters to the desk. That was one of the forms of back channel. To do a telegram that went out front channel, through the communications center, meant that everybody in the embassy was reading it. You couldn't very easily do that without the ambassador's being aware. So one of the back channels was to do official, informal letters which is what I did with the encouragement of some more senior officers.

Another, of course, was to talk to visitors from Washington or to talk on the phone in slightly guarded ways, but nonetheless to make clear what the message was. Then there was always the agency. The ambassador didn't always see what the agency was sending and you could talk to the agency and they could get stuff out. And I'm sure there were other ways that as a junior officer I didn't know about but anyway, those were ways that I was aware of.

Q: Did you have any contact or feeling for our embassy in Pakistan? I suppose it was in Karachi in those days or was it in Islamabad? I'm not sure. It moved.

PALMER: It did move, but I think it was Karachi also.

Q: Was it an us and them type situation?

PALMER: I didn't really work very much on the international side. I was in the internal side of political economic affairs. I don't really remember an "us/them" vis-à-vis the embassy in Pakistan. Maybe Bowles had a little bit of that, but I don't think the others in the embassy did have that perception.

Q: What about when you did consular work? What did that consist of?

PALMER: The usual run of things: people who had gotten sick and you had to try to help them in hospitals; who were in jail; accidents; both immigrant and non-immigrant visas. I really loved consular work. It was great because you could deal with people.

I got particular satisfaction because at one point I was left alone in the consular section. The consul had gotten sick and had to go for rehabilitation.. I had noticed that Indians were expected to wait in a long line when they came to apply for visas. It seemed to me that they had to wait forever and that Americans were immediately taken care of. I thought that was discriminatory, so given my sort of civil rights-y kind of nature I thought, "This is outrageous!"

So I called in all of my local employees, all of whom were twice my age and had worked in the embassy for years. They were quite used to this sort of system even though they were also Indian. But mostly they were south Indians and they were mostly Brahmans. They didn't really like north Indians. So I think they got secret pleasure out of having everybody wait in the long lines and telling them to come back and this sort of thing.

I said to them that we were not going to treat Indians differently than Americans. We were going to treat them on the same basis and the same time frame. They were going to get answers. If we had to refuse visas, we'd refuse them; but we weren't going to discriminate against.

Well, there was a whole lot of grumbling. We made a lot of headway in doing things faster. Then, unfortunately, the consul came back and didn't like what I'd done. So it was all reversed, but at least for a short time I had some success. I think consular work is terrific work. I did it also in Moscow for a year and loved doing it there.

Q: This is my specialty.

PALMER: I didn't know that so I'm not saying it because of you! (Laughter)

Q: Well, the '64 to '66 period was at least the beginning of the great sort of student wanderjahr, which was intimately tied to particularly hashish from Nepal and all of that. Were you getting any reflection of this as far as kids coming over and getting into trouble?

PALMER: A little bit but I can't remember any massive problem that we had in dealing with that. Maybe there was more than I was aware of. I didn't stay in the section too long. I don't remember a lot of that. I do remember going up to Kathmandu and it was a major thing up there.

Q: What about in India? You were working on internal matters. Was there any sort of difference in the reporting attitudes picked up by the reporters? Those in Calcutta, Bombay, Madras are among the ones I can think of.

PALMER: Do you mean that they saw India differently?

Q: Yes, differently, or were they all pretty much in line?

PALMER: I think they were pretty much in line. I wouldn't swear that my memory is right about that, but I don't recall any stark differences.

As I recall, Bowles was very good about bringing the consuls general and their staffs to Delhi, or our going out often. So there was a lot of interaction, as I recall. We were encouraged to do things in the consular districts as political officers or whatever. So I don't recall any particular tensions or differences.

I had a distant cousin and A 100 classmate who was serving in Madras as a Foreign Service officer, John Washburn. So I used to go down to see him and stay with him; and he came to see me in Delhi. I think that we had good relations, as I recall.

Q: Did you get out into the field and talk to Indian politicians at the local level?

PALMER: To some extent. I guess probably because I was so junior I didn't do a lot of that. I certainly did get out a lot to travel, but I don't remember seeing politicians so much. One of my things was youth politics, that is, dealing with youth organizations.

Q: There's a youth officer, isn't there?

PALMER: I was the youth officer, and so I did see a lot of young political types. Not members of parliament or ministers, but younger people. So I remember doing that. I spoke a lot to colleges. Bowles urged us to get out and we did get out.

Q: I've heard somebody in another interview say that Marxism in the Indian colleges was not something that had been imposed on them. It was something which they felt comfortable with and so, unlike most places where Marxism was expected, the Indians accepted this and the philosophy behind it. Did you find this in dealing with the students and, if so, how did you deal with it?

PALMER: Well, a sort of soft Marxism, yes. I would say it was more London School of Economics socialism than hard core, brutal Leninist Marxist thinking. Indians are very tolerant by nature. Hinduism is a very tolerant faith or set of faiths.

I think that among students there was a dominant left socialist mentality, but the worst communism...I never it felt was a strong strain in India. It didn't seem to fit, to root really well. When communists were in power, they were in Calcutta. It wasn't the same as communism in Russia or in China.

Q: Was it your impression that the Soviets had made much headway in India as far as competition with the United States?

PALMER: Yes, they had done very well. They had a huge presence in terms of their aid projects. They had big cultural programs. They were very visible and present. They were thought of as India's number one friend. You know, the Nehrus and everybody thought of them as a big friend. So they got big play.

Of course, I like Russians a lot. I am very definitely a Russophile, but I never liked their government. I thought it was terrible that they were in that position in India, that Indians didn't look realistically enough at what the reality was in Russia. This was no role model for India.

Q: Did you have the feeling that Nehru and his group were just by training, by attitude anti-American? Was this an accepted thing?

PALMER: Bowles used to say that the big problem is that they were insecure, that they didn't believe in themselves, that they had a "little brown Englishman complex." I think that's right. It wasn't so much that they were anti-American as they weren't secure in their own skins. As a result of that, they had built up a whole set of defenses by which they defined themselves, partly in opposition to the United States, but also in other ways. Some of that persists up until today, unfortunately.

Q: Was there a difference between, say, the British who had been the colonial rulers, and the Americans, I mean as far as what you had been able to sample?

PALMER: Yes. The British were not perceived to be as big of a threat and challenge as we were, even then. The British Embassy had a softer time with India. When there were demonstrations, we were the butt of the demonstrations, not the British Embassy, usually, even though we may have had the same positions on an issue. We were the imperial power, not the British at that time.

Q: I would imagine that at certain points it would have been rather frustrating. Here we are trying to be friends, only to have the students come out and demonstrate against us. Particularly, you were young and sort of in the “demonstrating mode,” not too far away. “So what the hell are you doing? Go down the street to the Soviet Embassy or something!”

PALMER: Well, I used to go out and talk to the demonstrators. I demonstrated yesterday on human rights. I mean I was there in Lafayette Park. I think it’s a good thing to demonstrate. I think it’s a very important part of the democratic process. So the fact that people demonstrated against us, I never thought it was so bad. I thought it was a good thing in a way.

Q: At this time, did you marry a woman from India?

PALMER: Yes. More or less. I met her in 1964 and I proposed in ‘66 before I left India.

Q: Was there any problem marrying a girl from a foreign country then?

PALMER: Well, we had to resign from the Foreign Service right away. I did, and then I informed the ambassador. I said I was really concerned because as far as I could tell, there had never been a marriage to an Indian in the Foreign Service. I said that I’d heard that if you wanted to marry a Brit or a Canadian or an Australian, there was never any question. There had been questions and people had been turned down for trying to marry people from other countries. I said I was really nervous but I loved her and I was going ahead. I had done my letter.

So Bowles said this would be outrageous if they turned down an Indian so he sent a cable in support. I had an amazingly fast response. I gathered they liked to take six months to make sure the marriage was solid. And I got my clearance in two weeks! (Laughter) I remember being astounded. The security officer was told by Washington to go up and do his thing quickly which he did. That was to look at her family.

Q: You mentioned at one point you were dating a girl who was a niece of Krishna Menon. Krishna Menon is one of these interesting characters. He was one of our devils during the early-late ‘40s, ‘50s, and slightly into the ‘60s. What was your impression of Krishna Menon?

PALMER: Well, I remember once Malati, his niece, wasn’t ready to go out. So I sat with him while I was waiting for her to get ready. We had talked about the Soviet Union and he knew that was my main interest and that I spoke Russian. He said, “I bet you think that I really like the Soviet Union and I’ve spent a lot of time there.” And he said, “And I bet that you think that I really hate Americans and that I don’t like the United States at all.”

And I said, “Yes, that is my impression.”

“Well, that’s absolutely reversed,” he said “I’ve spent very little time in the Soviet Union. They invite me all the time, but I’ve rarely ever been there. I love New York. I don’t dislike the United States at all. You Americans simply don’t understand anything about me.” (Laughter)

How much truth there was in that, I don’t really know. I don’t know, but my sense of him was that he was an extraordinarily arrogant, opinionated man; and that communism was not his cup of tea. A regimented, unthinking, monolithic kind of thing was not Krishna Menon, who was a free-wheeling, brilliant, difficult person. He wouldn’t have lasted a minute in the Soviet Union, and probably understood that at some level; but loved provoking the United States.

He adored doing that, but it didn’t necessarily mean that he disliked us. I think he probably did love New York City. New York City was his kind of city. Irreverent, messy, bright, creative, full of people just like him. Half of New York is full of people just like him. Arrogant everybody. (Laughter) Taxi drivers with opinions, you know. So anyway, for what it’s worth, I think it’s important not to demonize people, and not to worship them either.

Q: How was Krishna Menon? What did the people think about him in the embassy?

PALMER: Strong dislike. (Laughter) Including Bowles, as I recall. I don’t think Bowles had any use for him, as I recall. I mean, I might be wrong. My relationship with him was really just the niece.

Q: Oh, I understand!

PALMER: It didn’t have anything to do with the embassy. I don’t remember ever even mentioning to the embassy that I had this relationship with his niece.

Q: How about with Nehru? What was the impression? How did Nehru feel about the United States, that you were picking up?

PALMER: I don’t know, actually. I was much too junior, I guess. I don’t remember even thinking about that now. I worried about the Youth Congress, the youth wing of the Congress Party. Those were my kind of people, people that were 21 and 23 and 25. I really don’t know. Krishna Menon was through a twenty-whatever-she-was year old niece.

Q: Oh, yes. Did you find with the students you were dealing with sort of loved debate?

PALMER: Yes. And a liking of engaging Americans in that debate. I think that was a big satisfaction. And in that sense, India was palpably, clearly a democracy. There was plenty of open and free debate in the press. It was wonderful. It was a politically mature society, in a way.

Q: Did you change your mind about an assignment to India while you were there?

PALMER: Yes. In hindsight, I thought it was good for me that I was forced to look beyond Russia as a country to be interested in. And the mission was an extraordinary place because it was the largest Peace Corps, the largest A.I.D. mission, the largest USIA. It was huge everything.

So, in that sense, it was a good place for me to get started to see all of this. And if I hadn't done it, I never would have had it in the whole rest of my career. This is because then I ended up just doing "Commie countries," where we didn't have any of those things. We had no Peace Corps or A.I.D. missions.

Q: This is early in the height of the enthusiasm about the Peace Corps. What was your impression of it in India?

PALMER: Well, I didn't have a lot of experience. I remember that they did have a very good chicken and egg program. Beyond that I don't really recall much. Sort of results kind of things. I don't know how they did.

Q: In '66 you left New Delhi, and whither?

PALMER: I came back to Washington, and I worked on NATO political military things in the European bureau.

LEONARD H. ROBINSON
Peace Corps Volunteer
Paraphour (1964-1966)

Mr. Robinson was born and raised in North Carolina. After graduating from Ohio State University he joined the Peace Corp, serving first in India and later at Peace Corps Headquarters in Washington, D.C. His varied career took him to Capitol Hill, to AID and to the State Department as Deputy Assistant Secretary for African Affairs. Mr. Robinson was also active in a number of private organizations having to do with African Development and with Population Programs. Mr. Robinson was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 2003.

Q: Go on about 1964.

ROBINSON: In 1963, I had applied to the Peace Corps. Why did I apply to the Peace Corps? I had always been interested in international affairs. I think that came out in our earlier conversation. I was very interested in India in particular starting when I was seven or eight years old, I had this fascination with India in part because of a television program that came on Saturday morning called Gunga Din. Then there was the Jungle Book. I had a fascination for Kipling's writings.

So I applied for the Peace Corps. I can recall an impromptu conversation that I had in 1963 on our front porch with my dad and the then president of North Carolina A&T University, Samuel DeWitt Procto. We talked about the Peace Corps and whether I should join. I can remember both of them chiming in at the same time saying, "Governor, the Peace Corps experience would be worth the equivalent of two Ph.D.s because of the exposure to the culture and the language and the history of another country. This would be an in-depth immersion for two years." They were encouraging me strongly to join the Peace Corps.

Q: The Peace Corps also was quite new and on everyone's mind at this time, wasn't it?

ROBINSON: It was the era of the Kennedys and Shriver. He was Jack Kennedy's brother-in-law and was appointed as the first head of the Peace Corps. There was an aura about the Kennedy administration, and there was something very exciting and adventurous about the Peace Corps. So I applied, and interestingly enough the first invitation I got to train for the Peace Corps was for Iran. It wasn't India. In those days, in the early 1960s, the Peace Corps application form allowed one to indicate one's top three preferences in terms of country assignments. India was probably the only country I listed. But I was invited to train for a Peace Corps program in Iran.

Believe it or not, I think on the day that Nehru died (Jawaharlal Nehru, the first prime minister of an independent India who was very much involved in the independence movement with Mahatma Gandhi), I got a letter from the Peace Corps re-assigning me to a training program for India. That was kind of extraordinary because I really believed, and it certainly was proven to me after I got into the Peace Corps, that there has always been sort of a spiritual connection between me and India.

I accepted the invitation to go to India. I had intended to go to law school. I had applied to Duke University among other law schools. But when it came time to make the choice between the Peace Corps in India and law school, I did not hesitate. Interestingly enough, outside of my immediate family -- my mom, my father--and maybe some close friends with whom I grew up, a lot of my friends and classmates did not understand why I was going to Oregon State. Oregon State University is where the Peace Corps trained its volunteers for India. I can remember saying to a lot of people, "Well you know, I have always done things differently. I have always had an interest in international affairs. Beyond the fact that I really do want to help people to serve people from a humanitarian standpoint, it is difficult for me to say to you what is really motivating me to do this. This is my own personal calling if you will. This is something that I am feeling inside very powerfully."

So two days after I graduated from Ohio State, I was on a plane to Corvallis, Oregon. I flew from Greensboro to Chicago, Chicago to Portland, and then took a DC-3 to Corvallis, Oregon. I have to mention that in Portland I met a guy who was also on his way to Corvallis, Oregon, to train for the Peace Corps. I mention this because he and I are still best friends to this very day. His name is Artie Miller. Artie had graduated from Penn State. He grew up in Pittsburgh in a Jewish family -- not well to do, comfortably lower middle class, I would say. But Artie was a brilliant mathematician, just a brilliant mathematician.

There were 66 of us in the India training program. We lived on the Oregon State campus, and we trained there. There were four things that were notable about this group. First, we were all men. Secondly, the vast majority of us came from the east coast. Thirdly, most of us had gone to pretty good schools. Fourth, I was the only person of color. On our first night at Corvallis, six of us decided to walk down to the town to go to a bar and have a beer. It was Artie and I, a guy named Chip Wall, and some others. We walked into this bar, where there were two lumberjacks sitting at the bar. They both turned around, I am 6'4" and was pretty muscular at the time. Artie was to my left, with a couple of other guys. One of the lumberjacks said, "Well I'll be damned. This really must be America, because in walks this black guy." He didn't say "black guy." He didn't use the "N" word, fortunately. But in the way he said it, it was threatening. Artie immediately put his hands out like "let's go get them", which endeared me to Artie Miller from that moment. He just immediately became very protective.

Oregon State University was a very interesting experience because we were there to train to go to India. India "Eight" and "Nine" -- there were two groups. India "Eight" was a group to be trained in swine cultivation. India "Nine", of which I was a part, were to be trained in poultry management, rearing practices, diseases, etc. With the exception of perhaps eight guys out of 66 who had grown up on a farm, we didn't know anything about chickens or about pigs. But in three months, we learned a lot. It was a very rigid, intense training program that included the history and the politics of India, the caste system, the culture, etc. We clearly had to understand that. We had to learn a totally foreign language. Hindi is, in terms of sentence construction, the use of verbs, etc. is totally opposite to English.

We had to take all kinds of psychological tests. We had individual sessions with a psychiatrist once a week. We had group sessions with a psychologist every week because the management really wanted to see how tough we were. You have to realize that India in 1964 was quite different from American culture. Furthermore, we were all essentially just out of college, going away from the U.S. for the first time and didn't know anything about any other cultures or any other regions of the world with the exceptions of what we might have studied in college or read about. Going to India in 1964 was like landing on the other side of the moon. So our training program focused on all the various cultural aspects including the caste system, and on learning the language.

The training program ran from early morning until night every day for three months. At the halfway mark, six weeks, came the first selection process. In the early days of the Peace Corps, the selection process was pretty intense -- very pervasive in terms of the daily awareness that just because you were invited to train for a Peace Corps program did not necessarily mean that you were going to be selected in the final analysis. So after six weeks we had a selection process. As I said earlier, our training was primarily in poultry management and disease control. We had to learn how to recognize diseases and treat them, how to dissect birds, how to sex them -- males and females -- how to determine whether eggs were appropriate for market to sell, etc. We were evaluated by our trainers on the basis of our language competency in Hindi, our ability to read and write Hindi, our knowledge of Indian history and culture, and on our technical knowledge, plus the psychological profiles that we had all undergone individually and in group therapy sessions.

The first selection process took place in an evening. When the results were read, out of 66 guys, I think about 19 were selected out. It was a very traumatic event; grown men were crying. Those who were selected out were crying, and those of us who were left behind were crying because they got selected out and we were still in the program. There appeared to be no rhyme or reason for the decisions. There was no common thread that ran through those who were selected out. It was a very intimidating process.

At the end of the training program in December of 1964, 35 of us were selected to go on to India. Fortunately I was among those 35. We had a graduation ceremony. The president of Oregon State University gave us diplomas which I still display at home, indicating that we had graduated from this Peace Corps program at Oregon State University. We then flew back to our respective homes for about a week, met again at John F. Kennedy at the airport in New York on December 3, 1964, and took the Pan Am-1 flight to India via London.

Q: That was the flight that circled the globe. Let me ask a question or two about the training. In the first place, were you under rather strict injunction not to mess around with the caste system?

ROBINSON: That is a fascinating question. A lot of the teachers and trainers that we had at Oregon State were Indian. I think that they represented two or maybe three of the major castes. There are four major castes and maybe sub-castes. What I remember about that aspect of the instructions was that we were told that as Americans, as foreigners, as outsiders, we would have the opportunity to run the gamut, to intermingle and have contact with Indians from all castes. We were not warned to stay away from the so called "untouchables" -- the lower caste Indians. We were frankly encouraged to demonstrate that one could have contact socially and professionally with Indians across the spectrum, across the social and religious structure without fear of being reprimanded. We certainly were told to avoid situations that would be embarrassing to our hosts. "Don't commit any social faux pas. Don't try to force contact between a Brahmin and an "untouchable". Don't go out of your way to do anything like that. Don't try any social experiments." But we were certainly encouraged to have contact with people from all castes and we did that consciously. We didn't do it with arrogance. We had lots of conversations with Indians while in India as a Peace Corps volunteer about the caste system or about arranged marriages.

Obviously there were a lot of views that immediately clashed with our Americanism. But one of the things you learned real quick was to shift your focus from an American view to an Indian view. That is the only way to some extent that you can survive in that environment. You had to understand their way of doing things. Understanding the caste system however did not mean we accepted it. We always railed against it. We always talked in social settings about the disadvantages that the caste system brought to India. We would point out that there were people in India who are downtrodden; if they were educated or exposed to many of the educational opportunities that people of a higher caste enjoyed, perhaps the "untouchables" could make a stronger contribution to the development of India.

I became friends with an Indian woman whom I call my "Indian mother". She was a tribal member. So she was even outside the caste system. She was even lower than the lowest caste. The so-called "tribals" were Indians who, historically and biologically speaking, came from a different ethnic group and who evolved differently over time. They weren't Muslims; they weren't Hindus. They were known as "tribals" -- a lot like native Americans in this country. One of the first tribal females to attain a medical degree was a woman named Dr. Tiriki. Dr. Tiriki lived and practiced medicine in the village of Paraphour where I was assigned as a Peace Corps volunteer. Paraphour had a population of 40,000 people. She was quite an extraordinary lady. I would say she was in her mid-60s when I met her. She had silver hair. She was extremely nice, very friendly. Practically every afternoon when I was in Paraphour, Dr. Tiriki came out with her nieces and nephews and we would sit around and have tea together. She was able to get a medical degree because the government of India had reserved a certain percentage of seats for the “tribals”. It was a quota system -- a certain percentage of seats in the medical college, in the engineering schools, were reserved for lower caste and tribal people. She was fortunate enough to get one of those seats. She was known to be a very good doctor and was a prime example of what I kept telling Indians in conversation about the advantages of providing opportunities to lower caste people who could achieve and contribute to the growth and development of India. The caste system in India even to this day is extremely pervasive. It is difficult concept for most people to understand. It is rooted in Hinduism. It is a culture unlike the west and was similar to our understanding today of Islam, and the impact of Islam on the Middle East and parts of Africa. Religion is the way of life. The religious tenets of Hinduism are part of the fabric of the culture of India. It is very difficult to separate the social structure, cultural mores and folkways from religious tenets. They are all intermingled. Religion drives everything including a lot that happens in government. That is Hinduism. Islam works the same way.

Q: One can make the same argument about Christianity, although we are so close to it that we don't see it.

ROBINSON: But we do have, comparatively speaking, a pretty clear separation of church and state.

Q: I am talking about mind-set. In a way, I am lumping in the Jewish one, since both Christianity and Judaism come out of the same box.

ROBINSON: Hinduism is a very profound religion, but its dictates, including the caste system, are so imbued in the Indian psyche, in the Indian ethos, that nothing is done in their daily lives without Hinduism driving it. For example, if you have a conversation with an upper caste Hindu about the evils of the caste system as they impact on lower caste members, they will turn around and say to you, “But Hinduism preaches in part that you are an untouchable on this earth and in this life because during your first dimension, you were not a very good person.” (Hindis believe that there are three dimensions in each of our lives. There is one before you are born. Your life in earth is the second one, and the afterlife is the third dimension.) So if you were not a good person in your first dimension, you came into your second as an untouchable. You deserve to be treated the way you are. You deserve to live the way you live. However, if you are a “good” untouchable, if you are a good sudra, then you will be rewarded in your third dimension.

One of the aspects of Indian belief that used to boggle our minds is how Indians tended not to question anything. I used to liken it to your mother giving you castor oil. You know that when you were a kid, if something ailed you, your mother would say, “Take this; it is good for you. Don't ask any questions. Don't resist.” A lot of times Indians would do things according to practice and according to the dictates of the religion, according to the dictates of their caste system, and not question their actions at all. You would look at them and say, “Why don't they challenge that?" But the caste system is so prescriptive in terms of how they would lead their daily lives that it dictated their every move.

Q: Did moving into the field of chicken culture put you into any particular caste set or something?

ROBINSON: If it did, we didn't notice it. Being Americans, we were viewed as upper class people. We were status symbols. We got invitations to weddings. We got invitations to everything. We were not shunned. No one didn't want to have contact with us. Absolutely no one. It did put us on a higher plane.

Artie and I and Chip Wall, another Peace Corps volunteer, got a monthly allowance from the Peace Corps headquarters in New Delhi. We took that check, which was in rupees, to the bank and cashed it and paid our cook. We all had cooks because cooking was an all day affair. You had to buy everything fresh everyday. Then it had to be prepared. That was a long drawn out process. So we couldn't be tied down by doing our own cooking. We never would have gotten any work done. So Peace Corps paid for a cook. The money was for a cook, to buy food, and to pay for incidentals; e.g. travel and things like that. Housing was provided by the government of India. Our allowance was meager and we had to travel on a third class train or a bus, for example. For the most part, most volunteers did not have a jeep or a motorcycle. But we had access to a jeep and a motorbike. We had bicycles, which were provided to us by the Peace Corps. But if you wanted to go any distance, you had to take a train—for example from Bahawalpur, where I lived, to the state capital, Patna. We had just enough money for third class train travel. There are three classes of train travel in India -- first class, second class, and third class. Third class is what we used to call "cattle" car. If you wanted to travel second class, that meant you might get a reserved seat. If you were lucky, you might even get a reserved seat and a little bunk on top to sleep on overnight. Arnie and I got to the point where we learned how to cajole; we learned how to maneuver. Sometimes we would appeal to the conductor to let us ride second class even though we had third class tickets. That would not have happened had we been Indian, but because we were Americans and Peace Corps volunteers, we were treated differently.

There were a lot of what I used to call "world travelers". They were hippies but we called them "world travelers." There was a lot of concern for those of us assigned to India in the 1960s that we not be identified as hippies because hippies were disheveled. They had long hair; they looked scruffy. For the most part they were white, either Americans or Europeans. Indians looked upon them with a certain amount of disdain because they were so scruffy looking. They had money, but looked scruffy. That was just part of that hippie movement. Indians didn't like that look; so we as Peace Corps volunteers tended to dress differently. We were neat and clean shaven. Some of us wore sandals, but we didn't look like hippies. We consciously did it that way because we did not want to do anything that would diminish our ability to relate to Indians up and down the social spectrum.

As I said, we were treated differently. We were invited into homes and had access to practically anybody we wanted to see. From time to time, in the course of conducting our business, we would have to go to see high ranking government officials. We had access to them. We didn't abuse that privilege. But to get things done in India, you had to constantly push, push, push. There was a certain amount of inertia that you had to overcome. The importance of time which is a western attribute. For example, how to get from point A to point B was always a challenge. In India, if you ask for directions from a shopkeeper or somebody on the street, you would be told, "Sir. Go straight".

"What do you mean go straight?"

"Sir, just go straight."

"How long will it take? "

"You will get there sometime today."

There is an imprecision about things in India. One of the first things I learned was take my watch off. After about six months I did without my watch. There was a lot of waiting, but you had to adjust to their ways of doing things. But being a foreigner, and particularly a Peace Corps volunteer, if you were respectful, you could get some things done that they couldn't do or couldn't do as quickly or as efficiently. However, that posed a problem because from my perspective, one of the reasons why I wanted to be a Peace Corps volunteer was so that I could work with my Indian counterparts to try to get them to consider different ways of doing things within the confines of their own reality. Working with them closely to influence them over time is what I call the intangible impact of a cross cultural in depth experience which you gain as a volunteer. If you didn't learn that, you ran the risk of operating in a vacuum. The Indians could have said, "OK, we are going to tolerate you as the volunteer for two years because we know you are going to leave. So we will let you do your thing. But after two years, everything that you do may collapse. We may not retain it." I recognized that possibility right away; so my partner and I worked very hard to work with our Indian counterparts so that they didn't view us as being outsiders who would be gone soon enough. We wanted them to view us as being their partners, their counterparts. We were going to do these things together, so that, long after Artie and I had left the scene, the new approaches to which they took a liking, those new patterns that fit within their milieu, those activities which they could do without us, would continue to be done because somehow over the course of a year or two they grew to respect and accept a different way of doing things. I don't think anybody learned to tell time or to pay attention to time because I was an American, but certainly because of the style and manner with which we worked with our Indian counterparts and friends, some of our Americanisms, some of our way of doing things rubbed off on them.

Later I moved to the state capital from the town in which I had worked. We had some new volunteers that came in. One group of volunteers came as mechanics to work on UNICEF jeeps and other things in and around Patna. One of these volunteers got frustrated one day in the mechanic shop and struck an Indian because the Indian wouldn't do what he was being told to do. The volunteer was overheard to say, "You know, I am an American. I come from the most powerful country in the world, and if you do things the way I am telling you, one day you too can become powerful." That is not the way to get Indians to do things differently -- by being arrogant, by saying, "I am an American; do it my way because we know best." We sent that volunteer home in a strait jacket because he could not make the adjustment. He did not understand; he never learned how to work with the Indians to bring them along. He was busy dictating to the Indians. My Peace Corps experience taught me after two years that I had to motivate and influence people of a different culture. I figured that if I could do that in a different culture, certainly I could do some of that back in the United States.

Q: Could you talk a bit about both the town or the city, I take this to be a town, where you were, and how you went about, what were you contributing to the chicken business.

ROBINSON: Bahawalpur was on the Ganges River. It is in Bihar State which is sandwiched between West Bengal to the east and Uttar Pradesh to the west. It took an overnight train ride to get to Calcutta. Calcutta was where we went for rest and relaxation. Bahawalpur had about 40,000 inhabitants. The streets were dirt with the exception of maybe two or three paved roads. The Indians referred to one road as a “trunk” road -- what we call an express highway. There was a trunk road leading into Bahawalpur from West Bengal. There was a trunk road leading out that went from Bahawalpur to Patna, the capital of Bihar. Bahawalpur had two engineering colleges. It had a hospital, but it wasn’t a very good one. It had a train station -- every town in India practically had a train station, thanks to the British who constructed an incredibly extensive network of railroads throughout India. This was something that aided India’s development tremendously. I can recall the Anglican church. We lived in a little compound called Bose Park. We had a lean-to -- what I would call a lean-to which was attached to the back of a house. The government of India and the state government had to agree to provide housing and transportation for the Peace Corps volunteers. The government poultry farm was maybe four miles outside of Bahawalpur. We got there everyday either by bicycle or by jeep.

My Indian counterpart was a Muslim named Mister Jamal. Jamal was an extraordinarily progressive Indian -- very dynamic, full of energy, lots of good ideas. He was a Muslim which meant he had no hang-up about working with animals. There are lots of Hindu Indians who won’t eat meat. A large percentage of Indians who are Hindus are vegetarian. They won’t eat eggs. They are pure vegetarians. They will wear a mask so they don’t breathe any microbes or have any flies come around them. They will be careful where they walk because they don’t want to kill anything. But Muslims did not have any social or religious prohibitions about working with animals. Jamal was well trained as an expert in animal husbandry including chickens. When we first got to Bahawalpur, my partner was Chip Wall from Seattle. Chip was in piggery and I was in poultry. Our housing was not ready, so we were taken to what was called a bungalow -- a guest house -- about 12 miles outside of Bahawalpur, in the middle of nowhere. We were deposited there with a cook named Jalil who remained as my cook for two years. Jalil was also a Muslim.

Most of us had Muslim cooks because they could handle meat without any social or religious prohibitions. They knew that we Americans ate meat. The Muslims knew where the meat was. That didn’t mean we could get beef readily because cows are sacred in India. He could get beef from time to time. He would come back and say, “Sahib, I have got some beef for today.” He knew that would bring a smile to our faces. Most of the time we had chicken or fish.

I tell the story about being in this guest house-bungalow because it was our first experience in India. This was mid December. In addition to waiting for our permanent housing, we were also waiting for our assignments. Each of us had an Indian supervisor, known as the block development officer, the BDO. My BDO's name was Mr. Yadav. Mr. Yadav's office was in Bahawalpur. He was to give assignments for both piggery and poultry work. But for two or three weeks, we sat out there in the bungalow and we never heard from the BDO. So one day I looked at Chip and said, "You know what, they are going to let us sit here. They don't know what to do with us." In our stateside training program, we had been taught that we had two options as Peace Corps volunteers. Option number one was to work with the BDO, and to find out what he needed. We have been trained to be an expert consultant to the Indian government in poultry or in piggery, to help them with every aspect of their program. You can either get yourself involved in the government apparatus as far as piggery or poultry are concerned, or you could work with individual farmers to help them to improve their ability or capacity to grow either herds of pigs or chickens for the purpose of selling the eggs and using the meat for marketing purposes. But we are sitting for two or three weeks, doing nothing. Chip had a very different kind of temperament from me. Chip was very intellectual, very smart guy, but he wasn't a pusher. I was very energetic, very dynamic, and probably a bit brash in those days. I said to Chip. "You know, we have come 12,000 miles from home. We are just sitting here all day long cooling our heels."

One day I persuaded him to jump on our bikes and go to Bahawalpur. We rode 12 miles into Bahawalpur. It was hot as hell because Bahawalpur is on the Ganges Plain. It was late December and therefore the so-called "cool" season. It was very warm during the daytime because the sun is was directly overhead. We went to see the BDO. I will never forget walking into the BDO's office. He was chewing beetle nuts. This is sort of a stimulant that a lot of Indian men chew. It causes the saliva to turn red. In every government office there was a spittoon. The walls were splattered with red residue. The Indians would chew this stuff and try to talk at the same time. It was really funny. Yardav had a mouthful of this stuff. He was sitting looking very relaxed -- sort of blasé, very casual--when we walked in. We kind of burst into his office. It was an unpleasant confrontation because by the time we got to his office we were tired and it was hot. We said, "Look we have been here for almost a month. You haven't come out to see us. We didn't come all the way to India just to sit and do nothing. We came here to help you, and to work." I think we certainly showed our impatience. I can remember Yardav looking up at us and saying, "Your housing is not ready yet, so we thought we would just leave you out there until the housing is ready."

"When is it going to be ready?" we asked.

"We don't know when it is going to be ready,"

We went back and forth. We made our point that we were not going to sit for another two weeks and just cool our heels; we came to work. Yardav is the one who put us in touch with Jamal who became our ace in the hole.

Bahawalpur had a lot of farmers. We ran into some difficulties in part because there were tensions between the Muslims and the Hindus. You find this all over India even today, perhaps even more pronounced today than ever before. We came to the conclusion that the Peace Corps had made a mistake in participating in a piggery program. In essence, Chip really didn't have a job. He didn't have a job because it was socially almost impossible to do anything in piggery. So Chip was confronted with decisions. "Should I stay? Can I become a poultry expert?" I told Chip that I would teach him about poultry farming. He had another option and that was to participate in a teaching program because he had majored in education in college. He chose to do the latter. He chose to retool himself and become involved in education.

I just did my poultry thing with Jamal. As I mentioned earlier, I made friends with Dr. Tiriki, the Indian doctor who became my sort of Indian mother. I worked very closely with Jamal to upgrade and improve poultry management within the government poultry farm system in and around Bahawalpur. During the time I was there we built a whole new block of poultry houses. We probably built at least eight new poultry houses, and we upgraded the facilities to sex chickens and to grade the eggs. I must say that I had a pretty rewarding experience in Bahawalpur.

Maybe almost a year after I got to Bahawalpur -- late 1965 -- I got sick -- probably a heat stroke. In those days we didn't have American physicians in the Peace Corps. What Peace Corps did was to visit the doctors who practiced where the volunteers were being assigned. They interviewed Indian doctors to evaluate whether they would be suitable. Real medical care was only available in the big cities like Calcutta, Delhi -- large cities like that. The local physicians were to provide some coverage in the event of an emergency.

I went to the doctor that had been assigned to us. He didn't touch me. He didn't take my temperature; he didn't take my pulse; he just looked at me. He made his diagnosis on the basis of just looking at me. He said, "Well, maybe you have had too much sun, maybe a little delirium. Let me give you some medicine," and he prescribed codeine. I had a reaction to codeine. I broke out in hives; I was sick as a dog. I called around; there was no place in Bahawalpur that could detox me. Of course, I didn't know what was happening. I learned all this after the fact. I sent a telex, either a telex or a telegram, probably a telegram because that was a reliable telegram service in India. I sent a telegram to Artie who was in Patna. Patna was an overnight train ride to the west. I told Artie that I was coming to Patna. There was a big Catholic hospital in Patna -- the Holy Family Hospital. Patna was a city in 1965 of maybe 200,000 people with a big airport.

I crawled onto a train that night and got into Patna the next morning. Artie met me there and took me to the hospital. By this time I was in semi delirious condition. I spent a week in the Holy Family Hospital. Corgi was a little community outside of Patna, and I stayed there for five days while they detoxed me from the codeine.

Right after this episode, the Peace Corps office in New Delhi and I made the decision to move me from Bahawalpur to Patna because Jamal had been reassigned. We had done a lot of good work in Bahawalpur, but it was a good time to stop. Furthermore, Artie did not have a partner in what he was doing. He was setting up egg marketing centers all over the city of Patna. He and I were much closer friends than I was with Chip, my first partner.

There are two kinds of chickens that were being bred in India. We used leghorns which were the white birds, for egg laying purposes, and Rhode Island reds for broilers or meat. Artie and I came up with a scheme to grow Rhode Island reds which could be processed after three months. They would grow for from six weeks to three months and then they would process them, ice them down and ship them to Calcutta to all of those incredible restaurants and hotels. Calcutta was an overnight train in an express train. We managed to convince a number of farmers to grow Rhode Island reds. We said, "Look, we can make you some money. We'll process these birds anywhere from six weeks to three months depending on how big they are and send them to Calcutta in iced boxes. They will be received by merchants in Calcutta, and in the morning we will come back and give you the money."

So we set up very lucrative egg and meat marketing schemes for farmers in the capital area of Patna which really brought much welcomed additional income to the farmers.

The egg marketing scheme was interesting because we ran into a lot of problems with eggs in India. For one, a lot of Indians had religious superstitions about eating eggs -- it made the consumers oversexed they thought and therefore out of control. Secondly, strict vegetarians did not want to eat eggs. Three, when refrigeration is lacking, eggs will spoil quickly. You could cool them, but you couldn't always refrigerate them. If you had a lot of eggs coming in for processing or a lot of hens coming into production at one time, that meant we had a flood of eggs, and had to figure out how to process them quickly.

That is one reason we had egg marketing kiosks all over. We came up with this idea to sort of saturate the capital with kiosks, so we could spread out the distribution of the eggs and sell them quicker instead of throwing them away. In 1965-1966 there was a drought in India. Food became scarce. Therefore getting feed for chickens became difficult. We wrote a letter to Lyndon Johnson and appealed for maize because maize was the staple of the poultry feed formula that we used. We learned how to make poultry feed. Yellow corn (maize) was one of the ingredients that you had to have in order for the yolk to come out yellow, or deep orange. Without the maize, the eggs tasted horrible. In 1965-1966 the "cold war" was an active ingredient of politics in many parts of the world including India. The Indians were playing the United States off against the Soviet Union, and there was a real rift between the Johnson administration and the Indian administration headed by Shastri who later died in a taxicab in Tashkent. In light of the U.S.-India political situation and the drought, we couldn't get maize. We learned how to cut up red chilies and put them in the feed. That caused the egg to return to the yellow color.

We had lots of other problems, which we overcame one way or another. The egg marketing distribution program that we installed throughout Patna and the meat program that we had with Calcutta were huge successes. Artie and I became Peace Corps volunteer leaders, meaning that we helped to train the new volunteers as they arrived in India. We helped to select sites where volunteers could be assigned throughout the eastern region. By this time the Peace Corps had opened up an office in Calcutta, and we did a lot of administrative and programming work for the Peace Corps. It was an altogether very satisfying experience for me.

Q: You left there in 1966?

LAWRENCE J. HALL
Deputy Public Affairs Officer, USIS
New Delhi (1964-1966)

Lawrence J. Hall was born in Jersey City, New Jersey in 1920. He attended both New York University and the University of Wisconsin. His Foreign Service career included positions in India, Lebanon, Iraq, Iran, Vietnam, and Morocco. Mr. Hall was interviewed by Hans Tuch on August 23, 1988.

Q: Let's start with India, because you were in India from 1964 to 1966.

HALL: Yes.

Q: So, really, let's start with your assignment in India where you were the Deputy PAO.

HALL: Yes. That's right. I was deputy to Bill Weathersby who was a friend from the Middle East. He had been PAO in Cairo when I was PAO in Beirut and Baghdad. I volunteered for that assignment because Bill was there.

I arrived on the day of Nehru's funeral. So, since the entire establishment -- American as well as our Indian employees -- were turned to for that funeral, I was quickly hustled into someone's house and told to sit quiet for forty-eight hours until called for. Then I joined the USIS staff at Bhawalphur House.

I was the deputy for the biggest, at that time, USIS establishment anywhere in the world. (Ed. Note: Actually, India was probably smaller than USIS/Germany and possibly smaller than USIS/Japan at that time.)

Q: I was going to say, at that time, it was the largest?

HALL: At that time.

Q: Of course, part of its being so large was because it was able to spend a lot of local currency.

HALL: Yes, indeed. The rupee account was huge but we did have sixty-five American employees and several hundred Indian employees.

It was my first experience with a huge operation in which most of the authority had to be delegated to Information Officers and Cultural Officers and especially to Branch PAOs, since the branch posts, the three main ones in Bombay, Calcutta and Madras, each had ten American officers.

Nehru was succeeded by Lal Bahadur Shastri, an elderly man and a saintly type. It was a time when Lyndon Johnson was carefully meting out the amount of food aid that was vital to India's survival and which amounted to millions and millions of tons of grain.

The president was not very sympathetic to the neutralist foreign policy of India and especially unhappy with the criticism of the Vietnam War and his conduct of it, that the Indians were constantly voicing.

Therefore, he reacted by holding them on a very tight leash as far as our food aid was concerned, much to the consternation of Ambassador Chester Bowles, who had been appointed by President Kennedy as the result of power politics within the Kennedy Administration.

Q: Right, because Kennedy wanted to get rid of Bowles out of the State Department where he had been the Under Secretary and sent him to India.

HALL: That's right.

Q: He was your Ambassador during your entire time there?

HALL: That's right, he was. He was a good friend, too. Of course, he was very sympathetic not only with Indians but with the Third World generally and the problems of its emergence into the 20th Century.

He never really gave up the idea that he should have been Secretary of State and, therefore, he acted like a Secretary of State and kept the Secretary of State and the White House advised of everything that it should do on a global basis.

Q: It seems that our Ambassadors to India have had that proclivity. I mean, here was Kenneth Galbraith who was his predecessor, wasn't he?

HALL: Successor.

Q: I remember the telegrams that Kenneth Galbraith sent back. No, he was the predecessor because he sent back telegrams for Ed Murrow and I was working for Ed Murrow, you know, criticizing the wireless file and everything else that we did.

HALL: Yes, yes, you are right.

Q: Okay. Running a huge operation like USIS India must have been a tremendous operational burden and a tremendous policy, great policy problems, and what all did we do there at that time?

HALL: Amazingly enough, USIS India was traditionally one of the best operated posts and had the best system of internal communications. I am a bug on the need for good internal communications in order to properly run both USIS and its posts in the field. I felt we had an excellent system there.

We did profit from having direct teletype connections with our major branch posts. In addition to that, Bill and I visited those posts often and we had officers coming in to Delhi from them constantly.

Q: Who were at that time your primary target groups in India?

HALL: The young people in the universities we regarded as possibly the most important, since they would constitute the leadership within a very short time. Our University Program was one that I think was probably imitated in many other USIS posts.

Q: Did that include academic exchanges?

HALL: It did include academic exchanges and it included sending teams of Americans -- visiting academics and other specialists, U.S. government people, our officers or Ford Foundation people or any qualified American who was a good public speaker -- to go out to a specific university and spend several days there, holding seminars and meeting students and faculty members. There were, at that time, I think four hundred universities in India. With the teams we sent young Americans to hold bull sessions with the students. This program was enormously successful because the team members offered only friendship and their experience.

These teams would go out and spend a week, live at the university. They would have been previously scheduled by our branch post or cultural division officers to give any number of talks, hold seminars and then especially we would bring our young people with us, put them in the dormitory with the students and they would hold bull sessions with students nightly. That plus lectures and meetings with faculty members.

It was a multi-media interdisciplinary full, holistic approach to intercultural relations.

Q: With lots of personal contact.

HALL: With lots of personal contact and many questions and answers.

Q: Did you have a Fulbright Program?

HALL: We had a huge Fulbright Program that was separate but closely integrated with our operations through our cultural programs, such as the University Programs mentioned earlier. Happily we had one of the few cultural attachés who were political appointees, hand picked in this case by Chester Bowles. He was expert in his own discipline, but could also adapt to the demands and constraints of a government organization. His name was Robert R. R. Brooks. He had been Dean at Williams College and an economist in his own right. He could and did lecture on four or five subjects, a true Renaissance man.

Q: What were your main media products at that time in India?

HALL: In India we had a magazine called Span, which annually in competition with the scores of Indian magazines won awards for the best typography and lay-out and also for its editorial content, as well. That was sent to the elite on our list because its cost was high. I think it was restricted to about twenty-five thousand copies.

Our large publication was a news periodical called The Reporter, which we did in six languages - English and five Indian languages -- and I think its circulation was four hundred thousand and that was, I think, a monthly or perhaps a fortnightly.

Q: You just answered that question in part. Were your products mostly in the vernacular languages or mostly in English? There has always been this dichotomy with our PAOs in India. Should we primarily work with the English language or should we try to communicate in the vernacular?

HALL: We continued the debate and it was always a good debate worth continuing, to keep us on our toes. We actually did about half our emphasis in English and about half in the vernacular languages, which were so important. Language, as you know, is a tremendous political force in India and a very divisive and very sensitive one.

Riots can start in which fifty people are killed over the question of whether or not English should be a second official language in that part of the country.

Q: The reason I asked the question is even later, when I was at VOA, there was always the discussion on whether we should strengthen our broadcasts in the vernacular, in Hindi, Bengali and, of course, we also, towards Pakistan, we had Urdu. Hindi and Bengali were the only languages we were broadcasting and the BBC was broadcasting in other vernacular languages.

The then-PAO felt, "Forget about the vernaculars. Just concentrate on English." We did not agree. That question was not really resolved until after Iran became a major issue and the hostages were taken.

Suddenly, VOA was instructed, "Go into Farsi. Go into Pushtu. Go into Azari. Obviously, also, strengthen our Bengali and Hindi services."

HALL: That, of course, and the timing of it -- to divert a minute -- I think it was in part a reflection, even a subconscious one, of the fact that we had obviously in our policies toward Iran failed to contact this large and unseen population of people influenced by the Mullahs throughout the country in small towns who only spoke the local language, whatever it was.

MELBOURNE L. SPECTOR
Counselor for Administration
New Delhi (1964-1966)

Melbourne L. Spector was born in Pueblo, Colorado in 1918 and raised in Colorado and New Mexico. He received a degree in government from the University of New Mexico in 1940 and entered the U.S. Army in 1945. His Foreign Service career included positions in India, France, and Mexico. Mr. Spector was interviewed by W. Haven North on September 12, 1996.

SPECTOR: I went to New Delhi in '64 as the Counselor for Administration. I went there because Chester Bowles, who was the Ambassador, wanted to combine the two administrative staffs of AID and the Embassy. With my background in both AID and State, Bill Crockett sent me out. I tried to put them together. I think it would have worked there. It would have gone even better later, when you had one overall, comprehensive Foreign Service system. But I brought out a man named Orbin Powell, who was one of the best in the business to help me do it. We proposed the first head of the operation be an AID guy, not me. The efficiency ratings of all of the people working in the combined operation would first be done by the AID man and then reviewed by the Ambassador, so that the staff would feel they had just as much obligation to take care of the AID people as they did of the Embassy. But I could never get it approved back here. Again, it was Bill Hall. It was Bill who was the Foreign Service Officer, Assistant Administrator of AID, who blocked it. The local AID people approved it: a first rate AID Director, John Lewis. So we didn't bring it off. But, once again, AID had enormous resources of physical stuff that they would not let the Embassy use.

NICHOLAS A. VELIOTES
Political Officer
New Delhi (1964-1966)

Ambassador Nicholas A. Veliotes was born in California in 1928. He received a bachelor's degree from the University of California in 1952 and a master's degree in 1954. He joined the State Department in 1955. Ambassador Veliotes' career included positions in Italy, India, Laos, Israel, Washington, DC, and ambassadorships to Jordan, and Egypt. He was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy in 1990.

Q: Then your next assignment was to New Delhi.

VELIOTES: Yes, but it almost didn't happen.

Q: We're talking about 1964 to '66.

VELIOTES: Right, it almost didn't happen. Vietnam had become very big by that time, and I had been told that I was going to Vietnam to become the deputy political counselor, replacing Bob Miller. I wasn't wild about the idea, with two little kids and my wife, and not sure I could take my family. This was early in '64. Then the embassy was bombed, and the ambassador said there can be no transfers. So my assignment was canceled.

My assignment to India grew directly out of the fact that while I was in the Secretariat, I worked with the office of the under secretary, now the deputy secretary, very closely, and I was actually detached to Chester Bowles on some trips abroad. His executive assistant was Brandon Grove, in India. Brandon was back in Washington on a recruiting trip for the ambassador. Shortly after my assignment to Vietnam had collapsed, I saw him and he asked me if I'd like to come out to Delhi. If so, I was one of the people the ambassador would be interested in having. So I asked my wife, and she was delighted at the thought of going to India. And that's how we got to India, in the summer of '64.

But just as my wife and children had left for California, and our household shipment had left for New Delhi, I got a phone call, about midnight, congratulating me on my new assignment to Vietnam. And I just said, "No way. I don't care who, I'm not going. I was ready to go, I've gone through this, my wife and children and the household effects. I'm going to India."

Q: What were you doing in India? What was your position?

VELIOTES: It was rather interesting. I was a Class-Three officer at that time, which is today equivalent to a One, which made me rather overranked for the job that I got. I became the deputy, in the internal political section, to Howard Schaffer, who was ranked below me. But I'd just been promoted to Class Three, and I thought the best way to learn India was through Howard Schaffer, whom I'd known before and who even then was a great expert. So I spent a year doing domestic political reporting in India. My responsibilities were North India. I spoke a modicum of Hindi, just enough to get in and out of taxis, but fortunately, the English level in India is quite high.

Q: What was the situation in North India at the time?

VELIOTES: Well, at the time, you had to look at the Indian context. It's hard to believe today, but '62, '64, those times, no one was paying much attention to the Middle East. Vietnam had not yet grown to the point where it was to be a few years later. The last major flashpoint that could have threatened a Soviet-American confrontation had occurred in 1962 when the Indians and the Chinese went to war, and the Indians were soundly defeated. That led to a secret American-Indian agreement that if the Chinese were to attack India, we would go to India's defense with our Air Force. So, insofar as we had a major interest involving Soviet-American relations outside of Europe, it was the subcontinent. India, Pakistan, this was really big politics back home.

Q: And at that time, Pakistan had not been seen as the dominant key to the situation and where we were as concentrated on Pakistan...

VELIOTES: No, we had been, through the Dulles years, but with the Kennedy administration, particularly with Chester Bowles going there, remember John Kenneth Galbraith had gone earlier, the chips were on India, more or less, and the Indian democratic experiment, which is and was real, India's prominence in the world; nonalignment was very important. It's hard today, if you hadn't lived through that period, to think of India as one of the central pillars of American policy, but it was.

Q: Well, this is what we're trying to recreate now, to have scholars understand how we looked at the situation.

VELIOTES: Well, as I say, we had a secret agreement to go to India's aid should the Chinese attack. Those were the days when you could have secret agreements, by the way. The Indians wanted it because it reassured them, but if we had had to go up to the Congress with it, we never would have had one. I'm not sure that's bad, I'm just making a comment.

Q: Well, the Indians probably would not have accepted it either.

VELIOTES: But this was a time when, as I say, the thought of going to India was very exciting because it was central with respect to the national security interests of the United States. So when the chance came and they offered me the job of political/military officer in the embassy, I took it.

We had 135 American soldiers stationed in the embassy to run our military assistance program in India. Apart from that, we had a very large economic assistance program, and an extremely large PL 480 program.

Q: PL 480 being the surplus wheat, surplus grain.

VELIOTES: Surplus foodstuffs. My goodness, we were the largest embassy in the world by far. I've already mentioned the military mission. They had to build a whole new office building to hold our AID mission. USIS was extremely large. Then much of this was replicated in other posts. Madras, we had cultural centers all around the place. We had the three consulates.

Q: Those were Madras...

VELIOTES: Madras, Bombay, and Calcutta. It was during that time that we had two wars between India and Pakistan. The first was in the spring of '65, as I recall, and it took place in a strange place called the Rann of Kutch, down outside of Bombay, a desert.

Q: A horrible place.

VELIOTES: And I'm not even quite sure why the hostilities broke out. They were contained at the time.

That was the only experience I've ever had with fraudulent newspaper reporting. The Rann of Kutch made headlines all over the world when an American, who was a pool reporter (meaning there was room for one person on this plane, he went on the plane, from the Indian side, and whatever he learned, he was to share with all of the other reporters), came back reporting that he had seen Pakistani tank tracks in Indian territory. It was a scandal. It turned out later that it didn't exist; he made it up in order to get a byline in his newspaper.

This really escalated the tensions, but that calmed down.

However, some months later, in the fall, there was the outbreak of a very serious war between the Indians and the Pakistanis.

Just by coincidence, my wife and two children and I were up in Kashmir on a houseboat. And the last day we were there, we took the children and a guide, we rented horses and went up to see the glacier at Golmarg. To get there, we had to go through this enormous stand of timber. We came back down that afternoon, got on the plane the next morning, and flew to Delhi. When we arrived, we learned that Pak infiltrators, in that area that we had just ridden through, had started the hostilities that quickly escalated from the Indian Army against the Pak infiltrators, down to Lahore, where we were quite concerned about the possibility of a Pak breakthrough. Remembering what had happened in 1962 when the Chinese broke through up in the mountains, when the entire Indian civil administration collapsed, we were very worried about what would this mean.

So Jerry Green, our DCM, called me in and said, "You're in charge of our emergency evacuation. Keep me informed." But he let it be known that it was probably best if I didn't inform him of everything I was doing, because then he would have to tell the ambassador, and he was sure the ambassador would not agree. Chester Bowles was not known for his objectivity in assessing the Indian scene. Indeed, as we had been trying to predict the imminence of hostilities, he would predict the other way, because it didn't fit his own view as to what should go on out there.

So one of my jobs, then, was to prepare the evacuation plan, but beyond that, to look around at contingencies. And the big contingency we had to deal with was if the Paks broke through in the Punjab.

Now the Indians were already getting hysterical on the civil level. Rumors of Pak paratroopers sent scads of Indian vigilantes out trying to find people who were circumcised. Strangers who were circumcised were Pak parachutists. Howie Schaffer was stopped at gunpoint, in an embassy car, with an embassy driver, and he was fluent in Hindi. How could they think he was? He and I together one night were stopped. Vigilantes were roaming the streets. In our compound the Muslim servants all moved into the homes of the Americans, because the Christians, for survival, were siding with the Hindi majority servants, and they were worried about their lives and their families' lives.

In this kind of an environment, it would have been criminal for us not to look at the contingency of a breakdown of law and order and what that would mean with respect to the American community, indeed, the diplomatic community around the compound.

So, without telling the ambassador, we devised a plan to go up to the hill station where a lot of American kids were in school and bring them out.

Q: Was this Simla, or someplace like that?

VELIOTES: Somewhere like Simla, as I recall. And we devised a plan (I had a lot of soldiers, I told you, we had 135 soldiers there) on how to get to the airport if and when the planes came in, getting our air attaché and others to work on a plan to seize the airport and secure it. If law and order had broken down, that was the only thing. And then the question of hostile mobs coming out. Our guys were looking at perimeter defense, and perhaps suggesting that the British and the Japanese and the others out there come and join us. And, of course, we had the Pakistani Embassy right across the way.

Q: Because they hadn't broken relations, had they?

VELIOTES: No. In that time frame we had set up a hospital, a school, all quietly. And as far as weapons, we had been supplying the Khamba tribesmen. We did that so we had plenty of weapons in the compound. Fortunately, none of this had to come to pass, but in talking about things you do in the Foreign Service, well, you do things like this.

Q: Well, I assume part of this was an evaluation of the ability of the Indian Army, which had not shown itself to be very capable, at that particular time, against the Chinese.

VELIOTES: Right, and there was a lot of belief, amongst the American military, anyway, that since the Pak Army was armed by the Americans and indirectly trained by the Americans, they'd be irresistible. The soldiers in our Embassy said, "Look, the Indians are well trained, they're professional." I had no reason to believe it would happen or not happen. However, as a contingency, we had to plan.

Q: And particularly when you're talking not just about a military action, but civil unrest, which was your real concern.

VELIOTES: Civil unrest, that was our concern. The Indian authorities would have done their best to protect people, but that wasn't the point. They were in a war, and civil unrest, what could we do to protect ourselves? We had the fleet off on the horizon, ready to come in with airplanes if they needed them. Fortunately for us and for India, the Indians defeated the Paks soundly in the tank battles that took place, and the feared breakthrough never took place.

There were some other things that happened there. Much of this has not been reported, in the context of my relationships.

I had a newsman friend, a Canadian, working as a syndicated columnist for an American newspaper, who had a very good friend in the Polish Embassy, the Polish counselor from a previous...

The Chinese had delivered an ultimatum to the Indians. The Indians had done some humiliating things once they were safe from the Paks. And the Chinese had been threatening to support the Paks in this. The Indians went to the embassy, in the compound area, and taunted them -- no threats, but taunted them. The Chinese had threatened reprisals unless the Indians returned some Tibetan llamas, or something, that they claimed had been stolen -- a rather silly thing. The Indians came to us and said, "Okay, the Chinese are threatening us, we want to dust off the air agreement." It turned out I was the only one in the embassy who knew about the air agreement, because when I had inherited all these files the year before, as is my wont, I went through them, because I wanted to know what was there; I winnowed five or six file cabinets down to one, and, stuck somewhere in there, I found this very interesting air agreement. So when the DCM came back and said, "Where the hell...who knows what...I've just been called by the foreign minister, he wants to invoke the air agreement... what's he talking about?", I smiled and I said, "Here it is."

Q: So much for institutional memory.

VELIOTES: Yeah. And so, at that time, there was that concern. And, of course, people were wondering, well, geez, if the Chinese come in, and we clobber the Chinese, what'll the Russians do?

This friend of mine, who was a journalist, called me up and said, "I've got to see you right away. My Polish friend has given me a message. He knows we're friends, and he knows I'm going to tell you." And he said, "The Russians are not going to do anything if the Chinese do attack and you feel you have to help the Indians, just as long as you don't do anything stupid like try to overturn the Chinese government, unleash Chiang Kai-shek, and things like that."

Well, that led a lot of us to breathe a little easier, and we got that into the hopper. Things calmed down.

Q: This was the beginning of the great rift between China and the Soviet Union.

VELIOTES: As a matter of fact, it was not the beginning, it was the verification. See, there were some people who had seen it. Lindsay Grant, who's fascinating on this subject...

Q: I'm going to interview him next week.

VELIOTES: Well, he wrote a speech for Roger Hilsman, I think it was in '62.

Q: He was the director of INR at the time.

VELIOTES: Roger Hilsman was. But Lindsay was the very young acting director of China Affairs, and it was a speech, I forget the details, which said, "Hey, we are not silly, let's try to rebuild some bridges with these people," for which Lindsay was exiled to India. (That's me saying this, not him.)

There were people who had seen the rift. And I guess the reason why we didn't see it, in part, was because of Dean Rusk's own experiences. It was before the Khrushchev memoirs. Dean Rusk was assistant secretary for East Asia and the Far East at that time, during the Korean War. He always believed the Chinese started the Korean War. And he saw the Chinese also in Vietnam. It wasn't until we got Khrushchev's memoirs that we had the confirmation that the Russians started it, with the North Koreans. And, of course, the Chinese were not intervening on the side of the North Vietnamese. They were allowing their territory to be used, but they weren't the problem in Vietnam.

So that episode ended. But because the Indians and the Paks went to war, and both sides used American weapons, and because Lyndon Johnson believed that he had not been well served by his ambassadors out there, he cut all aid to both sides. That started a change in the American-Indian relationship and a change in the American-Pakistani relationship.

The change in the American-Indian relationship was confirmed during the Indo-Pak War of '72, when Henry Kissinger, in a very ill-advised move, sent our fleet into the Bay of Bengal.

Q: Sent the aircraft carrier "Enterprise".

VELIOTES: Yeah, I was able to delay that for a couple of days in Washington, because I was back at that time. Then the Paks became increasingly close to the Chinese. The American-Pak relationship was healed when the Paks paved the way for Nixon's visit to China.

So let me explain, what you see is South Asia from the early sixties...after all, the first assistant secretary for the Near East and South Asia, for Kennedy, was Phil Talbot, who only had experience in India. You had the metamorphosis over that period of time from the South Asian focus of the administration to South Asia becoming a subsidiary point of interest.

Q: In the time you were there, how were your personal relations in dealing with the Indian officials and Indian officialdom?

VELIOTES: Well, it's an acquired taste. It took time. We ended up with some friends -- not many, but you don't have many friends, anyway.

Q: Not in the Foreign Service.

VELIOTES: Not in the Foreign Service. To many, these are your contacts, these are your business associates. I had the same frustrations that anyone has dealing with Indians, particularly at that time. They were highly moralistic, monomaniacal on the Pakistan issue, which was their only concern, only interest, and, in a very unattractive manner, would dismiss anything on your mind or your country's mind as a sign of mistaken immaturity or imperialism. It was hard to take, in dealing with them.

They were clearly uncomfortable at the degree to which they had come to depend upon us by '64, in the two years after the Chinese invaded. Clearly uncomfortable. That was clear, too, that we should be trying to find ways to cut back ourselves, because that was a very unnatural situation. We were too deeply involved; we had too high a profile. Despite Chester Bowles, they didn't want to be like us. They wanted to have a good relationship with us, but they didn't want to have us on top. We were too close. You could see them starting to move back towards the Russians (that was well before we cut aid), because they had to, for their own psyche. They couldn't be Indian... did not want to be that dependent on one side.

We ended up with several friends in the Indian community -- a couple of officials, an Army officer and his wife, a doctor, a journalist, as I recall -- and I thought that was quite successful. My wife got very interested in Indian culture, and I think that helped us get into the Indian community to the extent we did.

Q: Looking at it at that time, did you see a real thrust from the Soviet Union on India, either internally or externally?

VELIOTES: No, the Soviet Union clearly did not want to replace us as the guarantor that there would be no starvation in India. In the first place, it couldn't. I used to periodically meet with a group of embassy officers, one of them being Russian. Anytime you were around Russians, in those days, there used to be a lot of heavy drinking, and, in vino veritas, the Russians would make it very clear that they had no interest in this.

As a matter of fact, just before I left, there was quite a breakthrough. I was approached by a Russian embassy officer who said he wanted to talk to me about nuclear matters, because I used to handle nuclear matters, too. So we had the beginning of a dialogue with the Russians on nonproliferation. We realized they were worried about this. No, it was awfully hard to see, from a Russian point of view, and they were extremely cynical themselves, the Russians.

I remember one day, in one of these sessions, one of the Russian counselors looked at me and said, "What would happen if there was no government in Delhi?" We'd been talking about...

And I said, "I never thought of that."

He said, "You should. Nothing would happen, because this country is so strange. It would still run, and the same people would run it."

India is much too culturally diverse and too immersed with nonmaterial symbolism and religiosity to ever become a Marxist government. It just could never happen. That didn't mean that there were not pockets of Communism, but they came in one of the most literate parts of India, Kerala, and in the poorest part of India, Calcutta.

Q: So this was not an overriding fear as far as we were concerned at the embassy.

VELIOTES: Well, certainly I didn't see this as being a problem, that the Indians were somehow going to become Communists. What we worried about was Indian positions on international policy issues of concern to us. One of them, increasingly, was Vietnam. And one of the things that we had in common with the Indians at that time was our opposition to China. And as the Russians increasingly were becoming opposed to China, the Russians were seen as less of a threat but more of a counterbalance to China. That's how the Indians saw the Russians. And the Indians figured, we're far away, we had a lot of interests; the Russians were closer and the Russians were obsessed with China, so it was to their interest. We were worried about the Indian economic development and whether they could really progress if they had linked themselves into Russia's five-year plan. There was a lot of barter going on then, and we thought that was a dangerous thing for the Indians to do, but that didn't pose a threat to us.

One of the greatest concerns that we had was the attitude of the Indian bureaucrats with respect to the private sector, most particularly foreign aid. There just seemed to be something in that combination of high-caste Hindu and high-class British education which seemed to combine the worst of both. You would get a lot of supercilious arrogance, and, you know, a merchant in traditional Hindu life is a banya, and we were above these people and looked down on them. And a lot of very frustrated foreign businessmen, who were invited by the senior government officials... down below. That was a major concern that we had. I can't really think that we saw India going Communist.

WILLIAM K. HITCHCOCK

Consul General Calcutta (1964-1968)

William K. Hitchcock was born in Wray, Colorado in 1919. He graduated with a bachelor's degree from Colorado University in 1941. He was interviewed by Steven Low in 1998.

Q: Yes, we'll go to India now.

HITCHCOCK: In many respects, India was the most interesting assignment of my career. I was truly fascinated with it, in large part because it was so different from anything I had known before. I did not understand eastern religions or the basic complexities of a society that large. I went to India in August 1964 on short notice and had virtually no time to prepare. (As you may now be gathering, this sort of characterizes my assignments one after the other.) As I said earlier, I was scheduled to go to Barcelona as Consul General, when Tom Hughes, a close associate of Chester Bowles, our ambassador-designate to India, discovered that Chet needed someone in Calcutta. He sold me to Chet who made the necessary arrangements within the Department to break my assignment to Spain.

My relationship with the Ambassador after my arrival in India began rather hesitantly but soon developed into a warm friendship. I certainly became an admirer of his, and I have no doubt that he liked me both personally and professionally. India isn't a place where you just arrive and gobble it up overnight. I read as extensively as I could before my arrival there particularly to begin developing an understanding of Indian philosophy and politics. Then I arrived in Calcutta after a quick tour of Delhi, Bombay and Madras. All in all it was a pretty modest preparation for the complicated tasks ahead of me.

The Calcutta consular district contained 140 million people. Calcutta itself was the locus of 20-30% of India's industrial output and the center of a lot of the Western (read British) history in India. Calcutta had been the capital of British India from the 18th century until 1914. When I was there it still had many of the trappings of empire. Eastern India was much more than that; it was the center of a great deal of India's own history. It was, for example, the place where Buddha attained his enlightenment in the state of Bihar. Our consular district also included Sikkim and Bhutan, then independent entities, plus the Northeast Frontier Agency (NEFA), the Northeastern Indian territories bordering China where the 1962 border dispute had occurred. This conflict was still smoldering. There was also a great deal of tension between India and Pakistan. Indeed in 1965, less than a year after I had arrived, a war broke out with Pakistan, much of it centered in the area of West Bengal and East Pakistan.

Eastern India was big and diverse in many ways, and we in the Consulate General were involved in its problems, sometimes substantially, sometimes on the margins. Examples of a few of the region's problem areas would include the following:

- Calcutta itself contained the University of Calcutta: with over 200,000 students it was believed to be the largest if not the greatest university in the world;

-In Eastern India, the problem of development was at that time receiving urgent attention in which US aid was an active participant;

-The memories of India's colonialism were a deep and complicating feature of the landscape;

-Linguistic unity was totally lacking. English was the de facto link language, but a lot of it was not linking. People were trying to substitute Hindi for English as the most used language, but many parts of the country did not speak Hindi or understand it including the Bengal area where I was principally located. There were 16 major languages in India and about 225-230 dialects;

-The country also had a substantial tribal population and a large Muslim minority. Hindus were the overwhelming majority; and -Residual cannibalism still existed in Nagaland.

All in all, there was a complexity about India that was interesting and important and sometimes perplexing. Shortly after I arrived, India experienced (1965 and 1966) successive famine years. This resulted from major crop failures in parts of the country where living was marginal at best. Suffering was great. The U.S., under Public Law 480, brought in over 11 million tons of food grains each year. One of the two centers of the famine was the state of Bihar, which was in my consular district. Obviously, it was basically an Indian responsibility to cope, but, given the suffering created by the crop failures, assistance of the type the U.S. provided was critical.

Throughout my tour, we were in the midst of a major attempt on the part of the Communist Party to take over West Bengal. And, in the year after I left India, they won a majority in the legislature and assumed the leadership of the state government. The communists were divided between the Chinese- and Russian-oriented approaches which was helpful in the sense that they often failed to achieve a cohesive approach in their revolutionary efforts.. There was, in this political ferment, recourse to a lot of extreme behavior. For example, they had a technique of bringing corporations to heel by locking in the management and turning off the electricity which meant turning off air conditioning. Production would become almost impossible in the oppressive heat.

We had frequent demonstrations against the United States, perhaps 30 or so per year. Most were small. But the ability of demonstrators to develop a crowd in a place like Calcutta is unbelievable, if you haven't seen it. Sometimes they would bring people in from the country by truck. But wherever the demonstrators came from they assembled in the Maidan, the big park in the center of Calcutta, which was two blocks from where the consulate general was located. We developed, in close partnership with the police, a technique whereby the marchers toward the consulate were thinned down as they proceeded. Let's say they would have a rally of 25,000 in the Maidan. The police would allow maybe 700 to march down the first block toward the Consulate and 150 or so to march down the second block. In thinned strength they would arrive at the locked gates to our office. We would almost always offer to meet with representatives to hear what their complaints were, and that usually was enough to diffuse the situation.

There was quite a lot of politically motivated violence throughout the state of West Bengal during the 1960s, though we were not involved in any of it so far as I can recall. I believe the reason might be found in the close and congenial relations we maintained with both the Calcutta police and the Indian Army's Eastern command whose headquarters were in the city.

Calcutta was considered by many people as the city with more problems than any other city in the world. It then had a population of eight million and now I guess it's 10 plus million and maybe more. The Ford Foundation financed a group of people to advise the Indians on what might be done to make living in Calcutta more viable. They had something like 22 specialists from all over the world, all recognized experts on urban problems. What the consequences of their recommendations were, I can't say. They had not been released by the time I left, but the problem of financing the improvements they were likely to consider essential would have been a major one in Indian terms.

Q: My impression is that you had an extraordinarily able staff.

HITCHCOCK: That's true. I also had a great deputy you know well - Roy Atherton.

Q: Beyond that you had some young people: Dennis Kux, Howie Schaffer - all of whom did quite well in the Foreign Service. There were some others too, weren't there?

HITCHCOCK: Kux and Schaffer were not in Calcutta, they were in Delhi. In Calcutta, Don Gelber was our political officer, and Roy was the Deputy Principal Officer the first year of my tour. Our staff not only was good, it was also large - the total number, American and locally hired, being over 300, including our USIA operation. For any consulate general that is a large number of people.

Q: And that was AID (Agency for International Development), too?

HITCHCOCK: No, there was no AID staff there, they were in Delhi. But we had a lot of connection with AID projects in the Consular District. AID personnel also acquired a semi-staff status when they were in the area.

Q: How were relations? Did you report directly to Washington or did you have to go through the Embassy?

HITCHCOCK: Most of our reports were sent simultaneously to both places. We made sure, of course, that things we were reporting that might be of importance India-wide were routed through the Embassy. I don't think we'll get into the CIA (Central Intelligence Agency) side of things, except to say they have a fair presence.

Sikkim, the tiny territory under India's protection and located on the Indo-Tibetan (i.e., China) border, requires special mention when recalling activities of the Calcutta Consulate General while I was there. The Indians were particularly sensitive about foreigners visiting the border areas. With respect to Sikkim that was less of a problem for me because the Maharaja of Sikkim was married to an American, Hope Cook, and they would invite us to Sikkim fairly often. We received our permits promptly, in part I believe because the Indians were not ready to take on a problem with the U.S. that refusing permits for our visits might cause.

Similar Indian security concerns existed with respect to Bhutan, an independent country located in the Himalayan mountains contiguous to Sikkim. Sikkim and Bhutan (plus Nepal) provided a buffer in the Himalayan mountains separating India from Chinese controlled Tibet. As I have already mentioned this area, and the Indian direct connection with China east of Bhutan (the Northeast Frontier Agency - NEFA) were of high sensitivity to the Indians because the Indo-China war at the end of 1962. The area had a long and interesting history during the British period, but it was the war in 1962 that prompted the Indian nervousness that I experienced. For our part, we were interested in developments on the Tibetan frontier and reported from time to time on the way certain groups-some of them were followers or under the leadership of American missionary groups-were escaping China through northern Burma.

Q: When you went to Sikkim and Bhutan, did you go by car?

HITCHCOCK: We went by helicopter. We'd fly to an airport in northern Bengal and then take a helicopter.

Q: These were Indian helicopters? Air Force?

HITCHCOCK: Yes, we used Indian Air Force choppers to go to Bhutan. In the case of Sikkim, we drove over wonderful mountain roads. Bhutan, a country of 850,000 and about 500 x 800 miles in size, did not have a road going into it until 1962. Bhutan was poor, in part because the lack of roads isolated people from each other, even within the country. I should add that this isolation was difficult to overcome also because of the height and precipitousness of the Himalayas.

Q: How about issues?

HITCHCOCK: Well, I've covered a lot of them.

Q: I meant policy issues that you got involved with?

HITCHCOCK: Many of our problems could be seen as policy issues or potentially so. We were dealing with a newly independent India whose colonial past raised all sorts of issues to which American representatives, among others, needed to be exceedingly sensitive. One example was the role India wanted to play in its relations with the rest of the world: as the leader of all non-aligned nations. This caused frequent frictions between the U.S. and India as, I dare say, it did between India and other countries, including the Soviet Union. India tried to hue an even line between us and the Soviet on Cold War issues, though its tilt toward the Russians was frequent and disturbing.

Maintaining a healthy U.S.- Indian relationship on other shared interests was also a challenge, often because of the newness of India's nationhood. The policy impact of such issues was, of course, of primary concern to the Embassy in Delhi but rarely did we escape them in the "outlying" cities. Indo-American problems didn't blossom into true crisis, but there were a series of constant strains. Those strains persisted to a degree, but I believe they were also slowly changing with the passage of time. India was, as I said earlier, very resistant to approaches to the problems which would have been welcomed by a lot of people. They had an underpinning of class structures, caste structures, religion, extended family – a tradition of 3,500-4,000 years out of which these things developed. They didn't want to be too close to us.

Not all U.S.-Indian relations concerned problems of the foregoing type. Far from it. I think we were really rather popular with influential Indians and on a personal level it was easy to relate to them and even develop warm friendships. India contains large numbers of intelligent, interesting people and they are a major reason why a foreign diplomat's tour there is so agreeable. But officially they saw in us some similarities with the British past they were trying so hard to get rid of.

Q: And, are still hanging on to.

HITCHCOCK: Yes, this is a constant I think. On the other hand, many Indians recognize that British contributions to India over the years will add vitally to its future development.

Q: The Labor attaché would have been active and other people of that kind would have come up from Delhi? Was that Maury Weisz? Who was the Labor attaché at that time?

HITCHCOCK: I believe he was the Labor Attaché in Delhi at that time, though I can't remember his visits to Calcutta. There were AID teams that came, as well as lots of others. The Russians had a major program in our area.

Q: Tata?

HITCHCOCK: No, Tata is a privately owned Indian mill. The steel mill the Russians built was called Bukhara. It was in Bihar, one of the states in my district, and was said at the time to be the largest in the world. The Russians had, I think, 4,000 people there. It was a big operation. They perceived this, I'm sure, as a point around which they could hook a lot of other activities. We had helped India some in developing its steel production capacity and then we decided to stop. I can't remember why.

Earlier I mentioned that my relationship with Ambassador Bowles started off in a rather rocky fashion. The difficulty arose at the first meeting of the Consuls General he called after I had been in Calcutta a few months. When he asked me to report on developments in Calcutta, I gave what I thought was an honest analysis of the situation, emphasizing the many challenges that needed to be overcome, etc. He was absolutely furious and said, "I didn't bring you out here to be an agent of pessimism." (Laughter) That was one of the initial little frictions which we got over - not by my capitulation though. I thought it important to confront head on and discuss the unpleasant realities Calcutta faced at that moment. Chet may have feared I was bringing too negative or defeatist an attitude to my new job. That was not true, but Chet was a true optimistic, as indeed am I. We soon got on the same wavelength and our 4 years working together were great, even when we were dealing with the numerous controversial issues that arose.

My Calcutta tour ended in the summer of '68 and, not knowing what to do with me, the Department appointed me as Diplomat-in-Residence at the University of Pennsylvania. The fall of 1968 was a restive period in American education, but, perversely, I enjoyed my 4 months in Philadelphia. Little did I know it would be an abruptly shortened tour. To clarify this, I should mention that well before the Philadelphia assignment Ambassador Bunker in Saigon had indicated his desire to get me assigned to Vietnam as soon as he could find an appropriate position. This was back before Ellsworth Bunker and Carole Laise got married in Kathmandu (Being in Calcutta I went to the wedding, since I was an old acquaintance of both.) At that time I told him, in effect: that's the last place I want to go, but, I'm in the Foreign Service, and I'll go if I'm told to go. When I was in Calcutta, there were recurrent feelers coming at me from Bunker about possible assignments. Finally, around Christmas 1968, his intermediary, Jim Grant, called me in Philadelphia-

HARMON E. KIRBY
Political Officer
Madras (1964-1966)

India Desk Officer
Washington, DC (1966-1967)

Political Officer
New Delhi (1969-1972)

Harmon E. Kirby was born and raised in Hamilton, Ohio. He received a bachelor's degree in government from Harvard University in 1956 and entered the U.S. Army thereafter. His Foreign Service career included positions in India, Switzerland, Belgium, Sudan, Afghanistan, Morocco, Togo, and Washington, DC. Mr. Kirby was interviewed by Charles Stuart Kennedy on August 31, 1995.

Q: Why don't we move on. You were assigned to Madras. Were you going to go somewhere else and then went to Madras?

KIRBY: I've forgotten what happened. Originally, I was to be assigned to Karachi. And then the Madras job opened, and they asked me whether despite the time I'd spent in Hindi-Urdu, I might like to go to Madras, where these languages were not spoken. I checked around with a couple of people who had been there and they were positive, so I said, "Yes, sure."

Q: You were there in Madras from when to when?

KIRBY: Summer of 1964 to summer of 1966.

Q: What was the situation first in India? When you arrived how did you see it? And then what was the situation in Southern India?

KIRBY: It was a very interesting time. Jawaharlal Nehru had just died...the great Pandit Nehru, independent India's first Prime Minister had died in May of 1964. He had been in decline for some time; upon his death he was replaced by Lal Bahadur Shastri. It was a time of testing for the Indian Union in a way. The old Gandhi-Nehru magic had held everything together for the first 17 years of Indian independence. Now Shastri, a member of the Indian National Congress Party hierarchy, but not part of that powerful, emotional Gandhi-Nehru tradition and line of succession, had been pushed forward by political party bosses who thought they would be able to dominate him, and push him around. That turned out not to be true, there were tremors and reverberations on the leadership front throughout 1964 and 1965. It was still an era during which people worried aloud regularly late at night about prospects for continued Indian unity. A few years before Selig Harrison had written his book India, the Dangerous Decades, and one of the questions it posed was whether or not India's fissiparous tendencies and the country's cultural, religious and political contradictions would not, in the end, drive the Union apart. 1964, to me, was not all that long ago. The importance of that year is that it fell only 17 years after Indian independence and the new India's unity was still being tested. Then, as now, India was a vibrant country. I always believed that the prospects for Indian unity for holding together, in pretty much the form we saw in 1964 were better than did some of other commentators. But, the prospects for India's continued unity, vitality, and economic and social development were perceived by perceptive Indian and foreigners alike to be important topics for discussion.

Q: If it were to split, what were sort of the conventional wisdom about how it might split up?

KIRBY: Oh, I think people had all sorts of partial, often not well thought out scenarios. They didn't necessarily sit around spinning precise blueprints. I think there was a feeling even then that the Sikhs would someday try to get either their own autonomous state or independence. Some felt that if certain elements in Kashmir, backed by certain elements in Pakistan, were successful, then maybe Kashmir would maybe become independent or parts of it would go with Pakistan. More generally, many people felt that these might eventuate a badly weakened central Indian government, with states nominally staying in the Indian Union but more or less going their own way on economic and social policy. Some thought that the Indian Union might sink into a rather loose, incoherent confederation. I would note again that I didn't particularly foresee that as the thing that was most likely to happen; I thought that the Indian Union and its institutions were strong enough, and deeply rooted enough, to survive. But some people that worried about it -- I'm not talking about people in the Embassy or in the American community particularly. Even local writers and newspaper editorials used to speculate along these lines. And certainly, when we arrived in Madras, the feeling of possible Tamil separatism was already in the air. In Madras, now called the state of Tamil Nadu, the Indian National Congress (the party of Ghent and Nehru) dominated the state government when we arrived. But indigenous Dravidian parties had begun to make serious inroads. There were several local parties. Some argued for Tamil Nadu's independence, although the mainline opposition Dravidian parties simply wanted a much broader measure of state autonomy than New Delhi wanted to grant. These were both practical and symbolic issues considered important in Tamil Nadu. We arrived in Madras in July, 1964, and in January, 1965, the state Madras broke out in serious anti-Hindi riots. (The language I had studied here in Washington.) The Indian constitution had said that English would be the country's "link language", but there was in the mid-1960's a strong move (I've forgotten all the details frankly) in New Delhi and among the northern states to make Hindi the sole official language. Indeed, Hindi was slated to become the official language for all government communications and publications. This created rumbles of discontent throughout the south, but particularly in Madras state. First of all, the Dravidian political parties which wanted more state autonomy, which wanted to dislodge the Indian National Congress state government and replace it with one of their own, used the Hindi issue symbolically in their struggle for political power. But the issue's importance to the Tamil people was more than symbolic. Madras had one of the longest traditions of superior education and higher education in the country. Presidency College in Madras is the oldest university in India, for example. Historically, going well back into British times, the Madras had always provided many of the clerks and government civil servants to run the national administration. And even in 1965 it was extraordinary how many Madras occupied high government positions in Delhi. So the Tamils, who were being educated in both English and Tamil, in secondary schools and at the university level, felt very strongly that it would be an imposition for them to have to learn Hindi and to have to pass qualifying exams, in Hindi for government employment. They were not about to stand still for a law or constitutional amendment that said that hereafter they would have to qualify in Hindi. So, to repeat, the language controversy had both practical and political/cultural overtones. Stoked by the politicians, many young people throughout Madras state were out busy burning busses and attacking such symbols of central authority as police stations and railway stations in January 1965. It was a rather destructive period. A few people lost their lives, but not many.

Q: The Consulate General in Madras covered what states?

KIRBY: The four states of Madras, Kerala, Andhra Pradesh, and Mysore. The Consulate General still covers those four states, although the names of two states have changed. Madras is now known as Tamil Nadu, and Mysore goes back to a historic name, Karnataka. They speak the Kannada language in Mysore.

Q: What about Kerala, it was sort of a thorn in our sides at that time, wasn't it?

KIRBY: Kerala was of concern for the Indian Government in New Delhi, as well as for the U.S. and some other western countries, because it was feared that a Communist state government might come to power there through the ballot box. This would be the only place in the free world that that had happened. Later, Kerala did indeed elect a Communist government. But in 1965 Kerala, symbolically for the Indians, and symbolically for Washington and the West -- indeed, for all those holding the line against a feared Communist advance in Asia -- Kerala loomed somewhat larger than the reality of hindsight would suggest to some people that it should have done. In any case, Kerala had, and has, a fantastically interesting mix of people. They have one of the highest educational levels in India, an extraordinarily interesting communal, religious, cultural mix. There are many Christians in Kerala, many Muslims and, of course, a Hindu majority. Politics in Kerala at that time was highly partisan. There were a great many political parties, seemingly dozens of political parties -- some of them quite small. The electoral combinations they would make prior to elections were quite creative and eclectic.

Q: You were the political officer?

KIRBY: Yes, I did two things at the Consulate General. As the political officer, I was reporting on the politics of the four southern states. I had four extraordinarily accomplished Foreign Service Nationals assisting me in that endeavor, one for each of the four states. In addition, I supervised the Consular section, which also had some very senior Foreign Service National employees. In Madras we had in all sections of the Consulate General many highly educated and very accomplished Indian employees. It was an excellent post. I am sure that is still the case today.

Q: Who was the Consul General?

KIRBY: When I was there it was Albert Franklin. My old friend, Bert Franklin, who, unfortunately, died a year or two ago.

Q: How did he operate? How did he have you operate when you were there?

KIRBY: Although it was an "old school" Foreign Service operation, the Consul General in a way, ruled with a relatively light rein. He had a deputy principal officer who coordinated day to day operations. In those days the Consulates in India were fairly large. And when you added the USIS presence, they were quite large indeed. It seems to me we had eight or ten Foreign Service officers in the Consulate General and five or six USIS officers. It was a large establishment. The Consul General made it clear he was in charge. He had studied Tamil and liked to give speeches in the Tamil language. He also liked to arrange cultural and representational events and meet Indian and American visitors. Beyond that, he left it to the staff to run their individual operations. So, I ran the consular section without much fuss. We had a lot of consular work. However, my bread and butter and major preoccupation was the political reporting. Fortunately, I liked to travel, and although the distances were fairly vast, I got around South India quite widely. I also accompanied the Consul General to the annual 2-3 day conferences in New Delhi that Ambassador Chester Bowles would hold with the three Consuls General and selected members of their staffs to discuss where India was going, politically and economically, and U.S.-Indian relations. I found it a very good working atmosphere.

Q: I want to come back to work in Madras, but you mentioned Chester Bowles. I never served in India but I've had the impression that when Bowles and Galbraith and other people go there they immediately fall in love with India and become "India-centric". They tend to want everything for India and, not being very realistic, get almost dismissed back in Washington. What was your impression at the time about how Bowles looked at things and what you were getting from his office?

KIRBY: This is something that I've thought a lot about, both at that time and more recently. I used to think about it when I was in Madras. The question had far more relevance to me personally later on when I was assigned to New Delhi during the India-Pakistan War. I think that is a danger which diplomats have to fight against constantly, of becoming overly identified with the country to which you are assigned. India (and Pakistan) are both very seductive in many ways, and, of course, there have been some U.S. representatives who tended to identify strongly with one or the other. I don't know the situation today, but I used to tell colleagues that perhaps (as you suggested) in certain environments political appointees were especially susceptible to this. Foreign Service officers were not totally immune, of course. I think there was a tendency among many Americans assigned to India either to fall madly in love with the place or to be repelled by it and thus turned off. Striking a middle balance is often very hard, particularly for Americans. I always believed, nonetheless, that one has to make a daily effort to strike that balance. It's very important not to give Washington the feeling that the diplomatic mission in India or in Pakistan, or in country X, has become client-ridden -- the old charge of clientitis. It's not easy. It's an occupational hazard but you have to try. Sitting down in Madras, far removed from New Delhi, I formed a great respect and admiration for Ambassador Bowles and I mean that very sincerely. He was an excellent Ambassador. Although I did not see him all that often, occasionally in the south, and perhaps once or twice a year in Delhi, I felt that he tended to view India and Indian developments through rose colored glasses. I did not think his views were seriously off base, as some have said; indeed, most of what he foresaw as a vibrant Indian democracy continuing to advance economically, has turned out to be true. But he sometimes did not see the Indians as they really were and perhaps had a tendency to give them the benefit of the doubt on some issues of interest to the U.S. where they shouldn't have been given the benefit of the doubt. On the other hand, to be fair about it, he really did have a big story to tell in Washington: India and its development as a democratic country is one of the exciting phenomena of the second half of this century, I think. And his views on the extent to which India might serve as a model of political and economic development in Asia had considerable merit. There was a lot going on in India and in Asia that American policy makers needed to know and think about, and Bowles insisted on bringing all that to their attention. But on the other hand, he could have pounded the table with the Indians a few times.

Q: Could we talk a bit about being the political officer? Here is a vast area, you have a lot of parties. Indians are known for wanting to talk and put forth their points of view of all hues. I would think working as a political officer would be a very trying and difficult thing to do. Could you talk about being...?

KIRBY: Sure. As you know, under the generic political officer position rubric there are subsumed many different specific functions. The political officer's position in Madras was very different from the political officer slot I filled in Delhi a few years later. In Madras the job primarily consisted of reporting on political developments in southern India to New Delhi and Washington. It was fascinating because there was a lot going on. We talked earlier about the vast scope of what was happening in India at the time -- i.e., the tension between the states and the central government and the latter's attempt to strengthen its position. India and Pakistan had a brief war in the autumn of 1965. And then in late 1965 or early 1966 Prime Minister Shastri died and was replaced by Indira Gandhi. So, there were many issues in play, both national and regional. You're quite right, the Indians -- and I am really enormously fond of India and the Indians -- not only talk a lot, but they speak well. It's delightful to engage in conversations with Indian politicians, intellectuals, and, indeed, the common people. And often one would be exposed to people of modest station. One was exposed to Indians of a wide variety of backgrounds and attainments. The local village chief would sometimes startle you with his comments, his range of interests. One day, I was asked to go somewhere in Andhra Pradesh to dedicate a school. (It was great fun, you'd get that type of assignment quite often.) After dedicating the school, and making a speech, I went out into some of the nearby villages and talked to local leadership about the issues of the day and to check in on a couple of small development projects which the U.S. had financed. My assistants and I were received very courteously by the local leaders, the chief village elder, who was in his dhoti tucked up around his loins, with no shirt, but sporting a wonderful beard like yours, was a distinguished looking man. Sitting on the ground and speaking only Telugu, he offered me something to drink and courteously observed how nice it was that I had come and said how glad he was that relations between the U.S. and India were so good. He said he didn't get out of his village much but that he understood that the U.S. and India had a wide community of interests. I acknowledged that was so. And then his eyes flashed and his tongue sharpened, and he demanded, "When are you Americans going to wake up and do something to get the Pakistanis out of Kashmir?" And I laughed and said that Kashmir was very far away. He rejoined: "Not remote from my concerns, it's not, I'm a good Indian." This conversation occurred in a village deep in southern India. The chief said he had heard that America was providing certain types of jet aircraft to Pakistan and said if that was true, then they certainly should provide even more sophisticated aircraft to India. And went on at some length and with some passion. I responded to all this, obviously trying to round the conversation off and to put the issue in appropriate perspective. This exchange was the last thing in the world I would have expected when I entered this remote village. Perhaps regional officials had put the chief up to it. But it is important to recall that through the transistor radio these local people were following national affairs. And the chief couldn't resist the opportunity, and he was right. In front of other village elders and the common people of the village, he wanted to be sure that he had spoken up for India.

Q: You don't get much of an opportunity in any country to talk to a diplomat of a major power and he was making his point.

KIRBY: Absolutely. He was making his point, and by his lights, doing it very well. We had a lot of contact with the local people in towns and villages throughout South India during my tour. While I didn't have much time available to do it, USIS used to ask me to undertake the occasional speaking tour. I did that once or twice in the South and once or twice later when I served in Delhi. In Bangalore, the capital of Mysore state, there are many universities and training institutes. Every couple of years USIS would arrange a week of lectures on U.S. culture, politics, and history by lecturers from the U.S. or locally acquired. They asked me to lecture on constitutional theory and constitutional law, on comparative government, and on U.S. foreign policy. That work led to on-going friendly relationships with university professors in Mysore during the remainder of my time in South India. I would look in on them when I passed through, sometimes to take local political temperature and sometimes just to exchange ideas on world developments. I enjoyed steady and full employment, I must say.

Q: Did you find that the University faculty that you would be talking to, so often coming out...I guess it's true today...out of the British experience and the French, tended to be left of the ruling party? Was this natural or not?

KIRBY: I wouldn't say that was universally true. There was in fact a mixture of orientations. There were some British-trained leftist intellectuals, of course, but I think that what leftist influence there was in the universities came more from some of the younger teaching staff trained by Marxists around the world including in the Soviet Union and other Eastern Bloc countries. This was particularly marked in the University of Calcutta and some of the other universities of north India. It was less marked in the universities of south India at that time, except for Kerala.

Q: One of the big pushes of the Kennedy time and moved over into part of the Johnson Administration which you were working for at this time, was an emphasis on making contact with the youth leaders...those who would be the great leaders of tomorrow. Did you find yourself a sort of "youth officer" or that type of thing?

KIRBY: I was not so designated, but I did a lot of that kind of work, yes. I was very much involved in helping choosing people for USIA's International Visitor Programs and for the Young Leaders travel program to the U.S. We chose promising politicians and young leaders in other fields. In Madras and at one or two other posts, I also sat on the board and interviewed people and made decisions on some of the Fulbright grantees, too.

Q: Was sort of Marxism the thing of the youth, on the campuses where you were? Or was this just one of the many?

KIRBY: Again, we're now talking about my time in Madras. Marxist influence was strong in Kerala and some parts of Andhra Pradesh. Elsewhere, Marxism was not particularly strong. In Madras, up in Hyderabad, in the institutions in Mysore state, and in Bangalore, leftist influence was not especially strong.

Q: Were we concerned about what the Soviet Union was doing down in your area?

KIRBY: We were concerned about what the Soviets were doing generally as they tried to expand their influence throughout India. At the policy level, that was an abiding U.S. concern right through the Cold War. On the other hand, we were not especially preoccupied about what they were doing in the south, as such. The Soviets had a large consulate in Madras, and so did the East Germans. We were concerned about some of their links around the country, and we did what we reasonably could to follow their cultural, commercial, and other activities and report on them as appropriate.

Q: This was during the time of our build-up in Vietnam. Did the Vietnam War come in as an issue much when you were there, or did that come later?

KIRBY: My memories of how Vietnam figured in the U.S.-Indian bilateral relationship are stronger from the time I spent in New Delhi, 1969-72 because being in the Indian capital caused me to hear about the issue day in and day out. We heard about Vietnam in the South, but the South tended to be more moderate in its' American basting than the North. In most times, on most things, the south was relatively more reasonable from the American point of view. We were criticized for Vietnam, but it was not as virulent as in some of the newspapers and among some of the peace groups of the North. The North had more fora -- the World Peace Council and the organizations that you have floating around any large capital city. Calcutta had a strong leftist tinge; there was a lot of communist influence there. The Consulate General in Calcutta took its' lumps, being the target of regular demonstrations. But, we didn't have any of that in Madras.

They just weren't as concerned about Vietnam down there. The south was generally more pro-American than the North, particularly Madras.

Q: You mentioned the Pakistani War up in the Rann of Kutch and in Kashmir. Was the United States identified with one side or the other?

KIRBY: We, in our own minds and policy, certainly identified with neither side. That was a brief war. Indians of course believed, as they always did that U.S. policy favored Pakistan since, prior to the conflict, we had had a military supply relationship with Pakistan, which was much greater than what we had with India. Indeed, we had the CENTO alliance relationship, and relations were generally closer with that country. The war didn't last long enough for us to get caught in any real squeeze between India and Pakistan, however. In southern India, apart from black-outs and driving with your lights off and that sort of thing, the war didn't really have too much of an impact. We were pretty far away from the war theater. We were conscious of it, and Indians were talking about it and getting the news bulletins on the radio but the conflict didn't have a major impact upon our relations with South Indians. More broadly, it is worth noting that no Indian government, by definition, was ever happy for the U.S. to have any kind of relationship with Pakistan. To the extent that we gave the Pakistanis any kind of military or political and diplomatic support, the Indians would always claim that it was directed against them, even though that was not our intention. In any case, in the 1965 war, the U.S. did not provide additional military or other assistance to either side. Our diplomatic efforts were concentrated on trying to get the war stopped and toward the restoration of peace between India and Pakistan.

Q: Well then, you left there in 1966. Why don't we stop at this point? This is a good cutting off point. Summer of 1966 you went back to Washington.

KIRBY: Yes, I came back to Washington to the "India Desk?"

Q: Tell me what you covered.

KIRBY: I worked on the India Desk for about a year. It was a big operation. The office covered India, Sri Lanka, Nepal, Bhutan and Sikkim. I was one of three (we had larger staffing at that time) people who worked on India pretty much full time. I did a lot of the analysis of what was going on in India and in U.S.-India relations for the State Department's "seventh floor" and for the White House. I responded to many Congressional inquiries. I gave a few speeches, particularly in the Washington area, on South Asian affairs. I met with a lot of visitors to the State Department, both Indians and Americans. We had quite an out-reach program to the university community in the United States. We had a program which brought university professors to the Department from time to time to examine salient issues in U.S.-Indian relations. Along with INR, I was very active in helping to put that together and to sustain it. I wrote a speech which Vice President Hubert Humphrey gave publicly commemorating Mahatma Gandhi's birthday, which the Vice President warmly praised. I recall drafting responses from President Johnson to letters sent to him by Indian Prime Minister Indira Gandhi. Thus, it was a full range of relatively junior desk-officer duties.

Q: As a junior desk-officer dealing with India, can you give a little bit of the hierarchy?

KIRBY: Yes. This was the era when the Country-Directorate concept was being introduced. Prior to that for years and years and years, it had been the Office of South Asian Affairs which handled not only the countries I mentioned above but, also Pakistan and Afghanistan. Well, when the country directorates were formed in the Bureau of Near East and South Asian Affairs, which is where we were all located, the South Asian office was split into two. One office, the one I was in, covered India, Nepal and Cyprus, as the latter country was still known at the time. (At least, I think it was still Cyprus in 1966- 67.) The country director was Doug Heck, a senior officer who had been Political Counselor in New Delhi and Deputy Chief of Mission in Cyprus before becoming country director. He had a deputy, Mary Olmsted, who was senior economic officer for the country directorate and also the deputy to the country director. She had one economic officer who worked for her. On the political side, the senior man was Carlton Coon, who dealt primarily with India, but had some responsibilities, I recall, for Nepal as well. There were two India desk officers with him. At first they were Herb Haggerty and I. Then Herb left the office, to be replaced by Howie Schaffer. And then we had a desk officer, Gil Wing, for Nepal and Bhutan, and a desk officer, George Griffin, for Cyprus. We worked as a team, a team with extensive South Asia experience. Everybody there had had a very, very good grounding in South Asian affairs, a mix of academia, the Department of State and/or field experience.

Q: Were you there when they introduced the Country Director concept or had that just arrived?

KIRBY: I think it had been introduced just a few months before I came on board in September 1966. I seem to recall that the reorganization had occurred earlier that year.

Q: I've heard criticism that during Rusk's time as Secretary of State he put in the Country Director system which added another layer and in a way took away power from the younger desk officers who had little...and added a more senior...but also added another layer. Was there any talk about this at the time?

KIRBY: I don't think there was much comment of that kind at that time. I think the talk, the theory, cut the other way in 1966. The whole idea of creating a Country Directorate, as it was advertised and explained to us, was to give more authority, not necessarily to the desk officer, but to the Country Director, and to get him/her and his staff more involved in policy making than apparently had been possible in the old office concept. The idea was to give more structure and intensity to the policy on Department's 4th and 5th floors where the country directorates were located, and to take a little bit away of the involvement in details of the 6th floor. Perhaps I'm anticipating you, but if we could look forward a bit, I might comment on how I think the Country Director concept has fared over the last 30 years. I speak as one who later was a country director, not for India-Nepal-Sri Lanka, but rather next door for Pakistan, Afghanistan and Bangladesh (PAB), and I felt very good about that experience, which occurred 1982-84. The NEA Bureau, where PAB was then located, permitted country directors and their staffs to operate pretty much in accordance with the original concept of making the country directorate the arena for hammering out the outline and details of policy in the country directorate and not make final policy, but it made the essential recommendations leading to policy decisions, and thus was intimately, and productively, involved in the policy process. In those bureaus where the country directorate concept has been allowed to work, I think it has worked very well. I'm not sure whether I had that perception as clearly as I do today, when I was a junior desk officer. But, I had no quarrel with the set-up as a desk officer. In those days, to the extent that there was any kind of layering or lack of room for maneuver by a junior desk officer, it had more to do with some slight over-staffing than it did with the organizational structure as such. Some of the Department's forced slenderizing over the years, driven initially by budgetary considerations, has validated the leaner staffing concept.

Q: You had that job from when to when?

KIRBY: I was in NEA/INS from September, 1966, to sometime in the summer or early fall of 1967. I liked the job greatly and admired and liked my colleagues; it was a tremendous group of people. Even after I left the office, we continued to see each other and do a lot of things together over the years. My game plan was to try to return to India after my Washington tour. As we have already discussed, I came onto the desk from India, and my plan was to try to go back to India. Moreover, I was encouraged by my superiors to do that. As happy as I was on the India desk, I wanted a slight break from South Asian affairs before going back to India, and I also wanted to get a view of a different side of the Department of State's business before I went overseas again. A job came open in the NEA Bureau's Personnel Assignment Office and I asked whether I could be considered for that, and I was accepted in mid-1967. For the last two years of my Washington tour, I was one of two NEA Personnel Assignments Officers. If memory holds on that, Stu, that was when I had the great pleasure of meeting you.

Q: During approximately this year, 1966-1967, were there any sort of issues you got a good bit of dealing with our relations with India?

KIRBY: It's a good question. In every other job I had later on, and I know we'll explore these later, I would be able to give you an unhesitating response. For the Asian desk job I can't think of any particular highlights. For reasons I won't bore you with here, U.S.-Indian relations were in one of many troughs during that period. As we discussed earlier, the India-Pakistan War of 1965 had once again reasserted the continuing salience and primacy of the Kashmir problem, and when I was on the desk, I did work on Kashmir issues among others. Intellectually, I found that fascinating. But there were no special high points. It was a period when we were at a relatively simple maintenance level in our bilateral relations. Indira Gandhi was the still relatively new Prime Minister and she was trying to consolidate her power. She was under attack from the "old guard" of the Indian National Congress, which was trying to wrest power from her. She was, as always, and not for very good reasons this time, suspicious of the United States which, she thought, could be in league with her political enemies. She was also against the growing U.S. involvement in Vietnam. So, our relations were at maintenance level. We had a lot of economic assistance and cultural programs going forward in India, but there were no truly compelling war and peace, or major political issues, that really stand out for me during that period.

Q: This was your first time on a political desk sort of area, wasn't it?

KIRBY: It was the first time, and even though I haven't been able to identify major undertakings at the time, it was actually a critical period in my own formation. The experience on the desk certainly made me a different kind of Foreign Service officer when I went overseas again, or, at least, it made a vast difference in my political reporting. Being on the desk, being in the busy Country Directorate, and having daily association with the 6th and 7th floor of the State Department, I gained from experience a more acute sense of the policy relevance of the work we did in the field. It changed substantially my approach to reporting political developments abroad.

Q: It's almost essential. Did you get a different feel for the government's -- the State Department's attitude toward India during that time, obviously looking around there's Pakistan and India. Did you get a feel for where it stood. Was it a "plague on both your houses" or well, this is Jacqueline Kennedy who was interested in India and India was a little more glamorous than Pakistan. Was there any of that?

KIRBY: That's a very interesting question. I think I did pick up some impressions, but they cut in a somewhat different direction from the way the question was put. The interesting and even extraordinary thing is that the talented group of people working in the two country directorates heading South Asia, and many of their superiors on the State Department's 6th and 7th floors, strongly believed that South Asia was important and that what happened in India, Pakistan, and some of the smaller regional countries might have a lot to do with how the third world developed generally. They thought this could have implications for U.S. security interests, as well as for democratic and economic development, and these were important in the making of the modern world. These sentiments were shared, incidentally, in the Kennedy and Johnson White House. I think that it was largely the people in the two NEA country directorates who kept South Asia front and center in our bureaucracy and in our policy process. This was as true of those who worked on Pakistan as of those who worked on India. If you worked on India or on Pakistan, you might differ about which of those two countries was at fault in a given skirmish, but there was a broad agreement among the people who worked in both areas that that part of the world was important. We all thought so. I think, had there not been that kind of dedication and commitment of the people who worked on these matters daily, at the working level in the Department, U.S. relations with those countries would not have gotten the kind of high-level attention salience that they did regularly in our government. Because the American people, by and large, were not that interested in South Asia. And in successive White House Administrations, interest waxed and waned. President Kennedy was very, very interested in India and his advisors were, too. As part of his inheritance of issues and advisers from Kennedy, Lyndon Johnson became interested in South Asia, too, but not every administration over later years was as interested. Many later argued that the State Department was putting more emphasis on India, particularly, than U.S. interests really required.

Q: So, where did you go?

KIRBY: In the summer of 1969, I went to New Delhi and was there until the autumn of 1972.

Q: What was your job there?

KIRBY: I was a political officer on the external affairs side of the Embassy's political section. Because of my growing background in South Asian affairs, I had asked to have the job which would cover relations between India and its near neighbors, except for China. We had a China hand handling Sino-Indian relations. My position was multi-faceted. I handled India's relations with all its near neighbors in South Asia -- Pakistan, Afghanistan, Sri Lanka and Nepal, I also had Bhutan and Sikkim. In addition, I followed developments in Kashmir. I also covered political-military affairs and, as a subset of that, military-scientific affairs. Regarding the latter, we had a science attaché, but he wasn't interested in or terribly oriented toward Indian nuclear policy or Indian missile technology. Thus, the little bit of reporting we did in those fields, I did myself. We were terribly interested in trying to get some sense of what India was doing in missilery and whether they were going to develop a nuclear weapons program. So, to the limited extent then possible I tried to follow those matters, although it wasn't easy for an Embassy political officer to do that. I also handled some Indo-U.S. related issues, particularly those that impinged on the India-Pakistan nexus. If a middle grade officer was assigned to take to the Foreign Office a message on such issues, I was often the one to handle it. So, I did get into some of the strictly Indo-U.S. matters as well.

Q: What was your impression of the role of India? Was she a colossus over the neighboring countries, including Pakistan?

KIRBY: Whatever the facts, and whatever India's actual intentions, India was so perceived by some neighboring countries, especially the two smaller ones, Nepal and Sri Lanka. I think they spent their days worrying about what they perceived as the Indian colossus. My own perception at the time was that India did fairly regularly put the squeeze on Nepal, largely through its trade and transit policy. India was concerned about the defense of its northern borders with China and wanted the smaller Himalayan states to be oriented toward New Delhi. The China-India War of 1962 had occurred not very long ago and security concerns relating to China was not a central focus of Indian policy. The Nepalese had to bring everything up through Calcutta port and the Indians used their trade and transit policy to try to keep the Nepalese in line on other matters. This was similar to Pakistan's use of the trade and transit card to try to keep Afghanistan in line, to the extent possible. I think India's sheer size and weight worried its neighbors. As a general proposition, I don't think India was unduly aggressive during most of the period I was in New Delhi, although once overt rebellion erupted in East Pakistan, India vigorously supported the Bengalis in their successful effort to break away from West Pakistan. India was not shy about using its diplomatic and economic muscle where it could effectively do so in the region, but, I think maybe the perception of an active, overbearing colossus outran the everyday reality.

Q: Before we move into the India-Pak War, which was the war really because that really changed the face of the 1971 one. A little about India's role. On the political-military side did you have anything to do with India as part of the tripartite group that was supposedly policing in Vietnam?

KIRBY: I didn't have anything to do with that. My colleague who handled Asia generally during most of my time there, Don Anderson, had that as part of his area of responsibility. Moreover, by the time I arrived in Delhi in 1969, the war in Vietnam was pretty well advanced, and the Tri-Tripartite Commission in Vietnam loomed less large on the political and diplomatic horizon than it had earlier in the 1960's.

Q: It really wasn't very much. I was in Saigon in '69-70. It was just the Indians were not seen as being very friendly toward the United States.

KIRBY: They weren't helpful at all. During my time in Delhi both their private diplomacy and their frequent public statements on Vietnam were quite unhelpful. I remember that our Ambassador and the Deputy Chief of Mission spent a lot of time trying to counter some of the things Indian officialdom were saying about Vietnam and the things that were appearing in their press, much of that inspired by the Indian Government. The Indian Government's press spokesman at the time regularly put out a lot of stuff on Vietnam that the United States Government and we in the Embassy found very unhelpful.

Q: Looking at this and you're dealing with the Indians at this particular time, what did you feel was the motivating force behind this antipathy towards the United States and Vietnam? I mean it seemed to run throughout the whole Indian thing.

KIRBY: I think there were two or three inter-related aspects to the Indian position. First, was India's self-assumed role of being a spokesman within the non-aligned movement, for the down-trodden, for the erstwhile colonial world and what have you. They saw Vietnam in that context. The U.S. saw one independent country, South Vietnam, as, essentially, being infiltrated, and ultimately invaded by its neighbor from the north. The Indians, however, chose to interpret the issue as being one of a small Asian country that had been dominated by, first the French, and now the Americans, which was trying to throw off the last vestiges of colonialism and bring about national unification. It wasn't that way in our case. Whether Indian officials genuinely perceived the issue that way, or whether they simply chose to see it that way for policy reasons because it suited their role in the UN and in the non-aligned movement of speaking up against great power pressure may be open to question, of course. One may continue the discussion by asking the Indians. They never found a way to speak out against Soviet pressure on other countries. That brings me to the second point I wanted to make about the strands of Indian policy. Another motivation for the Indians, was something we referred to earlier -- i.e., their security concerns about China. As the Indians perceived it, then and now, the overwhelming security threat is from China. Indian policy and diplomacy have always been designed to keep the Chinese at bay. And central to that was staying friendly with the Soviets and looking for Soviet diplomatic and other kinds of support where they could get it. Because of the perception of China they never wanted to be out of sync with the Soviets on Vietnam or anything else.

Q: They had the Soviet card to play.

KIRBY: Yes. They would never get too far out of step with the Soviets on Vietnam. In general, if you look back at what the Indians were saying about Vietnam, it was usually consistent with the line the Soviets were taking on Vietnam. And I think that the third element in Indian Vietnam policy -- and maybe this is a subset of the first element -- India then and now perceived itself as a big Asian country that should speak up for the rights of other, selected Asian countries when the latter are engaged in conflicts with the West. And, so it follows from all that, that India spoke for Vietnam against the American power, located so far away from Asia that, from the Indian viewpoint, it should not have involved itself in Asian affairs. I don't defend any of that and used to vigorously contest it with my Indian friends, as you can expect. However, I think those are the three elements that were driving Indian policy on Vietnam.

Q: Was there also an element that the Indians had caught...I don't know what to call it...the British "upper class virus" or something from their educational system and their leadership that the Americans are upstarts and uncouth, uncultured and over here sort of anything like that?

KIRBY: There may have been some aspect of that but I think, interestingly, and this may be a fourth element in the Indian attitude toward the U.S., it worked slightly differently, as Indian officials sought to "play" the U.S. to India's advantage. Nehru profoundly believed, and used to tell his close associates, that the way to get the attention of the Americans and to get things out of them is by calling on them and their country to live up to their better selves. He suggested that when Americans can be brought to feel that they are betraying their own principles or mankind's principles, then if you scream at them loudly enough and kick them in the shins, they will apologize and make up for it by doing what it is you want them to do. He tended to believe that was the way you dealt with Americans. That may have been naive on his part, but there were times when we gave Nehru and others reason to think so. I think we ourselves have matured greatly as a people. I think that a long time ago we began to get out the word that you don't get to be friends with the U.S. by kicking us in the shins or otherwise defaming us. There are those who say we should have done it earlier. I think there was that aspect to Indian attitudes toward the U.S., and that it took too many years for that to die among certain elements of Indian leadership. India doesn't believe that today, incidentally. By the way, I should interject here that I was a great friend of India when I was in India and that I remain one now. In saying the foregoing things bluntly, I would not wish to detract from my great interest in and friendship for India. It is one of the countries and one of the peoples for which I have the highest regard. I don't think my wife and I have ever been happier than during our two tours in India. But we always believed that where we agreed with Indian policy, we should be quick to say so, and that where we thought that Indian policy was misplaced or misdirected, we should say that, too. Friends have to be able to argue out their differences. We were considered, while we were there, to be genuine friends of India. I don't want to presume too much here, but people, both Indians and Americans, were good enough to say that they thought we struck a good balance. We were always quite clear that we were American spokesmen, that while our empathy for India was obvious, where differences arose, we should be quick to speak up vigorously, and repeatedly, for U.S. interests. That is what I think you have to do.

Q: As a political officer at the Embassy, how did you operate? Maybe not a typical day, but what did you do?

KIRBY: That's a very good question. First of all, I regularly saw a tremendous number of people. I made quite a point of cultivating all the people in the Indian Ministry of Foreign Affairs who dealt with the areas in which I had some interest and responsibility. There was a division of the foreign office that dealt uniquely with Pakistan. The Northern Division dealt with India's northern border, Nepal, Bhutan, Sikkim, and some other areas to the east. And then there was the division that dealt with Sri Lanka, Burma and the Indian Ocean. I really got to know people from junior desk officers up to their directors who were our Assistant Secretary equivalent. I saw a lot of those people. I would schedule office appointments fairly frequently, I would invite them to my home. They were very nice; as they got to know us, many of them invited us to their homes. The Indian officials are not only very accomplished diplomats, but like the Indian people generally, they are generous and warm-hearted. So, one got around and saw a lot of people.

Sometimes it was just chatting to "cultivate the garden," sometimes to explore specific things that Washington wanted to know about, or that I thought they ought to know about as to where Indian policy was going regarding Pakistan or how they were reacting to a given policy move in Nepal, let's say. I also got around -- I cultivated widespread contacts in other Embassies. And, again, this was from Third Secretary to Ambassador, most of whom were always good enough to give me some time. I especially got to know the people in the embassies and the high commissions of the countries that I was working on -- Pakistan, Sri Lanka, Nepal, and Afghanistan. I spent a lot of time with people in those embassies to get their perception of how their bilateral relations were with New Delhi. But I also found in New Delhi, as I had elsewhere, that the British, Australian, and Canadian High Commissions, and the French Embassy were all very good value. They all were very ably staffed, with very gregarious and nice people. In general terms, they were all interested in some of the same things that the U.S. was interested in in that part of the world. (Apart from India and its near neighbors, I was also covering Kashmir and Indian nuclear policy.) So, that was another part of the "network" if you will. I became particularly busy during the prolonged India-Pakistan crisis of 1971. It began roughly in January of 1971 and then, in some ways, reached its culmination on December 3, 1971, when war broke out between India and Pakistan over the question of whether what was then East Pakistan would become independent Bangladesh. The result of that war was that Bangladesh emerged as a new nation. During that year of prolonged crisis, I spent at least half my day (and these were very long days stretching into the evenings most times) given over to reporting and analysis, writing telegrams to Washington about what seemed to be going on in the India-Pakistan nexus. I repeatedly commented on the prospects for war and how the East Pakistan thing was likely to play itself out. I tried to predict (a) what would actually happen and (b), to lay out some of the markers as we saw them in New Delhi with respect to some of the pitfalls and challenges for American policy as the crisis unfolded. So, 1971 was a non-stop year.

Q: Why don't we talk about how 1971 developed. Bearing in mind we are talking about people who will not be as familiar with these transcripts -- there will be many other events around the world and this was one of them. How this played out and how you saw your role and what the Embassy was doing at this time?

KIRBY: Briefly put, there had been dissidence in what is today Bangladesh and then was East Pakistan, ever since Pakistan was created in 1947 when the British left the subcontinent. The two wings of Pakistan were separated by the land mass in India. The Bengali Muslims in East Pakistan had the same religion as their West Pakistan counterparts, but their culture and lifestyle were very different. By 1971, there had long been a dissident movement. Without going into more detail than you want, I would note that long-time Pakistani President Ayub Khan, who had been a fairly firm leader, had recently been replaced by another general, Yahya Khan. There began to be in 1969-1970 and early 1971 frequent and publicly audible questions about just how long Pakistan would be able to hold on to its eastern wing. That was one of the irritants in India-Pakistan relations, but there were many others, as well. The perennial Kashmir question continued to boil and problems between India and Pakistan on India's western border often produced tension. In January 1971 there was an airplane hijacking in Kashmir which caused India-Pakistan relations to plummet further. We did a lot of reporting and analysis on that. I remember telling my superiors in Delhi and in Washington that that incident would prove to be far more important in terms of the way the subcontinent would develop in the period ahead than the simple fact of the hijacking itself. It was bound to add considerably to bilateral tensions.

Q: Why did you feel this? Hijacking are hijacking...
